THE HISTORY

REFORMATION OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

PART IV.—BOOK III.

OF WHAT HAPPENED DURING THE TIME COMPREHENDED IN THE THIRD BOOK OF THE HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION; FROM THE YEAR 1535 TO KING HENRY'S DEATH, ANNO 1546.

KING HENRY seemed not a little pleased with his title of the Supreme Head of the Church of England; of which it was enacted, in the session of parliament that sat after the breach was made with Rome, that it should be for ever joined with the other titles of the crown, and be reckoned one of them. He ordered an office for all ecclesiastical matters, and a seal to be cut; which, in an inhibition sent to the archbishop, in order to a royal visitation of the whole clergy of all England, is, for aught I know, first mentioned. It is dated the 18th of September 1535; and at the end these words are added; "under our seal, that we use in ecclesiastical matters, which we have ordered to be hereunto appended."

The archbishop of Canterbury's title was also in convocation ordered to be altered: instead of the title of legate of the apostolic see, he was to be designated Metropolitan and Primate. This last was one of his antient titles. In that session there was some discourse concerning heresy, and of some English books; in particular of Tindal's books. And there was a book laid before them, with the title of a "Primer;" of which there is no other account given but that from the Rubrics of it, they suspected it was a book not fit to be published. This, it seems, produced a petition to the king, that he would command all heretical books to be called in within a time limited; and that he would appoint the Scripture to be translated in the vulgar tongue; but that though the laity might read it, yet they were to be required not to dispute concerning the catholic faith.

It is very probable that a breach was upon this occasion begun between Cranmer and Gardiner. The sharpness against heresy was probably supported by Gardiner; as the motion for the translation of the Bible was by Cranmer. But when Cranmer, in order to an archiepiscopal visitation of the whole province, having obtained the king's licence for it on the 28th of April, sent out his inhibition, according to form, to the ordinaries during the visitation; upon this Gardiner complained to the king of it for two reasons. He thought the title of Primate of England did derogate from the king's power. The other was, that since his diocese had been visited within five years last passed, and was now to pay for ever tenths to the king, it ought not to be charged with this visitation. Of this Cromwell gave Cranmer notice. He, on the 12th of May, wrote a vindication of himself, which will be found in the Col. Num. 37. Collection.

“He believed that Gardiner (who wanted neither law, invention, nor craft, to set out his matters to the best advantage), studied to value himself upon his zeal for the king’s supremacy, that so he might seem more concerned for that than for himself. Cranmer laid himself and all his titles at the king’s feet: but he wrote why did not Gardiner move this sooner? for he had received his monition on the 20th of April. The pope did not think it lessened his supremacy, that he had many primates under him: no more did his title lessen the king’s supremacy. Gardiner knew well, that if the pope had thought those subaltern dignities had weakened his supreme one, he would have got all the bishops to be put on the level, there being many contentions concerning jurisdiction in the court of Rome. But if all the bishops of the kingdom set no higher value on their styles and titles than he did, the king should do in those matters what he pleased: for if he thought that his style was in any sort against the king’s authority, he would beg leave to lay it down. He felt in his heart that he had no sort of regard to his style or title, further than as it was for the setting forth of God’s word and will; but he would not leave any just thing at the pleasure of the bishop of Winchester, he being no otherwise affectionate to him than he was. In the apostles’ days there was a Diotrephes, who loved the pre-eminence; and he had more successors than all the other apostles, from whom all glorious titles and much pomp was come into the church. He wished that he and all his brethren might leave all their styles, and call themselves only the apostles of Jesus Christ; so that they took not the name vainly, but were such indeed; and did order their dioceses, so that not parchment, lead, or wax, but the conversation of their people might be the seals of their office; as St. Paul said the Corinthians were to him.” He answers the other part very fully; but that will be found in the letter itself; it not being of that importance to deserve that any abstract should be made of it.

It was soon observed, that there was a great faction formed against any reformation in doctrine or worship; and that those who favoured and promoted it, were ill-used by the greater part of the bishops: of which I shall give one instance, and by it one may judge of the rest, for I have seen many complaints to the same purpose. Barlow was, by queen Anne’s favour, made prior of Haverfordwest in Pembrokeshire. He set himself to preach the pure gospel there, and found many were very desirous to hear it; but he was in danger of his life daily by reason of it: and an accusation being brought against him by a black friar there, set on by Rawlins, then bishop of St. David’s, who both rewarded him for it, and recommended him to the Arches: for Barlow had appealed to the king. He owns that by Cromwell’s favour, their design against him was defeated: but he having sent a servant home about business, the bishop’s officers cited him to their courts, and ransacked his house, where they found an English Testament, with an exposition of the sermon on the mount, and of some other parts of the New Testament. Upon this they clamoured against him as a heretic for it. They charged the mayor of the town to put him and some others in prison, seeking by all means to find witnesses against them; but none appearing, they were forced to let them go, but valued themselves upon their zeal against heresy. He sets forth the danger that all were in who desired to live according to the laws of God, as became faithful subjects: for in that multitude of monks, friars, and secular priests, that was then in those parts, there was not one that sincerely preached the word of God, and very few that favoured it. He complains of the enormous vices, fraudulent exactions, and heathenish idolatry, that was shamefully supported under the clergy’s jurisdiction; of which he offered to make full proof if it should be demanded and received: but that being done, he desired leave to remove from thence; for he could neither go home nor stay there safely, without a special protection. This letter will be found in the Collection.

Barlow was that year made bishop of St. Asaph, and the year after was translated to St. David’s; and was after that removed to Wells, but driven out by queen Mary; and was made bishop of Chichester by queen Elizabeth, in which he lived ten years.

Bishops proceed against those who desired a Reformation.

Collection, Number 38.

The secret opposition that the bishops gave to the steps made towards a reformation, obliged Cromwell to send many agents in whom he trusted up and down the nation, to observe all men's tempers and behaviour. Legh, among others, being much suspected. sent to York, did (in January) enjoin the archbishop, by an order from the king, to preach the word of God, and to set forth the king's prerogative. He also enjoined him to bring up to the king all the foundations of his see, and all commissions granted to it. In these, he did not doubt, but they would find many things fit to be reformed: and he advised that every bishop might be so ordered, that their dioceses might be better instructed and edified. That would establish them in their fidelity to the king and to his succession: but the jurisdictions might be augmented or diminished, as should seem convenient. This letter, which will be found in the Collection, Number 39. opens a design that I find often mentioned, of calling in all the pope's bulls and all the charters belonging to the several sees, and regulating them all. But, perhaps, the first design being the suppressing the monasteries, it was not thought fit to alarm the secular clergy till that was once done: yet the order for sending up all bulls was at the same time generally executed. There is a letter of Tonsal's, writ soon after this to Collection, Number 40. Cromwell, put in the Collection, in which he mentions the king's letters to all the bishops to come up immediately after the feast of the purification, with all the bulls they had obtained from Rome at any time. But the king considering that Tonsal had gone down but late, ordered Dr. Layton to write to him that he needed not come up; but advised that he should write to the king that he was ready to do as other bishops did, and to deliver up all such bulls as the king desired of him. Layton wrote to him that Cromwell, as his friend, had assured the king that he would do it.

In answer to this, Tonsal thanked him for his kindness on that and on many other occasions. "He did not understand to what intent these bulls were called for (and it seems he apprehended it was to have all the bishops give up their right to their bishoprics), yet he had sent them all up to be delivered at the king's pleasure: he adds, that he hoped by this demand, the king did not intend to make him leave his bishopric, and both to turn him out of his living, and to ruin all his servants, that had their living only by him; in which he wrote he could not be thought either ambitious or unreasonable: so he desired to know what the king's pleasure was; not doubting but that the king would use him as well as he used the other bishops in the kingdom, since as he had obtained these bulls by him, he had renounced everything in them that was contrary to his prerogative. He had but five bulls, for the rest were delivered to those to whom they were addressed: so he commits himself to the king's goodness, and to Cromwell's favour." Dating his letter from Cotton Libr. Cleop. E. 4. Auckland the 29th of January, which must be in the year 1535.

Tonsal might be under more than ordinary apprehensions of some effect of the king's displeasure; for as he had opposed the declaring him to be the Supreme Head in the convocation of York; so he had stuck firmly to the asserting the lawfulness of the king's marriage to queen Katherine. Before the meeting of the parliament, on which that matter was determined; he with the proxy that he sent to the bishop of Ely, wrote him a letter, of which Mr. Richard Jones saw the original, which he has inserted in his voluminous collections that are in the Bodleiam library; in which these words are, after he had told him that he had given him full power to consent or dissent from everything that was to be proposed: he adds,

"Yet, nevertheless, I beseech you, if anything harmful or prejudicial in any point to the marriage between the king's highness and the queen's grace shall be proposed, wherein our voices shall be demanded; in your own name say what you will, and what God putteth in your mind: but I desire you, and on God's behalf I require you, never in my name to consent to any such thing proposed, either harmful or prejudicial to the marriage aforesaid; but expressly to dissent unto the same: and for your discharge on that behalf, ye may show, when you think it requisite, this my particular declaration of my mind, made unto you therein: and what I have willed and required you to do in my name in this point, praying your lordship not to do otherwise in my name, as my singular trust is in you, that ye will not." Dated from Auckland in January, but neither day nor year are mentioned.

The session of parliament in which the act of the succession passed, by which the king's marriage with queen Katherine was condemned, meeting in January, this letter seems to be written before that session; and yet no opposition was made to that act in the house of lords, either by the bishop of Ely or by the bishop of Bath, whom he had made his second proxy as appears by the same letter, in which he is also named: the act passed so soon, that it was read the first time on the 20th of March, and passed on the 23rd in the house of lords, without either dissent or protest. It is also certain that Tonstal afterwards took the oath enjoined by that act. But how these bishops came to be so silent upon that occasion, being so solemnly required to do otherwise by Tonstal; and how he himself came to change and to take the oath, is that of which I can give no account. It is certain king Henry had a very particular regard for him; but yet by this letter it appears that he had some fears of a severity aimed at himself: but he was afterwards in all things very compliant, even to the end of king Edward's reign.

Cotton Libr.
Cleop. E. 4.

There came up from all parts of the kingdom many complaints of the ill-behaviour and bad practices of the monks and friars: of the last chiefly, for the Mendicant order being always abroad begging, they had many more occasions to show themselves: and though the monks had not those occasions to be in all public places, yet it was very visible that they were secretly disposing the people to a revolt. So it was resolved to proceed against them all by degrees: and after the visitations and injunctions, which had no great effect, they began with the smaller houses that were not above 200*l.* a year: this swept away at once all the Mendicants, who were the most industrious, and by consequence the most dangerous.

The archbishop of York was much suspected; and if many apologies look like intimations of some guilt, he had a great deal, for he took many occasions to justify himself. Upon the act for taking all the lesser monasteries into the king's hands, he expressed great zeal in serving the king, which appeared in a letter of his to Cromwell in April 1536. He gave a strict commandment to his archdeacons to warn all in the monasteries within the act, not to embezzle or to convey away any thing belonging to the house; and if they had done any such thing to restore it. He ordered them to give warning to all others not to meddle with any such goods. He had also warned the mayor of York and his brethren, and the master of the mint there, to receive none of the goods or plate of these monasteries: having thus expressed his care in that matter, he made an earnest suit for two places that were of the patronage of his see. The one was St. Oswalds, which was a free chapel; the prior was removable at the archbishop's pleasure, and he might put secular priests in it if he pleased. The other was Hexham upon the borders of Scotland, which was once an episcopal see; and there not being a house between Scotland and that lordship, if that house should go down, there would be a great waste that would run far into the country: whether he obtained these suits or not, does not appear to me: after that he adds, that he had given order that no preachers should be suffered that preached novelties, and did sow seeds of dissension: some after that they were forbid to preach, did go on and preach still, he had ordered process against them; some of them said they would get the king's licence: if that were done, he must be silent, but he hoped Cromwell would hinder that, and give him notice if they had obtained the king's licence: some said they had the archbishop of Canterbury's licence; but none of these should be obeyed there, none but the king's licences and his.

Upon the many complaints of preachers of all sorts, king Henry wrote a circular letter to all the bishops on the 12th of July, letting them know that, considering the diversity of opinion in matters of religion, he had appointed the convocation to set forth certain articles of religion most catholic; but, to prevent all distraction in the minds of his people, he ordered that, till that was published, no sermons should be preached till Michaelmas, unless by the bishop, or in his presence, or in his cathedral, where he is to take care to furnish such as he can answer for: every bishop is therefore required to call in all his licences for preaching, and to publish this in the king's name. He is also required to imprison all those who acted against this order, and not to suffer any private conventicles or disputations about these matters. To this is added a direction for the "bidding of prayers;" that they should pray for departed souls, that God would grant them the fruition of his presence : and a strict charge is laid on curates, that when the articles of religion shall be sent them they should read them to their people without adding or diminishing, excepting only such to whom he shall, under his seal, give power to explain them.

The blind bishop of Norwich, Nix, was condemned in a præmunire, and put out of the king's protection, for breaking through a custom that the town of Thetford had enjoyed past all memory,—that no inhabitant of that town could be brought into any ecclesiastical court, but before the dean of that town ; yet that old and vicious bishop cited the mayor before him, and charged him, under the pain of excommunication, not to admit of that custom. Upon this, judgment was given in the temporal courts against the bishop ; but he was now received into the king's protection. In the pardon, mention is made of his being convicted upon the statute of provisors. Stokesly, bishop of London, was charged with the breach of the same statute, for which he took out a pardon.

During these years, Cromwell carried no higher character than that of secretary of state ; but all applications were made to him in ecclesiastical matters : so whether this was Rymer.

only by reason of his credit with the king, or if he was then made vicar-general, does not appear to me. But as the king took care to keep all things quiet at home, so he set himself to cultivate a particular friendship with the princes of the empire of the Augsburg confession, hoping by their means to be able to give the emperor a powerful diversion if he should go about to execute the pope's censures. The king of France had been for some time endeavouring to beget a confidence of himself in the minds of those

A Treaty with the Lutheran Princes. princes, pretending that he was neither for the divine nor the unbounded authority that the popes had assumed, but only he thought it was reasonable to allow them a primacy in the church, and to set limits to that. Langey was the person most employed in the managing of this matter : but when the king came to understand that the king of France had sent for Melancthon, being then at Langley, he ordered the duke of Norfolk and the lord Rochford to write to Cromwell, commanding him to despatch Barnes immediately to Germany ; and to use such diligence, that if it was possible he might meet Melancthon before he was gone into France, and to dissuade his going thither, since the French king was then persecuting those who did not submit to the pope's usurped authority. He was to use all possible arguments to divert him from going, and to persuade him all he could to come over to England ; showing him the conformity of the king's opinions with his own, and setting forth the king's noble and generous temper. But if he was gone into France, Barnes was to go on to the princes of Germany, and Cromwell was to send a messenger with him, to be sent back with an account of the state of matters among them. He was to engage the princes to continue firm in the denial of the pope's authority, in which their honour was deeply concerned ; and they might depend upon the king in that matter, who had proceeded in it with the advice of the most part of the great and famous clerks in Christendom, from which he would never vary, nor alter his proceedings. Barnes was to carry over a book written on that subject, and some sermons of the bishops, and to put the princes on their guard as to the French king ; for he assured them that both he and his council were altogether papists.

Barnes was likewise directed to send Hains (afterwards dean of Exeter) and Christopher Mount (an honest German, who was long employed by the crown of England,) to sir John Wallop, the king's ambassador in France, on pretence that they went as his friends to visit him. Barnes sent to them. If Melancthon was in France, they were to go secretly to him to dissuade his stay long there, or his altering his opinion in any particular. Some copies of the book and the sermons were to be carried by them to France. If it is true that the king of France was so set to maintain the pope's supremacy, Wallop was to represent to him how contrary that was to his honour to subject himself to the pope, and to persuade others to do the same ; and to charge him that he would remember his promise to maintain the king's cause and proceedings ; and since the king did not move the subjects of any other prince, why should the French king study to draw the Germans from their opinion in that matter which the king thought himself much concerned in, since it was so much against the king's interest and his own promise. Wallop was to use all means to incline him rather to be of the king's opinion. They also ordered Cromwell to write to the bishop of Aberdeen, that the king took it very unkindly that his nephew, the king of Scotland, was suing to marry the duke of Vendome's daughter without his advice: he had proposed it to him before, and then he would not hearken to it. This negligence the king imputed to that bishop and to the rest of the Scottish council: the latter concludes that Barnes should not be stayed for further instructions from the bishop of Canterbury: these should be sent afterwards by the almoner (Fox). This letter will be found in the Collection.

Col. Num. 42.

This came soon enough to stop Melancthon's journey to France. The great-master and the admiral of France did not think of anything with relation to Germany, but of a civil league, to embroil the emperor's affairs: they were against meddling in points of religion, and so were against Melancthon's coming to France. They were afraid that the French divines and he would not agree; and that might alienate the German princes yet more from the court of France. Hains and Mount wrote this over from Rheims, on the 8th of August, 1535. It is true, Langey was sent to bring him, hoping to meet him at Wirtemberg; but he was not come thither; only the heads of their doctrine were sent to him: with these he came back to France. The king's divines made some emendations, which Langey said to Mount he believed the Germans would submit to: and so he was sent back, with a gold chain and letters, to bring Melancthon, and six other eminent German divines with him. Of this, Mount gave the king advice, the 7th of September, in that year.

This whole matter came to nothing; for Francis's sister, the queen of Navarre, was the person who pressed him chiefly to it, hoping by this, once to engage him in some point of doctrine which, as she hoped, might draw on a rupture with Rome. But his ministers diverted him from all thoughts of engaging in doctrinal matters; and they put him on entering into a league with the princes of the empire only with relation to their temporal concerns. Nor were the German princes willing to depart in a tittle from the Augsburg confession, or enter upon new treaties about points that were settled already among them, which might give occasion to new divisions among themselves. And no doubt the king's interposing in the matter with such earnestness had great weight with them: so he was delivered from the alarm that this gave him. But to go on with our king's affairs in Germany.

Fox, with Heath (on whom Melancthon set a high value), was sent soon after Barnes, to negotiate with the Germans. He had many conferences with some of their divines; and entered into a large treaty, about several articles of religion, with those of Wittemberg, which lasted three months, to the elector's great charge, and the uneasiness of the Germans.

§ 13, par. 39.
Fox sent to Germany.

Melancthon had dedicated his Commentary on the Epistles to the king, who sent him (upon it) a present of two hundred crowns, and wrote a letter to him full of particular expressions of esteem, and assurances that he would always assist him in those his pious labours; dated from Winchester, the 1st of October, 1535. Fox seemed to assure them that the king would agree with them in all things; and told them that the king had already abolished the popish superstitious, which he called the Babylonish tyranny; calling the pope antichrist. They of Wittemberg insisted on the abuses of the mass, and on the marriage of the clergy; and took notice that the king had only taken away some smaller abuses, while the greatest were still kept up. So that Melancthon wrote on the margin of their paper, at this part of it, in Greek, "Nothing sound." All this was sent over to the king, but did not at all please him; for, in an answer written by Cromwell, these words are a part of it: "The king knowing himself to be the learnedest prince in Europe, he thought it became not him to submit to them; but he expected they should submit to him." They, on the other hand, saw the great advantage of his protection and assistance; so that they brought Luther to make an humble submission to him, asking him pardon for the manner of his writing against him, which I find intimated, though it never came in my way. They studied also to gain both upon his vanity—offering him the title of the defender, or "protector of their league,"—and on his interest, by entering into a close confederacy with him.

It was an opinion, common enough in that time, that the emperor was the sovereign of Germany. Gardiner, in several of his letters, seems to be of that mind; and upon that account he endeavoured to possess the king with a prejudice against his treating with them, that it was to animate subjects to revolt against their prince: whereas, by the constitution and laws of the empire, the princes had secured to themselves the right of coining, fortifying, arming, and entering into treaties, not only with one another, but with foreign princes, for their defence. A homage was indeed due to the emperor, and a much greater submission was due to the diet of the empire; but the princes were sovereigns in their own territories, as the Hanse towns were free states. Fox pressed them to approve of all that the king had done in the matter of his divorce, and of his second marriage. To which they gave the answer that I had inserted in my History, among the transactions of the year 1530: but the noble Seckendorf shows that it was sent in the year 1536. In their answer, as they excused themselves from giving their opinion in that matter till they were better informed, they added (which, it seems, was suppressed by Fox), "Though we do agree with the ambassadors, that the law against marrying the brother's wife ought to be kept, yet we are in doubt whether a dispensation might not take place in this case, which the ambassadors denied; for that law cannot oblige us more strictly than it did the Jews. And if a dispensation was admitted to them, we think the bond of matrimony is stronger." Luther was vehemently against the infamy put on the issue of the marriage: he thought the lady Mary was cruelly dealt with when she was declared a bastard. Upon queen Katherine's death, they earnestly pressed the restoring her to her former honour; so true were they to that which was their principle, without regarding the great advantage they saw might come to them from the protection of so great a king.

His ambassadors, at that time, gave these princes an advertisement of great importance to them, that was written over to the king by Wiat, then his ambassador in Spain: that the emperor had, in a passionate discourse with him, called both the elector and the landgrave his enemies and rebels. The truth was, the elector did not entirely depend on all that Fox said to him: he thought the king had only a political design in all this negotiation, intending to bring them into a dependence on himself without any sincere intentions with relation to religion. So he being resolved to adhere firmly to the Augsburg confession, and seeing no appearance of the king's agreeing to it, he was very cold in the prosecution of this negotiation. But the princes and states of that confession met at this time at Smalcald, and settled the famous Smalcaldic league, of which the king's ambassadors sent him an authentic Col. Num. 43. copy, with a translation of it in English, which the reader will find in the Collection.

By it, "John Frederick, elector of Saxony, with his brother Ernest; Philip, Ernest, and Francis, dukes of Brunswick; Ulric, duke of Wirtemberg, Philip, landgrave of Hesse, the dukes of Pomeran; four brothers, princes of Anhalt; two brothers, counts of Mansfield; the deputies of twenty-one free towns" (which are not named in any order, for Hamburg and Lubeck are the last, save one; but, to avoid disputes, they were named in the order in which they came, and produced their powers): all these "did, on behalf of themselves and their heirs, seeing the dangers of that time, and that many went about to disturb those who suffered the sincere doctrine of the gospel to be preached in their territories; and who, abolishing all abuses, settled such ceremonies as were agreeable to the word of God; from which their enemies studied to divert them by force and violence: and since it was the magistrate's duty to suffer the sincere word of God to be preached to his subjects, and to provide that they be not violently deprived of it; therefore, that they might provide for the defence of themselves and their people, which is permitted to every man, not only by the law of nature, but also by the written laws, they entered into a Christian, lawful, and friendly league, by which they bound themselves to favour all of their body, and to warn them of any imminent danger, and not to give their enemies passage through their territories. This was only for their own defence, and not to move any war. So if any of them should be violently assaulted for the cause of religion, or on any pretence, in which the rest should judge that religion was the true motive, the rest of the confederacy were bound, with all their force and power, to defend him who was so assaulted, in such a manner as, for the circumstances of the time, shall be adjudged: and none of them might make any agreement or truce without the consent of the rest. And that it might not be understood that this was any prejudice to the emperor their lord, or to any part of the empire, they declare, that it was only intended to withstand wrongful violence. They also resolved to receive all into this confederacy who received the Augsburg confession, and desired to be joined to it. And whereas the confederacy made six years before was to determine on the Sunday Invocavit of the following year, in which the princes of Wirtemberg, Pomeran, and Anhalt, and six of the cities, were not comprehended, they received them into this confederacy, which was to last for ten years after the Sunday Invocavit. And if any war should be begun, but not finished within these ten years, yet it shall be continued till the war is brought to an end; but at the end of the ten years, it shall be lawful to the confederates to prolong it further. And they gave their faith to one another to observe this religiously; and set their seals to it."

On the same day, the king's answer was offered to the demands the princes had made: both which are in the Paper-office, and both will be found in the Collection. Col.Num.44. Their demands were, "That the king would set forth the true doctrine of Christ, according to the Augsburg confession; and that he would defend that doctrine at the next general council, if it be pious, catholic, free, and truly Christian: and that neither the king, nor the princes and states of that union, should, without mutual consent, agree to any indiction of a general council made by the bishop of Rome; but that if such a council should be called, as they had desired in their answer to Vergerius, the pope's ambassador, it should not be refused: and that if a council shall be celebrated, to which the king and these princes do not agree, they shall (to their power) oppose it. And that they will make protestations against it; that they will not obey any constitution made in it; nor suffer any decrees made in it to be obeyed, but will esteem them null and void; and will make their bishops and preachers declare that to their people. That the king will associate himself to the league, and accept the name of the defender or protector of it. That they will never suffer the monarchy of the bishop of Rome to take place; nor grant that it is expedient that he should have pre-eminence before all other bishops, or have any jurisdiction in the dominions of the king and of the princes. That upon these grounds they enter into a league with one another. And in case of any war, either for the cause of religion, or any other cause whatsoever, that they should not assist those who begin any such war. That the king shall lay down a hundred thousand crowns, which it shall be lawful to the confederates to make use of as a moiety of that which they themselves shall contribute; and, if need be, in any cause of urgent necessity, to contribute two hundred thousand crowns, they joining as much of their own money to it. And if the war shall end sooner than that all the money is employed in it, what remains shall be restored to the king. And they assured him, that they should not convert this money to any other use, but to the defence of the cause of religion, together with their own money. And since the king's ambassadors were to remain some time in Germany, disputing with their learned men about some points, they desire that they may know the king's mind, and that he will signify it to the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse; and then the princes will send their ambassadors, and a learned man with them, to confer with the king about the articles of doctrine and the ceremonies of the church."

To these the king sent two different answers, one after another. The first, that will be found in the Collection, was, "That the king intended to set forth the true Col.Num.45. doctrine of Christ, which he was ready to defend with life and goods; but that he being reckoned somewhat learned, and having many learned men in his kingdom, he could not think it meet to accept at any creature's hand what should be his faith or his kingdom's, the only ground of which was in Scripture; with which he desired they would not be grieved; but that they would send over some of their learned men to confer with him and his learned men, to the intent that they might have a perfect union in faith. He would also join with them in all general councils that were catholic, free, and held in a safe place for the defence of the true doctrine of the gospel. And as for ceremonies, there may be such a diversity in these used through the whole world, that he thought that ought to be left to the governors of the several dominions, who know best what is convenient for themselves. He agreed, that neither he nor they should accept of the indiction of a general council, but by all their mutual consent; but that if such a free council may be held in a safe place, it shall not be refused. The king did not think fit to accept the title offered by them, till first they should be thoroughly agreed upon the articles of doctrine; but that being once done, he would thankfully accept of it. To that of a defensive league, he added one clause—that they should not suffer any of their subjects to serve those who set on them in any such war. He thought it not reasonable that he should bear any share of the wars already past (which it seems was secretly mentioned, though not expressed in their demands), but for the future he was willing to contribute a hundred thousand crowns as they desire.” Upon further con-

 Col. Num. 46. sidering their demands, the king sent a second and fuller answer, which will be likewise found in the Collection.

“It begins with very tender expressions of the sense the king had of their benevolence to him, and of their constancy in adhering to the truth of the gospel. He acknowledges the goodness of God in giving them such stedfastness and strength: their wondrous virtues had so ravished the king, that he was determined to continue in a correspondence of love with them on all occasions.” Then follow some explanations of the former memorial, but not very important, nor differing much from it; only he lets them know “that it was not for any private necessity of his own that he was moved to join in league with them; for by the death of a woman all calumnies were extinct (this is meant of queen Anne), so that neither the pope nor the emperor, nor any other prince, had then any quarrel with him: yet, that they might know his good affection to them, he would contribute the sum they desired, and upon the terms they proposed; only, on his part, he demanded of them, that in case any prince invaded his dominions on the account of religion, that they would furnish him, at their expense, with five hundred horsemen, completely armed, or ten ships, well arrayed for war, to serve for four months. And that it should be at the king’s choice, whether horse or ships. And that they should retain, at the king’s charge, such a number of horse and foot as the king should need, not exceeding the number of two hundred horse and five thousand foot; or, instead of the foot, twelve ships in order, with all things necessary, which the king might keep in his service as long as he pleased. And last of all, that the confederates will promise, in all councils, and everywhere else, to promote and defend the opinion that Dr. Martin (so they named Luther), Justus, Jonas, Cruciger, Pomeran, and Melancthon had of his marriage.” This negotiation sunk to a great degree upon queen Anne’s tragical fall; and as the king thought they were no more necessary to him, so they saw his intractable humour, and had no hope of succeeding with him unless they would have allowed him a dictatorship in matters of religion. Yet, to end all this negotiation at once,

The elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse wrote a letter to the king, which will
 Col. Num. 47. be found in the Collection, taken from the original, occasioned by pope Paul III.’s summoning a general council to meet at Mantua on the 23rd of May, “upon which the emperor had sent messengers to them to give them notice of it, and to require them to come to it, either in person or by their proctors. But though they had always desired a council for the reforming of those abuses that had continued so long by the negligence or corruption of popes and prelates, yet in this bull the pope clearly insinuates that he will not suffer the restoring of true doctrine, or the correcting of abuses to be treated of; but that their doctrine, without any examination, was to be condemned with infamy. He also endeavoured to oblige all by the receiving of his bull, without taking cognizance of the matter, to extirpate and destroy the doctrine they professed. So that if they had accepted the bull, they had seemed to be involved in that design. They therefore told the emperor’s minister, that they looked on that bull as unjust and pernicious; and they desired he would let the emperor know that they could not accept of it. They did not doubt but the pope, or his party about the king, would, upon this occasion, pretend that the pope had done his duty, and would study to load them with ill characters; so they thought it necessary to justify themselves to the king and other princes on this occasion.

“They sent over with this a full vindication of their proceedings, which they desired the king would read; and that he would consider not only the present danger of the Germans, but the common concern of the whole church, in which it was visible that all good discipline was lost; and that great and worthy men had wished and desired that some received abuses, that could not be denied, might be amended. Therefore they recommend the cause of the church and their own cause to his care." This is dated the 25th of March, 1537.

I have, in my other work, given an account of the ambassadors whom they sent into England, of the representations they made, and of a full paper that they offered to the king. To all which I have nothing now to add, but that I have found a letter of Cranmer's to Col. Num. 48. Cromwell, which I have put in the Collection, in which he complains of the backwardness of the bishops. The ambassadors had been desired to tarry one month, that their book might be considered; but though he moved them to treat about it, as they had done upon other articles, they answered him they knew the king had taken it on himself to answer them, and that a book to that end was already devised by him; therefore they would not meddle with the abuses complained of. The bishops desired that the archbishop would go on to treat of the sacraments of matrimony, orders, confirmation, and extreme unction; in which they knew certainly that the Germans would not agree with them, except only in matrimony. "He saw the bishops were seeking an occasion to break the concord, and that nothing would be done unless there came a special command from the king. They saw they could not defend the abuses, and yet they would not yield that point. He complains likewise that the ambassadors were very ill lodged; multitudes of rats were running in their chambers, day and night; and their kitchen was so near their parlour, that the smell was offensive to all that came to them. He wishes that a more convenient house might be offered them."

It is true the king used them with a particular civility, and spoke to them before all his court in a most obliging manner, and often wished that Melancthon might be sent over to him. Cranmer and Cromwell used them with all possible kindness. Cranmer wrote often by them to the elector, exhorting him to continue firm and zealous for the truth and purity of the gospel: but under all the shows of the king's favour, they understood that his heart was turned from them. He wrote, when he dismissed them, to the elector, in terms full of esteem for their ambassadors: "Not doubting but good effects would follow on this beginning of the conferences with them: but the matter being of the greatest importance, it Seck. L. 3. ought to be very maturely considered. He again desired that Melancthon might Par. 66. be sent over to him, that he might treat with him, promising that he would apply himself wholly to what became a Christian prince to pursue." Dated the 1st of October 1538. During this embassy there was an anabaptist seized by the landgrave of Hesse, in whose papers they found that he had some followers in England, that he had hopes of great success there, and was designing to go thither, but he said he was forbidden by the Spirit: upon this they wrote an account of all they found to the king, and gave him a description of the anabaptists of Germany. They were much spread through Frisia and Westphalia and in the Netherlands; chiefly in those places where none of their preachers were tolerated. The not baptising infants was the known character of the party; but with this, they were for a community of goods: they condemned all magistracy, and all punishing of crimes, which they thought was revenge forbidden by Christ: they condemned all oaths, and were against all order and government. They seemed to be Manicheans in religion: they despised the Scriptures, and pretended to particular illuminations; and allowed both polygamy and divorce at a man's pleasure: and wheresoever their numbers increased, they broke out into sedition and rebellion. They wrote all this to the king in a letter, that by the style is believed to be penned by Melancthon, both to let him see how far they themselves were from favouring such corruptions, and to put the king on his guard against them.

Here ends this negotiation; for I find no mark of any further commerce between them: and though this run out far beyond the year 1535, in which it was begun, yet I thought it best to lay it all together, and so to dismiss it. The unlooked-for accidents that happened in England, had wrought much on the king's temper; his own inclinations were still biasing him to adhere to the old opinions and practices; and the popish party watched and improved all advantages, of which a very signal one happened soon to their great joy.

Queen Katherine, or, as she was called, the princess dowager, died first. I have nothing to add concerning her, but that I fell on a report of a conversation that sir Edmond Bedingfeld and Mr. Tyrrel had with her, in which she solemnly protested to them that prince Arthur never knew her carnally, and insisted much on it; and said many others were assured of it. But on the contrary, Bedingfeld urged very fully all the probabilities that were to the contrary; and said, that whatever she said on that subject, it was little believed, and it seemed not credible. The tragedy of queen Anne followed soon after this: it broke out on the 1st of May, 1536, but it seems it was concerted before; for a parliament was summoned, at least the writs were tested the 27th of April before.

There is a long account of her sufferings given by Meteren in that excellent history that he wrote of the "Wars in the Netherlands," which he took from a full relation of it given by a French gentleman, Crispin, who was then in London, and as Meteren relates the matter, wrote without partiality. He begins it thus:—"There was a gentleman who blamed his sister for some lightness that appeared in her behaviour: she said the queen did more than she did, for she admitted some of her court to come into her chamber at undue hours; named the lord Rochford, Norris, Weston, Breton, and Smeton the musician: and she said to her brother, that Smeton could tell much more." All this was carried to the king.

When the matter broke out on the 1st of May, the king, who loved Norris, sent for him, and said, if he would confess those things with which the queen was charged, he should neither suffer in his person nor his estate, nor so much as be put in prison: but if he did not confess, and were found guilty, he should suffer the extremity of the law. Norris answered, he would much rather die than be guilty of such falsehood: that it was all false, which he was ready to justify in a combat against any person whatsoever: so he was sent with the rest to the Tower. The confession of Smeton was all that was brought against the queen: he, as was believed, was prevailed on to accuse her; yet he was condemned contrary to the promise that had been made him: but it was pretended that his crime was, that he had told his suspicions to others, and not to the king: and when it was alleged that one witness was not sufficient, it was answered that it was sufficient. He adds that the queen was tried in the Tower, and that she defended her honour and modesty in such a way, as to soften the king (for she knew his temper) by such humble deportment, to favour her daughter. She was brought to her trial without having any advocate allowed her; having none but her maids about her. A chair was set for her, and she looked to all her judges with a cheerful countenance, as she made her curtsies to them without any fear: she behaved herself as if she had been still queen: she spoke not much in her own defence; but the modesty of her countenance pleaded her innocence much more than the defence that she made; so that all who saw her, believed her innocent. Both the magistrates of London, and several others who were there, said, they saw no evidence against her; only it appeared that they were resolved to be rid of her.

She was made to lay aside all the characters of her dignity, which she did willingly, but still protested her innocence. When she heard the sentence that she was to be beheaded or burnt, she was not terrified; but lifted up her hands to God and said; "O Father! O Creator! Thou, who art the Way, the Truth, and the Life; Thou knowest that I have not deserved this death!" And turning herself to her judges (her uncle, the duke of Norfolk, being the lord high steward), she said, "My lords, I will not say that your sentence is unjust; nor presume that my opinion ought to be preferred to the judgment of you all. I believe you have reasons, and occasions of suspicion and jealousy, upon which you have condemned me: but they must be other than those that have been produced here in court; for I am entirely innocent of all these accusations; so that I cannot ask pardon of God for them. I have been always a faithful and loyal wife to the king. I have not, perhaps, at all times showed him that humility and reverence, that his goodness to me, and the honour to which he raised me, did deserve. I confess I have had fancies and suspicions of him, which I had not strength nor discretion enough to manage: but God knows, and is my witness, that I never failed otherwise towards him: and I shall never confess any other at the hour of my death. Do not think that I say this on design to prolong my life : God has taught me to know how to die ; and he will fortify my faith. Do not think that I am so carried in my mind, as not to lay the honour of my chastity to heart ; of which I should make small account now in my extremity, if I had not maintained it in my whole life long, as much as ever queen did. I know these, my last words, will signify nothing, but to justify my honour and my chastity. As for my brother and those others who are unjustly condemned, I would willingly suffer many deaths to deliver them : but since I see it so pleases the king, I must willingly bear with their death, and shall accompany them in death, with this assurance, that I shall lead an endless life with them in peace." She said all this and a great deal more : and then, with a modest air, she rose up and took leave of them all. Her brother and the other gentlemen were executed first. "He exhorted those who suffered with him to die without fear ; and said to those that were about him that he came to die, since it was the king's pleasure that it should be so. He exhorted all persons not to trust to courts, states and kings, but in God only. He had deserved a heavier punishment for his other sins ; but not from the king, whom he had never offended. Yet he prayed God to give him a long and a good life." With him, all the rest suffered a death which they had no way deserved. Mark Smeton only confessed, he had deserved well to die, which gave occasion to many reflections.

When the queen heard how her brother and the other gentlemen had suffered, and had sealed her innocence with their own blood ; but that Mark had confessed, he deserved to die ; she broke out into some passion, and said, "Has he not then cleared me of that public shame he has brought me to ? Alas ! I fear his soul suffers for it, and that he is now punished for his false accusation. But for my brother and those others, I doubt not, but they are now in the presence of that Great King, before whom I am to be to-morrow."

It seems that gentleman knew nothing of the judgment that passed at Lambeth, annulling the marriage, for it was transacted secretly. It could have no foundation or colour, but from that story mentioned in Cavendish's "Life of Wolsey," of the lord Percy's addresses to her. He was now examined upon that : but it will appear from his letter to Cromwell, that he solemnly purged both himself and her from any precontract ; being examined upon oath by the two archbishops : and that he received the sacrament upon it before the duke of Norfolk and some of the king's council that were learned in the spiritual law ; assuring them by his oath, and by the sacrament he had received, and intended to receive, that there was never any contract, or promise of marriage, between her and him. This he wrote on the 13th of May, four days before queen's execution, which will be found in the Collection.

Collection,
Number 49.

This shows plainly that she was prevailed on, between fear and hope, to confess a precontract, the person not being named.

The French gentleman gives the same account of the manner of her death, and of her speech, that all the other writers of that time do. "When she was brought to the place of execution within the Tower, he says, her looks were cheerful, and she never appeared more beautiful than at that time. She said to those about her, be not sorry to see me die thus ; but pardon me from your hearts, that I have not expressed to all about me that mildness that became me ; and that I have not done that good that was in my power to do. She prayed for those who were the procurers of her death. Then, with the aid of her maids, she undressed her neck with great courage, and so ended her days."

This long recital I have translated out of Meteren ; for I do not find it taken notice of by any of our writers. I leave it thus, without any other reflections upon it, but that it seems all over credible.

Thevet, a Franciscan friar, who, for seventeen or eighteen years had wandered up and down Europe, to prepare materials for his Cosmography (which he published in the year 1563), says, that many English gentlemen assured him, that king Henry expressed great repentance of his sins, being at the point of death ; and, among other things, of the injury and the crime committed against queen Anne Boleyn, who was falsely accused, and convicted of that which was laid to her charge. It is true, Thuanus has very much disgraced that writer, as a vain and ignorant plagiary : but he having been of the order that suffered so much for their adhering to queen Katherine, is not to be suspected of partiality for queen Anne. We must leave those secrets to the great day.

It may be easily believed, that both the pope and the emperor, as they were glad to be freed from the obligation they seemed to be under to protect queen Katherine, so queen Anne's fall gave them a great deal of ill-natured joy. The pope, upon the first news of her disgrace, sent for Cassali, expressing a great deal of pleasure upon the queen's imprisonment, and, at the same time, spoke very honourably of the king. "He hoped, upon these emergents, all matters would be brought to a good agreement; and that the king would reconcile himself to the see, by which he would become the arbiter of all Europe. He told Cassali that he knew how good an instrument he was in pope Clement's time, and what pains he took both with the pope and the emperor to prevent the breach. He added, that the naming of Fisher to be a cardinal was so pressed on him, that he could not decline it. He desired Cassali would try how any messenger that he might send to the king would be received: for as soon as he knew that, he would send one immediately." Of all this, Cassali wrote an account to the king.

At the same time, Pace gave him an account of a long conversation he had with the emperor on the same subject: for he was then the king's ambassador in that court. "The emperor excused his adhering to his aunt, whom he could not in honour forsake: but at the same time, he said, he abhorred the pope's bull for deposing the king; and he was so far from any thoughts of executing it, that he commanded it to be suppressed in his dominions: nor did he encourage, as was suspected, the king of Scotland to undertake to execute it. He imputed the breach that had been made between him and the king, to the French king, who, he said, was like an eel in a man's hand, ready to forsake him, and even to renounce God, who, he believed, had given him over to a reprobate mind. He was resolved now to return to his old friendship with the king, and he would not hearken to intimations given him by the agent of France, that the king had poisoned his aunt. He pressed him to legitimate the princess Mary. He might do that without owning the lawfulness of the marriage, which was a point in which he would stir no more. She was born in a marriage in fact, and bonâ fide; and in many cases in which marriages had been dissolved, yet the legitimacy of the issue was often secured."

Of all this Pace gave the king an account; and pressed, with some vehemence, the legitimating the princess. The emperor was then going to Rome; so king Henry intended to join Cassali with Pace in his embassy to the emperor. Pace begged that might not be done, expressing a great aversion to him, as being a base and a perverse man. It is plain, Pace pressed the king much to think of being reconciled to the pope. Cardinal Ghinucci offered his service again to the king with expressions full of zeal. Grandville also entered with Cassali upon the same subject; but Cassali wrote to the king, that he did not at all meddle in that matter. The emperor went to Rome, and Pace followed him thither. The king sent a despatch to Pace, which will be found in the Collection, telling him of the motion that the emperor's ambassador made to him for returning to the old friendship with their master: they also made him some overtures in order to it. First, the emperor would be a mean to reconcile him to the bishop of Rome: he also hoped that the king would contribute towards the war against the Turk; and that since there was an old defensive league between them, and since it seemed that the French king intended to invade the duchy of Milan, he expected the king would assist him according to that league.

To all this the king answered, "That the interruption of their friendship proceeded from the emperor, who had made him ill returns for the services he had done him. For he pretends he made him first king of Spain, and then emperor: when the empire was at his disposition, he had furnished him with money, so that he ought to thank the king only for all the honour he was advanced to; but in lieu of that, he had showed great ingratitude to the king, and had not only contemned his friendship, but had set on all the ill-usage he had met with from the bishop of Rome, which, as he understood, he owed chiefly to him: yet such was the king's zeal for concord among Christian princes, and such was his nature, that he could continue his displeasure against no man, when the cause of it was once removed; so if the emperor would desire him to forget all that was passed, and would purge himself of all particular unkindness to him, he would be willing to return to their old friendship: but he having received the injuries, would not sue for a reconciliation, nor treat upon the foot of the old leagues between them, till the reconciliation should be first made, and that without any conditions: when that was done, he would answer all his reasonable desires.

“But as for the bishop of Rome, he had not proceeded on such slight grounds that he could in any sort depart from what he had done; having founded himself on the laws of God, of Nature, and honesty, with the concurrence of his parliament. There was a motion made to him from that bishop for a reconciliation, which he had not yet embraced, nor would he suffer it to be compassed by any other means: and therefore he would not take it in good part, if the emperor would insist in that matter, for the satisfaction of the bishop of Rome, that was his enemy; or move him to alter that which was already determined against his authority. When there was a general peace among Christian princes, he would not be wanting to give an aid against the Turk; but till the friendship between the emperor and him was quite made up, he would treat of nothing with relation to the king of France: when that was done, he would be a mediator between them. This was the answer given to the emperor's ambassador, which was communicated to Pace, that in case he had any discourse with the emperor on the subject, he should seem only to have a general knowledge of the matter, but should talk with him suitably on these grounds; encouraging the emperor to pursue what he had begun, and extolling the king's nature and courage, with his inclination to satisfy his friends, when he was not too much pressed: that would hurt and stop good purposes: and he orders him to speak with Grandville of it, of whom it seems he had a good opinion, and that he should represent to the emperor the advantage that would follow on the renewing their old friendship, but not to clog it with conditions; for whatever the king might be afterwards brought to upon their friendship, when made up, the king would not suffer it to be loaded with them; for the king had suffered the injury: but he was ordered to say all this, as of himself, and Pace was ordered to go to court and put himself in Grandville's way, that he might have occasion to enter upon these subjects with him.” Thus that matter was put in a method; so that in a little time the friendship seemed to be entirely made up.

The king would never hearken to a reconciliation with the pope. On the contrary, he went on in his design of reforming matters in England. In the convocation, in the year 1536, Cromwell came and demanded a place as the king's vicar-general; the archbishop assigned him the place next above himself. On the 21st of June, the archbishop laid before the house the sentence definitive of the nullity of the king's marriage with queen Anne, which Cromwell desired they would approve. It was approved in the upper house, and sent down to the lower, in which it was also approved. On the 23rd of June, the prolocutor, with the clergy, offered a book to the upper house, in which they set forth a collection of many ill doctrines that were publicly preached within the province. On the 28th of June, the confirmation of the decree concerning the king's last marriage was subscribed by both houses. On the 11th of July, the book concerning the articles of faith, and the ceremonies, was brought in by the bishop of Hereford, and was signed by both houses. These were also signed by the archbishop of York and the bishop of Durham. On the 20th of July, the bishop of Hereford brought another book containing the reasons why the king ought not to appear in a council summoned by the pope to meet at Mantua: this was likewise agreed to, and subscribed by both houses. I have nothing new to add to the account I have given in my History of the other proceedings in matters of religion this year, in which no convocation sate at York. There are several draughts of these articles that are in several places corrected by the king's own hand. Some of the corrections are very long and very material: of these only it was that I meant, and not of the engrossed and signed articles themselves, when I said they were corrected by the king; as I have been misunderstood.

By these steps it appearing clearly that the king had no thoughts of a reconciliation with Rome, the pope on his part resolved to create him as much trouble as he could. Pole made a Cardinal. Pole had been sent over from England to Paris, while the suit of divorce was in dependence: he was particularly recommended by the bishop of Bayonne in one of his letters to Montmorency, as a person of great hopes, and much favoured by the king: he came after that to England; for he tells himself that he was in England while the point of the "Supreme Headship" was in debate. He says he was then absent, which shows that at that time he was contented to be silent in his opinion, and that he did not think fit to oppose what was doing. He was afterwards suffered to go and settle at Padua, where the gravity of his deportment, that was above his age, and the sweetness of his temper, made him be very much considered. He was still supported from England, whether only out of his deanery of Exeter, or by any farther special bounty of the king's, is not certain. In several letters from Padua, he acknowledges the king's bounty and favour to him, and in one he desires a farther supply. He being commanded by the king to do it, wrote over his opinion concerning his marriage: the king sent it to Cranmer before his being sent out of England: for that faithful and diligent searcher into the transactions of those times, Mr. Strype, has published the letter that he wrote upon it; the year is not added, but the date being the 13th of June, it must be before he was sent out of England, this being writ before he was consecrated; for he subscribes Cranmer, and upon his return he was consecrated long before June. It is written to the earl of Wiltshire: he mentions Pole's book, and commends both the wit and eloquence of it very highly: he thinks if it should come abroad, it would not be possible to stand against it. Pole's chief design in it was to persuade the king to submit the matter wholly to the pope. In it

"He set forth the trouble that might follow upon the diversity of titles to the crown, which the wars upon the titles of Lancaster and York had given them a sad warning. All that was now healed, and therefore care should be taken not to return to the like misery. He could never agree to the divorce, which must destroy the princess's title, and accuse the king of living so long in a course of incest against the law of God and of Nature. This would increase the hatred the people began to bear to priests, if it should appear that they had so long approved that which is found now to be unlawful. As for the opinions of the universities, it was known they were often led by affections, and that they were brought over with great difficulty to declare for the king: but he sets in opposition to them, the king's father and his council, the queen's father and his council, and the pope and his council: it could not be expected that the pope would condemn the act of his predecessor, or consent to the abridging his own power, and do that which would raise sedition in many kingdoms, particularly in Portugal. He next shows the emperor's power and the weakness of France, that the prohibiting our trade to the Netherlands would be very ruinous, and that the French were never to be trusted: they never kept their leagues with us; for neither do they love us, nor do we love them; and if they find their aid necessary to England, they will charge it with intolerable conditions." This is the substance of that letter. So that at this time Pole wrote only to persuade the king by political considerations to submit wholly to the pope's judgment. The matter rested thus for some time: but when the breach was made, and all was passed reconciling, then Cromwell wrote to him by the king's order, to declare his opinion with relation to the king's proceedings. Upon this reason only he wrote his book, as he set forth in a paper of instructions given to one to be showed to the king, which will be found in the Collection, Number 51. In which he writes, "That he thinks if it had not been for that, he had never meddled in the matter, seeing so little hope of success; and that he had reason to think that what he should write would not be acceptable. They had sent unto him from England the books written on the contrary part: but he said he found many things suppressed in these; and all the colours that could be invented were set upon untrue opinions. Besides, what had followed was grievous, both in the sight of God and in the judgment of the rest of Christendom: and he apprehending yet worse effects, both with relation to the king's honour and the quiet of his realm, did upon that resolve to employ all the wit and learning that God had given him to dying for the authority of the bishop of Rome. He assures him, that from the time that he understood the progress of Christ's church from the beginning, and had read ecclesiastical history, he never thought to shed one drop of blood in that cause. None of those who had advantage by that authority would have lost one penny of it to have saved his life. He would do what in him lay to cool that indignation which his book had raised in the king. He desired him not to fancy (from what he saw in Italy or in other places) that it was so from the beginning: the councils would show him how that dignity was given to the bishops of Rome. The emperors called those councils; and the dignity that was given him was because he was bishop of the chief city of the empire, and not for the sake of Peter and Paul. The second place was given to the patriarchs of Constantinople, because it was called New Rome, and so was preferred to Antioch, where St. Peter was bishop, and where the name Christian first began; and it was set before Alexandria, and likewise before Jerusalem, where Christ himself preached, and the whole college of the apostles after him, and where James (the brother of our Lord) was the first bishop. That church was called the mother of all the churches: it was also set before Ephesus, where St. John wrote his gospel, and died. To all these, Constantinople was preferred; and yet this was fully settled in the council of Calcedon, where 630 bishops met. If he read the Greek fathers, Basil, Nazianzen, Chrysostome, and Damascen, he would find no mention of the monarchy of the bishop of Rome. He desired him to search further into this matter, and he would find that the old fathers knew nothing of the pope's late pretensions and usurpations. He wished, therefore, that he would examine these matters more carefully, which had been searched to the bottom in England. The learned men here thought they were happily delivered from that captivity to which he endeavours to bring them back. He tells him how much all his family and kindred would be troubled to see him so much engaged against his king and his country, whom he might comfort, if he would follow the establishment of the whole church of God from the beginning, and leave the supporting of those usurpations. He refers him to Gregory the Great, who wrote against the bishop of Constantinople, pretending to the like monarchy. St. Cyprian writes, that all the apostles were of equal dignity and authority, which is also affirmed by the third council of Ephesus. He begged him not to trust too much to himself, but to search further, and not to fancy he had found out the matter already. He prayed him to burn all his papers; and then he hoped he should prevail with the king to keep that which he had sent him secret. He concludes all with some very kind expressions."

This I have abstracted the more fully for the honour of Tonsal's memory, who was a generous and good-natured, as well as a very learned man. Pole, who was then a cardinal, wrote no answer to this, that I could find; but he wrote a long letter, either to Col. Num. 53. Tonsal or to Cromwell, in May 1537, which will be found in the Collection.

"He begins it with protestations of his affection to the king, though the king had taken such methods to destroy him as the like had not been known in Christendom against any who bore the person that he did at that time; yet he still maintained a deep affection to him. He knew well all that the king had designed against him, which, if he bore the king a small degree of love, would be enough to extinguish it. He saw what he did for the best was taken in the worst part. He did not think it possible that the king should conceive such indignation against him as to break through all laws to have him in his hands, and to disturb the whole commerce of nations rather than not have his person in his power. But he still adhered to his former principles, and maintained his former temper towards the king.

"Upon his arrival in France, he was ashamed to hear that, he coming thither in the quality of an ambassador and legate, one prince should desire of another to betray him, and deliver him into the king's ambassador's hands. He himself was so little disturbed at it, when he first heard of it, that he said upon it (to those who were about him), that he never felt himself in full possession of being a cardinal till then, since he was now persecuted by him whose good he most earnestly desired. Whatever religion men are of, if they would observe the law of nations, the law of nature alone would show how abominable it was to grant such a request; and it was no less to desire it. So that if he had the least spark of an alienation from the king in him, such proceedings would blow it up into a fire. He might, upon this, be justly tempted to give over all commerce with the king, and to procure (by all honest ways) the means to repay this malignity by doing him the utmost damage he could devise : but he did not, for that, abstain from trying to do all he could for the king's honour and wealth. He acknowledges, that the bishop of Verona was sent by him to the court of France to intimate that the pope (for the common good of Christendom) had committed some affairs to him to treat with the king. That bishop passed through Abbeville when the bishop of Winchester and Mr. Brian were there ; so he could not but wonder at the king's acting towards him, the whole design of his legation being for the king's honour. Upon which that bishop desired to confer with the king's ambassadors, that he might declare to them the whole truth of the matter which was made known to them. They, it is true, had no communication with him ; but they sent their secretary, after the bishop had declared the effect of his legation, as far as it related to the king, to him.

“ It seemed visible to all that the king (in what he had done against him) was abused by false reports, and by the false conjectures of some ; so it was hoped that, the matter being once cleared, the king would have changed his mind. All this he understood from the bishop of Verona at his return, and he readily believed it. That bishop had been the king's true servant, and had showed (when he was in a capacity to serve him) the sincere love that he bore him. He had been also Pole's particular acquaintance ever since he came out of England. He would have been ready, if the king had consented to it, to have gone and given the king full satisfaction in all things ; for the chief reason of his being sent into France was, the pope's intending to gain the king, knowing the friendship that was between him and the French king. So the bishop of Verona was thought the fittest person to be first employed, who had great merits on both kings for the services he did them when he was in office. And being esteemed the best bishop in Italy, it was designed that he should accompany Pole, as well as he was sent before, to prepare matters for his coming ; which he, out of his zeal to do God and the king service, undertook very willingly, and resolved to try how he could get access to the king's person. So now having fully explained himself, he hoped it would not be thought possible that he had those designs of which the king's proceeding against him showed he suspected him (which was, that he came on purpose to animate the people to rebel).

“ Upon his first coming to Rome, he acquainted the king with the design for which he was called thither ; and he had acquainted him with the cause of his legation. These were not the methods of those who intended to rebel. He had then procured a suspension in sending forth the censures, which at that time might have caused the king more trouble : and he sent his servant purposely with the offer of his assistance, animating the chief of his kindred to be constant in the king's service. If any had been at Rome, in the king's pay, to do him service, they could not have done more than he did ; so that some began to reflect on him, because he would not consent to divers things that would have been uneasy to him ; and particularly because he had the censures in his hand, which were instantly called for by those who had authority to command : yet they never came into their sight nor hands ; and to that hour he had suppressed them. He would go no further in justifying himself : if what he had already done, and what the bishop of Verona had said, did not do it, he would take no more pains to clear himself. He rather thought he had been faulty in his negligence in these matters ; but there was nothing now left to him but to pray for the king.”

This letter is dated from Cambray ; for upon the king's message to the French king, to demand him to be delivered into his hands, Francis could in no sort hearken to that, but he sent to him not to come to his court, but to go with all convenient haste out of his dominions. So he retired to Cambray, as being then a peculiar sovereignty. The king had a spy, one Throckmorton, secretly about Pole, who gave him an account of all his motions ; but by what appears in his letters, he was faithfuller to Pole than to the king. He wrote over that his book was not then printed, though he had been much pressed to print it by those at Rome ; but he thought that would hinder the design he went on : he believed, indeed, that upon his returning thither he would print it. He tells him that he had procured the suspensions of the pope's censures, to try if it was possible to bring about a reconciliation between the pope and the king : and he adds, that many wondered to see the king so set against him, and that he did not rather endeavour to gain him. He intended to have stayed some time in Flanders, but the regent sent him word that it could not be suffered. He went from thence, and stayed at Liege, where he was on the 20th of August; for the last of Throckmorton's letters is dated from thence. He writes, that the pope had called him back, having named him to be his legate to the council that he had summoned to meet the 1st of November, though it did not meet for some years after this.

The king's indignation upon his advancement, and for his book, carried him to a great many excesses, and to many acts of injustice and cruelty, which are not the least reconciled to among the great blemishes of that reign. Wyat was then the king's ambassador to the Emperor. at the emperor's court; and by his letters to the king, it seems an entire confidence was then settled with the emperor. The king pressed him much not to suffer the pope to call a council, but to call one by his own authority, as the Roman emperors had called the first general councils; and he proposed Cambray as a proper place for one. But he saw he was not like to succeed in that; so he only insisted on a promise that the emperor had made, that nothing should be done in the council, whensoever it should meet, against him or his kingdom.

The king was at this time under much uneasiness, for he sent both Bonner and Hains over to the emperor's court in conjunction: the one seems to have been chosen to talk with those who were still papistical, and the other had great credit with the protestants. Our merchants in the emperor's dominions were threatened by the inquisition for owning the king as supreme head of this church. Upon this, Wyat complained to the emperor; but though that prince vindicated the inquisitors, he promised to give such order that they should not be disquieted on that account; and when Pole applied himself to the emperor for leave to affix the pope's bull against the king in his dominions, he would not consent to it.

I cannot add much to what I wrote formerly, with relation to the suppression of the monasteries. There are many letters setting forth their vices and lewdness, and their robberies, and other ill practices; and now that the design against them was apparent, many ran beyond sea with their plate and jewels: but I must not conceal that the visitors give a great character of the abbess and nuns of Pollesworth, in Warwickshire. Dr. London, that was afterwards not only a persecutor of protestants, but a suborner of false witnesses against them, was now zealous even to officiousness in suppressing the monasteries. In the first commission that the visitors had, there was no order for the removing shrines, yet he, in his zeal, exceeding his commission, had done it; upon which Leighton, Legh, and others, desired that a commission for that end might be sent after them of the same date with their other commissions. He also studied to frighten the abbess of Godstow into a resignation. She was particularly in Cromwell's favour; so she wrote a plain honest letter to him, complaining of "London's violence, of his artifices to bring them to surrender their house, and of the great charge he put them to. She writes, that she did not hear that any of the king's subjects had been so handled: she insists on her care to maintain the honour of God, and all truth and obedience to the king; therefore she was positively resolved not to surrender her house, but would be ready to do it whensoever the king's command or his should come to her, and not till then." The great character I gave of that abbess, and of her house, in my former work, made me resolve to put this letter in the Collection.

The discovery of the cheats in images and counterfeits in relics contributed not a little to their disgrace. Among these, that of Boxley, in Kent, was one of the most enormous. Among the papers that were sent me from Zurich, there is a letter, written by the minister of Maidstone to Bullinger, that describes such an image, if it is not the same, so particularly, that I have put it in the Collection. He calls it the Dagon of Ashdod, or the Babylonish Bell. It was a crucifix that sometimes moved the head, the eyes, and did bend the whole body to express the receiving of prayers; and other gestures were at other times made to signify the rejecting them: great offerings were made to so wonderful an image. One Partridge suspected the fraud, and removing the image, he saw the whole imposture evidently: there were several springs within it, by which all these motions were made. This was brought to Maidstone, and exposed to all the people there. From thence it was carried to London, and was showed to the king and all his court, and in their sight all the motions were performed. The king's council ordered a sermon to be preached at Paul's, by the bishop of Rochester, where this imposture was fully discovered; and after sermon it was burned.

Upon the birth of prince Edward matters had a better face: here was an undoubted heir born to the crown. It is true, the death of his mother did abate much of the joy that such a birth would have given otherwise; for, as she was, of all the king's wives, much the best beloved by him, so she was a person of that humble and sweet temper that she was universally beloved on that account. She had no occasion given her to appear much in business, so she had no share of the hatred raised by the king's proceedings cast on her. I fell into a mistake, from a letter of queen Elizabeth's, directed to a big-bellied queen, which I thought belonged to her; but I am now convinced of my error; for it was no doubt written to queen Katherine when, after king Henry's death, she was with child by the lord Seymour. Upon queen Jane's death, Tonstal, being then at York, wrote a consolatory letter to the king, which will be found in the Collection. It runs upon the common topics of affliction, with many good applications of passages of Scripture, and seems chiefly meant to calm and cheer up the king's spirit. But the truth is, king Henry had so many gross faults about him, that it had been more for Tonstal's honour, and better suited to his character, if he had given hints to awaken the king's conscience, and to call upon him to examine his ways while he had that load upon his mind. Either Tonstal did not think him so faulty as certainly he was, or he was very faulty himself in being so wanting to his duty upon so great an occasion.

But I go on to more public concerns. The king had, by the lord Cromwell, sent injunctions to his clergy in the year 1536, as he did afterwards in the year 1538, which I have printed in my former work. There was also a circular letter written to the bishops: that to the bishop of Hereford is dated on the 20th of July, 1536, requiring them to execute an order abrogating some holidays. The numbers of them were so excessively great, and by the people's devotion, or rather superstition, were like to increase more and more, which occasioned much sloth and idleness, and great loss to the public in time of harvest. It sets forth, that the king, with the advice of the convocation, had settled rules in this matter. The feast of the dedication of churches was to be held every year on the first Sunday in October; but the feast of the patron of the church was to be no more observed. All the feasts, from the 1st of July to the 29th of September, and all feasts in term-time, were not to be observed any more as holidays, except the feasts of the apostles, of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and of St. George, and those days in which the judges did not use to sit; but the four quarter-days were still to be offering-days. These are all the public injunctions set out about this time. But after the first of these, I find the bishops sent likewise injunctions to their clergy round their dioceses, of which a copy, printed at that time, was given me by my worthy friend Mr. Tate, minister of Burnham. The first was by Lee, archbishop of York, in the Collection.

Col.Num.57. "He begins with the abolishing of the bishop of Rome's authority, and the declaring the king to be 'supreme head' of the church of England, as well spiritual as temporal. He requires his clergy to provide a New Testament in English or Latin, within forty days, and to read daily in it two chapters before noon, and two in the afternoon; and to study to understand it. He requires them also to study the book to be set forth by the king, of the Institution of a Christian Man. They were to procure it as soon as it should be published, that they might read two chapters a day in it, and be able to explain it to their people. All curates and heads of religious houses were required to repeat the Lord's Prayer and the Ave-Maria, in English, and, at other parts of the service, the Creed and the Ten Commandments, also in English, and to make the people repeat these after them; and none were to be admitted to the sacrament at Easter that could not repeat them. All parishes were required, within forty days, to provide a great Bible, in English, to be chained to some open place in the church, that so all persons might resort to it, and read it for their instruction. Priests were forbidden to haunt taverns or ale-houses, except on necessary occasions. The clergy that did belong to any one church were required to eat together, if they might; and not to play at prohibited games, as cards and dice. They must discourage none from reading the Scriptures, exhorting them to do it in the spirit of meekness, to be edified by it. They were required to read to their people the Gospel and Epistle in English: Rules are set for the frequent use of sermons, proportioned to the value of their livings: generally four sermons were to be preached every year, one in a quarter. None were to preach but such as had licence from the king or the archbishop; nor were they to worship any image, or kneel or offer any lights or gifts to it: but they might have lights in the rood-loft, and before the sacrament, and at the sepulchre at Easter. They were to teach the people that images are only as books to stir them up to follow the saints; and though they see God the Father represented as an old man, they were not to think that he has a body, or is like a man. All images, to which any resort is used, are to be taken away. They are to teach the people that God is not pleased with the works done for the traditions of men, when works commanded by God are left undone: that we are only saved by the mercy of God and the merits of Christ; that our good works have their virtue only from thence. They were to teach the midwives the form of baptism: they were to teach the people to make no private contracts of marriage, nor to force their children to marry against their wills; and to open to their people often the two great commandments of Christ, 'To love God and our neighbour,' and to live in love with all people, avoiding dissension."

The rest relate to the matters set out in the king's injunctions.

There were about the same time injunctions given by Sampson, bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, for his diocese, which will be found in the Collection. He begins with a charge to his clergy, "to instruct the people concerning the king's being the Supreme Head of the church of England, by the word of God; and that the authority used by the bishop of Rome was an usurpation: then he charges them to procure by the next Whitsuntide a whole Bible in Latin, and also one in English, and to lay it in the church, that every man may read in it. Then with relation to the reading the Scriptures, and the having sermons every quarter, he gives the same charge that Lee gave. As to their sermons, he charges them that they be preached purely, sincerely, and according to the true Scriptures of God. He next requires them in the king's name, and as his minister, to teach the people to say the Lord's Prayer, and the Ave, and the Creed in English: and that four times in every quarter they declare the seven deadly sins and the ten commandments. And because some out of neglect of their curates, and to hide their lewd livings, used in Lent to go to confession to friars, or other religious houses; he orders that no testimonial from them shall be sufficient to admit one to the sacrament, called by him 'God's Board;' till they confess to their own curates, unless upon some urgent considerations of conscience, that he or his deputies should grant a special licence for it: that on holidays, and in time of divine service, none should go to ale-houses or taverns, nor be received in them: and that the clergy should go in such decent apparel, that it might be known that they were of the clergy."

The last of the injunctions in that book was given by Shaxton, bishop of Salisbury, for his diocese, which will be found in the Collection; they are said to be given out from the authority given him by God and the king.

And by the Bishop of Salisbury. "He begins with provision about non-residents and their curates in particular, that no French or Irish priest that could not perfectly speak the English tongue should serve as curates. They were at high mass to read the Gospel and Epistle in the English tongue, and to set out the king's supremacy and the usurpations of the bishop of Rome: the same rules are given about sermons as in the former, with this addition, that no friar nor any person in a religious habit be suffered to perform any service in the church: as for reading the New Testament, the clergy are only required to read one chapter every day, and that every person having a cure of souls should be able to repeat, without book, the Gospels of Saint Matthew and Saint John, with the Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians, and the Acts of the Apostles, and the canonical Epistles; so that every fortnight they should learn one chapter without book, and keep it still in their memory: and that the 28th chapter of Deuteronomy should be read every quarter instead of the general sentence. He gave the same orders that the others gave about images, pilgrimages, and other superstitious observances, and for teaching the people the elements of religion in English; only he does not join the Ave Maria with the Lord's Prayer as the others did: he requires the curates to exhort the people to beware of swearing and blaspheming the name of God, or of Christ's precious body and blood, and of many other sins then commonly practised; he dispensed with all lights before images, and requires that every church should be furnished with a Bible: he complains of the practice of putting false relics on the people, naming stinking boots, mucky combs, ragged rockets, rotten girdles, locks of hair, gobbets of wood, as parcels of the holy cross, of which he had perfect knowledge; besides the shameful abuse of such as were perhaps true relics: he prays and commands them, by the authority he had under God and the king, to bring all these to him, with the writings relating to them, that he might examine them, promising to restore such as were found to be true relics, with an instruction how they ought to be used: he also orders that the Ave and pardon bell, that was wont to be tolled three times a day, should be no more tolled."

These are all the injunctions set out by bishops that have fallen into my hands. Here I must acknowledge a very great omission made in the copy that I printed in the Collection added to my History, of a very important paragraph in the second injunction given by Cromwell, which will be found in the Collection, together with an omission of a few lines in bishop Bonner's injunctions that were passed over by a very common fault of transcribers, who seeing the words that they wrote last in the original before them, do not enough examine, whether the same words did not belong to a new portion, and so write on without examining whether there are no words or lines between the one and the other: for churches and chapels being in two different places, my copier wrote on from the second place, and so omitted some lines between the one and the other. I am very ready to correct what I find amiss; I rather wonder that there is no more occasion for such reprehensions. I know I am not to expect either favour or common civility from some hands. I do not enter into faults of a worse nature made by others, but am very ready to confess my own when I see them*.

I find nothing to add with relation to the dissolution both of the smaller and the greater monasteries, nor of the several risings that were in different parts of the kingdom; only I find a letter of Gresham, then lord mayor of London; I suppose he was the father of him who was the famed benefactor to the city; but by the letter which will be found in the Collection, his father was the occasion of procuring them a much greater benefaction. He began his letter with a high commendation of the king, who, as he writes, "seemed to be the chosen vessel of God, by whom the true word of God was to be set forth, and who was to reform all enormities. This encouraged him, being then the mayor of the city of London, to inform him, for the comfort of the sick, aged, and impotent persons, that there were three hospitals near or within the city—that of Saint George, Saint Bartholomew, and Saint Thomas, and the new abbey on Tower-hill, founded and endowed with great possessions, only for the helping the poor and impotent, who were not able to help themselves; and not for the maintenance of canons, priests, and monks to live in pleasure, not regarding the poor who were lying in every street, offending all that passed by them: he therefore prayed the king, for the relief of Christ's true images, to give order that the mayor of London and the aldermen may from thenceforth have the disposition and rule both of the lands belonging to those hospitals, and of the governours and ministers which shall be in any of them. And then the king would perceive that whereas now there was a small number of canons, priests, and monks in them for their own profit only; that then a great number of poor and indigent persons should be maintained in them, and also freely healed of their infirmities: and there should be physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries with salaries to attend upon them: and those who were not able to labour should be relieved; and sturdy beggars not willing to labour should be punished: in doing this, the king would be more charitable to the poor than his progenitor Edgar, the founder of so many monasteries; or Henry the Third, the March, in the year 1539, by Butler, Elliot, Partridge, and Traheron, who had studied for some time under him, and were then entertained either by the king or by Cromwell. They write, "That many of the popish ceremonies were still tolerated; but that new significations were put on them; such as, that the 'holy water' did put us in mind of the blood of Christ, that cleansed us from all defilement: the 'pax' was carried about to represent our reconciliation to God through Christ. Things that were visible were thought fit to be preserved, to prevent commotions. This correction quieted some: but though these rites were ordered to be kept up till the king should think fit to alter them, yet some preached freely against them, even before the king.

"They write of the executions of the marquis of Exeter, the lord Montague, and sir Edward Nevil, who (they add) was a very brave, but a very vicious man. Sir Nic. Cary, who had been before a zealous papist, when he came to suffer, exhorted all people to read the Scriptures carefully. He acknowledged that the judgments of God came justly upon him for the hatred that he formerly bore to the gospel. The king was threatened with a war, in which the emperor, the French, and the Scots would attack him on all hands; but he seemed to despise it, and said, he should not sleep the less quietly for all these alarms. The day after these tidings were brought him, he said to his councillors, that he found himself moved in his conscience to promote the word of God more than ever. Other news came at the same time, which might perhaps raise his zeal, that three English merchants were burnt in Spain, and that an indulgence was proclaimed to every man that should kill an English heretic. Cranmer was then very busy instructing the people, and preparing English prayers to be used instead of the Litany." I can go no further on these subjects, but must refer to my History for the prosecution of these matters.

The foundation of the new bishoprics was now settled. Rymer has given us the charters by which they were founded and endowed. The new-modelling of some cathedrals was next taken care of. I have found the project that Cromwell sent to Cranmer for the church of Canterbury. It was to consist of a provost, twelve prebendaries, six preachers, three readers, one of humanity and of Greek, another of divinity and of Hebrew, and another of humanity and divinity in Latin, a reader of civil law, another of physic; twenty students in divinity, ten to be kept at Oxford, and as many at Cambridge: sixty scholars were to be taught grammar and logic, with Hebrew, Greek, and Latin: for these, a schoolmaster and an usher were to have salaries. Besides these, there were eight petty canons, twelve singing men, ten choristers, a master of the children, a gospeller, an epistler, and two sacristans; two butlers, two cooks, a caterer, two porters; twelve poor men, a steward, and an auditor; in all one hundred and sixty-two persons, with the salaries for every one of these; together with an allowance for an annual distribution of 100*l.* for the poor, and as much for reparations, and 40*l.* for mending the highways: in all, amounting to about one thousand nine hundred pounds a year. This I have put in the Collection, together with the letter that Cranmer wrote to Cromwell after he had considered of it: though perhaps this will sharpen some men's spirits that are of late much set to decry him, as much as any of his other opinions may have done: but a true historian, that intends to glean all that he could find relating to those transactions, must neither alter nor suppress things, but set them out as he finds them.

"He proposes the altering the prebendaries to somewhat more useful; for, by all the experience that he had, the prebendaries had spent their time in much idleness, and their substance in superfluous living; so he thought it was not a state to be maintained. Commonly, they were neither learned nor given to teach others, but only good vianders. They look to be the chief, and to bear the whole rule; and by their ill example, the younger sort grew idle and corrupt. The state of prebendaries hath been so excessively abused, that when learned men have been advanced to that post, they desisted from their studies, and from all godly exercises of preaching and teaching; therefore he wished the very name of a prebendary might be struck out of the king's foundations. The first beginning of them was good, so was that of religious men ; but both were gone off from their first estate ; so, since the one is put down, it were no great matter if both should perish together. For, to say the truth, it is an estate which St. Paul did not find in the church of Christ ; and he thought it would stand better with the maintenance of the Christian religion, that there were in their stead twenty divines, at ten pounds a-piece, and as many students of the tongues, and of French, at ten marks a-piece. And, indeed, if there was not such a number there resident, he did not see for what use there were so many lectures to be read ; for the prebendaries could not attend for the making of good cheer, and the children in grammar were to be otherwise employed. He, in particular, recommends doctor Crome to be dean."

But I leave this invidious subject, to turn now to a very melancholy strain. The king had thrown off all commerce with the Lutherans in Germany, and seemed now to think himself secure in the emperor's friendship ; yet he did not break with France, though on many occasions he complained both of the ingratitude and inconstancy of that king. The duchy of Milan seemed to be the object of all his designs ; and he was always turned, as the prospect of that seemed to come in view or to go out of sight. All the king's old ministers still kept up his zeal for his admired book "Of the Sacraments," most particularly for that article of transubstantiation ; so that the popish party prevailed with him to resolve on setting up the Six Articles, which (they said) would quiet all men's minds, when they saw him maintain that and the other articles with learning and zeal. It is certain he had read a great deal, and heard and talked a great deal more of those subjects ; so that he seems to have made himself a master of the whole body of divinity. I have seen many chapters of the "Necessary Erudition of a Christian" much altered by him ; and in many places so interlined with his hand, that it is not without some difficulty that they can be read, for he wrote very ill.

Upon the carrying the Six Articles, the popish party were much exalted. This appears by the end of a letter written to the ambassadors abroad, which will be found in the Collection. It sets forth, "how the king had showed himself in that parliament so wise, learned, and catholic, that no prince ever did the like : so it was no more doubted but the act would pass. The bishops of Canterbury, Ely, Salisbury, Worcester, Rochester, and St. David's defended the contrary side ; yet, in the end, the king confounded them. The bishops of York, Durham, Winchester, London, Chichester, Norwich, and Carlisle showed themselves honest and learned men." He writes as one of the peers ; for he adds, "We of the temporality have been all of one opinion. The lord chancellor and the lord privy-seal had been of their side : Cranmer and all the bishops came over ; only, he adds that Shaxton continued a lewd fool. For this victory, he writes that all England had reason to bless God."

Cromwell, though he complied with the king's humour, yet he studied to gain upon him, and to fix him in an alliance that should certainly separate him from the emperor, and engage him again into a closer correspondence with France, on design to support the princes of Germany against the emperor, whose uneasiness under the laws and liberties of the empire began to be suspected, and all the popish party depended wholly on him. I did, in my second volume, publish a commission to Cromwell, thinking it was that which constituted him the king's vicegerent, which I, upon reading the beginning of it, took to be so ; but that was one of the effects of the haste in which I wrote that work. It does, indeed, in the preamble, set forth, "that the king was then in some sort to exercise that supreme authority he had over the church of England under Christ ; since they who pretended that that authority ought to be lodged with them did pursue their own private gains more than the public good ; and had brought matters, by the negligence of their officers and their own ill example, to such a state that it might be feared that Christ would not now own his own spouse. Therefore, since the supreme authority over all persons, without any difference, was given him from Heaven, he was bound (as much as he could) to cleanse the church from all briars, and to sow the seeds of virtue in it. Those who before exercised this authority, thinking themselves above all censure, had (by their own bad examples) laid stumbling-blocks before the people. He therefore, designing a general reformation of his kingdom and church, resolved to begin with the fountains; for they being cleansed, the streams would run clear. But since he could not be personally present everywhere, he had deputed Thomas Cromwell, his principal secretary and master of the rolls, to be, in all ecclesiastical causes, his vicegerent and vicar-general; with a power to name others, to be authorised under the great seal: but he being so employed in the public affairs of the kingdom that he could not personally discharge that trust, therefore he deputed A, B, C, D, to execute that trust. The king being pleased with this deputation, did likewise empower them to visit all churches, both metropolitical, cathedral, and collegiate churches, hospitals, and monasteries, and all other places, exempt or not exempt; to correct and punish what was amiss in them, by censures of suspension and deprivation; to give them statutes and injunctions in the king's name; and to hold synods, chapters, or convocations, summoning all persons concerned to appear before them, and presiding in them, giving them such rules as they shall judge convenient: calling such causes as they shall think fit from the ecclesiastical courts to be judged by them, and to force obedience both by ecclesiastical censures and fines, and other temporal punishments:" with several other clauses of a very extended and comprehensive nature. How far this was put in practice does not fully appear to me: it certainly struck so deep into the whole ecclesiastical constitution that it could not be easily borne. But the clergy had lost their reputation and credit, so that every invasion that was made on them, and on their courts, seemed to be at this time acceptable to the nation, one extreme very naturally producing another; for all did acquiesce tamely in submitting to a power that was now in high exaltation, and that treated those that stood in its way not only with the utmost indignation, but with the most rigorous severity.

But to return to Cromwell. He, in concurrence with the court of France, carried matters so, that the marriage with Anne of Cleves was made up: this occasioned one of the most unjustifiable steps in all that reign. Among the papers that were sent me from Zurich, there is a long and particular account of many passages in this matter, with some other important transactions of this year, writ by one Richard Hille, who writes very sensibly and very piously; and he being zealous for a further reformation, went out of England as a man concerned in trade, which he pursued only as a just excuse to get out of the way. But before he went over, he wrote a long account to Bullinger of the affairs in England: he tells him, "that, before Whit-Sunday, three persons were burned in Southwark, because they had not received the sacrament at Easter, and had denied transubstantiation. There was, after that, one Collins, a crazed man, likewise burned, all by Gardiner's procurement." A little before Midsummer, it began to be whispered about that the king intended a divorce with Anne, who had been married to him above five months. It was observed that the king was much taken with a young person, a niece of the duke of Norfolk's (whom he afterwards married). Gardiner took care to bring them together to his palace, where they dined once, and had some meetings and entertainments there. This went on some time before there was any talk of the divorce: it was, indeed, believed that there was an ill commerce between them. Cromwell was newly made earl of Essex: Bouchier, in whom that line was extinct, who had been a severe persecutor, falling from his horse, and breaking his neck, died without being able to speak one word. The king gave Cromwell not only his title, but all that fell to the crown by his dying without heirs; yet he enjoyed not this long, for in the beginning of June he was sent to the Tower. He did not know the secret cause of his fall: it was generally believed it was because he did not flatter the king enough; and that he was against the divorce, as thinking it would neither be for the king's honour nor the good of the kingdom. Some suspected that his late advancement, and great grants the king had given him, was an artifice to make people conclude, when they saw him disgraced after such high favour, that certainly some very black thing was discovered: and it was also thought that the king restored to his son (who was so weak that he was thought almost a fool) much of his father's estate and goods (as he made him a baron, in December, after his father's death,) on design to make the father more silent, for fear of provoking the king to take from him what he had then given him. Here I stop the prosecuting the rest of the letter, till I have added somewhat more concerning Cromwell.

He had many offices in his person; for besides that he was lord vicegerent in ecclesiastical matters, and lord privy-seal, he was lord chamberlain and chancellor of the exchequer.

Rymer, t. 14. Rymer has published the grants that the king made of those offices, in which it is said that they were void upon his attainder; but, which was more, he was the chief minister, and had the king's confidence for ten years together, almost as entirely as

A new Treaty with the German Princes. cardinal Wolsey had it formerly. Mount had been sent to Germany to press a closer league defensive against the pope, and any council that he might summon. When the princes did object the act of the Six Articles, and the severities upon it, he confessed to one of the elector's ministers that the king was not sincere in the point of religion, he had, therefore, proposed a double marriage,—of the king with Anne of Cleves, and of the duke of Cleves with the lady Mary; for he said the king was much governed by his wives. The elector of Saxony, who had married the other sister of Cleves, had conceived so bad an opinion of the king, that he expressed no heartiness, neither in the marriage, nor in any alliance with England; but he yielded to the importunities of others, who thought the prospect of the advantage from such an alliance was great.

There are great remains that show how exact a minister Cromwell was; there are laid together many remembrances of things that he was to lay before the king. They

Cott. Libr. Titus, B. 1. Some of Cromwell's Memorandums. are too short to give any great light into affairs, yet I will mention some of them. In one, he mentions the abbots of Glastonbury and Reading, who were then prisoners, and were examined. The witnesses, with the council, were ordered to be sent to Berkshire and Somersetshire. Mention is made of their complices, who were to be tried, and to suffer with them. To this I must add, that in one of the Zurich letters it is written to Bullinger, that three of the richest abbots in England had suffered for a conspiracy, into which they had entered for restoring the pope's authority in England.

The learned Dr. Tanner has sent me the copy of a letter, that three visitors wrote to Cromwell from Glastonbury, concerning that abbot, on the 22d of September; but they do not add the year. It will be found in the Collection, signed by Richard Pollard, Thomas Moyle, and Richard Layton. "They give him an account of their examining the abbot upon certain articles. He did not seem to answer them clearly; so they desired him to call to his memory the things which he then seemed to have forgot. They searched his study, and found in it a written book against the king's divorce. They found also pardons, copies of bulls, and a printed life of Thomas Becket; but found no letter that was material. They examined him a second time upon the articles that Cromwell had given them; and sent up his answer, signed by him, to court: in which they write, that his cankered and traitorous heart, against the king and his succession, did appear; so, with very fair words, they sent him to the Tower. They found he was but a weak man, and sickly. Having sent him away, they examined the state of that monastery: they found in it above 300*l.* in cash; but had not the certainty of the rest of their plate; only they found a fair gold chalice, with other plate, hid by the abbot, that had not been seen by the former visitors; of which, they think, the abbot intended to have made his own advantage. They write, that the house was the noblest they had ever seen of that sort: they thought it fit for the king, and for none else." This I set down the more particularly, to demonstrate the falsity of the extravagant account that Sanders gives of that matter, as if it had been, without notice given, that the abbot was seized on, tried and executed, all of a sudden. But to return to Cromwell.

In another note, he mentions the determinations made by Day, Heath, and Thirleby, of the Ten Commandments, of Justification, and of Purgatory. Another is about Fisher and More. The judges' opinion was asked concerning More and the nun. Another is, whether the bishop of Rochester, and the monk, who wrote the letter as from heaven, should be sent for? In another, that Bocking printed the nun's book, and took away 500 copies, but left 200 with the printer. In another, he proposed to send Barnes for Melancthon. In another, he asks, who shall be prolocutor in the convocation. In another, he proposes the making lady Mary a considerable match for some foreign prince, the duke of Orleans or some other. This is all that I could gather, out of a vast number of those notes, which he took of matters, to move the king in.

Upon Cromwell's imprisonment, the comptroller was sent to him, and he ordered him to write to the king, what he thought meet to be written concerning his present condition ; and, it seems, with some intimations of hope. Upon that, Cromwell wrote a long letter to the king, which will be found in the Collection. "He begins it with great thanks to the king, for what the comptroller had said to him. He was accused of treason ; but he protests, he never once thought to do that which should displease him, much less to commit so high an offence. The king knew his accusers : he prayed God to forgive them. He had ever loved the king, and all his proceedings : he prays God to confound him, if he had ever a thought to the contrary. He had laboured much, to make the king a great and a happy prince ; and acknowledges his great obligations to the king. So he writes, that if he had been capable to be a traitor, the greatest punishment was too little for him. He never spoke with the chancellor of the augmentations (Baker) and Throckmorton together, but once : but he is sure, he never spoke of any such matter" (as, it seems, was informed against him). "The king knew what a man Throckmorton was, with relation to all his proceedings : and what an enemy Baker was to him, God and he knew : the king knew what he had been towards him. It seems, the king had advertised him of them ; but God, who had delivered Susan when falsely accused, could deliver him. He trusted only in God, and in the king. In all his service, he had only considered the king ; but did not know that he had done injustice to any person : yet he had not done his duty in all things ; therefore he asked mercy. If he had heard of conventicles, or other offences, he had for the most part revealed them, and made them to be punished, but not out of malice. He had meddled in so many things, that he could not answer them all ; but of this he was sure, that he had never willingly offended : and wherein he had offended, he humbly begged pardon. The comptroller told him, that fourteen days ago the king had committed a great secret to him, which he had revealed : he remembered well the matter, but he had never revealed it. For, after the king had told him what it was that he misliked in the queen, he told the king, that she often desired to speak with him, but he durst not : yet the king bade him go to her, and be plain with her, in declaring his mind : upon which, he spake privately with her lord chamberlain, desiring him, not naming the king, to deal with the queen to behave herself more pleasantly towards the king ; hoping thereby to have had some faults amended. And when some of her council came to him, for licence to the stranger maids to depart, he did then require them to advise the queen to use all pleasantness with the king. Both these words were spoken before the king had trusted the secret to him, on design that she might render herself more agreeable to the king : but after the king had trusted that secret to him (which it seems was his design to have the marriage dissolved) he never spoke of it, but to the lord admiral ; and that was by the king's order on Sunday last ; who was very willing to seek remedy for the king's comfort : he protests he was ready to die to procure the king comfort : he wishes he were in hell if it was not true. This was all he had done," (it seems the king thought the change in the queen's deportment towards him was the effect of his discovering the secret of the king's purpose, and in order to prevent it) ; "but for this he humbly begs pardon : he understood that it was charged upon him, that he had more retainers about him than the laws allowed : he never retained any, except his household servants, but against his will : he had been pressed by many, who said they were his friends, he had retained their children and friends, not as retainers, for their fathers and friends promised to maintain them : in this, God knows, he had no ill intent, but begs pardon if he had offended," (for that was represented as the gathering a force about him to defend himself). "He concludes he had not behaved himself towards God and the king as he ought to have done : and as he was continually calling on God for mercy, for offences committed against him, so he begs the king's pardon for his offences against him, which were never wilful ; and he assures him he had never a thought of treason against him, either in word or deed : and he continued to pray for him and the prince, ending, indeed, with too abject a meanness."

The Matters

These were all the particulars that were charged on him upon his first imprisonment : other matters were afterwards added to throw the more load on him ; but it seems they were not so much as thought on or mentioned at first : but now I return to the letter writ to Zurich. Hill adds, that they heard they once designed to burn Cromwell as a heretic, and that these considerations made him confess that he had offended the king. What he said that way at his execution was pronounced coldly by him ; upon that the writer runs out very copiously, and acknowledges that their sins had provoked God to bring upon them that great change that they saw in affairs : they had wholly trusted to the learning of some, and to the conduct of others ; but God, by the taking these away, was calling on them to turn sincerely to him, to trust entirely in him, and to repent with their whole heart. There was at that time a great want of sincere labourers, so that from east to west, and from south to north, there was scarce one faithful and sincere preacher of the gospel to be found.

The act of dissolving the king's marriage did set forth that some doubts were raised concerning the king's marriage, which, as he writes, was manifestly false, for nobody thought of any doubtfulness in it : nor did they pray, as is in the act, that it might be inquired into: for nobody spake of it till the king was resolved to part with the queen, that he might be married to Mrs. Howard, whom in his bad Latin he calls " Parvissima Puella," a very little girl. The archbishop of Canterbury, and the rest of the bishops, judged she was yet a virgin, which none that knew the man could believe. Here again I must leave my letter.

There had been no convocation for two years, for " the institution of a Christian man " was prepared by a commission, given to some bishops of both provinces, and to some archdeacons, but no deans were summoned with them : a convocation sate in both provinces in May, in the year 1539, to which abbots and priors were summoned ; but though there were eight abbots and nine priors in Exeter diocese, yet the return from thence says, there were none in the diocese. I do not know how to reconcile that with the abbot of Tavistock's sitting in the house of lords, as appears by the journals of that parliament.

Upon this occasion there was a particular summons for both provinces, to meet in a national synod, to judge of the king's marriage. When I wrote of this in my History, I did not at all reflect on the doctrine of the church of Rome, that makes marriage a sacrament, in which the two parties are the ministers, who transfer their persons to one another : and according to the doctrine of the necessity of the intention in him that ministers the sacrament, how vile soever this decision in the matter of the king's marriage may seem to be, yet it was a just consequence from that doctrine : for without a true, free, and inward intention, which the king affirmed he had not, the marriage could be no sacrament : so that the heaviest part of the shame of that decision falls indeed on that doctrine. When the news came to France of the king's dissolving his marriage with Anne of Cleves, king Francis himself asked the ambassadors upon what grounds it went : the cardinal of Ferrara did also send one to ask what was alleged for it by divines and lawyers. Wallop and others were then the ambassadors from England at the court : they sent to the council an account of this ; and Wallop wrote over to know what he should say upon the subject. The answer which the council wrote to him was, that the queen herself affirmed, her person had not been touched by king Henry : that a learned convocation had judged the matter ; that the bishops of Durham, Winchester, and Bath, were known to be great and learned clerks, who would do nothing but upon just and good grounds : so that all persons ought to be satisfied with these proceedings, as she herself was. And here this matter ended, to the great reproach of that body, that went so hastily and so unanimously into that scandalous decision.

But to return to my Zurich letter : after he had related the manner of that judgment of those called spiritual, who indeed were very carnal, he mentions the exceptions in the act of pardon ; for besides particular exceptions, all anabaptists and sacramentaries were excepted, and all those that affirmed there was a fate upon men, by which the day of their death was unalterably determined.

There was at this time a great design against Dr. Crome, whom Cranmer had recommended to be dean of Canterbury, in these words: "I know no man more meet A Design for the dean's room in England than Dr. Crome, who by his sincere learning, against godly conversation, and good example of living, with his great soberness, hath Crome. done unto the king's majesty as good service, I dare say, as any priest in England: and yet his grace daily remembereth all others that doth him service, this man only excepted, who never had yet, besides his gracious favour, any promotion at his hands. Wherefore if it please his majesty to put him in the dean's room, I do not doubt but that he should be a light to all the deans and ministers of colleges in this realm; for I know, that when he was but a president of a college in Cambridge, his house was better ordered than all the houses in Cambridge besides." Certainly this good opinion that Cranmer had of him made him, in the state in which things were at this time, to be the worse thought of, and the more watched. So, when he heard that he was to be searched for, he went to the king, and, on his knees, begged he would put a stop to the severities then on foot, and that he would set many, then in prison on the account of religion, at liberty. The king had such a regard for him that, upon this, he ordered a stop to be put to further prosecutions; and he set those at liberty who were then in prison, they giving bail to appear when they should be called for. The king seemed to think that by this small favour, after some severities, people would be more quiet and more obedient; but after the parliament was dissolved, six persons suffered. Three of these were popish priests, who suffered as traitors, for denying the king's supremacy; and Barnes, Gerrard, and Jerome were the other three. They were tied to one stake, and suffered without crying out, but were quiet and patient, as if they had felt no pain. He could never hear any reason given for this their suffering, unless it was to please the clergy: they were not condemned by any form of law. They had been so cautious, ever since the act of the Six Articles passed, that they had not opened their mouths in opposition to them in public; and, by the act, all offences done before it had passed were pardoned. Barnes himself said, at the place of execution, that he did not know for what cause he was brought thither to be burnt; for they were attainted by act of parliament, without being brought to make their answers.

The bishop of Chichester, Sampson, though a man compliant in all things, and Dr. Wilson, were exempted out of the general pardon, for no other crime, as he heard, but that Abel who suffered for denying the king's supremacy, being in the greatest extremity of want and misery in prison, where it was said he was almost eat up by vermin, they had sent him some alms. From this Hill goes on to give an account of Crome, whose constant way had been, when he saw a storm rising, to preach with more zeal than ordinary against the prevailing corruption: so on Christmas-day his enemies that were watching to find matter to accuse him, framed some articles which they carried to the king against him: he had condemned in his sermon all masses for the dead, and said, "if they were profitable to the dead, the king and parliament had done wrong in destroying the monasteries endowed for that end: he also said, that to pray to the saints, only to pray for us, was a practice neither necessary nor useful: he added, you call us the seditious preachers of a new doctrine, but it is you are the seditious persons, who maintain the superstitious traditions of men, and will not hear the word of God himself. The church of Christ will ever suffer persecution as it has done of late among us."

These and some other complaints being carried to the king, Crome was commanded to answer them. He in his answer explained and justified all he had said. The king had no mind to carry matters further against so eminent a man; so he passed a sentence, in which he set forth, that Crome had confessed the articles objected to him; but the king out of his clemency, intending to quiet his people, appointed Crome to preach at Saint Paul's, and there to repeat all the articles objected to him, and then to read the judgment that the king gave in the matter: and it concluded, that if ever he fell into the like offence again, he was to suffer according to law. The king's judgment was, "that private masses were sacrifices profitable both to the living and to the dead, but yet that the king's majesty with his parliament had justly abolished monasteries." Upon this Crome preached, and at the end of his sermon, he told the people he had received an order from the king to be read to them; which he read, but said not one word upon it, and with a short prayer dismissed the congregation: whereas the king expected that he should have applauded his judgment, and extolled his favour to himself, as Dr. Barnes and his two companions were unhappily prevailed on to do, and yet were burned afterwards. Hill was therefore afraid that Crome might be brought into further trouble. There was an order sent to him from the king to preach no more, as he had before forbidden both Latimer and Shaxton to preach any more. They were not excluded from the general pardon, but were still prohibited to preach: and when they were set at liberty, they were required not to come within ten miles of either of the universities, or the city of London, or the dioceses in which they had been bishops. Thus, says he, faithful shepherds were driven from their flocks, and ravenous wolves were sent in their stead: he concludes, hoping that God would not suffer them to be long oppressed by such tyranny. Thus I have given a very particular account of that long letter writ with much good sense and piety, but in very bad Latin, therefore I do not put it into the Collection.

Sampson, though he fell into this disgrace for an act of Christian piety, yet hitherto had showed a very entire compliance with all that had been done: he had published an explanation on the first fifty Psalms, which he dedicated to the king: in which, as he extolled his proceedings, so he run out into a severe invective against the bishop of Rome, and the usurpations and corruptions favoured by that see, and he reflected severely on Pole. Pole's old friend Tostal did also in a sermon at Saint Paul's on Palm Sunday in his grave way set forth his unnatural ingratitude. But now the popish party upon Cromwell's fall, and the exaltation of the duke of Norfolk by the king's marrying his niece, broke out into their usual violence; and they were, as we may reasonably believe, set on to it by Bonner, who upon Stokesly's death, a year before, had been brought to London, and immediately upon Cromwell's disgrace changed sides, and from having acted a forced part with heat enough, now came to act that which was natural to him.

There were so many informations brought in the city of London, that a jury sitting in Prosecutions upon the Six Articles. Mercers' Chapel presented five hundred persons to be tried upon the statute of the Six Articles, which, as may be easily imagined, put the city under great apprehensions: but Audley, the lord chancellor, represented to the king that this was done out of malice: so they were all dismissed, some say pardoned. Informations came against papists on the other side: a letter was sent from the council to Cranmer, to send Dr. Bengier to the Tower. Two of Bonner's chaplains were, by order of council, sent to the archbishop, to be examined by him. A vicar was brought out of Wiltshire, out of whose offices Thomas Becket's name was not yet rased: but he was dismissed, for it was believed to be the effect only of negligence, and not of any ill principles. There was a letter of Melancthon's against the king's proceedings, printed in English; (perhaps it was that which I published in the Addenda to my first volume). Goodrick bishop of Ely's chaplain and servant were examined, and his house was searched for it. Many were brought into trouble for words concerning the king and his proceedings. Poor Marbeck, of Windsor, was imprisoned in the Marshalsea. Many printers were prosecuted for bringing English books into the kingdom against the king's proceedings. In one council-day (for all these particulars are taken out of the council-books), five-and-twenty booksellers were examined as to all books, more particularly English books, that they had sold these last three years. Hains, the dean of Exeter, was oft before the council; but particulars are not mentioned. Articles were brought against him, and they were referred to the king's learned council. The bishops of Ely, Sarum, Rochester, and Westminster were appointed to examine him, and to proceed with all diligence. He was also sent to the Fleet for "lewd and seditious preaching" (the words in the council-book), and sowing many erroneous opinions; but, after a good lesson and exhortation, with a declaration of the king's mercy and goodness towards him, he was dismissed under a recognisance of five hundred marks, to appear (if called for) any time within five months, to answer to such things as should be laid against him.

On the 4th of May, 1542, an entry is made, Cranmer being present; that it was thought good, if the king's highness shall be so content, that a general commission shall be sent to

Kent, with certain special articles; and generally, that all abuses and enormities of religion were to be examined. This was laid on design to ruin Cranmer; but there is no other entry made in the council-book relating to this matter; unless this was a consequence of it, that on the 27th of June, Hards, of Canterbury, a prisoner for a seditious libel, was, after a good exhortation, dismissed. And this is all the light that the only council-book of that reign, for two years, affords as to those matters. Mr. Strype has helped us to more light.

While Cranmer was visiting his diocese, there were many presentments made of a very different nature. Some were presented for adhering still to the old superstitions condemned by the king, and for insinuations in favour of the pope's authority. Others again were, on the other hand, presented for doctrines, either contrary to the Six Articles, or to the rites still practised. This created a great confusion through that whole country, and the blame of all was cast on Cranmer by his enemies; as if he favoured and encouraged that which was called the "New Learning" too much.

A plot was contrived, chiefly by Gardiner's means, with the assistance of Dr. London and of Thornden (suffragan of Dover and prebendary of Canterbury), who had lived in Cranmer's house, and had all his preferment by his favour. Several others engaged in it, who had all been raised by him, and had pretended zeal for the gospel; but, upon Cromwell's fall, they reckoned, that if they could send Cranmer after him, they would effectually crush all designs of a further reformation.

They resolved to begin with some of the prebendaries and preachers. Many articles were gathered out of their sermons and private discourses, all terminating in the archbishop, who, as was said, showed so partial a favour to the men of the "New Learning," and dealt so harshly and severely with the others, that he was represented to be the principal cause of all the heat and divisions that were in Canterbury, and in the other parts of Kent. These articles went through many hands; but it was not easy to prevail with a proper person to present them. The steps made in the matter are copiously set forth by Mr. Strype. At last they came into the king's hands; and he, upon that, passing by Lambeth, where the archbishop stood, in respect to him, as he passed by, called him into his barge, and told him, he had now discovered who was the greatest heretic in Kent. With that he showed him the articles against himself and his chaplains. The archbishop knew the falsehood of many particulars, so he prayed the king to send a commission to examine the matter. The king said he would give him a commission, but to none else. He answered, it would not seem decent to appoint him to examine articles exhibited against himself. The king said he knew his integrity, and would trust it to no other person: nor would he name above one (though pressed to it) that should be joined in commission with him: and he even then seemed persuaded it was a contrivance of Gardiner's to ruin him.

The archbishop went down himself into Kent; and then the conspirators seeing the king's favour to him, were struck with fear. Some of them wept and begged pardon, and were put in prison: but the rest of the commission, in whose hands the archbishop left the matter, being secretly favourers of that party, proceeded faintly: so it was writ to court, that unless Dr. Legh were sent down, who was well practised in examinations, the conspiracy would never be found out: he was upon that sent down; and he ordered a search to be made at one and the same time of all suspected places, and so he discovered the whole train. Some of the archbishop's domestics, Thornden in particular, were among the chief of the informers. He charged them with it. They, on their knees, confessed their faults with many tears. He, who was gentle even to excess, said he did forgive them, and prayed God to forgive them, and to make them better men. After that, he was never observed to change his countenance, or alter his behaviour towards them. He expressed the like readiness to pardon all the rest: many were imprisoned upon these examinations, but the parliament granting a subsidy, a general pardon set them all at liberty; which otherwise the archbishop was resolved to have procured to them. This relation differs in several particulars from the account that I gave of it in my History: but this seems to be the exacter and the better vouched, and therefore I acquiesce in it. Another instance is given by the same writer of the king's zeal for Cranmer. Sir John

A Conspiracy
against Cranmer.

Mildness.

Gostwick, knight for Bedfordshire, did in the house of commons charge him for preaching heresy against the sacrament of the altar, both at Feversham and Canterbury: the king hearing of this, did, in his rough way, threaten Gostwick, calling him varlet, and charged him to go and ask Cranmer pardon, otherwise he should feel the effects of his displeasure. The king said if he had been a Kentish man, he might have had some more shadow for accusing him; but being of Bedfordshire, he could have none. Gostwick, terrified with this message, made his submission to Cranmer, who mildly forgave him, and went to the king and moved him for his favour, which he did not obtain without some difficulty.

It appears plainly that the king acted as if he had a mind to be thought infallible; and that his subjects were bound to believe as much as he thought fit to open to them, and neither more nor less. He went on this year, before he took his progress, in finishing "The necessary Doctrine and Erudition of any Christian Man." A great part of it was corrected by his own hand, particularly in that article of the creed, "the catholic church," where there are severe reflections added on the bishops of Rome. Here I found likewise some more of the answers made to the Refor. Vol. i. seventeen queries upon the matter of the sacraments that I published in my first Col.Num.69. volume. I set them out again in my Collection, that by these the reader may better understand the two following papers, that I print separately, and not intermixed with one another, as I did before, which I thought to be an ease to the reader: but since that was made a great offence, I will do it no more. One of these is only an answer to the queries: the writer of the first is not named; it is probably Tonsal's: he is plainly of the same side Col.Num.70. with the archbishop of York. It will be found in the Collection; as also another Col.Num.71. paper, with several marginal notes in the king's hand, by which it appears that the king was much shaken from his former notions. He asked for Scripture in several particulars that could not easily be brought. On the margin, Cranmer and Barlow are often named; but I do not understand with what view it was that they, and no other (except Cox, once), are named. Over against the 15th article, their names are set down in this order: York, Durham, Carlisle, Corren, Simon, Oglethorp, Edgworth, Day, Redman, Robinson, Winchester; and a little below, Canterbury, Hereford, Rochester, Davys (I suppose St. David's), Westminster, Layton, Tresham, Cox, Crayford: these are writ in a hand that I do not know, but not in the same hand. It seems those lists were made with relation to the different parties in which they stood. The book, thus carefully examined, was finished and published.

The king went in progress with his queen, who began to have a great influence on him; and on what reason I do not know, she withdrew from her uncle, and became Katherine Howard's Dis- his enemy: but before the king's return, her ill life came to be discovered, which grace. ended fatally to her. It is scarce worth the reader's while to say any more of a matter that is so universally acknowledged; but having found an original account, subscribed Col.Num.72. by herself, of one of her examinations, I have put it in the Collection. It appears there was a particular view in the archbishop of Canterbury's examining her, to draw from her all the discoveries they could make to fasten a pre-contract with Dereham on her. Many trifling stories relating to that being suggested, she was examined to them all: but though she confesses a lewd commerce with Dereham, she positively denied everything that could infer a pre-contract; nor did she confess anything of that sort done after the king married her, which she still denied very positively, even to the last. On the 15th of December, letters were written to the king's ambassadors abroad, that contain a severe account of the lewd and naughty behaviour and lightness of her lately reputed for queen (I give Paper-Office. the words of the letter), at which the king was much troubled.

Upon her disgrace there was a new negotiation proposed with the protestant princes of Germany. Mount was again sent over to excuse, as well as he could, the divorce with Anne of Cleves. He said she was treated nobly and kindly in all Secken.lib.3. p. 78. respects by the king: he renewed the proposition for a league, with relation to their common interests; but they still stood upon this, that they could enter into A Negotiation with the German Princes. no alliance with him unless they agreed in religion; insisting particularly on private masses, the denying the chalice, and the celibate of the clergy. Upon which a conference was proposed in Gelderland, or at Hamburg or Bremen. The king, in answer to this, wrote, that he would carefully examine all that they laid before him: he expressed great regard to the elector, but complained that some of his learned men had written virulently against him, and misrepresented his proceedings. Cranmer likewise wrote to the elector, and set forth the great things the king had already done in abolishing the pope's authority, the monastic state, and the idolatrous worship of images. He desired they would not be uneasy, though the king in some things differed still from them: he was very learned himself, and had learned men about him; he was quick of apprehension, had a sound judgment, and was firm in what he once resolved on; and he hoped the propositions they had sent over would be well considered.

Lord William Howard, the late queen's uncle, was then ambassador in France. He tells, in one of his letters, that the admiral was restored to favour, chiefly by the means of madame D'Estampes, whose credit with that king is well known. There were reports that the emperor and the French king were in a treaty, and that, in conclusion, they would join to make war on the king. This was charged on the French, but solemnly disowned by that king. It appears the proposition for marrying the lady Mary to the duke of Orleans was then begun. Great exceptions were taken to her being declared a bastard; but it was promised that, when all other things were agreed to, she should be declared legitimate. Upon queen Katherine Howard's disgrace, lord William was recalled, and Paget was sent over in his room.

There is in the Paper-office an original letter of Paget's to the king, that gives an account of his conversation with the admiral, who was then in high favour, Montmorency being in disgrace. It is very long, but it contains so many important passages that I have put it in the Collection, and shall here give an abstract of it. It is dated from Chablais, Col.Num.73. the 22d of April, in the year 1542.

“ He gave the admiral an account of his instructions, and of what both the king and his council had ordered him to say. He perceived the admiral sighed and crossed himself often; and said, in his answer to him, that he saw the king of France resolved to enter into some confederacy. He desired it might be with the king, and would think of no other prince till the king refused him. He thought both the kings were, by their interests, obliged to stick to one another, though the marriage had never been spoke of: it is true, that would fix and strengthen it. But he thought two hundred thousand crowns was a very mean offer for such a king's daughter to such a prince: four or five hundred thousand crowns was nothing to the king. The duke of Orleans was a prince of great courage, and did aspire to great things. So mean an offer would quite discourage them. The daughter of Portugal was offered with four hundred thousand ducats, together with the interest of it since her father's death, which was almost as much more. At the first motion of the matter, it was answered, the man must desire the woman. Now he does desire her, and you offer nothing: with this he sighed. Paget answered, and fully set out the personal love that he knew his master had for the French king; that none of the occasions of suspicion that had been given could alienate him from it; and he reckoned up many of these. He acknowledged there were great hopes of the duke of Orleans; but he studied to show that the offer was not unreasonable, all things considered. Louis XII. had but three hundred thousand crowns with the king's sister; and the king of Scots had with the other but one hundred thousand crowns: but he said, besides the two hundred thousand crowns which he offered to give, they will also forgive eight hundred thousand crowns that France owed the king, and discharge the one hundred thousand crowns yearly pension. To this the admiral replied, he counted the forgiving the eight hundred thousand crowns for nothing; and, for the annual pension, they would be at as much charge to maintain her and her court. Paget said the eight hundred thousand crowns was a just debt, lent in an extreme necessity; and because it had been long owing, and often respited, must that pass for nothing? So he bad him ask reasonably, or offer what was proper reciprocally for it. The admiral said the king was rich; and what was eight hundred thousand crowns to him, which they were not able to pay? So the admiral, said he, wished the thing had never been spoke of. He fell next to turn the motion to the lady Elizabeth; and he proposed a league offensive and defensive against the emperor; and that whatever should be got from the emperor should be the king's, in lieu of the pension during life. He knew the emperor was practising with the king, as he was, at the same time, with them. Bonner was then sent ambassador to Spain, and had carried over from the king to the emperor three horses of value. The emperor might say what he will in the way of practice; but he knew he would never unite with the king, except he would return to the pope: for so the nuncio told the chancellor, and the chancellor told it to the queen of Navarre, who fell out with him upon that occasion. She told him he was ill enough before; but now, since he had 'the mark of the beast' (for he was lately made a priest), he grew worse and worse. The emperor's design was only to divide them. He offered to them that the duke of Orleans should be king of Naples, and to give Flanders to the crown of France; but in lieu of that he asked the renunciation of Milan and Navarre, and the restoring of Piedmont and Savoy. But by this, the father and son being so far separate, the emperor would soon drive the duke of Orleans out of Naples. He was also studying to gain the duke of Cleves, and to restore him Gueldres quietly, provided that he and his wife would renounce Navarre. But he concluded that they knew the emperor did nothing but practise. They knew he offered to the king to reconcile him to the pope without any breach of his honour, for it should be at the pope's suit. Paget said he knew nothing of all that; but believed it would be hard to reconcile him to the bishop of Rome, for virtue and vice cannot stand together in one predicament. 'Call ye him Vice,' said the admiral; 'he is the very devil, and I trust to see his confusion: everything must have a time and a beginning.' 'But when begin you?' said Paget. The admiral answered, 'Before it be long, the king will give all the abbeyes to his lay gentlemen; and so by little and little overthrow him altogether. Why may not we have a patriarch in France?' This the pope's legate began to perceive; and though they talked of a general council, he believed the pope would as soon be hanged as call one. Paget said, he would be glad to see them once begin to do somewhat. 'Ah!' said the admiral, 'I'm ill-matched.' He wished the entire union of the two kings; and if an interview might be between them, it would be the happiest thing could befall Christendom: but he believed some of the king's council leaned too much to the emperor, and proposed several advantages from it. He said, the emperor cared not if father, friend, and all the world should sink, so his insatiable desires might be satisfied. He suffered two of his brothers-in-law to perish for want of fifty thousand crowns; first, the king of Hungary, and then the king of Denmark, whom he might have restored, if he would have given him ten thousand crowns. He was then low enough; and they would do well to fall on him, now that he was so low, before he took breath. So he pressed Paget to put matters on heartily with the king. He thought it an unreasonable thing for the emperor and his brother to ask aid against the Turk, to defend their own dominions, when they kept the king's dominions from him. Paget gave the king an account of all this conversation very particularly, with an humble submission to him if in anything he had gone too far. The court of France believed the emperor was treating with the king for the marriage of the lady Mary; and that, for that end, Bonner was sent to Spain, who was looked on as a man thoroughly imperial." After Paget had ended his letter, written on the 19th of April, he adds a long postscript on the 22d, for the admiral had entered into farther discourse with him the next day. "He told him how sorry he was to see all his hopes blasted; he could not sleep all night for it. They had letters from their ambassadors in England, and were amazed to find that a king who was so rich stood for so small a matter. The pope had offered the duke of Guise's son two hundred thousand crowns with his niece: he said he was much troubled at all this. All that were about the king his master were not of one mind; and he had been reproached for beginning this matter. They knew the falsehood and the lies of the pope and the emperor well enough: he wished they would consider well what the effects of an entire friendship with the king of France might be: the French could do no more than they could do. Within two years, they would owe the king one hundred thousand crowns, besides the one hundred thousand crowns during the king's life, and fifty thousand crowns for ever after that. But he said, in those treaties, many things ought to be done for their own defence. At this he was called away by the king, but came afterwards to Paget. He said, it was not one hundred thousand nor two hundred thousand lady Mary a considerable match for some foreign prince, the duke of Orleans or some other. This is all that I could gather, out of a vast number of those notes, which he took of matters, to move the king in.

Upon Cromwell's imprisonment, the comptroller was sent to him, and he ordered him to write to the king, what he thought meet to be written concerning his present condition; and, it seems, with some intimations of hope. Upon that, Cromwell wrote a long letter to the king, which will be found in the Collection. "He begins it with great thanks to the king, for what the comptroller had said to him. He was accused of treason; but he protests, he never once thought to do that which should displease him, much less to commit so high an offence. The king knew his accusers: he prayed God to forgive them. He had ever loved the king, and all his proceedings: he prays God to confound him, if he had ever a thought to the contrary. He had laboured much, to make the king a great and a happy prince; and acknowledges his great obligations to the king. So he writes, that if he had been capable to be a traitor, the greatest punishment was too little for him. He never spoke with the chancellor of the augmentations (Baker) and Throckmorton together, but once: but he is sure, he never spoke of any such matter" (as, it seems, was informed against him). "The king knew what a man Throckmorton was, with relation to all his proceedings: and what an enemy Baker was to him, God and he know: the king knew what he had been towards him. It seems, the king had advertised him of them; but God, who had delivered Susan when falsely accused, could deliver him. He trusted only in God, and in the king. In all his service, he had only considered the king; but did not know that he had done injustice to any person: yet he had not done his duty in all things; therefore he asked mercy. If he had heard of conventicles, or other offences, he had for the most part revealed them, and made them to be punished, but not out of malice. He had meddled in so many things, that he could not answer them all; but of this he was sure, that he had never willingly offended: and wherein he had offended, he humbly begged pardon. The comptroller told him, that fourteen days ago the king had committed a great secret to him, which he had revealed: he remembered well the matter, but he had never revealed it. For, after the king had told him what it was that he disliked in the queen, he told the king, that she often desired to speak with him, but he durst not: yet the king bade him go to her, and be plain with her, in declaring his mind: upon which, he spake privately with her lord chamberlain, desiring him, not naming the king, to deal with the queen to behave herself more pleasantly towards the king; hoping thereby to have had some faults amended. And when some of her council came to him, for licence to the stranger maids to depart, he did then require them to advise the queen to use all pleasantness with the king. Both these words were spoken before the king had trusted the secret to him, on design that she might render herself more agreeable to the king: but after the king had trusted that secret to him (which it seems was his design to have the marriage dissolved) he never spoke of it, but to the lord admiral; and that was by the king's order on Sunday last; who was very willing to seek remedy for the king's comfort: he protests he was ready to die to procure the king comfort: he wishes he were in hell if it was not true. This was all he had done," (it seems the king thought the change in the queen's deportment towards him was the effect of his discovering the secret of the king's purpose, and in order to prevent it); "but for this he humbly begs pardon: he understood that it was charged upon him, that he had more retainers about him than the laws allowed: he never retained any, except his household servants, but against his will: he had been pressed by many, who said they were his friends, he had retained their children and friends, not as retainers, for their fathers and friends promised to maintain them: in this, God knows, he had no ill intent, but begs pardon if he had offended," (for that was represented as the gathering a force about him to defend himself). "He concludes he had not behaved himself towards God and the king as he ought to have done: and as he was continually calling on God for mercy, for offences committed against him, so he begs the king's pardon for his offences against him, which were never wilful; and he assures him he had never a thought of treason against him, either in word or deed: and he continued to pray for him and the prince, ending, indeed, with too abject a meanness."

These were all the particulars that were charged on him upon his first imprisonment : other matters were afterwards added to throw the more load on him ; but it seems they were not so much as thought on or mentioned at first : but now I return to the letter writ to Zurich. Hill adds, that they heard they once designed to burn Cromwell as a heretic, and that these considerations made him confess that he had offended the king. What he said that way at his execution was pronounced coldly by him ; upon that the writer runs out very copiously, and acknowledges that their sins had provoked God to bring upon them that great change that they saw in affairs : they had wholly trusted to the learning of some, and to the conduct of others ; but God, by the taking these away, was calling on them to turn sincerely to him, to trust entirely in him, and to repent with their whole heart. There was at that time a great want of sincere labourers, so that from east to west, and from south to north, there was scarce one faithful and sincere preacher of the gospel to be found.

The act of dissolving the king's marriage did set forth that some doubts were raised concerning the king's marriage, which, as he writes, was manifestly false, for nobody thought of any doubtfulness in it : nor did they pray, as is in the act, that it might be inquired into: for nobody spake of it till the king was resolved to part with the queen, that he might be married to Mrs. Howard, whom in his bad Latin he calls "Parvissima Puella," a very little girl. The archbishop of Canterbury, and the rest of the bishops, judged she was yet a virgin, which none that knew the man could believe. Here again I must leave my letter.

There had been no convocation for two years, for "the institution of a Christian man" was prepared by a commission, given to some bishops of both provinces, and to some archdeacons, but no deans were summoned with them: a convocation sate in both provinces in May, in the year 1539, to which abbots and priors were summoned ; but though there were eight abbots and nine priors in Exeter diocese, yet the return from thence says, there were none in the diocese. I do not know how to reconcile that with the abbot of Tavistock's sitting in the house of lords, as appears by the journals of that parliament.

Upon this occasion there was a particular summons for both provinces, to meet in a national synod, to judge of the king's marriage. When I wrote of this in my History, I did not at all reflect on the doctrine of the church of Rome, that makes marriage a sacrament, in which the two parties are the ministers, who transfer their persons to one another : and according to the doctrine of the necessity of the intention in him that ministers the sacrament, how vile soever this decision in the matter of the king's marriage may seem to be, yet it was a just consequence from that doctrine : for without a true, free, and inward intention, which the king affirmed he had not, the marriage could be no sacrament : so that the heaviest part of the shame of that decision falls indeed on that doctrine. When the news came to France of the king's dissolving his marriage with Anne of Cleves, king Francis himself asked the ambassadors upon what grounds it went : the cardinal of Ferrara did also send one to ask what was alleged for it by divines and lawyers. Wallop and others were then the ambassadors from England at the court : they sent to the council an account of this ; and Wallop wrote over to know what he should say upon the subject. The answer which the council wrote to him was, that the queen herself affirmed, her person had not been touched by king Henry : that a learned convocation had judged the matter ; that the bishops of Durham, Winchester, and Bath, were known to be great and learned clerks, who would do nothing but upon just and good grounds : so that all persons ought to be satisfied with these proceedings, as she herself was. And here this matter ended, to the great reproach of that body, that went so hastily and so unanimously into that scandalous decision.

But to return to my Zurich letter : after he had related the manner of that judgment of those called spiritual, who indeed were very carnal, he mentions the exceptions in the act of pardon ; for besides particular exceptions, all anabaptists and sacramentaries were excepted, and all those that affirmed there was a fate upon men, by which the day of their death was unalterably determined.

There was at this time a great design against Dr. Crome, whom Cranmer had recommended to be dean of Canterbury, in these words: "I know no man more meet A Design for the dean's room in England than Dr. Crome, who by his sincere learning, against Crome. godly conversation, and good example of living, with his great soberness, hath done unto the king's majesty as good service, I dare say, as any priest in England: and yet his grace daily remembereth all others that doth him service, this man only excepted, who never had yet, besides his gracious favour, any promotion at his hands. Wherefore if it please his majesty to put him in the dean's room, I do not doubt but that he should be a light to all the deans and ministers of colleges in this realm; for I know, that when he was but a president of a college in Cambridge, his house was better ordered than all the houses in Cambridge besides." Certainly this good opinion that Cranmer had of him made him, in the state in which things were at this time, to be the worse thought of, and the more watched. So, when he heard that he was to be searched for, he went to the king, and, on his knees, begged he would put a stop to the severities then on foot, and that he would set many, then in prison on the account of religion, at liberty. The king had such a regard for him that, upon this, he ordered a stop to be put to further prosecutions; and he set those at liberty who were then in prison, they giving bail to appear when they should be called for. The king seemed to think that by this small favour, after some severities, people would be more quiet and more obedient; but after the parliament was dissolved, six persons suffered. Three of these were popish priests, who suffered as traitors, for denying the king's supremacy; and Barnes, Gerrard, and Jerome were the other three. They were tied to one stake, and suffered without crying out, but were quiet and patient, as if they had felt no pain. He could never hear any reason given for this their suffering, unless it was to please the clergy: they were not condemned by any form of law. They had been so cautious, ever since the act of the Six Articles passed, that they had not opened their mouths in opposition to them in public; and, by the act, all offences done before it had passed were pardoned. Barnes himself said, at the place of execution, that he did not know for what cause he was brought thither to be burnt; for they were attainted by act of parliament, without being brought to make their answers.

The bishop of Chichester, Sampson, though a man compliant in all things, and Dr. Wilson, were exempted out of the general pardon, for no other crime, as he heard, but that Abel who suffered for denying the king's supremacy, being in the greatest extremity of want and misery in prison, where it was said he was almost eat up by vermin, they had sent him some alms. From this Hill goes on to give an account of Crome, whose constant way had been, when he saw a storm rising, to preach with more zeal than ordinary against the prevailing corruption: so on Christmas-day his enemies that were watching to find matter to accuse him, framed some articles which they carried to the king against him: he had condemned in his sermon all masses for the dead, and said, "if they were profitable to the dead, the king and parliament had done wrong in destroying the monasteries endowed for that end: he also said, that to pray to the saints, only to pray for us, was a practice neither necessary nor useful: he added, you call us the seditious preachers of a new doctrine, but it is you are the seditious persons, who maintain the superstitious traditions of men, and will not hear the word of God himself. The church of Christ will ever suffer persecution as it has done of late among us."

These and some other complaints being carried to the king, Crome was commanded to answer them. He in his answer explained and justified all he had said. The king had no mind to carry matters further against so eminent a man; so he passed a sentence, in which he set forth, that Crome had confessed the articles objected to him; but the king out of his clemency, intending to quiet his people, appointed Crome to preach at Saint Paul's, and there to repeat all the articles objected to him, and then to read the judgment that the king gave in the matter: and it concluded, that if ever he fell into the like offence again, he was to suffer according to law. The king's judgment was, "that private masses were sacrifices profitable both to the living and to the dead, but yet that the king's majesty with his parliament had justly abolished monasteries." Upon this Crome preached, and at the end of his sermon, he told the people he had received an order from the king to be read to them; which he read, but said not one word upon it, and with a short prayer dismissed the congregation: whereas the king expected that he should have applauded his judgment, and extolled his favour to himself, as Dr. Barnes and his two companions were unhappily prevailed on to do, and yet were burned afterwards. Hill was therefore afraid that Crome might be brought into further trouble. There was an order sent to him from the king to preach no more, as he had before forbidden both Latimer and Shaxton to preach any more. They were not excluded from the general pardon, but were still prohibited to preach: and when they were set at liberty, they were required not to come within ten miles of either of the universities, or the city of London, or the dioceses in which they had been bishops. Thus, says he, faithful shepherds were driven from their flocks, and ravenous wolves were sent in their stead: he concludes, hoping that God would not suffer them to be long oppressed by such tyranny. Thus I have given a very particular account of that long letter writ with much good sense and piety, but in very bad Latin, therefore I do not put it into the Collection.

Sampson, though he fell into this disgrace for an act of Christian piety, yet hitherto had showed a very entire compliance with all that had been done: he had published an explanation on the first fifty Psalms, which he dedicated to the king: in which, as he extolled his proceedings, so he run out into a severe invective against the bishop of Rome, and the usurpations and corruptions favoured by that see, and he reflected severely on Pole. Pole's old friend Tostal did also in a sermon at Saint Paul's on Palm Sunday in his grave way set forth his unnatural ingratitude. But now the popish party upon Cromwell's fall, and the exaltation of the duke of Norfolk by the king's marrying his niece, broke out into their usual violence; and they were, as we may reasonably believe, set on to it by Bonner, who upon Stokesly's death, a year before, had been brought to London, and immediately upon Cromwell's disgrace changed sides, and from having acted a forced part with heat enough, now came to act that which was natural to him.

There were so many informations brought in the city of London, that a jury sitting in Prosecutions upon the Six Articles. Mercers' Chapel presented five hundred persons to be tried upon the statute of the Six Articles, which, as may be easily imagined, put the city under great apprehensions: but Audley, the lord chancellor, represented to the king that this was done out of malice: so they were all dismissed, some say pardoned. Informations came against papists on the other side: a letter was sent from the council to Cranmer, to send Dr. Bengier to the Tower. Two of Bonner's chaplains were, by order of council, sent to the archbishop, to be examined by him. A vicar was brought out of Wiltshire, out of whose offices Thomas Becket's name was not yet rased: but he was dismissed, for it was believed to be the effect only of negligence, and not of any ill principles. There was a letter of Melancthon's against the king's proceedings, printed in English; (perhaps it was that which I published in the Addenda to my first volume). Goodrick bishop of Ely's chaplain and servant were examined, and his house was searched for it. Many were brought into trouble for words concerning the king and his proceedings. Poor Marbeck, of Windsor, was imprisoned in the Marshalsea. Many printers were prosecuted for bringing English books into the kingdom against the king's proceedings. In one council-day (for all these particulars are taken out of the council-books), five-and-twenty booksellers were examined as to all books, more particularly English books, that they had sold these last three years. Hains, the dean of Exeter, was oft before the council; but particulars are not mentioned. Articles were brought against him, and they were referred to the king's learned council. The bishops of Ely, Sarum, Rochester, and Westminster were appointed to examine him, and to proceed with all diligence. He was also sent to the Fleet for "lewd and seditious preaching" (the words in the council-book), and sowing many erroneous opinions; but, after a good lesson and exhortation, with a declaration of the king's mercy and goodness towards him, he was dismissed under a recognisance of five hundred marks, to appear (if called for) any time within five months, to answer to such things as should be laid against him.

On the 4th of May, 1542, an entry is made, Cranmer being present; that it was thought good, if the king's highness shall be so content, that a general commission shall be sent to

Kent, with certain special articles; and generally, that all abuses and enormities of religion were to be examined. This was laid on design to ruin Cranmer; but there is no other entry made in the council-book relating to this matter; unless this was a consequence of it, that on the 27th of June, Hards, of Canterbury, a prisoner for a seditious libel, was, after a good exhortation, dismissed. And this is all the light that the only council-book of that reign, for two years, affords as to those matters. Mr. Strype has helped us to more light.

While Cranmer was visiting his diocese, there were many presentments made of a very different nature. Some were presented for adhering still to the old superstitions condemned by the king, and for insinuations in favour of the pope's authority. Others again were, on the other hand, presented for doctrines, either contrary to the Six Articles, or to the rites still practised. This created a great confusion through that whole country, and the blame of all was cast on Cranmer by his enemies; as if he favoured and encouraged that which was called the "New Learning" too much.

A plot was contrived, chiefly by Gardiner's means, with the assistance of Dr. London and of Thornden (suffragan of Dover and prebendary of Canterbury), who had lived in Cranmer's house, and had all his preferment by his favour. Several others engaged in it, who had all been raised by him, and had pretended zeal for the gospel; but, upon Cromwell's fall, they reckoned, that if they could send Cranmer after him, they would effectually crush all designs of a further reformation.

They resolved to begin with some of the prebendaries and preachers. Many articles were gathered out of their sermons and private discourses, all terminating in the archbishop, who, as was said, showed so partial a favour to the men of the "New Learning," and dealt so harshly and severely with the others, that he was represented to be the principal cause of all the heat and divisions that were in Canterbury, and in the other parts of Kent. These articles went through many hands; but it was not easy to prevail with a proper person to present them. The steps made in the matter are copiously set forth by Mr. Strype. At last they came into the king's hands; and he, upon that, passing by Lambeth, where the archbishop stood, in respect to him, as he passed by, called him into his barge, and told him, he had now discovered who was the greatest heretic in Kent. With that he showed him the articles against himself and his chaplains. The archbishop knew the falsehood of many particulars, so he prayed the king to send a commission to examine the matter. The king said he would give him a commission, but to none else. He answered, it would not seem decent to appoint him to examine articles exhibited against himself. The king said he knew his integrity, and would trust it to no other person: nor would he name above one (though pressed to it) that should be joined in commission with him: and he even then seemed persuaded it was a contrivance of Gardiner's to ruin him.

The archbishop went down himself into Kent; and then the conspirators seeing the king's favour to him, were struck with fear. Some of them wept and begged pardon, and were put in prison: but the rest of the commission, in whose hands the archbishop left the matter, being secretly favourers of that party, proceeded faintly: so it was writ to court, that unless Dr. Legh were sent down, who was well practised in examinations, the conspiracy would never be found out: he was upon that sent down; and he ordered a search to be made at one and the same time of all suspected places, and so he discovered the whole train. Some of the archbishop's domestics, Thornden in particular, were among the chief of the informers. He charged them with it. They, on their knees, confessed their faults with many tears. He, who was gentle even to excess, said he did forgive them, and prayed God to forgive them, and to make them better men. After that, he was never observed to change his countenance, or alter his behaviour towards them. He expressed the like readiness to pardon all the rest: many were imprisoned upon these examinations, but the parliament granting a subsidy, a general pardon set them all at liberty; which otherwise the archbishop was resolved to have procured to them. This relation differs in several particulars from the account that I gave of it in my History: but this seems to be the exacter and the better vouched, and therefore I acquiesce in it. Another instance is given by the same writer of the king's zeal for Cranmer. Sir John

Ch. 25. Mem.
Cranmer.

A Conspiracy against Cranmer.

Mildness.

Gostwick, knight for Bedfordshire, did in the house of commons charge him for preaching heresy against the sacrament of the altar, both at Feversham and Canterbury: the king hearing of this, did, in his rough way, threaten Gostwick, calling him varlet, and charged him to go and ask Cranmer pardon, otherwise he should feel the effects of his displeasure. The king said if he had been a Kentish man, he might have had some more shadow for accusing him; but being of Bedfordshire, he could have none. Gostwick, terrified with this message, made his submission to Cranmer, who mildly forgave him, and went to the king and moved him for his favour, which he did not obtain without some difficulty.

It appears plainly that the king acted as if he had a mind to be thought infallible; and that his subjects were bound to believe as much as he thought fit to open to them, and neither more nor less. He went on this year, before he took his progress, in finishing "The necessary Doctrine and Erudition of any Christian Man." A great part of it was corrected by his own hand, particularly in that article of the creed, "the catholic church," where there are severe reflections added on the bishops of Rome. Here I found likewise some more of the answers made to the seventeenth queries upon the matter of the sacraments that I published in my first volume. I set them out again in my Collection, that by these the reader may better understand the two following papers, that I print separately, and not intermixed with one another, as I did before, which I thought to be an ease to the reader: but since that was made a great offence, I will do it no more. One of these is only an answer to the queries: the writer of the first is not named; it is probably Tonsal's: he is plainly of the same side with the archbishop of York. It will be found in the Collection; as also another paper, with several marginal notes in the king's hand, by which it appears that the king was much shaken from his former notions. He asked for Scripture in several particulars that could not easily be brought. On the margin, Cranmer and Barlow are often named; but I do not understand with what view it was that they, and no other (except Cox, once), are named. Over against the 15th article, their names are set down in this order: York, Durham, Carlisle, Corren, Simon, Oglethorp, Edgworth, Day, Redman, Robinson, Winchester; and a little below, Canterbury, Hereford, Rochester, Davys (I suppose St. David's), Westminster, Layton, Tresham, Cox, Crayford: these are writ in a hand that I do not know, but not in the same hand. It seems those lists were made with relation to the different parties in which they stood. The book, thus carefully examined, was finished and published.

The king went in progress with his queen, who began to have a great influence on him; and on what reason I do not know, she withdrew from her uncle, and became his enemy: but before the king's return, her ill life came to be discovered, which ended fatally to her. It is scarce worth the reader's while to say any more of a matter that is so universally acknowledged; but having found an original account, subscribed by herself, of one of her examinations, I have put it in the Collection. It appears there was a particular view in the archbishop of Canterbury's examining her, to draw from her all the discoveries they could make to fasten a pre-contract with Dereham on her. Many trifling stories relating to that being suggested, she was examined to them all: but though she confesses a lewd commerce with Dereham, she positively denied everything that could infer a pre-contract; nor did she confess anything of that sort done after the king married her, which she still denied very positively, even to the last. On the 15th of December, letters were written to the king's ambassadors abroad, that contain a severe account of the lewd and naughty behaviour and lightness of her lately reputed for queen (I give the words of the letter), at which the king was much troubled.

Upon her disgrace there was a new negotiation proposed with the protestant princes of Germany. Mount was again sent over to excuse, as well as he could, the divorce with Anne of Cleves. He said she was treated nobly and kindly in all respects by the king: he renewed the proposition for a league, with relation to their common interests; but they still stood upon this, that they could enter into no alliance with him unless they agreed in religion; insisting particularly on private masses, the denying the chalice, and the celibate of the clergy. ference was proposed in Gelderland, or at Hamburg or Bremen. The king, in answer to this, wrote, that he would carefully examine all that they laid before him: he expressed great regard to the elector, but complained that some of his learned men had written virulently against him, and misrepresented his proceedings. Cranmer likewise wrote to the elector, and set forth the great things the king had already done in abolishing the pope's authority, the monastic state, and the idolatrous worship of images. He desired they would not be uneasy, though the king in some things differed still from them: he was very learned himself, and had learned men about him; he was quick of apprehension, had a sound judgment, and was firm in what he once resolved on; and he hoped the propositions they had sent over would be well considered.

Lord William Howard, the late queen's uncle, was then ambassador in France. He tells, in one of his letters, that the admiral was restored to favour, chiefly by the means of madame D'Estampes, whose credit with that king is well known. There were reports that the emperor and the French king were in a treaty, and that, in conclusion, they would join to make war on the king. This was charged on the French, but solemnly disowned by that king. It appears the proposition for marrying the lady Mary to the duke of Orleans was then begun. Great exceptions were taken to her being declared a bastard; but it was promised that, when all other things were agreed to, she should be declared legitimate. Upon queen Katherine Howard's disgrace, lord William was recalled, and Paget was sent over in his room.

There is in the Paper-office an original letter of Paget's to the king, that gives an account of his conversation with the admiral, who was then in high favour, Montmorency being in disgrace. It is very long, but it contains so many important passages that I have put it in the Collection, and shall here give an abstract of it. It is dated from Chablais, Col. Num. 73. the 22d of April, in the year 1542.

“ He gave the admiral an account of his instructions, and of what both the king and his council had ordered him to say. He perceived the admiral sighed and crossed himself often; and said, in his answer to him, that he saw the king of France resolved to enter into some confederacy. He desired it might be with the king, and would think of no other prince till the king refused him. He thought both the kings were, by their interests, obliged to stick to one another, though the marriage had never been spoke of: it is true, that would fix and strengthen it. But he thought two hundred thousand crowns was a very mean offer for such a king's daughter to such a prince: four or five hundred thousand crowns was nothing to the king. The duke of Orleans was a prince of great courage, and did aspire to great things. So mean an offer would quite discourage them. The daughter of Portugal was offered with four hundred thousand ducats, together with the interest of it since her father's death, which was almost as much more. At the first motion of the matter, it was answered, the man must desire the woman. Now he does desire her, and you offer nothing: with this he sighed. Paget answered, and fully set out the personal love that he knew his master had for the French king; that none of the occasions of suspicion that had been given could alienate him from it; and he reckoned up many of these. He acknowledged there were great hopes of the duke of Orleans; but he studied to show that the offer was not unreasonable, all things considered. Louis XII. had but three hundred thousand crowns with the king's sister; and the king of Scots had with the other but one hundred thousand crowns: but he said, besides the two hundred thousand crowns which he offered to give, they will also forgive eight hundred thousand crowns that France owed the king, and discharge the one hundred thousand crowns yearly pension. To this the admiral replied, he counted the forgiving the eight hundred thousand crowns for nothing; and, for the annual pension, they would be at as much charge to maintain her and her court. Paget said the eight hundred thousand crowns was a just debt, lent in an extreme necessity; and because it had been long owing, and often respited, must that pass for nothing? So he bad him ask reasonably, or offer what was proper reciprocally for it. The admiral said the king was rich; and what was eight hundred thousand crowns to him, which they were not able to pay? So the admiral, said he, wished the thing had never been spoke of. He fell next to turn the motion to the lady Elizabeth; and he proposed a league offensive and defensive against the emperor; and that whatever should be got from the emperor should be the king's, in lieu of the pension during life. He knew the emperor was practising with the king, as he was, at the same time, with them. Bonner was then sent ambassador to Spain, and had carried over from the king to the emperor three horses of value. The emperor might say what he will in the way of practice; but he knew he would never unite with the king, except he would return to the pope: for so the nuncio told the chancellor, and the chancellor told it to the queen of Navarre, who fell out with him upon that occasion. She told him he was ill enough before; but now, since he had 'the mark of the beast' (for he was lately made a priest), he grew worse and worse. The emperor's design was only to divide them. He offered to them that the duke of Orleans should be king of Naples, and to give Flanders to the crown of France; but in lieu of that he asked the renunciation of Milan and Navarre, and the restoring of Piedmont and Savoy. But by this, the father and son being so far separate, the emperor would soon drive the duke of Orleans out of Naples. He was also studying to gain the duke of Cleves, and to restore him Gueldres quietly, provided that he and his wife would renounce Navarre. But he concluded that they knew the emperor did nothing but practise. They knew he offered to the king to reconcile him to the pope without any breach of his honour, for it should be at the pope's suit. Paget said he knew nothing of all that; but believed it would be hard to reconcile him to the bishop of Rome, for virtue and vice cannot stand together in one predicament. 'Call ye him Vice,' said the admiral; 'he is the very devil, and I trust to see his confusion: everything must have a time and a beginning.' 'But when begin you?' said Paget. The admiral answered, 'Before it be long, the king will give all the abbeyes to his lay gentlemen; and so by little and little overthrow him altogether. Why may not we have a patriarch in France?' This the pope's legate began to perceive; and though they talked of a general council, he believed the pope would as soon be hanged as call one. Paget said, he would be glad to see them once begin to do somewhat. 'Ah!' said the admiral, 'I'm ill-matched.' He wished the entire union of the two kings; and if an interview might be between them, it would be the happiest thing could befall Christendom: but he believed some of the king's council leaned too much to the emperor, and proposed several advantages from it. He said, the emperor cared not if father, friend, and all the world should sink, so his insatiable desires might be satisfied. He suffered two of his brothers-in-law to perish for want of fifty thousand crowns; first, the king of Hungury, and then the king of Denmark, whom he might have restored, if he would have given him ten thousand crowns. He was then low enough; and they would do well to fall on him, now that he was so low, before he took breath. So he pressed Paget to put matters on heartily with the king. He thought it an unreasonable thing for the emperor and his brother to ask aid against the Turk, to defend their own dominions, when they kept the king's dominions from him. Paget gave the king an account of all this conversation very particularly, with an humble submission to him if in anything he had gone too far. The court of France believed the emperor was treating with the king for the marriage of the lady Mary; and that, for that end, Bonner was sent to Spain, who was looked on as a man thoroughly imperial." After Paget had ended his letter, written on the 19th of April, he adds a long postscript on the 22d, for the admiral had entered into farther discourse with him the next day. "He told him how sorry he was to see all his hopes blasted; he could not sleep all night for it. They had letters from their ambassadors in England, and were amazed to find that a king who was so rich stood for so small a matter. The pope had offered the duke of Guise's son two hundred thousand crowns with his niece: he said he was much troubled at all this. All that were about the king his master were not of one mind; and he had been reproached for beginning this matter. They knew the falshood and the lies of the pope and the emperor well enough: he wished they would consider well what the effects of an entire friendship with the king of France might be: the French could do no more than they could do. Within two years, they would owe the king one hundred thousand crowns, besides the one hundred thousand crowns during the king's life, and fifty thousand crowns for ever after that. But he said, in those treaties, many things ought to be done for their own defence. At this he was called away by the king, but came afterwards to Paget. He said, it was not one hundred thousand nor two hundred thousand crowns could not enrich the one, nor impoverish the other king. So he added, we ask your daughter, and you shall have our son; but desired that they might carry the matter further into a league, to make war on the emperor, defensive, for all their territories.

“He proposed that the king should send ten thousand foot and two thousand horse into Flanders, and to pay five thousand Germans; and the French king should furnish the same number of foot and of Germans, and three thousand horse, and an equal number of ships on both sides; and the king of France should, in some other places, fall into the emperor’s dominions, at an expense of two hundred thousand crowns a month. What a thing, said he, would it be, to the king, to have Gravelines, Dunkirk, and all those quarters joining to Calais! Paget answered, they might spend all their money, and catch nothing; and he did not see what ground of quarrel his master had with the emperor. Upon which the admiral replied, ‘Does not he owe you money? Hath not he broken his leagues with you in many particulars? Did not he provoke us to join with the pope and him, to drive your master out of his kingdom? And hath he not now put the pope on offering a council to sit at Mantua, Verona, Cambray, or Metz (this last place was lately named), all on design to ruin you? A pestilence take him!’ said he, ‘false dissembler that he is! If he had you at such an advantage as you now have him, you should feel it!’ And he run out largely, both against the bishop of Rome and the emperor. He desired the war might begin that year, the emperor being so low that, for all his millions, he had not a penny.”

On all this the admiral seemed wonderfully set. Paget excused himself from entering further into these matters, and desired that they might be proposed to the king by the French ambassador, then at London; yet, being pressed by the admiral, he promised to lay all before the king; and he did it very fully, but with many excuses and much submission.

The king’s council writ a short answer to this long letter: “They expressed their confidence in the admiral, with great acknowledgments for his affection to the king; but they seemed to suspect the king of France, that all his professions were only to get money from the king. Two hundred thousand crowns seemed nothing, when they were willing to forgive him a million; but, by this letter, it seems the French ambassadors did still insist on six hundred thousand crowns to be paid down.” So this matter was let fall. But to say all that relates to the duke of Orleans at once:

M. Le Vassor has published instructions, of which a collated copy was found among cardinal Granville’s papers. It is a question that cannot be answered, how he came by it: whether the original was taken with the landgrave of Hesse, or by what other way, is not certain. It bears date at Rheims, the 8th of September, 1543. “It expresses the great desire that he had, that the holy gospel might be preached in the whole kingdom of France; but the respect that he owed to the king his father, and to the dauphin his brother, made that he did not order it to be preached freely in his duchy of Orleans, that being under their obedience. But he sent to the duke of Saxony, to the landgrave of Hesse, and the other protestant princes, to assure them that he was resolved, and promised it expressly to them that he would order that the gospel should be preached in the duchy of Luxemburgh, and in all other places that should belong to him by the right of war. He desired to be received into their alliance, and to a league offensive and defensive with them. He desired earnestly that they would grant this request; not to be aided by them against any prince, but only on the account of the Christian religion, of which he desired the increase above all things; that by these means light may be spread into other dominions, and into the kingdom of France, when the king his father should see him so allied to those princes, which will be the cause of making him declare the good zeal he has to that matter; and will be able always to excuse it to him, and to defend it against all his enemies. He desires, therefore, that as soon as he shall give order that the gospel shall be preached in the duchy of Luxemburgh, this league and alliance may begin. He hopes this will not be delayed, from the opinion that they may have that he cannot quickly show what power he has to support the love he bears to this cause. He hopes in a little time to show, if it pleases God, some good effect of it; and he offers at present, not only all his own force, but the whole force of the king his father, who has given him authority to employ it in everything that he shall judge to be good for them, and in everything that may concern their welfare, their profit, and freedom.”

The Duke of Orleans promised to declare himself a Protestant.

It is impossible to read this, and to doubt either of his being sincerely a protestant, or at least that he was willing to profess it openly : and it can as little be doubted, that in this he had his father's leave to do what he did. The retaking of Luxemburgh put an end to this proposition : but, it seems, the emperor apprehended that the heat of this young prince might grow uneasy to him, therefore he took all methods to satisfy his ambition ; for, on the 18th of December, 1544, the ambassadors at the emperor's court write over, that he was treating a match between his own eldest daughter and the duke of Orleans ; and that he offered to give with her the ancient inheritance of the house of Burgundy, the two Practices on Burgundies, and the Netherlands : or if he would marry his brother Ferdinand's him end with second daughter, to give the duchy of Milan with her. They also mention in his life. April thereafter, that he came to the emperor, and stayed some days with him at Antwerp, and then went back. On this they all concluded that the treaty was like to go on, but do not mention which of the two ladies he liked best ; for there could be no comparison made between what was offered with them. But all the negotiation and all the hopes of that prince vanished on the 11th of September, 1545 ; for Karn, the king's ambassador in Flanders, writ over, that on that day he died of the plague.

I come next to put together all that I find in the minutes of convocation during this Proceedings reign. The necessary erudition was never brought in convocation : but it was in Convoca- treated by some bishops and divines of both provinces, and published by the king's tion. authority. It seems, when the doctrine was thus settled, there was a design to carry on the Reformation further. There was a convocation held in January 1541 ; in the second session of which, the archbishop delivered them a message from the king, that it was his pleasure, that they should consult concerning the reforming our errors. And he delivered some books to them to be examined by them : it does not appear what sort of books or errors those were ; whether of papists, sacramentaries, or of anabaptists ; for of this last sort some had crept into England. The business of Munster had made that name so odious, that three years before this, in October 1538, there was a commission sent to Cranmer, Stokesly, Sampson, and some others, to inquire after anabaptists, to proceed against them, to restore the penitent, to burn their books, and to deliver the obstinate to the secular arm : but I have not seen what proceedings there were upon this.

In October 1545 there was an order of council published, to take away shrines and A new Trans- images : several commissions were granted for executing this ; in some, they add lation of the bones to images. The archbishop did likewise move the convocation, in the Bible de- king's name, to make laws against simony, and to prepare a book of homilies, signed. and also a new translation of the Bible : for, it seems, complaints were made of the translation then printed and set up in churches. The several books of the Bible were parcelled out, and assigned to several bishops to translate them. This came to nothing during this reign ; but this same method was followed in queen Elizabeth's time. In the fifth session, the persons were named for this translation. Cranmer had, some few years before this, parcelled out an old translation of the New Testament to several bishops and divines, to be revised and corrected by them : but it was then much opposed. The Acts of Memor. of the Apostles was assigned to Stokesly ; but he sent in no return upon it, so the Cranmer. archbishop sent to him for it. His answer was sullen : " He wondered what Stuype, ch. 8. the archbishop meant thus to abuse the people, by giving them liberty to read the Scripture, which did nothing but infect them with heresy. He had not looked on his portion, and never would : so he sent back the book, saying, he would never be guilty of bringing the simple people into error." Notwithstanding this, Cranmer had published a more correct New Testament in English, which is referred to in the injunctions that were formerly mentioned ; but now he designed a new translation of the whole Bible. In the sixth session, which was on the 17th of February, a statute against simony was treated of : there was also some discourse about the translating the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments, in the vulgar tongue ; and it was considered how some words in them ought to be translated ; but what these were is not mentioned : only, it seems, there was a design to find faults in everything that Cranmer had done.

On the 24th of February several matters were treated of ; that in particular is named, that none should let leases beyond the term of twenty-one years. They treated about many of the rituals, and of Thomas Becket, and of the adorning of images, and about reforming some scandalous comedies. On the 3rd of March, the archbishop told them from the king, that it was his pleasure that the translation of the Bible should be revised by the two universities. But all bishops, except Ely and St. David's, protested against this; and, it seems, they insisted much upon trifles; for they treated of this, whether in the translation of the Bible, "the Lord," or "our Lord," should be the constant form. On the same day, the lord chancellor exhibited to them an act, allowing that the bishops' chancellors might marry. To this the bishops dissented. Some other matters were proposed; but all was referred to the king. Upon the convocation's being assembled on the 16th of February, 1542, some homilies were offered on different subjects, but nothing is marked concerning them. The archbishop also told them, that the king would have the books of the several offices used in churches to be examined and corrected: in particular, that both at matins and vespers, one chapter of the New Testament should be read in every parish. Some petitions were offered by the clergy; the first was, for making a body of the ecclesiastical laws. Of this we hear no more in this reign: but we are assured, that there was a digested body of them prepared; probably it was very near the same that was also prepared in king Edward's time. Cranmer, in a letter that he wrote to the king out of Kent, on the 24th of January 1545, which I did put in my second part, tells him, "That, according to his commands, he had sent for the bishop of Worcester (Heath), to let him know that the king's pleasure was to have the names of such persons sent him as he had formerly appointed to make ecclesiastical laws for the realm." The bishop promised, with all speed, to inquire out their names, and the book which they made, and to bring both the names and the book to the king; which, he writes, he had done before that time. By this it appears, that persons had been named for that; and that a commission was granted, pursuant to which the work had been prepared: for things of this kind were never neglected by Cranmer. It seems it had been done some years before, so that it was almost forgotten; but now, in one of king Henry's lucid intervals, it was prepared, as Mr. Strype has published: but how it came to pass, that no further progress was made during this reign, in so important and so necessary a work, is not easily to be accounted for; since it must have contributed much to the exaltation of the king's supremacy, to have all the ecclesiastical courts governed by a code authorised by him. In the convocation, in the year 1543, we have only this short word, that on the 29th of April, the archbishop treated of the sacraments, and on the next day, on the article of free will. This is all that I could gather from the copy of the minutes of the convocations, which was communicated to me by my most learned and worthy brother, the lord bishop of Lincoln, who assured me, it was collated exactly with the only ancient copy that remains, to give us light into the proceedings in the convocations of those times.

It does not appear to me, what moved Bell, bishop of Worcester, to resign his bishopric.

Bell, Bishop

Bishopric.

Rymer has printed his resignation, in which it is said that he did it simply of his own accord. He lived till the year 1556, as his tombstone in Clerkenwell church informs us. Whether he inclined to a further reformation, and so withdrew at this time; or whether the old leaven yet remaining with him, made it uneasy for him to comply, does not appear: if his motives had been of the former sort, it may be supposed he would have been thought of in king Edward's time; and if of the latter, then in queen Mary's reign he might again have appeared: so I must leave it in the dark, what his true motive was.

Audley, who had been lord chancellor from the time that sir Thomas More left that post, fell sick in the year 1544, and sent the great seal to the king by sir Edward

Audley, Lord Chancellor, died.

North and sir Thomas Bland. The king delivered it to the lord Wriothesley, and made him lord keeper during the lord Audley's infirmity, with authority to do everything that the lord chancellor might do; and the duke of Norfolk tendered him the oaths. It seems, there was such a regard had to the lord

Audley, that, as long as he lived, the title of lord chancellor was not given with the seals;

but, upon his death, Wriothlesley was made lord chancellor. This seems to be the first instance of a lord keeper, with the full authority of a lord chancellor.

I have not now before me such a thread of matters as to carry me regularly through the Practices on remaining years of this reign; and therefore, hereafter I only give such passages some Lords of as I have gathered, without knitting them together in an exact series. The Scotland. breach between England and France was driven on by the emperor's means, and promoted by all the popish party: so the king, to prevent all mischief from Scotland during this war with France, entered into an agreement with the earls of Lennox and

Rymer. Glencairn, and the elect bishop of Caithness, brother to the earl of Lennox, in May 1544. The articles are published. They promised, "that they should cause the word of God to be truly taught in their countries. 2dly, They should continue the king's faithful friends. 3dly, They should take care that the queen be not secretly carried away. 4thly, They should assist the king to seize on some castles on the borders." And they delivered the elect bishop of Caithness to the king as an hostage, for their observing these things. On the other hand, "the king engaged to send armies to Scotland, both by sea and land, and to make the earl of Lennox (written in this Levinax), as soon as he could, governor of Scotland; and that he should bestow his niece, lady Margaret Douglas, on him." There was a fuller agreement made with them, with more particulars in it, on the 26th of June; and a pension of 250*l.* was assigned to the earl of Glencairn, and 125*l.* to his son, both during life. Those in the castle of St. Andrew's were also taken into the king's protection: and

Tom. 15. they promised to promote the marriage and the king's interests, and to deliver Seck. l. 3, p. up the castle when demanded. There were also private agreements made with 121. Norman Lesley, Kirkaldy of the Grange, and some others, all to be found in Rymer.

The often-cited Seckendorf tells us, that at this time they in Germany began to have greater hopes of the king than ever. Mount was again sent to offer an alliance Mount sent to Germany. with them: he excused all the late proceedings. He said, Cromwell had rashly said, "That he hoped to see the time that he should strike a dagger into the heart of him that should oppose the Reformation;" which his judges thought was meant of the king. He said, Barnes had indiscreetly provoked the bishop of Winchester: he also blamed their ambassadors for entering into disputes in writing with the king. He believed Melancthon and Bucer would have managed that matter with more success. Bucer seconded Mount's motions, and magnified what the king had already done; though there was no complete reformation yet effected.

This did not move the elector: he looked on the king as an enemy to their doctrine. His whole design in what he had done, was, to make himself the "Head of the Church," to which he was not called of God. His government was tyrannical, and his life flagitious; so he looked for no good from him. The king of France moved him to undertake a mediation between him and the king; but the elector referred that to a general meeting of those who were engaged in the common Smalcaldic league. The princes in Germany having their chief dependence on the kings of France and England, saw how much they were weakened and exposed to the emperor by the war which was going on between those two kings; so they sent some empowered by them, to try if it was possible to prevent that war, and to mediate a reconciliation between them. To these, when they delivered their message to the king, he complained of the injustice and wilfulness of the French king: he thought their interposition could have no effect, and he used these words in an answer to their memorial, "We give them well to understand, that we do both repose an ampler and a fuller confidence in them than the French king either doth or will do."

De Bellay, who, being oft employed, understood those matters well, tells us that the emperor and king Henry had agreed to join their armies, and to march directly into France:

P. 1094. he tells in another place, that if king Henry had followed the opinion of his council, P. 1115. which was for his landing in Normandy with 30,000 men, he would have carried that whole duchy: and he ascribes his error in that matter to the providence of God, that protected France from so great a danger: the emperor had proposed to the king that upon the junction of their two armies, they should march straight to Paris; for they reckoned that both their armies would have amounted to ninety thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse ; but after the emperor had drawn the king into his measures, he went on taking some towns, pursuing his own ends, and then made his own peace with France, and left the king engaged in the war : so the king finding the emperor's main army was not like to join him, some bodies out of the Netherlands only coming to act in conjunction with him, upon that he sent the duke of Norfolk to besiege Montrevel, and he himself sat down before Boulogne. Marshal Bies, governor of Boulogne, apprehending the importance of Montrevel, carried a considerable part of the garrison of Boulogne with him, and threw himself into Montrevel : by this means he left Boulogne weak, and in ill hands. In the mean time the emperor took Luxemburgh, and some other places ; so all the project with which he had amused the king vanished, and a peace was struck up between him and the king of France.

The French sent an army to raise the siege of Montrevel ; and they were moving so as to get between the duke of Norfolk and the king's army : upon which the duke of Norfolk raised the siege, but Boulogne was taken ; and that small conquest was out of measure magnified by those who saw their own advantage in flattering their master, though at a vast charge he had gained a place scarce worth keeping.

The emperor had that address, and he had so strong a party about the king, that even all this was excused, and the intercourse between the two courts was not discontinued. In one point the emperor was necessary to the king, and he kept his word to him. It is certain the king had great apprehensions of the council that was now sitting at Trent, and the more because Pole was one of the legates sent to preside in it ; who, as he had reason to apprehend, would study to engage the council to confirm the pope's censure thundered out against the king ; and it was believed he was named legate for that end. The king of France had offered to Gardiner, that if the king would join with him, he would suffer no council to meet, but as the king should consent to it. But his fluctuating temper was so well known, that the king trusted in this particular more to the emperor, whose interest in that council he knew must be great : and the emperor had promised that the council should not at all intermeddle in the matter between the pope and the king : the effect showed he was true in this particular.

The king finding himself so disappointed, and indeed abandoned by the emperor, sent the earl of Hertford with Gardiner to him, to expostulate with him. A letter of the king's was sent by them to the emperor, written in a very severe strain, charging him with perfidy. The emperor either had the gout, or pretended to have it, so that he could not be spoke with : his chief ministers at that time, who were Grandville, and his son the bishop of Arras, delayed them from day to day, and discovered much chicane, as they wrote ; upon which they grew so uneasy, that at last they demanded a positive answer ; and then these ministers told them that the emperor could not carry on the war longer against France : but he offered to mediate a peace between England and France. After that they complain that they saw the pretence of mediation was managed deceitfully ; for the emperor's design upon Germany being now ready, he apprehended those two kings, if not engaged in war one with another, would support the princes of the empire, and not suffer the emperor, under the pretence of a religious war, to make himself master of Germany. Therefore he studied to keep up the war between France and England. I find Maurice of Saxony was this year, during the emperor's war with France, in his court : whether he was then mediating, or treating, about his perfidious abandoning the elector, and the other princes of the Smalcaldic League, I know not.

Before the king went out of England a great step was made towards the reforming the public offices. A form of procession in the English tongue was set out by the king's authority, and a mandate was sent to Bonner to publish it. The title of it was, " An Exhortation to Prayer, thought meet by his majesty and his clergy to be read to the people : also a Litany, with suffrages to be said or sung in the time of the processions." In the litany they did still invoke the Blessed Virgin, the angels and archangels, and all holy orders of blessed spirits, all holy patriarchs and prophets, apostles, martyrs, confessors, and virgins, and all the blessed company of heaven to pray for them : after the word "conspiracy" this is added, "from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable enormities : " the rest of the litany is the same that we still use, only some more collects are put at the end, and the whole is called a prayer of procession. To this are added some exercises of devotion, called Psalms, which are collected out of several parts of Scripture, but chiefly the Psalms : they are well collected, and the whole composition, as there is nothing that approaches to popery in it, so it is a serious and well-digested course of devotion. There follows a paraphrase on the Lord's Prayer : on the 4th petition there are expressions that seem to come near a true sense of the presence of Christ in the sacrament ; for by daily bread, as some of the ancients thought, the sacrament of the Eucharist is understood, which is thus expressed : "The lively bread of the blessed body of our Saviour Jesu Christ, and the sacred cup of the precious and blessed blood which was shed for us on the cross." This agrees with our present sense that Christ is present, not as he is now in heaven, but as he was on the cross : and that being a thing passed, he can only be present in a type and a memorial. The preface is an exhortation to prayer, in which these remarkable words will be found : "It is very convenient, and much acceptable to God, that you should use your private prayer in your mother tongue ; that you, understanding what you ask of God, may more earnestly and fervently desire the same ; your hearts and minds agreeing to your mouth and words." This is indeed all over of a pious and noble strain, and except the invocation of the saints and angels, it is an unexceptionable composition. At the same time Katherine Parre, whom the king had lately married, collected some prayers and meditations, "wherein the mind is stirred patiently to suffer all affliction here, to set at nought the vain prosperity of this world, and always to long for the everlasting felicity," which were printed in the year 1545.

But so apt was the king, whether from some old and inherent opinions that still stuck with him, or from the practices of those who knew how to flatter him suitably to his notions, to go backward and forward in matters of religion ; that though on the 15th of October, 1545, he ordered a mandate to be sent to Bonner, to publish the English procession ordained by him, which was executed the day following ; yet on the 24th of that month, there was a letter written to Cranmer, declaring the king's pleasure for the setting up an image that had been taken down by his injunctions ; ordering him at the same time to abolish the use of holy water about St. John's tide, and to take down an image called "Our Lady of Pity in the Pew," for the idolatry that was committed about it. At this time it was discovered that great indulgences, with all such like favours, were sent from Rome to Ireland ; so that generally in that kingdom the king's supremacy was rejected ; and yet at the same time it appears that many were put in prison for denying the presence in the sacrament : and a proclamation was set out, both against Tindall's New Testament and Coverdale's.

Thirleby, bishop of Westminster, was sent ambassador to the emperor, and afterwards secretary Petre was sent to the same court. Mount continued likewise to be employed, but without a character : he seems to have been both honest and zealous ; and in many letters writ both in the year 1545 and 1546, he warned the king of the emperor's designs to extirpate Lutheranism, and to force the whole empire to submit to the pope and the council, then sitting at Trent. The German princes sent over a vehement application to the king, to consider the case of Herman, bishop of Cologne, praying him to protect him and to intercede for him. They gave a great character of the man, of which Mount makes mention in his letters ; but I do not find that the king interposed in that matter : the emperor seemed to enter into great confidences with Thirleby, and either imposed on him, or found him easily wrought on. He told him that the king of France was making great levies in Switzerland, and he was well assured that they were not designed against himself : so he warned the king to be on his guard. This being inquired into, was not only denied by the court of France, but was found to be false, and was looked on as an artifice of the emperor's, to keep up a jealousy between those two courts. By such practices he prevailed on Thirleby to assure the king that the emperor did not design to enslave Germany, but only to repress the insolence of some princes, and to give justice a free course : all the news he wrote from thence did run in this strain : so that Germany was fatally abandoned by both kings. Yet still the king sent over to the emperor repeated complaints of the ill treatment his subjects met with in Spain, from inquisitors ; and that in many courts justice was refused to be done them, upon this pretence, that the king and all who adhered to him were declared heretics, and, as such, they were excommunicated by the pope, and so were not to be admitted to sue in judicatories. These were sent over to Thirleby ; but I do not see what was done upon all those representations.

The last message the king sent to the Germans was in the year 1546, by Mount, with whom one Butler was joined : the German princes, in general terms, prayed the king to insist on rejecting the Council of Trent, assuring him that the pope would suffer no reformation to be made. This letter was agreed to by the greater number of the princes of the union, only the elector of Saxony had conceived great prejudices against the king : “ He said he was an impious man, with whom he desired to have no commerce. He was no better than the pope, whose yoke he had thrown off only for his own ends ; and that he intended, out of the two religions, to make a third, only for enriching himself, having condemned the principal points of their doctrine in his parliament.”

I find, at this time, a secret disgust the emperor was in towards his brother Ferdinand ; upon which Ferdinand sent a message to the king, setting forth the just claim he had to his father's succession in Spain ; since, by the agreement of the marriage between Ferdinand of Arragon and Isabel of Castile, a special provision was made, that whensoever there was a second son issuing from that marriage, the kingdom of Arragon, and all that belonged to it, should be again separated from Castile. He also pretended that he ought to have had a larger share in the succession of the house of Burgundy ; and that, instead of those rich provinces, he was forced to accept of Austria, and the provinces about it, which lay exposed to the Turks, and were loaded with great debts, contracted by his grandfather Maximilian. To this the king sent an answer secretly, and ordered the person (who he does not appear, but I think it was Mount,) that carried it to insist on the discourse of his pretensions to the Netherlands, which were then vastly rich. He was particularly required to observe Ferdinand's behaviour, and all that he said on that subject : and it seems that our court, being then in a good understanding with the court of France, communicated the matter to Francis ; for he wrote, soon after that, a letter to Ferdinand, encouraging him to stand on his claim, and promising him his assistance to support his pretensions on the emperor. But Ferdinand, not being inclined to trust the court of France with this secret, sent the letter to the emperor. So I see no more of that matter.

The last transaction of importance in this reign was the fall of the duke of Norfolk, and the Duke of the earl of Surrey, his son. I find in the council-book, in the year 1543, that Norfolk's imprisonment. the earl was accused for eating flesh in Lent without licence, and for walking about the streets in the night, throwing stones against windows, for which he was sent to the Fleet. In another letter, he is complained of for riotous living. Towards the end of the year 1546, both he and his father were put in prison : and, it seems, the council wrote to all the king's ambassadors beyond sea an account of this, much aggravated, as the discovery of some very dangerous conspiracy, which they were to represent to those princes in very black characters. I put in the Collection an account, given by Col.Num.74. Thirleby, of what he did upon it. The letter is long ; but I only copy out that which relates to this pretended discovery, dated from Hailbron, on Christmas-day, 1546.

“ He understood, by the council's letters to him, what ungracious and ingrateful persons they were found to be. He professes he ever loved the father, for he thought him a true servant to the king. He says, he was amazed at the matter, and did not know what to say. God had not only on this occasion, but on many others, put a stop to treasonable designs against the king, who (next to God) was the chief comfort of all good men. He enlarges much on the subject, in the style of a true courtier. The messenger brought him the council's letters, written on the 15th of December, on Christmas-Eve ; in which he saw the malicious purpose of these two ungracious men. So, according to his orders, he went immediately to demand audience of the emperor ; but the emperor intended to repose himself for three or four days, and so had refused audience to the nuncio, and to all other ambassadors; but he said he would send a secretary, to whom he might communicate his business. Joyce, his secretary, coming to him, he set forth the matter as pompously as the council had represented it to him. In particular, he spoke of the haughtiness of the earl of Surrey, of all which the secretary promised to make report to the emperor, and likewise to write an account of it to Grandville. Thirlby excuses himself, that he durst not write of this matter to the king: he thought it would renew in him the memory of the ingratitude of these persons, which must wound a noble heart."

After so black a representation, great matters might be expected; but I have met with an original letter of the duke of Norfolk's, to the lords of the council, writ indeed in Col.Num.75. His Letter to the King. so bad a hand that the reading it was almost as hard as deciphering; it gives a very different account of that matter, at least with relation to the father. He writes, "that the lord great chamberlain and the secretary of state had examined him upon divers particulars. The first was, whether he had a cipher with any man. He said, he had never a cipher with any man but such as he had for the king's affairs when he was in his service; and he does not remember that ever he wrote in cipher, except, when he was in France, with the lord great master that now is, and the lord Rochford; nor does he remember whether he wrote any letters then or not, but these two lords signed whatsoever he wrote. He heard that a letter of his was found among bishop Fox's papers, which, being shown to the bishop of Durham, he advised to throw it into the fire. He was examined upon this: he did remember the matter of it was the setting forth the talk of the northern people, after the time of the commotions; but that it was against Cromwell, and not at all against the king (so far did they go back to find matter to be laid to his charge); but whether that was in cipher or not, he did not remember. He was next asked, if any person had said to him, that if the king, the emperor, and the French king came to a good peace, whether the bishop of Rome would break that by his dispensation; and whether he inclined that way. He did not remember he had ever heard any man speak to that purpose; but, for his own part, if he had twenty lives, he would rather spend them all than that the bishop of Rome should have any power in this kingdom again. He had read much history, and knew well how his usurpation began and increased; and both to English, French, and Scots he had upon all occasions spoken vehemently against it. He was also asked, if he knew anything of a letter from Gardiner and Knevet, the king's ambassadors at the emperor's court, of a motion made to them for a reconciliation with that bishop, which was brought to the king at Dover, he being then there.

"In answer to this, he writes, he had never been with the king at Dover since the duke of Richmond died: but for any such overture he had never heard anything of it, nor did any person ever mention it to him. It had been said in council, when sir Francis Bryan was like to have died, as a thing reported by him, that the bishop of Winchester had said he could devise a way to set all things right between the king and the bishop of Rome. Upon which, as he remembers, sir Ralph Sadler was sent to sir Francis to ask the truth of that; but sir Francis denied it; and this was all that ever he heard of any such overture." It seems these were all the questions that were put to him; to which those were his answers. He therefore prayed the lords to intercede with the king that his accusers might be brought face to face, to say what they had against him; and he did not doubt but it should appear he was falsely accused. He desired to have no more favour than Cromwell had, he himself being present when Cromwell was examined. He adds, Cromwell was a false man; but he was a true, poor gentleman. He did believe some false man had laid some great thing to his charge. He desired, if he might not see his accusers, that he might at least know what the matters were; and if he did not answer truly to every point, he desired not to live an hour longer.

"He had always been pursued by great enemies about the king; so that his fidelity was tried like gold. If he knew wherein he had offended, he would freely confess it. On Tuesday, in the last Whitsun-week, he moved the king that a marriage might be made between his daughter (the duchess of Richmond) and sir Thomas Seymour; and that his son Surrey's children might, by cross-marriages, be allied to my lord great chamberlain's children (the earl of Hertford). He appealed to the king, whether his intention in these motions did not appear to be honest. He next reckons up his enemies : cardinal Wolsey confessed to him, at Asher, that he had studied for fourteen years how to destroy him, set on to it by the duke of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, and the lord Sandys, who often told him, that if he did not put him out of the way he would undo him. When the marquis of Exeter suffered, Cromwell examined his wife more strictly concerning him than all other men, of which she sent him word by her brother, the lord Mountjoy. And Cromwell had often said to himself, that he was a happy man that his wife knew nothing against him, otherwise she would undo him. The late duke of Buckingham, at the bar, where his father sate lord high steward, said, that he himself was the person in the world whom he had hated most, thinking he had done him ill offices with the king ; but he said he then saw the contrary. Rice, that married his sister, often said, he wished he could find the means to thrust his dagger in him. It was well known to many ladies in the court how much both his two nieces, whom it pleased the king to marry, had hated him. He had discovered to the king that for which his mother-in-law was attainted of misprision of treason. He had always served the king faithfully, but had of late received greater favours of him than in times past ; what could therefore move him to be now false to him ? ‘ A poor man as I am, yet I am his own near kinsman. Alas, alas ! my lords (writes he), that ever it should be thought any untruth to be in me ! ’ He prays them to lay this before the king, and jointly to beseech him to grant the desires contained in it. So he ends it with such submissions as he hoped might mollify the king.”

Here I must add a small correction, because I promised it to the late sir Robert Southwell, for whose great worth and virtues I had that esteem which he well deserved. Sir Richard Southwell was concerned in the evidence against the duke of Norfolk. He gave me a memorandum, which I promised to remember when I reviewed my History. There were two brothers, sir Richard and sir Robert, who were often confounded, an R serving for both their christened names. Sir Richard was a privy-councillor to Henry VIII., king Edward, and queen Mary : the second brother, sir Robert, was master of the rolls in the time of Henry VIII. and in the beginning of Edward VI. I had confounded these, and in two several places called sir Richard master of the rolls.

I have now set forth all that I find concerning the duke of Norfolk ; by which it appears that he was designed to be destroyed only upon suspicion, and his enemies were put on running far back to old stories to find some colours to justify so black a prosecution. This was the last act of the king’s reign, which, happily for the old duke, was not finished when the king’s death prevented the execution.

Thus I have gone over all those passages in this reign that have fallen in my way since I wrote my History. I have so carefully avoided repeating anything that was in my former work, that I have, perhaps, not made it clear enough into what parts of it everything here related ought to be taken in. Nor have I put in my Collection any of those papers that either the lord Herbert or Mr. Strype had published, one or two only excepted in each of them ; but these I put in it, both because I copied them from the originals when I did not reflect on their being published by those writers, and because they seemed of great importance to the parts of my History to which they belonged. Some of these being very short, and the others not long, I thought the inserting them made my Collection more complete. I would not lessen the value of books, to which I have been too much beholden, to make so ill a return ; to the last especially, from whose works I have taken that which seemed necessary to make the History as full as might be, but refer my reader to such vouchers as he will find in them.

And now, having ended what I have to say of king Henry, I will add a few reflections on him, and on his reign. He had certainly a great measure of knowledge in learning, more particularly in divinity, than most princes of that or of any age, that gave occasion to those excessive flatteries which, in a great measure, corrupted his temper and disfigured his whole government. It is deeply rooted in the nature of man to love to be flattered, because self-love makes men their own flatterers ; and so they do too easily take down the flatteries that are offered them by others, who, when they expect advantages by it, are too ready to give this incense to their vanity, according to the returns that they expect from it.

His Mind corrupted by a course of Flattery.

Few are so honest and disinterested in their friendship as to consider the real good of others, but choose rather to comply with their humour and vanity. And since princes have most to give, flattery (too common to all places) is the natural growth of courts; in which, if there are some few so unfashioned to those places as to seek the real good and honour of the prince by the plain methods of blunt honesty, which may carry them to contradict a mistaken prince, to show him his errors, and, with a true firmness of courage, to try to work even against the grain; while they pursue that, which, though it is the real advantage and honour of the prince, yet it is not agreeable to some weak or perverse humour in him; these are soon overtopped by a multitude of flatterers, who will find it an easy work to undermine such faithful ministers, because their own candour and fidelity makes them use none of the arts of a countermine. Thus the flattered prince easily goes into the hands of those who humour and please him most, without regarding either the true honour of the master or the good of the community.

If weak princes, of a small measure of knowledge and a low capacity, fall into such hands, the government will dwindle into an unactive languishing, which will make them The Course of all Courts. a prey to all about them, and expose them to universal contempt both at home and abroad; while the flatterers make their own advantages the chief measure of the government, and do so besiege the abused and deluded prince, that he fancies he is the wonder and delight of all the world, when he is under the last degrees of the scorn of the worst, and of the pity of the best, of his people.

But if these flatterers gain the ascendant over princes of genius and capacity, they put them on great designs under the false representations of conquests and glory. They engage them either to make or break leagues at pleasure; to enter upon hostilities without any previous steps or declarations of war; to ruin their own people for supporting those wars that are carried on with all the methods both of barbarity and perfidy; while a studied luxury and vanity at home is kept up to amuse and blind the ignorant beholders with a false show of lustre and magnificence.

This had too deep a root in king Henry, and was too long flattered by cardinal Wolsey, Wolsey began it, but was a wise Minister. to be ever afterwards brought into due bounds and just measures; yet Wolsey pursued the true maxims of England, of maintaining the balance during his ministry. Our trade lay then so entirely in the Netherlands, without our seeming to think of carrying it further, that it was necessary to maintain a good correspondence with those provinces; and Charles's dominions were so widely scattered, that, till Francis was taken prisoner, it was visibly the interest of England to continue still jealous of France, and to favour Charles: but the taking of Francis I. changed the scene; France was then to be supported. It was also so exhausted, and Charles's revenue was so increased, that, without great sums both lent him and expended by England, all must have sunk under Charles's power if England had not held the balance.

It was also a masterpiece in Wolsey to engage the king to own that the book against A great Occasion of Flattery given by his Book. Luther was written by him, in which the secret of those who, no doubt, had the greatest share in composing it was so closely laid, that it never broke out. Seckendorf tells us, that Luther believed it was writ by Lee, who was a zealous Thomist, and had been engaged in disputes with Erasmus, and was afterwards made archbishop of York. If any of those who still adhered to the old doctrines had been concerned in writing it, probably, when they saw king Henry depart from so many points treated of in it, they would have gone beyond sea, and have robbed him of that false honour, and those excessive praises which that book had procured him. It is plain More wrote it not; for the king having showed it him before it was published, he (as he mentions in one of his letters to Cromwell) told the king, that he had raised the papacy so high that it might be objected to him if he should happen to have any dispute with the pope, as was often between princes and popes. And it will be found in the remarks on the former volumes, that he, in another letter, says he was a sorter of that book: this seems to relate only to the digesting it into method and order.

How far king Henry was sincere in pretending scruples of conscience with relation to his first marriage can only be known to God. His suit of divorce was managed at a vast expense, in a course of many years ; in all which time, how strong soever his passion was for Anne Boleyn, yet her being with child so soon after their marriage is a clear evidence that, till then, they had no unlawful commerce. It does not appear that Wolsey deserved his disgrace, unless it was that, by the commission given to the two legates, they were empowered to act conjunctly or severally ; so that though Campeggio refused to concur, he might have given sentence legally ; yet he being trusted by the pope, his acting according to instructions did not deserve so severe a correction. And had any material discovery been made to render Wolsey criminal, it may be reasonably supposed it would have been published.

The new flatterers, falling in with the king's passion, outdid and ruined Wolsey. More was the glory of the age ; and his advancement was the king's honour more than his own, who was a true Christian philosopher. He thought the cause of the king's divorce was just, and as long as it was prosecuted at the court of Rome, so long he favoured it ; but when he saw that a breach with that court was like to follow, he left the great post he was in with a superior greatness of mind. It was a fall great enough to retire from that into a private state of life ; but the carrying matters so far against him as the king did, was one of the justest reproaches of that reign. More's superstition seems indeed contemptible, but the constancy of his mind was truly wonderful.

Cromwell's ministry was in a constant course of flattery and submission ; but by that he did great things, that amaze one who has considered them well. The setting up the king's supremacy instead of the usurpations of the papacy, and the rooting out the monastic state in England, considering the wealth, the numbers, and the zeal of the monks and friars in all the parts of the kingdom, as it was a very bold undertaking, so it was executed with great method, and performed in so short a time, and with so few of the convulsions that might have been expected, that all this shows what a master he was that could bring such a design to be finished in so few years with so little trouble or danger.

But in conclusion, an unfortunate marriage, to which he advised the king, not proving acceptable, and he being unwilling to destroy what he himself had brought about, was, no doubt, backward in the design of breaking it when the king had told him of it. And then, upon no other visible ground but because Anne of Cleves grew more obliging to the king than she was formerly, the king suspected that Cromwell had betrayed his secret, and had engaged her to a softer deportment on design to prevent the divorce, and did upon that disgrace and destroy him.

The duke of Norfolk was never, till Cromwell's fall, the first in favour ; but he had still kept his post by perpetual submission and flattery. He was sacrificed at last to the king's jealousy, fearing that he might be too great in his son's infancy ; and being considered as the head of the popish party, might engage in an uneasy competition with the Seymours during the minority of his son : for the points he was at first examined on were of an old date, of no consequence, and supported by no proof.

When the king first threw off the pope's yoke, the reformers offered him, in their turn, all the flatteries they could decently give. And if they could have had the patience to go no further than as he was willing to parcel out a reformation to them, he had perhaps gone further in it : but he seemed to think, that as it was pretended in popery that infallibility was to go along with the supremacy, therefore those who had yielded the one ought likewise to submit to the other. He turned against them when he saw that their complaisance did not go so far ; and upon that, the adherers to the old opinions returned to their old flatteries, and for some time seemed to have brought him quite back to them, which probably might have wrought more powerfully, but that he found the old leaven of the papacy was still working in them. So that he was all the while fluctuating, sometimes making steps to a reformation, but then returning back to his old notions. One thing probably wrought much on him : it has appeared that he had great apprehensions of the council that was to meet at Trent, and that the emperor's engagements to restrain the council from proceeding in his matter, was the main article of the new friendship made up between them ; and it may be very reasonably supposed that the emperor represented to him that nothing could secure that matter so certainly as his not proceeding to any further innovations in religion ; more particularly his adhering firmly to the received doctrine of Christ's presence in the sacrament, and the other articles set forth by him. This agreeing with his own opinion had, as may be well imagined, no small share in the change of his conduct at that time.

The dexterous application of flattery had generally a powerful effect on him : but whatsoever he was, and how great soever his pride and vanity and his other faults were, he was a great instrument in the hand of Providence for many good ends. He first opened the door to let light in upon the nation : he delivered it from the yoke of blind and implicit obedience : he put the Scriptures in the hands of the people, and took away the terror they were formerly under by the cruelty of the ecclesiastical courts : he declared this church to be an entire and perfect body within itself, with full authority to decree and to regulate all things without any dependence on any foreign power : and he did so unite the supreme headship over this church to the imperial crown of this realm, that it seemed a just consequence that was made by some in a popish reign, that he who would not own that this supremacy was in him did by that renounce the crown, of which that title was made so essential a part that they could no more be separated.

He attacked popery in its strongholds, the monasteries, and destroyed them all ; and thus he opened the way to all that came after, even down to our days. So that while we see the folly and weakness of man in all his personal failings, which were very many and very enormous, we at the same time see both the justice, the wisdom, and the goodness of God, in making him, who was once the pride and glory of popery, become its scourge and destruction ; and in directing his pride and passion so as to bring about, under the dread of his unrelenting temper, a change that a milder reign could not have compassed without great convulsions and much confusion. Above all the rest, we ought to adore the goodness of God in rescuing us by his means from idolatry and superstition ; from the vain and pompous shows in which the worship of God was dressed up, so as to vie with heathenism itself, into a simplicity of believing, and a purity of worship, conform to the nature and attributes of God and the doctrine and example of the Son of God.

May we ever value this as we ought ; and may we, in our tempers and lives, so express the beauty of this holy religion that it may ever shine among us, and may shine out from us to all round about us ; and then we may hope that God will preserve it to us, and to posterity after us for ever.

PART IV.—BOOK IV.

OF WHAT HAPPENED DURING THE REIGN OF KING EDWARD THE SIXTH, FROM THE YEAR 1547 TO THE YEAR 1553.

I HAD such copious materials when I wrote of this king, partly from the original council-book, for the two first years of that reign, but chiefly from the journal writ in that king's own hand, that I shall not be able to offer the reader so many new things in this as I did in the former, and as I may be able to do in the succeeding reign. Some gleanings I have, which I hope will not be unacceptable.

I begin with acknowledging a great error committed in copying out a letter of Luther's, that I found among Bucer's collections. The noble Seckendorf was the first that admonished me of this, but with a modesty suitable to so great a man; without that rancour in which some among ourselves have vented their ill nature against me. I took the sure method to confess my error, and to procure an exact collated copy of that paper from that learned body, to whose library it belongs, which will be found in the Collection. It is an original in Luther's own hand; but it could not have been easily read, if Bucer had not writ out a copy of it, which is bound up in the same volume with the original. It was an instruction that Luther gave to Melancthon, when he went into Hesse, in the year 1534, to meet and treat with Bucer, upon that fatal difference concerning the manner of the Presence in the sacrament. "In which it appears, that Luther was so far from departing from his opinion, that he plainly says, he could not communicate with those of the Zuinglian persuasion; but he would willingly tolerate them, in hope that in time they might come to communicate together. And as for a political agreement, he does not think the diversity of religion ought to hinder that; no more than it was a bar to marriage or commerce, which may be among those of different religions." And now I have, I hope, delivered myself from all the censures to which the wrong publishing of that paper had exposed me.

I should next enter into the historical passages of king Edward's reign; but a great discovery, made with relation to the most important foreign transaction, that happened both in king Henry and king Edward's reign (I mean the council of Trent, the first session of which was in the former reign, and the second in this), has given me an opportunity of acquainting the world with many extraordinary passages relating to it.

There was a large parcel of original letters writ to Grandville, then bishop of Arras, afterwards cardinal, and the chief minister of Charles the emperor, that, when he left the Netherlands, were in the hands of some of his secretaries, and were not carried away by him. About fifty years after that, Mr. William Trumball, then king James the First's envoy at Brussels, grandfather to sir William Trumball (a person eminently distinguished by his learning and zeal for religion, as well as by the embassies and other great employments he has so worthily borne), got these into his hands; no doubt, under the promise of absolute secrecy, during the lives of those who had them: since, if they had been then published, it might have been easily traced from whence they must have come, which would have been fatal to those who had parted with them in a court so bigotted as was that of Albert and Isabella. I have read over the whole series of that worthy gentleman's own letters to king James the First, and saw so much honesty and zeal running through them all, that, it seems, nothing under some sacred tie could have obliged both father and son to keep such a treasure so secret from all the world, especially Padro Paulo's history coming out at that time in London; to which these letters, as far as they went, which is from the 7th of October 1551 to the last of February 1554, would have given an authentic confirmation. I have been trusted by the noble owner with the perusal of them. It is impossible to doubt of their being originals : the subscriptions and seals of most of them are still entire.

These were by sir William deposited in bishop Stillingfleet's hands when he was sent to his foreign employments ; that such use might be made of them, when he found a person that was master of the Spanish tongue, as the importance of the discovery might deserve. Soon after that, my very worthy friend, Dr. Geddes, returned from Lisbon, after he had been above ten years preacher to the English factory there : and since he is lately dead, I hope I shall be forgiven, to take the liberty of saying somewhat concerning him. He was a learned and a wise man. He had a true notion of popery, as a political combination, managed by falsehood and cruelty, to establish a temporal empire in the person of the popes. All his thoughts and studies were chiefly employed in detecting this, of which he has given many useful and curious essays in the treatises he wrote, which are all highly valuable. When bishop Stillingfleet understood that he was master of the Spanish tongue, he put all these papers in his hands. He translated them into English, intending to print the originals in Spanish with them : but none of our printers would undertake that ; they reckoning, that where the vent of the book might be looked for, which must be in Spain and Italy, they were sure it would not be suffered to be sold : he was therefore forced to print the translation in English, without printing the originals.

Since that time, that learned and judicious Frenchman, monsieur Le Vassor, has published a translation of them in French, with many curious reflections : but though he found, that a complete edition of the letters in Spanish was a thing that the booksellers in Holland would not undertake, yet he has helped that all he could, by giving the parts of the letters that were the most critical, and the most important, in Spanish. Both these books are highly valuable. The chief writer of those letters, Vargas, was a man not only very learned, but of a superior genius to most of that age, as appears both by the letters themselves, and by the great posts he went through. He was specially employed by the emperor, both in the session that was held in the former reign, and in that which sat in this reign, to which only these letters do relate. He was the chief of the council that the emperor's ambassadors had, in matters, in which either divinity or canon law (the last being his particular profession) were necessary : and such a value was set on him, that the emperor sent him ambassador to the republic of Venice. And when the last session was held by pope Pius the Fourth, Philip sent him ambassador to Rome, as the person that understood best how to manage that court, with relation to the session of the council.

I think it may give the reader a just idea of that council, both of the fraud and insolence of the legate, and of the method in which matters were carried there, to see some of the more signal passages in those letters, that it may both give him true impressions of what was transacted there, and may move him to have recourse to the letters themselves. “ He sets forth, how much the pope and his ministers dreaded the coming of the protestants to the council : we can plainly perceive that they are not themselves, nor in a condition to treat about any business, when they are brought to touch on that point.—These may, to their mortification, deliver their minds freely against abuses, and some other things.—Whosoever offers anything that is not grateful to the legate, or that doth not suit exactly with some people's prepossessions, he is reported to have spoke ill, and to think worse ; and to have taken what he said out of I do not know whom.—There are several matters which the legate ought to treat with more deliberation than he hath hitherto handled things : I pray God give him grace to understand this.”

In the next letter without date, mention is made of a letter that the emperor wrote to the pope, in which he did “ assure him, that nothing should be done in the council, but that which he had a mind should be done in it ; and that he would oblige the prelates to hold their tongues, and to let things pass without any opposition. The copy of this being showed the ambassador, he was astonished at it : but Vargas said, it was not to be understood literally (in the original it is Judaically) ; it was only writ to bring the pope to grant the bull : but that it was not intended by it that the pope should be suffered to do such things as would bring all to ruin; but only to do such things as are reasonable. He adds in Latin, that the liberty the pope took, was not only a disease and sickness of mind, but was really grown to a fury and a madness." Here the spirit of the promise is set up against the letter; and a strict adhering to words is counted a part of the yoke of Judaism, from which some most Christian princes have thought fit, on many occasions, to emancipate themselves.

In another letter he sets forth the behaviour of the prelates: "the legate never so much as acquaints them with the matter; all things appearing well to them at first sight, and, who knowing nothing of matters until they are just ready to be pronounced, pass them without any more ado.—I am willing to let you know how things are what they carried here, and what the pope's aims are, who seeks to authorise all his own did. pretensions by the council.—There are several other things I am not at all satisfied with, which were carried here with the same slight that pope Paul made use of.—And is not this a blessed beginning of a council!—As to the canons of reformation, they are of so trivial a nature, that several were ashamed to hear them; and had they not been wrapped up in good language together, they would have appeared to the world to be what they are."

In another letter he writes, "I cannot see how either catholics or heretics can be satisfied with what is done here.—All that is done here is done by the way of Rome: for the legate, though it were necessary to save the world from sinking, will not depart one tittle from the orders he receives from thence, nor indeed from anything that he has once himself resolved on."

In another he writes; "As for the legate he goes on still in his old way, consuming of time to the last hour, in disputations and congregations, concerning doctrines, and will at last produce something in a hurry in false colours, that may look plausible: by which means they have no time to read, and much less to understand what they are about.—Words, or persuasions, do signify but very little in this place, and, I suppose, they are not of much greater force at Rome.—By what I can perceive, both God and his majesty are like to be very much dishonoured by what will be done here. And if things should go on thus, and be brought to such an issue as the pope and his ministers aim at and give out, the church will be left in a much worse condition than she was in before.—I pray God the pope may be prevailed on to alter his measures; though I shall reckon it a miracle if he is, and shall thank God for it as such."

In another he writes; "There are not words to express the pride, the disrespect and shamelessness, wherewith the legate proceeds.—The success and end of this synod, if God by a miracle does not prevent it, will be such as I have foretold. I say by a miracle, because it is not to be done by any human means: so that his majesty does but tire himself in vain in negotiating with the pope and his ministers.—The legate has hammered out such an infamous reformation (for it deserves no better epithet), as must make us a jest to the world. The prelates that are here resent it highly; many of them reckoning that they wound their consciences by holding their tongues, and by suffering things to be carried thus."

Upon the point of collating to benefices, he writes, "we ought to put them to show what right the pope has to collate to any benefice whatsoever: I will undertake to demonstrate from the principles and foundations of the law of God and of nature, and of men, and from the ancient usage of the church, and from good policy, that he has no manner of right to it; and all this without doing injury to his dignity, and the plenitude of his power. He advises the leaving those matters to a better time, in which God will purge the sons of Levi: which purgation must come, and that with a severe scourge; it being impossible that a thing so violent and so fraught with abuses, should hold long: the whole nerve of ecclesiastical discipline being broke, and the goods of the church made a perfect trade and merchandise."

Speaking of general councils, he writes: "This which is now sitting here will totally No good to be expected from a Council. deceive the world, so as to convince it, that by reason of the opposition and industry of the popes to engross all to themselves, nothing of reformation is ever to be expected from a general council. I would not have things wherein the pope and his court have such great interest and pretensions, to be decided, or handled here ; since it cannot be done, but to our great prejudice, and to the great detriment of the whole church ; which at present has neither strength nor courage to resist ; and if God do not remedy it, I do not see when it will."

Speaking of exemptions, he writes, "The canonists have made strange work, having made many jests as well as falsehoods, to pass for current truths. When I speak of the exemption of chapters, I speak as a thief of the family, being sensible of the abuses which have been authorised by them in the church. The exemption of chapters ought to have been quite taken away, that so there might be something of order and discipline, and that they who are the head should not be made the feet. It troubles me to see how those matters are managed and determined here ; the legate doing whatever he had a mind to, without either numbering or weighing the opinions of the divines and prelates ; hurrying and reserving the substance of things which ought to have been well weighed and digested, to the last minute : the major part not knowing what they are doing. I mean before the fact ; for believing that Christ will not suffer them to err in their determinations, I shall bow down my head to them, and believe all the matters of faith that shall be decided by them : I pray God everybody else may do the same. The taking no care to reform innumerable abuses, has destroyed so many provinces and kingdoms ; and it is justly to be feared that what is done in this council may endanger the destroying of the rest. I must tell you further, that this council drawing so near an end, is what all people rejoice at here exceedingly ; there being a great many who wish it never had met ; and for my own part, I would to God it had never been called ; for I am mistaken if it do not leave things worse than it found them."

In another of the same date, if there is no error in writing, "He complains that the decree of the doctrine was not finished, till the night before the session : so that many bishops gave their "placet" to what they neither did nor could understand. The divines of Louvaine and Cologne, and some Spanish divines, being much dissatisfied with several of those matters, have publicly declared they were so. This is a very bad business ; and should things of this nature come once to be so public, it must totally ruin the credit of all that has been done, or shall be done hereafter ; and must hinder the council from being ever received, either in Flanders or in Germany. The bishop of Verdun, speaking to the canons of reformation, said, they would be unprofitable and unworthy of the synod, calling it a pretended reformation. The legate fell upon him with very rude language, calling him a boy, an impudent raw man, with many other hard names : nor would he suffer him to speak a word in his own defence, telling him with great heat, he knew how to have him chastised. It is really a matter of amazement to see how things appertaining to God are handled here ; and that there should not be one to contend for him, or any that have the courage to speak in his behalf ; but that we should be all dumb dogs that cannot bark."

In another he writes, "That the legate himself wished that the decrees were corrected as to some particulars : " and in another without date, he tells how "the divines were employed in correcting them." This secret was never heard of before : Father Paul knew nothing of it. A decree after it has passed in council was thus secretly corrected by divines ; so the infallibility was removed from the council, and lodged with the divines.

In another he writes, "It would have been a happy thing that this council had never met, which is no more than what I have often wished and declared, by reason of the many mischiefs it has already done, and is still doing. It is to little purpose, either in this or any following age, to hope for anything of a reformation from a general council, or to see any better order therein than is in this. He supposes the emperor will still continue to solicit the pope that things may not be carried there at such a scandalous rate as they have been hitherto ; and that he will take care that no occasion be given to the council for to disperse itself upon the prelates speaking their mind freely, or denying their consent to such matters as are not convenient ; which is a thing that may very justly be feared."

In another he writes : "This synod must end tumultuously and ingloriously."

Jan. 10. In another he writes, "that it was an astonishing thing that the legate had foisted in several passages into the doctrine of orders, which must of necessity ruin all. By the brutal violences, pretensions, and obstinacy of the legate, things are running into such a state, as must in the end, if I am not mistaken, make both himself and the whole earth to tremble : or if it does not make him tremble, it must be because he is given over to a reprobate sense : as in truth, he seems to be abundantly, in everything that he does."

In another he writes, " All they drive at is to get the pope's pretensions established under the doctrine of order ; and so instead of healing, to destroy and ruin all : those being matters which were never so much as proposed or disputed in the council : neither is it fitting, as things stand here, that they, or anything else of the same nature should be meddled with in this synod."

He enlarges on the authority of bishops being derived from Christ, though subjected to the pope, and he writes, that " upon this bottom only the hierarchy of the church can be established : to settle it on any other is in effect to confound and destroy it. Nevertheless, the pope, if he could carry this point, though all things else were ruined, and whatever was done in the ancient church condemned, would find his own account in it : for after that there would be no possibility of ever having anything redressed." The decree of order on which the legate had set his heart is set down at the end of this letter : the translation of it into English runs thus :—

" This may be called the New Jerusalem, that comes down from heaven : which was by the most exactly regulated policy of the Old Jerusalem, shadowed only as a pattern to represent the heavenly Jerusalem ; for as she had many different orders under one chief governor, so the visible church of Christ has his chief vicar ; for he is the only and supreme head on earth, by whose dispensation offices are distributed so to all the other members that in the several orders and stations in which they are placed, they may execute their functions to the good of the whole church, with the greatest peace and union. A deputation of twenty was named to consider of this. The legate and the two presidents making three of that number, it was severely attacked by the bishop of Guadix.

In his last letter he writes that " the legates would one way or other bring about the dissolution of the synod : which will be certainly done, if they can but get the said clauses determined ; because in them they will have gained all that they desire : and after that they will never stand in need of any more councils for to serve their pretensions. And in case they should not be able to carry those points, they will then, to rid themselves of this yoke that is upon their neck, and of the fears they will be under, when they shall find that they are not able to bring the synod to do all the mischief to the church, and to the authority of the present, and all future general councils, that the pope and his ministers would have them do, they will then perplex and confound all."

These are very clear discoveries of the zeal and indignation which possessed this great statesman during this whole session : he shows also the opinion he had of the former session under pope Paul (in which he had likewise assisted), in the directions he gives concerning the government of a council, and of the office of an ambassador, which he drew up before the council was re-assembled, in this its second session, in which these words are :

" In the whole conduct of this council of Trent there does not appear the least footsteps of any of the forementioned essentials of a general council. On the contrary, the most pernicious and effectual methods that can be contrived, have been taken to destroy liberty totally ; and to rob councils of that authority, which in case of great storms used to be the sheet anchor of the church ; by which means they have cut off all hope of ever having any abuses that infest the church redressed, to the great disparagement of all past, as well as future councils ; from which no good is ever to be expected.

" The conduct of this council has been of pernicious consequence, in which, under the title of directing it, the pope's legates have so managed matters, that nothing but what they have a mind to can be proposed, discussed, or defined therein ; and that, too, after such a manner as they would have it. All the liberty that is here being only imaginary, so that their naming it is nothing but cheat and banter—which is so notorious, that several of the prelates, even among the pope's pensioners, have not the face to deny it. The clause that they have inserted into the canons of reformation, which is, 'saving in all things the authority of the apostolical see,' is telling the world in plain terms, that what the pope does not like shall signify nothing. He writes of certain methods that the legates have used in negotiating with people to change their minds: this they have done so often, that it is now taken notice of by everybody: neither can there be any course more pernicious or destructive of the liberty of the council. The legates many times when they proposed a thing, declared their opinion of it first. Nay, in the middle of voting, when they observed any prelate not to vote as they would have him, they have taken upon themselves to speak to it, before another was suffered to vote, doing it sometimes with soft words, and at other times with harsher; letting others to understand thereby how they would have them vote. Many times railing at the prelates, and exposing them to scorn, and using such methods as would make one's heart bleed to hear of, much more to see.

"The common method was; the legates assembled the prelates in a general congregation, the night before the session was to be held. Then they read the decrees to them, as they and their friends had been pleased to form them. By which means, and by their not being understood by a great many prelates, some not having the courage to speak their minds, and others being quite tired out with the length of the congregation, the decrees were passed. We, who saw and observed all these doings, cannot but lament both our own condition and the lost authority of councils.

"He shows, the legate's drift was to canonize all the abuses of the court of Rome: so they never suffered them to be treated of freely, but managed them like the compounding of a law-suit: in all which courses, it is certain, the Holy Ghost did not assist. They strived still to authorize abuses; and giving the world to understand that the pope is gracious in granting them anything, as if all were his own. Taking abuses, though never so pernicious, and splitting them as they thought good: by which artifice, that part of the abuse which was approved of by the synod, becomes perpetual; and for the part that was reprobated, they will, according to their custom, find ways to defeat its condemnation.

"There is nothing that can be so much as put to the vote, without the consent of the legates: who notwithstanding that they are (by reason of the great number of pensioners, which the pope has here) always sure of a majority, do nevertheless make use of strange tricks, in their conduct of the council. Besides, by having made their own creatures the secretaries, notaries, and all the other officers of the council, they have made it thereby a body, without anything of soul or strength in it: whereas, all those officers ought to have been appointed by the council, and especially the notaries.

"This is the course that has been hitherto taken in the council of Trent, which is employed rather in struggling with the pope and his legates, who seek to engross all to themselves, than in reforming and remedying the evils under which the church groans. I pray God it do not increase them, by the course it takes, by artifice and dissimulation, to reduce the whole synod to the will of the pope.—It may be truly said, we are in a convention of bishops, but not in a council.—It would have been much better not to have celebrated a council at this time, but to have waited till God had put the christian commonwealth in a better disposition;—rather than to have celebrated one after this manner, with so little fruit, to the great sorrow of catholics, the scorn of heretics, and the prejudice of the present, and of all future councils." So much may serve to show the sense that Vargas had of the first, as well as of the second session of the council of Trent.

Malvenda, one of the emperor's divines, that was there, complains in one letter, "that the decrees, but especially the matters of doctrine, were communicated to them very late. So that notwithstanding the substance of these decrees may be found, which it is well if it is, nevertheless considering that they are to correct them upon a bare hearing them read, on the eve of a session, that must in my opinion hinder them from having that authority and majesty, which such matters do use to have. I pray God give them grace to mend this."—He confesses, it was not fit anything should be done without the pope's consent: yet that ought to be managed with all possible secrecy, in order to prevent the Lutherans, if they should come to know it, from reflecting on the liberty of the council, and the freedom that the prelates ought to have; who might safely enjoy more, without having anything pass to the prejudice of his holiness.

In another he writes, “As there will not want those that write of this council, so, for my own part, I pray God it may not do more harm than good, and especially to the Nov. 22. Germans that are here; who seeing how little liberty it enjoys, and how much it is under the dominion of the legate, cannot possibly have that respect and esteem for it, as is convenient.”

There are some letters from the bishop of Oren, written in the same strain. In one he Octob. 12. writes, “That for what concerns a reformation, the emperor must set himself about it in earnest, both with the pope, and the fathers: for if he does it not, we shall have our wounds only skinned over, but shall have the rotten core left, to the corrupting of all quickly again.—The prelates here are all very much troubled, to see with how ill a Nov. 28. grace people that say anything of a reformation, are heard.” In another he writes,

“They discover here little or no inclination, for to do anything that deserves the name of a true reformation. Several things might be done, that would be of great advantage to the people, and would be no prejudice to his holiness, or to his court. May God remedy things! under whom, unless his majesty and your lordship labour very hard, there will be no remedy left for the church.” In a postscript, he tells the same story that Vargas had told, of the legate’s treating the bishop of Verdun so ill, for his calling the reformation offered ‘a pretended reformation’: and he commanded him to be silent, when he was about to say somewhat in his justification. The bishop answered, that at this rate there was no liberty; and having obtained leave of the emperor, by whom he was sent thither, he would be gone. The legate told him, he should not go, but should do what he commanded him.—He writes, that it was “a great reproach to the bishops, from whom the world expected canons of reformation; that in truth they could give them nothing, but what the legate pleases.—It were just with the people, if we do not treat about their interest more in earnest than we have done hitherto, for to stone us, when we return home.”

I have set all this out so copiously, that it may appear, from what those, who were far Reflections from being in any sort favourers of the reformation, who were at Trent, and were upon those let into the secret of affairs, wrote of the council to the emperor’s chief minister, Proceedings. how little, not only of liberty, but even of common decency, there appeared in the whole conduct of that council.

This digression is, I hope, an acceptable entertainment to the reader; and it must entirely free every considering person from a vulgar but weak prejudice, infused into many by practising missionaries, which was objected to myself by a great prince, that no nation ought to have reformed itself, in a separation from the rest of the church: but that there ought to have been a general acquiescing in such things as were commonly received, till by a joint concurrence of other churches the reformation might have been agreed and settled in a general council. These letters do so effectually discover the vanity of this conceit, that at first sight it evidently appears that even those abuses and corruptions that could not be justified; yet could not be effectually reformed at Trent; and that everything was carried there, partly by the artifices of the legates, and partly by the many poor Italian prelates, who were all pensioners of the court of Rome: so that no abuse, how gross or crying soever, could be amended, but as the popes for their own ends thought fit to give it up. This appears so evidently in the letters, out of which I have drawn this abstract, that I hope any prejudice formed upon the prospect of an universal reformation, is by it entirely removed. I turn next to the affairs of England.

The earl of Hertford, advanced to be duke of Somerset, depended much on Paget’s advices. He told him on the day that king Henry died, that he desired his friendship; and promised to him, that he would have a great regard to his advice. But though Paget put him oft in mind of this, he forgot it too soon. His great success in his first expedition to Scotland was a particular happiness to him, and might have established him; but his quarrelling so soon with his brother was fatal to them both.

Thirlby was still ambassador at the emperor's court : he studied to make his court to the protector, and wrote him a very hearty congratulation upon his exaltation ; and Thirlby writes of the Interim. added, that the bishop of Arras seemed likewise to rejoice at it. At the same time, he warned him of the designs of the French against England. He gave him a long account of the Interim, in which he writes, that Malvenda had secretly a great hand : he himself seems to approve of it ; and says, that it was as high an act of supremacy, as any in all king Henry's reign ; for by it, not only many of the doctrines of popery had mollifying senses put on them, different from what was commonly received ; but the sacrament was allowed to be given in both kinds, and the married priests were suffered to officiate. It is true, all was softened by this, that it was only a prudent connivance in the Interim, till the council should be reassembled, to bring all matters to a final settlement.

The protector either mistrusted Thirlby, or he called him home, to assist Cranmer in carrying on the reformation. He sent sir Philip Hobby in his stead. He was Hobby sent Ambassador to the Emperor. a man marked in king Henry's time, as a favourer of the preachers of the new learning, as they were then called. There was one parson, a clerk, known to have evil opinions (so it is entered in a part of the council-book, for the year 1543,) touching the Sacrament of the Altar, who was maintained by Weldon, one of the masters of the household, and by Hobby, then a gentleman-usher ; for which they were both sent to the Fleet ; but they were soon after discharged.

Hobby was therefore sent over ambassador, as a person on whose advices the government here might depend, with relation to the affairs of Germany. I have seen a volume of the letters, writ to him by the protector and council, with copies of the answers that he wrote.

His first dispatch mentioned a particular dispute between the emperor and his confessor. The Emperor's Confessor refused him Absolution for not persecuting Heretics. The confessor refused to give him absolution, unless he would recal the decree of the Interim, and, instead of favouring heresy, would with the sword extirpate heretics. The emperor said, he was satisfied with what he had done in the matter of the Interim, and that he would do no more against the Lutherans : if the fryar would not give him absolution, others would be found who would do it. So the fryar left him.

At that time, a proposition of a marriage for the lady Mary was made by the emperor, who seemed to apprehend that she was not safe in England. It was with the brother of the king of Portugal. He was called at first the prince of Portugal ; and it was then hearkned to : but when the council understood he was the king's brother, they did not think fit to entertain it. And in the same letter, mention is made of Geoffrey Poole, who was then beyond sea, and desired a pardon : the council wrote, that he was included in the last act of pardon ; yet since he desired it, they offer him a special pardon. This letter is signed T. Cant., Wiltshire, Northampton, Wentworth, T. Ely, T. Cheyne, A. Wyngfield, Herbert, N. Walton, J. Gage.

The next dispatch to him has a particular account of two persons, whom the king of France had corrupted to betray one of their forts to him. The king of France had said to their ambassador, "par la foy de gentilhomme," by the faith of a gentleman, The Perfidy of the French King. he would make no war, without giving warning first. This he promised on the 20th of July ; yet hearing of the commotions that were in England, he began hostilities against Boulogne within three or four days after. This is signed E. Somerset, T. Cant., R. Ryeche, Can., W. St. Johns, W. Paget, W. Petre, J. Smith, E. Watton. So long ago did it appear that the bonâ fides of that court was not a thing to be much relied on. I would have printed these letters, if they were in my power : but having had the originals in my hands about 30 years ago, I did not then copy them out, but contented myself with taking extracts out of them, to which I shall upon other occasions have recourse.

As for the progress in the reformation at home, Cranmer was delivered from too deep a The Progress of the Reformation. subjection, in which he had lived to king Henry. The load of great obligations is a weight on a generous mind : the hope he had of gaining on the king, to carry him to a further reformation, did, no doubt, carry him too far in his compliances to him. He did, perhaps, satisfy himself, as I have reason to believe many in the Roman communion do, to this day, that he did not in his mind, or with his thoughts, go along in those devotions, that they cannot but think unlawful; but what, through a fearfulness of temper, or an ill-managed modesty, they do not depart from established practices, even though they think them unlawful. The compliances that we find in the apostles, particularly in St. Paul himself, the apostle of the Gentiles, in order to the gaining the Jews, might all meet together, to carry him too far in his submissions to king Henry. This can neither be denied, nor justified; but the censures passed on it may be much softened, when all these things are laid together. Now he was delivered from that servitude, so he resolved to set about a further reformation, with much zeal, though perhaps still with too great caution. He studied if it was possible to gain upon Gardiner. He had reason to believe from his forwardness in complying with king Henry, that he had no great scrupulosity in his own thoughts: so he tried to draw him to assist, at least not to oppose the steps that were to be made; and judging that it was necessary to give the people due instruction, to carry them to a further measure of knowledge, he set about the preparing a book of Homilies to be read in churches: and to give some more light into the meaning of the New Testament, he chose Erasmus's paraphrase as the most unexceptionable book that could be thought on; since he had been so much favoured in England; and as he had written against Luther, so he lived and died in the Roman communion.

Cranmer communicated his designs, with the draught of the Homilies to Gardiner: but he was resolved to set himself at the head of the popish party. He had no doubt great resentments, because he was left out of the council, which he imputed to the Seymours: Cranmer tried if the offer of bringing him to sit at that board could overcome these; yet all was in vain. He insisted at first on this, that during the king's minority, it was fit to keep all things quiet, and not to endanger the public peace by venturing on new changes: he pressed the archbishop with the only thing that he could not well answer; which was, that he had concurred in setting forth the late king's book of a necessary doctrine. Gardiner wrote that he was confident Cranmer was a better man than to do any such thing against his conscience upon any king's account; and if his conscience agreed to that book, which he himself had so recommended, he wished things might be left to rest there. Cranmer pressed him again and again in this matter, but he was intractable. In particular, he excepted to the homily of Justification, which was thought to be of Cranmer's own composing: because justification was ascribed to faith only, in which he thought charity had likewise its influence; and that without it faith was dead, and a dead thing could not be the cause of justification. But the archbishop showed him his design in that was only to set forth the freedom of God's mercy, which we relying on, had by that, the application of it to ourselves; not meaning that justifying faith was ever without charity; for even faith did not justify as a meritorious condition, but only as it was an instrument applying God's mercy to sinners. Upon this there was perhaps too much of subtilty on both sides. As for Erasmus's Paraphrase, Gardiner excepted to it as being in many things contrary to the Homilies: so he thought since they agreed so little together, they ought not to be joined and recommended by the same injunctions: to this it was said that the Paraphrase was a good and useful book, though, in some particulars, the Homilies differed from it.

But as they had the perverseness of the popish party to deal with, so it was not easy to restrain their own side. Those whose heat could not be well managed were apt to break out into great disorders; some insulting the priests as they were officiating, others talking irreverently of the sacrament; some defining the manner of the presence, and others asserting the impossibility of it, as it was explained. These disorders gave occasion to two proclamations this year; the first was on the 12th of November, against insolence towards priests, such as the reviling them, tossing them, and taking their caps and tippets violently from them: the other was on the 27th of December against irreverent talkers of the sacrament, and against those who in their sermons went to define the manner, the nature and fashion, and the possibility or impossibility of the presence. The visitors went about with their injunctions. They are registered in the books of the dean and chapter of York, where the visitation was held in September. It came not to Winchester till October, for the monition concerning it was made on the 7th of October. Whether the slowness of the visitors coming thither was occasioned by any secret practice with Gardiner, and upon the hopes of gaining him or not, I cannot tell. He it seems had before that refused to receive or obey the injunctions, for which he was put in the Fleet: and when he wrote his letter to the protector, complaining of the proceedings against him, he had been then seven weeks there.

I can say nothing new of the parliament that sate this year. When the convocation was opened on the 5th of November, the archbishop told them that it was with the king and the lords' consent that the prelates and clergy should consult together about settling the Christian religion right, and delivering it to the people. He sent them to choose their prolocutor, and to present him the Friday following. It is set down in the minutes, that the lower house consulted how they might be joined to the lower house of parliament, and about the reformation of the ecclesiastical laws. On the 9th of December some were appointed to know if the archbishop had obtained licence (in the minutes called indemnity or immunity) for them to treat of matters of religion. In the fifth session, on the last of November, the prolocutor exhibited an order given him by the archbishop for receiving the communion in both kinds, to which in the next session they agreed, no man speaking against it. Sixty-four agreed to this; Polydore Virgil and Weston being two of them. And in the eighth session, on the 17th of December, a proposition was offered to them in these words:—"That all such canons, laws, statutes, decrees, usages, and customs, heretofore made or used, that forbid any person to contract matrimony, or condemn matrimony already contracted by any person, for any vow or promise of priesthood, chastity or widowhood, shall from henceforth cease, be utterly void, and of none effect." Here it was that Redman's opinion was read, which I had in my History put as read the following year. This proposition went to all monastic vows, as well as to the marriage of priests. The proposition was subscribed by fifty-three who were for the affirmative, only twenty-two were for the negative: after which a committee was named to draw the form of an act for the marriage of priests. But all that is in the often-cited minutes as to this matter is,—“Item, propounded for the marriage of priests;” and to it is added, “and that the ecclesiastical laws should be promulgated;” there is no more in the minutes of the convocations during this reign.

Strype adds to this a particular remark out of the defence of the priests' marriage, that divers of those who were for the affirmative did never marry: and that some of those who were for the negative, yet did afterwards marry. Cranmer went on gathering authorities out of Scripture and the fathers against unwritten traditions: he wrote a book on this subject in Latin; but in queen Mary's time it was translated into English, and published by an English exile beyond sea. He took a special care to furnish Canterbury Labours and Zeal. with good preachers: but though their labours were not quite without success, yet superstition had too deep a root there to be easily subdued; and in the universities, the old doctrines were so obstinately persisted in, that when some in Cambridge offered to examine the mass by the Scriptures and the fathers, and to have a disputation upon it, the vice-chancellor did forbid it. The archbishop had procured a confirmation of their privileges of Cambridge at least, for Strype only mentions that: the mildness he expressed towards all who opposed him, even with insolence, was remarkable: when one who thought he carried this too far, told him that if ever it came to the turn of his enemies, they would show him no such favour; he answered, “Well, if God so provide, we must abide it.”

I did in the account of the arguments against transubstantiation, mention a letter of St. Chrysostom's to Cesarius, of which Peter Martyr brought over a copy in Latin to England. Since that time the popish clergy were sensible, that by that letter it appeared plainly that St. Chrysostom did believe that the substance of bread and wine remained still in the sacrament, as the human nature remained in the person of Christ: so that by this, all the other high figures used by that father must be understood so as to reconcile them to this letter; therefore they have used all possible endeavours to suppress it. When the learned bigot had brought a copy of it from Florence to France, and printed it with other things relating to that father, they ordered it to be cut out in such a manner, that in the printed book it appeared that some leaves were cut out; yet one copy of it was brought to the present learned and pious bishop of Lincoln, then chaplain to our ambassador at Paris, who first printed it here in England; as the learned Le Moyné, having another copy sent to him, printed it about the same time in Holland.

I have nothing to add concerning the tumults of the year 1549, but that the popish clergy were generally at the head of the rebels. Many of these were priests that had complied and subscribed the new book; some of them were killed in every skirmish, and very few of the clergy showed much zeal against them: so that the earl of Bedford could have none but Miles Coverdale to go along with the force that he carried into Devonshire to subdue them.

Upon some information, that lady Mary's servants were active in assisting those commotions, the protector and council wrote to her on the 17th; that letter being delivered to her on the 20th of July, she presently wrote an answer, which I had from sir William Cook, and it will be found in the Collection. In it "she expresses her dislike of those revolts. A chaplain of her's in Devonshire had been named, but she writes she had not one chaplain in those parts. Another that was named, lived constantly in her house: she justifies all her servants that had been named; and assured them, that all of her household were true subjects to the king. The council had likewise charged her, that her proceedings in matters of religion had given the rebels great courage: which she wrote, appeared to be untrue, since the rebels in her neighbourhood touched upon no point of religion. She prayed God, that their new alterations and unlawful liberties might not rather be the occasion of such assemblies: as for Devonshire, she had neither lands nor acquaintance in those parts."

In the suppressing these tumults, the protector did visibly espouse the people's interest, and blamed the lords for their inclosures, and the other oppressions that had, as he said, occasioned all those disorders. By this he came to be universally beloved by the people; but trusting to that, he began to take too much upon him; and was so wedded to his own thoughts, that he often opposed the whole council. Upon which Paget wrote him a long letter, in which, as a faithful friend, he set before him his errors; chiefly his wilfulness, and his affecting popularity too much. He desired to be dismissed the council; for while he was there, he was resolved to deliver his opinion according to his reason, and not seek to please another: he had offered him faithful advices, and warned him of the cloud that he saw gathering against him. This he wrote on the 6th of July, some months before it broke out: it seems the protector took this freedom well from him, for he continued firm to him to the last. His brother, the lord Seymour's fall lay heavy on him: though that lord had almost compassed another design of marrying the lady Elizabeth: so I find it in the council's letters to Hobby of the 18th of January 154 $\frac{5}{6}$.

As for the other matter with which he was loaded, the entertaining some German troops, I find among sir Philip Hobby's letters a great many orders and letters signed by the whole council, as well as by the protector, which show that they all concurred in that matter. The true secret of it on both sides was this: the bulk of the people of England was still possessed with the old superstition to such a degree, that it was visible they could not be depended on in any matter that related to the alterations that were made, or were designed to be made: whereas the Germans were full of zeal on the other side; so that they might well be trusted to: and the princes of Germany, who were then kept under by the emperor, so that they neither durst nor could keep their troops at home, but hoped they might at some better time have an occasion to use them, were willing to put them in the hands of the present government of England. Howsoever, this had an odious name put on it, and was called a ruling by strangers: so that it very much shook the duke of Somerset's popularity; for though it could not be denied that all the council had concurred with him in it, yet the load and blame of all was laid on him.

The popish party was very active in procuring the change of measures that followed. The council wrote over to the emperor to let him know that the necessity of their affairs was like to force them to treat for the delivering up of Boulogne to the French ; though this was a secret not yet communicated to the whole privy council.

Bonner's being removed was not much resented, neither at home nor abroad. He was a brutal man ; few either loved or esteemed him ; and Ridley, who came to succeed him, was the most generally esteemed man of all the reformers. One thing that made it more acceptable to those who favoured the Reformation was, the suppressing the bishopric of Westminster, and the removing Thirleby to Norwich, where it was thought he could do less mischief than where he was ; for though he complied as soon as any change was made, yet he secretly opposed everything while it was safe to do it. He had a soft and an insinuating way with him, which, as was thought, prevailed too much even on Cranmer himself : but Gardiner was a dexterous man, and much more esteemed, though as little beloved as Bonner was ; so the falling on him gave a greater alarm to the whole party. He, who was so well known both in the emperor's court and in the French court, sent over tragical accounts of the usage he met with. This was writ over hither by our ambassador at the court of France. Upon which a very severe character of him is given in a letter, signed E. Somerset, T. Cant., R. Rich, C. W. Wiltshire, J. Warwick, J. Bedford, W. Northampton, G. Clinton, W. Petre, W. Cecil. In it they gave an account of the proceedings against him ; and add, " he had showed not only a wilful pride, but a cankered heart, guilty of open and shameful lies ; by which impudent falsehood he showed himself most unworthy to be a bishop, whatsoever strangers may think of him. For religion, he is as far from any piety, or fashion of a good bishop, as a player of a bishop in a comedy is from a good bishop indeed."

Whether the protector designed anything against the constitution of the church, or at least to swallow up the great endowments that were not yet devoured, I cannot tell. But there is an advice in one of Hobby's letters, dexterously enough proposed, that gives reason to suspect this might be on design to broach a business that was to be so cunningly proposed : and Hobby being a confidant of the protector's, he may be supposed to have written as he was directed by him. He wrote it in September 1548. He tells the council, " that the protestants of Germany hoped that the king, seeing that the late wars in Germany happened chiefly by the bishops continuing in their princely and lordly estate, would, for preventing the like, appoint the godly bishops an honest and competent living, sufficient for their maintenance, taking from them the rest of those worldly possessions and dignities, and thereby avoid the vain-glory that letteth them truly and sincerely to do their office, and preach the gospel and word of Christ. On the other side, he wrote, the papists say they doubt not but my lords the bishops, being a great number of stout and well-learned men, will well enough weigh against their adversaries, and maintain still their whole estate ; which coming to pass, they have good hope that, in time, these princely pillars will well enough resist this fury, and bring all things again into the old order."

I have no particulars to add concerning the protector's fall, and the new scene ; but that soon after, when it appeared that the papists were not like to be more favourably dealt with than they were under the duke of Somerset, the bishop of Arras did expostulate upon it with Hobby. He said, they had been assisting to the pulling down of the duke of Somerset, and that hopes of better usage had been given them, yet things went worse with them than before : upon that he fell to rail at Bucer, and said he believed he inflamed matters in England as much as he had done in the empire. For at this time many were forced to come to England for shelter, the chief of whom were Bucer, Fagius, Peter Martyr, and Bernardin Oclinus. All these were entertained by Cranmer till he got good provisions to be made for them in the universities, which were now most violently set against every step that was made towards a reformation. Hobby came over to England, and tried what service he could do to his friend the duke of Somerset ; but the faction was grown too strong to be withstood. Upon his submission, the matter went for some time very high against him and his friends. On the 13th of October, sir Thomas Smith, sir Michael Stanhope, sir John Thynne, and Edward Wolfe, called adherents to the duke of Somerset, and the principal instruments of his ill government, were sent to the Tower ; and on the 14th, he himself was sent thither. No more mention is made of them till the 6th of February, that the duke of Somerset was set at liberty, but bound in a recognizance of ten thousand pounds not to go above four mile from Shene or Sion, nor to come into the king's presence unless he was called for by the king and his council; and when he knew that the king was to come within four miles of these houses, he was to withdraw from them. Yet it seems his enemies were still in some apprehension of him; and probably some messages went between him and his friends in the Tower; for on the 18th of February they were all made close prisoners, and their servants were not suffered to attend upon them. But it seems, upon examination, this was found not to be of a criminal nature; so, on the 22d, they were dismissed upon their recognizances. And upon the 10th of April, the duke of Somerset was again brought to the council-board, being that day sworn of the privy-council.

On the 20th of April, Hobby, being sent back to the emperor's court, had orders to try if the proposition for a marriage of the lady Mary to the prince of Portugal might be again set on foot; and in excuse for its being rejected before, he had orders to say that few of the council had been made acquainted with it. He was desired, therefore, to inquire what that prince's estate was. Whether this flowed from the earl of Warwick's ambitious designs, which might make him wish to have her sent away far out of England, or if it flowed from the uneasiness the council was in by reason of her persisting in the old way of religion, I cannot determine. Hobby had also orders to represent to the emperor that they had hitherto connived at her mass, in hopes that she would by that connivance be moved to conform herself to the laws. Diversity of rites in matters of religion ought not to be suffered: the laws were so strict that no licence could be granted in opposition to them; yet they were resolved to connive a little longer, though she abused the king's favour; for she kept, as it were, an open church, not only for her servants, but for all her neighbours. They therefore wished that the emperor would give her good advice in this matter. The letter was signed by Cranmer, by the earls of Wiltshire and Warwick, the marquis of Northampton, the lord Wentworth, and Paget, Petre, Herbert, Darcy, and Mason. To all this, it seems, the emperor had little regard; for not long after that, the ambassador wrote over, that, by the emperor's command, an order was served on him not to have the English service in his house. The council looked on this as contrary to the privileges of ambassadors by the law of nations; so they ordered that the emperor's ambassador should not have mass in his house, and gave him notice of it. When the emperor knew this, he complained of it as a high violation of the dignity of that character; but the council-books show that they stood firm, and would not recal their order till the emperor recalled his order against the new service in the English ambassador's house. What further proceedings were of either side in this matter, does not appear to me. I find, by the council-books, that the carrying on the Reformation was cordially espoused and pursued at that board.

Gardiner had been long a prisoner; and his being detained in the Tower, no proceedings being had against him, occasioned a great outcry. So, on the 8th of June, 1550, against Gardiner. it was resolved to send some to him, to see if he repented of his former obstinacy, and would apply himself to advance the king's proceedings; upon which the king would receive him into favour, and all past errors should be forgiven. So the duke of Somerset and others were sent to him. They made report, on the 10th of June, that he desired to see the book of the king's proceedings, and then he would make a full answer. He seemed to them, in all things, willing to conform himself to it; promising, that if he found anything in it against his conscience, he would open it to none but to the council. So the book was sent him; and he was allowed the liberty of the gallery and gardens in the Tower when the duke of Norfolk was not in them. On the 13th of June, the lieutenant of the Tower reported that he had given him back the king's book, and that he said he would make no answer to it till he was set at liberty, and that then he would speak his conscience. So the lords who had been with him were appointed to go to him again. The matter rested till the 8th of July.

In an imperfect book of the minutes of the council that I have by me, it is set down that Gardiner did at last subscribe six articles. The two first appear not; the third is, "That the book of Common-Prayer was a godly and christian book, to be allowed and observed by all the king's true subjects. 4th, That the king, in his young and tender age, was a full and entire king ; and that the subjects were bound to obey the statutes, proclamations, and commands set forth in this age, as well as if he were thirty or forty years old. 5th, That the statute of the Six Articles was, for just causes, repealed by the authority of parliament. 6th, That the king and his successors had full authority, in the churches of England and Ireland, to reform and correct errors and abuses, and to alter rites and ceremonies ecclesiastical, as shall seem most convenient for the edification of his people, so that the alteration is not contrary to the Scriptures and the laws of God." To all this he subscribed his name ; but no date is added in those minutes. But it is entered, that he did it in the presence of the council, who also subscribed as witnesses to it. Their names are, E. Somerset, W. Wiltshire, J. Warwick, J. Bedford, W. Northampton, E. Clinton, G. Cobham, W. Paget, W. Herbert, W. Petre, E. North. It was resolved to carry his submissions further ; so twenty new articles were drawn up, in which "the obligation to celibacy, and all the vows made by the monks, all images, relics, and pilgrimages, are condemned. It is affirmed, that the Scriptures ought to be read by all ; that the mass was full of abuse and superstition, and was justly taken away ; that the eucharist ought to be received in both kinds ; that private masses were not agreeable to Scripture ; that the sacrament ought not to be adored ; that the book of Homilies was godly and wholesome ; that the book of Ordaining Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, ought to be received and approved by all ; and that the lesser orders were not necessary. That the Scriptures contained all things necessary to salvation ; and that Erasmus' Paraphrase was, upon good and godly considerations, ordered by the king to be put in all churches."

But to this a preface was added, setting forth, "That whereas he had been suspected as favouring the bishop of Rome's authority, and that he did not approve of the king's proceedings in altering some rites in religion ; upon which he had been brought before the council, and admonished ; and was ordered to preach, declaring himself in those things. But though he promised to do it, he had not done this as he ought to have done. By which he had not only incurred the king's displeasure, but divers of the king's subjects were encouraged by his example (as the king's council was certainly informed) to repine at his majesty's proceedings : for which he was very sorry, and confessed that he had been condignly punished. And he thanked the king for his clemency, treating him not with rigour, but mercy. And that it might appear how little he did repine at his highness' doings, which in religion were most godly, and to the commonwealth most prudent, he did, therefore, of his own will, and without any compulsion, subscribe the following articles." But, on the margin of the minutes, the bishop's answer to this is thus set down : "I cannot in my conscience confess the preface, knowing myself to be of that sort ; I am, indeed, and ever have been——." The rest is torn out. On the 15th of July it is entered, that report was made by those who were sent to him, that he said he had never offended the king ; so he prayed that he might be brought to his trial, in which he asked no mercy, but only justice. When he had passed his trial, and was released, it should then appear what he would do with relation to the Articles ; but it was not reasonable that he should subscribe them while he was yet in prison.

Some of the privy-councillors were sent again to him, and they were ordered to carry with them a divine and a temporal lawyer ; so they took with them Ridley, bishop of London, and Mr. Goodrick : his answer was to the same purpose, and was next council-day reported. Upon which he was brought before the council, and required to subscribe the paper ; but he still refusing to do it, the sentence of sequestration was read, with a denunciation of deprivation, if he did not conform within three months : nevertheless (it is added in the council-book) upon divers good considerations, and especially upon hope that within that time he might be yet reconciled, it was agreed, that the said bishop's house and servants should be maintained in their present estate, until the time that this intimation should expire : and the matter in the mean time was to be kept private. These are all the additional passages taken from the council-book relating to Gardiner.

Those steps, in which the Reformation was advancing but slowly, occasioned great distractions over most parts of the kingdom : while those who adhered to the old practices and doctrines preached severely against all innovations, and others as severely against all to a proclamation on the 24th of April 1550, prohibiting all preaching, except by persons licensed by the king or the archbishop of Canterbury: and the disorders occasioned by men's divorcing their wives, or marrying more wives than one, were likewise ordered to be proceeded against by the same proclamation. On the 9th of August, there came out another proclamation, prohibiting all plays till Allhallowtide: what the reason of this last was does not appear. That against all preaching was much censured. It was represented that by reason of the proclamation against preaching, the people were running into great ignorance and dissoluteness. So letters were ordered to be written to the bishops of Durham and Ely; and eight days after to the bishop of Lincoln and other bishops, to appoint their chaplains and others by their discretion to preach in their dioceses, notwithstanding the proclamation against preaching. There was also an order made in council, that some bishops and other learned men should devise an order for the creation of bishops and priests. I use the words in the council-book. Twelve were appointed to prepare it. Heath, bishop of Worcester, was one of them. It seems there was a digested form already prepared, probably by Cranmer, for that service: for the order was made on the 2nd of February, and on the 28th it was brought to the council, signed by eleven of the number, Heath only refusing to sign it: he said, as it is entered in the council-book, that all that is contained in the book was good and godly; he also said he would obey it; but added that he would not sign it. The matter was respited for some days, and great pains was taken by Cranmer and others to persuade him to sign it; but he still refusing it (as the council-book has it) obstinately, he was on the 4th of March sent to the Fleet. He was in September called again before the council, and required to subscribe the book: and divers learned men argued to persuade him that the book was expedient and allowable: his obstinacy was charged on him, for which they said he had deserved a longer imprisonment; but he might still recover the king's favour if he would subscribe it. He acknowledged he had been very gently used, rather like a son than a subject: he insisted on what he had formerly said, that he would not disobey the order set forth in the book: every one in the council took pains on him, for it seemed a contradiction to say he would obey it, and yet not subscribe it. He was offered more time for conferences. He said he knew he could never be of another mind; adding, that there were other things to which he would not consent, as to take down altars and to set up instead of them tables. The matter ended with a charge given him to subscribe under the pain of deprivation: at this time two entries made in the council-books show the good effects of Latimer's zealous preaching. On the 10th of March he brought in 104*l.* recovered of one who had concealed it from the king; and a little after 363*l.* of the king's money, of which for his attendance in Lent 50*l.* was allowed to him. I find there was in this reign, as in the former, a peculiar seal for ecclesiastical matters, which was in secretary Petre's keeping: many took out licences under this seal for eating meat in Lent; some only for a man and his wife; and some for four, six, or ten, that did eat with them; and some for as many as should come to their house. Licences of another nature, I find, were often taken out for keeping a number of retainers, above what was allowed by the statute.

All endeavours were too weak to overcome the aversion that the people had to the steps that were made towards a reformation. Dr. Cox, the king's almoner and preceptor, was sent to Sussex to preach and instruct the people there, who were much disturbed (as the council-book has it) by the seditious preaching of Day, bishop of Chichester, and others. Day denied this: so an order was made in council, that he should bring in writing that which he had preached. The duke of Somerset reported to the council that Day had been with him, and owned that he had received the order that the council had made for the taking down of altars, and setting tables in their stead; but answered that he could not in conscience obey it. This seemed indeed unaccountable; but he insisted that he could not in conscience obey it, and prayed to be excused: upon that he was summoned to appear before the council, and there, he said, he could not conform himself to their order; for he thought he followed in that both the Scriptures, and the doctors, and fathers of the church; and that he did not perceive any strength in the six reasons given by the bishop of London to justify the change. He quoted a passage in Isaiah, which the archbishop, with the bishop of London, and the rest of the council, thought not at all to the purpose; so he was ordered to confer with the archbishop, and the bishops of Ely and London, and to appear before them on the 4th of December. When he was again before the council, he entered into a dispute with the archbishop and the bishop of Ely. They pressed him to give his reasons for being so positive; he insisted on those words in the Epistle to the Hebrews, "We have an altar:" and though they thought it was clear that by the altar Christ himself was meant, yet that did not satisfy him: they also showed him, from Origen, that the Christians in those days had no altars; he might call the table an altar if he pleased: so the ancient writers did; but all this had no effect on him. A few more days were given him to consider of the matter: he positively answered he could not obey their order with a good conscience; and rather than do it, he was resolved to suffer the loss of all he had. Two days more were given him, but he was still firm. So on the 11th of December, 1550, he was sent to the Fleet. Further proceedings against him were stopped for many months; in which time it is said that the king himself wrote to him; but all was in vain. So in September, 1551, a commission was given to judge him; and on the 14th of October, it seems, both Heath and he were deprived: for then an order passed in council for seizing the temporalities of both their bishoprics. Letters were written in June 1552 concerning them to the bishops of Ely and London; the former was to receive Day, and the latter Heath, and to use them as in Christian charity should be most seemly. It seems that both Heath and Day saw the change of doctrine that was preparing with relation to the sacrament: so they were willing to lay hold on the first colour to break off from any further compliances; for the points they stood upon did not seem of such importance as to suffer deprivation and imprisonment for them.

There was at that time a very scandalous venality of all offices and employments, which was so much talked of at the court of France, that the ambassador whom the king had there wrote over an account of it; and it was said that whereas king Henry had by his endowments made some restitution, yet for all the wealth they had seized on in chantries and collegiate churches, no schools nor hospitals were yet endowed. Here a very memorable passage in Ridley's life deserves to be remembered: he wrote to Cheke, that he, being to give Grindal a prebend in St. Paul's, had received a letter from the council to stop collation, for the king was to keep that prebend for the furniture of his stable. "Alas! sir (he writes), this is a heavy hearing. Is this the fruit of the gospel? Speak, Mr. Cheke, speak for God's sake, in God's cause, unto whomsoever you think you may do any good withal: and if you will not speak, then I beseech you let this my letter speak." There was nothing that opened all men's mouths, more than a complaint entered in the council-book, made by one Norman against the archbishop of York, that he took his wife and kept her from him. The council gave such credit to this, that as a letter was written to that archbishop not to come to parliament, so they ordered a letter to be written to sir Thomas Gargrave and Mr. Chaloner to examine the matter. What they did, or what report they made, does not appear to me. Holgate, during all the time he was archbishop of York, was more set on enriching himself than on anything else. He seemed heartily to concur in the Reformation, but he was looked on as a reproach to it, rather than a promoter of it. This might have a share in the censure that, as was reported, king Edward passed on the bishops in that time, "Some for sloth, some for ignorance, some for luxury, and some for popery, are unfit for discipline and government." At this time the anabaptists were again inquired after, and a commission was granted to Cranmer, Thirleby, Cox, and sir Thomas Smith, to inquire after them, and to judge them.

Now Gardiner's business was brought to a conclusion. On the 23rd of November, a committee of the council was appointed to consider how to proceed further against him: on the 14th of December an order was sent to the lieutenant of the Tower to carry him to Lambeth on the 16th, and after that as often as they required him. The commission to try him was directed to Cranmer and others: he desired council; it was granted; and his lawyers had free access to him. On the 19th of January his servants moved in council, that some of that board might be sworn as his witnesses:

they said they would answer upon their honour, but would not be sworn : and on the 15th of February, the last mention made of him in the council-book is in these words : “ For as much as the bishop had at all times, before the judges of his cause, used himself unreverently to the king’s majesty, and very slanderously towards his council, and especially yesterday being the day of the judgment given against him, he called the judges heretics and sacramentaries ; these being there as the king’s commissioners, and of his highness’s council ; it was ordered that he should be removed from his present lodging into a meaner one in the Tower, and have but one servant to wait on him ; that his books and papers should be taken from him, and that from henceforth he should have neither pen, ink, nor paper given him, but be sequestered from all conference, and from all means that may serve him to practise any ways.” Here was severity upon severity, which as it raised him to be depended on as the head of the popish party, so it must have recommended him to the compassions of all equitable people.

Whether these hard orders were rigorously executed or not, does not appear to me. I find in a letter of Hooper’s to Bullinger one circumstance relating to Gardiner. It is without date. In it, as he tells him that Crome did with zeal oppose their doctrine concerning the sacrament, but commends him as a person of great learning, and a man of a most holy life ; he tells him also, that Gardiner had a month before sent him a challenge to a public disputation upon that head ; promising, that if he did not clearly carry away the victory, he would submit himself to the laws, and would willingly suffer the cruellest hardships. Hooper accepted the challenge, and a day was set for them to dispute : but when the day came near, Gardiner said he must be first set at liberty : so all this show of a readiness to maintain the old doctrine vanished to nothing. Concerning the king, Hooper writes in that same letter, that these thousand years, there had not been any person of his age who had such a mixture both of piety and learning, with so true a judgment, as appeared in him. If he lived, and went on suitably to these beginnings, he would be the wonder and the terror of the world. He took notes of all the sermons he heard ; and after dinner he asked the young persons that were bred up with him an account of what they remembered of the sermon, and went over the whole matter with them. He wrote further in this letter, that then they were every day expecting that the duke of Somerset should be again called to sit in the council.

Poinet, bishop of Rochester, was translated to Winchester, being nominated to it the 8th of March : and on the 5th of April, he took his oath of homage. While he was bishop of Rochester, he had no house to live in, so he kept his benefice in London. But it is entered in the council-book, that no bishop after him was to have any benefice besides his bishopric.

A new scene of contention was at this time very unhappily opened. Hooper, a zealous, a pious, and a learned man, had gone out of England in the latter years of king Henry’s reign, and had lived at Zurich, at a time when all Germany was in a flame on the account of the Interim. Upon that a great question arose among the Germans concerning the use of things in themselves indifferent. For a great part of the design of the Interim was to keep up the exterior face of things as it had been in popery, with the softenings of some other senses put on them. It was said, “ if things were indifferent in themselves, it was lawful, and that it became the subject’s duty to obey them when commanded.” Many thought that Melancthon himself went in that matter too far. It was visible the design in it was to make the people think the difference was not great between that and popery : so the rites were ordered to be kept up on purpose to make it easy to draw the people over to popery. Out of this another question arose, “ Whether it was lawful to obey in indifferent things, when it was certain they were enjoined with an ill design ?” Some said the designs of legislators were not to be inquired into nor judged ; and whatever they were, the subjects were still bound to obey. This created a vast distraction in Germany, while some obeyed the Interim, but many more were firm to their principles, and were turned out of all for their disobedience. Those who submitted were, for the most part, Lutherans, and carried the name of Adiaphorists, from the Greek word that signifies, things indifferent. The reformed were generally firmer. Those of Switzerland, particularly at Zurich, had at this time great apprehensions of a design of introducing popery, by keeping up an exterior that resembled it. Of this I find a very late instance, Collection, the year before this, in a letter that Mont wrote from Strasburg on the 18th of Number 3. February, 1548, to Musculus, which will be found in the Collection.

“When he left Augsburg, there were no changes then begun there; but they expected every day, when the new superstitious practices were to be set up. One of the ministers told him that the magistrates had desired the ministers not to forsake them in that time of distress. They promised that they would give them timely notice when those rites were to be brought in among them. They prayed them likewise to recommend the Interim in the softest manner, and with the best colours they could. This was refused by the greater number of them, who said they could never approve that which was by an unanimous consent condemned. He did not doubt but they had heard what was done in Saxony. He wishes the German courage and firmness might now appear: that if they could not act with their usual courage, they might at least show their courage in suffering. The duke of Deux-Ponts had left Augsburg, and said, the publishing the Interim did not belong to him, but to the bishops. Those of Breme had such a heavy composition laid on them by the emperor, that they said it was not in their power to comply with it, though they had a mind to it. So it was thought this was done on design to take their town as a convenient post for a garrisoned place, to keep that country in order. He concludes, desiring to know what agreement there was, as to these matters, in the Helvetic churches.” They were, indeed, much inflamed on this occasion, and very zealous against any compliance with the Interim, or the use of the rites prescribed by it: so Hooper came from Zurich in the heat of this debate, and with this tincture upon his mind.

When he came to Brussels on the 20th of April, 1549, he wrote a letter to Bullinger, that is in the Collection. “He sets forth in it very tragically the misery of the Collection, Netherlands under the violent oppressions of the Spaniards. Complaints were Number 4. heard in all places of rapes, adulteries, robberies, and other insolencies every day committed by them: so that an hostess of a public-house said to him, if she could but carry her children in her arms with her, she would choose to go and beg from door to door, rather than suffer their brutalities every day as they were forced to do. He hoped this would be a warning, to put others on their guard.

“The emperor came seldom out of his chamber. Hooper had been at the duke of Saxony’s house, who had about thirty of his servants still attending on him: he designed to have talked with Hooper, but the Spaniards hindered it. He had no hope of obtaining his liberty, though his health was much broken: but he continued firm in his religion, and did not despair of things, but hoped religion would be again revived. The landgrave was kept at Oudenard. He was both uneasy and inconstant. Sometimes he was ready to submit to the emperor, and to go to mass: at other times he railed at the emperor and at the Interim (Hooper was entertained by Hobby, the English ambassador, from whom probably he heard these things); he prayed God to pity him, for he suffered justly for his treachery. The pope’s legate was there, and preached all that Lent in his own court.

“The pope and the emperor were then in very ill terms. The pope pressed the emperor to own the council at Bologna, for he was afraid to let it sit again in Trent: but the emperor was as positive for their coming back to Trent; and said roundly, he would break with the pope if that were not done. The ambassador told him that if the emperor’s confessor were to any degree right set, there might be good hope of the emperor: but both he and all his ministers were strangely governed, and in a manner driven by the confessor. About seven months before this he had left the emperor, because he would not be more severe, and would not restore popery entirely in Germany. The emperor had offered him a bishopric in Spain worth twenty thousand crowns; but he refused it, and said he would be tied to the church, but not to him, unless he would serve the church with more zeal. The emperor seemed to design to break the peace of Switzerland; and Hooper understood that some of Lucern were then hanging on at court, probably with no good design. He wishes they would fear God, lead holy lives, and fight bravely, and so they might expect to be protected by God: yet he understood that the emperor was troubled that he had meddled so much as he had done in matters of religion in Germany : he found that was like to cross his other designs, which might have succeeded better if he had left that matter more at liberty. His army lay then near Bremen, but was undertaking nothing. The cities there had furnished themselves with stores and provisions for five years, and were making no submissions." This account I thought no digression from my chief design in writing, since this intelligence came, no doubt, from the ambassador. Upon Hooper's coming to England, he applied himself much to preaching and to the explaining the Scriptures. He was much followed, and all churches were crowded where he preached. He went through the Epistle to Titus, and ten chapters of the Gospel of St. John : his fame came to court. Poinet and he were ordered to preach all the Lent at court ; Hooper on Wednesdays, and Poinet on Fridays : he was also sent to preach both in Kent and in Essex. At this time Bullinger wrote to the king, and sent with it a book that he dedicated to him, which was presented to the king by the marquis of Northampton ; for an order was made that none but privy councillors might bring books or papers to the king. The king said to Hooper, that he had read the letter, and would read Bullinger's book, and spoke to the marquis of a present to be sent him : but Hooper told him he never took any ; besides, that it was forbidden by the laws of Zurich. Hooper, in his letters to Bullinger, on the 8th of February, 1550, says, the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of Rochester, Ely, St. David's, Lincoln, and Bath, were sincerely set on advancing the purity of doctrine, agreeing in all things with the Helvetic churches. He commends particularly the marquis of Dorchester, afterwards duke of Suffolk, and the earl of Warwick, afterwards duke of Northumberland, who at that time put on such a show of zeal, that Hooper calls him a most holy instrument, and the best affected to the word of God. He writes of Cranmer, that he wishes he were not too feeble. He was at London when the council divided from the duke of Somerset, but had not meddled in that matter : and he says not a word of it, but that he blesses God the duke of Somerset was to be set at liberty. In June he was named to be bishop of Gloucester ; for he gives an account of

both for the oath, which he says was foul and impious, and by reason of the Aaronical habits. The king asked what his reasons were ? He told them very freely to him. He says of him, that the world never saw such a prince as he was for his age. He likewise says, the lady Elizabeth, his sister, was wonderfully zealous and very knowing : she read both Greek and Latin ; and few could maintain an argument against her, particularly in matters of religion.

Among the letters sent me from Zurich, I find some written upon the occasion of the difficulty that was made in Hooper's business, to Bullinger and Gualter, pressing them very earnestly to write to the king, to let fall all the ceremonies : they tell them that Ridley, though he stood upon the forms of the law, yet was very earnest to have Hooper made a bishop. They seem also to reflect on the bishops for their earnestness in that matter, as if they were ashamed to have that to be blamed, to which they themselves had submitted : and they reflect on Bucer for supporting the matter too much. Those of Zurich were more discreet and modest than to interpose in such a manner. It would have been too great a presumption in them to have made any such application ; but it seems Bullinger wrote about it to the king's preceptor, Cox. I have not found his letter ; but I find, by Cox's letter to him, that he himself was for proceeding easily in this matter. He wrote to him in May, in these words :—"I think all things in the church ought to be pure and simple, removed at the greatest distance from the pomps and elements of this world. But, in this our church, what can I do in so low a station ? I can only endeavour to persuade our bishops to be of the same mind with myself. This I wish truly, and I commit to God the care and conduct of his own work." Of the king he writes, "believe me, there appears in him an incredible beginning of learning, with a zeal for religion, and a judgment in affairs almost already ripe." Traheron, at the same time, writes of him, "We are training up a prince that gives the greatest hopes of being a most glorious defender of the faith, even to a miracle. For, if God is not so provoked by our sins as to take him too early from us, we do not doubt, but that England shall again give the world another Constantine, or rather one much better than he was."

This matter took up much time, and was managed with more heat than might have been expected, considering the circumstances of that reign: he being named to be bishop of Gloucester, was recommended by Dudley to Cranmer, that he would not charge him with an oath that was (as is expressed) burdenuous to his conscience. This was the oath of supremacy. He next desired to be excused from accepting the bishopric, or from the ceremonies used in the consecration; upon which the king writ to Cranmer in August, freeing him from all dangers and penalties that he might incur by omitting those rites, but left the matter to the archbishop's discretion, without any persuasion or command to omit them. The archbishop did not think fit upon that letter to act against the laws: there were several conferences between Ridley and Hooper, not without heat: Hooper maintaining that if it was not unlawful, yet it was highly inexpedient to use those ceremonies. The council apprehending the ill effects of controversies between men of the same profession, sent for Hooper, and wished him to let this opposition of his fall. He desired leave to put his reasons in writing; that was granted him: and when he offered his reasons, they were communicated to Ridley. I gave an account in my former work how honestly and modestly both Bucer and Peter Martyr behaved themselves on this occasion. Peter Martyr mentions Hooper's unseasonable and bitter sermons, which it seems his heat carried him to; and probably that was the reason that moved the council to command him to keep his house, unless it were to go to the archbishop of Canterbury, or to the bishops of Ely, London, or Lincoln, for the satisfaction of his conscience, and not to preach or read till he had further licence. But he did not obey this order: he writ a book on the subject, and printed it. This gave more distaste. He also went about and complained of the council, for which being called before the board, he was committed to the archbishop's custody, to be reformed by him, or to be further punished. The archbishop represented that he could in no sort work upon him, but that he declared himself for another way of ordination: upon that he was, on the 27th of January, committed to the Fleet.

Miconius, a minister of the German church at London, in a letter to Bullinger on the 28th of August, 1550, tells him that the exception that Hooper had to the oath of supremacy, was because the form was "by God, by the Saints, and by the Holy Gospels." This he thought impious; and when he was before the council, the king being present, he argued that God only ought to be appealed to in an oath, for He only knew the thoughts of men. The king was so fully convinced by this, that with his own pen he struck these words out of the oath, saying that no creature was to be appealed to in an oath. This being cleared, no scruple remained but with relation to the habits. The king and council were inclined to order him to be dispensed with as to these. But Ridley prevailed with the king not to dispense in that matter. The thing was indifferent, and therefore the law ought to be obeyed. This had such an effect, that all Hooper's exceptions were after that heard with great prejudice. Miconius was on Hooper's side as well as Alasco. Ridley had opposed the settling the German church in a different way from the rites of the church of England: but Alasco had prevailed to obtain an entire liberty for them to continue in the same forms of worship and government in which they had been constituted beyond sea, in which he had been assisted by Cranmer. It is added in that letter, that it was believed that the emperor had sent one over to carry away the lady Mary secretly, but the design was discovered and defeated. To explain this matter of the oath, I shall insert in the and continued to be used to that time, which is on record, and is among Mr. Rymer's manuscripts. Hooper's matter hung in suspense nine whole months; in which time he seemed positively resolved not to yield, not without severe and indecent reflections on those who used the habits. Cranmer expressed a willingness to have yielded to him; but Ridley and Goodrick stood firm to the law; while many reflected on them, as insisting too much on a thing practised by themselves, as if vain-glory and self-love had been their chief motives. They said they wished that distinction of habits was abolished; but they thought the breaking through laws was so bad a precedent, and might have such ill consequences, that they could not consent to it. Bucer and Peter Martyr expressed their dislike of the habits, but thought the thing was of itself indifferent; so they blamed him for insisting so much on it. Alasco, on the other hand, encouraged him to continue in his refusal to submit to the laws in that matter: in conclusion, he was prevailed on to submit, and was consecrated. This was written to Bullinger by one of the ministers of the German church. His standing out so long, and yielding in the end, lost him much of the popularity, that, to speak freely, he seemed to be too fond of; yet his great labours in his diocese, and his patience and constancy during his imprisonment, and in his last most extreme sufferings, made all good people willing to forget what was amiss, and to return to a just esteem of what was so truly valuable in him.

In conclusion, he submitted and was consecrated according to the established form, and went into his diocese, which he found overrun with ignorance and superstition: he applied himself to his duty with great and indefatigable industry; preaching often twice, sometimes thrice in a day, to instruct the people, and to reform the clergy: he did earnestly wish that the articles of religion, which he knew were under consideration, might be quickly published. He found the greatest opposition in his diocese rose from the prebendaries of his church. Of this he made great complaints; as indeed all the bishops that were well affected to the Reformation found the greatest opposition in their cathedrals; though none of them expressed it so severely as Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, who wrote to a lord, desiring that he might have leave to defend himself against those "high-minded, arrogant, stubborn, ambitious, covetous canons," who for private revenge were set against him: yet, on the other hand, there were great complaints made of his behaviour in his diocese, as both indiscreet and contentious. A petition was sent up to the council in the name of the inhabitants of his diocese against him, complaining of his insatiable covetousness, and his daily vexing his poor tenants and clergy without cause; and indeed his firmness and sufferings afterwards raised his character more than his conduct in his diocese had done.

The last and the most eminent of all the popish clergy that fell in trouble during this reign, was Tonstall, bishop of Durham. He was a generous and well-tempered man, learned far above the common rate. He retained his old opinion concerning the presence in the sacrament; but he had hitherto submitted, and gone along in all that was done: he had no heat, nor a spirit of opposition in his temper, yet his opinion was known. The true account of his matter has been taken out of the council-book, which has come to light since I wrote my history. One Ninian Mainvil charged him as consenting to a conspiracy in the north for raising a rebellion there; to this the bishop answered, and Mainvil made replication. The council-book only refers to these, and gives no account of the bishop's answer. Mainvil had a letter of the bishop's, which was his main evidence, upon which the issue of the trial depended: but that was then wanted; and, as appeared afterwards, the letter was put in the duke of Somerset's hands, and he still kept it; but whether he did it out of kindness to him, or to have this as a check to overawe Tonstall, does not appear.

This letter was found among the duke of Somerset's papers, after his last apprehension: upon which Tonstall was sent for, and his letter was produced against him. He could not deny it to be of his own hand; and not being able to make any further answer, he was on the 20th of December sent to the Tower. Whitehead, dean of Durham, and Handmarsh, Tonstall's chancellor, were accused of the same crime by Mainvil. The dean's death put an end to his trouble, but Tonstall lay in the Tower till queen Mary set him at liberty: and there, in the 77th year of his age, he wrote his book asserting the corporal presence of Christ in the sacrament. It seems the evidence against Tonstall did not at all amount to a consent to a conspiracy; for he was only charged with misprision of treason; whereas the consenting to it would have been carried further, to high treason itself: but even that must have been by a stretch of his words, since if his letter had imported that, Cranmer could not have opposed, much less have protested against the bill attainting him for misprision, if the evidence had been clear. This is confirmed by the opposition made in the house of commons, where the bill fell. So, since the parliament would not attain him, a commission was issued out some months after; and on the 22d of September, 1552, a letter was written to the lord chief justice, signifying to him that there was a commission addressed to him, and to some others, for determining the bishop of Durham's case, with eight letters, and other writings touching the same, which he is required to consider and to hear, and to give order in the matter as soon as the rest of his colleagues were brought together. He was brought before these commissioners: he desired counsel and time convenient to make his answer. Both were denied him, as is set forth in the sentence that reversed this. He was charged as a conspirator against the king and the realm. The commission empowered them to proceed against him for all offences, both according to the ecclesiastical and the temporal laws. He made divers protestations against the several steps of their proceedings, and at last he appealed from them to the king. The commissioners on the 11th of October deprived him of his bishopric, but did not attain him of misprision of treason; for the judgment in that case must have been the forfeiture of his goods, and imprisonment for life: but he was, by order of council on the 31st of October, to receive money for his necessities, remaining prisoner in the Tower, till further order should be given touching the money and goods lately appertaining to him.

This was one of the violent effects of the duke of Northumberland's ambition, who was all this while a concealed papist, as himself declared at his execution. I have laid all these things relating to the deprivation of the bishops that opposed the Reformation together, to give a full view of that matter. But now I must look back to some matters that happened while these proceedings went on. There was an information brought to the council, of some at Bocking, who were irregular in the worship of God, who thought that to stand or to kneel at prayer, or to be covered, or bare-headed, was not material, and that the heart only was necessary: when they were brought before the council, they confessed that they met together; sometimes to confer about the Scriptures; and that they had refused to receive the communion above two years, as was judged upon very superstitious and erroneous principles (so it is entered in the council-book), with diverse other evil opinions, worthy of great punishment. Five of them were sent to prison, and seven gave bonds to appear when called for: they were required to resort to their ordinaries, if they had any doubt in religion, for resolution from them. These were probably some of the anabaptists, though that is not objected to them.

The great point that was then most canvassed in the universities was, the presence in the sacrament. Concerning this I have, among the papers sent me from Zurich, a letter of Peter Martyr's to his friend Bullinger, dated from Oxford the 1st of June, Coll. Numb. G. 1550, which will be found in the collection. "He excuses himself for his slowness in answering his letters, by reason of the constant labours he was engaged in. For, besides his daily exposition of St. Paul, which might claim his whole time, there was a new load brought on him: he was commanded, by an order from the king, to be present at the public disputations upon theological matters, which were held once a fortnight. And in the college in which he was placed, there was a disputation, where he was appointed to be present, and to moderate. He was in a perpetual struggle with most obstinate adversaries. The business of religion did not go on with the zeal and success to be wished for: yet it made a better progress than he had expected four months before. The number of their adversaries was great; they had few preachers on their side; and many of those who professed the gospel were guilty of gross vices. Some, by a human policy, were for purging religion, but for altering outward things as little as might be. They being secular men, apprehended, that upon a more visible change, such disorders would follow as might prove fatal: whereas, it was evident that the innumerable corruptions, abuses and superstitions, that had overrun the church, were such, that it was impossible to reform it, without bringing matters back to those pure fountains, and to the first sound principles of religion. The devil studied to undermine those good designs, by keeping up still many relics of popery, that by these the memory of the old abuses might be preserved, and the return to them rendered easier. On the other hand, they had this great comfort, that they had a holy king, full of fervent zeal for true religion. He writes, that he speaks in all this tender age, with that learning, that prudence, and that gravity, that it amazes all people who hear it. Therefore they were all bound to pray God earnestly, to preserve him long for the good of the church. There were several of the nobility well inclined, and some bishops not of the worst sort, among whom the archbishop of Canterbury was the standard-bearer. Hooper was lately made a bishop, to the joy of all good men, who was to pass through Oxford, in his way to his diocese. He believed that he himself had given Bullinger an account of his being made a bishop, otherwise he would have wrote it. He also commends Coverdale's labours in Devonshire, and adds, that if they could find many such men, it were a great happiness. Alasco being forced to leave Friezeland, by reason of the Interim, was then about the settling his congregation in London. He was at that time in the archbishop's house. The peace with France gave them some hopes. All were under great apprehensions from the pope's designs of bringing his council again together: but they must still trust in God. And after somewhat of their private concerns, he desires his prayers, for the progress of God's word in this kingdom."

He also, in a letter written on the 6th of August, 1551, laments the death of the young duke of Suffolk, "looking on him as the most promising of all the youth in the nation, next to the king himself." After some more on that subject, he adds this sad word, "There is no end put to our sins, nor any measure in sinning*." He commends Hooper's labours in his diocese mightily, and wishes that there were many more such bishops as he was.

Upon the death of the two young dukes of Suffolk, Grey, marquis of Dorchester, was made duke of Suffolk. He had married their sister, but had no sons by her. He had three daughters, of whom the eldest, lady Jane, was esteemed the wonder of the age. She had a sweetness in her temper, as well as a strength of mind, that charmed all who saw her. She had a great aptness to learn languages, and an earnest desire to acquire knowledge. Her father found out a very extraordinary person, to give her the first impressions: Ailmer, who was afterwards, in queen Elizabeth's time, advanced to be bishop of London. Under his care, she made an amazing progress. He found, it seems, some difficulty in bringing her to throw off the vanities of dress, and to use a greater simplicity in it. So, on the 23d of December, 1552, he wrote to Bullinger, "That the lady Elizabeth was a pattern to all, in the modesty of her dress; and yet nobody was prevailed on by such an illustrious example to follow it; and, in all this light of the gospel, to abstain from wearing gold, or gems, or plating of hair." He was particularly charged with the education of lady Jane Grey, whom he calls his scholar: but, it seems, he could not prevail in this particular; so he desires Bullinger to write his thoughts to her on that head.

There was nothing done for almost two whole years, pursuant to the act passed in November 1549, for making a new body of ecclesiastical laws: concerning which, it is not easy to guess what was the clause in it that gave the bishops so much offence, that the greatest part of the bench protested against it. For both the archbishops, and the bishops of Ely, Durham, Worcester, Westminster, Chichester, Lincoln, Rochester, and St. David's, joined in the protestation. There were only two clauses that I can imagine could give them this disgust. One is, that only four bishops and four common lawyers were made necessary to be of the number of the thirty-two persons. The other might be, the limitation of the time to three years: though that seems designed to make the act have its effect in a little time. Two years were almost ended before any steps were made towards the execution of it. On the 6th of October, 1551, the council wrote to the lord chancellor, to make out a commission for thirty-two persons, to reform the ecclesiastical laws. These were the archbishop, the bishops of London, Winchester, Ely, Exeter, Gloucester, Bath, and Rochester. The eight divines were, Taylor, Cox, Parker, Latimer, Cook, Peter Martyr, Cheke, John Alasco. The eight civilians were, Petre, Cecil, Smith, Taylor of Hadley, May, Trahern, Lyell, Skinner. The eight common lawyers were, Hales, Bromley, Goodrick, Gosnald, Stamford, Caryl, Lucas, Brook.

This, it seems, brought Peter Martyr from Oxford to London, in March 1552. And on the 8th of that month he wrote to Bullinger, from Lambeth, being lodged with the archbishop. He tells him, "That the king did earnestly press the bishops, that since the papal authority was cast out of this church, the ecclesiastical laws might be so reformed, that none of the papal decrees might continue to be of any authority in the bishops' courts; and that another body of laws ought to be compiled for them. He had therefore appointed two-and-thirty persons to set about it, of which number he himself was one. He says, the greater number of them were persons both eminently learned and truly pious: in this, he desires both their advices and their prayers. This work must be so prepared, as to receive a confirmation in parliament, in which he foresaw some difficulties." It seems that this number was thought too great to bring anything to a good conclusion, or these persons had not all the same views; for soon after, on the 9th of November after this, a new commission was ordered to be made out to eight persons, for preparing the same work. These were the archbishop, the bishop of Ely, doctor Cox, Peter Martyr, Taylor, May, Lucas, Goodrick. Strype tells us he saw the digest of the ecclesiastical laws, written out by the archbishop's secretary; the title being prefixed to each chapter, with an index of the chapters in the archbishop's own hand. In many places there are corrections and additions in his hand, and some lines are scored out: some of them were also revised by Peter Martyr: the 7th chapter in the title De Prescriptionibus is all written by Peter Martyr. Several chapters are added to the first draught, which is probably that which was prepared in king Henry's time. There was a later and more perfect draught of this work, prepared for king Edward, which coming into Fox's hands, he printed it in the year 1571: the differences between the two draughts, as Mr. Strype assures us, are not very material. But all this was brought to no conclusion.

I find somewhat to be added concerning the duke of Somerset's tragical death, in a letter that one John ab Ulmis, a Switzer, then in England, wrote from Oxford the 4th of December, 1552, to Bullinger; that the duke of Somerset was censured, as having been too gentle to the lady Mary, in conniving at her mass: but when he proposed the doing that in council, the earl of Warwick answered, "The mass is either of God or of the devil: if it is of God, we ought all to go to it; if it is of the devil, why should it be connived at in any person?" yet still the gentleness of the duke of Somerset made him suffer it to go on. But now, he adds, since the earl of Warwick had the greatest share in the government, he had put her priests in prison, and had given strict orders to suffer no mass to be said in her house.

He tells one remarkable particular in the duke of Somerset's trial: "That after he was found guilty of the conspiracy against the earl of Warwick (upon which the people expressed a great concern), the earl of Warwick addressed himself to the duke, and told him, that now, since by the law he was adjudged to die, he, as he had saved him formerly, so he would not now be wanting to serve him, how little soever he expected it from him. He desired him, therefore, to fly to the king's mercy, in which he promised he would faithfully serve him. Upon this, the duke did petition the king, and it was hoped, that he would reconcile those two great men, and that by this means the duke of Somerset should be preserved."

It seems there was some treaty about his pardon: for though he was condemned on the 1st of December, he was not executed till the 22d of January. What made it to be respited so long, and yet executed at last, does not appear. It is probable it was from a management of the duke of Northumberland's, who, by the delay, did seem to act in his favour, that so he might be covered from the popular odium which he saw his death was like to bring upon him; and, at the same time, by the means of some who had credit with the king, he possessed him with so bad an opinion of the duke of Somerset, that he, looking on him as an implacable man, capable of black designs, resolved to let the sentence be executed upon him.

In the same letter he gives an instance of Hooper's impartial zeal in the discharge of his function in his diocese: that while he was censuring some inferior people for their scandalous life, one said to him, "We poor people must do penance for these things, while great and rich men, as guilty as we, are overlooked. Upon that, he said, name any person, how great soever, that was guilty of adultery, so that it could be proved against him, and he would leave himself in their hands, to be used by them as they pleased, if he did not proceed equally against all. So, in a few days, sir Anthony Kingston, a great man in those parts, being accused of adultery, he cited him into his court. He, for some time, refused to appear. At last he came, and when the bishop was charging his sin severely upon him, he gave him very foul language, and at last fell to beat him. This was presently followed so severely, that he was fined in 500*l.* and forced to submit to do penance."

This raised the bishop's character, as it contributed not a little to establish his authority in his diocese. He set himself to do his duty there with so much zeal, that his wife, who was a German, wrote to Bullinger, praying him to write to her husband, to take a little more care of himself: for he preached commonly thrice, sometimes four times in one day. The crowds of those who came constantly to hear him made him look on them as persons that were hungering for the word of life. So she apprehending that his zeal made him labour beyond his strength, studied to get others to put some stop to that, which, it seems, she could not prevail with him so far as to restrain.

About this time the bishops and divines were employed in the review of the Common-Prayer; but I have met with nothing new with relation to that matter, save that on the 6th of May, 1551, there was an order of council, for preserving peace, sent to all the Reg. Exon. cathedrals, at least to that of Exeter, for it is in that register. And on the 18th of January there was a commission issued out for the repressing of heresy, and for observing the Common-Prayer. And on the 27th of October, 1552, the council-book mentions also a letter, written to the lord chancellor, to add in the edition of the new Common-Prayer Book a declaration touching kneeling at the receiving the communion.

It remains that I give the best account I can of the articles of religion. It seemed to be a great want that this was so long delayed, since the old doctrine had still the legal authority of its side. One reason of delaying the publishing them probably was, that the king, in whose name, and by whose authority, they were to be published, might be so far advanced in years, and out of the time of pupillage, that they might have the more credit, and be of the more weight: for though it was a point settled in law, that the king's authority was at all ages the same, yet the world would still make a difference in their regard to things passed while he was a child, and those things authorized by him when he was in the 16th year of his age.

The first impression of these articles appeared with a title apt to make one think they had been agreed on in the convocation. It runs thus in English, "Articles which were agreed to in the synod of London, in the year 1552, by the bishops and other godly and learned men, to root out the discord of opinions, and establish the agreement of true religion." But there is reason to believe that no such articles were offered to the convocation. Weston objected afterwards to Cranmer that he had set forth a catechism in the name of the synod in London, and yet, said he, there be 50 which, witnessing that they were of the number of the convocation, never heard one word of this catechism. And in a long and much-laboured sermon of Brooks', preached at St. Paul's Cross in November 1553, there is an intimation that makes it indeed probable that the articles were brought into the upper house of convocation. For when he complains that they were set forth as allowed by the clergy, he adds, whereas the convocation, without all doubt (for the lower house at least), was never made privy thereto: that reserve seems to make it probable that they were brought into the upper house. In the first impression of the articles, the catechism is printed first before the articles: so this is to be understood of that whole book, which is indeed a very small one.

When this was objected to Cranmer, he answered, "I was ignorant of the setting to of that title, and as soon as I had knowledge thereof I did not like it. Therefore, when I complained thereof to the council, it was answered by them, that the book was so entitled, because it was set forth in the time of the convocation." In the interrogatories that were afterwards exhibited to him, in order to his final censure, the 7th ends thus, "That he did compile and caused to be set abroad divers books." The last part of his answer to that was, "As for the Catechism, the Book of Articles, with the other book against Winchester, he grants the same to be his doings."

It is true, in the first convocation under queen Mary, when the prolocutor charged Philpot with this, that a catechism was put forth without their consent, he answered on the sudden, that the house had granted an authority to make ecclesiastical laws to certain persons to be appointed by the king's majesty; and what was set forth by them might be well said to be done in the synod of London, although the house had no notice thereof before the promulgation; but Weston also said, "That the catechism beareth the title of the last synod before this, although many of them who were then present were never made privy thereof in setting it forth :” so that both Weston and Philpot agree that the book was never brought before the convocation. In this matter Philpot, as he could not deny the fact, so he made use of the best answer that then occurred to him, without considering that the convocation had not agreed to any such deputation of 32 persons,—for that was settled by an act of parliament ; nor did the deputation relate to matters of doctrine, but only to the canons and proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts ; for as it was a revival of the acts passed in king Henry’s time, so it run in the same strain with them. These evidences make it plain that the articles of religion did not pass in convocation. We have Cranmer’s own word for it, that he drew them, and that he, who was always plain and sincere, did not approve of that deceitful title that was prefixed to them, to impose upon the unwary vulgar. He also owns that they were his doings. One reason that may seem probable for his not offering them to the convocation might be, that he had observed that many made a difference between obeying orders already made, and the consenting before-hand to the making of them. A greater degree of authority and evidence seemed necessary for the one than for the other ; besides that the offering things to debate, while it was free to argue on either side of the question, might carry some to engage themselves so far, that they could not after that submit with any decency. This, as far as I can judge, seems to be Cranmer’s reason for not offering the articles to be debated and passed in convocation.

But now that they were to be published with authority, that was to be done in the king’s name ; so a very few days before the king’s death, he sent a mandate to Cranmer to publish the articles, and to cause them to be subscribed. This was done pursuant to the archbishop’s motion to the king and council ; for he had desired, “ That all bishops might have authority from him to cause all their preachers, archdeacons, deans, prebendaries, parsons, vicars, curates, with all their clergy, to subscribe the said articles ; and he trusted that such a concord and quietness in religion should shortly follow thereon, as else is not to be looked for in many years. God shall thereby be glorified ; his truth shall be advanced, and your lordships (for he writes it to the privy council) shall be rewarded of him, as the setters-forward of his true word and gospel. Dated from Ford, the 24th of November.” It seems they were prepared some time before that, for on the 20th of October, in the year 1552, the council had written to the six preachers, Harley, Bell, Horn, Grindall, Pern, and Knox, to consider of some articles then offered to be subscribed by all preachers, which can be no other than these articles ; but as this matter was long delayed formerly, so when it was now ordered, it was sent about with all the diligence that so important a work required. The king also directed his orders to all the archbishop’s officers, enjoining them to cause all rectors, vicars, or those in any ecclesiastical employments, to appear before the archbishop, to obey and do on the king’s part as shall be signified to them.

The mandate that upon this was sent out by the archbishop’s officers, which is in the Collection, though it is in the king’s name, yet was issued out by Cranmer himself, in execution of the mandate ; it is mentioned in it that it was sent to him by the king. It was thus put in the king’s name, pursuant to the act passed in the beginning of this reign, that all process in the ecclesiastical courts should be in the king’s name ; but its being tested by the archbishop shows it was the act of his court : for though there is an exception in that act for the archbishops, yet that only related to what they should act in their provinces as metropolitans, but not to their proceedings in their particular dioceses,—in which, it seems, they were put on the same foot with the other bishops. The king’s mandate to himself is not in any record that I was able to find out. After the mandate, the execution of it by his officers was certified to him on the 22d of June, which is in his register, and is added in the Collection to the mandate. But probably the time given them run further than the king’s life ; for nothing farther appears to have been done upon it. The clergy of the city of London (probably only his peculiars) appeared before him, and he exhorted them to subscribe the articles. No mention is made of any one’s refusing to do it ; but he compelled none to subscribe, which he affirmed in his answer to an interrogatory put to him by Queen Mary’s commissioners ; for he said that he compelled none, but exhorted such to subscribe as were willing to do it, before they did it. It came to Norwich, where Thirleby was bishop, who complied readily with everything that he was required to do, though by his sudden turn, and his employments in the next reign, it appears that he acted, at least, against his heart, if not against his conscience.

The mandate for Norwich, which will be found in the Collection, bears date the 9th of June, in the 7th year of this reign. And it is not to be doubted but that the

It sets forth that "whereas, after a long time of darkness, the light was now revealed to the inestimable benefit of the nation; the king thought it his duty to have a uniform profession, doctrine, and preaching for the evading dangerous opinions and errors; and therefore he sent him certain articles gathered with great judgment, of the greatest part of the learned bishops of the kingdom, and sundry others of the clergy; which he required and exhorted him to sign, and in his preaching to observe, and to cause them to be subscribed by all others, who do, or shall preach, or read within his diocese; and if any shall not only refuse to subscribe, but shall preach contrary to them, he is required to give notice of it to the king and his council, that further order may be given in the matter. And for such persons as came to be admitted to any benefice or cure, he was to confer with them on these articles, and to cause them to subscribe them, otherwise not to admit them to any such benefice, to which they were presented. But if the person was ignorant, and did not understand them, pains was to be taken on him to instruct him, and six weeks' time might be given him to examine them by the Scriptures: but at the end of six weeks, if he did not subscribe them, he was to be rejected. Then follows an order for him to receive the catechism, and to give it to all masters of schools, that it may be taught in them all; and he is required to make report to the archbishop of the province, of the obedience given to these orders." This order was so readily executed, that about fifty of the clergy subscribed it. This instrument was examined and sent to me by Dr. Tanner, the learned chancellor of Norwich.

But besides the evidence that appears from the registers of Canterbury and Norwich, I

And to the

To this is

Coll. Numb. 9. added the form of the oath to be taken: the injunction will be found in the Collection.

Thus it appears, by a variety of evidences, that these articles were not passed in convocation, nor so much as offered to it. And, as far as can be judged from Cranmer's

signed to set up the Provincial Sy-
node. proceedings, he intended to put the government of the church in another method, different from the common way by convocation; and to set up provincial synods of bishops, to be called as the archbishop saw cause, he having first obtained the king's licence for it. This appears by the 18th chapter of the "Reformation of the Ecclesiastical Laws" prepared by him, in which it is plain that these provincial synods were to be composed only of the bishops of the province. The convocations now in use by a long prescription, in which deans, archdeacons, and cathedrals, have an interest, far superior in number to those elected to represent the clergy, can in no sort pretend to be more than a part of our civil constitution, and have no foundation either in any warrant from Scripture, or from the first ages of the church; but did arise out of that second model of the church, set out by Charles the Great, and formed according to the feudal law; by which a right of giving subsidies was vested in all who were possessed of such tenures as qualified them to contribute towards the supporting of the state.

As for the catechism, it was printed with a preface prefixed to it in the king's name, bearing date the 24th of May, about seven weeks before his death: in which he sets forth that it was drawn by a pious and learned man (supposed to be bishop Poynt), and was given to be revised by some bishops and other learned men; he therefore commands all schoolmasters to teach it.

I come now to set forth the dismal overturning of all that had been done now in a course of twenty years. King Edward was for some months under a visible decay: ^{King Edward's} his thoughts were much possessed with the apprehensions of the danger ^{scheme of the} religion ^{Succession.} must be in, if his sister Mary should succeed him. This set him on contriving a design to hinder that. He seemed to be against all females' succession to the crown. I have put in the Collection a paper that I copied out of a manuscript of the late Mr. ^{Coll.Numb.} Petyt's, all written in that king's own hand, with this title, "My Device for the ^{10.} Succession:" by it "the crown was to go to the issue male of his own body, or if he had only female issue, to the issue male coming of the issue female; next to the issue male of the lady Frances, then in succession to her three daughters, and to their issue male; and if they had only female issue, to the first issue male of any of her daughters. The heir male after 18 was to enter upon the government: but his mother was to govern until he was of that age, with the advice of six of that council of twenty persons, which he should name by his last will: but if the mother of the issue male should not be 18, then the realm was to be governed by the council, provided that after the issue male was of the age of 14, all matters of importance should be opened to him. If at his death there were no issue male, the lady Frances was to be governess-regent; and after her life, her three daughters were to be governesses in succession, till an heir-male was born; and then the mother of that heir-male was to be governess. If four of the council should die, the governess was ordered, within a month, to summon the whole council, to choose four in their stead, in which the governess was to have three voices. But after the death of the governess, the council was to choose the new councillors till the king was 14, and then he was to choose them, but by their advice."

It may seem by this, that the king designed this some time before his death; while he thought that he himself might have issue: but he was prevailed on to change a great deal of this scheme, especially those clauses that kept the crown as in an abeyance, till an issue-male should be born; which would have totally changed the government: so he departed from these clauses.

This was afterwards put in another form by the judges; and that scheme which they ^{Much altered.} prepared was, in six several places, superscribed by the king's hand. Probably ^{Collection.} it consisted of so many pages. I never saw that paper; but I have put in the ^{Number 11.} Collection the paper that was subscribed by twenty-four councillors and judges: in which they set forth, "That they had often heard the king's earnest desire, touching the limitation of the succession of the crown, and had seen his device written in his own hand: and after that was copied out, and delivered to judges and other learned men, they did sign with their hands, seal with their seals, and promise by their oaths and honours, to observe every article in that writing, and all such other matter, as the king should by his last will declare, touching the limitation of the crown: and never to vary from it, but to defend and maintain it to the utmost of their power. And they also promised that they would prosecute any of their number, or any other, that should depart from it, and do their uttermost to see them severely punished."

I gave an account in my History of the opposition that Cranmer made to this: but ^{Opposed long} Mr. Strype has discovered more particulars concerning it. He tells us, "that ^{by Cranmer.} he argued with the king himself once about it in the hearing of the marquis of Northampton and the lord Darcy. He desired leave to speak to the king alone about it, that so he might be more free with him; but that was not allowed him. He hoped, if he had obtained that liberty, he should have diverted the king from it. He argued against it in council, and pleaded that the lady Mary was legitimate: but some lawyers were prevailed on to say that the king, being in possession of the crown, might dispose of it as he pleased. He stood firm and said, that he could not subscribe it without perjury, having sworn to the observance of king Henry's will. Some councillors said they had sworn to that will as well as he, and that they had consciences as well as he. He said every man was to answer to God for his own deeds, and not for other men's: he did not take upon him to judge any man's conscience but his own. He spake with the judges about the matter; and they agreed that the king might settle the succession, notwithstanding king Henry's will: yet he remained still unsatisfied; till the king himself required him to set his hand to his will, saying, he hoped he alone would not stand out, and be more repugnant to his will than all the rest of the council were. This made a great impression on him; it grieved him much: but such was the love that he bore to the king, that in conclusion he yielded, and signed it."

A little before the king's death, a very extraordinary thing happened in Ireland. I had The Primate of Ireland told in my former work, that Goodacre and Bale were sent over to promote the Reformation in Ireland. The former was made primate of Armagh: of whose poisoned. death there is a report, that has been all along believed by his posterity. A reverend and worthy clergyman of Hampshire, not far from Salisbury (who is the fourth in descent from that primate, they having been all clergymen but one), told me he had it from his grandfather, who was the primate's grandson. "That he being invited to a popish lord's house, a monk there drank to him in a poisoned liquor, on design to poison him; of which they both died." This I set down from the venerable person's own mouth, as a thing known and believed in the family.

I have no particulars to add, neither concerning the death nor the character of that good prince, king Edward, whose untimely end was looked on by all people as a just judgment of God upon those who pretended to love and promote a Reformation, but whose impious and flagitious lives were a reproach to it. The open lewdness in which many lived, without shame or remorse, gave great occasion to their adversaries to say they were in the right to assert justification by faith without works; since they were, as to every good work, reprobate. Their gross and insatiable scrambling after the goods and wealth, that had been dedicated with good designs, though to superstitious uses, without applying any part of it to promoting the gospel, the instructing the youth, and relieving the poor, made all people conclude that it was for robbery, and not for reformation, that their zeal made them so active.

I will here give an eminent instance of fraudulent proceedings in the beginning of this reign; of which the present learned and zealous dean of Norwich was pleased to send me a copious account out of their registers. The prior, when inducted into that dignity, took an oath not to alienate any of their lands, which was confirmed by injunctions exhibited to the convent in the royal visitation. But the king, upon certain reasons suggested by the prior and convent, and approved by him, did dispense with that oath; so that notwithstanding the oath, they were left at liberty to alienate some lands set forth in the instrument, dated the 1st of April 1538, countersigned by Cromwell. A month after that, on the 2nd of May that year, the church was converted from a prior and convent to a dean and chapter; and the last prior was made the first dean of the church.

But on the 26th of May 1547, in the beginning of king Edward's reign, a letter was sent to that church, signed by the duke of Somerset, Rich, the lord chancellor, and six other privy-councillors, pretending that they designed the advancement of God's glory, and the truest intent of the late king's determination: by which sir Richard Southwell, sir Roger Townshend, and sir William Paston, were authorised to receive a full surrender of the whole chapter; assuring both the dean and every one of the prebendaries, that there should be no alteration made in their yearly profits, and that there should be a just contentation given to the residue of the ministers there. A commission was granted on the 27th to these persons to take the surrender, with articles and instructions annexed to it: which, because, probably many others were of the same sort, are put in the Collection, Number 12. Collection. But, for all this appearance of fair dealing—it being pretended that this was only designed that the king should be the founder, and that the church should lose nothing by the surrender—yet when they had made the surrender, in the hope of new letters-patent, they could not obtain them. And lands, to the value of 200*l.* a year, were taken from them. Upon which that corporation tried, in queen Mary's time, to get a bill to pass, to restore them to the state they were in before they were prevailed on to make the surrender. But the bill did not pass. Perhaps it might be suggested that it would alarm the nation too much if any alienation of church lands, how fraudulently soever obtained, were meddled with. I give this as a well-attested instance; by which it may appear how things of this kind were obtained and managed chiefly in the beginnings of this reign. For I am not so much set on justifying everything that was done in this reign, as Coll. Eccl. another voluminous writer is on condemning almost everything done in it, with Hist. p. 332, a particular virulence against the memory of that pious prince. This, from one col. 2. of another communion, is that which might have been expected; but it is a little singular, when it comes from one who says he is of our church.

The irregular and immoral lives of many of the professors of the gospel, gave their enemies great advantages to say, they ran away from confession, penance, fasting, and prayers, only that they might be under no restraint, but indulge themselves in a licentious and dissolute course of life. By these things, that were but too visible in some of the more eminent among them, the people were much alienated from them: and as much as they were formerly prejudiced against popery, they grew to have kinder thoughts of it, and to look on all changes that had been made, as designs to enrich some vicious courtiers, and to let in an inundation of vice and wickedness upon the nation. Some of the clergy that promoted the Reformation, were not without very visible blemishes: some indiscretions, both in their marriages and in their behaviour, contributed not a little to raise a general aversion to them.

It is true, there were great and shining lights among them, whose exemplary deportment, continual labours, fervent charity, and constant zeal, both during their lives and at their deaths, kept up the credit of that work, as much as it was disgraced by others: but they were few in comparison of the many bad, and those of the clergy, in whom the old leaven had still a deep root, though they complied in everything that was imposed on them. Seeing that they had lost those perquisites at masses and other practices, which brought them their chief gains, and saw nothing came in lieu of them for their subsistence, they, who in their hearts hated all that they were forced to profess outwardly, did secretly possess such as were influenced by them, with an abhorrence of all that was done: and they disposed the nation to be ready to throw it all off.

That which was above all, was, that God was highly dishonoured by men who pretended zeal for his glory, but with their works dishonoured him. They talked of the purity of the gospel, while they were wallowing in all sensuality and uncleanness: pretending to put all their confidence in the merits and sufferings of Christ, while they were crucifying him afresh, and putting him to open shame. In such lamentations as these, I find the good men of that time did often vent their sorrows in their letters to one another, and break out into severe reflections on them. Some did it afterwards abroad in their exile, and others at home in their sufferings. Their only human hope was in the king himself; in whom there appeared such a progress, both in knowledge and zeal, that they expected to see him complete the Reformation, and redress those crying abuses in which the men in power found their account too evidently to expect remedy from them. They were men, in whose hands things grew every day worse and worse; and whose arrogance and other disorders our chief reformers were forced in some measure to connive at, that they might not provoke them to retard a work that could in no wise be carried without their countenance and authority; though they saw the prejudice it brought upon them to be obliged to apply to, and to make use of such tools with which the righteous souls of our best reformers were much grieved. They were engaged with men that were ready to pull down, especially when anything was to be got by it; but were as backward in building up as they were forward in plucking down: so that they seemed to design to leave all in a great ruin. These were great hindrances to the progress of the Reformation, as they were both the burden and the shame of our reformers.

I thought it not amiss to open this as fully as I found it lying before me: and I hope the reader will not only consider this as a part of the history of a former age, but as an admonition to us in the present: if we fall under the disorders and corruptions that then reigned, why should not we expect such a calamity as overtook and overwhelmed them? We may justly look for worse, since we have the advantages of much more light, and many more blessings, as well as many alarming terrors, which have all gone over us without those dismal convulsions that we might have looked for: and they have as easily slipped out of our thoughts, as if we had never seen or felt them. To the viciousness of life, and the open immoralities and neglect of religion, that were the sins of the former age, many among us have added a studied impiety and a laboured opposition to all revealed religion: which some have owned in so barefaced a manner, that perhaps no age of the world can show anything like it. If others with secular views have declaimed against this, and put on some show of zeal, how much more of party than of true religion has appeared in it. The divided parties among us have showed little true regard to religion, and to a course of virtue and piety, which can only give both strength and honour to a church; and this does too plainly appear in many who talk the most of it, or for it.

Have we of the clergy made the steps that became us, and that were designed in the former age, for throwing out abuses, for regulating the courts, and restoring discipline? while we have for above 150 years expressed once a year a faint wish that the primitive discipline were again restored, and yet have not made one step toward it: what a venality of the advowsons to livings do we hear of, and at best the disposing of them goes generally by secular regards, by importunities, obligations, or friendship: and above all, how few of those that labour in the gospel do labour indeed, and give themselves wholly to it? how much of their time and zeal is employed in things that do not deserve it so well as the watching over, the instructing, and the building up their flock in their most holy faith? How few do fast and pray, and study to prepare themselves and their people for the evil day that seems much nearer us than the greatest part are willing to apprehend; that so we may by our intercessions deliver our church and nation from that which is ready to swallow us up; or at least be so fortified and assisted, that we ourselves, and others, by what they see in us, may glorify God in that day of visitation.

I shall conclude this book with one reflection that may make us hope that the reformation was under a particular and watchful care of providence: when the light seemed almost extinguished in one place it broke out in another, by which as it was still kept shining somewhere, so there was a sanctuary opened, to which those who were forced to fly from one place, might in their flight find a covert in another from the storm. In the beginning of this reign, by breaking of the Smalcaldick league, by the taking of the elector of Saxony, and the landgrave of Hesse, and by the Interim, the reformation seemed to be near extinguished in Germany. In this church it was at that time advanced; and we kindly then received those who were forced to fly hither for shelter. And now in the year before the death of this good king, there was not only a revival, but a lasting settlement procured in Germany to the reformation there. So that those who fled from hence found a safe and kind harbour in all the places of the empire, to which they were driven by the storm and tempest that arose here. Of which I go next to gather up such gleanings as have come in my way.

PART III.—BOOK V.

OF WHAT HAPPENED DURING QUEEN MARY'S REIGN, FROM THE YEAR 1553 TO THE YEAR 1558.

As soon as the queen came to the Tower of London, she sent for the lord mayor and the aldermen of the city, and told them, "That though her own conscience was stayed in matters of religion, yet she meaneth graciously not to compel or strain other people's consciences, otherwise than God shall, as she trusteth, put in their hearts a persuasion of the truth." These soft words were not long remembered: of the progress of the severities in her reign, I have a very authentic account before me, in the original council-book, that begins on the 17th of August, 1553, and goes to the end of the year 1557: but from that to her death I have not so sure a thread. The book begins with orders for letters to be written to Coverdale and Hooper for their undelayed repair to the court; and a complaint being made of a sermon preached by Fisher, parson of Amersham; he was ordered to appear the next day, and to bring the notes of his sermon with him. A parliament was summoned to meet in November: on the 14th of August the writ for the convocation was directed to Cranmer. A letter was soon after written by the queen and council to the bishop of Norwich, to suffer none to preach without a special licence; the same order was intimated to the lord mayor of London, and the same was no doubt universally both ordered and executed.

On the 20th of August there was an order for guards to defend the preacher at St. Paul's cross, occasioned by what had happened to Bourn: it seems few came to hear the sermons, for the lord-mayor was ordered "to make the ancients of the companies resort to the sermons, lest the preacher should be discouraged by a small audience." Rymer MSS. On the 23d of August Gardiner was declared lord chancellor: here I shall set down the appointments of the lord chancellor as they were settled at that time. There was a privy seal given for wages and diets, and for the masters in chancery, for 542*l.* 15*s.* yearly: 50*l.* was ordered for attending on the star-chamber every term; and besides that a salary was given of 300*l.*, and 64*l.* for 12 ton of wine, and 16*l.* for wax. All these were granted the 21st of September, but were to commence from the 23d of August. On the 24th of August there was an order sent to the keeper of Newgate to receive and keep John Melvil, a Scot, and a very seditious preacher; so he was called in the warrant. On the same day a letter was written to the mayor of Canterbury, to set Panton, vicar of St. Dunstan's, and one Burden, on the pillory, for seditious words against the queen, and to take bonds at their discretion for their good bearing. On the 26th of August a letter was writ to the mayor of Coventry to apprehend Symonds, a vicar there, and to send him up with such matter as can be procured to charge him with: "And to punish at their discretion such slanderous talkers, as by his lewd preaching have had dissolute and seditious talk."

Here is a great deal of heat in ten days' time. Cranmer was called before the council in the beginning of August; probably on the account of his signing king Edward's will, and acting upon it: but since so many of those who had signed it, were then at the council board, they were perhaps ashamed to proceed further against him, who had opposed it so much. He had for that time only a severe reprimand, and was commanded to keep his house. He was brought again before some of the queen's commissioners, being cited to appear, and to bring the inventory of his goods with him; he brought it, but no further proceedings against him are mentioned at that time. On the 29th of August Hooper appeared before the council: on the 1st of September he was sent to the Fleet, no regard being had to the active zeal that he had expressed in asserting the queen's right, and against the lady Jane; so sincerely did he follow the dictates of his conscience, when he could not but see what consequences it was like to have. On the 2d, order was given that his servant might attend on him. On the 31st of August, Coverdale appeared before them, and in respect that he was a foreigner, he was ordered to attend till further order. On the 2d of September, Sanders, vicar in Coventry, appeared before the council, and a letter was written to the mayor of Leicester to bring up their vicar : on the 4th of September, Latimer was summoned to appear, and a letter was written to the mayor of Coventry to set Symonds at liberty, upon his repentance for a wish he had uttered, wishing they were hanged that said mass : if he refused to do that, the mayor was to give notice of it.

On the 5th of September a letter was written to sir John Sidenham to let the strangers depart, and to give them a passport. This related to the congregation of the foreigners that had settled, in order to set up a manufacture at Glastonbury. On the 10th of September a letter of thanks was ordered for the gentlemen of Cornwall, for their honest proceeding in electing knights for the parliament : it seems there was some debate about it with the sheriff, for a letter was written to him to accept of the election, and not to trouble the county for any alteration : on the 13th of September it is entered, that Latimer, for his seditious demeanor, should be close prisoned in the Tower, with a servant to attend him ; on the same day Cranmer was ordered to appear the next day at the star-chamber. On the 14th, in the the star-chamber, Cranmer, as well for his treason against the queen as for spreading seditious bills, moving tumults, to the disquieting the present state, was sent to the Tower, and referred to justice. There are several orders made for restoring all chalices to churches, together with all other goods belonging to them, though they had been sent into the great wardrobe. On the 4th of October the archbishop of York was committed to the Tower for divers offences ; and Horn, the dean of Durham, was summoned again and again, but he thought fit to go beyond sea. Nothing gave more offence than the promoting petitions for retaining the doctrine and service settled in king Edward's time. Those of Maidstone were charged with it ; and this is on several occasions mentioned in the council-book : but as the government was thus set to overthrow all that had been done in king Edward's time ; so the fierceness of the popish party made them on many occasions out-run the government : some of the clergy continued to perform the daily worship, and to celebrate the sacrament ; more they durst not do in public, all preaching being forbidden. The people that favoured the reformation frequented the service with great devotion and zeal, for all saw what was coming on them, and so they studied to prepare themselves for it. Some of the ruder multitudes came into their churches and disturbed them while they were at their devotions ; they insulted the ministers and laughed at their worship, and there were everywhere informers with false stories to charge the more zealous preachers : in many places the people broke in violently into churches and set up altars, and the mass in them, before the parliament met to change the laws.

The duke of Northumberland shewed that abjectness of mind that might have been expected from so insolent a man, loaded with so much guilt ; he begged his life with all possible meanness, " That he might do penance all the days of his life, if it were in a mouse-hole." He went to mass in the Tower, and received the sacrament in the popish manner. He sent for Gardiner, and asked him if there was no hope for him, to live, and do penance for his sins. The bishop said his offence was great, and he would do well to provide for the worst, especially to see that he stood well with God in matters of conscience and religion ; for to speak plainly, he said, he thought he must die. The duke desired he might have a learned priest sent him, for his confession and spiritual comfort. " For religion, he said, he could be of no other but of his, he never was of any other indeed ; he complied in king Edward's days only out of ambition, for which he prayed God to forgive him, and he promised that he would declare that at his death." The bishop shed many many tears, and seemed to be troubled for him ; and as he reported himself, he pressed the queen so much that he had almost gained her consent for his life. But the emperor who was then designing the marriage, that took effect afterwards, saw what a struggle there might be against that, and what mischief such a man might afterwards do : so he wrote his advice for his death positively to the queen ; and he was executed, and died as he had lived.

The Duke of Northumberland begs his life, but in vain.

Gates and Palmer, who suffered with him, had tried how far the going to mass and Others ^{receiving} the sacrament in the popish way, could save them: but when they ^{Others suf-} were brought to suffer, Gates confessed "that he had lived as viciously as any in ^{fered with} him. the world. He was a great reader of the Scriptures; but no man followed them less: he read them only to dispute. He exhorted people to consider how they read God's holy word, otherwise it would be but poison to them. Palmer thanked God for his affliction, and said, he had learned more in one dark corner of the Tower than he had ever learned formerly: he had there come to see God in his works, and in his mercies, and had seen himself a mass of sin, and of all vileness the vilest." He seemed not daunted with the fear of death, though he saw two die before him, and the bloody axe coming to finish the business on himself. I find nothing new, with relation to the session of parliament.

The writ upon which the convocation was summoned was directed to Cranmer, but executed by Bonner, bishop of London. Weston was chosen prolocutor; and the queen sent a message to them, to dispute about religion. I gave formerly an account of that disputation, and can add little to it. The minutes tell us that Philips, who was one of the five that refused to subscribe, did, on the 30th of April, recant and subscribe. It is indeed of little consequence to enquire into the proceedings of the convocation during this reign, in which all the old notions of popery were taken up, even before they were enacted. Though both this convocation and the next were summoned by the queen's writ, with the title of supreme head of the church.

There was at this time an infamous slander set about, of the queen's being with child by Gardiner. The queen's whole life being innocent as to all such things, that might have made them to despise such a report rather than to trace it up; besides, Gardiner's great age made that none could believe it. But the earl of Sussex, in his officious zeal, pursued it through eight or ten hands; and one at last was indicted for having reported it; though such an absurd lie had, perhaps, been better neglected than so minutely inquired into. In the same letter that mentions this, the earl of Sussex gives an account of examinations touching a design for an insurrection, upon the arrival of the prince of Spain.

The emperor had, on the 21st of December, signed a commission empowering the count of Egmond, and others, to treat a marriage between his son and the queen. Upon their coming to England, the queen gave a commission on the 1st of January to the lord chancellor, and others, to treat with them. And prince Philip of Spain did, on the 28th of April, send from Valladolid full powers to the same effect. That which quickened the treaty was, an account of a vast treasure that was come with the fleet, from the West Indies to Seville; reckoned to have brought over five millions, as Mason wrote from Brussels. He does not denominate the millions, whether pounds or crowns. He wishes the half were true. It was necessary to have a great treasure in view; for though I never found any hint of the corrupting of parliament men, before this time, yet there was now an extraordinary occasion for it; and they saw where only the treasure to furnish it could be had. A concurrence of many circumstances seemed to determine all things for this marriage. Everything was agreed to: the conditions seemed to be of great advantage to the nation. In this treaty of marriage, if Cæsar Campana (who wrote Philip's life very copiously) was well informed, Philip himself was extremely disgusted at it: for he desired to be married to a wife more suited to his own age. He adds another particular—"That the nation shewed such an aversion to it, that the count of Egmond, with the others sent over to treat about it, saw themselves in such danger, that they were forced to fly away, that they might avoid it: and a parliament was to be called, to approve of the conditions of the treaty."

Sir Thomas Wyatt was a man that had been oft employed in embassies, particularly in Spain; where he had made such observations upon the subtlety and cruelty of the Spaniards, and of the treatment that such kingdoms and provinces met with that came under their yoke, that he could not look on the misery that his country was like to fall under, without a just concern about it. He was the duke of Northumberland's kinsman, yet he would not join in lady Jane's business: and before he knew that any others had done it, he proclaimed the queen at Maidstone ; but he did not, upon that, run to her for thanks, as others did ; yet the queen was so sensible of his loyalty and zeal for her, that she sent her thanks to him by the earl of Arundel ; to whom he appealed, as to this particular, when he was under examination in the Tower. He had obtained a pass to go beyond the sea ; but his lady being with child, he stayed to see the end of that. Nothing set him on to raise the country as he did but his love and zeal for the public. He never pretended that religion was his motive : many papists joined with him. When he passed by Charing-Cross, he might have turned to Whitehall, which was but ill defended ; for many of the earl of Pembroke's men came over to him. This shewed that he meant no harm to the queen's person. His marching into London was, on design to engage the city to come and join with him in a petition to the queen against the Spanish match. The queen herself was so satisfied as to his good intentions, that she intended to have pardoned him, had not a message from the prince of Spain determined her to order his head to be cut off. I suppose there may be a mistake here ; and that it was the emperor, then in Flanders, and not the prince of Spain, who was yet in Spain, that sent this advice. He never accused the lady Elizabeth : but being entangled by questions in one examination, he had said somewhat reflecting on the earl of Devonshire ; for this he begged his pardon. And when he was on the scaffold, he not only cleared the lady Elizabeth, but referred himself with relation to her innocence, and that she was not privy to their matters, to the declaration he had made to the council. All this account concerning him I take from a relation that his son gave afterwards to the lord Burleigh, marked with that Ex MSS. Petyti. lord's hand on it. It seems the priests at this time understood the interests of their cause better than others did above an age after ; for they moved the queen to shew a signal act of mercy, and to pardon all that had been engaged in this rising.

Only it gave a colour to the severity against the lady Jane Gray and her husband. She was the wonder and delight of all that knew her. I have two of her letters Lady Jane Gray executed. in Latin, writ to Bullinger, copied from the originals all in her own hand, written in a pure and unaffected style. She was then entering on the study of the Hebrew, in the method that Bullinger advised her. She expresses in her letters a wonderful respect and submission to him, with a great strain of modesty, and a very singular zeal for religion. There being nothing in those letters that is in any sort historical, I thought it was not proper to put them in my Collection, though one cannot read them without a particular veneration for the memory of so young and so rare a creature.

And now the government finding all things under their feet, did begin to show the whole nation what was to be expected. All that adhered to the Reformation were sure Severities against the married Clergy. to be excluded from all favour : commissions were sent over the whole kingdom, to proceed, as upon other points, so particularly against the married clergy. These came to York, directed to the guardian of the spiritualities in that place : and the dean and chapter were authorized by the queen to act pursuant to their instructions. And they acted as in a vacancy, though the commission to proceed against the archbishop bears date the 16th of March ; yet on the 9th of March they sent out a general citation of the Reg. Ebor. Sede Vac. f. 65, 66. clergy, to appear before them on the 12th of March. They did not, indeed, begin to deprive any before the 27th of April ; and from that day to the 20th of December, they deprived one-and-fifty, of whom several were prebendaries.

I will here insert a short account of the unjust and arbitrary deprivations of the married clergy, that was published by Parker, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. " What examples have they in stories before-time, that deprivations have been thus handled before our days ? I will not speak of particular cases, where some men have been deprived, never convict, no, nor never called : some called that were fast locked in prison ; and yet they were nevertheless deprived immediately. Some were deprived without the case of marriage after their order : some induced to resign upon promise of pension, and the promise as yet never performed. Some so deprived, that they were spoiled of their wages, for the which they served the half year before, and not ten days before the receipt sequestered from it : some prevented from the half-year's receipt, after charges of tenths and subsidies paid, and yet not deprived six weeks after. Some deprived of their receipt somewhat before the day, with the which their fruits to the queen's majesty should be contented; and some yet in the like case chargeable hereafter, if the queen's merciful grace be not informed thereof, by the mediation of some charitable solicitor. * * * And a little after they were deprived or driven away, twelve or sixteen thousand, as some writer maketh his account." But there are good reasons to think that numbers have been wrong taken of this. Among other suggestions, Dr. Tanner has sent me this; that the diocese of Norwich is reckoned almost an 8th part of all England; and he finds there were only 335 clergymen deprived on that account: by this, the whole number will fall short of 3000. This, it is true, is but a conjecture; yet it is a very probable one, and the other account is no way credible.

I shall, to this, only add another short account of the proceedings at that time, published by Ailmer, afterwards bishop of London. "The bishops that were married were thrust out of the parliament-house; and all married deans and archdeacons, out of the convocation, Many put out of their livings, and others restored, without form of law. * * * Many churches were changed, many altars set up; many masses said, many dirges sung, before the law was repealed." From these accounts, we may easily believe, that when the laws were altered, there was a vigorous and a speedy execution of them.

After all matters relating to the queen's marriage was settled, the emperor sent a fleet for the prince of Spain: and upon that occasion the queen was prevailed on to break through all forms, and to write the first love-letter to him; of which, having met with the original, I have put it in the Collection, as a singularity in such matters. She tells him, "that she understanding that the emperor's ambassador was sending the bearer to him, though he had not written since their alliance had been a treating; yet she, thinking herself obliged by the sincere affection that he had for her, confirmed by good effects, and by the letters that he had written to the emperor's ambassador, could not restrain herself from letting him know the duty in which she intended to correspond always with him: and she thanked him for all his good offices. She acquainted him that her parliament had, without any opposition, agreed to the articles of their marriage, and thought them honourable, advantageous, and more than reasonable. This gave her an entire confidence, that his coming to England should be safe and agreeable to him. She ends recommending herself most affectionately and humbly to his highness, as being his entirely-assured and most obliged ally."

But the matter of the marriage being settled, and afterwards executed, I will now look again into the proceedings of the council. On the 16th of January, one Wotton called an esquire, was committed to be close prisoner in the Fleet, for his obstinate standing against matters of religion. On the 14th of February, letters were written to the lord Rich, and to sir John Wentworth, to punish some in Colchester, Coggeshal, and other places, who dissuaded people from frequenting such divine service as was then appointed by law to be observed. Upon this, many were committed, and others put under recognisances to appear. On the 8th of March an order was sent to the lieutenant of the Tower, to deliver Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, to sir John Williams, who was to carry them to Oxford. On the 26th of March, an order was given to send up Taylor, parson of Hadley, and Askew, of West Hillesly. Barlow, bishop of Bath and Wells, was carried beyond sea, by one Williams, a mariner of Bristol; who returning to Pembrokeshire, some gentlemen there seized on him, and sent him to London: so he was sent to the Marshalsea, and a letter of thanks was written to those who had seized on him, so careful were they to encourage every officious show of zeal.

But now came on the second convocation in this reign, in which all that was done was, that the prolocutor, Weston, with some deputed to go along with him, were ordered to go to Oxford to dispute with the three bishops; of which I can add nothing to the account I formerly gave of it. On the 27th of April, Weston returned, and reported the conference, or examination, of Cranmer and the two other bishops, attested under the seal of the university; and soon after that they were dismissed, for the parliament met on the 2nd of April, and was dismissed on the 5th of May.

Heretics.

A Convocation.

On the 3rd of May, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, being judged obstinate heretics, the judges were asked what the queen might do, since Cranmer was attainted. He was a man dead in law, and not capable of any other censure; and this seems to be the true reason that moved the queen to pardon the treason upon which he was already condemned: for though he was very earnest to obtain a pardon for that, it does not appear that there was any regard had to him in granting it, but on the contrary, it seems, it was resolved that he should be burned as a heretic. And since that could not be done while he stood condemned of treason, this seems to be the only motive of that mercy, which, in this case, was certainly done out of cruelty. On the 20th of May, a servant of the lady Elizabeth's was brought before the council; but there is nothing in particular mentioned, only he was required to attend. There were suspicions of her being concerned in Wyat's rebellion, as appeared in the account given of Wyat himself. It is alleged that Gardiner studied to suborn false witnesses to charge her with that; and that this went so far, that a warrant was brought to Bridges, the lieutenant of the Tower, for her execution, but that he would not obey it till he knew the queen's pleasure. Some credit seems due to this, since it was published in her reign, and was not contradicted, nor denied as far as I can find. But it seems to be denied in a declaration set forth many years after by herself, when she was queen, which shall be mentioned in its proper place. On the 25th of May, some in Stepney were ordered to be set on the pillory for spreading false news; the ears of one were ordered to be nailed to the pillory, and then cut off. On the 26th of May, sir Henry Bedingfeld was sent with instructions, signed by the queen, for the ordering the lady Elizabeth.

On the 1st of June, an order was sent to the bishop of London to send discreet and learned preachers into Essex, to reduce the people there. Bonner seemed to think of no way of reducing any but by severity and force, so that the council found it necessary to put him in mind of his pastoral care. Orders were then given for the reception of the prince of Spain. Some were ordered to be set on a pillory, and their ears were to be nailed to it, and cut off. The duchess of Northumberland desired that her sons might hear mass in the Tower: this was granted, but order was given that none might speak with them. On the 11th of June, orders were given to receive the duke of Savoy at Dover. And on the 5th of July, order was given to punish those who were concerned in the imposture called "the spirit in the wall." On the 6th of July, some of the lady Elizabeth's servants were committed for lewd words of the state of the kingdom. On the 24th of July, two treaties for the queen's marriage, made by the lord Fitzwater, who had been ambassador in Spain, were given to the lord Treasurer.

Now the marriage was made, and the jollities on such occasions put some stop to severities: but it was a short one; for on the 15th of August, letters were writ to the justices of peace, in Sussex, to punish those who railed at the mysteries of Christ's religion. I must observe here, once for all, that the letters themselves, writ by the council, are not entered in the book: these would have set out particulars much more clearly than those short entries do. But there were forms of those letters put in a chest, and the council-book refers us often to the letter in the chest. On the 19th of August, letters of thanks are ordered to Tirrell and others for their care, ordering them to imprison all such as came not to divine service, and to keep them in prison till they had the comfort of their amendment: several men and women were imprisoned in Huntingdonshire. The 20th of August, mention is made of some in prison for words. On the 21st of August, an order was sent to examine into a conspiracy, in Suffolk, by certain lewd persons. On the 16th of September, a letter was ordered to the lord mayor and aldermen of London to punish the spreaders of false rumours.

But now came on the great affair of the reconciling the nation to the see of Rome. The two former parliaments could not be brought up to that; so the court was willing to accept all that they could be brought up to; but when they saw at what they were stuck, they were sent home. And some were so weak as to think, that, by yielding in some things, they should give the court such content as to save the rest. They were willing to return back to that state of religion in which king Henry left it; and did not rightly apprehend that nothing could give the queen an entire content but a total reconciliation with the pope: whereas those who could not come up to this, ought to have stood firm at first, and not, by giving ground, have encouraged the court to compass their whole design. The queen was more than ordinary solicitous to get a parliament chosen to her mind. She wrote a letter to the earl of Sussex; and probably she wrote to all those in whom she confided, in the same strain: it will be found in the Collection. "She had now summoned a parliament to the 12th of November, in which she expected to be assisted by him; and that he would admonish her good subjects, who had a right to elect the members, to choose men of the wise, grave, and catholic sort,—such as indeed meant the true honour of God, and the prosperity of the commonwealth, which she and the king her husband did intend, without the alteration of any particular man's possession, which, among other false rumours, the hinderers of her good purposes, and the favourers of heretics, did most untruly report. She desired him to come up against the feast of All-Saints, at the furthest, that she might confer with him about those matters that were to be treated of in parliament." This is dated the 6th of October; and so careful was that lord to merit the continuance of the queen's confidence, that, on the 14th of October, he wrote to the gentlemen of the county to reserve their voices for the person whom he should name. He also wrote to the town of Yarmouth for a burgess. But now to open more particularly the great matter that was to be transacted in this parliament.

When the news of the change of government in England, and of the queen's intentions, were brought to Rome, it was not possible to deliberate long who was the properest person to be sent legate. Pole had so many meritorious characters on him, that, besides the signification of the queen's desire, no other person could be thought on. A Harmer has given the bull upon which he was sent from Rome: it is dated the 5th of August, 1553, though the queen came not to London till the 3rd of August, and Comendone, who carried her message to the pope, was in London on the 23rd; for he saw the duke of Northumberland's execution. It seems that at Rome, upon king Edward's death, they took it for granted, both that her right would take place, and that she would reconcile her kingdom again to that see; and therefore the bull was prepared. Pole had at that time retired three hundred mile from Rome, to an abbey upon the lake, now called Di Garda. In his absence he was declared legate; upon which he wrote a letter to the queen, on the 13th of August, which I have put in the Collection.

He begins expressing his joy at her exaltation, more particularly at the manner of it, which he reckons a singular work of an immediate providence; in which, as indeed the subject seemed to allow it, he enlarges very copiously. And since she carried the name of the Blessed Virgin, he calls on her to say the Magnificat, applying it to the late providences of God towards herself. He desires her to consider what was the beginning of all the miseries that England had felt: it was the king her father's departing from the apostolic see and the catholic church. He was a witness to all the steps made in that matter; he had upon all occasions asserted both her mother's marriage and her own right; and had done and suffered much on that account. He was, therefore, now most particularly concerned to know what her mind was with relation to religion; and though he was then three hundred miles from Rome, he was named legate to be sent to her, to the emperor, and to the French king; therefore he sent one to her to know her mind. He did not doubt of it; for no person owed more to the apostolic see than she did, since it was upon her account that so much outrage had been done to it. So, before he would proceed in his legate function, he desired to know her pleasure more particularly."

Upon this she wrote an answer on the 10th of October, which is also in the Collection. "She thanked him for all the kind expressions in his letter, and in particular for the good advice he gave her. She was full of reverence and obedience to the holy see; but it was a great trouble to her that she could not yet declare her mind openly in that matter: as soon as it was safe for her to do it, she would let him know it. His messenger would tell him all particulars: she was then crowned. She hoped the parliament would repeal all the bad laws; and that she should obtain the pope's pardon for all her own faults. She sends by him her most humble thanks to the pope for his clemency to her, and for his readiness to forget all that is past." With this she sent back Ormanet to him. The bull that the pope sent to Pole is all a rhetorical panegyric upon the queen's coming to the crown, and on her pious intentions: but bulls being often in a common form, it is not in it, but in the breves, that we are to seek the powers or instructions given to Pole. There was a part of cardinal Pole's register conveyed to me about a year after my second volume was printed: a short account of the most remarkable things in it was then printed, in a letter directed to me. The characters of the truth of the papers are visible: some of them are in Latin, and some in Italian; and because I look on this as a matter of great consequence, I will give a very particular account of them.

The first paper which will be found in the Collection is the breve, that was at first sent Col. Num. 17. him of the pope's own motion, and bears date the 8th of March, 1554. By it

His first Powers. "Pole is empowered to receive all heretics of both sexes and of all ranks, even bishops and archbishops, communities as well as single persons, of what heresies soever guilty, though relapsed in them, upon their true and unfeigned repentance; and to absolve them from all pains and censures, how long soever they had continued in their errors, and though their sins were reserved immediately to the holy see. And he was empowered to pardon all irregularities run into by them; and all the bigamies of ecclesiastical persons, they first relinquishing their wives; notwithstanding which they might be continued in their orders and functions, and might be capable of all ecclesiastical promotions: all infamy being pardoned, provided they, with a contrite heart, should sacramentally confess their sins to any catholic priest at their choice, and submit to such penance as he should enjoin: excusing them from all public confession, abjuration, or open penance: absolving all communities from any unlawful pactions in favour of others, though confirmed by oaths. Empowering him to receive all regulars, and to absolve them from the censures of apostacy, allowing them to possess benefices as seculars: dispensing with the strict observation of Lent, as to milk, meats, and eggs, and even flesh, upon the allowance of either the confessor or the physician. Giving him authority to suffer such of the clergy, under the degree of a bishop, who were married, upon their true conversion, to live in that state, so that no scandals were given by it; only they were not to minister at the altar, nor to do any ecclesiastical function; but they might lawfully continue in the married state, the issue being declared lawful." To this is added a power of uniting benefices.

Next comes the clause concerning the possessors of ecclesiastical goods. "He is empowered to agree, transact, and discharge them, for all the profits they had wickedly received, and for the moveable goods that they had consumed; 'the immoveable goods that have been by them unduly detained being first restored, if that should seem to be convenient to him.' And whatever should arise out of any such agreement was to be applied to the church to which such goods had belonged, or for the advancement of studies, and to schools. There is likewise a power granted to delegate others under him for the care and performance of all these particulars. But because he was to go first to Flanders, and stay in those parts for some time, the pope gave him authority to execute these powers even while he was without the kingdom, to all persons belonging to it that should apply to him, particularly with relation to all orders unduly received; and to confirm bishops or archbishops who had been promoted by a secular nomination during the schism, and had assisted the former kings, though they had fallen into heresy, upon their return to the unity of the church; and to provide to metropolitanical or cathedral churches such persons as should be recommended to him by the queen, according to the customs of the kingdom, upon any vacancy; and to absolve and rehabilitate all clergymen of all ranks, notwithstanding their past errors. All these powers are confirmed, with a full non obstante to all constitutions whatsoever."

Here was a great fulness of favour, with relation to all personal things. When Pole came to Flanders, he was stopped by the emperor's orders, till his power was seen, and sent to England. When they were seen, they were considered as far short of what was expected, and of what seemed necessary for the carrying on the reconciliation quietly through the nation; so Pole sent Ormanet to Rome for fuller powers, and retired to Diligam Abbey, near Brussels. While he was there, he heard the news of Philip's arrival in England, and of the queen's being married to him: upon which he wrote a letter of congratulation to the bishop of Arras, which is in the collection ; and Col.Num.18. on the same day he wrote this acceptable piece of news to cardinal de Monte, Col.Num.19. which is also in the Collection. In the postscript to the bishop of Arras he tells him that Ormanet was returned with fuller powers. He brought with him two breves.

The first is of no importance to this matter ; but because it was thought to be suppressed on design by the writer of the letter directed to me, by him that wrote on this subject in Col.Num.20. king James's time, it is put in the Collection. It sets forth, " That he was sent
 New and ful- first to the Queen of England ; and after that he was constituted legatè à latere, ler powers for mediating a peace between the emperor and the king of France. He had sent to Pole. also very ample powers given him while he remained in Flanders with relation to English persons and affairs. But since, by reason of the schism and other errors, many cases might happen that wanted a provision from the apostolical see, which could not be comprehended within the faculties given him ; and because it is doubtful whether he may yet use them in the queen's dominions, and which of them shall be made use of while he is either with the emperor or the king of France, the pope gives him full power to make use of all faculties sent to him by himself, or by any other deputed by him, and to do everything that he shall think will conduce to the glory of God, the honour of the holy see, and the bringing the queen's dominions to the communion of the church as fully as may be. And while he remained with the emperor, he gave him all the powers of a legatè à latere for all his dominions ; and he gave him the same powers while he should be with the king of France."

The other breve, which is also in the Collection, sets forth, " That upon the hopes of Col.Num.21. reducing the kingdom of England, that had been torn from the body of the to church had sent him his legatè à latere, with all the powers that seemed necessary lands. or proper for effecting that work ; in particular, to agree and transact with the possessors of church goods concerning them. And whereas, by the beginnings and progress already made, there is good hopes of bringing that work to a full perfection, which will go on the easier the more indulgent and bountiful the pope shows himself with relation to the possessions of those goods. The pope, therefore, not willing that the recovering that nation and the salvation of so many souls should be obstructed by any worldly regards, in imitation of the good father who received the returning prodigal, he empowered Pole, in whose prudence and dexterity he put an entire confidence, to treat with all the possessors or detainers of ecclesiastical goods for whom the queen should intercede ; and to transact and compound with them, that they might, without any scruple, enjoy and retain the said goods ; and to conclude everything that was proper or necessary with relation to them. ' Saving always such things in which, for the greatness and importance of them, it shall seem fit to you to consult this holy see, to obtain our approbation and confirmation.' " Upon which he is fully empowered to proceed, with a full non obstante, bearing date the 28th of June. With Col.Num.22. these breves, cardinal de Monte wrote him a letter, in the Roman way, of high compliment, which is in the Collection.

The next letter is from cardinal Marone, which is likewise in the collection. By this it Col.Num.23. appears that Pole had gone to France upon his legatine commission ; and after the usual Roman civilities, " He tells him he had laid his letter before the pope, who was beginning to despair of the affairs of England ; and though the pope had not the patience to read or hear his letter, which was his ordinary custom, yet he told him the sum of it, with which he was satisfied, and said he had given no cause, neither to the emperor nor to any other, to use such extravagant words to him. It seems Pole had desired to be recalled ; but the pope said that could not be done. It would be a great disgrace both to the pope and to the apostolical see, to the emperor himself, and to cardinal Pole, and a great prejudice to England. But he would not write to the emperor upon it ; nor was he resolved about the goods of the church, concerning which he spoke often very variously. He resolved to write both to the queen and to the prince of Spain, which letters, he adds, will be sent by Ormanet, who is despatched with everything necessary for the business, conform to his desire." The rest is all compliment, dated the 13th of July. Then follows a breve, merely in point of form, extending the former powers that were addressed only to the queen, to Philip her husband, dated the 10th of July.

Upon this, the emperor being then at Valenciennes, the cardinal sent Ormanet thither, who gave an account of his audience to Priuli, the legate's great and generous friend, which will be found in the collection. The bishop of Arras told him how much the emperor had the matters of religion at heart, and that he would be always ready to promote them. But when Ormanet pressed him for a present despatch, he said they had no news from England since the marriage, and that before any other step was made it would be necessary to know what ply the affairs of that kingdom were like to take. It was fit to consider whether the powers of securing the goods of the church should come from the legate, or from the king and queen. Then he desired to see the copy of the cardinal's faculties. As to the point of time, Ormanet said it was not fit to lose a moment, since so many souls were endangered by the delay; and the first coming of the prince of Spain ought not to be let slip, by which the honour of the work would be chiefly due to him. As for his faculties, all things necessary were committed to the cardinal in the amplest manner; and more particular resolutions could not be taken but upon the place. Somewhat further passed between them, which Ormanet reserves till he saw the cardinal. The bishop of Arras promised to lay all before the emperor, and to do all good offices. The emperor was at that time so well, that he was often on horseback to view his army, which had then marched to St. Amand, and the two armies were very near one another. This is dated the last of July.

On the 3d of August, the bishop of Arras wrote to the cardinal, "That the emperor received his congratulations on the marriage very kindly, but did not think it was yet proper for him to go to England, till they had a perfect account of the present state of affairs there. To know that, he had that day sent an express thither; upon his return he should be able to give him a more positive answer. He knew the zeal of the king and queen was such, that they would lose no time; but yet they must proceed with such moderation, that the way to a true remedy might not be cut off by too much haste." This is in the Collection. The cardinal had a letter from Bartholomew de Miranda, a friar, who (I suppose) was king Philip's confessor, and afterwards archbishop of Toledo, from Winchester, July 28. It is only a letter of respect, desiring his commands. The cardinal wrote to the bishop of Arras, on the 5th of August. He sent him the copy of his faculties, and expressed a great earnestness in his design of going speedily into England, as soon as the courier, sent by the emperor, should return. He showed himself as impatient of the delays as in good manners he could well do. This is also in the Collection.

King Philip stayed at Winchester some days after the marriage; for on the 4th of August he sent the count of Horn over to the emperor from thence; and by him he wrote a letter, partly of respect, partly of credit, to the cardinal. To this the cardinal wrote an answer, which I have put in the Collection; though, besides such high compliments as are usually given to princes, there is nothing particular in it, only he still insists earnestly for leave to come over. On the 11th of August the bishop of Arras wrote to him, "That he had seen the copy of his faculties, and he joins with him in his wishes to see that kingdom restored to its ancient obedience; he assures him the emperor was pressing the despatch of the matter, and he did not doubt but that it would be speedily accomplished." Pole wrote on the 2d of September to Soto, the emperor's confessor, "thanking him for those pressing letters that he had written, both to the emperor and to duke Alonzo d'Aquilara, with which the legate was so delighted that he writes as one in a rapture upon it, and he animates him to persist in that zeal for promoting this great work."

He was still put off with new delays, of which the best account I can give is, that this being the decisive stroke, there was a close canvassing over England for the elections to this parliament. Since nothing can effectually ruin this nation but a bad choice; therefore, as it is the constant character of a good ministry, who design nothing but the welfare and happiness of the nation, to leave all men to a due freedom in their elections, so it is the constant distinction of a bad ministry, that have wicked designs, to try all the methods of practice and corruption possible to carry such an election, that the nation being ill represented by a bad choice, it may be easy to impose anything on a body of vicious, ignorant, and ill-principled men, who may find their own mercenary account in selling and betraying their country. It appeared in the two former parliaments who they were that could not bear the returning to their old servitude to the papacy. It was, no doubt, spread over England, that they saw the legate was kept in Flanders, and not suffered yet to come over. This seems the true cause why his coming was so long put off. It might be likewise an artifice of Gardiner's, to make the difficulties appear the greater, and by that to enhance his own merit the more. It is plain that till the election was over, and till the pulses of the majority were first tried, it was resolved not to suffer the legate to come over. This seems to be that which he insinuates in his letter to the confessor, when he says, that "the wisdom of the wise has kept the gate so long shut against him."

On the 13th of October, Pole wrote the pope an account of what had passed between him and the bishop of Arras and the emperor himself. The bishop of Arras, as he writes, Col.Num.28. came to him and assured him that the emperor was in the best disposition possible; but it was necessary to come to particulars, to examine all the impediments, and the best methods to put them out of the way. The legate said he had full powers, and desired to know from England what impediments were suggested. He added, this was not a negotiation like that in making a peace, where both sides did conceal their own designs all they could, till they discovered those of the contrary side. Here all had but one design, and he was ready to enter into particulars when they pleased. He had an audience of the emperor, none but the nuncio and the bishop of Arras being present. In it, after usual compliments, the impediments proposed were two; the first related to the doctrine, in which there was no abatement to be made, nor indulgence to be showed. The other was concerning the lands; for the usurpers of them knowing the severity of the ecclesiastical laws, were afraid to return to the obedience of the church: to this the legate answered, that the pope was resolved to extend his indulgence in this case. First, as to all the mesne profits already received, and the censures incurred by that, which was a great point, the pope was willing freely to discharge that entirely: nor did he intend to apply any part of these to himself, or to the apostolical see, as many feared he would; though that might seem reasonable, as a compensation for damages sustained, but he would convert all to the service of God, and to the benefit of the kingdom: and he had such regard to the piety of those princes, that he had empowered him to grant such favours as they should intercede for, and to such persons as they should think worthy to be gratified, and were capable to assist him in the matter of religion. The emperor understanding all this, thanked the pope very heartily for his favour in that matter: he said he had granted enough; he excused himself, that being wholly taken up with the present war, he had no sooner applied himself to consider the matter; now he knew it well: he had already written to England, and he expected a speedy answer from thence, by which he would know the state of affairs there. He knew by his own experience in Germany, that this of the church lands was the point that was most stood on: as to matters of doctrine, he did not believe that they stood much upon that, they neither believing the one nor the other: yet those lands (or goods) being dedicated to God, he thought it was not fit to yield all up to those who possessed them: he added, that though the legate had told him the whole extent of his powers, yet he would do well not to open that to others. He then desired to see his faculties. The legate upon that, apprehending this would give a handle to a new delay, said he had already showed them to the bishop of Arras, and he told the emperor what a scandal it would give to the whole world if the reconciliation should not be settled by this parliament. The queen did not think fit to press it formerly, till she had received that mighty assistance which was now come to her by her marriage; yet if this, which ought to have been the beginning and the foundation of the rest, were delayed any longer, it must give great offence both to God and man. The emperor said, regard was to be had to the ill disposition of the people concerned, who had formed in themselves and others an aversion to the names of obedience, and to a red cap and religious habit. He said some friars whom his son had brought with him out of Spain, were advised to change their habits. They had not indeed done it, nor was it convenient that they should do it. He also touched on the ill offices that would be done them by their enemies abroad, in order to the raising of tumults: (meaning the French). The legate answered, if he must stay till all impediments were removed, that would be endless. The audience ended with this, that he must have a little patience till the secretary whom he had sent into England should return.

Mason was then the queen's ambassador at the emperor's court. He in a letter on the 5th of October, writ towards the end of it (the rest being a long account of the war between the emperor and the French king), concerning the cardinal (which will be found in the Collection), that he was sent by the pope on two designs; the one to mediate a peace between those two powers; the other to mediate a spiritual peace, as he called it, in the kingdom of England: but seeing no hope of succeeding, either in the one or the other, he began to despair: and if he did not quickly see some appearance of success in the last, he would go back to Rome, a sorrowful man; and here Mason runs out, either to make his court to the queen or to the legate, or that he was really possessed with a very high opinion of him, which seems the more probable, as well as the more honest motive: he says "all the world adores him for his wisdom, learning, virtue, and godliness. God seems to dwell in him; his conversation, with his other godly qualities, was above the ordinary sort of men. It would be a strong heart that he would not soften in half-an-hour's talk."

At this time the cardinal wrote a long letter to king Philip in Latin: he tells him he had been now for a year knocking at the gates of the palace, and nobody opened to him: though he is the person that was driven from his country into an exile of above twenty years' continuance, because he was against shutting the queen out of that palace, in which he now lived with her: but he comes with a higher authority, in the name of the vicar of the great king and shepherd, St. Peter's successor, or rather St. Peter himself, who was so long driven out of England: upon this he runs out into a long allegory, taken from St. Peter's being delivered out of prison, from Herod's cruel purpose, and coming to the gate of Mary, where, though his voice was known, yet he was kept long knocking at the door, Mary not being sure that it was he himself. He dresses this out with much pomp, and in many words, as a man that had practised eloquence much, and had allowed himself in flights of forced rhetoric; liker indeed to the declamation of a student in rhetoric, than the solemn letter of so great a man on such an occasion. It is true that this way of writing had been early practised, and had been so long used, even by popes themselves, that these precedents might to warrant him to copy after such originals.

At last the queen sent the lord Paget and lord Hastings to bring him over: their letter upon their coming to the emperor's court is dated from Brussels the 13th of November. In it they give an account of their waiting upon the emperor with the king and queen's compliments. The emperor had that day received the sacrament, yet they were admitted to audience in the afternoon: he expressed great joy when he heard them give an account how matters were in England and roused himself up in a cheerful manner and said, that among many great benefits, he was bound to thank God for this as a main one, that he now saw England, brought back to a good state. He had seen what the kingdom had once been, and into what calamities it fell afterwards: and now he thanked God for the miracles showed to the queen, to make her the minister to bring it again to its ancient dignity, wealth, and renown. He also rejoiced that God had given her so soon such a certain hope of succession: these tidings of the state of her person, with the report of the consent of the noblemen and others touching the cardinal, and their obedience and union with the catholic church, were so pleasant to him, that if he had been half dead they would have revived him: he promised them all assistance, as they should come to need it.

From the emperor they went to the cardinal, who welcomed them with great joy, and with expressions full of duty and thankfulness to the queen. Here they enlarge on his praises:—"They call him the man of God, full of godliness and virtue; and so eminently humble, that he was contented to come into England in such sort as the queen had commanded; not as a legate, but as a cardinal and an ambassador sent to the queen: and they assured the queen, that touching the matter of possessions, all things should pass on the pope's behalf so that every man there shall have cause to be contented." Pole took leave of the emperor on the 12th; he was to set out in slow journeys, his body being then too weak for great ones; in six days he was to be at Calais, where they had ordered everything to be ready for his transportation.

It seems by this that the queen reckoned on it, as sure, that she was with child: though The Queen believed herself to be with child. in that, after the hopes of it were published with too much precipitation, she found herself so much mistaken, that it was believed the grief and shame of it, both together, had an ill effect on her health and life.

About this time there was a very abusive libel, printed in the form of a letter as writ by Bradford to the queen; in which it was said, "that it was believed the queen intended to give the crown to the king, hoping that then he would keep company with her more, and live more chaste, contrary to his nature; for peradventure after he was crowned, he would be content with one whore; whereas he had then three or four in a night: and these not ladies, but common prostitutes." One John Capstoke the printer was discovered; Rymer, T. 15. he was condemned to be imprisoned, and to have his ears nailed to the pillory and cut off; yet he was pardoned. The consideration is not mentioned; it may be easily imagined it was no small one; probably enough it was upon the discovery of some of those whom they were seeking out for the slaughter.

I have nothing to add to what I wrote formerly with relation to this parliament and the reconciliation made in it: no doubt Pole, according to the powers in his breve, Cardinal Pole carries his Powers beyond the limits set him. desired the queen would name such persons to whom the favour of confirming them in their possessions should be granted; but it seems they durst not venture on any discrimination, lest that should have made the excepted persons desperate. So it is evident, that the confirming of all without exception was, if not beyond his powers, yet at least a matter of such importance, that he ought to have consulted the pope upon it; and to have stayed till he had new and special orders to pass it in so full a manner as he did. But still it is plain by the message sent to Rome, that he made the council at least to apprehend that it was necessary to send thither for a confirmation of what he had done; without any limits, upon powers that were expressly limited, and reserved to a confirmation.

On the 12th of December, Mason wrote from Brussels; and after he had given in his Some preach for restoring the Abbey Lands. letter an account of what passed in the diet, upon a letter written to it by the French king: he also writes, "that one of the emperor's council had told him that his master was displeased to hear that a preacher was beating the pulpit jollily" (I use his own words) "for the restitution of the abbey lands: Collection, Number 32. upon this he writes, that if it be so meant by the prince, and the thing be thought convenient, he did his duty: but if it was not so, it was a strange thing that in a well-ordered commonwealth, a subject should be so hardy as to cry thus to the people, to raise storms next summer, against what they were then doing in winter; and if the thing were to be talked of, it ought to be to the prince and council, and not to the people: he reflects on the unbridled sermons in the former times, that they were much misliked: so he hoped that in a good government that should have been amended. He thought the person that preached this might be well put to silence; for he being a monk, and having vowed poverty, possessed a deanery and three or four benefices. He tells them he had heard by the report of other ambassadors, that England was now returned to the unity of the Christian church. He should have been glad that he might have been able to confirm this by some certain knowledge of it; but it was ordinary for the ambassadors of England to know the least of all others of the matters of their own kingdom." A custom of a long Paper-Office. continuance, of which I have heard great complaints made of a later date. On the 25th of December he wrote, that according to his orders, he had let the emperor know the apprehensions the queen had of the progress of her big belly: and that all was quiet, and everything went on happily in England. Upon this the emperor fell into a free discourse with him of the difference between governing with rigour and severity; and the governing in such sort, that both prince and people might “s’entre entendre et s’entre aimer,” mutually understand and mutually love one another. This as it is at all times a noble measure of government, so it was more necessary to offer such an advice, at a time in which it was resolved to proceed with an unmerciful rigour against those whom they called heretics. The queen seemed to be so sure that she was quick with child, that the privy council wrote upon it a letter to Bonner, and ordered him to cause Te Deum to be sung upon it. With such a precipitation was this desired piece of news published.

Some small favour was, at king Philip’s desire, showed to some. The archbishop of York Jan. 18, 1555. was released, upon a bond of 20,000 marks for his good behaviour. How far he recanted or complied does not appear. One thing may be reasonably concluded, that since no more mention is made of the complaint put in against him for keeping another man’s wife from him, there is no reason to think there was any truth in it; for there being so particular a zeal then on foot to disgrace the marriage of the clergy, so flagrant an instance as this in a man put in so eminent a post, would not have been passed over if there had been any colour of truth or proof for it. On the 27th of January, Hopkins, sheriff of the city of Coventry, was put in the Fleet for ill religion. On the 19th of February, some small regard was had to Miles Coverdale, as being a foreigner—for he was a Dane. He had a passport to go to Denmark, with two servants, without any unlawful let or search.

On the 29th of January, cardinal Pole gave deputed powers to the bishops to reconcile all persons to the church, pursuant to the first breve he had from the pope, by which the reconciliation was made very easy, every one being left at his liberty to choose his own confessor, who was to enjoin him his penance: upon which the clergy, both regulars and seculars, were to be entirely restored, confirmed in their benefices, and made capable of all further favours; but those who were accused or condemned for heresy were only to be restored to the peace of the church, for the quiet of their consciences. All canonical irregularities were also taken off; all public abjurations or renunciations were, at discretion, to be either moderated or entirely forgiven; with a power to the bishop to depute such rectors and curates as he shall think fit, to absolve and reconcile all lay-persons to the church. That sent to the bishop of Norwich is still upon record, and was collated with the register, and sent me by Dr. Tanner. With this I have likewise put in the Collection the method in which it was executed; first, the articles of the visitation are in it, in English; then follow rules, in Latin, given by the cardinal to all bishops and their officials. The most material of these is, “that all who were empowered to reconcile persons to the church, were required to enter into a register the names of all such as they should receive, that it might appear upon record who were and who were not reconciled, and to proceed against all such as were not reconciled; in particular, they were to insert Thomas Becket’s name and also the pope’s in all their offices.”

Now came on the burning of heretics. Many had been kept above a year and a half in prison, when yet there was no law against them; and now a law was made against them, which it could not be pretended that they had transgressed. But articles were objected to them, to which they were, by the ecclesiastical law, obliged to make answer; and upon their answers they were condemned. Sampson, in a letter to Calvin, wrote on the 23d of February, “that Gardiner had ordered fourscore of the prisoners to be brought before him, and had tried to prevail on them, both by promises and threatenings, to return, as he called it, to the union of the church. But not one of them yielded except Barlow, that had been bishop of Bath and Wells, and Cardmaker, an archdeacon there.” So this proved ineffectual. How far these yielded does not appear.

It was resolved to begin with Hooper, against whom both Gardiner and Bonner had so peculiar an ill will, that he was singled out of all the bishops to be the first sacrifice. A copy of his process and sentence was sent me by Dr. Tanner, which I have put in the Collection. On the 28th of January he was brought before Gardiner, in his court in Southwark, and is called only John Hooper, clerk. Gardiner set forth, “that the day before he had been brought before him, and others of the privy council, and exhorted to confess his errors and heresies, and to return to the unity of the church, a pardon being offered him for all that was passed, but that his heart was so hardened that he would not accept of it: so he was then brought to answer to certain articles; but he had again the offer made him to be received into the bosom of the church if he desired it. He rejected that; and, as the acts of the court have it, he did impudently break out into some blasphemies." The articles that were objected to him were three:—1. That he, being a priest, and of a religious order, had married a wife, and lived with her; and did, both by preaching and writing, justify and defend that his marriage. To which he answered, acknowledging it was true; and that he was still ready to defend it. 2. That persons married might, for the cause of fornication or adultery, according to the word of God, be so divorced that they might lawfully marry again. To this he likewise answered, confessing it, and saying that he was ready to defend it against all who would oppose it. 3. That he had publicly taught and maintained that in the sacrament of the altar the true and natural body and blood of Christ are not present under the accidents of bread and wine; so that there is no material bread and wine in it." To which his answer is set down in English words, "that the very natural body and blood of Christ is not really and substantially in the sacrament of the altar; saying also that the mass was of the devil, and was an idol." Gardiner, upon this, ordered him to come again into court the next day; and then he did again try by many persuasions to prevail on him: but he continued still obstinate, and said further, "that marriage was none of the seven sacraments; and if it was a sacrament, he could prove there were sevenscore

Hooper, the first Bishop that suffered barbarously used. sacraments." After all this, Gardiner gave sentence, and delivered him over to the secular arm. Upon which the sheriffs of London took him into their hands as their prisoner; but it was resolved to send him to Gloucester, there to receive his crown of martyrdom. And there was a particular order sent along with him to Gloucester, in which he is designed "John Hooper, that was called bishop of Worcester and Gloucester, who was judged to be a most obstinate, false, detestable heretic, and did still persist obstinate, and refused mercy though it was offered to him.

Paper-office. He was sent to be burned at Gloucester, to the example and terror of those whom Col.Num.36. he had seduced. Order is also given, to call some of reputation in that shire, to assist the mayor and the sheriffs of that city. And because this Hooper is, as all heretics are, a vain-glorious person, and if he have liberty to speak he may persuade such as he has seduced to persist in the miserable opinions that he hath taught them; therefore strict order is given that neither at his execution nor in going to the place of it he be suffered to speak at large, but that he be led quietly and in silence for avoiding further infection." This will be found in the Collection. But though his words could not be suffered to be heard, yet the voice of his sufferings, which were extremely violent, had probably the best effect on those who saw both them and his consistency in them. He had been above a year and a half in prison, under much hard usage. He sent his wife out of England, to deliver himself from that which might raise too great tenderness in him, especially if he had seen her ill-used, which the wives of the clergy were in danger of daily. He wrote several letters to Bullinger from the prison, but was so watched that he durst not enter into any particulars. Most of his letters were recommendations of some who were then flying out of England. He in them all expressed much constancy and patience; and he was preparing himself for that in which he reckoned his imprisonment would soon end. He had no other prospect but of sealing the truth with his blood. He was very glad when he knew his wife had got safe to Frankfort, where she lived, and wrote several letters to Bullinger in a very clean and natural style of Latin; they do chiefly relate to her husband's condition.

Among several letters that Hooper wrote during his imprisonment to Bullinger, I find one that is so full, and shows so clearly the temper of that holy man in his imprisonment, that I have put it in the Collection. He had written several letters to him, that it Col.Num.37. seems fell into ill hands, and so came not to Zurich as they were directed, as he found by Bullinger's last letter that some of his were also intercepted. "That last which he had was directed to him, to be communicated to all his fellow-prisoners. He promised that he would take care to send it round among them. The wound that the papacy had received in England was then entirely healed; the pope was now declared the head of that church. The prisoners, who had been shut up for a year and a half, were daily troubled by the enemies of the gospel. They were kept asunder from one another, and treated with all manner of indignities; and they were daily threatened with the last extremities, which did not terrify them.

“They were so inwardly fortified, that they despised both fire and sword. They knew in whom they believed, and were sure they were to suffer for well-doing. He desires the continuance of their prayers; let God do with them what seemed good in his eyes. He sent over to him two books that he had written, the one of true religion, and the other of false religion, which he had dedicated to the parliament, as an apology for the reformation. He gives them liberty to correct them as they thought fit, and desired that they might be quickly printed, for they were well approved by the pious and learned about him. He desires they may not be frightened from doing it, by the apprehensions of any harm that might happen to himself upon that account. He committed himself to God, who was his defence and his guard through Jesus Christ, to whom he had entirely dedicated himself. If God would prolong his life, he prayed it might be to the glory of his name; but if he would put an end to this short and wicked life, which of these soever it pleased God to order, his will be done.” This is dated from his prison, the 11th of December, 1554. It appears that Hooper’s wife was a German, so his sending her in time out of England was a just expression of his care of her.

On the 18th of March, some sacrifices being to be made in Essex, “letters were written by the council to the earl of Oxford and the lord Rich to be present at the burning of those obstinate heretics that were sent to divers parts of that county.” And on the 1st of April, informations being brought that there were preachers at work in several parts of the kingdom, a general order was sent to all sheriffs to seize on them. When that madman, William Thomas, called otherwise Flower, or Branch, was seized on for wounding a priest in the church, they found a cloth about his neck, with these words, “Deum time, idolum fuge;” fear God, and fly from idolatry. He was seized on by Sir Nicholas Hare and Sir Thomas Cornwall: they had letters of thanks from the council for their pains. They were ordered first to examine him, then to send him to the bishop of London, to proceed against him for heresy, and to the justices of peace to punish him for the shedding of blood in the church; and if he persists in his heresy, order is given that he be executed in the latter end of the week, but that his right hand should be cut off the day before.

On the 16th of May, some persons were named, and their appointments ordered, who should be in readiness to carry the news of the queen’s delivery to foreign princes. The lord admiral was appointed to go to the emperor, and was allowed four pounds a-day, and two hundred pounds for equipage. The lord Fitzwater was to go to the French court, and was to have two hundred marks for equipage. Sir Henry Sydney was to go to the king of the Romans, and to have five hundred marks; and Shelley was to carry the news to the king of Portugal, and to have four hundred marks. This was repeated on the 28th of May. The money was ordered to be ready for the immediate despatch of those envoys; and on the 29th of May order was given that the persons named should be ready to go when warned. On the 1st of June, a letter was ordered to the bishop of London, to proceed against some who were suspected to be of evil religion. And on the 3d of June, letters were written to the lord Rich to assist at the execution of some heretics at Colchester, Harwich, and Manintree; a letter was also written to the earl of Oxford, to send his servants to attend on the lord Rich at those executions. It is not easy to guess whether the many letters written upon those occasions were to prevent tumults, because they apprehended the people might rescue those victims out of the sheriff’s hands if he had not been well guarded, or whether it was to celebrate those triumphs over heresy with much solemnity, which is commonly done in those countries where the inquisition is received. At the same time entries are made in the council books of the examinations of several persons for spreading false rumours.

On the 9th of June, letters were written to the lord North, and others, to put such obstinate persons as would not confess to the torture, and there to order them “at their discretion;” and a letter was written to the lieutenant of the Tower to the same effect. Whether this pretended obstinacy was a concealing of heretics, or of the reporters of false news, does not appear; but whatever the matter was, the putting people not yet convict, by that which the civil law called a half-proof (semiplena probatio), to the torture because they were thought obstinate, and would not confess, and the leaving the degree of the torture to the discretion of those appointed for their examination, was a great step towards the most rigorous part of the proceedings of inquisitors. On the 12th of June, orders were given for making out writs for the burning of three persons condemned for heresy in Sussex. On the 13th of June, letters of thanks were ordered to sir Henry Tirrel and Mr. Anthony Brown, for their assisting at the execution of heretics. And on the 15th of June, letters of thanks were ordered to the earl of Oxford and the lord Rich, on the same account. On the 17th of June, letters of thanks were written to those in Cambridge, who had committed some priests to prison; but they are ordered to release them if thoroughly penitent. And on the 18th of June, a letter was written to the bishop of London, informing him that four parishes in Essex did still use the English service. He is required to examine into this, and to punish it; and to send some of his chaplains to preach to them.

On that day, a letter was written from London to Peter Martyr, telling him that it was given out that the queen had said she could not be happily delivered till all the heretics then in prison were burned: for she continued still expecting to be delivered; and on the 24th of June, an order was given to have a passport ready for Shelley, that was to carry the news to Portugal. On the 27th of June, letters were written to the lord Rich to give the queen's thanks to some gentlemen of Rochford, in Essex, "for coming so honestly of themselves to Colchester, and other places, to assist the sheriff at executions." At this time a condition was put in all passports and licences to go beyond sea, that they shall avoid all heretics and all places infected with heresy.

I shall here add a passage, recorded by Fox, of a declaration that was made to himself before witnesses, in the year 1568. A woman told him that she lived near Aldersgate, and was delivered of a boy on the 11th of June, 1555; and after she had borne it, the lord North and another lord came to her and desired to have her child from her, with very fair offers, as that her child should be well provided for; so that she should take no care for it, if she would swear that she never knew or had such a child. And after this some women came to her, of whom one, they said, was to be the rocker; but she would in no case part with her child. This being at the time that the queen seemed to be every day looking for her delivery, may give some suspicions, and puts us in mind of the words of the Preacher, "That which is, is that which has been." On the 30th of June, letters were written to the gentlemen in Kent, to assist the sheriff at the execution of heretics in Rochester, Dartford, and Tunbridge.

On the 2nd of July, upon an information of a commotion designed in Sussex, the opinion of the judges was asked about it; and some judges were sent to proceed in it according to law. Great occasion was taken from foolish discourses to alarm the nation with the apprehension of plots, and the blame of all was to be cast on the concealed preachers that were now hid in corners instructing the people at the peril of their lives. Twelve persons were brought up out of Sussex as guilty of a conspiracy: but I find no more of that matter. Bird, that had been bishop of Chester, and was deprived for his marriage, did now think fit to repent, and engaged so far that Bonner made him his suffragan. He was blind of an eye; and being appointed to preach before the bishop, he chose those words for his text, "Thou art Peter;" but whether his conscience smote him, or his memory failed, he could go no further. So, instead of matter of triumph upon the apostacy of such a man, the shame of such a dumb action turned the triumph to the other side.

On the 9th of July, a letter was written to the bishop of London, directing him that the three condemned heretics should be burnt at Uxbridge, Stratford, and Walden; and he was ordered to proceed against the rest. At this time Pole thought it became him to write to Cranmer, to try how far a piece of highflown rhetoric could work on him, though some think this letter was written a very little while before Cranmer's execution: the original is yet extant. It does very little honour to his memory, being only a declamation against heresy and schism, against a married clergy, and separation from the see of Rome, and the rejecting of transubstantiation. In it all he proves nothing, and argues nothing, but supposes all his own principles to be true and sure. He inveighs against the poor prisoner with some seeming tenderness, but with a great acrimony of style, and in an insulting manner, like one that knew he might say what he pleased; and that there was no room for making remarks and answers to so poor an epistle, which M. Le Grand has thought fit to translate into French; but I do not think it worth the while to put it in the Collection.

On the 14th of July, the archbishop of York was ordered to appear; but no more is said concerning him. There was intimation given of commotions designed at fairs, and orders were sent to sheriffs and gentlemen to watch them. Informations were also brought of a conspiracy in Essex and Suffolk, and of another in Dorsetshire. On the 6th of August, thanks were written to the earl of Oxford and the lord Rich, with the other justices of peace in Essex, for their diligence; desiring them to proceed in their examination of the late intended conspiracy, and to bring the offenders before them. If their offence was found to be treason, they were to suffer as traitors; or if their guilt did not rise up to that, they were to order them to be punished according to the statutes.

On the 28th of August, notice was given to the sheriffs and justices of peace that the king was going to Flanders. The ambassadors sent to Rome did return about the middle of September; and in council, on the 16th of September, the bishop of Ely produced the pope's bull, erecting Ireland into a kingdom, and bestowing on the crown of England the title of King of Ireland. This was given to the bishop of Dublin, with an order to publish it in Ireland; for that insolent pope would not give them audience upon their powers from the king and queen of England and Ireland, pretending that none had a right to assume the title King but as it was derived from him. So, as a special grace, he conferred that regal title on the queen, and then admitted them to audience, after he had made them stay a month waiting for it at Rome. It seems they knew the bigotry of the English court too well to dispute this point; so they yielded it up very tamely, fearing that they should be disowned if they had made any opposition to it. But the main errand they came upon was, to obtain a confirmation of the settlement of the church lands, made in parliament by cardinal Pole, that was not only flatly refused, but a bull was published that in effect repealed it all.

“It begins setting forth what pope Symmachus decreed against the alienating of any lands belonging to the church upon any pretence whatsoever, or farming out the rights of the church. He laid an anathema on all who should be any way concerned in such bargains, and gave an authority to any ecclesiastical person to recover all with the mesne profits; and this was to take place in all churches. Pope Paul II. had likewise condemned all alienations of church goods, and all farms of leases beyond the term of three years; and had annulled all such agreements, farms, or leases. Both the parties, as well the granter as the receiver of such leases, were put under excommunication; and the goods so alienated were to revert to the church. But these prohibitions notwithstanding, of late years, several persons, both of the laity and of the clergy, had possessed themselves of castles and lands belonging both to the church of Rome and to other cathedrals, and even to metropolitan churches; and to monasteries, regular houses, and hospitals, under the pretence of alienations, to the evident damage of those churches and monasteries, without observing the solemnities required by law in such cases; and they continue their possession, by which the incumbents in those churches are great sufferers; and the popes themselves, who were wont to supply the poor who came to Rome out of these lands, are no more able to do that, and can scarce maintain themselves and their families, which turns to the offence of God, the reproach of the clergy, and is matter of scandal to the faithful. Therefore the pope, of his own motion, upon certain knowledge, and by virtue of the plenitude of the apostolic power, does annul all the alienations or impropriations, either perpetual, or leases to the third or to a single life, or beyond the term of three years; or exchanges and farms of cities, or lands, or goods, or rights, belonging to the Roman church; or to any cathedral, monastery, regular house, or to any ecclesiastical benefice, with or without cure; to seculars or regulars, hospitals, and other pious foundations, by whomsoever made, though by popes or by their authority, or by the prelates of cathedrals, monasteries, or hospitals; or the rectors of churches, though cardinals that had been made without the solemnities required by law, in what form of words soever they have been made, though confirmed by oath, and established by a long prescription. All these are by the apostolic authority rescinded, annulled, and made void, and the possessors of such lands are to be compelled by all censures and pecuniary pains to make satisfaction for all the mesne profits received or to be received; and all judges are required to give judgment conform to this bull." Dated the 12th of July.

Thus the pope, instead of confirming what the legate had done, did, in the most formal terms possible, reverse and annul it all. Even papal alienations, or made by the papal authority, are made void. The pretended consent of the convocation is declared null, and all ratifications of what was at first illegally made are annulled. By this also, not only the possessors of church lands, but all the tenants to any estate belonging to the church, who hold for lives or years, beyond the term of three years, may see in this bull how that all that they now hold by those tenures is made void. No doubt the ambassadors of England did all that in them lay to have this bull softened, or to have an exception made for England. But that pope was not to be moved; and perhaps he thought he showed no small favour to England, on the queen's account, in not naming it in this bull, and in not fulminating on the account of the late settlement. Thus the matter of securing the abbey lands by that fraudulent transaction is now pretty apparent.

Pope Paul was in the right in one thing, to press the setting up courts of inquisition everywhere as the only sure method to extirpate heresy. And it is highly probable that the king, or his Spanish ministers, made the court of England apprehend that torture and inquisition were the only sure courses to root out heresy. It has appeared already what orders were given about torture, even to use it at discretion; but another step was made that carried this matter much further.

Instructions had been given in March 1555 to the justices of peace to have one or more honest men in every parish secretly instructed to give information of the behaviour of the inhabitants amongst or about them. One of these was directed to the earl of Sussex, who acted with a superlative measure of zeal. He wrote on the 18th of April this year to the bishop of Norwich, complaining that at a town near him there had been no sepulchre, nor creeping to the cross before Easter. The day after he wrote that letter, it appears by another of his letters that Ket, who led the insurrection in Norfolk, in king Edward's reign, and whose body was hanged in chains, had fallen down from the gallows, and that prophecies were spread about the country of what should follow when that should happen. He ordered the body to be hanged up again, if it was not wasted; and he imprisoned those that gave out these prophecies. He went on to greater matters, and drew up an account of the obedience that the justices had paid to all the instructions and orders that had been sent them. I had a volume of his letters in my hands some years ago; but I wrote out of it only the answers he returned to the sixth article, in these words:—"It is agreed that the justices of the peace in every of their limits shall call secretly before them one or two honest and secret persons, or more, by their discretions, and such as they shall think good, and command them, by oath or otherwise, as the same justice shall think good; that they shall secretly learn and search out such person and persons as shall evil-behave themselves in the church, or idly, or despise openly by words the king's and queen's proceedings, or go about to make or move any stir, commotion, or unlawful gathering together of the people, or that tell any lewd or seditious tales, rumours, or news, to move or stir any person or persons, to rise, stir, or make any commotion or insurrection, or to consent to any such intent or purpose. And also, that the same persons so to be appointed shall declare to the same justices of the peace the ill-behaviour of lewd, disordered persons, whether it shall be for using unlawful games, idleness, and such other light behaviour of such suspected persons, as shall be in the same town or near thereabouts; and that the same informations shall be given secretly to the justices, and the same justices shall call such accused persons before them and examine them, without declaring by whom they be accused; and that the same justices shall, upon their examination, punish the offenders according as their offences shall appear to them, upon the accusation and examination by their discretion, either by open punishment or by good abearing.”

Here was a great step made towards an inquisition, this being the settled method of that court to have sworn spies and informers everywhere, upon whose secret advertisements persons are taken up ; and the first step in their examination is, to know of them for what reason they are brought before them ; upon which they are tortured till they tell as much as the inquisitors desire to know, either against themselves or others. But they are not suffered to know neither what is informed against them, nor who are the informers. Arbitrary torture, and now secret informers, seem to be two great steps made to prepare the nation for an inquisition.

In September, the duchess of Suffolk, who had married Mr. Bertie, went out of the kingdom without a licence ; upon which a commission was sent into Lincolnshire, to take an account of her estate. On the 19th of September, there was a paper cast into a house near Fulham, with some intimations of ill-designs in Essex. The master of the house brought it to the council, upon which they sent orders to that country to see what foundation there was for such suspicions. Tracy (probably the son of him concerning whose will there was much ado made in king Henry's time) had been brought before the bishop of Gloucester ; and he, as was informed, behaved himself stubbornly towards him ; upon which he was brought before the council, and was required to declare his conformity in matters of religion. He promised to do it ; and upon that he was sent back to his country. On the 23d of September, there was some hopes given of the king's coming back ; upon which Sir Richard Southwell was sent to attend on him. On the 9th of October, the governor of Jersey having examined one Gardiner, for speaking some indecent words of the king, desired orders how to proceed against him ; upon which he was ordered to proceed according to the statutes, if these took place in that island ; but if not, according to the custom of the place.

On the 12th of September, Brooks, bishop of Gloucester, who was constituted sub-delegate to cardinal Puteo, the pope's delegate, to try Cranmer (it being it seems thought indecent that Pole, who was to succeed him, should be his judge), came to Cranmer proceeded against. Oxford with Martin and Story, who were the king and queen's commissioners, to demand justice against Cranmer, exhibiting articles against him. Cranmer made a long apology for himself. Among other things, he said, “ The loss of his promotion grieved him not : he thanked God as heartily for that poor and afflicted state in which he was then as ever he did for the times of his prosperity. But that which stuck closest to him and created him the greatest sorrow was, to think that all that pains and trouble that had been taken by king Henry and himself for so many years to retrieve the ancient authority of the kings of England, and to vindicate the nation from a foreign yoke, and from the baseness and infinite inconveniences of crouching to the bishops of Rome, should now thus easily be quite undone, and that the king and queen should in their own realm become his accusers before a foreign power. If he had transgressed the law, they had sufficient authority to punish him ; and to that he would at all times submit himself.” They exhibited interrogatories to him, and he gave his answer to them. In conclusion, they required him to go to Rome within fourscore days, to make his answer in person. He said he was most willing to go if the king and queen would send him.

On the 16th of October, Ridley and Latimer suffered martyrdom ; but Gardiner, who was with impatience waiting for the news, was, soon after he heard it, struck with an illness, in which he languished for some time. Pilkington, bishop of Durham, in a sermon that he preached, said, “ He rotted above ground, so that it was scarce possible to get any to come near him.” He died on the 12th of November. On the 5th of November, orders were given for to dispose of many prisoners.

Cranmer was now to be offered up. Some have thought that upon his attainder the see of Canterbury was vacant, and indeed the chapter of Canterbury acted accordingly ; but the papal authority being restored, he was still, according to the papal law, archbishop, till by a commission from Rome he was judged an obstinate heretic, and was thereupon deprived. When the eighty days were out, a mock process was made at Rome ; in which it was falsely said, that he did not care to appear ; upon which he was declared contumacious ; and then a formal sentence was given in the pope's name, "as sitting on the throne of justice, having before his eyes God alone, who is the righteous Lord, and judgeth the world in righteousness." With such specious words was that grossly unrighteous judgment introduced. And upon that a letter came from Rome on the 14th of December, mentioning his being condemned and deprived, and delivering him over to the secular arm. The deprivation must have passed some days before; for on the 11th of December Pole's bulls were granted, in which mention is made of the see's being vacant, by the deprivation of Cranmer. The writ for burning him mentions his being judged an obstinate heretic by the pope, and deprived by him; and that he had been degraded by the bishops of London and Ely, by commission from the pope: so on the 24th of February the writ was sealed. I have nothing to add to the sad narration I gave both of his fall and of his repentance, and his firm constancy to the last in that amazing instance of holding his hand in the fire till it was almost burnt away, of which Thuanus gives a very particular account, so that the truth of the fact cannot be disputed.

On the 13th of March, the privy council were concerned when they heard his paper of recantation was printed. Rydall and Copeland, two printers, were required to deliver to Cawood, the queen's printer, the books of his recantation to be burned by him. One part of his character may be added out of Pole's letter to him. In one place he says, he hears "it was pretended that he forced no man in points of religion, but behaved himself mildly towards all persons." And in another place he writes, "that it was said his life was unblameable." But though Pole throws that off as of no importance, yet upon his mentioning these good characters, it may be depended on that they were true. Ridley, in that noble letter that he wrote to Grindall, when they were every day looking for their crown, says of him, "that he then showed how well he deserved the great character of the chief pastor and archbishop of this church;" to which he adds, of Latimer, "that he was the ancient and true apostle of Christ to the English nation." In a word, if it had not been for Cranmer's too feeble compliance in king Henry's time, and this last inexcusable slip, he might well be proposed as one of the greatest patterns in history. And if the excesses to which some opinions had formerly carried men did in some particulars incline him to the opposite extremes, this must be reckoned a very pardonable instance of managing the counterpoise without due caution. He was a pattern of humility, meekness, and clarity. He had a true and generous contempt of wealth, and of those shows of greatness that belong to a high station. His labours in searching into all ecclesiastical authors, both ancient and modern, are amazing to those who have seen the vast collections that he writ out on all matters of divinity with his own hand. But now, after a long course of vexation and contradiction, and, in conclusion, after a long and severe imprisonment, he was put to a cruel death by persons whom he had served faithfully and effectually. For he had both served the queen and reconciled her to her father; and he had showed a most particular favour to Thirleby and others who concurred to finish this tragedy. I have put all this matter together, and now I must look back to public affairs.

There was a convocation sat with the parliament in October, and to the middle of November, 1555. Christopherson was chosen prolocutor; and after Bonner had confirmed him, he desired that the lower house would name eight or ten persons to hear some secret propositions that were to be made to them by the king and queen and by the cardinal, concerning the public good of the kingdom and of the church. They upon that did choose the prolocutor, and ten more; and to these the bishop of Ely proposed to offer the queen a subsidy, in return for the great favour she had showed the clergy, in forgiving the first fruits and tenths, and in restoring to the church all the impropriations of benefices, that were then, by the suppression of the monasteries, vested in the crown; for all which the bishop of Ely proposed a subsidy of eight shillings in the pound, to be paid in four years. The last session of the convocation was on the 15th of November; and a memorandum was inserted in these words: "After this convocation was begun there was a national synod, the clergy of York being joined with them;" for which the cardinal thought it safe and fit to take out a licence under the great seal. The first session was on the 4th of November; and in this the cardinal set himself so zealously to remove many abuses, that Mason wrote that many of the clergy wished he were in Rome again.

The earl of Devonshire went out of England this summer. As he passed through Flanders, he waited on the emperor; and, as Mason wrote, he owned that he owed his liberty to him. The queen sent, and offered her mediation between the emperor and the French king: the emperor accepted it, but with very sharp reflections on the French king.

There was in April a treaty of peace between the emperor and the king of France set on foot, in which the queen was mediator, and sent over both Pole and Gardiner to Calais in order to it. The constable and the cardinal of Lorraine were ordered to come from the court, but the pope's death made it be thought more necessary to send that cardinal to Rome: what further progress was made in this does not appear to me, for I take it from a letter of Mason's to Vannes, then the queen's ambassador at Venice. It will be found in the Collection, the original being in Dr. Tanner's hands, who sent me this copy. By this letter it appears that Bolls of Cambridge, and S. Peter Mewtas, were there in prison upon suspicion, but nothing appeared against them. That letter tells us that the princes of Germany were alarmed upon the cardinal Morone's coming to Angsburgh, apprehending probably that he came to disturb the settlement then made in the matters of religion in the empire; but the emperor had sent such powers to his brother Ferdinand, that his coming was like to have no effect. He also tells in that letter that the dean and prebendaries of Westminster were using all endeavours to hinder the converting that foundation into an abbey; and that Dr. Cole was active in it, affirming that monks had not their institution from Christ as priests had; but he saw the court was resolved to have no regard to the opposition they made. He adds, that the duke of Alva was still in England, though he had sent his baggage and servants to Calais.

Mason writes news from the diet, that matters of religion had not been quite settled, but all were to continue in the state in which they were then till the next meeting; and it was provided that all parties should live according to the religion then accepted of them. The emperor seemed resolved not to consent to this. He writes that the allowance of the marriage of the clergy, and in particular of bishops, had been earnestly demanded, but was utterly refused. On the 28th of October, he writes that two monks of the Charter-house had desired the king's letter that they might return to their house, and at least receive their pension. The king answered, that as touching their house, since the parliament was then sitting, it was not a proper time to move it, but when he should come to England he would help them the best he could; and as to their pensions, he ordered Mason to write concerning that to secretary Petre. On the 7th of January, 1555-6, a letter was written to the mayor and alderman of Coventry, to choose some catholic grave man for their mayor for that year. A list of three persons was sent to them, and they were required to give their voices for one of them. These were, John Fitz-Herbert, Richard Wheeler, and one Coleman.

On the 14th of January, a letter of a very singular nature was written to the lord mayor and the sheriffs of London, "requiring them to give such substantial order, that when any obstinate man, condemned by the order of the laws, shall be delivered to be punished for heresy, that there be a great number of officers and other men appointed to be at the execution, who may be charged to see such as shall misuse themselves, either by comforting, aiding, or praising the offenders, or otherwise use themselves to the ill-example of others, to be apprehended and committed to ward; and besides, to give commandment that no householder suffer any of his apprentices or other servants to be abroad, other than such as their master will answer for; and that this order be always observed in like cases hereafter." Philpot's martyrdom had been about a month before this, and he being a man highly esteemed, who went through all his sufferings with heroic courage and christian constancy, it is probable there was more than ordinary concern expressed by the people at his sufferings, which drew this inhuman letter from the council, for they had no sacrifices at that time ready to be offered.

While these things passed in England, the scene abroad was considerably altered by the resignation of Charles the Fifth, who delivered over his hereditary dominions to his son

Philip. He began that with the dominions derived from the house of Burgundy ; after that, he resigned up to him the crown of Spain, and all that belonged to it. Upon that, letters were written to the several states and cities of Spain, on the 17th of January. These were all in one form ; so that which was addressed to the city of Toledo was sent over to the queen, translated out of Spanish into English, which, for the curiosity of the thing, I have put in the Collection.

In it, “ he tells them that which he always denied to the Germans, that for religion’s sake he had enterprised the war of Germany, upon the desire he had to reduce those countries to the unity of the church, that so he might procure an universal peace to all Christendom, and to assemble and assist at a general council for the reformation of many things, that so with the less difficulty he might bring home those who had separated themselves and departed from the faith. This he had brought to a very good point, when the French king allured the Germans to a league with him against their oaths and fidelity to the emperor, and so they made war on him both by sea and land ; and then the French king procured the coming of the Turk’s army into Hungary, to the great damage of Christendom ; upon which he was forced to bring down an army, to the great prejudice of his own person, by his being obliged to keep the field so long that it had brought on him painful infirmities. He was upon that become so destitute of health, that he was not able in his own person to endure the travel, and to use that diligence that was requisite, which proved a great hindrance to many things of which he had a deep sense. He wished he had taken the resolution he was now taking sooner ; yet he could not well do it, by reason of his son’s absence, for it was necessary to communicate many things to him. So he took order for his marriage, and to bring him over to him, and soon after that he resigned to him all his states, kingdoms, and the seigneries of the crown of Castile and Leon, with all their appurtenances, which are more amply contained in instruments which he had signed of the same date with this letter. Trusting that he with his great wisdom and experience, of which he had great proof in all that he had hitherto handled in his father’s name, would now order and defend the same with peace and justice. He therefore having had large experience of their loyalty, fidelity, and obedience, did not doubt but that they would continue to serve and obey him in the same manner and sort as if God had taken him into his mercy. Dated at Brussels the 17th of January, 1556.”

Soon after that he retired to the place he had designed to spend the rest of his days in ; and, according to the account given by my worthy friend Dr. Geddes, there is great reason to believe that he applied himself to serious reflections on religion. No prince knew better than he did both the corruptions and the practices of the court of Rome ; and the artifices and methods by which two sessions of the council of Trent had been conducted. He must likewise have understood the grounds upon which both the Lutherans and the reformed in Germany built their persuasions : he had heard them often set out : but the hurry of business, the prepossession of education, and the views of interest, had prejudiced him so far against them, that he continued in a most violent enmity to them : but now that he was at full leisure to bring all his observations together, and that passion and interest had no more power over him, there are great presumptions to believe that he died persuaded of the doctrines of the reformed religion. Augustin Casal, a canon of the church of Salamanca, was his preacher, and was esteemed the most eloquent preacher that Spain ever produced : he was taken up in the year 1558, and with thirteen more was publicly burned at Valladolid in the year 1559 ; the unfortunate prince Charles and his aunt, donna Juana, then governess, looking on that barbarous execution. Constantine Pontius, a canon of Seville, who was his confessor, esteemed a man of great piety and learning, was likewise taken up by the inquisition for being a protestant : he died in prison, probably enough by the torture the inquisitors put him to : but his bones with his effigies were burnt at Seville ; so were the bones of the learned Egidius, whom the emperor had named to the bishopric of Tortosa, one of the richest in Spain : and at the same time eighteen were burnt alive for being protestants ; of which the history of the inquisition gives this account, that had not the holy tribunal put a stop to those reformers, the protestant religion had run through Spain like wildfire. People of all degrees, and of both sexes, being wonderfully disposed at that time to have embraced it: and the writer of the pontifical history, who was present at some of those executions, says, that had those learned men been let alone but three months longer, all Spain would have been put into a flame by them.

The most eminent of them all was Bartholomew de Caranza, a dominican, who had been confessor to king Philip and to queen Mary, and had been by her recommended to the archbishopric of Toledo. He had assisted Charles in the last minutes of his life. He was within a few months after his death, upon suspicion of his being a protestant, first confined by the inquisition to his own palace at Tordelaguna: and after he had been for seven years kept within that confinement, he was carried to Rome, and kept ten years a prisoner in the castle of St. Angelo; and was at last condemned as one suspected of heresy. That great man had been sent by Charles as one of his divines to the council of Trent, where he preached, and wrote a treatise of the personal residence of bishops. These things put together, make it highly probable that Charles himself was possessed with that doctrine that was so much spread among those who were then most about him. Mezeray tells us, "that at Philip's arrival in Spain, he caused a great many to be burned for heretics in his own presence, both at Seville and at Valladolid, both seculars and ecclesiastics, men and women, and in particular the effigies of his father's confessor: and if reports may be believed, he intended to have made his father's process, and to have had his bones burnt for heresy; being only hindered from doing it by this consideration, that if his father was an heretic, he had forfeited all his dominions, and by consequence he had no right to resign them to his son." This digression will be forgiven me, I hope, both because it belongs to the main design upon which I write, and since our queen was queen of Spain when this persecution was first begun.

There are in my hands two papers concerning the method in which the queen ordered her council to proceed; there is no date put to them: but they were written, either soon after the king went beyond sea, or perhaps about this time; for now king Philip having the Spanish monarchy put in his hands, and being engaged in a war with France, the queen had reason to expect that her dominions might feel the war very sensibly, as afterwards they did: and so it might seem necessary to put the administration of her affairs into a good method. One of these papers is writ in cardinal Pole's own hand, and is a memorial prepared for the queen, of the things that she was to recommend to her council, for she had ordered them to attend on her. It is in the Collection. "First she was to put them in mind of the charge that the king gave them at his departure, which was to be rehearsed to them; and that is, perhaps, the following paper: they were still to attend at court, the matters they were to treat about being of great weight; and they were to lay such matters as were proposed in council before the king, that they might have his pleasure before they were to be executed. They were in particular to know the resolution of the council, touching those things that were to be proposed in this parliament, and these were to be sent to the king that very day: and since the king delayed his coming over, they were to consider whether it were not better to delay the parliament till Candlemas, if there should be no prejudice to her affairs, that money was so long wanted; for there was great need of it at present for the setting out of ships, both for the emperor's passage to Spain, and for the king's return, for the payments due at Calais, for the debt owing to the merchants, the day of payment approaching, and for the debt of Ireland: and she was to ask of her council an account concerning all these things: she was likewise to charge them to call in her own debts, as the best way to clear what she owed to others: and she was to offer them all authority for doing it effectually; and to require them that at the end of every week she might know what came in that week, and what order was taken for the rest. And that all those who have any commission to execute any matter, shall at the end of every week inform the council what progress they have made that week: and that the council should never begin to treat of any matter in the second week, till they were informed of what was done in the former week." Thus she was to be taught what she was to say to them: upon which they, who did not know how weak a woman she was, might imagine that she understood her own affairs well, and thought much of them : whereas the poor bigoted woman was only, as a machine, made to speak and to act as she was prompted by those who had the management of her : for, of herself, she seemed capable to think of nothing, but how to destroy the heretics, and to extirpate heresy.

The other paper is in Latin, and seems to be that which the king had left behind him.

It is also in the Collection. “ He named in it a select committee, to whom the Collection, special care of matters of state, of the revenue, and the weighty affairs of the Number 41. kingdom, were to be referred. These (in a modern term) were the cabinet-council ; and the persons were, the cardinal (in all great matters, when he could conveniently come), then the lord chancellor, the lord treasurer, the earl of Arundel, the earl of Pembroke, the bishop of Ely, the lord Paget, Rochester the comptroller, and Petre, the secretary. Every one of these was constantly to attend, to determine in all matters of state and revenue, and to make honourable payment of all debts, and to do everything in which the honour and dignity of the crown was concerned. They were also earnestly prayed to lay all differences or quarrels among themselves aside ; that so they might amicably, and in the fear of God, deliver such things in council as might tend to the glory of God, and the honour and good of the crown and kingdom. And when there is occasion for it, they were either to come to the queen, or to send some of their body to inform her of everything that came before them : and at least thrice a week, they were to give her an account of all their consultations and actings. In particular, they were to consider when the parliament was to meet, and what things were to be proposed and done in it, and to digest all that in writing. On Sundays they were to communicate such things to the whole council as should be thought convenient to be laid before them. They were to take special care for the payment of debts, for the retrenching of expense, and for the good management of the queen’s estate, revenues, and customs, and for the administration of justice.” Such were the orders laid down : how they were executed, does not appear.

The queen herself never came to council, and the cardinal very seldom. Sometimes they were very few that attended at that board : often not above three or four. And Proceedings now I return to give an account of what I find in the council-book. On the against Here- 19th of January, a letter of thanks was ordered to the lord Willoughby and tics. others in Lincolnshire. At first, upon the condemnation of heretics, notice was given to the council, before the execution, to see if a pardon should be offered them : but they found so few, if any, inclined to accept of it, that they did not think fit to expose the queen’s pardon to any further contempt : so those persons are required to proceed thereafter against all such as should be condemned before them, according to the laws, and not to stay for any order. On the 20th of January, letters were written to the sheriffs of Warwickshire, Bedfordshire, and Cambridgeshire, ordering them, that though the prisoners should be acquitted by order of law, yet to detain them in safe custody till they should hear from the earl of Sussex. On the 14th of February, the council was alarmed with this, that a stage play was to be acted in Shrovetide, and that many were to run to it : so the lord Rich was ordered to hinder the acting of it, and to examine and report what he could learn concerning it. On the 16th of February, there was an order sent to sir Henry Bedingfeld, lieutenant of the Tower, to put two to the torture, and to pain them at his discretion. On the 19th of February, a letter of thanks was ordered the lord Rich for stopping the stage play. He had put the actors in prison, but he gave a good character of them : so he was ordered to set them at liberty ; but to have an eye on all such meetings. Several inquiries were made at this time after seditious books : many examinations and commitments were made on that account.

On the 20th of April, one Harris, a carpenter and gunner at Deptford, was brought before the council for having said on Maundy-Thursdaiy, “ The queen hath this day given a great alms, and has given that away that should have paid us our wages. She hath undone the realm too ; for she loveth another realm better than this.” He confessed the words, but asked pardon, and was dismissed. It seems, about that time, they expected the king’s coming over : for, on the 1st of June, the lord-admiral was ordered to attend on him. On the 21st of June, an order was sent to the lieutenant of the Tower, and to a master of requests, to put one to the torture if he thought it convenient. Information was given to the queen by Wotton, her ambassador in France, that several heretics had fled over to France, and were well received there: in particular, that Henry Dudley (perhaps a son of the duke of Northumberland's) and Christopher Ashton, were plotting there against the queen. Upon that a letter was written to Wotton, to demand that they might be seized on, and sent at her charge to the frontier, to be delivered to her officers. When the draft of this was brought to her to be signed by her, she, with her own hand, interlined these words; "Considering that when the king my husband and he were enemies, I neither did, nor would have done the like."

Wotton wrote over, that the heretics took great advantage from the new war, that the pope engaged the French king to make on the king, after a truce for five years had been agreed to, and sworn by both kings. But the pope sent a legate to France to persuade that king to begin the war. And though the consciences of princes are not apt to be very scrupulous in the observing or breaking their treaties; yet a treaty made and confirmed by an oath so very lately, it seems, made such an impression on that king, that so great an authority was to be interposed to give a colour for the breaking it. Those called heretics took great advantages from this to infuse a horror in people at the papacy, since one who pretended to be the vicar of the prince of peace, became thus an open and a perfidious incendiary.

This, of the pope's dispensing with a prince's oath, gave so great a distaste everywhere, that I do not remember an instance in which it was openly put in practice since that time. But the protestant princes of Germany do believe, as one of the greatest of them told me, that the confessors of the princes of that communion have secret faculties to dispense with their breach of faith, which is so much the more dangerous the more secretly it may be managed. On that ground it was that the prince who told me this said, that, in all their dealings with princes of that communion, they took their word, but would never put anything to their oaths: for they knew that the popish princes reckoned they were bound by their word, as they were men and members of human society, but, for their oaths, they reckoned, these being acts of religion, their confessors had it in their breast to tell them how far they were bound to keep them, and when they were absolved from any obligation by them. But we have seen in our days, to the no small reproach of the Reformation, that princes professing it have, in an avowed manner, shaken off their leagues and alliances with this short declaration, "That they reckoned themselves freed from them;" as if they had been things of so little force they might be departed from at pleasure.

Pole was now, in his synod, labouring to bring the clergy to their duty. On the 13th of December, The Institution of a Christian Man was divided in parcels, to be examined by them; and some were appointed to prepare a Book of Homilies. On the 16th of December, a translation of the New Testament was ordered, and parcelled out: the Seven Sacraments were also treated of. On the 20th of December, the cardinal sent an order to the prolocutor to intimate to all the clergy, more particularly to all deans, that they should confirm no leases that had been made of their benefices. This seems to be done in obedience to the pope's bull, formerly mentioned, that condemned all leases for a longer term than three years. There was offered to them a schedule of some terms that were to be carefully considered in the translation of the New Testament. On the 8th of January that was again considered: propositions were also made for having schools in all cathedral churches. Thus Pole found it necessary to give some instruction in the matters of religion to the nation; for an earnest desire of knowledge in these points being once raised and encouraged, it was neither safe nor easy quite to extinguish that which is so natural to man. And, therefore, instead of discouraging all knowledge, and bringing men to the state of implicit faith without any sort of inquiry, he chose to give them such a measure of knowledge as might be governed and kept within its own bounds. There was in this synod a question moved, What should be done with such of the clergy as should refuse to say or come to mass? but I do not see what was determined upon it. Nor do I see what reason was given them for another petition to the queen, lords, and commons, for maintaining their liberties and immunities, nor what effect it had.

Pole prorogued the synod to the 10th of November, and from thence to the 10th of May.

“ Pro certiore bonorum Ecclesiasticorum quantitatis et qualitatis ratione habenda, majus temporis spatium requiri videbatur.”

A great scarcity of all things.

The reason given is, because the bishops were in their visitations, which could not be soon ended, since a large space of time seemed necessary for their taking an exact account of the quantity and quality of all ecclesiastical goods. I suppose this was the procuring terriers of the lands, and inventories of the goods belonging to the churches; for many orders were given out for restoring such plate and furniture as could be found that had belonged to any church.

From the 10th of May, Pole prorogued the synod to the 10th of November.

The reason given is for the great want and penury of victuals; for I find the dearth at this time was very great. Wheat was at four marks the quarter; malt, at two pound four shillings; peas, at two pound five shillings. But the next harvest proving plentiful, it fell as low as it had been high: wheat was at five shillings, malt at a noble, and rye at three shillings and fourpence a quarter.

On the 28th of July, the council hearing that some naughty books were sent over, and concealed in the duchess of Suffolk's house, ordered the bishop of Lincoln to search for them, and to send them up. On the 19th of July, the council was alarmed with reports of conspiracies in Suffolk and Essex: so they sent orders to inquire about them, and about a zealous man that went about carrying letters and books over the country; from whence he was called Trudge-over: so he was ordered to be sought for. On the 15th of August, a letter was written to the mayor, jurats, and commons at Rye, to choose one of the queen's servants to be mayor for the ensuing year.

On the 21st of August, a letter of thanks was ordered for the earl of Sussex, for his diligence in apprehending those who spread about lewd and seditious reports, with whom he is desired to proceed according to the laws. And as for those lewd priests that had been married, and were found still to repair to their women, they tell him they had written to the bishop of Norwich to cause them to be apprehended and punished: and a letter was at the same time ordered for the bishop of Norwich to that purpose. On the 23rd of August, a letter of thanks was ordered to the lord Darcy, for his apprehending some ill-disposed persons who used conventicles and readings about Harwich. He was to get them to be fined according to their quality, and as he thought fit; and to bind them to appear before the bishop of London. And a letter was ordered to the bishop, either to reduce them to the church, or to order them according to the laws.

On the 4th of September, the earl of Sussex had moved that offenders should be proceeded against by martial law. His zeal is commended; and it was written back to him, “that these deserved to be so used, but that is not thought best; they are to be punished as the laws order. But when they have had their punishment, he shall cause them to be kept in prison and in irons till they know themselves and their duty.” On the 15th of September, a letter of thanks was written to the earl of Sussex, and the justices of Norfolk, for their diligence in punishing one Thomas Long.

At this time they were called on to consider of the danger Calais might be in. So a state of the fortifications, and of what was necessary to maintain the place, was laid before the council; but the giving orders in that matter was delayed till the king should come over, of which they were in daily expectation. For on the 17th of September, they understood that the emperor, with his two sisters, had embarked on the Tuesday before, and that the king was to come to Calais, and from thence to England. Privy seals were at this time sent about everywhere for a loan of money, but it came in very slowly: some took the privy seal, but did not pay in the money. There was about one thousand privy seals given out, at one hundred pounds a-piece. On the 6th of October, a letter was sent to Calais to search for some who had fled from England thither. It is directed to the earl of Sussex, which makes it probable they were heretics; for in that matter his heart was entirely as the queen's heart was. On the 7th of October, the lady Throgmorton was before the council, asking leave to send some supply to her husband, sir Nicholas, who was then in France. The cardinal had told her, in the presence of the lord chancellor and others, that for this one time the queen allowed of it, so it did not exceed forty crowns. It seems the way of exchange was much beset when so small a supply from so near a relation could not be conveyed without such an application. On the 17th of November, a letter was ordered for the bishop of London to receive a companion of him who was called Trudge-over, to be ordered by him according to law ; and they complain to him that a man and a woman of Colchester, that had been sent to him charged with heresy, were returned back discharged by him, but were now worse than they were before. In another book, that seems to be the minutes of the council, it is entered that twenty-four persons were discharged by him, who were still rank heretics.

Calais in danger of falling into the hands of the French.

Prosecution of Heretics.

I find at this time the council was much employed in the matter of the privy seals. Our fleet was then so inconsiderable, that 14,000*l.* being ordered to be applied to the fleet by the lord treasurer and the lord admiral, both for repairing, furnishing, and victualling it, they reckoned that when that was done, 10,000*l.* a year afterwards would answer what was necessary. On the 19th of February, one Christopher Howe was ordered to be proceeded against for some detestable words, not fit to be heard ; so it was ordered that only such parts of them should be opened as might serve for evidence to the jury. On the 21st, complaints were brought of a jailor who suffered heretics to go freely about. On the 24th, the queen expected hourly to hear of the king's arrival ; so the lord admiral and others were ordered to attend on him. An ambassador came at this time from Russia ; he landed in the north of Scotland, and was well received, and nobly treated by the lord Wharton ; for which thanks were written to him. Here several orders are entered concerning the lord Sturton and his servants : three of them were ordered to be hanged in chains at Mere.

I had in my former work given a due commendation to that which seemed to me a just firmness in the queen, not to pardon the lord Sturton for so heinous a crime as the murdering father and son in so barbarous a manner. But since I have lived An Account of Lord Sturton's Execution. long in Wiltshire, I find there is a different account of this matter in that neighbourhood. The story, as it has been handed down by very old people, is this : The day before the execution was appointed, there was a report set about that a pardon or a reprieve was coming down ; upon which the sheriff came to the earl of Pembroke, who was then at Wilton, for advice. That lord heard the report, and was much troubled at it ; so, apprehending some message might come to him from the court, he ordered his gates to be shut somewhat early, and not to be opened till next morning. My lord Sturton's son came down with the order ; but since the gates were not to be opened, he rode over to his father, who received the news with great joy. In the night the sheriff left Wilton, and came so secretly to Salisbury that Sturton knew nothing of it, and believed he was still at Wilton, where he knew he was the night before. But when he was so far gone that the sheriff knew he could not come back in time to hinder the execution, he brought his men together, whom he had ordered to attend on him that day : and so the lord was executed before his son could come back with the order to stop it. I set down this story upon a popular report, of which I have had the pedigree vouched to me by those whose authors, upon the authority of their grandfathers, did give an entire credit to it. So meritorious a man as the lord Sturton was, who had protested against everything done in king Edward's parliament, had no doubt many intercessors to plead for him in this his extremity. I leave this with my reader as I found it.

On the 20th of March, the king came to England ; orders being sent into Kent that the gentlemen should attend upon him in their best apparel. Thanks were afterwards written to them for their readiness in furnishing him with post-horses. On the 17th of April, proceedings are ordered to be made upon a book that is called lewd and seditious. And the countess of Sussex coming over at this time, and bringing letters which gave some suspicion, she was sent to the Fleet. She had been for some years separated from her husband. She was ordered to be examined strictly ; but upon this and many other occasions, particulars are not set forth, and only a general mention is made of the minutes put in the chest.

There is, besides the great council-book, another council-book, which I suppose might be the minute-book, which was perused by my learned friend doctor Kennet, and who communicated to me all the extracts that he had made out of it, and some other manuscripts, which I never saw. It seems it was apprehended that the French designed a descent in Dorsetshire : so orders were sent to make musters in that county, and to have them in readiness in case of an invasion or a rebellion. And three hundred men were sent over to Calais, with orders concerning the fortifications.

On the 14th of June, complaint was made of some naughty plays and lewd books. The council was often alarmed with these plays; but it does not appear whether there was anything in the plays with relation to religion or the government, or whether it was that they apprehended some mischief from the concourse of the people that those representations brought together. One sir Thomas Cawarden was committed to the Fleet for his misbehaviour to the state. He was ordered to be kept a close prisoner, with only one servant, since he had made no manner of submission, and had not acknowledged his offence; but what this offence was does not appear to me. On the 29th of June, orders were given for sending two thousand men to Calais, with directions to distribute them to the places about that wanted a reinforcement the most. Eight hundred and sixty of them were ordered for Guisnes, and a letter was written to the mayor and jurats of Calais to continue their mayor for another year. On the 3d of July, the cardinal made an offer of one hundred men to serve the queen: he was ordered to levy them immediately, and to send them to Dover. Two hundred foot and six hundred horse more were ordered in all haste for Calais; and assurance was given that more should quickly follow. There were then great apprehensions of disorders on the borders of Scotland, which were wholly in the hands of the French.

Bonner at this time gave the city of London a most dismal spectacle, a little removed from the city, perhaps for fear of a tumult, at Stratford, where thirteen persons, eleven men, and two women, were burnt in one fire. He had condemned sixteen to be thus sacrificed; but cardinal Pole heard there was some hope of working on three of them, so there came an order to put them in his hands: and he by the 26th of July prevailed so far on two of them, that a pardon was granted to those two who had been condemned by the bishop of London, but were prevailed on by the cardinal to abjure (a very extraordinary thing, as is mentioned in the pardon), and had received them into the communion of the church, "and he had upon that interceded with the king and queen for their pardon, which they, as true sons of the church, did willingly imitate, and embraced this occasion of showing their zeal." I cannot tell what became of the third person, whom he had taken out of Bonner's hands.

But here I must lessen the character of the cardinal's mildness towards heretics: for on the 28th of March this year he sent orders to proceed against the heretics in his diocese; and on the 7th of July he sent a significant of some heretics to be delivered to the secular arm.

I find likewise by other evidences, suggested to me by the laborious Mr. Strype, that Pole was not so mild as I had represented him. Parker in his British Antiquities, which Strype believes assuredly he can prove that it was written by him, he calls him Ecclesie Anglicanæ Carnifex et Flagellum,—the whip and the executioner of the church of England; and Calfhill, a canon of Christ Church in Oxford, in a letter he wrote to Grindall, bishop of London, mentions the proceedings of the visitors sent to Oxford by Pole; who were Brooks, bishop of Gloucester; Cole, dean of St. Paul's; and Ormanet. He sent them thither, not only to restore the pope's authority, but diligently to inquire if there were any who neglected the pope's ceremonies, and if there were any found that were under the least suspicion (levissima suspicio), they were without any delay to eject them. He writes there was nothing eminent in Ormanet, but intolerable insolence; nothing could be imagined more arrogant than he was. They raged, as he adds, against a great many in the University, and burned in the open market-place an infinite number of Bibles and other books. The like severity was practised at Cambridge, of which Mr. Strype promises an account in the Life of Whitgift, now ready for the press.

The nation began to grow everywhere weary of the cruel executions of so many heretics: the great promoter of these barbarous proceedings was the earl of Sussex. He died in March this year; for his son Thomas, who succeeded to him in his honour, was then deputy of Ireland; and on the 1st of April order was given for a new patent to him, by the title of the earl of Sussex.

the 28th of January, Bonner, as the cardinal's commissary, proposed some heads of Reformation; and the lower house desired leave to offer their propositions. On the 4th of February, a subsidy was agreed to of eight shillings in the pound, to be paid in four years; and on the 9th, he told the bishops that the lower house had agreed to it. Complaint was made of a want of priests to serve the cures: in order to remedy this, and to provide a supply for the smaller benefices, it was proposed that no priest should be taken up to serve in the wars. 2. That the bishops might have authority to unite small benefices, which the priest should serve by turns. 3. That the parishioners of chapels of ease might be obliged to come to the parish church till curates could be provided. 4. That bishops might be authorised by the pope to ordain extra tempora. There was also some consideration had about the furnishing of arms; and a decree passed for the provision of them, after the same rate that the laity had agreed to. But then the convocation was prorogued, first to the 11th of November, and then to the 17th; on which day the queen died.

But now to open the state of the nation: Calais, and the places about, were lost; and the nation was so exhausted, that the supporting the government was no easy thing. The persons most in favour with the two kings of France and Spain, were two clergymen, the cardinal of Lorraine and the bishop of Arras, soon after promoted to be a cardinal. They saw that the continuance of the war made it reasonable on both sides, not to put a stop to the progress of heresy, though it had not that effect in England: they, therefore, at an interview projected a peace; that so both kings might be at full leisure to extirpate heresy out of their dominions.

In order to this, France was willing to make great restitutions: only, from the first opening of the treaty, they declared very positively that they resolved never to part with Calais. A treaty was opened, and the earl of Arundel, the bishop of Ely, and dean Wotton were sent to treat in the queen's name. I shall here only give the abstract of two papers which I found relating to this matter.

The first is the council's letter to the ambassadors, written on the 8th of November, which is in the Collection. The ambassadors saw no hope of the restoring of Calais, so they had moved the council to lay the matter before the parliament. "It was not thought convenient to break it to the whole house: it was thought best to begin with the nobility, and some of the best and gravest sort. But before they made that step, they thought it necessary to ask the queen's mind: she thought it was best to lay it first before the king. Upon which they sent the ambassadors with a letter to the king, and resolved to stay till his answer came. They write that the queen was still sick and weak: they hoped for her amendment; but they were driven to fear and mistrust the worst. In a postscript they tell them, they had received the ambassadors' letters of the 4th, by which they saw the French were resolved not to restore Calais: and that the king told them that his commissioners had almost agreed with the French in all other matters; but he would agree to nothing unless the queen was satisfied. The council ordered the ambassadors to lay before the king the importance of leaving Calais in the hands of the French; and how much it would touch the honour of the king and queen, that so many restitutions being to be made on both sides, this alone should not be restored. The subjects of this realm would certainly be very uneasy at this. The war was begun at the king's request, and for his sake. If to other of the king's allies, places are to be restored that were taken from them some years ago, what then can be judged, if a peace is concluded without this restitution? Yet, on the other hand, if there is an agreement in all other matters" (which is like a giving up of the point), "much were to be endured for the wealth of Christendom. In these matters the ambassadors were ordered to deal plainly with the king, and to study to know his mind; since the French keeping these places might be as great prejudice to his Low Countries as to England. They desire a plain and speedy answer, that they might know what to offer to the nobility and parliament with relation to this matter."

The answer to this belongs to this reign, though it was written on the day after the queen died, signed by the three ambassadors. It is in the Collection. "They had written formerly, that the French king had said he would hazard his crown rather than restore Calais: yet, for all those high words, they did not quite despair. The commissioners of both kings had broke up their conferences, and returned to their masters to give an account of what they had done, and to receive their final orders. The ambassadors believed that if the king insisted positively on the restitution of Calais, that this might induce the French to agree to it: whereas, if the king and his ministers spoke but faintly of that matter, they were sure the French would still refuse to do it. Therefore they did not think fit to use any words to the king, to make him imagine that the queen or the kingdom would consent to a peace without the restoring of Calais: because their instructions were express in that point. The king continued to say that he would make no peace unless the queen should be satisfied: so that if she and her council continued to insist on that point, they did believe the French would restore it, rather than lose the view they had of peace. And whereas the council wrote to them, that if all other things were near agreed, much were to be endured for the peace of Christendom; yet that all others should have restitution, and that poor England should only bear the loss, was hard; especially so great a loss: and they were so far from thinking that the leaving Calais to the French would purchase a sure peace, that they thought, on the contrary, that nothing showed more evidently, that the French did not intend to continue the peace with England especially, than their keeping of Calais. The French could easily annoy England on the side of Scotland, the dauphin being then married to the queen of Scots: and what the French pretend to by that marriage was not unknown to them. (This probably was to claim the crown of England upon the queen's death.) Now if the French kept Calais, the English could neither hurt their enemies nor assist their friends, or be assisted by them so easily as when that place was in their hands. England would be shut out from the rest of Europe: the very knowledge of the transactions abroad would come late to them, and that place would be a scourge for England, as it was before Edward the Third took it; which made him come with his son, and but with a small army, from Normandy into France, and to march through Picardy to besiege it, the enemy pursuing him with a greater army; but he fought through them, till at last he fought them at Cressy, where, though the French were three to one, yet he totally defeated them, and continued the siege till he took it. So the French having Scotland on the one hand, and Calais on the other, it was easy to apprehend what might follow on this. The French would sign any terms with them to keep that place. These would be only parchment and wax. They knew how many parchments king Francis sealed to king Henry; and the present king to king Edward. They saw the effects they had, and if a war should follow between England and France, they were not sure that Spain would join with England: whereas now the king could not honourably make any peace without us; and he himself said he would not: so they did not think Christendom should have a good peace if Calais were left to the French: and it was certainly more the interest of England to continue the war in conjunction with the king, than to make a peace, letting it go, and then be forced to begin a new war, and to have all the burden of it lie upon England. All this they thought themselves bound to lay before the council. The bishop of Ely adds, that he was with the commissioners by the king's order; they had not yet agreed concerning the matters of Corsica and Sienna; the French have likewise demanded the restitution of Navarre: so that some thought the treaty would be broken off without concluding in a peace." The earl of Arundel adds, that "after they had gone so far in their letter, he received a letter from the bishop of Arras, dated the 17th, in which he writes thus:—'The bishop of Ely has told you on what terms we were in this purgatory at his leaving us. The French told us yesterday that they would condescend to everything rather than yield in the matter of Calais, or let that place go out of their hands. And we on our part told them, that without full satisfaction to the kingdom of England, we would not treat with them in any sort. And we parted so, that there is more appearance of a rupture than of a conclusion of the treaty.'" But after all, our ambassadors doubted much whether it would break off only on the account of Calais. If they were in doubt about it, while the queen was yet alive, it may be easily supposed that her death put them out of all doubt concerning it.

And now I am come to the conclusion of this inglorious reign. Campana gives a different account of the immediate occasion of the queen's death, from what is to be found in other authors. He tells us that king Philip seeing no hope of issue by her, and that she was in an ill state of health, designed a marriage between the duke of Savoy and the lady Elizabeth: the queen had a very bad opinion of her sister, suspecting she had ill principles in religion. King Philip thought the duke of Savoy would be a firm friend to him, and a constant enemy to France. But he could never bring the queen to hearken to this: yet now that she was declining very fast, he sent over the duke of Feria to propose the match to the privy council, without any regard to the queen, or to the opposition she might make to it. And he ordered him to use all possible means to bring it to a conclusion. The queen resented this highly; and when she saw it was designed to force her to it, she fell into an extreme melancholy. The privy council did not entertain the motion; and the queen dying in a few days, an end was put to it: for though I find the duke of Feria was in England upon queen Elizabeth's coming to the crown, it does not appear that he made any proposition of that matter to her. What truth soever may be in this, the nation was now delivered from a severe and unhappy, though short reign: in which superstition and cruelty had the ascendant to such a degree, that it does not appear that there was any one great or good design ever set on foot, either for the wealth or glory of the nation. The poor queen delivered herself up to her peevish and fretful humours, and to her confessor, and seemed to have no other thoughts but about the extirpation of heresy and the endowing of monasteries. Even the war, that commonly slackens vigorous proceedings, had not that effect here. Her inexorable hatred of all she accounted heretics was such, that I find but one single instance of a pardon of any condemned of heresy; and that was upon the cardinal's intercession. God shortened the time of her reign for his elect's sake: and He seemed to have suffered popery to show itself in its true and natural colours, all over both false and bloody; even in a female reign, from whence all mildness and gentleness might have been expected; to give this nation such an evident and demonstrative proof of the barbarous cruelty of that religion as might raise a lasting abhorrence and detestation of it.

It was visible that the providence of God made a very remarkable difference, in all respects, between this poor, short, and despised reign, and the glory, the length, and the prosperity of the succeeding reign: so that as far as we can reason from the outward characters of things, the one was all over mean and black, while the other shined with a superior brightness, to the admiration of all the world. It wanted no foil to set it off, being all over lustre and glory: but if that was wanting, the base and contemptible reign that went before it could not but add to its brightness.

One amazing character of Providence in her death, and in the great successor that came after her, was, that at the time that the two ministers, being both ecclesiastics, of the kings of France and Spain, were designing a peace, with the view of destroying heresy, upon the conclusion of it, their project was entirely blasted in so critical a minute: first, by the death of queen Mary, and the succession of queen Elizabeth; and next, by the unlooked-for death of the king of France in July after. So that not only the design totally miscarried, but France fell under the confusions of a minority; and under which that they called heresy gathered great strength. And the cruelty of the Spanish government occasioned the revolt of the Netherlands; while the glorious queen of England protected and assisted both so effectually, that king Henry IV. owned his being supported by her in his lowest state, was the chief means that brought him to the possession of the crown of France; and the United Provinces had their main dependence on the protection and assistance that they had from her. So mercifully did God deal with this nation, by removing that queen, that he had set over it in his wrath; and so graciously did he watch over the Reformation, that, in the very time in which the enemies of that work reckoned it was to be rooted out, he raised up a glorious instrument that not only revived it among us, but by a kind and tender influence watched over it, and protected it everywhere. So I now turn to view the auspicious beginnings of that blessed reign.

PART III.—BOOK VI.

OF THE BEGINNINGS OF QUEEN ELIZABETH'S REIGN.

1558. No prince ever came to the throne in a more clouded state of affairs than this queen did: the nation was engaged in a war both with France and Scotland. The queen had no ally but king Philip; and though she was sensible of her particular obligations to him, yet, being resolved to make alterations in religion, she knew she could depend no longer on him when once these should be begun. The duke of Feria, then his ambassador in England, took all occasions to let her understand that his master was the catholic king, and that, therefore, he must protect that religion. The papists whom she found in the ministry possessed her with fears of rebellions at home, and of wars from abroad, if she set herself to alter religion. Those she brought into her councils, in conjunction with the papists, chiefly Bacon and Cecil, had been so accustomed to comply with what they condemned in matters of religion, that they brought themselves to bear what they did not approve; and they apprehended great danger if they should proceed too quick in those matters.

The queen's inclinations to the Reformation were universally relied on. Her education and knowledge; her bad usage during the former reign; and her title to the crown, that was grounded on a marriage made in defiance to the pope, led all people to conclude that, what slow steps soever she might make in it, she would certainly declare for it as soon as she saw she could be safe in doing it. Upon this some, whether out of a forwardness of zeal, or on design to encourage her, began early to pull down images and to make changes. But, on the other hand, the priests apprehending what was like to follow, began at the same time to alarm the people. Some broke out into seditious words, to animate the people against all changes; and the pulpits being all in their hands, they had free scope there to give the alarm. Some went further, and called her title to the crown in question, and set up the pretensions of the queen of Scotland. Of these, the industrious Mr. Strype has gathered many instances that showed, on the one hand, their seditious tempers, and, on the other hand, the great mildness of the government,—different from the cruelty of the former reign. To put a stop to these, she did by one proclamation prohibit all preaching; and by another, all alterations by private hands.

As her ministers advised this caution in matters of religion, so they persuaded her to digest the loss of Calais, and to come into a peace with France and Scotland.

They likewise thought of new alliances. In order to this, Mount was brought into England again; and had secret instructions given him by Cecil to go to all the princes of Germany to know how far the queen might depend on their assistance, and to receive the advices that the princes offered with relation to the affairs of England; and in particular, concerning a proper marriage for the queen. He found them ready to receive the queen into the Smalcaldic League; chiefly, if the Reformation that was intended might be made upon their model.

The match they all proposed was with Charles of Austria, the emperor Ferdinand's second son, brother to Maximilian, the king of Bohemia and Hungary, who was known to be a protestant: for though he complied in the outward acts of the popish worship, yet he had a minister in his court whom he heard frequently preach. Both the elector palatine and the duke of Wirtemberg assured Mount that Charles designed, as soon as he durst, for fear of his father's displeasure, to declare himself of their religion. He said to one of these princes, "I love the religion that my brother holds, and approve of it; and will, by the grace of God, profess it openly." He told him, "that his father suspected this, and had pressed him to take an oath that he would never change his religion. He refused that; but said to his father, that he believed, as he did, all that was in the New Testament, and in the orthodox fathers." Upon which the emperor said, "I see this son is likewise corrupted." They thought this match would be a great strengthening of the queen: it would engage the whole house of Austria in the protestant religion, and unite the whole empire in an alliance with the queen. This was writ to the queen in the year 1559; but in the copy I saw, the particular date is not added.

The news of the queen's coming to the crown no sooner reached Zurich, than all those who had retired thither resolved to return to England. They had been entertained there both by the magistrates and the ministers, Bullinger, Gualter, Weidner, Simler, Lavater, Gesner, and all the rest of that body, with a tenderness and affection that engaged them to the end of their lives to make the greatest acknowledgments possible for it. The first of these was, in all respects, the chief person of that society, with whom they held the closest correspondence. Peter Martyr was likewise there, and was treated by them all with a singular respect, even to a submission. Jewel was first formed by him at Oxford; and so continued to his death in a constant commerce of letters with him, writing always to him by the title of Father. I saw a great volume of those letters, as I passed through Zurich, in the year 1685; so I was desirous to have the volume sent me, but I found that by their rules that could not be done. I also understood that there were several letters relating to our affairs scattered through several other volumes; so professor Otto did kindly, and with much zeal, undertake to get them to be copied for me. The person who managed and procured this for me was that pious and learned professor at Geneva, Alphonsus Turretin, born to be a blessing to the state he lives in. He has given the world already, on many occasions, great instances of his exquisite learning, and of a most penetrating judgment, having made a vast progress in a few years; in which a feeble and tender body, though it is a great clog that gives his friends many sad apprehensions, yet cannot keep down an exalted mind from many performances that seem to be above both his years and his strength. But how valuable soever these qualities are, yet his zeal for the great things of religion, and his moderation in lesser matters, together with a sublime and exalted piety, is that which I observed in him, even when he was scarce out of childhood; and have, with a continual joy and delight, seen the advances of it ever since. This grateful account of him I owe not so much to his friendship (though I owe a great deal to that), but to his rare and singular worth. By his means I procured copies of the letters that our reformers continued to write, chiefly to Peter Martyr, Bullinger, and Gualter. And with them I have a solemn attestation, under the seal of that noble canton, of their being true copies, carefully collated with the originals, which I have put at the end of the Collection. If there had not been many interruptions in the series of those letters, they are so particular, that from them we should have had a clear thread of the history of that time; but many of them are lost, and they are wanting on some of the most critical occasions. I shall make the best use of them I can, as far as they lead me.

Horn and Sands went first to England; so Jewel, who was following them, writes from Strasburg, on the 26th of January, 1559, to Peter Martyr; and adds, "that they were well received by the queen; that many bishoprics were void; Christopherson was certainly dead. That White, whom Martyr knew well, had preached the funeral-sermon when queen Mary was buried,—the text was, 'I praised the dead more than the living:' in which he charged the audience, by all means, not to suffer any change to be made in religion. Inveighing against the fugitives that might perhaps return into England, he said, whosoever should kill them would do a deed acceptable to God." Upon this he writes, "that both the marquis of Winchester, and Heath, archbishop of York, seemed highly displeased at it." He adds, "that Bonner was obliged to restore to Ridley's executors all his goods that he had violently seized on, and was confined to his house." I have seen a copy of White's sermon: in it he commends queen Mary for this, that she would never be called Head of the Church. Though the falsehood of that is on record, in the writs that were sealed for above a year after she came to the crown. He runs out with great fury against heresy: Geneva is, in particular, named the seat of it. He says queen Mary's death was like the death of an angel, if they were mortal. He insinuates his fears of "flying in the winter on the Sabbath," or "being with child;" all which he represents as allegorical. Yet he has some decent words of the queen ; and says, they were to comfort themselves for the death of one sister in the other that survived.

Gualter wrote to one Masters, who was the queen's physician, and was well known to him, on the 16th of January. He congratulates the happy change of their affairs. "He wishes" (I translate his words strictly) "that they would not hearken to the counsels of those men, who, when they saw that popery could not be honestly defended nor entirely retained, would use all artifices to have the outward face of religion to remain mixed, incertain, and doubtful ; so that while an evangelical reformation is pretended, those things should be obtruded on the church, which will make the returning back to popery, to superstition, and to idolatry, very easy. I write not these things to you," he adds, "as knowing that there are any such among you ; but I write from a fear that there may be some such. For we have had the experience of this for some years in Germany, and know what influence such persons may have. Their councils seem, to a carnal judgment, to be full of modesty, and well fitted for carrying on an universal agreement ; and we may well believe that the common enemy of our salvation will find out proper instruments, by whose means the seeds of popery may still remain among you." A little after he writes, that "he apprehends that in the first beginnings, while men may study to avoid the giving some small offence, many things may be suffered under this colour that they will be continued but for a little while ; and yet afterwards it will scarce be possible, by all the endeavours that can be used, to get them to be removed, at least not without great strugglings." Dr. Masters, in answer to this, tells him he had laid his letter before the queen, and that she had read it all. He promises to use his best endeavours for carrying on a sound reformation. This plainly insinuated their fears of somewhat like what was designed by the Interim in Germany.

The Earl of Bedford had some time at Zurich, and wrote to them. Col Num. 46. Francis, earl of Bedford, had gone out of England in queen Mary's time, and had stayed some time at Zurich. He had expressed a true zeal for the Reformation, and a particular regard for the divines there, of which a letter in the Collection gives a clear account ; and upon that they wrote often to him, and pressed him vehemently to take care in the first beginnings to have all things settled upon sure and sound foundations.

On the 24th of January the convocation was opened ; but the bishops, in obedience to the queen's proclamation against preaching, did not think fit to open it with a sermon. Those who I find are marked as present, are the bishops of London, Winchester, Lincoln, Worcester, Coventry, and Litchfield, and the abbot of Westminster : these appeared personally ; and the bishops of Ely, Peterborough, and St. Asaph, sent their proxies. But no mention is made of the bishops of Bath and Wells, St. David's, Llandaff, and Exeter. All the other sees were then vacant : Canterbury, Salisbury, Norwich, Chichester, Hereford, Gloucester, Oxford, Bangor, Bristol, and Rochester ; ten in all. Harpsfield was chosen prolocutor. He asked what they had to do, and what was to be done to preserve religion ? The bishops answered, they must pray the queen that no new burden might be laid on the clergy in this parliament. This was to prevent the demand of a new subsidy, the former not being yet paid. In the 7th session, the prolocutor offered to the bishops the five articles mentioned in my history. These they had drawn up for the discharge of their consciences, and they desired the bishops to be their leaders in this matter. The bishops received their paper, and promised to offer it next day to the House of Lords. In the next session, the prolocutor and clergy came up and asked the bishops if they had delivered their paper to the House of Lords ? Bonner answered that they had delivered it to the lord-keeper, the mouth of that house, who to all appearance received it kindly or thankfully (gratanter), but gave them no answer. The clergy desired the bishops to get an answer from him, or at least to know his pleasure before their next meeting. In the 9th session, the bishops told the clergy that they had not yet found a fit opportunity to obtain an answer from the House of Lords. On the 10th session, Bonner told the clergy that all their articles except the last, which was, "That the authority of treating and defining in matters of the faith, of the sacraments, and of ecclesiastical discipline, belonged to the pastors of the church, and not to the laity," were approved by the two Universities.

Proceedings in Convocation.

After this came only perpetual prorogations from day to day, without any business done, till the 9th of May, in which the convocation was dissolved: so this was the last and feeble struggle that the popish clergy made in convocation.

The bishops stood firm in the House of Lords, where there were none of the other side to answer them, few of the temporal lords being very learned. They seemed to triumph there, and hung so upon the wheels, that there was a slow progress made. On the 20th of March, Jewel writes to Peter Martyr, "That after a journey of fifty-one days from the time he left Zurich, he got to London, where he was amazed to find the pope's authority was not yet thrown off. Masses were still said, and the bishops continued still insolent. Things were beginning to mend a little. A public disputation was then resolved on; and he adds, that the queen spoke with great esteem of Peter Martyr. The inferior sort of the populace was both ignorant and perverse. He tells him Brooks, bishop of Gloucester, whom he calls an Impure Beast, was newly dead; and cried out as he was dying that he was damned.

Jewel, in a letter to Bullinger from London on the 22d of May, 1559, which is in the Collection, after great acknowledgments of his obligations to him, and to all Zurich, "thanks him for quickening them to act with zeal and courage. There was need of it; for, besides those who had been always their enemies, the deserters who had left them in the former reign were now their most bitter enemies. Besides this, the Spaniards had corrupted the morals of the nation to a great degree. They were doing what they could, and all things were coming into a better state. The queen did very solemnly refuse to be called Head of the Church. She thought that title was only due to Christ. The Universities were strangely corrupted by Soto, and another Spanish monk. It was scarce credible how much mischief they had done in so little time. He tells him that the lord Bedford had asked him what would be the most acceptable present that he could send to him and his brethren. He answered, nothing could be so acceptable to them as his expressing a zeal for promoting the gospel, and against popery. That lord assured him he would do that faithfully; which, as he writes, he was doing very sincerely. He writes also how that several princes were making addresses to the queen for her marriage; but many suspected her inclinations lay to one Pickering, a worthy and pious man, and one of a most noble figure as to his person." He refers him for other things to his letters to Peter Martyr. On the 6th of April, Jewel wrote a particular account of the disputation, which, though it is upon the matter the same that is in my History, yet since it is both a confirmation of it, and has some circumstances that are new, I have put it in my Collection. "He tells him that Cole treated the reformers with many reproaches and much scorn; and called them seditious incendiaries. He delivered his speech with great emotion, stamping with his feet, and putting himself as in convulsions. He said the apostles divided their work into two provinces, the Western and the Eastern: the first, St. Peter and St. Paul had given to them, where the worship was to be all in Latin; the Eastern division fell to the other apostles, where all was to be performed in Greek. This he introduced with pomp as a thing certain. He affirmed that it was not fit the people should understand the public worship, for ignorance was the mother of devotion. The paper prepared by the reformers was read gravely and modestly by Horn; so that all who were present, he names the earl of Shrewsbury in particular, acknowledged the victory was clearly on their side. By this, and by what happened the second day, the popish cause sunk much in the opinion of the people."

On the 28th of April, in another letter, which is in the Collection, he tells Peter Martyr how earnestly the bishops contended in the House of Lords. "Feckenham defended monastic orders from the sons of the prophets, and the Nazarites among the Jews; and said Christ and his apostles were monks. None struggled more vehemently than Thirleby. He saw a design at court of seizing on the bishops' manors, and assigning parsonages to them instead of them; but he laments most of all that no care was taken of schools, or of promoting learning. The universities were in a most miserable condition. The earl of Bedford pressed the queen to send for Peter Martyr: she said she would do it. But as much as Jewel desired to see him, he writes, that he would not advise his coming over if he was not sent for with such an earnest and honourable invitation as he deserved to have. He saw many of the queen's ministers were in hope to enter into the Smalcaldic league. And one, who had been a bishop, possessed them with an opinion, that if Martyr were brought over, that would obstruct the other design." He expresses an ill opinion of that person, but does not name him. It must have been either Barlow, Scory, or Coverdale; for these were all the bishops of the Reformation that were then alive. Coverdale, as being a Dane, is the likeliest to have been engaged in the Lutheran opinion. He concludes his letter, that those who had returned from their exile were yet in great misery, no care being taken of them.

His next is on the 10th of April. "He laments the want of zeal and industry in promoting the Reformation, far short of what the papists showed in queen Mary's time. Then everything was carried on violently, without staying either for law or precedent; but now everything is managed in so slow, so cautious, and prudent a manner, as if the word of God was not to be received upon his own authority: so that as Christ was thrown out by his enemies, he is now kept out by his friends. This caution made, that the spirits of those that favoured them were sunk, while their enemies were much exalted upon it; yet he acknowledges, that though no law was made abrogating the mass, it was in many places laid down. The nobility seemed zealous in their hatred of popery. The queen had, indeed, softened her mass much; but there were many things amiss that were left in it. If she could be prevailed on to put the crucifix out of her chapel, it would give a general encouragement. She was truly pious, but thought it necessary to proceed by law, and that it was dangerous to give way to a furious multitude."

Cox, on the 20th of May, wrote to Weidner, another divine of Zurich, whom he calls a venerable old man. He tells him "that they found the short reign of queen Mary had such effects in hardening the minds of the people in their superstition, that it would not be easy to change the nation. Great opposition was made to every good motion by the scribes and pharisees in the House of Lords; for there was none there that could maintain arguments against the bishops. But the divines, who were returned from their exile, were called to preach at court before the queen, where they plainly affirmed that the pope was Antichrist, and that their traditions were blasphemies. Some of the nobility came every day over to them, and many of the people, but not one of the clergy: they stuck all together as a body that was not to be moved." He tells him the event that the public disputation had, and that now king Edward's laws were to be revived. "Thus," says he, "God has regarded the low estate we were in; and with his fatherly compassion has pitied us, and taken off the cross we lay under. God grant these his great and inestimable benefits may never be forgotten by us!" But he laments, that while there was so great a harvest, there were so few labourers.

All business was brought to a good conclusion in parliament. The king of France's unlooked-for death had given such a change to the face of affairs abroad, that the queen and her ministers seemed to be animated with more courage than had appeared hitherto. Of this there is a letter of Jewel's in the Collection. In the beginning of August, it appears, from another letter in the Collection, that preachers were sent to many different parts. "Many northern counties were assigned to Sands. Jewel had a large province: he was to make a circuit of about seven hundred miles, through Berkshire, Gloucestershire, Somersetshire, Devonshire, Cornwall, Dorsetshire, and Wiltshire. The popish bishops made a very poor address to the queen, persuading her not to change the state of religion; to which she answered very resolutely. And they, rather than abjure the pope once more, which they had often done before, were resolved now to relinquish their bishoprics. It was plain they had no religion among them, yet now they pretended conscience. They were full of rage; and one of the artifices they used at that time to keep the people from receiving the Reformation was, the giving out of prophecies that this change would be short-lived. Howsoever the queen had courage. So he thanks God for the state to which their affairs were then brought. Matters went well in Scotland: Knox was preaching in many places of the country, well guarded; the monasteries were everywhere pulled down, and all the superstitious stuff that was in them was destroyed. The young king of France took, among his titles, both England and Scotland. He understood it was designed to make himself bishop of Salisbury, but he was positively resolved to decline it." In the letters sent me from Zurich, I find none of Grindall's on this occasion : but Mr. Strype, in his Life, has informed the world that Grindall, when he knew he was designed to be a bishop, wrote to Peter Martyr for his opinion in several matters. I shall give the substance of his letter : " He did not approve of the queen's taking away the estates of the bishoprics, and giving them parsonages instead of them. He thought this was the patrimony of the inferior clergy ; so he did not see how they could be supplied, if these were given to the bishops. He had also a doubt concerning the popish vestments. At another time he asked his advice, whether the popish priests, upon their changing again, should be received and continued in their functions ; or whether such of them as had been concerned in the late cruelty ought not to be prosecuted for that."

To all this Peter Martyr answered, " that, for the taking away the bishops' estates, and giving them parsonages for them, they could neither hinder nor help it ; but they ought, out of them, to support the clergy that laboured in those parishes. For the habits, he confessed he did not love them ; for while he was a canon in Oxford he never would use the surplice. He thought they ought to do what they could to get them to be laid aside ; but that if that could not be done, he thought he might do more good, even in that particular, by submitting to it, and accepting a bishopric, which might give him an interest to procure a change afterwards. As for the popish priests, he advised the forgiving all that was past, and the receiving them according to the practice of the primitive church in the return of the Arians to the orthodox body. But they were to watch over them, and to instruct and examine them with more care." This answer came too late, for Grindall was consecrated before he got it ; but it was, no doubt, a great satisfaction to him to find that a person, whom he esteemed so highly, approved of the resolution that he had taken : in which it was probable Jewel's opinion, of whom they had all a high esteem, might contribute to settle him. For though he disliked the use of those vestments, and treats the insisting so much on it with great contempt ; yet, on the other hand, he blames those who laid too much weight upon that matter, and so looked on it as a thing of more importance than truly it was.

They all rejoiced in the happy turn of affairs then in Scotland, the much greater part of that nation declaring themselves openly and zealously against popery.

Here I shall insert an account concerning Scotland, of what happened in the reign of king Henry ; but that came not to my knowledge till the impression of this volume was advanced to the reign of queen Mary. The Scottish nation was so well disposed towards the Reformation, that immediately upon king James V.'s death, which was in December 1541, there appeared a wonderful inclination among them to be better informed in matters of religion. Cardinal Beaton, to prevent this, had got a will to be forged in the name of the deceased king, constituting him regent ; but as that was discovered to be a forgery, so the nobility had no regard to it, but owned the earl of Arran to be the second person in the kingdom ; and that he was next to the young queen, and the heirs of her body, the heir of the crown. So they took the oaths of allegiance to the queen as their sovereign, and to the earl of Arran as their governor, till the queen was of perfect age : and upon that the cardinal was secured.

A parliament was summoned to meet in May 1542, in which the regency of the earl of Arran was of new confirmed on the 13th of May ; and all the subjects were required to obey him in all things pertaining to that office, conform to the acts formerly made, which were again ratified by that parliament. They also ratified the oaths that had been taken to him by some lords spiritual and temporal ; and all who were present were required to confirm these oaths by solemn oaths in full parliament ; which they all did by the holding up of their right hands, swearing that they would be true and obedient to the lord governor, and serve him with their persons, kindred, friends, and goods, and no other, during the queen's nonage.

On the 15th of May, they ordered an authentic publication to be made of all they had done under the great seal ; and they all affixed their seals to the instrument made to confirm this settlement. On the same day a council was named : six of these was the number that was at the least necessary to concur with the governor. The cardinal was not one of them ; the archbishop of Glasgow, who was lord chancellor, with the bishops of Aberdeen, Murray, Orkney, Ross, and Brechin, and the abbots of Dunfermline and Cowper, were for the ecclesiastical state. The earls of Angus, Huntley, Murray, Argyle, Bothwell, Marshall, Cassilis, and Glencairn, and the lords Erskine, Ruthven, Maxwell, Seton, and Methuen, for the nobility ; with some other commoners of the boroughs. After whom, the treasurer, the secretary, the clerk of register, the justice clerk, and the queen's advocate, are named. It seems they intended that no peers should be created but with the concurrence of the parliament ; for the governor, with the advice and consent of the estates of parliament, made the lord Stewart of Ochiltry a peer, to have vote and place in parliament. In the same record, mention is made of the draught of an act offered by the lord Maxwell to the lords of the articles in these words :

“ It is statute and ordained, that it shal be lawful to all our sovereign lady's lieges to have the holy writ of the New Testament and the Old in the vulgar tongue, in Inglis or Scotts, of a good and tru translation ; and that they shall incurre no crime for the having or reding of the same : provided always, that no man dispute, or hold opinions, under the pains contained in the acts of parliament.”

The lords of articles found this reasonable, and thought that the Bible might be used among all the lieges of the realm in our vulgar tongue, of a good, true, and just translation, because there was no law showed to the contrary ; and therefore they agreed that none should incur any crime for having or reading it, nor be accused for it, but added the proviso that was added to the draught offered to them.

But the archbishop of Glasgow did, in his own name, and in the name of all the prelates of the realm that were present in parliament, when the act came to be read in full parliament, “ dissent (simpliciter) to it, as being one of the three estates of the parliament : and they opposed them thereto unto the time that a provincial council might be had of all the clergy of this realm, to advise and conclude thereupon, if the same be necessary to be had in the vulgar tongue, to be used among the queen's lieges or not, and thereafter to show the utter determination that shall be done in that behalf.” Upon this he demanded an instrument to be made according to the forms in that kingdom : but notwithstanding this opposition, the act passed ; for in the same record there is an order entered, as signed by the governor, requiring the clerk of register to cause the acts passed in parliament to be proclaimed ; “ and in special the act made for having the New Testament in vulgar tongue, with certain additions.” In the copy sent me, this bears date the 19th of March ; but I believe it should be May, since the matter was not before the parliament till May. I have set down all this matter almost in the words of the record of parliament that was sent me.

In the same record, the instructions are set down that were given to the ambassadors that were sent to treat concerning the queen's marriage with Edward, then prince of Wales. In which it appears that they thought it necessary, if their sovereign went out of the kingdom, even after she was of perfect age, yet that the governor of the realm should continue to exercise his authority all the days of his life ; and that, after his death, the nearest lawful person of the blood should succeed to the said office by a large and ample commission, of which they order a form to be devised.

The free use of the Scriptures was a great step to let the nation look into the nature of the Christian religion : and the clergy foresaw well the consequences that would naturally follow upon it ; so it was no wonder that this was opposed so zealously by them. It was a great piece of foresight to secure the nation by having a governor with full powers still residing amongst them. In the subsequent treaty with France, there was not that care nor precaution used : but at the conclusion of the marriage, the French proceeded in so perfidious a manner, as to give a warning to all who in future times should treat with that court. For on the 4th of April 1558 (a fortnight before the articles of the marriage were settled, which was on the 19th of April), the young queen being then but little more than fifteen, a secret act was passed ; in which, after she had set forth the ancient alliance between the two crowns, and the honourable entertainment that she had received from the present king of France ;

“She, to confirm and establish the affection between the two kingdoms, and in order to unite the kingdom of Scotland to the crown of France, in case she should die without heirs of her body, had made some dispositions in favour of the crown of France, which she intended should have their full effect: yet she, by a communication with the deputies sent from Scotland, saw into the secret designs of some, who were practising to the effect, that in default of heirs of her body, the crown should descend to some lords of the country; depriving her by that means, to her great regret, of the power of disposing of it. Yet since she could not at that time openly oppose them for certain just causes of fear; and considering that she was out of her kingdom, and had no strong places in it at her own disposal; and that great troubles might arise, if what she was then doing should be publicly known, especially considering the present war with the kingdom of England: she therefore did protest, that what consent or agreement soever she should make to the articles and instructions sent over by the states of her kingdom with relation to the succession, in case she should die without heirs of her body; she intended still, that the disposition then made in favour of the crown of France should have its full and entire effect, notwithstanding any agreement she had made, or should yet make, conform to these instructions, as a thing contrary to her will and intention.” Upon which she demanded an act from the keeper of the great seal, Bertrandi, who was made a cardinal that year*.

This instrument was signed by her and by the dauphin, and is printed in the great collection of the treaties of France that was published twenty years ago. Recueil des Traités, t. 2. opens a scene of treachery; that how much soever the design was suspected (as p. 508. will appear by the paper, of which an account will be given in the following relation), yet it was never certainly known till they themselves had made their own shame thus known to the world. But at that time this was so carefully concealed, that Francis the Second sent a formal obligation under his great seal, by which he bound himself to the duke of Chatellerauld, to maintain his right of succeeding to the crown of Scotland, in case the queen should die without heirs of her own body. The original obligation is still preserved in Hawdton. The queen’s secret act was as ill grounded in law as it was perfidious in itself: for certainly, what power soever our princes, with the concurrence of their parliaments, have to limit the succession to the crown, our princes themselves cannot, by any private act of their own, alter the succession, or dispose of it at pleasure. But to return to that which has led me into this digression.

The knowledge of religion, that the free use of the Scriptures brought the nation to, had such an effect, that the Reformation was everywhere desired; and the vices and ignorance of the popish clergy gave all people an aversion to them. This was long connived at even by the queen mother during her government: but now that she thought all was sure, she threw off the mask, and declared herself an open enemy to those whom she had courted hitherto, and seemed to favour. Upon this there was a great and a sudden turn. Popery was the object of all men’s hatred: the churches were purged from idolatry and superstition: the monasteries were broke into; and many acts of hot and irregular zeal were complained of in all the corners of the kingdom.

One thing is not a little to the honour of Knox and his followers in that tumultuary Reformation, that the multitude was so governed, even amidst all that popular heat, that no blood was shed, and no man was killed in it: which being positively delivered by Lesley †, bishop of Rosse, that must be looked on as a testimony beyond exception.

But since the affairs of Scotland have not hitherto been so clearly represented as I find them stated in some original papers that I fell on in the Cotton Library, I will give a full account of them as far as those papers do guide me.

There is a long representation drawn up of the breach of faith, and of the violation of their laws during the government of the queen-regent of Scotland: at the end of which there is a petition to the queen, signed by the great lords of that kingdom, in which both papists and protestants concurred. And in order to obtain that concurrence, the matters of religion are not insisted on : but the continued course of a perfidious and illegal administration is charged on the queen-dowager. So that from this it appears that the war was not begun nor carried on upon the account of religion, but upon the pretence of public and national rights. I have put it in the Collection.

* See page 824, where mention is made of two other instruments relating to this secret treaty, which had not come to the bishop’s hands when this page in the original edition had been printed off.—Ed.

† Nobilium qui hæreses obstringebantur crimine, humanitas non est reticenda, quod eo tempore paucos catholicos de religionis re mulctarint exilio, pauciores carcer, morte nullos.—Leslaus de Rebus Scot. l. 10.

Collection,
Number 53.

“ They begin it to show that the arms that they were forced to fly to was no rebellion. They run the matter back to the first proposition for carrying their queen into France : which, they say, was obtained, partly by corruption with money, partly by authority, and partly by fair promises : yet before that was agreed to, a treaty was made by the parliament, and sworn to, as well as ratified by the great seals of the king and dauphin of France, that Scotland should be governed by their own laws, and by the nobility and people of Scotland : that all offices should be given to them ; and that no garrisons of the French should be admitted to settle in the kingdom. Great practice was made after that to bring the parliament to consent that their queen should marry the dauphin : and to obtain that, the succession to the crown was declared to belong to the duke of Chatelherault and his heirs, after heirs of the queen’s body. New oaths were then taken, and charters given under the great seal of France, and under their queen and the dauphin’s seal, that Scotland should be governed by a council of natives : the castles were also to be put in sure hands. Duplicates of these were lodged in the castle of Edinburgh, and with the duke of Chatelherault. Upon this an embassy was sent to France of two bishops, two earls, and four lords, and the marriage was concluded. They were upon that dealt with to endeavour that the crown of Scotland might be given to the dauphin. They refused to undertake that ; and believed that it could not be brought about. The word upon that was changed. And it was desired only that the matrimonial crown might be sent him ” (which was afterwards explained in the act of parliament that granted it, that he should be king of Scotland during life). “ The lords were suffered to return : but when they came to Dieppe, one bishop, two earls, and two lords died in one night. The three that were left came home much amazed, believing that the others had been poisoned.”

Here I must add another particular relating to that deputation. In the council-book, that goes from April 1554 to January 1558, that was cast by and neglected, many leaves being cut out of it, and was first discovered by a nephew of mine, whom I desired to search their register for me ; it appears that on the 13th of December 1557, there was a tax laid on the kingdom, to be paid in before Easter, for the expense of that embassy, of 15,000*l.* Scots money, that is, 1250*l.* sterling, which was to be levied by the same proportion that all the taxes were then levied ; of which there are several instances in that book : the one-half was levied on the spirituality ; and two-thirds of the other half was on estates in land, and the other third was levied on the boroughs. This shows that the estates of the spirituality were then reckoned by a settled proportion, the full half of the kingdom. The persons deputed were the archbishop of Glasgow, the bishop of Orkney, and the prior of St. Andrew’s (afterwards earl of Murray), the earls of Cassilis and Rothes, and the lord Fleming, with the provost of Edinburgh and of Montrose. When I wondered how so small a sum could answer the expense of so great an embassy on such an occasion, he showed me that either the value of money, or, which is the same thing, the value of things to be purchased by money, is almost incredibly changed now in the course of one hundred and sixty years ; of which he gave me this instance : the tun of wine was then by act of parliament to be sold at twenty livres, or in sterling money at 1*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* ; and in retailing it, their pint, which is four English pints, was to be sold at four farthings, their penny having six farthings ; so that reducing this to English measures, three quarts of wine were to be sold at a penny. This I thought was a small digression, which the reader would not be ill pleased to find laid in his way. To return to the Scotch memorial.

“ The queen-dowager took two methods to gain her point : the one was to show favour to all those who had received no favour of the duke during his government, because they were in the interest of England ; whereas he was at that time in the interest of France : the other was, she offered them a permission to live according to their conscience in religion : in conclusion, the queen-dowager brought the parliament to give the matrimonial crown to the dauphin ; but with this condition, that the duke's right should not be impaired by it.

“ When all this was obtained, the queen forgot all her promises : she began with the greatest of the Scottish lords then in office, the earl of Huntley, who was then lord chancellor, and the duke's particular friend : she took the great seal from him, and gave it to one Rubay, a French advocate : she also put the earl of Huntley in prison, and set a great fine on him, and left him only the name of chancellor. She made another Frenchman comptroller, who had the charge of the revenue of the crown : and she put all Scotchmen out of the secrets of the council, committing these only to Frenchmen. She kept in several places garrisons of Frenchmen, who lived on discretion. She gave them no pay. She sent the revenue of the crown to France ; and brought over some base money that was decried in France, and made it current in Scotland. She also set up a mint for coining base money, with which she paid the soldiers. She tried to get the castle of Edinburgh into her hands, but that failed her. She gave such abbeyes as fell void to Frenchmen, as to her brother the cardinal of Guise, and others : and for the space of three years she kept all that fell void in her own hands, except such as were of any value ; and these she bestowed on Frenchmen. Nor did she ever follow the advice of those lords who upon her first entering upon the government were named to be of the council. Many intercessions were made to her upon these proceedings by the nobility : sometimes companies of them joined together ; and sometimes they applied to her more privately, for they foresaw that they could not be borne long.

“ The queen dowager set herself next to a practice, which of all others was both the most dangerous and the most dishonourable, to set aside the duke and his house : pains was taken to engage the lord James and other lords in it, who had no friendship for the duke ; to whom the queen-dowager promised that she would bear with their devotion in religion, if they would join with her against the duke in favour of the French. This encouraged them to do those things by which they incurred the censures of the church, and were, by reason of a law not much known, brought in danger of the guilt of treason : so process was ordered against them ; and upon that the queen-dowager tempted them to engage in the French interest : but that not prevailing, they were declared traitors. The rest of the nobility being alarmed at this, the queen-dowager brought out her French garrisons, and disposed of their estates, and entered into St. John's Town in a warlike manner : she changed the magistrates, and left a garrison in the town. The whole nation was alarmed at this, and were coming together in great numbers. But she not having force enough to conquer the nation, sent for the duke and the earl of Huntley, and employed them to quiet the country, promising that everything should be redressed in a parliament that should be held next spring, with many other more particular promises : upon this assurance, these lords quieted the country : while this was a doing, the duke's eldest son being then in France, was sent for to court, but he had secret advertisements sent him, that it was resolved to proceed against him to the utmost extremity for heresy ; upon which he kept out of the way till an order was sent to bring him in dead or alive : upon that he made his escape ; but they seized on a younger brother of his, of the age of fifteen, and put him in prison.

“ In Scotland the nobility had separated themselves, trusting to the faith that the duke had given them, that all things should be kept quiet till the parliament. But some companies coming out of France to Leith, the queen-dowager ordered that town to be fortified, and put twenty-two ensigns of foot with one troop of horse in it. The nobility upon that charged the duke with breach of faith, who could do no more but press the queen to forbear to give such cause of jealousy ; but all was to no purpose. The town was fortified ; all the ammunition she had was carried into it, and the French continued still to be sending over more forces. The duke, with the nobility, represented to the queen-dowager, that it was now plain she designed a conquest : but she despised all their requests, for by this time the French thought they were so strong, that they reckoned it would be a short work to subdue Scotland. There were but two or three mean lords, Bothwell and Seaton, that kept company with the queen-dowager ; yet even these signified to their friends, that their hearts were with their countrymen : upon all this, the duke, with the rest of the nobility, and with the barons and burgesses of the realm, seeing an imminent danger to the whole nation, and no hope of remedy at her hands, began deeply to consider the state of the kingdom: their sovereign lady was married to a strange prince out of the realm, and wholly in the hands of Frenchmen, without any council of her own natural people; and they considered the mortality of her husband, or of herself without issue. The queen-dowager, sister to the house that ruled all in France, persisted in ruining the liberties of her daughter the queen's subjects, on design to knit that kingdom for ever to France; and so to execute the old malice of the French on the crown of England, of which they had already assumed the title.

"They upon all these grounds were constrained to constitute a council for the government of the kingdom, and for the use of their sovereign, to whom they had signified the suspension of the queen-dowager's authority; maintaining that being sore oppressed with French power, they had, as natural subjects, sufficient strength for that; though they are not able to stand against the power of France, but partly for the right of their sovereign; and partly for the ancient rights of the crown, they have been forced to spend their whole substance; yet they cannot longer preserve themselves from being conquered by the power sent over from France; a greater force being promised to be sent next spring. They therefore lay the whole matter before the queen of England's ministers then upon their borders; and commit their cause to her protection; desiring nothing but that their country may be preserved from France, together with the rights of their sovereign and of the whole nation."

To this they add a petition, "That the numbers of French soldiers then within the kingdom might be removed speedily; that so they might live quietly, and be suffered to offer to the king and queen such articles as were necessary for the peace and good government of the kingdom, without alteration of their ancient liberties:" this was signed by the earl of Arran, as he was then called, but that was his father's title; for he had no higher title in Scotland: the son therefore signed James Hamilton. It was also signed by the earls of Argyle and Glencairn; by lord James, afterwards created earl of Murray; and by the lords Boyd, Ochiltre, Maxwell, and Ruthven; and by a son of the earl of Huntley's; and a son of the earl of Athol's; both these families being at that time papists. And thus by the tenor of this whole paper, it appears that religion was not pretended to be the cause of the war.

Upon the suspending the authority of the queen-regent, I will here add a particular reflection, which will show what archbishop Spottiswood's sense was when he first wrote his history of that transaction. He gives an account of the opinion that Willock and Knox delivered when they were called and required to give it, which they did in favour of that suspension: for which he censures the opinion itself in these words:—"Howbeit the power of the magistrate be limited, and their office prescribed by God, and that they may likewise fall into great offences; yet it is nowhere permitted to subjects to call their princes in question, or to make insurrection against them. God having reserved the punishment of princes to himself." Yet in a fair manuscript of that history, written with great care, as for the press, this whole period was first penned quite in another strain; "allowing the states of the kingdom a right to restrain their prince when he breaks through rules; only censuring clergymen's meddling in those matters." This is scored through, but so that it is still legible, and Spottiswood interlined with his own hand the alteration; according to which his book was printed. This manuscript belonged to me, and forty-two years ago, I presented it to the duke of Lauderdale, and showed him that passage, on which he made great reflection. I cannot find out in whose hands that manuscript is fallen; but whosoever has it, will, I hope, justify me in this particular; for though I am not sure as to the words, yet I am very sure they are to this purpose*.

* The bishop at the end of his third volume appended the following notice respecting this manuscript:—"I have laid out by all the methods I could think on, for that MS. of archbishop Spottiswood's History, that I mention p. 285 [orig. ed.]. I once thought I had found it; for I fell on one copy that had belonged to the late duke of Lauderdale: but it was not that which had belonged to me: yet by that I see, that the archbishop came gradually, and not all at once, out of his first opinion. For in this MS. there is a material difference in the correction that is in the archbishop's own hand, from the first draught. The draught is 'that princes may commit offences deserving deprivation,' but the correction is, 'that they may fall into great offences,' without any more. A

When this representation and petition was brought to the queen, Cecil drew up a state of the matter, which will be found in the Collection; putting this as the question, "Whether it was meet that England should help Scotland to expel the French or not?" for the negative "he says, it was against God's law, to aid any subjects against their natural prince or their ministers: it was also dangerous to do it: for an aid secretly given would be to no purpose; and an aid publicly given would draw on a war: and in that case the French would come to any composition with the Scots to join with them against England: since they will consent to anything, rather than suffer Scotland to be united to the crown of England: he adds, it may also be apprehended that the emperor, the king of Spain, the pope, and the duke of Savoy, with the potentates of Italy, will join with the French king, rather than suffer these two kingdoms to be joined in one manner of religion; and many within both kingdoms will not approve of this. But in opposition to all this, he concludes for assisting the Scots.

"He lays it down for a principle, that it is agreeable to the laws of God and of Nature, that every prince and state should defend itself, not only from perils that are seen, but from those that may probably come after: to which he adds, that nature and reason teach every person politic, or other, to use the same manner of defence, that the adversary useth of offence. Upon these grounds he concludes that England might, and ought to assist the Scots to keep out the French: and so earnest was that great statesman in this matter, that he prosecutes it very copiously.

"His first reason is that which the Scots would never admit, but he might think it proper to offer it to an English council; 'that the crown of England had a superiority over Scotland, such as the emperor had over Bohemia or Milan. He next shows that England must be in great danger from the French, if they became the absolute masters of Scotland. Upon this he runs out to show that the French had been long enemies to England; that they had been false and double in all their treaties with them these seven hundred years: and that the last peace was forced from them by their poverty. That France could not be poor above two years; nor could it be long without a war; beside the hatred that the house of Guise, who then governed the French councils, bore to England. They call in question the queen's title, and set up their own against it; and at the treaty of Cambray they set that pretension on foot; but it was then stopped by the wisdom of the constable; yet they used means at Rome to get the queen to be declared illegitimate: upon which the bull was brought into France: and at the solemnities, in which the king was killed, the arms of England and Ireland were joined with the queen of Scots' arms. The present embroilment in Scotland is the stop that now restrains them from carrying these pretensions further: but as soon as they can, they will certainly set them on foot: and the assaulting England by the way of Scotland is so easy, that it is not possible to avoid it but by stopping the progress of that conquest. A war by the way of Scotland puts France in no danger, though it should miscarry; but England is in the utmost danger if it should succeed. He concludes that as the matter was of the last importance, so no time was to be lost; since the prejudice, if too long delayed, would be irrecoverable.'"

What further steps were made in the secret debating of this point, does not appear to me but by the conclusion of the matter; for the queen sent forces, under the command of the duke of Norfolk, to the borders of Scotland. What followed upon that is set out fully in the common historians, and from them in my former work.

But a copy of the bond of association, into which the lords and others in Scotland entered (the original of which still remains in the possession of the duchess of Hamilton), will set out more particularly the grounds that they went on. It is in the Collection; and it sets forth, "that they promised faithfully, and in the presence of God, that little after he had written, 'whatsoever may be thought of this opinion'; which imports some doubt concerning it: these words are struck out, but so that they are still legible. A little after that the MS. has it, 'that by an act of council, all the errors committed by the queen-regent were reckoned up.' This is softened by these words inserted after 'errors';—'alleged to have been committed.' Thus it appears that the archbishop's first notions had carried him to write in a style that wanted great correction, as his thoughts grew into a better digestion, or as his interests carried him to see things in a different light from that in which they had at first appeared to him."

they would, to the utmost of their power, set forward the reformation of religion, according to God's word, that the true preaching of it might have a free passage through the whole kingdom, together with the administration of the sacraments. And that they, considering the misbehaviour of the French among them, and the intolerable oppression of the poor by their soldiers, maintained by the queen dowager under colour of authority, together with the tyranny of their captains, and the manifest danger of becoming their conquest, to which they were then reduced by fortifications on the sea-coast, and other attempts, do promise to join with the queen of England's army, then come in to their assistance, for driving out those their oppressors, and for recovering their ancient liberty; that so they may be ruled by the laws and customs of their country, and by the natives of the kingdom under the obedience of the king and queen their sovereign. And they promise, that they shall hold no private intelligence with their enemies but by the advice of the rest, or at the least of five of their number. And that they shall prosecute this cause as if it were the cause of every one of them in particular, and hold all who withstand it as their enemies; and that they will prosecute them as such, according to the orders of the council, to whom they refer the direction of the whole matter, promising in all things to submit to their arbitration."

This was first subscribed at Edinburgh on the 27th of April, in the year 1560; and is signed by the duke of Chatelherault, the earls of Arran, Huntley, Argyle, Morton, and some others, whose hands are not legible; and by the lords Salton, Ruthven, Boyd, Ogilby, Ochiltre; the abbot of Kinloss; and the commendator of Kilwinning. About one hundred and forty more subscribed it. This was the bond that was signed by those who were at that time at Edinburgh: and it is probable that many other bonds of the same nature were signed about the same time in other parts of the kingdom; but they have not been so carefully preserved as this has been. The earl of Huntley, though he continued still a papist, signing it, shows that either the ill usage he had met with from the queen dowager had shaken him in his religion, or that provocation and interests were then stronger in him than his principles. But I leave my conjectures, to go on with the history.

On the 2nd of November, Jewel, being returned from the circuit which he was ordered to make, wrote (in a letter to Peter Martyr, to be found in the Collection), "that the people were much better disposed to the gospel than it was apprehended they could be." But he adds, "that superstition had made a most extraordinary progress in queen Mary's short reign. The people were made believe they had, in many places, pieces of the true cross, and of the nails, with which Christ was crucified; so that the cathedral churches were dens of robbers; and none were more violent and obstinate than those who had been before of their body; as if by that they would justify their falling off from them. They had turned them all out. Harding went away, and would not change again: Smith, who had been a violent opposer of Peter Martyr in Oxford, fled towards Scotland, but was taken on the borders and brought back, and had abjured a fifth time, and was then become a violent enemy to the papists." In another letter he tells him, "Smith was married; and that being hated and despised by all sides, he was forced to keep a public house." Jewel wrote, "that if they had more hands, matters would go well; but it was hard to make a cart go without horses. He was glad to hear Peter Martyr was sent for; but he owns he had his fears still, that, though things were begun well, they would not end so well. He adds, 'we are islanders in all respects.' Oxford wanted him extremely. The queen was then courted both by the king of Sweden and by Charles of Austria." It was then given out that Sweden was full of mines of gold, and only wanted skill and industry to work them. But he writes, "perhaps the queen meant to marry one nearer at hand:" (he gives no other hint in that letter, to let it be understood of whom he meant; probably it was Pickering, as appears in another letter). He concludes, "that though religion did make a quick progress in Scotland, yet that the French did not despair of bringing that kingdom back to their obedience, and of restoring their religion in it."

On the same day he wrote to Simler, who had congratulated him upon the news they had of his being to be promoted to a bishopric. He wrote, "that there was yet nothing but a nomination of him." He adds, "we hope our bishops shall be pastors, labourers, and watchmen; and that they may be better fitted for this, the great riches of bishoprics are to be diminished, and to be reduced to a certain mediocrity: that so being delivered from that king-like pomp, and the noisiness of a courtly family, they may live in greater tranquillity, and may have more leisure to take care of Christ's flock with due attention."

On the 5th of November, he wrote, "that he found debates raised concerning the vestments, which he calls the habit of the stage, and wishes they could be freed from it. He says, they were not wanting to so good a cause; but others seemed to love those things, and to follow the ignorance of some priests, who were stupid as logs of wood, having neither spirit, learning, nor good life to commend them; but studied to recommend themselves by that comical habit, while no care was taken of learning, or of breeding up of youth. They hoped to strike the eyes of the people with those ridiculous trifles: these are the relics of the Amorites; that cannot be denied. He wishes that, at some time or other, all these may be taken away, and extirpated to the very deepest roots. He complains of a febleness in the councils: they still talked of bringing Martyr over; but he feared that we looked too much toward Saxony to expect that. Some among them, he says, were so much set on the matter of the habits, as if the Christian religion consisted in garments. But we (says he) are not called to the consultations concerning that scenical apparel: he could set no value on those fopperies. Some were crying up a golden mediocrity; he was afraid it would prove a leaden one."

On the 16th of November, he wrote, in a letter to be found in the Collection, "that the doctrine was everywhere purely preached. There was in many places too much folly, concerning ceremonies and masks. The crucifix continued still in the queen's chapel: they all spake freely against it, but, till then, without effect. There was a secret piece of worldly policy in this which he did not like. He complains of the uncertain and island-like state of their affairs: all was loose at present. He did not see in what they would settle; and did not know but he should be obliged to return back to Zurich again."

In December and January the consecration of the bishops came on. But here a stop lies in my way: for some months the thread of the letters to Zurich, by which I have been hitherto guided, is discontinued. At this time an ambassador came over from Ferdinand the emperor, with letters dated the 11th of February, 1560, proposing a match between his son, archduke Charles, and the queen. He had writ of it to her before, but thought fit to follow these letters with a formal embassy: the originals are yet extant. The queen wrote an answer in form, and signed it; but it seems that was, on some considerations, not thought fit to be sent, for the original is in the Paper-Office. It will be found in the Collection.

The queen wrote, "that, examining her own sentiments in that matter very carefully, she did not perceive any inclination to change her solitary life, but found herself more fixed to continue still in it. She hoped the emperor would favourably receive and rightly understand what she wrote to him. It might, indeed, seem strange, considering her age and her circumstances; but this was no new resolution, nor taken up on the sudden, but was the adhering to an old settled purpose. There had been a time in which her accepting some honourable propositions might have delivered her out of very great dangers and troubles; on which she would make no other reflections, but that neither the fear of danger, nor the desire of liberty, could then move her to bring her mind to hearken to them. She will not, by a plain refusal, seem to offend him; yet she cannot give occasion, by any of her words, to make him think that she accepts of that to which she cannot bring her mind and will." Dated the 5th of January, 1559. Signed, "Your majesty's good sister and cousin, Elizabeth." Countersigned, "Rog. Ascham."

The first letter of Jewel's, after his consecration, is on the 4th of February, 1560: it is in the Collection. He tells Peter Martyr "they were then engaged in the question about the lawfulness of having images in churches," (which he calls lis crucularia). "It could scarce be believed to what a degree of folly some men, who were thought to have a right judgment of things, were carried in that matter. There was not one of all those whom he knew that was drawn to be of that mind besides Cox. There was to be a conference concerning it the day following. Parker and Cox, on the one hand, and Grindal and he, on the other hand, were to debate it in the hearing of some of the council. He could not but laugh within himself when he thought what grave and solid reasonings would be brought out on this occasion. He was told, that it was resolved on to have crucifixes of silver or tin set up in all churches, and that such as would not obey this would be turned out of their bishoprics. If that was true, he would be no longer a bishop." White, bishop of Winchester, Oglethorp, of Carlisle, Bain, of Coventry and Litchfield, and Tonstal, of Durham, were lately dead. In another, he writes, "that Bonner was sent to the Tower; and that he went to see some criminals that were kept there, and called them his friends and neighbours: but one of them answered, 'Go, you beast, into hell, and find your friends there, for we are none of them! I killed but one man upon a provocation, and do truly repent of it; but you have killed many holy persons, of all sorts, without any provocation from them, and are hardened in your impenitence.'"

On the 5th of March, he writes, "that a change appeared now more visibly among the people. Nothing promoted it more than the inviting the people to sing psalms. That was begun in one church in London, and did quickly spread itself not only through that city, but in the neighbouring places: sometimes at Paul's Cross there will be six thousand people singing together. This was very grievous to the papists. The children began to laugh at the priests as they passed in the streets, and the bishops were called hangmen to their faces. It was said White died of rage. He commends Cecil much."

Sands, bishop of Worcester, wrote, in a letter on the 1st of April, 1560, which will be found in the Collection, "that after he returned from executing the injunctions and preaching in the North, he was pressed to accept of the bishopric of Worcester. He saw, if he absolutely refused it, the queen would have been highly offended. He found it more truly a burden than an honour. The doctrine of the sacrament was pure, to which he and his brethren were resolved to adhere firmly as long as they lived. There was yet a question concerning images: the queen thought that was not contrary to the word of God; and it seemed convenient to have a crucifix, with the Blessed Virgin, and Saint John, still in her chapel. Some of them could not bear this. 'We had,' says he, 'according to our injunctions, taken away all the images that we found in churches, and burned them. We see superstitious people plainly worship this idol.' Upon this he had spoken freely to the queen: with that she was so displeased as to threaten to deprive him. She was since that time more softened, and the images were removed. But the popish vestments were still used; yet he hoped that should not last long. He laments much that Peter Martyr was not sent for. It was easy to guess what it was that hindered it; it was the pretence of unity that gave occasion to the greatest divisions."

Parkhurst came into England in the end of the year 1559. He went to his church of Cleve, in Gloucestershire, and kept out of the way of the court. He writes, that many bishops would be glad to change conditions with him. He heard he had been named to a bishopric, but he had dealt earnestly with some great men to spare him in that. When he came through London, both Parker and a privy-councillor had pressed him to accept of one, but he could not resolve on being miserable.

Sampson had been with the other divines at Zurich, and was reckoned by them both a learned and a pious man. While he was coming to England with the rest, he was informed that a bishopric was designed for him; so he wrote, while he was on his journey, to Peter Martyr for his advice, as will be found in the Collection, "in this, whether it was lawful to swear to the queen as supreme head of the church under Christ. He thought Christ was the sole head of the church, and no such expression of an inferior head was found in the Scripture. He thought, likewise, that the want of discipline made that a bishop could not do his duty. Many temporal pressures lay upon bishops, such as first-fruits and tenths, beside the expense of their equipage and attendance at court; so that little was left for the breeding up of youth, for the relief of the poor, and other more necessary occasions to make their ministry acceptable. The whole method of electing bishops was totally different from the primitive institution: the consent either of the clergy or people was not so much as asked: their superstitious dress seemed likewise unbecoming. He wrote all this only to him,—not that he expected that a bishopric should be offered him,—he prayed God that it might never happen. He was resolved to apply himself to preach, but to avoid having any share in the government till he saw a full reformation made in all ecclesiastical functions, both as to doctrine and discipline, and with relation to the goods of the church. He desires his answer as soon as was possible."

Peter Martyr answered his letter on the 1st of November; but what it was can only be gathered from Sampson's reply to it. He received it on the 3rd of January, and answered it on the 6th, 1560. It is in the Collection. "They were then under sad apprehensions, for which he desires their prayers in a very solemn manner. They were afraid lest the truth of religion should either be overturned or very much darkened in England. The bishops of Canterbury, London, Ely, and Worcester, were consecrated; Pilkington was designed for Winchester; Bentham, for Coventry and Litchfield; and Peter Martyr's Jewel, for Salisbury.

"Things still stuck with him; he could neither have ingress nor egress. God knew how glad he would be to find an egress; let others be bishops, he desired only to be a preacher, but no bishop. There was yet a general prohibition of all preaching; and there was a crucifix on the altar still at court, with lights burning before it; and though, by the queen's order, images were removed out of churches all the kingdom over, yet the people rejoiced to see this was still kept in the queen's chapel. Three bishops officiated at this altar; one as priest, another as deacon, and a third as sub-deacon, all before this idol, in rich copes; and there was a sacrament without any sermon. He adds, that injunctions were sent to preachers not to use freedom in the reproof of vice; so he asks what both Martyr, Bullinger, and Bernardin thought of this: whether they looked on it as a thing indifferent, and what they would advise him to do, if injunctions should be sent out requiring the like to be done in all churches; whether they ought to be obeyed, or, if the clergy ought not to suffer deprivation rather than obey? Some among themselves thought that all this was indifferent, and so might be obeyed. He understood that the queen had a great regard to Bernardin Ochino; so he desires that he would write to her, to carry on the work of God diligently. He solemnly assures them, that she was truly a child of God; but princes had not so many friends to their souls as they had to their other concerns. He wishes they would all write to her, for she understood both Italian, Latin, and Greek well; so they might write in any language to her; but if they wrote, they must write as of their own motion, and not as if any complaints had been writ over to them."

On the 13th of May he wrote again, that "a bishopric had been offered to him, but that he had refused it; and he desires Peter Martyr, to whom he wrote, not to censure this till he knew the whole state of the matter. But he rejoices that Parkhurst was made bishop of Norwich;" and, by his letter, it seems Norwich was the bishopric that was offered to him. Parkhurst wrote, soon after his promotion, to Martyr, and assured him there was no danger of setting up Lutheranism in England; only he writes, "we are fighting about ceremonies, vestments, and matters of no moment."

Jewel wrote to Peter Martyr on the 22nd of May, "That the church of Salisbury was so struck with thunder, that there was a cliff all down for sixty foot: he was not got thither, so he could not tell whether foolish people made judgments upon this, with relation to him, or not. He writes that Bonner, Feckenham, Pole, Scory, and Watson, were all put in prison for railing at the changes that were made. The queen expressed great firmness and courage in maintaining the establishment she had made in matters of religion. He tells him that not only Cecil and Knolls desired to be remembered to him, but Petre likewise, which, perhaps, he did not look for."

On the 17th of July he writes to him, "That there was a peace made in Scotland, and that the French were sent away. Scotland was to be governed by a council of twelve persons; only all greater matters were to be referred to a parliament. He writes that the duke of Holstein was come over to see the queen, and was nobly treated by her, and made a knight of the garter: the king of Sweden's coming over was still talked of." After Jewel had been some time in his diocese, he wrote to Gualter, on the 2nd of November 1560, "That he now felt what a load government was to him who had led his life in the shade and at study: and had never turned his thoughts to government; but he would make up in his diligence what might be otherwise wanting: the opposition he met with from the rage of the papists was incredible."

On the 6th of November he wrote that May, dean of Saint Paul's, who was designed to be archbishop of York, was dead: it does not appear on what views that see was so long kept void after the rest were filled. Parker was much troubled at this, and wrote very earnestly about it to Cecil. The letter will be found in the Collection. There were great complaints in the north: the people there were offended to see no more care had of them; and for want of instruction they were become rude: this was like to have an ill influence on the quiet and order of the country. It was perhaps so long delayed for the advantage the queen's exchequer made by the vacancy: but if, for want of good instruction, the people should grow savage like the Irish, it might run to a far greater charge to reduce them. Why should any person hinder the queen's zeal to have her people taught to know and to fear God. If those hitherto named for the north were not liked, or not willing to go thither, he proposed that some of those already placed might be removed thither. And he named Young, bishop of St. David's, for York, and the bishop of Rochester, Guest, for Durham: and if any suspicions were had of any of their practising to the prejudice of their successors, there were precedents used in former times to take bishops bound to leave their churches in no worse case than they found them: he had pressed them formerly with relation to those vacant sees: he saw the matter was still delayed: he would never give over his importunity till the thing was done, which he hoped he would instantly promote, out of the zeal he bore to souls so dear to Christ."

This he wrote on the 16th of October, so it does not appear if the design for May was then so well fixed as Jewel apprehended. The hint in this letter of the practices of bishops was occasioned by the ruinous leases that the popish bishops had made; for seeing the change that was designed, they had by the law at that time so absolute a power over their estates, having no restraints laid on them but those of their canons, that their leases, how mischievous soever to their successors, were good in law. The new bishops in many places had scarce necessary subsistence or houses left them, and were to be supported by dignities given them in commendam: and it was perhaps suggested, that they, to procure a little better subsistence to themselves, might be prevailed on to prolong or confirm such leases.

The archbishop's importunity had its effect: for in February thereafter, Young was removed to York, and Pilkington, a learned and zealous man, was made bishop of Durham. And thus the sees of England were filled. Jewel, in a letter soon after to Peter Martyr, in February 1560, which will be found in the Collection, "Wishes that all the remnants of former errors, with all the rubbish, and even the dust that might yet remain, might be taken away: he wishes they could have obtained it." It seems by this, that their wishes had not prevailed. "The council of Trent was then to be opened again, but the queen was resolved to take no notice of it." He gives an account of his Apology that was then set out. This has been so often printed, and is so well known, that it is not necessary to enlarge more upon it: as it was one of the first books published in this reign, so it was written with that strength and clearness, that it, together with the defence of it, is still to this day reckoned one of our best books. In that letter he writes of the countess of Lenox, the mother to the lord Darnley, "that she was a more violent papist than even queen Mary herself. Her son was gone to Scotland, and it was believed he might marry the queen of Scotland: the earl of Hartford had a son by the lady Catharine Gray; some called him a bastard, but others affirmed that they were married. If that was true, then according to king Henry's will, he must be the heir of the crown. But he adds, 'Ah! unhappy we, that cannot know under what prince we are to live.' He complains that schools are forsaken, and that they were under a great want of preachers. The few they had were every where well received." He writes in another letter, that "in queen Mary's time, for want of good instruction, the Anabaptists and Arians did much increase; but now they disappeared everywhere."

The popish clergy, when they saw no appearance of any new change, did generally comply with the laws then made, but in so untoward a manner, that they made it very visible that what they did was against both their heart and their conscience. This put the bishops on receiving many into orders, that were not thoroughly well qualified, which exposed them to much censure. They thought that in that necessity, men of good hearts, that loved the gospel, though not so learned as might be wished for, were to be brought into the service of the church: but pains were taken, and methods were laid down, to breed up a more knowing race of men as soon as was possible.

I turn now to show how the affairs of religion went on, particularly with relation to Scotland, of which mention was made in some of Jewel's letters.

But before I open this, I will give an account of two instruments sent me from Scotland, that came not to my hands, but since the pages 280 and 281 * were printed off; Collection, Number 66. yet they are so important, that as I have put them in the Collection, so I will give a short account of them here. On the 19th of April, fifteen days after the queen of Scotland had passed that secret fraudulent protestation, formerly mentioned, when the articles of the marriage were mutually signed, it was not only provided that the crown of Scotland, in case she should die without children, should descend to the duke of Chatelherault and his heirs; the instrument itself being published in the French Collection; but the dauphin did, on the same day, set his seal to a charter still preserved at Hamilton, setting forth the faith and engagements that the king his father had formerly made, to secure to the earl of Arran the succession to the crown of Scotland, in case the queen should die without children; to which he promises he will pay all obedience. He confirms and ratifies that promise for himself and his successors; promising in good faith (bonâ fide), that in that case, he will not only suffer that lord to enjoy that crown, but that he will assist and maintain him in it.

The promise made by his father, king Henry, to which this refers, bears date the 17th day of June, anno 1549, and was sent over to Scotland, in order to the getting of queen Mary to be sent to France. By it the king promised, on the word of a king, that in case the queen should die without children, he would assist the earl of Arran in the succession to the crown against all that should oppose him. These instruments I have put in the Collection, as lasting memorials of the fidelity and sincerity of that court, to give a just precaution to posterity in future ages; by which it will appear, how little contracts, promises, and public stipulations are to be depended on: where a secret protestation, lodged in a clandestine manner, is set up to make all this void; which, I hope, will not be soon forgotten or neglected.

But to return from this digression, which, though a little out of its place, seemed too important to be omitted.

The distraction that France was in, made it not easy to them to carry on the war of Scotland, by reason of the charge, that the sending forces to so great a distance put them to: whereas it was but a short march to the English, to go to the assistance of the lords of Scotland; so they were willing to make up matters the best they could by treaty. Commissioners were appointed to treat on both sides. In the mean while the queen-regent of Scotland died: so Cecil and Wotton, who were employed by the queen in that treaty, apprehending the French might, upon this emergent, study to gain more time, wrote to the queen for positive orders.

A letter was written to them on the 15th of June, signed by five privy-councillors; which is in the Collection, taken from the original. By it it appears, that this treaty was then a secret, which they saw must soon break out; so the persons employed in Scotland, advised the acquainting king Philip with it, because they looked on it as brought very near a total agreement. To this the queen's council agreed. Those in Scotland apprehended, that perhaps the French would, upon the regent's death, go away and leave the kingdom, without coming to any agreement. If they should do so, they did order them to advise with the duke of Norfolk and the lords of Scotland in league with them, how the French may be forthwith expelled the kingdom without any loss of time. For by all the advertisements they had, they understood that the French intended to gain time as much as was possible. If the French desired to have some of their colleagues in the town, to assist them in managing the treaty, that was by no means to be granted: but if they desired the assistance of such Scottish men as were of their faction, and if their friends in Scotland consented to it, that seemed reasonable. The rest of the letter relates to one Parys an Irishman.

The treaty, by reason of the weakness of the French force, was soon brought to a conclusion. The French were to be sent away in three weeks. An assembly of the states was to meet, and to settle the affairs of the kingdom: it was to be governed by a council of twelve persons, of whom the king and queen were to name seven, and the states to choose five: and by these, all affairs were to be governed, they being made accountable to the parliament. The last article was, "that the king and queen should not use the title or arms of England and Ireland any more."

When matters were brought to a settlement in Scotland, the Scots sent up the earls of Morton and Glencairn to the queen. Their message will best appear from the Collection, instructions which will be found in the Collection, copied from the original, that is still preserved, and in the possession of the duchess of Hamilton: by which "the estates of parliament, considering how the two kingdoms lay joined together; and reflecting on the inconveniences that they and their ancestors had suffered by continual wars, and on the advantages of a perpetual friendship between them; therefore they did order a proposition of marriage to be made to the queen of England with the earl of Arran, who, after his father, in default of succession of the queen's body, was the next heir of the crown of Scotland. And they resolved that an embassy should be appointed to make the proposition in the honourablest manner that could be devised. They also order thanks to be given to the queen for the good-will she has on all occasions expressed for their kingdom; which she had particularly declared of late by the support she had given them for their relief; by the means of which they enjoyed their present quiet. And they were also ordered to move the queen to send strict commands to her wardens and other officers on the borders, to suppress all broken men, and to restrain all thefts." These instructions were appointed to be sealed and subscribed by six of every estate; and that was to be held as valid as if all the estates had sealed and subscribed them.

This order of parliament is signed by the archbishop of St. Andrew's, the bishops of Dunkeld, Galloway, Dumblane, Argyle, and the elect bishop of the Isles: and by as many abbots and priors; the prior of St. Andrew's, afterwards earl of Murray; the abbot of Arbroath, afterwards marquis of Hamilton; the abbots of Newbottle and Culross; the commendator of Kilwinning, and the prior of Lochleven. So many of the ecclesiastical state of both ranks concurring, shows, that they rejoiced in the deliverance that they had from the servitude under which the French had almost brought them.

These instructions are also signed by the duke of Chatelherault, who subscribed only James; and by the earls of Argyle, Athol, Morton, Crawford, and Sutherland; and by the lords Erskine, Gordon, Salton, Hay, Ochiltre, Innesmeth, Boyd, Lindsay, Gray, and some others, whose names cannot be read; and by eight provosts of boroughs. But no seals are in this noble instrument; so probably it was an authentic duplicate that was deposited in that family, to remain as an undoubted proof of the right of succeeding to the crown of Scotland, if the queen had left no issue of her own body.

To this an answer was given, which I have put in the Collection, from the draught of it in Cecil's hand. "The queen received the hearty thanks that the three estates sent her very kindly; and was glad the assistance she had given then was so well accepted by them. She was so well satisfied with the effects it had, that if the like cause should happen, in which they might need aid from her, she assures them it shall not be wanting. The queen did perceive the difference between the benefits bestowed by her father on many of the nobility of that nation, which were supposed to be to the prejudice of the kingdom, and so had not the success expected, and those they had received from her, which were directed to the safety of the realm: so the diversity in the bestowing them, had made this diversity in the acceptation of them.

"She received that proposition of marriage as a mark of the good intention of the estates for knitting the kingdoms in amity; in offering to her the best and choicest person that they had, though not without danger of the displeasure of the French king. But the queen was not disposed presently to marry; though the necessity of the kingdom might, perhaps, constrain her afterwards to it. Yet she desired that the earl of Arran might not forbear to marry on her account: but that the amity between the two kingdoms might remain firm; since it was so necessary to their preservation, though no marriage were made upon it. The queen had heard a very good report of the earl of Arran, and thought him a noble gentleman of great worth, and did not doubt but he would prove to be such. In the last place, the queen desired the states would reflect on former practices among them, and would continue in a good agreement among themselves, and not fall into factions. And she concluded with a promise, that on her part, no reasonable thing should be neglected that might tend to the common defence of both the realms, against the common enemy."

Things went on pursuant to this treaty, to which it was not thought the French would have any regard when their affairs should be in a better condition. The apprehensions of that were soon at an end. In December 1560, the union which that kingdom had with France was totally broke by the death of Francis the Second; so that Mary, queen of Scotland, had nothing left but her own strength to depend upon. The treaty of Leith being in all other points executed, the queen ordered both Throckmorton, her ordinary, ambassador in France, and the earl of Bedford, whom she had sent over extraordinary, to demand queen Mary's ratification of that treaty; which I shall open more particularly, because upon this occasion that jealousy was raised between the two queens, that ended so fatally to the one. The queen of Scots used many shifts to excuse her not doing it.

In a letter of Throckmorton's of the 16th of April, which is in the Collection, he tells the queen, "That having pressed the queen of Scots to it, she said she had not her council about her, particularly the cardinal of Lorraine, her uncle, by whom she was advised in all her affairs: nor had she heard from her council in Scotland. She promised, that when she heard from them, and had advised with her council about her, she would give an answer that should satisfy the queen. But her natural brother, the lord James, being come over to her, the queen had commanded Throckmorton to demand again the confirmation of the treaty. Upon which the ambassador sent a gentleman to know her pleasure, when he should wait on her, to receive it from her hand. This, as he wrote to her, was desired by the queen, as a mean to make them live hereafter in all love, peace, and amity together. And nothing could so demonstrate that queen's intention to entertain this, as the establishing that knot of friendship between them, for both their quiet and comfort, which was at that time the only refuge of them both." Of this he sent the queen, his mistress, a copy.

On the 1st of May, Mr. Somer, whom the ambassador had sent to Nancy, where the queen of Scotland was at that time, came back with her answer, which is in the Collection; it being the only original paper that ever I saw in her hand. Dated from Nancy, the 22nd of April 1561.

She writes, "she was then leaving that place, so she could give no answer till she came to Rhoims, where she intended to be at the king's coronation: and she says that lord James was only come to do his duty about her as his sovereign lady, without any charge or commission whatsoever." This Throckmorton sent to the queen, together with a letter from the cardinal of Lorraine to the same purpose, which he also sent her in a letter, which will be found in the Collection; in which he writes, “that though Col.Num.72. Somer had used the best means he could to put the Scottish queen in mind of the promise she had made to the earl of Bedford and to Throckmorton himself, yet he could get no other answer from her.” The ambassador was ordered by the queen not to be present at the coronation, so he did not know when or where he should see her; for it was said she did not intend for some time to come into the neighbourhood of Paris: he therefore proposed to the queen to send a letter of credit by Mr. Somer to that queen; and with it to order him to go and demand her answer. By that queen’s discourse with lord James, it seemed she did not intend to give a plain answer, but still to shift it off; but he thought the queen insisting on it by a person sent express to stay for an answer, she would be able to judge from thence what measures she ought to take. The queen of Scotland had said to the ambassador, that she intended to give lord James a commission, with a charge to look to the affairs of Scotland during her absence, and he, when he took leave of her, left one to bring that after him; but that person was come with letters from that queen, but with no commission; and he understood by him that she had changed her mind, and would give no such commission till she should come to Scotland herself; nor would she dispose of anything till then. This was easily seen to be on design to let all people understand on what terms they might expect benefices, grants, or other favours from her.

The true reason why she would not employ lord James was, because she found she could not draw him from his devotion to the queen; nor from his resolution to observe the late treaty and league between England and Scotland: and it is added, that the cardinal of Lorraine saw he could not draw him from his religion, though he used great persuasions to prevail on him. Upon these accounts the ambassador wrote over, “That he saw he might be much depended on: so he advises the queen to consider him as one that may serve her good purpose, and to use him liberally and honourably. He had made great acknowledgments of the good reception he met with as he came through London; so he on many accounts deserved to be both well used and much trusted. The queen of Scotland had many great expectations from the popish party, and from the earl of Huntley in particular. He gives in that letter an account of a great tumult that had then happened at Paris, upon occasion of an assembly of protestants for worship in a private house in the suburbs. The rabble met about the house, threatening violence, upon which those within, seeing persuasions had no effect, fired and killed seven or eight of them. The court of parliament sent an order to suppress the tumult, and disperse the multitude. This was plainly contrary to the edict lately made: but the ambassador apprehended that greater disorders would follow.” And that I may end all this matter at once, I find in a letter of Jewel’s, that is in the Collection, that the duke of Guise sent to the princes of Germany to divert them from assisting the prince of Condé, assuring them that he himself was very moderate in the points of religion, and had very favourable thoughts of the Augsburg Confession: he studied also to persuade the queen that the war which was then breaking out in France was not for religion, but was a conspiracy against the government; which he hoped she as queen would not assist. At the same time the queen of Scotland sent the queen a present of a diamond of value, with some very fine verses made by Buchanan, then in her court. She also in her letters vowed a perpetual friendship with her, and wrote that she would pass through England. Yet the queen saw through all this, and was not diverted by it from assisting the prince of Condé. Upon this the duke of Guise did openly charge all the disorders in France on her as the principal author of them: by this the mask was thrown away, and these jealousies broke out into an open war. Jewel wishes the queen had begun it sooner, and that the princes of Germany would follow her example, now that she was engaged, and had sent one to engage them likewise.

By that time the queen of Scotland had got by sea into her kingdom: she alone had her mass, which was put down all the kingdom over.

There was this year an extraordinary bad season through every quarter of the year, and perpetual rains. There was also much talk of many monstrous births both by women and beasts, hogs, mares, cows, and hens: some births were without heads, or heads of a strange form; and some without arms or legs: very probably things of that sort were magnified by those who reported them; and, no doubt, they were made the presages of some dismal events to be looked for; it being ordinary in all great changes to enlarge, and even to forge stories of that sort, on design to alarm people with the apprehensions of some signal judgments to follow after such unusual warnings. This last letter being written some time after the great convocation that settled our Reformation, is mentioned here out of its place, to finish a matter to which I have nothing here to add.

But now to return to give an account of that famous meeting of the clergy. I must first lament that here there is another total stop in the correspondence with Zurich, that has hitherto furnished me with so many particulars. I cannot think but that there were copious accounts of the progress of matters in it given to them, if not during the convocation, in which the bishops were no doubt much employed, yet at least soon after the prorogation, which was in the beginning of April: but in all the volume of letters that is sent me, I find not one either during their sitting or after it was ended, till that I mentioned last, which is of the 14th of August. Being then destitute of those authentic vouchers, I must gather up what remains I could find to give a clear account of the great transactions then on foot.

The imperfect abstract which I have often vouched, gives us but a very defective account of their proceedings. The first session was on the 13th of January; Day, provost of Eaton, preached. Parker told them they had now in their hands an opportunity of reforming all things in the church: the queen did earnestly desire it, and so did many of the nobility. He sent them to choose a prolocutor, and recommended Nowel, dean of St. Paul's, to them. They choose him upon that; and on the 16th of January, Parker exhorted them to consider against the next session what things wanted a reformation. On the 19th he sent for the prolocutor, who came up with six of the clergy. He said they had before them some sheets of matters to be offered for a reformation, which were then referred to be considered by a committee. He also said that the articles set forth in a synod at London in king Edward's time, were likewise before a committee to be considered, and if need was, to be corrected by them. On the 20th, the archbishop and bishops were for the space of three hours consulting secretly about those articles. On the 22nd, they were again for three hours considering the same matter. On the 25th, they were two hours. And on the 27th, they were for three hours more upon the same matter. And on the 29th of January, all in the upper house agreed unanimously in settling the articles of religion, and they subscribed them.

The differences between these articles and those set forth by king Edward are very particularly marked in the Collections added to my second volume. The most material is, the leaving out that express declaration that was made against the corporal presence of Christ in the sacrament, which I then thought was done in compliance with the opinion prevalent among the people of the popish persuasion, who were strangely possessed with the belief of such a presence; but I am convinced, by the letters sent me from Zurich, that, in this, great regard was likewise had to the Lutheran churches, with whom a conjunction was much endeavoured by some. So that, perhaps, this was one consideration that made it be thought convenient to suppress the definition then made in this matter by the convocation. But it does no way appear to me, whether these words were suppressed by the consent of the convocation, or whether the queen ordered it to be done, either by a direct command, or by denying to give her assent to that part of the article.

I must also add, that the homily "against wilful rebellion," for that is its true title, was not drawn up till some years after this convocation had settled those articles, in which the titles of the homilies are set forth, though it is added in the manuscript to the rest, with the title "against rebellion." It is plain, both by the body of the homily, and by the prayer at the end of it, that it was penned after the rebellion that was raised by the earls of Northumberland and Westmorland many years after this, and while there were wars abroad on the account of religion. This I do not write as disagreeing in any part from the doctrine delivered in that homily, but only as a historian, in order to the setting matters of fact in a true light.

But now I go on as the minutes, or rather the abstracts, lead me. When the great matter of the articles was settled, the bishops of London, Winchester, Lincoln, and Hereford, were appointed to draw articles of discipline. On the 3rd of February, the archbishop and bishops were in a secret conference for the space of three hours. On the 5th of February, a committee was appointed to examine the catechism. Then the prolocutor, with six of the clergy, brought up the articles of religion that had been sent by the archbishop to the lower house. Many had already subscribed them; but he proposed that such as had not yet done it might be required either to subscribe them in the lower house, or to do it in the presence of the bishops. Upon this the upper house ordered that the names of those who had not subscribed them might be laid before them next session. On the 10th, the prolocutor, with eight of the clergy, came up and told the bishops that many had subscribed since their last meeting. Upon that the bishops renewed their former order.

On the 13th, there was some treaty concerning the subsidy; but on that day, and it seems on some days following, there were very warm debates in the lower house, of which I shall give a particular account from a copy taken from the minutes of the proceedings of the lower Col. Num. 74. house, which will be found in the Collection. On the 13th day, six articles were Great debates concerning some Alterations in the Book of Common Prayer. offered to the house, which follow: first, "That all holidays, except Sundays, and the feasts that related to Christ, should be abrogated. Second, That in the common prayer, the minister should always turn his face towards the people, so as to be heard by the people, that they might be edified. Third, That the ceremony of the cross in baptism may be omitted, as tending to superstition. Fourth, That forasmuch as divers communicants were not able to kneel during the time of communion, for age, sickness, and other infirmities, and some also do superstitiously both kneel and knock *, that the order of kneeling may be left to the discretion of the ordinary within his jurisdiction. Fifth, That it be sufficient for the minister, in time of saying divine service and ministering the sacraments, to use a surplice; and that no minister say service, or minister the sacraments, but in a comely garment or habit. The sixth and last is, That the use of organs be removed." The words are strictly as I took them from the copy of the Journal; but the sense of the fifth is not clear, except we suppose the word once to have come after the minister; so that it was proposed that it should be sufficient once to use the surplice †.

There arose great disputes concerning these propositions, some approving and others rejecting them; and it was proposed by some to refer the matter to the archbishop and bishops. Many protested that they could in no manner consent to any one of them, since they were contrary to the book of Common Prayer that was ratified by an act of parliament; nor would they admit of any alteration of the orders, rules, rites, or regulations already settled by that book. There were public disputations between learned men, some approving and others condemning the propositions. Thirteen persons were named as the disputants. In conclusion, the house was divided and counted; forty-three voted for the propositions, and thirty-five voted against them; and that no change should be made in the book of Common Prayer then established. But when the proxies were counted, those who were for the propositions were in all fifty-eight; and those who were against them were fifty-nine: so that they were agreed to by a majority of eight of those who were present, and who had heard the disputations; yet those were out-voted by a majority of one vote by the proxy of an absent person. All their names are set down in the paper. One thing observable is, that in this minute it is added, that those who rejected the articles seemed to go chiefly on this ground,—that they were contrary to the authorised book of Common Prayer; as if this had been the assuming an authority to alter what was settled by the legislature. It is not to be imagined, but if the affirmative vote had prevailed, that it could not be intended to have any other effect but to make an address to the parliament to alter the book in those particulars. I have represented † Query, does not this article rather refer to the use of copes and embroidered vestments, in addition to the surplices, as customary in the church of Rome? It would this matter as I found it, and will not make any judgment upon it, either on the one side or the other, but will leave that to the reader, and go on with what remains in the abstract.

This debate in the lower house put a stop to the business of the convocation for six days, in which they only treated of the subsidy. On the 19th of February, some articles were communicated to the lower house; and they were ordered to bring them back, with their observations on them. These seem to relate to benefices and dilapidations; and they were ordered to inquire how many benefices were then vacant. On the 22nd, the subsidy was agreed to; on the 24th, the prolocutor being absent, his surrogate, with the clergy, were called up; and the engrossed bill of subsidy was read to them, and they all unanimously agreed to it.

On the 26th, a Book of Discipline was brought to the upper house by the prolocutor, with ten of the clergy; to which, as it was then said, the whole clergy did unanimously consent. This was referred to the archbishop, with the bishops of London, Winchester, Chichester, Hereford, and Ely. On the 1st of March, the prolocutor brought up some additional articles, which they desired might be added to the Book of Discipline that they had formerly brought up. The archbishop gave them the book back again, and ordered them to bring it back, together with the additions they had made to it.

On the 3rd of March, the prolocutor brought up the Catechism, to which he said the house did unanimously agree. The considering of it was committed to the bishops of Winchester, Hereford, Lincoln, and Coventry. (This seems to be the catechism drawn by Nowel, dean of St. Paul's.) After that, there was a conference among the bishops for the space of two hours. On the 5th of March, the prolocutor brought up the Book of Discipline, with some additional chapters: one only is named, Of Adultery, with an &c. On the 10th, there was a conference among the bishops for two hours; and on the 12th, for two hours more; and on the 16th, for other two hours; and on the 19th, for two hours more. After that nothing is marked, but several prorogations, till the 10th of April, that the royal writ came for the prorogation. And this is all that remains of this great convocation.

It does not appear what that Book of Discipline was. In one of the Zurich letters, as shall be told afterwards, it is said, that some things agreed to in this synod were afterwards suppressed. This, I suppose, relates to that Book of Discipline: but whether this was the reformation of the ecclesiastical laws, prepared by Cranmer and others, or whether it was modelled in any other manner, cannot now be certainly known.

But to this account that I have given, I will add some other particulars, that the diligent Mr. Strype has laid together, referring my reader for a more copious account of them to his Annals.

“It was designed to have Jewel’s Apology joined to the Articles, which archbishop Parker intended should be in all cathedral and collegiate churches, and also in private houses.

“Degrees of punishment were proposed for all those who should preach, write, or speak in derogation or contempt of this book, for the first, second, and third offence.

“It was proposed, that all vestments, copes, and surplices should be taken away; that none but ministers should baptize; that the table for the sacrament should not stand altar-wise; that organs and curious singing should be removed.

“That godfathers and godmothers should not answer in the child’s name; but should recite the Creed, and desire that the child may be baptized in that faith. Here, on the margin, Parker writes, ‘Let this be considered.’

“That none should be married but after the banns have been asked for three Sundays or holidays. On the margin Parker writes, ‘Priests solemnising matrimony without testimonial of banns, to suffer grievous punishment.’

“That the queen and parliament be prayed to renew the act for empowering thirty-two persons to gather ecclesiastical laws, and to review those appointed in king Edward’s time.

“That all peculiar jurisdictions should be extinguished, so that the whole diocese be put under the jurisdiction of the bishop, that no appeal shall lie in cases of correction. On the margin Parker writes, ‘Let this be thought on.’

Other things prepared for the Convocation.

“ That in every cathedral a divinity-lecture should be read thrice a week.

“ That the apparel of the clergy should be uniform. That no person, not in priest's orders, shall hold any ecclesiastical dignity above a year, if he does not take priest's orders. Parker writes, ‘ Too much ; and let it be thought on.’

“ That none be capable of a dispensation for a plurality of benefices with cure of souls, if he is not at least a master of arts, and they not beyond twelve miles' distance. Parker writes, ‘ Let it be considered, whether this ought to be restrained to degrees.’

“ That if any has two cures, he shall reside constantly on one, unless at some times to go and preach in the other, under the pain of losing the greater benefice. Parker adds, ‘ Let this be thought on.’

“ That no patron sell or assign the next advowson ; and that no grant be made of any benefice till it is void.

“ That all incumbents or curates shall, on Sundays, in the afternoon, offer to teach the children of the parish the catechism.”

The next paper is, of Remedies for the Poverty of Ministers' Livings : but the remedies, how good soever, were not found practicable, so all this matter was let fall.

With this convocation, my design of continuing the History of the Reformation is now concluded. And here I once intended to have ended my work ; but the letters sent me from Zurich give me such a full and particular account of the first unhappy breach that was made in our church, with so many curious incidents, that I am by these invited to set that matter out in a clear light, since I have it before me in the letters of the most eminent of our bishops.

Continuation of the History beyond my former Work.

There was a great variety of sentiments among our reformers on this point : “ Whether it was fit to retain an external face of things, near to what had been practised in the times of popery, or not ?” The doing that made the people come easily in to the more real changes that were made in the doctrines, when they saw the outward appearances so little altered. So this method seemed the safer and the readier way to wean the people from the fondness they had for a splendid face of things, by that which was still kept up. But, on the other hand, it was said, that this kept up still the inclination in the people to the former practices : they were by these made to think that the reformed state of the church did not differ much from them, and that they imitated them. And they apprehended that this outward resemblance made the old root of popery to live still in their thoughts ; so that if it made them conform at present more easily to the change that was now made, it would make it still much the easier for them to fall back to popery. So, for this very reason, they stood upon it ; and thought it better to put matters in as great an opposition to the practices of popery as was possible or convenient.

A Controversy about the use of things indifferent.

The queen had, in her first injunctions, ordered the clergy to wear seemly garments and square caps ; adding, that this was only for decency, and not to ascribe any worthiness to the garments. But when the Act of Uniformity was settled,—whereas in the liturgy, passed in the second year of king Edward, copes and other garments were ordered to be used, but in the second book, passed in the sixth year of that king, all was laid aside except the surplice, yet the queen, who loved magnificence in everything, returned back to the rules in king Edward's first book, till other order should be taken therein by the queen. There was likewise a clause put in the Act of Uniformity, empowering the queen to “ ordain and publish such further ceremonies and rites as might be for the advancement of God's glory, the edifying of his church, and the due reverence of Christ's holy mysteries and sacraments.”

The matter being thus settled, there followed a great diversity in practice ; many conforming themselves in all points to the law, while others did not use either the surplice or the square caps and hoods, according to their degree. This visible difference began to give great offence, and to state two parties in the church. The people observed it, and run into parties upon it. Many forsook their churches of both sides : some because those habits were used, and some because they were not used. It is likewise suggested, that the papists insulted upon this division among the protestants ; and said it was impossible it should be otherwise, till all returned to come under one absolute obedience.

Great diver-
tice.

Upon this the queen, in January 1564, wrote to the archbishop of Canterbury, “reflecting (not without some acrimony of style) on these diversities, as if they were the effect of some remissness in him and in the other bishops; requiring him, that, with the assistance of other bishops, commissioned by her for causes ecclesiastical, he should give strict orders that all diversities and varieties, both among the clergy and people, might be reformed and repressed; and that all should be brought to one manner of uniformity through the whole kingdom, that so the people might quietly honour and serve God.”

Upon that some of the bishops met; six in all. Of these, four were upon the ecclesiastical commission,—the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of London, Ely, and Rochester; and with these joined the bishops of Winchester and Lincoln. They agreed on some rules and orders meet to be observed, not as equivalent to the word of God, nor as laws that did bind the conscience from the nature of the things considered in themselves, or as that they did add any efficacy or more holiness to the public prayers and sacraments, but as temporary orders, merely ecclesiastic, and as rules concerning decency, distinction, and order for the time.

They begun with articles of doctrine and preaching. “That all preachers should study to preach to edification, and handle matters of controversy with sobriety and discretion; exhorting people to receive the sacrament frequently, and to continue in all obedience to the laws, and to the queen’s injunctions. All former licences are declared void, but are to be renewed to such as the bishop thought meet for the office, they paying only a groat for the writing. If any should preach unsound doctrine, they were to be denounced to the bishop, but not to be contradicted in the church. All were to be required to preach once in three months, either in person or by one in their stead. Such as were not licensed to preach were to read the homilies, or such other necessary doctrine as should be prescribed. In the sacrament the principal minister was to wear a cope, but at all other prayers only surplices. That deans and prebendaries should wear a hood in the choir, and preach with their hood. All communicants were to receive the sacrament kneeling. Then follow rules about tolling the bell when people die; about the altar; the font; and who may be godfathers in baptism. That no shops be opened on Sundays. That bishops shall give notice against the day of giving orders, that all men may except against such as are unworthy: that none be ordained but within their own diocese, except those who have degrees in the university. Rules follow for licences; for archdeacons to appoint curates to get some texts of the New Testament by heart, and at the next synod to hear them rehearse them. Ordinaries were to guard against simoniacal practices; and none were to marry within the Levitical degrees. Then follow rules of their wearing apparel, gowns, and caps: they were to wear no hats but in travelling; but those who were deprived might not wear them. To this they added a form of subscription, to be required of all that were to be admitted to any office or cure in the church, to this effect: that they should not preach but by the bishop’s special licence; that they should read the service distinctly and audibly; that they should keep a register-book, and use such apparel, specially at prayers, as was appointed; that they should endeavour to keep peace and quiet in their parishes; that they should every day read a chapter in the Old and New Testament, considering it well, to the increase of their knowledge; and in conclusion, that they should exercise their office to the honour of God and the quiet of the queen’s subjects; and observe an uniformity in all laws and orders already established; and that they should use no sort of trade, if their living amounted to twenty nobles, or upwards.”

The proceedings here in England are fully collected by Mr. Strype; so, as to these, I refer my reader to the account given by him, which is both full and impartial. I shall only give the abstracts of the letters that passed in this matter between our bishops and Bullinger, Gualter, and the other divines in Zurich. These foreign divines did not officiously, nor of their own motion, intermeddle in this matter. It began in January 1565, for then the queen wrote to the archbishop; and in March the order was settled by the archbishop and bishops. But when the bishops saw the opposition that many were making to this, Sampson and Humphreys being the most eminent of those who opposed it, who were in great reputation, particularly in the university of Oxford, where the one was dean of Christ's church, and the other was president of Magdalen's, and divinity professor; and they were much distinguished for their learning, piety, and zeal in religion: upon this Ilorn, bishop of Winchester, wrote, on the 16th of July, to Gualter, and stated the matter clearly to him. I have put his letter in the Collection, though it is already printed; but I thought it convenient to insert it, since the letters that are to follow depend upon it.

After he had mentioned some of Gualter's works, he commends those of Zurich Horn, Bishop of Winchester, writes to Zurich upon these diversities in Practice. Col. Num. 75. for not being imposed on by the artifices of the French; in which he hopes those of Berne would follow the example that they had set them. He comes to the affairs of England, "where they were still in fear of the snares of the papists, who took great advantage from a question lately raised about vestments, to say protestants could never agree together. The act of parliament was made before they were in office, so that they had no hand in making it. By it the vestments were enacted, but without any superstitious conceit about them, the contrary being expressly declared. What was once enacted in parliament could not be altered but by the same authority. The bishops had obeyed the law, thinking the matter to be of its nature indifferent; and they had reason to apprehend that if they had deserted their stations upon that account, their enemies might have come into their places. Yet upon this there was a division formed among them: some thought they ought to suffer themselves to be put from their ministry rather than obey the law; others were of a different mind. He desires that he would write his opinion of this matter as soon as was possible. They were in hope to procure an alteration of the act in the next parliament; but he apprehended there would be a great difficulty in obtaining it, by reason of the opposition the papists would give them; for they hoped that if many should leave their stations, they might find occasions to insinuate themselves again into the queen's favour."

It seems he wrote a letter in the same strain to Bullinger, as will appear by his answer of the 3rd of November, which will be found in the Collection. "He writes, that he had heard of the division among them from others; but not knowing the whole state of the question, he was not forward to give his opinion till he had his letter. He laments this unhappy breach among them: he approves their zeal who wished to have the church purged from all the dregs of popery. On the other hand, he commends their prudence who would not have the church to be forsaken because of the vestments. The great end of the ministry was edification; and that was not to be abandoned but upon very good grounds, especially when the deserting their stations was like to make way for much worse things; and that they saw either papists or Lutherans would be put in their places, and then ceremonies would be out of measure increased. No doubt, they had brought many persons of all sorts to love the purity of doctrine; but what a prejudice would it be to these to open such a door, by which swarms of abuses might creep in among them! this they ought carefully to prevent. As for those who first made those laws, or were zealous maintainers of them, he confesses he is not pleased with them; they acted unwisely, if they were truly of the reformed side; but if they were only disguised enemies, they were laying snares with ill designs. Yet he thinks everything of that sort ought to be submitted to rather than that they should forsake their ministry: and since it was declared that those vestments were to be used without any superstitious conceit, he thinks that ought to satisfy men's consciences. But in the mean while he proposes to them to press the queen and the nobility to go on and complete a reformation that was so gloriously begun. He knew that in many places questions were at that time moved concerning the extent of the magistrates' authority: he wishes these might be everywhere let alone. Certainly matters of that nature ought not to be meddled with in sermons. There may be an occasion to debate about them in parliament; and it may be proper to speak to the queen and to her counsellors in private about them. Upon the whole matter, he concludes, that as, on the one hand, he would be tender in dealing with men of weak consciences, so, on the other hand, he proposes St. Paul's rule in such cases, of 'becoming all things to all men.' He circumcised Timothy that he might not give offence to the Jews, though at the same time he condemns those who were imposing the yoke of the Judaical law as necessary in the beginnings of Christianity."

Col. Num. 76. Answers from thence justifying those who obeyed the Laws.

When Sampson and Humphreys understood in what a strain Bullinger and Gualter had written concerning the vestments, they wrote on the 16th of February, a copious account of the grounds on which they founded their refusal to obey these orders. Their letters came to Bullinger on the 26th of April; and he answered them on the 1st of May. This will be found in the Collection. "He puts them in mind of Peter Martyr's opinion in a like matter when he was at Oxford, to which he could add nothing. He could not approve of any persons officiating at an altar on which there was a crucifix; and in a cope, on the back of which there was a crucifix. He tells them how both he and Gualter had answered Horn's letter on the subject; and he sent them copies of these letters. He would be extreme sorry if these did not give them satisfaction. He prayed earnestly to God for them. He had a great dislike to all controversies of that sort, and did not willingly meddle in them: he did think that laws might be made prescribing decent habits to the clergy, which may be reduced to that branch of St. Paul's character of a bishop, that he ought to be κοσμίος, which may be rendered decent, as well as we have it of 'good behaviour.' Nor was this the reviving the Levitical law. Everything is not to be called Levitical, because it was practised by the Jews. The apostles commanded the converts to Christianity, to abstain from things strangled, and from blood. The maintaining the clergy by the tithes, came from laws given to Jews; and from them we have the singing of psalms among us: so things are not to be rejected because of some conformity to the Mosaical institution. Nor can this be called a conformity to popery: nor is everything practised among them to be rejected on that account; otherwise we must not use their churches, nor pronounce the Creed; nor use the Lord's Prayer; since all these are used by them. It was in this case expressed in the orders set out lately by them that the habits were not enjoined on the superstitious conceits of the papists; they were only to be used in obedience to the law. It savours too much of a Jewish or of a monastic temper, to put religion in such matters: if it is pretended that the obeying laws in matters indifferent was the giving up our Christian liberty, that would go a great way to the denying all obedience, and might provoke the magistrate to lay yet heavier loads on them. Habits peculiar to the clergy was an ancient practice than popery itself. St. John is said to have carried on his head somewhat like a mitre: and mention is made of St. Cyprian's having a peculiar garment called a dalmatica. St. Chrysostom speaks of their white garments. Tertullian tells us that the heathens converted to Christianity quitted their toga, the Roman upper garment, and used the pallium, or cloak. He wishes there were no impositions on the clergy in such matters: yet since this was an ancient habit, and was now enjoined, without making it a matter of religion, he wishes they would not set too great a value upon it, but yield somewhat to the present time; and that they would consider it as a thing indifferent, and not affect to dispute too subtly about it; but to behave themselves modestly. They had put a question to him, whether anything may be prescribed that is not expressed in Scripture? He did not approve of laying on a load of such things on people's necks; but some things might be appointed for order and discipline. Christ kept the feast of the dedication, though appointed by no law of God. If it is said the things commanded are not necessary, and are of no use, yet they are not for that to be condemned, nor are schisms to be raised on that account." Many things are again repeated in this letter that were in his letter to Horn.

A copy of this was sent to Horn, and both Grindal and he apprehending the good effect that the printing it might have in settling the minds of many that were much shaken by the opposition that was made to the orders that had been set out, printed it here. So that it was not necessary for me to put it in the Collection, if I did not intend to lay the chief papers relating to this matter so together, as to set it all in a clear light.

Upon this Sampson and Humphreys wrote over to Zurich, complaining of the printing of their letter, and carrying their complaints against the constitution of the church much further than to the matter of the vestments: they complain of the music and organs; of making sponsors in baptism answer in the child's name ; of the cross in baptism ; of the court of faculties ; and the paying for dispensations ; all which will appear fully in a letter of theirs in the Collection, which they wrote to them in July : " They acknowledge their letter had not fully satisfied them : they do not think the prescribing habits to the clergy merely a civil thing ; they think St. Paul's κοσμίος belongs to the ornaments of the mind. And add, how can that habit be thought decent that was brought in to dress up the theatrical pomp of popery ? The papists gloried in this our imitation of them. They do approve of setting rules concerning order, but that ought not to be applied to this, that overturns the peace and quiet of the church in things that are not either necessary or useful ; that do not tend to any edification, but serve to recommend those forms which all do now abhor. The papists themselves glory in this, that these habits were brought in by them ; for which they vouch Otho's constitution and the Roman pontifical. They were not against the retaining anything that was good, because it had been abused in popery.

" They affirm that in king Edward's time the surplice was not universally used nor pressed ; and the copes then taken away are now to be restored. This is not to extirpate popery, but to plant it again ; and instead of going forward, is to go back. It was known how much virtue and religion the papists put in the surplice ; and at this day it is held in as great esteem as the monks' habits were wont to be. The use of it may, by degrees, bring back the same superstition. They did not put religion in habits, they only opposed those that did ; and they thought that it gave some authority to servitude to depart from their liberty. They hated contention, and were ready to enter into friendly conferences about this matter. They do not desert their churches, and leave them exposed to wolves ; but to their great grief they are driven from them. They leave their brethren to stand and fall to their own masters ; and desire the same favourable forbearance from them, though in vain hitherto. It was by other men's persuasion that the queen was irritated against them : and now, to support these orders, all that is pretended is, that they are not unlawful : it is not pretended that there is anything good or expedient in the habits. The habits of the clergy are visible marks of their profession ; and these ought not to be taken from their enemies. The ancient fathers had their habits ; but not peculiar to bishops, nor distinct from the laity. The instances of St. John and Cyprian are singular. In Tertullian's time the pallium was the common habit of all Christians. Chrysostom speaks of ' white garments,' but with no approbation : he rather finds fault with them. They had cited Bucer ; but he thought that the orders concerning habits, by reason of the abuse of them in the church of England, ought to be taken away, for a fuller declaration of their abhorrence of Antichrist, for asserting the Christian liberty, and for removing all occasions of contention. They were far from any design of making a schism, or of quarrelling. They will not condemn things indifferent as unlawful : they wish the occasion of the contention were removed, that the remembrance of it might be for ever buried. They who condemned the papal pride, could not like a tyranny in a free church. They wish there might be a free synod to settle this matter ; in which things should not be carried according to the mind of one or two persons. The matter now in debate had never been settled by any general decree of a council, or of any reformed church. They acknowledge the doctrine of this church was now pure ; and why should there be any defect in any part of our worship ? Why should we borrow anything from popery ? Why should they not agree in rites as well as in doctrine with the other reformed churches ? They had a good opinion of their bishops, and bore with their state and pomp : they once bore the same cross with them, and preached the same Christ with them : why are they now turned out of their benefices, and some put in prison, only for habits ? Why are they publicly defamed ? The bishops had printed the private letter that they had written to them without their knowledge or consent. The bishops do now stand upon it, as if the cause were their own. But to let them see that the dispute was not only about a cap, they sent them an abstract of some other things, to which they wish some remedy could be found (which is in the Collection) ; and conclude with some prayers to God to quiet those dissensions, and to send forth labourers into his vineyard."

To this I have joined the answer that Bullinger and Gualter wrote to them. In it they tell them, "that they did not expect that their letters should fully satisfy them: they only wrote their opinion to them because they desired it. They were heartily sorry to find that they could not acquiesce in it. They would engage no further in that matter: they could answer their arguments, but they would give no occasion to endless disputations. They thought it would be more expedient to submit to those habits, and to continue in the church, than by refusing to use them to be forced to leave their churches. They went no further, and did not approve of any popish defilements or superstitions. Nor did they in any sort enter into those other matters, of which they do now complain, and of which they knew nothing before. These were matters of much greater consequence than either the surplices or the copes; so that it was to be hoped that the letter they had written about the habits, could not be stretched to these matters. There was nothing left to them but to commend them to God, and to pray that he would quiet this unhappy dissension among them, and give his church the blessings of peace. They only desire them to remember that the ministers of the gospel ought not only to hold fast the truth, but likewise to be prudent stewards, having a due regard to the times, bearing many things with patience and charity, and so maintain the peace of the church: and not to prejudice it by an over-cager or morose temper; nor think it enough that they had a good design; but they must pursue it by prudent methods."

Bullinger and Gualter, seeing the division like to be carried much further than the matter of the vestments, thought the best office that they could do their friends was, to write to the earl of Bedford, being well assured of his zeal in the matters of religion. They wrote to him on the 11th of September that year. The Collection, letter will be found in the Collection. They tell him "that when they first Number 81. heard of the contention raised about the vestments, they were afraid it might have a further progress. They being desired, did give their opinion freely in the matter; and thought, that for things of so little importance, it was not fit for the clergy to desert their stations, and to leave them to be filled, perhaps, by wolves and deceivers. They were sorry to find that their fears of the mischief that might follow on this contention, were but too well grounded. They hear that not only the vestments are complained of, but that many other things are excepted to, that plainly savour of popery. They are also sorry that the private letter which they wrote should have been printed; and that their judgment of the vestments was extended to other things, of which they could in no sort approve: so that their opinion in one particular is made use of, to cast a load on persons for whom they should rather have compassion in their sufferings, than study to aggravate them. It gave them a very sensible grief to see the church of England, scarce got out of the hands of their bloody enemies, now like to be pulled down by their intestine broils. So, having an entire confidence in his good affection to the gospel, they pray him to intercede with the queen and the nobility, in the parliament that was soon to meet, for their brethren that were then suffering; who deserved that great regard should be had to them, and that their faults should be forgiven them. It had appeared what true zeal they had for religion; since the only thing about which they were so solicitous was, that religion should be purged from all the dregs of popery. This cause in general was such, that those who promoted it proved themselves to be worthy of the highest dignity. Princes were to be nursing fathers to the church: then they perform that office truly, when they not only rescue her out of the hands of her enemies, but take care that the spouse of Christ be not any way stained with the false paint of superstition, or render herself suspected by having any rites unbecoming the Christian simplicity. They do therefore earnestly pray him, that as he has hitherto showed his zeal in the cause of the gospel, so he will at this time exert himself, and employ all the interest he has in the queen, and in the nobility, that the church of England, so happily reformed, to the admiration of the whole world, may not be stained with any of the defilements or remnants of popery. This will look like a giddiness in them: it will offend the weak among them, and give great scandal to their neighbours, both in France and in Scotland, who are yet under the cross. The very papists will justify their tyrannical impositions by what is done now among them. They lay all this before him with the more confidence, knowing his zeal as they do." They also wrote in the same strain to Grindal and Horn, Col. Num. 82. as will be found in the Collection.

When Grindal and Horn understood that those of Zurich were not pleased with the printing of their letter; of which they wrote to them, and sent with it the paper in which were put the heads of those other things in the constitution of this church, to which they excepted; they both, jointly, wrote answer to them, in one letter to Bullinger and Gualter, on the 6th of February; which will be found in the Collection, Number 83. Collection.

"They tell them they had printed their letter, but had suppressed the names of those to whom it was directed. It had the good effect that they expected from it: for it had satisfied and settled the minds of many who were upon the point of leaving their churches: and even the most troublesome were so far wrought on by it that they were silent, and less violent in their opposition than they had formerly been. Some few were turned out, but they were not of the more learned sort, except Sampson, who, they acknowledge, was both pious and learned. Humphreys, and other learned men, were still continued in their stations. The letter that they had printed, related only to that particular upon which it was written, and could not be applied to anything else; nor was there any other question then on foot: so that it was a calumny to say, that their opinion was asked about any other matter. The noise and the complaints that some had made, had very much provoked the queen and many of the nobility against them. The papists triumphed upon it, and hoped to come in again, and to fill the places which were made void upon their deserting their stations. They do solemnly attest the great God, that this dissension was not raised by any fault of theirs; and that it did not lie at their door that those vestments were not quite taken away. They may take their oaths upon it, that they had used all possible means in that matter; and had, with the utmost earnestness, and the most sincere diligence, laboured to obtain that which their brethren desired, and which they themselves wished for. But since they could not do what willingly they would do, they must be content with doing what they could do."

As to the other particulars complained of, they plainly write, "they did not approve of that figured music, together with the use of organs, that was continued in cathedrals. They enlarge on many other particulars, and set forth the method of convocations. They did in no sort approve of women's baptising. They gave way till God should send better times, to the form of making the sponsors in baptism answer in the child's name; for which St. Austin's authority was pretended; but they did openly declare, that they thought it was not convenient. Nor did they approve of using the cross in baptism; though the words spoken when it was made did plainly show there was no superstitious conceit kept up by the use of it. They also suffered the posture of kneeling in the sacrament, with the due caution with which it was enjoined, that was set down in king Edward's book, declaring the reason for which that posture was still continued. For the abuses of their courts, though they cannot correct them entirely, yet they did openly inveigh against them; which they would continue still to do, till they should be sent back to hell from whence they came. Every man had full freedom to declare his mind as to all these abuses: they had laboured in the last parliament all they could to purge out all errors and abuses; which, though it had not then the desired effect, yet they would not give over their endeavours to bring it to a happy conclusion: and this they would do, as they desired the continuance of their friendship and brotherly love."

The others still insisted, and Sampson in a letter from Oxford, the 9th of February, 1565, to Bullinger, reduces the questions concerning the habits to seven heads. 1st, If a habit different in form and colour from the laity, ought to be enjoined to the clergy? 2ndly, If the Mosaical ceremonies may be brought into the Christian church? 3dly, If it is lawful to conform to papists in habits and outward rites, and if it is fitting to borrow ceremonies from that corrupt church? 4thly, If the using a peculiar priestly habit is merely a civil matter, and if it does not savour of monkery, popery, and Judaism? 5thly, If those who have hitherto used their liberty may with a good conscience, upon the account of the queen's mandate, involve themselves and the church again in a yoke of bondage? 6thly, If the popish clerical habit can be called a thing that is indifferent? And the 7th is, If they ought to use these habits rather than desert their stations? To these he begs him to send as soon as may be a full and copious answer.

Collection, A few days after this, Jewel wrote to Bullinger (in the letter that is in the Number 84. Collection), "that he was so attacked by many different hands, that it took him Jewel's Sense wholly up to prepare answers to them. He was not in the house of lords during of those mat- the last parliament, in which there was great heat for a whole month concerning ters. the succession to the crown. But the queen would suffer no declaration to be made in that matter, though it was most vehemently pressed, there appearing on both sides a great deal of earnestness. The queen thought any such declaration would turn the eyes of the nation too much towards the rising sun. He says the controversy about the vestments had raised great heats. The queen was fixed, and could not be wrought on to let any change be made. Some of their brethren were so eager in disputing about that matter, as if the whole business of religion was concerned in it. They leave their stations and churches, rather than yield a little. Nor were they at all moved from their stiffness by the most learned letters that he and Gualter had written to them on that subject; nor by all the advices of their friends. He thanks God that they had no other nor more important debates then among them. Cheyney, bishop of Gloucester, did indeed in parliament profess himself openly to be a Lutheran; but he was not like to have many followers."

Collection, In a letter of his, that is also in the Collection, written to Bullinger on the Number 85. 1st of March, 1565, he writes "that he was overwhelmed with the books that the papists had written against him, and was by that means engaged in a profound course of study. He tells him how cardinal Granville had intended to cut off the intercourse between England and the Netherlands; hoping by that means to provoke the English to break out into tumults; but the design turned upon himself; for the English resolving to settle their trade and staple at Embden, the people of Flanders could not bear that. The pope had sent one to Ireland to raise a flame in that island. But the pope's agent, who was an Irishman, was taken and sent over a prisoner to England. In Scotland the queen only had her mass, all the nation being averse to it."

Reflections on By Grindal and Horn's letters, it appears that they had no other zeal in this this matter. matter but to preserve the church in the queen's favour, and in obedience to the Collection, laws; yet in letters that were upon this occasion written to Zurich (a part of Number 86. one is in the Collection) by some others that adhered to Sampson, they let them know, that both Parker the archbishop and Grindal and Horn were too much sharpened in this matter: therefore they pray them to use their endeavours to soften them more towards their brethren. But they acknowledge that Pilkington of Durham, Sands of Worcester, and Parkhurst of Norwich, had by their moderation made good all their promises; so they deserved that thanks should be given them. They desire further, that they would write to them all to proceed more mildly, and to endeavour to get those dregs of popery to be removed; and that they would tolerate, at least connive at, those who did not approve them.

Other Letters I find Pilkington complains in a letter to Gualter, "that the disputes which written to began about the vestments were carried much farther, even to the whole consti- Zurich by tution. Pious persons lamented this; atheists laughed at it; and the papists some Bishops. blew the coals, and were full of hopes upon it. The blame of all was cast on the bishops. He adds, I confess we suffer many things against our hearts, groaning under them. We cannot take them away, though we were ever so much set on it. We are under authority, and can innovate nothing without the queen; nor can we alter the laws. The only thing that is left to our choice is, whether we will bear these things, or break the peace of the church."

Parkhurst in one letter writes, "Many good people are pleased with all that is done; but there are some things that do not please me." And in another he writes, "Matters of religion go on well: there are but a very few things that I dare find fault with. That which grieved him most was, that the lives of those who professed the gospel were so very contrary to it. The gospel was never preached among them more faithfully, and with more zeal. He prays, God grant us his Spirit that we may walk in the Spirit, and mortify the works of the flesh." The last letter that those of Zurich wrote on this subject was on the 26th of August, 1567, directed to the bishops of London, Winchester, and Col. Num. 87. Norwich. "They express their grief that some learned men were deprived: they hear daily that some of those that had given good proofs of themselves in the Marian persecution were now not only turned out, but imprisoned. They hear that in Ireland many that have the same scruples are yet kept out of all trouble by the queen's order, upon the intercession of their bishops; which makes it probable that the like favour might be obtained in England, if the bishops would intercede with her majesty for it; which may the rather be expected, since the bishops themselves acknowledge that it were better for the church that these ceremonies were all laid aside; and affirm that they had often moved in parliament that they might be taken away, that so the church might be more pure and less burdened. Therefore they do not doubt but that they, out of their piety, will endeavour to procure favour to their brethren, to which they do very earnestly, but yet decently and modestly, press them." Cox, bishop of Ely, who I do not find meddled much in these controversies, has in a letter to Gualter some very sad expressions, for which there is too much occasion at all times. "When I consider the sins that do everywhere abound, and the neglect and contempt of the word of God, I am struck with horror, and tremble to think what God will do with us. We have some discipline among us with relation to men's lives, such as it is; but if any man would go about to persuade our nobility to submit their necks to that yoke, he may as well venture to pull the hairs out of a lion's beard."

Sands was of the same mind: he lamented the occasion of this dispute, and hoped to see an end put to it. In a letter to Bullinger from Worcester, dated the 3d of January, 1566, he writes thus: "The true religion of Christ is now settled among us, which is the most valuable of all things. The gospel is no more shut up, but is freely preached; and for other things, we need not be much concerned about them. There is some small dispute concerning the popish vestments, whether they ought to be used or not. But God will put an end to these things."

A few days after that, Jewel, in a letter dated the 8th of February, 1566, to Bullinger, (a part of it is in the Collection, the rest of it relates to the books he was then writing in defence of his Apology,) tells him, "that the queen seemed fixed in her resolution not to marry: he expresses his great concern that the heat raised on the account of the surplice was not extinguished; he writes that the affairs of Scotland were not in a quiet state; some of the chief of the nobility had retired into England; others fortified themselves in their castles, and were as in a state of war with the papists. The queen, though an obstinate papist, yet does not seem resolved what course she had best take; for in matters of religion the greatest part both of the nobility and people were against her; and their number did daily increase. The king of Spain sent lately an Italian abbot thither with Spanish gold. He was a subtle and crafty man, and did so far gain not only on the queen but on the king, that though he had hitherto gone to sermons, and had no mass, yet upon the assurance of a rich ship that was expected within a day, he presently ordered mass to be said in his church; while Knox in the very next church was preaching against idolatry, and the whole papal tyranny, with greater zeal than ordinary. But the Spanish ship was furiously shattered by a storm and was cast on the coast of England, so that weak king would find what he had gained by his going to mass." Sampson and Humphreys wrote a long and particular answer to the letter that Grindal and Horn wrote to Bullinger; but that runs into a tedious controversy, with which the divines of Zurich wrote that they would meddle no more in those matters, so I do not think fit to insert it.

"They complain that the archbishop had contributed to buy an organ for Canterbury, which was no sign of his disliking it. They complain that many were put in prison because they would not provide godfathers and godmothers for baptising their children. They say the convocation signified little: for many things were agreed to in the convocation in the year 1562, that would have tended to the great good of the church, but were suppressed, for nothing was of force but as the queen and the archbishop consented. And in the last convocation, a very learned man that belonged to the bishop of Norwich proposed somewhat relating to the vestments; to whom a bishop said, What have you to do in those matters? we began them and we will end them. He answered the bishop, This matter has been hitherto laid wholly on the queen, but now you take it on yourselves." They also in another paper set forth, "that in queen Mary's days, when the church of England was broken and dispersed, a body of protestants formed themselves into a church at London, and had their ministers and deacons, and continued through all her reign, though many of them were burned: but that after queen Mary's death, the exiles were recalled, and the prisoners were set at liberty; only this church that had continued all the while in the midst of the flame was now extinguished." In another letter he assures Simler, "there was no danger of Lutheranism, only we are now fighting among ourselves about ceremonies, vestments, and matters of no importance. That matter has somewhat shaken men of weak minds: I wish that all, even the smallest, remnants of popery could be wholly put not only out of our churches, but chiefly out of the minds of all people; but the queen at this time cannot bear any alteration in religion."

I shall carry this matter no farther, having gone beyond what I had at first proposed by the importance of these papers, that give so clear and so true an account of the beginnings of those unhappy disputes of which we have seen and do still feel the unhappy consequences. In these we clearly see what was the sense of the most eminent and the most learned of our reformers in those matters. They continued their correspondence with Zurich as long as those great men lived with whom they had lodged in their great distress, and to whom they had been so singularly obliged that they were ready always to acknowledge it, and were often sending presents to them.

The Queen of Scots marries the Lord
Darnley. In Scotland, things were running into great disorder. The queen, as she liked the person of the Lord Darnley, and perhaps the better because he seemed to be of a soft and gentle temper, and easy to be governed, so her faithfullest counsellors concurred in advising the marriage. He was the next heir to the crown of England after the queen. For though the queen dowager of Scotland, that was Henry the Eighth's sister, having married the earl of Angus, after king James the Fourth was killed, but falling to be in ill terms with him, either found or suborned witnesses (as it was given out) to prove upon him a pre-contract in words of the present time, by which she obtained a sentence dissolving that marriage; yet the daughter she had borne to him was declared legitimate, in the bull that confirmed the sentence declaring that marriage dissolved, the original of which I saw. The reason given is, because she was born of the mother's part bonâ fide. Lord Darnley being thus descended, and born within the kingdom of England, might have been a dangerous competitor for that crown, especially if he should fortify himself by a prudent marriage, and a good conduct in England: so it was certainly good advice given the queen, since she liked his person, to secure her right to that succession by this marriage. When she married him, she declared him king, and put his name on the coin after her own. The qualities of his mind did not answer the gracefulness of his person; for sometimes he was in all things compliant to the queen, but that lasted not long. She had such an affable and obliging air, which her education in the court of France had much improved, that it was not easy to resist it. At first she seemed so indifferent as to the matters of religion, that the minds of the nation were much quieted, when they concluded that she continued to be a papist more from principles of honour and interest than from her own persuasion.

But they came to have other thoughts of her when she began to express more zeal in those matters. Her kindred by her mother pushed her on; and she was animated both from the court of France and from Rome to restore the popish religion. On these hopes she set her gates open to all that desired to come to her mass, and had many masses every day in her chapel. The body of the Scottish nation did not easily bear with the mass which the queen had at first privately in her court for herself, and for a very small number of servants who were of her own religion. In the parliament, in the year 1563, a petition was offered by the noblemen, and the superintendents, and ministers of the reformed religion, which will be found in the Collection, setting forth, that "whereas in the last convention of the kirk that was held at Edinburgh in June last, some were sent to the queen with certain articles to which they desired answer; and though the queen had answered them in part, yet she referred the farther answer to the present parliament: so a full answer was now prayed. And whereas in the parliament held in July 1560, it was enacted, that the mass and all papistry should be put out of the realm, and Christ's religion should be universally received; and that the queen, by divers proclamations, has approved Christ's religion, which she found publicly received at her arrival, in particular at Dundee, on the 15th of September last, in which the king and queen did, both by act of council and by proclamation, promise, that in this present parliament she would establish the religion of Christ, and abolish all laws and constitutions contrary to the same: upon which they desired that the premises might be considered; and so they laid before the parliament the articles which they had laid before the queen and her council, together with her answer and the reply made to it by the kirk."

In the articles they demand, first, that "the papistical mass, with all idolatry, and the pope's jurisdiction, might be abolished not only in the subject's, but in the queen's own person; and that the true religion might be ratified through the whole kingdom as well in the queen's person as in the subject's; and that the people might be required to resort on Sundays to prayers and preaching, as they were before to the idolatrous mass. Secondly, that provision may be made for the ministers' maintenance; and that such as are admitted into the ministry may have their livings assigned them where they labour, or in parts adjacent, and that they may not be put to crave them of others. And that the benefices then vacant, or that have been vacant since March, anno 1558, or that shall become vacant, be given to learned persons, able to preach God's word, upon their trial and admission by the superintendents. And that no bishopric, abbey, or other ecclesiastical benefice, having many churches annexed to it, be given to any one man; but that the churches may be severally disposed of, so that every man may serve at his own church; and that glebes and manses be assigned to them, that they may reside at their churches, and discharge their consciences in them; and that the churches may be kept in due repair. Thirdly, that none may have charge of souls, or be put in colleges or universities, or publicly instruct the youth, but such as are tried by the superintendents and the visitors of the churches, and are admitted by them. Fourthly, that lands founded for hospitals may be restored to the use of the poor; and that all rents and profits belonging to any order of friars be applied to the poor, and for schools in towns. Fifthly, that horrid crimes, blasphemy, sorcery, adultery, incest, and murder, with many other crimes that are reckoned up, may be severely punished; and that some order may be taken for the ease of the labourers of the ground, concerning the reasonable payment of their tithes, and in the letting of them."

To this the queen answered, "that as she did not think that there was any impiety in the mass, so she hoped her subjects would not press her to receive any religion against her own conscience, which would throw her into a perpetual inquietness by the remorse of her conscience. She would never leave the religion in which she had been brought up; and it would be further a great prejudice to her, in that, by her so doing, she should lose the friendship of the king of France, the ancient ally of this kingdom, and of other princes, from whom she may find great supports; so she will not in an instant put herself in hazard of losing all her friends. And since she has not yet pressed, nor means she hereafter to press, the conscience of any man, but leaves them to worship God according to their persuasion, she hopes they will not press her to offend her own conscience. But when the parliament meets, her majesty will consent to everything that the three estates shall agree upon; and she renews the assurance she had given, that men's lives or estates shall be in no hazard for any cause of religion."

As to the second article, "the queen thought it not reasonable that she should deprive herself of so great a part of the patrimony of the crown, by putting the patronage of benefices out of her hands; for her own necessity required the keeping them in her own hands; yet she was contented to assign what might serve for the reasonable sustentation of the ministers. She referred the other articles to the parliament."

To this answer the kirk replied, "that the firmness she expressed to the mass gave no small grief to her good subjects. Their religion was no other than that which Christ revealed, and his apostles preached ; which differed from the impiety of the Turks, the blasphemy of the Jews, and the vain superstition of the papists." And upon that, as they run out into a high commendation of their religion, so " they require the queen, in the name of God, to embrace the means by which she may be persuaded to the truth, which they offered presently to her by the preaching of God's word, and by public disputation against the adversaries of it whensoever she thought it expedient. And as for the mass, they undertook to prove it to be a mass of impiety from the beginning to the end. As for the prejudice that the queen thinks would follow on her changing her religion, by dissolving the alliance she is in with the king of France and other foreign princes, they answer, that the true religion is the undoubted means to keep up a perfect confederacy with him who is the King of kings, and who has the hearts of all princes in his hands, which ought to be more valued than all other confederacies whatsoever."

As to the second article, " they did not intend to defraud her of the patronages, but only that persons presented to benefices should be tried and examined by the learned men of the kirk, or the superintendents appointed for that end. But as the presentations belong to her, so collation upon them belongs to the church, and the patrons may not present without trial and examination ; which, if they might do, must bring great ignorance and disorder into the church ; and it was far against all good conscience for the queen to retain a good part of the benefices in her own hands. This was so contrary both to all divine and human laws, that they were unwilling to open up that whole matter to her ; and therefore they beg she would consider, that though the patronage of benefices belonged to her, yet the retention of them in her own hands, and the not giving them to qualified persons, is ungodly, and contrary to all order, and ruinous to the souls of the people. They were desirous to have her necessities relieved ; but they add, that the tithes are the patrimony of the church, out of which, in the first place, those who serve in the ministry ought to be relieved, the churches ought to be repaired, and the youth instructed. They concluded with thanks for her willingness to have the ministers provided for ; and they pray that a special condescending on particulars may be thought on."

But all these petitions were still put off ; and the queen, by her practice among the nobility, began to divide them into factions ; and plainly said, when these petitions were read to her, that " she would do nothing in prejudice of the religion that she professed ;" and in wrath told them, " she hoped, before a year was expired, to have the mass, and the catholic religion professed through the whole kingdom." And she managed the parliament so dexterously, that neither was the treaty of Leith, nor the settlement of religion made in the parliament 1560, so much as named, much less confirmed. In this parliament some small provision was made for the ministers ; and acts were made against sorcery and adultery, that they should be punished by death. There was, indeed, an act of oblivion passed for all that was done from the 6th of March, 1558, to the 1st of September, 1561 ; but the parliament of the year 1560 came to be looked on as an illegal assembly. So that upon this a great alarm was given to the whole body of the reformed in that kingdom ; and the jealousy was increased by the queen's marrying the lord Darnley. He had been bred up a strict papist, but now pretended to be a protestant ; yet as he was all the while suspected of favouring the religion he was bred up in, so he quickly returned to the open profession of it. This gave occasion to another petition in a bolder strain, in which the body of the reformed set forth, " that the true religion was established in that nation ; that the mass, and all the idolatry and tyrannical usurpations of the pope, were suppressed ; and that they were going on to a perfect reformation ; but that all had been stopped now for the space of four years. That upon her arrival, that idol the mass was again set up, and men were put in offices to which they had no right. From such beginnings they saw what they might look for ; yet, in hope that God would mollify the queen's heart, and out of their desire to maintain the public peace, they had long expected to see what answer would be made to their petitions ; but they saw things grew daily worse and worse. The queen's gates were then set open in contempt of proclamations set out by herself to the contrary. The patrimony of the church was bestowed on unworthy persons ; their ministers were reduced to great poverty, and put to much trouble ; vices of all sorts abounded universally ;

they therefore prayed the queen to think of redressing these matters, and to answer their other petitions, assuring her of all due obedience to her laws and authority. They also pray that she would give them no occasion to think that she intended the subversion of the true religion, and the destruction of those who professed it; for they assure her they would never be subject to that Roman Antichrist, nor suffer (as far as it lay in their power to hinder it) any branches of his usurped authority to have place within the realm." This, Col.Num.90. which is in the Collection, prevailed no more than their other petitions had done.

I will add to this a few particulars relating to the affairs of Scotland, as they are set forth in some of these letters that were sent me from Zurich. Parkhurst, bishop of Norwich, in Col.Num.91. a letter to Bullinger (which is in the Collection), writes, in the year 1566, "that, in March last, an Italian, called Signior David (whom he charges as skilled in necromancy), who was in great favour with the queen, was dragged out of her room, and stabbed by many hands; and adds, that an abbot was then so wounded, that though he escaped, yet he died of his wounds soon after; and that one Black, a Dominican, in great esteem among the papists, was also killed in the court. And upon all that disorder, while the privy-council was sitting, the lords escaped with their lives. Since that time the queen had brought forth a prince. She was reconciled to her husband, and had called home her brother and the lords that were of the reformed side. But though the queen had borne her son ten weeks before he wrote, yet all that while he was not baptised; for she intended to do it with pomp, and many masses in the great church, though the inhabitants of Edinburgh were resolved to hinder that. They apprehended she would bring over a force from France." He concludes with a prayer, not very evangelical, "that God would either convert or confound her." There are circumstances in this letter of some others killed with seignior David that I have found nowhere else.

About the same time, Grindal wrote likewise a letter to Bullinger, which is also in the Collection; in which he thanks him for the letters he had written over concerning the controversy about the habits: he writes, "that it was not credible that a question about things of no moment should have raised so great a disturbance as this had done: many, both of the ministers and the people, were designing to withdraw from them, and to set up separate meetings; but most of them were now come to a better mind. He acknowledges their wise and good letters had contributed much towards that: yet some continued still in their former resolutions. It were an easy thing to reconcile them to the queen, if they could be brought to change their mind: but till that was done, it was not in their power to effect it. The bishops, upon their return, and before they were consecrated, had endeavoured all they could to get those things removed that gave occasion to the present dispute: but in that they could not prevail, neither with the queen nor with the parliament. So they upon consulting among themselves came to a resolution not to desert their churches for the sake of a few rites that were not unlawful, since the doctrine was entire and pure, in which they agreed in all things with them of Zurich. They saw the good effects of these their resolutions: and those unseasonable contentions about things indifferent did not edify, but tear the churches."

From their own affairs he turns to those of Scotland; where he writes, "things were in no good state. They still retained the profession of the truth; but the queen endeavoured by all means to extirpate it: she had lately ordered six or seven masses to be said every day in her chapel, and admitted all that pleased to come to them: whereas at first she was contented with one private mass, to which no Scotchman was admitted: and whereas it was provided that the ministers should be maintained out of the revenues of the church, she had now for three years stopped all payments: there were no public changes yet made; both the nobility and the people continued very firm: of whom he reckons the earl of Murray the chief: he understood that the queen was in very ill terms with her husband on this account: there was one David, an Italian, recommended to her by the cardinal of Lorraine, who governed all the councils there, and was secretary of state. The king, finding he had no regard to him, grew uneasy at it; and being young and rash, he entered into a conspiracy with some of the nobility and some of his court; so the Italian was dragged out of the queen's presence, notwithstanding her earnest intreaties to save him; and he was no sooner out than many ran their daggers into him ; so he was murdered without any cause declared. This horrid crime stuck deep in the queen's heart ; so that, though she had borne a son to him, she could never forgive him."

The dismal fate of that unfortunate queen is so tender a point, that I will say nothing of it but in the words of others. There is a letter of Grindal's to Bullinger, dated Collection, Number 93. the 21st of June, 1567. All in that letter which relates to this matter, is in the Collection ; in which these words will be found :—" Scotland is fallen into new troubles : for their late king Henry, on the 10th of February, was found dead in a garden near his lodgings. It is not yet agreed how he died. Some say that a few barrels of gunpowder, being on design laid under the chamber in which he lay ; these being kindled, the house was blown up, and so he was thrown out into that garden. Others say, that in the night he was dragged out of his chamber and strangled, and that then the house was blown up. The earl of Bothwell was generally thought the author of this murder : he also procured, by the authority of the archbishop of St. Andrew's, a divorce from his lawful wife : and on the 15th of May last, the queen had married him, and created him duke of Orkney. Almost all the nobility had left the court before this marriage, when they saw that no inquiry was made into the king's murder : they had a meeting at Stirling, where it appeared by clear evidences, that the murder was committed by Bothwell : so an army was brought together on design to seize on him, but he made his escape ; and it was not then known whither he was gone. Some say the queen was besieged in a certain castle ; and others say she was made a prisoner in the castle of Edinburgh, as having been conscious to the murder of her husband. But whatsoever may be in this, that infamous marriage must end tragically." With this he concludes that matter, promising him a more particular account, when the certainty of it was better understood.

To this I will add another relation that may be more certainly depended on. Cardinal Laurea, whom the pope had sent to be his nuncio in Scotland, may be supposed to have had the best information that he could procure from those of her party, and of her religion, and he would certainly have put the best face possible on that matter ; especially after her tragical fate, which raised a universal disposition in all people to think as well of her as was possible ; but chiefly among those of that religion, so that I know no relation of that affair that can be so certainly depended on (making still some allowances for the softenings of a partial writer), as that which we find in that cardinal's life, which was written by the abbot of Pignerol, and was printed at Bologna in the year 1599, in which he gives this account of this whole matter.

Pope Pius the Fifth sent Laurea to be his nuncio in Scotland, to assist and encourage the queen in her zeal : he sent by him 20,000 crowns to her as an earnest of further supplies ; and wrote to her with his own hand, recommending his nuncio to her. The nuncio came to Paris in the dog-days, and brought him who writes his life along with him to be his secretary. He received letters from the queen of Scots by the hands of the archbishop of Glasgow, who was then her ambassador in France : by these she expressed her desires that he might come to Scotland as soon as might be ; but wished him to delay coming till he should hear from her once more, that she might have all things prepared for his reception. He upon that wrote to her in a very vehement style, pressing her to zeal and fortitude of mind, in carrying on the restoring the catholic religion in her kingdom : with that he sent her over 4000 crowns, and sent one Edmund Hay, a jesuit, and a man of a cunning and penetrating temper, to be a secret assistant to her : in particular, he pressed her either to punish, or at least to disgrace, Lethington, who he believed set on all the tumults, and was a determined heretic, and a favourer of the earl of Murray.

Con has printed these letters. Pius the Fifth's letter bears date the 16th of June, 1566.

Life of Queen Mary, printed at Rome, An. 1624. In it " he recommends his nuncio to her confidence, who was then bishop of Mondovi (Montis Regalis), and promises all possible assistance to her in her design of bringing back her kingdom to the obedience of the holy see." Queen

Mary's answer bears date the 9th of October that year, from Edinburgh : " She in it acknowledges the pope's favour and bounty to her : she adds some high expressions of her sense of the pope's zeal and piety, and promises to treat his nuncio with all respect and confidence. She tells him that she had borne a son ; and that she had brought her nobility, though not without much difficulty, to consent that he should be publicly baptised after the manner of the catholic church. She promises to bring him up in that religion : and she hoped this should prove a good beginning of restoring the right use of the sacraments in her dominions." The pope seemed much pleased with this beginning of his pontificate ; and in his answer on the 22nd of January following, "he congratulates the birth and baptism of her son, and prays that it may have a good effect."

Three months passed before Laurea had any intimation from the queen concerning his coming over : upon which he sent the bishop of Dumblane, who was then at Paris, with copious advices to that queen, and continued to press her very earnestly by his letters, to admit of his coming over : the substance of all which is set forth in his life : he tells us further, "That the queen held a convention of the estates, and had obtained two things of them, not without difficulty : the one was, that her child should be baptised according to the rites of the Roman church ; and the other was, that the pope's nuncio should be admitted with due respect." Upon this the nuncio designed to go to Antwerp, thinking that the navigation would be safer from thence than from Calais. But then he adds, "that such a barbarous and impious crime was committed in Scotland, that it gave a horror to think of it, much more to write of it." Of what follows in that life I will add a verbal translation.

"The king, as was said, had the small-pox, upon which, that the contagion might not endanger the queen, he retired to a house at some distance from the palace : as he began to recover, he was often visited by her : one day they supped together, and after much discourse, and that they had diverted themselves till it was late, the queen pretended she could not stay with him all night, for one of her maids of honour being married that day, she must, according to the custom of former queens, see the bride put to bed. She was scarce gone, when some gunpowder that was secretly laid under the house, was fired, so that the whole house was blown up, and the king killed : though some said that he was not blown up, but that hearing some noise of armed men, he had got out by a back door into a neighbouring garden ; and that he and one of his servants were strangled before the house was blown up. It is certain that the king's dead body was found in that garden, with no other hurt but that about his neck a blackness appeared all round it. When this base murder was known, all people were struck with horror : some spoke severely of the queen herself ; libels were published upon it ; and some having discovered that Bothwell was the author of this horrid murder, they charged him, as being not only an assassinate, but a cruel hangman : it being on such occasions ordinary for people to search into and to discover such things.

"Bothwell, though a heretic, had been always zealous for the queen, and faithful to her ; and he had lately with great courage rescued her out of a danger she was in, from a very great sedition : besides, that the queen loved him desperately ; therefore, he in hope to be married to the queen, first divorced his wife, as if upon adultery that might be so done, that he might marry another wife, and then he cruelly contrived the murdering the king. The queen, after she had borne down some very wicked reports concerning herself, and Bothwell being afraid of some tumult that might have been fatal to them, thought fit to leave Edinburgh. So she carried her son with her to Stirling, a place of defence : having laid (as is probable) a design with Bothwell how matters were to be managed. A few days after she pretended to go out a hunting ; then Bothwell with two hundred horse seemed to surprise her, and to seize her by force. But the queen coming back with him to the castle, presently made him duke of Orkney, and declared him her husband. That marriage did neither prove happy nor lasting : it being a conjunction that had nothing of the matrimonial dignity in it, but had sprung from a partnership in an unworthy crime. Murray was then out of Scotland, but he had left Lethington among others behind him, who were to raise new quarrels and tumults upon every occasion. It was easy to Lethington to work up the minds of the people, who were universally enraged against the queen and Bothwell to a great flame : therefore a tumultuary army being in haste brought together at Edinburgh, they marched towards Stirling. But when the queen heard that, she, with a few women, and some of her court, went to them. They received her with due respect: and being asked why they came thither armed, they answered, they came only to punish Bothwell for the crimes committed by him, both in the base and cruel murder of the king, and in the force he had put on her person. The queen justified Bothwell, and said, he had done nothing but by her consent: this did provoke them to such a degree of indignation, that they cried all out with one voice, ‘Then, madam, you shall be our prisoner:’ and without more delay, they imprisoned her in a castle within an island in Lochlevin; appointing only one footman and two ordinary women to attend upon her.”

Thus the pope’s nuncio understood this matter. There are some inconsiderable circumstances in this relation wrong told; yet the main of the story, agreeing with other relations, shows how falsely this matter has been since that time represented, not only by writers in the church of Rome, but by many among ourselves, to put better colours on this odious business. To this (that I may end all this unhappy matter at once, without adding any reflections on it, or telling what were the censures that passed on this occasion,—of which I have a great variety on both sides by me, in books printed very near that time,) I shall only

p. 72. add another very important passage that is in the Life of that cardinal, relating to the testament which that queen wrote with her own hand in French the day before she was beheaded. In it “she expressed her constant zeal for the catholic religion; and provided, that if the prince, her son, did not renounce the false and heretical persuasion which he had drunk in, the inheritance of the crown of England should never descend to him, but should devolve from him to Philip, king of Spain. When this original will was brought to the cardinal, he examined it with great care, that so it might appear that it was truly her last will, and that it ought to be acknowledged as such. He compared it with the letters he had formerly received from that queen; and not only he himself, but one Lewis Owen, an Englishman (bishop of Casana), then at Rome, whom the writer calls a pious and a most honest man, signed and attested it. The will being thus confirmed, and as it were fortified by a public authority, he delivered it to the count of Olivares, the king of Spain’s ambassador, that it might be faithfully transmitted to that king himself.” I have put the

Col.Num.94. words of the author of that Life in the language in which he wrote it in the Collection, so that the reader may compare the translation I have given with the original. I leave this dismal relation as I found it in these vouchers, without any further canvassing of that black affair, which was followed by a train of very extraordinary transactions.

The Scottish nation, both papists and protestants, concurred in the new settlement, of which I shall give a particular account from an authentic proof lately found in Scotland, and now kept in the library of the college of Glasgow. It is the first bond of association that was entered into, upon the resignation of the crown, which the queen was prevailed on to make (by force, as she afterwards declared, when she made her escape out of the prison with which she was threatened). She sent it by the lord Lindsay (ancestor to the earl of Crawford) and the lord Ruthven, afterwards made earl of Gowrie. This bears date, at Edinburgh, the 24th of July, 1567. By it she resigned the crown to her son; and, during his infancy, she named the earl of Murray to be regent, who was then in France, and did not come to Scotland,—at least he did not sign this bond before the 22nd of August. But in the council-book, on the 25th of July, the bond itself is entered on record. And the council removing to Stirling on the 29th of July, the queen’s resignation was presented, and received by the earls of Morton, Athol, Glencairn, Mar, Montcith, the master of Graham, the lord Home, and the bishop of Orkney, in the name of the three estates. And the earl of Morton taking the coronation-oath in the name of the prince, he was anointed and crowned by the bishop of Orkney, who did indeed little honour to this ceremony; for he, a few days before, had performed the nuptial ceremonies between the queen and the earl of Bothwell. Upon all this,

Col.Num.95. the bond (which is in the Collection) was made to this purpose: “That whereas the queen being weary of the pains and travail of government, and desiring that in her lifetime her son might be placed in the kingdom, and be obeyed by all her subjects, had resigned the crown in favour of her son; they therefore promised, and bound themselves, to assist their king in setting him on the throne, and putting the crown on his head; and that they should give their oaths of homage, with all dutiful obedience to him, as became true subjects ; and should concur in establishing him in his kingdom, and resist all such as should oppose it."

This was made up in some sheets of vellum ; and there are above two hundred hands of the most eminent families of that kingdom set to that bond. Twenty-five of these were then earls and lords ; and there are fifteen others, whose families are since that time advanced to be of the nobility. The noblemen are, the earl of Murray (who signs James, regent), the earls of Huntley, Argyle, Athol, Morton, Mar, Glencairn, Errol, Buchan ; the lords Graham, Home, Ruthven, Sanquhar, Glamis, Lindsay, Carlisle, Borthwick, Innermaith, Ochiltry, Sempil, Methven, Cathcart, Grey, Ross, Lovat, and the master of Montrose ; for earls' sons were then so designed. The noble families whose ancestors signed this bond are, Buccleugh, Queensberry, Athol, Roxburgh, Annandale, Galloway, Findlater, Panmure, Dalhousie, Leven, Stair, Kenmore, Jedburgh, Cranston, Kircudbright.

Besides those who subscribed the first bond, there was a second bond (that is likewise in the Collection) entered into in April 1569, "by which they did not only acknowledge the king's authority, but likewise (during the king's minority) the authority of the earl of Murray as regent, renouncing all other authority. And they swear to observe this bond ; in which if they failed, they are contented to be counted false, perjured, and defamed for ever." This, besides many of those who signed the former bond, was signed by the earls of Crawford and Cassilis, and the lords Salton, Ogilby, Oliphant, and the ancestors of the earls of Seaforth and Southesk, and of the lord Duffus. And in a subsequent bond, signed by the earl of Morton when he was regent, there are five other lords who signed it : the earl of Angus, ancestor to the duke of Douglas ; the lords Levingston, Drummond, Boyd, and Hoy of Yester, the ancestors of the earls of Linlithgow, Perth, and Kilmarnock, and of the marquis of Tweeddale.

These were for the greatest part protestants ; but there were many papists that joined with them. The earl of Huntley, ancestor to the present duke of Gordon, was the head of the popish party. The earl of Athol, whose name was Stuart, and whose family is since extinct in the male line, protested against the Reformation in parliament, and had assisted at the baptism of the young king in the popish manner. And besides these, the lords Oliphant, Gray, Sempil, Maxwell, and Borthwick, were still papists. Thus, as the war against the queen-regent (eight years before) was engaged in on national grounds, this great revolution of that kingdom seems to have proceeded, as to the civil part, upon the same principles. So that whatsoever was done in this matter, was done, not upon the grounds of the Reformation, but upon national grounds, and pretended precedents, and laws : in all which the queen of England had secretly a great hand, how much soever it was disguised or denied.

The interest of state was clearly of her side ; for the house of Guise, that began to form great projects in France, laid a main part of their scheme in the design of advancing the unfortunate queen of Scotland to the crown of England ; and in the view of that succession, many plots were formed to destroy that glorious queen. They also practised upon the king, her son, as soon as he was capable of being wrought on, by the duke of Lennox and others, whom they employed about him to keep him in a dependence on them. They assured him he should still be king of Scotland ; their design being, that if their practices against queen Elizabeth had succeeded, his mother should have left Scotland to him when she was advanced to the crown of England. They did likewise engage him to continue unmarried ; though he, being the only person of his family, it was otherwise very reasonable to marry him soon : yet they durst not venture on a popish match till their great design on the crown of France had succeeded ; and they would by no means suffer him to marry into a protestant family.

They kept him so much in their management, that the queen of England, and her wise council, understanding all this practice, raised those jealousies of his religion, and made such discoveries of that secret correspondence he was in with the house of Guise, that to this all the troubles that the kirk gave him were chiefly owing. The leaders among them knew, from the intelligence sent them by the court of England, more than that this had.

they thought fit to own, or than could be well proved. This was the true cause of all that peevish opposition that he met with from the ministers there, which is copiously set forth by archbishop Spotswood; but either he knew not, or did not think fit to set that out as the effect of the jealousy raised by the court of England, on the account of the confidence in which he was engaged with the house of Guise.

But as these practices had a fatal conclusion with relation to the unfortunate queen Mary after her long imprisonment, so when upon the murder of the duke of Guise, and the successes in the beginning of Henry the Fourth of France's reign, all those projects of that ambitious and persecuting house were at an end, the king of Scotland married to a daughter of Denmark, and continued still after that in a confidence with the queen of England, which secured to him the succession to that crown.

In giving this short view, which I thought important, and in which I was instructed by many papers that I have seen, I have run a great way beyond my design, which was only to open the first settlement of the Reformation in the isle of Great Britain, now happily by her late majesty united into one kingdom: so that nothing remains to be written in pursuance of that. Only, since upon some public occasions, I have referred to a declaration of queen Elizabeth's (by which she owned and justified the assistance that she gave to the subjects, both of Scotland and in the Netherlands, in the necessary defence to which the illegal cruelty of their governors forced them), and since I have been challenged to publish it, not without insinuations that it was a forgery, I have thought it proper to conclude my collection of records with that declaration, that so a paper of such importance may be preserved, and may be more generally read.

I now conclude this work, in which, as I have faithfully set out everything according to the materials and vouchers with which I was furnished, so I have used all proper means to procure the best information that I could. It remains, that I leave this to posterity, as the authentic history of a series of great transactions, honestly (though often feebly) conducted, with good intentions and happy beginnings, though not carried on to the perfection that was designed and wished for.

The proviso that had passed in king Henry the Eighth's time, that continued all the canon law then received in England, till a code of ecclesiastical laws was prepared, which though attempted and well composed, was never settled, has fixed among us many gross abuses, besides the dilatory forms of those courts, which make all proceedings in them both slow and chargeable. This has in a great measure enervated all church discipline. A faint wish, that is read on Ash-Wednesday, intimates a desire of reviving the ancient discipline; yet no progress has been made to render that more effectual.

The exemptions settled by the papal authority do put many parts of this church in a very disjointed state; while in some places the laity, and in many others presbyters, exercise episcopal jurisdiction independent on their bishops, in contradiction to their principles, while they assert a divine right for settling the government of the church in bishops, and yet practise episcopal authority in the virtue of an act of parliament, that provisionally confirmed those papal invasions of the episcopal power, which is plainly that which by a modern name is called Erastianism, and is so severely censured by some who yet practise it; since whatsoever is done under the pretence of law against the divine appointment, can go under no better name than the highest and worst degree of Erastianism.

The abbots, with the devouring monasteries, had swallowed up a great part of that which was the true patrimony of the church: these houses being suppressed, unlimited grants were made of their lands, without reserved provisions for the subsistence of those who were to serve at the altar; this has put a great part of our clergy under crying necessities; and though the noble bounty of the late queen has settled funds for their relief, the good effect of that comes on but slowly: yet it is some comfort to think that within an age there will be an ample provision for all that serve in the church; and upon that prospect we may hope that many abuses will be then quite abolished.

But with all these defects, we must rejoice in this, that our doctrine is pure and uncorrupted; that our worship is truly a reasonable service, freed from idolatry and superstition; and that the main lines of our church government agree to the first constitution of the churches by the apostles: so that upon the grounds laid down by St. John, all may hold fellowship with us, since we hold fellowship with the Father, and with the Son, Jesus Christ.

May we all adhere firmly to the doctrine of the apostles, and continue in their fellowship, in sacraments and prayers, suitably to the rules laid down by them: contending earnestly for the faith delivered by them to the saints, the first Christians: and may all “who believe in God, be careful to maintain good works for necessary uses, which are both good and profitable unto men; avoiding foolish questions and contentions, for they are unprofitable and vain.”

May we all continue to recommend our doctrine and church by a holy and exemplary deportment, “shining as lights, and walking worthy of God, who has called us to his kingdom and glory;” improving all the advantages that we have, and bearing with all the defects that we labour under, using our best endeavours to have them redressed; yet still keeping the “unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace;” waiting for such a glorious conjunction as may restore everything among us to a primitive purity and splendour: which God may perhaps grant to the prayers of those who call on him night and day for it.

But if we never see so happy a time upon earth, we know if we continue watchful and “faithful to the death,” we shall arrive at last at a blessed society, of “innumerable companies of angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect; of whom is composed the general assembly and church of the first born, who are written in heaven, who see and enjoy God for ever.” In the view of directing myself and others thither, I have written, and now I do conclude this work.

Julius Secundus Papa venerabili Fratri Guilielmo Archiepiscopo. Cantuarien.

VENERABILIS Frater, salutem et Apostolicam Benedictionem. Charissimum in Christo Filium nostrum Henricum Angliæ Regem Illustrissimum, quem peculiari charitate complectimur, aliquo insigni Apostolico munere in hoc Regni sui primordio, decorandum putantes, mittimus nunc ad eum Rosam Auream, Sancto Chrismate delibutam, et odorifero Musco aspersam, nostrisq; manibus de more Romanorum Pontificum benedictam, quam ei a tua Fraternitate inter Missarum solemnias per te celebranda, cum cæremoniis in notula alligata contentis, dari volumus nostra et Apostolica benedictione. Datum Romæ apud Sanctum Petrum sub Annulo Piscatoris 5 April, 1510. Pontificatus nostri Anno septimo.

Sigismundus.

The Note of the Ceremonies of delivering the Rose, referred to in the Letter, was not thought worthy to be put in the Register.

III.—A Writ for Summoning Convocations.

[Tonst. Regist. Fol. 33.]

REX, &c. Reverendissimo in Christo Patri Cantuarien. Archiepis. totius Angliæ Primati et Apostolicæ sedis Legato, salutem. Quibusdam arduis et urgentibus negotiis, Nos, defensionem et securitatem Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, ac pacem, tranquillitatem, et bonum publicum, et defensionem Regni nostri et subditorum nostrorum ejusdem concernentibus, vobis in fide et dilectione quibus nobis tenemini rogando mandamus, quatenus præmissis debito intuitu attentis et ponderatis, universos et singulos Episcopos vestræ Provinciæ, ac Decanos et Priores Ecclesiarum Cathedralium, Abbates, Priores et alios Electivos, exemptos et non exemptos, necnon Archidiaconos, Conventus, Capitula, et Collegia, totumq; Clerum, cujuslibet Dioceseos ejusdem Provinciæ, ad conveniendum coram vobis in Ecclesia Sancti Pauli London. vel alibi prout melius expedire videritis, cum omni celeritate accommoda, modo debito convocari faciatis ad tractandum, consentiendum, et concludendum super præmissis, et aliis quæ sibi clarius proponentur, tunc et ibidem ex parte nostra. Et hoc, sicut Nos et statum Regni nostri, et honorem et utilitatem Ecclesiæ prædictæ diligitis, nullatenus omittatis. Teste meipso, &c. apud Westminst., 6 Feb., Anno Regni 14.

Warham in his Writ of executing this Summons, prefixes the 20th of April for the day of their meeting.

IV.—A Writ for a Convocation summoned by Warham on an Ecclesiastical account.

WILLIELMUS permissione divina Cantuar. Archiepiscopus, totius Angliæ Primas et Apostolicæ sedis Legatus, venerabili confratri nostro Domino Ricardo Dei Gratia London. Episcopo, salutem et fraternam in Domino caritatem. Cum nuper Ecclesia Anglicana, quæ majorum nostrorum temporibus, multis ac magnis libertatibus et immunitatibus gaudere solebat, quorundam iniquorum hominum malitiis, et nequitiis fortiter fuerit inquietata et perturbata, qui omnia quæ a majoribus nostris sancte et pie, ob tranquillitatem dictæ Ecclesiæ, fuerunt ordinata ac sancita, vel prava et sinistra interpretatione prope subvertentes, vel personas Ecclesiasticas male tractantes, ac eas contemptai habentes, dictam Ecclesiam pene prostraverunt ac pedibus conculcarunt: Ne igitur dicta Ecclesia Anglicana ad calamitatem insignem seu ruinam ac jacturam, et quod absit, desolationem perveniat, quas diu eadem Ecclesia Anglicana per diversas personas, ut præsertim præ oculis suis Deum non habentes, nec censuras Sanctæ Matris Ecclesiæ timentes, sustinuit et sustinebat, prout de verisimili Reformatione non habita in futurum sustinere debeat; Nos prout tenemur, congruum remedium in hac parte providere cupientes, et ob id ipsum Prælatos et Clerum nostræ Cantuar. Provinciæ convocare volentes; Fraternitati vestræ igitur committimus et mandamus, quatenus omnes et singulos

[Anno Dom. 1523. Regist. Cuthberti Tonstall. Fol. 40.]

QUUM Illustrissimus et Potentissimus Dominus noster Rex Angliæ et Franciæ, Defensor Fidei et Dominus Hibern. semper extitit constantissimus Ecclesiæ Protector et Patronus optime meritis, atq; superioribus annis, in diebus felicitis recordationis Julii ejus nominis Papæ secundi, grave schisma in Ecclesia Romana exortum pacavit et extinxit; et postea ipsam Ecclesiam Romanam contra vim et potentiam Gallorum, qui tunc Italiam et Urbem Romanam in servitute redigere moliebantur, validissimo exercitu et bello longe omnium sumptuosissimo feliciter defendit, et securam reddidit: Ac præterea postremis his diebus Lutheranas, Hæreses, in Ecclesiæ Sacramenta Ecclesiæq; statum furiose debaccantes doctissimo et nunquam satis laudato libello contudit et superavit; vicissim tam gladio quam calamo hostes Ecclesiæ strenuissime profigans, quibus meritis suam clarissimam famam immortalis gloriæ pariter consecravit, tales laudes et gratias sua incomparabili bonitate ab Ecclesia promeruit, quales nunquam satis dignas quisquam mortalifè referre poterit sed Deus affatim persolvat præmia digna. Quumq; idem Rex noster et Protector illustrissimus a Rege Gallorum per Mare et per Terras, incolas hujus Regni contra percussum fœdus, promissam fidem, et suum ipsius salvum conductum assidue infestante, et Scotos contra Regnum hoc instigante ac suis stipendiis conducente, atq; duces Albanæ in perniciem principis Scotorum nostri Regis ex sorore Nepotis impellente, aliasq; injurias multas et graves contra Regiam Majestatem suosq; amicos et subditos quotidie multiplicante, provocatur, irritatur atq; urgetur ut bellum suscipiat, suumq; Regnum tam contra Gallos quam contra Scotos ut decet invictissimum Principem potenter defendat; non enim ultra pacem colere vel pacem longius expectare convenit postquam Rex Gallorum summum Pontificem bene moventem, et quæ pacis sunt suadentem, audire recusat, exercitum instruens et bellum apparatus, fortassis in multos annos duraturum: dignissimum est ob præfata tam præclara facinora: ut sicut Rex noster illustrissimus plus cæteris Regibus antecessoribus suis pro Ecclesiæ defensione, utilitate et honore insudavit, et plus expensarum sustinuit; ita ad sustinenda bellorum onera imminencia, pro Ecclesiæ et totius Regni hujus defensione, per Ecclesiam tali subsidio adjuvetur quale anterioribus Regibus nunquam antelac concessum est, nec fortassis posterioribus Regibus unquam simile, nisi ob talia benefacta vel extremam bellorum necessitatem postea concedetur. Quocirca ut Regia Majestas ad fovendam et protegendam Ecclesiam, et Clerum Angliæ, magis indies animetur, et ut jura, libertates et privilegia Ecclesiæ concessa benigne Ecclesiæ servet, et ab aliis servari faciat, et ne præfata benefacta in ingratos contulisse videatur:

Nos Prælati et Clerus Cant. Provinciæ in hac Sacra Synodo Provinciali sive Prælatorum et Cleri ejusdem Convocatione, in Ecclesia Cathed. Divi Pauli London. vicesimo die mensis Aprilis Anno Dom. millesimo quingentesimo vicesimo tertio inchoata, ac usq; ad et in decimum quartum diem mensis Augusti proxime ex tunc sequentis diebus in dies continuata, congregati, Illustrissimo Domino Regi perpetuo et potentissimo Fidei et Ecclesiæ defensori, subsidium dare et concedere Decrevimus, quam nostram Benevolentiam ut gratam et acceptam habeat humillime deprecamur, protestantes expresse, quod per præsentem concessionem, quam tanquam novam et ante insolitam pro nostra singulari et personali in Regiam Majestatem observantia sine exemplo donamus, omnino nolumus Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ aut successoribus nostris in aliquo prejudicium generari, nec casum hunc singularem ad sequen. trahi: Quod si præsentem Concessionem pro exemplo et (ut vocant) pro Præsidente ad similes unquam Concessionem exigendam accipiendam fore præsentiremus, certe in eam omnino consentire recusassemus; quandoquidem subsidium sub modis, formis, conditionibus, exceptionibus ac provisionibus, et protestatione super et infrascriptis, et non aliter, neq; alio modo, Damus et Concedimus, viz. Subsidium se extendens ad Medietatem sive mediam partem valoris omnium fructuum reddituum, et proventuum, possessionum, unius anni, omnium et singulorum Episcopatum, Ecclesiarum Cathed. et Collegiarum, Dignitatum, Hospitalium, Monast. Abbaciarum, Prioratum aliarumq; domorum Religiosarum, necnon quorumcunq; beneficiorum et Possessionum Ecclesiasticarum, &c.

VI.—Bishop Tonstall's Licence to Sir Thomas More for reading Heretical Books.

[Regist. Tonst. Fol. 138.]

CUTHBERTUS permissione Divina London. Episcopus Clarissimo et Egregio viro Domino Thomæ More fratri et amico Charissimo Salutem in Domino et benedict. Quia nuper, postquam Ecclesia Dei per Germaniam ab hæreticis infestata est, juncti sunt nonnulli iniquitatis Filii, qui veterem et damnatam hæresim Wyckliffianam et Lutheranam, etiam hæresis Wyckliffianæ alumni transferendis in nostratrem vernaculam linguam corruptissimis quibuscunq; eorum opusculis, atque illis ipsis magna copia impressis, in hanc nostram Regionem inducere conantur; quam sane pestilentissimis dogmatibus Catholicæ fidei veritati repugnantibus maculare atq; inficere magnis conatibus moluntur. Magnopere igitur verendum est ne Catholica veritas in totum periclitetur nisi boni et eruditi viri malignitatem tam prædictorum hominum strenue occurrant, id quod nulla ratione melius et aptius fieri poterit, quam si in lingua Catholica veritas in totum expugnans hæc insana dogmata simul etiam ipsissima prodeat in lucem. Quo fiet ut Sacrarum Literarum imperiti homines in manus sumentes novos istos Hæreticos Libros, atq; una etiam Catholicos ipsos refellentes, vel ipsi per se verum discernere, vel ab aliis quorum perspicacius est iudicium recte admoneri et doceri possint. Et quia tu, Frater Clarissime, in lingua nostra vernacula, sicut etiam in Latina, Demosthenem quendam præstare potes, et Catholicæ veritatis assertor acerrimus in omni congressu esse soles, melius subcisivas horas, si quas tuis occupationibus suffurari potes, collocare nunquam poteris, quam in nostrate lingua aliqua edas quæ simplicibus et ideotis hominibus subdolan hæreticorum malignitatem aperiant, ac contra tam impios Ecclesiæ supplicationes reddant eos instructiores: habes ad id exemplum quod imiteris præclarissimum, illustrissimi Domini nostri Regis Henrici octavi, qui Sacramenta Ecclesiæ contra Lutherum totis viribus ea subvertentē asserere aggressus, immortale nomen Defensoris Ecclesiæ in omne ævum promeruit. Et ne Andabatarum more cum ejusmodi larvis lucteris, ignorans ipse quod oppugnes, mitto ad te insanas in nostrate lingua istorū nœnias, atque una etiam nonnullos Lutheri Libros ex quibus hæc opinio monstræ prodierunt. Quibus abs te diligenter perlectis, facilius intelligas quibus latibulis tortuosi serpentes sese condant, quibusq; anfractibus elabi deprehensi studeant. II.—The King's Protestation against the Marriage.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitel. B. 12.]

IN Dei Nomine, Amen. Coram vobis Reverendo in Christo Patre et Domino, Domino Richardo Dei et Apostolicæ sedis gratia Episcopo Wintoniensi, Ego Henricus Walliæ Princeps, Dux Cornubiæ et Comes Cestriæ, dico, allego et in his Scriptis propono, Quod licet ego minorem ætatem agens, et intra annos pubertatis notorie existens, cum Serenissima Domina Catharina Hispaniarum Regis Filia, Matrimonium de facto contraxerim, qui quidem Contractus, quamvis obstante ipsa minore ætate mea de se jam invalidus, imperfectus, nullus efficaciæ aut vigoris extiterit; quia tamen annis pubertatis et matura ætate jam superveniente, Contractus ipse per tacitum Consensum, mutuam cohabitationem, munerum aut intersignum dationem seu receptionem, vel alium quemcunq; modum jure declaratum, forsā existimari seu videri poterit apparenter validatus aut confirmatus; Ea propter, Ego Henricus Walliæ Princeps prædictus, jam proximus pubertati existens, et annos pubertatis attingens, Proteator, quod non intendo eundem præsentium contractum per quecunq; per me dicta seu dicenda, facta aut facienda, in aliquo approbare, validare, seu ratum habere, sed nunc in præsentī, non vi, dolo, nec prece inductus, sed sponte et libere, nullo modo coactus, contra hujusmodi Contractum reclamo, et eidem dissentio, volo; et omnino intendo ab eodem contractu Matrimoniali prætenso, melioribus modo et forma, quibus de jure melius, validius, aut efficacius potero vel possim, penitus resilire, et eidem expresse dissentire, prout in præsentī contra eundem reclamo, et eidem dissentio. Protestor; quod per nullum dictum, factum, actum, aut gestum per me, aut nomine meo per alium quemcunque, quandocunq; aut qualemcunque, imposterum faciendum, agendum, gerendum, aut explicandum, volo aut intendo in præfatum contractum Matrimoniale, aut in dictam Dominam Catharinam tanquam Sponsam aut Uxorem meam consentire. Super quibus vos omnes testimonium perhibere volo, requiro, rogo, atque obtestor.

Per me Henricum Walliæ Principem.

LECTA fuit et facta superscripta Protestatio, per præfatum Serenissimum Principem Dominum Henricum, coram Reverendo in Christo Patre et Domino, Domino Richardo permissione Divina Winton. Episcopo, Judicialiter pro tribunali sedent. et me Notarium infra scriptum ad tunc præsentem in ejus Actorum Scribam in hac parte assumentem, et Testium infrascriptorum præsentis. Anno Dom. 1505. Indictione octava, Pontificatus Sanctissimi in Christo Patris et Domini nostri Julii, Divina Providentia eo nomine Papæ secundi Anno secundo, Mensis vero Junii die 27; quo die Dominus Serenissimus Princeps proximus pubertati, et annos pubertatis attingens erat, ut tunc ibidem asserbat, in quadam bassa Camera infra Palatium Regium Richemondis, in parte occidentali ejusdem Palatii situat. Super quibus omnibus et singulis, præfatus Serenissimus Princeps me Notarium præmemoratum Instrumentum conficere, et testes infra nominatos testimonium perhibere requisivit instanter, et rogavit. In quorum omnium et singulorum fidem et testimonium, præfatus Serenissimus Princeps supra, et testes, ut præmittitur, rogati et requisiti, sua nomina propriis manibus infra scripserunt. III.—Cardinal Wolsey's first Letter to Sir Gregory Cassali, about the Divorce. — Taken from the Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitol. B. 9.]

DOMINE GREGORI, Post meam cordatissimam Commendationem, post ultimum vestrum a me discessum ex compendio ad vos scripsi, ut ob nonnullas maximi momenti causas procurare differretis quod de Regiæ Majestatis negotio in quibusdam nobis traditis Commissionibus continebatur, quoad rursus vobis significarem quid ea in re fieri vellemus. Ubi vero ad Regiam Majestatem redissem, variis crebrisq; cum ea habitis sermonibus, adeo abunde ac distincte illi aperui quam ex animo ac diligenter, et quam sincere et ex fide, diu noctuque exoptetis eidem Regiæ Majestati inservire; neque ullum unquam laborem, periculum aut molestiam vos velle recusare, ut omni studio ac viribus id fideliter præstare possitis quod illi gratum aut acceptum quoquo modo esse posse cognoveritis, omnemq; industriam vos esse adhibituros quo vestræ fidei cursuque commissa optatum finem consequantur; vestrum animam propensissima voluntate sic sub mea fide Regiæ Majestati insinuavi, ut meam hanc relationem atque sponsonem pectori suo constantissime adfixerit, certissimaque fiducia concepit, omnino futurum ut nostræ tunc expectationi quacunque in re et occasione respondeatis: Ex quo fit ut vestræ operæ, curæ atque prudentiæ ea nunc tractanda et procuranda committat, quibus nihil magis cordi habeat, nihil ardentius exoptet, aut majoris sit momenti vel gravioris successus, nec ullum habet Consiliarium, utcunque intimum, cui graviora possit committere. Quum itaque, me intercedente et procurante, nunc vos Regia Majestas præ cæteris ad hoc fidei adsciverit et elegerit, ut in re tam gravi fidelissima vestra opera ac ministerio utatur, fidemque illi meam de vobis jam ei adstrinxerim, nihil ambigens quin postquam ejus animam ac voluntatem cognoveritis, fueritisque abunde instructi quam maximi hæc quæ nunc expono sunt momenti, utpote quæ potissimum concernunt Regiæ conscientiæ exonerationem animæque suæ salutem, vitæ conservationem et incolunitatem, Regii Stemmatum continuationem, publicumque commodum et quietem subditorum omnium, eorum pariter qui sub ejus imperio nunc vivunt vel qui postea unquam in hoc suo Regno vivent; quumque perspiciam sedulum vestrum Ministerium hoc in negotio impendendum omnino redundaturum esse in præcipuum vestram exaltationem et utilitatem, postquam infelices istos jam passos successus occasionem se obtulisse videtis, qua vestra familia hujusmodi operam huic Serenissimo Principi navare possit, quod statum omnem vestrum in longe meliorem quam antea sit haud dubie restitutus et adacturus, certissimum competissimumque habeo, quod ob has tam urgentes causas et tam graves successuros effectus, adeo toto pectore vires omnes vestras industria ac studio tantæ conficiendæ rei addicetis, ut omnia queatis ad optatum exitum perducere; atque ita promissum fidemque meam præstabitis, tam optimum Regiæ Majestatis institutum juvabitis, ejus desiderio et expectationi omni ex parte satisfacietis, et præter bene peractæ rei honorem et laudem comparandam, mercedem quoque reportabitis tanti Principis liberalitate dignam, quæ certissime cedet in perpetuum vestrum totiusque vestræ familiæ commodum et incrementum: Et quum jam mihi persuadeam futurum omnino ut officiis actionibusque vestris sitis promissis sponsonibusque meis omnino satisfacturi, ad id pluribus verbis nequitum adhortabor, proinde ad rem nunc ipsam venio. Ante hoc tempus vobis aperui, quemadmodum Regia Majestas, partim assiduo suo studio et eruditione, partim relatu ac judicio multorum Theologorum, et in omni Doctrinæ genere doctorum virorum asseveratione, existimans conscientiam suam non esse sufficienter exoneratam, quod in conjugio existeret cum Regina, Deumque primo et ante omnia ac animæ suæ quietem et salutem respiciens, mox vero suæ Successionis securitatem, perpendsensque accurate quam gravia hinc mala provenirent, aperte sentit quam maxime futurum sit Deo molestum, inhonorificum sibi, et ingratum apud homines, suisque subditis periculosum, ex hoc non sufficienti conjugio, si deprehendatur dicta Majestas sciens ac volens in eo perstare, et vivere præter modum debitum, juxtaque ritum et legitima Ecclesiæ Statuta: quibus igitur ex causis longo jam tempore, intimo suæ conscientiæ remorsu, summique Dei rationem habens, existimat animam suam læsam et offensam, adeo quod, quum in suis conatibus actionibusque quibuscunque Deum potissimum sibi semper proponat, ingenti cum molestia cordisque perturbatione in hoc Matrimonio degit; super qua rematurum sanumque judicium consulit clarissimum celeberrimorumq; Doctorum aliorumq; complurium in omni eruditionis genere excellentiorum virorum ac Prælatorum, partim Theologorum, partim Jurisperitorum, tum in suo Regno, tum alibi existentium, ut aperte vereq; cognosceret, an Dispensatio antea concessa pro se et Regina, ex eo quod Regina Fratris sui uterini Uxor antea exiterit, valida et sufficiens foret, necne: demum; a variis multisq; ex his Doctoribus asseritur, quod Papa non potest dispensare in primo gradu affinitatis, tanquam ex jure Divino, moraliter, naturaliterq; prohibito, ac si potest, omnes affirmant et consentiunt quod hoc non potest, nisi ex urgentissimis et arduis causis, quales non subferunt. Bulla præterea Dispensationis fundatur et concessa est sub quibusdam rationibus falso suggestis et enarratis, in ea namq; asseritur, quod hæc Regia Majestas Matrimonium hoc cum Regina percupiebat, pro bono pacis inter Henricum septimum Ferdinandū et Elizabetham, quam revera nulla tunc dissensio aut belli suspicio esset inter dictos Principes, vel Regiam Majestatem prædictam, quæ in teneris adhuc annis, nec in discretione aut judicio constitutis agebat; nunquam deinde assensit, aut quicquam cognovit de hujusmodi bullæ Impetratione, nec unquam hoc Matrimonium optavit, aut aliquid de eo accepit ante bullæ Impetrationem. Quocirca ab his omnibus Doctoribus atq; Prælatibus judicatur hujusmodi Dispensationem non adeo validam et idoneam esse ac efficacem, ut prædictum Matrimonium manifeste justum legitimumq; sit: sed potius quod multa possunt objici, magnis probabilibusq; fundata et corroborata rationibus, in non leve periculum Regiæ prolis, totiusq; Regni ac subditorum gravem perturbationem. Adhæc, postquam Regia Majestas, qui Walliæ Princeps tunc erat, decimum quartum annum attigisset, contractus Revocato subsequuta est, Rege Patre expresse nolente quod hujusmodi Matrimonium ullo pacto sortiretur effectum. His causis Rex hic Serenissimus, tanquam bonus et Catholicus Princeps, timens ne ob tam diuturnam cum Regina continuationem, indignatus et iratus Deus citius ex humanis evocaverit Masculam e Regina susceptam prolem, graviusq; a Deo supplicium expavescit si in Matrimonio hoc non-legitimo perseveraverit; ex hac ideo occasione, intimis præcordiis hunc Conscientiæ scrupulum concepit, in animo nihilominus habens, pro animi conscientiaq; suæ quiete et salute, prolisq; securitate, ad Sanctam Domini nostri sedemq; Apostolicam confugere, tantæ rei remedium impetraturus confidens, quod ob complura sua erga eam merita et officia tum calamo ingeniiq; viribus, tum armis præstita, subsidia in Ecclesiæ calamitatibus prompte subministrata, sanctissimus Dominus noster non gravabitur sua beniginitate, Autoritate ac facultate, intimum hunc Regiæ Majestatis cordi inhærentem dolorem amovere, eumq; modum ac rationem inire qua Regia Majestas prædicta Uxorem aliam ducere, et, Deo volente, masculam prolem in suæ successionis securitatem queat ex ea suscipere, et tam certam quietem in suo Regno constituit: Quumq; ejus Sanctitas ab his nunc captiva detineatur, qui pro virili sua forsitan conabuntur impedire, turbareq; hoc Regiæ Majestatis desiderium et Statutum, ipsa præterea cogitur vias omnes excogitare, quibus dicta Sanctitas de hac re dexterius et commodius instrui, et facilius adduci queat ad ea concedenda, præsertim medio et vigore Regiæ Majestatis animus et desiderium queat optatum sortiri effectum: Proinde ipsa Regia Majestas de fide, industria, dexteritate prudentiaq; vestra plenissime confidens, vult ut statim his literis acceptis, rebus aliis omnibus quibuscunq; ab eo vel a quovis alio vobis commissis omnino posthabitis, vias modosq; omnes possibiles excogitetis quibus potestis secretissime, mutato habitu et tanquam alicujus Minister, vel tanquam Commissionem habens a Duce Ferrariæ pro nonnullis inter Pontificem et eum componendis controversiis, vel alia qua licuerit securiori via, ad Pontificis præsentiam et colloquium accedendi, omnibus arbitris semotis, si fieri possit, pro vestris obeundis mandatis; quorum obtinendorum gratia, si ita expedire judicaveritis, eam mercedem ac pecuniarum summam promittetis ac tradetis, his qui revera volent atq; poterunt hoc negotium ad effectum pertrahere, quam summam, et ejus limitationem, judicio, prudentiæque vestræ integram Regia Majestas remittit; etiam si his danda foret qui Pontificem asservant, vel cuiuscunq; alio qui vos tuto ad secretum cum sua Sanctitate Sermonem adducere, in locumq; tutum reducere posset: Cujus rei gratia, aliisq; ad hunc finem consequendum sustinendis oneribus necessariis, pecuniæ ad summam decem mille ducatorum, per Mensarios Venetias transmittentur, qui illic in promptu aderunt, persolvendæ et consignandæ Prothonotario Fratri vestro, Regio illic existenti Oratori; per eumq; de tempore in tempus ad vos transmitti eadem summa poterit quam huic obtinendo negotio conducere posse existimaveritis, nihilq; ambigo quoniam dictam pecuniam fideliter collocetis, ex Regiæ Majestatis utilitate, expectatione atq; sententia. Atq; ubi ad Sanctum Dominum nostrum accesseritis, post filiales et cordatissimas Regiæ Majestatis measq; devotas et humillimas commendationes, et post exhibitas a Rege Creditiæ literas, in quibus in negotii adjumentum clausula velemens est propria ejus manu conscripta, ut ex earum exemplo cognoscetis, ejus Sanctitati exponetis quam grave, molestumq; Regiæ Majestati et mihi sit, audire infelicissimos eventus, calamitatemq; miserandam, in qua nunc ejus Sanctitas cum Reverendiss. Cardinalib. versatur, cum gravissimo detrimento irreparabili; sedis Apostolicæ illiusq; Patrimonii jactura, ad quæ mala sublevanda et corrigenda nullum in Regia Majestate officium desiderabitur, quod ab ullo erga Sanctam Domini nostri vel sedem Apostolicam observantissimo Principe queat excogitari; in eoq; omne meum ministerium ac studium non minus promptum aderit, quam si ex ea re solum posse me mihi cœlum comparare: quemadmodum experientia, aliqua in parte, jam docuit, et Deo duce posthac uberius comprobabit: quam rem copiosius optimisq; verbis agetis, præsertim, quam sciatis quanto et quam sincero affectu Regia Majestas ejus Sanctitatem prosequatur, et quanta mea sit in ipsam devotio, in hisque sermonibus insistetis prout loci, temporis, negocii que ratio videbitur judicio vestro postulare.

Secundo, Sanctissimo Domino nostro solita vestra dexteritate aperietis id quod in his ipsis literis ad vos scripsi concernens hujus Matrimonii insufficientiam, ab hisq; rationibus et causis fundamentum capietis, quæ superius enarrantur integramq; discursum ejus Sanctitati declarabitis, non omitentes intrinsicum dolorem, conscientie scrupulum, Dei rationem, Mascule prolis respectum, hujus Regni bonum, et alia omnia ut superius scripta sunt: addentes insuper, nihil vehementius optari a tota Regni Nobilitate, subditisq; omnibus nullo discrimine, quam de Regiæ Majestatis corpore Masculum heredem a Deo sibi dari, in perpetuam consolationem, gaudium, quietem, ac totius Regni securitatem, posteritatisq; firmissimum columnen: prudentiorumq; opinionem esse, quod Deus omnipotens a tanto bono concedendo divinam suam manum substrahit, ob errorem, culpamq; in dicte Matrimonio hactenus admissam, quæ nisi mature corrigatur, graviora ex hac occasione in hoc Regno mala succedent, quam antea unquam fuerunt audita; etenim si hoc negotium in suspenso et indiscussum relinquere, hujusmodi possent questiones, controversiæ et contentiones ac factiones post defunctum Regem exoriri, ob Regni hereditatem, quæ non possent in multorum ævo restingui, ut antea olim ex causa longe leviori accidit, neq; ex re tam ambigua, tam sævæ olim depopulationes, bella, intestinæq; controversiæ exortæ, et ad multum tempus continuatæ sunt, in extremum et ferme ultimum Regni exordium; quæ quum tam gravia sunt, Sanctissimus Dominus noster veluti pater et gubernator Christianitatis prospicere ex officio debet, et quibuscumque modis potest, pro viribus adniti et conari, ut hæc Regna ac dominia quæ nunc superant in fide et obedientia Ecclesiæ assidue contineant, inter quæ, Deo sit laus, hoc Regnum haud recensendum est inter minima sed tanquam illud quod hactenus juvavit, et posthac pro tuto præsidio semper haberi poterit, adversus ea quæ cedere possent in Ecclesiæ Catholicæ vel sanctæ fidei detrimentum.

Tertio, Sanctissimo Domino nostro proponetis præsentem Ecclesiæ statum, rogabitque; ut in mentem velit dirigere, quo nunc in statu suæ Sanctitatis res cum Christianis Principibus versentur, cumque private contentiones, quæ illi sunt cum magna eorum principum parte, addita et ambitione immoderatoque; regum appetitu et ex arbitrio suo, Temporale jus omne atque Spirituale tractandi, Ecclesiasticamque; Jurisdictionem et Autoritatem invertendi, eo certe animo ut sedis Apostolicæ dignitatem extinguant; his omnibus in unum connexis ac bene consideratis, ejus Sanctitas manifeste cognoscat, Principem nullum, neque portum, aut refugium tam tutum, cui in omnem eventum queat inhaerere, sibi relictum esse, quam hæc Regia Majestas est quæ nihil sibi vendicat, nil ambit, quod præjudicio esse possit dictæ Sanctitati, sed ejus, Apostolicæque sedis, semper fuit, est, esseque; decrevit firmissimum scutum, tutissimumque; propugnaculum, ita suas actiones cum cæteris Principibus firmans et connectens, ut semper ex ea occasione in suam hanc optimam sententiam reliquos possit atrahere, adeo quod Regi tam optime in Sanctissimum Dominum nostrum affecto nihil denegari debeat, utcumque; maximum quod possit ab ejus Sanctitate præstari ordinaria vel absoluta sua Autoritate; nam procul dubio, post vias modosque; omnes tentatos, omnino perspicitur omnia alia amicitiae officia, si huic quod petitur comparentur, esse perquam exigua, et hoc amicum officium hujusmodi futurum, ex quo reliqua queant incrementum capere, sine eo futura alioquin parvi ac nullius fere momenti.

Tertio, probe notandum est, quod res nunc aperta et petita, a Regiaque; Majestate tantopere optata, ex tam magno conscientiae scrupulo, cordisque; remorsu oritur, ut unicuique; debita sit, quantumcumque; minori quam Regia Majestas sit de Sanctissimo Domino nostro merito. Quocirca judicat, et pro re comperta sibi persuadet, quod si ulla meritorum vel officiorum ratio habeatur, nunc ipsius Sanctitas huic suo desiderio et petitioni benignissime liberrimeque adjuvet, nullo prorsus dubio, difficultate, contradictione aut mora injecta. Negotiumque hujusmodi est, ut cognita Dispensationis insufficientia, quamvis id non requisivisset Rex, ultro proponi offerrique debuisset ab eadem Sanctitate tanquam a Patre Spirituali, in ejus salutis et conscientiae beneficium.

In gratiam igitur et contemplationem præmissorum omnium instantissime vehementissimeque; a Sanctissimo Domino nostro requiratis et contentetis, ut dubio, metuque; omni seposito, respicere velit ad causæ statum, et ad ea quæ subsequutura videantur, rationemque; habere infinitorum commodorum, quæ ex hac re suæ Sanctitatis Apostolicæque; sedi inde provenient, rem hanc statim, absque; temporis tractu, et causæ circumstantia, nemini eam aperiens, libere concedere et indulgere nullique; communicata specialem Commissionem ad hunc effectum et finem confectam in forma Brevis concedere, et ad me dirigere, Facultatem addens, ut mihi liceat quoscunque; voluero ad me vocare, mihique; assilacere ad procedendum in hac causa, et inquirendum de dictæ Bullæ ac Dispensationis sufficientia, juxta formam ac tenorem expressum in quodam libello hujus rei gratia confecto; quem cum his ad vos mitto, sic in debita forma conscriptum et digestum ut non sit futurum opus quo denuo ab ullo alio exercibatur, si forsitan periculosum putaretur eam rem cuique; patefacere vel in dubium aut dilationem protrahere iri negotium, si ulli ex Sanctissimi Domini nostri officariis committeretur rursus conscribendum; sed quod in hujusmodi periculi eventum possit ejus Sanctitas sine ullo discrimine vel alicujus cognitione eam dicto libello signaturam, sigillumque; apponere, ut aperte inde constet, Pontificis meram voluntatem sic esse, illiusque; Signaturæ ac Sigilli vigore, legitime et sufficienter possim ego procedere ad inquisitionem de dictæ Dispensationis insufficientia, cognitionem et aliarum causarum et rationum, quæ adduci possunt pro dicti Matrimonii invaliditate.

Item cum his ad vos mitto Dispensationem in debita forma confectam et scriptam in modum Brevis, secreto impetrandam et expediendam eidem Signaturam vel Sigillum apponendo, vel alio quovis modo valido: Et quamvis ex hac re multa pendeant, ob quæ ista requiruntur, et quæ, Deo favente, neutiquam timenda sunt; Attamen Regia Majestas exemplo innitens, et recordationi complurium rerum, quæ olim præteritis temporibus fuerunt injuste asserta, vel adducta, in animo habens causas suas omnes absque; ulla controversia aut difficultate ad perfectum finem perducere, et ne ullo quovis prætextu, argumento aut colore, postmodum emergente perturbarentur, hoc a Sanctissimo Domino nostro requirit, veluti rem necessariam, qua nullo pacto carere queat; firmiter confidens, quod Sanctitas sua, benigne atque; amanter isti ejus desiderio assentiet, et concedet sine ullo obstaculo dictam Commissionem, juxta formam quam Regia Majestas petit et eodem tempore, atque; hæc omnia ita benigne ac liberaliter expedire, secretiori et validiori quo fieri possit modo, quo optatus finis subsequi possit in eum effectum, laudabileque; propositum, de quo superius dictum est; Quæ ex occasione Sanctissimum Dominum nostrum in perpetuum sibi adstringet, indissolubilique; amicitiae vinculo hanc Regiam Majestatem sibi alligabit, quæ nulli labori, periculo, opibus, Regno, subditis, nec ipsi sanguini parcens, ab ejus Sanctitate nunquam divelleat aut eam deseret, sed totis suis viribus constantissime semper illi adhaerebit, tum in suæ Sanctitatis et Cardinalium liberationem, tum in hostibus persequendis; ad quem finem, magnam jam pecuniarum summam ad Regem Christianissimum misit, pro illo Italiae exercitu continuando, et præter id in animo statutum habet, quod nisi Cæsar de dicta Sanctitate liberanda consentire, et ad pacem devenire voluerit, bellum gerere adversus hæc inferiores Cæsaris Regiones et Dominia, quo vehementius urgeat Sanctissimi Domini nostri liberationem, Ecclesiæque; in pristinam suam dignitatem et autoritatem restitutionem, eaque; de se indicia exhibebit ut universo orbi manifestum sit futurum, dictam suam Majestatem esse solidum perfectum amicum, filium obsequentissimum et ejus devotissimum; a qua pectoris sui sententia, nullo thesauro, nullis opibus, nullis Regnis, seu Ditionibus, vel occasione quacunque; unquam adducetur, sed ex filiali sua observantia in Christianam Religionem zelo, innatogue; erga sedis Apostolicam studio, et præcipuo quodam affectu, quem Sanctissimo Domino nostro gerit: in compensationem quoque; gratitudinis, quam tam avide in hoc suo negotio ab ejus Sanctitate expectat, decretum prorsus habet in constantissimo hoc et indissolubili amicitiae et conjunctionis vinculo sincerissimo perstare, id quod dicta Regia Majestas Sanctissimum Dominum nostrum vehementissime rogat, ut probe velit in omnem partem librare, vicissimque; efficere, ut ex Regiæ petitionis indulgentia palam constet parem benevolentiam et humanitatem a Sanctissimo Domino nostro ex mutuo præstari.

Hac autem causa ipsius Sanctitati a vobis, ut dictum undoubtedly follow, with other considerations at length contained in our instructions. We desired his holiness to commit the knowledge of the dispensation that was obtained in time of Julius, of famous memory, for matrimony to be had between the king and the widow, relict late of prince Arthur; and that we might have it in form, as that was that your grace sent hither. His holiness answered, that our sayings had great likelihood of truth, for lacking of issue male of the king's stem, considering the nature of men being prone unto novelties and disposed unto parties and factions, the realm of England would not only enter into their accustomed divisions, but also would owe or do small devotion unto the church; wherefore his holiness was right well content and ready to adhibit all remedy that in him was possible as this time would serve. And because he was not expert in making of commissions, he would consult with the cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor, and use his advice, which we should shortly know.

We, perceiving that the obtaining of our charges after the king's and your grace's pleasure depended much upon the advice of Sanctorum Quatuor, did prevent his going unto the pope and delivering your grace's letters with recommendations accordingly, we desired him to be good and favourable unto our requests in the king's behalf; and for the better obtaining of our desires, we promised to see unto him with a competent reward. And this communication had, we showed unto him the commission, which he said could not pass without perpetual dishonour unto the pope, the king, and your grace; and a great part of such clauses as be omitted, he hath touched and laid reason for the same in a writing, which I do send unto your grace with this. Considering his great experience, wisdom, learning, and the entire affection that he beareth unto the king and your grace; and that it was far from the king's desire, and nothing for your purposes, that I should first have sent the said cardinal's sayings unto your grace, and abide answer, and eft-soons prevent to do the same: considering also that the said king desireth a commission convenient and sufficient, we desired him to make the minute of one, which he gladly did: when it was made, the pope said, that at his being in the castle of St. Angelo, the general of the Observants in Spain required his holiness, in the emperor's name, not to grant unto any act that might be preparative, or otherwise, to divorce to be made between the king and the queen: and, moreover, desired an inhibition, that the said cause should not come in knowledge before any judge within the king's dominions. The pope answered that Inhibitio non datur nisi post litem motam. And as unto the first his holiness was content, if any like thing were demanded, to advertise the emperor before, that he did let it pass; and this was in a manner for his holiness being in captivity. But his holiness being yet in captivity, as your grace reports, and esteemeth him to be as long as the Almains and Spaniards continueth in Italy; he thought, if he should grant this commission, that he should have the emperor his perpetual enemy, without any hope of reconciliation: notwithstanding, he was content rather to put himself in evident ruin, and utter undoing, than the king, or your grace, should suspect any point of ingratitude in him, heartily desiring cum suspiriis et lacrimis, that the king and your grace, which have always been fast and good unto him, will not now suddenly precipitate him for ever; which should be done, if immediately upon delivering of the commission your grace should begin process. He intendeth to save all upright thus: if Monsieur de Lautrech would set forwards, which he saith daily that he will do, but yet he doth not, at his coming the pope's holiness may have good colour to say, he was required by the ambassador of England of a like commission. And denying the same, because of his promise unto the general, he was eft-soons by Monsieur de Lautrech, to grant the said commission, inasmuch as it was but a letter of justice. And by this colour he would cover the matter, so that it might appear unto the emperor, that the pope did it not as he that would gladly do displeasure unto the emperor, but as an indifferent prince that could not nor might deny justice, specially being required by such personages; and immediately he would despatch a commission, bearing date after the time that Monsieur Lautrech had been with him or nigh unto him. The pope most instantly beseecheth your grace to be a mean that the king's highness may accept this in a good part, and that he will take patience for this little time; which, as it is supposed, will be but short, and (in omnem eventum) I do bring a commission with me, and a dispensation, which I trust the king and your grace will like well.

We have given unto my lord cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor 4000 crowns, and unto the secretary 30 crowns.

With this your grace shall receive a letter from the pope's holiness, Item, a counsel of Oldrand, that giveth light unto the king's cause. I shall make the most diligence homeward that I can. Our Lord Jesus preserve your grace.

Rome, Jan. 1, 1528.

TO THE KING.

PLEASE it your highness to understand, that as soon as the pope was at liberty, and came unto Orvieto, I resorted unto his holiness with all diligence; and at my coming unto him did make congratulation on your highness's behalf; forasmuch as he was restored unto his liberty, which he accepted very joyfully and thankfully, giving unto your highness manifold and high thanks for your great goodness, as well proved in his adversity, as when he was in his most felicity. After this he released my being at Rome, how dangerous it was, inasmuch as when my being there was detected, espial was made, and I was not passed out of Rome by the space of two hours, or two hundred Spaniards invaded and searched the house. He showed also that he had received all such letters as I, at my being in Rome, did send unto his holiness; whereby he did perceive the effect of your highness's desire concerning your dispensation. And albeit he did send me word that I should depart, and his holiness would send unto me the said dispensation fully speed. Nevertheless, he trusted that your highness would be content to tarry for a time: for the general of the Observants in Spain being lately in Rome, had required him, according unto his instructions, that he should suffer nothing to pass that might be prejudicial or against the queen, directly or indirectly, but that the pope should first advertise thereof certain of the Cæsarians here. And forasmuch as this dispensation might encourage your grace to cause my lord legate Auctoritate Legationis to hear and decern in the cause that your highness intendeth, and his holiness standeth as yet in manner in captivity and perplexity: his holiness therefore besought your grace to have patience for a time, and it should not be long ere your highness should have, not only that dispensation, but anything else that may lie in his power. I replied unto this, that his holiness had once granted it, and that I had despatched a post, and made relation thereof, by my writings, unto your highness; so that I could not imagine by what reason I might persuade unto you that he would perform the promise that he had once broken. In conclusion, he was content that your highness should have it, but he would have it delivered with this condition; that the prothonotary Gambora and I, should beseech your highness not to attempt anything in your cause against the queen till such time as the pope were frankly at his liberty; which could not be as long as the Almaynes and Spaniards did thus reign in Italy; and promise made, we should deliver the dispensation: and in my poor judgment, it was best always to be in possession of this dispensation. After this he showed the minute unto the cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor, willing him to reform it according to the style of this court; which done, he showed it unto me, and after said, that he thought good I should depart, because I rode but competent journeys, and the prothonotary Gambora should follow by post and bring the bull with him, which is of the same form and substance that your highness's minute is of. And if there be anything omitted, or to be added, his holiness is always content to reform it, and to put it unto the same date that the same dispensation now beareth; the copy whereof I do send unto your highness with this, the commission general and protestation being void, because they were conceived durante captivitate only. And here, on my behalf, none other thing being to be done, I took my leave of the pope and departed. At my coming unto Scarperii near unto Bonony, I did meet with Thadeus this courier, which brought certain expeditions triplicate; the one unto the prothonotary Gambora, the other unto Gregory de Cassali, and the third unto me; among which was a general commission triplicate, the one to be committed to my lord legate; and if that could not be obtained, because my lord legate might be thought partial, then the same to be committed unto Staphileius. Item.—There was a copy of a dispensation, where I perceived, by your grace's letter, that your pleasure was to have your dispensation in form, after the minute that Barlow brought, which was then sped, and already passed; so remained nothing to be sped, but the commission your highness pleases. This knowing, I caused my servants to continue their journey, and with one servant and this courier I returned unto Orvieto with post-horses; where Mr. Gregory and I, with much business, have obtained a commission directed unto my lord legate, not in the form that was conceived in England, but offer such manner as is sufficient for the cause, and as I trust shall content your highness; wherein the lord cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor hath taken great pains to pen, as well your dispensation as the commission; for which, and that hereafter he may do unto your highness the better service, Mr. Gregory and I have rewarded him with 4000 crowns, of such money as your highness hath caused to be made unto Venice for the furtherance of your causes. But albeit that everything is passed according to your highness's pleasure, I cannot see, but in case the same be put in execution at this time, the pope is utterly undone, and so he saith himself. The Imperialists do daily spoil castles and towns about Rome; Monsieur de Lautrek is yet at Bonony, and small hope is of any great act that he intends. The Cæsarians have taken within these three days, two castles lying within six miles of this: and the pope being in this perplexity, not assured of any one friend but of your highness, that lieth too far off; if he do at this time any displeasure unto the emperor, he thinketh he is undone for ever; wherefore he puts his honour and health wholly into your highness's power and disposition. This morning I return homewards, and Gregory de Cassali goeth in my company as far as unto Florence; and from thence he goeth unto Monsieur de Lautrek, to solicit him forwards, if it may be. The Holy Ghost send your highness a prosperous new year, and many.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitel. B. 10.]

YOUR grace commandeth, that I should send the commission and dispensation with diligence, in case they were sped before the receipt of your grace's letters sent at this time. Wherefore the prothonotary Gambora and I being commanded sub pœna excommunicationis to deliver the same, with a certain request to be made to the king's highness and his grace, at the time of delivery; I send the same at this time unto Gambora, requiring him in anywise to make diligence towards the king's highness, and not to abide my coming; the request and cause thereof your grace shall perceive by mine other letters adjoined herewith; and supposing that when your grace hath seen my letters, and the dispensations, and considered this time well, it may chance that the king and your grace will be rather well content with that that is past, without suing for any other thing that could not be obtained without long tract, and peradventure not so. Your grace hath committed as much unto Gregory de Cassali at this time as unto me, which being near unto the pope, will without fail do his best diligence: and if it shall be thought good unto the king's highness, and your grace, that I do return unto Orvieto, I shall do as much as my poor carcase may endure, and thereby at Turin I shall abide the knowledge of your grace's pleasure. The datary hath clean forsaken the court, and will serve no longer but only God and his cure. The cardinal Campegius continueth in Rome, sore vexed with the gout; the cardinals Pisane, Trivulcis, Ursine, Gadis, and Cesis, remaineth for hostages. The cardinals Monte, Sanctorum Quatuor, Ridulph, Ravenna, and Perusino, be with the pope,—the rest abides absent. Our Lord Jesus preserve your grace. Your most humble beadsman and servant,

The Cardinal's Letter to John Cassali about it; taken from a Duplicate written by his Secretary.

[Cott. Libr. Vitel. B. 10.]

REVERENDE Domine Protonotari, tanquam Frater Amantissime, cum aliis meis literis copiose ad vos perscripsi Regiæ Majestatis animum, et desiderium super his rebus quas vobis in præsentia commisit, suo nomine S. D. N. declarandas.

Nunc vero ob humillimam sinceramq; meam Devotionem, quæ ex jure et officio non solum ejus Sanctitati, sed miseris Ecclesiæ sublevandis rebus, dignitatiq; Apostolicæ restituendæ adstringor, his literis vos instruum super quibusdam rebus, præcipue et accurate notandis et considerandis, quas post humillimam, reverentissimamq; meam Commendationem dictæ Sanctitati, meo nomine sigillatim, speciatim declarabitis; et cum causam concernant, quam Regia Majestas nunc maxime optat et requirit, eandem Sanctitatem vehementissime rogabit, ut cuncta legere et bene notare non gravetur.

Primo itaq; indoleus infelicem adversumq; præsentium rerum successum, in quo S. D. N. Cardinaliumq; Collegium versatur, diuq; ac noctu mente volvens, quo pacto quibusve modis, totis meis viribus, omni sumptu molestiaq; neglecta, et cum proprii sanguinis vitæq; effusione, ministerium aliquod impendere, tantæq; afflictioni solamen afferre, et Ecclesiæ Sanctissimi Domini nostri collapse statui opitulari, in quam rem haud dubie quoadq; vita suppetet incumbam; mihiq; in hac cogitatione versauti, in mentem recordationemq; subiit, mirus quidem et grandis affectus, qui Divina sic disponente Providentia, ex instanti assiduaq; mea opera provenit, ut hunc optimum Dominum meum Regem inducerem, eique persuaderem quod ad artissimam istam intimaq; cordis et animi conjunctionem deveniret erga, S. D. N. Ecclesiæq; et sedis Apostolicæ tutelam ac patrocinium suscipiendum, memorieq; succurrunt innumere rationes a me adductæ, ut Regiam Majestatem, quæ Cæsari tenacissime inhærebat, adducerem, ad S. D. N. defensionem, rerumq; Italicarum tutelam amplectendam, ac inter omnes allegatas rationes, nulla fuit validior aut vehementior, vel quæ Regiæ Majestatis pectus magis permoveret, quam intima securitas, perfectaq; constantia, quam ei assidue indesinenterq; insinuavi de ejus Sanctitatis vera optimaq; et flagranti correspondentia in amore perpetuo indissolubilq; amicitia, animo et voluntate, petitionibus semper suæ R. Majest. et desideriis concedendis, quoad Ecclesiæ Thesaurus et Autoritas ejus Sanctitati Christi Vicario concessa permittit, vel quoad se extendit, seu possit extendere; super idq; omnia uberime promisi, meam etiam salutem, fidem, honorem animamque adstringens, quod omnia ex ipsius Regiæ Majestatis votis, in omne tempus præstarentur, absq; ulla prorsus occasione aut scrupulo, ab hujusmodi indulgentis petitionibus digrediendi, adeo quod Regia Majestas, ex hoc meo asseveranti relatu, hunc propensum S. D. N. in se animum perspicuens. mihiq; ejus Sanctitatis nomine, veluti Legato, et Sedis Apostolicæ membro loquenti, firmam, certamq; fidem adhibens, periculis omnibus posthabitis, laboribus sumptibusq; spreto, nullaq; sui Regni aut subditorum habita ratione, animum adixit, prorsusq; statutum et decretum in omnibus se adjungere, atq; perpetuo et constanter cum S. D. N. in affectu concurrere, in eoq; certum habeo velle decrevisseq; perstare, ad mortem usque, nisi fors ex eventibus, longe diversis a meo promisso et ejus expectatione, occasio subministraret suam Regiam Majestatem ab hoc animi sui decreto amovendi. Id si illi accideret (quod avertat Deus) merito mihi posset adscribere perfidiam, levitatem, violationemq; promissionis, quo casu quid mox officii aut ministerii possem Sanctissimo Domino nostro præstare, aut quæ fides in Ecclesiæ rebus mihi haberetur, singulari ejus Sanctitatis prudentiæ judicandum relinquo: nunquam enim meo in arbitrio posthac esset, quicquam alicujus momenti hinc efficere, in ejus Sanctitatis commodum, hac nunc in re Regiæ Majestatis concepta spe, aut expectatione frustrata.

Est secundo accurate considerandum quantopere hoc negotium Regiæ Majestati intersit, et quanti sit momenti, unde nanque, præter Conscientiæ Regiæ exonerationem, omnis quoq; Regiæ lineæ, et stemmatis continuatio pendet; huic adnectitur totius Regni felicitas, vel excidium, hic securitas et salus eorum consistit, qui sub Regis sunt Imperio, et qui ullo unquam tempore nascentur in ejus Regno, qua ex re oriri potest occasio, et fomes tranquillitatis perpetuæ, aut discordiæ belliq; atrocissimi in universum Christianum orbem, quæ omnia majoris sunt momenti, et vigilantius prospicienda quam cujusq; Principis vel Principissæ gratia, favor et expectatio.

Tertio, Causa ex se est hujusmodi ut in animam meam spondere ausim, ejus concessionem, futurum non solum in conscientiæ, honorisq; Pontificis exonerationem coram Deo et hominibus, sed in Cælis quoq; gratam, acceptamq; exituram: In hac deinde re secreta insunt nonnulla, secreto S. D. N. exponenda, et non credenda literis, quas ob causas, morbosq; nonnullos, quibus absq; remedio Regina laborat, et ob animi etiam conceptum scrupulum, Regia Majestas nec potest, nec vult ullo unquam posthac tempore, ea uti, vel ut Uxorem admittere, quodcunq; advenerit. Non exigua præterea habenda est ratio eorum, quæ aliis meis literis continentur, concernentia, quæ pro ingenti thesauro S. D. N. habere queat, tam certam Regiæ Majestatis amicitiam, cum ejus Sanctitate constantissime conjunctam futuram in prosperis et adversis, in quas etiam partes amicos suos omnes pertraxit, et assidue pertrahit: ad Ecclesiæ defensionem, Sanctissimi Domini nostri conservationem, causas, omnes suas et actiones dirigens; possentq; hi omnes, Regiæ Majestate deficiente, in contrarium verti, et, ut vera loquar, nullum Principium video in quo S. D. N. possit, quam in Regia Majestate plenius aut perfectius confidere, vel cuius medio Apostolicæ sedis status in pristinam suam dignitatem queat certius restitui, cum absq; ejus subsidio, nisi solus Deus ex immensa sua bonitate manum citissime apponat, omnino imminutus iri videatur. Quod si Sanctissimus Dominus noster nunc (quod absit) in his Regiis petitionibus durum se, aut difficilem se exhibuerit, mihi certe molestissimum est futurum vivere diutius, ob innumera mala, quæ inde subsequutura videntur, hoc præsertim firmo, tutoq; Regio subsidio tam ingrante abjecto; hocq; solum, et certum, et salubre remedium videtur tantæ corrigendæ calamitati superesse, quo neglecto omnia corruant necesse est. Hac autem in re S. D. N. sua erga Regiam Majestatem animi gratitudine comprobata, poterit de illius amicitia et conjunctione quæcunq; volet sibi polliceri, adversus eos omnes, qui ejus Autoritatem aut dignitatem voluerint oppugnare. Tandem his causis rationibusq; omnibus in unum congestis, mecum ipse reputans, quam multa gravissimi momenti in hujus conjugii Dissolutione occurrant, in tanta æquitate justoq; fundamento posita, ob quæ hæc Dissolutio nec possit absq; gravissimo detrimento, nec debeat diutius protrahi aut intermitteri; videns quoq; quid allegari possit et allegabitur omnino ad Regiæ Majestatis conscientiam coram Deo purgandam, etiamsi id a S. D. N. neutiquam admittatur, quæ in hujusmodi allegationibus confisa, vereor ne in tanta rerum extremitate constituta, potius quam ingentia mala, quæ hinc apertissime imminet, succedant, dicta Regia Majestas ex duobus malis minus malum eligat, et soli suæ puræq; conscientie immitens, id agat, quod nunc tam reverenter a Sedis Apostolicæ Autoritate exigit, unde Sedis contemptus indies gravior excresceret, hoc præsertim tempore admodum periculoso: quæ omnia sunt a S. D. N. summa sua prudentia alte consideranda, nullo prorsus dubio aut difficultate in re tam gravi mature concedenda interjecta; nec eam retardare debet cujusquam mortalis instantia, contemplatio vel satisfactio, præsertim quum in multis aliis rebus, forsan non tam manifestis et apparentibus, Sanctitas sua liberalem, facilemq; erga alios se sæpe præstiterit; cui humillima reverentia præmissa meo nomine dicentis, quod hæc loquor tamquam fidele, utcunq; Ecclesiæ indignum membrum, omnia excogitans quæ possent in Ecclesiæ augmentum et existimationem cedere, ea etiam admoventis et consulens ut evitentur, quæ cessura videantur in contrarium. Staphileus's Letter to the Cardinal, that shows how much he was persuaded of the justice of the King's Cause. The Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitel. B. 10.]

REVERENDISSIME et Illustrissime Domine D. mihi colendissime, post humillimam commendationem D. V. Reverend. dignabitur intelligere, qualiter quintadecima die post recessum nostrum a Londino conscendimus navem, retenti interim in portu ob tempestatem Maris et contrarios ventos: interim in itinere fui cum Reverendo Domino Roffen. et disputavimus materiam multum, copiose, et satis prolixè, in præsentia Domini Doctoris Marmeduci, qui intellexit omnia ex utraq; parte ab utroque dicta et sapius replicata; penes quem autem steterit victoria, vel saltem, uter nostrum validius certaverit, D. V. Reverend. percipiet ex fideli relatione præfati D. Marmeduci. Unum certifico D. V. Reverend. quod pro uno mediocri Episcopatu desiderassem quod huic nostræ disputationi interfuisset Serenissimus Rex noster et D. V. et Regina, pro intelligentia veritatis et pro modo disputandi: etenim commendo humiliter D. V. Reverend. istum bonum virum, bonum servitorem ac diligentem Serenissimæ Regiæ Majestatis et D. V. Reverendiss. Quibus me quoq; humillimum ac ex toto devotissimum eorum servum quam humillime possum ex toto corde meo semper commendo, præstiturus utriq; fideliss. et amantiss. obsequium in rebus et negotiis mihi commissis et committendis. Bene valeat D. V. Reverendiss. quæ dignabitur tenere me semper in bona gratia Serenissimi Regis nostri, qui est decus et ornamentum Regiæ Dignitatis. Ex Bononia, 20 Jan. 1528.

D. V. Reverendiss.

Humillimus Servitor Episcopus
STAPHILEUS.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitel. B. 10.]

REVERENDISSIME in Christo Pater, grata semper huic Regiæ Majestati extiterunt Vestræ Reverend. Dominat. officia, sed gratissimum omnium illud fuit, quod tanta fide et sedulitate in ipsius promovenda causa ab ea fuisse præstitum ex Reverendi Domini Jerdonen. sermone cognovit: quam optimi amoris significationem toto pectore amplexatur, jussitque; ut suis nominibus ingentes vestræ Reverendissimæ D. gratias haberemus: Cui ego eo quoque; nomine maxime quoque; me debere fateor, nulla enim in re magis obnoxium me sibi potest efficere, quam si totis suis viribus, omni gratia et Autoritate adnitatur, quo negotium hoc ex Regiæ Majestatis sententia quam citissime conficiatur; hujusmodi enim est ut nullum gravius possit accidere, dilationem nullam patitur, utpote quod totius hujus Regni conservationem, Regiæ sobolis continuationem et ejus animi salutem in se contineat: causa quidem manifestior est quam disputatione egeat, et sanctorum quam debeat in controversiam adduci, hanc unam gratiam et nunc primum a Sede Apostolica votis omnibus petit, et eam tum ex rei justitia, tum ex sua in S. D. N. filiali devotione, spem concepit, ut nullo pacto sibi persuadeat unquam fieri posse ut sua expectatione frustretur, quam scit vestræ R. D. opera ac pio patrocinio maxime posse juvari.

Iterum igitur atque; iterum Reverendissimam D. vestram obsecro, ut postquam recenti et claro hoc testimonio purgavit quicquid antea in Regiam Majestatem fide sinistra fuerat ad nos delatum, et nostrum animum sibi totum devinxit, non gravetur nunc strenue in hoc Regio promovendo negotio ad optatum usque; finem perseverare, quod ita cor nostrum premit, ut vel proprio sanguine id vellemus posse a S. D. N. impetrare. Cætera, vestra Reverendissima D. uberius ac distinctius cognoscet ex Reverendo Domino Episcopo Jerdonensi, et ex Domino Stephano Gardinero intimo meo servo, et Domino Edwardo Foxo Regio familiari, quibus rogo ut certissimam in omnibus fidem veliti habere. Et felicissime valeat.

MAGNIFICE Domine Gregori, &c. Ingentem Serenissima Regia Majestas et ego letitiam concepimus, quum tum ex Domini Stephani literis, tum vero ex Domini Foxi relatu cognovimus, quanta fide, industria, ac vigilantia usi sitis in ejusdem Regiæ Majestatis conficiendo negotio, quem vestrum animum, etsi sæpe antea arduis in rebus exploratissimum certissimumque; haberemus, hoc tamen tam claro testimonio nihil a vobis omissum perspiciamus, quod votum nostrum utcumque; juvare potuisset. Cæterum quum nonnulla adhuc meo aliorumque; Doctiss. virorum judicio superesse videantur, ad Regiæ Majestatis causam securissime stabiliendam finiendamque; de quibus ad D. Stephanum in præsentia perscribo; Vos iterum atque; iterum rogo, ut de illis impetrandis apud S. D. N. una cum Domino Stephano vestram gratiam et Autoritatem, quam apud ejus Sanctitatem maximam esse et audio et gaudeo, pro viribus interponatis, maxime autem ut in Commisssione illa Decretali a S. D. N. nullis Arbitris seu consultoribus admissis concedenda, et secreto ad me mittenda, omnes vires ingenii, prudentiæ diligentiaque; vestræ adhibeatis, affirmabitisque; et in salutem animamque; meam eidem S. D. N. spondebitis, quod dictam Bullam secretissime nullis mortalium oculis conspiciendam apud me asservabo, tanta fide et cautione, ut ne minimum quidem ex ea re periculum, vel periculi metum ejus Sanctitas sit sensura; non enim eo consilio aut animo eam Commisssionem impetrari tam vehementer cupio, ut vel illius vigore ullius processus aut aliud præterea quicquid ageretur, vel eadem publice privatimve legere illi exhiberetur, sed ut hac quasi arrha et pignore summæ paternæque; S. D. N. erga Regiam Majestatem benevolentia apud me deposita, quum videat nihil illi denegaturum quod petiverit, perspiciatque; tantum fidei ejus Sanctitatem in me reposuisse, sic mea apud dictam Majestatem augeatur Autoritas, ut quanquam vires omnes suas opesque; Apostolicæ Sedis conservationi et in pristinum statum reparationi sic sponte dicaverit, me tamen suasore et consultore omnia in posterum, et in sanguinis effusionem sit concessura et effectura, que in ejusdem Sedis et suæ Beatitudinis securitatem, tranquillitatem et commodum, quaquam ratione cedere poterunt.

JULIUS Papa Secundus. Dilecte Fili et dilecta in Christo Filia, salutem et Apostolicam Benedictionem. Romani Pontificis præcellens Autoritas concessa sibi desuper utitur potestate, prout personarum, negotiorum et temporum qualitate pensata id in Domino conspicit expedire. Oblatæ nobis nuper pro parte vestra petitionis series continebat, quod cum alias tu Filia Catharina, et tunc in humanis agens quondam Arthurus Carissimi in Christo Filii nostri Henrici Angliæ Regis illustrissimus primogenitus, pro conservandis pacis et amicitia nexibus et fœderibus inter præfatum Angliæ Regem, et Carissimum in Christo Filium nostrum Ferdinandum Regem, et Carissimam in Christo Filiam nostram Elizabeth. Reginam Catholicos Hispaniarum et Siciliæ, Matrimonium per verba legitime de præsentibus contraxeritis, illudque carnali copula consummaveritis, quia tamen Dominus Arthurus, prole ex hujusmodi Matrimonio non suscepta, decessit, et hujusmodi vinculum pacis et connexitatis inter præfatos Reges et Reginam ita firmiter verisimiliter non perduraret, nisi etiam illud alio affinitatis vinculo confoveretur et confirmaretur, ex his et certis aliis causis, desideratis Matrimonium inter vos per verba legitime de præsentibus contrahere: Sed quia desiderium vestrum in præmissis adimplere non potestis, Dispensatione Apostolica desuper non obtenta, nobis propterea humiliter supplicari fecistis, ut vobis providere in præmissis de Dispensationis gratia et benignitate Apostolica dignaremur. Nos igitur qui inter singulos Christi fideles, præsertim Catholicos Reges et Principes, pacis et concordia amicitiam vigere intensius desiderii affectamus, his et aliis causis animum nostrum moventibus, hujusmodi supplicationibus inclinati, vobiscum, ut aliquo impedimento affinitatis hujusmodi ex præmissis proveniente non obstante Matrimonium inter vos contrahere, et in eo postquam contractum fuerit, remanere, libere et licite valeatis, Autoritate Apostolica per præsentem Dispensamus; et quatenus forsam jam Matrimonium inter vos de facto publice vel clandestine contraxeritis, ac carnali copula consummaveritis, vos et quemlibet vestrum ab excessu hujusmodi, ac Excommunicationis sententia quam propterea incurristis, eadem Autoritate absolvimus, ac etiam vobiscum ut in hujusmodi Matrimonio sic de facto contracto remanere, seu illud de novo contrahere, inter vos libere et licite valeatis, similiter Dispensamus, prolem ex hujusmodi Matrimonio sive contracto sive contrahendo suscipiendam legitimam decernendo. Volumus autem, si hujusmodi Matrimonium de facto contraxistis, Confessor, per vos et quemlibet vestrum eligendus, pœnitentiam, quam adimplere teneamini, propterea vobis injungat. Dat. Romæ apud Sanctum Petrum sub annulo Piscatoris, die 26 Decemb. millesimo quingentesimo tertio. Pont. nostri Anno primo.

ILLUD igitur video maxime necessarium superesse ut Decretalis Bulla, quam Reverendissimus Dominus Legatus secum defert, secreto legenda exhibeatur nonnullis ex Regis Consultoribus, eo quidem consilio, non ut in iudicium proferatur, vel ad causam definiendam adhibeatur, sed solum ut perspicientes illi, quorum prudentia et Autoritas non parva est, nihil a me fuisse omissum, quod causam Regis possit securissimam redere, omniaque; fuisse a S. D. Proinde, Domine Gregori, iterum atque; iterum vos impense rogo, quod ad S. D. N. genua devoluti ejus Beatitudinem meo nomine obsecretis, ut hoc relinquam meæ fidei meæque; dexteritati de Bulla Decretali ostendenda committere velit, quam rem sic moderatur, ut nullum prorsus periculum, nullum damnum, nullum odium queat unquam sibi, vel Sedi Apostolicæ provenire; hocque; tam instanter precor, ut pro salute mea conservanda petere queam ardentius nihil.

XVII.—John Cassali's Letter about a Conference he had with the Pope. An Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitel. B. 10.]

Reverendissime ac Illustrissime Domine D. mi Colendissime, &c.

QUUM Tabellarius D. Vestræ Reverendissimæ cum ejus mandatis literisq; die 2 Novem. datis Bononiam ad Equitem fratrem pervenisset, neque ipse tunc posset præ debilitate properatis itineribus Romam venire, ne ad eam rem longioris temporis moram interponeret, misit per dispositos equos D. Vicentium Cassalium fratrem nostrum patrualem, volens ipsum statim subsequi; venit igitur D. Vincentius Cassalius. At ego Vestræ Dominationis Reverendissimæ literis lectis ac perpensis, S. D. N. adivi, et ea quæ D. V. Reverendissima scripserat, diligenter ejus Sanctitati exposui, ipsaque; etiam literas recitavi, quæ prudentissime et efficacissime omnia explicabant. Atque; hujusmodi verbis sum loquutus.

Non locus hic nec tempus postulat, Beatissime Pater, ut ego nunc commemorem, quanto amore, quanto animi effectu, quibusque; officiis illa Regia Majestas Apostolicam Sedem Sanctitatemque; Vestram sit ubique omni tempore prosequuta, quantaque; observantia et fide Reverendissimus Dominus Eboracen. semper coluerit; nec recensendum hic videtur, quot labores, quot incommoda subiverint, quæ officia, quas multoties impensas effecerint, quærentes Ecclesiasticum statum, Christianam Religionem, et Catholicam Fidem protegere ac conservare: Nec vestra Sanctitas ignorare debet, quibus laboribus, quantis precibus, quot tabellaris, quot oratoribus missis, quot non dicam literis, sed voluminibus conscriptis, post multa insuper Jurisperitorum consilia, tum ex Anglia allata, tum hic etiam formata, fuerit tandem a vestra Sanctitate impetratum, ut res eo, quo fuit pacto, componeretur: Qua ratione Regiæ Majestatis desiderio indulgebatur, et Beatitudinis vestræ honori ac conscientiæ, justitiæque; et æquitati consulerebatur: At nunc Sanctitas Vestra animadvertit illos, præter omnium nostrum spem et opinionem, omni auxilio penitus esse destitutos:

Reverendiss. Campegius non modo non ostendit, se adeo urgentibus precibus Serenissimi Regis obtemperare velle, sed ut primum ad Colloquium venit, rem totam pervertit, Regiam Majestatem a Divortio dissuasit, perinde ac si ei Legatio demandata fuerit, ut Serenissimo Regi ex parte Regine persuadere debeat, ut se a Divortio absteineat, adeo ut non possit Regia Majestas stimulum hunc Conscientiæ ex suo pectore evellere, semperque; in ea mentis perturbatione illi sit permanendum, ut omnibus horis cogitet successorem sui Regni ex suo sanguine defuturum. Neque; adhuc Reverendissimus Campegius ullam significationem dedit, velle se ad id exequendum descendere, quod priore illa generali Commissione continetur; verum, quod pejus etiam est, quum multis precibus Bulla Decretalis in hac causa Regia impetrata fuerit, promiseritque; Vestra Sanctitas se permissurum ut Serenissimo Regi ac Reverendiss. D. Eboracen. ostenderetur, et eorum manibus crederetur, quam ipsi aliquibus ex Secretissimis Consiliariis ostenderunt, ut Serenissimus Rex de totius negotii æquitate instructor fieret, noluit Reverendissimus Campegius eam credere Serenissimo Regi, aut Reverendissimo Domino Eboracen. suo in ea causa Collegæ. Cur autem velit Vestra Sanctitas Regiam Majestatem in eam spem adduxisse, et deinde hoc pacto illam frustretur ac deludat. Tunc S. D. N. injecta in meum brachium manu, me ulterius loqui prohibuit, se ira accensum non abscondens, dixit, Non parum sibi de D. V. Reverendissima conquerendum esse, atque sub ejus fide se deceptum esse; Bullam Decretalem dedisse, ut tantum Regi ostenderetur, concremareturque; statim: ad hoc me (inquit) multis ille magnisque precibus protraxit, ostendens, si id non daretur, manifestam suæ salutis ruinam impendere; nunc autem eam Bullam, quæ debuit esse Secretissima, vult divulgare, neque; unquam se promississe concessurum ut Consiliariis ostendatur: literas (inquit) ipsas Reverendissimi Eboracen. proferre possum, quibus id tantum, quod dixi, petit, et ipsum Equitem Cassalium testem volo, quod Dominus Stephanus Gardinerus et ipse nil aliud a me postulaverunt, nec si postulassent, quicquam amplius obtinissent; atque; utinam aliter rem petissent, eam namque; facile denegassem, nec ad hanc penitentiam venissem, ex qua vel unius digiti jactura (modo fieri possit) quod factum fuit revocarem, video enim quantum mali ex eo mihi subeundum sit. Quum S. D. N. hæc et similia contra suum morem dixisset, ego in eam sententiam subsequutus, sciendum esse, quod D. V. Reverendissima petit, non esse ab eo, quod ejus Sanctitas constitutum fuisse dicit alienum, nec D. V. Reverendissima hanc rem divulgari velle, aut secundum eam Bullam sententiam ferri; Cæterum Regiæ Majestati et sibi tradi, ut possent aliquibus fidelioribus carioribusque; Consiliariis ostendere, ut ipsi de re tota fiant instructiores, quod perinde arcanum erit, ac si in nullius notitiam devenisset. An non (inquam) Sanctitas Vestra plerosque; habet, quibus quum aliquid arcanum crediderit, putet id non minus celatum esse, quam si uno tantum pectore contineretur, quod multo magis Serenissimo Angliæ Regi evenire debet, cui singuli in suo Regno sunt subjecti, neque; etiamsi velint, possunt Regi non esse fidelissimi: Ve namque; illis si vel parvo momento ab illius voluntate recederent, quid hoc præterea obesse potest? an non sic petitum, sic constitutum fuit? quæ ratio Sanctitatem Vestram propositum mutare cogit? Ibi Pontifex iracundus, et concitator etiam quam paulo ante; Haud (inquit) ita fuit constitutum, nec me latet, quid de ea Bulla facere cogitent et ejusmodi ex eo mihi damnum redundaturum sit; firmum igitur illud habeatis, me decrevisse, neque; sententiam mutò, nolle quicquam amplius hac in re permittere. At ego, nolit (quæso) Vestra Sanctitas sic ex certa animi sententia loqui, ac potius in his literis Reverendissimi Domini Eboracen. consideret damna, ruinas, hæreses, quæ Vestræ Sanctitatis culpa in illo Regno orientur: Regia enim Majestas male a Vestra Beatitudine tractata, injuria, et ignominia affecta, studium et voluntatem, quam semper optimam in Sedem Apostolicam habuit, in contrariam partem convertere posset, hoc est Dominationi Vestræ toto peccore considerandum. Esto quod de hujus negotii æquitate disceptatum non sit, concedamus etiam hanc rem malam, et mali exempli futuram (quod quidem secus esse judicaverunt omnes) an non Vestra Sanctitas novit pleræque non bona sunt præferri nunquam a nobis solere, ne pejora patiamur; atque hoc tum aliis in rebus, tum imprimis hæresium evitandarum causa providendum est, quas videmus, quum semel altiores radices egerint, non posse amplius extirpari: atque ibi ad illius pedes genibus flexis, eam precibus omnibus sum obtestatus, ut amicitiam potentissimi Regis conservare, observantium Dominationis Vestræ Reverendissimæ erga ejus Sanctitatem, nostramque; servitutum respicere vellet; relicta namque Regiæ Majestatis amicitia, religionis imminutio subsequeretur, et Regni illius a tam antiqua cum Sede Apostolica conjunctione dissolutio, ac Dominationis Vestræ Reverendissimæ gratia et Autoritas apud serenas. Regem non suo merito deficeret, ejusque fortasse salus periclitaretur; Nos autem qui semper Beatitudini Vestræ inservivimus, pro qua tot bonis officiis functi sumus, et tantum operæ perfecimus, ad integram amicitiam inter Regiam Majestatem et Vestram Sanctitatem conservandam, in medio nostrarum actionum, Regni illius damna et calamitatem, nostramque; certissimam ruinam conspiceremus. Ad hæc S. D. N. et brachiorum et totius corporis agitatione, animum commotum ostendens, Volo (inquit) ego ruinam, quæ mihi modo immineat considerare, et id ipsum quod feci valde me angit; Si hæreses, vel alia mala oritura sunt, quenam in eo mea culpa erit, satis meæ conscientiæ fuerit me vacasse culpa, cui essem obnoxius, si hoc etiam quod nunc ex me petitur concederem: Nec Reverendissimus Dominus Eboracensis, nec vos ullam causam de me conquerendi habetis, quicquid nunc pollicitus sum præstiti, neque aliud unquam, etsi mihi faciendi esset facultas, Regia Majestas et Reverendissimus Dominus Eboracen. a me petitur, quod non promptissime concesserim, ut quisque facile intelligat, quanti eos semper fecerim; ad aliqua etiam Vestri causa faciliorem me præbui. Cæterum ubi vertitur meæ conscientiæ integritas omnia posthabenda censeo, agant per se ipsi quod volunt, Legatum remittant eo prætextu, quod in causam ulterius procedi nolint, et deinceps ut ipsi volent rem conficiant, modo ne me autore injuste quicquam agatur. Tunc ego, Nonne Vestra Sanctitas vult, ut ex vigore Commissionis procedatur? quod quum velle affirmasset, dixi, igitur Reverendissimus Campegius Sanctitatis Vestræ voluntati adversatur, Divortium enim Regi dissuasit; At Pontifex, ego (inquit) illi imposui, ut Divortium Regi dissuaderet, persuaderet Reginæ; quod autem ad Commissionem pertinet, si requiratur, exequetur. Sumus ergo (inquam) concordēs, Beatissime Pater, quod quum ita sit, quid nocere poterit Decretalem Bullam aliquibus secretissimis ac juramento addactis Consiliariis ostendisse: Tum quassans caput, Scio (inquit) quid de ea facere constituat, verum nondum Campegii literas ex Anglia legi, quapropter die crastino ad me redibitis. Hoc pacto S. D. N. primo die dimisit. Adfuit his sermonibus Dominus Vincentius Cassalius, quem ob equitem fratrem huc missum dixi, qui equitem ipsum excusavit, quod quamvis ille animadverteret negotium hoc tanti momenti esse, ut etiam cum vitæ discrimine Romam per dispositos equos sibi properandum esse videret, nihilominus supersedisse videns quod si id fecisset necesse sibi futurum domi, et in lectulo permanere potius, quam de re tanta coram ejus Sanctitate agere. Atque interim Dominus Vincentius multas rationes ad persuadendum, equitis Cassalii nomine adhibuit, quas eodem pacto ejus Sanctitas in sequentem diem rejecit.

Postridie ejus diei signatura habita est, cui ego tanquam referendarius interfui, in vespertinis; est protracta, nec judicavi opportunum Pontificem signaturæ munere defessum aggredi, quum præsertim ejus Sanctitas diceret se nondum Campegii literas perlegisse. Res igitur iterum in diem proximum rejecta fuit, quo postea horam commodam nactus Pontificem adivi, quumque; omnium Caput, quæ D. V. Reverendissimæ literis continebantur, quasi summam effecissem, ne quicquam per oblivionem præterirem, ab ea primum parte cœpi, in qua dicitur suam sanctitatem concessisse Commissionem generalem in amplissima forma, et promississe ferendam sententiam, ratificaturum. Pontifex hoc verum esse affirmavit, dicens se contentum esse, ut ad sententiam procedatur; Qua vero parte est, ejus Sanctitatem Bullam Decretalem concessisse, ut secretiores Regiæ Majestatis Consiliarios instrueret, id a veritate longe remotum dixit, posseque; ad id se literas D. V. Reverendissimæ ostendere: Atque ea repetivit, quæ priore die super hoc dixerat, viz. Dominum Stephanum Gardinerum et Equitem Cassalium se testes habere, hanc Bullam non ea conditione petitam fuisse ut ostenderetur cuiquam, præterquam Serenissimo Regi et D. V. Reverendissimæ, et Campegium nunc ad se scribere tantundem effecisse, quo facto ex conventionem Bullam comburi debere, promissurum quoque; se dixit, ut si quæ allegantur, probentur, ad sententiam ferendam procedatur, se id ratum habiturum. Quumque; ego quæsissem an vellet, quæ fierent per eam Bullam comprobare, minime id oportere dixit; negavit quoque; eam Consiliariis ostendam esse, quasi tametsi rem bonam non judicaret, approbarent tamen super ejus Sanctitatis Conscientiam; ac sæpius interim repetivit, non esse amplius in ea re commorandum. Ad aliam igitur partem deveni, in qua D. V. Reverendissima dicit, Reverendissimum Campegium Divortium inter Regem Serenissimum et Reginam conatum dissuadere: Tum Pontifex Campegium scribere dixit, eo se etiam functurum officio, ut Reginæ Divortium persuaderet, quam ab eo alienam invenerit; modeste tamen eam, ait, locutam fuisse, et Consiliarios petiisse, qui ex Hispania denegati fuerint, ex Flandria autem concessi. Dixit etiam S. D. N. se literas ad Regem, Reverendissimo Campegio ex suo Chirographo dedisse, ut Regia Majestas fidem his haberet, quæ Reverendissimus Campegius suæ Sanctitatis nomine diceret. Ad illam deinde partem deveni, ubi est: Causam Regis perinde differt, ac si nolit ad judicium, sententiamque; in partem suæ Majestatis ferendam descendere, donec S. D. N. certiore prius effecerit, de his ad hanc causam concernentibus, quæ ibi vidit et audivit. Ad hæc respondit, Campegium quodcumque; requisitus fuerit, processurum, neque; de supersedendo Commissionem habere; se tantum injunxisse, ut quum procedi cœptum esset, se certiore faceret, ne tamen interim moræ aliquid interponeretur. At ubi est nullo pacto adduci vult, ut mihi suo Collegæ Commissionem hanc Decretalem credat: Dixit verum id esse, ideo factum ne pluribus plam fieret, eaque conditione qua petium fuit, ostensam nequicquam amplius expectandum, ea repetens, quæ prius etiam circa hoc dixerat. At ego, videat Sanctitas vestra quod ex his verbis, quæ hic scripta sunt loquor, quæ dicunt Sanctitatem Vestram Commissionem Decretalem concessisse, ea conditione ut aliquibus Regiis Consiliariis ostenderetur. Tum Pontifex iterum excandescens; Ostendam (inquit) litteras ipsius Reverendissimi Eboracen. nec loquor mendacia, et non minus meis verbis, literisq; prioribus Reverendissimi Eboracen. fides est habenda, quam his quas nunc afferitis. Tum ejus Sanctitatem mitigari quæsi, si minus urgeter mandata exequerer, quoniam id a me fieri oportet. Quod ad Regni ruinas, damna, calamitates, scandala, et diminutionem Religionis, multa in eandem sententiam dixit, in quam primo die locutus fuit; quum diceret, Egregium vero decus Serenissimo huic Regi fuerit, si ipse, qui Fidei Defensor et sit et appelletur, qui libros etiam pro ejus defensione ediderit, eandem nunc impugnare cogatur; Ad hæc quam recte sint venturi, viderint ipsi. Eo autem loco, in quo dicebatur aliquid de Regio negotio, inter Generale Fratrurn de Observantia, et ejus Sanctitatem convenisse, et eo autore fœdus inter ejus Sanctitatem et Cæsarianos componendum, Dixit, id ostendere, quod de Regio negotio nihil promiserit, quod quicunq; pollicitus sit, et quin poterit habita ratione suæ conscientiæ, re ipsa præstare velit: In eo autem quod de Pace tractanda affertur, dixit, se nullum modum in tali negotio invenire, neq; se adhuc scire, quod iste Generalis ulla pacis conditiones sit allaturus; atq; ea insuper addidit, quæ meis literis die 15 Novemb. datis D. V. Reverendissimæ significavi.

Aliis deinde diebus S. D. N. sæpissime sum alloquutus, qui decrevit cum Reverendissimis de Monte et Sanctorum Quatuor Cardinalibus de his rebus omnibus loqui, præterquam de Bulla Decretali, de qua cum nemine vult ullam fieri mentionem, jussitq; ex omni Scriptura ejus memoriam eximi. De reliquis itaq; rebus omnibus loquutus sum cum his duobus Cardinalibus qui dixerunt Pontificem contentum fore, ut ad sententiam procedatur, tametsi id plerisq; alienum videatur, deque eo nonnulli ex Cardinalibus cum obtreactione loquuntur, et Cæsaris Orator ne procedatur Protestatur, voluntq; fieri in Curia Cause advocacionem, Commissionemq; cum Inhibitione ad partes; dicuntq; hi duo Reverendissimi, quod que postulant illi, justa sunt, nec minimo cuiq; denegari possent, nolle tamen Regiæ Majestatis causa S. D. N. quicquam ex eo quod factum sit, immutare.

Quum alio etiam die Pontificem otiosum nactus essem, multa cum ejus Sanctitate, de rebus præteritis disserui, deque eo, quod ego ad ejus utilitatem cum Venetis egissem, quoniam scirem Serenissimi Regis et D. V. Reverendissimæ voluntatem esse, ut quotiescunq; occasio daretur, pro suæ Sanctitatis commodo omnia fierent: exposui deinde quantopere elaborassem pro negotio Cerviæ et Ravenna, utq; multa Gallici Oratores egissent a D. V. Reverendissima potissimum instigati; Addidi etiam efficacissima verba, quibus usus est Dominus Stephanus Gardinerus. Ad omnia S. D. N. respondit, se ea de Regiæ Majestati, ac D. V. Reverendissimæ gratias habere, et mihi quoque gratias egit; dixitque, non tamen omnes simul tantum efficere potuistis, ut mihi mæ civitates redderentur. Scitis autem conditiones fœderis in quo ego quoque eram, fuisse, ut quum quis nostrum injuria afficeretur, ab eo ceteri confœderati injuriam propulsarent, quod multo magis pro me faciendum erat, quum qui in ipso fœdere essent mihi injuriarentur; Et inde Cæsariani volunt mihi persuadere Venetos non fuisse id facturos, si putassent Regi Angliæ aut Christianissimo displiciturum: Neque interim desistunt, multa, magnaq; mihi polliceri, unde ego, quod alias etiam dixi, id quod affertur, quum aliter facere nequeam, accipere cogar. Illudq; etiam vos scire volo promissum mihi fuisse, si legatus hic in Angliam mitteretur, futurum ut mihi civitates a Venetis restituerentur. Tum ego, non omnia, Beatissime Pater, adhuc sunt perfecta, Rex enim potentissimus omnino operam dabit, ut illæ civitates Beatitudini Vestræ restituantur: An non, quæ ejus Majestas scribit Vestra Sanctitas animadvertit? Cui videndum imprimis est, ne de ipsa Serenissimo Regi sit conquerendum; et ex hac occasione iterum ad Regiam Causam redii. At ejus Sanctitas dixit, se omnia quæ potuisset pro Regia Majestate et D. V. Reverendissima fecisse, facturamq; etiam libenter.

Nonne igitur (inquam) posset ratio aliqua inveniri qua concederetur eam Bullam aliquibus ex Secretioribus Consiliariis ostendi posse? Tum Pontifex, non (inquit) Non potest hoc fieri, nec a me impetrari; quod si ullo modo fieri potuisset, minime tam multas magnasq; preces a Serenissimo Rege, et Reverendissimo Domino Eboracen. expectassem; quumq; quibusdam validis Argumentis instarem, prohibuit me ulterius de hujusmodi re loqui. Nolui ego unquam dicere, equitem fratrem brevi esse venturum, ne Pontifex rem in illius adventum protraheret, ea tantum de causa, ut moram interponeret.

Omnibus deinde aliis diebus super eodem negotio institi, nunquam tamen Pontifex sententiam suam ulla ex parte immutare voluit; tantum illud decrevit, Nuntium mittere velle, qui suam sententiam verbis explicaret: quumq; nulla mihi amplius spes relinquere- tur quicquam amplius impetrandi, tum demum dixi, Equitem fratrem Romæ futurum sequenti die, qui quum adeo gravis momenti rem, cerneret, noluerit suæ valetudini consulere, et quod is minime putasset, suæ servitutis in ejus Sanctitatem merita hoc modo male tractanda fuisse. Gratum sibi dixit Pontifex Equitis adventum fore, quodq; cum ipso et constituerentur omnia, negans tamen se ullo pacto id quod nunc petitur concessurum. Venit itaq; Eques frater, qui non secus ac si nunquam quisquam de hac re cum Pontifice egisset, singula de integro tractavit, omnibus his modis et rationibus tentatis quæ excogitari poterunt. Quæ omnia minutim Dominus Vincentius Cassalius noster patruelis, quem ad ipsum mittimus, verbis coram explicabit, egoque ne D. V. Reverendissimæ jam nimis molestus sim, de hac ulterius non scribam.

Quod ad Wintoniensem Expeditionem spectat multum hi Reverendissimi Domini Cardinales offende- bantur, nunc ab ipsis pecuniarum remissiones postulari, quum deprædata eorum bona sint, ipsiq; propter id ad Paupertatem redacti. Quibus ego ostendi, majus emolumentum ad ipsos venturum, si D. V. Reverendissima unam Ecclesiam acciperet, alteram deponeret, quam si alter tantum Wintoniensis Ecclesiæ expeditionem faceret; neque D. V. Reverendissimum nimis hanc permutationem optare dixi, quum Wintoniensis non multo Ecclesiæ Dunelmensi sit ditior. Ad hæc dixerunt, quod libentius D. V. Reverendissimæ quam cuiquam alteri erunt gratificaturi, quoniam ipsa de sede Apostolica sit semper bene merita, non tamen se vereri, quin D. V. Reverendissima Wintoniensem Ecclesiam illius Regni primariam sit acceptura. Ego quum Pontificem, et deinde Cardinales eos qui magis rebus nostris student ambissem, effeci ut Pontifex, de ea re in Consistorio referret, quod ejus Sanctitas effecit, multis etiam additis laudibus D. V. Reverendissimæ, quibus aliqui Cardinales, et maxime Neapolitani, responderunt ea que superius dixi. Illud tandem decreverunt, quod quum D. V. Reverendissima solvere debeat, pro expeditione Wintoniensis Ecclesiæ, et pro retentione Ecclesiæ Eboracensis et Abbatie Sancti Albani, habita ratione totius summe, ejus pars dimidia D. V. Reverendissimæ condonaretur, et ut ad 13 vel 14 millia aureorum remittant, et non multo plus eo, quod pro Wintonient. tum Ecclesiæ deberet solvere. Id Reverendissimis Cardinalibus ideo displicebat, quoniam nolent res hujusmodi in exemplum trahi, quum præsertim Magnus Franciæ Cancellarius, ipse quoque in magna quadam Expeditione, idipsum in ~~consequenti~~ flagitat, quod isti concedere nolunt.

A part of Peter Vannes his Instructions, directing him to threaten the Pope. An Original.

AND Peter, as of himself, shall a-part say unto his holiness: sir, I being an Italian, cannot but with a more fervent zeal and mind than any other, study and desire the weal, honour and safety of your holiness and the see apostolic; which compelleth me to show unto your holiness, frankly, what I see in this matter. Surely, sir, in case your holiness continuing this particular respect of fear of the emperor, do thus delay, protract, and put off the accomplishment of the king's so instant desire in this matter, and not impart to his majesty therein bounteously of the treasure and goods of the church, and the see apostolic,—quantum potestis ex thesauro ecclesie et ex plenitudine potestatis ac auctoritate a Deo vel ab ecclesia collata.—I see assuredly, that it will be a means so to alienate the fast and entire mind which his highness beareth to your said holiness, as not only thereby his grace, nobles, and realm, but also many other princes his friends and confederates, with their nobles and realms, shall withdraw their devotion and obedience from your holiness, and the see apostolic, studying how they may acquite this your ingratitude, in the highest cause that can be devised, showed, and so long continued with the semblable. And therefore, sir, at the reverence of Almighty God, cast not from you the heart of this noble virtuous prince, who finally cannot fail, the peace had, which Christendom may not long forbear, to have in his puissance, such a stay as may be able, in the highest and largest manner, to recompence his friends, and to acquite the contrary.

XXI.—An Information given to the Pope about the Divorce. An Original.

Adnotatio Summaria eorum quæ aliis libellis fuis explicata S. D. N. tum licere, tum expedire, persuadent, ut in Causa Regiæ Majestatis Sententiam divortii ferat.

Divinum enim jus duci prohibet Uxorem fratris, quin hic fratris Uxorem ductam fuisse sit notorium.

Humanum vero jus, duo hujus Matrimonii impedimenta continet, alterum Affinitatis, quod divino jure inductum severissime sancivit; alterum publicæ Honestatis, et justitiæ, quod promulgavit Deus, si ex definitione Matrimonii, divini, humaniq; juris commutatio interveniret, quibusnam auspiciis hoc Matrimonium constare dicemus, quod utroque jure adversante ac repugnante, contractum est, coit, et utcumque consistit?

Sed cessavit, inquit, in hac specie juris utriusq; prohibitio per gratiam et Dispensationem summi Pontificis.

Respondetur quidem istis multis modis. Primo non esse videri, quod nullum est, nullum autem haberi quod sine Autoritate legitima fiat; deniq; Pontificis Autoritatem non eatenus pertinere, ut in gradibus divina lege prohibitis dispensare possit: non opinionibus Scripturientium, qui Pontificis Authoritatem immutatam velint, sed ipsius Pontificis sententia constat, quem suæ Jurisdictionis modum, et optime novisse et ampliari velle potius quam restringere credendum est; quæ quum ita sint, etiam si humani juris prohibitio per Dispensationem sublata videatur, manet nihilominus immotum, quod divinum est, si ipsis contra seipsos credimus Pontificibus.

Deinde, ut posse Pontifices dispensare fateamur, et in ea parte tribuamus plus Authoritatis quam ipsi sibiipsis audeant arrogare, tamen non passim, non quocunq; modo, non temere, et sine omni consideratione, posse eos dispensare; atq; fatendum est ne suo testimonio Dissipatores verius, quam Dispensatores appellentur. Itaque ut causam urgentissimam et evidentissimam, tum etiam manifestissimam debet habere Dispensatio, tum etiam manifestissimam debet habere Dispensatio, precibus deniq; veris, non ementitis atq; confictis inniti.

In Dispensatione autem, quæ constat hoc Matrimonium, verbis quidem pacis causa proponitur, sed non ideo quia sic refertur, re ipsa subsistit. Pontificis facta non ad verborum superficiem, sed rei ipsius solidam veritatem expendi convenit.

Certum est, pacem multis modis, tum firmissimam fuisse unoq; Matrimonio conciliatam, pactorum deniq; ac fœderum vi constantem, istud necessario Matrimonium non desiderasse, et jam Dispensationem sine causa intervenisse dicimus, et consequenter nullam esse, manereq; adhuc divinam prohibitionem atq; adeo et humanam.

Porro etiam, si aliqua sit, et causam haberet, tum mendacis confata est, subreptitia et obreptitia merito appellanda, jure tum divino, tum humano reprobata.

Nam quum quod alioqui Canonibus cautum sit ipsius etiam Dispensationis, præmium, continet, "Romani Pontificis Autoritatem concessa sibi desuper uti potestate, prout personarum, causarum, et temporum qualitate pensata, id in Domino salubriter conspicit expedire;" Quomodo potuit S. D. N. hujus Serenissimi Regis qualitates pensare quas ignoravit? Neque enim de ætate quicquam, quæ in contrahendo hoc Matrimonio præcipua qualitas erat, narrabatur, et tamen illum annum eo tempore duodecimum non excessisse notorium est; et tacita ad hunc modum ætate, mendacium pro causa suggestum est manifestissimum; Cupiisse, viz. tunc Serenissimum Regem contrahere Matrimonium, ad hoc ut pacis fœdera continuarentur: facti veritas est, tum quid ageretur ignorasse, et etiamsi tum scivisset, tamen non fuisse verum quod cuperet ad hoc ut pacis fœdera continuarentur, ætas ostendit, quæ per communis juris dispositionem discretionem non admittit; cupere quidem affectus est, cæterum cupere contrahere Matrimonium, ad hoc ut pacis fœdera continuarentur, iudicii est et discretionis. Porro autem, quum de continuandis inter duos Principes fœderibus ageretur, alter ante mandatam executioni Bullam fati concessit, et re integra, causa, si quæ fuit, cessavit.

Sed manet nihilominus eorum sententia, qui Pontificem non posse dispensare affirmant, secundum quos nec Breve nec Bulla consistit; deinde Breve falsum esse, et pro falso judicari deberi, multis rationibus convincitur: denique falsum cum sit, et tamen prioris Bullæ errores corrigat, illam opinionem merito confirmet, ne prior Dispensatio efficax videatur, vel eorum iudicio, qui hoc Matrimonium defendere studuerunt, viz. qui veris allegationibus diffisi, ad falsas et confictas Dispensationes, vitia objecta removens confugere coacti sunt.

Ista, si singula minus sufficiant, saltem collata, obtineant et persuadeant licere. Illa vero opinio multis persuasa, Pontificem, viz. non potuisse dispensare, ut sola infirmet Dispensationem, non petitur, sed habet nihilominus aliquid considerationis; quanquam enim refellatur a quibusdam et reprobetur, manet tamen scripta, atque adeo testimonio ipsius Pontificis comprobata. Perpendatur deinde causa et suggestionis veritas, si mendacium intervenisse appareat, et quod est notorium, illam Dispensationem adversariorum factis in novi Brevis fabricatione tacite reprobari, quis non videt ex his causis licere ut sententia Divortii proferatur?

pensationis cum omnibus convenit opinionibus, sive quia Authoritas abfuit, sive quia non recte interposita dicatur; Approbatio vero cum istis dissentit omnibus.

Expedit ut firma sit et inconcussa Regni Successio, quæ contra has opiniones confirmari non potest.

Expedit ut conscientia Serenissimi Regis his scrupulis impedita, et turbata, expedita et tranquilla redatur.

Breviter, expedit votis Serenissimi Regis satisfieri, qui pro genuinis et innatis suis virtutibus, non nisi optima cupit, et modo etiam optimo votorum suorum compotem effici laborat; si non virtutem spectaret, cætera nihil haberent difficultatis, sed omnium virtutum cogitationem quandam esse animadvertens, suum iustitiæ decorum, quod temperantia est, querit, ut justum, justo modo, obtineat et assequatur. Itaq; expedit ne auxilium denegetur, vel differatur ei qui id iuste implorat.

XXII.—The second part of a long Dispatch of the Cardinal's concerning the Divorce. An Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitel. B. 11.]

To my loving Friends, Master Stephen Gardiner, Doctor of both Laws; Sir Francis Brian, and Sir Gregory Cassali, Knights; and Mr. Peter Vannes, Secretary to the King's Highness for the Latin Tongue; His Grace's Orators, Residents in the Court of Rome.

ANOTHER part of your charge consisteth in expedition of the king's great and weighty cause of matrimony, whereupon depend so many high consequences, as for no earthly cause to suffer or tolerate, tract or delay, in what case soever the pope's holiness be of amendment or danger of life; nor as is aforesaid, oweth to be by his holiness pretermitted, whether the same be in the state of recovery, or in any doubt or despair thereof: for one assured and principal fundamental and ground is to be regarded, whereupon the king's highness doth plant and build his acts and cogitations in this behalf, which is from the reasonable favour and justice, being the things from the which the pope's holiness, in prosperis nec adversis, may lawfully and honestly digress; and when the plainness of his cause is well considered, with the manifest presumptions, arguments, and suspicions, both of the insufficiency of the bull, and falsity of the brief, such as may lead any man of reason or intendment well to perceive and know that no sufficiency or assured truth can be therein; How may the pope's holiness, ex æquo et iusto, refuse or deny to any Christian man, much less to a prince of so high merits, and in a cause whereupon depend so many consequences, to his holiness well known, for a vain respect of any person, or by excuse of any sickness, justify, colour, or defend any manner refusal, tract, or delay, used in declaration of the truth in so great a matter, which neither for the infinite conveniences that thereby might ensue, admitteth or suffereth to be delayed, nor by other than himself, his act or authority, may lawfully be declared. And well may his holiness know, that to none it appertaineth more to look unto the justness of the king's desire in this behalf, than to his highness his self, whose interest, whose cause, with the same of his realm and succession resteth herein; for if his grace were minded, or would intend to do a thing inique or unjust, there were no need to recur unto the pope's holiness for doing thereof. But because his highness and his council, who best know the whole of this matter, and to whose part it belongeth most profoundly to weigh and ponder everything concerning the same, be well assured of the truth of the matter, needing none other thing but for observance of his duty towards God and his church, to have the same truth also approbate and declared by him to whom the doing thereof appertaineth ; his grace therefore seeing an untruth alleged, and that so craftily as by undue and perverse ways, the same, without good reason adhibited, may for a season bring things into confusion, doth communicate unto the pope's holiness presumptions and evidences enough, and sufficient to inform the conscience of his holiness of the very truth : which then, if his holiness will not see, but either for affection, fear, or other private cause, will hearken to every dilatory and vain allegation of such as led upon undue grounds would colour the truth ; what doth his holiness less therein, than under a right vain colour expressly deny and refuse the said justice, which to be done either in health or sickness, in a matter of so great moment, is in nowise tolerable ? But for the same reasons that he before mentioned, is the thing, whether the pope's holiness be in hope or despair of life, without further tract to be absolved and determined ; for if Almighty God grant his holiness life, this act is, and always shall be, able to bear itself, and is meet to be an example, a precedent, and a law, in all like cases emerging, the circumstances and specialities of the same in every part concurring as they do in this ; nor can the emperor make exceptions at the same, when he best knowing, perceive, the untruth shall see the grounds and occasions, that of necessity and mere justice have enforced and constrained the pope's holiness thereunto ; which he could not refuse to do, unless he would openly and manifestly commit express injury and notorious injustice. For be it that the pope's holiness hearkening to the said frivolous and vain allegations, would refuse to declare the law herein to the king's purpose, then must his holiness, either standing in doubt, leave and suffer the cause to remain in suspense, to the extreme danger of the king's realm and succession for ever ; or else declare the bull or brief, or both, to be good, which I suppose neither his holiness nor any true Christian man can do, standing the manifest occasions, presumptions, and apparent evidences to the contrary. Then if the matter be not to be left in suspense, no judgment can be truly given to the approbation of the bull or brief ; how can the pope's holiness of conscience, honour or virtue, living or dying, thus procrastinate or put over the immediate finishing thereof, according to the king's desire ? or how may his holiness find his conscience towards God exonerate, if either living he should be the cause of so many evils as hereof may arise ; or dying, wilfully leave this so great a matter, by his own default, in this confusion, uncertainty, and perplexity ? It is not to be supposed, that ever prince most devout to the see apostolic, could so long tolerate so high an injury, as being so merited towards the said see, is both unacquitted for his kindness with any special grace, and also denied upon his petition of that which is evident to be plain justice. This thing is otherwise to be looked upon, than for the pope's sickness, where most need were to put an end unto it, to be delayed, seeing that living and amending it is of itself expedient and justifiable, and dying, it shall be an act both necessary, meritorious, and honourable. For this cause ye now knowing the king's mind in this behalf, shall, if ye have not already before this time spoken with the pope's holiness at length in these matters, as the king's grace trusteth ye have done, solicit as well by the means of Messire Jacobo Salviati, as by the bishop of Verone, and otherwise as ye can think best, to have such commodious access unto his holiness, as ye may declare the premises unto him ; which by your wisdoms, in as effectual and vive manner as ye can open it unto his holiness. It is undoubtedly to be thought the same shall rather be to his comfort and increase of health, than to any his trouble or unquietness ; and that his holiness hearing these reasons not evitable, will, whether he be in way and hope of amendment, or otherwise, both proceed to the said indication, and also to the declaration of the law, and passing of a sufficient and ample decretal, as hath been devised in the king's said cause, with other such things, as by former letters and instructions, by the decrees mentioned in the same, that failing have been committed unto you, to be solicited and procured there ; in the labouring whereof, albeit since your departures from hence, the things have, by reasons of the pope's sore sickness, otherwise chanced than was here supposed, by means whereof ye not instructed what to do in any such case, were peradventure not over hasty or importune to labour these matters, till the pope's holiness might be better amended, nor could perceive find the means to have convenient access unto his presence for the same, ye must nevertheless adhibit such diligence, as howsoever the sickness of his holiness shall cease, amend, or continue, these things be not for the same, or any other cause, tractred or left in longer suspense ; but finding possible means to come unto the pope's presence, to declare all such things unto the same, mentioned both in the former letters and instructions given unto you, and also in these presents, as may make to the purpose ; and failing of often access in your own persons to his holiness, ye cause the bishop of Verone, and other such assured friends as ye can attain, being about him at such times as they may have with his holiness, to inculcate unto him the said points and considerations, and all other that ye can excogitate and devise to the furtherance and advancement of these matters, not forbearing or sparing also, if ye shall see difficulty at the pope's hand, or in audience to be given to you or your friends there, being about his person, to break and open after a good fashion and manner the same unto such of the cardinals as ye may perceive assuredly and constantly to favour the king's highness, and the French king in election of a future pope, in case (as God forbid) the pope's holiness should decease ; and to show unto the same cardinals all such things as you shall think meet, both for their more ample instructions in the truth and specialities of the matters, as well concerning the indication of truce as the king's said cause, and the presumptuous reasons, and plainer evidences, leading to the insufficiency of the bull, and apparent falsity of the said brief ; to the intent, that as many of the said cardinals as ye can win, made sure in those matters, they may, both in time of sickness and also of amendment, move and induce the pope's holiness thereunto, laying before him as well the merits and honour that may ensue by the perfection of the premises, as the danger imminent by the contrary ; and semblably it shall be expedient that ye win and make sure to the same purpose as many of the officers of the Rota and other as ye can, who as ye write be not accustomed, nor will give counsel to any person but the pope's holiness ; for albeit, ye cannot have them to be of the king's council, yet nevertheless they may do as much good, or more, in training and counselling the pope's holiness upon the great reasons that you can show unto them, to hearken unto your overtures in this behalf. To which purpose you shall adjure, make, and win, as many friends of the cardinals, of them, and other, as ye possibly may, as for the thing which the king's highness and I more esteem than twenty papalities ; and amongst other, ye shall insist, by all means and good persuasions ye can, for the continuance there of the said bishop of Verone, so as he may countervail the archbishop of Capuan, who, as it seemeth, is continually about the pope's person, and were necessary to be met with in the labours and persuasions, which by likelihood he maketh to the hindrance of the king's purpose: for the better continuing of the which bishop of Verone, not only the king's highness and I write unto him at this time, as by the copy of the same several letters being herewith ye shall perceive, but also the French king will do the semblable. And furthermore, to the intent that the pope's holiness may well perceive that not only the said French king mindeth the king's said cause, and taketh it to heart as much as it were his own, and will effectually join and concur with the king's highness therein, but that also he is and will be conformable to the said indication,—he will send thither, with all speed, the bishop of Bayon, to further, solicit, and set forth the same; who, before his departure from hence, which was a good season passed, was and is sufficiently and amply instructed in all things requisite to this purpose; and not only in these matters, but also in such other as were written unto you by Vincent de Cassalis and Hercules, upon advertisement given hither that the pope's holiness was deceased; so as ye may be sure to have of him effectual concurrence and advice in the furtherance and solicitation of your charges, whether the pope's holiness amend, remain long sick, or (as God forbid) should fortune to die; trusting, that being so well furnished by all ways that can be devised, ye will not fail to use such diligence as may be to the consecuting and attaining of the king's purpose: wherein, though ye be so amply and largely instructed that more cannot be, yet nevertheless having lately received from the bishop of Worcester a memorial of divers great things to be well noted and considered, for trial of the falsity of the said brief, I send you herewith a copy of the same memorial, to the intent ye substantially visiting and perusing the same, may follow and put in execution such part thereof, for better trial of the falsity, as is to be done there, like as the rest meet to be done here, shall not fail to be executed with diligence accordingly.

Thus be ye with these, and other former writings, sufficiently instructed what is to be done by you there, whether the pope's holiness continue long in his sickness, or whether the same fortune to decease, or soon, God willing, to amend. There resteth no more, but that ye always take for a perfect ground, that though to every new chance not before known, sufficient provision and instruction could not be given to you at your departure, ye always note, remember, and regard, that this the king's cause admitteth nor suffereth any manner negative, tract, or delay; wherefore, knowing that so well as ye do, and also how much the indication of the truce shall be commodious and necessary, both to the king's highness in particular, and to all Christendom in general, by means whereof his grace shall avoid contribution, and other charges of the war, ye must now, if ever ye will have thanks, laud, or praise, for your service, employ yourselves opportune and importune, to put an end to the points to the king's satisfaction and desire; and in every difficulty to study, by your wisdoms, the best and next remedy, and not always to tract your doings, till upon your advertisement hither, ye shall have new knowledge from hence: for thereby the matter itself, and also your demur there, be of over long a continuance, and infinite inconveniences by the same may ensue. I therefore require you, according to the special trust and confidence that the king's highness and I have in you, now for ever to acquit yourselves herein with all effect possible, accordingly so as the king's highness be not longer kept in this perplexity and suspense, to his grace's intolerable inquietness, and the great heaviness of all those that observe and love the same.

Furthermore, though it so be that the king's trust, and also mine is, ye will by your wisdom find such good means and ways as ye shall not fail, God willing, to open and declare unto the pope's holiness, the whole of the king's mind, and all and singular the premises, with the residue above-mentioned in your former instructions and letters sent unto you: yet, nevertheless, considering what ye wrote of the doubt of continuance of the pope's sickness, and to make sure for all events and chances, in case his holiness (as God forbid) should long remain in such state, as he might either take upon him the naming of the peace, journeying and repairing to the sacred diet, nor also hear the whole of the things by you to be opened and propounded, touching the king's said cause,—it hath been thought to the king's highness convenient, rather than these great and weighty matters should hang in longer suspense, to excogitate some other good means and way how these matters, so necessary, may by some ways be conduced and brought to an end; and it is this,—that the pope's holiness not being able to travel to the place devised, where the princes may be near him for treaty, and managing of the peace, he do depute me and my lord cardinal Campegius, conjunctim et divisim, as his legates for that purpose, to do and execute all such things in his holiness's name, as the same should do in that behalf if he were there present; whereunto, for the wall of Christendom, we shall be contented to condescend. So always, that as hath been written heretofore unto you, before I pass or set forth to any convention or place, to the intent before specified, the king's highness be fully satisfied and pleased in his said matter of matrimony, without which, neither with nor without the pope's presence, I will ever begin or take that voyage: for performance whereof, this article following is of new devised, to be by you propounded unto his holiness, if the decretals cannot be obtained, or some other thing, that ye shall well know and perceive, by advice of expert counsel there, to be better to the king's purpose than this thing now devised, and that may without tract be passed or granted; that is to say, that his holiness do enlarge, extend, and amplify his commission given to me and my lord legate Campegius, whereby we jointly and severally may be sufficiently furnished and authorized, to do as much in this cause of matrimony, with all the emergents and dependencies upon the same, as his holiness may do of his ordinary and absolute power, with sufficient and ample clauses, ad Decernend. et Interpretand. jura, leges, et Rescripta quæcumq; hoc Matrimonium concernentia, una cum omnibus et singulis dubiis in eadem causa emergentibus. And further, to make out compulsories to any princes, or persons of what pre-eminence, dignity, state, or condition soever they be, Etiam si in Imperiali, Regali, vel alia quacunque dignitate perfurgeant, sub quibuscumq; penis, and in what countries and places soever they be, to exhibit and produce any manner, witness, records, originals, rescripts, or other thing, in what place or time we, or the one of us, shall require them, or any of them in this behalf, with all and singular the circumstances requisite and necessary to such a commission, after such ample and assured manner as the same once had, we shall not need for any objections, doubt, or other thing that might infringe or lack, to send of new to the pope's holiness for other provision, whereby the king's said cause might hang in any longer tract or delay. In which case of coming to this commission, ye Mr. Stevens must have special regard to see the same sufficiently and substantially penned, by advice of the most expert men that ye can find to that purpose; for the better doing whereof, I send unto you herewith a copy of the said commission to me and my lord Campegius, with certain additions thereunto noted in the margin, such as have been here devised, and also a copy of certain clauses in a bull, to the intent ye may see how amply the same be couched, to avoid appellations and other delays in causes of far less moment and importance than the king's is. Nevertheless ye must, if it shall come to the obtaining of this new commission, see to the penning and more fully perfecting thereof, so as the same may be in due perfection, without needing to send eftsoons for remedying of anything therein, as is aforesaid; looking also substantially whether the chirograph of pollicitation, being already in your hands, be so couched, as the date, and everything considered, it may sufficiently oblige and astringe the pope's holiness to confirm all that we, or one of us, shall do, by virtue of this new or the old commission: and if it be not of such efficacy so to do, then must ye in this case see, that either by sufficient and ample words to be put in this new commission, if it may be so had, or by a new chirograph the pope's holiness may be so astringed; which chirograph, with the commissions before specified, if ye obtain the same, the king's pleasure is, that ye, sir Francis Brian, shall bring hither, in all possible diligence, after the having and obtaining thereof, soliciting nevertheless, whether the pope be to be easily spoken with or not, the immediate indication of the truce, as is aforesaid, without which in vain it were for me, either with or without the pope, to travel for labouring and conducting of the peace. And so by this way should the pope's holiness, with his merit and sufficient justification, proceed for the truce, as a fundament of universal peace, satisfy the king's desires, and avoid any doubt of the emperor; forasmuch as his holiness might allege, that being so extremely sick that he was not able to know of the cause himself, he could no less do of justice than to commit it unto other, seeing that the same is of such importance as suffereth no tract or delay. And finally, the king's highness, God willing, by this means, should have an end of this matter. One thing ye shall well note, which is this; albeit this new device was now for doubt of the pope's long continuance in sickness, first excoitate; yet it is not meant, nor ye be limited to this device, in case ye can obtain any other, nor ye be also commanded, to prefer this before all the other devices: but now that ye shall see and understand what this device is, and knowing what thing is like or possible to be obtained there, without long putting over of your pursuits, expend, consider, and regard well with yourself, what thing of this, or any other that may best serve to the brief and good expedition of the king's cause. So always that it be a thing sure, sufficient, and available to his grace's purpose, that may without any further tract be there had; and then by your wisdom taking unto you the best learned counsel that ye can have there, leave you to the expedition of that which so may be most meet, as the times require and suffer, to the brief furnishing of the king's said cause to this purpose, without tract or delay, and that ye may see is the thing which, as the matter stands, can speedily be obtained and sped, as is aforesaid. For whether the decretal be better than this, or this better than that, or which soever be best, far it shall be from wisdom to stick, and still to rest upon a thing that cannot be obtained; but since ye know the king's meaning, which is to have a way sufficient and good for the speedy finishing of this cause to his grace's purpose, note ye now, and consider with yourself, by advice of learned counsel, as is aforesaid, how ye may bring that to pass, and shall ye deserve as high thanks as can be possible. So always that it be so well provided and looked upon; that in it be no such limitations or defaults, as shall compel us any more to write or send for reformation thereof: and coming to this commission, though percase ye can by no means or sticking have it in every point as the copy, which I send you with the annotations do purport; yet shall ye not therefore refuse it, but take it, or any other thing as can be had, after such form as may substantially serve, and as ye can by your wisdom and good solicitations obtain, for the speedy finishing of the king's cause to his purpose, as is aforesaid, which is the scope wherunto we must tend at this time; and therefore ye be not limited or coacted within any such bounds as ye should thereby be compelled or driven, for lack of obtaining any thing or point mentioned in these or other your instructions, or former writings, to send hither again for further knowledge of the king's pleasure; but ye be put at liberty so to qualify, so to add, detract, immix, change, choose or mend as ye shall think good; so always that ye take the thing that best can be had, being such as may as effectually as ye can bring about, serve to the king's purpose, and to put in delayed end to it, according to his grace's desire, without further tract, or sending thither, which is as much as here can be said or devised. And therefore at the reverence of Almighty God bring us out of this perplexity, that this virtuous prince may have this thing sped to the purpose desired, which shall be the most joyous thing that this day in earth may chance and succeed to my heart; and therefore I eftsoons beseech you to regard it accordingly: howbeit if the pope's holiness refusing all your desires, shall make difficulty and delay therein, it is an evident sign and token that his holiness is neither favourable to the king's reasonable petitions, nor indifferent, but should thereby show himself both partial, and expressly averse unto his grace; wherefore in that case finding in his holiness such unreasonableness, as it can in no wise be thought ye shall do, the king's pleasure is, that ye proceed to the protestations mentioned in the first instructions given to you Mr. Stevins, for you and the residue of your colleagues; and that ye not only be plain and round with the pope's holiness therein, if ye come to his speech, but also ye show and extend unto the cardinals, and other that be your friends, which may do any good with him, the great peril and danger imminent unto the Church and See apostolic; thereby exhorting them that they, like virtuous fathers, have regard thereunto, and not to suffer the pope's holiness, if he would thus wilfully, without reason or discretion to precipitate himself and the said see, which by this refusal is like to suffer ten times more detriment, than it could do for any discontentment that the emperor could take with the contrary: for ye shall say, sure they may be, and so I for my discharge declare, both to the pope's holiness and to them, if this noble and virtuous prince, in this so great and so reasonable a cause, be thus extremely denied of the grace and lawful favour of the church, the pope's holiness shall not fail for the same to lose him and his realm, the French king and his realm, with many other their confederates; besides those that having particular quarrels to the pope, and so aforesaid will not fail, with divers other, as they daily seek occasions, and provoke the king's highness thereunto, which will do the semblable, being a thing of another sort to be regarded, than the respect to the emperor; for two cities, which nevertheless shall be had well enough, and the emperor neither so evil contented, nor so much to be doubted herein, as is there supposed. This, with other words mentioned in your instructions concerning like matter, ye shall declare unto his holiness, and to the said cardinals, and other being your friends, if it come to that point; whereby it is not to be doubted, but they perceiving the dangers aforesaid, shall be glad to exhort and induce his holiness, for the well of himself and the church, to condescend to the king's desire; which is as much as can be here thought or devised, to be by you done in all events and chances: and therefore I pray you, eftsoons, and most instantly require you, as afore, to handle this matter with all effect possible. Coming to this new commission, when you shall have once attained such thing as shall be sufficient for the king's purpose, as is aforesaid; and that ye have it in your hands and custody, and not afore, lest thereby ye might hinder the expedition thereof, ye shall by all ways and means possible, labour and insist, that the king's highness, as need shall be, may use and enjoy the benefit of the decretal, being already in my Lord Cardinal Campegius's hands, whereunto his highness and I desire you to put all your effectual labour for the attaining of the pope's consent thereunto accordingly.

Ye shall furthermore understand, that it is thought here, in case, as God forbid, the pope should die before ye should have impetrate any thing that may serve to the absolution of the king's matter, that the college of cardinals have authority, power, and jurisdiction, sede vacante, to inhibit, avoke, et ex consequenti, to pass and decide the king's matter, seeing that the same is of so high moment and importance, concerning the surety of a prince and his realm, as more amply ye shall perceive in the chapters, ubi Periculum de Electione, ne Romani, de Jurejurando, et capite primo de Scismaticis; wherefore the king's pleasure is, that ye Mr. Stevens shall diligently weigh and ponder the effect of the said chapters, not only with yourself, but also with such the king's learned counsel as ye and your colleagues have conducted there; and what jurisdiction, sede vacante, the college of cardinals have, either by the common law, usage or prescription, which may far better be known there than here: and if ye find that the cardinals have in this the king's cause, and such other like authority and jurisdictions to inhibit, avoke and decern, then, in casu mortis Pontificis, quod Deus avertat, ye shall specially foresee and regard that for none intercession or pursuit made by the emperor and his adherents, they shall either inhibit or avoke: and also if before such death ye shall not have obtained such thing to the king's desire and purpose, as these present letters before do purport, his grace's pleasure is, that ye shall pursue the effectual expedition of the same, at the hands of the said college, sede vacante, ne res quæ nullam dilationem exposcit, tantopere usque ad electionem novi pontificis quoquam modo differatur; using for this purpose all such reasons, allegations, and persuasions mentioned in those letters, and your former instructions, as ye shall see and perceive to serve to that effect; and so to endeavour and acquit yourself, that such things may be attained there, as may absolve this the king's matter, without any further tract or delay; whereby ye shall as afore highly deserve the king's and my special thanks, which shall be so acquitted, as ye shall have cause to think your pains and diligencies therein in the best wise employed, trusting in God that howsoever the world shall come, ye shall by one means or other bring the king's matter, which so highly toucheth his honour and quiet of mind, unto the desired end and perfection.

Finally, ye shall understand that the French king, among other things, doth commit at this time to the bishop of Bayon, and Mr. John Joachim, to treat and conclude the confederation heretofore spoken of, between his holiness and the king's highness, the French king, the Venetians, and other potentates of Italy, for a continual army to be entertained to invade Spain in case it stand by the emperor, that the peace shall not take effect: wherefore the king's pleasure is, that ye having conference with them at good length in that matter, do also for your parts, solicit, procure, and set forth the same; entering also on the king's behalf unto the treaty, and conclusion thereof, after such manner as your former instructions and writings do purport. So as like as the French king is determined, that his agents shall join and concur with you in the king's pursuits and causes; so ye must also concur with them in advancement of their affairs, the successes whereof, and of all other your doings there, it shall be expedient ye more often notify hitherto than ye do, for many times in one whole month no knowledge is had from you, which is not meet in those so weighty matters, specially considering that sometime by such as pass to Lyons, ye might find the means to send your letters, which should be greatly to the king's and my consolation, in hearing thereby from time to time, how the things succeed there; I pray you, therefore to use more diligence therein, as the king's and my special trust is in you. And heartily fare you well. From my palace besides Westminster, the sixth day of April.

The French king hath sent hither an ambassade, Monsieur de Langes, brother to the said bishop of Bayon, with certain clauses in his instructions, concerning the said treaty of confederation, the copy whereof ye shall receive herewith, for your better carrying on that matter. Praying God to speed you well, and to give you grace to make a good and short end in your matters. And eftsoons fare ye well.

Your loving friend,
T. CARDIN. EBORAC.

XXIII.—Another Dispatch to the Ambassadors to the same purpose. A Duplicate.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitel. B. 11.]

RIGHT well, beloved friends, I commend me unto you in my hearty manner, letting you wit, that by the hands of Thadeus bearer hereof, the king's highness hath received your several letters to the same, directed with the pope's pollicitation mentioned in the same, and semblably I have received your conjunct and several letters of the date of the 18th and 29th days of March; the 8th, 19th, 20th, and 22nd of April, to me directed, wherein ye at right good length have made mention of such discourses, conferences, audiences and communications as ye have had concerning your charge, since the time of your former advertisements made in that behalf, with all such answers and replications as have been made unto you by the pope's holiness, and other on his behalf concerning the same. In the circumstances whereof ye have so diligently, discreetly, and substantially, acquitted yourselves, as not only your firm and fervent desire, to do unto the king's highness special and singular service in this his great and weighty cause, but also your wisdom, learning, and perfect dexterities, heretofore well known, hath every one for his part thereby been largely of new shewed, comprobate and declared to the king's good contentment, my rejoice and gladness, and to your great laud and praise. For the which his grace giveth unto you right hearty thanks, and I also for my part do the semblable; assuring you, in few words, though the time and state of things hath not suffered that your desires might at this time be brought unto effect, yet the king's grace well knoweth, perceiveth, and taketh, that more could not have been done, excogitated, or devised, than ye have largely endeavoured yourself unto for conducting the king's purpose, which his grace accepteth, as touching your merits and acquittal in no less good and thankful part, than if ye, finding the disposition of things in more direct state, had consecute all your pursuits and desires: nor ye shall doubt or think, that either the king's highness or I have conceived, or thought any manner negligence in you for such things as were mentioned, in the last letters sent unto you by Alexander, Messenger; but that albeit his highness had cause, as the same wrote, to marvel of your long demor, and lack of expedition of one or other of the things committed to your charge; yet did his highness right well persuade unto himself the default not to be in you, but in some other cause, whereof his grace not knowing the same, might justly and meritoriously be brought unto admiration, and marvel: and therefore be ye all of good comfort, and think your perfect endeavours used, and services done, to be employed there, as it can right well, in every part regarded and considered.

In effect coming to the specialities of the things now to be answered, the king's highness having groundly noted and considered the whole continue and circumstances of all your said letters and advertisements, findeth and perceiveth evidently, that whatsoever pursuits, and instances, and requests have been, or shall be for this present time, made there by you on his grace's behalf to the pope's holiness, for the furtherance of the said great and weighty cause; and how much soever the necessity of Christendom for the good of peace, the importance of the matter, the justness of the thing itself, reason, duty, respect to good merits, detecting of falsities used, evident arguments and presumptions to the same, or other thing whatsoever it be, making for the king's purpose, do weigh; the times be now such, as all that shall be done in any of the premises there, is apparent by such privy intelligence and promise as is between the pope and the emperor, to hang and depend upon the emperor's will, pleasure, and arbitre, as whom the pope's holiness neither dare nor will in any part displease, offend, or miscontent, nor do by himself anything notable therein, which he shall think or suppose to be of moment, the said emperor first inconsulted, or not consenting thereunto. And for that cause, since the emperor not only is the adversary of universal peace, letter, and impeacher thereof, but also, as hath appeared by sundry letters heretofore, and now of new sent out of Spain, doth show himself adverse, and enterponing himself as a party against the king's said great matter; it were in manner all one to prosecute the same at the emperor's hands, as at the pope's, which so totally dependeth upon the emperor; and as much fruit might be hoped of the one as of the other, so as far discrepant it were from any wisdom in a thing so necessary, and which as ye know must needs be brought unto an end without any farther delay, to consume and spend the time, where such express contrariety and in manner despair appeareth to do good therein, and where should be none other but continual craft, colour, abuses, refuses and delays, but rather to proceed unto the same in place, and after such form as may be an appearance of some good and brief effect to ensue. Wherefore to show you in counsel, and to be reserved unto yourselves, the king's highness finding this ingratitude in the pope's holiness, is minded for the time to dissemble the matter, and taking as much as may be had and attained there to the benefit of his cause, to proceed in the decision of the same here, by virtue of the commission already granted unto me and my lord, legate Campegius.

And for because that ye Mr. Stevins be largely ripened and acquainted in this matter, and that both the king's highness and I have right large experience of your entire zeal and mind to the studying and setting forth of such things concerning the law, as may be to the furtherance hereof; considering also that for any great thing like to be done there herein, such personages as be of good authority, wisdom, and experience, though they be not learned in the law, may with such counsel as ye have retained there, right well serve to the accomplishment of such other things as shall occur, or be committed unto them on the king's behalf, though so many ambassadors do not there remain and continue: his grace therefore willing and minding to revoke you all by little and little, except you sir Gregory being his Ambassador there continually residing, willetth, that after such things perfected and done, as hereafter shall be mentioned, ye Mr. Stevins, and you Sir Francis Brian, shall take your leave of the pope's holiness, and with diligence return home. For if ne had been the absence of you Mr. Stevins, seeing that there is small appearance of any fruit to be obtained there, the king's highness would have entered into process here before this Whitsuntide: But because his grace would have you here present, as well for the forming of the said process, and for such things as be trusted that ye shall obtain and bring with you, as also for the better knowledge to be had in sundry matters, wherein you may be the better ripened and informed by means of your being in that court: and otherwise his highness will somewhat the longer defer the commencement of the said process, and respite the same, only for your coming; which his grace therefore desireth you so much the more to accelerate, as ye know how necessary it is, that all diligence and expedition be used in that matter. And so ye all to handle and endeavour yourselves there, for the time of your demor, as ye may do the most benefit and advantage that may be to the speedy furtherance of the said cause.

And forasmuch as at the dispatch of your said last letters, ye had not opened unto the pope's holiness, the last and uttermost device here conceived, and to you written in my letters sent by the said Alexander, but that ye intended, as soon as ye might have time and access, to set forth the same; wherein it is to be trusted, since that thing could by no colour or respect to the emperor be reasonably denied, ye have before this time done some good, and brought unto perfection; I therefore remitting you to such instructions as ye received at that time, advertise you that the king's mind and pleasure is, ye do your best to attain the ampliation of the said commission, after such form as is to you in the said last letters and instructions prescribed; which if ye cannot in everything bring to pass, at the least to obtain as much to the king's purpose, and the benefit of the cause as ye can; wherein all good policy and dexterity is to be used, and the pope's holiness by all persuasions to be induced thereunto; showing unto the same how ye have received letters from the king's highness and me, responsive to such as ye wrote of the dates before rehearsed; whereby ye be advertised that the king's highness, perceiving the pope's strange demeanour in this his great and weighty cause, with the little respect that his holiness hath, either to the importance thereof, or to do unto his holiness at this his great necessity, gratuity and pleasure; not only cannot be a little sorry and heavy to see himself frustrate of the future hope and expectation that his grace had, to have found the pope's holiness a most loving, fast, near and kind father, and assured friend, ready and glad to have done for his grace, that which of his power, ordinary or absolute, he might have done in this thing, which so near toucheth the king's conscience, health, succession, realm, and subjects; but also marvelleth highly, that his holiness, both in matters of peace, truce, in this the king's cause, and in all other, hath more respect to please and content him of whom he hath received most displeasures, and who studieth nothing more than the detriment of the see, than his holiness hath either to do that which a good common father, for the weal of the church, himself, and all Christendom, is bounden and oweth to do, or also that which, everything well pondered, it were both of congruence, right, truth, equity, wisdom, and conveniency for to do. Thinking verily that his highness deserved to be far otherwise entreated, and that not at his most need in things nearest touching his grace, and where the same had his chief and principal confidence, thus to have his just and reasonable petitions rejected and totally to be converted, to the arbitre of his enemy; which is not the way to win, acquire and conserve friends to the pope's holiness and see apostolic, nor that which a good and indifferent vicar of Jesus Christ, and common father unto all princes, oweth and is bound to observe. Nevertheless ye shall say the king's highness, who always hath showed, and largely comprobate himself a most devout son unto the see apostolic, must and will take patience; and shall pray to God to put in the pope's mind a more direct and virtuous intent, so to proceed in his acts and doing, as he may be found a very father, upright, indifferent, loving, and kind; and not thus for partial respect, fear, or other inordinate affection, or cause, to degenerate from his best children, showing himself unto them as a step-father, nor the king's highness ye shall say can persuade unto himself, that the pope's holiness is of that nature and disposition, that he will so totally fail his grace in this matter of so high importance, but that by one good mean or other, his holiness will perfectly comprobate the entire love that always the same hath showed to bear towards his highness, wherein ye shall desire him now to declare by his acts the uttermost of his intent and disposition: so as ye Mr. Stevins and Mr. Brian, who be revoked home, do not return with void hands, or bring with you things of such meagreness, or little substance, as shall be to no purpose: and thus by these, or like words, seconding to the same effect, which as the time shall require, and as he shall have cause, ye by your wisdoms can qualify and devise, it is not to be doubted, but that the pope's holiness perceiving how the king's highness taketh this matter, and that two of you shall now return, will in expedition of the said ampliation of the commission, and other things requisite, strain himself to do unto the king's highness as much gratuity and pleasure as may be; for the better attaining whereof, ye shall also show, how heavy and sorry I with my lord legate Campegius be, to see this manner of proceeding, and the large promises which he and I so often have made unto the king's highness, of the pope's fast and assured mind, to do all that his holiness, etiam ex plenitudine potestatis, might do, thus to be disappointed: most humbly beseeching his holiness on my behalf, by his high wisdom to consider what a prince this is; the infinite and excellent gratitudes which the same hath exhibited to the pope's person in particular, and to the see apostolic in the general; the magnitude and importance of this cause, with the consequences that may follow, by the good or ill entreating of the king's highness in the same; wherein ye shall say, I have so largely written, so plainly for my discharge declared the truth unto his holiness, and so humbly, reverently, and devoutly, made intercession, that more can I not add or accumulate thereunto, but only pray unto God that the same may be perceived, understood, and taken, as the exigence of the case and the merits of this noble prince doth require; trusting always and with fervent desire, from day to day, abiding to hear from his said holiness some such thing as I shall now be able constantly to justify and defend, the great things which I and my said lord legate have said and attested on his holiness' behalf.

This, with all other such matter as may serve to the purpose, ye shall extend as well as ye can, and by that means get and attain as much to your purpose for the corroboration and surety of all things to be done here as is possible, leaving to speak any more, or also to take or admit any rescripts for exhibition of the brief, advocacy of the cause, or other of the former degrees, seeing that all which shall or can be done or attained there, shall hang merely upon the emperor's will, consent, and arbitre: and therefore nothing is now or hereafter to be procured, that may tend to any act to be done, in decision of the cause or otherwise there, or which may bring the adverse party to any advantage to be taken by the favour or partiality, that the same may have in that court; but to convert and employ all your suit to that thing which may be to the most convalidation and surety of the process, and things to be done here, as well by attaining, as ample, large, and sufficient words, clauses, and sentences as ye can get, for ampliation of the new commission.

As for the defeating of anything that may be procured to the impeachment of the process thereof, and the corroboration of the things to be passed, and done, by virtue of the same. And amongst other things, whereas ye with these last letters, sent the pope's pollicitation, for the non-inhibition or avoking of the cause, the ratifying and confirming of the sentence by us his legates herein to be given, and other things mentioned in the same, ye shall understand, that the said pollicitation is so couched and qualified, as the pope's holiness whensoever he will may resile; like as by certain lines and annotations, which in the margin of a copy of the said pollicitation I send you herewith, ye shall perceive more at large: and therefore after your other suits, for the ampliation of the new commission, if any such may be attained, brought unto as good a purpose as ye can, ye shall by some good way find the mean to attain a new pollicitation, with such, or as many of the words and additions newly devised as ye can get; which ye may do under this form and colour, that is to say, to show unto the pope's holiness, by way of sorrow and dolence, how your courier, to whom ye committed the conveyance of the said pollicitation, so chanced, in wet and water in the carriage thereof, as the packet wherein it was, with such letters as were with the same, and amongst other the rescripts of pollicitation, were totally wet, defaced, and not legible; so as the packet and rescript was and is detained by him to whom ye direct your letters, and not delivered amongst the other unto the king's hands; and unless his holiness, of his goodness unto you, will grant you a double of the said pollicitation, ye see not but there shall be some notable blame imputed unto you for not better ordering thereof, to the conservation of it from such chance. And thus coming to a new pollicitation, and saying, ye will devise it as near as ye can remember, according to the former, ye by your wisdoms, and namely ye Mr. Stevins, may find the means to get as many of the new and other pregnant, fat, and available words as is possible, the same signed and sealed as the other is, to be written in parchment; the politic handling whereof, the king's highness and I commit unto your good discretions; for therein, as ye Mr. Stevins know, standeth a great strength and corroboration of all that shall be done there, in decision of the king's said cause; and as ye write, may be in manner as beneficial to the king's purpose, as the commission decretal.

And to the intent ye may the better know how to proceed in this business, I advertise you that the king's highness hath now received fresh letters out of Spain, answering to those sent by Curson jointly with a servant of the queen's, for exhibition of the original brief here, of whose expedition you, Mr. Stevins, were privy before your departure. The letters were of sundry dates, the last whereof is the 21st of April, at which time the emperor was at Cæsar Augusta, upon his departure towards Barcelona. In effect, the emperor minding by his departure thither, and other his acts, to make a great demonstration of his coming into Italy, who is to nothing, as the king's ambassadors write, more unmeet and unfurnished than to that voyage, not having any galleys there but three, which lay on dry land unrigged, as they have done a long time past, none assembly of the states of that land, none order, provision of victual, towardness in conscription of men-of-war, or appearance of such thing; but that his going to Barcelona is chiefly under pretext to attain certain old treasure there remaining, and to give the better reputation to his affairs in Italy. As to the matter of peace and truce, he seemeth not so alien from it but that he would, under colour thereof, be glad to separate and disjoin other from the sincerity of confidence that is between them, working somewhat with the French king, which he himself confesseth to be but abuses. On the other side, he maketh overture of peace or truce to be had with the king's highness apart; and in the mean time entertaineth the pope's holiness as one whom, won from the residue of the confederates, he thinketh himself most assured of. Howbeit, in all this his business, ye may constantly affirm, that his compasses cannot prevail in anything that may be excogitate to the separation of the king's highness and the French king, who so entirely proceed together, that the emperor coming or not coming into Italy, the said French king intendeth to prosecute him in the place where his person shall be. To whom the king's highness now sendeth the duke of Suffolk, with the treasurer of his honourable household; who, if the pope will not really and actually intend to the maintaining of the peace, coming to the convention of his holiness, moved as the case shall require, shall be furnished of a substantial number of men-of-war out of his realm to the assistance of the said French king, if the emperor happen to descend in Italy. So, as his things there be not like to be in such surety as might bring the pope's holiness to this extremity of fear and respect. And all the premises touching this knowledge had out of Spain, and the French king's interest with the king's concurrence, as afore; it shall be well done ye declare to the pope's holiness, whereby, peradventure, the same shall be removed from some part of his said overmuch respect to that part.

As to sending of the brief, the emperor refusing to send it into England, showeth some towardness of sending it to Rome, minding and intending to have the king's matter decided there and not here; howbeit, all be but vain collusions. For, as ye shall perceive by such things as be extracted out of the letters of the king's orators resident in Spain, a copy whereof I send you herewith, the more the said breve cometh into light and knowledge, the more falsities be deprehended therein; and, amongst other, one there is specially to be noted, making, if it be true, a clearer and manifest proof of the same falsity; which—because if it were perceived by the adverse party, or any of their friends, counsellors or adherents, it might soon by a semblable falsity be reformed,—is above all other things to be kept secret, both from the pope and all other there, except to yourselves: for in computation of the year of our Lord is a diverse order observed in the court of Rome in bulls and breves: that is to say, in the bull beginning at the Incarnation of our Lord, in the brief at the Nativity; so, as the thing well searched, it is thought it shall be found, that the date presupposed to be of the breve, which is 26th Decemb., Anno Dom. 1503, Pontificatus Julii anno primo, well conferred with the manner and usages of that court: he that counterfeited the breve, not knowing such diversity between the date of the bull and breves, and thinking to make both dates of one day, dated the breve at a day before pope Julius was pope; which ye shall more plainly perceive by the said copy, and specially if under some good colour ye ripen yourselves there, whether the year in the date of breves change upon Christmas-day or upon New-year's day, wherein the king's pleasure is, that ye ensearch and certify here what ye shall know and perceive. And if ye shall by such inquiry find matter making to the purpose, as it is not doubted but ye shall do, then for the more sure justification and proof thereof before the judges, it shall be expedient ye in writing make mention of such a doubt, finding the means that it may be answered and declared in the same writing, by certain expert persons of the secretaries, and other officers of that court, with subscription of their answer and names; whereby it may appear here before us as judges, as a thing true and approved: howbeit, great dexterity is to be used for the secrecy thereof; for if such exceptions might come to the knowledge of the adverse party, they might, as the said orators write, soon reform that default by detraing one letter, or title, or forging a new brief, alleging error in the transumpt, which might be the total disappointment of deprehension of the falsity in that chief and principal point. I pray you therefore to regard that matter substantially, and to order it by your good wisdoms accordingly.

XXIV.—The two Legates' Letter to the Pope, advising a Decretal Bull. A Duplicate.

[Cotton. Libr. Vite. B. 11.]

PRIORIBUS nostris ad Sanctitatem Vestram literis quid hic ageremus, quove in statu causa hæc esset exposuimus; postea quum, et res ipsa, et desiderium Regis admodum urgeret, ut ad Causæ ipsius merita agnoscenda accingeremur, quando in suspensio, non modo horum Regum vota, sed nec hujus Regni firmandi ratio, diutius haberi potest, omni suasionis genere horum animis prius adhibito, ut alterius voluntati alter cederet, eique morem gererent, cum nihil profecerimus, ad Judicii institutionem accedentes, de modo causam ipsam pertractandi, multa longioribus colloquiis inter nos commentati sumus; qua in re, dum quæ necessaria sunt adornantur, exhibitum est per Reginam exemplum Brevis Julii 2. eodem tempore quo et Bulla super hac materia, dati et scripti, sed attentiore cura et longe consideratiore mente confecti, quod, quia in substantialibus etiam ab ipsa Bulla diversum est, non modo Regium, sed nostrum quoque; animum, mire suspensum habuit, usque adeo ut de ejus veritate plurimum suspicari libeat; nam præter insperatam in tanta opportunitate ejus apparitionem, incredibile videtur, ut eodem tempore idem author, eisdem partibus, in eadem Causa, diversa admodum ratione caverit, et permansuro Diplomati ejusque Decreto, ad perpetuam rei memoriam, proferendo, et plumbeo caractere excudendo dormitaverit, brevioribus vero literis, molli cera communiendis exactissimi studii et sobriæ cogitationis speciem impresserit: ne tamen Majestatis hæc rem hanc damnatam priusquam exploratam habeat, quippe quæ magis in veritate quam in voto suo, Causæ hujus eventum sus-ceptura videtur, ad ipsius Brevis exhibitionem instat, quod, quia honestum et rationi consonum videtur, a nobis etiam probatur, propterea omni studio curamus, ut Breve ipsum, quod in Hispaniis esse dicitur, et a quo exemplum hoc effigiatum aiunt proferatur; atque ut hoc expeditior cura, et majore compendio assequamur, præter primam et summam illam de Causa cognoscendi potestatem, quam a Sanctitate Vestra habemus, aliam quoque ad hunc specialiter articulum habendam putamus, per quam possimus etiam per censuras, omnes etiam Regia et Imperiali Autoritate fulgentes, monere et adigere ut dictum Breve nobis exhibeant, sine quo causa hæc nedum absolvi, sed nec commode tractari queat. Atque hoc primum est, quod Majestas hæc, in tanta animi fluctuatione qua nunc æstuat, a nobis curandum putat, quo impetrato, Judicii via insistentes ad Causæ cognitionem procedemus; quod si non proferatur, vel inutile et vitiatum, et fide sua facile rejiciendum, prolatum fuerit, nihil prohibebit, hoc sublato obice, quin ex officio nostro reliqua prosequamur: sin vero exhibeatur, et veritate sua, vel adeo scite conficta fallacia, ita se tueatur ut acriori examine id inquiri debeat, patefacto jam patronorum cavillis et calumniis foro, quibus undis et iudicii fluctibus non solum articulum hunc Brevis, sed universam Causam implicaturi simus, nullus non videbit; neque enim deerunt quæ suspectam ipsius Brevis fidem faciant, vel ex hoc maxime, quod cum maxime Regis et Regni hujus intersit, nihil prorsus de eo antehac auditum fuerit, nec ejus memoria aut ratio ulla extet in Scriptis Regiis, in quibus etiam minima quæque ad Regnum spectantia asservari solent: nam verisimile non est in Hispaniis majorem Anglicæ rei curam fuisse quam in ipsa Anglia, neque quempiam solerti et acri adeo ingenio fuisse, qui hujuscemodi dissidium vigesimo quinto ab hinc anno suboriturum, et hac sola ratione sublato iri posse divinaverit, nulla ut diximus apud hunc Regem, et in hoc Regno talis rei memoria extante. Porro si ex Brevis ad Bullam, et ex Bulla ad Breve transitus fiat, atque illius jejunitatem et ariditatem insectemur, hujus prægnantia verba, et ad omnes fere exceptiones tollendas, supersticiosam quodammodo vigilantiam conferamus, et quæ utrinque deduci poterunt in Rescriptis Apostolicis æquo animo audiamus, periculatiori certe sumus, ne, quod minime cupimus, Sedis Apostolicæ Authoritatem patientia nostra in discrimen rapiamus, atque dum Regno, et Regi hinc suppetias ferre volumus, rem dignitatemque nostram multo minorem faciamus, cui tum posita etiam anima, favere et adesse semper cupimus et debemus. Propterea, Beatissime Pater, non solum pro Regis et Causæ hujus commodo, sed pro dignitate quoque Ecclesiastica et Sanctitatis Vestræ Autoritate licet tuenda et conservanda, nullo pacto committendum ducimus, ut nobis spectantibus et audientibus, de Potestate Romani Pontificis, de literarum Apostolicarum sub plumbo et sub annulo scriptarum fide, et repugnantia, deque juris divini abrogatione disceptetur, maxime in Regum causa oppugnanda et defendenda, qui, ut sublimiore sunt fastigio collocati, ita iniquiori animo patiuntur Causæ suæ casum, cum qua et dignitatem et existimationem suam diminutam iri intelligunt, quæ si ignobilium etiam animos quosque exulcerare, ipsa rerum experientia docti cernimus, qualiter quæso putamus Regios et generosos affectura. Itaque quoniam hanc Carybdim et hos scopulos evitasse semper tutum erit, propterea hujusmodi incommoda quodammodo prætervecti, ubi ad litis molestias et incertas fori fluctuationes causam deducendam perspicimus, suadere, rogare et summis precibus pari; reverentia contendere non desinemus, ut si exhibitio Brevis pura veritas ita latitaverit, quod rectamque an falsum, vitiatum ceu adulterinum fuerit judicare ac decernere minime valeamus, Sanctitas

Vestra Causam hanc ad se avocet, non solum ut tanto discrimine, et perplexitate nos eximât, sed ut paterno affectu Causæ et Regi huic optimo subveniat et operam ferat, atque ex Potestatis suæ plenitudine et summa prudentia finem huic rei optatum imponat, quæ non sine magno hujus Regni et Ecclesiasticæ dignitatis periculo diutius trahi potest: Speramus autem Serenissimū hunc Regem in hujusmodi avocandæ Causæ consilio facile quieturum, salebrosa hæc litium itinera et labirinthos evitaturum, modo in fide Sanctitatis Vestræ chyrographo manus suæ testata, cognoverit, se diutius suspensio in hac re animo detinendum non fore, atque ab hujusmodi Matrimonio se tandem liberandum, in quo nec humano nec divino jure permanere se posse putat, ex causis Sanctitatis Vestræ forsitan notis, et per hos suos nuntios longioribus verbis explicandis. Quod si Sanctitas Vestra commodius existimaverit, Avocatione hujusmodi posthabita, per Decretalis unius concessionem huic causæ occurri et succurri posse, in hanc quoque rationem Regis animum paratum dabimus; et propterea concepto quodam Decretalis modulo, cum per hos ipsos Majestatis suæ nuntios mittimus, ex quibus abunde intelligit, quodque non absque exemplo istiusmodi auxilia proponantur, et quam non temere nec absque ratione Majestas hæc desiderio huic suo in hæret: interea vero, dum hac vel illa ratione huic rei occurritur et Breve ipsum perquiretur, posset utique Sanctitas Vestra iterum Regiæ animum tentare, et ad Religionem emollire, curando (ut quod maxime apud eam gratia et Autoritate esse debeant) et literis, et precibus, et nuntiis, omnique alia ratione, hac ipsa via, sibi, suisque rebus omnibus, atque aliis optime consulat. Cujusmodi multa, pro salute Regni et publica cum dignitate, tum tranquillitate animo agitamur, ut tandem optimo Regi presidio simus, qui incredibili patientia et humanitate, nostram et Sanctitatis Vestræ opem expectat, sed tanta obsessus cura, sollicitudine et anxietate, ut nullus facile explicare possit, vix enim in hoc ipso, oculis et auribus nostris credimus; cujus usque adeo nos miseret, ut nihil ingrato magis animo audiamus quam ejus de hac re verba, querelas et cruciatum: jure, an injuria liceat nobis hoc, Beatissime Pater, cum Sanctitate Vestra tacere, ne præjudicium nobis aut aliis faciamus, sed quem non excitet tot annorum Conscientiæ Carnificina, quam ut transversum et modo in has et modo in illas partes agant Theologorum disputationes, et Patrum decreta, nullus non videt; qua in re enucleanda ita ambiguo laboratur sensu, ut jam non doctioris sed melioris hominis lumine et pietate egeamus, et propterea factum est ut cum ab utraque parte stant assertores maximi, in illam magis Majestas sua inclinat, quæ ab offensionibus et periculis magis remota videtur. Quem præterea non moveat dulcis illa insitaque sobolis successio, in qua morientes et animam exhalaturi conquiescere, natura ipsa, videmur omnes? quem insuper non accendat, Regni atque imperii propagatio, et per solos liberos continuata quedam fructio? quem denique populorum fidei ac ejus curæ commissorum tranquillitas et securitas, quæ in designatis jam regibus et principibus nutritur et vivit, non sollicitet? ita ut tanti adeoque; communis boni fundamenta nulla a se jacta, non doleat et suspiret, cum in extremis ejus diebus, extrema quoque tempora eis adventare sentiat, atque secum omnia quodammodo in ruinam trahi? Majores habet, Beatissime Pater, Causa hæc anfractus et difficultates, quam superficie tenus inspectantibus offerantur, in qua vel hæc Beatissime sunt quod nec moram patitur, et in alteram partem non inclinat quidem, sed omnino cogit, ni velimus ab ea præcipites et maxima cum privata tum publicæ rei jactura cadere; nam qui vel Regiæ odio, vel sperate, nec dum forsitan note, futuræ conjugis illecebra et titillatione Regem agi.

putant, ii excordes plane et toto, quod aiunt, cœlo errare videntur: at enim credere dignum est, nullis illius quamlibet duris moribus aut injocunda consuetudine, vel ulterioris sobolis spe desperata, Regium animum tanto periculo ad odium impelli posse; ita nec in hominis bene sani mente cadere debet, Regem hunc imbecillo adeo esse animo, ut sensuum suadela eam abrupterem cupiat consuetudinem, in qua adolescentiæ suæ florentes annos exegerit persancte adeo, ut in hac quoque fluctuatione, non sine reverentia et honore versetur. Inest, credite omnes, voluntati ejus non modo divinæ legis timor, sed humani quoque juris ratio eximia, hæcque non privata sed publica, ad quam cum ejus animum trahant, utriusque juris peritissimi, et Regni hujus sui proceres, et primates omnes, nihil tamen suo, aut suorum tantum arbitrio constitutum habere cupit, sed Apostolicæ Sedis judicio; qua in re quanta sit pietate, maxime ostendit, quum non ex majorum carminibus, et circulatorum imposturis, aliisve malis artibus, sed Sanctissima Pontificis manu, tanto huic vulnere suo opem petat, de quo vel plura forte quam licuisset Sanctitati Vestræ subjecimus, quoniam hæc ipsa ulcera manibus nostris contractavimus, et quantum vitales spiritus exhalent cognovimus: proinde Sanctitas Vestra, pii patris et peritissimi medici more, dum virtus adhuc stat, dum salus non desperatur, dum æger ipse sese sustinet et legitima petit auxilia, Regem de se et Apostolica sede optime meritum in pietatis suæ sinu foveat, illudque ei indulgeat quod nec disputationum immortalia dissidia, nec litium immensum chaos unquam dabit, nec sine maximo discrimine unquam tractabitur; atque illud etiam secum reputet, quum injurium, et cum privatis tum publicis rebus incommodum sit, extremos juris apices consecrari, quanquam non expediat ex scripto jure semper judicari; cui, quia Pontifices et Principes miro omnium consensu, a Deo ipso præfecti, censentur Spiritus et animæ vice, merito in ambiguis, et ubi multa periclitatur hominum salus, arbitrio suo ejus dritiem moderari possunt et debent, in quo Sanctitas Vestra et Regem et Regnum hoc plane servaverit. Quod si alia ratione vel aliunde paranda sibi fuerint auxilia, veremur ne de Regno et Rege hoc actum sit, quicquid enim alia manu huic vulnere impositum fuerit, nihil minus faciet quam sanitatem, seditionibus enim et tumultibus omnia exponentur, atque imprimis Ecclesiastica Dignitas et Apostolicæ Sedis Authoritas hinc deturbabitur; quod non erit difficile, aut ingratum quibusdam, qui Rege cum Sanctitate Vestra nunc conjunctissimo, impietatis suæ venenum perbelle dissimulant; Cujusmodi jacturam si dura hæc tempora nostra fecerunt, quod deinde sperandum sit, non videmus. Conservandus itaque Rex est, ejusque eximia in Apostolicam Sedem voluntas et fides, ne eo a nobis abalienato, non modo Angliæ Regem, sed Fidei quoque Defensorem amittamus, cujus virtutes et Religionem tanto plausu orbi commendavimus. Brevitati studentes multa præterimus, et præsertim quid Regni proceres, Nobiles æque atque ignobiles dicant, qui fremunt et acerbissime indignantur, ac tandem suspensus haberi, atque ab aliorum nutu et voluntate expectare, quid de fortunis eorum omnibus et capitibus statuatur, aut decernatur: atque hæc potissimum via insistunt, qui nullum aut certe diminutum hic Romani Pontificis Authoritatem vellent, quorum plerique in his disceptationibus, quibus alter alteri, ut usu venire solet, re in ambiguo posita, adversatur, et dicunt quæ non absque horrore referri queant: nam inter cætera illud maxime in ore obvium habent, et prædicant, se nunquam satis demirari, aut ridere posse quorundam ignaviam, qui patienter audiunt, Pontificibus in Jure Divino figendo et refigendo licere, Pontifici Pontificis oerum aut plumbum conflare non permitti; nos, ut hos scopulos et has syrtes evitemus, nihil non agimus: et ne præceps, huc vel illuc, Rex hic ruat, curamus, quem in officio vix contineri posse confidimus, dum a Sanctitate Vestra his literis rescribatur: quibus si ut speramus et cupimus aliquid rescriptum fuerit, per quod et Regem et horum omnium animos quietiores reddere valeamus, accedet nobis quoque vis aliqua cætera fælicius perficendi; sin minus, omnia in deterius itura non ambigimus. Quæ ut celerius Majestas sua cognoscat præsentem hos nuntios suos per dispositos equos ad Sanctitatem Vestram mittit, ex quorum sermone plura quoque intelligit quam literæ ipsæ commode capere potuerunt. Ignoscat vero Sanctitas Vestra literarumstrarum prolixitatem, quæ tametsi modum excedunt, rei tamen hujus difficultatem et periculum majori ex parte minime attingunt.

Another Dispatch to Rome. An Original.

RIGHT well beloved friends, I commend me unto you in my most hearty manner, by the hands of Alexander, messenger. I have in good diligence received your letters of the 4th of this month; and seemably the king's highness hath received your other letters, sent by the same messenger unto his grace; by tenor whereof it well appeareth, that the king's highness is now frustrate of the good hope and expectation that his grace and seemably I were in of the pope's determination to have done for his highness in this great and weighty cause of matrimony, as his holiness by his chamberlain promised,—not only that which might be done of power ordinary, but also of absolute; and that ye be utterly in despair to consecrate or attain anything to the purpose there, to the benefit of the said cause, with the strange demeanour that hath been used in calling you to make answer why the supplications presented by the emperor's ambassador for advocacy of the cause should not proceed, and how discreetly and substantially ye have answered and ordered yourselves therein; affirming finally, that as to that matter ye think it shall not serve to any purpose, but only to stop your suit in the obtaining of a new commission, and desiring to be ascertained of the king's pleasure touching the protestation mentioned in your instructions, and how the same is meant and understood, with many other things comprised in your said letters, right well and substantially couched and handled; for the which the king's highness giveth you hearty thanks, and I also thank you in most hearty manner for my part.

Ascertaining you, that by Thadeus, courier, upon receipt of your former letters sent by him, who I trust be arrived with you long before this time, I wrote unto you the king's mind and pleasure, as well to forbear any further pursuits of the degrees committed unto your charge, except only the expedition of a new commission and pollicitation mentioned in the same: as also that you Mr. Stevins, and Sir Francis Brian, should return home, like as my said letters purported. And forasmuch as now it appeareth that there is no hope for you to attain the said commission and pollicitation, the king's highness, supposing that ye the said Mr. Stevins and Sir Francis be on your way homeward, and perceiving that it should be necessary for his grace to have there a substantial counsellor of his, well learned in the laws, as well to defend all such things as shall be procured or set forth by the Cæsareans, to the hindrance of the king's cause, as to let and impeach any advocations, inhibitions, or other thing that may be damageable thereunto, hath despatched thither this bearer and Mr. Bennet, who hath commandment to show unto you, and every of you, wheresoever he shall meet with or find you, his whole instructions, by tenor whereof ye shall be advertised of the king's further mind and pleasure in that behalf; wherefore this shall be only to signify unto you, how his highness will that ye now forbear any further pursuit, either for commission, pollicitation, or rescript, to be sent to the emperor for exhibition of the brief, either here or at Rome, but that following in every part the tenor of the said instructions, ye Mr. Stevins and Sir Francis Brian use all the diligence possible in your voyage homeward, and the residue of you to intend to such things as be mentioned in the said instructions; ascertaining you, that whereas ye were in doubt what is meant by the protestation spoken of in my former letters and your instructions, it was none other thing than in the same instructions was plainly specified and declared; that is to say, failing of all your requests and pursuits touching the king's great matter, to have showed unto his holiness the danger that might ensue, by losing the entire favour of this prince, by mean of his so strange and unkind dealing with his grace; howbeit, considering in what state the things now be, and how much the pope's holiness seemeth to be inclined to the emperor's part. And yet, as appeareth both by your letters and by such other knowledge as the king hath, his holiness would gladly conserve the king's love and favour, and is loth to do anything to the prejudice of his cause; it is no time to come to any rigorous or extreme words with his holiness, but in gentle and modest manner to show himself in such words as be mentioned in my said last letters sent by Thadeus; and so without irritation of him, but with conservation of his favour to entertain his holiness in the best manner that may be, without meddling in any other protestation, but only to look what may be done touching such protestations apart, as is mentioned in the said instructions given to Mr. Bennet, which with these letters shall be a sufficient information of you all what to do in the causes to you committed, not doubting but in all other particular suits of bulls, and other things committed unto you, ye, Mr. Stevins and Sir Francis Brian, have or will do your best to bring the same with you; the expedition whereof, if they be not sped already, the king's highness committeth to the wisdoms of such of you as shall fortune to be in the court of Rome at the receipt hereof; wherein, and in all other things, his highness trusteth, and I do the semblable, that ye will order yourselves with all effectual diligence, as the special confidence that is put in you doth appertain.

And forasmuch as the greatest thing that is to be looked unto is the importune suit of the Cæsareans, not only to stop any further things to be granted to the king's highness, but also to revoke the commission given to the lord legate Campegius, and to me, which should be a clear disappointment and frustration of the king's cause; ye shall, therefore, look substantially by all politic means to withstand, that no such thing be granted; assuring the pope and all the cardinals, and such other as have respect to the well of the see apostolic, that if he should do such an high injury to the king and his realm, and an act so contumelious to us his legates, and so contrarious to his faith and promise, he should thereby not fail so highly to irritate the king and all the nobles of this realm, that undoubtedly they should decline from the obedience of the see apostolic, and consequently all other realms should do the semblable, forasmuch as they should find in the head of the same neither justness, uprightness, nor truth; and this shall be necessary, as the case shall require, well to be inculked and put in his head, to the intent his holiness by the same may be preserved from granting, passing, or condescending to any such thing.

After these letters perfected higher, and read unto the king's highness, albeit that mention is made in sundry places heretofore, that as well ye Mr. Stevins and Sir Francis Brian, if ye be not returned from the court of Rome, as also the rest of the king's ambassadors, which at the arrival of Mr. Doctor Bennet shall fortune to be there, shall forbear to make any further means or pursuit for the new commission and pollicitation, but clearly to use silence therein; yet nevertheless regarding, and more profoundly considering the effect of your letters last sent, it doth plainly appear, that though after the overture made to the pope's holiness of the said new commission, the business chanced to be made by the emperor's ambassador, upon preferring a supplication for advocacy of the cause; which thing by your writing Mr. Stevins to Capisuke was well avoided; yet was there none express refusal made by the pope's holiness to condescend unto the said new commission, but order given that you should consult and confer with the cardinal Anconitane and Symonette upon the same; which conference, by mean of the said business, was deferred and disappointed, without any final conclusion or resolution taken thereupon. Wherefore, inasmuch as yet there appeareth none utter despair of obtaining the said new commission and pollicitation, with some more fat, pregnant, and effectual clauses than the other hath; the king's pleasure is, that notwithstanding any words before mentioned, both ye, the said Mr. Stevins and Sir Francis Brian, if ye be not departed from the court of Rome, do for the time of your demur there, which the king's pleasure is, shall not be long, but only for taking of your leave; and also the rest of the king's said orators, after your departure shall, as ye shall see the case require, endeavour yourselves as much as may be, to obtain the said new commission and pollicitation, foreseeing always that you handle the matter after such manner, as thereby the pope be not the rather induced to hearken and incline to any pursuits of the imperialists for advocacy of the cause, which were a total frustration of all the king's intent, but so to use yourselves as ye shall see to be to the benefit, and not to the hindrance thereof: which done, the king's grace doth refer the good handling of this thing to your wisdoms and discretions, neither to leave the pursuit for the said commission and pollicitation, if it may without damage be followed; nor to follow it, if thereby you shall see apparent danger of any such advocacy, or advantage to ensue to the purpose of the imperialists, like as his highness doubteth not, knowing now the king's mind and pleasure, you will with wisdom and dexterity order yourselves herein accordingly.

And furthermore, you shall in anywise dissuade the pope for sending either by his Nuntio, to be sent unto Spain, or otherwise, for the original brief: and if the Nuntio be already passed, having charge to speak for sending the same to the court of Rome, then to find the means that a commandment be by the pope's holiness sent after him, not to make any mention thereof: which done to you, the king's said ambassador shall have a good colour to induce the pope's holiness, saying, as of yourself, that you have well considered your own pursuits for producing the brief at Rome, and because the emperor might per-case think that the pope were about to arect unto him the falsity of the said brief, therefore you can be contented that that matter be put off, and no mention to be made thereof by his Nuntio, or otherwise; whereunto it is not to be doubted but the pope's holiness will have special regard, and facily condescend to your desires in that behalf.

Finally: It appeareth also, by certain your letters sent, as well to the king's highness as to me, that the pope's holiness is much desirous to study and find a mean and way to satisfy the king's highness in this behalf; amongst which one clause in his letters to me is this: Tametsi enim jurisperitorum consilium quaesiverimus, sed nihil reperimus, quod bonis oratoribus simul et iustitiæ ac honori nostro satisfaceret; sed tamen agimus omnia, et tentamus omnes modos Regiæ suæ Serenitati, ac circumspectioni tuæ satisfaciendi. (And it is added in the margin, with Wolsey's hand:

Mi Petre, referas tuis literis pervelim quid tibi et mihi Pontifex dixerit de modis excogitandis, et quomodo subridens dicebat. In nomine Patris, et cetera.)

Wherefore, since his holiness so plainly declared that he seeketh the ways and means to satisfy the king's highness, it shall be in any wise expedient that you, the said orators, perceiving any towardness of advocacy, lay this to the pope's holiness, saying, that that is not the way to satisfy his grace; and yet besides that, by your wisdoms to find the means to understand and know of his holiness what be the ways and means which his holiness hath studied or can study to satisfy the king according to his writing in this behalf, whereof they shall say his grace is glad, and is very desirous to know and understand the same; and as you shall perceive any towardness or untowardness in the pope in that behalf, so to set forth your pursuits to the best purpose accordingly. And thus heartily fare you well. From Richmond, the 21 day of May.

The King's Letter to his Ambassadors, to hinder an Avocation of the Suit. An Original.

BY THE KING.

HENRY REX.

TRUSTY and right well-beloved, we greet you well. Since your departure from hence, we have received sundry your letters to us directed, whereof the last beareth date at Rome, the 4th day of the last month; and have also seen such other as from time to time ye have sent to the most reverend father in God, our most entirely well-beloved counsellor the lord legate, cardinal, archbishop of York, primate of England, and our chancellor: by continue whereof, we have been advertised of the successes, as well of your journey thitherwards, as of such things as ye to that time had done in our causes to you committed; for the which your diligent advertisement, and good acquittal, we give unto you condign thanks: ascertaining you, we do not a little marvel, that in your said last letters you show so much desperation of any great favour to be had at the pope's hand in our said causes; considering that neither ye then had spoken with his holiness in the same, nor by such conferences as ye had had with Mr. Jacobo Salviati, or other on his behalf, we can perceive but all good favour and towardness; though per-case the superiority of the imperials, and the common fame, led you to think the contrary: howbeit as you know no credence is to be given unto such common report, nor we trust the same shall prove more true, than hath done the opinion that was of the lord legate Campegius now here resident, whom we find and certainly know to be of a far other sort in his love and inclination towards us, than was spoken, not having such affection towards the emperor, as in him was suspected. And to be plain with you, if ever he had been of other mind, we have said somewhat to him after such manner as might soon change that intention. So that little faith is to be given to the outward sayings and opinions of such people as measure everything at their pleasure; which we doubt not but ye right wisely do consider, and that ye have before this time, by your diligent solicitation made to speak with the pope's holiness for declaration of your charge, proved the contrary. Whereof we shall be glad and joyous to hear; willing and desiring you therefore, according to the great and special confidence that we have in you, to premit no time in the diligent handling and execution of your said charge, but by one good way or other to find the mean, if you have not already done it, to declare the same unto the pope, wherewith the good advice and address of the bishop of Verone shall, we trust, do you great furtherance; and by whose means, if ye for the pope's extreme debility or sickness might in nowise be often admitted unto his presence, ye may signify unto him at great length our whole mind, desire, and intent, after such form as your instructions and letters given and sent unto you in that behalf do purport: for sure ye may be, it shall highly confer unto the benefit of our causes, that ye have there present one so fast and assured friend unto us, as we trust the bishop of Verone is, who shall be able right largely to countervail, and meet with the malicious practices of the archbishop of Capua, who is thought to be one of the chief authors and contrivers of the falsities, crafts, and abuses, set forth to the hindrance of our said causes; which no man shall more politely and facility deprehend, than the said bishop of Verone may do: and therefore he is by you, with all good means and ways possible, to be entertained; as we doubt not but you will have special eye and regard to the making, winning, and conservation of as many friends to our purpose as ye can possibly obtain; so handling yourself, as now may appear your dexterity and perfect endeavour to conduce, with your diligent labour and policy, our matters to the speedy, undelayed, and desired end and effect, which ye may be sure we shall not put in oblivion, but will have the same in remembrance accordingly. Marvelling nevertheless, that though ye Mr. Stevins could not bring hitherto our great causes to perfection, ye had not in the mean season advertised us what is done touching such bulls as were to be sped for our other particular matters, whereof no mention is made in your said letters; willing and desiring you therefore, by your next letters, to advertise us in what state and train the same be; knowing right well that ye being not only by the former letters and writings, but also by such as be sent unto you, at this time sufficiently and amply instructed of our mind and pleasure, will now so acquit yourself, as shall correspond to the perfect expectation and firm opinion that we have of you, which we shall not fail to have in our tender consideration to your well, as is aforesaid. Ye shall also, in your conferences with the said bishop of Verone, understand and know of him, by what ways and means ye may best further his advancement to the cardinality; exhorting him, for the manifold good effects that thereof may ensue, to conform himself to the acceptation thereof, if it may be obtained; for doubtless his virtue, wisdom, and experience, fidelity, and other great and commendable merits well considered, we think no man more meet at this time to be preferred thereunto than him: and therefore our express mind and pleasure is, that ye do it by all the ways and means to you possible. And finally, we will that ye show unto him how effectually we have written unto you in that behalf, to the intent, being advanced thereunto, he may give us the better thanks, and in every way bear to us the more perfect affection. And by your next letters, we will that ye advertise us what advocates ye have on our part, with their names and qualities; finding the means also, if it be possible, to retain some notable and excellent divine, a frier, or other that may, can, or will firmly stick to our causes, in leaning to that, Quod Pontifex ex Jure Divino non potest dispensare, &c. And of all the successes to advertise us, as our special trust is in you. The King's Letter to his Ambassadors, about his appearance before the Legates. An Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitel. B. 11.]

To our trusty and right well-beloved counsellors, Mr. William Bennet, Doctor of both Laws; Sir Gregory de Cassalis, knight; and Mr. Peter Vannes our Secretary for the Latin Tongue, our Ambassadors, resident in the Court of Rome, and to every of them.

BY THE KING.

HENRY R.

TRUSTY and right well-beloved, we greet you well. By former letters and writings sent to you, sir Gregory and Mr. Peter, with other of your colleagues then being at Rome, and by such conference as was had with you Mr. Benet before your departure, you were advertised in what state then stood our cause and matter of matrimony, and how it was intended that the process of the same should with diligence be commenced before the pope's legates here, being authorized for that purpose. Since that time, ensuing the deliberation taken in that behalf, the said legates, all due ceremonies first observed, have directed citations both to us and to the queen, for our and for her appearing before them the 18th of this month; which appearance was duly on either party kept, performed, and all requisite solemnities accomplished: at which time the queen trusting more in the power of the imperialists, than in any justness of her cause, and thinking of likelyhood, by frustratory allegations and delays, to tract and put over the matter to her advantage, did protest at the said day, putting in libels, recusatories of the judges; and also made a provocation, alledging the cause to be avoked by the pope's holiness, et litis pendentiam coram eodem; desiring to be admitted for probation thereof, and to have a term competent for the same: whereupon day was given by the judges till the 21st of the same month, for declaration of their minds and intentions thereunto; the queen in person, and we by our proctor enjoined to appear the same day, to hear what the said judges should determine in and upon the same. At which time both we and the queen appeared in person; and notwithstanding that the said judges amply and sufficiently declared, as well the sincerity of their minds directly, justly to proceed without favour, dread, affection, or partiality; as also that no such recusation, appellation, or term for proving of litis pendentium, could or might be by them admitted: yet she nevertheless persisting in her former wilfulness, and in her appeal, which also by the said judges was likewise recused: and they minding to proceed further in the cause, the queen would no longer make her abode to hear what the said judges would fully discern, but incontinently departed out of the court; wherefore she was thrice preconisate, and called eftsoons to return and appear; which she refusing to do, was denounced by the judges contumax, and a citation decerned for her appearance on Friday next, to make answer to such articles and positions as should be objected unto her: So as now it is not to be doubted, but that she will use all the ways and means to her possible, to impetrate and attain such things, as well by her own pursute, as by her friends, as may be to the impeachment of the rightful process of this cause, either by advocacy, inhibition, or otherwise: wherefore seeing now in what state this our matter standeth and dependeth, necessary and requisite for the great consequences hanging upon the same, not only for the exoneracion of our conscience, but also for the surety of our succession, and the well of this our realm and people, to be with all celerity perfected and observed. It was thought convenient to advertise you of the premisses, to the intent ye being well and sufficiently instructed in all things concerning the same, shall by your wisdoms and diligences have special regard that nothing pass or be granted there by the pope's holiness, which may either give delay or disappointment to the direct and speedy process to be used in this cause, neither by advocacy of the cause, inhibition, or otherwise; but that if any such thing shall, by the Cæsareans, or by her agents, or other, be attempted, or desired, the like men of wisdom, good zeal, learning, and experience, diligently procure the stopping thereof, as well upon such reasons and considerations as before have been signified unto you, as by inferring the high and extream dishonour, and intolerable prejudice that the pope's holiness thereof should do to his said legates; and also the contrariety both of his bull and commission, and also of his promise and pollicitacion passed upon the same; beside the notable and excellent displeasure thereby to be done by his holiness to us, and our realm, clear contrary to our merits and deserts; extending also the other dangers mentioned in the said former writings, apparent to ensue thereby to his holiness, and the see apostolic, with the manifold, and in manner, infinite inconveniences like to follow of the same to all Christendom, and all other such reasons, introductions and persuasions ye can make and devise for that purpose: putting him also in remembrance of the great commodity coming unto his holiness herein, by reason that this cause being here decided, the pope not only is delivered from the pains that he should in this time of disease and sickness, to the extreme peril of his life, sustain with the same, seeing that it is of such moment and importance, as suffereth no tract or delay; but also his holiness shall by such decision here eschew and avoid all displeasure that he should not fail to have, if it were or should be passed elsewhere: which matter is no little wisdom well to foresee and consider, and not only to forbear to do or pass anything derogatory or prejudicial to his said commission, but also by all means possible to corroborate and fortify the same, and all such acts judicial as shall pass by his said legates by virtue thereof. Like as we doubt not but that the pope's holiness, of his uprightness, virtue, and perfect wisdom will do; and rather, like a most loving father and friend, tender and favour our good, just and reasonable causes and desires, putting thereunto all the furtherance he may do, than to do or consent to be done anything hurtful, prejudicial, damageable, or displeasent unto us, or this our said cause. And finally; if need shall be we will ye also infer, as the case shall require, how inconvenient it were this our matter should be decided in the court of Rome; which now dependeth totally in the emperor's arbitre, having such puissance near thereunto, that, as hath been written by the pope's own letters, their state and life there is all in the emperor's hands, whose armies may famish or relieve them at their pleasure. And seemably ye shall not forget the prerogative of our crown and jurisdiction royal, by the ancient laws of our realm, which admitteth nothing to be done by the pope to the prejudice thereof, and also what danger they should incur that would presume to bring or present any such thing unto the same, as in our last letters sent by Alexander was touched at good length. Wherein since ye be already so well and amply instructed, knowing also how much the matter imports and toucheth us, and what profit and agreeable service ye may do unto us herein, with the high thanks that ye may deserve for the same; we shall not be more prolix, but refer the substantial, perfect, and assured handling hereof to your circumspections, fidelities, and diligences, not doubting but that ye will now, above all other things, look vigilantly hereunto, and so acquit yourselves in the same, as it may well appear that your acts shall be correspondent to our firm trust and expectation, and no less tender this thing than ye know it to be imprinted in the bottom of our heart, nor then as ye know both the importance and high moment, and also the very necessity of the matter doth require. In which doing, beside the laud and praise that ye shall consecrate thereby of all good men, we shall so have your acquittals in our remembrance, as ye shall have cause to think your travels, pains, and studies herein, in the best wise collocate and employed. Given under our signet, at our palace of Bridewell, the 23d day of June.

Doctor Bennet's Letter to the Cardinal, showing how little they might expect from the Pope. An Original.

PLEASE it your grace to understand, that the 6th day of this month the pope's holiness sent for us: albeit we had made great suit for audience before to his holiness, soon after that we had understanding that his holiness was recovered of this his last sickness, into the which he fell the second day after I had my first audience of his holiness, which was the 21 day of the last month: and after our long communication and reasoning in the king's highness' cause, which at length we have written to your grace in our common letter, for a confirmation of many inconveniences and dangers which we persuaded to his holiness, to follow both to himself and to the see apostolic, in case his holiness should avoke the cause; I thought much convenient at that same time to deliver the king's familiar and likewise your grace's letter, and so to show your grace's credence to his holiness. After the foresaid letters delivered, and by his holiness read, his holiness showed me, that he perceived by your grace's letters, that I had certain credence to show unto him of great moment and importance, concerning him and the see apostolic. I showed to his holiness your grace's faith and observance, his holiness doth best know; most humbly besought his holiness to believe these undoubtedly to follow. That if his holiness should, at the labours of the Cæsareans, avoke the cause, he should not alone offend the king's highness, which hitherto hath been a stay, a help, and a defence of the see apostolic; but also by reason of this injury, without remedy, shall alienate his majesty and realms, with others, from the devotion and obedience of the see apostolic. This I showed his holiness, that your grace doth evidently perceive to follow, in case his holiness should incline to the Cæsareans' desire on this behalf: yea further, I said, that your grace most clearly perceiveth also by that act, the church of England utterly to be destroyed, and likewise your person; and that these your grace, with weeping tears, most lamentably committed unto me to show to his holiness. Furthermore I showed to his holiness that your grace, howsoever you should proceed in this cause, did intend to proceed so sincerely, indifferently, and justly, that you would rather suffer to be jointed, joint by joint, than, either for affection or fear, do any act either against your conscience or justice. Furthermore I said, that seeing his holiness may be so well assured, that your grace will do nothing but according to justice in this cause, he may the more boldly deny avocations to the Cæsareans, seeing that the queen and the emperor can desire but justice, which they may have at your grace's hand, and my lord Campegius, as well there as here; and by this means his holiness should deliver himself from great pains and unquietness of mind, which he should sustain in case the cause should be known here, where he should have the king's highness on one part, and the emperor on the other side, daily calling upon his holiness. To this his holiness most heavily, and with tears, answered and said, That now he saw the destruction of Christendom, and lamented that his fortune was such to live to this day, and not to be able to remedy it, (saying these words,) For God is my judge, I would do as gladly for the king as I would for myself; and to that I knowledge myself most bounden, but in this case I cannot satisfy his desire, but that I should do manifestly against justice to the charge of my conscience, to my rebuke, and to the dishonour of the see apostolic; affirming that his counsel shows him, that seeing the Cæsareans have a mandate or proxy of the queen, to ask the avocations in her name, he cannot of justice deny it, and the whole signature be in that same opinion; so that though he would most gladly do that thing that might be to the king's pleasure, yet he cannot do it, seeing that signature would be against him whensoever the supplication should be up there: and so being late, we took our leave of his holiness and departed, seeing that we could obtain nothing of the pope for stopping the avocation, we consulted and devised for the deferring of it till such time as your grace might make an end in the cause there. And so concluded upon a new device, which at length we have written in our common letter, wherein, I promise your grace, Mr. Gregory has used great diligence, and taken great labours at this time, we can do no more for our lives: and if your grace saw the importune labour of the ambassadors of the emperor's and Ferdinandoes you would marvel, I promise your grace they never cease ; wherefore in staying hitherto, as we have done, it is marvel, as God knoweth, whom I pray to preserve your grace in health and prosperity ad multos annos. I beseech your grace most humbly to commend me to the king's highness, and likewise I beseech your grace to pardon my ill writing. At Rome, the 9th day of July.

Your daily beadman and servant,

W. BENET.

DILECTE Fili noster, salutem et Apostolicam Benedictionem. Difficile est nobis Explicare literis, qua nostra molestia seu potius dolore fuerimus coacti, ad Avocationem Cause istic commissæ concedendam ; nam etsi res ita fuit justa ut tanto tempore differri non debuerit, tamen nos qui isti Serenissimo Regi pro ejus singularibus erga nos et Apostolicam sedem meritis placere in omnibus cupimus, sicut consuevimus, segre nunc adducti sumus, ut quamquam justitia cogente, quicquid contra ejus voluntatem concederemus. Nec vero minus, Fili, doluimus tua causa, cui rem hanc tantæ curæ esse perspeximus quantum tua erga dictum Regem fides et amor postulat ; sed tamen quod datur justitiæ minus esse molestum debet, cum præsertim id fuerit tam dilatatum a nobis, omniaque ; antea pertentata ne ad hoc descenderemus. Itaque ; optamus in hoc adhiberi a te illam tuam singularem prudentiam et æquitatem, persuadereque ; te tibi id quod est, nos qui semper vobis placere quantum nobis licuit studuimus, id quod vestro maximo merito fecimus, et semper facturi sumus, nunc non nisi invitos et justitia coactos quod fecimus fecisse : Teque omni studio et amore hortamur, ut dictum regem in solita erga nos benevolentia retinere velis, eique ; persuadere, nihil ex hoc apud nos de benevolentia erga se veteri imminutum unquam fore, quod recipimus a Circumspectione tua longe gratissimum. Quemadmodum plenus dilectus Filius noster Cardinalis Campegius hæc circumspectioni tue explicabit. Dat. Romæ apud Sanctum Petrum sub annulo Piscatoris die 19 Julii 1529. Pont. nostri anno sexto.

XXXI.—Act 26. Anno Regni 21 Henr. 8.

An Act for the releasing unto the King his Highness of such Sums of Money as was to be required of him, by any his Subjects, for any Manner of Loan, by his Letters Missives, or other ways or manner whatsoever.

Item quædam alia billa formam cujusdam actus in se continens, exhibitæ est præfato Domino Regi in Parlamento prædicto, cujus quidem billæ tenor sequitur in hæc verba. The king's humble, faithful, and loving subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in this present parliament assembled, considering and calling to their remembrances the inestimable costs, charges, and expences which the king's highness necessarily hath been compelled to support and sustain since his assumption to his crown, estate, and dignity royal ; as well first for the extinction of a right dangerous and damnable schism sprung and risen in the church ; which, by the providence of the Almighty God, and the high prudence and provision and assistance of the king's highness was, to the great honour, laud, and glory of his majesty, repressed ; the enemies then being of the church reformed, returned, and restored to the unity of the same, and peace over all composed and concluded, as also for the modifying of the insatiable and inordinate ambition of those which do aspire unto the monarchy of Christendom, did put universal trouble, divisions in the same, intending, if they might, not only to have subdued this realm, but also all the rest unto their power and subjection : for the resistance whereof, the king's highness was compelled, after the universal peace, by the great study, labour, and travel of his grace conducted, and the same by some of the contrahents newly violate and infringed ; in showing the form of the treaties thereupon made again, and take armour. And over and besides the notable and excessive treasure and substance which his highness in his first wars had employed for the defence of the church, the faith catholic, and this his realm, and of the people and subjects of the same, was eftsoons brought of necessity to new, excellent, and marvellous charges, both for the supportation of sundry armies by sea and by land ; and also for divers and manifold contributions outward, to serve, keep, and contain his own subjects at home in rest and repose ; which hath been so politicly handled and conducted, that when the most part of all religious Christians have been infested with cruel wars, discords, divisions, and dissensions, the great heads and princes of the world brought unto captivity ; cities, towns, and places, by force and sedition, taken, spoiled, burnt, and sacked ; men, women, and children found in the same slain and destroyed ; virgins, wives, widows, and religious women, ravished and deflowered ; holy churches and temples polluted, and turned unto profane use ; the reliques of the holy saints irreverently treated ; hunger, dearth, and famine, by mean thereof in the said outward regions ensuing, and gently over all, was depopulation, destruction and confusion ; the king's said subjects in all this time were by the high providence and politic means of his grace nevertheless preserved, defended, and maintained, from all these inconveniences and dangers ; and such provisions taken, by one way or other, so as reasonable commodity was always given unto them to exercise their trafficks of merchandise, and other their crafts, mysteries, and occupations for their living ; which could not possibly have been brought about, unless then the king's highness, with continual studies, travels, and pains, and with his infinite charges and expenses, had converted the peril and danger of the enterprises and exploits, set forth for the reduction of the enemies unto peace from his own subjects unto strangers : whereof finally such fruit and effect is ensued, as by the king's policy, puissance, and means, general and universal peace is established amongst all Christian princes ; and this realm now, thanked be God, constitute in free, better, and more assured and profitable amity with all outward parties, than hath been at any time whereof is memory or remembrance. Considering, furthermore, that his highness, in and about the premises, hath been fain to employ not only such sums of money as hath risen and grown by any manner of contribution made unto his grace by his said loving subjects, but also over and above the same, sundry other notable and excellent sums of his own treasure, and yearly revenues, which else his grace might have kept and reserved to his own use ; amongst which manifold great sums so employed, his highness also, as is notoriously known, and as doth evidently appear by the accounts of the same, hath to that use and none other, converted all such money, as by any his subjects and people, spiritual and temporal, hath been advanced unto his grace by way of preat and loan, either particularly, or by any taxation made of the same, being a thing so well collocate and bestowed, seeing the said high and great fruits and effects thereof ensued, to the honour, surety, well, perfect commodity, and perpetual tranquillity of this sad realm, as nothing could better nor more to the comfort of his said subjects be desired, studied, or imagined; of one mind, consent and assent, and by authority of this present parliament, do for themselves and all the whole body of the realm whom they do represent, freely, liberally, and absolutely, give and grant unto the king's highness, by authority of this present parliament, all and every sum and sums of money, which to them, and every of them, is, ought, or might be due, by reason of any money, or any other thing, to his grace at any time heretofore advanced, or payed, by way of prest or loan, either upon any letter or letters under the king's privy seal, general or particular, letter, missive, promise, bond, or obligation of payment, or by any taxation, or other assessing, by virtue of any commission or commissions, or by any other mean or means whatsoever it be heretofore passed for that purpose, and utterly, frankly, liberally, and most willingly and benevolently for them, their heirs, executors, and successors, do remit, release, and quit claim, unto his highness, his heirs and successors for ever, all and every the same sums of money, and every parcel thereof, and all and singular suits, petitions, and demands, which they, or any of them, their heirs, successors, or executors, or the heirs, executors, or successors of any of them, have, had, or may have for the same, or any parcel thereof; most humbly and lovingly beseeching his highness, for the more clear discharge for the same, that it may be ordained and enacted by the king, our said sovereign lord, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons of this present parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, that all promises, bonds, writings, obligatory letters, under the king's privy seal, signet, sign manual, or great seal passed, and other bonds or promises, whatsoever they be, had, or made, to any person or persons, spiritual or temporal, shire, city, borough, waxentale, tranship, hamlet, village, monastery, church, cathedral or collegiate, or to any guild, fraternity, or body corporate, fellowship, or company, or other whatsoever, having capacity to take any bond, specially and generally, jointly or severally, touching or concerning the same prest or loan, or every of them, or the repayment of any sum or sums of money for the same, be from henceforth void and of none effect. Cui quidem billa probe et ad plenum intellecta per diatum Dominum Regem ex assensu et Autoritate Parliamenti predicti taliter est responsum. Le Roy remercie Les Seigneurs et ses communes de leur bonne cueurs en faisant cest graunt, et icelle se Majeste accepte et tout le contenu, et cest escriture a graunt et approve aveoques tous les articles en ceste escripture specifies.

Feb. 1530, from Cambridge, by Stephen Gardiner.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitel. B. 13.]

To the King's Highness.

PLEASETH it your highness to be advertised, that arriving here at Cambridge upon Saturday last past at noon, that same night, and Sunday in the morning, we devised with the vice-chancellor, and such other as favourerth your grace's cause, how and in what sort to compass and attain your grace's purpose and intent; wherein we assure your grace we found much towardness, good-will, and diligence, in the vice-chancellor and Dr. Edmunds, being as studious to serve your grace as we could wish or desire: nevertheless there was was not so much care, labour, study, and diligence employed on our party, by them, ourself, and other, for attaining your grace's purpose, but there was as much done by others for the lett and empagement of the same; and as we assembled they assembled; as we made friends they made friends, to lett that nothing should pass as in the Universities name; wherein the first day they were superiors, for they had put in the ears of them, by whose voices such things do pass, multas fabulas, too tedious to write unto your grace. Upon Sunday at afternoon were assembled, after the manner of the University, all the doctors, batchelors of divinity, and masters of art, being in number almost two hundred: in that congregation we delivered your grace's letters, which were read openly by the vice-chancellor. And for answer to be made unto them, first the vice-chancellor calling apart the doctors, asked their advice and opinion; whereunto they answered severally, as their affections led them, et res erat in multa confusione. Tandem they were content answer should be made to the questions by indifferent men: but then they came to exceptions against the abbot of St. Benets, who seemed to come for that purpose; and likewise against Dr. Reppes, and Dr. Crome; and also generally against all such as had allowed Dr. Cranmer's book, inasmuch as they had already declared their opinion. We said thereunto, that by that reason they might except against all; for it was lightly, that in a question so notable as this is, every man learned hath said to his friend as he thinketh in it for the time; but we ought not to judge of any man, that he setteth more to defend that which he hath once said, than truth afterward known. Finally, the vice-chancellor, because the day was much spent in those altercations, commanding every man to resort to his seat apart, as the manner is in those assemblies, willed every man's mind to be known secretly, whether they would be content with such an order as he had conceived for answer to be made by the University to your grace's letters; whereunto that night they would in nowise agree. And forasmuch as it was then dark night, the vice-chancellor continued the congregation till the next day at one of the clock; at which time the vice-chancellor proponed a grace after the form herein inclosed; and it was first denied: when it was asked again, it was even on both parties to be denied or granted; and at the last, by labour of friends to cause some to depart the house which were against it, it was obtained in such form as the schedule herein enclosed purporteth; wherein be two points which we would have left out; but considering by putting in of them we allured many, and that indeed they shall not hurt the determination for your grace's part, we were finally content therewith. The one point is that where it was first, that quicquid major pars of them that be named deceverit, should be taken for the determination of the University. Now it referred ad duas partes, wherein we suppose shall be no difficulty. The other point is, that your grace's question shall be openly disputed, which we think to be very honourable; and it is agreed amongst us, that in that disputation shall answer the Abbot of St. Benets, Dr. Reppes, and I Mr. Fox, to all such as will object anything or reason against the conclusion to be sustained for your grace's part. And because Mr. Doctor Clyss hath said, that he hath somewhat to say concerning the canon-law; I your secretary shall be adjoined unto them for answer to be made therein. In the schedule which we send unto your grace herewith, containing the names of those who shall determine your grace's question, all marked with the letter A. be already of your grace's opinion; by which we trust, and with other good means, to induce and obtain a great part of the rest. Thus we beseech Almighty God to preserve your most noble and royal estate. From Cambridge the day of February.

A Letter from Crook, out of Venice, concerning the Opinions of Divines about the Divorce. An Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitel. B. 13.]

PLEASE if your highness to be advertised, that as this day I obtained the common seal of the University of Padua, in substantial and good form; for all the doctors were assembled upon Sunday, and the case was amongst them solemnly and earnestly disputed all Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, and this present Friday in the morning again; and thereupon they concluded with your highness, and desired a notary to set his sign and hand unto an instrument, by Leonicus and Simonetus devised, in corroboration of your cause, and thereby to testify that this instrument was their deed, device, act, and conclusion; and for the more credence to be given to the said instrument, they caused the chancellor of the Potestate here to set his hand and seal for the approbation of the authority of the notary. A copy of all the which things I send unto your highness by this bearer, in most humble wise beseeching the same to be advertised, that the general of the blackfriars hath given a commandment, that no blackfriar dispute the pope's power: notwithstanding, prior Thomas Omnibonus procureth daily new subscriptions, and will do till the brief of contrary commandment shall come unto his hands.

My fidelity bindeth me to advertise your highness, that all Lutherans be utterly against your highness in this cause, and have letted as much with their wretched power, malice, without reason or authority, as they could and might, as well here as in Padua and Ferrara, where be no small companies of them. I doubt not but all Christian universities, if they be well handled, will earnestly conclude with your highness. And to obtain their assent, as well through Italy, France, Almagne, Austritch, Hungary, and Scotland, I think it marvellous expedient, for the preferment of this your most honourable and high cause; as from the seigniory and dominion of Venice towards Rome, and beyond Rome, I think there can be no more done than is done already, albeit, gracious lord, if that I had in time been sufficiently furnished with money. Albeit, I have, beside this seal, procured unto your highness an hundred and ten subscriptions, yet it had been nothing in comparison of that that I might easily and would have done; and at this hour, I assure your highness, that I have neither provision nor money, and have borrowed an hundred crowns, the which also are spent about the getting of this seal; of the which my need, and divers impediments in your highness's cause here, I have advertised your highness by many and sundry letters, and with the same sent divers books and writings; part to Hierom Molins a Venetian, and factor to Mappheus Bernardus, by the hands of your subject Edmund Herwell; part directed to Mr. Tuke, whereof I am nothing ascertained whether they be exhibited unto your highness or not, to no little discomfort unto me; notwithstanding, I have reserved a copy of all things, letters, and other, and herein enclosed a bill, specifying by whom and to whom I directed my said letters; in most humble wise, beseeching your most royal clemency, to ponder my true, sure, and good endeavours, and not to suffer me to be destitute of money, to my undoing, and utter loss of your most high causes here; for of myself I have nothing whereby to help myself. And thus the most Blessed Trinity keep and preserve your highness in his most royal estate. At Venice, the 1st day of July at night, Anno —30. R. CROOK.

DECANUS et Facultas Sacræ Theologiæ almæ Universitatis Parisiensis, omnibus, ad quos præsens scriptum pervenerit, salutem in eo, qui est vera Salus.

Cum nuper suborta magnæ difficultatis controversia super invaliditate Matrimonii, inter Serenissimum Henricum Octavum Angliæ Regem, Fidei Defensorem, et Dominum Hiberniæ, ac Illustrissimam Dominam Catharinam Angliæ Reginam, claræ memoriæ Ferdinandi Regis Catholici Filiam contracti, et carnali copula consummati, illa etiam nobis Quæstio in justitia et veritate discutienda et examinanda proposita fuerat, videlicet, An ducere relictam fratris mortui sine liberis sic esset jure divino et naturali prohibitum, ut interveniente summi Pontificis Dispensatione, non posset fieri licitum, ut quis Christianus relictam fratris ducat, et habeat in Uxorem; Nos Decanus et Facultas antedicta, cogitantes, quam esset pium et sanctum, necnon debito charitatis, et nostræ Professioni consentaneum, ut his, qui in lege Domini secunda, tranquillaque conscientia vitam hanc ducere, et transigere cupiant, viam justitiæ ostenderemus, nolimus tam justis et piis votis deesse. Hinc more solito, apud ædem S. Mathurini per juramentum convenientes, et solemnem Missam cum Invocatione Spiritus Sancti ob hoc celebrata, necnon præstito juramento de deliberando super præfata quæstione, secundum Deum et Conscientiam; Post varias et multiplices Sessiones, tam apud ædem S. Mathurini, quam apud Collegium Sorbonæ, ab octava Junii usque ad secundum Julii habitas, et continuatas, pertractatis prius excussisque; quam diligentissime, ac ea qua decuit, reverentia et religione, Sacræ Scripturæ Libris eorumque; probatissimis interpretibus, necnon Sacrosanctæ Ecclesiæ generalibus ac Synodicalibus Concilii Decretis et constitutionibus longo usu receptis et approbatis: Nos prædicti Decanus et Facultas de prædicta Quæstione disserentes, et ad eam respondentem, sequentes unanime iudicium et consensum Majoris partis totius Facultatis, Asserimus et Determinavimus, prout et in his Scriptis per præsentem Asserimus et Determinamus, quod prædictæ nuptiæ cum Relictis fratrum decedentium sine liberis, sic naturali jure pariter et divino sunt prohibitæ, ut super talibus Matrimoniis contractis, sive contrahendis, Summus Pontifex dispensare non possit. In cujus nostræ Assertionis et Determinationis fidem et testimonium, sigillum nostræ Facultatis cum signo nostri Notarii, seu Bedelli, præsentibus apponi curavimus. Datum in generali nostra Congregatione per juramentum celebrata apud S. Mathurinum. Anno Dom. Millesimo quingentesimo trigesimo, Mensis vero Julii die secundo.

IN Nomine Domini Amen. Cum proposita fuisset coram nobis Decano et Collegio Consultissimæ Facultatis Decretorum Parisiensis Universitatis Quæstio; An Papa possit dispensare, quod Frater possit in Uxorem ducere, sive accipere relictam Fratris sui, Matrimonio consummato per Fratrem præmortuum? Nos Decanus et Collegium præfate Facultatis, post multas Disputationes et Argumenta hinc inde super hac materia facta ac habita, cum magna et longa laborum, tam divini, quam Pontificii et Civilis, jurium revolutione consulimus, et dicimus, Papam non posse in facto proposito dispensare. In cujus rei testimonium, has præsentem Sigillo nostræ Facultatis, et signo nostri scribæ primi Bedelli muniri fecimus. CUM ab hinc aliquod tempus nobis Collegio Doctorum Regentium almæ Universitatis Aurelianensis propositæ fuerint, quæ sequuntur Quæstiones, videlicet;

Si jure divino liceat fratri Relictam fratris (quam Fratrem vocant) accipere Uxorem? Item et si hoc sit eo jure vetitum, utrum divinæ Legis prohibito Pontifici Dispensatione remitti possit? Nos prædictum Collegium, post multas ad prædictorum dubiorum Disputationem (de more nostro) factas Sessiones et Congregationes, postque Juris tum Divini tum Canonici locos (quod facere potuimus) examinatos, et omnibus mature atque exacte pensatis et consideratis: Definivimus, prædictas nuptias citra divinæ legis injuriam attentari non posse, etiamsi summi Pontificis accedat indulgentia, vel permissus. In cujus rei testimonium præsens publicum Instrumentum a Scriba præfate almæ Universitatis subsignari fecimus, ejusdemque Sigillo communiri. Actum in Sacello Beatæ Mariæ Boninuncii Aurelianensis. CUM certo ab hinc tempore nobis Rectori et Doctoribus Regentibus in Pontificia et legum disciplina almæ Universitatis Andegavensis sequentes Quæstiones propositæ fuerint, scilicet, Utrum Jure Divino pariter et naturali illicitum sit homini Christiano Relictam fratris sui, etiam absque liberis, sed Matrimonio jam consummato defuncti, ducere Uxorem? Et an Summo Pontifici liceat super hujusmodi nuptiis dispensare? Nos præfati Rector et Doctores, post plures ad Disputationem hujusmodi quæstionum, et veritatem comperendam factas, ex more, Congregationes et Sessiones, postque varios Juris tam Divini, quam humani locos, qui ad eam rem pertinere videbantur, discussos, multas quoque rationes in utramque partem adductas et examinatas, omnibus fideliter consideratis, et matura deliberatione præhabita, Definivimus neque Divino neque Naturali Jure permitti homini Christiano, etiam cum Sedis Apostolicæ Authoritate sui Dispensatione super hoc adhibita, Relictam fratris, qui etiam sine liberis post consummatum Matrimonium decesserit, Uxorem accipere vel habere. In quorum omnium supradictorum fidem, præsens publicum Instrumentum a Scriba seu Notario præfate Almæ Universitatis subsignari jussimus, ejusdemque Universitatis Magno Sigillo muniri. Nos cum Decano Theologiæ, Facultas in Universitate Bituricensi (ut Doctoris Gentium Pauli exemplo plerisque locis auspicemur scriptum nostrum a precatione) omnibus dilectis Dei in quibus vocati estis, Lectores Charissimi, quique ad quos scribimus, Gratia vobis et pax a Deo Patre et Domino nostro Jesu Christo. Dum completeretur dies inter Octavas Pentecostes, et essemus omnes pariter in eodem loco, corpore et animo congregati, sedentesque; in domo dicti Decani; facta est nobis rursus Quæstio eadem, quæ sæpius antea, non quidem parva, hunc in modum: An rem faciat illicitam necne, frater accipiens Uxorem a præmortuo fratre relictam, consummato etiam Matrimonio? Tandem rei ipsius veritate disquisita et perspecta, multo singulorum labore, et Sacrorum iterata atque iterata revolutione codicum, unusquisque nostrum non fascinatus, quominus veritati obediret, coepit, prout Spiritus Sanctus dedit, suum hoc unum arbitrium eloqui, absque personarum acceptione, in veritate comperi, personas memoratas in Capite Levitico octavo supra decimum prohibitas esse jure ipso naturali, authoritate humana minime relaxabili, et vetitas, ne invicem Matrimonium contrahant, quo fit fraternæ turpitudinis abominabilis Revelatio. Et hoc nobis signum nostri Bedelli Notarii publici, cum Sigillo dictæ supra nostræ Facultatis presentibus appenso. Die decimo Junii, Anno vero a Christi Nativitate, Mille-simo quingentesimo tricesimo. Ut autem nostræ scriptio nis pes et caput uni reddatur formæ, quemadmodum sumus auspicati a precatone, ita claudamus illius quo utimur exemplo. Gratia Domini nostri Jesu Christi, charitas Dei, et communicatio Sancti Spiritus sit cum omnibus vobis. Amen.

XXXV.—The Judgment of the Lutheran Divines about the King's Marriage, ex MSS. R. Smith, London.

Ex hac Collatione in qua audivimus Argumenta de Controversia Divortii Serenissimi et Illustrissimi Regis Angliæ, Franciæ, &c. proposita et diligenter agitata a Reverendo D. D. Edwardo Hereford. Episcopo, D. Nicolao Archidiacono et D. D. Barnes, intelleximus Serenissimum Regem maximis et gravissimis Causis adductum, superatum et conclusum esse, ut in hoc negotio Matrimonii sui faceret quod fecit: Nam hoc manifestum est et negare nemo potest, quod Lex Levit. tradita Lev. 18. v. 20. prohibet ducere fratris Uxorem, &c. sed Divina, naturalis, et moralis lex est intelligenda tam de vivi quam de mortui fratris Uxore, et quod contra hanc legem nulla contraria lex fieri aut constitui possit, sicut et tota Ecclesia semper hanc Legem retinuit, et judicavit hujusmodi nuptias incestas esse, sicut testantur Synodorum Decreta et Sanctissimorum Patrum Clarissimæ Sententiæ, et has nuptias prohibent et vocant incestas etiam jura Civilia. Proinde et nos sertimus, et hanc Legem de non ducenda Uxore fratris in omnibus Ecclesiis servandam esse veluti divinam, naturalem, et moralem Legem; Nec in nostris Ecclesiis vellemus dispensare aut permittere, præsertim ante factum, ut ejusmodi nuptiæ contraherentur, et hanc Doctrinam possumus et volumus Deo volente facile defendere. Cæterum quantum ad Divortium pertinet, nondum sumus plene persuasi ut sententiam nostram ferre possimus. An post Contractum Matrimonium in hoc casu Serenissimi Regis debuisset fieri Divortium. Rogamus igitur Seren. Regem ut æquo animo ferat, differri nostram Sententiam in hac re donec erimus certiores.

XXXVI.—An Abstract of the Grounds of the Divorce.

Written in the beginning, Thomas Cantuarien, with his own hand.

Articuli ex quibus plane admodum demonstratur Divortium inter Hen. VIII. Angliæ Regem Invictiss. et Serenissimam Catharinam necessario esse faciendum.

1. AFFINITAS quæ Divino et Naturali Jure impedit ne Matrimonium contrahatur, et contractum dirimit, solo nuptiali fœdere inducitur.

2. Substantia Matrimonii, verum perfectumq; conjugium, sola conjugalī pactione, et non carnali copula efficitur.

3. Vir et Uxor solo fœdere conjugalī, Deo inprimis operante, una mens et una caro fiunt.

4. Carnalis Copula affinitatem solo Jure Ecclesiastico repertam inducit.

5. Affinitas sola Carnis concubitu orta Sanctione humana solum impedit, ne Matrimonium contrahatur, et contractum dissolvit.

6. Carnalis Copula Matrimonium necessario reddit consummatum.

7. Potest Matrimonium Carnali Copula consummari, etiam Uxoris Virginitate irrecuperabili non amissa.

8. Serenissimam Catharinam ab Illustrissimo Principe Arthuro relictam Virginem non fuisse affirmamus.

9. Sereniss. Catharinam ex Judiciis quam plurimis attestantibus, et violentam præsumptionem inducentibus, ab eodem Illustrissimo Principe Arthuro corruptam, atque Matrimonium inter eos consummatum fuisse non dubitamus.

10. Serenissima Catharina, præsumptione violenta hujusmodi constante, Virginitatem suam Juramento præsertim publico probare nequit.

11. Judex eandem Serenissimam Catharinam, super ea causa jurare volentem, ad juramentum jure quidem admittere non potest.

12. Henrici octavi Angliæ Regis Invictissimi et Serenissimæ Catharinæ prætersum Matrimonium, lege Divina et naturali prohibente, nullum omnino fuisse neq; esse posse Censemus.

Ex MS. D. Petyt.

MARTINUS Episcopus, Servus Servorum Dei, venerabili Fratri Archiepiscopo Cantuariensi salutem et Apostolicam Benedictionem. Si quam districto Dei Judicio de commissis tibi ovibus rationem redditurus es, aliquando cogitares, si meminisses et tu quæ pastoralis officii cura esse debet, quantumq; Ecclesiæ Romanæ, a qua dignitatem et auctoritatem vendicas, jus atque honorem tueri obligatus es, in considerationem duceres; profecto non usque adeo dormitares neque negligeres: Surrexisses jamdudum, et post oves jam longe aberrantes in clamares, ac pro viribus resisteres iis, qui jura ac privilegia a summo Ecclesiarum capite omnium Christo, Ecclesiæ Romanæ tradita, sacrilego vel ausu violant atque contemnunt. Numquid ideo Pontificalis Dignitas tibi commissa est ut hominibus præsis, opes cumules, et quæ tua sunt non quæ Jesu Christi quærere debeas? Si id existimas vehementer erras, et a Christi intentione longe abes, qui cum Beato Petro oves suas committeret, nil ei aliud nisi ut illas pasceret indixit, priusque non semel, sed bis ac tertio, an ab eo diligeretur expostulans. Estne hæc in Christum dilectio quam habes? Estne hoc amare ac pascere oves? Itane debitum quo Ecclesiæ Romanæ astringeris, recte exsolvis? En ante oculos tuos ab ovili errantes in præcipitium labuntur oves, nec illas revocas neque reducis. In conspectu tuo herbas pergunt pestiferas pascere, nec illas prohibes, immo (quod abominabile est) tuis quasi manibus hujusmodi præbes mortiferum cibum. Te vidente, lupus illas dispergit, et taces tanquam canis mutus non valens latrare. Aspicias simul et Christi et Ecclesiæ et sedis Apostolicæ mandata, auctoritatem, reverentiamque contemptui haberi, nec semel unum murmurans verbum, clanculum saltem, si nolles palam. An ignoras ante æterni tribunalis judicis hujusmodi reatus et culpæ usque ad minimum quadrantem redditurum te rationem? num credis, si qua tuo neglectu perierit ovium (pereunt autem multæ) de tuis manibus sanguis earum exigetur? Quid per os Ezechielis Dominus comminatur, memorare et extimesce. Ipse, inquit, Speculatorem Domini posuit te Deus, si videris gladium venientem, et non insonueris buccina, et aliquis perierit, sanguinem ejus de manibus tuis requiram; hæc dicit Dominus. Qualis autem et qualis iniquitatis et abominationis gladius in Angliæ Regnum, atque oves tuas descenderit, tuo judicio (si ratione uteris) relinquimus. Perlege illud Statutum Regium, si tamen Statutum, si tamen Regium dici fas est. Nam quomodo Statutum, quod Statuta Dei et Ecclesiæ destruit? Quomodo Regium? quod Instituta peremit? contra illud quod scriptum est, Honor Regis Judicium diligit. Et judica, venerabilis Frater et Christiane Episcopo, ac Catholice Præsul, si justum, si æquum, si a Populo Christiano servari est. Imprimis per illud execrabile Statutum ita Rex Angliæ de Ecclesia cum Provisionibus et Administrationibus disponit, quasi Vicarium suum Christum eum instituisset. Legem condit super Ecclesias, beneficia, Clericos et Ecclesiasticum statum, ad se suamq; laicalem Curiam nonnullas causas Spirituales et Ecclesiasticas jubet introduci; et ut uno verbo concludamus, ita de Clericis statuit, de Ecclesiis et Ecclesiastico Statu, quasi Ecclesiæ claves in manibus haberet, et non Petro, sed sibi hujusmodi cura commissa foret. Præter hanc nefandam Dispositionem, viperæ quasdam contra Clericos adject poenas, quæ ne quidem contra Judæos vel Saracenos, per illum de Statutis suis, promulgatæ inventiuntur. Possunt ad Angliæ Regnum cujuslibet generis homines libere proficisci; soli acceptantes beneficia Auctoritate Summi Pontificis, Vicarii Jesu Christi, jubentur exulari, capi, incarcerari, omnibusq; bonis exui, executoresq; literarum Apostolicarum, Procuratores, Notarii, ac quicumq; alii Censuram seu Processum ab Apostolica sede in Regnum mittentes aut deferentes, ultimo supplicio deputantur, projectiq; extra protectionem Regis exponuntur ab omnibus captivandi. Vide si audita est unquam similis Statuti iniquitas: Consideret prudentia tua, si Regem aut Regnum hujusmodi Statuta decet: Cogita si te talia inspicientem silere oporteat, et non magis clamare, contradicere, et pro viribus resistere. Estne ista filialis Reverentia? Estne ista Christiana devotio quam Regnum Angliæ suæ Matri Ecclesiæ ac Sedi Apostolicæ exhibet? Potestne Catholicum Regnum dici, ubi hujusmodi statuantur profanæ leges et observantur, ubi prohibetur adiri Vicarius Christi, ubi oves suas Successor Apostoli Petri pascere juxta mandatum Domini non permittitur? Christus dixit Petro suisq; Successoribus, Pasce oves meas; Statutum autem Regni pascere ipsas non sinit, sed vult ut Rex ipse pascat, devolvendo ad eum in certis casibus Apostolicam Auctoritatem. Christus edificavit supra Petrum Ecclesiam; sed Regni Statutum, id prohibet: Nam non patitur Petri Cathedram de Ecclesia prout judicaverit, expedire, ordinare vel disponere. Christus voluit quod quicquid summus Pontifex in terris solverit aut ligaverit, solummodo ligatumve esset in cœlis; Statutum huic divinæ voluntati non assentit: Nam si quos Sacerdotes ad ligandum solvendumq; animas Christi Vicarius in Regnum contra Statuti tenorem destinaret, non modo ipsos non admittit Statutum sed exulare jubet, bonis privari, aliisq; poenis affligi, et censuram seu Processum Apostolicum in Regnum deferens, tanquam Sacrilegus capite punitur. Quid ad hoc tua Discretio respondebit? Estne hoc Catholicum Statutum? Potestne sine Christi injuria, sine Evangelii transgressione, sine animæ interitu tolerari aut observari? Cur igitur non clamas, et quasi tuba exaltas vocem tuam, annuncians populo tuo peccata sua,

MARTINUS Episcopus, Servus Servorum Dei, Charissimus in Christo Filio Henrico Regi Angliæ Illustri, salutem et Apostolicam Benedictionem. Quum post multos nuncios ad tuam Serenitatem pro abolitione illius detestabilis Statuti contra libertatem Ecclesiasticam editi olim transmissos, postremo dilectum filium Magistrum Julianum causarum curiæ Cameræ Apostolicæ Auditorem, pro eadem causa destinasset; per ipsum tua Celsitudo tunc nobis respondit, quod quamprimum commode possit, Parliamentum, sine quo idem nequit aboleri Statutum, convocaret, et in eo quod sibi possibile foret pro nostræ requisitionis implemento faceret, Protestans quod Sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ sedis; Apostolicæ Juribus ac Privilegiis nullo modo detrahere aut derogare intendebat: Nos ob hoc, sicut deinde aliis literis tibi significavimus, usq; ad id tempus cum patientia expectare decrevimus, sperantes quod in Verbo Regio nobis pollicitus fueris, id tempore suo exequi non differes; itaq; quicquid ex parte nostra hactenus faciendum fuit, omnem mansuetudinis et patientiæ modum experientes jam fecimus. Et licet gravibus interim per aliquos de Regno tuo lacesiti sumus injuriis, volumus tamen (ne quod contra promissum fieri videretur) usq; ad id tempus (non sine rubore Sedis Apostolicæ) expectare, ut merito illud verbum Evangelicum jam dici possit, Quid debui huic vinæ facere et non feci? Tu vero, Fili Charissime, cum ipsis Parliamentis jam tempus instet, quod ex tua parte agendum restat, juxta promissionem tuam ac verbum Regium implere non omittas, ad quod et Jure Divino et Humano tanquam Christianissimus Princeps obligatus, sine cujusvis requisitione tua et tuorum subditorum salute et honore facere teneris: præsertim quum talia obtuleramus, ob quæ nec tibi nec dicto Regno ex prædicti Statuti abolitione præjudicium ullum redundare possit; providere enim iis omnibus quæ causam Statuto dedisse dicuntur, jam sæpe nostro nomine oblatum est, et nunc de novo offerimus. Jam igitur cum nulla quævis contradicendi occasio prætendi possit, speramus in dicto Parlamento tuam Serenitatem ita futuram, ut prædictum tam execrabile Statutum penitus de eodem Regno tollatur. Quod si feceris, salvabis primum tuam, tum vero multorum animas, quæ ob dictum Statutum gravi crimine illaqueatæ tenentur: Providebis deinde tuo et ipsius Regni honori, quod utiq; propterea non modicum est notatum: Demum nos ac sedem ipsam semper tuis justis desideris obligabis. Super iis autem omnibus et de nostra intentione plene per literas nostras instructo, dilecto Filio magistro Joanni de Obizis in dicto Regno Nuncio et Collectori nostro, dabis credentem fidem plenam. XXXIX.—A Letter to the Parliament upon the same occasion.

MARTINUS Episcopus, Servus Servorum Dei, venerabilibus Fratribus et dilectis Filiis, Nobilibus viris Parliamenti Regni Angliæ, salutem et Apostolicam Benedictionem. Multis nunciis ac frequentibus exhortationibus, pro debito pastoralis officii, vos ac Regnum vestrum hactenus admonuimus, ut pro salute animarum vestrarum, et ipsius Regni honore, quoddam detestabile Statutum contra Divinum et Humanum Jus editum, quod sine interitu salutis æternæ nullatenus servari potest, aboleretur. Et quoniam id sine Parlamento tolli non posse, ex parte Charissimi in Christo Filii nostri Henrici Regis Angliæ illustris, Dilecto Filio Magistro Juliano Causarum curiæ Cameræ Apostolicæ Auditori, tunc Nuncio nostro, responsum extitit, in quo (quam primum posset) convocato, quod sibi possibile foret pro nostræ Requisitionis executione se facturum, idem Rex pollicitus est, protestans Juribus ac Privilegiis Sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ et Sedis Apostolicæ in nullo velle detrahere aut derogare. Nos volentes solita erga vos mansuetudine uti, decrevimus usq; ad ipsius Parliamenti tempus expectare, sperantes quod tam Rex juxta suam Regiam Promissionem, quam vos pro salute animarum vestrarum, Sancte ac Catholice secundum nostram Requisitionem concludetis. Itaq; cum Parliamentum (ut fertur) jam instet, vos omnes, quorum animas nostræ curæ Dominus noster Jesus Christus commisit, hortamur, monemus, obsecramus, ut unanimes vestrarum animarum salutem, ac conscientiarum puritatem præ cæteris rebus amantes, prædictum abominabile Statutum (quod qui observat vel observari faciat salvum non potest) penitus tollatur, et de Regno in perpetuum aboletis. Quod si quis forsitan vobis contrarium persuadere audeat, quicumq; ille sit, Sæcularis vel Ecclesiasticus Status, tanquam hostem animarum vestrarum et honorum, nullatenus audite; nec eum virum Catholicum reputetis, qui adversus Romanæ Ecclesiæ Auctoritatem, Juraque et Privilegia Sedi Apostolicæ Divinitus concessa, aliquid machinari præsumperit, quibus ipse Rex vester Illustris nolle ullatenus derogare publice protestatus est. Nos quidem ipsi sumus ab omnipotenti Deo Jesu Christo super vos et Universalem Ecclesiam constituti, cujus Doctrinæ ac persuasioni sine ulla contradicitione omnimodam fidem vos et quilibet Christianus habere debetis: Nos tamen, etsi indignos, oves suas pascere Christus voluit, clavesq; aperiendi ac solvendi Cælos tradidit. Et si quis nos audit, servi Christi testimonium Christianum audit; et si quis nos spernit, Christum spernere convincitur. Et quoniam de vobis ac singulis Christianis in districto Dei Judicio rationem reddituri sumus, ideo vos pro salute vestra tam sæpe tamq; efficaciter admonemus; et ne quisquam sub alicujus damni temporalis prætextu vos ab hac nostra Catholica Doctrina submoveat, ecce nos promptos paratosq; offerimus, omnibus causis, propter quas dictum Statutum conditum esse prætenditur, salubriter providere, ita ut nec Regno nec cuiquam privatæ personæ præjudicium aliquod ex ipsius Statuti abolitione possit accidere. Super his omnibus et nostra intentione plene instructo dilecto Filio Magistro Joanni de Obizis, in dicto Regno Nuntio et Collectori nostro, dabitis Credentem plenam fidem. Dat. XL.—An Instrument of the Speech the Archbishop of Canterbury made to the House of Commons about it.

DIE Veneris, penultimo mensis Januarii, Anno Domini secundum cursum et computationem Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ millesimo quadringentesimo decimo septimo, indictione sexta, Pontificatus Sanctissimi in Christo Patris et Domini nostri Domini Martini Divina Providentia Papæ quinti Anno undecimo, Reverendissimi in Christo Patris et Domini, Domini, Henricus Dei Gratia Cantuariensis et Johannes Eboracensis Archiepiscopi, necnon Reverendiss. Patres W. Londiniensis, Benedictus Menevensis, Philippus Eliensis, Jochey et W. Norvicensis, Episcopi, et cum eis venerabiles Patres et viri religiosi Westmonasterii et Radingiæ Abbates de palatio regio Westmonasteriensi de Camera, viz. Ubi tam Domini Spirituales quam Temporales in Parlamento ad tunc tento negotia Regni

quadrantem redditurum te rationem? num credis, si qua tuo neglectu perierit ovium (pereunt autem multæ) de tuis manibus sanguis earum exigeret? Quid per os Ezechielis Dominus comminatur, memorare et extimesce. Ipse, inquit, Speculatorem Domini posuit te Deus, si videris gladium venientem, et non insonueris buccina, et aliquis perierit, sanguinem ejus de manibus tuis requiram; hæc dicit Dominus. Qualis autem et qualis iniquitatis et abominationis gladius in Angliæ Regnum, atque oves tuas descenderit, tuo iudicio (si ratione uteris) relinquitur. Perlege illud Statutum Regium, si tamen Statutum, si tamen Regium dici fas est. Nam quomodo Statutum, quod Statuta Dei et Ecclesiæ destruit? Quomodo Regium? quod Instituta peremit? contra illud quod scriptum est, Honor Regis Iudicium diligit. Et judica, venerabilis Frater et Christiane Episcopo, ac Catholice Præsul, si iustum, si æquum, si a Populo Christiano servari est. Imprimis per illud execrabile Statutum ita Rex Angliæ de Ecclesia cum Provisionibus et Administrationibus disponit, quasi Vicarium suum Christus eum instituisset. Legem condit super Ecclesias, beneficia, Clericos et Ecclesiasticum statum, ad se suamque laicalem Curiam nonnullas causas Spirituales et Ecclesiasticas jubet introduci; et ut uno verbo concludamus, ita de Clericis statuit, de Ecclesiis et Ecclesiastico Statu, quasi Ecclesiæ claves in manibus haberet, et non Petro, sed sibi hujusmodi cura commissa foret. Præter hanc nefandam Dispositionem, vipereas quasdam contra Clericos adject pœnas, quæ ne quidem contra Judæos vel Saracenos, per illum de Statutis suis, promulgatæ inveniuntur. Possunt ad Angliæ Regnum cujuslibet generis homines libere proficisci; soli acceptantes beneficia Auctoritate Summi Pontificis, Vicarii Jesu Christi, jubentur exulari, capi, incarcerari, omnibusque bonis exui, executoresque literarum Apostolicarum, Procuratores, Notarii, ac quicumque; alii Censuram seu Processum ab Apostolica sede in Regnum mittentes aut deferentes, ultimo supplicio deputantur, projectique extra protectionem Regis exponuntur ab omnibus captivandi. Vide si audita est unquam similis Statuti iniquitas: Consideret prudentia tua, si Regem aut Regnum hujusmodi Statuta decet: Cogita si te talia inspicientem silere oporteat, et non magis clamare, contradicere, et pro viribus resistere. Estne ista filialis Reverentia? Estne ista Christiana devotio quam Regnum Angliæ suæ Matri Ecclesiæ ac Sedi Apostolicæ exhibet? Potestne Catholicum Regnum dici, ubi hujusmodi statuuntur profanæ leges et observantur, ubi prohibetur adiri Vicarius Christi, ubi oves suas Successor Apostoli Petri pascere juxta mandatum Domini non permittitur? Christus dixit Petro suisque Successoribus, Pasce oves meas; Statutum autem Regni pascere ipsas non sinit, sed vult ut Rex ipse pascat, devolvendo ad eum in certis casibus Apostolicam Auctoritatem. Christus ædificavit supra Petrum Ecclesias; sed Regni Statutum, id prohibet: Nam non patitur Petri Cathedram de Ecclesia prout judicaverit, expedire, ordinare vel disponere. Christus vult quod quicquid summus Pontifex in terris solverit aut ligaverit, solum ligatumve esset in cœlis; Statutum huic divinæ voluntati non assentit: Nam si quos Sacerdotes ad ligandum solvendumque; animas Christi Vicarius in Regnum contra Statuti tenorem destinaret, non modo ipsos non admittit Statutum sed exulare jubet, bonis privari, aliisque pœnis affligi, et censuram seu Processum Apostolicum in Regnum deferens, tanquam Sacrilagus capite punitur. Quid ad hoc tua Discretio respondebit? Estne hoc Catholicum Statutum? Potestne sine Christi injuria, sine Evangelii transgressione, sine animæ interitu tolerari aut observari? Cur igitur non clamas, et quasi tuba exaltas vocem tuam, annuncians populo tuo peccata sua, Domui Israel scelera eorum, ne sanguis eorum de manibus tuis requiratur. Quod et si omnes quibus populorum cura commissa est, facere teneantur, quanto magis id tibi erit necessarium exequi, cui populos et populorum ministros, oves et ovium pastores, tuæ sollicitudini Romana deputavit Ecclesia, a qua et Primatum et Sedis Apostolicæ legationem super Anglicanas Ecclesias suscepisti, et ipsius gloriosissimi Martyris Beati Thomæ olim Cantuariæ Archiepiscopi Successor effectus es, qui adversus similia decertans Statuta, holocaustum se Deo offerens pro libertate Ecclesiastica occubuit. Tu certe ob hæc, omnium primus qui vexillo assumpto in aciem prodire deberes, et fratres Co-episcopos tuos tuo exemplo in certamine sistere, primus omnium terga vertis, et aliquos qui forte resistendi impetum caperent, tua sive pusillanimitate, sive dissimulatione, sive (ut omnes attestantur) evidenti prævaricatione a bono proposito dejicis. Itaque si de te queritur Ecclesia, si in te omnis culpa transfertur, non mirari sed dolere, immo potius te ipsum corrigere debes, et debitum quo ovium jure astrictus es audacter exolvere: pro qua re efficienda, si velis quam potes operam adhibere, non magnum certamen subeundum est. Persuade tuo pro officio et Auctoritate tua, secularibus, et eos veritatem instrue. Ostende eis peccatum quo observantes prædictum Statutum illaqueantur: Et erunt (ut omnes asserunt) prava in directa, et aspera in vias planas. Ne ergo, si tacueramus et nos, tuam aliorumque deandiam dissimulationis similis apud omnipotentem Deum culpæ reos efficiat, neve ovium nostrarum sanguis (si neglexerimus) de manibus nostris exigatur, tuam fraternitatem qua possumus instantia, toto corde, totoque affectu hortamur, monemus, requirimus, et in virtute Sanctæ obedientiæ, et sub Excommunicationis pœna cui (si neglexeris) ipso facto te subjicimus, districte præcipiendo mandamus, quatenus quamprimum ad locum ubi Consilarii Charissimi in Christo Filii nostri Henrici Angliæ Regis Illustris conveniunt, personaliter accedas, eosque tam Ecclesiasticos quam Seculares pro sapientia tua, quam tibi Dominus inspiraverit, rationibus ac monitionibus reddas instructos, ut prædictum Statutum in proximo Parlamento tollant penitus et aboleant: Cum enim Divinæ et Humanæ rationi, veteris ac Novi Testamenti, Conciliorum, Sanctorum Patrum, Summorum Pontificum Decretis, ipsius denique Universalis Ecclesiæ observantiæ evidentissime contradicat, nec sine interitu salutis æternæ quovis modo servari possit. Illudque inter alia dicere non omittas, qualiter Ecclesiasticæ libertatis violatores, facientesque Statuta aut consuetudines contra libertatem servari, Officiales, Rectores et Consilarii, locorum ubi hujusmodi Statuta vel consuetudines editæ fuerint vel servatæ, Ac etiam qui secundum prædicta judicaverint, ipso jure Excommunicationem incurrunt, quæ quantum sit Christi fidelibus metuenda, ipsis plene poteris declarare. Idem sub pœna eadem te facere volumus cum Parliamentum inchoabitur, tam erga prædictos Consilarios quam Communitates, et alios qui vocem in ipso habuerint Parlamento. Insuper ut pluribus viis honori Dei et Sanctæ Matris Ecclesiæ, et animarum salutis provideatur, sub simili pœna mandes ac præcipias omnibus tam Rectoribus Ecclesiarum, quam aliis officium prædicationis obtinentibus, Secularibus et Religiosis, ut frequenter in sermonibus suis populos de prædicta materia instruere non omitant. Volumus autem ut quicquid super prædictis feceris per tuas literas (quibus saltem duæ graves personæ, quæ ipsis requisitionibus per te faciendis interfuerint, se subscribant) nos certos efficias. XLI.—Act. 33. Anno Regni vicesimo tertio.

An Act concerning Restraint of payment of Annates to the See of Rome.

FORASMUCH as it is well perceived, by long approved experience, that great and inestimable sums of money have been daily conveyed out of this realm, to the impoverishment of the same; and specially such sums of money as the pope's holiness, his predecessors, and the court of Rome, by long time have heretofore taken of all and singular those spiritual persons which have been named, elected, presented, or postulated to be archbishops or bishops within this realm of England, under the title of annates, otherwise called first fruits; which annates, or first fruits, have been taken of every archbishopric or bishopric within this realm, by restraint of the pope's bulls, for confirmations, elections, admissions, postulations, provisions, collations, dispositions, institutions, installations, investitures, orders, holy benedictions, palls, or other things requisite and necessary to the attaining of those their promotions, and have been compelled to pay, before they could attain the same, great sums of money, before they might receive any part of the fruits of the said archbishopric or bishopric whereunto they were named, elected, presented, or postulated; by occasion whereof not only the treasure of this realm hath been greatly conveyed out of the same, but also it hath happened many times, by occasion of death, unto such archbishops and bishops so newly promoted, within two or three years after his or their consecration, that his or their friends, by whom he or they have been holpen to advance and make payment of the said annates, or first fruits, have been thereby utterly undone and impoverished: and for because the said annates have risen, grown, and increased, by an uncharitable custom grounded upon no just or good title, and the payments thereof obtained by restraint of bulls, until the same annates or first fruits have been paid, or surety made for the same, which declareth the said payments to be exacted and taken by constraint, against all equity and justice. The noblemen, therefore, of the realm, and the wise, sage, politic Commons of the same, assembled in this present parliament, considering that the court of Rome ceaseth not to tax, take, and exact the said great sums of money, under the title of annates or first fruits, as is aforesaid, to the great damage of the said prelates and this realm; which annates or first fruits were first suffered to be taken within the same realm, for the only defence of Christian people against the Infidels, and now they be claimed and demanded as mere duty, only for lucre, against all right and conscience. Inasmuch that it is evidently known that there hath passed out of this realm unto the court of Rome, sithen the second year of the reign of the most noble prince, of famous memory, king Henry VII., unto this present time, under the name of annates or first fruits, paid for the expedition of bulls of archbishops and bishops, the sum of eight hundred thousand ducats, amounting, in sterling money, at the least to eight-score thousand pounds, besides other great and intolerable sums which have yearly been conveyed to the said court of Rome, by many other ways and means, to the great impoverishment of this realm. And albeit, that our said sovereign the king, and all his natural subjects, as well spiritual as temporal, been as obedient, devout, Catholic, and humble children of God, and holy church, as any people be within any realm christened, yet the said exactions of annates or first fruits be so intolerable and importable to this realm, that it is considered and declared, by the whole body of this realm now represented, by all the estates of the same assembled in this present parliament, that the king's highness before Almighty God is bound, as by the duty of a good christian prince, for the conservation and preservation of the good estate and commonwealth of this his realm, to do all that in him is to obviate, repress, and redress the said abuses and exactions of annates or first fruits. And because that divers prelates of this realm being now in extreme age, and in other debilities of their bodies, so that of likelihood, bodily death in short time shall or may succeed unto them; by reason whereof great sums of money shall, shortly after their deaths, be conveyed unto the court of Rome, for the unreasonable and uncharitable causes abovesaid, to the universal damage, prejudice, and impoverishment of this realm, if speedy remedy be not in due time provided: It is therefore ordained, established, and enacted, by authority of this present parliament, That the unlawful payment of annates, or first fruits and all manner contributions for the same, for any archbishopric, or bishopric, or for any bulls hereafter to be obtained from the court of Rome, to or for the foresaid purpose and intent, shall from henceforth utterly cease, and no such hereafter to be paid for any archbishopric, or bishopric, within this realm, other or otherwise than hereafter in this present act is declared; and that no manner person, nor persons hereafter to be named, elected, presented, or postulated to any archbishopric, or bishopric, within this realm, shall pay the said annates, or first fruits, for the said archbishopric, or bishopric, nor any other manner of sum or sums of money, pensions, or annates for the same, or for any other like exaction or cause, upon pain to forfeit to our said sovereign lord the king, his heirs and successors, all manner his goods and chattels for ever, and all the temporal lands and possessions of the same archbishopric, or bishopric, during the time that he or they which shall offend, contrary to this present act, shall have, possess, or enjoy, the archbishopric, or bishopric; wherefore he shall so offend contrary to the form aforesaid. And furthermore it is enacted, by authority of this present parliament, That if any person hereafter named and presented to the court of Rome by the king, or any of his heirs or successors, to be bishop of any see or diocese within this realm hereafter, shall be letted, deferred, or delayed at the court of Rome from any such bishopric, whereunto he shall be so represented, by means of restraint of bulls apostolic, and other things requisite to the same; or shall be denied, at the court of Rome, upon convenient suit any manner bulls requisite for any of the causes aforesaid, any such person or persons so presented, may be, and shall be, consecrated here in England by the archbishop, in whose province the said bishopric shall be, so always that the same person shall be named and presented by the king for the time being to the same archbishopric: and if any persons being named and presented, as aforesaid, to any archbishopric of this realm, making convenient suit, as is aforesaid, shall happen to be letted, deferred, delayed, or otherwise disturbed from the same archbishopric, for lack of pall, bulls, or other to him requisite, to be obtained in the court of Rome in that behalf, that then every such person named and presented to be archbishop, may be, and shall be, consecrated and invested, after presentation made, as is aforesaid, by any other two bishops within this realm, whom the king's highness, or any of his heirs or successors, kings of England for the time being, will assign and appoint for the same, according and in like manner as divers other archbishops and bishops have been heretofore, in ancient time by sundry the king's most noble progenitors, made, consecrated, and invested within this realm: and that every archbishop and bishop hereafter, being named and presented by the king's highness, his heirs or successors, kings of England, and being consecrated and invested, as is aforesaid, shall be installed accordingly, and shall be accepted, taken, reputed, used, and obeyed, as an archbishop or bishop of the dignity, see, or place whereunto he so shall be named, presented, and consecrated requireth; and as other like prelates of that province, see, or diocese, have been used, accepted, taken, and obeyed, which have had, and obtained completely, their bulls, and other things requisite in that behalf from the court of Rome. And also shall fully and entirely have and enjoy all the spiritualities and temporalities of the said archbishopric, or bishopric, in as large, ample, and beneficial manner, as any of his or their predecessors had or enjoyed in the said archbishopric, or bishopric, satisfying and yielding unto the king our sovereign lord, and to his heirs and successors, kings of England, all such duties, rights, and interests, as before this time had been accustomed to be paid for any such archbishopric, or bishopric, according to the ancient laws and customs of this realm, and the king's prerogative royal. And to the intent our said holy father the pope, and the court of Rome, shall not think that the pains and labours taken, and hereafter to be taken, about the writing, sealing, obtaining, and other businesses sustained, and hereafter to be sustained, by the offices of the said court of Rome, for and about the expedition of any bulls hereafter to be obtained or had for any such archbishopric, or bishopric, shall be irremunerated, or shall not be sufficiently and condignly recompensed in that behalf. And for their more ready expedition to be had therein, it is therefore enacted by the authority aforesaid, That every spiritual person of this realm, hereafter to be named, presented, or postulated, to any archbishopric or bishopric of this realm, shall and may lawfully pay for the writing and obtaining of his or their said bulls, at the court of Rome, and ensembling the same with lead, to be had without payment of any annates, or first fruits, or other charge or exaction by him or them to be made, yielded, or paid for the same, five pounds sterling, for and after the rate of the clear and whole yearly value of every hundredth pounds sterling, above all charges of any such archbishopric, or bishopric, or other money, to the value of the said five pounds, for the clear yearly value of every hundredth pounds of every such archbishopric, or bishopric, and not above, nor in any other wise, any things in this present act before written notwithstanding. And forasmuch as the king's highness, and this his high court of parliament, neither have, nor do intend to use in this, or any other like cause, any manner of extremity or violence, before gentle courtesy or friendship, ways and means first approved and attempted, and without a very great urgent cause and occasion given to the contrary, but principally coveting to disburden this realm of the said great exactions, and intolerable charges of annates, and first fruits, have therefore thought convenient to commit the final order and determination of the premises, in all things, unto the king's highness. So that if it may seem to his high wisdom, and most prudent discretion, meet to move the pope's holiness, and the court of Rome, amicably, charitably, and reasonably, to compound, other to extinct and make frustrate the payments of the said annates, or first fruits; or else by some friendly, loving, and tolerable composition to moderate the same in such wise as may be by this realm easily borne and sustained; that then those ways and compositions once taken, concluded, and agreed, between the pope's holiness and the king's highness, shall stand in strength, force, and effect of law, inviolably to be observed. And it is also further ordained, and enacted by the authority of this present parliament, That the king's highness at any time, or times, on this side the feast of Easter, which shall be in the year of our Lord God, one thousand five hundred and three and thirty, or at any time on this side the beginning of the next parliament, by his letters patents under his great seal, to be made, and to be entered of record in the roll of this present parliament, may and shall have full power and liberty to declare, by the said letters patents, whether that the premises, or any part, clause, or matter thereof, shall be observed, obeyed, executed, and take place and effect, as an act and statute of this present parliament or not. So that if his highness, by his said letters patents, before the expiration of the times above limited, thereby do declare his pleasure to be, that the premises, or any part, clause, or matter thereof, shall not be put in execution, observed, continued, nor obeyed, in that case all the said premises, or such part, clause, or matter, as the king's highness so shall refuse, disaffirm, or not ratify, shall stand and be from henceforth utterly void and of none effect. And in case that the king's highness, before the expiration of the times afore-prefixed, do declare by his said letters patents his pleasure and determination to be, that the said premises, or every clause, sentence, and part thereof, that is to say, the whole, or such part thereof as the king's highness so shall affirm, accept, and ratify, shall in all points stand, remain, abide, and be put in due and effectual execution, according to the purport, tenor, effect, and true meaning of the same; and to stand and be from henceforth for ever after, as firm, stedfast, and available in the law, as the same had been fully and perfectly established, enacted, and confirmed, to be in every part thereof, immediately, wholly, and entirely executed, in like manner, form, and effect, as other acts and laws; the which being fully and determinately made, ordained, and enacted in this present parliament: and if that upon the foresaid reasonable, amicable and charitable ways and means, by the king's highness to be experimented, moved, or compounded, or otherwise approved, it shall and may appear, or be seen unto his grace, that this realm shall be continually burdened and charged with this, and such other intolerable exactions and demands as heretofore it hath been. And that thereupon, for continuance of the same, our said holy father the pope, or any of his successors, or the court of Rome will, or do, or cause to be done at any time hereafter, so as is above rehearsed, unjustly, uncharitably, and unreasonably vex, inquiet, molest, trouble, or grieve our said sovereign lord, his heirs or successors, kings of England, or any of his or their spiritual or lay subjects, or this his realm, by excommunication, excommungement, interdiction; or by any other process, censures, compulsories, ways, or means; be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the king's highness, his heirs and successors, kings of England, and all his spiritual and lay subjects of the same, without any scruples of conscience, shall and may lawfully, to the honour of Almighty God, the increase and continuance of virtue and good example within this realm, the said censures, excommunications, interdictions, compulsories, or any of them notwithstanding, minister, or cause to be ministered, throughout this said realm, and all other the dominions or territories belonging or appertaining thereunto; all and all manner sacraments, sacramentals, ceremonies, or other divine services, of the holy church, or any other thing or things necessary for the health of the soul of mankind, as they heretofore at any time or times have been virtuously used or accustomed to do within the same; and that no manner such censures, excommunications, interdictions, or any other process or compulsories, shall be by any of the prelates, or other spiritual fathers of this region, nor by any of their ministers or substitutes, be at any time or times hereafter published, executed, nor divulged, nor suffered to be published, executed, or divulged in any manner of ways. Cui quidem Billæ prædictæ et ad plenum intellectæ per dictum Dominum Regem ex assensu et Autoritate Parlamenti prædicti taliter est Responsum.

To the Pope's Holiness, 1532.

AFTER most humble commendations, and most devout kissing of your blessed feet. Albeit that we have hitherto differed to make answer to those letters dated at Bonony, the 7th day of October; which letters of late were delivered unto us by Paul of Cassali: yet when they appear to be written for this cause, that we deeply considering the contents of the same, should provide for the tranquillity of our own conscience, and should purge such scruples and doubts conceived of our cause of matrimony; we could neither neglect those letters sent for such a purpose, nor after that we had diligently examined and perpended the effects of the same, which we did very diligently, noting, conferring and revolving every thing in them contained, with deep study of mind, pretermitt ne leave to answer unto them. Forsith that your holiness seemeth to go about that thing chiefly, which is to vanquish those doubts, and to take away inquietations which daily do prick our conscience; inasmuch as it doth appear at the first sight to be done of zeal, love, and piety, we therefore do thank you of your good will. Howsith it is not performed in deed, that ye preter have thought it expedient to require your holiness provide us other remedies; wherefore foras much your holiness would vouchsafe to write unto concerning this matter, we heartily thank you, greatly lamenting also both the chance of your holiness, and also ours, unto whom both twain it hath chanced in so high a matter of so great moment to be frustrated and deceived; that is to say, That your holiness not being instructed, nor having knowledge of the matter, of yourself, should be compelled to hang upon the judgment of others, and so put forth and make answers, gathered of other men, being variable and repugnant among themselves. And that we being so long sick, and exagitate with this same sore, should so long time in vain look for remedy; which when we have augmented our ægritude and distress by delay and protracting of time, ye do so cruciate the patient and afflicted, as who seeth it should much avail to protract the cause, and through vain hope of the end of our desire to lead us whither ye will. But to speak plainly to your holiness; forasmuch as we have suffered many injuries, which with great difficulty we do sustain and digest; albeit that among all things passed by your holiness, some cannot be laid, alleged, nor objected against your holiness, yet in many of them some default appeareth to be in you, which I would to God we could so diminish, as it might appear no default; but it cannot be hid, which is so manifest, and though we could say nothing, the thing itself speaketh. But as to that that is affirmed in your letters, both of God's law and man's, otherwise than is necessary and truth, let that be ascribed to the temerity and ignorance of your counsellors, and your holiness to be without all default, save only for that ye do not admit more discreet and learned men to be your counsellors, and stop the mouths of them which liberally would speak the truth. This truly is your default, and verily a great fault, worthy to be alienate and abhorred of Christ's Vicar, in that ye have dealt so variably, yea rather so inconstantly and deceptively. Be ye not angry with my words, and let it be lawful for me to speak the truth without displeasure; if your holiness shall be displeased with that we do rehearse, impute no default in us, but in your own deeds; which deeds have so molested and troubled us wrongfully, that we speak now unwillingly, and as enforced thereunto. Never was there any prince so handled by a pope as your holiness hath entreated us. First, when our cause was proponed to your holiness, when it was explicated and declared afore the same; when certain doubts in it were resolved by your counsellors, and all things discussed, it was required that answer might be made thereunto by the order of the law. There was offered a commission, with a promise also that the same commission should not be revoked; and whatsoever sentence should be given, should straight without delay be confirmed. The judges were sent unto us, the promise was delivered to us, subscribed with your holiness's hand; which avouched to confirm the sentence, and not to revoke the commission, nor to grant anything else that might let the same; and finally to bring us in a greater hope, a certain commission-decretal, defining the cause, was delivered to the judge's hands. If your holiness did grant us all these things justly, ye did unjustly revoke them; and if by good and truth the same was granted, they were not made frustrate nor annihilate without fraud; so as if there were no deceit nor fraud in the revocation, then how wrongfully and subtly have been done those things that have been done! Whether will your holiness say, That ye might do those things that ye have promised, or that ye might not do them? If he will say that ye might do them, where then is the faith which ye have promised? If he will say that ye might not do them, ye have broken your promise, and much more a pope to have, those things not being performed, which lawfully were promised? And if ye will say that ye might not do them, have we not then very just cause to mistrust those medicines and remedies with which in your letters ye go about to heal our conscience, especially in that we may perceive and see those remedies to be prepared for us, not to relieve the sickness and disease of our mind, but for other means, pleasures, and worldly respects? And as it should seem profitable, that we should ever continue in hope or despair, so always the remedy is attempted; so that we being always a-healing, and never healed, should be sick still. And this truly was the chief cause why we did consult and take the advice of every learned man, being free, without all affection, that the truth (which now with our labour and study we seem partly to have attained) by their judgments more manifestly divulged, we might more at large perceive; whose judgments and opinions it is easy to see how much they differ from that, that those few men of yours do show unto you, and by those your letters is signified. Those few men of yours do affirm the prohibition of our marriage to be inducted only by the law positive, as your holiness hath also written in your letters; but all others say the prohibition to be inducted, both by the law of God and nature: those men of yours do suggest, that it may be dispensed for avoiding of slanders; the others utterly do contend, that by no means it is lawful to dispense with that, that God and nature hath forbidden. We do separate from our cause the authority of the see apostolic, which we do perceive to be destitute of that learning whereby it should be directed; and because your holiness doth ever profess your ignorance, and is wont to speak of other men's mouths, we do confer the sayings of those with the sayings of them that be of the contrary opinion, for to confer the reasons it were too long. But now the universities of Cambridge, Oxford, in our realms; Paris, Orleans, Biturisen, Andegavon, in France; and Bonony in Italy, by one consent; and also divers other of the most famous and learned men, being freed from all affection, and only moved in respect of verity, partly in Italy, and partly in France, do affirm the marriage of the brother with the brother's wife, to be contrary both to the law of God and nature; and also do pronounce that no dispensation can be lawful or available to any Christian man in that behalf: but others think the contrary, by whose counsels your holiness hath done that, that sithence ye have confessed ye could not do in promising to us as we have above rehearsed, and giving that commission to the cardinal Campege to be showed unto us; and after, if it so should seem profitable to burn it, as afterwards it was done indeed as we have perceived. Furthermore, those which so do moderate the power of your holiness, that they do affirm, that the same cannot take away the appellation which is used by man's law, and yet is available to Divine matters everywhere without distinction. No princes heretofore have more highly esteemed, nor honoured the see apostolic than we have; wherefore we be the more sorry to be provoked to this contention, which to our usage and nature is most alienate and abhorred. Those things so cruel we write very heavily, and more glad would have been to have been silent if we might, and would have left your authority untouched with a good will, and constrained to seek the verity, we fell, against our will, into this contention; but the sincerity of the truth prohibited us to keep silence, and what should we do in so great and many perplexities? For truly if we should obey the letters of your holiness, in that they do affirm that we know to be otherwise, we should offend God and our conscience, and we should be a great slander to them that do the contrary, which be a great number, as we have before rehearsed: also, if we should dissent from those things which your holiness doth pronounce, we would account it not lawful, if there were not a cause to defend the fact, as we now do, being compelled by necessity, lest we should seem to contemn the authority of the see apostolic. Therefore your holiness ought to take it in good part, though we do somewhat at large and more liberally speak in this cause, which doth so oppress us, specially forasmuch as we pretend none atrocity, nor use no rhetoric in the exaggerating and increasing the indignity of the matter; but if I speak of anything that toucheth the quick, it proceedeth of the mere verity, which we cannot nor ought not to hide in this cause, for it toucheth not worldly things but divine, not frail but eternal; in which things no feigned, false, nor painted reasons, but only the truth, shall obtain and take place: and God is the truth, to whom we are bound to obey rather than to men; and nevertheless we cannot but obey unto men also, as we were wont to do, unless there be an express cause why we should not; which by those our letters we now do to your holiness: and we do it with charity, not intending to spread it abroad, nor yet further to impugn your authority, unless ye do compel us; albeit also, that that we do, doth not impugn your authority, but confirmeth the same, which we revocate to its first foundations; and better it is in the middle way to return, than always to run forth headlong and do ill. Wherefore if your holiness do regard or esteem the tranquillity of our mind, let the same be established with verity, which hath been brought to light by the consent of so many learned men; so shall your holiness reduce and bring us to a certainty and quietness, and shall deliver us from all anxiety, and shall provide both for us and our realm, and finally shall do your office and duty. The residue of our affairs we have committed to our ambassadors to be propounded unto you, to whom we beseech your holiness to give credence, &c.

XLIV.—Bonner's Letter about the proceedings at Rome. An original.

Rome, April 29, 1532.

PLEASETH it your highness; this is to advertise the same, that sithen we William Benet, Edward Karne, and Edmond Bonner, sent our letters of the 7th of this present to your highness; there hath been two disputations public, the one the 13th of this, the other the 20th day of the same, according to the order given and assigned, which was three conclusions to be disputed every consistory; and what was spoken, as well by your highness's counsel, for the justification of the conclusion purposed the said 13th, as also for the impugnation thereof by the party adverse, with answers made thereunto by your highness's said counsel as fully as were anywise deduced, your said highness shall perceive by the books sent herewithal containing the same; and also the justifications, objections, and answers, made in the 6th of this present according as I Edward Karne in my said letters promised. The copies of all the which justifications, objections, and answers, after that they were fully noted and deduced in writing, and maturely considered by your highness's learned counsel, I Edward Karne did bring to the pope's holiness, and to the cardinals, for their better information; and likewise did of the first, alwise afore the consistory, according to the order assigned at the beginning; looking in likewise that the queen's counsel should do this same, but as yet they have done nothing therein, though your ambassadors and I have called upon the pope many times for the same. And as concerning such things as were spoken and done for either part in the disputation of the 20th day, it is not possible for us, by reason of the shortness of time, to reduce all in good order, and to send the same to your highness at this time; nevertheless with all speed it shall be made ready, and sent to your highness by the next courier. After the disputation done, the said 13th day of this present, the advocate of the party adverse did allege, that we did seek this disputation but only to defer the process; protesting therefore, that the queen's counsel would dispute no more; and desiring therefore the pope's holiness, and the whole consistory, to make process in the principal cause. Whereunto I Edward Karne said, that the pope's holiness, with the whole senate, had granted the disputations upon the matters, and given an order that the conclusions published should be disputed according to the same. Whereupon I desired that forasmuch as there remained sixteen conclusions not disputed, (which to propose and justify, with your highness's counsel, I would be ready at all times,) that if the party adverse knowing the conclusions to be canonical, would not confess them, and thereby avoid disputations, that then the said party should dispute them, and upon the refusal of both the same, the matters excusatories to be admitted by his holiness, especially because the said party adverse hath nothing material that could be perceived to let the same. The pope's holiness answered, that he would deliberate upon the demand of both parties. The 16th of this present, the datary on the pope's behalf sent unto me Edward Karne an intimation for disputation of the consistory to be kept the 20th of this present, and that I should send the conclusions not disputed, that they might be in the said consistory disputed; adding withal, that the said consistory should be ultimus et peremptorius terminus quoad alias disputationes. Of the which intimation your highness shall receive a copy herewith. Upon this, with the advice of your ambassadors and counsel here I repaired unto the said datary, and brought unto him three conclusions to be disputed, with a protestation, de non recedendo ab ordine hactenus observato, according to the proem of the said conclusions, the copy whereof your highness shall receive herewith. Afterwards with the same conclusions and protestation I went to cardinal de Monte, who said at the beginning that all the consistory crieth out upon the disputation, and that we had been heard sufficiently, and that it was enough that we should have the fourth disputation, adding withal that it was a thing never seen before after such sort, and that it stood not with the honour of the see to have such disputations in the consistory to the great disquieting of the pope and the cardinals, especially considering the manner that is used, and that all the conclusions be touched which should content us. To this I answered and desired his most reverend lordship to call to his remembrance what he had promised to your highness's ambassadors and me, in the Castel-Angel upon Shrove-Sunday, the pope being present and allowing the same, contented that all the conclusions should be disputed singulariter, and that I should at my pleasure from time to time choose the conclusions to be disputed. And how also afterward, viz. 17th February, the pope's holiness, cardinal Ancona and his lordship not going from that promise, gave direction for three conclusions to be disputed every consistory, the choice whereof to be at my liberty (according to the copy of the said order which I sent to your highness with my letters, of the date of the 22nd of the last); and furthermore, that what time the order to dispute three conclusions in a consistory was sent unto me, and I required to send the conclusions first to be disputed according to the said order, I did, to avoid all manner of doubts, protest afore I would accept it, and in the deliverance of the said conclusions that I would not otherwise accept it, but that all the conclusions according to the order promised in Castel-Angel should be disputed and examined singulariter, and that standing and not otherwise I delivered my said conclusions according to the order of the 17th of February, which order the pope's holiness hitherto had approved and observed, and from that I neither could nor would go from: and where he said that we had been heard sufficiently, I said that audience and information of less than the one half of a matter could not be sufficient; and if they intended to see the truth of the whole every point must be discussed. And as for the crying out of the cardinals, I said they had no cause so to do, for it was more for the honour of the see apostolic to see such a cause as this is well and surely tried, so that the truth may appear and the matters be well known, than to proceed precipitantly, as they did at the beginning of this matter afore they well knew what the matter was. And as touching the disquieting the pope's holiness and the said cardinals, I said your highness for their pains was much beholden unto them; nevertheless, I said that they might on the other side ponder such pains as your highness hath taken for them, in part declared by me, which was much more than for them to sit in their chairs two or three hours in a week to hear the justice of your defence in this cause. And as touching the manner used in the said disputation, I said his lordship knew well that it was by the party adverse, which all manner of ways goeth about to fatigue and make weary the consistory of the disputations, specially in chiding, scolding, and alleging laws and decisions that never were, nor spoken of by any doctor, and vainly continuing the time, to the intent that the pope's holiness and the cardinals dissolving the consistory, and not giving audience, the said party, without law, reason, or any good ground, might attain their desire, and keep under the truth that it should not appear; and if anything was sharply spoken of our party, I said it was done only for our defence, and to show the errors and falsity of the queen's advocates in their allegations, wherein I said they should not be spared. And forasmuch as on the behalf of your highness there was nothing spoken but that which was grounded upon law, and declared in what place, so that it cannot be denied; I desired his lordship that he would continue his goodness in this matter, as your highness's especial trust was he would do; and that we might always, as we were accustomed, have recourse unto the same in all our business for his good help and counsel. His lordship, not yet satisfied, said that as concerning the order, the pope's holiness might interpretate and declare what he meant by it; and as touching the conclusions, they were superfluous, impertinent, and calumnious, only proposed to defer the matter. I answered and said, that to interpretate the said order, where it is clear out of doubt, the pope's holiness considering the promise made on Shrove-Sunday, with my protestation foresaid, and the execution of the said order to that time, in divers consistories observed, could not by right interpretate the said order, admitting disputation upon all the conclusions; and of this I said, that if such alterations were made, without any cause given of your highness's party, there was little certainty to be reckoned upon amongst them. And as touching the superfluity and impertinency of the said conclusions, I said, that that was the saying of the party adverse, that did not understand the same conclusions. And further, that such conclusions as were clamorously by the advocates of the party adverse alleged to be superfluous, his lordship in the disputation and trial thereof in the consistory did manifestly perceive that it was not so. And where it was alleged the said conclusions to be calumnious, and laid in to defer the process, I answered that we might well allege again the counsel of the party adverse, the thing against us alleged, and say truly that we were calumniously dealt withal, seeing the matters were so just and clear, and yet not admitted. Then his lordship went further, and said, that impedimentum allegatum erat perpetuum, because your highness, ex causa rripublicæ, could not come out your realm, and quia dignitas vestra est perpetua; and also quod causa requirit celeritatem. To this, I said that his lordship mistook the matter, for we said not in the matters that your highness could not go out of your realm to no place, but we said that the same could not go, ad loca tam remota, as Rome is; so that it was not perpetuum impedimentum. And to the other I showed him a text, and the common opinion of doctors in a cause of matrimony, being inter Regem et Reginam, which took away the thing that he had said. Then his lordship said, that it was enough that the place were sure to the procurator by the chapter, cum olim de testibus. I said that that chapter did not prove that allegation, and that they mistook the text that so did understand it, for the alternative that is in that text is not referred ad locum tutum, but ad ordinem citationis inchoanda in persona principali, aut ejus procuratore; and so Petrus de Anchorano understandeth that text; and otherwise understanding the same it should be against the chapter, Ex parte de appellatione, and the common opinion there. Then he said that Aretine saith, Quod sufficit quum locus sit tutus procuratori. I said, that under his favour, Aretine saith the contrary, for he saith, Quod partibus debet locus tutus assignari si poterit, et si non poterit partibus, delur procuratoribus. Then his lordship said to me, that I knew well he began to set forward these disputations, and that he would do the best he could for the furtherance thereof.

The 19th of this present I went with your highness's ambassadors to the pope, and delivered his holiness in writing those things that were done in the disputation of the 13th of this: and then your ambassadors were in hand with the pope to alter the intimation, and to put out the term peremptory, and other that were exclusory of further disputations to be had upon the same conclusions. The pope's holiness said, that disputations was no act judicial requiring to be in the consistory; and therefore he said, he would call certain congregations of cardinals, on Friday and Monday following, to hear the disputations. Then I, William Benet, said, that that could not stand very well with the decree of the intimation, which was peremptory for any further disputations after the 20th of this present; and therefore I spake that the same term peremptory might be put out of the intimation, alleging withal, that upon the said Friday or Monday it was no time to hear the disputation, being so nigh after; and that his holiness hitherto hath observed the consistory for the disputations, which consistory cannot be unto after Easter, if the manner of the court be observed. Then the pope said, he might call a consistory when he would, as he hath done in making of cardinals, an act much more solemn than a disputation. To that I said, his holiness might do so if he would; howbeit, it should be præter solitum morem; and therefore desired his holiness to consider therein the order before assigned, and that this term peremptory would not stand with the order. His holiness then willed we should inform the cardinals Ancona and de Monte, and so we did; Ancona showed himself somewhat reasonable, and was contented the term peremptory should be put out. De Monte said that the pope would promise to hear the conclusions disputed in congregations, calling thereto certain cardinals, so that the term peremptory should not be prejudicial. Then I, Edward Karne, desired him, that if the said term should not be prejudicial, that it might be stricken out, for I told him plainly that I would not stand to words, the writing showing the contrary; adding withal, that I would not dispute in this term, tanquam peremptorio, but would manifestly show and protest, that I, with other your highness's counsel, were ready to defend the conclusions published, according to the order given, and hitherto observed; alleging also, that the conclusions being justified, the matters ought to be admitted; and that if the pope's holiness and the cardinals would not give audience to me and your highness's said counsel, for the manifest trial and showing of the truth, they should give us cause to complain upon them, and to cry out, usque ad Sidera, your highness's ambassadors all affirming the same. Then the said cardinal de Monte said, that the pope's holiness would provide for the disputations, notwithstanding the term peremptory assigned, and said also, that in the morning he would speak with the pope, and give your ambassadors and me an answer.

In the morning, which was the 20th of this present, the said cardinal would that nothing of the decree of Intimation should be manifested, because the other part had a copy thereof, but would the pope's holiness to give an order that the word peremptory should be only for disputations to be had in the consistory, and not in congregations, in which congregations the conclusions remaining might be disputed; and though they had drawn out this order, yet because it was nothing plain, neither certain to be conformable to the former order, I would have had the said cardinal to speak to the said datary for to make it as afore: and he was then contented, howbeit the pope's holiness commanded all the cardinals to their places, so that I could not have the said order, and was driven thereby either to dispute and accept the term, tanquam peremptorium, or else to fly the disputations; giving occasion to the adverse party to say, that I diffided in the justness of the matters, and defence of the conclusions. Whereupon your highness's ambassadors and we, with other your learned counsel, concluded, that I Edward Karne should protest, De non consentiendo in termino, tanquam peremptorio, and afterward to proceed to the proposing of the conclusions, and so I did by mouth according to the tenor of a copy, which herewithal your highness shall receive. When I had protested, and the pope had spoken this word Acceptamus, the queen's advocate began to protest that they would dispute no more, and desired his holiness to proceed in the principal cause. Then I Edward Karne said, that the pope's holiness did well perceive that the conclusions were published and proposed, not only for them to dispute, but also for all other, come who would, for the information of his holiness, and the whole consistory. And therefore I said, that though they would not dispute, yet I was there, with other your highness's learned counsel, to propose the conclusions, according to the order given, justifying them to be canonical, and ready to defend them against all those that would gainsay them; and thereupon desired the pope's holiness, that though the counsel of the party adverse would not dispute, yet I, with your highness's learned counsel, might be heard again; against which my desire the queen's advocate made great exclamations, till at the last the pope commanded him to silence, and willed us to go to the conclusions, which we did.

And here now it is determined, that we shall have no more disputations in the consistory, but the rest of the conclusions to be disputed in congregations before the pope, purposely made for the same; and what therein shall be determined or done, your highness from time to time shall thereof by us be advertised, and of all other our doings in that behalf.

And as concerning the letters which your highness sent by Francis the courier, of the last of February, as well to the pope as to me Edward Karne, for the admission of me and the matter excusatory, we shall, according to your highness's pleasure and order assigned, in the common letter sent unto us by your said highness, proceed and do therein as may be most beneficial and profitable for the same.

And thus most humbly we commend us to your highness, beseeching Almighty God to preserve the same in felicity and health many years. At Rome the 28th of March, 1532.

Your highness's most humble subjects,
servants, and chaplains,

XLV.—Another Letter concerning the Process at Rome. An Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Vitel. B. 13.]

PLEASETH it your highness, sithen our letters of the 23rd of March, here hath been great labour and soliciting, to bring the disputation public out of the consistory, kept once in the week, into the congregations, to be observed and kept before the pope's holiness and the cardinals, in such place, and as oft as should please them; to the intent, as we perceived, that the said disputation might be the sooner ended, and not take such effect as it was devised for. And upon this great importune labour, I, Edward Karne, was monished oftentimes to send conclusions to be proposed in the said congregations, as well in Palm-Sunday week as in Easter-week, as appeareth by the copies of the intimations sent herewithal to your highness: upon which intimations I delivered certain conclusions, according to the order taken at the beginning, with a protestation devised by your grace's counsel here, De non recedendo ab eodem ordine, et de proponendo easdem Conclusiones in Consistorio, juxta eundem ordinem et non aliter. That, notwithstanding, the pope's holiness caused me to be monished again, cum Comminatione, that if I would not come in, cum Advocatis, the 3rd day of April, procederet ad ulteriora protestatione me a prævia non obstante. Whereupon, with the advice of your said learned counsel, I conceived a protestation, and the same delivered to the pope's holiness the said third day in the morning, protesting as it was therein contained, and causing it to be registered by the datary; of the which protestation your highness shall also receive a copy herewithal. This notwithstanding, the pope's holiness, the said third day in the afternoon, made a congregation, where the said protestation was examined; and, after the treaty had upon the same, we were in conclusion remitted again to the consistory, there to be heard, as much as the consistory intendeth to hear, upon the conclusions that are published; which was much more beneficial to us than to have had all proposed in congregations to have been kept as is afore. And by this means the matter was shifted off, and deferred unto the 10th of this month; at which time the pope's holiness kept the consistory. And one Mr. Providel, a singular good clerk, which came from Bonony for the furtherance of your highness's cause, very compendiously, and after good fashion and handling, to the great contentation, as appeared, of the audience there, purposed three conclusions, of the which two concerned the habilitation of me, Edward Karne, to lay in the matters excusatory: and the third was, that the cause ought to be committed, extra curiam, ad locum tutum utriusque partis: of the which conclusions, and also his sayings, the said 10th day, your highness shall receive a copy herewithal. And forasmuch as at the said consistory, neither the imperials, neither yet the queen's counsel, did appear; I, Edward Karne, with the advice of your highness's counsel, said to the pope's holiness, after the proposition made by Mr. Providel, that his holiness might perceive well, that if the party adverse had any good matter to allege, against such things as were deduced for the justification of the conclusions and matter excusatory, and did not diffide of their part, they would not have absented themselves or shrunken from the disputations, which they afore had accepted and taken; wherefore I accused their contumacy and absence, desiring that it might be enacted, and thereupon departed from the consistory, for that day dissolved.

The 14th of this present, the pope's holiness caused intimation to be made unto me, of the consistory to be kept the 17th of the same; willing me to be there, cum Advocatis, to dispute all the conclusions not proposed and disputed: upon the which intimation, I delivered to the datary three conclusions, the 19th, the 20th, and the 21st in order, with a protestation devised by your learned counsel, sent herewithal to your highness: and in the said consistory, Mr. Providel did also allege for the justification of the matters and conclusions; and over that answered to such objections as he thought the party adverse to make foundation upon, and that very compendiously, being sorry that the imperials and queen's counsel did not come in to dispute the said conclusions, and the sayings of the said Mr. Providel in the said consistory, with my protestation also, in not agreeing to the term, as peremptory, your highness shall perceive in writing sent herewithal.

As concerning the seven conclusions yet remaining undisputed, we think the pope's holiness will bear us no further in the consistory, saying that the part adverse will not abide the disputations, nor come into the same; nevertheless to take otherwise out of the consistory, with the cardinal's information, his holiness is well contented.

And verily, sir, to study, labour, set forward, and call upon such things as may confer to the advancement of the matter and your highness's purpose, there shall not want neither good will, neither diligence to the uttermost, that we can excogitate or desire: as hitherto surely neither party hath failed; trusting in God that thereby, if justice be not oppressed, some good effect shall follow, to the good contentation of your highness. With these presents your highness shall also receive a copy of all things that were spoken, as well for your highness's behalf as by the party adverse in the consistory, the 20th day of March.

And thus most humbly we commend us to your highness, beseeching Almighty God long to continue the same in his most royal estate. At Rome, the 29th of April.

Your highness's most humble subjects,
and poor servants,

EDWARD KARNE.
EDMOND BONNER.

SERENISSIME et Invictissime Domine noster Supreme, salutem. Tribus Superioribus Consistoriis ante vacationes habitis, de Causa Excusatoria actum fuit; sed quid illud fuerit quod in primo egerunt rescire non potuimus, quia Cardinales pena Excommunicationis prohibiti fuerant quicquam revelare. Secundo etiam aliquod super eadem causa tractarunt, quod itidem nos celaverunt. Sed ultimo illo, quod die octavo Julii Congregatum fuit, ita ut inferius patebit, constituerunt. Quam ergo postero die Pontificem advisavimus, ut quod decretum foret cognosceremus, ab eo sic accepimus; nolle se ore suo, propterea quod Jurisperitus non sit, Consistorii deliberationem pronunciare; quocirca die sequenti ad ipsum rediremus, quoniam vellet Cardinales Montem et Anconitanum id ipsa nobis proferre: Et nihilominus idem quod deinde ex ipsis Cardinalibus audivimus tunc explicavit, noluit tamen nobis esse Responsi loco. Igitur sicut dixerat, redivimus, et nobis duo illi Cardinales sic retulerunt summum Dominum et Cardinales decrevisse, literas Exhortatorias cum a Pontifice, tum a Collegio Cardinalium, Majestati vestræ scribendas esse, quibus vestram Majestatem adhortarentur, ut velit hic ad

Causam Procuratorem constituere, idq; per totum Octobrem proximum facere. Pontifex præterea suadebat ut ad idem nos Majestatem Vestram cohortaremur, iidemq; fecerunt Cardinales, volentes omnes ambiguitates et dubitationes tollere. Respondimus, velle quod nobis injungebatur Majestati Vestræ scribere; verum illud non posse reticere quod erga Majestatem Vestram inique actum videbatur; quum neq; Excusator admissus, neq; ipsius allegationes forent probatæ ac receptæ, id quod tam sæpe instantissime petium fuerat. Præterea non posse nos non valde mirari, ac etiam summopere conqueri, quod quum pro comperto haberemus juris esse id fieri, esset nihilominus denegatum; quum præsertim petendo Mandatum procuratorium, tacite viderentur rejicere Excusatorem, et per ipsum allegata. Sic autem illi nobis respondeant, neque Excusatorem fuisse rejectum, neq; per ipsum allegata, sed in eodem, quo prius, statu permanere; hoc autem excusatorium negotium minime, ut nobis iudicibus clarum, sed dubium videri. Ibiq; Anconitanus quedam nostris contraria adduxit, quæ D. Karne suis literis recenset. Dicebant quoq; in hac re favorabilius nos, quam adversarios fuisse tractatos; illud etiam addentes, quod si procuratorium mandatum mittatur, justitia optime ministrabitur, ac etiam quantum fieri possit, favorabiliter; idque et Pontifex et Cardinales ambo constanter asseverabant. Quum vero nos sæpius diceremus, excusatorem admitti debuisse, dixerunt, si recte considerare velimus, nos idem ipsum re habuisse; si enim (aibant), Procurator hic constituatur, literæ Remissoriæ et Compulsoriæ decernentur, ad testes in partibus examinandos. Itemq; vir aliquis probus ad id delegabitur ad utramq; partem, testesque scil. examinandos, ita ut processus in partibus fiat; Atque hoc pacto nos id consequi quod desideramus, quoniam quod ad totius causæ decisionem pertinet, ex eo quod de Pontificis potestate cognoscendum, et de jure Divino disceptandum sit, ac aliis etiam de causis, ipsam Decisionem Pontifici integram semper reservari nihilominus oporteret, quamvis causam alibi quam Romæ cognosci permissum fuisset. Nobis certe visum est, haud parum esse quod obtinuumus, longe enim pejora timebamus, quum nemo in urbe esset, qui non crederet Excusatorem una cum suis allegationibus rejectum iri. Hunc quidem eventum rei Cæsariani ægerime tulerunt. Optime valeat Majestas Vestra. Romæ die 13 Julii 1532.

Vestræ Regiæ Majestatis

XLVIII.—Act 5, Anno Regni 25.

An Act concerning the Deprivations of the Bishops of Salisbury and Worcester.

WHERE before this time the church of England, by the king's most noble progenitors, and the nobles of the same, have been founded, ordained, and established, in the estate and degree of prelatie dignities, and other promotions spiritual, to the intent and purpose that the said prelates, and other persons, having the said dignities and promotions spiritual, continually should be abiding, and reseants upon their said promotions within this realm; and also keep, use, and exercise hospitality, divine services, teaching and preaching of the laws of Almighty God to such persons as were and have been within the precinct of their promotions or dignities, for the wealth of the souls of their givers and founders, greatly to the honour of Almighty God. Of the which said spiritual persons, the king's highness, and his most noble progenitors, have had right honourable and well-learned personages, apt, meet, and convenient, for to guide and instruct his highness, and his most noble progenitors, in their counsels, concerning as well their outward as inward affairs, to be devised and practised for the utility and preservation of this realm; by reason whereof the issues, revenues, profits, and treasure, rising and coming of the said spiritual promotions and dignities, were and should be spent, employed, and converted within this realm, to the great profit and commodity of the king's subjects of the same. And where also by the laudable laws and provisions of this realm, before this time made, it hath been ordained, used, and established, that no person nor persons, of whatsoever estate, degree, or quality he or they were, should take or receive within this realm of England, to farm, by any procuracy, writ, letter of attorney, administrations, by indenture, or by any other mean, any benefice, or other promotion within this realm, of any person or persons, but only of the king's true and lawful subjects, being born under the king's dominions. And also that no person or persons, of what estate and degree soever he or they were, by reason of any such farm, procuracy, letter of attorney, administration, indenture, or by any other mean, as is aforesaid, should carry, convey, or cause to be carried and conveyed out of this realm, any gold, silver, treasure, or other commodity, by letter of exchange, or by way of merchandise, or otherwise, for any of the causes aforesaid, to the profit or commodity of any alien, or other stranger, being born out of this realm, having any such promotion spiritual within the same, without license of the king's highness, by the advice of his council, as by the same laws, statutes, and provisions, more plainly at large it may appear; which said laudable laws, statutes, and provisions, were made, devised, and ordained by great policy and foresight of the king's most noble progenitors, (i.e. nobles and commons of this realm, for the great profit, utility, and benefit of the same, to the intent that the gold, silver, treasure, riches, and other commodity of the same, by the occasion aforesaid, should not be exhausted, employed, converted, and otherwise transported out of this realm and dominions of the same, to the use, profit, and commodity of any stranger being born out of this realm, or the dominions of the same; but only to be spent, and used, and bestowed within the same, to the great comfort and consolation of the subjects of this realm. Notwithstanding which said wholesome laws, statutes, and provisions, the king's highness being a prince of great benignity and liberality, having no knowledge, nor other due information, or instruction of the same laws, statutes, and provisions, heretofore hath nominated, and preferred, and promoted Laurence Campegius bishop of Sarum, with all the spiritual and temporal possessions, promotions, and other emoluments and commodities in anywise belonging or appertaining to the same: and also hath nominated, preferred, and promoted Hierome, being another stranger, born out of the king's said realm and dominions, to the see and bishopric of Worcester, with all the spiritual and temporal promotions, and other emoluments and commodities, in anywise belonging or appertaining to the same. Which said two bishops, and namely the bishop of Sarum, nothing regarding their duties to Almighty God, nor their cures of the said bishoprics, ever sith or for the more part of the time of their said promotions or profections into the same, have been, and yet be resident, dwelling and abiding at the see of Rome, or elsewhere, in other parts beyond the sea, far out and from any of the king's said dominions; by reason whereof, the great hospitality, divine service, teaching and preaching the laws, and examples of good living, and the other good and necessary effects before rehearsed, have been many years by-past, and yet continually be, not only withdrawn, decayed, hindered, and minished, but also great quantity of gold, silver, and treasure, to the yearly sum and value of 3000*l.* at the least, have been yearly taken and conveyed out of this realm, to the singular profit and great enriching of the said bishops, and daily is like to be conveyed, transported, and sent, contrary to the purport and effect of the said former wholesome laws and statutes, to the great impoverishing of this realm, as well presently as for to come, if speedy remedy be not had therefore in brief time provided. In consideration whereof, be it enacted by the authority of this present parliament, that the said two several sees and bishoprics of Salisbury and Worcester, and either of them from henceforth, shall be taken, reputed, and accounted in the law to be utterly void, vacant, and utterly destitute of any incumbent or prelate, &c.

XLIX.—A Letter from Cromwell to Fisher, about the Maid of Kent, Anno 34, or end of 35.

[Cotton. Libr. Cleop. E. 4.]

My lord, in my right hearty wise I commend me to your lordship, doing you to understand, that I have received your letters, dated at Rochester the 18th day of this month; in which ye declare what craft and cunning ye have to persuade, and to set a good countenance upon an ill matter, drawing some Scriptures to your purpose; which well weighed, according to the places whereout they be taken, make not so much for your purpose as ye allege them for; and where in the first leaf of your letters ye write, that ye doubt nothing, neither before God nor before the world, if need shall that require, so to declare yourself, whatsoever hath been said of you, that ye have not deserved such heavy words or terrible threats, as hath been sent from me unto you by your brother.

How ye can declare yourself afore God and the world, when need shall require, I cannot tell; but I think verily that your declaration made by these letters is far insufficient to prove that ye have deserved no heavy words in this behalf. And, to say plainly, I sent you no heavy words, but words of great comfort, willing your brother to show you how benign and merciful the prince was: and that I thought it expedient for you to write unto his highness, and to recognise your offences, and desire his pardon, which his grace would not deny you now in your age and sickness; which my counsel I would you had followed, rather than to have written these letters to me, excusing yourself although there were no manner of default in you. But, my lord, if it were in another manner of case than your own, and out of the matter which ye favour, I doubt not but that ye would think him that should have done as ye have done, not only worthy heavy words, but also heavy deeds; for where ye labour to excuse yourself of your hearing, bribing, and concealing of the maiden's false and feigned revelations, and of your manifold sending of your chaplains unto her, by a certain intent which ye pretend yourself to have had, to know by communing with her, or by sending your chaplains to her, whether her revelations were of God or no, alleging divers Scriptures that ye were bound to prove them, and to receive them after they were proved. My lord, whether ye have used a due means to try her and her revelations or no, it appeareth by the process of your own letters. For where you write that ye had conceived a great opinion of the holiness of this woman, for many considerations rehearsed in your letters, comprised in six articles; whereof the first is grounded upon the bruit and fame of her; the second, upon her entering into religion after her trances and diffiguration; the third, upon the rehearsal that her ghostly father, being learned and religious, should testify that she was a woman of great holiness; the fourth, upon the report that divers other virtuous priests, men of good learning and reputation, should so testify of her, with which ghostly father and priests ye never spake, as ye confess in your letters; the fifth, upon the praises of my late lord of Canterbury, which showed you, as ye write, that she had many great visions; the sixth, upon the saying of the prophet Amos, Non faciet Dominus Deus Verbum, nisi revelaverit secretum suum ad servos suos Prophetas. By which considerations ye were induced to the desire to know the very certainty of this matter, whether these revelations, which were pretended to be showed to her from God, were true revelations or not. Your lordship, in all the sequel of your letters, show not that ye made no further trial upon the truth of her and her revelations, but only in communing with her, and sending your chaplains to her with idle questions, as of the three Mary Magdalens, by which your communication and sending, ye tried out nothing of her falsehood, neither (as it is credibly supposed) intended to do as ye might have done, in anywise more easily than with communing with her, or sending to her; for little credence was to be given to her, affirming her own feigned revelations to be from God; for if credence should be given to every such lewd person as would affirm himself to have revelations from God, what readier way were there to subvert all common-weals and good orders in the world?

Verily, my lord, if ye had intended to trace out the truth of her and of her revelations, ye would have taken another way with you; first, you would not have been converted with the vain voices of the people, making bruits of her trances and diffiguration, but like a wise, discreet, and circumspect prelate, ye should have examined (as other since) such sad and credible persons as were present at her trances and diffigurings, not one or two but a good number, by whose testimony ye should have proved whether the bruits of her trances and diffigurations were true or not. And likewise ye should have tried by what craft and persuasion she was made a religious woman; and if ye had been so desirous, as ye pretended, to inquire out the truth or falsehood of this woman and of her revelations, it is to be supposed ye would have spoken with her good, religious, and well-learned ghostly father ere this time, and also with the virtuous and well-learned priest, (as they were esteemed,) of whose reports ye would have been informed by them which heard them speak; or ye would also have been minded to see the book of her revelations which was offered you, of which ye might have had more trial of her and her revelations than of a hundred communications with her, or of as many sendings of your chaplains unto her. As for the late lord of Canterbury's saying unto you, that she had many great visions, it ought to move you never a deal to give credence unto her or her revelations; for the said lord knew no more certainty of her or of her revelations than he did by her own report. And as touching the saying of Amos the prophet, I think verily the same moved you but a little to hearken unto her; for sithence the consummation and the end of the Old Testament, and sithen the passion of Christ, God hath done many great and notable things in the world, whereof he showed nothing to his prophets that hath come to the knowledge of men. My lord, all these things moved you not to give credence unto her, but only the very matter whereupon she made her false prophecies; to which matter ye were so affected, as ye be noted to be in all matters which ye enter once into, that nothing could come amiss that made for that purpose. And here I appeal your conscience, and instantly desire you to answer, Whether if she had showed you as many revelations for the confirmation of the king's grace's marriage, which he now enjoyeth, as she did to the contrary, ye would have given as much credence to her as the same done, and would have let the trial of her and her revelations to overpass those many years, where ye dwelt not from her but twenty miles in the same shire where her trances, and diffigurings, and prophecies in her trances, were surmised and reported. And if perchase, ye will say, (as it not unlike but ye will say, minded as ye were wont to be,) that the matter be not like, for the law of God, in your opinion, standeth with the one and not with the other: surely, my lord, I suppose there had been no great cause more to trust the one more than the other; for ye know by Scriptures of the Bible, that God may by his revelation dispense with his own law, as with the Israelites spoiling the Egyptians, and with Jacob to have four wives, and such other. Think you, my lord, that any indifferent man, considering the quality of the matter, and your affections, and also the negligent passing over of such lawful trials as ye might have had of the said maiden, and her revelations, is so dull, that cannot perceive and discern that your communing, and often sending to the said maid, was rather to hear and bruit many of her revelations than to try out the truth or falsehood of the same. And in this business, I suppose, it will be hard for you to purge yourself before God or the world, but that ye have been in great default in hearing, believing, and concealing such things as tended to the destruction of the prince; and that her revelations were bent and purposed to that end, it hath been duly proved afore as great assembly and council of the lords of this realm as hath been seen many years meet out of a parliament. And what the said lords deemed them worthy to suffer, which said, heard, believed, and concealed those false revelations, be more terrible than any threats spoken by me to your brother.

And where ye go about to defend, that ye be not to be blamed for concealing the revelations concerning the king's grace, because ye thought it not necessary to rehearse them to his highness, for six causes following in your letters; afore I show you my mind concerning these causes, I suppose that albeit you perchance thought it not necessary to be showed to the prince by you, yet that your thinking shall not be your trial, but the law must define whether ye ought to utter it or not.

And as to the first of the said seven causes; Albeit she told you that she had showed her revelations concerning the king's grace to the king herself; yet her saying or others discharged not you, but that ye were bound by your fidelity, to show to the king's grace that thing which seemed to concern his grace and his reign so nighly: for how knew you that she showed these revelations to the king's grace but by her own saying, to which she should have given no such credence, as to forbear the utterance of so great matters concerning a king's weal? And why should you so sinisterly judge the prince, that if he had showed the same unto him, he would have thought that ye had brought that tale unto him, more for the strengthening and confirmation of your opinion than for anything else? Verily, my lord, whatsoever your judgment be, I see daily such benignity and excellent humanity in his grace, that I doubt not but his highness would have accepted it in good part if ye had showed the same revelations unto him, as ye were bounden by your fidelity.

To the second cause; Albeit she showed you not that any prince, or other temporal lord, should put the king's grace in danger of his crown; yet there were ways enough by which her said revelations might have put the king's grace in danger, as the aforesaid council of lords have substantially and duly considered: and therefore albeit she showed you not the means whereby the danger should ensue to the king, yet ye were nevertheless bounden to show him of the danger.

To the third; Think you, my lord, that if any person would come unto you and show you that the king's destruction were conspired against a certain time, and would fully show you that he were sent from his master to show the same to the king, and will say further unto that, he would go straight to the king; were it not yet your duty to certify the king's grace of this revelation, and also to inquire whether the said person had done his foresaid message or no? Yes verily, and so were ye bound, though the maiden showed you it was her message from God to be declared by her to the king's grace.

To the fourth; Here ye translate the temporal duty that ye owe to your prince, to the spiritual duty of such as be bound to declare the word of God to the people, and to show unto them the ill and punishment of it in another world; the concealment whereof pertaineth to the judgment of God, but the concealment of this matter pertaineth to other judges of this realm.

To the fifth; There could no blame be imputed to you, if ye had showed the maiden's revelation to the king's grace, albeit they were afterward found false, for no man ought to be blamed doing his duty: and if a man would show you secretly, that there were a great mischief intended against the prince, were ye to be blamed if ye showed him of it; albeit, it was a feigned talk, and the same mischief were never imagined.

To the sixth; Concerning an imagination of Mr. Pary, it was known that he was beside himself, and therefore they were not blamed that made no report thereof; but it was not like in this case, for ye took not this maiden for a mad woman, for if ye had, ye would not have given unto her so great credence as ye did.

To the final and seventh cause; Where ye lay unto the charge of our sovereign, that so hath unkindly entreated you with grievous words and terrible letters, for showing his grace truth in his great matter, whereby ye were discomforted to show unto him the maiden's revelations: I believe that I know the king's goodness and natural gentleness so well, that his grace would not so unkindly handle you, as your unkindly writings him, unless ye gave him other causes than be expressed in your letters. And whatsoever the king's grace hath said or written unto you heretofore, yet notwithstanding ye were nevertheless bounden to utter to him those pernicious revelations.

Finally; Where ye desire, for the passion of Christ, that ye be no more twitted in this matter, for if ye be put to that strait, ye will not lose your soul, but ye will speak as your conscience bindeth you, with many more words of great courage. My lord, if ye had taken my counsel sent unto you by your brother, and followed the same, submitting yourself by your letters, at the king's grace, for your offences in this behalf, I would have trusted that ye should never be quikkrand in this matter more. But now, where ye take upon you to defend the whole matter, as ye were in no default, I cannot so far promise you: and surely, my lord, if the matter come to trial, your own confession in this letter, besides the witness which be against you, will be sufficient to condemn you: wherefore, my lord, I will eftsoons advise you, that laying apart all such excuses as ye have alleged in your letters, which in my opinion be of small effect, as I have declared, ye beseech the king's grace by your letters to be your gracious lord, and to remit unto you your negligence, oversight, and offence committed against his highness in this behalf; and I dare undertake that his highness shall benignly accept you into his gracious favour, all matters of displeasure past afore this time forgotten and forgiven. As touching the speaking of your conscience, it is thought that ye have written and have spoken as much as ye can, and many things, as some right probably believes, against your own conscience: and men report that at the last convocation, ye spake many things which ye could not well defend; and therefore it is not greatly feared what ye can say or write in that matter, howsoever ye be quikkraned and startled. And if ye had taken, &c.

II.—General Injunctions to be given on the King's Highness's behalf, in all Monasteries and other Houses, of whatsoever order or religion they be.

[Cotton. Libr. Cloop. E. 4.]

FIRST; That the abbot, prior, or president, and all other brethren of the place that is visited, shall faithfully, truly, and heartily keep and observe, and cause teach, and procure to be kept and observed of other, as much as in them may lie, all and singular contents, as well in the oath of the king's highness' succession, given heretofore by them, as in a certain profession lately sealed with the common seal, and subscribed and signed with their own hands: also that they shall observe and fulfil, by all the means that they best may, the statutes of this realm, made, or to be made, for the suppression and taking away of the usurped and pretended jurisdiction of the bishop of Rome within this realm: and for the assertion and confirmation of the authority, jurisdiction, and prerogative of our most noble sovereign lord the king, and his successors; and that they shall diligently instruct their juniors and youngers, and all other committed to their cure, that the king's power is by the laws of God most excellent of all under God in earth; and that we ought to obey him afore all other powers, by God's prescript; and that the bishop of Rome's jurisdiction or authority heretofore usurped by no means is founded or established by Holy Scripture: but that the same, partly by the craft and deceit of the same bishop of Rome, and by his evil and ambitious canons and decretals; and partly by the toleration and permission of princes, by little and little hath grown up; and therefore now, of most right and equity, is taken away and clean expelled out of his realm.

Also, that the abbot, prior, or president and brethren may be declared, by the king's supreme power and authority ecclesiastical, to be absolved and loosed from all manner obedience, oath, and profession by them heretofore perchance promised, or made, to the said bishop of Rome, or to any other in his stead, or occupying his authority; or to any other foreign prince, or person : and nevertheless let it be enjoined to them, that they shall not promise or give such oath or profession to any such foreign potentate hereafter. And if the statutes of the said order religious, or place, seem to bind them to obedience, or subjection, or any other recognizance of superiority to the said bishop of Rome, or to any other foreign power, potentate, person or place, by any ways ; such statutes, by the king's grace's visitors, be utterly annihilate, broken, and declared void and of none effect ; and that they be in no case bounden or obligate to the same, and such statutes to be forthwith utterly put forth and abolished out of the books or muniments of that religion, order or place, by the president and his brethren.

Also, that no monk, or brother of this monastery, by any means go forth of the precinct of the same.

Also, that women, of what state or degree soever they be, be utterly excluded from entering into the limits or circuits of this monastery, or place, unless they first obtain license of the king's highness, or his visitor.

Also, that there be no entering into this monastery but one, and that by the great fore-gate of the same, which diligently shall be watched and kept by some porter specially appointed for that purpose, and shall be shut and opened by the same both day and night, at convenient and accustomed hours ; which porter shall repel all manner women from entrance into the said monastery.

Also, that all and singular brethren, and monks of this monastery, take their refectiions altogether in a place called the Misericorde, such days as they eat flesh, and all other days in their refectory ; and that at every mess there sit four of them, not of duty demanding to them any certain, usual, or accustomed duty or portion of meat as they were wont to do ; but that they be content with such victuals as is set before them, and there take their refectiions soberly, without excess, with giving due thanks to God ; and that at every such refectiion, some chapter of the New Testament, or Old, by some of the said brethren, be read and recited to the other, keeping silence, and giving audience to the same.

Also, that the abbot and president do daily prepare one table for himself and his guests thither resorting, and that not over-sumptuous, and full of delicate and strange dishes, but honestly furnished with common meats ; at which table, the said abbot, or some senior in his stead, shall sit to receive, and gently entertain the strangers, the guests.

Also, that none of the brethren send any part of his meat, or the leavings thereof, to any person, but that there be assigned an almoner, which shall gather the leavings, both of the convent and strangers' tables, after that the servants of the house have had their convenient refectiions, and distribute the same to poor people ; amongst whom special consideration be had of such, before other, as be kinsfolk to any of the said brethren, if they be of like power and debility as other be ; and also of those which endeavour themselves, with all their will and labour, to get their living with their hands, and yet cannot fully help themselves for their chargeable household, and multitude of children : yet let not them be so cherished, that they shall leave labour and fall to idleness ; with consideration also specially to be had of them, which by weakness of their limbs and body be so impotent that they cannot labour ; and by no means let such alms be given to valiant mighty and idle beggars and vagabonds, as commonly use to resort about such places ; which rather, as drove-beasts and mychers, should be driven away and compelled to labour, than in their idleness and lewdness, against the form of the king's grace's statute in this behalf made, cherished, and maintained, to the great hindrance and damage of the common-weal.

Also, that all other almses or distributions due, or accustomed to be made, by reason of the foundation, statutes, or customes of this place, be made and given, as largely and as liberally as ever they were at any time heretofore.

Also, that the abbot, prior, or president, shall find wood and fuel sufficient to make fire in the refectory, from Allhallow-even to Good-Friday.

Also, that all the brethren of this house, except the abbot and such as be sick, or evil at ease, and those that have fulfilled their jubilee, lie together in the dormitory, every one by himself in several beds.

Also, that no brother, or monk, of this house, have any child or boy laying, or privily accompanying with him, or otherwise haunting unto him, other than to help him to mass.

Also, that the brethren of this house, when they be sick, or evil at ease, be seen unto, and be kept in the infirmary duly, as well for their sustentance of meat and drink, as for their good keeping.

Also, that the abbot, or president, keep and find in some university, one or two of his brothers, according to the ability and possessions of this house ; which brethren, after they be learned in good and holy letters, when they return home, may instruct and teach their brethren, and diligently preach the word of God.

Also, that every day, by the space of one hour, a lesson of Holy Scripture be kept in this covent, to which all, under pain by this said president to be moderated, shall resort ; which president shall have authority to dispense with them, that they, with a low and treatable voice, say their long hours, which were wont to be sung.

Also, that the brethren of this house, after divine service done, read or hear somewhat of Holy Scripture, or occupy themselves in some such like honest and laudable exercise.

Also, that all and every brethren of this house, shall observe the rule, statutes, and laudable customs of this religion, as far as they do agree with Holy Scripture and the Word of God. And that the abbot, prior, or president of this monastery, every day shall expound to his brethren, as plainly as may be, in English, a certain part of the rule that they have professed, and apply the same always to the doctrine of Christ, and not contrariwise ; and he shall teach them, that the said rule, and other their principles of religion (so far as they be laudable) be taken out of Holy Scripture ; and he shall show them the places from whence they were derived ; and that their ceremonies, and other observances of religion, be none other things than as the first letters or principles, and certain introductions to true Christianity, or to observe an order in the church. And that true religion is not contained in apparel, manner of going, shaven heads, and such other marks ; nor in silence, fasting, up-rising in the night, singing, and such other kind of ceremonies, but in cleanness of mind, pureness of living, Christ's faith not feigned, and brotherly charity, and true honouring of God in spirit and verity : And that those above said things were instituted and begun, that they being first exercised in these, in process of time might ascend to those as by certain steps, that is to say, to the chief point and end of religion ; and therefore let them be diligently exhorted, that they do not continually stick and surcease in such ceremonies and observances, as though they had perfectly fulfilled the chief and utmost of the whole true religion ; but that when they have once passed such things, they endeavour themselves to higher things, and convert their minds from such external matters, to more inward and deeper considerations, as the law of God and Christian religion doth teach and show. And that they assure not themselves of any reward or commodity any-wise, by reason of such ceremonies and observances, except they refer all such to Christ, and for his sake observe them; and for that they might thereby the more easily keep such things as he hath commanded, as well to them as to all Christian people.

Also, that the abbot and president of this place shall make a full and true reckoning and account of his administration every year to his brethren, as well of his receipts as expenses; and that the said account be written in a great book remaining with the convent.

Also, that the abbot and president of this house shall make no waste of the woods pertaining to this house, nor shall set out unadvisedly any farms or reversions, without the consent of the more part of the convent.

Also, that there be assigned a book and a register that may copy out into that book all such writings, word by word, as shall pass under the convent-seal of this house.

Also, that no man be suffered to profess or to wear the habit of religion in this house ere he be twenty-four years of age complete; and that they entice nor allure no man with suasions and blandiments to take the religion upon him.

Item, that they shall not show no reliques, or feigned miracles, for increase of lucre; but that they exhort pilgrims and strangers to give that to the poor, that they thought to offer to their images or reliques.

Also, that they shall suffer no fairs or markets to be kept or used within the limits of this house.

Also, that every brother of this house that is a priest, shall, every day in his mass, pray for the most happy and most prosperous estate of our sovereign lord the king, and his most noble and lawful wife queen Anne.

Also, that if either the master, or any brother of this house, do infringe any of the said injunctions, any of them shall denounce the same, or procure to be denounced, as soon as may be, to the king's majesty, or to his visitor-general, or his deputy. And the abbot, or master, shall minister spending-money and other necessaries, for the way to him that shall so denounce.

Other spiritual injunctions may be added by the visitor, as the place and nature of the comperts shall require, after his discretion.

Reserving power to give more injunctions, and to examine and discuss the comperts, to punish and reform them that be convict of any notable crime, to search and try the foundations, charters, donations, appropriations, and muniments of the said places; and to dispose all such papistical scripts as shall be there found, to the right honourable Mr. Thomas Cromwell, general visitor to the king's said highness, as shall seem most expedient to his high wisdom and discretion.

III.—Some Particulars relating to the Dissolution of Monasteries.

Sect. I.—The Preamble of the Surrender of the Monastery of Langden.

OMNIBUS Christi fidelibus, &c. Willielmus Dyer, Abbas Monasterii Beatæ Mariæ Virginis et S. Thomæ Martyris de Langden, in Com. Kent, et ejusdem loci Conventus, Ordinis Præmonstrat. capitulum dictæ domus plene facientes, ejusdemq; domus (quæ in suis fructibus, redditibus, provenien. even. et emolumen. non mediocriter deteriorata est, et quasi in totum diminuta, ingentiq; ære alieno obruta, oppressa, et gravata extitit) statum usq; adeo matura deliberatione, et diligenti tractatu, considerantes, ponderantes, et pensantes, quod nisi celeri remedio, regia provisione huic monasterio sive Prioratui (quippe quod de ejus fundatione et personatu existit) brevi succuratur et provideatur, funditus in spiritualibus et temporalibus annihiletur, per præsentés damus et concedimus, &c.

The rest follows in the ordinary form of law: but the ordinary preamble in most surrenders is,

Omnibus Christi fidelibus, &c. Nos—Salutem. Sciatís quod nos, deliberate, certa scientia, et mero motu, nostris, ex quibusdam causis, justis, et rationabilibus, nos, animas et conscientias nostras, specialiter moventibus, ultro et sponte dedisse et concessisse, Domino Regi, &c.

But it seems some few houses, though they were prevailed with to surrender, yet would not do it with such a preamble; for there are about twenty surrenders without any preamble at all, made to John London, clerk, ad usum Domini Regis.

Sect. IV.

It seems there was generally a confession made with the surrender: of these some few are yet extant, though undoubtedly great care was taken to destroy as many as could be in queen Mary's time. That long and full one made by the prior of St. Andrews in Northampton, the preamble whereof is printed by Fuller, and is at large printed by Weaver, is yet preserved in the Augmentation-office. There are some few more also extant: six of these I have seen, one of them follows:—

Forasmuch as we Richard Green, abbot of our monastery of our blessed Lady St. Mary of Betlesden, and the convent of the said monastery, do profoundly consider, That the whole manner and trade of living, which we and our pretended religion have practised, and used many days, does most principally consist in certain dumb ceremonies, and other certain constitutions of the bishops of Rome, and other forinsecal potentates, as the abbot of Cistins, and therein only noseled, and not taught in the true knowledge of God's laws, procuring always exemptions of the bishops of Rome from our ordinaries and diocesans: submitting ourselves principally to forinsecal potentates and powers, which never came here to reform such disorders of living and abuses, as now have been found to have reigned amongst us. And therefore now assuredly knowing, that the most perfect way of living is most principally and sufficiently declared unto us by our master Christ, his evangelists and apostles, and that it is most expedient for us to be governed and ordered by our Supreme Head, under God, the king's most noble grace, with our mutual assent and consent, submit ourselves, and every one of us, to the most benign mercy of the king's majesty; and by these presents do surrender, &c.

The Surrender follows in common form, signed by the Abbot, Sub-prior, and 9 Monks, 25 Septemb. Regni 30.

There are others to the same purpose signed by the guardian and seven Franciscans at Alisbury, the 1st of October. By the Franciscans at Bedford the 3d of October. The Franciscans in Coventry the 5th of October. And the Franciscans in Stamford the 8th of October. And the Carmelites in Stamford on the same day, which I shall also insert, the former four agreeing to it.

Forasmuch as we the prior and friars of this house of Carmelites in Stamford, commonly called the white friars in Stamford, in the county of Lincoln, do profoundly consider that the perfection of Christian living doth not consist in some ceremonies, wearing of a white coat, disguising ourselves after strange fashions, dockying and beeking, wearing scapulars and hoods, and other like papistical ceremonies, wherein we have been most principally practised and noseled in times past; but the very true way to please God, and to live a true Christian man, without all hypocrisy and feigned dissimulation, is sincerely declared to us by our master Christ, his evangelists, and apostles: being minded hereafter to follow the same, conforming ourself to the will and pleasure of our Supreme Head, under God, on earth, the king's majesty; and not to follow henceforth the superstitious traditions of any forinsecal potentate or power, with mutual assent and consent, do submit ourselves unto the mercy of our said sovereign lord, and with the like mutual assent and consent do surrender, &c. Signed by the prior and 6 friars.

Sect. V.—Of the manner of suppressing the Monasteries after they were surrendered.

THE reader will best understand this by the following account of the suppression of the monastery of Tewksbury, copied from a book that is in the Augmentation-office, which begins thus:—

The certificate of Robert Southwell, esquire, William Petre, Edward Kairne, and John London, doctors of law; John Aprice, John Kingsman, Richard Paulet, and William Bernars, esquires, commissioners assigned by the king's majesty, to take the surrenders of divers monasteries, by force of his grace's commission to them, 6, 5, 4, or 3 of them, in that behalf directed; bearing date at his highness's palace of Westminster, the 7th day of November in the 31 year of the reign of our most dread sovereign lord Henry VIII, by the grace of God, king of England, and of France, defender of the faith, lord of Ireland, and in earth immediately under Christ supreme head of the church of England, of all and singular their proceedings, as well in and of these monasteries by his majesty appointed to be altered, as of others to be dissolved, according to the tenour, purport, and effect of his grace's said commission; with instructions to them likewise delivered, as hereafter ensueth.

IV.—Queen Ann Boleyn's last Letter to King Henry.

[Cotton. Libr. Otho. C. 10.]

SIR,

Your grace's displeasure, and my imprisonment, are things so strange unto me, as what to write, or what to excuse, I am altogether ignorant. Whereas you send unto me (willing me to confess a truth, and so obtain your favour) by such an one whom you know to be mine ancient professed enemy. I no sooner received this message by him, than I rightly conceived your meaning; and if, as you say, confessing a truth indeed may procure my safety, I shall with all willingness and duty perform your command.

But let not your grace ever imagine that your poor wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault, where not so much as a thought thereof preceded. And to speak a truth, never prince had wife more loyal in all duty, and in all true affection, than you have ever found in Ann Boleyn, with which name and place I could willingly have contented myself, if God, and your grace's pleasure had been so pleased. Neither did I at any time so far forget myself in my exaltation, or received queenship, but that I always looked for such an alteration as now I find; for the ground of my preferment being on no surer foundation than your grace's fancy, the least alteration, I knew, was fit and sufficient to draw that fancy to some other subject. You have chosen me, from a low estate, to be your queen and companion, far beyond my desert or desire. If then you found me worthy of such honour, good your grace let not any light fancy, or bad counsel of mine enemies, withdraw your princely favour from me; neither let that stain, that unworthy stain of a disloyal heart towards your good grace, ever cast so foul a blot on your most dutiful wife and the infant-princess your daughter: try me, good king, but let me have a lawful trial, and let not my sworn enemies sit as my accusers and judges; yea, let me receive an open trial, for my truth shall fear no open shame; then shall you see, either mine innocence cleared, your suspicion and conscience satisfied, the ignominy and slander of the world stopped, or my guilt openly declared. So that whatsoever God or you may determine of me, your grace may be freed from an open censure; and mine offence being so lawfully proved, your grace is at liberty, both before God and man, not only to execute worthy punishment on me as an unlawful wife, but to follow your affection, already settled, on that party, for whose sake I am now as I am, whose name I could some good while since have pointed unto: your grace being not ignorant of my suspicion therein.

But if you have already determined of me, and that not only my death, but an infamous slander must bring you the enjoying of your desired happiness; then I desire of God, that he will pardon your great sin therein and likewise mine enemies, the instruments thereof; and that he will not call you to a strict account for your unprincipally and cruel usage of me, at his general judgment-seat, where both you and myself must shortly appear, and in whose judgment I doubt not (whatsoever the world may think of me) mine innocence shall be openly known, and sufficiently cleared.

My last and only request shall be, that myself may only bear the burden of your grace's displeasure, and that it may not touch the innocent souls of those poor gentlemen, who (as I understand) are likewise in strait imprisonment for my sake. If ever I have found favour in your sight, if ever the name of Ann Boleyn hath been pleasing in your ears, then let me obtain this request; and I will so leave to trouble your grace any further, with mine earnest prayers to the Trinity to have your grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions. From my doleful prison in the Tower this 6th of May,

Your most loyal and ever faithful wife,

ANN BOLEYN.

V.—The Judgment of the Convocation concerning General-Councils. Published by the L. Herbert from the Original.

As concerning general councils, like as we (taught by long experience) do perfectly know that there never was, nor is, anything devised, invented, or instituted by our forefathers more expedient or more necessary for the establishment of our faith, for the extirpation of heresies, and the abolishing of sects and schisms; and finally, for the reducing of Christ's people unto one perfect unity and concord in his religion, than by the having of general councils. So that the same be lawfully had and congregated in Spiritu Sancto, and be also conform and agreeable, as well concerning the surety and indifferency of the places, as all other points requisite and necessary for the same, unto that wholesome and godly institution and usage, for the which they were at first devised and used in the primitive church. Even so on the other side, taught by like experience, we esteem, repute, and judge, that there is, ne can be, anything in the world more pestilent and pernicious to the common-weal of Christendom, or whereby the truth of God's word hath in times past, or hereafter may be sooner defaced or subverted, or whereof hath and may ensue more contention, more discord and other devilish effects, than when such general councils have or shall be assembled, not christianly nor charitably, but for and upon private malice and ambition, or other worldly and carnal respects and considerations, according to the saying of Gregory Nazianzenus, in his epistle to one Procopius, wherein he writeth this sentence following; Sic sentio, si verum scribendum est, omnes Convventus Episcoporum fugiendos esse, quia nullius Synodi finem vidi bonum, neque habentem magis solutionem malorum, quam incrementum: Nam cupiditates contentionum, et gloria (sed ne putes me odiosum ista scribentem) vincunt rationem. That is to say, "I think this, if I should write truly, that all general councils be to be eschewed, for I never saw that they produced any good end or effect, nor that any provision or remedy, but rather increase of mischiefs proceeded of them. For the desire of maintenance of men's opinions and ambition of glory (but reckon not that I write this of malice) hath always in them overcome reason." Wherefore we think that Christian princes, especially and above all things, ought and must, with all their wills, power, and diligence, foresee and provide; Ne Sanctissima hac in parte majorum Instituta, ad improbitissimos ambitionis aut malitiæ effectus explendos, diversissimo suo fine et celeratissimo pervertantur: Neve ad alium prætextum possint valere, et longe diversum effectum orbi producere quam Sanctissima rei facies præ se ferat. That is to say, "Lest the most noble wholesome institutions of our elders in this behalf be perverted to a most contrary and most wicked end and effect; that is to say, to fulfil and satisfy the wicked affections of men's ambition and malice; or, lest they might prevail for any other colour, or bring forth any other effect than their most virtuous and laudable countenance doth outwardly to the world show or pretend." And first of all, we think that they ought principally to consider who hath the authority to call together a general council. Secondly, whether the causes alleged be so weighty and so urgent, that necessarily they require a general council, nor can otherwise be remedied. Thirdly, who ought to be judges in the general council. Fourthly, what order of proceeding is to be observed in the same, and how the opinions or judgments of the fathers are to be consulted or asked. Fifthly, what doctrines are to be allowed or defended, with divers other things which in general councils ought of reason and equity to be observed. And as unto the first point, we think that neither the bishop of Rome, nor any one prince, of what estate, degree, or pre-eminence soever he be, may by his own authority, call, indict, or summon any general council without the express consent, assent, and agreement of the residue of Christian princes, and especially such as have within their own realms and seigniories, Imperium merum, that is to say, of such as have the whole, entire, and supreme government and authority over all their subjects, without knowledging or recognising of any other supreme power or authority. And this to be true, we be induced to think, by many and sundry, as well examples as great reasons and authority. The which, forasmuch as it should be over-long and tedious to express here particularly, we have thought good to omit the same for this present. And in witness that this is our plain and determinate sentence, opinion, and judgment, touching the premises, we the prelates and clergy under-written, being congregated together in the convocation of the province of Canterbury, and representing the whole clergy of the same, have to these presents subscribed our names the 20th of July, in the year of our Lord 1536, 28 Hen. 8.

Signed by THOMAS CROMWEL, THOMAS CANTUARIENSIS, JOHANNES LONDON, with thirteen bishops and of abbots, priors, archdeacons, deans, proctors, clerks, and other ministers, forty-nine.

There were then but seventeen bishops in the province of Canterbury, and Rochester being vacant of the other sixteen, fourteen did sign this.

VI.—Instructions for the King's Commissioners, for a new Survey and an Inventory to be made of all the Demesnes, Lands, Goods, and Chattels, appertaining to any House of Religion of Monks, Canons, and Nuns, within their Commission, according to the Articles hereafter following. The number of which Houses in every County limited in their Commission, being annexed to the said Commission. An Original.

[EX MSS. Nob. D. G. Piepoint.]

HENRY R.

FIRST, After the division made, one auditor, one particular receiver, one clerk of the register of the last visitation, with three other discreet persons to be named by the king in every county where any such houses be; after their repair to such house, shall declare to the governor and religious persons of the same the statute of dissolution, the commission, and the cause and purpose of their repair for that time.

Item, That after the declaration made, the said commissioners shall swear the governors of the houses, or such other the officers of the same house, or other, as ye shall think can best declare the state and plight of the same, to make declaration and answer to the articles there under-written.

Item, Of what order, rule, or religion, the same house is, and whether it be a cell or not; and if it be a cell, then the commissioners to deliver to the governors of the house a privy seal, and also to enjoin him, in the king's name, under a great pain, to appear without delay before the chancellor of the augmentations of the revenues of the king's crown and the council; and in the mean time not to meddle with the same cell, till the king's pleasure be further known.

Item, What number of persons of religion be in the same, and the conversation of their lives, and how many of them be priests, and how many of them will go to other houses of that religion; or how many will take capacities; and how many servants or hinds the same house keepeth commonly, and what other persons have their living in the same house.

Item, To survey the quantity or value of the lead and bells of the same house, as near as they can, with the ruin, decay, state, and plight of the same.

Item, Incontinently to call for the covent-seal, with all writings and charters, evidences and muniments, concerning any of the possessions to be delivered to them, and put the same in sure keeping, and to take a just inventory betwixt them and the governor, or other head officer, by indenture, of the ornaments, plate, jewels, chattels, ready money, stuff of household, coin, as well signed as not signed, stock and store in the farmer's hands, and the value thereof, as near as they can, which were appertaining to the same houses the first day of March last past; and what debts the house doth owe, and to what person; and what debts be owing to them, and by whom.

Item, After, to cause the covent, or common-seal, the plate, jewels, and ready money, to be put in safe keeping, and the residue of the particulars specified in the inventory, to be left in the keeping of the governor or some other head officer, without wasting or consumption of the same, unless it be for necessary expense of the house.

Item, That they command the governor, or other receiver of the same house, to receive no rents of their farms until they know further of the king's pleasure, except such rents as must needs be had for their necessary food or sustenance, or for payment of their servants' wages.

Item, To survey discreetly the demesnes of the same house; that is to say, such as have not been commonly used to be letten out, and to certify the clear yearly value thereof.

Item, To examine the true yearly value of all the farms of the same house, deducting thereof rents reserved, pensions and portions paid out of the same, synodals, and proxies; bailiffs, receivers, stewards, and auditors' fees, and the names of them to whom they be paid and due, and to none other.

Item, What leases hath been made to any farmer, of the farms pertaining to the same house; and what rent they reserved, and to whom, and for how many years, and a copy of the indenture if they can get it, or else the counterpane.

Item, To search and inquire what woods, parks, forests, commons, or other profit belonging to any of the possessions of the same houses, the number of the acres, the age and value, as near as they can.

Item, What grants, bargains, sales, gifts, alienations, leases of any lands, tenements, woods, or offices, hath been made by any the said governors, of any of the said houses, within one year next before the 4th day of February last past, and of what things, or to what value, and to whom, and for what estate.

Item, If there be any house of the religion aforesaid omitted and not certified in the exchequer, then the said commissioners to survey the same, and to make certificate accordingly.

Item, That they straitly command every governor of every such house limited in their commission, to sow and till their grounds as they have done before, till the king's pleasure be further known.

Item, If there be any house given by the king to any person, in any of the said several limits of the said commission, the names whereof shall be declared to the said commissioners, then the said commissioners shall immediately take the covent from the governor, and take an inventory indented of the lead, bells, debts, goods, chattels, plate, jewels, ornaments, stock and store, to the king's use; and to make sale of the goods, chattels, and other implements, plate and jewels only excepted.

Item, The said commissioners in every such house, to send such of the religious persons that will remain in the same religion, to some other great house of that religion, by their discretion, with a letter to a governor for the receipt of them; and the residue of them that will go to the world, to send them to my lord of Canterbury and the lord chancellor for their capacities, with the letter of the same commissioners.

Item, The said commissioners to give the said persons that will have capacities, some reasonable rewards, according to the distance of the place, by their discretions to be appointed.

Item, The said commissioners to command the governor to resort to the chancellor of the augmentation for his yearly stipend and pension.

Item, If there be any house dissolved or given up to the king by their deed, then the commissioners shall order themselves in every point and purpose, as the houses given by the king to any other person in form aforesaid.

Item, Every of the said commissioners having in charge to survey more than one shire within the limits of their commission, immediately after they have perused one shire, parcel of their charge, in form aforesaid, shall send to the chancellor of the court for the augmentation of the revenues of the king's crown, a brief certificate of all these comperts, according to the instructions aforesaid, what they have done in the premises, and in every county so surveyed, then to proceed further to another county; and so as they pass the said counties to make like certificate, and so forth, till their limits be surveyed, and there to remain till they know further of the king's pleasure.

Item, If the said commissioners have but one county in charge, then to certify the said chancellor in form aforesaid, and there to remain till they know further of the king's pleasure.

VII.—Injunctions given by the Authority of the King's Highness to the Clergy of this Realm.

[Register, Cranm. fol. 47.]

In the name of God, amen. In the year of our Lord God one thousand five hundred thirty-six, and of the most noble reign of our sovereign lord, Henry the Eighth, king of England and France, the twenty-eighth year, and the day of I Thomas Cromwell knight, lord Cromwell, keeper of the privy seal of our said sovereign lord the king, and vicegerent unto the same, for and concerning all his jurisdictions ecclesiastical within the realm, visiting by the king's highness's supreme authority ecclesiastical, the people and clergy of this deanery of _____ by my trusty commissary lawfully deputed and constitute for this part, have, to the glory of Almighty God, to the king's highness's honour, the public weal of this his realm, and increase of virtue in the same, appointed and assigned these injunctions ensuing to be kept and observed, of the dean, parsons, vicars, curates, and stipendiaries, resiant or having cure of soul, or any other spiritual administrations within this deanery, under the pains hereafter limited and appointed.

The first is, that the dean, parsons, vicars, and other, having cure of soul anywhere within this deanery, shall faithfully keep and observe, and, as far as in them may lie, shall cause to be observed and kept of other, all and singular laws and statutes of this realm, made for the abolishing and extirpation of the bishop of Rome's pretended and usurped power and jurisdiction within this realm. And for the establishment and confirmation of the king's authority and jurisdiction of the same, as of the supreme head of the church of England; and shall, to the uttermost of their wit, knowledge, and learning, purely, sincerely, and without any colour or dissimulation, declare, manifest, and open, for the space of one quarter of a year next ensuing once every Sunday, and after that at the leastwise twice every quarter, in their sermons and other collations, that the bishop of Rome's usurped power and jurisdiction, having no establishment nor ground by the law of God, was of most just causes taken away and abolished; and therefore they owe unto him no manner of obedience or subjection; and that the king's power is within his dominion the highest power and potentate, under God, to whom all men within the same dominions, by God's commandment, owe most loyalty and obedience, afore and above all other powers and potentates in earth.

Item, Whereas certain articles were lately devised and put forth by the king's highness's authority, and condescended upon by the prelates and clergy of this his realm in convocation, whereof part are necessary to be holden and believed for our salvation, and the other part do concern and teach certain laudable ceremonies, rites, and usages of the church, meet and convenient to be kept and used for a decent and politic order in the same; the said dean, parsons, vicars, and other curates, shall so open and declare in their said sermons, and other collations, the said articles unto them that be under their cure, that they may plainly know and discern which of them be necessary to be believed and observed for their salvation, and which be not necessary, but only do concern the decent and politic order of the said church: according to such commandment and admonition as hath been given unto them heretofore, by authority of the king's highness in that behalf.

Moreover, that they shall declare unto all such as be under their cure, the articles likewise devised, put forth, and authorised of late, for and concerning the abrogation of certain superfluous holy-days, according to the effect and purport of the same articles: and persuade their parishioners to keep and observe the same inviolable, as things honestly provided, decreed, and established, by common consent and public authority, for the weal, commodity, and profit of all this realm.

Besides this, to the intent that all superstition and hypocrisy crept into divers men's hearts may vanish away, they shall not set forth or extol any images, relics, or miracles, for any superstition or lucre; nor allure the people by any enticements to the pilgrimages of any saint otherwise than is permitted in the articles lately put forth by the authority of the king's majesty, and condescended upon by the prelates and clergy of this his realm in convocation; as though it were proper or peculiar to that saint to give this commodity or that; seeing all goodness, health, and grace, ought to be both asked and looked for only of God, as of the very author of the same, and of none other, for without him it cannot be given: but they shall exhort, as well their parishioners as other pilgrims, that they do rather apply themselves to the keeping of God's commandments, and fulfilling of his works of charity; persuading them that they shall please God more by the true exercising of their bodily labour, travail, or occupation, and providing for their families, than if they went about to the said pilgrimages; and that it shall profit more their souls' health if they do bestow that on the poor and needy which they would have bestowed upon the said images or relics.

Also in the same their sermons and other collations, the parsons, vicars, and other curates, aforesaid, shall diligently admonish the fathers and mothers, masters and governors of youth, being within their cure, to teach or cause to be taught their children and servants, even from their infancy, their pater noster, the articles of our faith, and the ten commandments, in their mother tongue: and the same so taught, shall cause the said youth oft to repeat and understand. And to the intent that this may be the more easily done, the said curates shall in their sermons deliberately and plainly recite of the said pater noster the articles of our faith, and the ten commandments, one clause or article one day, and another another day, till those be taught and learned by little; and shall deliver the same in writing, or show where printed books containing the same be to be sold to them that can read or will desire the same. And thereto that the said fathers and mothers, masters and governors, do bestow their children and servants, even from their childhood, either to learning or some other honest exercise, occupation, or husbandry: exhorting, counselling, and by all the ways and means they may, as well in their said sermons and collations as otherwise, persuading the said fathers, mothers, masters, and other governors, being under their cure and charge, diligently to provide and foresee that the said youth be in no manner-wise kept or brought up in idleness, lest at any time afterwards they be driven, for lack of some mystery or occupation to live by, to fall to begging, stealing, or some other unthriftiness; forasmuch as we may daily see, through sloth and idleness, divers valiant men fall, some to begging, and some to theft and murder; which, after brought to calamity and misery, impute a great part thereof to their friends and governors which suffered them to be brought up so idly in their youth; where if they had been well educated and brought up in some good literature, occupation, or mystery, they should, being rulers of their own family, have profited as well themselves as divers other persons, to the great commodity and ornament of the common-weal.

Also, that the said parsons, vicars, and other curates, shall diligently provide that the sacraments and sacramentals be duly and reverently ministered in their parishes; and if at any time it happened them, either in any of the cases expressed in the statutes of this realm, or of special licence given by the king's majesty to be absent from their benefices, they shall leave their cure, not to a rude and unlearned person, but to an honest, well-learned, and expert curate, that may teach the rude and unlearned of their cure wholesome doctrine, and reduce them to the right way that do err; and always let them see, that neither they nor their vicars do seek more their own profit, promotion, or advantage, than the profit of the souls that they have under their cure or the glory of God.

Item, That every parson or proprietary of any parish church within this realm, shall on this side the feast St. Peter ad vincula next coming, provide a book of the whole Bible, both in Latin and also in English, and lay the same in the quire, for every man that will to read and look therein, and shall discourage no man from the reading any part of the Bible, either in Latin or in English; but rather comfort, exhort, and admonish every man to read the same as the very word of God, and the spiritual food of man's soul, whereby they may the better know the duties to God, to their sovereign lord the king, and their neighbour: ever gently and charitably exhorting that, using a sober and a modest haviour in the reading and inquisition of the true sense of the same, they do in no wise stiffly or eagerly contend or strive one with another about the same, but refer the declaration of those places that be in controversy to the judgment of them that be better learned.

Also, the said dean, parsons, vicars, curates, and other priests, shall in no wise, at any unlawful time, nor for any other cause than for their honest necessity, haunt or resort to any taverns or ale-houses; and after their dinner and supper, they shall not give themselves to drinking or riot, spending their time idly, by day or by night, at tables or cards-playing, or any other unlawful game; but at such times as they shall have such leisure, they shall read or hear somewhat of Holy Scripture, or shall occupy themselves with some other honest exercise; and that they always do those things which appertain to good congruence and honesty, with profit of the common-weal, having always in mind, that they ought to excel all others in purity of life, and should be examples to all other to live well and christianly.

Furthermore; because the goods of the church are called the goods of the poor, and in these days nothing is less seen than the poor to be sustained with the same; all parsons, vicars, pensionaries, prebendaries, and other beneficed men within the deanery, not being resident upon their benefices which may dispend yearly 20*l.* or above within this deanery, or elsewhere, shall distribute hereafter yearly amongst their poor parishioners, or other inhabitants there, in the presence of the church-wardens, or some other honest men of the parish, the fortieth part of the fruits and revenues of the said benefices: lest they be worthily noted of ingratitude, which reserving so many parts to themselves, cannot vouchsafe to impart the fortieth portion thereof amongst the poor people of that parish that is so fruitful and profitable unto them.

And to the intent that learned men may hereafter spring the more for the execution of the premises, every parson, vicar, clerk, or beneficed man within this deanery, having yearly to dispend in benefices and other promotions of the church, an 100*l.* shall give competent exhibition to one scholar; and for as many hundred pounds more as he may dispend to so many scholars more, shall give like exhibition in the university of Oxford or Cambridge, or some grammar school; which after they have profited in good learning, may be partners of their patron's cure and charge as well in preaching as otherwise in the execution of their offices; or may, when need shall be, otherwise profit the common-weal with their counsel and wisdom.

Also, that all parsons, vicars, and clerks, having churches, chapels, or mansions within this deanery, shall bestow yearly hereafter upon the same mansions, or chancels of their churches being in decay, the fifth part of their benefices till they be fully repaired; and the same so repaired shall always keep and maintain in good state.

All which and singular injunctions shall be inviolably observed of the said dean, parsons, vicars, curates, stipendiaries, and other clerks and beneficed men, under the pain of suspension and sequestration of the fruits of their benefices, until they have done their duty according to these injunctions.

VIII.—Cromwell's Letter to Shaxton, bishop of u, taken from a copy writ by Morison, his Secretary.

My lord, after hearty commendations I cannot but both much marvel that you whom I have taken as my trusty friend should judge me, as I perceive by your letters you do, and also be glad that ye so frankly utter your stomach to me. I would thank you for your plain writing and free monitions, saving that you seem fuller of suspicion than it becometh a prelate of your sort to be: and (to say that maketh me more sorry) much worse persuaded of me than I thought any of your learning and judgment could have been. I took a matter out of your hands to mine; if upon considerations mine office bind me to do so, what cause have ye to complain? if I had done this either upon affection, or intending prejudice to your estimation, you might have expostulated with me; and yet if ye then had done it after a gentler sort, I should both sooner have amended that I did amiss, and also have had better cause to judge your writing to me to be of a friendly heart towards me. If ye be offended with my sharp letters, how can your testy words (I had almost given them another name) delight me? I required you to use no extremity in your office, durus est hic sermo, ye call it; and when ye have done, ye begin again, even as though all being said all were still behind. If ye have used none extremity, I am, I ensure you, as glad of it as I ought to be: and though ye do not, yet upon a complaint my office bindeth me to succour him that saith he is over-matched, and is compelled to sustain wrong. I was thus informed, and by persons to whom I gave more credit than I intend to do hereafter, if they have abused me as ye would make me believe they have. They thus complaining, could I do less than grant unto them such remedies as the king's highness and his laws give indifferently to all his subjects? Might I not also somewhat gather, that ye proceeded the sorer against the reader, Roger London, when I had seen how much you desired the preferment of your servant to that revenue? My lord, you had showed yourself of much more patience, I will not say of much more prudence, if ye had contented yourself with their lawful appeal, and my lawful injunctions; and rather have written somewhat fully to instruct us in this matter, than thus to desire to conquer me by shrewd words, to vanquish me by sharp threp of Scripture, which as I know to use travel, so I trust to God as great a clerk as ye be is done already. Thus out of their place it becometh me not, neither yet I am wont to vaunt myself of well-doing, I know who worketh all that is well wrought by me; and whereas he is the whole doer, I intend not to offer him this wrong to labour, and I to take the thanks; yet as I do not cease to give thanks that it hath pleased his goodness to use me as an instrument, and to work somewhat by me, so I trust I am as ready to serve him in my calling to my little power, as ye are pressed to write worse of me than ye ought to think. My prayer is, that God give me no longer life than I shall be glad to use mine office in *edificationem, and not in destructionem, as ye hear me in hand I do. God, ye say, will judge such using of authority, meaning flatly, that I do abuse such power as hath pleased God and the king's highness to set me in; God, I say, will judge such judges as ye are, and charge all such thoughts as ye misuse: ye do not so well as I would ye should do, if ye so think of me as your letters make me think ye do. The crime that ye charge me withal, is greater than I may or ought to bear, untruer, I trust, than they that would faintest, shall be able to prove. It is a strange thing, you say, that I neither would write nor send you word by mouth, what ye should do with the popish monks of Abington; and that the abbot of Reading could get straightway my letters to inhibit your just doings: that was not my mind which I wrote, I did not intend to let your just doings, but rather to require you to do justly; neither I was swift in granting my letters to him, albeit I am much readier to help him that complains of wrong, than prest to further on him that desireth punishment of a person whom I am not sure hath offended. I made you no answer, a strange thing! my lord, I thought ye had better known my business than for such a matter to esteem me not your friend; you might have better judged that I was too much cumbered with other affairs, that those which sued for the abbot could better espy their time than you could. Some man will think it rather utter displeasure conceived before, than that ye have any urgent occasion here to misjudge my mind towards you. As concerning your manor you must use your privileges as things lent unto you, so long as ye shall occupy them well, that is according to the mind and pleasure of them that gave you them. I took neither the monk's cause, nor any other, into my hands to be a bearer of any such whom their upright dealings is not able to bear. No, you know I think that I love such readers of Scripture as little as ye do: would God men of your sort were as diligent to see that in all their dioceses good were made, as I am glad to remove things when I know them; if ye had taken even then but half the pains to send up such things against him as ye now send, neither you should have had cause, no nor occasion thus easily to divine of my good or evil will towards you, nor I have been cumbered with this answer. My lord, I pray you, while I am your friend, take me to be so; for if I were not, or if I knew any cause why I ought not, I would not be afraid to show you what had alienated my mind from you; so you should well perceive that my displeasure should last no longer than there were cause. I pass over your Nemo leditur nisi a scipso, I pray with you this first part, Our Lord have pity upon me; the other part is not in my prayers, That God should turn my heart, for he is my judge, I may err in my doings for want of knowledge, but I willingly bear no misdoers, I willingly hurt none whom honesty and the king's laws do not refuse. Undo not you yourself, I intend nothing less than to work you any displeasure. If hitherto I have showed you any pleasure, I am glad of it: I showed it to your qualities and not to you; if they tarry with you, my good-will cannot depart from you, except your prayer be heard, that is, My heart be turned. I assure you I am right glad ye are in the place ye are in, and will do what shall lie in me to aid you in your office to maintain your reputation, to give you credit among your flock, and elsewhere; as long as I shall see you faithful to your duty, according to your calling. I will not become your good lord, as your desire is; I am and have been your friend, and take you to be mine; cast out vain suspicion, let rash judgment rule men of less wit and discretion; wilfulness becometh all men better than a bishop, which* should always teach us to lack gladly our own will, because you may not have your own will. Here is Christus paup. facit et ditat, cum Dominus dedit et Dominus abstulit, to what purpose? Sit nomen Domini benedictum, can never lack his place, it becometh alwise in season; or else as great a divine as ye are, I would say, it were not the best placed here, except you wist better, you had rather lose all than any part of your will. I pray you teach patience better in your deeds, or else speak as little of it as ye can. My lord, you might have provoked an other in my place, that would have used less patience with you, finding so little in you; but I can take your writings, and this heat off your stomach, even as well as I can, I trust, beware of flatterers. As for the abbot of Redding, and his monk, if I find them as ye say they are, I will order them as I shall think good; ye shall do well to do your duty; if you so do, ye have no cause to mistrust my friendship; if ye do not, I must tell it you, and that somewhat after the plainest sort: to take a cause out of your hands into mine, I do but mine office, you meddle further than your office will bear you thus roughly to handle me for using of mine. If ye do so no more, I let pass all that is past, and offer you such kindness as ye shall lawfully desire at my hands. Thus fare you well.

Damnatio et Excommunicatio Henrici VIII. Regis Angliæ, ejusque Factorum et Complicum, cum aliarum personarum adjectione.

Pontificum prædecessorum nostrorum desuper editis contentas, et alias in tales a juratas damnabiliter incurrendo, ac Regno Angliæ, et dominiis quæ tenebat, necnon regalibus fastigijs celsitudine ac præfati tituli prærogativa, et honore se indignum reddendo.

2. Nos licet ex eo, quod prout non ignorabamus, idem Henricus Rex certis censuris Ecclesiasticis, quibus a piæ memoriæ Clemente Papa VII. etiam prædecessore nostro, postquam humanissimis literis et paternis exhortationibus, multisque nunciis et mediis, primo et postremo etiam judicialiter, ut præfatam Annam a se dimitteret, et ad prædictæ Catharinæ suæ veræ Conjugis consortium rediret, frustra monitus fuerat, innodatus extiterat, Pharaonis duritiam imitando, per longum tempus in clavium contemptum insorduerat, et insordesceret, quod ad cor rediret, vix sperare posse videremus, ob paternam tamen Charitatem, qua in minoribus constituti donec in obedientia, et reverentia Sedis prædictæ permansit, eum prosecuti fuëramus, utque clarius videre possemus, an clamor qui ad nos delatus fuerat, (quem certe etiam ipsius Henrici Regis respectu falsum esse desideramus) verus esset, statuimus ab ulteriori contra ipsum Henricum Regem processu ad tempus abstinendo, hujus rei veritate diligentius indagare.

3. Cum autem debitis diligentibus desuper factis clamorem ad nos, ut præfertur, delatum, verum esse, simulque, quod dolenter referimus, dictum Henricum Regem ita in profundum malorum descendisse, ut de ejus resipiscentia nulla penitus videatur spes haberi posse, repererimus: Nos attendentes veterem lege, crimen adulterii notatum lapidari mandatum, ac auctores Schismatis halitu terræ absorptos, eorumque sequaces cœlesti igne consumptos, Elimamque; Magum viis Domini resistentem per Apostolum æterna severitate damnatum fuisse, volentesque; ne in districto examine ipsius Henrici Regis et subditorum suorum, quos secum in perditionem trahere videmus, animarum ratio a nobis exposcatur, quantum nobis ex alto conceditur, providere contra Henricum Regem, ejusque complices, fautores, adhærentes, et sequaces, et in præmissis quomodolibet culpabiles, contra quod ex eo quod excessus, et delicta prædicta adeo manifesta sunt et notoria, ut nulla possint tergiversatione celari, absque ulteriori mora ad executionem procedere possemus, benignius agendo, decrevimus infrascripto modo procedere.

5. Complices vero, fautores, adhærentes, consultores, et sequaces dicti Henrici Regis in præmissis, et circa ea ipsi Henrico Regi super his de cetero non adsistant, nec adhæreant, vel favcant, nec ei consilium, auxilium, vel favorem, desuper præstent.

6. Alias si Henricus Rex, ac fautores, adhærentes, consultores, et sequaces, hortationibus et requisitionibus hujusmodi non annuerint cum effectu, Henricum Regem, fautores, adhærentes, consultores et sequaces, ac alios culpabiles prædictos, auctoritate Apostolica, ac ex certa nostra scientia, et de Apostolicæ potestatis plenitudine, tenore presentium, in virtute sanctæ obedientia, ac sub majoris Excommunicationis lata sententia, a qua etiam prætextu cujuscunque privilegii, vel facultatis, etiam in forma confessionalis, cum quibuscunque efficacissimis clausulis nobis et Sede prædicta quomodolibet concessis, et etiam iteratis vicibus innovatis, ab alio quam a Romano Pontifice, præterquam in mortis Articulo constituti, ita tamen, quod si aliquem absolvi contingat, qui postmodum convalescerit, nisi post convalescentiam, monitioni et mandatis nostris hujusmodi paruerit cum effectu, in eandem Excommunicationis sententiam reincidat, absolvi non possint.

7. Necnon rebellionis, et quoad Henricum Regem, etiam perditionis Regni, et Dominiorum prædictorum, et tam quoad eum, quam quoad alios monitos supra dictos supra et infrascriptis pœnis, quas si dictis monitioni et mandatis, ut præfertur, non paruerint, eos, et eorum singulos, ipso facto respective incurrere volumus, per præsentem monemus; eisque et eorum cuilibet districtè præcipiendo mandamus, quatenus Henricus Rex per se, vel procuratorem legitimum et sufficientem mandato suffultum, infra nonaginta, complices vero, fautores, adhærentes, consultores, et sequaces, ac alii in præmissis quomodolibet culpabiles supradicti, Sæculares et Ecclesiastici etiam regulares, personaliter infra sexaginta dies compareant coram nobis, ad se super præmissis legitime excusandum et defendendum; alias videndum et audiendum contra eos et eorum singulos, etiam nominatim, quos sic monemus, quatenus expediat, ad omnem et singulos, actus, etiam sententiam definitivam, declaratoriam, condemnatoriam, et privatoriam, ac mandatum executivum procedi. Quod si Henricus Rex, et alii moniti prædicti intra dictos terminos eis ut præferunt, respective præfixos non comparuerint, et prædictam Excommunicationis sententiam per tres dies, post lapsum dictorum terminorum animo, quod absit, sustinerint indurato, censuras ipsas aggravamus, et successive reaggravamus, Henricumq; ipsum, privationis Regni et Dominiorum prædictorum, et tam eum quam alios monitos prædictos, et eorum singulos, omnes et singulas alias pœnas prædictas incurrisse, ab omnibusq; Christi fidelibus, cum eorum bonis perpetuo diffidatos esse. Et si interim ab humanis decedat, Ecclesiastica debere carere sepultura, auctoritate et potestatis plenitudine prædictis decernimus, et declaramus, eosq; anathematis, maledictionis, et damnationis æternæ mucrone percutimus.

8. Necnon quæ præfatus Henricus Rex quomodolibet, et ex quavis causa tenet, habet, aut possidet, Quamdiu Henricus Rex, et alii moniti prædicti, et eorum singuli in aliis per dictum Henricum Regem non tentis, habitis, aut possessis permanserint, et triduo post eorum inde recessum, et alia quæcunq; ad quæ Henricum Regem, et alios monitos prædictos, post lapsum dictorum terminorum declinare contigerit, Dominia, civitates, terras, castra, villas, oppida, Metropolitanasque, et alias Cathedralas, ceterasq; inferiores Ecclesias, necnon Monasteria, Prioratus, Domos, Conventus, et loca religiosa, vel pia cujuscunq; etiam S. Benedicti, Cluniacensis, Cisterciensis, Præmonstratensis, a. Prædicatorum, Minorum, Eremitarum S. Augustini Carmelitarum, et aliorum Ordinum, ac Congregationum, et Militiarum quarumcunq; in ipsis Dominiis, Civitatibus, terris, castris, villis, oppidis, et locis existentia, Ecclesiastico supponimus Interdicto, ita ut illo durante in eis itam prætextu cujuscunq; Apostolici indulti, Ecclesias, Monasteria, Prioratus, Domicilia, Conventus, locis, ordinibus, aut personis, etiam quæcunq; dignitate fulgentibus concessi, præterquam in casibus a jure permissis, ac etiam in illis alias quam clausis januis, et Excommunicatis et interdictis exclusis, nequeant Missæ, aut alia divina officia celebrari.

9. Et Henrici Regis, complicumque, fautorum, adhærentium, consultorum, sequacium, et culpabilium prædictorum filii, pœnarum, ut hic in hoc casu par est, participes sint, omnes et singulos ejusdem Henrici Regis ex dicta Anna, ac singulorum aliorum prædictorum filios natos, et nascituros, aliosq; descendentes, usq; in eum gradum, ad quem jura pœnas in casibus hujusmodi extendunt (nemine excepto, nullaq; minoris ætatis, aut sexus, vel ignorantie, vel alterius cujusvis causæ habita ratione) dignitates, et honoribus in quibus quomodolibet constituti existunt, seu quibus gaudent, utuntur, potiuntur, aut muniti sunt, necnon privilegiis, concessionibus, gratis, indulgentiis, immunitatibus, remissionibus, libertatibus, et indultis, ac dominiis, civitatibus, castris, terris, villis, oppidis, et locis, etiam Commendatis, vel in Gubernium concessis, et quæ in feudum, emphyteusim, vel alias a Romanis, vel aliis Ecclesiis, Monasteriis, et locis Ecclesiasticis, ac secularibus Principibus, Dominiis, Potentatibus, etiam Regibus et Imperatoribus, aut aliis privatis, vel publicis personis quomodolibet habent, tenent, aut possident, cæterisq; omnibus bonis, mobilibus et immobilibus, juribus et actionibus, eis quomodolibet competentibus privatos, dictaq; bona feudalia, vel emphyteutica, et alia quæcunq; ab aliis quomodolibet obtenta, ad directos dominos, ita ut de illis libere disponere possint, respective devoluta, et eos qui Ecclesiastici fuerint, etiamsi religiosi existant, Ecclesiis etiam Cathedralibus, et Metropolitanis, necnon Monasteriis et Prioratibus, præposituris, præpositatibus, dignitatibus, personatibus, Officiis, Canonicatibus et Præbendis, aliisq; beneficiis Ecclesiasticis per eos quomodolibet obtentis privatos, et ad illa ac alia in posterum obtinenda inhabiles esse, similiter decernimus et declaramus; eosq; sic respective privatos ad illa, et alia quæcunq; similia, ac dignitates, honores, administrationes, et officia, jura, ac feuda in posterum obtinenda, auctoritate et scientia, ac plenitudine similibus inhabilitamus.

10. Ipsiusq; Henrici Regis, ac Regni omniumq; aliorum dominiorum, civitatum, terrarum, castrorum, villarum, fortalitiorum, arcium, oppidorum, et locorum suorum, etiam de facto obtentorum Magistratus, judices, Castellanos, Custodes et Officiales quoscunq; necnon Communitates, Universitates, Collegia, Feudatarios, vassallos, subditos, cives, incolas, et habitatores etiam forenses, dicto Regi de facto obedientes, tam sæculares, quam si qui rationis alicujus temporalitatis ipsum Henricum Regem in superiorem recognoscant, etiam Ecclesiasticos, a præfato rege, seu ejus complicibus, fautoribus, adhærentibus, consultoribus, et sequacibus supradictis deputatis, a juramento fidelitatis, jure vassallico, et omni erga Regem, et alios prædictos subjectione absolvimus, ac penitus liberamus. His nihilominus sub Excommunicationis pœna mandantes, ut ab ejusdem Henrici Regis, suorumq; officialium, judicum, et magistratum quorumcunq; obedientia pœnitent et omnino recedant, nec illos in superiores recognoscant, neque illorum mandatis obtemperent.

11. Et ut alii eorum exemplo perterriti discant ab hujusmodi excessibus abstinere, eisdem auctoritate, scientia, et plenitudine, volumus, ac decernimus, quod Henricus Rex et complicēs, fautores, adhærentes, consultores, sequaces, et alii in præmissis culpabiles, postquam alias pœnas prædictas, ut præferunt, respective incurrerint, necnon præfati descendentes, ex tunc infames existant, et ad testimonium non admittantur, testamenta, et codicillos, aut alias dispositiones, etiam inter vivos concedere, et facere non possint, et ad alicujus successionem ex testamento, vel ab intestato, necnon ad jurisdictionem, seu iudicandi potestatem, et ad Notariatum Officium, omnesq; actus legitimos quoscunq; ita ut eorum processus, sive instrumenta atq; alii actus quicunq; nullius sint roboris vel momenti, inhabiles existant, et nulli ipsis, sed ipsi aliis super quocunq; debito et negotio, tam civili, quam criminali, de jure respondere teneantur.

12. Et nihilominus omnes, et singulos Christi fideles, sub Excommunicationis, et aliis infrascriptis pœnis, monemus, ut monitos, Excommunicatos, aggravatos, interdictos, privatos, maledictos, et damnatos prædictos evitent, et quantum in eis est, et ab aliis evitari faciant, nec cum eisdem, seu præfati Regis Civitatum, Dominiorum, Terrarum, Castrorum, Comitatum, Villarum, Fortalitiorum, Oppidorum, et locorum prædictorum civibus, incolis, vel habitatoribus aut subditis et vassalis, emendo, vendendo, permutando, aut quancunq; mercaturam, seu negotium exercendo, commercium, seu aliquam conversationem, seu communionem habeant: aut vinum, granum, sal, seu alia victualia, arma, pannos, merces vel quasvis alias mercantias, vel res per mare in eorum navibus, trirēibus, aut aliis navigiis, sive per terram cum mulis, vel aliis animalibus, deferre aut conducere, seu deferri aut conduci facere, vel delata per illos recipere, publice vel occulte, aut talia facientibus auxiliū, consiliū, favorem publice vel occulte, directe vel indirecte, quovis quæsito colore, per se, vel alium, seu alios quoquo modo præstare presument. contractum quos inirent, necnon perditionis mercium, victualium, et bonorum omnium delatorum, quæ capitientium fiant, pœnas similiter eo ipso incurrant.

13. Cæterum quia convenire non videtur, ut cum his qui Ecclesiam contemnunt, dum præsertim eorum pertinacia spes corrigibilitatis non habetur, hi qui divinis obsequiis vacant, conversentur, quod etiam illos tuto facere non posse dubitandum est, omnium et singularum Metropolitanarum et aliarum Cathedralium, cæterarumq; inferiorum Ecclesiarum et Monasteriorum, domorum et locorum Religiosorum, et piorum quorumcumque, etiam S. Augustini, S. Benedicti, Cluniacen. Cisterciën. Præmonstraten. ac Prædicatorum, Minorum, Carmelitarum, aliorumque quorumcumq; ordinum, et militiarum, etiam Hospitalis Hierosolymitani, Prælati, Abbatibus, Prioribus, Præceptoribus, Præpositis, Ministris, Custodibus, Guardianis, Conventibus, Monachis et Canonici, necnon Parochialium Ecclesiarum Rectoribus, aliisq; quibuscumq; personis Ecclesiasticis in Regno et Dominiis prædictis commorantibus, sub Excommunicationis ac privationis Administrationum et regiminum Monasteriorum, dignitatum, personatum, administrationum, ac officiorum, Canonicatumque, et Præbendarum, Parochialium Ecclesiarum, et aliorum beneficiorum Ecclesiasticorum quorumcumq; quomodolibet qualificatorum, per eos quomodolibet obtentorum, pœnis mandamus, quatenus infra quinque dies, post omnes et singulos terminos prædictos elapsos, de ipsis Regno, et Dominiis, dimissis tamen aliquibus Presbyteris in Ecclesiis parum curam habuerint, pro administrando baptismo parvulis, et in penitentia decedentibus, ac aliis Sacramentis Ecclesiasticis, quæ tempore Interdicti ministrari permittantur, exeant et discedant, neque ad Regnum, et Dominiis prædicta revertantur: donec moniti, et Excommunicati, aggravati, reaggravati, privati, maledicti, et damnati prædictis monitionibus, et mandatis nostris hujusmodi obtemperaverint, meruerint a censuris hujusmodi absolutionis beneficium obtinere, seu Interdictum in Regno, et Dominiis prædictis, fuerit sublatum.

14. Præterea si præmissis non obstantibus, Henricus Rex, complices, fautores, adherentes, consultores, et sequaces prædicti in eorum pertinacia perseveraverint, nec conscientie stimulus eos ad cor reduxerit, in eorum forte potentia, et armis confidentes, omnes et singulos Duces, Marchiones, Comites, et alios quoscumq; tam Seculares, quam Ecclesiasticos etiam forenses, de facto dicto Henrico Regi obediens, sub eisdem Excommunicationis, ac perditionis bonorum suorum (quæ, ut infra dicitur, similiter capientium fiant) pœnis, requirimus et monemus, quatenus omni mora, et excusatione postposita, eos, et eorum singulos, ac ipsorum milites et stipendiarios, tam equestres quam pedestres, aliosq; quoscumque, qui eis cum armis faverint, de Regno et Dominiis prædictis, etiam vi armorum, si opus fuerit, expellant: ac quod Henricus Rex, et ejus complices, fautores, adherentes, consultores, et sequaces, mandatis nostris non obtemperantes prædicti, de Civitatibus, Terris, Castris, Villis, Oppidis, Fortalitiis, aut aliis locis Regni et Dominiis prædictorum se non intromittant, procurent: eis sub omnibus et singulis pœnis prædictis inhibentes, ne in favorem Henrici, ejusque complicum, fautorum, adherentium, consultorum, et sequacium aliorumq; monitorum prædictorum, mandatis nostris non obtemperantium, arma cujuslibet generis, offensiva vel defensiva, machinas quoq; bellicas, seu tormenta (artellarias nuncupata) sumant aut teneant, seu illis utantur, aut armatos aliquos præter consuetam familiam parent, aut ab Henrico Rege, complicitibus, fautoribus, adherentibus, consultoribus, et sequacibus, vel aliis in Regis ipsius favorem paratos, quomodolibet, quavis occasione vel causa, per se vel alium seu alios, publice vel occulte, directe vel indirecte teneant, vel receiptent, aut dicto Henrico Regi, seu illius complicitibus, fautoribus, adherentibus, consultoribus, et sequacibus prædictis, consilium, auxilium, vel quomodolibet ex quavis causa, vel quovis quæsito colore sive ingenio, publice vel occulte, directe vel indirecte, tacite vel expresse, per se vel alium seu alios præmissis, vel aliquo præmissorum præstent, seu præstari faciant quomodolibet.

15. Præterea ad dictum Henricum Regem facilius ad sanitatem, et præfatæ Sedis obedientiam reducendum, omnes et singulos Christianos Principes, quoscumq; etiam Imperiales et Regales dignitate fulgentes, per viscera misericordiæ Dei nostri (cujus causa agitur) hortamur et in Domino requirimus, eis nihilominus, qui Imperatore et Rege inferiores fuerint, quos propter excellentiam dignitatis a censuris excipimus, sub Excommunicationis pœna mandantes, ne Henrico Regi ejusq; complicitibus, fautoribus, adherentibus, consultoribus, et sequacibus, vel eorum alicui, per se vel alium seu alios, publice vel occulte, directe vel indirecte, tacite vel expresse, etiam sub prætextu confœderationum aut obligationum quocumq; etiam juramento, aut quavis alia firmitate roboratarum, et sæpius geminarum, a quibus quidem obligationibus et juramentis omnibus, nos eos et eorum singulos eisdem auctoritate et scientia ac plenitudine per præsentem absolvimus, ipsasq; confœderationes et obligationes tam factas, quam in posterum faciendas, quas tamen (in quantum Henricus Rex et complices, fautores, adherentes, consultores, et sequaces prædicti circa præmissa, vel eorum aliquod se directe vel indirecte juvare possent) sub eadem pœna fieri prohibemus, nullius roboris vel momenti, nullasque, irritas, cassas, inanes, ac pro infectis habendas fore decernimus et declaramus, consilium, auxilium, vel favorem quomodolibet præstent, quinimo si qui illis, aut eorum alicui ad præsens quomodolibet assistant, ab ipsis omnino et cum affectu recedant. Quod si non fecerint postquam præsentem publicatæ et executioni demandatæ fuerint, et dicti termini lapsi fuerint, omnes et singulas civitates, terras, oppida, castra, villas, et alia loca eis subjecta, simili Ecclesiastico Interdicto supponimus, volentes ipsum Interdictum donec ipsi Principes a Consilio, auxilio, et favore Henrico Regi et complicitibus, fautoribus, adherentibus, consultoribus et sequacibus prædictis præstando destiterint, perdurare.

16. Insuper tam Principes prædictos, quam quoscumq; alios, etiam ad stipendia quorumcumq; Christi fidelium militantis, et alias quascumq; personas, tam per mare, quam per terras, armigeros habentes, similiter hortamur et requirimus, et nihilominus eis in virtute sanctæ obedientiæ mandantes, quatenus contra Henricum Regem, complices, fautores, adherentes, consultores, et sequaces prædictos, dum in erroribus prædictis, ac adversus Sedem prædictam, rebellionem permanserint, armis insurgant, eosq; et eorum singulos persequantur, ac ad unitatem Ecclesie, et obedientiam dictæ Sedis redire cogant et compellant; et tam eos quam ipsorum subditos et vassallos, ac civitatum, terrarum, castrorum, oppidorum, villarum, et locorum suorum incolas, et habitatores, aliosque omnes et singulas personas supradictis mandatis nostris, ut præfertur, non obtemperantes, et quæ præfatam Henricum Regem, postquam censuras, et pœnas prædictas incurrerit, in Dominum quomodolibet, etiam de facto recognoverint, vel ei quovis modo obtemperare præsumperint, aut qui eum, ac complices, fautores, adherentes, consultores, sequaces, ac alios non obtemperantes prædictos, ex Regno et Dominiis prædictis, ut præfertur, expellere noluerint, ubicumq; invenerint, eorumque bona, mobilia et mercantias, pecunias, navigia, credita, res, et animalia, etiam extra territorium dicti Henrici Regis ubilibet consistantia, capiant.

17. Nos enim eis bona, mercantias, pecunias, navigia, res, et animalia prædicta sic capta, in propriis eorum usus convertendi, eisdem auctoritate, scientia, et potestatis plenitudine, plenariam licentiam, facultatem et auctoritatem concedimus, illa omnia ad eosdem capientes plenarie pertinere, et spectare, et personas ex Regno et Dominiis prædictis originem trahentes, seu in illis domicilium habentes, aut quomodolibet habitantes, mandatis nostris prædictis non obtemperantes, ubicumque eos capi contigerit, capiendum servos fieri decernentes: presentesque; literas quoad hoc ad omnes alios cujuscumque; dignitatis, gradus, status, ordinis, vel conditionis fuerint, qui ipsi Henrico Regi, vel ejus complicibus, fautoribus, adhærentibus, consultiorebus, et sequacibus, aut aliis monitionibus, et mandatis nostris hujusmodi quod commercium non obtemperantibus, vel eorum alicui victualia, arma, vel pecunias subministrare, aut cum eis commercium habere, seu auxilium, consilium, vel favorem, per se vel alium, seu alios, publice vel occulte, directe vel indirecte, quovis modo contra tenorem præsentium præstare præsumperint, extendentes.

18. Et ut præmissa facilius iis quos concernunt innotescant, universis et singulis Patriarchis, Archiepiscopis, Episcopis, et Patriarchalium Metropolitan. et aliarum Cathedralium, et Collegiarum: Ecclesiarum Prælati, Capitulis, aliisque; personis Ecclesiasticis, Sæcularibus ac quorumvis ordinum Regularibus, necnon omnibus et singulis, etiam mendicantium ordinum Professoribus, exemptis et non exemptis, ubilibet constitutis, per easdem præsentibus sub Excommunicationis et privationis Ecclesiarum, Monasteriorum, ac aliorum Beneficiorum Ecclesiasticorum, graduum quoque; et officiorum, necnon privilegiorum, et indultorum quorumcumque; etiam a Sede prædicta quomodolibet emanatorum pœnis ipso facto incurrendis, præcipimus et mandamus, quatenus ipsi ac eorum singuli, si, et postquam vigore præsentium desuper requisiti fuerint, infra tres dies immediate sequentes, præfatum Henricum Regem, omnesque; alios et singulos, qui supradictas censuras et pœnas incurrerint, in eorum Ecclesiis, Dominicis et aliis festivis diebus, dum major inibi populi multitudo ad divina convenerit, cum Crucis vexillo, pulsatis campanis, et accensis, ac denum extinctis, et in terram projectis, et conculcatis candelis, et aliis in similibus servari solitis cæremoniis servatis, Excommunicatos publice nuncient, et ab aliis nuntiar, ac ab omnibus arctius evitari faciant et mandent, necnon sub supradictis censuris et pœnis, presentes literas, vel earum transumptum, sub forma infrascripta confectum, infra terminum trium dierum, postquam, ut præfertur, requisiti fuerint, in Ecclesiis, Monasteriis, Conventibus, et aliis eorum locis, publicari et affigi faciant.

19. Volentes, omnes et singulos cujuscumque; status, gradus, conditionis, præeminentie, dignitatis, aut excellentie fuerint, qui quo minus præsentibus literæ, vel earum transumpta, copie, seu exemplaria, in suis civitatibus, terris, castris, oppidis, villis, et locis legi et affigi, ac publicari possint, per se, vel alium, seu alios, publice vel occulte, directe vel indirecte impederint, easdem censuras et pœnas, ipso facto incurrere. Et cum fraus et dolus nemini debeant patrocinari, ne quisquam ex his, qui alicui regimini et administrationi deputati sunt, infra tempus sui regiminis seu administrationis prædictas sententias, censuras et pœnas sustineat, quasi post dictum tempus sententia, censuris et pœnis prædictis amplius ligatus non existat, quemcumque; qui dum in regimine, et administratione existens, monitioni et mandato nostris, quoad præmissa vel aliquid eorum obtemperare noluerit, etiam deposito regimine, et administratione hujusmodi, nisi paruerit, eisdem censuris et pœnis subjacere decernimus.

20. Et ne Henricus Rex ejusque; complicēs, et fautores, adhærentes, consultores, et sequaces, aliique; quos præmissa concernunt, ignorantiam earundem præsentium literarum, et in eis contentorum prætereundere valeant, literas ipsas (in quibus omnes et singulos, tam juris, quam facti, etiam solemnitatibus, et processuum, citationumque; omissarum defectus, etiam si tales sint, de quibus specialis, et expressa mentio faciendæ esset, propter notorietatem facti, auctoritate, scientia, et potestatis plenitudine similibus, supplementis) in Basilicæ Principis Apostolorum, et Cancellariæ Apostolicæ de urbe, et in partibus in Collegiæ B. Mariæ Burgen. Tornacen. et Parochialis de Dunikerke oppidorum Morinensis diæcesis, Ecclesiarum valvis affigi, et publicari mandamus: Decernentes quod earundem literarum publicatio sic facta, Henricum Regem, ejusque; complicēs, fautores, adhærentes, consultores, et sequaces, omnesque; alios, et singulos quos literæ ipsæ quomodolibet concernunt, perinde eos arctent, ac si literæ ipsæ eis personaliter lectæ, et intimatæ fuissent, cum non sit verisimile, quod ea, quæ tam patenter fiunt, debeant apud eos incognita remanere.

21. Cæterum quia difficile foret præsentibus literas ad singula quæque loca, ad quæ necessarium esset deferri, singula volumus et dicta auctoritate decernimus, quod earum transumptis manu publici Notarii confectis, vel in alma urbe impressis, ac sigillo alicujus personæ in dignitate Ecclesiastica constitutæ munitis, ubique eadem fides adhibeatur, quæ originalibus adhiberetur, si essent exhibitæ vel ostensæ.

Datum Romæ apud Sanctum Marcum. Anno Incarnationis Domini 1535. 3 Kal. Sept. Pont. nostri Anno I.

Sequitur suspensio Executionis dictæ Bullæ, et tandem ejus revocatio, et Executio.

Paulus Episcopus Servus Servorum Dei, ad perpetuam rei memoriam.

Cum Redemptor noster ideo illum qui ipsum negaverat, Petrum, viz. Universæ Ecclesiæ præficere voluerit, ut in sua culpa disceret aliis esse miserendum, non immerito Romanus Pontifex qui ipsius Petri in dignitate Successor existit, debet etiam in Officio exercendæ misericordiæ ipsius esse Successor. Sed cum in eum dirigitur misericordia, qui ex hoc sit insolentior, et obstinatio, aliosque; secum trahit in perditionem, debet ipse Romanus Pontifex, postposita in eum misericordia, omnem severitatem adhibere, quo membrum illud putridum ita a corpore separaretur, ut reliqua membra absque; metu contagionis salva remaneant, præsertim cum pluribus curis adhibitis, et multo tempore in hoc consumpto morbum quotidie magis invalescere, ipsa experientia comprobatur.

1. Alias cum nobis relatum fuisset, quod Henricus Angliæ Rex, præter ea quæ Matrimonium de facto, et contra prohibitionem Ecclesiæ temerarie contractum concernebant, quasdam leges, seu generales constitutiones subditos suos ad hæresim, et schisma trahentes ediderat, et bonæ memoriæ Joann. tit. Sancti Vitalis Presbyterum Cardinalem Roffen. publice damnari et capite puniri, ac alios quamplures Prælatos necnon alias personas Ecclesiat. X.—The Judgment of some Bishops concerning the King's Supremacy. An Original.

[Ex MSS. D. Stillingfleet.]

THE words of St. John in his 20th chapter, Sicut misit me Pater, et ego mitto vos, &c. hath no respect to a king's or a prince's power, but only to show how that the ministers of the word of God, chosen and sent for that intent, are the messengers of Christ, to teach the truth of his gospel, and to loose and bind sin, &c. as Christ was the messenger of his Father. The words also of St. Paul, in the 20th chap. of the Acts; Attendite vobis et universo gregi, in qua vos Spiritus Sanctus posuit Episcopos regere Ecclesiam Dei, were spoken to the bishops and priests, to be diligent pastors of the people, both to teach them diligently, and also to be circumspect that false preachers should not seduce the people, as followeth immediately after in the same place. Other places of Scripture declare the highness and excellency of Christian princes' authority and power; the which of a truth is most high, for he hath power and charge generally over all, as well bishops as priests as other. The bishops and priests have charge of souls within their own cures, power to minister sacraments and to teach the word of God; to the which word of God Christian princes knowledge themselves subject; and in case the bishops be negligent, it is the Christian prince's office, to see them do their duty.

XI.—Injunctions to the Clergy made by Cromwell.

[Regist. Cranmer.]

In the name of God, Amen. By the authority and commission of the excellent prince Henry, by the grace of God, king of England and of France, defensor of the faith, lord of Ireland; and in earth supreme head, under Christ, of the church of England. I, Thomas lord Cromwel, privy seal, and vicegerent to the king's said highness, for all his jurisdiction ecclesiastical within this realm, do, for the advancement of the true honour of Almighty God, increase of virtue, and discharge of the king's majesty, give and exhibit unto you these injunctions following, to be kept, observed, and fulfilled, upon the pains hereafter declared.

First, That ye shall truly observe and keep all and singular the king's highness' injunctions, given unto you heretofore in my name, by his grace's authority; not only upon the pains therein expressed, but also in your default after this second monition continued, upon further punishment to be straitly extended towards you by the king's highness' arbitrement, or his vicegerent aforesaid.

Item, That ye shall provide on this side the feast of next coming, one book of the whole Bible of the largest volume in English, and the same set up in some convenient place within the said church that ye have cure of, whereas your parishioners may most commodiously resort to the same and read it; the charge of which book shall be ratably borne between you the parson and the parishioners aforesaid, that is to say, the one half by you, and the other half by them.

Item, That you shall discourage no man privily or apertly from the reading or hearing of the said Bible, but shall expressly provoke, stir, and exhort every person to read the same, as that which is the very lively word of God, that every Christian man is bound to embrace, believe and follow, if he look to be saved; admonishing them nevertheless to avoid all contention, altercation therein, and to use an honest sobriety in the inquisition of the true sense of the same, and refer the explication of the obscure places to men of higher judgment in Scripture.

Item, That ye shall every Sunday and holy-day through the year, openly and plainly recite to your parishioners, twice or thrice together, or oftener if need require, one particle or sentence of the Pater Noster or Creed, in English, to the intent they may learn the same by heart; and so from day to day, to give them one little lesson or sentence of the same, till they have learned the whole Pater Noster and Creed in English by rote. And as they be taught every sentence of the same by rote, ye shall expound and declare the understanding of the same unto them, exhorting all parents and householders to teach their children and servants the same, as they are bound in conscience to do. And that done, ye shall declare unto them the ten commandments one by one, every Sunday and holiday, till they be likewise perfect in the same.

Item, That ye shall in confessions every Lent examine every person that cometh to confession unto you, whether they can recite the articles of our faith, and the Pater Noster in English, and hear them say the same particularly; wherein if they be not perfect, ye shall declare to the same, that every Christian person ought to know the same before they should receive the blessed sacrament of the altar; and monish them to learn the same more perfectly by the next year following, or else, like as they ought not to presume to come to God's board without perfect knowledge of the same, and if they do, it is to the great peril of their souls; so ye shall declare unto them, that ye look for other injunctions from the king's highness by that time, to stay and repel all such from God's board as shall be found ignorant in the premises; whereof ye do thus admonish them, to the intent they should both eschew the peril of their souls, and also the worldly rebuke that they might incur after by the same.

Item, That ye shall make, or cause to be made, in the said church, and every other cure ye have, one sermon every quarter of the year at least, wherein ye shall purely and sincerely declare the very gospel of Christ, and in the same exhort your hearers to the works of charity, mercy, and faith, especially prescribed and commanded in Scripture, and not to repose their trust or affiance in any other works devised by men's fantasies besides Scripture: as in wandering to pilgrimages, offering of money, candles, or tapers, to images, or relics; of kissing or licking the same over, saying over a number of beads, not understood or minded on, or in such like superstition; for the doing whereof, ye not only have no promise of reward in Scripture, but contrariwise great threats and maledictions of God, as things tending to idolatry and superstition, which of all other offences God Almighty doth most detest and abhor, for that the same diminisheth most his honour and glory.

Item, That such feigned images as ye know in any of your cures to be so abused with pilgrimages or offerings of anything made thereunto ye shall, for avoiding of that most detestable offence of idolatry, forthwith take down, and without delay; and shall suffer from henceforth no candles, tapers, or images of wax to be set afore any image or picture, but only the light that commonly goeth across the church by the rood-loft, the light before the sacrament of the altar, and the light about the sepulchre; which for the adorning of the church, and divine service, ye shall suffer to remain: still admonishing your parishioners, that images serve for none other purpose, but as to be books of unlearned men, that ken no letters, whereby they might be otherwise admonished of the lives and conversation of them that the said images do represent; which images if they abuse for any other intent than for such remembrances, they commit idolatry in the same, to the great danger of their souls; and therefore the king's highness graciously tendering the weal of his subjects' souls, hath to part already, and more will hereafter, travail for the abolishing of such images as might be an occasion of so great an offence to God, and so great a danger to the souls of his loving subjects.

Item, That all in such benefices, or cures, as ye have, whereupon ye be not yourself resident, ye shall appoint such curates in your stead, as can both by their ability, and will also promptly, execute these injunctions, and do their duty, otherwise that ye are bounden in every behalf accordingly, and may profit them, no less with good examples of living, than with declaration of the word of God, or else their lack and defaults shall be imputed unto you, who shall straightly answer for the same if they do otherwise.

Item, That ye shall admit no man to preach within any your benefices or cures, but such as shall appear unto you to be sufficiently licensed thereunto by the king's highness, or his grace's authority, by the archbishop of Canterbury, or the bishop of this diocese; and such as shall be so licensed ye shall gladly receive to declare the word of God, without any resistance or contradiction.

Item, If ye have heretofore declared to your parishioners any thing to the extolling or setting forth of pilgrimages, feigned relics, or images, or any such superstitions, that you shall now openly afore the same recant and reprove the same, showing them (as the truth is) that ye did the same upon no ground of

[Rot. Pat. 31, Hen. 8.]

HENRY the Eighth, &c. To all and singular printers and sellers of books within this our realm, and all other officers, ministers, and subjects, these our letters hearing or seeing, greeting. We let you wit, that being desirous to have our people, at all times convenient, give themselves to the attaining the knowledge of God's word, whereby they will the better honour him, and observe and keep his commandments; and also do their duties better to us, being their prince and sovereign lord: and considering that this our zeal and desire cannot by any mean take so good effect, as by the granting to them the free and liberal use of the bible in our own natural English tongue: so unless it be foreseen that the same pass at the beginning by one translation to be perused and considered; the frailty of men is such, that the diversity thereof may breed and bring forth manifold inconveniences; as when wilful and heady folk shall confer upon the diversity of the said translations. We have therefore appointed our right trusty and well-beloved counsellor, the lord Cromwell, keeper of our privy-seal, to take for us, and in our name, special care and charge, that no manner of person, or persons, within this our realm, shall enterprise, attempt, or set in hand to print any bible in the English tongue of any manner of volume, during the space of five years next ensuing after the date hereof, but only all such as shall be deputed, assigned, and admitted by the said lord Cromwell.

The 13 Novemb. Tricesimo primo Regni.

XVI.—The Attainder of Thomas Cromwell.

[Parliament Rolls, Act 60, An. Reg. 32.]

Item quadam alia petito, formam cujusdam actus attinctura in se continens, exhibita est suæ Regiæ Majestati in Parlamento prædicto, cujus tenor sequitur in hæc verba.

In their most humble-wise showing to your most royal majesty, the lords spiritual and temporal, and all your most loving and obedient subjects, the commons in this your most high court of parliament assembled; that where your most royal majesty, our natural sovereign lord, is justly, lawfully, and really entituled to be our sole supreme head and governor, of this your realm of England, and of the dominions of the same; to whom, and to none other under God, the kingly direction, order, and governance of your most loving and obedient subjects, and people of this your realm, only appertaineth and belongeth. And the which your most loving and obedient subjects, your highness prudently and quietly, without any manner of disturbance, by a long time most graciously hath preserved, sustained, and defended: and your highness, for the quietness, wealth, and tranquillity of your said humble and obedient subjects, hath made and ordained divers and many most godly, virtuous, and wholesome laws; and for due execution of the same, hath not desisted to travel in your own most royal person, to support and maintain, as well the laws of Almighty God, as the laws by your highness made and ordained, by due and condign execution of the same laws upon the transgressors offending contrary to the same: and your majesty hath always most virtuously studied and laboured, by all ways, and all means, to and for the setting forth thereof, in such wise as it might be most to the honour, glory, and pleasure of Almighty God; and for the common accord and wealth of this your realm, and other your dominions: and for the true execution of the same, hath elected, chosen, and made divers, as well of your nobles, as others, to be of your most honourable council, as to the honour of a noble prince appertaineth. And where your majesty hath had a special trust and confidence in your said most trusty counsellors, that the same your counsellors, and every of them, had minded and intended, and finally purposed to have followed and pursued your most godly and princely purpose, as of truth the more number hath most faithfully done; yet nevertheless Thomas Cromwell, now earl of Essex, whom your majesty took and received into your trusty service, the same Thomas then being a man of very base and low degree, and for singular favour, trust, and confidence, which your majesty bare and had in him, did not only erect and advance the same Thomas unto the state of an earl, and enriched him with manifold gifts, as well of goods, as of lands and offices, but also him, the said Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, did erect and make one of your most trusty counsellors, as well concerning your grace's supreme jurisdictions ecclesiastical, as your most high secret affairs temporal. Nevertheless your majesty now of late hath found, and tried, by a large number of witnesses, being your faithful subjects and personages of great honour, worship, and discretion, the said Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, contrary to the singular trust and confidence which your majesty had in him, to be the most false and corrupt traitor, deceiver, and circumventor against your most royal person, and the imperial crown of this your realm, that hath been known, seen, or heard of in all the time of your most noble reign: inasmuch that it is manifestly proved and declared, by the depositions of the witnesses aforesaid, that the same Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, usurping upon your kingly estate, power, authority, and office, without your grace's commandment or assent, hath taken upon him to set at liberty divers persons, being convicted and attainted of misprision of high treason; and divers other being apprehended, and in prison, for suspicion of high treason; and over that, divers and many times, at sundry places, in this your realm, for manifold sums of money to him given, most traitorously hath taken upon him, by several writings, to give and grant, as well unto aliens, as to your subjects, a great number of licenses for conveying and carrying of money, corn, grain, beans, beer, leather, tallow, bells, metals, horses, and other commodities of this your realm, contrary to your highness's most godly and gracious proclamations made for the commonwealth of your people of this your realm in that behalf, and in derogation of your crown and dignity. And the same Thomas Cromwell, elated, and full of pride, contrary to his most bounden duty, of his own authority and power, not regarding your majesty royal; and further, taking upon him your power, sovereign lord, in that behalf, divers and many times most traitorously hath constituted, deputed, and assigned, many singular persons of your subjects to be commissioners in many your great, urgent, and weighty causes and affairs, executed and done in this your realm, without the assent, knowledge, or consent of your highness. And further also, being a person of as poor and low degree, as few be within this your realm; pretending to have so great a stroke about you, our, and his natural sovereign liege lord, that he letted not to say publicly, and declare, that he was sure of you; which is detestable, and to be abhorred amongst all good subjects in any Christian realm, that any subject should enterprise or take upon him so to speak of his sovereign liege lord and king. And also of his own authority and power, without your highness's consent, hath made, and granted, as well to strangers as to your own subjects, divers and many passports, to pass over the seas, with horses, and great sums of money, without any search. And over that, most gracious sovereign lord, amongst divers other his treasons, deceits, and falsehoods, the said Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, being a detestable heretic, and being in himself utterly disposed to set and sow common sedition and variance among your true and loving subjects, hath secretly set forth and dispersed into all shires, and other territories of this your realm, and other your dominions, great numbers of false erroneous books, whereof many were printed and made beyond the seas, and divers other within this realm, comprising and declaring, amongst many other evils and errors, manifest matters to induce and lead your subjects to diffidence, and refusal of the true and sincere faith and belief, which Christian religion bindeth all Christian people to have, in the most holy and blessed sacrament of the altar, and other articles of Christian religion, most graciously declared by your majesty, by authority of parliament: and certain matters comprised in some of the said books, hath caused to be translated into our maternal and English tongue: and, upon report made unto him by the translator thereof, that the matter so translated hath expressly been against the said most blessed and holy sacrament; yet the same Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, after he had read the same translation, most heretically hath affirmed the same material heresy so translated, to be good; and further hath said, that he found no fault therein; and over that, hath openly and obstinately holden opinion, and said, that it was as lawful for every Christian man to be a minister of the said sacrament as well as a priest. And where also your most royal majesty, being a prince of virtue, learning, and justice, of singular confidence and trust, did constitute and make the same Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, your highness's vicegerent within this your realm of England; and, by the same, gave unto him authority and power, not only to redress and reform all, and all manner of errors and erroneous opinions, insurging and growing among your loving and obedient subjects of this your realm, and of the dominions of the same, but also to order and direct all ecclesiastical and spiritual causes within your said realm and dominions; the said Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, not regarding his duty to Almighty God and to your highness, under the seal of your vicegerent, hath, without your grace's assent or knowledge, licensed and authorised divers persons, detected and suspected of heresies, openly to teach and preach amongst your most loving and obedient subjects, within this your realm of England. And, under the pretence and colour of the said great authorities and cures, which your majesty hath committed unto him in the premises, hath not only, of his corrupt and damnable will and mind, actually, at some time, by his own deed and commandment, and at many other times by his letters, expressly written to divers worshipful persons, being sheriffs, in sundry shires of this your realm, falsely suggesting thereby your grace's pleasure so to have been, caused to be set at large many false heretics, some being there indicted, and some other being thereof apprehended, and in ward: and commonly, upon complaints made by credible persons unto the said Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, of great and most detestable heresies committed and sprung in many places of this your realm, with declaration of the specialities of the same heresies, and the names of the offenders therein, the same Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, by his crafty and subtle means and inventions, hath not only defended the same heretics from punishment and reformation; but, being a fautor, maintainer, and supporter of heretics, divers times hath terribly rebuked divers of the said credible persons being their accusers, and some others of them hath persecuted and vexed by imprisonment and otherwise. So that thereby many of your grace's true and loving subjects have been in much dread and fear to detect or accuse such detestable known heretics; the particularities and specialities of which said abominable heresies, errors, and offences, committed and done by the said Thomas Cromwell, being over-tedious, long, and of too great number here to be expressed, declared, or written. And to the intent to have those damnable errors and heresies, to be inculcated, impressed, and infix'd in the hearts of your subjects, as well contrary to God's laws as to your laws and ordinances. Most gracious sovereign lord, the same Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, hath allured and drawn unto him, by retainers, many of your subjects sundrily inhabiting in every of your said shires and territories, as well erroneously persuading and declaring to them the contents of the false erroneous books, above-written, to be good, true, and best standing with the most Holy Word and pleasure of God; as other his false and heretical opinions and errors; whereby, and by his confederacies therein, he hath caused many of your faithful subjects to be greatly infected with heresies, and other errors, contrary to the right laws and pleasure of Almighty God. And the same Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, by the false and traitorous means above-written, supposing himself to be fully able, by force and strength, to maintain and defend his said abominable treasons, heresies, and errors, not regarding his most bounden duty to Almighty God and his laws, nor the natural duty of allegiance to your majesty, in the last day of March, in the thirtieth year of your most gracious reign, in the parish of St. Peter the Poor, within our city of London, upon demonstration and declaration then and there made unto him, that there were certain new preachers, as Robert Barnes, clerk, and other, whereof part been now committed to the Tower of London for preaching and teaching of lewd learning against your highness's proclamations; the same Thomas affirming the same preaching to be good, most detestably, arrogantly, erroneously, wilfully, maliciously, and traitorously, expressly against your laws and statutes; then and there did not let to declare, and say, these most traitorous and detestable words ensuing, amongst other words of like matter and effect; that is to say, that "if the king would turn from it, yet I would not turn; and if the king did turn, and all his people, I would fight in the field in mine own person, with my sword in my hand, against him and all others;" and then and there most traitorously pulled out his dagger, and held it on high, saying these words, "Or else this dagger thrust me to the heart, if I would not die in that quarrel against them all: and I trust, if I live one year or two, it shall not lie in the king's power to resist or let it if he would." And further, then and there, swearing by a great oath, traitorously affirmed the same his traitorous saying and pronounciation of words, saying, "I will do so indeed," extending up his arm, as though he had had a sword in his hand; to the most perilous, grievous, and wicked example of all other your loving, faithful, and obedient subjects in this your realm, and to the peril of your most royal person. And, moreover, our most gracious sovereign lord, the said Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, hath acquired and obtained into his possession, by oppression, bribery, extortion, power, and false promises made by him, to your subjects of your realm, innumerable sums of money and treasure; and, being so enriched, hath had your nobles of your realm in great disdain, derision, and detestation, as by express words by him most opprobriously spoken hath appeared. And, being put in remembrance of others, of his estate, which your highness hath called him unto, offending in like treasons, the last day of January, in the thirty-first year of your most noble reign, at the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Field, in the county of Middlesex, most arrogantly, willingly, maliciously, and traitor-ously, said, published, and declared, that "if the lords would handle him so, that he would give them such a breakfast as never was made in England, and that the proudest of them should know;" to the great peril and danger as well of your majesty as of your heirs and successors: for the which his most detestable and abominable heresies and treasons, and many other his like offences and treasons, overlong here to be rehearsed and declared. Be it enacted, ordained, and established by your majesty, with the assent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the said Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, for his abominable and detestable heresies and treasons, by him most abominably, heretically, and traitorously practised, committed, and done, as well against Almighty God as against your majesty, and this your said realm, shall be, and stand, by authority of this present parliament, convicted and attainted of heresy and high-treason, and be adjudged an abominable and detestable heretic and traitor; and shall have and suffer such pains of death, losses, and forfeitures of goods, debts, and chattels, as in cases of heresy and high-treason, or as in cases of either of them, at the pleasure of your most royal majesty. And that the same Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, shall, by authority abovesaid, lose, and forfeit to your highness, and to your heirs and successors, all such his castles, lordships, manors, messuages, lands, tenements, rents, reversions, remainders, services, possessions, offices, rights, conditions, and all other his hereditaments, of what names, natures, or qualities soever they be, which he the said Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, or any other to his use had, or ought to have had, of any estate of inheritance, in fee-simple or fee-tail, in reversion or possession, at the said last day of March, in the said thirtieth year of your most gracious reign, or at any time sith or after, as in cases of high-treason. And that all the said castles, lordships, manors, lands, messuages, tenements, rents, reversions, remainders, services, possessions, offices, and all other the premises forfeited, as is abovesaid, shall be deemed invested and adjudged in the lawful, real, and actual possession of your highness, your heirs, and successors for ever in the same, and such estate, manner, and form, as if the said castles, lordships, manors, messuages, lands, tenements, rents, reversions, remainders, services, possessions, offices, and other the premises, with their appurtenances, and every of them, were specially or particularly founden, by office or offices, inquisition or inquisitions, to be taken by any escheator or escheators, or any other commissioner or commissioners, by virtue of any commission or commissions to them, or any of them, to be directed in any county or counties, shire or shires, within this your realm of England, where the said castles, and other the premises, or any of them, been, or do lay, and returned into any of your majesty's courts. Saving to all and singular person and persons, bodies politic and corporate, their heirs and successors, and their successors and assignees of every of them, other than the said Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, and his heirs, and all and every other person and persons, claiming by the same Thomas Cromwell, and to his use, all such right, title, entry, possession, interest, reversions, remainders, lease, leases, conditions, fees, offices, rents, annuities, commons, and all other commodities, profits, and hereditaments, whatsoever they or any of them might, should, or ought to have had, if this act had never been had nor made. Provided always, and be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that this act of attainder, ne any offence, ne other thing therein contained, extend not unto the deanery of Wells, in the county of Somerset; nor to any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments thereunto belonging; nor be in anywise prejudicial or hurtful unto the bishop of Bath and Wells, nor to the dean and chapter of the cathedral church of St. Andrew of Wells, nor to any of them, nor to any of their successors; but that the said bishop, dean, and chapters, and their successors, and every of them, shall and may have, hold, use, occupy, and enjoy, all and singular their titles, rights, manors, lands, tenements, rents, reversions, and services, and all and singular other their hereditaments, commodities, and profits, of what nature, kind, or quality, or condition soever they be, in as ample and large manner and form, as though this act of attainder, or any offence therein mentioned, had never been had, committed, nor made; and that from henceforth the dean, and his successors, deans of the said cathedral church that hereafter shall be preferred, elected, and admitted to the same, shall, by the authority aforesaid, be dean of the said cathedral church, fully and wholly incorporated with the chapter of the same, in as ample, large, and like manner and form, to all intents and purposes, as the deans before this time hath been and used to be, with the said chapter of the said cathedral church of Wells. And that the same dean and chapter, and their successors, shall have, occupy, and enjoy, all and singular their such possessions, manors, lands, tenements, rents, reversions, and services, and all and singular their hereditaments, of what nature, kind, name or names they be called or known. And shall be adjudged and deemed in actual and real possession and season of, and in the same premises, to all intents and purposes, according to their old corporation, as though this act of attainder, or anything, clause, or matter therein contained had never been had, committed, nor made. This said act of attainder, or any other act, provision, or anything heretofore had or made to the contrary notwithstanding. Cui quidem petitioni cum provisione prædictæ. et intellect. per dictum Dominum Regem ex autoritate et consensu Parlamenti prædicti sic Responsum est,

[Cott. Libr. Otho. C. 10.]

To the King, my most Gracious Sovereign Lord his Royal Majesty.

Most merciful king, and most gracious sovereign lord, may it please the same to be advertised, that the last time it pleased your benign goodness to send unto me the right honourable lord chancellor, the right honourable duke of Norff. and the lord admiral, to examine, and also to declare unto me divers things from your majesty; among the which, one special thing they moved, and thereupon they charged me, as I would answer before God at the dreadful day of judgment, and also upon the extreme danger and damnation of my soul and conscience, to say what I knew in the marriage, and concerning the marriage, between your highness and the queen. To the which I answered as I knew, declaring unto them the particulars as nigh as I then could call to remembrance. Which when they had heard, they, in your majesty's name, and upon like charge as they had given me before, commanded me to write to your highness the truth, as much as I knew in that matter; which now I do, and the very truth, as God shall save me, to the uttermost of my knowledge. First; after your majesty heard of the lady Ann of Cleves, arrival at Dover, and that her' journeys were appointed toward Greenwich, and that she should be at Rochester on New-year's even at night, your highness declared to me that you would privily visit her at Rochester, upon New-year's-day, adding these words, "to nourish love;" which accordingly your grace did upon New-year's-day, as is above said. And the next day, being Friday, your grace returned to Greenwich, where I spake with your grace, and demanded of your majesty how ye liked the lady Ann: your highness answered as methought heavily, and not pleasantly, "Nothing so well as she was spoken of;" saying further, "that if your highness had known as much before as ye then knew, she should not have come within this realm;" saying, as by the way of lamentation, "what remedy?" unto the which I answered and said, I know none, but was very sorry therefore; and so God knoweth I was, for I thought it a hard beginning. The next day after the receipt of the said lady, and her entry made into Greenwich, and after your highness had brought her to her chamber, I then waited upon your highness into your privy chamber; and being there, your grace called me unto you, saying to me these words, or the like, "My lord, is it not as I told you? say what they will, she is nothing so fair as she hath been reported; howbeit she is well and seemly." Whereunto I answered and said, By my faith, sir, ye say truth; adding thereunto, that I thought she had a queenly manner; and nevertheless was sorry that your grace was no better content: and thereupon your grace commanded me to call together your council, which were these by name,—the archbishop of Canterbury, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, my lord admiral, and my lord of Duresme, and myself,—to commune of these matters, and to know what commissions the agents of Cleves had brought, as well touching the performance of the covenants sent before from hence to Dr. Wotton, to have been concluded in Cleves, as also in the declaration how the matters stood for the covenants of marriage between the duke of Lorraine's son and the said lady Ann. Whereupon Ollisleger and Hogeston were called, and the matters purposed; whereby it plainly appeared that they were much astonished and abashed, and desired that they might make answer in the next morning, which was Sunday: and upon the Sunday in the morning your said counsellors and they met together early, and there afterwards were proposed unto them, as well touching the commission for the performance of the treaty and articles sent to Mr. Wotton, as also touching the contracts and covenants of marriage between the duke of Lorraine's son and the lady Ann, and what terms they stood in. To which things so proposed, they answered as men much perplexed, that as touching commission, they had none to treat concerning the articles sent to Mr. Wotton. And as to the contract and covenants of marriage they could say nothing, but that a revocation was made and that they were but spousals. And finally, after much reasoning, they offered themselves to remain prisoners, until such time as they should have sent unto them from Cleves the first articles ratified under the duke their master's sign and seal, and also the copy of the revocation made between the duke of Lorraine's son and the lady Ann. Upon the which answers I was sent to your highness by my lords of your council to declare to your highness their answer; and came to you by the privy way into your privy chamber, and declared unto the same all the circumstances, where-with your grace was very much displeased, saying "I am not well handled ;" insomuch that I might well perceive that your highness was fully determined not to have gone through with the marriage at that time, saying unto me these words, or the like in effect ; " that if it were not that she is come so far unto my realm, and the great preparations that my states and people have made for her, and for fear of making a ruffle in the world ; that is, to mean to drive her brother into the hands of the emperor and the French king's hands, being now together I would never have ne married her." So that I might well perceive your grace was neither content with the person ne yet with the proceedings of the agents ; and at after-dinner, the said Sunday, your grace sent for all your said counsellors in, repeating how your highness was handled, as well touching the said articles, as also the said matter of the duke of Lorrain's son. It might, and I doubt not, did appear unto them how loth your highness was to have married at that time. And thereupon, and upon the considerations aforesaid, your grace thought that it should be well done that she should make a protestation before your said counsellors and notaries to be present, that she was free from all contracts, which was done accordingly. And thereupon I repairing to your highness, declared how that she had made her protestation. Whereunto your grace answered in effect these words, or much like : " Is there none other remedy but that I must needs, against my will, put my neck in the yoke ?" and so departed, leaving your highness in a study or pensiveness. And yet your grace determined the next morning to go through ; and in the morning, which was Monday, your Majesty preparing yourself towards the ceremonies, there was one question, who should lead to the church ? And it was appointed that the earl of Essex deceased, and an earl that came with her, should lead her to the church. And thereupon one came to your highness and said to you, that the earl of Essex was not come ; whereupon your grace appointed me to be one that should lead her : and so I went into her chamber, to the intent to have done your commandment ; and shortly after I came into her chamber, the earl of Essex was come : whereupon I repaired back again into your grace's privy chamber, and showed your highness how he was come ; and thereupon your majesty advanced towards the gallery out of your privy chamber ; and your grace being in and about the midst of your chamber of presence, called me unto you, saying these words, or the like in sentence ; " My lord, if it were not to satisfy the world, and my realm, I would not do that I must do this day for none earthly thing ;" and therewith one brought your grace word that she was coming ; and thereupon your grace repaired into the gallery towards the closet and there paused for her coming, being nothing content that she so long tarried as I judged then. And so consequently she came, and your grace afterward proceeded to the ceremonies ; and they being finished, travelled the day as appertained, and the night after the custom. And in the morning on Tuesday, I repairing to your majesty into your privy chamber, finding your grace not so pleasant as I trusted to have done, I was so bold to ask your grace how you liked the queen ? Whereunto your grace soberly answered, saying, " that I was not all men, surely, as ye know, I liked her before not well, but now I like her much worse ; for," quoth your highness, " I have felt her belly and her breasts, and thereby, as I can judge, she should be no maid ; which strook me so to the heart when I felt them, that I had neither will nor courage to proceed any further in other matters ;" saying, " I have left her as good a maid as I found her :" which methought then ye spake displeasantly, which made me very sorry to hear ; your highness also after Candlemass, and before Showstie, once or twice said, that " ye were in the same case with her as ye were afore, and that your heart could never consent to meddle with her carnally." Notwithstanding your highness alleged, that ye for the most part used to lay nightly, or every second night, by her, and yet your majesty ever said, " that she was as good a maid for you, as ever her mother bare her, for anything ye had ministered to her." Your highness showed to me also in Lent last passed, at such time as your grace had some communication with her of my lady Mary, how that she began to wax stubborn and wilful, ever lamenting your fate, and ever verifying that ye never had any carnal knowledge with her : and also after Easter, your grace likewise, at divers times, and in the Whitsun week, in your grace's privy chamber at Greenwich, exceedingly lamented your fate, and that your greatest grief was, that " ye should surely never have any more children for the comfort of this realm, if ye should so continue ;" assuring me, " that before God ye thought she was never your lawful wife." At which time your grace knoweth what answer I made ; which was, that I would for my part do my utmost to comfort and deliver your grace of your afflictions ; and how sorry I was both to see and hear your grace, God knoweth. Your grace divers times sithen Whitsuntide, ever alleging one thing, and also saying, " that ye had as much to do to move the consent of your heart and mind as ever did man, and that you took God to witness ; but ever, you said, the obstacle could never out of your mind." And, gracious prince, after that you had first seen her at Rochester, I never thought in my heart that ye were or would be contented with that marriage. And, sir, I know now in what case I stand, in which is only the mercy of God and your grace ; if I have not to the uttermost of my remembrance said the truth, and the whole truth in this matter, God never help me. I am sure there is, as I think, no man in this your realm that knew more in this than I did, your highness only excepted. And I am sure, my lord admiral calling to his remembrance, can show your highness, and be my witness what I said unto him after your grace came from Rochester, yea, and after your grace's marriage : and also now of late, sithence Whitsuntide, and I doubt not but many and divers of my lords of your council, both before your marriage and sithence, have right-well perceived that your majesty hath not been well pleased with your marriage. And as I shall answer to God, I never thought your grace content, after you had once seen her at Rochester. And this is all that I know, most gracious and most merciful sovereign lord, beseeching Almighty God, who ever hath in all your causes counselled, preserved, opened, maintained, relieved, and defended your highness ;—so he will now vouchsafe to counsel you, preserve you, maintain you, remedy you, relieve and defend you, as may be most to your honour, with prosperity, health, and comfort of your heart's desire. For the which, and for the long life, and prosperous reign of your most royal majesty, I shall, during my life, and whiles I am here, pray to Almighty God, that he of his most abundant goodness will help, aid, and comfort you, after your continuance of Nestor's years : that that most noble imp, the prince's grace, your most dear son, may succeed you to reign long, prosperously, and felicitously to God's pleasure : beseeching most humbly your grace to pardon this my rude writing, and to consider that I a most woful prisoner, ready to take the death, when it shall please God and your majesty : and yet the frail flesh inciteth me continually to call to your grace for mercy and grace for mine offences ; and thus Christ save, preserve, and keep you.

Written at the Tower this Wednesday, the last of June, with the heavy heart and trembling hand of your highness's most heavy and most miserable prisoner and poor slave,

THOMAS CROMWELL.

Most gracious prince, I cry for mercy, mercy, mercy.

XVIII.—The King's own Declaration concerning it. An Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Otho. C. 10.]

FIRST; I depose and declare, that this hereafter written is merely the verity intended, upon none sinister affection, nor yet upon none hatred nor displeasure, and herein I take God to witness. Now to the matter I say and affirm, that when the first communication was had with me for the marriage of the lady Ann of Cleves, I was glad to hearken to it, trusting to have some assured friend by it; I much doubting that time, both the emperor, France, and the bishop of Rome; and also because I heard so much, both of her excellent beauty and virtuous conditions. But when I saw her at Rochester, the first time that ever I saw her, it rejoiced my heart that I had kept me free from making any pact or bond before with her till I saw her myself; for then I assure you I liked her so ill, and so far contrary to that she was praised, that I was woe that ever she came into England; and deliberated with myself, that if it were possible to find means to break off, I would never enter yoke with her. Of which misliking both the great master, the admiral that now is, and the master of the horses, can and will bear record. Then after my repair to Greenwich, the next day after I thint, and doubt not, but that the lord of Essex well examined, can, and will, or hath declared what I then said to him in that case; not doubting, but since he is a person which knoweth himself condemned to die by act of parliament, will not damn his soul, but truly declare the truth, not only at that time spoken by me, but also continually till the day of marriage; and also many times after, whereby my lack of consent, I doubt not, doth or shall well appear; and also lack enough of the will and power to consummate the same; where-in both he, my physicians, the lord privy seal that now is, Hennage and Denny can, and I doubt not will testify according to truth, which is, that I never for love to the woman consented to marry; nor yet if she brought maidenhead with her, took any from her by true carnal copulation. This is my brief, true, and perfect declaration.

In cujus rei Testimonium has Literas nostras fieri fecimus Patentes, Teste meipso apud Westmon. sexto die Julii Anno Regni nostri tricesimo secundo. Nos tenorem et effectum Vestre Commissionis per omnia sequentes, postquam matura deliberatione perpendimus et consideravimus omnes Matrimonii prætensi inter Vestram Majestatem Illustrissimam et Nobilem fœminam Dominam Annam Clevensem circumstantias, nobis multis modis expositas, cognitatas et perspectas, tandem ad definitionem et determinationem sequentem, quam communi omnium consensu justorumq; animorum nostrorum judicio ac recto conscientie dictamine protulimus, processimus, in hunc modum et (quod tenor Vestre Commissionis exigit) Vestræ Nobilissimæ Majestati in hoc presenti scripto referend. duximus, et significamus prout sequitur.

Primum itaq; comperimus et consideravimus Matrimonium inter Majestatem Vestram et Nobilem fœminam Dominam Annam Clevensem prætensam præcontracto quodam sive sponsaliorum, sive Matrimonii, inter dictam Dominam Annam et Marchionem Lotharingiæ concluso ambiguum, plane impeditum et perplexum reddi; Animadvertimus enim quod quamvis Vestra Majestas in prima hujus Matrimonii prætensi tractatione præcontractus prædicti, et de quo tum sermo multas habebatur, discussionem et declarationem ante solemnizandum cum dicta Domina Anna Matrimonium tanta instantia exegerit, ut pro conditione contrahendi deinde Matrimonii fuisse merito existimari possit, qua conditione defecta nihil ageretur; atq; hæc cum ita se haberent tamen neque ante solemnizationem illa de præcontractu ambiguitas expedita et declarata est, cum idipsum tum temporis Majestas Vestra denuo exposceret et effugitaret, cui clara jam et expedita esse omnia falso renunciabatur, neq; postea quicquam efficax ut promissum ab Oratoribus fuerat, huc transmissum est, quo scrupulus ille ex præcontractu natus eximeretur, tolleretur aut amoveretur, adeo quidem ut prætensum Matrimonium inter Majestatem Vestram et Dominam Annam prædictam non modo ex conditionis defectu corruerit, sed si nulla conditio hujusmodi omnino fuisset, certe quidem Matrimonium hujusmodi prætensum ex sola præcontractus hujusmodi causa non explicata in suspensio manserit, in eum etiam casum nullius vigoris omnino ac valoris pronuntiandum, quo præcontractum illum verbis de præsentis factum fuisse constiterit, id quod multis de causis est verisimilius et merito suspectum haberi potest.

Consideravimus præterea ex his quæ allegata, affirmata et probata nobis fuerunt, quod prætensum Matrimonium inter Majestatem vestram et Dominam Annam prædictam internum, purum, perfectum et integrum consensum non habuit: Imo contra quemadmodum inter ipsa tractationis initia, cum de hoc Matrimonio ageretur, plurimus illecebrarum focus adhibitus est, et magnus laudationum acervus supra fidem cumulatus, ut hic perduceretur et obtruderetur ignota, ita solemnizationis actus qui instabat a Majestate Vestra animo reluctantæ et dissentientis exortus est, causis maximis et gravissimis urgentibus et prementibus quæ animum invitum et alienum percellere merito possent.

Consideravimus etiam carnalem Copulam inter Majestatem Vestram et prædictam Dominam Annam minime secutam esse, nec cum ea justo impedimento intercedente consequi deinde posse. Quæ omnia ex his quas audivimus probationibus vera et certa esse existimamus. Postremo illud quoque Consideramus, quod et nobis ab aliis propositum etiam nos verum esse fatemur, agnosimus et approbamus, viz. ut si Majestas Vestra (modo ne fiat divinæ jussioni præjudicium) in libertate contrahendi Matrimonii cum alia esse declaratur, maxime totius Regni beneficio id futurum. Cum quidem Regni felicitas omnis et conservatio, tum in Regia Vestra persona ad Dei honorem et divinarum legum executionem conservandam consistit, tum in vitandis etiam sinistris omnibus opinionibus et scandalis quæ de Majestatis Vestræ progænie post natam nobis ex prætenso Matrimonio sobolem suborirentur, si præcontractus ille de quo diximus, et cujus delaratio nulla secuta est, prædictæ Dominæ Annæ objiceretur. His itaque de causis et considerationibus aliisque; multis non necessariis quæ exprimentur, cum separatim singulis, tum conjunctim omnibus consideratis et perpensis, Nos Archiepiscopi et Episcopi, cum Decanis, Archidiaconis, et reliquo hujus Regni Clero nunc congregato, circumstantias facti ejusque; veritatem ut antedictum est considerantes, tum vero quid Ecclesia in hujusmodi casibus et possit facere et sæpe numero antehac fecerit pendentes, tenore præsentium declaramus et definimus, Majestatem Vestram prædicto Matrimonio prætenso, utpote nullo et invalido, non alligari, sed alio desperiudicio non expectato Ecclesiæ suæ Autoritate fretam posse arbitrio suo ad contrahend. et consummand. Matrimonium cum quavis fœmina, divino jure vobiscum contrahere non prohibita, procedere, prætenso illo cum Domina Anna prædicta Matrimonio non obstante.

Similiter Dominam Annam prædictam non obstante Matrimonio prætenso cum Majestate Vestra, quod nullo pacto obstare debere Decernimus, posse arbitrio suo cum quavis alia persona divino jure non prohibita Matrimonium contrahere. Hæc nos Clerum et doctam Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ partem representantes, tum vera, justa, honesta et sancta esse Affirmamus, tum eisdem qui perfectissime, integerrime et efficacissime ad omnem intentionem, propositum et effectum a nobis exiguntur potest, Consentimus et Assentimur per præsentem. In quorum omnium et singulorum testimonium hæc scripta manuum nostrarum subscriptione, communis, utriusque; etiam Archiepiscopi sigillo appositæ. Dat. Westmon. nono die mensis Julii Anno Dom. 1540.

[Cotton. Libr. Otho. C. 10.]

BROTHER,—Because I had rather ye knew the truth by mine advertisement, than for want thereof ye should be deceived by vain reports, I write these present letters unto you, by which ye shall understand, that being advertised how the nobles and commons of this realm desired the king's highness here to commit the examination of the matter of marriage, between me and his majesty, to the determination of the clergy: I did the more willingly consent thereunto, and since the determination made, have also allowed, approved, and agreed unto the same, wherein I have more respect, as becometh me, to truth and good pleasure, than any worldly affection that might move me to the contrary. I account God pleased with that is done, and know myself to have suffered no wrong or injury; but being my body preserved in the integrity which I brought into this realm, and I truly discharged from all band of consent, I find the king's highness, whom I cannot justly have as my husband, to be nevertheless as a most kind, loving, and friendly father and brother, and to use me as honourably, and with as much humanity and liberality as you, I myself, or any of our kin or allies, could wish or desire; wherewith I am, for mine own part, so well content and satisfied, that I much desire my mother, you, and other mine allies so to understand it, accept, and take it; and so to use yourself towards this noble and virtuous prince, as he may have cause to continue his friendship towards you, which on his behalf shall nothing be impaired or altered for this matter; for so hath it pleased his highness to signify unto me, that like as he will show me always a most fatherly and brotherly kindness, and has so provided for me; so will he remain with you and other according to such terms as have passed in the same knot of amity which between you hath been concluded, this matter notwithstanding, in such wise as neither I, ne you, or any of our friends shall have just cause of discontentment. Thus much I have thought necessary to write unto you, lest for want of true knowledge ye might otherwise take this matter than ye ought, and in other sort care for me than ye should have cause. Only I require this of you, that ye so use yourself, as for your untowardness in this matter, I fare not the worse; wherunto I trust you will have regard.

XXI.—The Resolutions of several Bishops and Divines, of some Questions concerning the Sacraments; by which it will appear with what maturity and care they proceeded in the Reformation. Taken from the Originals, under their own hands: only in copying them, I judged it might be more acceptable to the reader to see every Man's Answer set down after every question; and therefore they are published in this method.

Ex MSS. D. Stillingfleet.

The First Question.

What a Sacrament is by the Scripture.

THE Scripture showeth not what a sacrament is; nevertheless where in the Latin text we have Sacra-

* This letter was drawn by Gardiner; but it is not certain that it was sent.—STRYPE'S CORRECTIONS.

mentum, there in the Greek we have Mysterium; and so by the Scripture, Sacramentum may be called Mysterium, id est, res occulta sive arcana.—Canterbury.

To the first; in Scripture we neither find definition nor description of a sacrament.—York.

Without prejudice to the truth, and saving always more better judgment, Cum facultate etiam melius deliberandi in hac parte.

To the first question; I think that the Scriptures do use this word Sacramentum in divers places, according to the matter it treateth upon, Tobi. 12; Rev. 1; Wisd. ii. 6, 12; Dan. ii; Ephes. i. 3, 5; Col. i; 1 Tim. 10; Rev. xvii; as also it doth divers other words: yet what a sacrament is by definition, or description of Scripture, I cannot find it explicated openly. Likewise as I cannot find the definition or description of the Trinity, nor yet such-like things. Mary what other men can find, being daily and of long season exercised in Scripture, I cannot tell, referring therefore this thing to their better knowledge.—London.

I think that where this word, Sacramentum, is found in the Scripture in the Latin translation, there in the Greek is found this word μυστήριον, that is to say, a mystery, or a secret thing.—Rochester.

What the word Sacramentum betokeneth, or what is the definition, description, or notification thereof, I have found no such plainly set out by Scripture. But this I find, that it should appear by the same Scripture, that the Latin word Sacramentum, and the Greek word Mysterium, be in manner always used for one thing; as much to say as, Abconditum, Occultatum, vel in occulto.—Carlisle.

Thomas Robertson. Ad Questiones :

Ad primam respondeo, vocem Sacramenti, mihi in Sacris Literis non reperiri in hac significatione, nisi quatenus ad Matrimonium applicatur a Paulo, ubi tamen Græce habetur Mysterium: et proinde ex meris Scripturis expresse defini non posse.—Dr. Robertson.

I find not in Scripture, the definition of a Sacrament, nor what a Sacrament is.—Dr. Cox.

I find no definition in Scripture of this word Sacramentum; howbeit wheresoever it is found in Scripture, the same is in the Greek Mysterium, which signifieth a secret or hid thing.—Dr. Day.

Non habetur in Scripturis, quid Sacramentum proprie sit, nisi quod subinde Mysterium dicitur: varia enim, et in Scripturis, et in Ecclesiasticis Scriptoribus reperitur ejus nominis significatio; ideoque defini non potest.—Dr. Oglethorp.

I find no definition of this word Sacramentum, in the Scripture; nor likewise of this word Gratia, or Lex, with innumerable more; and yet what they signify, it is known; so the signification of this word Sacramentum is plain, it is nothing else but a secret hid thing, or any mystery.—Dr. Redmayn.

Like as Angelus, Cælum, Terra, be spoken of in Scripture, yet none of them defined: so although Sacramentum be spoken of in Scripture, yet it hath no definition there, but is taken divers ways, and in divers significations.—Dr. Edgeworth.

This word Sacramentum in Scripture is not defined.—Dr. Symmons.

I say this word Sacramentum, taken in his common signification, betokeneth a mystery, and hid or secret thing: but if ye understand it, in his proper signification, as we use to apply it only to the seven Sacraments, the Scripture showeth not what a Sacrament is. And yet lest any man might be offended, thinking, that because the Scripture showeth not what a Sacrament is, therefore the same is a light thing, or little to be esteemed; here may be remembered that there are some weighty and godly things, being also of our belief, which the Scripture showeth not expressly what they are. As for example; we believe the Son is consubstantial to the Father: Item, that the Father is unbegotten, yet the Scripture showeth not what is consubstantial, nor what is unbegotten, neither maketh any mention of the words. Likewise it is true, baptism is a Sacrament, penance is a Sacrament, &c. yet the Scripture showeth not what a Sacrament is.—Dr. Tresham.

Edwardus Leyghton.

Responsions unto the Questions.

To the first question, I say; that in Holy Scripture I never found, and I think there is no man that will find, a definition or description of this word Sacramentum; which is as much to say in English, as, a mystery, a secret, or a hid thing.—Dr. Leyghton.

I do read no definition of this word, Sacramentum, in Scripture; but sometimes it is used in Scripture, to signify a thing secret or hid.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—In primo articulo conveniunt omnes, non satis constare ex Scriptura, quid sit Sacramentum; Plerique tamen dicunt Græce appellari, Mysterium, i. e. a secret, or a hid thing.

*Agreement.—In the answer unto the first question, they do all agree, that it is not evident by Scripture what a Sacrament is, but Mysterium, that is, a secret or a hid thing.

2. Question.

What a Sacrament is by the Ancient Authors.

Answers.

The ancient doctors call a Sacrament, Sacræ rei Signum, viz. visibile Verbum, Symbolum, atque pactio qua sumus constricti.—Canterbury.

To the second; of St. Augustin's words, this description following of a Sacrament may be gathered; Sacramentum est invisibilis gratiæ, visibilis forma. And this thing, that is such visible form or sign of invisible grace in sacraments, we find in Scripture, although we find not the word sacrament, saving only in the sacrament of matrimony.—York.

To the second; I find in authors this declaration, Sacramentum est Sacræ rei signum. Also, Invisibilis Gratiæ Visibilis Forma. Also, Visibilis Forma Invisibilis Gratiæ imaginem gerens et causa existens. And of the verity and goodness of this description or declaration, I refer me to the divines, better acquainted with this matter than I am.—London.

I think that this word sacrament, as it is taken of the old authors, hath divers and sundry significations; for sometimes it is extended to all holy signs, sometimes to all mysteries, sometimes to all allegories, &c.—Rochester.

Thomas Waldensis, who writeth a solemn work de Sacramentis, causeth me to say, that this word, Sacramentum in *Commun*i, is defined of the ancient authors; who after that he had showed how that Wycliff, and before him Berengarius, hath said, that Augustin defineth Sacramentum thus: Sacramentum est sacrum Signum; and Signum in this wise Signum, est res præter speciem quam sensibus ingerit aliquid aliud ex se faciens in cogitationem venire †. He himself, with ancient authors, as he saith, defineth it thus: Sacramentum est invisibilis Gratiæ visibilis Forma, vel, Sacramentum est Sacræ rei Signum: both these descriptions (saith he) be of the ancient fathers.—Carlisle.

Sacramentum a vetustioribus, quemadmodum fert Hugo de S. Victore, et Thomas Aquinas, nondum reperiri definitum, nisi quod Augustinus interdum

* The agreement at the end of these Questions, is in Cranmer's hand.—Cott. Lib. 2. Cleop. E. 5.

† De Doctrina Christiana.

vocet Sacramenta, Sacra signa aut signacula, interdum similitudines earum rerum, quarum sunt Sacramenta. Et Rabanus, Sacramentum dicitur, quod sub tegumento rerum corporalium, virtus Divina secretius salutem eorumdem Sacramentorum operatur, unde et a secretis virtutibus vel Sacris, Sacramenta dicuntur.—Dr. Robertson.

The ancient authors commonly say, that a sacrament is Sacræ rei Signum, or Sacrosanctum Signaculum; but they do not utterly and properly define what it is.—Dr. Cox.

Ex Augustino et aliis colligitur, Sacramentum posse dici, Sacræ rei Signum, vel, invisibilis gratiæ visibilis Forma, quanquam hæc posterior definitio non conveniat omnibus Sacramentis, sciz. tantum septem istis usitatis; sed nec his quoc; ex æquo, cum non æqualem conferant gratiam.—Dr. Oglethorpe.

Generally it is taken to signify every secret mystery, and Sacramenta be called, Sacrarum rerum signa, or, Sacra signacula: and as this word sacrament particularly is attributed to the chief sacraments of the church, this definition of a sacrament may be gathered of St. August. Invisibilis Gratiæ visibilis Forma. And also that a sacrament is a mystical or secret work, which consisteth ex Verbo et elemento. And Cyprian saith, Verborum solemnitas et sacri invocatio nominis, et signa institutionibus Apostolicis Sacerdotum Ministeriis Attributa, visibile celebrant Sacramentum, rem vero ipsam Spiritus Sanctus format et efficit.—Dr. Redmayn.

By the ancient authors, Sacramentum hath many significations; sometimes it is called a secret counsel, Tob. 12. Sacramentum Regis abscondere bonum est. Nebuchadnezzar's dream was called Sacramentum, Dan. 2. The mystery of Christ's incarnation, and of our redemption, is so called, Ephes. 3. and 1 Tim. 3. So that every secret thing, having some privy sense or signification, is called Sacramentum, generally extending the vocable: notwithstanding in one signification, Sacramentum accordeth properly to them that be commonly called the seven sacraments; and hath this definition taken of St. August. and others, Invisibilis gratiæ visibilis Forma, ut ipsius imaginem gerat et quodammodo causa existat.—Dr. Edgeworth.

The ancient authors of divinity use this word sacrament in divers significations, for they call it Mysterium; and so the Scripture useth it in many places, as 1 Tim. 3; Tobie 12; Wisd. 2; Dan. 2; Eph. 1. and 3. The word sacrament is also used for a figure or a sign of the old testament, signifying Christ, as the Paschal Lamb, and the Brazen Serpent, and divers other holy signs. It is also taken of the holy authors, to be an holy sign, which maketh to the sanctification of the soul, given of God against sin for our salvation, as it may be gathered of them; for this word sacrament is called by them, Sacrum Signum; but I have not read any express definition common to all sacraments.—Dr. Symmons.

This word sacrament, in the ancient authors, is oft-times used in this general signification, and so (as is before said) it is a mystery, or secret thing: and sometimes the same word is used as applicable only unto the seven sacraments; and is thus described, a visible form of an invisible grace: and thus also, a thing by the which, under the covering of visible things, the godly power doth work our health.—Dr. Tresham.

To the second, I say; that Hugo de Sancto Victore is one of the most ancient authors that I ever could perceive, took upon him to define or describe a sacrament: howbeit, I suppose, that this common description which the schoolmen use, after the Master of the Sentences, viz. Sacramentum est invisibilis Gratiæ visibilis seu sensibilis Forma, may be gathered of St. Austin, and divers other ancient authors' words in many places of their works.—Dr. Leyghton.

I do find no definition plainly set forth, in old authors, notwithstanding this definition, Invisibilis Gratiæ visibilis Forma, may be gathered out of St. Augustine.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—In secundo Articulo conveniunt omnes, Sacramentum esse sacræ rei signum. Tresham, Oglethorpe, et Edgworth, dicunt hanc definitionem, Sacramentum est invisibilis gratiæ visibilis Forma, his septem convenire. Thurlbeus ait, non convenire omnibus septem, et æque plurius posse attribui atq; septem.

Agreement.—In the second they put many descriptions of a sacrament, as the sign of a holy thing, a visible word, &c. But upon this one definition, a sacrament is a visible form of invisible grace, they do not all agree: for Doctors Edgworth, Tresham, and Oglethorpe say, that "it is applicable only and properly unto the word sacrament, as it signifieth the seven sacraments usually received." My lord elect of Westminster saith, that "it agreeth not unto all the seven, nor yet more specially unto the seven, than unto any other."

3. Question.

How many Sacraments there be by the Scripture?
Answers.

The Scripture showeth not how many sacraments there be, but Incarnatio Christi and Matrimonium, be called in the Scripture Mysteria, and therefore we may call them by the Scripture Sacramenta. But one Sacramentum the Scripture maketh mention of, which is hard to be revealed fully, as would to God it were, and that is Mysterium Iniquitatis, or Mysterium Meretricis magnæ et Bestiæ.—Cauterbury.

To the third; in Scripture we find no precise number of sacraments.—York.

To the third; I find not set forth the express number, with express declaration of this many and no more; nor yet of these expressly by Scripture which we use, especially under the name of Sacraments, saving only of matrimony.—London.

I think that in the Scripture be innumerable sacraments, for all mysteries, all ceremonies, all the facts of Christ, the whole story of the Jews, and the revelations of the Apocalypse, may be named sacraments.—Rocheater.

The certain number of sacraments, or mysteries, contained within Scripture, cannot be well expressed or assigned; for Scripture containeth more than infallibly may be rehearsed.—Carlisle.

De istis septem, quæ usitate vocamus Sacramenta, nullum invenio nomine Sacramenti appellari, nisi Matrimonium. Matrimonium esse Sacramentum, probat Eckius, Homi. 73. et conferre gratiam, ibid.—Dr. Robertson.

There be divers sacraments by the Scripture, as in Tobie, 12. Sacramentum Regis, the king's secret. Also Nebuchadnezzar's dream, Dan. 2, is called, Sacramentum. Incarnatio Christi, Sacramentum, Ephes. 3. Matrimonium, Sacramentum.—Dr. Cox.

Taking for sacraments anything that this word Sacramentum doth signify, there be in Scripture a great number of sacraments more than seven.—Dr. Day.

Non habetur determinatus Sacramentorum numerus in Scripturis, sunt enim innumera fere illi, quæ passim vocantur Sacramenta; cum omnia allegoria, omneq; Mysterium, dicatur Sacramentum. Quin et somnia, ac secreta, subinde Sacramenta vocantur. Tobie 2. Sacramentum Regis abscondere bonum est; et Dan. 2. Imploremus misericordias Dei Cœli super Sacramento isto, et somnio. Paulus etiam Epist. 2. vocat Mysterium Incarnationis Christi Sacramentum: Et in Apoc. 1. vocat Sacramentum septem Stellarum. Ac hoc præcipue observandum venit, nullum a septem Sacramentis receptis, hoc nomine appellari, præter solum matrimonium.—Dr. Ogletorph.

As many as there be mysteries, which be innumerable; but by Scripture, I think, the seven which be named sacraments, may principally bear the name.—Dr. Redmayn.

Speaking of sacraments generally, they be innumerable spoken of in Scripture; but properly to speak of sacraments, there be but seven that may be so called, of which matrimony is expressly called Sacramentum, Ephes. 5, and, as I think, in the germane and proper signification of a sacrament; so that the indivisible knot of the man and his wife in one body, by the sacrament of matrimony, is the matter of this sacrament; upon which, as on the literal verity, the apostle foundeth this allegorical saying, Ego autem dico in Christo et in Ecclesia; for the mystical sense presupposeth a verity in the letter on which that is taken. Six more there be to which the definition doth agree, as manifestly doth appear by the Scriptures with the exposition of the ancient authors.—Dr. Edgeworth.

In the Scripture there is no certain number of sacraments.—Dr. Symmons.

I find no more of the seven, called expressly sacraments, but only matrimony; but, extending the name of sacrament in his most general acception, there are in Scripture a great number of sacraments, whereof the apostle saith, Si noverint Mysteria omnia, &c.—Dr. Tresham.

To the third; I say, that I find not in Scripture any of these seven which we commonly call sacraments, called Sacramentum, but only Matrimonium. But I find divers and many other things called sacraments in Scripture, as in the 21st of Tobie, Sacramentum Regis abscondere bonum est. Item, Apoc. 17. Dicamus tibi Sacramentum. Item, 1 Tim. 3. Magnum est pietatis sacramentum, &c.—Dr. Legginton.

I cannot tell how many sacraments be, by Scripture, for they be above one hundred.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—In tertio conveniunt satis: non esse certum numerum Sacramentorum per Scripturas. Redmaynus addit, But by Scripture I think the seven which be named sacraments, may principally bear the name. Idem sentit Edgeworth, et septem tantum. Matrimonium in Scripturis haberi sub nomine Sacramenti pleriq; dicunt.

Agreement.—In the third they do agree, that there is no certain number of sacraments by Scripture, but even as many as there be mysteries; and none of these seven called sacraments, but only matrimony in Scripture.

4. Question.

How many Sacraments there be by the Ancient Authors?

Answers.

By the ancient authors there be many sacraments more than seven, for all the figures which signify Christ to come, or testify that he is come, be called sacraments, as all the figures of the old law, and in the new law; Eucharistia, Baptismus, Pascha, Dies Dominicus, lotio pedum, signum Crucis, Chrisma, Matrimonium, Ordo, Sabbatum, Impositio manuum, Oleum, Consecratio Olet, Lac, Mel, Aqua, Vinum, Sal, Ignis, Cinis, adaperio Aurium, vestis candida, and all the parables of Christ, with the propheties of the Apocalypse and such others, be called by the doctors, Sacramenta.—Canterbury.

To the fourth; There is no precise number of sacraments mentioned by the ancient authors, taking the word sacrament in his most general signification.—York.

To the fourth; I find that St. Austin speaketh de Baptismo, de Eucharistia, de Matrimonio, de Ordinatione clericorum, de Sacramento Chrifticis et Unctionis: also I find in the said St. Austin, that in the old law there were many sacraments, and in the new law few.—London.

I think that in the doctors be found many more sacraments than seven, viz. Paris Catechumenorum, signum Crucis, Oleum, Lac, Sal, Mel, &c.—Rochester.

That Scripture containeth, by the same Holy Ghost which is author thereof, the holy doctors, and ancient fathers expoundeth; so that where in Scripture the number of sacraments is uncertain, it cannot be among them certain.—Carlisle.

Apud Augustinum lego Sacramentum Nuptiarum, Sacramentum Baptismi, Sacramentum Eucharistie, quod et altaris sive panis vocat; Sacramentum Ordinationis; Sacramentum Chrifticis, quod datur per manus impositionem Baptizatis; Sacramentum Unctionis.—Dr. Robertson.

I find in the ancient authors, that baptism is called Sacramentum, Eucharistia Sacramentum, Matrimonium Sacramentum, Ordo Sacramentum, Chrisma Sacramentum, Impositio Manuum per Baptismum Sacramentum, Dilectio Sacramentum, Lotio pedum Sacramentum, Oleum, Mel, Lac, Sacramenta; and many others.—Dr. Cox.

There be a great sort of sacraments found in the doctors, after the acception above-said, more than seven.—Dr. Day.

Taking this word sacrament universally for mysteries, or all secret tokens, there be more sacraments than can be reckoned; but the seven by old authors may specially obtain the name. Lotio pedum is spoken of in old authors as a special sacrament used then in the church, and as it appeareth, having a great ground in the Scripture; and I think it were better to renew that again, and so to have eight sacraments, rather than to diminish the number of the seven now used.—Dr. Redmayn.

The ancient authors acknowledge many more than seven; for they call in their writings all rites and ceremonies, sacraments.—Dr. Symmons.

Generally, as many as mysteries, specially seven, and no more of like nature to them; for although I find not express mention where penance is called a sacrament, yet I think it may be deduced and proved by Cyprian, in his sermon de Passione Christi, in these words. Deniq; quæcumq; fiunt Sacramentorum Ministri, per operationem auctoritas in figura Crucis omnibus Sacramentis largitur effectum, et cuncta peragunt nobis quod omnibus nominibus eminet a Sacramentorum vicariis invocatum: At licet indigni sint qui accipiunt, Sacramentorum tamen reverentia et propinquiorum ad Deum parat accessum, et ubi redierint ad cor constat ablutionis donum, et redit effectus munerum, nec alias quæri aut repeti necesse est salutiferum Sacramentum; in these words, redit effectus munerum; and neo alias repeti necesse est salutiferum Sacramentum, must needs be understood penance, and also that penance is a sacrament: for as our first access to God is by the sacrament baptism, which Cyprian there following called Ablutionem primam; so if we fall by deadly sin, we cannot repetere God again, but by penance; which repeating, i. e. penance, Cyprian calleth Salutiferum Sacramentum.—Dr. Tresham.

To the fourth, I say: that I find in ancienter authors every one of these seven, which we call commonly sacraments, called Sacramentum; as in Austin every one of them is called Sacramentum but only penance, which Cyprian calleth Sacramentum. Also I find in the ancienter authors divers other things (besides the seven) called sacraments, as Lotio pedum in Cyprian, &c.—Dr. Leyghton.

More sacraments be found in old authors than seven.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—In quarto conveniunt, plura esse Sacramenta quam septem apud Autores: Redman addit; But the seven, by old authors, may specially obtain the name. Idem putat Edgeworth and Tresham. Lotio pedum, he thinketh were better to be renewed, and so made eight sacraments, than the number of the seven to be diminished. Tresham citat Cyprianum in Serm. de Passione Christi pro penitentia, quod dicatur Sacramentum, cum alii fere omnes nusquam appellari aiunt Sacramentum apud Autores, et hic locus aperte agit de Baptismo, quod vocat donum ablutiois, et Sacramentum Salutiferum.

Agreement.—In the fourth they agree, that there is no determinate number of sacraments spoken of in the old authors; but that my lord of York, and Edgeworth, Tresham, Redman, Crayford, and Simmons, say, that those seven, by old authors, may specially obtain the name of sacraments. The bishop of St. David's saith, that there be but four sacraments in the old doctors most chiefly spoken of, and they be baptism, the sacrament of the altar, matrimony, and penance.

5. Question.

Whether this word Sacrament be and ought to be attributed to the seven only? and whether the seven Sacraments be found in any of the old Authors?

Answers.

I know no cause why this word sacrament should be attributed to the seven only; for the old authors never prescribed any certain number of sacraments, nor in all their books I never read these two words joined together, viz. septem Sacramenta.—Cauterbury.

To the fifth; to the first part of this question, this word sacrament is used and applied in Scripture to some things that be none of the seven sacraments. To the second part; the seven sacraments be found in some of the ancient authors.—York.

To the fifth, I answer; that this word sacrament in our language commonly hath been attributed to the seven customably called sacraments, not for that yet, that the word sacrament cannot be applied to any more, but for that the seven have been specially of very long and ancient season received, continued, and taken for things of such sort.—London.

I think that the name of a sacrament is and may be attributed to more than seven, and that all the seven sacraments be found in the old authors, though all peradventure be not found in one author. But I have not read penance called by the name of a sacrament in any of them.—Rochester.

Certain it is, that this word sacrament neither is nor ought to be attributed to seven only, for both Scripture and ancient authors otherwise applieth it, but yet nothing letteth, but that this word sacrament may most especially, and in a certain due pre-eminence, be applied to the seven sacraments, of most ancient name and usage among Christian men. And that the ancient authors have so used and applied it, affirmeth the said Thomas Walden., convincing Wycliffe and Berengarius, who enforced the contrary, from Cyprian, and also Augustin, with other holy doctors, they may so well be gathered.—Carlisle.

Vocabulum, Sacramenti, in Sacris Literis, nulli Sacramentorum quod sciam tribuitur, nisi Matrimonio: a vetustis Scriptoribus tribuitur Cereoniis et umbris legis, Incarnationi Christi, figuris, allegoriis, et festivitatis: apud Paulum legitur divinitatis, voluntatis divinæ, et pietatis Sacramentum. Cæterum loquendo de Sacramentis his, quæ sunt invisibilis gratiæ collatæ in Ecclesia Christi visibilia signa, opinor non plura quam septem inveniri, hisq; magis proprie quam reliquis, sub hac ratione, tribui nomen Sacramenti.—Dr. Robertson.

This word sacrament is not, nor ought not to be attributed to these seven only. Those that we call seven sacraments be found in old authors, although some of them be seldom found called by this name sacrament.—Dr. Cor.

This word Sacramentum neither is nor ought to be so attributed unto these seven, but that it is and may be attributed to many more things, and so the ancienter doctors use it. The seven sacraments be found in ancient doctors under the name of sacrament, saying that I remember not that I have read in them penance called a sacrament.—Dr. Day.

Nomen commune est multis aliis rebus, quam septem istis usitatis Sacramentis. Septem Sacramenta, seorsim et sparsim reperiuntur in veterum monumentis.—Dr. Oglethorpe.

To the seven specially and principally, and in general to innumerable more. But I cannot tell whether in any old author might be found these two words, seven sacraments, or this number limited; but every one of the seven sacraments, one by one, be found in the old authors.—Dr. Redmayn.

Sacramentum, in his proper signification, is and ought to be attributed to the seven only; and they be all seven found in the authors.—Dr. Edgeworth.

This word sacrament is not only to be attributed to the seven, but that the seven sacraments especially conferreth grace, the old authors especially accounteth them by the number of seven; and these seven are found in authors and scriptures, although they be not found by the name of seven.—Dr. Symmons.

I say, this word sacrament is attributed to the seven; and that the seven sacraments are found in the ancient authors.—Dr. Tresham.

To the fifth I say, first (as before), that this word Sacramentum is not applied or attributed in holy Scripture to any of the seven, but only to matrimony. But it is attributed in Scripture and ancient authors to many other things besides these: howbeit, taking this word Sacramentum for a sensible sign of the invisible grace of God given unto Christian people, as the schoolmen and many late writers take it; I think that these seven commonly called sacraments, are to be called only and most properly sacraments.—Dr. Leyghton.

This word sacrament may well be attributed to the seven; and so it is found in old authors, saying that I do not read expressly in old doctors, penance to be under the name of a sacrament, unless it be in Chrysostom, in the exposition ad Hebræ. Homil. 20. sect. 1. cap. 10. in principio.—Dr. Coren.

Non. Con.—In quinto præter Herfordens. Roffens.

Dayum, Oglethorpum, Menevens. et Coxum, putant omnes nomen Sacramenti præcipue his septem convenire. Symons addit, The seven sacraments specially confer grace: Eboracens. Curren, Tresham, Symons, aiunt septem Sacramenta inveniri apud veteres, quanquam Curren et Symons mox videntur iterum negare.

Dissent.—In the fifth; the bishops of Hereford and St. David, Dr. Day, Dr. Cox, say, that this word sacrament, in the old authors, is not attributed unto the seven only, and ought not to be attributed; the bishop of Carlisle alleging Waldensis, Doctors Curren, Edgworth, Symons, Tresham say, that it is and may be attributed. And Dr. Curren and Mr. Symmons seem to vary against themselves each in their own answers; for Dr. Curren saith, that this word sacrament is attributed unto the seven in the old doctors, and yet he cannot find that it is attributed unto penance. Dr. Symons saith, that the old authors account them by the number of seven; and yet he saith, that they be not found there by the name of Seven.

6. Question.

Whether the determinate number of seven Sacraments be a Doctrine, either of the Scripture, or of the old Authors, and so to be taught?

Answers.

The determinate number of seven sacraments is no doctrine of the Scripture, nor of the old authors.—Canterbury.

To the sixth; the Scripture maketh no mention of the sacraments determined to seven precisely; but the Scripture maketh mention of seven sacraments, which be used in Christ's church, and grounded partly in Scripture; and no more be in use of the said church but seven so grounded; and some of the ancient doctors make mention of seven, and of no more than seven, as used in Christ's church so grounded; wherefore a doctrine may be had of seven sacraments precisely used in Christ's church, and grounded in Scripture.—York.

To the sixth; I think it be a doctrine set forth by the ancient fathers, one from another, taking their matter and ground out of Scripture, as they understood it; though Scripture for all that doth not give unto all the seven, the special names by which now they are called, nor yet openly call them by the name of Sacrament, except only (as is before said) the sacrament of matrimony.—London.

Albeit the seven sacraments be in effect found both in the Scripture and in the old authors, and may therefore be so taught; yet I have not read this precise and determinate number of seven sacraments, neither in the Scripture, nor in the ancient writers.—Rochester.

By what is here before said, I think it doth well appear, that both the Scripture of God, and holy expositors of the same, would have the seven sacraments both taught, and in due form exhibited to all Christian people, as it shall also better appear by what followeth.—Carlisle.

In Scriptura tantum unum ex istis septem Sacramentum vocari invenio, nimirum Matrimonium: apud veteres reperiuntur omnia hæc septem, a nullo tamen, quod sciam, nomine 7. Sacramentorum celebrari, nisi quod Eras. ait 7. a veteribus recenseri: August. loquens de Sacramentis ad Januarium Ep. 118. ait numerum septenarium tribui Ecclesie proprie instar universitatis; Item obiectum fuisse Husso in Concilio Constantienti quod infideliter senserit de 7 Sacramentis. De perfectione Num. Septenarii, vide August. lib. 1. de Civ. cap. 31.—Dr. Robertson.

This determinate number of seven sacraments is no doctrine of Scripture, nor of the old authors, nor ought not to be taught as such a determinate number by Scripture and old authors.—Dr. Cox.

Neither the Scripture nor the ancient authors do recite the determinate number of the seven sacraments; but the doctrine of the seven sacraments is grounded in Scripture, and taught by the ancient authors, albeit not altogether.—Dr. Day.

Septenarius Sacramentorum numerus, Doctrina est recentium Theologorum; quam illi partim ex Scriptura, partim ex veterum scriptis, argute in sacrum hunc (ut aiunt) numerum, collegerunt.—Dr. Oglethorpe.

I think, as I find by old authors, the ancient church used all these seven sacraments; and so I think it good to be taught.—Dr. Redmayn.

The determinate number of seven sacraments is not taught in any one process of the Scripture, nor of any one of the old authors of purpose speaking of them altogether, or in one process, as far as I can remember; albeit they all seven be there, and there spoken of in Scripture manifestly, and so have the old authors left them in sundry places of their writings; and so it ought to be taught.—Dr. Edgworth.

Forasmuch as the Scripture teacheth these seven, and showeth special graces given by the same, the which are not so given by others, called sacraments, the old authors perceiving the special graces, have accounted them in a certain number, and so have been used by doctors to be called Seven, and without inconvenience may so be taught.—Dr. Symmons.

I say, the determinate number of seven is not expressly mentioned in the Scripture, like as the determinate number of the seven petitions of the prayer is not expressly mentioned; and as I think the seven petitions to have their ground in Scripture, even so do I think of the seven sacraments, to be grounded in Scripture.—Dr. Tresham.

To the sixth I say as before, that the old authors call each of these seven sacraments; but be it, I cannot remember that ever I read the determinate, precise, and express number of seven sacraments in any of the ancient authors, nor in Scripture. Howbeit we may find in Scripture, and the old authors, also mention made, and the doctrine of each of these seven, commonly called sacraments.—Dr. Leyghton.

The determinate number of seven is a doctrine to be taught, though they have not the number of seven set forth there, no more than the petitions of the Pater Noster be called seven, nor the articles of the creed be called twelve.—Dr. Coren.

Agreement.—In the sixth, touching the determinate number of the seven sacraments, the bishop of Duresme, Hereford, St. David, and Rochester, the elect of Westminster, Dr. Day, and Dr. Oglethorpe, say, "this prescribed number of sacraments is not found in the old authors." The bishop of York, Drs. Curren, Tresham, and Symmons, say the contrary. Concerning the second part, Whether it be a doctrine to be taught? the bishops of Hereford, St. David's, and Dr. Cox, "think it ought not to be so taught as such a determinate number by Scripture." The bishops of York, London, Carlisle; Drs. Day, Curren, Tresham, Symmons, Crayford, "think it a doctrine meet to be taught;" and some of them say, that "it is founded on Scripture."

7. Question.

What is found in Scripture of the matter, nature, effect, and virtue of such as we call the seven Sacraments; so as although the name be not there, yet whether the thing be in Scripture or no, and in what wise spoken of?

Answers.

I find not in the Scripture, the matter, nature, and effect of all these which we call the seven sacraments, but only of certain of them, as of baptism, in which we be regenerated and pardoned of our sin by the blood of Christ: of Eucharistia, in which we be incorporated unto Christ, and made lively members of his body, nourished and fed to the everlasting life, if we receive it as we ought to do, and else it is to us rather death than life. Of penance, also, I find in the Scripture, whereby sinners after baptism returning wholly unto God, be accepted again unto God's favour and mercy. But the Scripture speaketh not of penance, as we call it a sacrament, consisting in three parts, contrition, confession, and satisfaction; but the Scripture taketh penance for a pure conversion of a sinner in heart and mind from his sins unto God, making no mention of private confession of all deadly sins to a priest, nor of ecclesiastical satisfaction to be enjoined by him. Of matrimony, also, I find very much in Scripture; and among other things, that it is a mean whereby God doth use the infirmity of our concupiscence to the setting forth of his glory and increase of the world, thereby sanctifying the act of carnal commixtion between the man and the wife to that use—yea, although one party be an infidel: and in this matrimony is also a promise of salvation, if the parents bring up their children in the faith, love, and fear of God. Of the matter, nature, and effect of the other three, that is to say, confirmation, order, and extreme unction, I read nothing in the Scripture as they be taken for sacraments.—Canterbury.

To the seventh; Of baptism, we find in Scripture the institution by the word of Christ; we find also that the matter of baptism is water, the effect and virtue is remission of sins. Of confirmation, we find that the apostles did confirm those that were baptized, by laying their hands upon them, and that the effect then was the coming of the Holy Ghost into them, upon whom the apostles laid their hands, in a visible sign of the gift of divers languages, and therewith of ghostly strength to confess Christ, following upon the same. Of the sacrament of the altar, we find the institution by Christ, and the matter thereof, bread and wine, the effect, increase of grace. Of the sacrament of penance, we find the institution in the gospel, the effect, reconciliation of the sinner, and the union of him to the mystical body of Christ. Of the sacrament of matrimony, we find the institution both in the Old and New Testament, and the effect thereof, remedy against concupiscence and discharge of sin, which otherwise should be in the office of generation. Of the sacrament of order, we find, that our Saviour gave to his apostles power to baptize, to bind and to loose sinners, to remit sins, and to retain them, to teach and preach his word, and to consecrate his most precious body and blood, which be the highest offices of order; and the effect thereof grace, we find in Scripture. Of extreme unction, we find in the Epistle of the holy apostle St. James, and of the effects of the same.—York.

To the seventh, I find, that St. Austin is of this sentence, that "where the sacraments of the old law did promise grace and comfort, the sacraments of the new law do give it indeed." And moreover he saith, that "the sacraments of the new law are, factu faciliora, pauciora, salubriora, et feliciora, more easier, more fewer, more wholesomer, and more happy."—London.

The Scripture teacheth of baptism, the sacrament of the altar, matrimony, and penance manifestly: there be also in the Scripture manifest examples of confirmation, viz., that it was done after baptism by the apostles, per manuum Impositionem. The Scripture teacheth also of order, that it was done, per manuum Impositionem cum oratione et jejunio. Of the unction of sick men, the Epistle of St. James teacheth manifestly.—Rochester.

I think verily, that of the substance, effect, and virtue of these seven usual sacraments, that are to be taken and esteemed above others, we have plainly and expressly by holy Scripture. Of baptism, that who-soever believeth in Christ, and is christened, shall be saved; and except that one be born again of water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot come within the kingdom of God. Of matrimony, we have in Scripture, both by name and in effect, in the Old and New Testament, both by Christ and his apostle Paul. Of the sacrament of the altar, I find plainly, expressly, both in the holy gospels and other places of Scripture. Of penance in like manner. Of confirmation, we have in Scripture, that when the Samaritans, by the preaching of Philip, had received the word of God and were christened, the apostles, hearing of the same, sent Peter and John unto them; who, when they came thither, they prayed for them that they might receive the Holy Ghost: then they laid their hands upon them, and so they received the Holy Ghost; "This," saith Bede, "is the office and duty only of bishops." "And this manner and form" (saith St. Hieron.) "as it is written in the Acts, the church hath kept, that the bishop should go abroad to call for the grace of the Holy Ghost, and lay his hands upon them, who had been christened by priests and deacons." Of the sacrament of orders, we have, that Christ made his apostles the teachers of his law, and ministers of his sacraments, that they should duly do it, and make and ordain others likewise to do it after them. And so the apostles ordained Matthias to be one of their number; St. Paul made and ordained Timothy and Titus, with others likewise. Of the sacrament of extreme unction, we have manifestly in the Gospel of Mark, and Epistle of St. James.—Carlisle.

Materia Sacramentorum est Verbum et Elementum, virtus quam Deus per illa digne sumentibus conferat gratiam, juxta suam promissionem, nimirum quod sint Sacra Signacula, non tantum signantia sed etiam sanctificantia. Unde opinor constare hanc Sacramentorum vim esse in Sacris Literis.—Dr. Robertson.

I find in Scripture, of such things as we use to call sacraments; First, of baptism manifestly. Of Eucharistia manifestly. Of penance manifestly. Of matrimony manifestly. Of ordering, per manus Impositionem et Orationem manifestly. It is also manifest that the apostles laid their hands upon them that were christened. Of the unction of the sick, with prayer, manifestly.—Dr. Cox.

Albeit the seven sacraments be not found in Scripture expressed by name, yet the thing itself, that is, the matter, nature, effect, and virtue of them, is found there. Of baptism in divers places; of the most holy communion; of matrimony; of absolution; of bishops, priests, and deacons, how they were ordained per manuum Impositionem cum Oratione; of laying the apostles' hands on them that were christened, which is a part of confirmation; of unction of them that were sick, with prayer joined withal.—Dr. Day.

Natura, vis, effectus, ac uniuscujusque Sacramenti proprietas, seorsim in Scriptura reperitur, ut veteres eam interpretati sunt.—Dr. Oglethorp.

As it appeareth in the articles which be drawn of the said seven sacraments.—Dr. Redmayn.

In Scripture we find of the form of the sacraments, as the words sacramental; and the matter, as the element, oil, chrism; and the patient receiving the sacrament; and of grace and increase of virtue given by them as the effects.—Dr. Edgeworth.

The things are contained in Scripture, as baptism, confirmation, Eucharistia, Pœnitentia, Extrema Unctio, Ordo, although they have not there this name Sacramentum, as matrimony hath; and every one of them hath his matter, nature, effect, and virtue.—Dr. Symmons.

I think the thing, the matter, the nature, the effect, and virtue of them all be in the Scripture, and all there institute by God's authority, for I think that no one man, neither the whole church, hath power to institute a sacrament, but that such institution pertaineth only to God.—Dr. Tresham.

To the seventh, I say, that we may evidently find in Scripture the substance of every one of the seven Sacraments, the nature, effect, and virtue of the same; as of baptism, confirmation, penance, matrimony, and so forth of the rest.—Dr. Leyghton.

Of the matter, nature, virtue, and effect of such as we call sacraments, Scripture maketh mention: of baptism manifestly, of the most holy communion manifestly, of absolution manifestly, of matrimony manifestly: of bishops, priests, and deacons, Scripture speaketh manifestly; for they were ordered, per Impositiones manuum Presbyterii cum Oratione et jejunio.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—Conveniunt præter Menevens. naturam septem Sacramentorum nobis tradi in Scripturis. Eboracens. effectus singulorum enumerat, item Carliolens.

Londinens. non Respondet Quæstioni. Treshamus ait ideo à Scripturis tradi nobis Sacramenta, quoniam tota Ecclesia non habet Autoritatem Instituenti Sacramenta.

Agreement.—In the seventh they do agree, saving this, that the bishop of St. David says, that the nature, effect, and virtue of these seven sacraments, only baptism, the sacrament of the altar, matrimony, penance, are contained in the Scripture. The other say, that the nature and the virtue of all the seven be contained in the Scripture.

B. Question.

Whether Confirmation, cum Chrismate, of them that be baptized be found in Scripture.

Answers.

Of confirmation with chrism, without which it is counted no sacrament, there is no mention in the Scripture.—Canterbury.

To the eighth; We find confirmation, cum Impositione manuum, in Scripture, as before; cum Chrismate we find not in the Scripture, but yet we find chrismation with oil used even from the time of the apostles, and so taken as a tradition apostolic.—York.

To the eighth; I find in Scripture, in many places, de Impositione manuum, which I think (considering the usage commonly and so long withal used) to be confirmation; and that with chrism, to supply the visible appearance of the Holy Ghost, which Holy Ghost was so visibly seen in the primitive church;—nevertheless, for the perfect declaration of the verity hereof, I refer it to the judgment of men of higher knowledge in this faculty.—London.

Although confirmation be found in the Scripture, by example, as I said before, yet there is nothing written de Chrismate.—Rochester.

The imposition of hands, the holy doctors take for the same which we call confirmation, done upon them which were christened before, whereof is written in the Acts. And as for Chrisma, it should seem by Cyprian, both as touching the confection and usage thereof, that it hath a great ground to be derived out of Scripture, though it be not manifestly therein spoken of.—Carlisle.

Res et Effectus Confirmationis continentur in Scriptura, nempe, Impositio manuum per Apostolos Baptizatis, per quam datur Spiritus Sanctus. De Chrismate nihil illic legimus, quia per id tempus Spiritus Sanctus signo visibili descenderit in Baptizatos. Quod ubi fieri desierit, Ecclesia Chrismate signi externi loco uti cœpit.—Dr. Robertson.

I find not in Scripture that the apostles laying their hands upon them that were baptized, did anoint them Chrismate.—Dr. Cox.

Confirmation cum Chrismate I read not in Scripture, but Impositionem manuum super Baptizatos I find there is, which ancient authors call confirmation; and inunction with Chrisma hath been used from the primitive church.—Dr. Day.

De Impositione manuum cum Oratione, expressa mentio est in Scripturis, quæ nunc usitato nomine, a Doctoribus dicitur, Confirmatio. Sacrum Chrisma, traditio est Apostolica, ut ex veteribus liquet.—Dr. Oglethorpe.

The question is not simple, but as if it were asked, Whether Eucharistia in infermentato be in the Scripture, or Baptismus cum sale. Imposition of the apostles' hands, in which was conferred the Holy Ghost for confirmation of them who were baptized, is found in Scripture. Chrisma is a tradition deduced from the apostles, as may be gathered by Scripture, and by the old authors, and the mystery thereof is not to be despised.—Dr. Redman.

This sacrament is one, unitate integritatis, as some others be: therefore it hath two parts, of which one, that is, Impositio manuum, is taken Heb. vi. and Act. viii. The other part, that is, Chrisme, is taken of the tradition of the fathers, and so used from the primitive church. Vide Cyp. Epist. lib. i. ep. 12.—Dr. Edgeworth.

Confirmation is found in Scripture, and confirmation cum Chrismate is gathered from the old authors.—Dr. Symmons.

I say confirmation is found in Scripture, but this additament, cum Chrismate, is not of the Scripture, yet is it a very ancient tradition, as appeareth by Cyp. de Unct. Chrism.—Dr. Tresham.

To the eighth question I say, that confirmation of them that be baptized is found in Scripture; but cum Chrismate it is not found in Scripture, but it was used cum Chrismate in the church soon after the apostles' time, as it may evidently appear by the cited authors.—Dr. Leyghton.

The laying of the bishop's hands upon them that be christened, which is a part of confirmation, is plainly in Scripture; and the unction with Chrisme, which is another part, hath been observed from the primitive church, and is called of St. Austin, Sacramentum Chrismatis. Unction of the sick with oil and the prayer is grounded expressly in Scripture.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—Conveniunt omnes Confirmationem cum Chrismate non haberi in Scripturis. Eboracens. Tresham, Coren, Day, Oglethorpe, Edgeworth, Leighton, Symmons, Redman, Robinsonus, Confirmationem in Scripturis esse contendunt; ceterum Chrisma esse traditionem Apostolicam: addit Robertsonus, et ubi fieri desierat miraculum Consecrandi Spiritus Sancti, Ecclesia Chrismate signi externi loco uti cœpit; Convenit illi Londinens.

Carloliens. putat usum Chrismatis ex Scripturis peti posse; Putant omnes tum in hoc Articulo, tum superiori, Impositionem manuum esse Confirmationem.

Agreement.—In the eighth they do agree all, except it be the bishop of Carlisle, that confirmatio cum chrismate is not found in Scripture, but only confirmatio cum manuum impositione. And that also my lord of St. David's denieth to be in Scripture, as we call it a sacrament. My lord of Carlisle saith, that "chrisma, as touching the confection and usage thereof, hath a ground to be derived out of Scripture." The other say, "that it is but a tradition."

9. Question.

Whether the Apostles, lacking a higher power, as in not having a Christian king among them, made bishops by that necessity, or by authority given by God?

Answers.

All Christian princes have committed unto them immediately of God the whole cure of all their subjects, as well concerning the administration of God's word, for the cure of souls, as concerning the ministration of things political and civil governance: and in both these ministrations, they must have sundry ministers under them to supply that which is appointed to their several offices. The civil ministers under the king's majesty, in this realm of England, be those whom it shall please his highness for the time to put in authority under him; as for example, the lord chancellor, lord treasurer, lord great master, lord privy seal, lord admiral, majors, sheriffs, &c. The ministers of God's word, under his majesty, be the bishops, parsons, vicars, and such other priests as be appointed by his highness to that ministration; as for example, the bishop of Canterbury, the bishop of Durham, the bishop of Winchester, the parson of Winwick, &c. All the said officers and ministers, as well of that sort as the other, be appointed, assigned, and elected, and in every place, by the laws and orders of kings and princes. In the admission of many of these officers be divers comely ceremonies and solemnities used, which be not of necessity, but only for a good order and seemly fashion; for if such offices and ministrations were committed without such solemnity, they were nevertheless truly committed; and there is no more promise of God, that grace is given in the committing of the ecclesiastical office, than it is in the committing of the civil office. In the apostles' time, when there was no Christian princes, by whose authority ministers of God's word might be appointed, nor sins by the sword corrected, there was no remedy then for the correction of vice, or appointing of ministers, but only the consent of Christian multitude among themselves, by an uniform consent, to follow the advice and persuasion of such persons whom God had most endued with the spirit of counsel and wisdom; and at that time, forasmuch as the Christian people had no sword nor governor amongst them, they were constrained of necessity to take such curates and priests, as either they knew themselves to be meet thereunto, or else as were commended unto them by others, that were so replete with the Spirit of God, with such knowledge in the profession of Christ, such wisdom, such conversation and counsel, that they ought even of very conscience to give credit unto them, and to accept such as by them were presented: and so sometimes the apostles and others, unto whom God had given abundantly his Spirit, sent or appointed ministers of God's word; sometimes the people did choose such as they thought meet thereunto; and when any were appointed or sent by the apostles or others, the people of their own voluntary will with thanks did accept them: nor for the supremacy, empire, or dominion, that the apostles had over them to command, as their princes and masters, but as good people ready to obey the advice of good counsellors, and to accept anything that was necessary for their edification and benefit.—Canterbury.

To the ninth, We find in Scripture that the apostles used the power to make bishops, priests, and deacons; which power may be grounded upon these words:—Sicut misit me vivens Pater, sic ego mitto vos, &c. And we verily think that they durst not have used so high power unless they had had authority from Christ; but that their power to ordain bishops, priests, or deacons, by imposition of hands, requireth any other authority than authority of God, we neither read in Scripture nor out of Scripture.—York.

To the ninth, I think the apostles made bishops by the law of God; because, Acts xxii., it is said, In quo vos Spiritus Sanctus posuit. Nevertheless, I think if Christian princes had been then, they should have named by right, and appointed the said bishops to their rooms and places.—London.

I think that the apostles made bishops by authority given them from God.—Rochester.

That Christ made his apostles priests and bishops; and that he gave them power to make others like, it seemeth to be the very trade of Scripture.—Carlisle.

Opinor Apostolos Autoritate Divina creasse Episcopos et Presbyteros, ubi Publicus Magistratus permittit.—Dr. Robertson.

Although the apostles had no authority to force any man to be priest, yet (they moved by the Holy Ghost) had authority of God to exhort and induce men to set forth God's honour, and so to make them priests.—Dr. Coar.

The apostles made, that is to say, ordained, bishops by authority given them by God; Joh. xx., Sicut misit me vivens Pater, ita et ego mitto vos. Item, Joan. ult. et Act. xx. and 1 Tim. iv., Paulus ordinavit Timotheum et Titum, et prescribit quales illi debeant ordinare. 1 Tim. i., Tit. i.—Dr. Day.

Apostoli autoritate et mandato Dei, ordinabant ac instituebant Episcopos, petita ac obtenta prius facultate a Principe ac Magistratu (ut opinor) qui tum preerat.—Dr. Ogleshorpe.

Christ gave his apostles authority to make other bishops and ministers in his church, as he had received authority of the Father to make them bishops; but if any Christian prince had then been, the apostles had been, and ought to have been, obedient subjects, and would nothing have attempted but under the permission and assent of their earthly governors: yet was it meet that they which were special and most elect servants of our Saviour Christ, and were sent by him to convert the world, and having most abundantly the Holy Ghost in them, should have special ordering of such ministry as pertained to the planting and increasing of the faith; whereunto I doubt not but a Christian prince, of his godly mind, would most lovingly have condescended. And it is to be considered, that in this question, with other like, this word, making of a bishop or priest, may be taken two ways: for understanding the word, to ordain or consecrate, so it is a thing which pertaineth to the apostles and their successors only; but if by this word (making) be understood the appointing or naming to the office, so it pertaineth specially to the supreme heads and governors of the church, which be princes.—Dr. Redmayn.

The apostles made bishops and priests by authority given them of God, and not for lack of any higher power. Notwithstanding, where there is a christened king or prince, the election, deputation, and assignation of them that shall be priests or bishops, belongeth to the king or prince, so that he may forbid any bishop within his kingdom, that he give no orders, for considerations moving him, and may assign him a time when he shall give orders, and to whom: example of king David, 1 Chron. xxiv., dividing the Levites into twenty-four orders, deputed over every order one chief bishop, prescribing an ordinal and rule how they should do their duties, their courses; and what sacrifices, rites, and ceremonies they should use every day, as the day and time required. And his son, king Solomon, diligently executed, and commanded the same usages to be observed in the temple after he had erected and finished it, 2 Chron. viii.—Dr. Edgworth.

The apostles made bishops and priests, by authority given them of God.—Dr. Symmons.

I say, that the apostles had authority of God to make bishops; yet if there had been a Christian king in any place where they made bishops, they would and ought to have desired authority also of him for the executing of such their godly acts which no Christian king would have denied.—Dr. Tresham.

To the ninth, I say, that the apostles (as I suppose) made bishops by authority given unto them of Christ: howbeit, I think they would and should, required the Christian princes' consent and license thereto, if there had been any Christian kings or princes.—Dr. Leighton.

The apostles made bishops and priests by authority given them of God: notwithstanding if there had been a Christian king at that time, it had been their duties to have had his license and permission to do the same.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—Omnes Conveniunt Apostolos Divinitus accepisse Potestatem creandi Episcopos; Eboracens. addit, non opus fuisse alia autoritate Apostolis quam divina: Sic Thirleby et Edgworth, Redmanus distinguit de Institutione Presbyteri, Ordinationem et Consecrationem tribuit tantum Apostolis et eorum Successoribus, nominationem et electionem Magistratibus: Sic Londinens. Leightonus, Redman, Tresham, Curren, aiunt petendam fuisse Potestatem a Magistratu Christiano, si tum fuisset. Robertsonus non respondet Quæstioni, concedit enim datam esse Apostolis Potestatem creandi Episcopos ubi Magistratus permittit. Oglethorpus putat eos impetrasse potestatem a principibus: Carliolens. Roffens. Dayus, non respondent ultimæ Parti.

Agreement.—In the ninth, touching the authority of the apostles in making priests, the bishop of York, the elect of Westminster, Dr. Edgworth, say, that "the apostles made priests by their own power, given them by God, and that they had no need of any other power." The bishop of St. David saith, that "because they lacked a Christian prince, by that necessity they ordained other bishops." Dr. Leighton, Curren, Tresham, and Redman suppose, that "they ought to have asked license of their Christian governors, if then there had been any."

10. Question.

Whether Bishops or Priests were first? and if the Priests were first, then the Priest made the Bishop

Answers.

The bishops and priests were at one time, and were no two things, but both one office in the beginning of Christ's religion.—Canterbury.

To the tenth; We think that the apostles were priests before they were bishops; and that the divine power which made them priests, made them also bishops; and although their ordination was not by all such course as the church now useth, yet that they had both visible and invisible sanctification, we may gather of the gospel, where it is written, Sicut misit me Pater vivens, et ego mitto vos: et cum hæc dixit, insufflavit in eos et dixit, Accipite Spiritum Sanctum: quorum remisistis, &c. And we may well think, that then they were made bishops, when they had not only a flock, but also shepherds appointed to them to overlook, and a governance committed to them by the Holy Ghost to oversee both; for the name of a bishop is not properly a name of order, but a name of office, signifying an overseer. And although the inferior shepherds have also cure to oversee their flock, yet forso much as the bishop's charge is also to oversee the shepherds, the name of overseer is given to the bishops, and not to the other; and as they be in degree higher, so in their consecration we find difference even from the primitive church.—York.

To the tenth: I think the bishops were first, and yet I think it is not of importance, whether the priest then made the bishop, or else the bishop the priest; considering (after the sentence of St. Jerome) that in the beginning of the church there was none (or if it were, very small) difference, between a bishop and a priest, especially touching the signification.—London.

I find in Scripture, that Christ being both a priest and a bishop, ordained his apostles, who were both priests and bishops; and the same apostles did afterwards ordain bishops, and commanded them to ordain others.—Rochester.

Christ made his apostles exorcists, as it appeareth in the 10th Matthew; deacons, priests, and bishops, as partly there, and after, in the 20th of St. John, Quorum Remiseritis, &c. and where he said, Hoc facile in meam Commemorationem. In the Acts, Cæterorum nemo audebat se conjungere illis. So that they were all these together; and so being according to the ordinance of Christ, who had made after them seventy-two other priests, as it appeareth in the 10th of St. Luke, they made and ordained also others the seven principal deacons, as it is showed in the 6th of the Acts; where it is said, that they praying laid their hands upon them. In the 13th of the Acts, certain there named at the commandment of the Holy Ghost severed Saul and Barnabas to that God had taken them, fasting, praying, and laying their hands upon them; the which Saul, Ananias the disciple had baptized, laying his hand upon him, that he might be replenished with the Holy Ghost. And Paul so made, ordained Timothy and Tite, willing them to do likewise as he had done, and appointed to be done from city to city. James was ordained the bishop of Jerusalem by Peter, John, and James. So that example otherwise we read not.—Carlisle.

Incertus sum utri fuerit priores, at si Apostoli in prima professione Ordinati erant, apparet Episcopos fuisse priores, nempe Apostolos, nam postea designavit Christus alios septuaginta duos. Nec opinor absurdum esse, ut Sacerdos Episcopum Consecret, si Episcopos haberi non potest.—Dr. Robertson.

Although by Scripture (as St. Hierome saith) priests and bishops be one, and therefore the one not before the other; yet bishops, as they be now, were after priests, and therefore made of priests.—Dr. Coe.

The apostles were both bishops and priests, and they made bishops; and bishops, as Titus and Timothy, made priests. Episcopatum ejus accipiat alter, Act i. Presbyteros qui in vobis sunt, obsecro et ego Compresbyter, 1 Pet. v. And in the beginning of the church, as well that word Episcopus as Presbyter was common and attributed both to bishops and priests.—Dr. Day.

Utique primi a Deo facti, Apostoli, Episcopi;

They be of like beginning, and at the beginning were both one, as St. Hierome and other old authors show by the Scripture, wherefore one made another indifferently.—Dr. Redmayn.

Christ, our chief priest and bishop, made his apostles priests and bishops all at once; and they did likewise make others, some priests and some bishops; and that the priests in the primitive church made bishops, I think no inconvenience; (as Jerome saith) in an Epist. ad Euagrium. Even like as soldiers should choose one among themselves to be their captain, so did priests choose one of themselves to be their bishop, for consideration of his learning, gravity, and good living, &c. and also for to avoid schisms among themselves by them, that some might not draw the people one way, and others another way, if they lacked one head among them.—Dr. Edgworth.

Christ was and is the great high bishop, and made all his apostles bishops; and they made bishops and priests after him, and so hath it evermore continued hitherto.—Dr. Symmons.

I say, Christ made the apostles first priests, and then bishops, and they by this authority made both priests and bishops; but where there had been a Christian prince, they would have desired his authority to the same.—Dr. Tresham.

To the tenth.—Dr. Leyghlon.

The apostles were made of Christ, bishops and priests, both at the first; and after them, Septuaginta duo Discipuli, were made priests.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—Menevens. Therleby, Redmanus, Coxus, asserunt in initio eosdem fuisse Episcopos et Presbyteros. Londinens. Carloliens. Symons, putant Apostolos fuisse institutos Episcopos a Christo, et eos postea instituisse alios Episcopos et Presbyteros, et 72 Presbyteros postea fuisse Ordinatos: Sic Oglethorpus, Eboracens. et Tresham aiunt Apostolos primo fuisse Presbyteros, deinde Episcopos, cum aliorum Presbyterorum credita esset illis cura. Robertsonus incertus est utri fuere priores, non absurdum tamen esse opinatur, ut Sacerdos consecret Episcopum, si Episcopos haberi non potest. Sic Londinens. Edgworth, Dayus, putant etiam Episcopos, ut vulgo de Episcopis loquimur, fuisse ante Presbyteros. Leightonus nihil respondet.

Agreement.—In the tenth; where it is asked, whether bishops or priests were first? The bishop of St. David, my lord elect of Westminster, Dr. Cox, Dr. Redmayn, say, that "at the beginning they were all one." The bishops of York, London, Rochester, Carlisle; Drs. Day, Tresham, Symmons, Oglethorp, be in other contrary opinions. The bishop of York and doctor Tresham think, "that the apostles first were priests, and after were made bishops, when the overseeing of other priests was committed to them." My lords of Durham, London, Carlisle, Rochester, Drs. Symmons and Crayford, think, "that the apostles first were bishops, and they after made other bishops and priests." Drs. Coren and Oglethorp say, "that the apostles were made bishops, and the 72 were after made priests." Dr. Day thinks, "that bishops, as they be now-a-days called, were before priests." My lord of London, Drs. Edgworth and Robertson, "think it no inconvenience, if a priest made a bishop in that time."

II. Question.

Whether a Bishop hath Authority to make a Priest by the Scripture, or no? And whether any other but only a Bishop may make a Priest?

Answers.

A bishop may make a priest by the Scripture, and so may princes and governors also, and that by the authority of God committed to them, and the people also by their election; for as we read that bishops have done it, so Christian emperors and princes usually have done it, and the people before Christian princes were, commonly did elect their bishops and priests.—Canterbury.

To the eleventh; That a bishop may make a priest, may be deduced of Scripture; for so much as they have all authority necessary for the ordering of Christ's church, derived from the apostles, who made bishops and priests, and not without authority, as we have said before to the ninth question; and that any other than bishops or priests may make a priest, we neither find in Scripture nor out of Scripture.—York.

To the eleventh; I think, that a bishop duly appointed hath authority, by Scripture, to make a bishop, and also a priest; because Christ being a bishop did so make himself; and because alive, his apostles did the like.—London.

The Scripture showeth by example, that a bishop hath authority to make a priest; albeit no bishop being subject to a Christian prince, may either give orders or excommunicate, or use any manner of jurisdiction, or any part of his authority, without commission from the king, who is supreme head of that church whereof he is a member; but that any other man may do it besides a bishop, I find no example, either in Scripture, or in doctors.—Rochester.

By what is said before, it appeareth, that a bishop by Scripture may make deacons and priests, and that we have none example otherwise.—Carlisle.

Opinor Episcopum habere Authoritatem creandi Sacerdotem, modo id Magistratus publici permisso fiat. An vero ab alio quam Episcopo id rite fieri possit, haud scio, quamvis ab alio factum non memini me legisse. Ordin. conferr. gratiam. vid. Eck. homil. 60.—Dr. Robertson.

Bishops have authority, as is aforesaid, of the apostles, in the tenth question, to make priests, except in cases of great necessity.—Dr. Cox.

Bishops have authority by Scripture to ordain bishops and priests; Joh. xx. Hujus rei gratia reliqui te Creata ut constituas oppidatim Presbyteros, Tit. i., Act. xiv.—Dr. Day.

Autoritas ordinandi Presbyteros data est Episcopis per verbum, multisq; aliis quos lego.—Dr. Oglethorpe.

To the first part, I answer, yea; for so it appeareth Tit. i., and I Tim. v.; with other places of Scripture. But whether any other but only a bishop may make a priest, I have not read, but by singular privilege of God; as when Moses (whom divers authors say was not a priest) made Aaron a priest. Truth it is, that the office of a godly prince is to oversee the church, and the ministers thereof; and to cause them do their duty, and also to appoint them special charges and offices in the church, as may be most for the glory of God, and edifying of the people: and thus we read of the good kings in the Old Testament, David, Joas, Ezekias, Josias. But as for making, that is to say, ordaining and consecrating of priests, I think it specially belongeth to the office of a bishop, as far as can be showed by Scripture, or any example, as I suppose from the beginning.—Dr. Redmayn.

A bishop hath authority by Scripture to make a priest, and that any other ever made a priest since Christ's time I read not. Albeit Moses, who was not anointed priest, made Aaron priest and bishop, by a special commission or revelation from God, without which he would never so have done.—Dr. Edgeworth.

A bishop placed by the higher powers, and admitted to minister, may make a priest; and I have not read of any other that ever made priests.—Dr. Symmons.

I say, a bishop hath authority by Scripture to make a priest, and other than a bishop hath not power therein, but only in case of necessity.—Dr. Tresham.

To the eleventh; I suppose that a bishop hath authority of God, as his minister, by Scripture to make a priest; but he ought not to admit any man to be priest, and consecrate him, or to appoint him unto any ministry in the church, without the prince's license and consent, in a Christian region. And that any other man hath authority to make a priest by Scripture, I have not read, nor any example thereof.—Dr. Leighton.

A bishop being licensed by his prince and supreme governor, hath authority to make a priest by the law of God. I do not read that any priest hath been ordered by any other than a bishop.—Dr. Coren.

Agreement.—In the eleventh; To the former part of the question, the bishop of St. David's doth answer, "that bishops have no authority to make priests, without they be authorised of the Christian prince." The others all of them do say, "that they be authorised of God." Yet some of them, as the bishop of Rochester, Dr. Curren, Leighton, Robertson, add, "that they cannot use this authority without their Christian prince doth permit them." To the second part, the answer of the bishop of St. David's is, "that laymen have other whiles made priests." So doth Dr. Edgeworth and Redman say, "that Moses, by a privilege given him of God, made Aaron his brother priest." Drs. Tresham, Crayford, and Cox say, "that laymen may make priests in time of necessity." The bishops of York, Durham, Rochester, Carlisle, elect of Westminster, Drs. Curren, Leighton, Symmons, seem to deny this thing; for they say, "they find not, nor read not any such example."

12. Question.

Whether in the New Testament be required any Consecration of a Bishop and Priest, or only appointing to the office sufficient.

Answers.

In the New Testament, he that is appointed to be a bishop, or a priest, needeth no consecration by the Scripture, for election or appointing thereto is sufficient.—Canterbury.

To the twelfth question; The apostles ordained priests by imposition of the hand with fasting and prayer; and so following their steps, we must needs think that all the foresaid things be necessarily to be used by their successors: and therefore we do also think, that appointment only, without visible consecration and invocation for the assistance and power of the Holy Ghost, is neither convenient nor sufficient; for without the said invocation, it beseebeth no man to appoint to our Lord ministers, as of his own authority: whereof we have example in the Acts of the Apostles; where we find, that when they were gathered to choose one in the place of Judas, they appointed two of the disciples, and commended the election to our Lord, that he would choose which of them it pleased him, saying and praying, "Lord, thou that knowest the hearts of all men, show whether of these two thou dost choose to succeed in the place of Judas." And to this purpose in the Acts we read, Dixit Spiritus Sanctus segregate mihi Barnabam, &c. And again, Quos posuit Spiritus Sanctus regere Ecclesiam Dei. And it appeareth also that in the Old Testament, in the ordering of priests, there was both visible and invisible sanctification; and therefore in the New Testament, where the priesthood is above comparison higher than in the Old, we may not think that only appointment sufficeth, without sanctification, either visible or invisible.—York.

To the twelfth; I think consecration of a bishop and priest be required, for that in the old law (being yet but a shadow and figure of the new) the consecration was required, as appears Levit. viii.; yet the truth of this I leave to those of higher judgments.—London.

The Scripture speaketh, de Impositione manus et de Oratione: and of other manner of consecrations, I find no mention in the New Testament expressly; but the old authors make mention also of inunctions.—Rochester.

Upon this text of Paul to Timothy; Noli negligere gratiam quæ in te est, quæ data est tibi per prophetiam cum Impositione manuum Presbyterii; St. Anselm saith this grace "to be the gift of the bishop's office, to the which God of his mere goodness had called and preferred him. The prophecy (he saith) was the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, by the which he knew what he had to do therein. The imposition of the hands is that by the which he was ordained and received that office: 'And therefore (saith St. Paul) God is my witness, that I have discharged myself, showing you as I ought to have done. Now look you well upon it whom that ye take to orders, lest ye lose yourself thereby.' Let bishops, therefore, who (as saith St. Hierome) hath power to make priests, consider well under what law the order of ecclesiastical constitution is bounden; and let them not think those words of the apostle to be his, but rather the words of Christ himself."—Carlisle.

Opinor requiri Consecrationem quandam, hoc est, impositionem manuum, Orationem, jejunium, &c., tamen nusquam hoc munere fungi posse, nisi ubi Magistratus invitet, jubeat, aut permittat.—Dr. Robertson.

By Scripture there is no consecration of bishops and priests required, but only the appointing to the office of a priest, cum Impositione manuum.—Dr. Cox.

Consecration of bishops and priests I read not in the New Testament, but Ordinatio per manuum Impositionem cum Oratione is read there, as in the places above; and the only appointment, as I think, is not sufficient.—Dr. Day.

Præter vocationem, seu designationem externam, quæ vel a Principe fit, vel a populo per electionem et suffragia, requiritur Ordinatio alia per manuum impositionem, idque per Verbum Dei.—Dr. Oglethorpe.

Besides the appointing to the office, it appeareth that, in the primitive church, the apostles used certain consecration of the ministers of the church, by imposition of hands and prayer, Acts vi.; and, with fasting,

RECORDS.

Acts xiv., &c. The office of priesthood is too dangerous to set upon, when one is but appointed only: therefore, for the confirmation of their faith, who take in hand such charge, and for the obtaining of farther grace requisite in the same, consecration was ordained by the Holy Ghost, and hath been always used from the beginning.—Dr. Redmayn.

Deputation to the office is not sufficient to make a priest or a bishop, as appeareth by David and Solomon, who deputed the 24 abovementioned to their offices, yet they made none of them priests, nor any other.—Dr. Edgworth.

The appointing to the office per manuum Impositionem is in Scripture, and the consecration of their hath of long time continued in the church.—Dr. Symmons.

There is a certain kind of consecration required, which is imposition of the bishop's hands, with prayer, and the appointing only is not sufficient.—Dr. Tresham.

To the twelfth; I suppose that there is a consecration required, as by imposition of hands; for so we be taught by the ensample of the apostles.—Dr. Leighton.

In the New Testament is required to the making of a bishop, Impositio manuum cum Oratione, which I take for consecration, and appointment unto the office is not sufficient; for king David, 1 Chron. xxiv., did appoint 24 to be bishops, who after were consecrated; so that both the appointment and the consecration be requisite.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—Respondent Eboracens. Londinens. Carliolens. Leighton, Tresham, Robertsonus, Edgworth, Curren, Dayus, Ogletorph, Consecrationem esse requisitam. Agreement.—In the twelfth question, where it is asked, Whether in the New Testament be required any consecration of a bishop, or only appointing to the office be sufficient? the bishop of St. David's saith, "that only the appointing;" Dr. Cox, "that only appointing, cum manuum Impositione, is sufficient without consecration." The bishops of York, London, Durham, Carlisle, Drs. Day, Curren, Leighton, Tresham, Edgworth, Ogletorph, say, "that consecration is requisite." Dr. Redmayn saith, "that consecration hath been received from the apostles' time, and institute of the Holy Ghost to confer grace." My lord of Rochester, Drs. Day and Symmons, say, "that priesthood is given per manuum Impositionem, and that by Scripture; and that consecration hath of long time been received in the church."

13. Question.

Whether (if it fortun'd a Christian Prince learned, to conquer certain dominions of Infidels, having none but temporal learned men with him) if it be defended by God's law, that he and they should preach and teach the word of God there, or no? And also make and constitute Priests, or no?

Answers.

It is not against God's law, but contrary they ought indeed so to do; and there be histories that witnesseth, that some Christian princes, and other laymen unconsecrate, have done the same.—Canterbury.

To the thirteenth; To the first part of this question, touching teaching and preaching the word of God in case of such need; we think that laymen not ordered not only may, but must preach Christ and his faith to infidels, as they shall see opportunity to do the same, and must endeavour themselves to win the miscreants to the kingdom of God, if that they can; for as the wise man saith, "God hath given charge to every man of his neighbour;" and the Scripture of God chargeth "every man to do all the good that he can to all men." And surely this is the highest aims to draw men from the devil, the usurper, and bring them to God the very owner: wherefore in this case every man and woman may be an Evangelist, and of this also we have example. But touching the second part, for case of necessity: as we neither find Scripture, nor example, that will bear, that any man, being himself no priest, may make, that is to say, may give the order of priesthood to another, and authority therewith to minister in the said order, and to use such powers and offices as appertaineth to priesthood grounded in the gospel; so we find in such case of need, what hath been done in one of the ancient writers; although this authority to ordain, after form afore-mentioned, be not to laymen expressly prohibited in Scripture; yet such a prohibition is implied, in that there is no such authority given to them, either in Scripture or otherways; for so much as no man may use this or any other authority which cometh from the Holy Ghost, unless he hath either commission grounded in Scripture, or else authority by tradition, and ancient use of Christ's church universally received over all.—York.

To the thirteenth and fourteenth following; I think that necessity herein might either be a sufficient rule and warrant to determine and order such cases, considering that "tempore necessitatis mulier baptizat, et laicus idem facit, et audit confessionem;" or else that God would inspire in the prince's heart to provide the best and most handsome remedy therein: and hard were it peradventure to find such great necessity, but either in the train of the said prince, or in the regions adjoining thereunto, there might be had some priests for the said purposes; or finally, that the prince himself, goddily inspired in that behalf, might, for so good purposes and intents, set forth the act indeed, referring yet this thing to the better judgment of others.—London.

To the thirteenth and fourteenth following; I never read these cases, neither in Scripture, nor in the doctors, and therefore I cannot answer unto them by learning, but think this to be a good answer for all such questions, viz. Necessitas non habet Legem—Rochester.

It is to be thought, that Christ may call, as it pleaseth him, inwardly, outwardly, or by both together: so that if no priest might be had, it cannot be thought, but that a Christian prince, with others learned, inwardly moved and called, might most charitably and goddily prosecute that same their calling in the most acceptable work, which is to bring people from the devil to God, from infidelity to true faith, by whatsoever means God shall inspire.—Carlisle.

In hoc casu existimare accersendos verbi et Sacramentorum Ministros, si qui forent vicini; quin si nulli invenirentur, Principem illum Christianum haberemus pro Apostolo, tanquam missum a Deo, licet externo Sacramento non esset commendatus, quum Deus Sacramentis suis non sit alligatus.—Dr. Robertson.

To the thirteenth and fourteenth following; It is not against God's law that the prince, and his learned temporal men, may preach and teach, and in these cases of extreme necessity make and institute ministers.—Dr. Cox.

In this case (as I think) the prince, and other temporal learned men with him, may, by God's law, teach and preach the word of God, and baptize; and also (the same necessity standing) elect and appoint men to those offices.—Dr. Day.

In summa necessitate baptizare et prædicare possunt et debent, hæc etenim duo, necessaria sunt media ad salutem; at ordinare (ut conjectura ducor) non debent, sed aliunde Sacrificos accersire, quos si habere nequeant, Deus ipse (cujus negotium agitur) vel oraculo admonebit, quid faciendum erit, vel necessitas ipsa (quæ sibi ipsi est Lex) modum Ordinandi suggeret ac suppeditabit.—Dr. Oglethorp.

I think they might, in such case of necessity; for in this case the laymen made the whole church there, and the authority of preaching and ministering the sacraments is given immediately to the church; and the church may appoint ministers, as is thought convenient. There be two stories good to be considered for this question, which be written in the tenth book of the History Ecclesiastic; the one of Frumentius, who preached in India, and was after made priest and bishop by Athanasius. And the other story is of the king of the Iberians, of whom Rufine, the writer of the story, saith thus: "Et nondum initiatus Sacris fit suæ gentis Apostolus." Yet nevertheless it is written there, that "an ambassade was sent to Constantine, the emperor, that he would send them priests for the further establishment of the faith there."—Dr. Redmayn.

The prince and his temporal learned men might and ought, in that necessity, to instruct the people in the faith of Christ, and to baptize them, ut idem res fit, et suæ gentis Apostolus, and these be sufficient for the salvation of his subjects. But as concerning other Sacraments, he ought to abide and look for a special commission from Almighty God, as Moses had, or else to send unto other regions where priests or bishops may be had, and else not to meddle. Examples in Eccles. Hist. lib. 10. cap. 1. de Frumentio. et cap 2. de Ancilla captiva quæ convertit gentem Iberorum cujus captivæ monitis ad Imperatorem Constantinum totius gentis legatio mittitur, res gesta exponitur, Sacerdotes mittere exorantur qui captum erga se Dei munus implerent, &c.—Dr. Edgeworth.

I think that in such a necessity, a learned Christian prince, and also temporal men learned, be bound to preach and minister either Sacraments, so that the same ministers be orderly assigned by the high power and the congregation.—Dr. Symmons.

I say, to the first part, that such a king, and his temporal learned men, not only might, but were also bound to preach God's word in this case. And as to the second part, I say, that if there could no bishop be had to institute, the prince might in that of necessity do it.—Dr. Tresham.

To the thirteenth; I suppose the affirmative thereof to be true; Quamvis potestas clavium residet præcipue in Ecclesia.—Dr. Leyghton.

In such a case, I do believe that God would illuminate the prince; so that either he himself should be made a bishop, by internal working of God (as Paul was) or some of his subjects, or else God would send him bishops from other parts. And as for preaching of the word of God, the prince might do it himself, and other of his learned subjects, although they were no priests.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—In prima parte Questionis Conveniunt omnes, etiam laicos, tali rerum statu, non solum posse sed debere docere. Menevens. Thirleteus, Leightonus, Coxus, Symmons, Tresham, Redmanus, Robertsonus, etiam potestatem Ministrandi Sacramenta, et Ordinandi Ministros, con-cedunt illis. Eborascens. hanc prorsus potestatem denegat, Coren credit Principem Divinitus illuminandum et consecrandum fore in Episcopum interne, aut aliquem ex suis, Pauli exemplo. Simile habet Herefordensis et Carliolensis. Dayus nihil respondet de Ordinandis Presbyteris in hac necessitate.

Agreement.—In the thirteenth; Concerning the first part, whether laymen may preach and teach God's word? they do all agree, in such a case, that not only they may, but they ought to teach. But in the second part, touching the constituting of priests of laymen, my lord of York and doctor Edgworth doth not agree with the other; they say, that laymen in no wise can make priests, or have such authority. The bishops of Durlham, St. David's, Westminster, Drs. Tresham, Cox, Leighton, Crayford, Symmons, Redmayn, Robertson, say that laymen in such case have authority to minister the sacraments and to make priests. My lords of London, Carlisle, and Hereford, and Dr. Coren, think that God in such a case would give the prince authority, call him inwardly, and illuminate him or some of his, as he did St. Paul.

14. Question.

Whether it be forfended by God's Law, that (if it so fortune that all the Bishops and Priests of a region were dead, and that the Word of God should remain there unpreached, and the Sacrament of Baptism and others unministered) that the King of that region should make Bishops and Priests to supply the same, or no?

Answers.

It is not forbidden by God's law.—Canterbury.

To the fourteenth; In this case, as we have said in the next article afore, teaching of the word of God may be used by any that can and would use it, to the glory of God; and in this case also the sacrament of baptism may be ministered by those that be no priests; which things although we have not of Scripture, yet the universal tradition and practice of the church doth teach us: and peradventure contract of matrimony might also be made, the solemnization thereof being only ordained by law positive, and not by any ground, either of Scripture, or of tradition; although for very urgent causes, the said solemnization is to be observed when it may be observed; but that the princes may not make, that is, may not order priests nor bishops not before ordered to minister the other sacraments, the ministry whereof in Scripture is committed only to the apostles, and from them derived to their successors, even from the primitive church hitherto, and by none other used, we have answered in the thirteenth article.—York.

Ut supra, quest. 13.—London.

Ut supra, quest. 13.—Rochester.

Not only it is given of God to supreme governors, kings and princes immediate under them, to see, cause, and compel all their subjects, bishops, priests, with all others, to do truly and uprightly their bounded duties to God, and to them, each one according to his calling; but also if it were so that anywhere such lacked to do and fulfil that God would have done, right well they might, by the inward moving and calling of God, supply the same.—Carlisle.

Ut supra, Quest. 13.—Dr. Cox.

To this case, as to the first, I answer, that if there could no bishops be had to order new priests there by the prince's assignation and appointment, then the prince himself might ordain and constitute, with the consent of the congregation, both priests and ministers,

To this, I think, may be answered, as to the last question before; howbeit the surest way, I think, were to send for some ministers of the church dwelling in the next regions, if they might be conveniently had.—Dr. Redmayn.

Likewise as to the next question afore.—Dr. Edgworth.

If the king be also a bishop, as it is possible, he may appoint bishops and priests to minister to his people: but hitherto I have not read that ever any Christian king made bishop or priest.—Dr. Symmons.

I make the same answer as to the thirteenth question is made.—Dr. Tresham.

To the fourteenth; I suppose the affirmative to be true, in case that there can no bishops nor priests be had forth of other countries, conveniently.—Dr. Leygh-ton.

In this case I make answer as before, that God will never suffer his servants to lack that thing that is necessary: for there should, either from other parts, priests and bishops be called thither, or else God would call inwardly some of them that be in that region to be bishops and priests.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—Fatentur ut prius omnes, Laicos posse Docere. Eboracens, Symmons, Oglethorp negant posse Ordinare Presbyteros, tamen concedit Eboracens, baptizare et contrahere Matrimonia, Edgworth tantum baptizare posse; nam sufficere dicit ad salutem. Alii omnes eandem potestatem concedunt, quam prius. Roffens. non aliud respondet his duabus Questionibus, quam quod necessitas non habeat Legem.

Agreement.—In the fourteenth they agree for the most part as they did before, “that laymen in this case may teach and minister the sacraments.” My lord of York, Dr. Symmons, and Oglethorp say, “they can make no priests;” although Symmons said “they might minister all sacraments, in the question before.” Yet my lord of York and Edgworth do grant, “that they may christen.” The bishops of London, Rochester, and Dr. Crayford say, “that in such a case, Necessitas non habet Legem.”

15. Question.

Whether a man be bound by authority of this Scripture (Quorum Remiseritis), and such like, to confess his secret deadly sins to a priest, if he may have him or no?

Answers.

A man is not bound, by the authority of this Scripture, Quorum Remiseritis, and such like, to confess his secret deadly sins to a priest, although he may have him.—Canterbury.

To the fifteenth; This Scripture is indifferent to secret and open sins; nor the authority given in the same is appointed or limited, either to the one or to the other, but is given commonly to both: and therefore seeing that the sinner is in no other place of Scripture discharged of the confession of his secret sins, we think, that this place chargeth him to confess the secret sins, as well as the open.—York.

To the fifteenth; I think that as the sinner is bound by this authority to confess his open sins, so also is he bound to confess his secret sins, because the special end, to wit, Absolutionem a peccato cuius fecit se aervum, is all one in both cases: and that all sins as touching God are open, and in nowise secret or hid.—London.

I think that confession of secret deadly sins is necessary for to attain absolution of them; but whether every man that hath secretly committed deadly sin, is bound by these words to ask absolution of the priest therefor, it is a hard question, and of much controversy amongst learned men, and I am not able to define betwixt them; but I think it is the surest way to say that a man is bound to confess, &c.—Rochester.

I think that by the mind of most ancient authors and most holy expositors, this text, Quorum Remiseritis peccata, &c. with other like, serveth well to this intent; that Christian folk should confess their secret deadly sins to a priest there to be assoiled, without which mean there can be none other like assurance.—Carlisle.

I cannot find that a man is bound by Scripture to confess his secret deadly sins to a priest, unless he be so troubled in his conscience that he cannot be quieted without godly instruction.—Dr. Coar.

The matter being in controversy among learned men, and very doubtful, yet I think rather the truth is, that by authority of this Scripture, Quorum Remiseritis, &c., and such like, a man is bound to confess his secret deadly sins, which grieve his conscience, to a priest, if he may conveniently have him. Forasmuch as it is an ordinary way ordained by Christ in the gospel, by absolution to remit sins; which absolution I never read to be given, sine confessione praevid.—Dr. Day.

Confitenda sunt opinor, etiam peccata abdita ac secreta propter Absolutionem ac conscientie tranquillitatem, et praecipue pro vitanda desperatione, ad quam plerumq; adiguntur multi in extremis, dum sibi ipsis de remissione peccatorum nimium blandiuntur, nullius (dum sani sunt) censuram subeuntes nisi propriam.—Dr. Oglethorpe.

I think, that although in these words confession of privy sins is not expressly commanded, yet it is insinuated and showed in these words, as a necessary medicine or remedy, which all men that fall into deadly sin ought, for the quieting of their consciences, seek, if they may conveniently have such a priest as is meet to hear their confession.—Dr. Redmayn.

Where there be two ways to obtain remission of sin, and to recover grace, a man is bound by the law of nature to take the surer way, or else he should seem to contemn his own health, which is unnatural. Also because we be bound to love God above all things, we ought by the same bond to labour for his grace and favour: so that because we be bound to love God, and to love ourselves in an order to God, we be bound to seek the best and surest remedy to recover grace for ourselves. Contrition is one way; but because a man cannot be well assured whether his contrition, attrition, or displeasure for his sin be sufficient to satisfy or content Almighty God, and able or worthy to get his grace, therefore it is necessary to take that way that will not fail, and by which thou mayest be sure, and that is absolution of the priest, which by Christ's promise will not deceive thee, so that thou put no step or bar in the way; as, if thou do not then actually sin inwardly nor outwardly, but intend to receive that the church intendeth to give thee by that absolution, having the efficacy of Christ's promise, Quorum Remiseritis, &c. Now the priest can give thee no absolution from that sin that he knoweth not: therefore thou art bound, for the causes aforesaid, to confess thy sin.—Dr. Edgeworth.

I say, that such confession is a thing most consonant to the law of God, and it is a wise point, and a wholesome thing so for to do, and God provoketh and allureth us thereto, in giving the active power to priests to assail in the words, Quorum Remiseritis. It is also a safer way for salvation to confess, if we may have a priest: yet I think that confession is not necessarily deduced of Scripture, nor commanded as a necessary precept of Scripture, and yet is it much consonant to the law of God, as a thing willed, not commanded.—Dr. Tresham.

To the fifteenth; I think that only such as have not the knowledge of the Scripture, whereby they may quiet their consciences, be bound to confess their secret deadly sins unto a priest: howbeit no man ought to condemn such auricular confession, for I suppose it to be a tradition apostolical, necessary for the unlearned multitude.—Dr. Leighton.

A man whose conscience is grieved with mortal secret sins is bound by these words, Quorum Remiseritis, &c., to confess his sin to a priest, if he may have him conveniently.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—Eboracens. Londinens. Dayus, Oglethorpus, Coren, Redmayn, asserunt obligari. Edgeworth tradit duplicem modum remissionis peccatorum, per Contritionem sive Attritionem, et per Absolutionem: et quia nemo potest certus esse, num attritio et dolor pro peccato sufficiat ad satisfaciendum Deo et obtinendam gratiam, ideo tutissimam viam deligendam, scilicet, Absolutionem a Sacerdote, quæ per promissionem Christi est certa; Absolvere non potest nisi cognoscat peccata; Ergo peccata per Confessionem sunt illi revelanda.

Agreement.—In the fifteenth; concerning confession of our secret deadly sins. The bishops of York, Durham, London, Drs. Day, Curren, Oglethorp, Redmayn, Crayford, say, "that men be bound to confess them of their secret sins." Drs. Cox, Tresham, Robertson, say, "they be not bound, if they may quiet their consciences otherwise." The bishop of St. David's also saith, "that this text bindeth no man." Dr. Leighton saith, that "it bindeth only such as have not the knowledge of Scripture." The bishop of Carlisle and Symmons say, that "by ancient doctors' exposition, men be bound, by this text, to confess their deadly sins."

16. Question.

Whether a Bishop or a Priest may excommunicate, and for what crimes? And whether they only may excommunicate by God's Law?

Answers.

A bishop or a priest by the Scripture is neither commanded nor forbidden to excommunicate; but where the laws of any region giveth him authority to excommunicate, there they ought to use the same in such crimes as the laws have such authority in; and where the laws of the region forbiddeth them, there they have no authority at all; and they that be no priests may also excommunicate if the law allow therunto.—Canterbury.

To the sixteenth; The power to excommunicate, that is, to disserve the sinner from the communion of all Christian people, and so put them out of the unity of the mystical body for the time, donec resipiscat, is only given to the apostles and their successors in the gospel, but for what crimes, although in the gospel doth not appear, saving only for disobedience against the commandment of the church, yet we find example of excommunication used by the apostles in other cases: as of the fornicator by Paul, of Hymeneus and Alexander for their blasphemy by the same; and yet of other crimes mentioned in the epistle of the said Paul writing to the Corinthians. And again of them that were disobedient to his doctrine, 2 Thess. 3. We find also charge given to us by the apostle St. John, that we shall not commune with them, nor so much as salute him with Ave, that would not receive his doctrine. By which it may appear that excommunication may be used for many great crimes, and yet the church at this day doth not use it, but only for manifest disobedience. And this kind of excommunication, whereby man is put out of the church, and dis severed from the unity of Christ's mystical body, which excommunication toucheth also the soul, no man may use but they only to whom it is given by Christ.—York.

To the sixteenth; I think that a bishop may excommunicate, taking example of St. Paul with the Corinthian; and also of that he did to Alexander and Hymeneus. And with the lawyers it hath been a thing out of question, that to excommunicate solemnly appertaineth to a bishop, although otherwise both inferior prelates and other officers, yea and priests too in notorious crimes, after divers men's opinions, may excommunicate semblably, as all others that be appointed governors and rulers over any multitude or spiritual congregation.—J

I answer affirmatively to the first part, in open and manifest crimes, meaning of such priests and bishops as be by the church authorised to use that power. To the second part, I answer, that it is a hard question, wherein I had rather hear other men speak than say my own sentence; for I find not in Scripture, nor in the old doctors, that any man hath given sentence of excommunication, save only priests; but yet I think, that it is not against the law of God that a layman should have authority to do it.—Rochester.

Divers texts of Scripture seemeth, by the interpretation of ancient authors, to show that a bishop or a priest may excommunicate open deadly sinners continuing in obstinacy with contempt. I have read in histories also, that a prince hath done the same.—Carlisle.

Opinior Episcopum aut Presbyterum Excommunicare posse, tanquam ministrum et os Ecclesiæ, ab eadem mandatum habens. Utrum vero id juris nulli nisi Sacerdotibus in mandatis dari possit, non satis scio. Excommunicandum esse opinor pro hujuscemodi criminibus, qualia recenset Paulus, 1 Cor. 5. si, is qui frater nominatur, est fornicator, aut avarus, aut idolis serviens, aut maledicus, aut ebrius, aut rapax, cum hujusmodi ne cibum sumere, &c.—Dr. Robertson.

A bishop or a priest, as a public person appointed to that office, may excommunicate for all public crimes: and yet it is not against God's law for others than bishops or priests to excommunicate.—Dr. Cor.

A bishop or a priest may excommunicate by God's law for manifest and open crimes: also others appointed by the church, though they be no priests, may exercise the power of excommunication.—Dr. Day.

Non solum Episcopus Excommunicare potest, sed etiam tota Congregatio, idq; pro lethalibus criminibus ac publicis, è quibus scandalum Ecclesiæ provenire potest. Non tamen pro re pecuniaria uti olim solebant.—Dr. Oglethorp.

They may excommunicate, as appeareth 1 Cor. v. 1 Tim. i., and that for open and great crimes, whereby the church is offended; and for such crimes as the prince and governors determine and thinketh expedient, men to be excommunicate for, as appeareth in novellis Constitutionibus Justiniani. Whether any other may pronounce the sentence of excommunication but a bishop or a priest I am uncertain.—Dr. Redmayn.

A bishop, or a priest only, may excommunicate a notorious and grievous sinner, or obstinate person, from the communion of Christian people, because it pertaineth to the jurisdiction which is given to priests, Jo. xxvi. Quorum Remiseritis, &c. et Quorum retinueritis, &c. There is one manner of excommunication spoken of, 1 Cor. v. which private persons may use. Si is qui frater nominatur inter vos est fornicator, aut avarus, aut idolis serviens, &c. cum huiusmodi ne cibum quidem capiat; excluding filthy persons, covetous persons, brawlers and quarrellers, out of their company, and neither to eat nor drink with them.—Dr. Edgeworth.

Whosoever hath a place under the higher power, and is assigned by the same to execute his ministry given of God, he may excommunicate for any crime, as it shall be seen to the higher power if the same crime be public.—Dr. Symmons.

A bishop and priest may excommunicate by Scripture: as touching for what crimes; I say, for every open deadly sin and disobedience. And as touching, whether only the priest may excommunicate? I say, not he only, but such as the church authorises so to do.—Dr. Tresham.

To the sixteenth, I say, that a bishop or a priest having license and authority of the prince of the realm, may excommunicate every obstinate and inobedient person, for every notable and deadly sin. And further, I say, that not only bishops and priests may excommunicate, but any other man appointed by the church, or such as have authority to appoint men to that office, may excommunicate.—Dr. Leyghton.

A bishop or a priest may excommunicate an obstinate person for public sins. Forsomuch as the keys be given to the whole church, the whole congregation may excommunicate; which excommunication may be pronounced by such a one as the congregation does appoint, although he be neither bishop nor priest.—Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt.—Menevens. Herefordens. Thirleby, Dayus, Leightonus, Coxus, Symmons, Coren, concedunt auctoritatem excommunicandi etiam Laicis, modo a Magistratu deputentur. Eboracens. et Edgworth prorsus negant datum Laicis, sed Apostolis et eorum successoribus tantum. Roffensis, Redmanus, et Robertsonus ambigunt, num detur Laicis. Londinens. non respondet Questioni: Oglethorpus et Thirleby aiunt, Ecclesie datam esse potestatem Excommunicandi; Idem Treshamus.

Agreement.—In the sixteenth, of excommunication, they do not agree. The bishops of York, Durham, and Dr. Edgeworth say, that "laymen have not the authority to excommunicate, but that it was given only unto the apostles and their successors." The bishops of Hereford, St. David's, Westminster—Doctors Day, Coren, Leighton, Cox, Symmons, say, that "laymen may excommunicate, if they be appointed by the high ruler." My lord elect of Westminster, Dr. Tresham, and Dr. Oglethorpe, say further, that the power of excommunication was given to the church, and to such as the church shall institute."

17. Question.

Whether Unction of the Sick with Oil, to remit Venial Sins, as it is now used, be spoken of in the Scripture, or in any ancient Authors?

Answers.

Uction of the sick with oil, to remit venial sins, as it is now used, is not spoken of in the Scripture, nor in any ancient authors.

*T. Cantuarien. This is mine opinion and sentence at this present, which I do not temerarily define, but do remit the judgment thereof wholly unto your majesty.

To the seventeenth; Of unction of the sick with oil, and that sins thereby be remitted, St. James doth teach us; but of the holy prayers, and like ceremonies used in the time of the unction, we find no special mention in Scripture, albeit the said St. James maketh also mention of prayer to be used in the ministry of the same.—Edward Ebor.

To the seventeenth; I think that albeit it appeareth not clearly in Scripture, whether the usage in extreme unction now be all one with that which was in the beginning of the church: yet of the unction in time of sickness, and the oil also with prayers and ceremonies, the same is set forth in the Epistle of St. James, which place commonly is alleged, and so hath been received, to prove the sacrament of extreme unction.

Ita mihi Edmundo Londinensi Episcopo pro hoc tempore dicendum videtur, salvo iudicio melius sentientis, cui me prompte et humiliter subijcio.

Inunction of them that be sick with oil, and praying for them for remission of sins, is plainly spoken of in the Epistle of St. James; but after what form or fashion the said inunction was then used, the Scripture telleth not.

Written on the back of the paper,

The bishop of Rochester's book.

Extreme unction is plainly set out by St. James; with the which maketh also that is written in the 6th of St. Mark, after the mind of right good ancient doctors.—Robert Carliolen.

De Unctione Infirmorum nihil reperio in Scripturis, præter id quod scribitur, Marc. vi. et Jacob. v.—Thomas Robertson.

T. Cantuarien.

Uction of the sick with oil consecrate, as it is now used, is not spoken of in Scripture.—Richardus Cox.

Uction of the sick with praying for them is found in Scripture.—George Day.

Opiniones non Assertiones.

De Unctione Infirmorum cum oleo, adjecta Oratione, expressa mentio est in Scripturis, quanquam nunc addantur alii ritus, honestatis gratia (ut in aliis Sacramentis) de quibus in Scripturis nulla mentio.—Owinus Oglethorpus.

Uction with oil, adjoined with prayer, and having promise of remission of sins, is spoken of in St. James and ancient authors; as for the use which now is, if anything be amiss, it would be amended.—J. Redmayn.

It is spoken of in Mark vi. and James v. Augustine, and other ancient doctors, speaketh of the same.—Edgeworth.

The unction of the sick with oil, to remit sins, is in Scripture, and also in ancient authors.—Symon thew.

* These are the subscriptions which are at the end of every man's paper.

PART I.—BOOK III.

Uction with oil is grounded in the Scripture, and expressly spoken of; but with this additament (as it is now used) it is not specified in Scripture, for the ceremonies now used in unction I think mere traditions of man.—William Tresham.

To the seventeenth, I say, that unction of the sick with oil, and prayer to remit sins, is manifestly spoken of in St. James's Epistle and ancient authors, but not with all the rites and ceremonies as be now commonly used.

T. Cantuarien. Per me Edwardum Leyghton.

Conueniunt.—Meneuens. et Coxus negant Uctionem Olei (ut jam est recepta) ad remittenda peccata contineri in Scripturis. Eboracens. Carloliens. Edgworth, Coren, Redmayn, Symmons, Leightonus, Oglethorp aiunt, haberi in Scripturis. Roffens. Thirleby, Robertsonus, præterquam illud Jacobi v. et Marci vi. nihil proferunt. Herefordensis ambigit. Tresham vult Uctionem Olei tradi nobis è Scripturis, sed Uctionis Cæremonias traditiones esse humanas.

Agreement.—In the last, the bishop of St. David's and Dr. Cox say, that "unction of the sick with oil consecrate, as it is now used to remit sin, is not spoken of in Scripture." My lords of York, Durham, Carlisle, Drs. Coren, Edgworth, Redmayn, Symmons, Leyghton, and Oglethorp, say, that it is found in Scripture.

XXII.—Dr. Barnes's Revunciation of some Articles informed against him

BE it known to all men, that I, Robert Barnes, doctor of divinity, have, as well in writing as in preaching, overshot myself and been deceived, by trusting too much to mine own heady sentence, and giving judgment in and touching the articles hereafter ensuing; whereas being convented, and called before the person of my most gracious sovereign lord king Henry VIII. of England and of France, defender of the faith, lord of Ireland, and in earth supreme head immediately under God of the church of England; it pleased his highness, of his great clemency and goodness, being assisted with sundry of his most discreet and learned clergy, to enter such disputation and argument with me upon the points of my oversight, as by the same was fully and perfectly confuted by Scriptures, and enforced only for truth's sake, and for want of defence of Scriptures to serve for the maintenance of my part, to yield, confess, and knowledge my ignorance, and with my most humble submission, do promise for ever from henceforth to abstain and beware of such rashness: and for my further declaration therein, not only to abide such order for my doings passed as his grace shall appoint and assign unto me, but also with my heart to advance and set forth the said articles ensuing, which I knowledge and confess to be most catholic, and Christian, and necessary to be received, observed, and followed of all good Christian people. Though it so be, that Christ, by the will of his Father, is he only which hath suffered passion and death for redemption of all such as will and shall come unto him by perfect faith and baptism; and that also he hath taken upon him gratis the burden of all their sins, which as afore will, hath, or shall come to him, paying sufficient ransom for all their sins, and so is become their only Redeemer and Justifier; of the which number I trust and doubt not but that many of us now-a-days be of: yet I in heart do confess, that after, by the foresaid means, we become right Christian folks, yet then, by not following our Master's commandments and laws, we do lose the benefits and fruition of the same, which in this case is irrecoverable but by true penance, the only remedy left unto us by our Saviour for the same; wherefore I think it more than convenient and necessary, that whensoever justification shall be preached of, that this deed be joined with all the fore part, to the intent that it may teach all true Christian people a right knowledge of their justification.

By me ROBERT BARNES.

Also I confess with my heart, that Almighty God is in nowise author, causer of sin, or any evil; and therefore, whereas Scripture saith, Induravit Dominus Cor Pharaonis, &c., and such other texts of like sense, they ought to understand them, quod Dominus permisit eum indurari, and not otherwise; which doth accord with many of the ancient interpreters also.

By me ROBERT BARNES.

For I do confess with my heart, that whensoever I have offended my neighbours, I must first reconcile myself unto him ere I shall get remission of my sins; and in case he offend me, I must forgive him ere that I can be forgiven; for this doth the Pater Noster, and other places of Scripture, teach me.

By me ROBERT BARNES.

I do also confess, with my heart, that good works limited by Scripture, and done by a penitent and true reconciled Christian man, be profitable and allowable unto him, as allowed of God for his benefit, and helping to his salvation.

By me ROBERT BARNES.

Also do confess with my heart, that laws and ordinances made by Christian rulers ought to be obeyed by the inferiors and subjects, not only for fear, but also for conscience; for whoso breaketh them, breaketh God's commandments.

By me ROBERT BARNES.

All and singular the which articles before written, I the foresaid Robert Barnes do approve and confess to be most true and catholic, and promise, with my heart, by God's grace, hereafter to maintain, preach, and set forth the same to the people, to the uttermost of my power, wit, and cunning.

By me ROBERT BARNES.

By me WILLIAM JEROME.

By me THOMAS GERARDE.

XXIV.—A Proclamation ordained by the King's Majesty, with the advice of his Honourable Council, for the Bible of the largest and greatest volume to be had in every church; devised the sixth day of May, the thirty-third year of the King's most gracious reign.

. Bonner. fol. 21.]

WHEREBY injunctions heretofore set forth by the authority of the king's royal majesty, supreme head of the church of this his realm of England, it was ordained and commanded, amongst other things, that in all and singular parish churches, there should be provided, by a certain day now expired, at the costs of the curates and parishioners, Bibles containing the Old and New Testament in the English tongue, to be fixed and set up openly in every of the said parish churches; the which godly commandment and injunction was to the only intent that every of the king's majesty's loving subjects, minding to read therein, might, by occasion thereof, not only consider and perceive the great and ineffable omnipotent power, promise, justice, mercy and goodness of Almighty God, but also to learn thereby to observe God's commandments, and to obey their sovereign lord and high powers, and to exercise godly charity, and to use themselves according to their vocations, in a pure and sincere Christian life without murmur or grudging: by the which injunctions, the king's royal majesty intended that his loving subjects should have and use the commodities of the reading of the said Bibles, for the purpose above rehearsed, humbly, meekly, reverently, and obediently, and not that any of them should read the said Bibles with high and loud voices, in time of the celebration of the holy mass, and other divine services used in the church; or that any his lay-subjects reading the same, should presume to take upon them any common disputation, argument, or exposition of the mysteries therein contained; but that every such layman should, humbly, meekly, and reverently, read the same for his own instruction, edification, and amendment of his life, according to God's holy word therein mentioned. And notwithstanding the king's said most godly and gracious commandment and injunction, in form as is aforesaid, his royal majesty is informed, that divers and many towns and parishes within this his realm have neglected their duties in the accomplishment thereof; whereof his highness marvelleth not a little; and minding the execution of his said former most godly and gracious injunctions, doth straitly charge and command, that the curates and parishioners of every town and parish within this his realm of England, not having already Bibles provided within their parish churches, shall, on this side the feast of All Saints next coming, buy and provide Bibles of the largest and greatest volume, and cause the same to be set and fixed in every of the said parish churches, there to be used as is aforesaid, according to the said former injunctions, upon pain that the curate and inhabitants of the parishes and towns shall lose and forfeit to the king's majesty for every month that they shall lack and want the said Bibles, after the same feast of All Saints, 40s. the one half of the same forfeit to be to the king's majesty, and the other half to him or them which shall first find and present the same to the king's majesty's council. And finally, the king's royal majesty doth declare and signify to all and singular his loving subjects, that to the intent they may have the said Bibles of the greatest volume at equal and reasonable prices, his highness, by the advice of his council, hath ordained and taxed, that the sellers thereof shall not take for any of the said Bibles unbought, above the price of ten shillings; and for every of the said Bibles well and sufficiently bound, trimmed and clasped, not above twelve shillings, upon pain the seller to lose, for every Bible sold contrary to his highness's proclamation, four shillings, the one moiety thereof to the king's majesty, and the other moiety to the finder and presenter of the defaulter as is aforesaid. And his highness straitly chargeth and commandeth, that all and singular ordinaries, having ecclesiastical jurisdiction within this his church and realm of England, and dominion of Wales, that they and every of them shall put their effectual endeavours that the curates and parishioners shall obey and accomplish this his majesty's proclamation and commandment, as they tender the advancement of the king's most gracious and godly purpose in that behalf, and as they will answer to his highness for the same.

God save the king.

XXV.—An Admonition and Advertisement given by the Bishop of London to all Readers of this Bible in the English Tongue.

[Regist. Bonner.]

To the intent that a good and wholesome thing, godly and virtuously, for honest intents and purposes, set forth for many, be not hindered or maligned at, for the abuse, default, and evil behaviour of a few, who for lack of discretion, and good advisement, commonly without respect of time, or other due circumstances, proceed rashly and unadvisedly therein; and by reason thereof, rather hinder than set forward the thing that is good of itself: it shall therefore be very expedient, that whosoever repaireth hither to read this book, or any such like, in any other place, he prepare himself chiefly and principally, with all devotion, humility, and quietness, to be edified and made the better thereby; adjoining thereto his perfect and most bounden duty of obedience to the king's majesty, our most gracious and dread sovereign lord and supreme head, especially in accomplishing his grace's most honourable injunctions and commandments given and made in that behalf. And right expedient, yea necessary it shall be also, that leaving behind him vainglory, hypocrisy, and all other carnal and corrupt affections, he bring with him discretion, honest intent, charity, reverence, and quiet behaviour, to and for the edification of his own soul, without the hindrance, let, or disturbance of any other his Christian brother; evermore foreseeing that no number of people be specially congregated therefore to make a multitude; and that no exposition be made thereupon otherwise than it is declared in the book itself, and that especially regard be had no reading thereof be used, allowed, and with noise in the time of any divine service or sermon; or that in the same be used any disputation, contention, or any other misdemeanour, or finally that any man justly may reckon himself be offended thereby, or take occasion to grudge or malign thereat.

God save the king.

[Regist. Bonner. fol. 38.]

INJUNCTIONS made by the consent and authority of me Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, in the year of our Lord God 1542, and in the thirty-fourth year of the reign of our sovereign lord Henry VIII. by the grace of God king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and supreme head here in earth, next under God, of the church of England and Ireland. All which and singular injunctions, by the authority given to me of God, and by our said sovereign lord the king's majesty, I exhort, require, and also command, all and singular parsons, vicars, curates, and chantry priests, with other of the clergy, whatsoever they be, of my diocese and jurisdiction of London, to observe, keep, and perform accordingly, as it concerneth every of them in virtue of their obedience, and also upon pains expressed in all such laws, statutes, and ordinances of this realm, as they may incur, and be objected against them, now, or at any time hereafter, for breaking and violating of the same, or any of them.

First; That you, and every of you, shall, with all diligence and faithful obedience, observe and keep, and cause to be observed and kept, to the uttermost of your powers, all and singular the contents of the king's highness' most gracious and godly ordinances and injunctions given and set forth by his grace's authority; and that ye, and every of you, for the better performance thereof, shall provide to have a copy of the same in writing, or imprinted, and so to declare them accordingly.

Item; That every parson, vicar, and curate shall read over and diligently study every day one chapter of the Bible, and that with the gloss ordinary, or some other doctor or expositor, approved and allowed in this church of England, proceeding from chapter to chapter, from the beginning of the Gospel of Matthew to the end of the New Testament, and the same so diligently studied to keep still and retain in memory, and to come to the rehearsal and recital thereof at all such time and times as they, or any of them, shall be commanded thereunto by me or any of my officers or deputies.

Item; That every of you do procure and provide of your own a book, called "The Institution of a Christian Man," otherwise called "The Bishop's Book;" and that ye, and every of you, do exercise yourselves in the same, according to such precepts as hath been given heretofore, or hereafter to be given.

Item; That ye being absent from your benefices, in cases lawfully permitted by the laws and statutes of this realm, do suffer no priest to keep your cure, unless he being first by you presented, and by me or my officers thereunto abled and admitted. And for the more and better assurance and performance thereof to be had, by these presents I warn and monish peremptorily all and singular beneficed parsons having benefices with cure, within my diocese and jurisdiction, that they and every of them shall either be personally resident upon their benefices and cures, before the feast of St. Michael the Archangel now next ensuing; or else present, before the said feast, to me the said bishop, my vicar-general, or other my officers deputed in that behalf, such curates as upon examination made by me, or my said officers, may be found able and sufficient to serve and discharge their cures in their absence; and also at the said feast, or before, shall bring in and exhibit before my said officers their sufficient dispensations authorised by the king's majesty as well for non-residence as for keeping of more benefices with cure than one.

Item; That every parson, vicar, and other curates, once in every quarter, shall openly in the pulpit exhort and charge his parishioners that they in nowise do make any privy or secret contract of matrimony between themselves, but that they utterly defer it until such time as they may conveniently have the father and mother, or some other kinsfolks or friends of the person that shall make such contract of matrimony; or else two or three honest persons to be present, and to hear and record the words and manner of their contract, as they will avoid the extreme pains of the law provided in that behalf, if they presumptuously do or attempt the contrary.

Item; That in the avoiding of divers and grievous offences and enormities, and specially the most detestable sin of adultery, which oftentimes hath happened by the negligence of curates in marrying persons together which had been married before, and making no due proof of the death of their other husbands and wives at the time of such marriages, I require and command you, and monish peremptorily by these presents all manner of parsons, vicars, and curates, with other priests, being of my diocese and jurisdiction, that they, nor any of them, from henceforth do presume to solemnise matrimony in their churches, chapels, or elsewhere, between any persons that have been married before, unless the said parson, vicar, curate, or priest, be first plainly, fully, and sufficiently informed and certified of the decease of the wife or husband of him or her, or of both, that he shall marry, and that in writing, under the ordinary's seal of the diocese, or place where he or she inhabited or dwelt before, under pain of excommunication, and otherwise to be punished for doing the contrary, according to the laws provided and made in that behalf.

Item; That ye, and every of you that be parsons, vicars, curates, and also chauntry-priests and stipendiaries, do instruct, teach, and bring up in learning the best ye can, all such children of your parishioners as shall come to you for the same; or at the least to teach them to read English, taking moderately therefor of their friends that be able to pay, so that they may thereby the better learn and know how to believe, how to pray, how to live to God's pleasure.

Item; That every curate do at all times his best diligence to stir, move, and reduce such as be at discord, to peace, concord, love, charity, and one to remit and forgive one another, as often and howsoever they shall be grieved or offended: and that the curate show and give example thereof, when and as often as any variance or discord shall happen to be between him and any of his cure.

Item; Where some froward persons, partly for malice, hatred, displeasure, and disdain, neglect, contemn, and despise their curates, and such as have the cure and charge of their souls, and partly to hide and cloak their lewd and naughty living, as they have used all the year before, use at length to be confessed of other priests which have not the cure of their souls: wherefore I will and require you to declare, and show to your parishioners, that no testimonials brought from any of them shall stand in any effect, nor that any such persons shall be admitted to God's board, or receive their communion, until they have submitted themselves to be confessed of their own curates (strangers only except), or else upon arduous and urgent causes and considerations they be otherwise dispensed with in that behalf, either by me or by my officers aforesaid.

Item; That whereupon a detestable and abominable practice universally reigning in your parishes, the young people and other ill-disposed persons doth use upon the Sundays and holidays, in time of divine service, and preaching the word of God, to resort unto ale-houses, and there exerciseth unlawful games, with great swearing, blasphemy, drunkenness, and other enormities, so that good and devout persons be much offended therewith: wherefore I require and command you to declare to such as keepeth ale-houses or taverns within your parishes, that at such times from henceforth, they shall not suffer in their houses any such unlawful and ungodly assemblies; neither receive such persons to bowling and drinking at such seasons into their houses, under pain of excommunication, and otherwise to be punished for their so doing, according to the laws in that behalf.

Item; That all curates shall declare openly in the pulpit, twice every quarter to their parishioners, the seven deadly sins, and the ten commandments, so that the people thereby may not only learn how to obey, honour, and serve God, their prince, superiors, and parents, but also to avoid and eschew sin and vice, and to live virtuously, following God's commandments and his laws.

Item; That where I am credibly informed, that certain priests of my diocese and jurisdiction doth use to go in an unseemly and unpriestly habit and apparel, with unlawful tonsures, carrying and having upon them also armour and weapons, contrary to all wholesome and godly laws and ordinances, more like persons of the lay than of the clergy; which may and doth minister occasion to light persons, and to persons unknown, where such persons come in place, to be more licentious both of their communication and also of their acts, to the great slander of the clergy: wherefore in the avoiding of such slander and obloquy hereafter, I admonish and command all and singular parsons, vicars, curates, and all other priests whatsoever they be, dwelling, or inhabiting, or who hereafter shall dwell and inhabit within my diocese and jurisdiction, that from henceforth they, and every of them, do use and wear meet, convenient, and decent apparel, with their trussures accordingly, whereby they may be known at all times from lay-people, and to be of the clergy, as they intend to avoid and eschew the penalty of the laws ordained in that behalf.

Item; That no parson, vicar, or other beneficed man, having cure within my diocese and jurisdiction, do suffer any priest to say mass, or to have any service within their cure, unless they first give knowledge, and present them with the letters of their orders to me as ordinary, or to my officers deputed in that behalf, and the said priest so presented shall be by me, or my said officers, found able and sufficient thereunto.

Item; That every curate, not only in his preachings, open sermons, and collations made to the people, but also at all other times necessary, do persuade, exhort, and monish the people being of his cure, whatsoever they be, to beware and abstain from swearing and blaspheming of the holy name of God, or any part of Christ's most precious body or blood. And likewise to beware and abstain from cursing, banning, chiding, scolding, backbiting, slandering, and lying. And also from talking and jangling in the church, specially in time of divine service or sermon-time. And seembly to abstain from adultery, fornication, gluttony, and drunkenness: and if they or any of them be found notoriously faulty or infamed upon any of the said crimes and offences, then to detect them at every visitation, or sooner, as the case shall require, so that the said offenders may be corrected and reformed to the example of other.

Item; That no priest from henceforth do use any unlawful games, or frequently use any ale-houses, taverns, or any suspect place at any unlawful times, or any light company, but only for their necessities, as they, and any of them, will avoid the danger that may ensue thereupon.

Item; That in the plague-time, no dead bodies or corpses be brought into the church, except it be brought straight to the grave, and immediately buried, whereby the people may the rather avoid infection.

Item; That no parsons, vicars, nor curates, permit or suffer any manner of common plays, games, or interludes, to be played, set forth, or declared within their churches or chapels, where the blessed sacrament of the altar is, or any other sacrament, ministered, or divine service said or sung; because they be places constitute and ordained to well-disposed people for godly prayer, and wholesome consolation. And if there be any of your parishioners, or any other person or persons, that will obstinately or violently enforce any such plays, interludes, or games to be declared, set forth, or played in your churches or chapels, contrary to this our forbidding and commandment; that then you, or either of you, in whose churches or chapels any such games, plays, or interludes shall be so used, shall immediately thereupon make relation of the names of the person or persons so obstinately and disobediently using themselves unto me, my chancellor, or other my officers, to the intent that they may be therefore reformed and punished according to the laws.

Item; That all priests shall take this order when they preach: first, they shall not rehearse no sermons made by other men within this two hundred or three hundred years; but when they shall preach, they shall take the gospel or epistle of the day, which they shall recite and declare to the people, plainly, distinctly, and sincerely, from the beginning to the end thereof, and then to desire the people to pray with them for grace, after the usage of the church of England now used: and that done, we will that every preacher shall declare the same gospel or epistle, or both even from the beginning, not after his own mind, but after the mind of some catholic doctor allowed in this church of England, and in nowise to affirm anything but that which he shall be ready always to show in some ancient writer; and in nowise to make rehearsal of any opinion not allowed for the intent to reprove the same, but to leave that for those that are and shall be admitted to preach by the king's majesty, or by me the bishop of London, your ordinary, or by mine authority. In the which epistle and gospel, ye shall note and consider diligently certain godly and devout places which may incense and stir the hearers to obedience of good works and prayers: and in case any notable ceremony used to be observed in the church shall happen that day when any preaching shall be appointed, it shall be meet and convenient that the preacher declare and set forth to the people the true meaning of the same, in such sort that the people may perceive thereby what is meant and signified by such ceremony, and also know how to use and accept it to their own edifying. Furthermore, that no preacher shall rage or rail in his sermon, but coldly, discreetly, and charitably, open, declare, and set forth the excellency of virtue, and to suppress the abomination of sin and vice; every preacher shall, if time and occasion will serve, instruct and teach his audience what prayer is used in the church that day, and for what the church prayeth, specially that day, to the intent that all the people may pray together with one heart for the same; and as occasion will serve, to show and declare to the people what the sacraments signifieth, what strength and efficacy they be of, how every man should use them reverently and devoutly at the receiving of them; and to declare wherefore the mass is so highly to be esteemed and honoured, with all the circumstances appertaining to the same. Let every preacher beware that he do not feed his audience with any fable, or other histories, other than he can avouch and justify to be written by some allowed writer. And when he hath done all that he will say and utter for that time, he shall then in few words recite after the pith and effect of his whole sermon, and add thereunto as he shall think good.

Item; That no parson, vicar, curate, or other priest, having cure of souls within my diocese and jurisdiction, shall from henceforth permit, suffer, or admit any manner of person, of whatsoever estate or condition he be, under the degree of a bishop, to preach, or make any sermon or collation openly to the people within their churches, chapels, or elsewhere within their cures, unless he that shall so preach have obtained before special license in that behalf, of our sovereign lord the king, or of me Edmund, bishop of London, your ordinary; and the same license so obtained shall then and there really bring forth in writing under seal, and show the same to the said parson, vicar, curate, or priest, before the beginning of his sermon, as they will avoid the extreme penalties of the laws, statutes, and ordinances provided and established in that behalf, if they presumptuously do or attempt anything to the contrary.

Item; I desire, require, exhort, and command you, and every of you, in the name of God, that ye firmly, faithfully, and diligently, to the uttermost of your powers, do observe, fulfil, and keep all and singular these mine injunctions. And that ye, and every of you, being priests, and having cure, or not cure, as well benefice as not beneficed, within my diocese and jurisdiction, do procure to have a copy of the same injunctions, to the intent ye may the better observe and cause to be observed the contents thereof.

XXVIII.—A Mandate for publishing and using the Prayers in the English Tongue.

Mandatum Domino Episcopo London. direct. pro publicatione Regiarum Injunctionum.

Most reverend father in God, right trusty and right well-beloved, we greet you well, and let you wit, that calling to our remembrance the miserable state of all Christendom, being at this present, besides all other troubles, so plagued with most cruel wars, hatred, and dissensions, as no place of the same almost (being the whole reduced to a very narrow corner) remaineth in good peace, agreement, and concord; the help and remedy whereof far exceeding the power of any man, must be called for of Him who only is able to grant our petitions, and never forsaketh nor repelleth any that firmly believe and faithfully call on him; unto whom also the example of Scripture encourageth us, in all these and other our troubles and necessities, to fly and to cry for aid and succour; being therefore resolved to have continually from henceforth general processions, in all cities, towns, churches, and parishes of this our realm, said and sung, with such reverence and devotion as appertaineth. Forasmuch as heretofore the people, partly for lack of good instruction and calling, and partly for that they understood no part of such prayers or suffrages as were used to be sung and said, have used to come very slackly to the procession, when the same have been commanded heretofore; we have set forth certain godly prayers and suffrages in our native English tongue, which we send you herewith, signifying unto you, that for the special trust and confidence we have of your godly mind, and earnest desire, to the setting forward of the glory of God, and the true worshipping of his most holy name, within that province committed by us unto you, we have sent unto you these suffrages, not to be for a month or two observed, and after slenderly considered, as other our injunctions have, to our no little marvel, been used; but to the intent that as well the same, as other our injunctions, may be earnestly set forth by preaching good exhortations and otherwise to the people, in such sort as they feeling the godly taste thereof, may godly and joyously, with thanks, receive, embrace, and frequent the same, as appertaineth. Wherefore we will and command you, as you will answer unto us for the contrary, not only to cause these prayers and suffrages aforesaid to be published, frequented, and openly used in all towns, churches, villages, and parishes of your own diocese, but also to signify this our pleasure unto all other bishops of your province, willing and commanding them in our name, and by virtue hereof, to do and execute the same accordingly. Unto whose proceedings, in the execution of this our commandment, we will that you have a special respect, and make report unto us, if any shall not with good dexterity accomplish the same; not failing, as our special trust is in you.

[Regist. Bonner. fol. 100.]

The first; Almighty God, by the power of his word, pronounced by the priest at mass in the consecration, turneth the bread and wine into the natural body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ; so that after the consecration, there remaineth no substance of bread and wine, but only the substance of Christ, God and man.

The second; The said blessed sacrament being once consecrate, is and remaineth still the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ, although it be reserved, and not presently distributed.

The third; The same blessed sacrament being consecrate, is and ought to be worshipped and adored with godly honour wheresoever it is, forasmuch as it is the body of Christ inseparably united to the Deity.

The fourth; The church, by the ministration of the priest, offereth daily at the mass for a sacrifice to Almighty God, the self-same body and blood of our Saviour Christ, under the form of bread and wine, in the remembrance and representation of Christ's death and passion.

The fifth; The same body and blood which is offered in the mass, is the very propitiation and satisfaction for the sins of the world; forasmuch as it is the self-same in substance which was offered upon the cross for our redemption; and the oblation and action of the priest is also a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving unto God for his benefits, and not the satisfaction for the sins of the world, for that is only to be attributed to Christ's passion.

The sixth ; The said oblation, or sacrifice, so by the priest offered in the mass, is available and profitable, both for the quick and the dead, although it lieth not in the power of man to limit how much or in what measure the same doth avail.

The seventh ; It is not a thing of necessity that the sacrament of the altar should be ministered unto the people under both kinds, of bread and wine : and it is none abuse that the same be ministered to the people under the one kind ; forasmuch as in every of both the kinds, whole Christ, both body and blood, is contained.

The eighth ; It is no derogation to the virtue of the mass, although the priest do receive the sacrament alone, and none other receive it with him.

The ninth ; The mass used in this realm of England is agreeable to the institution of Christ ; and we have in this church of England the very true sacrament, which is the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ, under the form of bread and wine.

The tenth ; The church of Christ hath, doth, and may lawfully order some priests to be ministers of the sacraments, although the same do not preach, nor be not admitted thereunto.

The eleventh ; Priests being once dedicated unto God by the order of priesthood, and all such men and women as have advisedly made vows unto God of chastity or widowhood, may not lawfully marry, after their said orders received, or vows made.

The twelfth ; Secret auricular confession is expedient and necessary to be retained, continued, and frequented in the church of Christ.

The thirteenth ; The prescience and predestination of Almighty God, although in itself it be infallible, induceth no necessity to the action of man, but that he may freely use the power of his own will or choice, the said prescience or predestination notwithstanding.

I, NICHOLAS SHAXTON, with my heart do believe, and with my mouth do confess all these articles above-written to be true in every part.

XXX.—A Letter written by Lethington the Secretary of Scotland, to Sir William Cecil, the Queen of England's Secretary, touching the title of the Queen of Scots to the Crown of England: by which it appears that King Henry's Will was not signed by him.

[EX MS. D. G. Petyl.]

I CANNOT be ignorant that some do object as to her majesty's foreign birth, and hereby think to make her incapable of the inheritance of England. To that you know for answer what may be said by an English patron of my mistress's cause, although I being a Scot will not affirm the same, that there ariseth amongst you a question, whether the realm of Scotland be forth of the homage and leageance of England ; and therefore you have in sundry proclamations preceding your wars-making, and in sundry books at sundry times, laboured much to prove the homage and fealty of Scotland to England. Your stories also be not void of this intent. What the judgment of the fathers of your law is, and what commonly is thought in this matter, you know better than I, and may have better intelligence than I, the argument being fitter for your assertion than mine.

Another question there is also upon this objection of foreign birth ; that is to say, whether princes inherit-able to the crown, be in case of the crown exempted or concluded as private persons, being strangers born forth of the allegiance of England. You know in this case, as divers others, the state of the crown : the persons inheritable to the crown at the time of their capacity, have divers differences and prerogatives from other persons ; many laws made for other persons take no hold in case of the prince, and they have such privileges as other persons enjoy not : as in cases of attainders and other penal laws : examples, Henry VII. who being a subject, was attained ; and Edward IV. and his father Richard Plantagenet were both attained ; all which notwithstanding their attainders had right to the crown, and two of them attained the same. Amongst may reasons to be showed, both for the differences, and that foreign birth doth not take place in the case of the crown as in common persons, the many experiences before the Conquest and since of your kings do plainly testify. 2. Of purpose I will name unto you, Henry II. Maud the empress's son, and Richard of Bourdeaux, the Black Prince's son, the rather for that neither of the two was the king of England's son, and so not Enfant du Roy, if the word be taken in this strict signification. And for the better proof, that it was always the common law of your realm, that in the case of the crown foreign birth was no bar ; you do remember the words of the Stat. 25 Edward III. where it is said, the law was ever so : whereupon if you can remember it, you and I fell out at a reasoning in my lord of Leicester's chamber, by the occasion of the abridgment of Rastal, wherein I did show you somewhat to this purpose ; also these words, infant and ancestors be in Predicamento ad aliquid, and so correlatives in such sort, as the meaning of the law was not to restrain the understanding of this word infant, so strict as only to the children of the king's body, but to others inheritable in remainder ; and if some sophisters will needs cavil about the precise understanding of infant let them be answered with the scope of this word ancestors in all provisions, for Filii, Nepotes and Liberi, you may see there was no difference betwixt the first degree and these that come after by the civil law. Liberorum appellacione comprehenduntur non solum Filii, verum etiam Nepotes, Pronepotes, Abnepotes, &c. If you examine the reason why foreign birth is excluded, you may see that it was not so needful in princes' cases as in common persons. Moreover, I know that England hath oftentimes married with daughters, and married with the greatest foreign princes of Europe. And so I do also understand, that they all did repute the children of them, and of the daughters of England, inheritable in succession to that crown, notwithstanding the foreign birth of their issue ; and in this case I do appeal to all chronicles, to their contracts of marriages, and to the opinion of all the princes of Christendom. For though England be a noble and puissant country, the respect of the alliance only and the dowry hath not moved the great princes to match so often in marriage, but the possibility of the crown in succession. I cannot be ignorant altogether in this matter, considering that I serve my sovereign in the room that you serve yours. The contract of marriage is extant betwixt the king, my mistress's grandfather, and queen Margaret, daughter to king Henry VII. by whose person the title is devolved on my sovereign ; what her father's meaning was in bestowing of her, the world knoweth by that which is contained in the chronicles written by Polidorus Virgilius, before (as I think) either you or I was born ; at least when it was little thought that this matter should come in question. There is another exception also laid against my sovereign, which seems at the first to be of some weight, grounded upon some statutes made in king Henry VIII.'s time, (viz.) of the 28th and 35th of his reign, whereby full power and authority was given him the said king Henry, to give, dispose, appoint, assign, declare and limit, by his letters patents under his great seal, or else by his last will made in writing, and signed with his hand at his pleasure, from time to time thereafter the imperial crown of that realm, &c. Which imperial crown is by some alleged and constantly affirmed to have been limited and disposed, by the last will and testament of the said king Henry VIII. signed with his hand before his death, unto the children of the lady Francis, and Elenor, daughter to Mary the French queen, younger daughter of Henry VII. and of Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk; so as it is thought the queen, my sovereign, and all others, by course of inheritance, be by these circumstances excluded and fore-closed: so as it does well become all subjects, such as I am, so my liking is, to speak of princes, of their reigns and proceedings, modestly and with respect; yet I cannot abstain to say, that the chronicles and histories of that age, and your own printed statutes, being extant, do contaminate and disgrace greatly the reign of that king in that time. But to come to our purpose, what equity and justice was that to disinheric a race of foreign princes of their possibility and maternal right, by a municipal law or statute made in that, which some would term abrupt time, and say, that that would rule the roast, yea, and to exclude the right heirs from their title, without calling them to answer, or any for them: well, it may be said, that the injury of the time, and the indirect dealing is not to be allowed; but since it is done, it cannot be avoided, unless some circumstances material do annihilate the said limitation and disposition of the crown.

Now let us examine the manner and circumstances how king Henry VIII. was by statute enabled to dispose the crown. There is a form in two sorts prescribed him, which he may not transgress, that is to say, either by his letters patents, sealed with his great seal, or by his last will, signed with his hand: for in this extraordinary case he was held to an ordinary and precise form; which being not observed, the letters patents, or will, cannot work the intent or effect supposed. And to disprove that the will was signed with his own hand: you know that long before his death he never used his own signing with his own hand; and in the time of his sickness, being divers times pressed to put his hand to the will written, he refused to do it. And it seemed God would not suffer him to proceed in an act so injurious and prejudicial to the right heir of the crown, being his niece. Then his death approaching, some as well known to you as to me, caused William Clarke, sometimes servant to Thomas Henneage, to sign the supposed will with a stamp (for otherwise signed it was never); and yet notwithstanding some, respecting more the satisfaction of their ambition, and others their private commodity, than just and upright dealing, procured divers honest gentlemen, attending in divers several rooms about the king's person, to testify with their handwritings the contents of the said pretended will, surmised to be signed with the king's own hand. To prove this dissembled and forged signed testament, I do refer you to such trials as be yet left. First, the attestation of the late lord Paget, published in the parliament in queen Mary's time, for the restitution of the duke of Norfolk. Next, I pray you, on my sovereign's behalf, that the depositions may be taken in this matter of the marquis of Winchester, lord treasurer of England, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Pembroke, sir William Petre, then one of king Henry's secretaries, sir Henry Nevill, sir Maurice Barkley, doctor Buts, Edmond Harman Baker, John Osborn, groom of the chamber, sir Anthony Demmis, if he be living, Terris the churrgion, and such as have heard David Vincent and others speak in this case; and that their attestations may be enrolled in the chancery, and in the arches, In perpetuum rei memoriam.

Thirdly; I do refer you to the original will surmised to be signed with the king's own hand, that thereby it may most clearly and evidently appear, by some differences, how the same was not signed with the king's hand, but stamped as aforesaid: and albeit it is used both as an argument and calumination against my sovereign to some, that the said original hath been embezzed in queen Mary's time, I trust God will and hath reserved the same to be an instrument to relieve the truth, and to confound false surmises, that thereby the right may take place, notwithstanding the many exemplifications and transcripts, which being sealed with the great seal, do run abroad in England, and do carry away many men's minds, as great presumptions of great verity and validity. But, sir, you know in cases of less importance, that the whole realm of England, transcripts and exemplifications be not of so great force in law to serve for the recovery of anything, either real or personal: and inasmuch as my sovereign's title in this case shall be little advanced, by taking exceptions to others' pretended and crased titles, considering her precedency, I will leave it to such as are to claim after the issue of Henry VII., to lay in bar the polygamy of Charles Brandon, the duke of Suffolk, and also the vitiated and clandestine contract (if it may be so called), having no witness nor solemnization of Christian matrimony, nor any lawful matching of the earl of Hertford and the lady Katharine. Lastly; the semblably compelling of Mr. Key and the lady Mary, sister to the lady Katharine.

And now, sir, I have to answer your desire, said somewhat briefly to the matter, which indeed is very little, where so much may be said; for, to speak truly, the cause speaketh for itself. I have so long forborne to deal in this matter, that I have almost forgotten many things which may be said for roboration of her right, which I can shortly reduce to my remembrance, being at Edinburgh, where my notes are; so that if you be not by this satisfied, upon knowledge from you of any other objection I hope to satisfy you unto all things may be said against her. In the meantime I pray you so counsel the queen your sovereign, as some effectual reparation may follow without delay, of the many and sundry traverses and disfavours committed against the queen my sovereign: as the publishing of so many exemplifications of king Henry's supposed will, the secret embracing of John Halle's books, the books printed and not avowed the last summer, one of the which my mistress hath sent by Henry Killigrew to the queen your sovereign; the disputes and proceedings of Lincoln's Inn, where the case was ruled against the queen my sovereign; the speeches of sundry in this last session of parliament, tending all to my sovereign's derision, and nothing said to the contrary by any man, but the matter shut up with silence, most to her prejudice,—and by so much the more as every man is gone home settled and confirmed in his error. And, lastly, the queen your sovereign's resolution to defend now by proclamations all books and writings containing any discussion of titles, when the whole realm hath engendered by these fond proceedings and other favoured practices, a settled opinion against my sovereign's, to the advancement of my lady Katharine's title. I might also speak of another book lately printed and set abroad in this last session, containing many untruths and weak reasons, which Mr. Wailing desired might be answered before the defence were made by proclamation. I trust you will so hold hand to the reformation of all these things, as the queen my sovereign may have effectual occasion to esteem you her friend; which doing, you shall never offend the queen your mistress, your country, nor conscience, but be a favourer of the truth against errors, and yet deserve well of a princess, who hath a good heart to recognize any good turn, when it is done her, and may hereafter have means to do you pleasure. For my particular, as I have always honoured you as my father, so do I still remain of the same mind as one whom in all things not touching the state you may direct, as your son Thomas Cecil, and with my hearty commendations to you and my lady, both, I take my leave. From Striving, the 14th of January 1566.

AN APPENDIX

CONCERNING SOME OF THE ERRORS AND FALSEHOODS IN SANDERS' BOOK OF THE ENGLISH SCHISM.

Those who intend to write romances or plays do commonly take their plot from some true piece of history; in which they fasten such characters to persons and things, and mix such circumstances and secret passages with those public transactions and changes that are in other histories, as may more artificially raise these passions and affections in their readers' minds, which they intend to move, than could possibly be done if the whole story were a mere fiction and contrivance: and though all men know those tender passages to flow only from the invention and fancy of the poet, yet, by I know not what charm, the greatest part that read or hear their poems are softened and sensibly touched.

Some such design Sanders seems to have had in his book, which he very wisely kept up as long as he lived: he intended to represent the Reformation in the foulest shape that was possible, to defame queen Elizabeth, to stain her blood, and thereby to bring her title to the crown in question; and to magnify the authority of the see of Rome, and celebrate monastic orders, with all the praises and high characters he could devise: and therefore after he had writ several books on these subjects, without any considerable success, they being all rather filled with foul calumnies and detracting malice than good arguments or strong sense, he resolved to try his skill another way; so he intended to tell a doleful tale, which should raise a detestation of heresy, an ill opinion of the queen, cast a stain on her blood, and disparage her title, and advance the honour of the papacy. A tragedy was fitter for these ends, since it left the deepest impressions on the graver and better affections of the mind; the scene must be laid in England, and king Henry VIII. and his three children, with the changes that were in their times, seemed to afford very plentiful matter for a man of wit and fancy, who knew where he could dexterously show his art, and had boldness enough to do it without shame, or the reverence due either to crowned heads or to persons that were dead. Yet because he knew not how he could hold up his face to the world after these discoveries were made, which he had reason to expect, this was concealed as long as he lived: and, after he had died for his faith (that is, in rebellion, which I shall show is the faith in his style), this work of his was published. The style is generally clean, and things are told in an easy and pleasant way; only he could not use his art so decently as to restrain that malice which boiled in his breast, and often fermented out too palpably in his pen. The book served many ends well, and so was generally much cried up by men who had been long accustomed to commend anything that was useful to them, without troubling themselves with those impertinent questions, whether they were true or false: yet Rish-ton, and others since that time, took the pencil again in their hands, and, finding there were many touches wanting which would give much life to the whole piece, have so changed it, that it was afterwards reprinted, not only with a large continuation, that was writ by a much more unskilful poet, but with so many and great additions scattered through the whole work, whereby it seemed so changed in the vamping that it looked new.

If any will give themselves the trouble to compare his fable with the history that I have written, and the certain undoubted authorities I bring in confirmation of what I assert, with the slender and (for the most part) no authorities he brings, they will soon be able to discern where the truth lies: but because all people have not the leisure or opportunities for laying things so critically together, I was advised by those whose counsels directed me in this whole work, to sum up, in an appendix, the most considerable falsehoods and mistakes of that book, with the evidences upon which I rejected them. Therefore I have drawn out the following extraction, which consists of errors of two sorts. The one is of these in which there is indeed no malice, yet they show the writer had no true information of our own affairs, but commits many faults which, though they leave not such foul imputations on the author, yet tend very much to disparage and discredit his work. But the others are of an higher guilt, being designed forgeries, to serve partial ends; not only without any authority, but manifestly contrary to truth and to such records as (in spite of all the care they took in queen Mary's time by destroying them, to condemn posterity to ignorance in these matters) are yet reserved, and serve to discover the falsehood of those calumnies in which they have traded so long. I shall pursue these errors in the series in which they are delivered in Sanders' book, according to the impression at Colen 1628, which is that I have. I first set down his errors, and then a short confutation of them, referring the reader for fuller information to the foregoing history.

Page 2.—1. Sanders says; "that when prince Arthur and his princess were bedded, king Henry VII. ordered a grave matron to lie in the bed, that so they might not consummate their marriage."

This is the groundwork of the whole fable; and should have been some way or other proved. But, if we do not take so small a circumstance upon his word, we treat him rudely; and who will write histories if they be bound to say nothing but truth! But little thought our author that there were three depositions upon record, point blank against this; for the duchess of Norfolk, the viscount of Fitzwater, and his lady, deposed they saw them bedded together, and the bed blessed after they two were put in it; besides, that such an extravagant thing was never known done in any place.

Ibid.—2. Sanders says, "Prince Arthur was not then fifteen years of age, and was sick of a lingering disease."

The plot goes on but scurvily, when the next thing that is brought to confirm it is contradicted by records. Prince Arthur was born the 20th of September in the year 1486, and so was fifteen years old and two months past at the 11th of November 1501, in which he was married to the princess, and was then of a lively and good complexion, and did not begin to decay till the Shrovetide following, which was imputed to his excesses in the bed, as the witnesses deposed.

Ibid.—3. He says; "Upon the motion for the marrying of his brother Henry to the princess, it was agreed to by all, that the thing was lawful."

It was perhaps agreed on at Rome, where money and other political arts sway their counsels; but it was not agreed to in England: for which we have no meaner author than Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, who, when examined upon oath, deposed that himself then thought the marriage was not honourable nor well pleasing to God, and that he had thereupon opposed it much, and that the people murmured at it.

Page 3.—4. He says; "There was not one man in any nation under heaven, or in the whole church, that spake against it."

The common style of the Roman church, calling the see of Rome the Catholic church, must be applied to this, to bring off our author; otherwise I know not how to save his reputation. Therefore, by all the nations under heaven, must be understood only the divines at Rome; though when it came to be examined, they could scarce find any who would justify it: all the most famous universities, divines, and canonists condemned it, and Warham's testimony contradicts this plainly, besides the other great authorities that were brought against it, for which see lib. 2. from page 69 to page 78.

Page 4.—5. He says; "The king once said, he would not marry the queen."

Here is a pretty essay of our author's art, who would make us think it was only in a transient discourse, that the king said he would not marry queen Katharine; but this was more maturely done, by a solemn protestation, which he read himself before the bishop of Winchester, that he would never marry her, and that he revoked his consent given under age. This was done when he came to be of age, see page 36: it is also confessed by Sanders himself.

Ibid.—6. He says; "The queen bore him three sons and two daughters."

All the books of that time speak only of two sons, and one daughter; but this is a flourish of his pen, to represent her a fruitful mother.

Page 5.—7. He says; "The king had sometimes two, sometimes three concubines at once."

It does not appear he had ever any but Elizabeth Blunt; and if we judge of his life, by the letters the popes wrote to him, and many printed elegies that were published then, he was a prince of great piety and religion all that while.

Page 6.—8. He says; "The lady Mary was first desired in marriage by James V. of Scotland, then by Charles V. the emperor; and then Francis asked her, first for the Dolphin, then for the duke of Orleans, and last of all for himself."

But all this is wrong placed, for she was first contracted to the Dolphin, then to the emperor, and then treated about to the king of Scotland; after that it was left to Francis his choice, whether she should be married to himself, or his second son the duke of Orleans: so little did our poet know the public transactions of that time.

Ibid.—9. He says; "She was in the end contracted to the Dolphin: from whence he concludes that all foreign princes were satisfied with the lawfulness of the marriage."

She was first of all contracted to the Dolphin. Foreign princes were so little satisfied of the lawfulness of the marriage, that though she being heir to the crown of England, was a match of great advantage; yet their counsellors excepted to it, on that very account, that the marriage was not good. This was done in Spain, and she was rejected, as a writer who lived in that time informs us; and Sanders confesses it was done by the French ambassador.

Page 7.—10. He says; "Wolsey was first bishop of Lincoln, then of Durham, after that of Winchester, and last of all archbishop of York; after that he was made chancellor, then cardinal and legate."

The order of these preferments is quite reversed; for Wolsey soon after he was made bishop of Lincoln, upon cardinal Bembridge his death, was not only promoted to the see of York, but advanced to be a cardinal in the seventh year of the king's reign: and some months after that, he was made lord chancellor; and seven years after that, he got the bishopric of Durham, which six years after he exchanged for Winchester. He had heard perhaps that he enjoyed all these preferments; but knowing nothing of our affairs beyond hearsay, he resolved to make him rise as poets order their heroes, by degrees, and therefore ranks his advancement not according to truth, but in the method he liked best himself.

Page 8.—11. He says; "Wolsey first designed the divorce, and made Longland, that was the king's confessor, second his motion for it."

The king not only denied this in public, saying, that he himself had first moved it to Longland in confession; and that Wolsey had opposed it all he could: but in private discourse with Grinæus told him, he had laboured under these scruples for seven years; septem perpetuis annis trepidatio. Which reckoning from the year 1531, in which Grinæus wrote this to one of his friends, will fall back to the year 1524, long before Wolsey had any provocation to tempt him to it.

Page 9.—12. He says; "In the year 1526, in which the king was first made to doubt of his marriage, he was resolved then whom to marry when he was once divorced."

But by his other story, Ann Boleyn was then but fifteen years old, and went to France at that age, where she stayed a considerable time before she came to the court of England.

Ibid.—13. He says; "The king spent a year in a private search, to see what could be found, either in the Scriptures, or the pope's bull, to be made use of against his marriage; but they could find nothing."

In that time all the bishops of England, except Fisher, declared under their hands and seals, that they thought the marriage unlawful; for which see page 29: and upon what reasons this was grounded, has been clearly opened, page 74.

Ibid.—14. He says; "If there were any ambiguities in the pope's first letters (meaning the bull, for dispensing with the marriage), they were cleared by other letters, which Ferdinand of Spain had afterwards procured."

These other letters (by which he means the breve) bear date the same day with the bull; and so were not procured afterwards. There were indeed violent presumptions of their being forged long after, even after the process had been almost a year in agitation. But though they helped the matter in some lesser particulars; yet in the main business, whether prince Arthur did know his princess, they did it a great prejudice; for whereas the bull bore, that by the queen's petition her former marriage was perhaps consummated, the breve bears that in her petition, the marriage was said to be consummated, without any perhaps.

Ibid.—15. He says; "The king having seen these second letters, both he and his council resolved to move no more in it."

The process was carried on, almost a year, before the breve was heard of: and the forgery of it soon appeared, so they went on notwithstanding it.

Page 16.—He says; "The bishop of Tarby being come from France, to conclude the match for the lady Mary, was set on by the king and the cardinal, to move the exception to the lawfulness of the marriage."

There is no reason to believe this; for that bishop, though afterwards made a cardinal, never published this: which both he ought to have done as a good catholic, and certainly would have done as a true cardinal, when he saw what followed upon it, and perceived that he was trepanned to be the first mover of a thing, which ended so fatally for the interests of Rome.

Page 11.—17. He says; "The bishop of Tarby, in a speech before the king in council, said, that not he alone, but almost all learned men, thought the king's marriage unlawful and null: so that he was freed from the bond of it, and that it was against the rules of the gospel; and that all foreign nations had ever spoken very freely of it, lamenting that the king was drawn into it in his youth."

It is not ordinary for ambassadors to make speeches in king's councils: but if this be true, it agrees ill with what this author delivers in his third page, that there was not a man in the whole church, nor under heaven, that spoke against it, otherwise the bishop of Tarby was both an impudent and a foolish man.

Page 13.—18. He says; "Upon the pope's captivity, Wolsey was sent over to France with 300,000 crowns to procure the pope's liberty."

Hall, Hollingshead, and Stow say, he carried over 240,000 pounds sterling, which is more than thrice that sum.

Ibid.—19. He says; "Two colleagues were sent in this embassy with the cardinal."

His greatness was above that, and none are mentioned in the records.

Ibid.—20. He says; "Orders followed him to Calais, not to move anything about the king's marriage with the French king's sister, the king having then resolved to marry Ann Boleyn."

This agrees ill with what he said, page 9, that a year before the king was resolved whom to marry.

Ibid.—21. He says; "King Henry, that he might have freer access to sir Thomas Boleyn's lady, sent him to France; where after he had stayed two years, his lady was with child of Ann Boleyn by the king."

This story was already confuted, see page 31, 32. And in it there are more than one or two lies.

1. Sir Thomas Boleyn went not ambassador to France till the 7th year of the king's reign: and if two years after that, Ann was born, which was the 9th of his reign, she must then have been but ten years old at this time.

2. Though he had sent him upon his first coming to the crown, this could not be true; for two years after, admit her to be born, that is anno 1511, then a year before this, which was anno 1526, she was fifteen years old; in which age, Sanders says, she was corrupted in her father's house, and sent over to France, where she staid long. But all this is false: for,

3. She was born two years before the king came to the crown, in the year 1507; and if her father was sent to France two years before, it was in the year 1505.

4. The king being then prince, was but fourteen years old, for he was born the 28th of June, in the year 1491: in which age there is no reason to think he was so forward as to be corrupting other men's wives, for they will not allow his brother, when almost two years elder, to have known his own wife.

As for the other pieces of this story, that sir Thomas Boleyn did sue his lady in the spiritual court; that upon the king's sending him word that she was with child by him, he passed it over; that the king had also known her sister, and that she had owned it to the queen, that at the fiftieth year of Ann's age, she had prostituted herself both to her father's butler and chaplain; that then she was sent to France, where she was at first for some time concealed; then brought to court, where she was so notoriously lewd, that she was called an hackney; that she afterwards was kept by the French king; that when she came over into England, sir Thomas Wiat was admitted to base privacies with her, and offered to the king and his council, that he himself should with his own eyes see it: and in fine, that she was ugly, misshaped, and monstrous,—are such an heap of impudent lies, that none but a fool, as well as a knave, would venture on such a recital. And for all this, he cites no other authority but Rastal's Life of Sir Thomas More, a book that was seen by none but himself; and he gives no other evidence that there was any such book but his own authority. Nor is it likely that Rastal ever writ More's Life, since he did not set it out with his works, which he published in one volume, anno 1556. It is true, More's son-in-law, Roper, writ his life, which is since printed, but there is no such story in it. The whole is such a piece of lying, as if he who forged it had resolved to outdo all who had ever gone before him: for can it be so much as imagined, that a king could pursue a design for seven years together, of marrying a woman of so scandalous a life, and so disagreeable a person; and that he who was always in the other extreme of jealousy, did never try out these reports, and would not so much as see what Wiat informed? Nor were these things published in the libels that were printed at that time, either in the emperor's court, or at Rome. All which show that this was a desperate contrivance of malicious traitors, against their sovereign queen Elizabeth, to defame and disgrace her. And this I take to be the true reason, why none made any full answer to this book all her time. It was not thought for the queen's honour to let such stuff be so much considered as to merit an answer. So that the 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th pages are one continued lie.

Page 16.—22. He says; "Sir Thomas Boleyn hearing the king intended to marry his supposed daughter, came over in all haste from France, to put him in mind that she was his own child; and that the king bade him hold his peace for a fool, for a hundred had lien with his wife as well as he, but whosoever daughter she was, she should be his wife: and upon that sir Thomas instructed his daughter how she should hold the king in her toils."

Sir Thomas must have thought the king had an ill memory, if he had forgot such a story: but the one part of this makes him afraid that the king should marry his daughter, and the other part makes him afraid they should miss their hopes in it: not to mention how little likely it is, that a king of such high vanity would have done that which the privatist person has an aversion to; I mean, the marrying the daughter of one whom they know to be a common prostitute.

Page 19.—23. He says; "Wolsey, before his return from France, sent Gambara to the pope, desiring him to name himself vicar of the papacy, during his captivity."

This was not done till almost a year after this: and the motion was sent by Staphileus dean of the Rota, for which see page 37.

Page 20.—24. He says; "None but ill men and ignorant persons wrote against the marriage, but all learned and good men wrote for it."

The whole doctors of the church, in all ages, were against it; and no doctor, ancients than Cajetan, could ever be found to have writ for it.

Ibid.—25. He says; "That though great endeavours were used to persuade sir Tho. More of the unlawfulness of the marriage, all was in vain."

Is it probable that the king would have made him lord chancellor, when he was so earnest in this business, if he had not known that he would have gone along with him in it? By one of his letters to Cromwell out of the Tower, it appears that he approved the divorce, and had great hopes of success in it, as long as it was prosecuted at Rome, and founded on the defects in the bull. And in the 22d year of the king's reign, when the opinions of the universities, and the books of learned men were brought to England against the marriage, he carried them down to the house of commons, and made read them there; after which he desired they would report in their country what they had heard and seen; and then all men would openly perceive that the king had not attempted this matter of his will and pleasure, but only for the discharge of his conscience. More was a man of greater integrity than to have said this, if he had thought the marriage good; so that he has either afterwards changed his mind, or did at this time dissemble too artificially with the king.

Page 22.—26. After a long flourish about the king's secret fears and apprehensions, and the perplexities the cardinal was in, which must pass for a piece of his wit, that is to say, lying, for he knew none of their thoughts; he says, "that Gardiner and sir Francis Brian were sent to the pope together, Gardiner being then secretary of state."

In this there are only three gross mistakes. First, Gardiner was not sent with the first message to the pope; secretary Knight carried it.

2. Sir Francis Brian went never to Rome with Gardiner: it is true, a year after the commencing the suit, sir Francis Brian was sent to Rome, and about a month after him Gardiner was also sent; so though they were both together at Rome, yet they were not sent thither together.

3. Gardiner was not secretary of state, but was Wolsey's secretary, when he went first to Rome, and was made a privy counsellor when he was sent thither the second time; and was not secretary of state till some months after his return from his journey the last time.

Page 23.—27. He says; "They made the pope believe that the queen would willingly retire into a monastery."

This was on the contrary a contrivance of the pope's, who thought it the easiest way to bring the matter to a good issue; but in England they had no hopes of it, and so always diverted the motion when it was proposed by the pope.

Ibid.—28. He says; "The pope said he would consult with some cardinals and divines, and do all that he could lawfully do to give the king satisfaction."

Upon the first motion of it, the pope frankly granted the king's desire, and gave a bull with a commission upon it; and only consulted some cardinals about the methods of doing it. And did assure the king, that he would not only do everything that could be granted in law or justice, but whatsoever he could grant out of the fullness of his power. It is true, afterwards when the pope changed his measures, and resolved to agree with the emperor, he pretended he understood not these things himself, but would needs turn it over upon the cardinals and divines.

Page 24.—29. He says; "All the cardinals were of a mind that the marriage was good."

Cardinal Sanctorem Quatuor, by the force of that mighty argument of 4000 crowns, changed his mind. All the other cardinals were forward in granting the king's desires, for which he wrote them a letter of thanks.

Page 26.—30. He says; "The pope granted the commission to the two legates, not doubting but it was true that had been told him of the queen's readiness to go into a monastery."

The pope knew she would not yield to any such thing; but when he granted that commission, he sent with Campegio a decretal bull annulling the marriage; and sent afterwards a promise never to advocate the process, but to confirm what sentence the legates should give; though soon after he broke his promise most signally. And, since he had often dispensed with others for breaking their faith, he might think that it was hard to deny him the same privilege for himself.

Ibid.—31. He says; "The pope understanding that the queen did not consent to the propositions that were made, and that he had been abused, sent after Campegio, when he was on his journey, that he should not proceed to a sentence without a new order."

The pope sent Campana to England after Campegio, to assure the king he would do everything for him that he could do out of the fullness of his power: and ordered the same person to charge cardinal Campegio to burn the decretal bull which he had sent by him: in all which the pope, as appears by the original letters, was only governed by politic maxims, and considered nothing but the dangers himself was like to fall in; though Sanders would persuade us he was ready to run the hazard of all these.

Page 30.—32. He says; "The king, by his letters to the pope, did, at the same time that he was moving scruples about his own marriage, transact about a dispensation for a marriage betwixt his own natural son the duke of Richmond and his daughter the lady Mary."

Though the whole despatches at that time, both to and from Rome, be most happily preserved, there is not the least mention of any such design: and can anybody think that if any such motion had been made, the pope would not have taken great advantages from it, and that these letters would not have been afterwards published? But this Sanders thought was a pretty embellishment of his fable; and of a piece with this is his next.

Ibid.—33. He says; "The king did under his own hand confess he had known Anne Boleyn's sister Mary, and desired the pope would dispense with his marrying Anne notwithstanding that."

The falsehood of this appears from the recital of it: and how came it that these letters were not published?

Nor is there any mention of this in all the despatches I have seen. And it is not possible that in so many conferences which the English ambassadors had with the pope, these two things should never have been discoursed of. And can it be thought credible that at the same time when the king pretended such scruples and troubles of consciences, he could be guilty of so much folly and impudence as to put himself thus in the pope's mercy by two such demands? This was a forgery of cardinal Pole's, which Sanders greedily caught to dress up the scene.

Page 34.—34. From page 34 to 42 there is a trifling account given of the reasons brought against the marriage, which Sanders answers manfully, and fights courageously against the man of straw he had set up. But if that be compared with what has been opened in the history, it will appear how lame and defective his account is.

Page 42.—35. He says; "Clarke bishop of Bath and Wells, Tonstal bishop of London, and West bishop of Ely, writ for the lawfulness of the king's marriage."

All the bishops, except Fisher, had a year before this given it under their hands and seals that the king's marriage was unlawful: and, in all the memoirs of that time, Fisher is the only bishop I find mentioned to have writ for it. Tonstal was also soon after translated to Durham, which none that have considered that king's temper will think could have been done, if he had interposed in so tender a point, against what the king so vehemently desired.

Ibid.—26. He says; "that Abel, Powel, Fetherston, and Ridley, also writ for the marriage."

This is not likely of the second and third, for they being afterwards attainted of treason, no such books were objected to them; but the crime charged on them was only that they said, the king's marriage with queen Katharine was good.

Page 43.—37. He says; "All things appeared clear in the trial before the legates, in behalf of the marriage, so that they could give no sentence against such full evidence as was brought for it."

This is said without any regard to truth; for all the matter of fact that had been alleged was clearly proved for the contrary side. It was proved that prince Arthur married the queen; violent presumptions appeared of his consummating the marriage: it was also proved that the king was under age when the bull was obtained, and that the petitions given in his name, upon which the bull was granted, were false: that the king had not desired it, but when he came of age he had protested against it: and that there was no hazard of a war between Spain and England, the preventing which was the chief reason set down in the bull that permitted it. So that all that had been informed at Rome, as to matter of fact, was fully proved before the legates, by clear instruments, and many and noble witnesses.

Ibid.—38. He puts a long bold speech in Campegio's mouth, who was far from assuming such freedom; but lived licentiously in England, in all manner of disorders, of which both he and his bastard son were guilty. And, by dissembling and other arts, persuaded the king to delay the process from day to day, giving him full assurances that in conclusion he should obtain what he desired: and by such means he gained time, and drew out the trial, till the pope had ended his treaty with the emperor; and then he served him an Italian trick, by adjourning the court.

Page 48.—39. He says; "Some doctors being corrupted with the king's money, declared for him; but those were none of the most learned."

The king ordered those he sent not to give or promise anything to any person, till they had delivered their opinion freely: upon which some of them wrote to him, that they would answer upon their heads, that they had followed his orders in that particular.

Ibid.—40. He says; "These determinations were published in the names of the universities to deceive the world by a false representation of so great authorities."

Were the public seals of the universities put to their determinations, after a long debate, all being required to deliver their consciences upon oath, and done with the unanimous consent of the whole faculty in some places, false representations? This was done in Italy, in Padua, Bononia, Ferrara, and Milan, under the pope and the emperor's eye, and within their dominions.

Page 50.—41. He says; "Endeavours were used to corrupt the university of Colen and some others in Germany, for which great sums were offered, and that the king was at a vast expense in it."

Crook's accounts show that his expense in Italy was very inconsiderable. And who can imagine that when Paris, Padua, and Bononia had declared for the king, he would be much concerned for Colen or any other university in Germany? Those who will believe Sanders and such authors as he quotes, Cochleus, and an unknown bishop of Brasile, may if they will.

Page 51.—42. He says; "In Oxford the king not being able to obtain a satisfactory answer in that matter, eight students of the university broke into the place where the seal was laid, and put it to an answer, which passed for the determination of the university."

The lord Herbert says, there was an original instrument passed, which he saw; by which the university did appoint a committee of thirty-three doctors and bachelors of divinity to examine the questions proposed by the king, and to set the seal of the university to any answer that they should agree on; and these did afterwards give a resolution against the lawfulness of the marriage.

Page 52.—43. He tells a long story of "the king's endeavours to gain Reginald Pole, and that he came over to England; and being much pressed by his kindred to comply with the king, he went to him, fully purposed to have done it, but could not speak a word to him till he resolved to talk to him in another style; and then he found his tongue and spake very freely to the king, who put his hands sometimes to his poignard intending to have killed him, but was overcome with the simplicity and humility of his discourse, and so the king continued his pension to him, and gave him leave to go back to Padua."

This is another pretty adventure of one of the heroes of the romance, but has this misfortune in it, that it is all without any proof; for as none of the books of that time ever mention it, so neither did Pole himself pretend to have carried so in his book, though written with the most provoking insolence that was possible. In it he mentions his going over to England, but not one word of any such discourse with the king. And king Henry was not a man of such a temper as to permit one of Pole's quality to go out of England, and live among his enemies, and continue his pensions to him, if he had to his face opposed him in a matter he laid so much to heart.

Page 53.—44. He says, "Fisher of Rochester, and Holman bishop of Bristol, wrote for the marriage."

There was no bishopric, nor bishop of Bristol, at that time, nor thirteen years after.

Ibid.—45. "Many are reckoned up who wrote for the marriage in all nations."

These are neither to be compared in number nor authority to those who wrote against it; an hundred books were showed in parliament, written by divines and lawyers beyond sea, besides the determinations of twelve of the most celebrated universities in Europe. The emperor did indeed give so great rewards and such good benefices to those who wrote against the king, that it is a wonder there were not more writers of his side.

Page 56.—46. He says ; "That upon Warham archbishop of Canterbury's death, the earl of Wiltshire told the king that he had a chaplain, who was at his house, that would certainly serve the king in the matter of his divorce ; upon which Cranmer was promoted."

Cranmer was no stranger to the king at this time : he was first recommended by the king to the earl of Wiltshire, to be kept in his house ; but was in Germany when Warham died, and made no haste over, but delayed his journey some months. It is true he was of the mind that the king ought to be divorced ; but this was not out of servile compliance, for when the king pressed him in other things that were against his conscience, he expressed all the courage and constancy of mind which became so great a prelate.

Ibid.—47. He says ; "That Cranmer being to swear the oath of obedience to the pope, before he was consecrated, did protest to a public notary, that he took it against his will, and that he had no mind to keep his faith to the pope, in prejudice to the king's authority."

He did not protest that he did it unwillingly, nor was it only to a notary, but twice at the high altar he repeated the protestation that he made ; which was to this effect, that he intended not thereby to oblige himself to anything, contrary to the law of God, the king's prerogative, or the laws of the land ; nor to be restrained from speaking, advising, or consenting to anything that should concern the reformation of the christian faith, the government of the church of England, and the prerogative of the crown and kingdom.

Page 57.—48. He says ; "Cranmer did in all things so comply with the king's lusts, that the king was wont to say he was the only man that had never contradicted him in anything he had a mind to."

Cranmer was both a good subject and a modest and discreet man, and so would obey and submit as far as he might, without sin ; yet when his conscience charged him to appear against anything that the king pressed him to, as in the matter of the six articles, he did it with much resolution and boldness.

Page 58.—49. He says ; "The king going over to Calais, carried Ann Boleyn secretly with him."

He carried her over in great state, having made her marchioness of Pembroke ; and in the public interview between him and Francis, she appeared with all possible splendour.

Page 59.—50. He says ; "After the king's return from France, he brought the action of premunire against all the clergy."

This is an error of two years, for so long before this voyage to France was that action begun ; and the clergy about eighteen months before had made their submission, and obtained their pardon in March 1531, which appears by the printed statutes, and the king went over to France in September 1532 ; so that it is clear Sanders never looked for any verification of what he wrote.

Ibid.—51. He says ; "The king by an unheard-of tyranny, and a new calumny, brought this charge against the clergy."

These laws upon which the charge was founded, had been oft renewed : they were first made under Edward I., by reason of the papal encroachments that gave the rise to them ; they were oft confirmed by Edward III., Richard II., Henry IV., and Henry V., with the concurrence of their parliaments ; so the charge was neither new nor tyrannical.

Ibid.—52. He says ; "The clergy submitted to the king, being betrayed by their metropolitans, Cranmer and Lee."

The submission was made two years before Cranmer was archbishop, in March 1531, and Cranmer was consecrated in March 1533, but at that time Warham sat in Canterbury ; as for Lee, he opposed it for some time.

Ibid.—53. He says ; "The whole clergy petitioned the king to forgive their crime, according to that supreme power which he had over all the clergy and laity, within his kingdom ; from whence the king's counsellors took occasion afterwards to call him supreme head."

The clergy did in the title of their submission call the king in formal terms, "Supreme Head of the Church and Clergy of England, as far as by the law of Christ is lawful ;" to which Fisher, with the rest of the convocation, subscribed. And all this was done when More was chancellor.

Page 62.—54. He says ; "When the king went to marry Ann Boleyn, he persuaded Rowland Lee, made soon after bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, to officiate in it, assuring him he had obtained a bull for it from Rome, which was then lying in his cabinet. Upon which Lee, giving credit to what he said, did marry them."

This is another trial of Sanders' wit to excuse Lee, who though at this time he complied absolutely with the king, yet did afterwards turn over to the popish party ; therefore to make him look a little clean, this story must be forged. But at that time all the world saw that the pope and the emperor were so linked together, that Lee could not but know that no such thing was possible. And he was so obsequious to the king, that such arts were needless to persuade him to anything the king had a mind to.

Page 67.—55. For five pages he runs out in repetition of all those foul lies concerning Ann Boleyn, by which he designed both to disgrace the Reformers, who were supported by her, and to defame her daughter queen Elizabeth, which have been before confuted. After that he says, "Queen Katharine, with three maids and a small family, retired into the country."

She had both the respect of a princess dowager, and all the jointure contracted to her by prince Arthur ; so she could not be driven to that straitness, but this must go for an ornament in the fable.

Page 71.—56. He says ; "It was concluded that Cranmer might be more free to pass sentence, that there should be an oath imposed on the clergy for paying the same obedience to the king that they had paid the pope ;" upon which he tells a long formal story, for two pages, that "it was resolved to draw Fisher into it, to swear obedience to the king in all ecclesiastical causes, with that exception, 'as far as is lawful, according to the word of God ;' which he did, and persuaded others to do it ; and upon this Cranmer taking the new oath, went and pronounced judgment for divorce."

There is not one tittle of this true, for there was no oath sworn about the king's supremacy at this time. The story of Fisher is that which was done by the convocation two years before Cranmer's preferment ; nor was there any oath taken then, or at this time. It is true, two years after this, Gardiner, Stokesley, and many other bishops, did of their own accord take such an oath ; but there was no law for it till the 28th year of the king's reign.

Page 72.—57. He says ; "One Richard Risey (or Rouse, according to the Records) was hired by Ann Boleyn to poison Fisher."

Rouse was boiled alive for poisoning the bishop's family, but did not discover any that set him on it: which none can think but he would have done, if the queen had hired him to it, and had then deserted him, to perish in so horrid a manner.

Page 73.—58. He says; "Cranmer being by authority of parliament freed from his oath to the pope, and bound by a new one to the king, went now confidently to pronounce sentence."

The parliament did not put down the pope's authority for eight months after this, and appointed no new oath till three years after; for Craumer sat in judgment as primate of England, and legate of the apostolic see.

Ibid.—59. He says; "Cranmer carried some bishops with him, and having cited the queen, without hearing her, he gave sentence against the marriage."

Gardiner, Stokesly, Clark, and Longland, the bishops of Winchester, London, Bath, and Lincoln, went with him. He could not hear the queen, when she would not appear; but he examined all the instruments and evidences that had been brought in the whole process.

Page 75.—60. He says; "The pope would not proceed against the king till he met with the French king at Marseilles; but that the English ambassadors did there carry so insolently, that Francis was ashamed of their behaviour, and desired the pope to proceed against the king as he thought fit, and that he should never defend him more, but should be against him."

Here the romance goes on too grossly, for the pope and the French king agreed at Marseilles to bring this matter to an issue: the pope declared he thought the king's cause was just and right, and promised, if the king would send a full submission to Rome, he would give sentence in his favours: upon which the French king sent over the bishop of Paris, who prevailed with the king to do it; though this afterwards came to nothing. It is true, Bonner, who was always officious and forward when there was anything to be got by it, being sent to Marseilles by the king, to deliver an appeal in the king's name to the pope, to the next general council, and perhaps knowing nothing of the private transactions between the pope and the French king, it being a secret of too great importance to be communicated to such a hot-brained man, did deliver his message to the pope in such provoking language, that the pope talked of throwing him into a boiling cauldron; and he was fain to fly for it.

Page 76.—61. He says; "The pope returning to Italy, after he had again most carefully reviewed the whole cause, gave sentence."

This was so precipitated, that they would not stay six days beyond the time which they prefixed for the return of the messenger that was sent to England; but despatched that, which by the forms of their court should have been done in three consistories, all in one day.

Page 78.—62. He says; "Upon this sentence, the king being enraged, did command queen Katharine to be only called princess, and declared her daughter the lady Mary a bastard."

Both these were done five months before the pope's sentence, and soon after the sentence was pronounced by Cranmer. And these were the natural consequences of it; for the marriage being annulled, neither could she be longer a queen, nor her daughter princess any more.

Ibid.—63. He says; "The king imprisoned F. Forest, a Franciscan Observant, a most holy and learned man, for contradicting Latimer when he was inveighing against the pope's authority."

Concerning this Forest, I have seen an original letter of one List, a friar of the same house, a year after this, that says Forest was a great scandal to their house, and was very ignorant; and that though he had been much against the king in his marriage, yet he had then insinuated himself into his favour, of which many of the house, who were for the king's cause, had great apprehensions. In the same letter he writes how cruel they were against any of their brethren, who they thought discovered anything that was done among them; and that one Rainscroft, a brother, whom they suspected to have informed what passed among them, was cruelly used, and kept in prison till he died; which he chiefly imputes to Forest. This friar swore the king's supremacy, and yet at the same time was persuading others not to do it; and being questioned upon it, said, he took the oath only with his outward, but not with his inward man; and for that, and his denying the gospel, he was burnt as an obstinate heretic.

Page 79.—64. He says; "Abell, Powel, and Fetherston, were put in prison because they consulted with the Maid of Kent."

This is only charged upon the former of these, but the two latter are not accused of any such thing.

Ibid.—65. He says; "Elizabeth being born the 8th of September, but five months after the king had publicly married her mother, could not be the lawful issue of that marriage."

This is a malicious lie, for himself confessed that the king was married to her mother, the 14th of November the former year; between which and the 8th of September, there were ten months; nor was the king ever after that married publicly to the queen; for what he calls a public marriage, was only the showing her openly as queen. But the design of this lie is so visible that it needs not be opened.

Ibid.—66. He says; "The king's daughter Mary, who was then present, could never be induced to think she was the king's child."

In the former page he said Mary was sent to her mother; and now forgetting himself too soon, he says, she was present when Elizabeth was born. What Mary's thoughts were, none can tell; but she publicly acknowledged her to be her sister, though she did not use her as one.

Page 80.—67. He says; "Elizabeth Barton, who was famed for her sanctity, and six with her, who thought she was inspired by the Holy Ghost, were accused in parliament."

Those six knew that she was not inspired; and that all that was given out about her was a contrivance of theirs, who had instructed her to play such tricks, as was proved by their own confessions and other evidences.

Ibid.—68. He says; "They all died very constantly;" and on the margin calls them "seven martyrs."

The nun herself acknowledged the imposture at her death, and laid the heaviest weight of it on the priests that suffered with her, who had taught her the cheat: so that they died both for treason and imposture. And this being Sanders' faith, as appeared by his works, they were indeed martyrs for it.

Ibid.—69. He says; "More and Fisher having examined her, could see no ground to think she was acted by a fanatical spirit, as it was given out."

It was not given out that she was acted by a fanatical spirit, for that had been more honest; but her spirit was cheating and knavery. More cleared himself, and looked on her as a weak woman, and commonly called her the Silly Maid: but Fisher did disown her when the cheat was discovered, though he had given her too much encouragement before.

Page 81.—70. He says; "The thing she prophesied came to pass ; which was, that Mary should be queen of England."

The thing for which she and her complices were attainted of treason was, that she said, if the king married Ann Boleyn, he should not be a king a month longer, and not an hour longer in the sight of God, and should die a villain's death. But it did not serve Sanders' ends to tell this.

Ibid.—71. He says ; " The day she suffered, many of the nobility came and swore to the succession of the issue of the king's marriage with queen Ann, before the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, and Cromwell."

Both houses of parliament did in the house of lords take that oath, on the day of their prorogation, which was the 30th of March, as appears by the second act of the next session : and the nun, with her complices, did not suffer till the 21st of April after.

Ibid.—72. He says ; " The Franciscans of the Observance, chiefly two fathers in London, Elston and Payton, did, both in their sermons and public disputes, justify the king's marriage with queen Katharine."

Elston and Payton were not of London, but of Greenwich. They compared the king to Achab, and said, in the pulpit to his face, the dogs should lick his blood ; with many other such virulent expressions. But to rail at a prince with the most spiteful reproaches that could be, was a part of Sanders' faith : and so no wonder those pass for confessors, when Elizabeth Barton and her complices are reckoned martyrs.

Page 82.—73. He says ; " Tonsal bishop of Durham was ordered by the king's messengers not to come to the session of parliament 26 regni, in which the king's supremacy was established."

In this he is safer than in some other stories, for the journals of that session are lost, so the falsehood of this cannot be demonstrated : yet it is not at all likely, that he who justified all that was done in the former session, in which the pope's power was put down, the nomination of bishops annexed to the crown, a reformation of ecclesiastical laws appointed to be made, in defence of all which he wrote afterwards, was now so scrupulous as to be ordered to stay at home. But Tonsal suffering imprisonment in Edward the Sixth's time, it was fit to use some art to show that he was unwillingly brought to comply with the king.

Ibid.—74. He, to show God's judgments on the chief instruments that served the king, says, that " the duke of Norfolk was by the king condemned to perpetual imprisonment."

This bewrays palpable ignorance, since he was attainted of high treason, the very day before the king's death, and should have suffered the next day, if the king's death had not prevented it. But since he will descant on the providence of God, he should rather have concluded that his escaping so narrowly, was a sign of God's great care of him.

Ibid.—75. In the session of parliament that met the third of November (as he describes it, which was the 26th year of the king's reign) he says, " Mary the king's daughter was illegitimated, and all her honours were transferred on Elizabeth, and the pope's power put down."

This shows he never looked on our public statutes ; otherwise he had seen that these acts passed in the former session.

Page 84.—76. He says ; " When the king sent his ambassadors to the French court, Francis would not so much as hear them give a justification of the king's proceedings."

How true this can be, the world may judge, since these two kings continued in a firm alliance eight years after this. And Francis did often treat, both with him and the princes of Germany, about these things, and was inclined to do almost all that he did.

Ibid.—77. He says ; " The Lutherans did so abominate the grounds of his separation from Rome, that they could never be induced to approve it ;" for which he cites Cochleus, an author of his own kidney.

They did condemn the king's first marriage as unlawful, and thought the pope's dispensation had no force : and so far they approved it. But they had this singular opinion, that he should have continued unmarried as long as queen Katharine lived. Yet in that they were so modest that they only desired to be excused, as to the second marriage : which considering that queen Ann favoured their doctrine, and that by an absolute compliance with what the king had done, they might have secured his protection to themselves, whom otherwise they provoked highly, is an evidence of a strict adhering to what their consciences dictated, that cannot be sufficiently commended.

Page 85.—78. He says ; " The king made many write apologies for what he did ; which some did willingly, being tainted with heresy, others unwillingly, and for fear, as Gardiner and Tonsal."

In this he shows how little judgment he had of the nature of things, when he thinks to excuse their writing for the king, as extorted by force : to have done it through error and mistake, was much the softer excuse ; but to make them men of such prostituted consciences, as not only to subscribe and swear, but to write with learning and zeal, and yet against their consciences, represents them guilty of unexpressible baseness. Indeed Gardiner was a man like enough to write anything that might please the king ; but Tonsal was a man of greater probity than to have done so unworthy a thing upon any account whatsoever. But since he mentioned writers, he should have named Longland bishop of Lincoln, Stokeley bishop of London, and above all Bonner, who did officiously thrust himself into the debate, by writing a preface to Gardiner's book, with the greatest vehemence that could be. But the blood he shed afterwards did so endear him to this author, that all past faults were forgiven and to be clean forgotten.

Page 86.—79. He says ; " Five martyrs suffered because they would not swear the king's supremacy according to the law that was then passed."

There was no such law made at that time, nor could any such oath be then put to them. The only oath which the parliament had enacted, was the oath of the succession, and the refusing it was only misprision of treason, and was not punishable by death. But it was for denying the king's supremacy, and for writing and speaking both against it and his marriage, that they suffered according to law.

Page 87.—80. He says ; " Cromwell threatened the jury, in the king's name, with certain death, if they did not bring them in guilty."

Everybody that knows the law of England, will soon conclude this to be a lie : for no such threatenings were ever made in trials in this nation. Nor was there any need at this time, for the law was so plain, and their facts so clearly proved, that the jury could not refuse to bring them in guilty.

Pages 88, 89.—81. He says ; " The three Carthusians that suffered, were made stand upright and in one place fourteen days together, with irons about their necks, arms, and legs, before they died : " and then with great pomp he describes their death in all its parts, as if it had been a new-devised cruelty, it being the death which the law appoints for traitors. He tells, that Cromwell lamented that others of them had died in their cells, and so prevented his cruelty.

He also adds a long story of the severities against the Franciscans.

All this he drew from his learning in the Legend. The English nation knows none of these cruelties, in which the Spanish inquisitors are very expert. I find, by some original letters, that the Carthusians who were shut up in their cells, lived about a year after this; so if Cromwell had designed to take away their lives, he wanted not opportunities: but it appears from what More writ in his imprisonment, that Cromwell was not a cruel man, but, on the contrary, merciful and gentle. And for the Franciscans, though they had offended the king highly, two of them railing spitefully at him to his face, in his chapel at Greenwich; yet that was passed over with a reproof, from which it appears that he was not easily provoked against them. So all that relation which he gives, being without any authority, must pass for a part of the poem.

Page 91.—82. He says; "The bishop of Rochester was condemned, because he would not acknowledge the king's supremacy in ecclesiastical matters."

He was never pressed to acknowledge it, but was condemned for denying it, and speaking against it: for had he kept his opinion to himself, he could not have been questioned. But the denying the king's titles, of which his being supreme head was one, was by the law treason; so he was tried for speaking against it, and not for his not acknowledging it.

Page 93.—83. He runs out in an high commendation of Fisher, and among other things mentions his "episcopal and apostolical charity."

His charity was burning indeed. He was a merciless persecutor of heretics, so that the rigour of the law, under which he fell, was the same measure that he had measured out to others.

Page 100.—84. Sanders will let the world see how carefully he had read the Legend, and how skilfully he could write after that copy, in a pretty fabulous story concerning More's death; to whom I will deny none of the praises due to his memory, for his great learning and singular probity: nor had he any blemish, but what flowed from the heaven of that cruel religion, which carried him to great severities against those that preached for a reformation. His daughter Roper was a woman of great virtue, and worthy of such a father, who needed none of Sanders' art to represent her well to the world. His story is; "that the morning her father died, she went about distributing all the money she had in alms to the poor: and at last was at her prayers in a church, when of a sudden she remembered that she had forgot to provide a winding-sheet for his body; but having no more money left, and not being well known in that place, she apprehended they would not give her credit: yet she went to a linen-draper's shop, and calling for so much cloth, she put her hand in her pocket, knowing she had nothing in it, but intending to make an excuse, and try if they would trust her. But by a miracle she found the price of the sheet, and neither more nor less was conveyed into her pocket." This is such a lively essay of the man's spirit that invented it, that I leave it without any further commentary.

Page 105.—85. He says; "Lee, that was not in orders, was sent to visit the monasteries, who solicited the chastity of the nuns."

He does not mention Leighton and London, the two chief visitors, for Leighton brought in Lee: but they were of the popish party, and Lee was Cranmer's friend, therefore all must be laid on him. He was in orders, and soon after was made dean of York. I have seen complaints of Dr. London's soliciting the nuns, yet I do not find Lee complained of. But since London was a persecutor of heretics, such a small kindness as the concealing his name, and the turning the blame over on Lee, was not to be stood on among friends, especially by a man of Sanders' ingenuity.

Page 107.—86. For the correspondence between queen Katharine and Father Forest, and the letters that passed; since Sanders tells us not a word how he came by them, we are to look on them as a piece of the romance.

Page 114.—87. He says; "Ann Boleyn bore a monstrous and misshaped lump of flesh, when the time of her bearing another child came."

She bore a dead child before the time, says Hall; but there was no great reproach in that, unless made up by Sanders' wit.

Page 115.—88. He lays out the business of Ann Boleyn with so much spite and malice, that we may easily see against whom he chiefly designed this part of his work. He says; "She was found guilty of adultery and incest."

There was no evidence against her, but only a hearsay from the lady Wingfield: we neither know the credit of that lady, nor of the person who related it in her name. It is true, Mark Smeton did confess his adultery with the queen, but it was generally thought he was drawn into it by some promises that were made to him, and so cheated out of his life; but for the queen, and the other four, they attested their innocency to the last: nor would any of those unfortunate persons redeem their lives at so ignominious a rate, as to charge the queen, whom they declared they knew to be innocent; so that all the evidence against her was an hearsay of a woman that was dead, the confession of a poor musician, and some idle words herself spake of the discourses that had passed between her and some of those gentlemen.

Page 116.—89. He says; "Foreigners did generally rejoice at her fall;" and to prove this, he cites Cochleus's words, that only show that author's ill opinion of her.

The Germans had so great a value of her, that all their correspondence with the king fell to the ground with her: but he may well cite Cochleus, an author of the same honesty with himself, from whose writings we may, with the like security, make a judgment of foreign matters, as we may upon Sanders' testimony believe the account he gives of English affairs.

Page 117.—90. He tells us, among other things done by the king, and picks it out as the only instance he mentions of the king's injunctions, "that the people should be taught in churches the Lord's Prayer, the Ave, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments, in English."

It seems this author thought the giving these elements of religion to the people in the vulgar tongue, a very heinous crime, when this is singled out from all the rest.

Ibid.—91. "That being done," he says, "there was next a book published, called Articles, appointed by the king's majesty, which were the Six Articles."

This shows that he either had no information of English affairs, or was sleeping when he wrote this: for the Six Articles were not published soon after the injunctions, as he makes it, by the same parliament and convocation, but three years after, by another parliament: they were never put in a book, nor published in the king's name; they were enacted in parliament, and are neither more nor less than twenty-five lines in the first impression of that act; so far short come they of a book.

Page 119.—92. He reckons up very defectively the differences between the church of Rome and the doctrine set forth by the king's authority: but in one point he shows his ordinary wit; for, in the sixth particular, he says, "He retained the sacrament of order, but appointed a new form of consecrating of bishops."

This he put in out of malice, that he might annul the ordinations of that time: but the thing is false, for except that the bishops, instead of their oaths of obedience to the pope, which they formerly swore, did now swear to the king, there was no other change made; and that, to be sure, is no part of the form of consecration.

Page 120.—93. He resolved once to speak what he thought was truth, though it be treasonable and impious; and says, "Upon these changes many in Lincolnshire, and the northern parts, did rise for religion and the faith of Christ."

This was indeed the motive by which their seditious priests misled them; yet he is mistaken in the time, for it was not after the Six Articles were published, but almost three years before it. Nor was it for the faith of Christ, which teaches us to be humble, subject, and obedient; but because the king was removing some of the corruptions of that faith, which their false teachers did impiously call the faith of Christ.

Ibid. 94. He says; "The king did promise most faithfully that all these things of which they complained should be amended."

This is so evidently false, that it is plain Sanders resolved dexterously to avoid the speaking of any sort of truth: for the king did fully and formally tell them, he would not be directed nor counselled by them in these points they complained of, and did only offer them an amnesty for what was past.

Page 121.—95. Then he reckons up "thirty-two that died for the defence of the faith."

They were attainted of treason, for being in actual rebellion against the king: and thus it appears that rebellion was the faith in his sense; and himself died for it, or rather in it, having been starved to death in a wood, to which he fled after one of his rebellious attempts on his sovereign, in which he was the pope's nuncio.

Page 122.—96. He says; "The king killed the earl of Kildare, and five of his uncles."

By this strange way of expressing a legal attainder, and the execution of a sentence for manifest treason and rebellion, he would insinuate on the reader a fancy, that one of Bonner's cruel fits had taken the king, and that he had killed those with his own hand. The lord Herbert has fully opened that part of the history from the records that he saw, and shows that a more resolved rebellion could not be than that was of which the earl of Kildare and his uncles were guilty. But because they sent to the pope and emperor for assistance, the earl desiring to hold the kingdom of Ireland of the pope, since the king by his heresy had fallen from his right to it, Sanders must needs have a great kindness for their memory, who thus suffered for his faith.

Ibid.—97. He says; "Queen Jane Seymour being in hard labour of Prince Edward, the king ordered her body to be so opened by surgeons, that she died soon after."

All this is false, for she had a good delivery, as many original letters written by her council (that have been since printed) do show, but she died two days after of a distemper incident to her sex.

Page 124.—98. He sets down some passages of cardinal Pole's heretical constancy; which being proved by no evidence, and not being told by any other writer (whom I ever saw), are to be looked on as the flourishes of the poet to set off his hero.

Page 125.—99. He would persuade the world, that the marquis of Exeter, the lord Montacute, and the rest that suffered at that time, died, because they were believed to dislike the king's wicked proceedings; and that the countess of Sarum was beheld on this single account, that she was the mother of such a son, and was sincerely addicted to the Catholic faith; and that she was condemned because she wrote to her son, and for wearing in her breast the picture of the five wounds of Christ.

The marquis of Exeter pretended he was well satisfied with the king's proceedings, and was lord steward when the lords Darcy and Hussie were tried, and he gave judgment against them. But it being discovered that he and other persons approved of cardinal Pole's proceedings, who endeavoured to engage all Christian princes in a league against the king, pursuant to which they had expressed themselves, on several occasions, resolved, when a fit opportunity offered itself, to rebel; it was no wonder if the king proceeded against them according to law. And for the countess of Sarum, though the legality of that sentence passed against her cannot be defended, yet she had given great offence, not only by her correspondence with her son, but by the bulls she had received from Rome, and by her opposing the king's injunctions, hindering all her tenants to read the New Testament, or any other books set out by the king's order. And for the picture, which was found among her clothes, it having been the standard of the rebellion, and the arms of England being found on the other side of it, there was just ground to suspect an ill design in it.

Page 129.—100. He says; "The images which the king destroyed, were by many wonderful works of God recommended to the devotion of the nation."

All the wonder in these works, was the knavery of some juggling impostors, and the simplicity of a credulous multitude, of which see page 165, which being so openly discovered, nothing that had shame in it could speak of them as our author does.

Page 131.—101. He says; "Six-and-twenty carts drawn with oxen, were loaded with the riches taken from Thomas Becket's shrine;" whom he makes "a most glorious martyr, that died for the defence of the faith, and was honoured by many miracles after his death."

Other writers have sufficiently showed what a perfidious, ingrateful, and turbulent priest he was. All these were virtues in our author's opinion, and ingredients in his faith. But he has in this account of the riches of that shrine gone beyond himself, having, by a figure of speech very familiar to him (called lying), increased two chests (see page 179) to twenty-six cart-loads.

Page 132.—102. He says; "The sentence which P. Paul gave out against the king, was affixed in some towns, both in France, Flanders, and Scotland;" from which he infers, that "both the emperor, the French, and the Scotch king, did consent to that sentence."

In this he designed an eminent piece of service to the apostolic see, to leave on record an evidence that three sovereign princes had acknowledged the Pope's power of deposing kings. But he did ill to name the proofs of his assertion, and had done better to have said simply that it was so, than to have founded it on so ill grounds: as if the affixing papal bulls in a place, were an evidence that the princes in whose dominions it was done consented to it. He might with the same reason have concluded, that queen Elizabeth consented to the sentence against herself; which it is very like will not be easily believed, though the bull was affixed in London. But all those very princes whom he names, continuing to keep up their correspondence with the king, as well after as before this sentence, is a much clearer demonstration that they despised the Pope's sentence.

Page 134.—103. He says; "The king, by his own authority, threw all the begging orders out of their houses."

The falsehood of this has appeared already, for they resigned their houses to the king: and of these resignations, though many were destroyed, yet near an hundred are still extant.

Ibid.—104. He says; "The parliament, in the year 1539, gave the king all the great monasteries."

The parliament passed no such act; all that they did, was only to confirm the grants made, or to be made, by these houses to the king. It was their surrenders that clothed the king with the right to them. All the tragical stories he tells us that followed upon this, are founded on a false foundation.

Page 135.—105. He sets down a form of a resignation, which, he says, "all the abbots, and many religious persons, were made to sign and set their seals to it."

Among all the resignations which are yet extant, there is not one in this form, for which see page 175.

Page 136.—106. He says; "The king's commissioners, who went about getting hands to that form, made them believe, in every house, that all the rest had signed it; and so by that, and other persuasions, prevailed with many to set their hands to it."

If all the subscriptions had been procured about the same time, such arts might be suspected: but in a thing that was three years a-doing, these tricks could not have served their turn.

Ibid.—107. He says; "They told the monks, that though the king might, by virtue of the act of parliament, seize on their houses and rents, yet he desired rather to do it with their good-will."

In this there are two errors: first, most of these houses were resigned to the king before the act of parliament, see page 174; and next, the act of parliament only confirmed their deeds, but did not give their houses to the king.

Page 137.—108. He says; "The abbots of Glastonbury, Colchester, and Reading, suffered martyrdom, because they refused to set their hands to that writing."

There was no such writing ever offered to them; nor was there any law to force them to resign: so they could not suffer on that account, but they were martyrs for Sanders' faith, for they were attainted by a legal trial of high treason.

Page 138.—109. He tells a long story of Whitting abbot of Glastonbury being "brought up to London, to be prevailed with to set his hand to the surrender. Which he still refusing to do, was sent back; and though a book against the king's divorce was found among his papers, which was laid there by those who searched for it; yet that was past over in a chiding: but as he went home, hearing there was a meeting of the county at Wells, he went thither; and as he was going up to his place on the bench, he was called to the bar to answer some things that were to be objected to him: he was amazed at it, and asked what the matter was? but one told him, he needed fear nothing, for somewhat was only to be done for form, to terrify others: upon which he was condemned and sent away to his abbey, little thinking he was so near his end; but when he came near it, a priest was sent to him to take his confession, for they told him he must die immediately; he begged a day or two's respite, but in vain: so they hanged him up in his habit, on the top of the hill near his abbey, and quartered him; and all this was done in one day."

This book came out in foreign parts, and was printed at Rome, in the reign of Sixtus the Fifth, who took great pleasure in such executions, as he describes this to have been, which may fall off out, where the lives of the subjects are wholly at the prince's mercy: but to tell such tales of England, which is so famed over the world for the safety and security the subjects enjoy, and for the regular and legal proceedings in all trials, especially of life and death, was a great error in the poet; for the decorum of the laws and customs of a place must be observed, when any nation is made the scene of a fable. But as nothing like this can be done by the law of England, so there was nothing of it in this case: the jury that sate on him were men of great credit in the country; when he died, he acknowledged his offences, and with appearance of repentance, begged God's pardon, and the king's: see page 176.

Page 145.—110. After many bitter invectives against Cromwell, for which I could never see good evidence, though I cannot disprove them by any convincing arguments; he says, "that he advised the king to make a law, that persons might be convented and condemned in absence, and without being heard: and that this law first of all fell upon himself."

There was no such law ever made, only the parliament by their supreme authority did attaint some in that manner, but no other court might do it. Nor was this first applied to Cromwell, for a year before his attainder, the countess of Sarum, with a great many more, were so attainted, though she did not suffer till a year after him.

Ibid.—111. He tells many reasons why the king had a mind to put away Ann of Cleves: but in this, as in other things, he betrays a profound ignorance of that time; for everybody knew, that the king, from the first time he saw her, disliked her, and that he never consummated the marriage.

This is a subject not fit to be long dwelt on: but if any will compare the account I give of this matter from the Records with Sanders' tale, they will see that he wrote at random, and did not so much as know public transactions.

Page 146.—112. He says; "The king had promised to the emperor, that he would no longer continue in the Smalcaldick league; but Cromwell counterfeited the king's hand, to a new confirmation of it; which coming to the emperor's knowledge, he challenged the king of it: and sent him over a copy of it; upon which the king disowned it, and cast it on Cromwell; and that this was the cause of his fall."

This I believe is one of Sanders' dreams: there is not one word of it in Cromwell's attainder; nor do I find the least shadow of this in some original letters which he wrote to the king for his pardon, in which he answers many of the things laid to his charge. Nor is it likely he would adventure on so bold a thing, with such a king; nor could the emperor have that writing in his power, as long as the king lived: for it is not to be imagined how he could come by it, till he had taken the duke of Saxony prisoner, which was after this king's death.

Page 148.—113. He says; "When Cromwell was put to death, the king proceeded to the divorce of Ann of Cleves."

The divorce was judged by the convocation eight days before Cromwell's death, and confirmed in parliament, which was dissolved before he suffered.

Ibid.—114. He says; "The king sent to her, to tell her, he had a mind to be separated from her; and though he could proceed more severely against her, since he knew she was an heretic; yet for her family's sake, he left it to herself to devise any reason for their divorce: upon which she came next day to the senate (which may be either the king's council, or the parliament), and confessed she had been married to another before she was married to the king; and thereupon, by the authority of parliament, he was divorced, and within eight days married Katharine Howard."

There are but six gross errors in this period. 1. The king sent not any message to her, nor came there any answer from her till the sentence of divorce was quite passed. 2. In the original letter which those he sent to her wrote to him from Richmond, it appears that they used no threatenings to her, but barely told her what was done; to which she acquiesced. 3. She never came from Richmond in all that process, and so made no such declaration in the senate. 4. She did not say that she was married to another, but only that she had been contracted to the prince of Lorraine when she was under age. 5. The parliament did not dissolve the marriage, but only confirmed the sentence of the convocation. 6. The king did not marry Katharine Howard before the 8th of August, and the divorce was judged the 10th of July, a month wanting two days.

Page 149.—115. He says; "The king had consummated the marriage for seven months together."

There were but six months between his marriage and the divorce; and in all that while, as they bedded but seldom, so there were very clear evidences brought, that it was not consummated.

Page 151.—116. He says; "The king sent the bishop of Winchester and Sir Henry Knevet to the diet of the empire; who were ordered to propose to the emperor, that the king might be again reconciled to the see of Rome; to which," he adds, "his conscience did drive him: but since the king would not confess his past crimes, nor do penance for them, nor restore the goods of the church, it came to nothing."

This is another ornament of the fable, to show the poet's wit; but is as void of truth as any passage in Plautus or Terence is. For the king was all his life so intractable in that point, that the popish party had no other way to maintain their interest with him, but to comply, not without affectation in that matter: and when an information was given against Gardiner, for his holding some correspondence with the pope's legate at the diet, he got the man who had innocently discovered it to be put in prison; and said, it was a plot against him to ruin him, which he needed not be so solicitous about, if his instructions from the king had allowed him to enter on such a treaty.

Page 153.—117. He runs out in a long digression, upon the king's assuming the title of King of Ireland; to show that the kings of England only hold Ireland by the pope's donation.

In this Sanders shows his art, he being to carry the standard of rebellion in that kingdom, to blast the king's right to it. He acknowledges the crown of England had the dominion of Ireland, with the title of Lord of Ireland, about 400 years: and certainly if so long a possession does not give a good title, and a prescription against all other pretenders, most of the royal families in Christendom will be to seek for their rights. But he says, it was given by the pope to king Henry II., and yet he confesses that he had conquered some parts of it before that grant was sent him by Hadrian IV. Certainly king Henry II. had as good a right to take it as pope Hadrian had to give it: nor was the king's accepting the pope's donation any prejudice to his title, for things extorted or allowed upon a public error can have no force when that is openly discovered. If then the superstition of those ages made that the pope's donation was a great help to any pretender, it was no wonder that kings made use of it; but it were a wonder indeed if they should acknowledge it, after the trick is known and seen by all.

Page 162.—118. After this, and a satire against queen Elizabeth for assuming the title Defender of the Faith, and a long enumeration of the exactions in the last years of this reign; in which, though there is matter enough for severe complaints, yet many of the particulars he mentions are without any proof, and must rest on the author's credit; which, by this time, the reader will acknowledge is not very great. Another long discourse of some length follows, of the misfortunes of the duke of Norfolk, and of all that served the king in his divorce, and in the following actions of his life; from which he infers, that these were effects of a curse from heaven upon all that he did, and on all those that assisted him: but as the inference is bad, so he forgot to mention those noble families that were raised in his time, and have continued since in great honour,—as the Seymours, from whom the dukes of Somerset are descended; the Paulets, from whom the marquis of Winchester derives; the Russels, Wriotheslies, Herberts, Riches, and Cromwells, from whom the earls of Bedford, Southampton, Pembroke, Essex, and Ardglass have descended; and the Browns, the Petres, the Pagets, the Norths, and the Mountagues, from whom the vice-count Mountague, the barons Petre, Paget, North, and Mountague are descended. These families have now flourished in great wealth and honour an age and a half; and only one of them has, and that but very lately, determined in the male line: but the illustrious female branches of it are intermixed with other noble families. So that the observation is false, and the inference is weak.

Page 164.—119. He says; "When the king found his strength declining, he had again some thoughts of reconciling himself to the church of Rome; which when it was proposed to one of the bishops, he made a flattering answer. But Gardiner moved that a parliament might be called for doing it; and that the king, for the quiet of his own conscience, would vow to do it, of which God would accept in that extremity when more was not possible to be done. But some of his courtiers coming about him, who were very apprehensive of such a reconciliation, lest they should have been made restore the goods of the church, diverted the king from it:" and from this our author infers, that what the king had done was against his conscience, and that so he sinned the sin against the Holy Ghost.

I shall not examine this theological definition of the sin against the Holy Ghost, for my quarrel is not at present with his divinity, but with his history; though it were easy to show that he is alike at both. But for this story, it is a pure dream; for not only there is no evidence for it, nor did Gardiner in the reign of queen Mary ever own any such thing, though it had been then much for the credit of their cause, especially he being often upbraided with his compliances to this king, for which the mention of his repentance had furnished him with a good answer: but, as the tale is told, the fiction appears too plainly, for a parliament was actually sitting during the king's sickness, which was dissolved by his death, and no such proposition was made in it. The king, on the contrary, destroyed the chief hopes of the popish party, which were founded on the duke of Norfolk's greatness, by the attainder which was passed a day before he died. And yet Sanders makes this discourse to have been between the king and Gardiner after his fall, and his son's death, between which and the king's death there were only nine days: but besides all this, Gardiner had lost the king's favour a considerable time before his death.

Page 166.—120. He says; "The king, that he might not seem never to have done any good work in his whole life, as he was dying, founded Christ's Church Hospital in London; which was all the restitution he ever made for the monasteries and churches he had robbed and spoiled."

If it had not already appeared, in many instances, that our author had as little shame as honesty, here is a sufficient proof of it. I will not undertake to justify the king, as if he had done what he ought to have done in his new foundations; but it is the height of impudence to deny things that all England knows. He founded six bishoprics; he endowed deans and prebendaries, with all the other offices belonging to a cathedral, in fourteen several sees:—Canterbury, Winchester, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Rochester, Worcester, and Carlisle,—together with Westminster, Chester, Oxford, Gloucester, Peterborough, and Bristol, where he endowed bishoprics likewise. He founded many grammar-schools, as Burton, Canterbury, Coventry, Worcester, &c. He founded and endowed Trinity College in Cambridge, which is one of the noblest foundations in Christendom. He also founded professors in both universities for Greek, Hebrew, law, physic, and divinity. What censure then deserves our author for saying that the hospital of Christ's Church was all the restitution he ever made of the church lands?

Ibid.—121. He gives a character of the king which suits very well with his history, his malice in it being extravagantly ridiculous. Among other things, he says, "The king promoted always learned bishops, Cranmer only being excepted, whom he advanced to serve his lusts."

Cranmer was a man of greater learning than any that ever sat in that see before him, as appears in everything that he writ: Tonstal was a learned man, and Gardiner was much esteemed for learning; yet if any will compare Cranmer's books of the sacrament with those the other two writ on the same subject, there is so great a difference between the learning and solidity of the one and the other, that no man of common ingenuity can read them but he must confess it.

Page 170.—122. He says; "When the king found himself expiring, he called for a bowl of white wine, and said to one that was near him, 'We have lost all;' and was often heard repeating, 'Monks, monks;' and so he died."

This was to make the fable end as it had gone on, and it is forged without any authority or appearance of truth. The manner of his death was already told, so it needs not be repeated.

Page 172.—123. He says; "The king by his will appointed the crown to go to his righteous heirs after his three children, and commanded his son to be bred a true catholic: but his will was changed, and another was forged, by which the line of Scotland was excluded, and they bred his son an heretic."

There was no such will ever heard of: and in all the debates that were managed in queen Elizabeth's reign about the succession, those that pleaded for the Scottish line never alleged this; which, had it been true, did put an end to the whole controversy. It was indeed said, that the will which was given out as the king's will, was not signed by his hand, nor sealed by his order, but it was never pretended that there was any other will: so this is one of our author's forgeries.

The Conclusion.

Thus I have traced him in this history, and hope I have said much more than was necessary to prove him a writer of no credit, and that his book ought to have no authority, since he was not only a stranger to the public transactions, printed statutes, and the other authentic registers of that time, but was a bold and impudent asserter of the grossest and most malicious lies that ever were contrived. I have not examined all the errors of his chronology, for there is scarce anything told in its right order and due place; nor have I insisted on all the passages he tells, without any proof, or appearance of truth; for as I could only deny these without any other evidence but what was negative, so there are so many of them, that I must have transcribed the greatest part of his book if I had considered them all. I have therefore only singled out these passages, which I had in the former history demonstrated to be false: and these are both so many and so important, that I am sure enough is said to destroy the credit of that author, and of his book, which has too long deceived the world. And what is performed in this first part will, I hope, dispossess the reader of any ill impressions the following parts of that work have made on him concerning the succeeding reigns, of which an account shall be given as soon as it possibly can be made ready.

I shall esteem my time to have been well employed, and my pains rightly placed, if my endeavours have so good an effect as to take off the unjust prejudices which some may have conceived at the changes that were then made in religion; or at the beginnings of them, which being represented by this author, and upon his testimony by many other writers, in such odious characters to the world, are generally so ill looked on.

The work itself was so good, done upon so much reason, managed with such care, directed by such wisdom, and tempered with so great moderation, that those who intended to blast it, did very wisely to load it with some such prejudices: for if without these, the thing itself be examined by men of a candid temper and solid judgment, the opposers of it know well where the truth lies; and on whose side, both the Scriptures and the best ages of the primitive church have declared. But it was not fit to put a question of such importance, on so doubtful and so dangerous an issue: therefore it was well considered by them, that some popular and easily understood calumnies, to disgrace the beginnings of it, and the persons that were most employed in it, were to be fastened on them: and if these could be once generally received, then men might be alienated from it by a shorter way, than could be done by the dull and unsuccessful methods of reason. Therefore as the cause of our church hath been often vindicated, by the learned books that have been published in it; and never with more success, and a clearer victory, than of late, in the elaborate writings (which are never to be mentioned but with honour) of the renowned Dr. Stillington; so I judged it might not be an unuseful and unacceptable work (which though it be of a lower form, and so most suitable to my genius, yet will be of general use) to employ the leisure I enjoy, and the small talent committed to me, in examining and opening the transactions of those times: and if these who read it are dispossessed of their prejudices, and inclined to consider things as they are now set before them, in a truer light, I have gained my end in it.

The truths of religion need no support from the father of lies. A religion made up of falsehoods and impostures must be maintained by means suitable to itself: so Sanders' book might well serve the ends of that church, which has all along raised its greatness by public cheats and forgeries; such as the Donation of Constantine, and the Book of the Decretals; besides the vast number of miracles and visions that were for many ages made use of by them; of which even the most disingenuous of their own writers begin to be now ashamed. But the Reformation of religion was a work of light, and needs none of the arts of darkness to justify it by. A full and distinct narrative of what was then done, will be its apology, as well as its history. There is no need of artifice, but only of industry and sincerity, to gather together all the remains of that time, and put them in good order.

I am now beginning to look towards the next, and indeed the best part of this work: where in the first reign, we shall observe the active endeavours of those restorers of religion. The next reign affords a sadder prospect of that work laid in ruins, and the authors of it in ashes; but the fires that consumed them, did rather spread than extinguish that light which they had kindled. And what is fabled of the Phoenix, will be found true of our church, that she rose new out of these ashes, into which she seemed consumed.

Towards the perfecting this history, I hope all that love the subject of it, will contribute their endeavours, and furnish everything that is in their power, which may make it fuller or clearer: so I end with that desire which I made in the preface, that any who have in their hands any papers relating to these times, will be pleased to communicate them; and whatever assistance they give to it, shall be most thankfully owned and acknowledged.

END OF THE APPENDIX.

ADDENDA.

Number I.—Articles about Religion, set out by the Convocation, and published by the King's Authority. An Original.

[Cott. Libr. Cleop. E. 5.]

HENRY VIII., by the grace of God king of England and of France, defender of the faith, and lord of Ireland, and in earth supreme head of the church of England, to all and singular our most loving, faithful, and obedient subjects, greeting. Amongst other cures committed unto this our princely office, wherunto it hath pleased God of his infinite mercy and goodness to call us, we have always esteemed and thought (as we also yet esteem and think) this to be most chief, most ponderous, and of most weight, that his holy word and commandments may sincerely, without let or hinderance, be of our subjects truly believed and reverently kept and observed; and that unity and concord in opinions, namely in such things as does concern our religion, may increase and go forthward, and all occasion of dissent and discord touching the same be repressed, and utterly extinguished; for the which cause we being of late to our great regret credibly advertised of such diversity in opinions, as have grown and srongen in this our realm, as well concerning certain articles necessary to our salvation, as also touching certain honest and commendable ceremonies, rites, and usages in our said church, for an honest policy, and decent order heretofore of long time used and accustomed; minding to have that unity and agreement established through our said church concerning the premises; and being very desirous to eschew not only the dangers of souls, but also the outward inquietness which by occasion of the said diversity in opinions (if remedy had not been provided) might perchance have ensued, have not only in our own person many times taken great pain, study, labour, and travails, but also have caused our bishops and other, the most discreet and best learned men of our clergy of this our whole realm, to be assembled in our convocation, for the full debatement and quiet determination of the same; where after long and mature deliberation and disputations, had of and upon the premises, finally they have concluded and agreed upon the said matters, as well those which be commanded of God, and are necessary to our salvation, as also the other touching the honest ceremonies, and good and politic order, as is aforesaid; which their determination, debatement, and agreement, forasmuch as we think to have proceeded of a good, right, and true judgment, and to be agreeable to the laws and ordinances of God, and much profitable for the establishment of that charitable concord and unity in our church of England, which we most desire, we have caused the same to be published, willing, requiring, and commanding you to accept, repute, and take them accordingly; most heartily desiring and praying Almighty God, that it may please him so to illumine your hearts that you, and every of you, may have no less desire, zeal, and love to the said unity and concord, in reading, divulging, and following the same, than we have had and have, causing them to be thus devised, set forth, and published. And for because we would the said articles, and every of them, to be taken and understanden of you after such sort, order, and degree as appertaineth accordingly,—we have accused, by the like assent and agreement of our said bishops and other learned men, the said articles to be divided into two sorts, that is to say, such as are commanded expressly by God, and are necessary to our salvation, and such other, as although they be not expressly commanded of God, nor necessary to our salvation, yet being of a long continuance for a decent order and honest policy, prudently instituted, are for that same purpose and end to be observed in like manner; which ye following, after such sort as we have prescribed unto you, shall not only attain that most charitable unity and loving concord, whereof shall ensue your incomparable commodity, profit and lucre, as well spiritual as other; but also ye conforming yourselves, and using these our said articles as is aforesaid, shall not a little encourage us to take further travel, pains and labours for your commodities in all such other matters as in time to come may happen to occur, and as it shall be most to the honour of God and ours, the profit, tranquillity, and quietness of all you our most loving subjects.

The Articles of our Faith.

First, As touching the chief and principal articles of our faith, sith it is thus agreed as hereafter followeth by the whole clergy of this our realm, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people, by us committed to their spiritual charge, that they ought and must most constantly believe and defend all those things to be true, which be comprehended in the whole body and canon of the Bible, and also in the three Creeds or symbols, whereof one was made by the Apostles, and is the common creed which every man useth; and the second was made in the holy council of Nice, and is said daily in the mass; and the third was made by Athanasius, and is comprehended in the psalm Quicumque vult; and that they ought and must take and interpret all the same things according to the self-same sentence and interpretation, which the words of the self-same creeds or symbols do purport, and the holy approved doctors of the church do entreat and defend the same.

Item, That they ought and must repute, hold, and take all the same things for the most holy, most sure, and most certain and infallible words of God, and such as neither ought ne can be altered or couvelled by any contrary opinion or authority.

Item, That they ought and must believe, repute and take all the articles of our faith contained in the said creeds to be so necessary to be believed for man's salvation, that whosoever being taught will not believe them as is aforesaid, or will obstinately affirm the contrary of them, he or they cannot be the very members of Christ and his spouse the church, but be very infidels or heretics, and members of the devil, with whom they shall perpetually be damned.

Item, That they ought and must most reverently and religiously observe and keep the self-same words, according to the very same form and manner of speaking, as the articles of our faith be already conceived and expressed in the said creeds, without altering in any wise or varying from the same.

Item, That they ought and must utterly refuse and condemn all these opinions contrary to the said articles, which were of long time past condemned in the four holy councils, that is to say, in the council of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedonense, and all other sith that time in any point consonant to the same.

The Sacrament of Baptism.

Secondly, As touching the holy sacrament of baptism, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us unto their spiritual charge, that they ought and must of necessity believe certainly all those things, which hath been always by the whole consent of the church approved, received and used in the sacrament of baptism; that is to say, that the sacrament of baptism was instituted and ordained in the New Testament by our Saviour Jesus Christ, as a thing necessary for the attaining of everlasting life, according to the saying of Christ, Nisi quis renatus fuerit ex aqua et Spiritu Sancto, non potest intrare in regnum caelorum.

Item, That it is offered unto all men, as well infants as such as have the use of reason, that by baptism they shall have remission of sins and the grace and favour of God, according to the saying of St. John, Qui crediderit et baptizatus fuerit salvus erit.

Item, That the promise of grace and everlasting life, which promise is adjoined unto the sacrament of baptism, pertaineth not only unto such as have the use of reason, but also to infants, innocents and children; and they ought therefore and must needs be baptised: and that by the sacrament of baptism they do also obtain remission of their sins, the grace and favour of God, and be made thereby the very sons and children of God, insomuch as infants and children dying in their infancy shall undoubtedly be saved thereby, or else not.

Item, That infants must needs be christened because they be born in original sin, which sin must needs be remitted; which cannot be done but by the sacrament of baptism, whereby they receive the Holy Ghost which exerciseth his grace and efficacy in them, and cleanseth and purifeth them from sin by his most secret virtue and operation.

Item, That children or men once baptised, can, ne ought ever to be baptised again.

Item, That they ought to repute and take all the Anabaptists' and the Pelagians' opinions contrary to the premises, and every other man's opinion agreeable unto the said Anabaptists' or the Pelagians' opinions in this behalf, for detestable heresies, and utterly to be condemned.

Item, That men or children having the use of reason, and willing and desiring to be baptised, shall by the virtue of that holy sacrament obtain the grace and remission of all their sins, if they shall come thereunto perfectly and truly repentant and contrite of all their sins before committed, and also perfectly and constantly confessing and believing all the articles of our faith, according as it was mentioned in the article before, or else not.

And finally, if they shall also have firm credence and trust in the promise of God adjoined to the said sacrament, that is to say, that in and by this said sacrament which they shall receive, God the father giveth unto them for his son Jesus Christ's sake, remission of all their sins, and the grace of the Holy Ghost, whereby they be newly regenerated and made the very children of God, according to the saying of Christ and his apostle St. Peter, Poenitentiam agite et baptizetur unusquisque vestrum in nomine Jesu Christi in remissionem peccatorum, et accipietis donum Spiritus Sancti; and according also to the saying of St. Paul ad Titum 3. non ex operibus justitiae quas, sed secundum suam misericordiam, salvos nos fecit per lavaerum regenerationis et renovationis Spiritus Sancti, quem effudit in nos opulenter per Jesum Christum servatorem nostrum, ut justificati illius gratia haeredes efficiamur juxta spm

The Sacrament of Penance.

Thirdly, Concerning the sacrament of penance, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us unto their spiritual charge, that they ought and must most constantly believe, that that sacrament was instituted of Christ in the New Testament as a thing so necessary for man's salvation, that no man which after his baptism is fallen again and hath committed deadly sin, can without the same be saved or attain everlasting life.

Item, That like as such men which after baptism do fall again into sin, if they do not penance in this life, shall undoubtedly be damned; even so whensoever the same men shall convert themselves from the said naughty life, and do such penance for the same as Christ requireth of them, they shall without doubt attain remission of their sins and shall be saved.

Item, That this sacrament of perfect penance which Christ requireth of such manner of persons, consisteth of three parts, that is to say, contrition, confession, with the amendment of the former life, and a new obedient reconciliation unto the laws and will of God, that is to say, exterior acts in works of charity according as they be commanded of God, which be called in Scripture fructus digni poenitentia.

Furthermore, as touching contrition, which is the first part, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us unto their spiritual charge, that the said contrition consisteth in two special parts, which must always be conjoined together and cannot be dissevered; that is to say, the penitent and contrite man must first knowledge the filthiness and abomination of his own sin, whereunto he is brought by hearing and considering of the will of God declared in his laws, and feeling and perceiving in his own conscience that God is angry and displeased with him for the same; he must also conceive not only great sorrow and inward shame that he hath so grievously offended God, but also great fear of God's displeasure towards him, considering he hath no works or merits of his own which he may worthily lay before God as sufficient satisfaction for his sins; which done, then afterwards with this fear shame and sorrow must needs succeed and be conjoined—the second part, viz. a certain faith, trust and confidence of the mercy and goodness of God, whereby the penitent must conceive certain hope and faith that God will forgive him his sins, and repute him justified and of the number of his elect children, not for the worthiness of any merit or work done by the penitent, but for the only merits of the blood and passion of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

Item, That this certain faith and hope is gotten and also confirmed, and made more strong by the applying of Christ's words and promises of his grace and favour contained in his gospel and the sacraments, instituted by him in the New Testament: and therefore to attain this certain faith, the second part of penance is necessary, that is to say, confession to a priest if it may be had; for the absolution given by the priest was institute of Christ to apply the promises of God's grace and favour to the penitent.

Wherefore as touching confession, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us to their spiritual charge, that they ought and must certainly believe that the words of absolution, pronounced by the priest, be spoken by the authority given to him by Christ in the gospel.

Item, That they ought and must give no less faith and credence to the same words of absolution so pronounced by the ministers of the church, than they would give unto the very words and voice of God himself if he should speak unto us out of heaven, according to the saying of Christ, Quorum remisistis peccata, &c., et qui vos audit me audit.

Item, That in no ways they do condemn this auricular confession which is made unto the ministers of the church, but that they ought to repute the same a very expedient and necessary mean, whereby they may require and ask this absolution at the priest's hands, at such time as they shall find their consciences grieved with mortal sin, and have occasion so to do, to the intent they may thereby attain certain comfort and consolation of their consciences.

As touching the third part of penance, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us to their spiritual charge, that although Christ and his death be the sufficient oblation, sacrifice, satisfaction, and recompense, for the which God the Father forgiveth and remitteth to all sinners not only their sin, but also eternal pain due for the same; yet all men truly penitent, contrite, and confessed, must needs also bring forth the fruits of penance, that is to say, prayer, fasting, almsdeeds, and must make restitution or satisfaction in will and deed to their neighbour, in such things as they have done them wrong and injury in, and also must do all other good works of mercy and charity, and express their obedient will in the executing and fulfilling of God's commandments outwardly, when time, power, and occasion shall be ministered unto them, or else they shall never be saved; for this is the express precept and commandment of God, Agite fructus dignos penitentia; and St. Paul saith, Debitores sumus; and in another place he saith, Castigo corpus meum et in servitutem redigo.

Item, That these precepts and works of charity be necessary works to our salvation; and God necessarily requireth that every penitent man shall perform the same, whensoever time, power, and occasion shall be ministered unto him so to do.

Item, That by penance and such good works of the same, we shall not only obtain everlasting life, but also we shall deserve remission or mitigation of these present pains and afflictions in this world, according to the saying of St. Paul, Si nos ipsi judicaremus, non judicemur a Domino; et Zacharias, Convertimini ad me et ego convertar ad vos; Esaias 58. frange esurienti panem tuum, &c., tunc eris velut hortus irriguus. Hæc sunt inculcanda ecclesiis et ut exerceantur ad bene operandum, et in his ipsis operibus exerceant et confirmet fidem, petentes et expectantes a Deo mitigationem presentium calamitatum.

The Sacrament of the Altar.

Fourthly, As touching the sacrament of the altar, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us unto their spiritual charge, that they ought and must constantly believe, that under the form and figure of bread and wine, which we there presently do see and perceive by our outward senses, is verily, substantially, and really contained and comprehended the very self-same body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ which was born of the Virgin Mary, and suffered upon the cross for our redemption; and that under the same form and figure of bread and wine, the very self-same body and blood of Christ is corporally, really, and in the very substance exhibited, distributed and received of all them which receive the said sacrament; and that therefore the said sacrament is to be used with all due reverence and honour, and that every man ought first to prove and examine himself, and religiously to try and search his own conscience, before he shall receive the same, according to the saying of St. Paul, Quisquis ediderit panem hunc aut biberit de poculo Domini indigne, reus erit corporis et sanguinis Domini; probet autem seipsum homo, et sic de pane illo edat et de poculo illo bibat: nam qui edidit aut bibit indigne, iudicium sibi ipsi manducat et bibit, non dijudicans corpus Domini.

Fifthly, As touching the order and cause of our justification, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us unto their spiritual charge, that this word justification signifieth remission of our sins, and our acceptance or reconciliation into the grace and favour of God, that is to say, our perfect renovation in Christ.

Item, That sinners attain this justification by contrition and faith joined with charity, after such sort and manner as we before mentioned and declared; not as though our contrition, or faith, or any works proceeding thereof, can worthily merit or deserve to attain the said justification; for the only mercy and grace of the Father, promised freely unto us for his Son's sake Jesus Christ, and the merits of his blood and his passion, be the only sufficient and worthy causes thereof; and yet that notwithstanding to the attaining of the said justification, God requireth to be in us not only inward contrition, perfect faith, and charity, certain hope and confidence, with all other spiritual graces and motions, which as we said before must necessarily concur in remission of our sins, that is to say, our justification: but also he requireth and commandeth us, that after we be justified, we must also have good works of charity and obedience towards God, in the observing and fulfilling outwardly of his laws and commandments; for although acceptance to everlasting life be conjoined with justification, yet our good works be necessarily required to the attaining of everlasting life, and we being justified be necessarily bound, and it is our necessary duty to do good works; according to the saying of St. Paul, Debitores sumus non carni ut secundum carnem vivamus, nam si secundum carnem viverimus moriemur, sin autem spiritu facta corporis mortificaverimus, vivemus; ceterum quicumque Spiritu Dei ducuntur hi sunt filii Dei: and Christ saith, Si vis ad vitam ingredi serva mandata: and St. Paul saith, De malis operibus, qui talia agunt regnum Dei non possidebunt: Wherefore we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us unto their spiritual charge, that God necessarily requireth of us to do good works commanded by him, and that not only outward and civil works, but also the inward spiritual motions and graces of the Holy Ghost; that is to say, to dread and fear God, to love God, to have firm confidence and trust in God, to invoke and call upon God, to have patience in all adversities, to hate sin, and to have certain purpose and will not to sin again, and such other like motions and virtues; for Christ saith, Nisi abundaverit justitia vestra plusquam scribarum et pharisaeorum, non intrabitis in regnum caelorum; that is to say, we must not only do outward civil good works, but also we must have these foresaid inward spiritual motions consenting and agreeable to the law of God.

Of Images.

As touching images, truth it is that the same have been used in the Old Testament, and also for the greater abuses of them sometime destroyed and put down, and in the New Testament they have been also allowed, as good authors do declare; wherefore we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us to their spiritual charge, how they ought and may use them. And first, that this may be attributed unto them that they be representers of virtue and good example, and that they also be by occasion the kindlers and firers of men's minds, and make men often remember and lament their sins and offences, especially the images of Christ and Our Lady; and that therefore it is meet that they should stand in the churches, and none otherwise to be esteemed: and to the intent the rude people should not from henceforth take such superstition, as in time past it is thought that the same hath used to do, we will that our bishops and preachers diligently shall teach them, and according to this doctrine reform their abuses; for else there might fortune idolatry to ensue, which God forbid. And as for censuring of them, and kneeling and offering unto them, with other like worshippings, although the same hath entered by devotion and fallen to custom; yet the people ought to be diligently taught, that they in no ways do it, nor think it meet to be done to the same images, but only to be done to God and in his honour, although it be done before the images, whether it be of Christ, of the cross, or of Our Lady, or of any other saint besides.

Of Honouring of Saints.

As touching the honouring of saints, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people, committed by us unto their spiritual charge, that saints now being with Christ in heaven be to be honoured of Christian people in earth; but not with that confidence and honour which are only due unto God, trusting to attain at their hands that which must be had only of God, but that they be thus to be honoured, because they be known the elect persons of Christ, because they be passed in godly life out of this transitory world, because they already do reign in glory with Christ; and most especially to laud and praise Christ in them for their excellent virtues which he planted in them, for example, of and by them to such as are yet in this world to live in virtue and goodness, and also not to fear to die for Christ and his cause as some of them did; and finally, to take them, in that they may, to be the advancers of our prayers and demands unto Christ. By these ways and such like be saints to be honoured and had in reverence, and by none other.

Of Praying to Saints.

As touching praying to saints, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us unto their spiritual charge, that albeit grace, remission of sin, and salvation, cannot be obtained but of God only by the mediation of our Saviour Christ, which is only sufficient mediator for our sins; yet it is very laudable to pray to saints in heaven everlastingly living, whose charity is ever permanent, to be intercessors and to pray for us and with us unto Almighty God after this manner: "All holy angels and saints in heaven pray for us and with us unto the Father, that for his dear Son Jesus Christ's sake, we may have grace of him and remission of our sins, with an earnest purpose, not wanting Ghostly strength, to observe and keep his holy commandments, and never to decline from the same again unto our lives' end." And, in this manner, we may pray to our Blessed Lady, to St. John Baptist, to all and every of the apostles, or any other saint particularly, as our devotion doth serve us; so that it be done without any vain superstition, as to think that any saint is more merciful, or will hear us sooner than Christ; or, that any saint doth serve for one thing more than another, or is patron of the same. And, likewise, we must keep holy-days unto God in memory of him and his saints, upon such days as the church hath ordained their memories to be celebrated; except they be mitigated and moderated by the assent or commandment of the supreme head, to the ordinaries, and then the subjects ought to obey it.

Of Rites and Ceremonies.

As concerning the rites and ceremonies of Christ's church, as to have such vestments in doing God service as be and have been most part used, as sprinkling of holy water to put us in remembrance of our baptism and the blood of Christ sprinkled for our redemption upon the cross; giving of holy bread to put us in remembrance of the sacrament of the altar, that all Christian men be one body mystical of Christ, as the bread is made of many grains and yet but one loaf, and to put us in remembrance of the receiving the holy sacrament and body of Christ, the which we ought to receive in right charity; which in the beginning of Christ's church men did more often receive than they use now-a-days to do; bearing of candles on Candlemas-day in memory of Christ the spiritual light, of whom Simeon did prophesy as is read in the church that day; giving of ashes on Ash-Wednesday, to put in remembrance every Christian man in the beginning of Lent and penance that he is but ashes and earth, and thereto shall return; which is right necessary to be uttered from henceforth in our mother-tongue always on the same day: bearing of palms on Palm-Sunday in memory of receiving of Christ into Jerusalem a little before his death, that we may have the same desire to receive him into our hearts; creeping to the cross and humbling ourselves to Christ on Good-Friday before the cross, and offering there unto Christ before the same, and kissing of it in memory of our redemption by Christ made upon the cross;

setting up the sepulture of Christ, whose body after his death was buried; the hallowing of the font, and other like exorcisms and benedictions by the ministers of Christ's church: and all other like laudable customs, rites, and ceremonies, be not to be contemned and cast away, but to be used and continued as things good and laudable, to put us in remembrance of those spiritual things that they do signify, not suffering them to be forgotten, or to be put in oblivion, but renewing them in our memories from time to time; but none of these ceremonies have power to remit sin, but only to stir and lift up our minds unto God, by whom only our sins be forgiven.

Of Purgatory.

Forasmuch as due order of charity requireth, and the book of Maccabees, and divers ancient doctors, plainly showing, that it is a very good and charitable deed to pray for souls departed, and forasmuch also as such usage hath continued in the church so many years even from the beginning, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us unto their spiritual charge, that no man ought to be grieved with the continuance of the same, and that it standeth with the very due order of charity for a Christian man to pray for souls departed, and to commit them in our prayers to God's mercy; and also to cause others to pray for them in masses, and exequies, and to give alms to others to pray for them, whereby they may be relieved and holpen of some part of their pain: but forasmuch as the place where they be, the name whereof and kind of pains there, also be to us uncertain by Scripture; therefore this with all other things we remit to God Almighty, unto whose mercy it is meet and convenient for us to commend them, trusting that God accepteth our prayers for them, referring the rest wholly to God, to whom is known their estate and condition; wherefore it is much necessary that such abuses be clearly put away, which under the name of purgatory hath been advanced as to make men believe that through the bishop of Rome's pardon souls might clearly be delivered out of purgatory, and all the pains of it, or that masses said at Scala cali, or otherwise, in any place, or before any image, might likewise deliver them from all their pain, and send them straight to heaven, and other like abuses. Some Observations on the former Subscriptions.

(A) The abbots of Glastonbury and Reading subscribe with the rest; by which it appears that they complied in the changes that were made as readily as others did.

(B) The abbots writ generally so ill that it is very hard to read their subscriptions; some of them I could by no means know what to make of.

(C) There are fifty of the lower house of Convocation; of those there are twenty-five archdeacons, four deans of cathedrals, three deans of collegial churches, seventeen procurators for the clergy, and one master of a college.

12.—Item, If such as have deaneries, archdeaconries, chanterships, and other offices or promotions of the clergy, use not themselves in their own persons after such sort as the primary institution of these offices or promotions require, and according to the wills of them that endowed the same, what the king and his parliament may do or ought to do in this case ?

13.—Item, For what causes and to what ends and purposes such offices and promotions of the clergy were first instituted ?

14.—Item, If curates having benefices with cure, for their more bodily ease, refuse to dwell upon any of their said cures, and remain in idleness continually in cathedral or collegial churches, upon their prebends, whether it be in this case expedient, that the king's highness or his parliament take any order for the redress of the same ?

15.—Item, Of the sacraments of confirmation, order, matrimony, and extreme unction, what the external signs and inward graces be in every of the said sacraments, what promises be made to the receivers of them by God, and of what efficacy they be of and energy of themselves ?

III.—Some Queries concerning Confirmation, with the Answers which were given to them by Cranmer, and Stokesley Bishop of London. An Original.

[Written with Cranmer's hand. Cott. Libr. Cleop. E. 5.]

WHETHER Confirmation be instituted by Christ ?

Respon. There is no place in Scripture that declareth this sacrament to be instituted of Christ.

First, For the places alleged for the same be no institutions, but acts and deeds of the apostles.

Secondly, These acts were done by a special gift given to the apostles for the confirmation of God's word at that time.

Thirdly, The said special gift doth not now remain with the successors of the apostles.

What is the external sign ?

The church useth chrism for the exterior sign, but the Scripture maketh no mention thereof.

What is the efficacy of this sacrament ?

The bishop in the name of the church doth invoke the Holy Ghost to give strength and constancy, with other spiritual gifts, unto the person confirmed : so that the efficacy of this sacrament is of such value, as is the prayer of the bishop made in the name of the church.

Hec respondeo, salvo semper eruditorum et Ecclesie orthodoxe iudicio.

Stokesley's Paper.

The first question, Whether the sacrament of confirmation be a sacrament of the New Testament institute by Christ ?

To this I answer, that it is.

The second question, What is the outward sign and the invisible graces which be conferred in the same ?

To this I answer, that the words Signo te signo sancte crucis et confirmo te, &c. with the consignation, with the cream, imposition of hands of the prelates, be the signs : and the increase of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and especially of fortitude, to speak, show, and defend the faith, and to suffer for the same in case need be.

The third question, What promises be made of the said graces ?

I answer, that the facts and deeds that be expressed in the books of the apostles, with the effects ensuing, by the imposition of their hands upon them that before had received remission of their sins, joined with the promises of Christ, made to his church, and the continual belief of the universality of the same Catholic church from the time of the apostles hitherto, without contradiction of any man (ignorance and suspects of heresy only excepted) maketh us, and in my opinion, without prejudice of other men's opinions, ought to suffice to make all men that hath promised to believe the Catholic church, assuredly to think that God hath made the promises of the said grace.

Ego Joannes London. sic respondeo, fructus Autoritate et Testimonio antiquissimorum, eorumque Doctissimorum pariter ac Sanctissimorum virorum, et præcipue sanctæ matris nostræ Ecclesiæ Catholicæ, cui etiam in non expressis in sacra Scriptura, non mollo minus quam scriptis, fides adhibenda est; nisi tam de baptismo parvulorum, quam de perpetua Deiparæ virginis integritate, et id genus compluribus, quibus sine salutis periculo nemo discredit, licebit salva fide contradicere.

IV.—Some Considerations offered to the King by Cranmer, to induce him to proceed to a further Reformation.

[Cett. Libr. Cleop. E. 4.]

PLEASETH it your highness graciously to consider, deeply to ponder and weigh by your high wisdom, these considerations following.

First, How no great thing is to be determined, principally matters of Christ's religion, without long, great, and mature deliberation.

Secondly, How evil it hath succeeded when in provincial, yea or yet in general councils, men have gone about to set forth anything as in the force of God's law, without the manifest word of God, or else without apparent reasons, infallibly deduced out of the word of God.

Thirdly, How all Christened regions are now full of learned men in the Scripture, which can well espy out and judge how things that be or shall be set forth are agreeable with Scripture or not.

Fourthly, Of what audacity men be of now-a-days, which will not spare to write against high princes, as well as against private persons, without any respect to their high estates, only weighing the equity or the iniquity of the cause.

Fifthly, How not only men of the new learning (as they be called), but also the very papistical authors, do allow that by the word of God, priests be not forbidden to marry, although they were not ignorant that many expounders of Scripture were of the contrary judgement.

Sixthly, How that it is not possible that all learned men should be of one mind, sentence, and opinion, as long as the cockle is mingled with the wheat, the godly with the ungodly, which certainly shall be as long as the world endureth.

Seventhly, How variety of opinions have been occasion of the opening of many verities heretofore taken for heresy, yea and yet so esteemed and taken of many, in other regions; as namely the usurped authority of the bishop of Rome hath by that occasion come into light, with the effusion of the blood not of a few, such as were the first stirrers up thereof.

Lastly, There be also other opinions not spoken of, which have made and yet will make as much variance in your grace's realm as any of them treated of, namely, whether the holy Scripture teacheth any purgatory to us after this life or not? whether the same Scripture teacheth the invocation of dead saints? Whether there be any unwritten verities necessary to be believed not written in Scripture, nor deducted by infallible arguments out of the open places of Scripture? Whether there be any satisfactions beside the satisfaction of Christ? Whether free will by its own strength may dispose itself to grace of a conveniency (as it is said) de congruo? Whether it be against Scripture to kiss the image of Christ in the honour of him? And generally whether images may be used any other way than your grace setteth forth in your injunctions?

Wherefore in consideration of the premises it may please your highness to suspend your judgment for a time, and not to determine the marriage of priests to be against Scripture, but rather to put both parts to silence, commanding them neither to preach, dispute, nor openly to talk thereof under pain of, &c. And in case these premises do not move your highness to stay, that then it may please the same to grant that the article of priests' marriage may be openly disputed in both universities, under indifferent judges, before it be determined. All the arguments of the contrary party first to be delivered in writing to the defenders twelve days before the disputation; to the intent they may the more maturely and deliberately make answer to the same; and they that shall enter as defenders into this disputation, to do it under this condition, that if their judges discern them to be overcome, they be right well contented to suffer death, therefore: and if their adversaries cannot prove their purpose, their desire is no more but that it may please your highness to leave your most humble subjects to the liberty that God's word permitteth them in that behalf; and your said humble subjects shall pray unto almighty God for the preservation of your most royal estate long to continue to God's glory and honour.

V.—A Declaration made of the Functions and Divine Institution of Bishops and Priests. An Original.

[Cett. Libr. Cleop. E. 5.]

As touching the sacrament of holy orders, we will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed by us unto their spiritual charge,

First, How that Christ and his apostles did institute and ordain in the New Testament, that beside the civil powers and governance of kings and princes, which is called in Scripture, potestas gladii, the power of the sword, there should be also continually in the church militant, certain other ministers or officers, which should have spiritual power, authority and commission under Christ, to preach and teach the word of God, unto his people, and to dispense and administer the sacraments of God unto them; and by the same to confer and give the grace of the Holy Ghost, to consecrate the blessed body of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, to loose and absolve from sin all persons which be duly penitent and sorry for the same; to bind and excommunicate such as be guilty in manifest crimes and sins, and will not amend their defaults; to order and consecrate others in the same room, order and office, whereunto they be called and admitted themselves; and finally, to feed Christ's people like good pastors, and rectors, as the apostles calleth them, with their wholesome doctrine, and by their continual exhortations and monitions to reduce them from sin and iniquity, so much as in them lieth, and to bring them unto the perfect knowledge, the perfect love and dread of God, and unto the perfect charity of their neighbours.

Item, That this office, this ministration, this power and authority is no tyrannical power, having no certain laws or limits, within the which it ought to be contained, nor yet none absolute power, but it is a moderate power, subject, determined, and restrained unto those certain limits and ends for the which the same was appointed by God's ordinance; which, as was said before, is only to administer and distribute unto the members of Christ's mystical body, spiritual and everlasting things; that is to say, the pure and heavenly doctrine of Christ's Gospel, and the graces conferred in his Sacraments: and therefore this said power and administration is called in some places of Scripture, donum et gratia, a gift and a grace; in some places it is called Claves sive potestas clavium, that is to say, the keys or the power or the keys, whereby is signified a certain limited office restrained unto the execution of a special function or ministration, according to the saying of St. Paul in his first chap. of his Epistle to the Romans, and in the fourth chap. of his First Epistle to Timothy, and also in the fourth chap. of his Epistle to the Ephesians, where he writes in this sentence: Quum ascendisset Christus in altum, captivam duxit captivitatem, et dedit dona hominibus, dedit autem, alios quidem apostolos, alios vero prophetas, alios vero evangelistas, alios autem pastores ac doctores, ad instaurationem sanctorum, in opus administrationis, in edificationem corporis Christi, donec perveniamus omnes in unitatem fidei et agnitionis filii Dei, in virum perfectum, in mensuram ætatis plene adultæ Christi. That is to say, "When Christ ascended into heaven, he subdued and vanquished very captivity herself, and led or made her thrall and captive, and distributed and gave divers heavenly gifts and graces unto men here on earth; and among all he made some the apostles, some priests, some evangelists, some pastors and doctors, to the intent they should execute the work and office of their administration, to the instauration, instruction, and edifying of the members of Christ's mystical body: and that they should also not cease from the execution of their said office, until all the said members were not only reduced and brought unto unity of the faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God, but also that they were come unto a perfect state, and full age therein, that is to say, until they were so established and confirmed in the same that they could no more afterwards be wavering therein, and be led or carried like children into any contrary doctrine, or opinion, by the craft or subtle persuasion of the false pastors and teachers, which go about by craft to bring them into erroneous opinions, but that they should constantly follow the true doctrine of Christ's gospel, growing and increasing continually by charity unto a perfect member of that body, whereof Christ is the very head, in whom if the whole body, that is to say, if every part and member be grown and come unto his perfect estate, not all in like, but every one according to the gift and quality which is deputed unto it, and so to be compacted, united, and corporated together in the said body, no doubt but that whole body and every part thereof shall thereby be made the more perfect and the more strong, by reason of that natural love and charity, which one member so united in the body hath unto the other;" by which words it appeareth evidently not only that St. Paul accounted and numbered this said power and office of the pastors and doctors among the proper and special gifts of the Holy Ghost, but also it appeareth that the same was a limited power and office, ordained specially and only for the causes and purposes before rehearsed.

Item, That this power, office, and administration is necessary to be preserved here in earth for three special and principal causes. First, For that it is the commandment of God it should be so, as it appeareth in sundry places of Scripture. Secondly, For that God hath instituted and ordained none other ordinary mean or instrument, whereby he will make us partakers of the reconciliation which is by Christ, and confer and give the graces of his Holy Spirit unto us, and make us the right inheritors of everlasting life, there to reign with him for ever in glory, but only his words and sacraments; and therefore the office and power to minister the said word and sacraments may in nowise be suffered to perish, or to be abolished, according to the saying of St. Paul, Quomodo credent in cum de quo non audierunt? quomodo autem audient sine prædicante? quomodo autem prædicabunt nisi missi fuerunt? sicut scriptum est, quam speciosus super montes pedes evangelizantium pacem, annunciantium bona! Thirdly, Because the said power and office or function hath annexed unto it assured promises of excellent and inestimable things; for thereby is conferred and given the Holy Ghost with all his graces, and finally our justification and everlasting life, according to the saying of St. Paul, Non me pudet Evangelii Jesu Christi, potentia siquidem est Dei ad salutem omni credenti; that is to say, I am not ashamed of the room and office which I have given unto me by Christ, to preach his Gospel, for it is the power of God, that is to say, the elect organ or instrument ordained by God and endued with such virtue and efficacy, that it is able to give and minister effectually everlasting life unto all those that will believe and obey unto the same.

Item, That this office, this power and authority was committed and given by Christ and his apostles unto certain persons only,—that is to say, unto priests or bishops, whom they did elect, call, and admit thereunto by their prayer and imposition of their hands.

Secondly, We will that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach our people committed unto their spiritual charge, that the sacrament of order may worthily be called a sacrament, because it is a holy rite or ceremony instituted by Christ and his apostles in the New Testament, and doth consist of two parts, like as the other sacraments of the church do,—that is to say, of a spiritual and an invisible grace, and also of an outward and a visible sign. The invisible gift or grace conferred in this sacrament is nothing else but the power, the office, and the authority before mentioned: the visible and outward sign is, the prayer and imposition of the bishop's hands upon the person which receiveth the said gift or grace. And to the intent the church of Christ should never be destituted of such ministers as should have and execute the said power of the keys, it was also ordained and commanded by the apostles, that the same sacrament should be applied and ministered by the bishop from time to time, unto such other persons as had the qualities, which the apostles very diligently describe, as it appeareth evidently in the third chap. of the first Epistle of St. Paul to Tim. and his Epistle unto Titus. And surely this is the whole virtue and efficacy, and the cause also of the institution of this sacrament, as it is found in the New Testament; for albeit the holy fathers of the church which succeeded the apostles, minding to beautify and ornate the church of Christ with all those things which were commendable in the temple of the Jews, did devise not only certain other ceremonies than be before rehearsed, as tonsures, rasures, unctions, and such other observances to be used in the administration of the said sacraments, but did also institute certain inferior orders or degrees, as janitors, lectors, exorcists, acolits, and subdeacons, and deputed to every one of those certain offices to execute in the church, wherein they followed undoubtedly the example and rites used in the Old Testament; yet the truth is, that in the New Testament there is no mention made of any degree or distinctions in orders, but only of deacons or ministers, and of priests or bishops; nor is there any word spoken of any other ceremony used in the conferring of this sacrament, but only of prayer, and the imposition of the bishop's hands.

VI.—A Letter of Melanthon's, to persuade the King to a further Reformation. An Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Cleop. E. 5.]

S. D. SERENISSIME et Inclyte Rex, Etsi audieramus Romanum Episcopum omnibus artificibus incendere Cæsaris Caroli et Regis Gallici animos adversus Britannos et Germanos, tamen quia spero Deum hæc pericula gubernaturum esse, et defensurum tranquillitatem tuam, scripsi in alteris literis de Ecclesiarum emendatione, quam si tempora sinent, rogo ut Regia Majestas tua suscipiat. Postea adjeci hanc Epistolam, non impudentia, sed optimo studio, et amore cum Ecclesiarum, cum Regiæ Majestatis tue incitatus: quare per Christum obtestor Regiam Majestatem tuam ut meam libertatem boni consulat. Sæpe cogito Britannicæ Ecclesiæ primordii, et cæteras laudes: hinc enim propagata est doctrina Christiana in magnam Germaniæ et Galliæ partem; imo Britannicæ Ecclesiæ beneficium fuit, quod primum Romanæ Provinciæ liberatæ sunt persecutione. Hæc primum nobis Imperatorem pium Constantinum dedit: magna hæc gloria est vestri nominis. Nunc quoque Regia Majestas tua, primum heroica magnitudine animi ostendit se veritatis patrocinaturum esse, excussit Romani Episcopi tyrannidem, quare veterem puritatem Ecclesiæ vestræ maxime optarim restitui integram. Sed animadverto istic esse quosdam qui veteres abusus ortos aut confirmatos a Romano Episcopo adhuc mordicus tenent. Mirum est autem Autore abusu ejecto ipsa tamen venena retineri; qua in re illud etiam periculi est, quod illi ipsi aut eorum imitatores aliquando revocaturi potestatem Romani Episcopi videntur, si populum hunc putavit esse Magistrum Ecclesiarum, incurrunt enim ritus in oculos et admonent de autore, ut Solonis memoria cum legibus Athenis et propagata et jucunda fuit.

Gaudebam igitur in Edicto recens istic proposito de Religione, promitti publicam deliberationem et emendationem de Ecclesiarum ritibus et legibus, eaque sententia mitigavit Decreti acerbitatem: quanquam enim laudo pietatem, quod errores prohibentur, qui pugnant cum doctrina Catholicæ Ecclesiæ quam et nos profitemur; tamen doleo ad eas causas adjectum esse articulum, in quo præcipitur omnium rituum usitatorum et cælibatus observatio. Primum enim multi transferent Edicti Autoritatem ad stabiliendos abusus Missæ. Deinde in universum confirmatur pertinacia eorum qui Doctrinæ nostræ sunt iniquiores, et debilitantur studia piorum. Augustinus queritur sua ætate jam duriorem fuisse servitutem Christianam quam Judaicam, quanto erit asperior servitus, si superstitioniosiores ineptiæ, ut reptatio ad crucem aut res similes, munientur corporum supplicii? Gerson scribit prodesse piis, qui tamen superstitioniosius observant ritus, ut invitentur ad eos violandos, ut usu et exemplo dediscant superstitionem.

tudine rituum excitari discordias. Ego de piis et modestis loquor qui humanas traditiones sine tumultibus violant, non de his qui in cætu publico seditiose tranquillum populum aut concitant aut perturbant. Extant autem antea leges de seditiosis, nec statim violatio inepti et non necessarij ritus judicanda est seditiosia, attamen hæc in re non solum tranquillitatis, sed etiam piarum conscientiarum ratio habenda est: est enim tenera res conscientia, facile languescit perculsa potentum judicii.

Nec ignoro quosdam novo jam uti genere sapientiæ, excusant abusus, et leniunt eos astute affictis interpretationibus, ut habeant speciosam causam cur eos retineant; sicut nefarios abusus excusat Autor reformationis Coloniensis, ut campanarum consecrationem et similes imposturas. Quam multa sunt in fabulosis historiis sanctorum, ut Christophori, Georgii, quæ ut poemata continent venustissimas Allegorias; nec tamen propter has cogendæ sunt Ecclesiæ ut illas poeticas personas colant, Erat in Egypto sacrum cum fici maturuissent, populus enim in templo edens recentes ficus, addebant canticum his verbis, Dulcis veritas. Huic ritui facile est bellam significationem addere, eumque accommodare ad laudem Verbi Dei, nec tamen propterea hic mos in Ecclesias revocandus est; atqui hæc novam sophisticam exoriri passim videmus. Sic in Italia dicuntur abusibus patrocinari, Contarenus, Sadoletus, et Iolus Cardinalis; nam hi præcipue susceperunt sibi jam has partes defendendæ Romanæ impietatis, et hæc ducunt esse magnam ingenii laudem fucos illinire vitiosis ritibus, putantque; se his ineptiis Dionysii Theologiam Mysticam renovare. Hæc Sophistica, nisi prudentes gubernatores Ecclesiarum obsident, pariet horribilem confusionem religionum, et rursus obruet veritatem. Donec flagitantur humani ritus tanquam necessarij, confirmatur prava opinio de cultu: ideo Paulus tam vehementer non modo opinionem, sed ritus ipsos Leviticis insectatus est, prævidebat enim non excuti posse superstitionem, si ritus manerent, quare gravissime inquit, si circumcidimini, Christus vobis nihil proderit.

Retineatur ergo simplex et perspicua sententia de libertate in adiphoribus, et doceant concionatores quæ scandala vitanda sint; retineatur ritus divinitus instituti, et aliquæ humane traditiones utiles ad bonum ordinem, ut Paulus loquitur, et sit modus cæremoziarum quæ habeant conjunctam gravitatem et elegantiam; decet autem abesse ab Ecclesiis barbariem: Cæteri inutiles et inepti ritus non duriter flagitentur.

Deinde quantum periculi adfert conscientijs prohibitio conjugii, nec ignorat Regia Majestas tua, legem de cælibatu perpetuo tantum Romæ natam esse: extant Epistolæ Episcopi Tarracoenensis defendentes conjugia Presbyterorum in Hispania contra Romanum Episcopum. In Germania ante annos quingentos adhuc Sacerdotes fuerunt mariti, adeoque ægre tulerunt sibi eripi hanc libertatem, ut in Episcopum Moguntinum recitantem edictum Romanum tumultuantes usitatum fecerint, quare Episcopus fugere coactus recitationem omisit. Erat Autor Edicti Gregorius septimus qui culibet tyrannorum veterum audacia et impietate par fuit. Hic cum longo et funesto bello civili nostros Germanicos imperatores implicuisset, simul etiam Ecclesias Tyrannide oppressit. Audio et in Anglia Sacerdotes fuisse maritos: denique notæ sunt Historiæ, quæ exempla satis multa continent, quare miror in Edicto citari Epistolam ad Corinthios, cum hæc longe aliud tradat de conjugio, ac præcipiat conjugium iis qui non sunt idonei ad cælibatum.

propter Christum, singulos justos fieri: At illi docent alienum opus pro remittendis peccatis alteri, quod quidem merum est somnium et figmentum humanum, repugnans Evangelicæ Doctrinæ; nam tunc demum adplicatur gratia per Verbum et Sacramentorum usum, cum ipsi utimur Sacramentis, sed isti pro aliis utuntur, quod perinde est ac si pro aliis Baptizarentur. Neque vero potest dici quantopere deformet Christi Gloriam opinio illa de Missa, quæ ex opere operato conferat gratiam, aut applicata pro aliis meretur eis remissionem venialium et mortalium peccatorum culpæ et pœnæ; idque aperte adversari Scripturæ, et a vero usu Missæ sive communionis longe discedere, vel inde liquet, quia Missa sive Synaxis ideo est instituta, ut fidelis qui utitur Sacramento recordetur quæ beneficia accipiat per Christum, et erigat ac soletur pavidam conscientiam; ideoque ibi porrigi debet Sacramentum, his quibus opus est consolatione, sicut Ambrosius ait, quia semper pecco, semper deo accipere Medicinam. Atque hic usque ad tempora Gregorii in Ecclesia Missæ usus fuit, neque antea privatæ Missæ cognitæ fuerunt; quod quidem cum multis aliis Patrum Sententiis patet, tum Chrysostomi, qui inquit, Sacerdotem stare ad altare et alios ad Communionem accersere, alios arcere: Et ex veteribus Canonibus constat, unum aliquem celebrasse Missam, a quo reliqui Presbyteri et Diaconi sumpserunt corpus Domini, sic enim inquit Canon Nicenus, Accipiant Diaconi secundum Ordinem post Presbyteros ab Episcopo vel Presbytero, Sacram Communionem. Et scribit Epiphanius, in Asia Synaxim ter celebratam singulis septimanis, nec quotidianas fuisse Missas, eumque morem ab Apostolis traditum esse; qui quidem Missæ usus etiam hodie in Græcis Parochiis durare dicitur, nam tantum singulis dominicis diebus et festis, fit ibi una publica Missa, privatas vero non habent: fuitque Græca Ecclesia hoc nomine longe felicior quam Latina, quæ meliorem usum cœnæ Domini, Synaxis, sive Missæ retinuerit, neque vel Sacramentum Corporis et Sanguinis Domini, contra claram Evangelii Doctrinam divisit, ut paulo ante diximus, neque etiam privatas Missas Sacræ Scripturæ acerrime repugnantes, receperit; cujus quidem rei hanc potentissimam causam fuisse arbitramur, quod Græca Ecclesia Romanum Episcopum auctorem perversæ et Idololatriæ Doctrinæ, et omnium pœnæ abusuum qui in Ecclesiam introducti sunt, pro summo Ecclesiæ Universalis sive Catholicæ capite, nunquam agnovit.

Sed concedunt quidam adplicationes quæ fiunt in Missa pro vivis et mortuis, et item opiniones, quod ex opere operato gratiam mereri traduntur, non esse probandas, et disputant abolitis illis opinionibus impiis, alia ratione Missas privatas retinendas, nempe quia sunt gratiarum actiones, quæ possint ab uno vel a pluribus fieri. Hæc sane ratio videtur aliquam habere speciem, estque σοφὸν φαρμακόν, ut inquit Sophocles, quo in causis invalidis, et ut ipse ait, morbidis utendum sit. Si Missa tantum esset gratiarum actio, possit fortassis tali aliquo prætextu colorari; verum constat eam principaliter institutam esse, ut sit Sacramentum quod per ministrum alteri exhibeatur, ut accipiens et credens consequatur gratiam. Et hoc quidem principali fineposito, accedit alter de gratiarum actione; quare nullo modo ab institutione Christi recedere, sed modum et formam illius Institutionis, et exemplum veteris Ecclesiæ sequi et retinere debemus: Nulla enim novitas, præsertim in Sacramentis, recipienda est, contra formam a Christo traditam, et contra exempla veteris Ecclesiæ.

Porro constat privatas Missas esse recentes, et a Romanis Pontificibus introductas, et ne hodie quidem, ut paulo ante dictum est, in Græcis Ecclesiis esse, nisi Parochiales diebus festis, cum quibus adhuc manet vestigium Communionis: Cum igitur contra Dei Verbum Missa privata introducta sit, eamque humanum tantum et commentitium cultum esse adpareat, quis dubitat quin talis Missa, sine ullo periculo omitti possit, imo debeat, cum repugnet Evangelio? Estque pium et sanctum opus, verum Missæ sive Synaxis usum Ecclesiæ restituere ac reddere, quo per Romanum Pontificem, hoc est Antichristum, multis jam annis miserabiliter privata fuit, qui quidem adhuc mordicus privatas Missas tenet, adserit, et defendit. Neque id immerito, facile enim sentit quod labefactata Missa privata, labefactetur imo ruat Universum ejus Regnum et Tyrannis, quæ Missis illis nititur; ut enim in seminibus causa est Arborum et stirpium, ita hujus luctuosissimi dominatus, imperii, tyrannidis, nundinationis et idololatriæ Pontificiæ semen fuit superstitionis Missarum privatarum: Nam hæc pepererunt et sustinuerunt, veluti Atlas quidam, totum Papatum; ad harum normam omnia redacta sunt, siquidem nihil fuit, quod non Missa aliqua expiari posse creditum est. His aucupatus Pontifex Romanus indulgentias, quibus immensam pecuniam ex toto orbe terrarum prædatas est; hæc Monachorum turbas infinitas coacerarunt, cum eorum nullus alius esset usus, quam demurmurandi Missas privatas, et alioquin inutile terræ pondus forent. Hæc sunt et fuerunt universa pietas, quam Pontifex Romanus proficitur, hanc solam novit ille Religionem, quæ in Missis privatis consistit; Doctrinam enim Evangelii non modo non habet, verum acerrime odit et prosequitur, et in summa his Missam ipsam prædicationem Verbi Divini Pontifex exterminavit, ut per omnia Antichristi munere fungeretur: Nam in loco unius concionis Verbi, amplius mille Missæ privatæ, hoc est, humani et commentitii cultus, contra Divinum Verbum successerunt; cum non Missas fieri sed Evangelium prædicare, et Sacramenta rite distribuere et administrare, Christus Apostolis, quorum illi vult esse successores, mandaverit.

Curarunt igitur Illustrissimi Principes nostri, et alii Evangelii Doctrinam profitentes Principes et Status, privatas Missas penitus aboleri, et verum Missæ usum sive Synaxim Christi institutioni, exemplo Apostolorum, veteris Ecclesiæ ac Patrum sententiis conformem, in Ecclesiam revocant et restituerunt. Quæ quidem Missa sive Synaxis summa cum reverentia celebratur, servatis pene omnibus usitatis Cæremoniis, quæ non repugnant pietati; et addiscentur Germanicæ sive vernaculæ cautiones ad docendum populum, præcepit enim Paulus, in Ecclesia uti lingua intellecta a populo. Porro, quia propter communionem sive usum Sacramenti Missa instituta est, hi qui sunt idonei et antea explorati, sacramento utuntur; ac dignitas et usus Sacramenti, summa diligentia ac cura ex Verbo Dei populo commendatur, ut scient et intelligant homines, quantam consolationem pavidis conscientii adferat, ac discant Deo credere, et optima quæque ab eo expectare et petere.

Et hunc quidem Sacramenti et Missæ usum, Scripturæ consentaneum, Deo gratum, et pietati conducibilem esse, Serenissima Regia Majestas Vestra facile agnoscit; neque enim hic aliquid contra Dei Verbum admittitur, imo secundum Christi mandatam et ordinationem, qui hanc Sacram Communionem ad hunc finem instituit, omnia geruntur: Nulla est hic admixta, prava, aut impia opinio, ut in Missa privata Papiistica, cujus finis et institutio cum Evangelio pugnat. Nihil hic etiam absque summa reverentia, ordine, et decoro, digno Ecclesiæ, fieri cernitur. Audemusque adfirmare, majore Religione hunc verum Missæ usum exhiberi apud nos, quam hactenus unquam sub Papatu privatæ Missæ celebratæ fuerint, provocamusque ad testimonia doctissimorum virorum, qui a Majestate Vestra missi in illis locis fuerunt, et hæc omnia coram fieri viderunt at audierunt.

Quod enim Adversarii clamant, Nostros omnes cultus Divinos, omnes Cæremonias, omnem denique Religionem abolere et labefactare, ea in re Principibus nostris, et aliis Evangelii Doctrinam profitentibus, injuriam faciunt; et hæc eos insigni quadam malevolentia et odio plusquam Vatiniano, ut dici solet, confingere et comminisci clare adparet, cum ex Doctrina nostrorum, quam consentientem Sacris Literis in lucem ediderunt, et Scriptis suis universo, orbi Christiano promulgarunt, tum etiam exemplis nostrarum Ecclesiarum, in quibus nolint velint coguntur fateri, omnia religiosius et sanctius fieri, quam apud ipsos; immo Dei beneficio universus populus, non tantum in templis est religiosior, sed in tota disciplina publica modestius se gerit, majoremque erga Magistratum civilem, et eos qui Ecclesie presunt, reverentiam et honorem exhibet, quam unquam antea factum fuerit: et hoc sinceræ Evangelii Doctrinæ acceptum referre debemus, quæ singulos, rectius omnibus Pontificis constitutionibus, sui officii admonet, et sola in quibus re vera pietas ac cultus divinus consistat, tradit ac docet.

Porro, quod Missæ collocatæ ad quæstum, ut sub Papatu accidit, turpiter prophaneantur, quodque hic abusus in omnibus pene templis latissime pateat, non est obscurum: Nam Christi beneficium qui nos precioso suo sanguine redemit, idque gratuito pro vili stipe et mercede vendere, et tale etiam opus inde constituere velle, quod ex sui natura, hoc est ex opere operato, mereatur gratiam, et possit adplicari pro peccatis aliorum, mortuorum et vivorum, quis non videt summam esse impietatem? Quid enim est corpus Domini indigne tractare et sumere, si hoc non esset? An potest etiam magis impium quidquam dici, quam illi de Missis istis docuerunt? Nempe quod Christus sua passione satisfecerit pro peccatis Originis, et instituerit Missam, in qua fieret Oblatio pro quotidianis delictis mortalibus et venialibus: cum Christus pœnitentiam et remissionem peccatorum prædicari mandaverit; Missam vero, hoc est Synaxim, ad alium plane finem instituerit, viz. ut porrigatur Sacramentum his quibus opus est consolatione, et ut per Verbum et Sacramentum credentes gratiam recipient, et remissionem peccatorum consequantur, non ut ipsi suum opus, quod quale quale sit, humanum figmentum, humanus cultus est, contra Scripturam Deo offerant ac sacrificent. Hoc enim non placat Deum, ut Christus ipse inquit, se frustra coli mandatis hominum: Nam Missam non esse tale opus sive Sacrificium, quod mereatur gratiam et prosit etiam aliis, inde adparet, quia Missa sive Synaxis ad hoc est instituta, non ut Deo aliquid offeratur, sed ut communicantes consolationem hauriant, et veluti pignus seu certum signum gratiæ ac bonæ voluntatis Dei erga se recipient, atque ita recordentur mortis Christi, hoc est, beneficiorum quæ per Christum accipiunt, qui quidem pro nobis mortuus est, solusque pro peccatis nostris satisfecit, idque probant Verba ipsa quibus et Christus et Paulus de Missa sive Synaxi uni sunt.

Primum enim inquit Christus, hoc est Corpus Meum, quod pro vobis traditur. Hæc sunt Verba promissionis Divinæ quæ solam fidem exigunt, quibusque offertur nobis gratia et remissio peccatorum, ergo non est Sacrificium, hoc est, opus quod Deo offeratur et quidem pro abolendis peccatis. Item Paulus ait, Annunciantes mortem Domini: Annunciare autem non est Sacrificare, hoc est tale opus Deo reddere, quo peccata deleantur. Præterea Evangelii textus ita sonat, Fregit et dedit Discipulis, inquit, accipite et comedite, &c. item, bibite ex hoc omnes, &c. accipere autem, comedere, et bibere, non est sacrificare, quia hæc opera ex opere operato non delent peccata.

Neque mandatur hisce verbis, ut nos Deo aliquid offeramus, sed potius ut ab eo accipiamus, quia addit, pro vobis traditum, et sanguis qui pro vobis effunditur; quæ Verba ostendunt, non exhiberi a sumentibus Eucharistiam Deo Sacrificium, sed donum hominibus datum. Præterea vero nemo dicit Laicos cum sumunt Sacramentum, Sacrificare: at quantum ad hanc Sacram Communionem, Missam, sive Synaxim pertinet, nulla est ratio diversitatis, cum idem Christus uno eodemque tempore ac momento, propter eundem finem et usum, hoc Sacramentum absque differentia utentium Sacerdotum vel Laicorum instituerit. Et quemadmodum prohibitio utriusque speciei, humanum tantum commentum et mandatum est; ita quod de Sacrificio Missæ ex opere operato gratiam promerente traditur, humana tantum opinio est, contra Verbum Dei, a quo in rebus maximis, nempe ad remissionem peccatorum, salutem animarum, et vitam æternam pertinentibus, nullo modo est discedendum: Non enim frustra Paulus inquit et bis repetit, Si nos aut Angelus de Cælo Evangelizet vobis præter id quod Evangelizavimus et accepistis, Anathema sit.

Præterea nec potest ratio diversitatis adsignari ex Sacris Literis, cur magis dicant eos qui Sacramento Eucharistiæ fruuntur Sacrificare, quam illos qui alio Sacramento, ut Baptismo, utuntur, cum utrumque nihil aliud sit, quam Sacramenta, quæ Christus horum institutor et auctor prorsus ad alium finem, quam ut sint talia Sacrificia, qualia illi comminiscuntur, ordinavit. Sed oportuit Romanum Pontificem Missas privatas, ad opprimendam Christi, cum ipse hostis est, gloriam attollere, ut populum Christianum a veritate Evangelica et agnitione Christi, et Sacramentorum legitimo usu, prorsus abduceret, Christie bonitatem et misericordiam obliteraret. Qui enim Missam tale Sacrificium esse cogitant, quo Deus placetur, hi non queunt Christi beneficium expendere pro dignitate, et in terroribus ac doloribus iræ et iudicii Dei non habebunt refugium, neque bona conscientia poterunt dona et signa amoris divina agnoscere, si alieno opere Deum placari et peccata remitti sibi persuasum habeant: Nam illi ipsi qui nituntur impias opiniones de Missa privata excusare, hoc prætextu, quasi Missa ideo vocetur Sacrificium, quia sit gratiarum actio et sacrificium laudis, hi convincuntur propriis ipsorum testimoniis et Scriptis quæ de Missis extant, hæque persuasiones hominum animis etiam hodie de Missis privatis inhærent: sic enim Thomas inquit in Opusculo de Sacramento Altaris, cur Missa instituta sit? Corpus Domini semel oblatum est in cruce, pro debito originali, sic offeratur jugiter pro quotidianis delictis in Altari, ut habeat in hoc Ecclesia munus ad placandum sibi Deum, super omnia legis Sacrificia preciosum et acceptum.

Alexander Papa, nihil in Sacrificiis Ecclesiæ majus esse potest, quam Corpus et Sanguis Christi, nec ulla oblatio hac potior est, sed omnes præcellit: item ipsa veritas nos instruit, Calicem ac Panem in Sacramento offerre, quando ait, Accipite et comedite, nam crimina atque peccata, oblatiis his Domino Sacrificiis, delentur. Et rursus inquit, talibus hostiis delectabitur et placabitur Deus, et peccata demittet ingentia. Gabriel de Canon. Missæ, Sacramentum Eucharistiæ veluti Sacrificium summo patri oblatum, nedum veniale sed etiam mortale, non dico sumentium sed omnium eorum pro quibus offertur, et quantum ad reatum culpæ et pœnæ, plus vel minus secundum dispositionem eorum pro quibus offertur, tollit: unde Thomas in Quarto Dist. i. 2. q. 2. Eucharistia in quantum est Sacrificium, habet effectum etiam in aliis pro quibus offertur, in quibus non præ-exigit vitam spirituales in actu, sed in potentia, et ideo si eos dispositos inveniat, eis gratiam obtinet, virtute illius veri Sacrificii a quo omnis gratia in nos fluxit, et per consequens peccata mortalia in eis delet, non sicut causa proxima, sed in quantum gratiam contritionis eis impetrat.

His et similibus omnes libri Scolasticorum pleni sunt, quibus uno ore docent, Missam tale esse Sacrificium, quo gratiam homines mereantur ex opere operato, quod ad delenda aliorum peccata adplicari possit. Quæ Doctrina aut potius perversum et impium figmentum, an pugnet cum Sacris Literis necne? An verum Missæ seu communionis usum tradat necne? An Christi beneficium non magis obscuret quam illustret, imo etiam prorsus tollat? Vestræ Serenissimæ Regiæ Majestati diducandum relinquimus, quæ pro sua sapientia, et non tantum in rebus politicis, sed etiam Sacris et in omni genere doctrinarum acerrimo iudicio, facile censebit, iustissimam causam habuisse Principes nostros et alios Evangelii Doctrinam profitentes, Missas privatas abrogandi, et verum Missæ sive Communionis usum, pro Christi gloria et consolatione totius Ecclesiæ Christianæ, restituendi et revocandi, postquam ex Dei Verbo cognoverunt, quantum private Missæ a veritate Evangelicæ distent, quantumq; in iis insit impietatis et idolatriæ: fuit enim unicum Sacrificium propitiatorium in mundo, viz. Mors Christi, qui, ut Paulus inquit, semel est pro nobis oblatus, et factus hostia pro peccatis nostris, quod cætera legis Sacrificia propitiatoria significarunt, quæ similitudine quadam, erant satisfactiones redimentes iustitiam legis, ne ex politia excluderentur illi qui peccaverant, caq; cessaverunt post Revelatum Evangelium: in Novo Testamento, necesse est cultum tantum esse Spiritualem, hoc est, iustitiam fidei et fructus fidei, quia adfert iustitiam et vitam spiritualem et æternam, juxta, Dabo legem meam in cordibus eorum; et Christus ait, Veri adoratores adorabunt Patrem in spiritu et veritate, id est, vero cordis affectu, qua de causa abrogati sunt Levitici cultus, quod debeant succedere cultus Spirituales mentis, et horum fructus ad signa, ut in Epistola ad Hebræos manifeste docetur.

Ex quibus omnibus sequitur Missam non esse Sacrificium, quod ex opere operato mereatur, faciente vel alii remissionem peccatorum, ut illi docuerunt. Et quocunq; quidam fuco nitantur excusare Missas privatas, semper eis refragat et reclamat Doctrina ipsorū de Missa, qua eam aliis posse adplicari tradiderunt, et peccata delere hominibus persuaserunt. Hæc opinio nisi restituito vero Missæ usu, nunquam ex animis hominum delbitur, sed perpetuo manet et redit is error, quod oporteat talem esse cultum in Ecclesia, quo Deus placetur.

Et ut videatur fictione juris: ut Jureconsulti loquuntur, Missam posse vocari sacrificium memoriale sive laudis: at cum id non sit satisfactorium pro facientibus, vel adplicabile pro aliis, quo quis mereatur remissionem peccatorum, quorsum atinebit, relicto vero ejus usu et institutione, id in Ecclesiis introducere, ubi propter nullam humanam rationem, commentum, aut opinionem, a Christi mandato et ordinatione est descendendum? Eadem enim ratione; Natalis Domini et similia festa, quæ in Christi memoriam celebrantur, sacrificia memorialia sive Eucharistica dici possent; imo talia Sacrificia verius sunt, Evangelii prædicatio, fides, invocatio, gratiarum actio, adflictiones, aut applicationes pro aliis; et Missæ principalis finis, ut supra disseruimus, is est, ut sit Sacramentum, quod per ministrum alteri exhibeatur, quare non potest dici Sacrificium; cum nemo ignoret magnum inter Sacrificia et Sacramenta discrimen esse, his enim nos dona a Deo oblata accipimus, illis vero nostrum Deo reddimus et offerimus.

nunc illam cæremoniam, cantionem, aut orationem, singuli pro sua sanctitate et opinione adjecerunt, ut historiæ uno consensu testantur, donec eandem, egregium illud opus, dignum istis auctoribus exædificarunt, et relicto vero Missæ sive Communionis usu, ac oblitterata doctrina de Christo, Universa Ecclesia Missis privatis in qua sola omnem poenæ sanctitatem posuerunt, repleta et obruta fuit.

Hæc serenissime ac Potentissime Rex, nostrorum Principum et aliorum Imperii ordinum, Evangelicam Doctrinam profitentium, Theologi et Doctores, iustis voluminibus explicarunt, quæ quidem hæc Epistola nos breviter attingenda duximus; non quod Serenissimam Regiam Majestatem Vestram hæc latere penitus putemus, neque enim ignoramus Serenissimæ Regiæ Majestati Vestræ et veterū et recentiū scripta, de his et aliis Controversiis Ecclesiasticis diligentissime cognita esse, de quibus etiam Majestas Vestra sapientissime eruditissime sæpe cum doctis viris conferre et disputare solet: Sed hæc ideo fecimus ut Majestati Vestræ quam posset fieri brevissime, occasione et causas quasdam abolitarū privatarum Missarum apud nos, summa cum observantia ut decet exponeremus; et adversariorum calumnias, quibus cum apud Regiam Majestatem Vestram tum alias, undecunq; quæsitæ et arrepta occasione, variis technis et figmentis, doctrinam sincerioem gravare et in odium omnium perducere conantur, declinarem.

Neque vero ambigimus quin Majestas Vestra, ut Rex eruditissimus et veritatis Evangelicæ amantissimus, facillime judicabit, quod non temere private Missæ apud nos abrogatæ sint, sed iustissimis et firmissimis rationibus, ex Dei Verbo quod solum errare non potest, sincere et absque sophistica deductis, pro conservanda et illustranda Christi Gloria, et hominum salute id factum esse: Et opponantur qualescunq; excogitari possint cavillationes et sophismata, tamen adparebit nostris hoc agere quod sit tutius, dum retinent modum et formam institutionis Christi. Ac maxima pars Sacerdotum sua sponte apud nos desit Missas privatas celebrare, posteaquam intellexerunt ex Evangelicæ Doctrina, quantum in iis erroris et impietatis esset; et plurimi ac doctissimi quique, qui Sacerdotia aut Parochias sub Magistratibus alienis a sincera Evangelii Doctrina tenebant, eas deseruerunt, ne cogenter facere contra suas conscientias, seque ad ea loca in quibus Evangelii Doctrina libere prædicatur contulerunt; gravissimum enim est quencum in re præsertim tali, quæ Dei gloriam lædit, ac Divino Verbo repugnat, tanquam ad cultum divinum adigi, et compelli.

Sed ne Serenissimæ Regiæ Majestati Vestræ prolixitate literarum simus molesti, desinemus plura de hoc articulo in præsentiarum disserere.

De Conjugio Sacerdotum.

Restat tertius locus instituti Argumenti, viz. de Conjugio Sacerdotum, quod itidem Romanus Episcopus contra Scripturam, contra leges naturæ, et contra omnem honestatem prohibuit, ac multorum peccatorum, scelorum et turpitudinis occasionem præbuit: sed fortassis ne possit dubitari eum esse Christi adversarium, de quo cum illum ipsam prohibitionem, tum alia quædam quæ in illum solum adperte quadrant, Scriptura clare prædixit, oportuit eum talem legem Cælibatus Sacerdotalis sancire, ut sicut leo ex unguibus, ita Papa, hoc est Antichristus, ab hac prohibitionem Sanctissimi et in omnibus honorabilibus conjugii, agnosceretur; sic enim Paulus inquit, Spiritus autem manifeste dicit, quod in novissimis temporibus discedent quidam a fide, attendentes Spiritibus Erroris et Doctrinis Dæmoniorum, in hypocriis loquentium mendacium, cauteriam habentium conscientiam suam, prohibentium nubere: hæc si non in Romanum Episcopum congruunt, in quem alium convenient? nemo enim alius quam ipse conjugium Sacerdotibus injustissime eripuit, et cœlibatum impurissimum sub specie Sanctitatis, et ut Paulus ait in Hypocrisi et per mendaciam introduxit.

Scriptura non minus Sacerdotibus, quam alterius sortis hominibus matrimonium liberum permittit, sunt enim de eadem carne, quæ totum genus humanum vestit et continet, nati: non possunt igitur naturam suam mutare, non possunt carnem abjicere, nec absque singulari Dei dono cœlibes vivere, nam non quilibet, ut Christus inquit, capit Verbum hoc: et Paulus, propter Fornicationem unusquisque suam Uxorem habeat; et peculiariter de Sacerdotibus ait, constituas per civitates Presbyteros sicut disposui tibi, si quis sine crimine est, unius Uxoris vir, Filios habens fideles, non in accusatione luxuriæ; item, oportet Episcopum esse irreprensibilem, unius Uxoris virum: patet igitur hanc prohibitionem non ex jure Divino, sed potius contra Sacram Scripturam decretum esse.

At solet a quibusdam Pontificiis defensoribus opponi, quod licet conjugium Sacerdotum non videatur vetitum Divinis Litteris, tamen Sacerdotes a veteribus temporibus in hunc usque diem in cœlibatu vixisse, eaque de causa addunt non esse discedendum hac in re a tali exemplo, neque permittendum conjugium Sacerdotibus. His, Sereuissime ac potentissime Rex, adperte refragantur historie, tum Ecclesiasticæ tum aliæ, ex quibus clare patet, Episcopos et Sacerdotes veteribus temporibus conjugatos fuisse.

Primum enim Spiridon Cyprius Episcopus, vir unus ex ordine prophetarum, ut Historia Ecclesiastica ait, Uxorem habuit ex qua filiam nomine Irenen suscepit; deinde ordine pene omnes Episcopi Uxorati fuerunt, quorum plurimi Filii postea, tum Romani, tum alii Episcopi creati sunt: fuit enim Sylvester Papa Hormisdæ Episcopi Filius, Papa Theodorus Theodori Episcopi Hierosolymitani, Papa Adrianus secundus Talari Episcopi, Joannes decimus Papa Sergii Papæ, Gelasius Valerii Episcopi, Papa Joannes decimus-quinctus Leonis Presbyteri Filius; et ne omnes enumeremus, patet vel unica historia Polycratis, ex cujus parentibus septem fuerunt per ordinem Episcopi, ipse vero fuit octavus: at non est credibile omnes illos ex illegitimis nuptiis prognatos esse, cum ipsi canones et decreta Synodorum doceant, conjugia Sacerdotum esse licita; sic enim inquit Canon Apostolorum, si quis docuerit Sacerdotem sub obtentu Religionis propriam Uxorem continere, Anathema sit.

Item extat præclarum exemplum de Paphnutio confessore, qui universæ Synodo Nicenæ prohibitionem conjugii dissuasit, et obtinuit ne hac ex parte sancitum, sed hoc in uniuscujusque voluntate non necessitate permissum fuerit. Quæ Historia etiam in jure Pontificio recensetur, extatque decretum quoddam sextæ Synodi, in quo palam damnatur prohibitio conjugii Sacerdotalis.

Sed objicit iterum, propter votum castitatis, quod Sacerdotes præsisterunt, non posse eis permitti nuptias. Hoc quale votum sit, quamque obligatorium, quod sine peccato servari non potest, Sereuissima Regia Majestas Vestra pro summa sapientia et Doctrina, facile estimabit: neque enim donum castitatis omnibus datum est, idque cœlibatus ipse Sacerdotum, et quotidiana experientia etiam nunc testatur; et quid de tali voto sentiendum sit, Sanctorum Patrum sententia declaravit, sic enim Augustinus ait, quidam nubentes post votum adserunt adulteros esse, ego autem dico vobis quod graviter peccant qui tales dividunt. Et Cyprianus de virginibus qui continentiam voverunt, sic inquit, si perseverare nolunt, vel non possunt, melius est ut nubant, quam ut in ignem delitias suis cadant.

Consent itaque prædicti Sancti Patres, tale votum non debere impedire Matrimonium, sicut revera etiam non potest ob stare quo minus hi quibus donum continentiae non contigit, matrimonium contrahant: nam melius est nubere quam uri, ut inquit Paulus; Quid autem est impurius cœlibatu illo Sacerdotali? quam pauci vero continent? quam plurimi in fornicationibus, adulteriis, et id genus similibus ac gravioribus peccatis et flagitiis pene quotidie deprehenduntur, contra quod si leges severe animadverterent, non habituri essent, quo de illo ficto et hypocritico cœlibatu adeo gloriarentur?

Ac tradunt Historici in Germania triennium aut amplius, Sacerdotes acerrime restitisse Sanctioni Pontificis Hildebrandi de cœlibatu, qui summa vi eis Uxores adimere conatus est, lique justissimas causas contra illam constitutionem ac tyrannidem Pontificiam, pro Matrimonio defendendo allegarunt, in qua re cum nihil æqui obtinere potuerint, tandem ingens orta est seditio contra Archiepiscopum Moguntinum, qui decretum pontificium detulit, adeo ut is ab increpto destiterit; et vix tandem Papa post multas diras execrationes et bullas, quibus etiam cœlum ipsum expugnare conatus est, miseris Sacerdotibus facultatem liberam conjugii, contra divina et humana jura abstulerit, et omnis generis libidinis et impuritatis exercendæ occasionem præbuerit: Extat quoque Epistola ad Nicolaum Episcopum Romanum I. Divi Udalrici Episcopi Augustensis, qua is gravissimis et optimis argumentis dissuadet et damnat prohibitionem conjugii Sacerdotum.

Cum igitur Principes nostri, et alii proficentes Evangelii Doctrinam, patefacta per Dei Gratiam iterum veritate, intellexerint quid de prohibitione illa pontificia conjugii Sacerdotalis sentiendum esset, et palam viderent et experirentur, quod non posset cœlibatus ille sine peccatis et scandalis consistere, ruperunt in ea etiam vincula pontificia, ac Matrimonium Sacerdotibus, sicut hoc Scriptura Sacra et exempla Sanctorum Patrum ac veteris Ecclesiæ exigunt et testantur, liberum permisissent. Existimant enim hoc quoque ad suum officium pertinere, ut infinitorum scandalorum et scelorum, que necessario secum trahit cœlibatus Sacerdotalis, occasionem et materiam præscinderent et auferrent, publicæque honestati hac quoque in re consulerent; maxime cum animadverterent quantæ etiam abominationes, et in ordine Sacerdotali, et in Monasteriis Vestalium ac Monachorum evenerint, in quibus compertum est sæpe infantes crudeliter necatos, pharmacis foctos depulsos, et similia nefaria crimina commissa, quos solos fructus cœlibatus ille protulit: ideoque plurimi nunc sunt conjugati Sacerdotes apud nos, multi etiam cœlibes, idque cujusque conscientie ut vel ducat uxorem, vel a conjugio absteineat, permittitur; modo ita vivat ne sit aliis offendiculo, alioqui enim non minus in Sacerdotes quam reliquum vulgus, hac quoque parte, secundum leges politicas animadvertitur. Ac per Dei Gratiam, hoc inde secutum est, quod eorum conscientias, quibus continentiae donum non contigit, consultum fuerit, plurimorum flagitorum et scelorum occasio cessaverit, matronis ac puellis quibus plerique istorum sub specie pietatis sæpissime inhiabant, et laqueos nectebant, nihil ejusmodi periculi sit; et in summa, quod quantum Officia Ecclesiastica tum politica majore reverentia et honestate tractentur, quodque ab universis in majore honore et favore habeantur Sacerdotes, quam antea in illo pleno scandalis cœlibatu acceiderit, id quoque magna ex parte honestum conjugium Sacerdotum præstat.

Adhuc, nulli acrius et constantius oppugnant Romanum Pontificem, et tum Matrimonii libertatem, tum sanam Doctrinam ab illo obscuratam et oppressam defendunt, quam hi qui ab ejus jugo impuri illius cœlibatus liberati sunt: et honeste etiam suos liberos, quos ex conjugio suscipiunt educare solent, quibus haud dubie Deus etiam post mortem parentum, ubi in timore Domini aliti et edocti fuerint, prospiciet; gravissimum enim esset, Sacerdotes ideo a conjugio arcere, quia sua munia sive officia tantum ad vitam suam, non autem jure hæreditario tenent; eadem ratione multis aliis qui sunt aut in publicis muneribus, aut in privatis Ministeriis, Matrimonium interdiciendum foret. Quod quidem si fieret, Reip. plus incommodi quam boni allaturum esset; cum et Sacrarum Literarum Auctoritate, Sanctissimorum Patrum Sententiis, legum naturæ et gentium testimonio, et omnium sapientissimorum virorum judicio ac suffragiis constet, Matrimonium semper iis qui cælibes vivere non queant, ad vitanda graviora pericula, concessum et liberum esse debere.

Hæc, Serenissime ac invictissime Rex, coram Serenissima Regia Majestate Vestra, breviter disserenda duximus, ut Majestati Vestræ rationes quasdam commemoraremus, cur Illustrissimi Principes nostri, et alii Evangelii Doctrinam profitentes Principes et Status Imperii, in his tribus Articulis adeo dissentiant a Romano Pontifice, ut sicut in reliquis Doctrinæ Christianæ partibus, a veritate vel latum digitum non discedendum esse existimant, ita in his etiam decreverint, abjecta ejus tyrannide, pro Gloria Evangelii, et ad vitanda infinita scelera, perdurare: neque vero hic dicemus de aliis abusibus a Romano Pontifice introductis, in quos imprimis Confessio Auricularis recenseri meretur, qua ille, et Potestatem clavium tantum ad turpissimum quæstum et tyrannidem redegit, et Confessionem ipsam, quæ informandarum et consolandarum conscientiarum gratia salubriter instituta fuit, carnificinam tantum Conscientiarum reddidit, perque eam tum omnes Reges, Principes, et Potentatus sub suo jugo tenuit, tum multorum malorum auctor extitit; de qua quid nostri sentiant, ac qua reverentia in Ecclesiis retineant, edita ipsorum scripta testantur.

Ac gratulamur nobis datam occasionem hæc Serenissimæ Regiæ Majestati Vestræ exponendi, ejusque censuræ committendi: Cum enim Majestas Vestra et summa Doctrina, sapientia ac studio veritatis prædita sit, et Romani Episcopi tyrannidem (haud sine mente deum, sive numine divum, ut Poeta inquit) itidem ex suis amplissimis Regnis exterminari curaverit, neque amplius per Dei Gratiam illius impiis opinionibus captiva teneatur; persuasissimum nobis habemus Vestræ Serenissimæ Regiæ Majestatis hisce de rebus maximis, quæ ad Dei Gloriam, salutem Ecclesiæ, et perpetuam profigationem Romani Antichristi pertinent, æquissimum ac liberimum fore judicium, quod sane ii, quibus vel Doctrina aut veritatis studium deest, vel animum habent addictum Pontificis Opinionibus, vel metu interdum prohibentur, aut etiam ab affectibus diverse trahuntur, non adeo facile præstare possunt; et plurimi interdum inservientes tempori, fingunt se odiosse pontificem, simulantque studium veritatis, quibus tamen revera aliud est cordi, hi vero quum non possint nec debeant de hisce controversiis ferre sententiam, Serenissima Regia Majestas Vestra nequaquam ignorat.

Non autem dubitamus, quin ut quisque est eruditissimus, et veritatis Evangelicæ amantissimus, ita facillime eum causam nostram immo Christi et Ecclesiæ adprobaturam esse, neque enim ea ullum commodum aut emolumentum privatum quæritur, sed solum agitur de abolendis impiis abusibus in Christi Ecclesiam per Antichristum investitis, et Christi Gloria illustranda, ac veris cultibus restituendis, et ut hominum Conscientiæ jugo ac tyrannide pontificia liberentur, ac scandala publica, quantum fieri possit à medio tollantur. Quarum quidem rerum studium quo jure reprehendi queat, ut etiam magis favore et imitatione dignum censendum sit: Cum enim omnium bene constitutarum Rerumpub. hic præcipue finis et scopus esse debeat, ut et Dei Gloria ornaret, et publica salus, honestas, pax, et tranquillitas conservetur, quis dubitat eos qui sedent ad gubernacula Rerumpub. et ad hæc tanquam ad Cynosuram ut dici solet, cursum suum et omnem rationem regendi Rempublicam instituunt, maximis laudibus dignos esse? Et quoniam Serenissima Regia Vestra Majestas, ut Rex sapientissimus et eruditissimus, hunc quoque scopum in gubernandis amplissimis et laudatissimis Regnis et Provinciis suis, ob oculos habere luce meridiana clarius adparet, non possumus non nobisipsis, quum in hac honestissima causa promovendæ Christi gloriæ et publicæ utilitatis ad Serenissimam Regiam Majestatem Vestram Oratores missi sumus, non gratulari; non possumus etiam non felices judicare universos subditos Majestatis Vestræ, quibus divina bonitate talis Rex et Princeps contigerit, qui cum aliis regiis virtutibus excellit, tum studio veræ pietatis et veritatis Evangelicæ omnibus modis admirandus conspicitur.

Sunt quidem illa maxima Remp. certis et justis legibus civilibus constituere, bonos tueri et juvare, improbos pœnis adficere, arcere injurias, pacem et concordiam subditorum conservare; quis enim non tanquam Deum aliquem talem Principem amplectendum et honorandum putet, a quo ista præstentur: sed adhuc sunt majora, si vera pietas accesserit, si Christi Gloria ornatur, si Dei Verbum in pretio habeatur, si cultus Divinæ voluntati consentanei instituantur, si hominum conscientias consulatur, et publica scandala e medio tollantur; illa enim tantum hanc civilem vitam attingunt, quam unumquemque; quum tempus præfinitum advenerit, deserere oportet; hæc vero ad æternam salutem pertinent quæ bonos et pios, cessante hac misera conditione humane vitæ, expectat, quibusque; et in hoc, et in futuro sæculo, maxima præmia proposita sunt. Hoc est cur Deus Reges honore sui nominis ornat, cum ait, ego dixi Dii estis, maxime ut res divinas intelligant, et veram Religionem in mundo conservent; huc præcipue Scriptura hortatur, cum inquit, nunc Reges intelligite, et erudimini qui judicatis terram, servite Domino, &c. hic invitant exempla præstantissimorum regum in Sacris Literis, qui summa cura, opera, ac studio veram Religionem promoverunt, et impios cultus abrogarunt: hoc David, hoc Josias, hoc Josaphat, hoc Ezechias, et deinceps omnes Sanctissimi Reges præstiterunt. Eadem cum Sereniss. R. M. Vestra haud dubie etiam cogitet, imo jam nunc in hoc totis viribus incumbat, ut sincera Evangelii Doctrina Papæ Tyrannide oppressa restituatur, Gloria Christi itidem a Pontifice obscurata iterum illustretur, et impii abusus ab illo ipso Antichristo in Ecclesiam tanquam venenum quoddam pestilentissimum sparsi et introducti aboleantur, ac veri et Divinis Literis consentanei cultus et cæremonie constituantur, non dubitabimus quin Deus Opt. Max. Sereniss. R. Majestatis Vestræ conatus et consilia, in hisce rebus Sanctissimis et Honestissimis fortunaturus sit, et pro sua bonitate clementer effecturus, ut inter Sereniss. R. M. Vestram et Principes nostros, ac eorum in causa Religionis confæderatos, talis concordia constituatur, quam et in laudem Evangelii, et publicam totius Christiani Orbis utilitatem cessuram, et majori exitio Romano Antichristo futuram esse, minime ambigimus; estque optima spes, ut volente Deo, plures Reges, Principes, et potentatus, ad hanc Sanctissimam causam accedant, ac Evangelicæ veritatis Doctrinam agnoscant et recipiant, sicut etiam hactenus per Dei Gratiam, maximi progressus facti sunt, et non tantum in Germaniam, verum etiam extra Germaniam, Potentissimi Reges, Principes et civitates, Divini Verbi Doctrinam receperunt.

Scriptis eorum qui Evangelii Doctrinam profitentur et docent, per totum pene orbem terrarum sparsis, sanioris Doctrinæ admodum cupidos esse, quorum preces aliquando Deus pro sua benignitate exaudiet, ac suum Verbum illuminatis mentibus Regum et Principum latissime propagabit, ut sit unus pastor, hoc est Dominus noster Iesus Christus, et unum ovile, quod est Ecclesia Catholica, quæ profitetur sincerum Christi Evangelium, et illi consentaneum usum Sacramentorum retinet, non Papistica aut Romana, quæ utrumque reprobatur, odit, et oppugnat.

Quod reliquum est, Serenissime ac Potentissime Rex, Domine Clementissime, precamur et optamus ut Sereniss. Regia Majestas Vestra in cœpto negotio veritatis Evangelicæ pro illustranda Christi Gloria et salute publica, per Dei Gratiam fortiter pergat, quod quidem Majestatem Vestram, ut Regem veræ pietatis et omnis virtutis ac Doctrinæ amatissimum, facturam nihil dubitamus: Oramusque ut Serenissima Regia Majestas Vestra dato benigno responso, ad Illustrissimos Principes nostros, quam primum fieri queat, ne commodam præsentis Navigationis occasionem negligamus, clementer nos dimittat; et ut Serenissima Regia Majestas Vestra, erga quam nostra debita officia atque servitia summa cum observantia perpetuo constabunt, has nostras literas pro sua insigni humanitate, bonitate ac clementia, in optimam partem accipiat, nosque etiam clementer commendatos habeat. Bene valeat Serenissima Regia Majestas Vestra, quam Deus Opt. Max. pro illustranda et propaganda nominis sui Gloria et publica salute, diu servet incolorem. Datæ Londini quinto die Augusti Anno Dom. 1538.

Vestræ Serenissimæ Regiæ Majestatis Addictissimi et obsequentissimi, FRANCISCUS BURGRATUS, Vicecancellarius.

VIII.—The King's Answer to the former Letter.

[Cotton. Libr. Cleop. E. 5.]

LITERAS Vestras, Egregii ac præstantissimi Oratores, per ministrum vestrum nuper ad nos missas, summa humanitate plenas, atque ingentem erga nos benevolentiam spirantes, tum libenter accepimus, tum magna cum voluptate legimus; quibus significatis vos, post exposita nobis mandata, cum quibusdam Episcopis et Theologiæ Doctoribus a nobis designatis de Christianæ Religionis nonnullis articulis per duos menses contulisse; non dubitare quoque quin inter Principes vestros et nos, atque utrorumque; Episcopos Theologos et subditos, firma perpetuaque concordia in Evangelii Doctrina ad laudem Dei, et Romani Antichristi perniciem sit sequutura: Verum quia reliquam disputationem de abusibus expectare non potestis, cum jam naves appulerint vos in patriam deportaturæ, ante discessum vestrum existimatis vestri officii esse ut sententiam vestram de quibusdam abusuum articulis nobis declaratis, de quibus nos post discessum vestrum cum Episcopis et Theologis nostris conferre possemus. Et quia tria capita præcipua putatis quæ fundamentum Pontificiæ Tyrannidis sustentare videntur, nempe Prohibitionem utriusque speciei in cœna Domini, Missas privatas, et Prohibitionem Conjugii Sacerdotum; de his articulis sententiam vestram ingenue aperitis, atque eam iudicio nostro quantumcumque; id sit, et censuræ committitis: Quis non hanc vestram benevolentiam, Egregii Oratores, summopere amplectatur? Quis non hanc Vestram gratitudinem modis omnibus admiretur? Qui nobiscum ea communicare studetis, quæ non modo ad præsentem vitam transigendam sed ad futuram quoque assequendam conferunt? Enimvero si illos non abs re existimamus amicos, qui in Regionum commerciis ea quæ sunt grata atque commoda important, ne quid usquam desit quod ad præsentem vitam degendam pertinet, quanto magis illi sunt amici iudicandi, qui quæ ad æternam vitam conferunt impertiri non gravantur! nam quæ præsentis vitæ subsidia parantur durabilia diu non sunt, quæ vero ad æternam promovent nunquam intermoriuntur; quinimo amicitia ipsa terræna, quantumvis ingens, quantumvis firma, finem habet e vita excessum, charitas vero quæ nunquam excidit post hanc vitam splendescit magis. Et quia nostrum iudicium non aspernari videmini, quod nos ipsi indignum existimamus, ut de rebus tam arduis iudicemus, atque ea proponitis quæ putatis imprimis amplectenda, qua in re non vulgarem sed ingentem vim erga nos amoris ostenditis, ne nos non respondere huic vestræ tantæ gratitudini videremur, si quæ nobis ad presens videntur vobiscum non communicarem, decrevimus itidem de his tribus Articulis nonnulli attingere, et pectus nostrum ingenue vobis aperire: Quo fiet ut mutuis inter nos et Principes vestros amor eo magis aucescat, eo diutius foveatur, si nihil occultum inter amicos retentetur, sed summa sinceritate gerantur omnia, id quod nos cum omnibus amicis semper facere consuevimus; quod nostrum perpetuum institutum in præsentia apud Amicissimos, eosque quos habemus charissimos, mutare nequaquam libuit. Verum de Articulis ipsis tandem agamus.

De utraque Specie.

Quod imprimis sub utraque Specie semper Eucharistiam populis secundum primariam Christi institutionem dandam esse existimetis, et nullo pacto sub altera tantum, non possumus quovis pacto adduci, egregii et præstantissimi Oratores, ut putemus vos id serio affirmasse, sed forsitan probandi causa nobis id protulisse, ut quid sentiamus intelligeretis; nam ipsa opinio tam aliena est a recta Scripturæ intelligentia, ut vix quivis id serio affirmare præsumeret, quod latius in hac Epistola declarabimus. Nec nobis persuadere possumus, etsi occasio sit, vos non nobiscum credere, quod sub specie Panis sit realiter et substantialiter verum et vivum Corpus Christi, et una cum Corpore Sanguis verus, alioqui fatendum esset Corpus ibi exsanguis esse, quod nefas esset dicere, cum Caro illa Christi non modo viva, sed et vivificatrix sit; et quod sub specie vini non modo vivus et verus Christi Sanguis sit, sed etiam una cum vero Sanguine viva et vera etiam Corporis sit Caro. Quod cum ita sit, necessario consequetur etiam eos qui sub altera specie communicant, et solum sub specie Panis Corpus Christi sumunt, non fraudari Communione Sanguinis Christi, atque eos etiam qui sub specie vini Communicant non fraudari communione Corporis Domini; Quocirca cum sub alterutra specie utrumque; contineatur, viz. et Corpus et Sanguis Christi, utraque solum species porrigatur populis, utrumque, id est tam Sanguis quam Corpus Christi, per hoc eisdem exhibeatur. Nam Christus ipse sub altera specie dedisse legitur in Evangelio Lucæ Discipulis duobus in Emaus euntibus, quando agnitus est in fractione Panis; scribitur enim, quod cum recumberet cum eis, accepit panem et benedixit, ac fregit et porrigebat illis, et aperti sunt oculi eorum, et cognoverunt eum fractione panis. Ubi de Eucharistia eum locum vetustissimi Authores Chrysostomus, Theophylactus, et Augustinus intelligunt, et tamen de vini poculo nulla ibi fit mentio: Unde Christus qui in altera specie ministravit Eucharistiam, libertatem Ecclesiæ sponsæ suæ reliquisse videtur, ut imitetur sponsi sui vestigia, ac similiter sub altera specie, sicut sub utraque, communicare libere possit. Nam Christus qui sub utraque; specie Communionem docuit, etiam de Communionem sub altera ipse exemplum reliquit, qui secum tamen nusquam, vel in præceptis vel in exemplis, dissidet.

Simile idem Lucas in Actis Apostolorum citat, quando post adventum Spiritus Sancti, prædicante Petro, appositæ sunt animæ circiter tria millia, inquires, Erant autem perseverantes in Doctrina Apostolorum et Communionem et fractione panis et orationibus; Ubi similiter de Eucharistia eum locum intelligunt veteres, et de poculo nulla fit ibi mentio. Jam si Christum ipsum Autorem, si Apostolos ab eo ad docendum orbem missos patronos habet, Communio sub una specie, nempe Panis, usitata in Ecclesia non est, tanquam Evangelicis præceptis contraria, statim repudianda; nam Apostoli, qui per adventum Spiritus edocti sunt omnem veritatem, nunquam in fractione Panis Communionem dedissent populo, si utraq; species de præcepto Christi semper necessario fuisset porrigenda, ne Christi jubentis parum memores institutum ejus mutasse viderentur.

Porro ipsa Christi Verba, quæ post Evangelistas Paulus totam cœnam dominicam Corinthiis enarrans citat, nos admonent Christum separatim de alterutra specie locutum esse; ait enim, Dominus Iesus in qua nocte tradebatur, accepit panem et gratias agens fregit, et dixit, accipite et manducate, Hoc est Corpus meum quod pro vobis traditur, hoc facite in mei commemorationem. Ecce Christus de Corpore suo sub specie panis sumendo separatim locutus est, inquires, Hoc facite, priusquam ullam de poculo faceret mentionem. Postea autem de Calice ait Paulus, Similiter et Calicem postquam cœnavit accepit dicens, Hic calix Novum Testamentum est in meo sanguine, hoc facite quotiescunq; bibetis in mei commemorationem: Nec dixit sicut de corpore dixerat simpliciter, Hoc facite in mei commemorationem, sed dixit, Hoc facite, cum hac adjectione, nempe quotiescunq; bibetis, in mei commemorationem: per hoc nobis indicans non semper sub specie vini sumendum esse sanguinem una cum corpore sub specie Panis, sed quotiescunq; sumeretur Sanguis sub specie Vini in Commemorationem Christi id faciendum.

Ecce rursus Christus post distributionem corporis sui, peracta cœna in qua corpus suum sub specie Panis separatim prius dederat, iterum separatim sub specie Vini Sanguinem suum offert, inquires, Hoc facite quotiescunq; bibetis in mei commemorationem, significans nobis et seorsum nonnunquam alterum porrigi posse, et tamen cum ita sit, utriusq; vim integram populis dari, alioqui sufficisset semel duntaxat de utroq; fuisse dictum, Hoc facite, nec de Calice adjectis Hoc facite quotiescunq; bibetis, cum prius de specie Panis simpliciter dixisset Hoc facite, nisi separatim ea sumi posse judicaret.

Neque quisquam negare potest Discipulis in cœna sub specie panis sumpsisse Corpus Christi, nam cœnantibus illis, accepit panem et benedixit, ac fregit dedit; illis, dicens Hoc est Corpus meum: Calicem autem non nisi post intervallum ac peracta cœna porrexit, nisi quis adeo stupidus esset, ut crederet post assumptionem speciei panis non prius eos sumpsisse Corpus Christi, quam postquam cœnavit porrexisset Calicem; quasi vero priora Verba Christi irrita fuissent, cum de specie panis diceret Hoc est Corpus meum, aut ipsa distributio facta Discipulis nullam vim haberet, priusquam de Calice peracta Cœna bibissent; Quod cum impium sit sentire, tum ipsum Verbum et factum Christi, proli nefas! evacuat. Denique ipse Paulus, postquam etiam de utraque specie conjunctim locutus est, rursus de ipsis speciebus disjunctim infert, inquires ὡστε δε ἂν ἐσθίει τὸν ἄρτον οὐτον, ἢ πίνει τὸ ποτήριον τοῦ Κυρίου ἀναξίως, ἔνοχος ἐστὶ τοῦ σώματος καὶ αἵματος τοῦ Κυρίου.

Quæ verba latine sic transtulit Erasmus, Itaq; quisquis ederet panem hunc aut de Calice biberit indigne, reus erit corporis et sanguinis Domini: ubi ex Pauli verbis aperte liquet, Quisquis indigne panem hunc sumpserit, reum esse Corporis et Sanguinis Domini, aut si quis de Calice biberit indigne, similiter reum esse Sanguinis et Corporis Domini, quod tamen nullo modo crimini daretur, nisi seorsum sub specie panis esset et Corpus et Sanguis Christi, atq; itidem sub specie vini seorsum esset et Corpus et Sanguis Christi; nec disjunctim de specie panis locutus fuisset Paulus, si nunquam nisi conjunctim cum Calice sumeretur: Neq; rursus disjunctim de Calice dixisset, si nunquam nisi conjunctim cum specie panis esset sumendus. Quorsum enim ea disjunctis si nunquam nisi conjuncta esse possent? At Verba ipsa Scripturæ singula sunt attendenda, nam Propheta inquit. Inclinate aurem vestram in Verba oris mei; et Moises in Deuteronomio ait, Ponite corda vestra in omnia verba quæ ego testificor vobis hodie, quia non incassum præcepta sunt vobis. Et iterum, non additis ad verbum quod vobis loquor, nec auferetis ab eo. Verba igitur Domini atque ipsius Pauli, et separatim de alterutra specie primum posita, et post utriusque conjunctionem etiam iterum disjuncta, significare nobis videntur, et posse alterutram speciem seorsum porrigi secundum Verbum Christi.

Nec per hoc quod Christus dixit, Bibite ex hoc omnes, statim consequetur Christum jussisse Communionem cuiilibet de populo semper sub utraq; specie et nunquam sub altera dandam esse: Nam illorum Verborum sensum non alium esse apparet, quam quem ipse Dominus Apostolum suum Paulum, qui a Domino de hoc Sacramento omnia se accepisse testatur, edocuit, nempe quod quotiescunq; de Calice hoc quisquam biberet, id in Christi memoriam faceret, sicuti fecerant Discipuli, qui tunc aderant præsentibus et de eo biberunt omnes: Itaque quotiescunq; Sanguis Christi bibendus a quoquam esset, in memoria Passio Christi recordanda est; sicut similiter quisquis Corpus Christi sumpserit ad memoriam passionem ejus revocare debet: Neque ex præcepto Christi toties bibendum esse de hoc Calice, quotiescunq; Corpus Christi sumendum est, apparet per ea quæ de verbis et de exemplo Christi supradicta sunt. Certe quicquid Christus omnino observari præcepit, non posse ulla humana sanctione prohiberi putamus, cum humana lex divinam abolere non possit. Similiter etiam existimamus, nec morem ullum, nec ullam consuetudinem tantopere apud homines valere debere, ut Dei Verbum expugnet et Christi præceptum subvertat.

Veruntamen cum Christus nobis libere reliquerit ut eum tribus modis corporaliter sumere possimus, et quarto spiritualiter, nempe primo sub utraque specie, secundo, sub Panis specie tantum; tertio, sub Vini; quarto, voluntate et desiderio solo cum aliter necessitate coacti eum sumere nequimus; existimamus pro primo, ut si quis fidelis ardenti in Deum amore flagrans, pietateq; ingenti æstuans, magnopere desideraret Sacramentum sub utraq; specie sumere, si nullum vel valetudinis vel imbecillitatis obstaret impedimentum, ei sub utraq; specie Communio præberi possit, dummodo neq; postulans neq; ministrans Sacramentum in scandalum populi, aut in contemptum Ecclesiæ id faciat, neque suo jure leges regionis in qua degit, sive Ecclesiasticas sive laicas, infringere præsumat.

Pro secundo et tertio sic, Quod si impedimentum aliquod hujusmodi intervenit, ut in utraque specie absq; periculo sumi non possit, ut si quis Paralyti correptus, aut ab alio quovis naturæ aut morborum impedimento utraq; speciem recipere commode non possit, hic si desideret Sacram Communionem sumere, ei sub altera tantum specie porrigatur. Pro quarto autem, Quod si quis nausea, vel alia corporis molestia adeo sit infestatus, ut nihil in stomachus receptum non rejectet, huic si id petat Sacramentum saltem ostendi posset, ut viso eo mortem Christi redemptoris sui citius revocans in memoriam compunctus corde spiritualiter communicet.

Plurimum igitur demiror, quod hi qui Christianæ Libertatis assertores et acerrimi propugnatores videri volunt, libertatem hanc nostram in hoc uno Corporis et Sanguinis Domini Sacramento, quo nihil superexcellenti, nihil celebrius, nihil incomparabilius, nihil deniq; ad consolandos fidelium animos solidius, Christus hinc abiturus Ecclesiæ suæ reliquit, nobis tollere velint; Quid enim majus donare potuit Christus in hoc Sacramento sumendum quam seipsum? Deinde cum ipse omnino liberum nobis reliquerit, et posse aliquos sub utraq; specie Communionem accipere, et posse alios sub altera, nonnullos quoq; morborum necessitate impeditos, saltem in conspectum prolato Corpore Domini compuncto corde posse Spiritualiter communicare, quanta immodestia, quanta inclementia esset, libertate hac fraudare Christianos! Ut quibus sub utraq; specie, ob impedimenta quæ sunt innumera, Communio præberi non posset, his summi boni fructione privatis sub neutra daretur! Nec adhuc fatentur etsi non corporaliter sumatur saltem Spiritualiter capi posse. Qua non servitute durior esset hæc conditio, ut Christi redemptoris nostri corpus, quod ille a fidelibus sumi voluit, nobis id summopere desiderantibus violenter eripatur? quia ingenue Christianus libertatem fructuionis hujus sibi extortam non omni morte intolerabiliorem putaret? Itaq; libertas hæc a Christo nobis relicta omni conatu retinenda est, omnibus viribus amplectenda, nec ipsis mea opinione fidendum est, qui eam nobis tollere velint.

Præterea quid fiat apud septentrionales populos? quid apud populos Aprichæ, qui intra Tropicos habitant? apud quos non ea vini copia est ut populis omnino sub specie vini præberi possit, (nam his populis cervisia ex frugibus esse potui,) an ideo quia sub utraq; specie his ministrari Sacramentum non potest, ab utraq; arcendi essent? aut sub una non integrum Christum capere possent? id quod absit.

Quando autem primum populus priscum morem deserere, et sub altera tantum panis specie Communionem sacram sumere cœpit, nobis est incompertum; credibile est majores nostros auctoritate Scripture motos, quæ alteram nonnunquam speciem per Christum et Apostolos datam memorat, propter periculum effusionis in terram Sanguinis Christi, cum liquida omnia levi membrorum trepidante motu facile effundantur, religiosa quadam et pia reverentia, non mediocriq; Dei timore, abstinnisse in Sacramento a vini specie, nec Christum qui se cum Ecclesia usque in finem omnibus diebus mansurum promisit, tot sæculis eam deseruisse, ut si necessarium præceptum de utraq; specie semper ab omnibus sumenda dedisset, in re tanti momenti eam permisisset turpiter labi; sed magis Ecclesiæ suæ liberum reliquisse videtur, ut cum in alterutra specie totus et integer Christus contineatur, sub altera etiam sumi possit.

Qui vero sit mos hodie de utraq; specie in Ecclesiis Græcis, quæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ Tyrannidem nunquam admiserunt, non satis nobis est compertum, cum Græcia tota Turcarum subsit imperio, nec liberam habeant facultatem Christum ut libet profitendi, quando nec Verbum Dei publice prædicare, nec ad Campanarum sonitum populum convocare, nec publicas Litanias crucis vexillo præeunte facere, his ullo pacto est concessum.

Illud quoq; imprimis est observandum, nempe quod in Universis Ecclesiis in die Parasceves Sacerdos et omnis populus sub una tantum specie panis communicant, non sub specie Vini, ut cum is dies repræsentat mortem Christi in qua sanguis ejus pretiosus pro nostra salute effusus est et separatus a corpore, separatim illo die sub altera solum specie communicarent omnes sive Sacerdos sive populus; qui mos per universam Ecclesiam nunquam fuisset admixtus, nisi sub altera tantum specie integer Christus contineretur, atq; nisi sub altera Sacramentum populis ministrari posset.

De Missa Privatæ.

Per Missas autem privatas multos abusus introductos esse dicitis, quas velut Atlantem quendam Papatum sustinuisse, indulgentias invexisse, orbem expillasse, utpote quæ ad quaestum pateant, monachorum turbas coacervasse, Verbum Dei exterminasse asseritis, atq; ideo Germanos Principes Synaxim veteri more reduxisse, quam lingua vernacula facere, ritu satis decore atque decenti commemoratis; privatas vero Missas apud vos in totum abolitas esse, quæ tot pepererunt abusus et foetus malignos. Qua de re nobiscum diu multumq; cogitantes, consideramus imprimis nihil unquam in Ecclesia sua Christum ordinasse quo malignus serpens aliquando non sit abusus, neque tamen propterea rejiciendum est quicquid sancte est ordinatum, alioqui Sacramenta omnia antiquanda essent; quin magis reputavimus longe satius esse abusus omnes in totum removere, quæ vero Sancte et pie introducta sunt in Ecclesiam, illa ipsa stabilia manere.

Nam si ideo Missæ privatæ abolendæ sunt in totum, quia de illis Thomas Aquinas, Gabriel, atque alii Doctrinas ut dicitis impias induxerunt, viz. Missas ex opere operato gratiam mereri, et tollere peccata vivorum et mortuorum, et applicari posse alienum opus ad alterum, Quicquid sit, quod illi asserunt, hoc de omni Missa asserunt, non de privata duntaxat; Qua propter si ad tollendas illas opiniones qualescunque Missa privata esset abroganda, eadem ratione abroganda esset Synaxis et Missa publica, quam vos ipsi retinetis nec censetis abolendam, quicquid de ea alii opinentur. Missa vero privata, velut privata quædam est Communio et Synaxis, quæ si recte atque ut decet fiat, quicumque fideles illi interesse decreverint, si pœnitentes convenerint contriti de peccatis, Deiq; implorent misericordiam cum filio prodigo dicentes, Pater peccavi in Cœlum et coram te, haud dubie quin ipsi Spiritualiter cum Sacerdote communicant, offerentes se et animas suas, hostias vivas et acceptabiles Deo, tametsi pauci fuerint, atq; a corporali Sacramenti sumptione abstinnuerint: ac per hoc Missa privata Ecclesiæ adeo non obest, ut non parum et ad vitam corrigendam, et ad fidem in Christum corroborandam prodesse videatur; quippe Christiani per hoc peccatores se agnoscent quotidie delinquentes, quotidie veniam postulant, quotidie per peccatum in saebroso vitæ hujus cursu cadentes, quotidie pœnitentes resurgunt, et velut alacriores redditi, devicto sæpius hoste, fiunt ad pugnam audaciores.

Porro statim in exordio omnis Missæ privatæ publica est peccatorum omnium generalis Confessio, venia postulatur a Deo, absolutio impartitur a Sacerdote secundum Dei Verbum, quemadmodum in Missa publica.

Et si in Missa publica et quantumcumq; solenni nemo adsit alius præter Sacerdotem qui Communicare velit in esu Sacramenti, quid quæso differet Missa publica a privata? An Sacerdos in solenni die populo ad Sacra conveniente, si nemo alius communicare velit, abstinet a Missa publica? atque inter Græcos ipsos, ubi singulis dominicis diebus fit una Missa publica uti asseritis, raro admodum communicat in esu Sacramenti quisquam è populo, uti a fide dignis accepimus, qui ipsi Græcorum Sacris inter fuerunt.

Græcia singulis Dominicis fiat populi conventus ad Sacra, si mutari mos potuit ab Apostolis inductus, ut rarius quam statuerunt Apostoli populus congregaretur, cur non etiam mutari potuit ut sæpius conveniret, quando per hoc celebrior fit mortis Christi memoria, id quod in Missa fit etiam privata.

Jam vero si Sacramentum hoc a fidelibus exerceri Christus in mortis suæ memoriam præcepit, inquiens, Hoc facite in meam commemorationem, ne mors ejus raro admodum commemorata in oblivionem transiret, quo crebrius, quo frequentius, memoria ejus in Sacramento repetitur, eo mandatum ejus servatur magis: Etenim sicut raro admodum memorata oblivioni sunt obnoxia, ita crebro frequentata radices in mente agunt altius, ne obliterari unquam possint; itaq; ut mors Christi crebra memoria illustretur, Missa etiam privata non parum confert.

Certe Paulus Apostolus singulas domos privatas, ubi credentium numerus aliquis erat, Ecclesias vocat, membra Majoris Ecclesiæ, civitatis illius in qua essent, sicut majores ipsas civitates Ecclesias, membra Catholicæ et universalis Ecclesiæ appellat, scribens ad Corinthios; at que Ecclesiæ arcenda est a Communionem Corporis Domini? Christus etiam ipse instituendo Sacramentum hoc Corporis et Sanguinis sui, inquit, Hoc, quotiescunq; facitis, facite in meam commemorationem; nec tempus nec locum ullum cohibuit, quo fieri id non posset, quoniam modo igitur arcebimus quenquam a Missis privatis? Et ad dies festos publicamq; Synaxim eum relegabimus? Cujus arbitrio Christus liberum reliquit, quando et ubi id vellet decenter exequi, dum inquit quotiescunq; nam si certa tempora servanda essent, non indefinite locutus fuisset Christus, ipsum Dei Verbum, ipsa sapientia Patris.

Jam vero ab initio nascentis Ecclesiæ per singulas domos ubi erant fideles fiebat communio, atq; id quotidie, teste Luca in Apostolorum Actis, ubi ait, Quotidie quoq; perdurantes unanimiter in templo, et frangentes circa domos panem; quem locum etiam de Communionem veteres interpretes intelligunt, et tamen singulis diebus non agebant publice dies festos, sed privatim per domos communicabant: Etsi terrenorum regum atq; principum ministri pleriq; omnes nullum diem transigere cupiunt, quo non fruatur vel solo aspectu sui Domini, tametsi propior congressus non contingat, quis fidelis Christianus non omnibus optabit votis, ut quando in hac vita Christum Regem Regum, et Dominum Dominantium, in Majestate gloriæ regnantem cernere mortales oculi non possunt, saltem per fidem in Sacramento Corporis Domini, quod ille fidelibus in memoriam sui frequentandam reliquit, interim quotidie Regem gloriæ videat?

Quod vero Chrysostomus Sacerdotem ad altare stare, et alios ad Communionem accersere, alios arcere scribit, enarrat morem publicæ Communionis, qui in initio nascentis Ecclesiæ crebrius quam nunc fit frequentabatur; qui mos nunc in Paschate, quando ubiq; communicat populos, apud omnes servatur Ecclesias: Cæterum ille ipse expostulat cum fidelibus sui temporis, quod rarius communicent, quam vel oporteret, vel vetus mos erat; cæterum nusquam is privatas Missas vetuit.

At Canon Nicenus Diaconis in Communionem publica suum locum designat post Presbyteros; cæterum nec is Canon, nec ullus alius Missas privatas abrogat.

Sacramentum autem Eucharistiæ Sacrificium non esse arbitramini, quod unum Sacrificium sit propitiatorum mors Christi, et cum is ultra non moritur, qui semel tantum pro nobis oblatus est, nullum restat ultra Sacrificium, nisi cultus Spiritualis, hoc est, justitia fidei et fructus fidei. Quid sibi velit justitia quæ ex fide est scimus, quippe quam Paulus opponit Justitiæ quæ est ex lege: Cæterum qui sunt fructus fidei, nobis ex Scripturis non satis liquet, ipsam fidem sicut charitatem, et multas alias virtutes scimus esse fructus Spiritus. Verum enimvero non satis miramur, cur quispiam ægre ferat Missam Sacrificium vocari, quando omnis vetustas et Græcorum et Latinorum sic eam appellare consuevit, quum ibi fiat consecratio Corporis et Sanguinis Domini in memoriam mortis ejus, qui, ut inquit Paulus, pro peccatis offerens hostiam, in sempiternum sedet ad dextram Dei, quia enim oblatione consummavit in sempiternum sanctificatos; itaq; si Christus et Sacerdos esset, et Sacrificium, et hostia, ubicunq; est Christus, ibi est hostia nostra, ibi est sacrificium nostrum; at si in Sacramento altaris est verum Corpus Christi, et verus Sanguis Christi, quo pacto manente veritate Corporis et Sanguinis Domini, non est ibi Sacrificium nostrum?

Porro quia in Missa est Christus Sacrificium nostrum, qui ipse ultra non moritur, ibiq; cum ipso capite nostro, nos illius Corpus et membra nosmet ipsos Deo hostias vivas offerimus, Græci id totum ἀναμικτρον θύσιας, id est, Sacrificium incruentum vocant: ita veteres omnes intrepide Missam Sacrificium vocarunt, quod ibi sit Christus Sacrificium nostrum in Sacramento.

Sic Basilus, sic Chrysostomus, sic Hieronymus, sic Augustinus eam appellare non dubitavit; Quocirca quid vetat Missam, in qua consecratur Panis in Corpus Christi, et Vinum in Sanguinem ejus, qui vere est Sacrificium nostrum, et hoc fieri in memoriam sui jussit, vocari Sacrificium: alioqui si id negabimus, non parum verendum est, ne cum Sacramentariis quos nunc vocant, qui veritatem Corporis et Sanguinis in Sacramento negant, et cum Anabaptistis consentire videamur, a qua suspicione sicut in animo nostro nos profitemur longe abesse, ita quoq; cupimus calumniantibus adversariis omnem obtrectandi ansam auferri: Atqui cum in Missa tum Sacerdos, tum populos contritus de peccatis se, ut hortatur Paulus, hostiam vivam, sanctam atq; Deo placentem exhibeat, laudes quas Deo canat et in gratiarum actione versetur, quis dubitare potest, ea quoq; ratione, Missam jure Sacrificium nominari, cum Propheta appellat Sacrificium laudis, et Paulus omnes hortetur, ut se hostias vivas exhibeant, id quod fit in Missa. Malachias etiam Propheta inquit, Ad ortu solis usq; ad occasum, magnum est nomen meum in gentibus, et in omni loco Sacrificatur, et offertur nomini meo oblatio munda, quia magnum est nomen meum in gentibus, dicit dominus exercituum. At quæ alia oblatio munda in omni loco inter gentes, nisi solus Christus aut quod aliud Sacrificium Christianorum, nisi Missa, ubi Commemoratio mortis Christi agitur? Nam aut aliquod inter gentes Christianorum oportet esse Sacrificium, aut mentitus est Propheta: quemnam quæso est oblatio munda, nisi solus Christus hostia nostra, qui in Sacramento altaris est sub Panis et Vini speciebus? quippe quantumcumq; nos ipsi nos Deo offeramus, hostiæ mundæ non meremur nomen, quorum omnis justitia velut pannus est menstruæ: Itaq; constat Missam Sacrificium vocari ex Verbo Dei per Malachiam enunciato, quod cum ita sit, cur Missæ invidemus nomen Sacrificii, quod Propheta prædixit, et in qua Christus in Sacramento præsens est ipse mundi Sacrificium?

De Conjugio Sacerdotum.

Cælibatum Sacerdotum contra Scripturam, contra leges naturæ, contra honestatem, per pontificem Romanum asseritis introductum, cum Scriptura Sacerdotibus, sicut cæteris hominibus, conjugium permittat, nec possint naturam suam mutare, nec absq; singulari dono cælibes vivere: nam non omnes capiunt verbum hoc, et Paulus inquit, propter fornicationem unasquisq; Uxorem suam habet.

Hic primum ordiri juvat, ut locum illum Evangelii de tribus Eunuchorum generibus consideremus, quandoquidem Christus alios a natura Eunuchos esse asserit, alios per vim facta, quorum neutrum genus continentiae virtute splendet; quoniam alteros ad generandum natura, alteros violentia reddidit inutiles. Tertium vero genus eorum est, qui quamquam terrena generatione uti possunt, malunt continere, et se castrare propter Regnum Cœlorum; de quo genere Christus statim infert, qui potest capere, capiat, id quod nec de primo, nec de secundo Eunuchorum genere intelligi potest, quibus continentiae palma negata est, cum descendere in certamen nequeunt: tertium vero genus eorum est, qui continentiae student, et a licitis nuptiis abstinere malunt propter Regnum Cœlorum, quo Christum liberius atq; expeditius sequantur, ne terrenis nuptiis implicati, cogitare cogantur, ut inquit Paulus, quæ sunt mundi; ad quod genus Christus virginitatis autor homines sapientissime invitatur, inquiens, Qui potest capere, capiat: per hoc quod inquit, capiat, homines adhortans ad capescendum certamen ut palmam arripiant, nempe Regnum Cœlorum, ad quod neminem hortaretur; si nemo carnem posset vincere; per hoc vero quod ait, qui potest capere, posse capi palmam indicans; alioqui si impossibile esset carnem superare, quorsum attineret dicere, Qui potest, si nemo id posset.

Præterea per ea verba Qui potest capere, quosdam etiam esse declarat, qui non facile possunt, nam nisi alii non facile possent capere, cur secerneret eos qui possunt; itaq; considerandas animi vires admonet, priusquam certamen aggrediare, ne temere arripere certamine turpiter succumbas: Nec dixisset quosdam esse, qui se castraverunt propter Regnum Cœlorum, si caro easet insuperabilis, et nemo se castrare posset. Nec dubitandum est quin is qui hortatur ad subeundum certamen, gratiam suam sine qua nihil possent, his non defuturam demonstrat, qui nomina sua in militiam ei dederunt, quorum ille ipse dux futurus est, qui non modo in periculis suos milites invocatus nunquam deserit, sed stat ante januam et pulsatur, paratus semper ad succurrendum, si quis ei aperiat: Nam Paulus tentationes superari posse nos admonet, modo Dei auxilium imploremus inquiens, Tentatio vos non apprehendit nisi humana, fidelis autem Deus qui non patietur vos tentari supra id quod potestis, sed faciet etiam cum tentatione proventum ut possitis sustinere. Quamobrem his qui continentiam semel profitentur, et eam postea turpiter deserunt, etiam atq; etiam considerandum est, ne nomen Dei blasphemare videantur, Christum accusantes deserti auxilii, cum sint ipsi desertores militiæ, et primo statim congressu terga dantes hosti: itaq; quod Paulus liberum cuiq; facit, ut propter fornicationem Uxorem suam habeat, id de his intelligi, qui continentiam non sunt professi, Paulus ipse nos docet, inquiens, de viduis adolescentioribus, quæ cum luxuriatæ fuerunt in Christo nubere volunt, habentes damnationem quia primam fidem irritam fecerunt. Augustinus Pauli Doctrinam secutus Psal. lxxxiii. inquit, alius ex Dei munere majus aliquid vovit, statuit, nec nuptias pati, qui non damnaretur si duxisset Uxorem; post votum quod Deo promisit si duxerit damnabitur: sic virgo quæ si nuberet non peccaret, Sanctimonialis si nupsit Christi adultera reputabitur, respexit enim retro de loco quo accesserat, exemplo Uxoris Loth, et sicut canis reversus ad vomitum reputatur.

Itidem Augustinus, Psal. lxxv. ample asserit votum semel emissum servandum esse. Hieronymus etiam adversus Jovinianum inquit, virgo quæ se Deo dicavit, si nubat, damnationem habet; atq; alio loco adversus eundem, Virgines tuæ quas prudentissimo consilio (quod nemo unquam legerat, nec audierat de Apostolo) docuisti, melius esse nubere quam uri, occultos adulteros in apertos verterunt maritos; non suavit hoc Apostolus, non Electionis vix Virgilianum consilium est, conjugium vocat, hoc præterit nomine culpam. Verbum ipsum Dei palam adversatur ubique ne rumpantur vota. Propheta inquit, vovete et reddite Domino Deo Vestro; in Deuteronomio quoq; scribitur, cum votum voveris Domino Deo tuo, non tardabis reddere, quia requirit illud Dominus Deus tuus, et si moratus, fueris, reputabitur tibi in peccatum; si nolueris polliceri absq; peccato eris, quod autem egressum est de labiis tuis, observabis et facies, sicut promisisti Domino Deo tuo et propria voluntate et ore locutus es. Ecclesiastes etiam inquit, si quid vovisti ne moreris reddere, sed quodcumq; voveris redde: Et in Numerorum libro scribitur, si quis virorum votum Domino voverit, aut se constrinxerit juramento, non faciat irritum Verbum suum, sed omne quod promisit implebit. Quocirca Ecclesia a principio sicut conjugatos Sacerdotes et Episcopos, qui sine crimine essent unius Uxoris viri, propter necessitatem admisit, cum tot alii quot possent ad edocendum orbem sufficere tunc non reperirent idonei, et tamen Paulus ipse Timotheum cælibem elegit; ita quoq; si quis ad Sacerdotium cælebs accersitur, postea Uxorem duxerit, semper a Sacerdotio deponetur, secundum Canonem Neocesariensis Concilii, quod fuit ante Nicenum. Similiter in Calcedonensi Concilio, in cujus primo capite priora Concilia confirmantur, statuitur ut Diaconissa, si se nuptiis tradat, maneat sub Anathemate, et Virgo Deo dicata et Monachus junctes se nuptiis, maneat excommunicati.

Hoc quoq; observandum est, quod in Canonibus Apostolorum habetur, tantummodo Lectores cantoresq; non conjugatos postea Uxores ducere, cæteris vero in clerum admissis postea Uxorem ducere nunquam licuit.

Qui vero conjugati ad Sacerdotium admissi erant, Uxores suas prætextu Religionis abjicere nequaquam poterant, ut docet Canon Apostolicus; neque in Niceno Concilio proponeretur de Presbyterorum jam ductis Uxoribus abjiciendis, restitit Paphnutius ne legitime Uxores pellerentur, cujus sententiam, cum Canone Apostolorum de non abjiciendis Uxoribus concordantem, omnes sunt secuti.

Cæterum in Niceno Concilio nihil unquam propositum fuit, ut Sacerdotes post Sacerdotium Uxores ducerent, quod jam ante sic erit prohibitum, ut si quis contrarium auderet, ducens postea Uxorem, deponeretur a Sacerdotio, ut supra dictum est; itaq; Paphnutius de non abjiciendis jam ductis ante Sacerdotium Uxoribus, non autem de ducendis post Sacerdotium aperte locutus est.

Itaq; neq; Canon aliquis Apostolicus, neq; Concilium Nicenum quicquam habet ejusmodi ut in Sacerdotium admissi, postea Uxores ducant, sicuti vos allegatis.

His concordat sexta Synodus in qua sancitum est, quod si quis è clero vellet Uxorem ducere, ante subdiaconatum id faceret, postea nequaquam liceret, nec ulla usquam libertas Sacerdotibus in sexta Synodo datur post Sacerdotium Uxores ducendi, sicut vos asseritis.

Itaq; a principio nascentis Ecclesiæ, plane comperitum est nullo unquam tempore licuisse Sacerdoti post Sacerdotium Uxorem ducere; atq; ubicunq; id fuit attentatum, id non fuit impune, nam tantum nefas ausus deponetur a Sacerdotio. Paulus Apostolus inquit, de conjugibus loquens, nolite fraudare invicem nisi forte ex consensu ad tempus, ut vacetis orationi. Hieronymus in Apologia ad Pammachium ait, Paulus Apostolus dicit, Quando coimus cum Uxoribus nos orare non posse, si per coitum quod minus same, and that our people may thereto the better know their duties to us, being their king and sovereign lord.

Thirdly; We straitly charge and command you, that neither in your private communications you shall use any words that may sound to the contrary of this our commandment, ne you shall keep or retain any man of any degree, that shall in his words privately or openly, directly or indirectly, speak in these matters of the ceremonies, contentiously or contemptuously; but we will that in case ye have, or shall have towards you any such person that will not better temper his tongue, you shall as an offender and a seductor of our people, send the same in sure custody to us and our council, to be punished as shall appertain; and seembly to do with other strangers whom ye shall hear to be notable offenders in that part.

Fourthly; Our pleasure and commandment is, that you shall on your behalf, give strait commandment upon like pain of deprivation and further punishment, to all parsons, vicars, curates, and governors of religious houses, colleges, and other places ecclesiastical within your diocess, that they and every of them shall, touching the indifferent praise of ceremonies, the avoiding of contentious and contemptuous communication, concerning any of the same, and the distinct and plain reading of our said articles, observe and perform, in their churches, monasteries, and other houses ecclesiastical aforesaid, the very same order that is before to you prescribed. And further, that you permit nor suffer any man, of what degree soever in learning, strangers or other, to preach in any place within your said diocess out of his own church, by virtue of any license by us, or any other of our ministers, granted before the fifteenth day of this month, neither in your presence nor elsewhere, unless he be a man of such honesty, virtue, learning, and judgment as you shall think able for that purpose, and one whom in manner you dare answer for.

Finally; Whereas we be advertised that divers priests have presumed to marry themselves, contrary to the custom of our church of England, our pleasure is, Ye shall make secret enquiry within your diocess, whether there be any such resident within the same or not: and in case ye shall find that there be any priests that have so presumed to marry themselves, and have sithence nevertheless used and exercised in anything the office of priesthood, we charge you, as ye will answer upon the pains aforesaid, not to conceal their doings therein, but rather to signify their demeanour to our council, or to cause them to be apprehended, and so sent up unto us accordingly. Given under our signet at our castle of Windsor, the 19th day of November, in the 28th year of our reign.

[Cotton Libr. Cloop. E. 5.]

Quod Confessio Auricularis sit de Jure Divino.

PROBARI videtur ex illo loco Matthæi iii. ubi Joanne Baptista in deserto prædicante pœnitentiam, exhibat ad eum Hierosolyma et omnis Judæa, et baptizabantur ab eo in Jordane confidentes peccata sua; quem locum Chrysostomus ita exponit, inquiens, Confessio peccatorum est testimonium Conscientiæ confidentis Deum, qui enim timet Judicium Dei peccata sua non erubescat confiteri; qui autem erubescit non timet, perfectus enim timor solvit omnem pudorem; illic enim turpitudine confessionis aspicitur, ubi futuri judicii pœna non creditur. Nunquid nescimus quia Confessio peccatorum habet pudorem, et quia hoc ipsum erubescere pœna est gravis, sed ideo magis nos jubet Deus confiteri peccata nostra, ut verecundiam patiamur pro pœna? nam et hoc ipsum pars est Judicii, O misericordia Dei! quem totiens ad iracundiam excitavimus, sufficit ei! solus pudor pro pœna.

Si verecundia pro pœna est apud Deum, ea autem non continget ex confessione facta soli Deo, nam nemo rationis compos ignorat etiam absque confessione. Deum peccata nostra scire, de Confessione facta homini necesse est intelligatur¹. Præterea ipsa Verba demonstrant quod Joanni Baptiste confessi sunt peccata sua, nam dixit eis, facite ergo fructum dignum pœnitentia, quod apte dicere non poterat, nisi pœnitentes eos ex confessione sibifacta rescivisset.

Beda Marci I.

Et Baptizabantur ab illo in Jordane flumine, confidentes peccata sua². Exemplum confitentium peccata ac meliorem vitam promittendi datur eis, qui Baptisma accipere desiderant, sicut etiam prædicante³ Paulo in Epheso multi credentium veniebant, confitentes et annunciantes actus suos, quatenus abdicata vita veteri, renovari mererentur in Christo.

Scribitur quoque in Evangelio Joannis xxi. Quorum remisistis peccata, remittuntur eis, et quorum retinueritis, retenta sunt: et Matth. xviii. Quæcunq; ligaveritis super terram erunt ligata in Cœlo, et quæcunq; solveritis super terram, erunt soluta in Cœlo⁴. Remittere autem et solvere nemo potest id quod ignorat, occulta autem peccata præter peccantem novit nisi solus Deus, quare nisi peccata aperiantur Sacerdoti, nec ea ligare nec solvere posset. Et⁵ quemadmodum Sacratissima tua Majestas, si commissionem aliquibus dedisset audiendi et terminandi negotium aliquod, non possent judices rem ignorantes nisi negotio coram eis patefacto causam finire, viz. propter culpam litigatorum non comparentium coram eis; sic nec Sacerdotes ligare et solvere possunt peccata quæ ignorant. Itaque cum Deus Sacerdotem velut medicum Spiritualem Ecclesiæ dederit, si quis enim sua vulnera celat ipse sua culpa perit, cum tamen de salute sua deberet esse sollicitus, sicut Paulus ad Phil. ii. admonet, inquiens, cum metu et tremore Salutem vestram operamini.

Origines in Levit. Homilia 2. loquens de Remissionibus Peccatorum.

Est⁷ adhuc et septima, licet dura et laboriosa, per pœnitentiam remissio peccatorum, cum lavat peccator lacrimis stratum suum, et fiunt ei lacrimæ suæ panis die et nocte, et cum non erubescit Sacerdoti Domini indicare peccatum suum, et quærere medicinam secundum eum qui ait, Dixi pronuntiatio adversum me injustitiam meam Domino, et tu remisisti impietatem cordis mei, in quo impletur et illud quod Jacobus Apostolus dicit, Si quis autem infirmatur, vocet Presbyteros Ecclesiæ, et imponant ei manus⁸, ungentes eum oleo in nomine Domini, et oratio fidei salvabit infirmum, et si in peccatis fuerit remittentur ei.

Origenes Homilia 2. in Psal. 37.

Intellige mihi fidelem quidem hominem sed tamen infirmum, qui etiam vinci ab aliquo peccato potuit, et propter hoc mugientem pro delictis suis et omnimodo curam vulneris sui sanitatemque requirentem,

³ Exemplum dicit non præceptum.

⁴ Non præceptum.

⁵ Huic respondendum est. Absolutio datur in remedium peccatorum petentibus tantum, nam si non petiero.

⁶ Exemplum bene declarat rem, sed non perire positum.

licet præventus sit et lapsus, volentem tamen medelam ac salutem reparare; si ergo hujusmodi homo memor delicti sui, confiteatur quæ commisit, et humana confusione parvi pendat eos, qui exprobrant eum confitentem, et notant vel irrident¹, ille autem intelligens per hoc veniam sibi dari, et in die Resurrectionis pro his quibus nunc confunditur coram hominibus, tunc ante Angelos Dei confusionem atque opprobria evasurum, ut nolit tegere et occultare maculam suam, sed pronunciet delictum suum, nec velit esse Sepulchrum dealbatum, quod deforis quidem appareat hominibus speciosum, id est ut videntibus se quasi justus appareat, intus autem sit repletus omni immunditie et ossibus mortuorum.

Et paulo post, Quoniam iniquitatem meam pronuncio. Pronunciationem iniquitatis, id est confessionem peccati, frequentius diximus, vide ergo quid edocet nos scriptura divina, quia oportet peccatum non celare intrinsecus; fortassis enim sicut ii qui habent intus inclusam escam indigestam, aut humoris, vel flegmatis stomacho graviter et moleste imminentem, si vomuerunt relevantur; ita etiam hi qui peccarunt, si quidem occultant et retinent intra se peccatum intrinsecus urgentur, et propemodum suffocantur a phlegmate vel humore peccati: Si autem ipse sui accusator fiat, dum accusat semetipsum, simul evomit et delictum, atque omnem morbi digerit causam. Tantummodo circumspice diligentius cui debeas confiteri peccatum tuum, proba prius medicum cui debeas causam languoris exponere, qui sciat infirmari cum infirmante, flere cum flente, qui condolendi et compatiendi noverit disciplinam, ut ita demum si quid ille dixeret, qui se prius et eruditum medicum ostenderit et misericordem, si quid consilii dederit, facias et sequaris, si intellexerit et præviderit talem esse languorem tuum, qui in conventu totius Ecclesiæ exponi debeat et curari, ex quo fortassis et cæteri edificari poterunt, et tu ipse facile sanari, multa hac deliberatione et satis perito medici illius consilio procurandum est.

Denique², quando et fide majore et timore meliores sunt, qui quamvis nullo Sacrificii aut libelli facinore constricti, quoniam tamen de hoc vel cogitaverunt, hoc ipsum apud Sacerdotes Dei dolenter et simpliciter confitentur, exomologesin conscientiæ faciunt, animi sui pondus exponunt, salutarem medelam parvis licet et modicis vulneribus exquirunt, scientes scriptum esse, Deus non deridetur; derideri et circumveniri Deus non potest, nec astutia aliqua fallente deludi: plus imo delinquit qui secundum hominem Deum cogitans evadere se pœnam criminis credit si non palam crimen admisit. Christus in præceptis suis dicit, qui confusus me fuerit, confundet eum filius hominis, et Christianum se putat qui Christianus esse aut confunditur aut veretur: Quomodo potest esse cum Christo, qui ad Christum pertinere aut erubescit aut metuit? minus plane peccaverit non videndo idola, nec sub oculis circumstantis atque insultantis populi sanctitatem fidei profanando, non polluendo manus suas funestis Sacrificiis, nec sceleratis cibis ora maculando; hoc eo proficit ut sit minor culpa, non ut innocens conscientia; facilius potest ad veniam criminis pervenire, non est tamen immunis a crimine, nec cessat in agenda pœnitentia, atque in Domini misericordia deprecanda, ne quod minus esse in qualitate delicti videtur, in neglecta satisfactione cumuletur. Confiteantur singuli, queso vos fratres, delictum suum, dum adhuc qui deliquit in sæculo est, dum admitti confessio ejus potest, dum satisfactio et remissio facta per Sacerdotes apud Dominum grata est; convertamur ad Dominum mente tota, et pœnitentiam criminis veris doloribus exprimentis Dei misericordiam deprecemur; illi se anima prosternat, illi mœstitia satisfaciatur, illi spes omnis incumbat; rogare qualiter debeamus dicit ipse, Revertimini inquit, ad me ex toto corde vestro, simulque et jejunio, et fletu, et planctu, et scindite corda vestra et non vestimenta.

XI.—A Letter of King Henry's to Tonstall, Bishop of Durham, against Auricular Confession being of Divine Institution. An Original.

[Cott. Libr. Cleop. E. 5.]

SINCE me thought (my lord of Durham) that both the bishops of York, Winchester, and your reasons and texts were so fully answered this other day, in our house as, to my seeming and supposal, the most of the house was satisfied; I marvelled not a little why efts-oon you have sent to me this now your writing, being in a manner few other texts or reasons than there were declared both by the bishop of Canterbury and me, to make small or nothing to your intended purpose: but either I esteem that you do it to prove my simple judgment alone, which indeed doth not much use (though not the wisest) to call in aid the judgments of other learned men, and so by mine ignorant answer, seem to win the field; or else that you be too much blinded in your own fancy and judgment, to think that a truth, which by learning you have not yet proved, nor I fear me cannot by Scriptures, nor any other direct and probable grounds, though I know mine insufficiency in learning, if the matter were indifferent, and that the balance stood equal, since I take the verity of the cause rather to favourize the part I take than yours; it giveth me therefore great boldness, not presuming in learning, but in justness of the cause, seeing by writing you have provoked me to it, to make answer to your arguments: therefore I beginning now to reply to your first allegation, shall essay to prove, if I can, that your own author in place by you alleged, maketh plain against your opinion; for as you allege him, St. Chrysostom saith, Quod sufficit solus pudor pro pœna, then auricular confession is not by commandment necessary; for if it were, this word (Solus) is by your author ill set; therefore your author in this place furthereth you but little. To your Fallax argument, I deny your consequent, founded only upon small reason, which is the ground of your Fallax argument: which reason I need not take away, for your alleged author doth show too plainly, in his 5 Homily, Tom. 5, that you gather wrong sense upon his words; for he saith, with much more touching this matter, these few words, Non hominibus peccato delegere cogo; then this other text before rehearsed, is not to be understood as you will by writing it. Further, methinketh, I need not (God thank you) too greatly study for authors to conclude your wrong taking of texts, for those yourself allege serveth me well to purpose: for all your labour is to prove that auricular confession were by God commanded, and both your authorities of Bede and Paul sheweth nothing but that they did confess their sins, and yet do not they affirm that it was by commandment; wherefore they make for mine argument and not for yours. Your other texts, of John 21 and Matthew 10, were so thoroughly answered this other day, and so manifestly declared not to appertain to our grounded argument, that I marvel you be not ashamed eft-soons to put them in writing, and to found your argument now so fondly on them; for what fonder argument can be made to prove thereby a necessity of confession, than to say, If you confess not, I cannot forgive? Would a thief which committeth felony, think himself obliged by the law to disclose his felony, if the law say no more, but if thou confess not I cannot forgive thee? or would theft the sooner therefore to be forgiven? This is matter so apparent, that none can but perceive except he would not see. As touching Origen's places by you alleged; as the first, in Leviticum, sheweth that we be as much bound lavare stratum lacrimis, as dicere sacerdoti, no man, I think, will affirm that we be bound to do; and yet he affirmeth not that any of them is commanded: the text also whereby ye would approve his so saying, doth not yet speak quod pronuntiabo justitiam meam sacerdoti, but Domino: the other o. James seemeth better to make for extreme unction, than for confession; for when was ever the use, that folk coming only to confession, were wont to be anointed with oil? therefore this makes nothing to your argument. As touching Origen in Psalm xxxvii. he saith not, quod obligamur dicere sacerdoti, but si confiteantur; and seemeth rather to persuade men that they should not parvipendere confessionem, (as all good folk would) than that they were obliged to confess them to a priest. Though Cyprian de Lapsis doth praise them which do confess their faults to priests, yet doth he confess that we be not bound to do so; for he saith in the highest of his praise these words, How much be they then higher in faith, and better in fear of God, which though they be not bound by any deed of sacrifice, or book, yet be they content sorrowfully to confess to the priest sins! He knowledgeth no bond in us by neither fact of sacrifice or libel, why allege you (though he praise auricular confession) that we should be bound by God and law thereto? This is no proof thereof, neither by reason nor by Scripture, nor any good authority. And whereas he saith further, Confiteantur singuli, quæso vos fratres, delictum suum; this doth not argue a precept: nor yet the saying of Esay, cap. xliii. secundum Septuaginta; nor Solomon in the Proverbs x.

for these speak rather of knowledging our offence to God in our heart, than of auricular confession; after David the prophet's saying and teaching, when he said, Tibi soli peccavi, that was not to a priest. By the text also which you allege, beginning, circa personas vero ministrorum, &c. you do openly confess that the church hath not accepted auricular confession to be by God's commandment; or else by your saying and allegation, they have long erred: for you confess that the church hath divers times changed both to whom confession should be made, and times when; and that also they have changed divers ways for divers regions; if it were by God's commandment they might not do thus; wherefore, my lord, since I hear no other allegations, I pray you blame not me though I be not of your opinion; and of the both, I think that I have more cause to think you obstinate than you me, seeing your authors and allegations make so little to your purpose. And thus fare you well.

THE REFORMATION OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

THE JOURNAL OF KING EDWARD'S REIGN,

WRITTEN WITH HIS OWN HAND.

The Original is in the Cotton Library. Nero C. 10.

THE year of our Lord 1537, was a prince born to king Henry VIII., by Jane Seimour then queen, who within few days after the birth of her son died, and was buried at the castle of Windsor. This child was christened by the duke of Norfolk, the duke of Suffolk, and the archbishop of Canterbury. Afterwards was brought up till he came to six years old among the women. At the sixth year of his age he was brought up in learning by master doctor Cox, who was after his almoner, and John Cheeke master of arts, two well-learned men, who sought to bring him up in learning of tongues, of the Scripture, of philosophy, and all liberal sciences. Also John Bellmaine, Frenchman, did teach him the French language. The tenth year not yet ended, it was appointed he should be created prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and count Palatine of Chester; at which time, being the year of our Lord 1547, the said king died of a dropsie as it was thought. After whose death incontinent came Edward earl of Hartford, and sir Anthony Brown, master of the horse, to convoy this prince to Enfield, where the earl of Hartford declared to him and his younger sister Elizabeth the death of their father.

Here he begins anew again.

After the death of king Henry VIII., his son Edward, prince of Wales, was come to at Hartford, by the earl of Hartford, and sir Anthony Brown, master of the horse; for whom before was made great preparation that he might be created prince of Wales, and afterward was brought to Enfield, where the death of his father was first shewed him; and the same day the death of his father was shewed in London, where was great lamentation and weeping: and suddenly he proclaimed king. The next day, being the of he was brought to the Tower of London, where he tarried the space of three weeks; and in the mean season the council sat every day for the performance of the will, and at length thought best that the earl of Hartford should be made duke of Somerset, sir Thomas Seimour lord Sudley, the earl of Essex Marquess of Northampton, and divers knights should be made barons, as the lord Sheffield, with divers others. Also they thought best to chuse the duke of Somerset to be protector of the realm, and governor of the king's person during his minority; to which all the gentlemen and lords did agree, because he was the king's uncle on his mother's side. Also in this time the late king was buried at Windsor with much solemnity, and the officers broke their staves, hurling them into the grave; but they were restored to them again when they came to the Tower. The lord Lisle was made earl of Warwick, and the lord great-chamberlainship was given to him; and the lord Sudley made admiral of England: all these things were done, the king being in the Tower. Afterwards all things being prepared for the coronation, the king then being but nine years old, passed through the City of London, as heretofore hath been used, and came to the palace of Westminster; and the next day came into Westminster-hall. And it was asked the people, whether they would have him to be their king? Who answered, yea, yea: then he was crowned king of England, France, and Ireland, by the archbishop of Canterbury, and all the rest of the clergy and nobles; and anointed with all such ceremonies as were accustomed, and took his oath, and gave a general pardon, and so was brought to the hall to dinner on Shrove Sunday, where he sat with the crown on his head, with the archbishop of Canterbury, and the lord protector; and all the lords sat at boards in the hall beneath, and the lord marshal's deputy, (for my lord of Somerset was lord marshal) rode about the hall to make room; then came in sir John Dimock, champion, and made his challenge, and so the king drank to him, and he had the cup. At night the king returned to his palace at Westminster, where there was justs and barriers; and afterward order was taken for all his servants being with his father, and being with the prince, and the ordinary and unordinary were appointed. In the mean season sir Andrew Dudley, brother to my lord of Warwick, being in the Paunsie, met with the Lion, a principal ship of Scotland, which thought to take the Paunsie without resistance; but the Paunsie approached her, and she shot, but at length they came very near, and then the Paunsie shooting off all one side, burst all the overlop of the Lion, and all her tackling, and at length boarded her and took her; but in the return, by negligence, she was lost at Harwich-Haven, with almost all her men.

In the month of May* died the French king, called Francis, and his son called Henry was proclaimed king. There came also out of Scotland an ambassador, but brought nothing to pass, and an army was prepared to go into Scotland. Certain injunctions were set forth, which took away divers ceremonies, and commissions sent to take down images, and certain homilies were set forth to be read in the church. Dr. Smith of Oxford recanted at Paul's certain opinions of the mass, and that Christ was not according to the order of Melchisedeck. The lord Seimour of Sudley married the queen, whose name was Katherine, with which marriage the lord protector was much offended.

There was great preparation made to go into Scotland, and the lord protector, the earl of Warwick, the lord Dacres, the lord Gray, and Mr. Brian, went with a great number of nobles and gentlemen to Warwick; where the first day after his coming, he mustered all his company, which were to the number of thirteen thousand footmen, and five thousand horsemen. The next day he marched on into Scotland, and so passed the Pease; then he burnt two castles in Scotland, and so passed a stright of a bridg, where three hundred Scots' light-horsemen set upon him behind him, who were discomfited. So he passed to Musselburgh, where the first day after he came, he went up to the hill, and saw the Scots, thinking them, as they were indeed, at least thirty-six thousand men; and my lord of Warwick was almost taken, chasing the earl of Huntley, by an ambush, but he was rescued by one Bertivell, with twelve hagbutters on horseback, and the ambush ran away.

* Should be March.

The 10th day of September, the lord protector thought to get the hill, which the Scots seeing, passed the bridge over the river of Musselburgh, and strove for the higher ground, and almost got it; but our horsemen set upon them, who although they stayed them, yet were put to flight, and gathered together again by the duke of Somerset, lord protector, and the earl of Warwick, and were ready to give a new onset. The Scots being amazed with this, fled their ways, some to Edinburgh, some to the sea, and some to Dalkeith; and there were slain ten thousand of them, but of Englishmen fifty-one horsemen, which were almost all gentlemen, and but one footman. Prisoners were taken, the lord Huntley chancellor of Scotland, and divers other gentlemen; and slain of lairds one thousand. And Mr. Brian, Sadler, and Vane, were made bannerets.

After this battel Broughty Crag was given to the Englishmen, and Hume, and Roxburgh, and Heymouth, which were forfeited, and captains were put in them, and the lord of Somerset rewarded with 500*l.* lands. In the mean season, Stephen Gardiner bishop of Winchester, was, for not receiving the injunctions, committed to ward. There was also a parliament called, wherein all chauntries were granted to the king, and an extream law made for vagabonds, and divers other things. Also the Scots besieged Broughty-Crag, which was defended against them all, by Sir Andrew Dudley Knight, and oftentimes their ordnance was taken and marred.

YEAR II.

A triumph was, where six gentlemen did challenge all comers, at barriers, jousts, and tournay; and also that they would keep a fortress with thirty, with them against an hundred, or under, which was done at Greenwich.

Sir Edward Bellingam being sent into Ireland deputy, and sir Anthony St. Leiger revoked, he took O'Canor, and O'Mor, briuing the lords that rebelled into subjection; and O'Canor and O'Mor leaving their lordships, had a-piece an 100*l.* pension.

The Scots besieged the town of Haddington, where the captain, Mr. Willford, every day made issues upon them, and slew divers of them. The thing was very weak, but for the men, who did very manfully. Oftentimes Mr. Holcroft and Mr. Palmer did victual it by force, passing through the enemies; and at last the Rhinegrave unawares set upon Mr. Palmer, which was there with near a thousand and five hundred horsemen, and discomfited him, taking him, Mr. Bowes warden of the West Marches, and divers other, to the number of four hundred, and slew a few. (Upon St. Peter's day, the bishop of Winchester was committed to the Tower.) Then they made divers brags, and they had the like made to them. Then went the earl of Shrewsbury general of the army, with twenty-two thousand men, and burnt divers towns and fortresses; which the Frenchmen and Scots hearing, levied their siege in the month of September; in the levying of which there came one Tiberio, who as then was in Haddington, and setting forth the weakness of the town, told him, that all honour was due to the defenders, and none to the assailers; so the siege being levied, the earl of Shrewsbury entred it, and victualled, and reinforced it. After his departing by night, there came into the outer court at Haddington two thousand men armed, taking the townsmen in their shirts; who yet defended them, with the help of the watch, and at length, with ordnance, issued out upon them, and slew a marvellous number, bearing divers assaults, and at length drove them home, and kept the town safe.

A parliament was called, where an uniform order of prayer was institute, before made by a number of bishops and learned men gathered together in Windsor. There was granted a subsidy, and there was a notable disputation of the sacrament in the parliament house. Also the lord Sudley, admiral of England, was condemned to death, and died in March ensuing. Sir William Sharington was also condemned for making false coin, which he himself confessed. Divers also were put in the Tower.

YEAR III.

Hume castle was taken by night, and treason, by the Scots. Mr. Willford, in a skirmish, was left of his men, sore hurt and taken. There was a skirmish at Broughty-Craig, wherein Mr. Lutterell, captain after Mr. Dudley, did burn certain villages, and took Monsieur de Toge prisoner. The Frenchmen by night assaulted Boulningberg, and were manfully repulsed, after they had made faggots with pitch, tar, tallow, rosin, powder, and wildfire, to burn the ships in the haven of Bolein, but they were driven away by the Boloners, and their faggots taken.

In Mr. Bowes place, who was warden of the West Marches, was put the lord Dacres; and in the lord Gray's place, the earl of Rutland; who after his coming entred Scotland, and burnt divers villages, and took much prey. The people began to rise in Wiltshire, where sir William Herbert did put them down, over-run, and slew them. Then they rose in Sussex, Hampshire, Kent, Gloucestershire, Suffolk, Warwickshire, Essex, Hartfordshire, a piece of Leicestershire, Worcestershire, and Rutlandshire, where by fair persuasions, partly of honest men among themselves, partly by gentlemen, they were often appeased; and because certain commissions were sent down to pluck down inclosures, they did rise again. The French king perceiving this, caused war to be proclaimed; and hearing that our ships lay at Jersey, sent a great number of his galleys, and certain ships to surprise our ships; but they being at anchor, beat the French, that they were fain to retire with the loss of one thousand of their men.

At the same time the French king passed by Bolein to New Haven, with his army, and took Blackness by treason, and the Almain camp; which done, New Haven surrendered. There were also in a skirmish, between three hundred English footmen, and three hundred French horsemen, six noblemen slain. Then the French king came with his army to Bolein, which they seeing, razed Boulningberg; but because of the plague, he was compelled to retire, and Chastilion was left behind, as governor of the army. In the mean season, because there was a rumour that I was dead, I passed through London.

After that they rose in Oxfordshire, Devonshire,

Norfolk, and Yorkshire. To Oxford, the lord Gray of Wilton was sent with fifteen hundred horsemen and footmen; whose coming, with the assembling of the gentlemen of the country, did so abash the rebels, that more than half of them ran their ways, and other that carried were some slain, some taken, and some hanged. To Devonshire the lord-privy seal was sent, who, with his band, being but small, lay at Honington, whiles the rebels besieged Exeter, who did use divers pretty feats of war, for after divers skirmishes, when the gates were burnt, they in the city did continue the fire till they had made a rampier within; also after, when they were undermined, and powder was laid in the mine, they within drowned the powder and the mine with water they cast in; which the lord privy-seal having thought to have gone to enforce them a by-way, of which the rebels having spial, cut all the trees betwixt St. Mary Outrie and Exeter; for which cause the lord privy-seal burnt that town, and thought to return home. The rebels kept a bridg behind his back, and so compelled him, with his small band, to set upon them, which he did, and overcame them, killing six hundred of them, and returning home without any loss of men. Then the lord Gray, and Spinola, with their bands, came to him, and afterward Gray, with two hundred of Reading, with which bands he being reinforced, came to raise the siege at Exeter, for because they had scarcity of victual; and as he passed from Honington, he came to a little town of his own, whither came but only two ways, which they had reinforced with two bulwarks made of earth, and had put to the defence of the same about two thousand men; and the rest they had laid, some at a bridg called Honington-bridg, partly at a certain hedg in a high-way, and the most part at the siege of Exeter. The rereward of the horsemen, of which Travers was captain, set upon the one bulwark, the ward and battail on the other; Spinola's band kept them occupied at their wall; at length Travers drove them into the town, which the lord privy-seal burnt. Then they ran to a bridg thereby, from whence being driven, there were in a plain about nine hundred of them slain.

The next day they were met about other two thousand of them, at the entry of a high-way, who first desired to talk, and in the mean season fortified themselves; which being perceived, they ran their ways, and that same night the city of Exeter was delivered of the siege. After that they gathered at Launston, to whom the lord privy-seal and Sir Will. Herbert went and overthrew them, taking their chief heads and executing them. Nevertheless some sailed to Bridgewater, and went about sedition, but were quickly repressed. Hitherto of Devonshire. At this time the black gally was taken. Now to Norfolk. The people suddenly gathered together in Norfolk, and increased to a great number, against whom the lord marquess of Northampton was sent, with the number of one thousand and sixty horsemen, who winning the town of Norwich, kept it one day and one night; and the next day in the morning, with the loss of one hundred men, departed out of the town, among whom the lord Sheffield was slain. There were taken divers gentlemen and servingmen, to the number of thirty; with which victory the rebels were very glad; but afterward hearing that the earl of Warwick came against them, they began to stay upon a strong plot of ground upon a hill near to the town of Norwich, having the town confederate with them. The earl of Warwick came with the number of six thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horsemen, and entered into the town of Norwich; which having won it, was so weak that he could scarcely defend it; and oftentimes the rebels came into the streets, killing divers of his men, and were repulsed again; yea, and the townsmen were given to mischief themselves; so, having endured their assaults three days, and stopped their victuals, the rebels were constrained, for lack of meat, to remove; whom the earl of Warwick followed with one thousand Almain, and his horsemen, leaving the English footmen in the town, and overcame them in plain battel, killing two thousand of them, and taking Ket their captain, who in January following was hanged at Norwich, and his head hanged out; Ket's brother was taken also, and punished alike. In the mean season Chastilion besieged the peer of Bolloin made in the haven, and after long battery, twenty thousand shot or more, gave assault to it, and were manfully repulsed; nevertheless they continued the siege still, and made often skirmishes, and false assaults, in which they won not much. Therefore seeing they profited little that way, they planted ordnance against the mouth of the haven, that no victual might come to it; which our men seeing, set upon them by night and slew divers Frenchmen, and dismounted many of their peeces; nevertheless the French came another time and planted their ordnance toward the sea-side of the sand-hills, and beat divers ships of victualers at the entry of the haven; but yet the Englishmen, at the king's adventure, came into the haven and refreshed divers times the town. The Frenchmen, seeing they could not that way prevail, continued their battery but smally, on which before they had spent fifteen hundred shot in a day, but loaded a galley with stones and gravel, which they let go in the stream to sink it; but ere it sunk, it came near to one bank, where the Bulloners took it out, and brought the stones to reinforce the peer. Also at Guines was a certain skirmish, in which there was about an hundred Frenchmen slain, of which some were gentlemen and noblemen. In the mean season in England rose great stirs, like to increase much if it had not been well foreseen. The council, about nineteen of them, were gathered in London, thinking to meet with the lord protector, and to make him amend some of his disorders. He fearing his state, caused the secretary, in my name, to be sent to the lords, to know for what cause they gathered their powers together; and if they meant to talk with him, that they should come in a peaceable manner. The next morning, being the 6th of October and Saturday, he commanded the armour to be brought down out of the armoury of Hampton-court, about five hundred harnesses to arm both his and my men, with all the gates of the house to be rampiered, people to be raised: people came abundantly to the house. That night, with all the people, at nine or ten of the clock of the night, I went to Windsor, and there was watch and ward kept every night. The lords sat in open places of London, calling for gentlemen before them, and declaring the causes of accusation of the lord protector, and caused the same to be proclaimed. After which time few came to Windsor, but only mine own men of the guard, whom the lords willed, fearing the rage of the people so lately quieted. Then began the protector to treat by letters, sending sir Philip Hobbey, lately come from his ambassage in Flanders, to see to his family, who brought in his return a letter to the protector, very gentle, which he delivered to him, another to me, and another to my house, to declare his faults, ambition, vain-glory, entering into rash wars in my youth, negligent looking on Newhaven, enriching of himself of my treasure, following of his own opinion, and doing all by his own authority, &c. Which letters were openly read, and immediately the lords came to Windsor, took him, and brought him through Holborn to the Tower. Afterward I came to Hampton-court, where they appointed, by my consent, six lords of the council to be attendant on me, at least two and four knights; lords, the marquess of Northampton, the earls of Warwick and Arundel, the lords Russell, St. John, and Wentworth; knights, sir Andr. Dudley, sir Edw. Rogers, sir Tho. Darcy, and sir Tho. Wroth. After I came through London to Westminster. The lord of Warwick made admiral of England; sir Thomas Cheiney sent to the emperor for relief, which he could not obtain; Master Wotton made secretary; the lord protector by his own agreement and submission, lost his protectorship, treasurership, marshalship, all his moveables, and more, 2000*l.* land, by act of parliament. The earl of Arundel committed to his house, for certain crimes of suspicion against him, as plucking down of bolts and locks at Westminster, giving of my staff away, &c., and put to fine of 12000*l.* to be paid 1000*l.* yearly, of which he was after relieved.

Also Mr. Southwell committed to the Tower for certain bills of sedition, written with his hand, and put to fine of 500*l.* Likewise sir Tho. Arundel, and six, then committed to the Tower for conspiracies in the west places. A parliament, where was made a manner to consecrate, priests, bishops, and deacons. Mr. Paget surrendering his comptrolership, was made lord Paget of Beaudesert, and cited into the higher house by a writ of parliament. Sir Anthony Wingfield, before vice-chamberlain, made comptroller. Sir Thomas Darcy made vice-chamberlain. Guidotti made divers errands from the constable of France to make peace with us; upon which were appointed four commissioners to treat; and they, after long debate-ment, made a treaty as followeth.

Anno 1549. Mart. 24.

Peace concluded between England, France, and Scotland. By our English side, John earl of Bedford, lord privy seal, lord Paget de Beaudesert, sir William Petre secretary, and sir John Mason. On the French side, monsieur de Rochepot, monsieur Chastilion, Guillaert de Mortier, and Boucheral de Sany, upon these conditions, that all titles, tribute, and defences, should remain; that the faults of one man, except he be not punished, should not break the league. That the ships of merchandize shall pass to and fro: that pirates shall be called back, and ships of war. That prisoners shall be delivered of both sides. That we shall not war with Scotland. That Bolein, with the pieces of new conquest, and two basilisks, two demy-cannons, three culverins, two demy-culverins, three sacres, six falcons, ninety-four hagbutts, a crook, with wooden tails, and twenty-one iron pieces; and Lauder, and Dunglas, with all the ordnance save that that came from Haddington, shall, within six months after this peace proclaimed, be delivered; and for that the French to pay 200000 scutes within three days after the delivery of Bolein, and 200000 scutes on our Lady-day in harvest next ensuing; and that if the Scots raze Lauder, and we should raze Roxburg and Heymouth. 16. Removing to Westminster.

19. Prices were set of all kind of grains, butter, cheese, and poultry-ware, by a proclamation.

20. The Frenchmen came to Sandfield and Finswood, to the number of eight hundred, and there on my ground did spoil my subjects that were relieved by the wood.

26. The French ambassador came to excuse the foresaid men, saying, they thought it not meet that that wood should be spoiled of us, being thought and claimed as theirs, and therefore they lay there.

24. There were a thousand men embarqued to go to Calais, and so to Guisnes, and Hammes, Riebank, Newmanbridge, the cause and the bulwarks, with victual for the same.

November.

19. There were letters sent to every bishop to pluck down the altars.

20. There were letters sent down to the gentlemen of every shire, for the observation of the last proclamation touching corn, because there came none to the markets, commanding them to punish the offenders.

29. Upon the letters written back by the same, the second proclamation was abolished.

December.

15. There was letters sent for the taking of certain chaplains of the lady Mary for saying mass, which she denied.

19. Borthwick was sent to the king of Denmark, with privy instructions for the marriage of the lady Elizabeth to his son.

20. There was appointed a band of horsemen divided amongst the nobles.

An hundred to the duke of Somerset.

Fifty to my lord Marquess of Northampton.

Lord Marquess of Dorset. To the earl of Warwick.

Earl of Wiltshire.

Lord Wentworth.

Lord privy seal.

Lord Admiral.

Lord Paget.

Mr. Herbert.

Mr. Sadler.

Mr. Treasurer.

Mr. Darcy.

24. Removing to Greenwich.

26. Peace concluded between the emperor and the Scots.

January.

6. The earl of Arundel remitted of 80,000*l.* which he ought to have payed for certain faults he had committed within twelve years.

7. There was appointed, for because the Frenchmen did go about practice in Ireland, that there should be prepared four ships, four barques, four pinaces, and twelve victuallers, to take three havens; of which two were on the south side toward France, and one in James Cannes the Scottish country, and also send and break the foresaid conspiracies.

10. Three ships being sent forth into the narrow seas, took certain pirates, and brought them into England, where the most part was hanged.

27. Monsieur de Lausac came from the French king by way of request, to ask that Coumilis, the fishing of the Tweed, Edrington, the ground debatable, and the Scotch hostages that were put here in the king my father's days, should be delivered to the Scots, that they might be suffered to traffique, as though they were in peace, and that all interest of the foresaid houses should be delivered to the Scots. Also that those prisoners which were bound to pay their ransoms before the peace last concluded, should not enjoy the benefit of the peace.

18. The lord Cobham was appointed to be general lieutenant in Ireland.

30. Letters written to Mr. St. Lieger to repair to the south parts of Ireland with his force.

February.

3. Mr. Crofts appointed to go into Ireland, and there, with Rogers and certain artificers, to take the havens aforesaid, and begin some fortification.

5. Divers merchants of London were spoken withal for provision of corn out of Dansick, about 40,000 quarters.

10. Mountford was commanded to go to provide for certain proportions of victual for the ships that should go into Ireland.

11. Also for provision to be sent to Barwick and the north parts.

16. Whaley was examined, for perswading divers nobles of the realm to make the duke of Somerset protector at the next parliament, and stood to the denial, the earl of Rutland affirming it manifestly.

13. The bishop of Winchester, after a long trial, was deposed of his bishoprick.

20. Sir William Pickering, kt. was dispatched to the French king for answer to monsieur de Lausac, to declare, that although I had right in the foresaid places, yet I was content to surrender them, under conditions to be agreed on by commissioners on both sides; and for the last articles I agreed without condition.

25. The lord marquess Dorset appointed to be warden of the north borders, having three sub-wardens, the lord Ogle, &c. in the east, and the lord Coniers in the west. Also Mr. Auger had the charge for victualling Calais.

28. The learned man Bucerus died at Cambridg; who was two days after buried in St. Mary's church at Cambridg; all the whole university, with the whole town, bringing him to the grave, to the number of three thousand persons. Also there was an oration of Mr. Haddon made very eloquently at his death, and a sermon of *—; after that master Redman made a third sermon; which three sermons made the people wonderfully to lament his death. Last of all, all the learned men of the university made their epitaphs in his praise, laying them on his grave.

March.

3. The lord Wentworth, lord chamberlain, died about ten of the clock at night, leaving behind him sixteen children.

* Dr. Parker.

1. Sir John York made great loss about 2000*l.* weight of silver, by treason of English men which he brought for prison of the Mints. Also Judd 1500, and also Tresham 500; so the whole came to 4000*l.*

February.

20. The Frenchmen came with a navy of one hundred and sixty sail into Scotland, loaden with provision of grain, powder, and ordnance; of which sixteen great ships perished on Ireland coast, two loaden with artillery, and fourteen with corn.

Also in this month the deputy there set at one, certain of the west lords that were at variance.

March.

10. Certain new fortifications were devised to be made at Calais; that at Graveling the water should be let in in my ground, and so should fetch a compass by the six bulwarks to Guisnes, Hammes, and Newnam-bridg; and that there should be a wall of eight foot high, and six broad of earth, to keep out the water, and to make a great marsh about the territories of Calais thirty-seven miles long. Also for flankers at the keep of Guisnes, willed to be made a three-cornered bulwark at the keep to keep it. Furthermore, at Newnam-bridg, a massy wall to the French side there, as was a green. Besides, at the West Gittie there should be another Gittie, which should defend the victuallers of the town always from shot from the sand-hills.

5. Mr. Aucher had 2000*l.* in mony, wherewith he provided out of Flanders for Calais two thousand quarters of barley, five hundred of wheat.

18. The lady Mary, my sister, came to me at Westminster, where, after salutations, she was called, with my council, into a chamber; where was declared how long I had suffered her mass, in hope of her reconciliation, and how now being no hope, which I perceived by her letters, except I saw some short amendment, I could not bear it. She answered, "that her soul was God's, and her faith she would not change, nor dissemble her opinion with contrary doings." It was said, "I constrained not her faith, but willed her not as a king to rule, but as a subject to obey; and that her example might breed too much inconvenience."

19. The emperor's ambassador came with a short message from his master of war, if I would not suffer his cousin, the princess, to use her mass. To this was no answer given at this time.

20. The bishops of Canterbury, London, Rochester, did consider to give license to sin, was sin; to suffer and wink at it for a time might be born, so all haste possible might be used.

23. The council having the bishop's answers, seeing my subjects taking their vent in Flanders, might put the whole realm in danger. The Flemings had cloth enough for a year in their hand, and were kept far under the danger of the papists; the fifteen hundred cinquetales of powder I had in Flanders, the harness they had for preparation of the gendarmory, the goods my merchants had there at the Woolfleet, decreed to send an ambassador to the emperor, Mr. Wotton, to deny the matter wholly, and perwade the emperor in it, thinking, by his going, to win some time for a preparation of a mart, convenience of powder, harness, &c., and for the surety of the realm. In the mean season, to punish the offenders, first of my servants that heard mass, next of hers.

24. Sir Anthony Brown sent to the Fleet for hearing mass with serjeant Morgan, sir Clement Smith, which a year before heard mass, chidden.

25. The ambassador of the emperor came to have his answer, but had none, saving, that one should go to the emperor within a month or two to declare the matter.

22. Sir William Pickering came with great thanks from the French king.

27. Removing to Greenwich.

31. A challenge made by me, that I, with sixteen of my chamber, should run at base, shoot, and run at the ring, with any seventeen of my servants' gentlemen in the court.

Mr. Croftis arrived in Ireland, and came to Waterford to the deputy, consulting for fortification of the town.

April.

1. The first day of the challenge at base, or running, the king won.

3. Monsieur de Lansac came again from the French king to go to Scotland, for appointing his commissioners on the Scotch side, who were the French ambassador in Scotland, the bishop of—, the master of Erskin, &c.

Thomas Darcy made lord Darcy of Chich, and lord chamberlain; for maintenance whereof he had given 100 merks to his heirs generally, and 300 to his heirs males.

6. I lost the challenge at shooting at rounds, and won at rovers.

7. There were appointed Commissioners on my side, either the bishop of Litchfield if he had no impediment, or Norwich, Mr. Bowes, Mr. Bekwith, and sir Thomas Chaloner.

8. Sir John Yates made vice-chamberlain, and captain of the guard, and 120*l.* land.

5. Poinet, bishop of Rochester, received his oath for the bishoprick of Winchester, having 2000 merk land appointed to him for his maintenance.

7. A certain Arrian of the strangers, a Dutchman, being excommunicated by the congregation of his countrymen, was after long disputation condemned to the fire.

9. The earl of Wiltshire had fifty more in my lord marquess Dorset's place, warden in the north; and my lord of Rutland in my lord Wentworth's place other fifty.

10. Mr. Wotton had his instructions made to go withal to the emperor, to be as ambassador legier in Mr. Morison's place, and to declare this resolution, that if the emperor would suffer my ambassador with him, to use his service, then I would him; if he would not suffer mine, I would not suffer his. Likewise, that my sister was my subject, and should use my service appointed by act of parliament.

Also it was appointed to make 20000 pound weight for necessity somewhat baser, to get gains 16,000*l.* clear, by which the debt of the realm might be paid, the country defended from any sudden attempt, and the coin amended.

11. Mr. Pickering had his instructions and dispatch to go into France as ambassador legier there, in Mr. Mason's place, who desired very much to come home; and Mr. Pickering had instructions to tell the French king of the appointing of my commissioners in Scotland aforesaid.

2. They of Magdeburg having in January last past taken in a conflict the duke of Mecklenburg, and three other earls, did give an onset on duke Maurice by boats on the river, when it overflowed the country, and slew divers of his men, and came home safe, receiving a great portion of victual into the town.

15. A conspiracy opened of the Essex-men, who within three days after minded to declare the coming of strangers, and so to bring people together to Chelmsford, and then to spoil the rich men's houses if they could.

16. Also of Londoners, who thought * Woodcock to rise on May-day against the strangers of the city, and both the parties committed to ward.

23. The French king, and the lord Clinton, chosen into the Order of the Garter; and appointed that the duke of Somerset, the marquess of Northampton, the earl of Wiltshire, and the earl of Warwick should peruse and amend the order.

24. The lords sat at London, and banqueted one another this day, and three days after, for to shew agreement amongst them, whereas discord was bruited, and somewhat to look to the punishment of tale-bearers, and apprehending of evil persons.

25. A bargain made with the Foulcare for about 60,000*l.* that in May and August should be paid for the defraying of it. 1. That the Foulcare should put it off for ten in the hundred. 2. That I should buy 12,000 marks' weight, at 6*s.* the ounce, to be delivered at Antwerp, and so conveyed over. 3. I should pay 100,000 crowns for a very fair jewel of his, four rubies marvelous big, one orient and great diamond, and one great pearl.

27. Mallet, the lady Mary's chaplain, apprehended and sent to the Tower of London.

30. The lord marquess of Northampton appointed to go with the order, and further commission of treaty, and that in post; having joined with him in commission, the bishop of Ely, sir Philip Hobbey, sir William Pickering, and sir John Mason, knights, and two other lawyers, Smith that was secretary, &c. †

May.

2. There was appointed to go with my lord marquess the earls of Rutland, Worcester, and Ormond; the lords Lisle, Fitzwater, and Bray, Barguenny, and divers other gentlemen, to the number of thirty in all.

3. The challenge at running at the ring performed; at the which first came the king, sixteen footmen, and ten horsemen, in black silk coats, pulled out with white taffety; then all the lords, having three men likewise apparelled; and all gentlemen their footmen in white fustian, pulled out with black taffety. The other side came all in yellow taffety; at length the yellow band took it thrice in one hundred and twenty courses, and my band touched often, which was counted as nothing, and took never, which seemed very strange, and so the prize was of my side lost. After that tourney followed between six of my band, and six of theirs.

4. It was appointed that there should be but four men to wait on every earl that went with my lord marquess of Northampton, three on every lord, two on every knight or gentleman: also that my lord marquess should in his diet be allowed for the loss in his exchange.

5. The muster of the gendarmoury appointed to be the first of June if it were possible; if not, the 8th.

6. The testourn cried down from 12*d.* to 9*d.* and the groat from 4*d.* to 3*d.*

9. One Stewart, a Scotchman, meaning to poison the young queen of Scotland, thinking thereby to get favour here, was, after he had been a while in the Tower and Newgate, delivered on my frontiers at Calais to the French, for to have him punished there according to his deserts.

10. Divers lords and knights sent for to furnish the court at the coming of the French ambassador, that brought hither the order of St. Michael.

12. A proclamation proclaimed, to give warning to all those that keep any farms, multitudes of sheep, above the number limited in the law, viz. two thousand; decayed tenements and towns, regratters, forestalling men that sell dear, having plenty enough, and put plough-ground to pasture, and carriers over-sea of victual, that if they leave not these enormities, they shall be streightly punished very shortly, so that they should feel the smart of it; and to command execution of laws made for this purpose before.

14. There mustered before me an hundred archers, two arrows a piece, all of the guard; afterward shot together, and they shot at an inch board, which some pierced quite, and stuck in the other board; divers pierced it quite thorow with the heads of their arrows, the boards being very well-seasoned timber. So it was appointed there should be ordinarily an hundred archers, and a hundred halbertiers, either good wrestlers, or casters of the bar, or leapers, or runners, or tall men of personage.

15. Sir Philip Hobbey departed toward France, with ten gentlemen of his own, in velvet coats and chains of gold.

16. Likewise did the bishop of Ely depart with a band of men well furnished.

20. A proclamation made, that whosoever found a seditious bill, and did not tear and deface it, should be a partaker of the bill, and punished as the maker.

21. My lord marquess of Northampton had commission to deliver the order, and to treat of all things, and chiefly of marriage for me to the lady Elizabeth his daughter. First, to have the dote 12,000 marks a year, and the dowry at least 800,000 crowns. The forfeiture 100,000 crowns at the most if I performed not, and paying that to be delivered; and that this should not impeach the former covenants with Scotland, with many other branches.

22. He departed himself in post.

24. An earthquake was at Croidon and Blechinglee, and in the most part of Surrey, but no harm was done.

30. Whereas before commandment was given that 160,000*l.* should be coined of three ounces in the pound fine, for discharge of debts, and to get some treasure, to be able to alter all, now was it stopped, saving only 80,000*l.* to discharge my debts, and 10,000 mark weight that the Foulcare delivered in the last exchange, at four ounces in the pound.

31. The musters deferred till after Midsummer.

June.

2. It was appointed that I should receive the Frenchmen that came hither at Westminster, where was made preparation for the purpose, and four garnish of new vessels taken out of church stuff, as miters, and golden missals, and primers, and crosses, and reliques of Plessay.

4. Provision made in Flanders for silver and gold plate, and chains to be given to these strangers.

7. A proclamation set forth, that exchange, or re-exchange, should be made under the punishment set forth in king Henry the Seventh's time, duly to be executed.

10. Monsieur Mareschal departed from the court to Bulloigne in post, and so hither by water in his galleys and foists.

In this month, and the month before, was great business for the city of Parma, which duke * Horatio had delivered to the French king, for the pope ascited him, as holding it in capite of him, whereby he could not alienate it without the pope's will; but he came not at his day, for which cause the pope and imperialists raised eight thousand men, and took a castle on the same river side. Also the French king sent Monsieur de Thermes, who had been his general in Scotland, with a great piece of his gendarmory into Italy, to help duke Horatio. Furthermore the Turks made great preparation for war, which some feared would at length burst out.

12. I was elected of the company of St. Michael in France by the French king and his order.

13. Agreement made with the Scots for the borders, between the commissioners aforesaid, for both the parties.

In this month Dragute, a pirate, escaped (Andrea Doria, who had closed him in a creek) by force of his galley-slaves, that digged another way into the sea, and took two of Andrea's galleys that lay far into the sea.

14. Pardon given to those Irish lords that would come in before a certain day limited by the deputy; with advertisement to the deputy to make sharp war with those that would resist; and also should administer my laws everywhere.

18. Because of my charges in fortifications at Calais and Barwick should be payed, it was agreed, that beside the debt of the realm 80,000*l.* there should be 40,000*l.* coined, three ounces fine, nine of alloy; and 5000 pound weight should be coined in a standard of seven ounces fine at the least.

17. Soperantio came as ambassador from Venice, in Daniel Barbaro's place.

16. I accepted the order of Monseigneur Michael by promise to the French ambassador.

17. My lord marquess of Northampton came to Nants with the commissioners, and all those noblemen and gentlemen that came over-sea with him.

20. Upon advertisement of Scipperus coming, and rigging of certain ships in Holland—also for to show the Frenchmen pleasure at their coming, all the navy that lay in Gillingham Water was appointed to be rigged, and furnished with ordnance, and lay in the river of Thames, to the intent, that if Scipperus came afterward, he might be met with, and at least the Frenchmen should see the force of my navy.

22. The lady Mary sent letters to the council, marvelling at the imprisonment of Dr. Mallet, her chaplain, for saying of mass before her household, seeing it was promised the emperor's ambassador she should not be molested in religion, but that she and her household should have the mass said before them continually.

24. They answered, that because of their duties to king, country, and friends, they were compelled to give her answer, that they would see, not only him, but also all other mass-sayers, and breakers of order, straitly punished. And that as for promise they had, nor would give none, to make her free from the punishment of the law in that behalf.

18. Chastilion came to my lord marquess, and there banqueted him by the way at two times between Nantes and Chasteau Brian, where the king lay.

15. Mendoza, a gentleman of the king's chamber, was sent to him to conduct him to the court.

19. My lord marquess came to Chasteau Brian, where half a mile from the castle there met him—with an hundred gentlemen, and brought him to the court, booted and spur'd, to the French king.

20. The French king was invested with the order of the garter in his bedchamber, where he gave a chain to the garter worth 200*l.* and his gown dressed with aulegts worth 25*l.* The bishop of Ely making an oration, and the cardinal of Lorrain making him answer. At afternoon the lord marquess moved the French king to the marriage of the Scots queen to be consummate, for whose hearing he appointed two commissioners.

21. The cardinal of Lorrain, and of Chastilion, the constable, the duke of Guise, &c. were appointed commissioners on the part of France, who absolutely denied the first motion for the Scotch queen, saying both they had taken too much pains and spent too many lives for her. Also a conclusion was made for her marriage to the dolphin. Then was proponed the marriage of the lady Elizabeth, the French king's eldest daughter; to which they did most cheerfully assent. So after they agreed neither party to be bound in conscience nor honour, till she were twelve years of age and upwards. Then they came to the dote, which was first asked 1500,000 scutes of France, at which they made a mock; after for donatio propter nuptias, they agreed that it should be as great as hath been given by the king my father to any wife he had.

22. Our commissioners came to 1,400,000 of crowns, which they refused, then to a million, which they denied; then to 800,000 crowns, which they said they would not agree to.

23. Then our commissioners asked what they would offer? First they offered 100,000 crowns, then 200,000, which they said was the most, and more than ever was given. Then followed great reasonings, and showing of precedents, but no nearer they would come.

24. They went forward unto the penalties of the parties misliked, after that the king's daughter were twelve and upwards, which the French offered 100,000, 50,000 crowns; or promise, that she should be brought, at her father's charge, three months before she were twelve, sufficiently jewelled and stuffed. Then bonds to be delivered alternatively at London, and at Paris, and so forth.

26. The Frenchmen delivered the foresaid answers written to my commissioners.

July.

1. Whereas certain Flemish ships, twelve sail in all, six tall men-of-war, looking for eighteen more men-of-war, went to Diep, as it was thought, to take monsieur le Mareschal by the way; order was given, that six ships being before prepared, with four pinnaces and a brigandine, should go both to conduct him, and also to defend, if anything should be attempted against England, by carrying over the lady Mary.

2. A brigandine sent to Diep, to give knowledg to monsieur le Mareschal of the Flemings coming; to whom all the Flemings veiled their bonnet. Also the French ambassador was advertised; who answered, that he thought him sure enough when he came into our streams, terming it so.

2. There was a proclamation signed for shortening of the fall of the mony to that day; in which it should be proclaimed, and devised, that it should be in all places of the realm within one day proclaimed.

3. The lord Clinton and Cobham was appointed to meet the French at Gravesend, and so to convey him to Duresme-place, where he should lie.

4. I was banqueted by the lord Clinton at Debtford, where I saw the Primrose and the Mary Wiloughby launched.

The Frenchmen landed at Rie, as some thought, for fear of the Flemings lying at the Lands-end, chiefly because they saw our ships were let by the wind that they could not come out.

6. Sir Peter Meutas, at Dover, was commanded to come to Rie to meet monsieur le Mareschal, who so did; and after he had delivered his letters, written with mine own hand, and made my recommendations, he took order for horses and carts, for monsieur le Mareschal, in which he made such provision as was possible to be for the suddain.

7. Monsieur le Mareschal set forth from Rie, and in his journey Mr. Culpepper, and divers other gentlemen, and their men, to the number of one thousand horse, well furnished, met him, and so brought him to Maidston that night.

Removing to Westminster.

8. Monsieur le Mareschal came to Mr. Baker's, where he was very well feasted and banqueted.

9. The same came to my lord Cobham's to dinner, and at night to Gravesend.

Proclamation made that a testourn should go at 9d. and a groat at 3d. in all places of the realm at once.

At this time came the sweat into London, which was more vehement than the old sweat: for if one took cold, he died within three hours; and if he escaped, it held him but nine hours or ten at the most: also, if he slept the first six hours, as he should be very desirous to do, then he roved, and should die roving.

11. It grew so much, for in London the 10th day there died an hundred in the liberties, and this day an hundred and twenty; and also one of my gentlemen, another of my grooms, fell sick and died, that I removed to Hampton Court with very few with me.

The same night came the Mareschal, who was saluted with all my ships being in the Thames, fifty and odd, all with shot well furnished, and so with the ordinance of the Tower. He was met by the lord Clinton, lord admiral, with forty gentlemen, at Gravesend, and so brought to Duresme-place.

13. Because of the infection at London, he came this day to Richmond, where he lay with a great band of gentlemen, at least four hundred, as it was by divers esteemed, where that night he hunted.

14. He came to me at Hampton Court at nine o the clock, being met by the duke of Somerset at the Wall-end, and so conveyed first to me; where after his master's recommendations and letters, he went to his chamber on the queen's side, all hanged with cloth of Arras, and so was the hall, and all my lodging. He dined with me also. After dinner, being brought into an inner chamber, he told me, he was come, not only for delivery of the order, but also for to declare the great friendship the king his master bore me, which he desired I would think to be such to me as a father beareth to a son, or brother to brother. And altho' there were divers persuasions, as he thought, to dissuade me from the king his master's friendship, and witless men made divers rumours, yet he trusted I would not believe them. Furthermore, that as good ministers on the frontiers do great good, so ill much harm. For which cause he desired no innovation should be made on things had been so long in controversy by hand-strokes, but rather by commissioners' talk. I answered him, that I thanked him for his order, and also his love, &c. and I would shew like love in all points. For rumours they were not always to be believed, and that I did some time provide for the worst, but never did any harm upon their hearing. For ministers, I said, I would rather appease these controversies with words, than do anything by force. So after, he was conveyed to Richmond again.

17. He came to present the order of Monsieur Michael; whereafter, with ceremonies accustomed, he had put on the garments, he, and monsieur Gye likewise of the order, came one at my right hand, the other at my left to the chappel, where, after the communion celebrated, each of them kissed my cheek.

After that they dined with me, and talked after dinner, and saw some pastime, and so went home again.

18. A proclamation made against regratters, and forestallers, and the words of the statute recited, with the punishment of the offenders. Also letters were sent to all officers and sheriffs for the executing thereof.

19. Another proclamation made for punishment of them that would blow rumours of abasing and enhaunting of the coin to make things dear withal.

The same night monsieur le Mareschal St. André supped with me; after supper saw a dozen courses, and after I came and made me ready.

20. The next morning he came to me to mine arraying, and saw my bed-chamber, and went a hunting with hounds; and saw me shoot, and saw all my guards shoot together. He dined with me, heard me play on the lute, ride; came to me to my study; supped with me, and so departed to Richmond.

19. The Scots sent an ambassador hither for receiving the treaty, sealed with the great seal of England, which was delivered him. Also I sent sir Thomas Chaloner, clerk of my council, to have the seal of them, for confirmation of the last treaty at Northampton.

17. This day my lord marquess and the commissioners coming to treat of the marriage, offered by later instructions 600,000 crowns, after 400,000*l.* and so departed for an hour. Then seeing they could get no better, came to the French offer of 200,000 crowns, half to be paid at the marriage, half six months after that.

Then the French agreed that her dote should be but 10,000 marks of lawful mony of England.

Thirdly, It was agreed, that if I died, she should not have the dote, saying, they did that for friendship's sake without precedent.

19. The lord marquess having received and delivered again the treaty sealed, took his leave, and so did all the rest.

At this time was there a bickering at Parma between the French and the Papists, for monsieur de Thermes, Petro Strozi, and Pontivello, with divers other gentlemen, to the number of thirty, with fifteen hundred souldiers, entered Parma; Gonzaga, with the emperor's and pope's band, lay near the town. The French made sallies, and overcame, slaying the prince of Macedonia, and the seignieur Baptista the pope's nephew.

22. Mr. Sidney made one of the four chief gentlemen.

23. Monsieur le Mareschal came to me, declaring the king his master's well-taking my readiness to this treaty; and also how much his master was bent that way. He presented monsieur Bois Dolphine to be ambassador here, as my lord marquess the 19th day did present Mr. Pickering.

26. Monsieur le Mareschal dined with me. After dinner saw the strength of the English archers. After he had so done, at his departure I gave him a diamond from my finger, worth, by estimation, 150*l.* both for pains, and also for my memory. Then he took his leave.

27. He came to a hunting to tell me the news, and shew the letter his master had sent him, and doubtless of monsieur Termes and Mariguan's letters, being ambassador with the emperor.

28. Monsieur le Mareschal came to dinner to Hide Park, where there was a fair house made for him, and he saw the coursing there.

30. He came to the earl of Warwick's, lay there one night, and was well received.

was made to call the earl of Warwick to a banquet, with the marquess of Northampton, and divers others, and to cut off their heads. Also he found a bare company about them by the way to set upon them.

11. He declared also, that Mr. Vane had two thousand men in readiness; sir Thomas Arundel had assured my lord, that the Tower was safe; Mr. Partridge should raise London, and take the great seal with the apprentices of London; Seymour and Hammond should wait upon him, and all the horse of the gendarms should be slain.

13. Removing to Westminster, because it was thought this matter might easilier and surclier be dispatched there, and likewise all other.

14. The duke sent for the secretary Cecil to tell him he suspected some ill. Mr. Cecil answered, that if he were not guilty, he might be of good courage; if he were, he had nothing to say, but to lament him. Whereupon the duke sent him a letter of defiance, and called Palmer, who after denial made of his declaration, was let go.

16. This morning none was at Westminster of the conspirators. The first was the duke, who came later than he was wont of himself. After dinner he was apprehended. Sir Thomas Palmer on the Terras walking there, Hammond passing by Mr. Vice-chamberlain's door, was called in by John Piers to make a match at shooting, and so taken. Nudgates was called for as from my lord his master, and taken; likewise were John Seimour and David Seimour. Arundel also was taken, and the lord Gray coming out of the country. Vane, upon two sendings of my lord in the morning, fled at the first sending; he said, my lord was not stout, and if he could get home, he cared for none of them all, he was so strong. But after he was found by John Piers in a stable of his man's at Lambeth under the straw. These went with the duke to the Tower this night, saving Palmer, Arundel, and Vane, who were kept in chambers here apart.

17. The dutches, Crane and his wife, with the chamber-keeper, were sent to the Tower for devising these treasons. James Wingfield also for casting of bills seditious; also Mr. Partridge was attached, and sir Thomas Holcroft.

18. Mr. Banister and Mr. Vaughan were attached and sent to the Tower, and so was Mr. Stanhope.

19. Sir Thomas Palmer confessed that the gendarms, on the muster-day, should be assaulted by two thousand footmen of Mr. Vane's, and my lord's hundred horse; besides his friends which stood by, and the idle people which took his part. If he were overthrown, he would run through London, and cry Liberty! liberty! to raise the apprentices and rabble; if he could, he would go to the Isle of Wight, or to Pool.

22. The dowager of Scotland was by tempest driven to land at Portsmouth; and so she sent word she would take the benefit of the safe-conduct to go by land, and to see me.

23. She came from Portsmouth to Mr. White's house.

24. The lords sat in the star-chamber, and there declared the matters and accusations laid against the duke, meaning to stay the minds of the people.

25. Certain German princes, in the beginning of this month, desired aid in cause of religion 400,000 dollars, if they should be driven to make shift by necessity; and offered the like also, if I entered into any war for them; whereupon I called the lords, and considered, as appeareth by a scroll in the board at Westminster, and thereupon appointed that the secretary Petre, and sir William Cecil another secretary, should talk with the messenger to know the matter precisely, and the names of those would enter the confederacy.

28. The Dowager came to sir Richard Cotton's house.

29. She came from sir Richard Cotton's to the earl of Arundel to dinner, and brought to Mr. Brown's house, where met her the gentlemen of Sussex.

30. She came and was conveyed by the same gentlemen to Guilford, where the lord William Howard, and the gentlemen of Surrey, met her.

All this month the Frenchmen continued spoiling of the emperor's frontiers, and in a skirmish at Ast they slew one hundred Spaniards.

31. A letter, directed to sir Arthur Darcy, to take the charge of the Tower, and to discharge sir John Markham upon this, that without making any of the council privy, he suffered the duke to walk abroad, and certain letters to be sent and answered between David Seimour and Mrs. Poinings, with other divers suspicions.

17. There were letters sent to all emperors, kings, ambassadors, noblemen, men, and chief men, into countries, of the late conspiracy.

31. She came to Hampton Court, conveyed by the same lords and gentlemen aforesaid; and two miles and an half from thence, in a valley, there met her the lord marquess of Northampton, accompanied with the earl of Wiltshire, son and heir to the lord high treasurer, marquess of Winchester; the lord Fitzwater, son to the earl of Sussex; the lord Evers, the lord Bray, the lord Robert Dudley, the lord Garet, sir Nicholas Throgmorton, sir Edward Rogers, and divers other gentlemen, besides all the gentlemen pensioners, men-of-arms, and ushers, sewers and carvers, to the number of an hundred and twenty gentlemen; and so she was brought to Hampton Court. At the gate thereof met her the lady marquess of Northampton, the countess of Pembroke, and divers other ladies and gentewomen, to the number of sixty; and so she was brought to her lodging on the Queen's side, which was all hanged with Arras; and so was the hall, and all the other lodgings of mine in the house very finely dressed; and for this night, and the next day, all was spent in dancing and pastime, as though it were a court, and great presence of gentlemen resorted thither.

26. Letters were written, for because of this business, to defer the musters of gendarmory till the — day of December.

November.

1. The Dowager perused the house of Hampton Court, and saw some coursing of deer.

2. She came to the bishop's palace at London, and there she lay, and all her train lodged about her.

3. The duke of Suffolk, the earl of Warwick, Wiltshire, and many other lords and gentlemen, were sent to her to welcome her, and to say, on my behalf, that if she lacked anything she should have it for her better furniture; and, also, I would willingly see her the day following.

The 26th of Octob

Crane confessed the most part, even as Palmer did before, and more also: how that the place where the nobles should have been banqueted, and their heads stricken off, was the lord Paget's house, and how the earl of Arundel knew of the matter as well as he, by Stanhop, who was a messenger between them; also some part, how he went to London to get friends once in August last, feigning himself sick. Hammond also confessed the watch he kept in his chamber at night. Bren also confessed much of this matter. The lord Strange confessed how the duke willed him to stir me to marry his third daughter, the lady Jane, and willed him to be his spie in all matters of my doings and sayings, and to know when some of my council spoke secretly with me : this he confessed of himself.

November.

4. The duke of Suffolk, the lord Fitzwater, the lord Bray, and divers other lords and gentlemen, accompanied with his wife the lady Francis, the lady Margaret, the dutchesses of Richmond and of Northumberland, the lady Jane daughter to the duke of Suffolk ; the marquess of Northampton and Winchester ; the countesses of Arundel, Bedford, Huntington, and Rutland, with one hundred other ladies and gentlewomen, went to her, and brought her through Loudon to Westminster. At the gate there received her the duke of Northumberland, great master, and the treasurer and comptroller, and the earl of Pembroke, with all the sewers, and carvers, and cupbearers, to the number of thirty. In the hall I met her, with all the rest of the lords of my council, as the lord treasurer, the marquess of Northampton, &c. ; and from the outer gate up to the presence-chamber, on both sides stood the guard. The court, the hall, and the stairs, were full of serving-men ; the presence-chamber, great chamber, and her presence-chamber, of gentlemen. And so having brought her to her chamber, I retired to mine. I went to her to dinner ; she dined under the same cloth of state at my left hand : at her rereward dined my cousin Francis and my cousin Margaret ; at mine sat the French ambassador. We were served by two services, two sewers, cupbearers, carvers, and gentlemen. Her master hostell came before her service, and my officers before mine. There were two cupboards, one of gold four stages high, another of massy silver six stages : in her great chamber, dined at three boards, the ladies only. After dinner, when she had heard some music I brought her to the hall, and so she went away.

5. The duke of Northumberland, the lord treasurer, the lord marquess of Northampton, the lord privy-seal, and divers others went to see her, and to deliver a ring with a diamond, and two nags, as a token from me.

6. The duke of Northumberland, with his band of an hundred, of which forty were in black velvet, white and black sleeves, sixty in cloth ; the earl of Pembroke with his band, and fifty more ; the earl of Wiltshire, with fifty-eight of his father's band, all the pensioners, men-of-arms, and the country, with divers ladies, as my cousin Margaret, the duchesses of Richmond and Northumberland, brought the queen to Shoreditch, through Cheapside and Cornhill ; and there met her gentlemen of Middlesex an hundred horse, and so she was conveyed out of the realm, met in every shire with gentlemen.

The earl of Arundel committed to the Tower, with Mr. Stroudly, and St. Alban his men, because Crane did more and more confess of him.

7. A Frenchman was sent again into France, to be delivered again to the eight Frenchmen at the borders, because of a murder he did at Diep, and therupon he fled hither.

14. Answer was given to the Germans, which did require 400,000 dollars, if need so required, for maintenance of religion.

First, that I was very well inclined to make peace, amity, or bargain with them I knew to be of mine religion ; for because this messenger was sent only to know my inclination and will to enter, and not with full resolution of any matters.

Secondly, I would know whether they could get unto them any such strength of other princes as were able to maintain the war, and to do the reciproque to me if need should require ; and therefore willed those three princes, duke Maurice of Saxon, the duke of Mecklenburgh, and the marquess John of Brandenburg, from which he was sent, to open the matter to the duke of Prussia, and to all princes about them, and somewhat to get the good will of Hamburg, Lubeck, Bremen, &c. showing them an inking of the matter.

Thirdly, I would have the matter of religion made more plain, lest when war should be made for other quarrels, they should say it were religion.

Fourthly, he should come with more ample commission from the same states to talk of the sum of money and other appurtenances. This answer was given, lest if I assented wholly at the first, they would declare mine intent to the stadts and whole senates, and so to come abroad, whereby I should run into danger of breaking the league with the emperor.

16. The lord admiral took his leave, to go into France for christening of the French king's son.

18. Fossey, secretary to the duke Maurice, who was here for matter above specified.

20. A proclamation appointed to go forth, for that there went one before this time, that set prices of beef, oxen, and muttons, which was meant to continue but to November ; whereas the parliament should have been to abrogate that, and to appoint certain commissioners to cause the grasiors to bring to the market, and to sell at prices reasonable. And that certain overseers should be besides to certify of the justices doings.

23. The lord treasurer appointed high steward for the arraignment of the duke of Somerset.

At this time duke Maurice began to show himself a friend to the Protestants, who before that time had appeared their enemy.

21. The foresaid proclamation proclaimed.

17. The earl of Warwick, sir Henry Sidney, sir Henry Nevil, and sir Henry Gates, did challenge all commers at tilt the 3d of January, and at tournay the 6th of January ; and this challenge was proclaimed.

28. News came that Maximilian was coming out of Spain, nine of his galleys with his stuff, and 120 gennets, and his treasure was taken by the French.

24. The lord admiral entered France and came to Buloign.

26. The captain of Portsmouth had word and commandment to bring the model of the castle and place, to the intent it might be fortified, because baron de la Gard had seen it, having an engineer with him, and as it was thought had the plot of it.

30. 22 peers and nobles, besides the council, heard sir Thomas Palmer, Mr. Hammond, Mr. Crane, and Nudigate, swear that their confessions were true : and they did say, that that was said without any kind of compulsion, force, envy, or displeasure, but as favourably to the duke as they could swear to with safe consciences.

24. The lord admiral came to Paris.

December.

1. The duke of Somerset came to his trial at Westminster-hall ; the lord treasurer sat as high steward of England, under the cloth of state, on a bench between two posts, three degrees high. All the lords to the number of twenty-six, viz. The dukes of Suffolk, Northumberland ; marquess of Northampton ; earls of Derby, Bedford, Huntingdon, Rutland, Bath, Sussex, Worcester, Pembroke ; vis. Hereford ; barons Burgavenny, Audley, Wharton, Evers, Latimer, Bourough, Souch, Stafford, Wentworth, Darcy, Sturton, Windsor, Cromwell, Cobham, Bray.

These sat a degree under and heard the matter debated.

First, after the indictments were read, five in number, the learned counsel laid to my lord of Somerset Palmer's confession. To which he answered, that he never minded to raise the North, and declared all the ill he could devise of Palmer, but he was afraid for bruits, and that moved him to send to sir William Herbert. Replied it was again, that the worse Palmer was, the more he served his purpose. For the banquet, he swore it was untrue, and required more witnesses. Whence Crane's confession was read, he would have had him come face to face. For London, he meant nothing for hurt of any lord but for his own defence. For the gendarmoury, it were but a mad matter for him to enterprise with his one hundred against nine hundred. For having men in his chamber at Greenwich, confessed by Partridge, it seemed he meant no harm, because when he could have done harm he did it not. My lord Strange's confession, he swore it was untrue; and the lord Strange took his oath it was true. Nudigate's, Hammond's, and Alexander Seimour's confessions he denied, because they were his men.

The lawyers rehearsed, how to raise men at his house for an ill intent, as to kill the duke of Northumberland, was treason, by an act, anno tertio of my reign, against unlawful assemblies, for to devise the death of the lords was felony. To mind resisting his attachment was felony; to raise London was treason, and to assault the lords was felony. He answered, he did not intend to raise London, and swore that the witnesses were not there. His assembling of men was but for his own defence. He did not determine to kill the duke of Northumberland, the marquess, &c. but spoke of it, and determined after the contrary, and yet seemed to confess he went about their death.

The lords went together. The duke of Northumberland would not agree that any searching of his death should be treason. So the lords acquitted him of high treason, and condemned him of treason felonious, and so he was adjudged to be hanged.

He gave thanks to the lords for their open trial, and cried mercy of the duke of Northumberland, the marquess of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, for his ill meaning against them, and made suit for his life, wife, children, servants, and debts, and so departed without the ax of the Tower. The people not knowing the matter, shouted half a dozen of times so loud, that from the hall-door it was heard at Charing Cross plainly, and rumours went that he was quit of all.

2. The peace concluded by the lord marquess, was ratified by me before the ambassador, and delivered to him signed and sealed.

3. The duke told certain lords that were in the Tower, that he had hired Bertivill to kill them; which thing Bertivill examined on, confessed, and so did Hammond that he knew of it.

4. I saw the musters of the new bandmen of arms: one hundred of my lord treasurer's; one hundred of Northumberland, one hundred Northampton, fifty Huntingtown, fifty Rutland, one hundred and twenty of Pembroke, fifty Darcy, fifty Cobham, one hundred sir Thomas Cheyney, and one hundred and eighty of the pensioners and their bands, with the old men-of-arms, all well-armed men; some with feathers, staves, and pensils of their colours; some with sleeves and half-coats; some with bards and staves, &c. The horses all fair and great, the worst would not have been given for less than 20*l.*; there was none under fourteen hand-ful and an half the most part, and almost all horses with their guider going before them. They passed twice about St. James's Field, and compassed it round, and so departed.

15. Then were certain devices for laws delivered to my learned council to pen, as by a schedule appeareth.

18. It was appointed I should have six chaplains ordinary, of which two ever to be present, and four always absent in preaching: one year two in Wales, two in Lancashire and Darby; next year two in the marches of Scotland, two in Yorkshire; the third year, two in Devonshire, two in Hampshire; fourth year, two in Norfolk and Essex, and two in Kent and Sussex, &c. These six to be Bill, Harle, Perne, Grindall, Bradford, and Knox.

20. The bishop of Duresme was for concealment of treason written to him, and not disclosed at all till the party did open him, committed to the Tower.

21. Richard lord Rich, chancellor of England, considering his sickness, did deliver his seal to the lord treasurer, the lord great master, and the lord chamberlain, sent to him for that purpose during the time of his sickness, and chiefly of the parliament.

5. The lord admiral came to the French king, and after was sent to the queen, and so conveyed to his chamber.

6. The lord admiral christened the French king's child, and called him, by the king's commandment, Edward Alexander. All that day there was musick, dancing, and playing with triumph in the court; but the lord admiral was sick of a double quartane, yet he presented Barnabe to the French king, who took him to his chamber.

7. The treaty was delivered to the lord admiral, and the French king read it in open audience at mass, with ratification of it. The lord admiral took his leave of the French king, and returned to Paris very sick.

The same day the French king shewed the lord admiral letters that came from Parma, how the Frenchmen had gotten two castles of the imperialists; and in the defence of the one, the prince of Macedonia was slain on the walls, and was buried with triumph at Parma.

22. The great seal of England delivered to the bishop of Ely, to be keeper thereof during the lord Rich's sickness.

The band of an hundred men-of-arms, which my lord of Somerset of late had, appointed to the duke of Suffolk.

23. Removing to Greenwich.

24. I began to keep holy this Christmass, and continued till Twelve-tide.

26. Sir Anthony St. Legier, for matters laid against him by the bishop of Dublin, was banished my chamber till he had made answer and had the articles delivered him.

28. The lord admiral came to Greenwich.

30. Commission was made out to the bishop of Ely, the lord privy-seal, sir John Gates, sir William Petre, sir Robert Bowes, and sir Walter Mildmay, for calling in my debts.

January.

1. Orders were taken with the chandlers of London, for selling their tallow-candles, which before some denied to do; and some were punished with imprisonment.

3. The challenge that was made in the last month was fulfilled.

The challengers were:—Sir Henry Sidney. Sir Henry Nevel. Sir Henry Gatas.

Defendants:—The lord Williams. The lord Fitzwater. The lord Ambrose. The lord Roberts. The lord Fitzwarren. Sir George Howard. Sir William Stafford. Sir John Parrat. Mr. Norice. Mr. Digby. Mr. Warcop. Mr. Courtney. Mr. Knolls. The lord Bray. Mr. Paston. Mr. Cary. Sir Anthony Brown. Mr. Drury.

These in all ran six courses apiece at tilt against the challengers, and accomplished their courses right well, and so departed again.

5. There were sent to Guisnes sir Richard Cotton, and Mr. Bray, to take view of Calais, Guisnes, and the marches; and with the advice of the captain and engineers, to devise some amendment, and thereupon to make me certificate, and upon mine answer to go further to the matter.

4. It was appointed, that if Mr. Stanhop left Hull, then that I should no more be charged therewith, but that the town should take it, and should have 40*l.* a year for the repairing of the castle.

2. I received letters out of Ireland, which appear in the secretary's hand; and thereupon the earldom of Thowmount was by me given from O'Brian's heirs, whose father was dead, and had it for term of life, to Donnas baron of Ebrecaan, and his heirs males.

3. Also letters were written of thanks to the earls of Desmond and Clanrikard, and to the baron of Dunganan.

3. The emperor's ambassador moved me several times that my sister Mary might have mass, which with no little reasoning with him was denied him.

6. The foresaid challengers came into the tourney, and the foresaid defendants entered in after, with two more with them, Mr. Terill, and Mr. Robert Hopton, and fought right well, and so the challenge was accomplished.

The same night was first of a play, after a talk between one that was called Riches, and the other Youth, whether of them was better. After some pretty reasoning, there came in six champions of either side.

On YOUTH's side came:—My lord Fitzwater. My lord Ambrose. Sir Anthony Brown. Sir William Cobham. Mr. Cary. Mr. Warcop. On RICHES' side:—My lord Fitzwarren. Sir Robert Stafford. Mr. Courtney. Mr. Digby. Mr. Hopton. Mr. Hungerford.

All these fought two to two at barriers in the hall. Then came in two apparelled like Almains, the earl of Ormond and Jaques Granado; and two came in like friars, but the Almains would not suffer them to pass till they had fought: the friars were Mr. Drury and Thomas Cobham. After this followed two masques, one of men, another of women. Then a banquet of one hundred and twenty dishes. This day was the end of Christmass.

7. I went to Debtford to dine there, and broke up the hall.

8. Upon a certain contention between the lord Willowby, and sir Andrew Dudley, captain of Guisnes, for their jurisdiction, the lord Willowby was sent for to come over, to the intent the controversy might cease, and order might be taken.

12. There was a commission granted to the earl of Bedford, to Mr. Vice-chamberlain, and certain others, to call in my debts that were owing me, and the days past; and also to call in these that be past when the days be come.

17. There was a match run between six gentlemen of a side at tilt.

Of one side:—The earl of Warwick. The lord Roberts. Mr. Sidney. Mr. Novel. Henry Gates. Anthony Digby. These wan by four taintes.

Of the other side:—The lord Ambrose. The lord Fitzwater. Sir Francis Knollis. Sir Anthony Brown. Sir John Parrat. Mr. Courtney.

18. The French ambassador moved, that we should destroy the Scotch part of the debatable ground as they had done ours. It was answered:—1. The lord Coniers that made the agreement, made it none otherwise but as it should stand with his superior's pleasure: whereupon the same agreement being misliked, because the Scotch part was much harder to overcome, word was sent to stay the matter. Nevertheless the lord Maxwell did, upon malice to the English debatable, overrun them; whereupon was concluded, that if the Scots will agree it, the ground should be divided; if not, then shall the Scots waste their debatable, and we ours, commanding them by proclamation to depart.

This day the Stillard put in their answer to a certain complaint that the merchant-adventurers laid against them.

19. The bishop of Ely, custos sigilli, was made chahcellor, because as custos sigilli he could execute nothing in the parliament that should be done, but only to seal ordinary things.

21. Removing to Westminster.

22. The duke of Somerset had his head cut off upon Tower Hill, between eight and nine a clock in the morning.

16. Sir William Pickering delivered a token to the lady Elizabeth, a fair diamond.

18. The duke of Northumberland, having under him an hundred men-of-arms, and an hundred light-horse, gave up the keeping of fifty men-at-arms to his son the earl of Warwick.

23. The sessions of parliament began.

24. John Gresham was sent over into Flanders, to shew to the Foulcare, to whom I owed money, that I would defer it; or if I paid it, pay it in English, to make them keep up their French crowns with which I minded to pay them.

25. The answer of the Stillard was delivered to certain of my learned counsel to look on and oversee.

27. Sir Ralph Vane was condemned of felony in treason, answering like a ruffian.

Paris arrived with horses, and shewed how the French king had sent me six Cortals, two Turks, a Barbary, two Gennets, a stirring horse, and two little mules, and shewed them to me.

29. Sir Thomas Arundel was likewise cast of felony in treason, after long controversie, for the matter was brought in trial by seven of the clock in the morning.

28. At noon the inquest went together; they sat shut up in a house together, without meat or drink, because they could not agree all that day and all that night.

29. This day in the morning they did cast him.

February.

2. There was a king-of-arms made for Ireland, whose name was Ulster, and his province was all Ireland; and he was the fourth king-of-arms, and the first herald of Ireland.

The emperor took, the last month and this, a million of pounds in Flanders.

6. It was appointed that sir Philip Hobby should go to the regent, upon pretence of ordering of quarrels of merchants, bringing with him 63,000*l.* in French crowns to be paid in Flanders at Antwerp, to the Schortz and their family, of debts I owed them, to the intent he might dispatch them both under one.

5. Sir Miles Partridge was condemned of felony for the duke of Somersct's matter, for he was one of the conspirators.

8. Fifty men-at-arms appointed to Mr. Sadler.

9. John Beaumont, master of the rolls, was put in prison for forging a false deed from Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk, to the lady Ann Powis, of certain lands and leases.

10. Commission was granted out to thirty-two persons, to examine, correct, and set forth the ecclesiastical laws.

The persons' names were these:—The bishops—Canterbury, Ely, London, Winchester, Exeter, Bath, Gloucester, Rochester.

The divines:—Taylor, of Lincoln; Tylor, of Hadlee; Mr. Cox, almoner; sir John Cheek; sir Anthony Cook; Petrus Martyr; Joannes Alasco; Parker, of Cambridge.

Civilians:—Mr. Secretary Petre; Mr. Secretary Cecil; Mr. Traherne; Mr. Red; Mr. Coke; May, dean of Paul's; Skinner.

Lawyers:—Justice Broomley; Justice Hales, Gosnald, Goodrick, Stamford, Carel, Lucas, Gawdy.

10. Sir Philip Hobbey departed with somewhat more crowns than came to 53,500 and odd livres, and had authority to borrow, in my name, of Lazarus Taker 10,000*l.* Flemish, at seven per cent. for six months, to make up the pay, and to employ that that was in bullion, to bring over with him; also to carry 3000 merks' weight upon a license the emperor granted the Scheitz which they did give me. After that to depart to Bruges, where the regent lay, and there to declare to her the griefs of my subjects.

11. There was delivered of armour, by John Gresham, merchant, eleven hundred pair of corslets and horsemen-harnesses, very fair.

14. It was appointed that the Jesus of Lubeck, a ship of eight hundred tun, and the Mary Gouston of six hundred tun, should be let out for a voyage to merchantmen for 1000*l.* they at the voyage to Levant end to answer the tackling, the ship, the ordnance, munition, and to leave it in that case they took it. Certain others of the worst of my ships were appointed to be sold.

9. Proclamation was made at Paris, that the bands of the dolphine, the duke of Vendosme, the count d'Anguien, the constable of France, the duke de Guise, and d'Aumale, the count de Sancerres, the mareschal St. Andrew, monsieur de Jarnac and Tavennes, should, the 15th day of March, assemble at Troyes in Champaign to resist the emperor. Also that the French king would go thither in prison, with two hundred gentlemen of his household, and four hundred archers of his guard.

16. The French king sent his secretary de Lausespine to declare this voyage to him,* and to desire him to take pains to have Mr. Pickering with him, and to be a witness of his doings.

19. Whereupon it was appointed, that he should have 2000 crowns for his furnishment, besides his diet, and Barnabe eight hundred.

20. The countess of Pembroke died.

18. The merchant-adventurers put in their replication to the Stiliard's answer.

23. A decree was made by the board, that upon knowledge and information of their charters, they had found: first, that they were no sufficient corporation. Second. That their number, names, and nation was unknown. Third. That when they had forfeited their liberties, king Edward IV. did restore them on this condition,—that they should colour no stranger's goods, which they had done. Also that whereas in the beginning they shipped not past eight clothes, after one hundred, after one thousand, after that six thousand; now in their name was shipped forty-four thousand clothes in one year, and but eleven hundred of all other strangers. For these considerations sentence was given, that they had forfeited their liberties, and were in like case with other strangers.

28. There came ambassadors from Hamburg, and Lubeck, to speak on the behalf of the Stiliard merchants.

29. A Fleming would have searched the Falcon for Frenchmen; the Falcon turned, shot off, boarded the Fleming, and took him.

Payment was made of 63,500*l.* Flemish to the Fouleare, all saving 6,000*l.* which he borrowed in French crowns by sir Philip Hobbey.

March.

2. The lord of Burgavenny was committed to ward for striking the earl of Oxford in the chamber of presence.

The answer for the ambassadors of the Stiliard was committed to the lord chancellor, the two secretaries, sir Robert Bowes, sir John Baker, judge Montague, Griffith solicitor, Gosnald, Goodrick, and Brooks.

3. It was agreed, for better dispatch of things, certain of the council, with others joined with them, should overlook the penal laws, and put certain of them in execution. Others should answer suitors; others should oversee my revenues, and the order of them; also the superfluous payments heretofore made. Others should have commission for taking away superfluous bulwarks.

First, order was given for defence of the merchants, to send four barques and two pinaces to the sea.

4. The earl of Westmoreland, the lord Wharton, the lord Coniers, sir Tho. Palmer, and sir Tho. Chaloner, were appointed in commission to meet with the Scotch ambassadors, for equal division of the ground that was called the debatable.

6. The French ambassador declared to the duke of Northumberland, how the French king had sent him a letter of credit for his ambassadry. After delivery made of the letter, he declared how duke Maurice of Saxony, the duke of Mecklenburgh, the marquess of Brandenburg, the count of Mansfield, and divers other princes of Germany, made a league with his master offensive and defensive; the French to go to Strasburg with thirty thousand footmen, and eight thousand horsemen; the Almans to meet with them there the 25th of this month, with fifteen thousand footmen, and five thousand horsemen. Also the city of Strasburg had promised them victual, and declared how the French would send me ambassadors to have me into the same league. Also, that the marquess of Brandenburg, and count of Mansfield, had been privately conveyed to the French king's presence, and were again departed to levy men, and he thought by this time they were in the field.

10. He declared the same thing to me in the same manner.

9. It was consulted touching the marts, and it was agreed that it was most necessary to have a mart in England for the enriching of the same to make it the more famous, and to be less in other men's danger, and to make all things better cheap, and more plentiful. The time was thought good to have it now, because of the wars between the French king and the emperor. The places were the meekest; Hull for the east parts. Southampton for the south parts of England, as appeareth by two bills in my study. London also was thought no ill place, but it was appointed to begin with the other two.

11. The bills put up to the parliament were overseen, and certain of them were for this time thought meet to pass and to be read, other of them for avoiding tediousness to be omitted, and no more bills to be taken.

* This is imperfect.

15. Those that were appointed commissioners for the requests, or for the execution of penal laws, or for overseeing of the courts, received their commissions at my hand.

18. It was appointed, that for the payment of 14,000*l.* in the end of April, there should be made an anticipation of the subsidy of London, and of the lords of my council, which should go near to pay the same with good provision.

20. The French ambassador brought me a letter of credit from his master, and thereupon delivered me the articles of the league betwixt the Germans and him, desiring me to take part of the same league: which articles I have also in my study.

23. The merchants of England having been long staid, departed, in all about sixty sail, the wool-fleet, and all to Antwerp. They were countermanded because of the mart, but it was too late.

24. Forsomuch as the exchange was staid by the emperor to Lions, the merchants of Antwerp were sore afraid; and that the mart could not be without exchange, liberty was given to the merchants to exchange and rechange mony for mony.

26. Henry Dudley was sent to the sea with four ships and two barks, for defence of the merchants, which were daily before robbed; who, as soon as he came to the sea, took two pirats ships, and brought them to Dover.

28. I did deny, after a sort, the request to enter into war, as appeareth by the copy of my answer in the study.

29. To the intent the ambassador might more plainly understand my meaning, I sent Mr. Hobby and Mr. Mason to him, to declare him mine intent more amply.

31. The commissioners for the debatable of the Scotch side did deny to meet, except a certain castle, or pile, might be first razed; whereupon letters were sent to stay our commissioners from the meeting till they had further word.

10. Duke Maurice mustered at Artostat in Saxony all his own men, and left duke August, the duke of Anhalt, and the count of Mansfield, for defence of his country, chiefly for fear of the Bohemians. The young Lantsgrave, Reiffenberg, and others, mustered in Hassen.

14. The marquess Albert of Brandenburg mustered his men two leagues from Erdfort, and after entred the same, receiving of the citizens a gift of 20,000 florins; and he borrowed of them 60,000 florins, and so came to Steinfurt, where duke Maurice and all the German princes were assembled.

April.

2. I fell sick of the measels and small-pox.

4. Duke Maurice, with his army, came to Augusta; which town was at the first yielded to him, and delivered into his hands, where he did charge certain officers, restored their preachers, and made the town more free.

5. The constable, with the French army, came to Metz, which was within two days yielded to him; where he found great provision of victuals, and that he determined to make the staple of victual for his journey.

8. He came to a fort wherein was an abbey called Gocoza, and that fort abide eighty cannon-shot; at length came to a parley, where the Frenchmen got in and won it by assault, slew all, saving one hundred and fifteen, with the captain, whom he hanged.

9. He took a fort called Maranges, and razed it.

12. The French king came to Nancy to go to the army, and there found the dutchess and the young duke of Lorraine.

13. The mareschal St. Andrew, with two hundred men-of-arms and two thousand footmen, carried away the young duke, accompanied with few of his old men, toward France, to the Dolphin, which lay at Rhemes; to the no little discontentation of his mother the dutchess. He fortified also divers towns in Lorraine, and put in French garisons.

14. He departed from Nancy to the army, which lay at Metz.

7. Monsieur Senarpon gave an overthrow to the captain of St. Omer's, having with him six hundred footmen and two hundred horsemen.

15. The parliament broke up; and because I was sick, and not able to go well abroad as then, I signed a bill containing the names of the acts which I would have pass; which bill was read in the house. Also I gave commission to the lord chancellor, two archbishops, two bishops, two dukes, two marquesses, two earls, and two barons, to dissolve wholly this parliament.

18. The earl of Pembroke surrendered his mastership of the horse, which I bestowed on the earl of Warwick.

19. Also he left fifty of his men of arms; of which twenty-five were given to Sir Philip Hobby, and twenty-five to Sir John Gates.

21. It was agreed that commissions should go out for to take certificate of the superfluous church plate to mine use, and to see how it hath been embeled.

The French ambassador desired, that forasmuch as it was dangerous carrying of victual from Boleign to Ard by land, that I would give license to carry by sea to Calais, and from Calais to Ard, in my ground.

22. The lord Paget was degraded from the order of the Garter for divers his offences; and chiefly because he was no gentleman of blood, neither of father-side nor mother-side.

Sir Anthony St. Leiger, which was accused by the bishop of Dublin for divers brawling matters, was taken again into the privy-chamber, and sat among the knights of the order.

23. Answer was given to the French ambassador, that I could not accomplish his desire, because it was against my league with the emperor.

24. The order of the Garter was wholly altered, as appeareth by the new statutes. There were elected Sir Andrew Dudley and the earl of Westmoreland.

26. Monsieur de Couriers came from the regent, to desire that her fleet might safely, upon occasion, take harbour in my havens. Also, he said, he was come to give order for redressing all complaints of our merchants.

25. Whereas it was appointed that the 14,000*l.* that I owed in the last of April should be paid by the anticipation of the subsidy of London and of the lords, because to change the same over sea was loss of the sixth part of the mony I did so send over. Stay was made thereof, and the payment appointed to be made over of 20,000*l.* Flemish, which I took up there fourteen per cent., and so remained 6000*l.* to be paid there the last of May.

30. Removing to Greenwich.

28. The charges of the mints were diminished 400*l.*, and there was left 600*l.*

18. King Ferdinando, Maximilian his son, and the duke of Bavaria, came to Linz, to treat with duke Maurice for a peace; where Maurice declared his griefs.

16. Duke Maurice's men received an overthrow at Ulms; marquess Albert spoiled the country, and gave them a day to answer.

31. A debt of 14,000*l.* was paid to the Foulcare.

May.

2. The stiliard-men received their answer; which was, to confirm the former judgment of my council.

7. A letter was sent to the Foulcare from my council, to this effect: that I have paid 63,000*l.* Flemish in February, and 14,000*l.* in April, which came to 77,000*l.* Flemish, which was a fair sum of money to be paid in one year, chiefly in this busy world; whereas it is most necessary to be had for princes. Besides this, that it was thought money should not now do him so much pleasure as at another time, peradventure. Upon these considerations, they had advised me to pay but 5000*l.* of the 45,000*l.* I now owe, and so put over the rest according to the old interest, fourteen per cent., with which they desired him to take patience.

4. Monsieur de Couriers received his answer, which was, that I had long ago given order that the Flemish ships should not be molested in my havens, as it appeareth, because Frenchmen chasing Flemings into my havens, could not get them because of the rescue they had; but that I thought it not convenient to have more ships to come into my havens than I could well rule and govern. Also, a note of divers complaints of my subjects was delivered to him.

10. Letters were sent to my ambassadors, that they should move to the princes of Germany, to the emperor, and to the French king, that if this treaty came to any effect or end, I might be comprehended in the same.

Commission was given to sir John Gates, sir Robert Bowes, the chancellor of the augmentation, sir Walter Mildmay, sir Richard Cotton, to sell some part of the chauntry lands, and of the houses, for the payment of my debts, which was 251,000*l.* sterling at the least.

Taylor, dean of Lincoln, was made bishop of Lincoln.

Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, was made bishop of Worcester and Gloucester.

Story, bishop of Rochester, was made bishop of Chichester.

Sir Robert Bowes was appointed to be made master of the rolls.

Commandment was given to the treasurer, that nothing of the subsidy should be disbursed, but by warrant from the board; and likewise for our Lady-day revenues.

14. The baron of the exchequer, upon the surrender made by Justice Lister, was made chief justice; the attorney, chief baron; the solicitor-general, attorney; and the solicitor of the augmentation, Gosnold, general solicitor; and no more solicitor to be in the augmentation court. Also, there were appointed eight sergeants of the law against Michaelmas next coming; Gaudy, Stamford, Carell, &c.

16. The muster was made of all the men-at-arms, saving fifty of Mr. Sadler's, twenty-five of Mr. Vice-chamberlain's, and twenty-five of sir Philip Hobbey's; and also of all the pensioners.

17. The progress was appointed to be by Dorchester to Pool in Dorsetshire, and so through Salisbury homeward to Windsor.

18. It was appointed money should be cried down in Ireland after a pay, which was of money, at Midsommer next; in the mean season, the thing to be kept secret and close. Also, that Pirry, the mint-master, taking with him Mr. Brabazon, chief treasurer of the realm, should go to the mines, and see what profit may be taken of the ore the Almainns had digged in a mine of silver; and if it would quit cost, or more, to go forward withal; if not, to leave off, and discharge all the Almainns.

Also, that of five hundred of the two thousand soul-diers there being, should be cut off, and as many more as would go and serve the French king or the emperor, leaving sufficient at home; no fortifications to be made also yet for a time, in no place unfortified; and many other articles were concluded for Ireland.

20. Sir Richard Wingfield, Rogers, and —, were appointed to view the state of Portsmouth, and to bring again their opinions concerning the fortifying thereof.

4. The French king having passed the straits of Lorraine, came to Savern, four miles from Strasburg, and was victualled by the country, but denied passage through their town.

21. Answer came from the Foulcare, that for the deferring of 30,000*l.*, parcel of forty-five troas, he was content; and likewise August Py, so he might have paid him 20,000*l.* as soon as might be.

22. It was appointed, that forasmuch as there was much disorder on the marches on Scotland-side, both in my fortifications of some places, and negligent looking to other forts, the duke of Northumberland, general warden thereof, should go down and view it, and take order for it, and return home with speed. Also, a pay of 10,000*l.* to go before him.

23. It was appointed that these bands of men-of-arms should go with me this progress:—Lord treasurer, thirty; lord great-master, twenty-five; lord privy-seal, thirty; duke of Suffolk, twenty-five; earl of Warwick, twenty-five; earl of Rutland, fifteen; earl of Huntingdon, twenty-five; earl of Pembroke, fifty; lord admiral, fifteen; lord Darcy, thirty; lord Cobham, twenty; lord Warden, twenty; Mr. Vice-chamberlain, fifteen; Mr. Sadler, ten; Mr. Sidney, ten.

29. It was appointed that Thomas Gresham should have paid him, out of the money that came of my debts, 7000*l.*, for to pay 6800*l.* the last of the month, which he received the same night.

28. The same Thomas Gresham had 9000*l.* paid him toward the payment of 20,000*l.*, which the Foulcare required to be paid at the passmart; for he had taken by exchange from hence 5000*l.* and odds; and 10,000*l.* he borrowed of the Scheits, and ten of Lazarus Tukkar. So there was in the whole twenty-five, of which was paid the last of April fourteen; so there remained 11,000, and 9000*l.*, which I now made over by exchange; which made 20,000*l.* to pay the Foulcare with.

30. I received advertisement from Mr. Pickering, that the French king went from Savern to Aroumashes, which was yielded to him; from this to Leimsberg, and so towards Spires; his army to be about twenty thousand footmen and eight thousand horsemen, well appointed, besides rascals. He had with him fifty pieces of artillery, of which were twenty-six cannons, and six organs, and great number of boots. From Leimsberg, partly doubting Duke Maurice's meaning, partly for lack of victual; and also because he had word that the regent's army, of which were guides the count de Egmont, Monsieur de Rie, Martin Vanrouse, and the duke of Holest, to the number of sixteen thousand footmen and six thousand horsemen, had invaded Champaign and fortified Aschenay; he retired homeward till he came to Striolph, and there commanded all unprofitable carriage and men should depart to Chalons; and sent to the admiral to come to him with six thousand Swissers, four thousand Frenchmen, fifteen hundred horsemen, and thirty pieces of ordnance, meaning, as it was thought, to do some enterprise about Luxemburg, or to recover Aschenay, which the regent had fortified. There died in this journey two thousand men for lack of good victual; for eight days they had but bread and water, and they had marched sixty Dutch miles at the least, and past many a streight, very painfully and labourously.

19. Duke Maurice coming from Auspurg in great hast, came this day to the first passage called the Clowse, which the emperor had caused to be strongly fortified and victualled; a passage through an hill, cut out artificially in the way to Inspurg, and there was a strong bulwark made hard by it, which he wan, after a long fight, within an hour and an half by assault, and took and slew all that were within. And that night he marched through that hill into a plain, where he looked for to see twelve ensignes of lansknights of his enemies, but they retired to the second streight, and yet divers of them were both slain and taken; and so that night he lodged in the plain, at the entry of the second passage, where there were five forts and one castle, which with ordnance slew some of duke Maurice's men.

20. This morning the duke of Mecklenburg, with three thousand footmen, cast a bridg over a river five miles beneath the sluice, and came and gave assault behind the sluice; and duke Maurice gave assault in the face, and the country men of Tirol, for hate of the Spaniards, helped duke Maurice; so that five forts were won by assault, and the castle yielded upon condition to depart, not to serve in three months after the emperor. In this enterprise he slew and took three thousand and five hundred persons, and twenty-three pieces of artillery, and 240,000 S.

The emperor hearing of this, departed by night from Inspruck, forty miles that night in post; he killed two of his gennets, and rode continually every night, first to Brixinium; and after, for doubt of the cardinal of Ferrara's army, turned to Villucho in Carinthia. The 30th of May, tarrying for the duke d'Alva, who should come to him with two thousand Spaniards, and three thousand Italians that came from Parma. Also, the emperor delivered duke Frederic from captivity, and sent him through Bohemia into Saxony, to raise a power against duke Maurice's nephew.

22. Duke Maurice, after that Hala and divers other towns about Inshpruck in Tirol had yielded, came to Inshpruck, and there caused all the stuff to be brought to the market-place, and took all that pertained to imperialists as confiscate; the rest he suffered the townsmen to enjoy. He took there fifty pieces of ordnance, which he conveyed to Ausburg; for that town he fortified, and made it his staple of provision.

Certain things which the commissioners for the requests shall not meddle withal.

Secondly, suits for forfeits, amounting to more than 40*l.* value.

Thirdly, suits for pensions.

Fourthly, reversions of farms, which have more than one year to come.

Fifthly, leases of manours.

Sixthly, leases for more than twenty-one years.

Seventhly, no offices of special trust in reckonings of mony, as customers, comptrollers, surveyors, receivers, auditors, treasurers, and chancellors, &c., to be given otherwise than durante bene placito. Also all mint-masters, and others that have a doing in the mint, and such like. The bishops, judges, and other officers of judgment, quamdiu se bene gesserit. Baliewicks, stewardships, keeping of parks and houses, &c. to be granted during life.

Eighthly, suits for forgiveness of debts.

Tenthly, suits for mony, to the intent to pay debts they owe elsewhere.

Eleven, suits to buy land.

Twelve, suits for licenses, to carry over gold, silver, ead, leather, corn, wood, &c., that be things unlaw.

Thirteen, unresidence upon benefices.

They shall meddle with baliewicks and stewardships uring leases for twenty-one years; forfeits under 40*l.*, receiverships, woodwardships, surveyorships, &c. during pleasure. Instalments of days for debts. To those gentlemen that have well served, fee-farms to them and their heirs males of their body, paying their rent, and discharging the annuities due to all officers touching the same. Keeping of houses and parks, ordinary offices, as yeomen of the crown, the household offices, &c.

June.

2. Sir John Williams, who was committed to the Fleet for disobeying a commandment given to him for not paying any pensions, without not making my council privy, upon his submission was delivered out of prison.

4. Beamont, master of the rolls, did confess his offences, who in his office of wards had bought land with my mony, had lent it, and kept it from me, to the alue of 9000*l.* and above, more than this twelvemonth, and 11,000 in obligations; how he, being judg in the Chancery between the duke of Suffolk and the lady Powis, took her title, and went about to get it into his hands, paying a sum of mony, and letting her have a farm of a manour of his, and caused an indenture to be made falsly, with the old duke's counterfeit hand to it; by which he gave these lands to the lady Powis, and went about to make twelve men perjured. Also, how he had concealed the felony of his man to the sum of 200*l.*, which he stole from him, taking the mony into his own hand again. For these considerations, he surrendered into my hands all his offices, lands, and goods, moveable and unmoveable, toward the paiement of this debt, and of the fines due to these particular faults by him done.

6. The lord Paget, chancellor of the dutchy, confessed how he, without commission, did sell away my lands and great timber-woods; how he had taken great fines of my lands, to his said particular profit and advantage, never turning any to my use or commodity; how he made leases in reversion for more than twenty-one years. For these crimes, and other-like recited before, he surrendered his office, and submitted himself to those fines that I or my council would appoint to be levied of his goods and lands.

7. Whaley, receiver of Yorkshire, confessed how he lent my mony upon gain and lucre; how he paid one years revenue over, with the arrearages of the last; how he bought mine own land with my own mony; how in his accompts he had made many false suggestions; how, at the time of the fall of mony, he borrowed divers sums of mony, and had allowance for it after, by which he gained 500*l.* at one crying-down; the whole sum being 2000*l.* and above. For these and such-like considerations he surrendered his office, and submitted to fines which I or my council should assign him, to be levied of his goods and lands.

8. The lords of the council sat at Guildhall in London, where, in the presence of a thousand people, they declared to the mayor and brethren their sloathfulness in suffering unreasonable prices of things, and to craftsmen their willfulness, &c.; telling them, that if upon this admonition they did not amend, I was wholly determined to call in their liberties as confiscate, and to appoint officers that should look to them.

10. It was appointed that the Lord Gray of Wilton should be pardoned of his offences, and delivered out of the Tower.

Whereas sir Philip Hobby should have gone to Calais with sir Richard Cotton and William Barnes, auditor, it was appointed sir Anthony St. Legier, sir Richard Cotton, and sir Thomas Mildmay, should go thither, carrying with them 10,000*l.*, to be received out of the Exchequer.

Whereas it was agreed that there should be a pay now made to Ireland of 5000*l.*, and then the money to be cried down, it was appointed that three thousand weight which I had in the Tower should be carried thither, and coined at three denar. fine; and that incontinent the coin should be cried down.

12. Because Pirry tarried here for the bullion, William Williams, essay-master, was put in his place, to view the mines with Mr. Brabazon, or him whom the deputy should appoint.

13. Banester and Crane, the one for his large confession, the other because little matter appeared against him, were delivered out of the Tower.

16. The lord Paget was brought into Star-chamber, and there declared effectuously his submission by word of mouth, and delivered it in writing.

Beaumont, who had before made his confession in writing, began to deny it again; but after being called before my council, he did confess it again, and there acknowledged a fine of his land, and signed an obligation in surrender of all his goods.

17. Monsieur de Couriers took his leave.

2. The French king won the castle of Robdemac. Certain horsemen of the regent's came and set upon the French king's baggage, and slew divers of the carriers; but at length, with some loss of the Frenchmen, they were compelled to retire. The French king won Mount St. Anu.

4. The French king came to Deuvillars, which was a strong town, and besieged it, making three breaches.

12. The town was yielded to him with the captain. He found in it two thousand five hundred footmen, two hundred horsemen, sixty-three great brass pieces, three hundred hagbuts of croke, much victual, and much ammunition, as he did write to his ambassador.

19. It was appointed that the bishop of Durham's matter should stay till the end of the progress.

20. Beaumont in the Star-chamber confessed, after a little sticking upon the matter, his faults, to which he had put to his hand.

22. It was agreed that the bands of men-of-arms appointed to Mr. Sidney, Mr. Vice-chamberlain, Mr. Hobby, and Mr. Sadler, should not be furnished, but left off.

25. It was agreed that none of my council should move me in any suit of land for forfeits above 20*l.*, for reversion of leases, or other extraordinary suits, till the state of my revenues were further known.

15. The French king came to a town standing upon the river of Mosa, called Yvoire, which gave him many hot skirmishes.

18. The French king began his battery to the walls.

14. The townsmen of Mountmedy gave a hot skirmish to the French, and slew Monsieur de Toge's brother, and many other gentlemen of the camp.

12. The prince of Salerno who had been with the French king, to treat with him touching the matter of Naples, was dispatched in post with this answer, that the French king would aid him with thirteen thousand footmen and fifteen hundred horsemen, in the French wages, to recover and conquer the kingdom of Naples; and he should marry, as some said, the French king's sister, madam Margaret. The cause why this prince rebelled against the emperor was, partly the uncourteous handling of the viceroy of Naples, partly ambition.

The Flemings made an invasion into Champaign, in so much that the Dolphin had almost been taken; and the queen lying at Chalons, sent some of her stuff towards Paris.

Also another company took the town of Guise, and spoiled the country.

22. Monsieur de Tallie was sent to raise the arrier-bands and legionars of Picardy and Champaign, to recover Guise and invade Flanders.

27. Removing to Hampton Court.

30. It was appointed that the statds should have this answer, that those clothes which they had bought to carry over, to the sum of two thousand clothes and odd, should be carried at their old custom, so they were carried within six weeks; and likewise all commodities they brought in till our Lady-day in term next; in all other points the old decree to stand, till by a further communication the matter should be ended and concluded.

The lord Paget was licensed to tarry at London and thereabouts, till Michaelmas, because he had no provision in his country.

26. Certain of the heralds, Lancaster and Portcullis, were committed to ward, for counterfeiting Clarencieux' seal, to get money by giving of arms.

23. The French king having received divers skirmishes of the townsmen, and chiefly two; in the one, they slew the French light-horse lying in a village by the town; in the other, they entred into the camp, and pulled down tents; which two skirmishes were given by the count of Mansfield, governor of the town. And the duke of Luxemburg and his three hundred light-horse, understanding, by the treason of four priests, the weakest part of the town, so affrighted the townsmen and the Flemish souldiers, that they by threatnings compelled the captain, the count, that he yielded himself and the gentlemen prisoners; the common souldiers to depart with white wands in their hands. The town was well fortified, victualled, and furnished.

24. The town of Mountmedy yielded to the French king, which before had given a hot skirmish.

July.

4. Sir John Gates, vice-chamberlain, was made chancellor of the dutchy.

7. Removing to Oatlands.

5. The emperor's ambassador delivered the regent's letter, being of this effect; that whereas I was bound by a treaty with the emperor, made Anno Dom. 1542, at Dotrecht, that if any man did invade the two counties, I should help him with five thousand footmen, or 700 crowns a-day during four months, and make war with him within a month after the request made; and now the French king had invaded Luxemburg, desiring my men to follow the effect of the treaty.

7. The names of the commissioners was added, and made more, both in the debts, the surveying of the courts, the penal laws, &c.; and because my lord chamberlain, my lord privy seal, Mr. Vice-chamberlain, and Mr. Secretary Petre, went with me this progress.

8. It was appointed that fifty pound weight of gold should be coined after the new standard, to carry about this progress, which maketh 150*l.* sterling.

9. The chancellor of the augmentation was willed to surcease his commission, given him the third year of our reign.

3. Monsieur de Bossy, grand escuer to the emperor, was made general of the army in the Low Countries; and Monsieur de Prat over the horsemen.

10. It was appointed here, that if the emperor's ambassador did move any more for help or aid, this answer should be sent him by two of my council, that this progress-time my council was dispersed, I would move by their advice, and he must tarry till the matter were concluded, and their opinions heard. Also, I had committed the treaty to be considered by divers learned men, &c. And if another time he would press me, then answer to be made, that I trusted the emperor would not wish me, in these young years, having felt them so long, to enter into them. How I had amity sworn with the French king, which I could not well break; and therefore, if the emperor thought it so meet, I would be a mean for a peace between them, but not otherwise. And if he did press the treaty, lastly to conclude, that the treaty did not bind me which my father had made, being against the profit of my realm and country; and to desire a new treaty to be made between me and the emperor in the last wars. He answered, that he marvelled what we meant, for we are bound, quoth the emperor, and not you. Also, the emperor had refused to fulfil it divers times, both in not letting pass horses, armour, ammunition, &c., which were provided by me for the wars. As also in not sending aid upon the forraging of the low country of Calais.

12. A letter was written to sir Peter Meutas, captain of the isle of Jersey, both to command him that divine service may there be used as in England; and also that he take heed to the church-plate, that it be not stollen away, but kept safe till further order be taken.

9. The French king came to the town Aveins in Hainault, where after he had viewed the town he left it, and besieged a pile called Tirlokbut. The bailiff of the town, perceiving his departure, gave the onset on his rereward with two thousand footmen and five hundred horsemen, and slew five hundred Frenchmen. After this, and the winning of certain holds of little force, the French king returned into France, and divided his army into divers good towns to rest them, because divers were sick of the flux and such other diseases; meaning shortly to increase his power, and so to go forward with his enterprise.

12. Frederick, duke of Saxony, was released from his imprisonment, and sent by the emperor into his own country, to the great rejoicing of all the protestants.

5. The emperor declared, that he would none of these articles to which duke Maurice agreed, and the king of the Romans also. The copy of them remaineth with the secretary Cecil.

Marquess Albert of Brandenburg did great harm in the country of Franconia; burnt all towns and villages about Norimberg, and compelled them to pay to the princes of his league 200,000 dollars, ten of the fairest pieces of ordnance, and one hundred and fifty kintals of powder. After that he went to Frankfort, to distress certain souldiers gathered there for the emperor.

15. Removing to Guilford.

20. Removing to Petworth.

23. The answer was made to the emperor's ambassador, touching the aid he required, by Mr. Wotton and Mr. Hobbey, according to the first article supra.

24. Because the number of bands that went with me this progress made the train great, it was thought good they should be sent home, save only one hundred and fifty, which were pickt out of all the bands. This was because the train was thought to be near four thousand horse, which were enough to eat up the country; for there was little meadow nor hay all the way as I went.

25. Removing to Londre, sir Anthony Brown's house.

27. Removing to Halvenaker.

30. Whereas it had been before devised, that the new fort of Barwick should be made with four bulwarks; and for making of two of them, the wall of the town should be left open on the enemies' side a great way together (which thing had been both dangerous and chargeable), it was agreed the wall should stand, and two slaughter-houses to be made upon it, to scour the outer courtain; a great rampier to be made within the wall, a great ditch within that, another wall within that, with two other slaughter-houses, and a rampier within that again.

26. The Flemings entred in great numbers into the country of Terovenne; whercupon five hundred men-of-arms arose of Frenchmen, and gave the onset on the Flemings, overthrew them, and slew of them fourteen hundred and thirty-five, whereof were one hundred and fifty horsemen.

31. It was appointed, on my lord of Northumberland's request, that he should give half his fee to the lord Wharton, and make him his deputy-warden there.

August.

2. Removing to Warbington.

3. The duke of Guise was sent into Lorrain, to be the French king's lieutenant there.

4. Removing to Waltham.

8. Removing to Portsmouth.

9. In the morning I went to Chaterton's bulwark, and viewed also the town; at afternoon went to see the store-house, and there took a boat, and went to the wooden tower, and so to Haselford. Upon viewing of which things, it there was devised two forts to be made upon the entry of the haven; one where Ridley's tower standeth, upon the neck that maketh the chamber; the other upon a like neck standing on the other side the haven, where stood an old bulwark of wood. This was devised for the strength of the haven. It was meant that that to the town-side should be both stronger and larger.

10. Henry Dudley, who lay at Portsmouth, with a warlike company of one hundred and forty good souldiers, was sent to Guisnes with his men, because the Frenchmen assembled in these frontiers in great numbers.

14. Removing to Southampton.

16. The French ambassador came to declare how the French king meant to send one that was his lieutenant in the civil law, to declare which of our merchants' matters have been adjudged on their side, and which against them, and for what consideration.

16. Removing to Beuleu.

The French ambassador brought news how the city of Siena had been taken by the French side on St. James's day, by one that was called the count Perigliano, and other Italian souldiers, by treason of some within the town; and all the garison of the town, being Spaniards, were either taken or slain. Also how the mareschal Brisac had recovered Saluzzo, and taken Verucca. Also how Villebone had taken Turnaham and Mountreville in the Low Country.

18. Removing to Christ-church.

21. Removing to Woodlands.

In this month, after long business, duke Maurice and the emperor agreed on a peace; but marquess Albert of Brandenburg would not consent thereto, but went away with his army to Spires and Worms, Colen and Treves, taking large sums of money of all cities which he passed, but chiefly of the clergy. Duke Maurice's souldiers perceiving marquess Albert would enter into no peace, went almost all to the marquess's service; among which were principal the count of Mansfelt, baron Haydeke, and a colonel of three thousand footmen and one thousand horsemen, called Reiffenberg; so that of seven thousand which should be sent into Hungary against the Turks, there remained not three thousand. Also the duke of Wittenberg did secretly let go two thousand eight hundred of the best souldiers in Germany to the service of marquess Albert; so that his power was now very great.

Also in this month the emperor, departing from Villachia, came to Insbruck; and so to Monaco and to Augusta, accompanied with eight thousand Spaniards and Italians, and a little band of a few ragged Almans. Also in this month did the Turks win the city of Tamesino in Transilvania, and gave a battel to the Christians, in which was slain count Pallavicino, and seven thousand Italians and Spaniards. Also in this month did the Turk's navy take the cardinal of Trent's two brethren, and seven gallies, and had in chase thirty-nine other. Also in this month did the Turk's navy land at Terracina, in the kingdom of Naples; and the Prince of Salerno set forward with four thousand Gascoigns and six thousand Italians: and the count Perigliano brought to his aid five thousand men of those that were at the enterprise of Siena. Also the mareschal Brisac won a town in Piedmont, called Bussac.

24. Removing to Salisbury.

26. Upon my lord of Northumberland's return out of the North, it was appointed, for the better strengthening of the marches, that no one man should have two offices; and that Mr. Sturley, captain of Barwick, should leave the wardenship of the east marches to the lord Evers; and upon the lord Coniers' resignation, the captainship of the castle of Carlisle was appointed to sir — Gray, and the wardenship of the west marches to sir Richard Musgrave.

27. Sir Richard Cotton made comptroller of the household.

28. Removing to Wilton.

30. Sir Anthony Aucher was appointed to be marshal of Calais, and sir Edward Grimston comptroller of Calais.

22. The emperor being at August, did banish two preachers protestants out of Augusta, under pretence that they preached seditiously; and left Mecardus, the chief preacher, and six other protestant preachers, in the town, giving the magistrates leave to chuse others in their place that were banished.

29. The emperor caused eight protestant citizens of the town to be banished, of them that went to the fair at Lintz, under pretence that they, taking marquess Albert's part, would not abide his presence.

September.

2. Removing to Wotisfunt, my lord Sandes' house.

5. Removing to Winchester.

7. From thence to Basing, my lord treasurer's house.

10. And so to Dennington-castle, besides the town of Newbery.

12. And so to Reading.

15. To Windsor.

16. Stuckley being lately arrived out of France, declared how that the French king, being wholly persuaded that he would never return again into England, because he came away without leave, upon the apprehension of the duke of Somerset, his old master, declared to him his intent, that upon a peace made with the emperor, he meant to besiege Calais, and thought surely to win it by the way of Sandhills; for having Ricebank both to famish the town, and also to beat the market-place; and asked Stuckley's opinion. When Stuckley had answered, he thought it impossible, then he told him that he meant to land in England, in an angle thereof about Falmouth, and said, the bulwarks might easily be won, and the people were papistical; also that Monsieur de Guise at the same time should enter into England by Scotland-side, with the aid of the Scots.

19. After long reasoning it was determined, and a letter was sent in all haste to Mr. Morison, willing him to declare to the emperor, that I having pity, as all other Christian princes should have, on the invasion of Christendom by the Turk, would willingly join with the emperor, and other states of the empire, if the emperor could bring it to pass, in some league against the Turk and his confederates, but not to be aknownd of the French king, only to say, that he hath no more commission; but if the emperor would send a man into England, he should know more. This was done on intent to get some friends. The reasonings be in my desk.

21. A letter was sent only to try Stuckley's truth to Mr. Pickering, to know whether Stuckley did declare any piece of this matter to him.

Barnabe was sent for home.

23. The lord Gray was chosen deputy of Calais, in the lord Willowby's place, who was thought unmeet for it.

24. Sir Nicholas Wentworth was discharged of the portership of Calais, and one — Cotton was put into it. In consideration of his age, the said Sir Nicholas Wentworth had 100*l.* pension.

26. Letters were sent for the discharge of the men-of-arms at Michaelmas next following.

27. The young lord's table was taken away, and the masters of requests, and the serjeants of arms, and divers other extraordinary allowances.

26. The duke of Northumberland, the marquess of Northampton, the lord chancellor, Mr. Secretary Petre, and Mr. Secretary Cecil, ended a matter at Eaton College, between the master and the fellows; and also took order for the amendment of certain superfluous statutes.

28. Removing to Hampton Court.

29. Two lawyers came from the French king, to declare what things had passed with the Englishmen in the king's privy-council; what and why against them, and what was now in doing, and with what diligence. Which when they had eloquently declared, they were referred to London, where there should speak with them Mr. Secretary Petre, Mr. Wotton, and sir Thomas Smith; whereby then was declared the griefs of our merchants, which came to the sum of 50,000*l.* and upwards; to which they gave little answer, but that they would make report when they came home, because they had yet no commission, but only to declare us the causes of things done.

The first day of this month the emperor departed from Augusta towards Ulmes; and thanking the citizens for their stedfast sticking to him in these perilous times, he passed by them to Strasburgh, accompanied only with four thousand Spaniards, five thousand Italians, twelve thousand Almans, and two thousand horsemen; and thanking also them of Strasburgh for their good-will they bore him, that they would not let the French king come into their town; he went to Weysenberg, and so to Spire, and came thither the 23d of this month. Of which the French king being advertised, summoned an army at Metz, and went thitherward himself; sent a pay of three months to marquess Albert, and the rhinegrave and his band; also willing him to stop the emperor's passage into these Low-countries, and to fight with him.

27. The matter of the debatable was agreed upon, according to the last instructions.

26. Duke Maurice, with four thousand footmen and one thousand horsemen, arrived at Vienna against the Turks.

21. Marquess Hans, of Brandenburg, came with an army of thirteen thousand footmen and fifteen hundred horsemen, to the emperor's army; and many Almain soulders encreased his army wonderfully, for he refused none.

October.

3. Because I had a pay of 48,000*l.* to be paid in December, and had as yet but 14,000 beyond seas to pay it withal, the merchants did give me a loan of 40,000*l.* to be paid by them the last of December, and to be repaid again by me the last of March. The manner of levying this loan was of the clothes, after the rate of 20*s.* a cloth, for they carried out at this shipping forty thousand broad-clothes. This grant was confirmed the 4th day of this month, by a company assembled of three hundred merchant-adventurers.

2. The bulwarks of earth and boards in Essex, which had a continual allowance of souldiers in them, were discharged; by which was saved presently 500*l.*, and hereafter 700 or more.

4. The duke d'Alva, and the marquess of Marigna, set forth with a great part of the emperor's army, having all the Italians and Spaniards with them, towards Treves, where the marquess Albert had set ten ensigns of lance-knights to defend it, and tarried himself with the rest of his army at Landaw, besides Spires.

6. Because sir Andrew Dudley, captain of Guisnes, had indebted himself very much by his service at Guisnes; also because it should seem injurious to the lord Willowby, that for the contention between him and sir Andrew Dudley, he should be put out of his office; therefore it was agreed, that the lord William Howard should be deputy of Calais, and the lord Gray captain of Guisnes.

Also it was determined that sir Nicholas Strelly should be captain of the new fort at Barwick, and that Alex. Brett should be porter, and one Roksbey should be marshal.

7. Upon report of letters written by Mr. Pickering, how that Stuckley had not declared to him, all the while of his being in France, no one word touching the communication afore-specified; and declared also how Mr. Pickering thought, and certainly advertised, that Stuckley never heard the French king speak no such word, nor never was in credit with him, or the constable, save once, when he became an interpreter between the constable and certain English pioneers, he was committed to the Tower of London.

Also the French ambassador was advertised how he had committed him to prison, for that he untruly slandered the king our good brother, as other such runnagates do daily the same. This was told him to make him suspect the English runnagates that be there. A like letter was sent again to Mr. Pickering.

8. Le seigneur de Villandry came in post from the French king with this message. First, that although Mr. Sidney's and Mr. Winter's matters were justly condemned, yet the French king, because they both were my servants, and one of them about me, was content gratuito to give Mr. Sidney his ship, and all the goods in her; and Mr. Winter his ship, and all his own goods. Which offer was refused, saying, we required nothing gratuito, but only justice and expedition. Also Villandry declared, that the king his master wished that an agreement were made between the ordinances and customs of England and France in marine affairs. To which was answered, that our ordinances were nothing but the civil law, and certain very old additions of the realm; that we thought it reason not to be bound to any other law than their old laws, which had been of long time continued, and no fault found with them. Also Villandry brought forth two new proclamations, which for things to come were very profitable for England; for which he had a letter of thanks to the king his master. He required also pardon and releasement of imprisonment for certain Frenchmen taken on the sea-coast. It was shewed him they were pirats: now, some of them should by justice be punished, some by clemency pardoned; and with this dispatch he departed.

11. Horne, dean of Durham, declared a secret conspiracy of the earl of Westmoreland, the year of the apprehension of the duke of Somerset, how he would have taken out treasure at Middleham, and would have robbed his mother, and sold 200*l.* land; and to please the people, would have made a proclamation for the bringing up of the coin, because he saw them grudg at the fall. He was commanded to keep this matter close.

6. Mr. Morison, ambassador with the emperor, declared to the emperor the matter of the Turks before specified: whose answer was, he thanked us for our gentle offer, and would cause the regent to send a man for the same purpose, to know our further meaning in that behalf.

11. Mr. Pickering declared to the French king, being then at Rhemes, Stuckley's matter of confession, and the cause of his imprisonment: who after protestation made of his own good meaning in the amity, and of Stuckley's ingratitude toward him, his lewdness and ill-demeanour, thanked us much for this so gentle an uttering of the matter, that we would not be led with false bruits and tales.

The bishop Tonstal of Durham was deprived of his bishoprick.

In this month Monsieur de Rue, Martin Rossin, and an army of Flemings, while the French had assembled his men of war in Lorraine, had sent the constable to the army, which lay four leagues from Verdun, the duke de Guise with seven thousand men to Metz, and the mareschal St. Andrew at Verdun, razed and spoiled, between the river of Some and Osse, many towns, as Noyon, Roy, Chamy; and villages, Nelle, Follambray, a new-built house of the king's, &c., insomuch that the French king sent the admiral of France to help the duke of Vendosme against that army.

There was at this time a great plague that reigned in sundry parts of France, of which many men died.

20. A man of the earl of Tyrone's was committed to the Tower, because he had made an untrue suggestion and complaint against the deputy and the whole council of Ireland. Also he had bruted certain ill bruits in Ireland, how the duke of Northumberland and the earl of Pembroke were fallen out, and one against another in the field.

17. The Flemings, and the Englishmen that took their parts, assaulted by night Hamletue; the Englishmen were on the walls, and some of the Flemings also; but by the cowardice of a great part of the Flemings, the enterprise was lost, and many men slain. The number of the Flemings were four thousand, the number of the men within Hamletue four hundred. The captain of this enterprise was Monsieur Vandeville, captain of Gravelin.

6. Monsieur de Boissey entred Treves with a Flemish army, to the number of twelve thousand footmen and two thousand five hundred horsemen, Burgunions, without any resistance, because the ensigns there left by marquess Albert were departed; and thereupon the duke d'Alva, and the marquess of Marion, marched toward Metz; the emperor himself, and the marquess Hans of Brandenburg, having with him the rest of his army, the ninth day of this month departed from Landaw towards Metz. Monsieur de Boissey's army also joined with him at a place called Swayburg, or Deuxpont.

23. It was agreed, that because the state of Ireland could not be known without the deputy's presence, that he should, in this dead time of the year, leave the governance of the realm to the council there for the time, and bring with him the whole state of the realm, whereby such order might be taken, as the superfluous charge might be avoided, and also the realm kept in quietness, and the revenue of the realm better and more profitably gathered.

25. Whereas one George Paris, an Irishman, who had bin a practiser between the earl of Desmond and other Irish lords and the French king, did now, being weary of that matter, practise means to come home, and to have his old lands in Ireland again; his pardon was granted him, and a letter written to him from my council, in which he was promised to be considered and holpen.

There fell in this month a great contention among the Scots, for the Kers slew the lord of Balcleugh, in a fray in Edinburgh; and as soon as they had done, they associated to them the lord Home and all his kin: but the governour thereupon summoned an army to go against them; but at length, because the dowager of Scotland favoured the Kers and Homes, and so did all the French faction, the French king having also sent for five thousand Scotch footmen and five hundred horsemen, for his aid in these wars, the governour agreed the five thousand footmen under the leading of the earl of Cassils; and five hundred light-horsemen, of which the Kers and the Homes should be captains, and go with such haste into France, that they might be in such place as the French king would appoint them to serve in, by Christmass, or Candlemass at the furthest. And thus he trusted to be well rid of his most mortal enemies.

27. The Scots hearing that George Paris practised for pardon, committed him to ward in Striveling Castle.

25. Monsieur de Rue having burnt in France eighteen leagues in length, and three leagues in breadth; having pillaged, and sacked, and razed the fair towns of Noyon, Roy, Nelle, and Chamy, the king's new house of Follambray, and infinite other villages, bulwarks, and gentlemen's houses in Champaign and Picardy, returned into Flanders.

23. The emperor in his person came to the town of Metz with his army, which was reckoned forty-five thousand footmen, as the bruit went, and seven thousand horsemen. The duke d'Alva, with a good band, went to view the town; upon whom issued out the souldiers of the town, and slew of his men about two thousand, and kept him play till the main force of the camp came down, which caused them to retire with loss. On the French party was the duke of Nemours hurt on the thigh. There was in the town, as captain, the duke of Guise; and there were many other great lords with him, as the prince of Rochsurion, the duke de Nemours, the vicedam of Chartres, Pierro Stozzy, Monsieur Chastillion, and many other gentlemen.

November.

5. Monsieur de Villandry returned to declare, how the king his master did again offer to deliver four ships against which judgment had passed. He said, the king would appoint men to hear our merchants at Paris, which should be men of the best sort. He said likewise, how the king his master meant to mend the ordinance; of which amendment he brought articles.

7. These articles were delivered to be considered by the secretaries.

9. Certain were thought to be sought out by several commissions: viz. Whether I were justly answered of the plate, lead, iron, &c. that belonged to abbeys? Whether I were justly answered the profit of alome, copper, fustians, &c. which were appointed to be sold? and of such land as the king my father sold, and such like articles.

12. Monsieur Villandry received answer for the first article, as he did before, how I meant not by taking freely so few, to prejudice the rest. For hearing of our merchants' matters at Paris by an inferior council, we thought both too dilatory after these long suits, and also unreasonable, because the inferior council would undoe nothing (though cause appeared) which had been before judged by the higher council. And as for the new ordinances, we liked them in effect as ill as their old, and desired none other but the old accustomed ones which have been used in France of late time, and to be yet continued between England and the Low-country. Finally, we desire no more words, but deeds.

4. The duke d'Aumale being left in Lorraine, both to stop the emperor's provision, to annoy his camp, and to take up the straglers of the army, with a band of four hundred men-of-arms, which is twelve hundred horse, and eight hundred light-horse, hearing how marquess Albert began to take the emperor's part, sent first certain light-horse to view what they intended. Those avan-couriers lighted on a troop of five hundred horsemen, who drove them back till they came to the duke's person; whereupon the skirmish grew so great, that the marquess, with twelve thousand footmen and one thousand horsemen, came to his men's succours, so the duke's party was discomfited, the duke himself taken and hurt in many places; monsieur de Roan was also slain, and many other gentlemen slain and taken. This fight was before Toul, into which fort escaped a great part of the light-horse.

6. Heading town and castle was taken by the Monsieur de Reux. The castle was reckoned too well stored of all things, and rendred either by cowardice or treason. The battery was very small, and not suitable. The most was, that the captain, Monsieur Jeulis, was, with one of the first shots of the cannon, slain, and his lieutenant with him.

In this month Ferdinando Gonzaga besieged St. Martin's in Piedmont.

18. There was a commission granted out to sir Richard Cotton, sir John Gates, sir Robert Bowes, and sir Walter Mildmay, to examine the account of the fall of mony, by the two proclamations.

20. The lord Ogle leaving the wardenship of the Middle Marches, because my lord Evers' land lay there, he was made deputy warden there, with the fee of 600 merks; and sir Thomas Dacres of the East Marches, with the fee of 500 merks.

24. Thomas Gresham came from Antwerp hither, to declare how Monsieur de Langie, treasurer to the emperor of Flanders, was sent to him from the regent with a certain packet of letters which the Burgonions had taken in Bullonois, coming from the dowager of Scotland: the effect whereof was, how she had committed George Paris, the Irishman, to prison, because she had heard of his meaning to return into England; how she had found the pardon he had, and divers other writings; and how she had sent O-Coniers's son into Ireland, to comfort the lords of Ireland. Also he shewed certain instructions, anno 1548, upon the admiral's fall, given to a gentleman that came hither, that if there were any here of the admiral's faction, he should do his uttermost to raise an uproar.

29. Henry Knowls was sent in post into Ireland with a letter, to stay the deputy, if he met him, in Ireland, because of the business ; and that he should seem to stay for his own affairs, and prolong his going from week to week, lest it be perceived. Also he had with him certain articles concerning the whole state of the realm, which the deputy was willed to answer.

30. There was a letter of thanks written to the regent, and sent to Mr. Chamberlain, to deliver her for the gentle overture made to Thomas Gresham by the treasurer Langie. He was also willed to use gentle words in the delivery of the letters, wishing a further amity : and for recompence of her overture, to tell her of the French king's practice, for five thousand Scotch footmen and five hundred horsemen. And also how he taketh up by exchange at Lubeck 100,000*l.*, whereby appeareth some meaning that way the next spring.

28. The lord Paget was put to his fine of 6000*l.* and 2000*l.* diminished, to pay it within the space of — years, at days limited.

Here the Journal ends ; or if more was written by the king, it is lost.
