Le fervent zèle que je vous aperceoy avoir en la réformation de idolatrie, tres-cher et bien-aimé oncle, m'a incité comme par manière de passe-temps, en lisant la Sainte Escriture, de noter plusieurs lieux en icelle qui défendent de n'adorer ny faire aucuns images, non seulement de dieux estranges, mais aussi de ne former chose pensant la faire semblable à la majesté de Dieu le Créateur si très bahy ; veu que lui-mesme et son St. Esprit, par la bouche de ses prophètes, l'a si souvent défendu, que tant de gens ont osé et osent commettre idolatrie en faisant et adorant les images. Mais je croy que c'estoit pourtant qu'ils n'avoient ou n'entendoit par ses paroles. Car comme il dit, il ne peut estre veu en choses qui soient matérielles ; mais veu estre veu par ses ouvres, ni plus ni moins que quand on voit quelque excellente pièce d'ouvrage sans voir ouvrier qui l'a fait, on peut imaginer son excellence : ainsi regardant et considérant l'excellence du firmament et les choses tant parfaites et merveilleuses, que y sont comprises, nous pouvons imaginer quelle è le Créateur qui les a formées seulement par sa parole, et en telle manière nostre Oeil Spirituel pourroit beaucoup mieux voir quelle chose c'est que de Dieu, que nostre oeil corporel ne le pourroit voir en chose que créature humaine ait fait et formé. Pourtant, cher oncle, après avoir noté en ma Bible en Anglois plusieurs sentences qui contredisent à toute idolatrie, à cette fin de m'apprendre et exercer en l'Escriture Françoisé, je me suis amusé à le translater en la dite langue Françoisé : puis les ay fait rescrire en ce petit livret, lequel de tres-bon cueur je vous offre : priant Dieu le Créateur de vous donner grace de continuer en vostre labour spirituel au salut de vostre ame et à l'honneur et gloire d'iceluy.

Then follow seventy-two passages out of the Old Testament, against worshipping strange gods or images, with little paraphrases of his own : he concludes,

Il y a autres places en la Sainte Escriture, tant Apocryphes que autres, desquelles je ne fais nulle mention pour le présent, qui toutesfois sont correspondentes à celles dont est fait mention par cy-devant. Mais pour tant que quasi tous les prophètes et autres saints, desquels la Sainte Escriture parle, défendent de ne commettre idolatrie, je désire et exhorte toute la congrégation des Chrestiens qu'un chascun d'eux vueille délaissier cet abominable vice.

II.—A Discourse about the Reformation of many Abuses.

[Cotton. Libr. Nero C. 10.]

The Government of this Realm is divided into two Parts, one Ecclesiastical, and the other Temporal.

THE ecclesiastical consisteth in setting forth the word of God, continuing the people in prayer, and the discipline. The setting forth of the word of God consisteth in the good discreet doctrine and example of the teachers and spiritual officers ; for as the good husbandman maketh his ground good and plentiful, so doth the true preacher, with doctrine and example, print and graft in the people's mind the word of God, that they at length become plentiful. Prayers also to God must be made continually, of the people and officers of the church, to assist them with his grace. And those prayers must first, with good consideration, be set forth, and faults therein be amended. Next, being set forth, the people must continually be allured to hear them. For discipline, it were very good that it went forth, and that those that did notably offend in swearing, rioting, neglecting of God's word, or such the like vices, were duly punished, so that those that should be the executors of this discipline were men of tried honesty, wisdom, and judgment. But because those bishops who should execute it, some for papistry, some for ignorance, some for age, some for their ill name, some for all these, are men unable to execute discipline, it is therefore a thing unmeet for these men : wherefore it were necessary that those that were appointed to be bishops or preachers were honest in life, and learned in their doctrine ; that by rewarding of such men, others might be allured to follow their good life.

As for the prayers and divine service, it were meet the faults were drawn out (as it was appointed) by learned men, and so the book to be established, and all men willed to come thereunto to hear the service, as I have put in remembrances in articles touching the statutes of this parliament. But as for discipline, I would wish no authority given generally to all bishops, but that commission be given to those that be of the best sort of them to exercise it in their diocesses.

Thus much generally for religion.

Temporal Regiment.

The temporal regiment consisteth in well-ordering, enriching, and defending the whole body politick of the common-wealth, and every part of the whole, to one part, not the other. The example whereof may be best taken of a man's body ; for even as the arm defendeth, helpeth, and aideth the whole body, chiefly the head, so ought serving-men, and gentlemen chiefly, and such-like kind of people, be always ready to the defence of their country, and chiefly of their superior and governor ; and ought in all things to be vigilant and painful for the encreasing and aiding of their country. And forasmuch as they, in serving their king and country, have divers great and manifold charges, even as the arm doth many times bear great stresses for defence of the head and body, having no kind of way to enrich themselves, neither by merchandise, neither by handicraft, neither by husbandry ; as the arm doth decoct no meat itself, nor engendereth no blood ; therefore, even as the stomach, liver, and lights, which parts engender the blood, doth send nourishment to the arms and legs sufficient to strengthen the part, even so must the artificers so use their gain in working, and so truly and justly make that that they work: the merchants must so sell their ware, and so labour to bring in strange commodities: the husbandmen must pay such rents, and so sell things that come of the increase of the ground, that the hands and the legs, that is to say, the states of gentlemen and of serving-men, may well do the common-wealth that service they ought to do. And as the gentlemen and serving-men ought to be provided for, so ought not they neither to have so much as they have in France, where the peasantry is of no value, neither yet meddle in other occupations; for the arms and legs doth never draw the whole blood from the liver, but leaveth it sufficient to work on; neither doth meddle in any kind of engendering of blood. No, nor no one part of the body doth serve for two occupations; even so neither the gentleman ought to be a farmer, nor the merchant an artificer, but to have his art particularly. Furthermore, no member in a well-fashioned and whole body is too big for the proportion of the body; so must there be, in a well-ordered common-wealth, no person that shall have more than the proportion of the country will bear; so it is hurtful immoderately to enrich any one part. I think this country can bear no merchant to have more land than 100*l.*; no husbandman nor farmer worth above 100 or 200*l.*; no artificer above 100 merks; no labourer much more than he spendeth. I speak now generally, and in such cases may fail in one particular; but this is sure, this common-wealth may not bear one man to have more than two farms, than one benefice, than two thousand sheep, and one kind of art to live by. Wherefore, as in the body no part hath too much nor too little, so in a common-wealth ought every part to have ad vicium et non ad saturitatem. And there is no part admitted in the body that doth not work and take pains; so ought there no part of the common-wealth to be but labourous in his vocation. The gentleman ought to labour in service in his country; the serving-man ought to wait diligently on his master; the artificer ought to labour in his work; the husbandman in tilling the ground; the merchant in passing the tempests; but the vagabonds ought clearly to be banished, as is the superfluous humour of the body, that is to say, the spittle and filth; which because it is for no use, it is put out by the strength of nature. This is the true ordering of the state of a well-fashioned common-wealth, that every part do obey one head, one governor, one law, as all parts of the body obey the head, agree among themselves, and one not to eat another up, through greediness; but that we see that order, moderation, and reason, bridle the affections. But this is most of all to be had in a common-wealth well ordered, that the laws and ordinances be well executed, duly obeyed, and ministred without corruption. Now having seen how things ought to be, let us first see how now they be ordered, and in what state they stand now, and then go forward to seek a remedy.

The first point in ordering the common-wealth we touched, was, that the gentlemen, noblemen, and serving-men should stand stoutly to the defence of their superior and governor, and should be painful in ordering their country; which thing, although in some part, and the most part, be well (thanks be to God), yet in some parts is not absolutely, which I shall shew hereafter particularly.

But the second point, for maintenance of the state of landed-men, is ill looked to; for that state of gentlemen and noblemen, which is truly to be termed the state of nobles, hath alone not exercised the gain of living: for merchants have enhanced their ware;

farmers have enhanced their corn and cattel; labourers their wages; artificers the price of their workmanship; and mariners and boatmen their hire for service, whereby they recompense the loss of things they buy; but the most part of true gentlemen (I mean not these farming gentlemen, nor clarking knights,) have little or nothing increased their rents; yet their house-keeping is dearer, their meat is dearer, their liveries dearer, their wages greater; which thing at length, if speedy remedy be not had, will bring that state into utter ruin, quod absit.

The artificers work falsly; the clothiers use deceit in cloth; the masons in building; the clockmakers in their clocks; the joiner in his working of timber; and so forth all other almost, to the intent they would have men often come to them for amending their things, and so have more gain, although at the beginning they take out of measure. The merchants adventure not to bring in strange commodities, but loiter at home, send forth small boys with two or three mariners, occupy exchange of money, buy and sell victual; steal out bullion, corn, victual, wood, and such-like things, out of the realm, and sell their ware unreasonably. The husbandmen and farmers take their ground at a small rent, and dwell not on it, but let it to poor men for triple the rent they take it for; and sell their flesh, corn, milk, butter, &c. at unreasonable prices. The gentleman, constrained by necessity and poverty, becometh a farmer, a grasier, or a sheep-master. The grasier, the farmer, the merchants, become landed-men, and call themselves gentlemen, though they be churls; yea, the farmer will have ten farms, some twenty, and will be a pedlar-merchant. The artificer will leave the town, and for his more pastimes will live in the country; yea, and more than that, will be a justice of the peace, and will think scorn to have it denied him; so lordly they be now-a-days: for now they are not content with two thousand sheep, but they must have twenty thousand, or else they think themselves not well; they must have twenty mile square their own land, or full of their farms, and four or five crafts to live by is too little, such hell-hounds be they. For idle persons, there were never, I think, more than be now; the wars, men think, is the cause thereof; such persons can do nothing but rob and steal: but slack execution of the laws hath been the chiefest sore of all; the laws have been manifestly broken, the offenders banished, and, either by bribery or foolish pity, escaped punishment. The dissention and disagreement, both for private matters and also in matters of religion, hath been no little cause; but the principal hath been the disobedient and contentious talking and doing of the foolish and fond people, which for lack of teaching have wandered, and broken wilfully and disobediently the laws of this realm. The lawyers also, and judges, have much offended in corruption and bribery.

Furthermore, they do now-a-days much use to forestall, not only private markets of corn and victual, whereby they enhance the price thereof, but also send to the sea too, aboard ships, and take the wine, sugar, dates, or any other ware, and bring it to London, where they sell at double the price. What shall I say of those that buy and sell offices of trust, that impropriate benefices, that destroy timber; that, not considering the sustaining of men of their corn, turn till ground to pasture; that use excess in apparel, in diet, and in building of inclosures of wastes and commons; of those that cast false and seditious bills? but that the thing is so tedious, long, and lamentable to entreat of the particulars, that I am weary to go any further in the particulars; wherefore I will cease, having told the worst, because the best will save itself.

Now I will begin to entreat of a remedy. The ill in this common-wealth, as I have before said, standeth in deceitful working of artificers, using of exchange and usury, making vent with hoys only into Flanders; conveying of bullion, lead, bell-mettle, copper, wood, iron, fish, corn, and cattel, beyond sea; inhauncing of rents; using no arts to live by; keeping of many sheep and many farms; idleness of people; disobedience of the lower sort; buying and selling of offices, impropriations, benefices; turning till-ground to pasture; exceeding in apparel, diet, and building; enclosing of commons; casting of ill and seditious bills.

These sores must be cured with these medicines or plaisters: 1. Good education. 2. Devising of good laws. 3. Executing the laws justly, without respect of persons. 4. Example of rulers. 5. Punishing of vagabonds and idle persons. 6. Encouraging the good. 7. Ordering well the customers. 8. Engendering friendship in all parts of the common-wealth. These be the chief points that tend to order well the whole common-wealth.

And for the first, as it is in order first, so it seemeth to be in dignity and degree; for Horace saith very wisely,
 Quo est imbuta recens servabit odorem
 Testa diu—

With whatsoever thing the new vessel is embued, it will long keep the savour, saith Horace; meaning, that for the most part men be as they be brought up, and men keep longest the savour of their first bringing up. Wherefore, seeing that it seemeth so necessary a thing, we will shew our device herein. Youth must be brought up, some in husbandry, some in working, gilding, joining, printing, making of clothes, even from their tenderest age, to the intent they may not, when they come to man's estate, loiter as they do now-a-days, and neglect, but think their travail sweet and honest. And for this purpose would I wish that artificers and others were either commanded to bring up their sons in like trade, or else had some places appointed them in every good town, where they should be apprentices, and bound to certain kind of conditions. Also that those vagabonds that take children and teach them to beg, should, according to their demerits, be worthily punished. This shall well ease and remedy the deceitful working of things, disobedience of the lower sort, casting of seditious bills, and will clearly take away the idleness of people.

2. Devising of good laws. I have shewed my opinion heretofore what statutes I think most necessary to be enacted this sessions: nevertheless I would wish that beside them hereafter, when time shall serve, the superfluous and tedious statutes were brought into one sum together, and made more plain and short, to the intent that men might the better understand them, which thing shall much help to advance the profit of the common-wealth.

3. Nevertheless, when all these laws be made, established, and enacted, they serve to no purpose, except they be fully and duly executed. By whom? By those that have authority to execute; that is to say the noblemen and the justices of peace. Wherefore I would wish that, after this parliament were ended those noblemen (except a few that should be with me) went to their countries, and there should see the statutes fully and duly executed; and that those men should be put from being justices of peace, that be touched or blotted with those vices that be against these new laws to be established; for no man that is in fault himself can punish another for the same offence.

Turpe est doctori cum culpa redarguit ipsum.

And these justices being put out, there is no doubt for execution of the laws.

Desunt cetera.

II.—A Reformation of the Order of the Garter; translated out of English into Latin by King Edward.

[Cotton. Libr. Nero C. 10.]

EDWARDUS sextus Dei Gratia Angliæ, Franciæ, et Hiberniæ, Rex, &c. Omnibus qui præsentem videbunt Literas Salutem. Serenissimi Majores nostri Reges Angliæ deliberantes et secumipsis cogitantes, de eo officio quo uti debeant erga Deum, Patriam, et eos qui suæ ditioni erant subjecti, satis facile invenerunt nihil tam ad suum officium pertinere quam ut bonos, fortes, magnanimos, prudentes et claros viros (pro singularibus eorum meritis) honore gloriaque afficerent, et amicitiam, societatem, consensionem quandam in bonis rebus inter omnes, præcipue vero inter pares foverent. Honorem enim (ut certe est) præmium virtutis iudicabant; concordiam vero fundamentum et auctricem rerum publicarum existimabant. Hæc igitur illis perpendentibus, optimum visum est constituere societatem, cœtum aut conventum aliquem eorum, qui in domesticis pacis negotiis optime se gesserant, et in militariibus pugnis fortiter et prudenter se exercuerant. Hosque voluerunt in signum concordie et unitatis Tibias fascia quadam circumligare, quasi eo facto divulgantes sese non dubitare Patriæ, Religionis et Domini causa vitam et bona profunderè, eamque ob causam Ordinem Garterii nominaverunt. Quem quidem Ordinem omnium voce celebratum, serpens ille humano generi infestus Satanas conspiciens, tantopere ad virtutem homines incitare, conatus est penitus delere. In quo tantum elaboravit, tam diligenter prædam quesivit, tam ingeniose et callide homines decipit, ut tandem repleverit decreta hujus Societatis multis ambiguis, superstitionibus, Papisticiis et inter se contrariis sententiis. Putandum enim erit, quod si Evangelii lux non apparuisset, de isto Ordine penitus actum fuisset, saltem de his rebus in Ordine in quo bonorum nomen meruissent. Indies enim crevit malum; Nos autem summopere commoti, antiquitate, magnificentia et pulchritudine hujus Ordinis, omnibus viribus elaboravimus ad eum reducendum ad statum pristinum. Quapropter in cœtu quodam celebrato die Anno Dom. 1551 Regni vero nostri Ubi permulti Milites ejusdem Ordinis aderant, constitutum erat a nobis, Autoritate eorundem Militum, quod hi articuli infrascripti firmissime observantur, ut hujus Ordinis Decreta.

1. Primum Conclusum Statutumque; existit, quod hic ordo posthac appellabitur Ordo Garterii; non Ordo Sancti Georgii; nec idem Georgius amplius posthac appellabitur; nec nominabitur Patronus Ordinis, ne ille honor qui soli Deo debeat, cuidam creaturæ attribuat.

2. Item Milites circumligabunt Tibias Garteriis (ut vulgo dicunt) quibus inscribunt hæc verba. Boni sunt qui malè p' p'ncip; in collis autem catenarum more gerent equitem sculptum, altera manu tenentem gladium penetrantem librum, in quem gladium scribebatur Protectio, in Librum vero Verbum Dei, altera autem Clipeum, in quem inscribetur Fides, hæc re significantes se concordēs protectores Verbi Divini et Fideles existere. Cum enim ab Georgio eodem auferetur honor ille, quod Patronus amplius Ordinis non erit, Milites non amplius gestabunt eundem divum, post Festum Michaelis proxime sequentis.

3. Arma tamen Ordinis maneat in eodem Statu quo antea manere sunt solita, viz. Crux rubea in Campo Argenteo.

4. Numerus militum erunt 24 præter præfectum, si enim plures existant tum minorum in honore habebitur Collegam esse Ordinis, hi autem Milites jam existunt.

5. Quod Rex Angliæ, Hæredes et Successores ejus, erunt hujus Ordinis Præfecti quemadmodum et solitum est antehac. Et quia sæpe oriuntur ambiguitates, contentiones et mutationes temporum; propter quas aut tolli, aut definiri, aut adjungi debent aliqua decreta hujus Ordinis, sæpe etiam in mortuorum Militum locum alii substituantur necesse est: Idcirco conclusum est, quod licet eidem Regi Angliæ, aliqua tali re mota, Advocatis sex ex Sociis Ordinis, cum eorum consensu, Celebratis in loco aliquo, mutare, definire, addere, aut detrudere ab hoc Ordine; ut illis bonum videbitur, et etiam eligere, in numerum Militum, alios omnes, qui ubi generosi, insignia gestantes, a parte Patrum et Matrum per tres progenies sive generationes quoscunque arbitrabuntur maxime idoneos.

6. Omnes hi qui rei sunt inventi Capitalium Criminum, aut ignave a prælio anferunt, aut Notabili Crimine sunt contaminati, quanquam mors illis non infligatur, tamen Milites Ordines esse desinent. Equum enim qui esse potest, eum qui insigni et frædo aliquo vitio sit contaminatus, in bonorum Societate aut cœtu manere. Capitalia vero sint Crimina, pro quibus leges judicant debere mortis pœnam subire.

7. Si autem idem Ordinis præfectus intelligat locum aliquem vacuum existere, tum mittet ad Milites vicinos et propinquos ut certo quodam die adsint, hasque litteras mittet triduum ante diem celebrandi cœtus; nisi forte adsint plus quam sex Milites.

8. Qui Milites Congregati in cœtu quodam vestibus Ordinis induti, si locus aliquis sit vacuum, scribent unusquisque nomina trium Principum: viz. Imperatorum, Regum, Archiducum, Ducum, Marchionum, Comitum, aut Vicecomitum, nomina tria Baronum, sive Dominorum, et nomina trium Militum Aureatorum quos Baccalaureos Milites vulgo dicunt.

9. Cum nomina sunt scripta, tum Rex Angliæ Ordinis præfectus ex eorum numero eliget quem maxime idoneum arbitrabitur ex antiqua illustriq; familia natum, aut qui suis gestis præclaris nomen, famam et honorem summum acquisiverit, nam in electione Militum divitias respicere nullo modo oportet, sed virtutem et generis Nobilitatem, primo autem in loco virtutem.

10. Miles electus, cum proxime adsit, adducetur in Domum ubi cœtus celebratur per duos Collegas Ordinis, Præfectus induet eum cathena sive Collario Rosarum circumligatarum fasciis cum sculpta equitis imagine, ut prædixi, appendente; duo vero Collegæ fascia, sive ut vulgo dicunt, Garterio tibiam circumligabunt: Tradetur etiam electo Militi liber horum decretorum.

11. Miles vero electus ibit Windesoræ, et Præfectus Ordinis mittet ad illum substitutum suum et duos coadjutores, qui collocabunt eum, si fieri possit, sine aliorum Militum detrimento in sede, ejus gradui Nobilitatis apta et accomoda, et secundum veterem modum vestes recipiet (quos vulgo dicunt Anglice, the Mantel, the Cirtel, and the Hood), et his vestibus indutus audiet preces divinas in sede illi constituta, simul cum substituto et coadjutoribus Communionem recipiens.

12. Post preces absolutas recipiet hoc jururandum; se pro viribus velle sustinere et defendere omnes honores, titulos, querelas et Domina Regis Angliæ Ordinis Præfecti; velle etiam (quantum in se est) protegere, amare et colere Divini Verbi studiosos; velle deponere humanas Traditiones et augere Gloriam et Honorem Dei.

13. Ille ordo qui institutus fuit olim de insignibus, gladiis, galæis et armis reponendis in cellis aut sedibus, maneat in priori forma.

14. Adhæc cum Dedicatio Ordinis auferatur a divo Georgio, et si tempus anni non sit idoneum ad multos homines cogendos, et ex patria accersendos, præsertim vero ne ipsam dedicationem Verbis auferentes re videamur retinere, idcirco statutum est cœtum celebratum fore, ut olim in Anglia die Divi Georgii; sic nunc primo Die Sabbati, et primo Die Dominico in mense Decembris, nisi forte primus dies mensis Decembris sit dies Dominicus; tunc autem celebrabitur primo Die Sabbati, et secundo die Dominico.

15. Primo vero Die Sabbati Milites qui adsunt (omnes autem adesse debent nisi forte habeant licitam excusationem) audient preces Vespertinas institutas Auctoritate Parliamenti vestibus Ordinis induti, sedentes quisque in sede constituta. Miles autem electus non collocatur in sede stabit directe versus eum locum ubi collocabitur.

16. Die Dominico sequenti in aurora audient supra dicti Milites preces, et qui se paratos facere possint, Communionem recipient, vesperi etiam audient preces vespertinas.

17. Milites autem absentes tenebuntur eadem facere in suis ædibus toto hoc tempore vestibus Ordinis induti.

18. Præterea Milites qui adsunt vestibus Ordinis induti prandebunt omnes, ab uno latere sedentes in eodem gradu quo collocatur Windesoræ, in cellis in cœtum etiam intrabunt hoc die, ut si, quid faciendum sit, perficiant.

19. Cantatores et Præbendarii fruuntur suis possessionibus durante Vita, post mortem autem eorum conferentur in Concionatores in castro Windesoræ.

20. Pauperes autem qui in eodem Collegio manent, habebunt omnia sua pristino more, loci autem conferentur in Milites vulneratos aut admodum senes viros, solum privabuntur superstitionis et vanis Cæremoniis quibus uti sunt soliti, ut Oratione pro defunctis, &c. Quemadmodum vero soliti sunt missæ adesse sic jam adsint in precibus constitutus.

21. Sunt autem certe summæ Argenti quæ solent impendi cum moriantur Milites Ordinis.

A Rege Angliæ	8	6	8	A Comite	2	10	0

A Marchione	8	6

Hæ prædictæ summæ Argenti colligantur et quotannis pauperibus distribuantur ut interdum solitum est fieri.

22. Rex Angliæ exsolvat Pecuniam quam peregrini Principes debebunt propter articulum supradictum.

23. Sed quia difficile est omnia hæc sine Ministris idoneis fieri, igitur constitutum est fore quatuor Ordinis hujus Ministros. Cancellarius, Annotator sive Register, Præcessor qui nigram virgam gestabit, et præcipuus Rex armorum qui ab Ordine nomen obtinebit Garter.

24. Sigillum Ordinis habebit ex uno latere Arma Angliæ et Franciæ simul cum Armis Ordinis circumligata hac circumscriptione, Verbum Domini manet in æternum, ex altera parte equitem sculptum, ut Milites gestabant circumligatum fascia sive Garterio.

25. Hoc sigillo Cancellarius sigillabit omnia decreta, licentias, constitutiones, litteras et reliqua omnia quæ ad ordinem prædictum pertinent aut ullo modo debent pertinere.

26. Annotator in magno Libro Annotabit Latine quibus temporibus quisque miles fuerit electus, quibus mortuus, quænam sancita erant decreta, quænam dis-soluta, et si quæ erunt alia pertinentia ad Ordinem supradictum, hunc autem librum relinquet in Castro Windesoræ suo successori in eodem officio.

27. Rex Heroaldorum et insignium Garter servabit nomina et cognomina, arma et insignia cuiusq; Militis electi, eundem librum relinquens suo successori, et si quæ sit ambiguitas de armis, ipse adjudicabit.

28. Præcessor Ordinis gestans virgam nigram præibit ordinem et ostium custodiet, et eandem autoritatem habebit, qua antehac usus est. Quod si quis Militum contumeliose et graviter offenderit, et ejus criminis in cœtu fuerit convictus, Præcessor Ordinis cum Rege Heroaldorum cum excent catena et Garterio.

29. Adhæc cum aliquis peregrinus Rex in Militum numerum substituat et eligatur, Cæremoniis hujus Ordinis non detinebitur, sed prout placuerit.

30. Post electionem vero præfectus Ordinis mittet duos Milites ejusdem Ordinis, qui post preces in ejus patria vulgares induent cum vestibus illis quæ solent gestari, viz. Anglice, the Mantel, the Cirtel, and the Hood. In collum etiam imponent catenam rosarium cum equite sculpto appendente et fascia vulgo dicto Garterio.

31. Postea per procuratorem in sede collocabitur, nullum omnino juramentum recipiens, nec preces unquam alias quam solitus audiens.

32. Quod Rex Angliæ possit dispensare et veniam dare omittendi ulla Cæremonias, si causa postulet.

33. Quod hi articuli ut monumenta, decreta et Leges Ordinis reponentur in Collegio Windesoræ, omnes autem his contrariæ penitus abrogabuntur.

IV.—A Paper concerning a Free Mart in England.

The Reasons and Causes why it is now most necessary to have a Mart in England.

1. BECAUSE our vent of clothes might be open in all wars.

2. Because our merchants' goods might be out of danger of strangers, without fear of arresting for every light cause.

3. Because it would much enrich the realm; for as a market enricheth a town, so doth a mart enrich a realm.

4. Because for, at a need, round sums of money might be of them borrowed that haunt the mart.

5. Because we should have a great multitude of ships strangers to serve in the wars.

6. Because all strangers' goods, when war is made, should be in our danger.

7. Because we should buy all things at the first hand of strangers; whereas now the Spaniards sell to the Flemings their wares, and the Flemings to us.

8. Because the towns toward the sea-side should be much more populous.

9. Because whereas now they bring tapestry, points, glasses, and laces, they would then bring in bullion, and other substantial merchandice, to the intent to have our cloth and our tin.

10. Because we should take from our enemies their power, and make that they should borrow no money of merchants but when we list; at least, no great sum of money.

The Causes why this Time is most Commodious to erect a Mart in.

1. The wars between the French king and the emperor, and the ships of either side, maketh the Italians, Genoa's, Portugals, and Spaniards, to forbear their trade to Antwerp. 2. The Frenchmen, the Stadts, the Sprusses, and ships of Eastland, being against the emperor, will not come neither. 3. The French king invading Lorraine, and fearing Flanders. 4. And the Almains lying on the river of Rhene, stoppeth the course of merchants out of Italy to Antwerp, and also Frankfort. 5. The putting of men of war in the town, maketh the merchants to forbear their traffique, and to look to their lives. 6. The breach of the last tempest is like, they say, to make the channel uncertain, and the haven naught. 7. The stop of the exchange to Lions, will make many Flemings bankrupts. These things will decay the marts of Antwerp and Frankfort. But these nations cannot live without a vent, therefore they will now most willingly come hither if they had a free mart.

2. It were an easier matter to come to Southampton for the Spaniards, Britanes, Vascoins, Lombards, Geneoese, Normands, and Italians, than to go to Antwerp.

3. It were easier for the merchants of the Eastland, the Sprusses, the Dunes, Swedens, and Norvegians, to come to Hull than to Antwerp.

4. Southampton is a better port than Antwerp.

5. The Flemings have allured men to make a mart there with their privileges, having but very little commodities; much easier shall we do it, having cloth, tin, sea-coal, lead, bell-metall, and such other commodities, as few realms Christian have the like; nor they when they began had no such opportunity,

How the Mart will be brought to pass.

1. Our merchants are to be staid from a mart or two, under pretence that they abstain because of the imposition.

2. Then proclamation must be made in divers places of the realm where merchants resort, that there shall be a free mart kept at Southampton, with these liberties and customs.

1. The time of the mart to begin after Whitsontide, and to hold on five weeks; by which means it shall not let St. James's fair at Bristol, nor Bartholomew fair at

2. All men coming to the mart shall have free going and free coming, without arresting, except in cases of treason, murder, or felony.

3. For the time of the mart, all sorts of men shall pay but half the custom they do in other places of the realm.

4. No shipping shall be from any other place from South Wales to Essex during that time.

5. In the shires of Hampshire, Wiltshire, Sussex, Surrey, Kent, Dorsetshire, that no bargain shall be made of wares during that time but in the mart town.

6. A court to correct offenders, with liberties thereto.

7. Some one commodity must be assigned to the mart, or some one kind of cloth.

8. The merchants of the staple must be bargained withal, and contented with some honest offer, to the intent by their liberties they may not let the mart.

9. Some more liberties must be given to the inhabitants of Southampton; and if mony may be spared, some must be lent them to begin their trade withal.

10. Our ships on the sea must look as well as they may, observing the treaties, to the safeguard of the merchants when they come.

11. If this prove well, then may another be made at Hull, to begin after Stowbridg fair, to the intent they may return before the great ices come to their seas.

The Discommodities and Letts to the Mart to be kept in England.

1. Because strangers lack access hither by land, which they have at Antwerp.
2. The ill-working of our clothes, which maketh them less esteemed.
3. The abundance of our clothes in Flanders will make them less sought for here.
4. The merchants have established their dwelling-places at Antwerp.
5. That other nations will stay their coming hither for a while by the emperor's commandment.
6. The denial of the request of the merchants of the Stiliard will somewhat let the mart, if it be not looked to.
7. The poverty and littleness of the town of Southampton.
8. The goodliness of the Rhine.

The Remedies and Answers thereunto.

To the first Point.

1. At this time when the mart should begin at Southampton, the French king and the Almains shall stop the intercourse by land, so that nothing shall come that way but in great danger.
2. When war shall be made against us, then our navy may defend them.
3. As the town of Southampton lacketh the commodity of the access of merchandise by land, so it hath this commodity, that there can be no access of enemies by land, which may be at Antwerp, and men think will be this year, which is a great safety to the merchants.
4. The traffique that cometh by land will not much diminish the mart, for it is only almost the Venetian's traffique, who shall much easilier come hither by sea than to Antwerp, and with less danger of the seas.

To the second Point.

1. The ill-making of our clothes will be meet to be looked on this parliament, and order thereupon to be given. The matter is come to some ripeness already; the upper house hath one bill, and the nether house hath another in good forwardness.
2. As ill as they be made, the Flemings do at this time desire them wonderfully, offering rather to pay the imposition of the emperor than to lack them.

To the third Point.

1. It were very necessary that the ships that shall be hereafter going, were staid till the mart were come to some ripeness.
2. The clothes hereafter might be bought up with our mony here, and conveyed to Southampton, to be there uttered at the mart time, and so it should help the mart very well.

To the fourth Point.

1. The danger of their lives, which they now fear very much, will make them seek another harbour to rest in more safely.
2. They came from Bruges to Antwerp only for the English commodities, although they were settled a Bruges.
3. They have a great commodity to come to Southampton, and a great fear of spoiling to drive them from Antwerp.
4. The merchants never assign to themselves such a mansion, but for more gain they will leave that, and take another.

To the fifth Point.

1. The emperor is at this time so driven to his shifts, that neither he shall be able to attend the stay of mony from coming to the mart; neither if he were able to attend, could, I think, do it, now the Flemings being put in such fear as they be of the loss of all they have.

2. The Flemings and the Spaniards which be under him, can hardlier be without us than we without them, and therefore they would hardly be brought to forbear our traffique.

To the sixth Point.

1. It were good the Stiliard-men were for this time gently answered, and that it were seen, whether by any gentle offer of some part of their liberties, again they might be brought to ship their wares to the mart. The Frenchmen also I think would easily be brought to come hither, having now none other traffique but hither; these two nations would suffice to begin a mart for the first part.

To the seventh Point.

1. It is not the ability of the English merchants only that maketh the mart, but it is the resort of other nations to some one place when they do exchange their commodities one with another, for the bargaining will be as well amongst the strangers themselves; the Spaniards with the Almains, the Italians with Flemings, the Venetians with the Danes, &c., as other nations will bargain with us.
2. The merchants of London, of Bristol, and other places, will come hither for the mart time, and traffique.
3. The merchants will make shift enough for their lodging.
4. There may be some of these clothes that shall go hereafter, be bought with my mony, and so carried to Southampton to be there uttered.

To the eighth Point.

1. Bruges, where the mart was before, stood not on the river of Rhine, nor Antwerp doth not neither stand on that river.
2. Frankfort mart may well stand for a fair in Almain, although Southampton serve for all nations that lie on the sea-side; for few of those come to Frankfort mart.

[Windsor, Sept. 23. Sexto Edwardi Sexti. 1552.]

Questions.

1. Whether the king's majesty shall enter into the aid of the emperor?
Answer.—He shall.
 1. The king is bound by the treaty; and if he will be helped by that treaty, he must do the reciproke.
 2. If he do not aid, the emperor is like to ruin, and consequently the house of Burgundy come to the French possession, which is perilous to England; and herein the greatness of the French king is dreadful.
 3. The French king bringeth the Turk into Christendom, and therefore that exploit to be staid.
 4. If the emperor, for extremity, should agree now with the French, then our peril were double greater. 1. The emperor's offence for lack of aid. 2. The French king's enterprises towards us; and in this peace, the bishop of Rome's devotion towards us.

Pro Repub. et Patria. 5. Merchants be so evil used, that both for the loss of goods and honour, some remedy must be sought.

Pericula consequentia. 6. The French king's proceedings be suspicious to the realm, by breaking and burning of our ships, which be the old strength of this isle.

Declaration of Stuckley's tale.

Answer.—He shall not.

Difficile quasi impossibile. 1. The aid is to be chargeable for the cost, and almost to be executed is impossible.

Solitudo in periculis. 2. If the emperor should die in this confederacy, we should be left alone in the war.

Amicorum suspitio vitanda. 3. It may be the German protestants might be more offended with this conjunction with the emperor, doubting their own causes.

Sperandum bene ab amicis. 4. The amity with France is to be hoped will amend and continue; and the commissioners coming may perchance restore.

Corollarium of a mean way.

Judicium.

1. So to help the emperor, as we may also join with other Christian princes, and conspire against the French king, as a common enemy to Christendom.

Reasons for the Common Conjunction.

Auxilia communia. 1. The cause is common, and therefore there will be more parties to it.

Sumptus vitandi. 2. It shall avoid the chargeable entry into aid with the emperor, according to the treaties.

Amicorum copia. 3. If the emperor should die or break off, yet it is most likely some of the other princes and parties will remain, so as the king's majesty shall not be alone.

Dignitas causæ. 4. The friendship shall much advance the king's other causes in Christendom.

ProFide etReligione. 5. It shall be most honourable to break with the French king for this common quarrel of Christendom.

Reasons against this Conjunction.

Inter multos nihil secretum. 1. The treaty must be so with so many parties, that it can neither be speedily or secretly concluded.

Amicitia irritata. 2. If the matter be revealed, and nothing concluded, then consider the French king's offence, and so may he at his leisure be provoked to practise the like conjunction against England with all the papists.

Conclusion.

[In the king's own hand.]

1. The treaty to be made with the emperor, and by the emperor's means with other princes.

2. The emperor's acceptance to be understood, before we treat anything against the French king.

The lord chamberlain, the bishop of Norwich, sir Thomas Wroth, sir Robert Bowes, sir Richard Cotton, sir Walter Mildmay, Mr. Gosnald.

I understand it is a member of the commission that followeth, but yet those shall do well to do it for the present, because the other shall have no leasure till they have called in the debts; after which done, they may sit with them.

Those that now be in commission for the debts, to take accompts of all payments since the thirty-fifth of the king that dead is, after that they have done this commission they are now in hand with.

Likewise for the bullwarks, the lord chamberlain, Mr. Treasurer, and Mr. Comptroller, to be in commission in their several jurisdictions.

The rest of the council, some go home to their countries straight after the parliament; some be sore sick that they shall not be able to attend any thing, which when they come, they shall be admitted of the council. Also that these councils sit apart. Also that those of the council that have these several commissions.

Desunt quedam.

[Cotton. Libr. Nero C. 10.]

Certain Articles devised and delivered by the King's Majesty, for quicker, better, and more orderly Dispatch of Causes by his Majesty's Privy Council.

1. His majesty willeth, that all suits, petitions, and common warrants, delivered to his privy council, be considered by them on the Mondays in the morning, and answered also on the Saturdays at afternoon; and that that day, and none others, be assigned to that purpose.

2. That in answering these suits and bills of petition, heed be taken that so many of them as pertain to any court of his majesty's laws be as much as may be referred to those courts where by order they are triable; such as cannot be ended without them, be with expedition determined.

3. That in making of those warrants for mony that pass by them, it be foreseen that those warrants be not such as may already be dispatcht by warrant dormant, lest, by means of such warrants, the accompts should be uncertain.

4. His majesty's pleasure is, that on the Sundays * they intend the public affairs of this realm; they dispatch answers to letters for the good order of the realm, and make full dispatches of all things concluded the week before.

5. That, on the Sunday night, the secretaries, or one of them, shall deliver to his majesty a memorial of such things as are to be debated by his privy council; and then his majesty to appoint certain of them to be debated on several days, viz. Munday afternoon, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, morning.

6. That on Friday, at afternoon, they shall make a collection of such things as have been done the four days past; how many of those articles they have concluded; how many they debated, but not ended; how many the time suffered not to peruse; and also the principal reasons that moved them to conclude on such matters as seemeth doubtful.

* Provided that on Sundays they be present at common prayer.

7. That on Saturday morning they shall present this collection to his majesty, and know his pleasure upon such things as they have concluded, and also upon all the private suits.

8. That on Sunday night, again, his majesty having received of the secretaries such new matters as hath arisen upon new occasion, with such matters as his council have left, some not determined, and some not debated, shall appoint what matters, and on which days shall be determined, the next week following.

9. That none of them departed his court for longer than two days, without there be left here at the least eight of the council; and that not without giving notice thereof to the king's majesty.

10. That they shall make no manner of assembly or meeting in council, without there be to the number of four at the least.

11. Furthermore, if they be assembled to the number of four, and under the number of six, then they shall reason and debate things, examine all inconveniences and dangers, and also commodities on each side; make those things plain which seem diffuse at the first opening; and if they agree amongst themselves, then at the next full assembly of six they shall make a perfect conclusion and end with them.

12. Also if there rise such matter of weight as it shall please the king's majesty himself to be at the debating of, then warning shall be given, whereby the more may be at the debating of it.

13. If such matter shall happen to rise as shall require long debating or reasoning, or ere it come to a full conclusion or end, then his majesty's council shall not intermeddle other causes, nor fall to other matters for that day, until they have brought it to some end.

14. When matters for lack of time be only debated, and yet brought to no end, then it shall be noted how far, and to what point the matter is brought, and which have been the principal reasons on each side, to the intent, when the matter is treated or spoken of again, it may the sooner and easilier come to conclusion.

15. In matters that be long, tedious, and busy, there may be pointed or chosen two or three, more or less, as the case shall seem to require, to prepare, set forth, and make plain the matters, and to bring report thereof, whereby the things, being less cumbrous and diffuse, may the easilier be dispatcht.

Finally; if upon advertisements, letters, or other occasion whatsoever, there arise matters of great importance that require haste, his majesty's meaning is not but that such matters be waved, considered, and determined, notwithstanding the articles pointed to several days; so that, nevertheless, this order be not generally or commonly broken.

17. That all warrants for reward above 40*l.*, and for his business or affairs above 100*l.*, pass not but under his signature.

18. That no private suit be intermeddled with the great affairs, but heard on the Munday before.

19. If there be under four, and a matter of expedition arise, they shall declare it to the king's majesty, and before him debate it, but not send answer without it require wonderful haste.

NUMBER III.

The Council's Letter to the Justices of Peace.
An Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Titus B. 2.]

AFTER our right hearty commendations: where the most noble king, of famous memory, our late sovereign lord and master king Henry the eighth (whom God pardon), upon the great trust which his majesty had in your virtuous wisdoms and good dispositions to the commonwealth of this realm, did specially name and appoint you, among others, by his commissions under his great seal of England, to be conservatours and justices of his peace, within that his county of Norfolk.

Forasmuch as the same commissions were dissolved by his decease, it hath pleased the king's majesty, our sovereign lord that now is, by the advice and consent of us, the lord protector and others, executors to our said late sovereign lord, whose names be under-written; to whom, with others, the government of his most royal person, and the order of his affairs, is by his last will and testament committed, till he shall be of full age of eighteen years, to cause new commissions again to be made for the conservation of his peace throughout this realm, whereof you shall by this bearer receive one for that county. And for that the good and diligent execution of the charge committed to you and others by the same, shall be a notable surety to the king, our sovereign lord's person that now is, to whom God give increase of vertue, honour, and many years, a most certain stay to the commonwealth; which must needs prosper where justice hath place and reigneth. We shall desire you, and in his majesty's name charge and command you, upon the receipt hereof, with all diligence, to assemble yourselves together; and calling unto you all such others as be named in the said commission. You shall first cry and call to God to give you grace to execute this charge committed unto you with all truth and uprightness, according to your oaths, which you shall endeavour yourself to do in all things appertaining to your office accordingly: in such sort as all private malice, sloth, negligence, displeasure, disdain, corruption, and sinister affections set apart, it may appear you have God, and the preservation of your sovereign lord and natural country, before your eyes; and that you forget not that by the same, your selves, your wives, and your children, shall surely prosper and be also preserved. For the better doing whereof, you shall, at this your first assembly, make a division of your selves into hundreds or wapentakes; that is to say, two at the least, to have especial eye and regard to the good rule and order of that, or those hundreds, to see the peace duly kept, to see vagabonds and perturbors of the peace punished, and that every man apply himself to do as his calling doth require; and in all things to keep good order, without alteration, innovation, or contempt of any thing that by the laws of our late sovereign lord is prescribed and set forth unto us, for direction and framing of our selves towards God and honest policy. And if any person or persons, whom ye shall think you cannot rule and order, without trouble to this country, shall presume to do the contrary, upon your information to us thereof, we shall so aid and assist you in the execution of justice, and the punishment of all such contemptuous offenders, as the same shall be example to others. And further, his majesty's pleasure, by the advice and consent aforesaid, is, that you shall take such orders amongst you, as you fail not once every six weeks, till you shall be otherwise commanded, to write unto the said lord protector, and others of the privy-council, in what state that shire standeth; and whether any notable things have happened, or were like to happen, in those parts, that you cannot redress, which would be speedily met withal and looked unto; or whether you shall need any advice or counsel, to the intent we may put our hands to the stay and reformation of it in the beginning as appertains: praying you also to take order, that every commissioner in the shire may have a double, or a copy of this letter, both for his own better instruction, and to shew to the gentlemen, and such others as inhabit in the hundreds specially appointed to them, that every man may the better conform himself to do truth, and help to the advancement of justice, according to their most

[Ex Libro Consilii.]

Sunday, Feb. 13, at the Tower, &c.

THIS day the lord protector, and others his executors, whose names be hereunto ascribed, upon mature and deep deliberation had among them, did finally resolve, that forasmuch as divers of the old observances and ceremonies afore-times used at the coronations of the kings of this realm were by them thought meet, for sundry respects, to be corrected; and namely, for the tedious length of the same, which should weary and be hurtful to the king's majesty, being yet of tender age, fully to endure and bide out. And also for that many points of the same were such as by the laws of the realm at this present were not allowable. The king's majesty's coronation should be done and celebrated upon Shrove-Sunday next ensuing, in the cathedral church of Westminster, after the form and order ensuing:—

First, the archbishop of Canterbury shall show the king to the people, at four parts of the great pulpit or stage to be made for the king, and shall say on this wise,—“Sirs, here I present king Edward, rightful and undoubted inheritor, by the laws of God and man, to the royal dignity and crown imperial of this realm, whose consecration, inunction, and coronation, is appointed by all the nobles and peers of this land to be this day. Will ye serve at this time, and give your good-wills and assents to the same consecration, inunction, and coronation, as by your duty of allegiance ye be bound to do?”

The people to answer, “Yea, yea, yea; king Edward, king Edward, king Edward.”

This done, the archbishop of Canterbury, being revested as he should go to mass, with the bishops of London and Winchester on both sides, with other bishops, and the dean of Westminster in the bishop's absence, to go in order before the king; the king shall be brought from his seat by them that assisted him to the church to the high altar, where, after his prayer made to God for his grace, he shall offer a pall and a pound of gold, twenty-four pound in coin, which shall be to him delivered by the lord great chamberlain. Then shall the king fall groveling before the altar, and over him the archbishop shall say this collect, Deus humilium, &c. Then the king shall rise and go to his chair, to be prepared before the altar, his face to the altar, and standing, one shall hold him a book; and the archbishop standing before the king, shall ask him, with a loud and distinct voice, in manner and form following:—

“Will ye grant to keep to the people of England, and others your realms and dominions, the laws and liberties of this realm, and others your realms and dominions?”

I grant and promit.

“You shall keep, to your strength and power, to the church of God, and to all the people, holy peace and concord.”

I shall keep.

“You shall make to be done, after your strength and power, equal and rightful justice in all your dooms and judgments, with mercy and truth.”

I shall do.

“Do you grant to make no laws but such as shall be to the honour and glory of God, and to the good of the commonwealth; and that the same shall be made by the consent of your people, as hath been accustomed?”

I grant and promit.

Then shall the king rise out of his chair, and by them that before assisted them be led to the high altar, where he shall make a solemn oath upon the sacrament, laid upon the said altar, in the sight of all the people, to observe the premisses; and laying his hand again on the book, shall say,

The things which I have before promised I shall observe and keep. So God help me, and those holy Evangelists by me bodily touched upon this holy altar.

That done, the king shall fall again groveling before the high altar, and the said archbishop kneeling before him shall, with a loud voice, begin Veni Creator Spiritus, &c.

Which done, the said archbishop, standing, shall say over the king, Te invocamus; and at the end shall kneel again, and then shall the king rise, and be set in the chair again; and after a little pause he shall rise, and assisted with those that did before that office, go again to the high altar, where he shall be unclothed by his great chamberlain unto his coat of crimson satin; which, and also his shirt, shall be opened before and behind on the shoulders, and the bowgirt of the arms, by the said great chamberlain, to the intent that on these places he be anointed; and whiles he is in the anointing, sir Anthony Denny and sir William Herbert must hold a pall over him. And first, the said archbishop shall anoint the king, kneeling, in the palms of his hands, saying these words, Unctus Manus; with this collect, Respice Omnipotens Deus. After he shall anoint him in the breast, in the midst of his back, on his two bowgirts of his arms, and on his head, making a cross; and after making another cross on his head, with holy chrism, saying, as he anointeth the places aforesaid, Unctus Caput, unctus scapule, &c. During which time of unction, the quire shall continually sing, Ungebant Regem, and the psalm, Domine in virtute tua latuitur Rex. And it is to be remembered, that the bishop or dean of Westminster, after the king's inunction, shall dry all the places of his body where he was anointed, with cotton or some linnen cloth, which is to be burnt. And furthermore, the places opened for the same is to be clothed by the lord great chamberlain; and on the king's hands shall be put, by the said archbishop of Canterbury, a pair of linnen gloves, which the lord great chamberlain shall before see prepared.

This done, the king shall rise, and the archbishop of Canterbury shall put on the king a tabert of Tarterton white, shaped in manner of a dalmatick; and he shall put upon the king's head a quioif, the same to be brought by the great chamberlain. Then the king shall take the sword he was girt withal, and offer it himself to God, laying it on the altar, in token that his strength and power should first come from God. And the same sword he shall take again from the altar, and deliver it to some great earl, to be redeemed of the bishop or dean of Westminster for 100s.; which sword shall be borne naked afterwards before the king.

Then the king being set in his chair before the altar, shall be crowned with St. Edward's crown; and there shall be brought, by the bishop or dean of Westminster, royal sandals and spurs, to be presently put on by the lord great chamberlain; and the spurs again immediately taken off, that they do not encumber him.

Then the archbishop, with all the peers and nobles, shall convey the king, sustained as before, again into the pulpit, setting him in his siege royal; and then shall the archbishop begin Te Deum laudamus; which done, the archbishop shall say unto the king, Sta et retine a modo locum. And the king being thus set, all the peers of the realm and bishops, holding up their hands, shall make unto him homage, as followeth: first, the lord-protector alone, then the archbishop of Canterbury and the lord chancellor, so two and two as they be placed.

"I, N. become your liege man, of life and limb, and of earthly worship, and faith, and truth, I shall bear unto you, against all manner of folks, as I am bound by my allegiance, and by the laws and statutes of this realm. So help us God and Allhallowes." And then every one shall kiss the king's left cheek; which done, all they holding up their hands together, in token of their fidelity, shall with one voice on their knees say, "We offer to sustain and defend you and your crown, with our lives, and lands, and goods, against all the world." And then with one voice to cry, "God save King Edward;" which the people shall cry accordingly. Then shall the king be led to his travers to hear the high mass, and so depart home crowned in order, as he set forth accordingly.

THE said students, referring to the consideration of the said protector and council what the granting out of the said commission without warrant did weigh; forasmuch as the said protector and council, minding the surety of the king's majesty, and a direct and upright proceeding in his affairs, and the observation of their duties in all things, as near as they can, to his majesty, with a desire to avoid all things which might offend his majesty or his laws; and considering that the said commission was none of the things which they in their assemblies in council, at any time since the death of the king's majesty late deceased, did accord to be passed under the great seal, have for their own discharges required us, whose names be under-written, for the opinion they have of our knowledge and experience in the laws of this realm, to consider the said case of making of the said commission without warrant; and after due consideration thereof, to declare in writing to what the said case doth weigh in law. We, therefore, whose names be under-written, after mature and advised consultation and deliberation thereupon, do affirm and say, for our knowledges and determinations, that the said chancellor of England having made forth, under the great seal of England, without any warrant, the commission aforesaid, hath done, and doth by his so doing offend the king's majesty, hath, and doth by the common law, forfeit his office of chancellor, and incurreth the danger, penalty, and payment of such fine as it shall please the king's majesty, with the advice of the said lord protector and council, to set upon him for the same; with also imprisonment of his body at the king's will:

In witness whereof we have set our names to this present, the last day of February, in the first year of the reign of our sovereign lord king Edward the sixth, by the grace of God king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and in earth of the church of England, and also of Ireland, the supreme head; and have likewise, for more ample testimony of this our opinion of and upon the premisses, put and subscribed our names to this present duplicate of the same here asserted, in this present act of this 6th day of the month of March accordingly.

NUMBER VI.

The Duke of Somerset's Commission to be Protector.

[Ex Libro Concilii, Fol. 62.]

EDWARD the Sixth, by the grace of God king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and of the church of England, and also of Ireland, in earth the supreme head. Whereas our council, and divers of the nobles and prelates of this our realm of England, considering our young and tender age, have thought meet and expedient, as well for our education and bringing up in knowledge, learning, and exercises of good and goodly manners, virtues, and qualities, meet and necessary for a prince of our estate, and whereby we should, and may at our full age be the more able to minister and execute the charge of our kingly estate and office, committed unto us by the goodness of Almighty God, and left and come unto us by right inheritance, after and by the decease of our late sovereign lord and father, of most famous memory, king Henry the Eighth, whose soul God pardon. As also to the intent, that during the time of our minority, the great and weighty causes of our realms and dominions may be set forth, conducted, passed, applied, and ordered, in such sort as shall be most to the glory of God, our surety and honour; and for the weal, benefit, and commodity of us, our said realms and dominions, and of all our loving subjects of the same, have advised us to nominate, appoint, and authorize some one meet and trusty personage, above all others, to take the special care and charge of the same for us, and in our name and behalf; without the which the things before remembered could not, nor can, be done so well as appertaineth. We therefore, using their advices and counsels in this behalf, did heretofore assign and appoint our dear and well-beloved uncle, Edward, now duke of Somerset, governour of our person, and protector of our said realms and dominions, and of our subjects and people of the same. Which thing albeit we have already declared heretofore, and our pleasure therein published by word of our mouth, in the presence of our said council, nobles, and prelates of our said realm of England, and not by any writing set forth under our seal for that only purpose; yet for a more perfect and manifest knowledge, and further corroboration and understanding of our determination in that behalf; and considering that no manner of person is so meet to have and occupy the said charge and administration, and to do us service in the same, as is our said uncle Edward, duke of Somerset, eldest brother to our natural most gracious late mother queen Jane, as well for the proximity of blood, whereby he is the more stirred to have special eye and regard to our surety and good education, in this our said minority; as also for the long and great experience which our said uncle hath had in the lifetime of our said dear father, in the affairs of our said realms and dominions, both in time of peace and war; whereby he is more able to order and rule our said realms, dominions, and subjects of the same:

and for the special confidence and trust that we have in our said uncle, as well with the advice and consent of our council, and other our nobles and prelates, as also of divers discreet and sage men that served our said late father in his council and weighty affairs;—we therefore, by these presents, do not only ratify, approve, confirm, and allow, all and every thing and things whatsoever devised or set forth, committed or done by our said uncle, as governor of our person, and protector of our said realms and dominions, and of the subjects of the same, sith the time he was by us named, appointed, and ordained by word governor of our person, and protector of our said realms and dominions, and of the subjects of the same, as is aforesaid, or otherwise any time before, sithence the death of our said late father; but also by these presents, we, for a full and perfect declaration of the authority of our said uncle, given and appointed as aforesaid, do nominate, appoint, and ordain our said uncle governor of our said person, and protector of our said realms and dominions, and of the subjects of the same, until such time as we shall have, by the sufferance of God, accomplished the age of eighteen years.

And we also do grant to our said uncle, by these presents, full power and authority, from time to time, until such time as we shall have accomplished the said age of eighteen years, to do, procure, and execute, and cause to be done, procured, and executed, all and every such thing and things, act and acts, which a governor of the king's person of this realm, during his minority, and a protector of his realms, dominions, and subjects, ought to do, procure, and execute, or cause to be done, procured, and executed; and also all and every other thing and things, which to the office of a governor of a king of this realm, during his minority, and a protector of his realms, dominions, and subjects, in any wise appertaineth or belongeth; willing, authorising, and commanding our said uncle, by these presents, to take upon him the name, title, and authority of governor of our person, and protector of our realms, dominions, and subjects; and to do, procure, and execute, and cause to be done, procured, and executed, from time to time, until we shall have accomplished the said age of eighteen years, all and every thing and things, act and acts, of what nature, quality, or effect soever they be or shall be, concerning our affairs, doings, and proceedings, both private and publick, as well in outward and foreign causes and matters, as also concerning our affairs, doings, and proceedings within our said realms and dominions, or in any of them, or concerning any manner, causes, or matters, of any of our subjects of the same, in such like manner and form as shall be thought, by his wisdom and discretion, to be for the honour, surety, and prosperity, good order, wealth, or community of us, or of any of our said realms and dominions, or of the subjects of any of the

And to the intent our said uncle should be furnished with men qualified in wit, knowledge, and experience for his aid and assistance in the managing and accomplishment of our said affairs, we have, by the advice and consent of our said uncle, and others, the nobles, prelates, and wise men of our said realm of England, chosen, taken, and accepted, and by these presents do chuse, take, accept, and ordain to be our counsellors, and of our council, the most reverend father in God, Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, and our right trusty and well-beloved William, lord St. John, great master of our household, and president of our council; John lord Russel, keeper of our privy seal; and our trusty and right well-beloved cousins,

William marquess of Northampton; John earl of Warwick, great chamberlain of England; Henry earl of Arundel, our lord chamberlain; Thomas lord Seymour of Sudley, high admiral of England; the reverend father in God, Cuthbert bishop of Duresme, and our right trusty and well-beloved Richard lord Rich; sir Thomas Cheney, knight of our order, and treasurer of our household; sir John Gage, knight of our order, and comptroller of our household; sir Anthony Brown, knight of our order, master of our horse; sir Anthony Wingfield, knight of our order, our vice-chamberlain; sir William Paget, knight of our order, our chief secretary; sir William Petre, knight, one of our two principal secretaries; sir Ralph Sadler, knight, master of our great wardrobe; sir John Baker, knight; Dr. Wotton, dean of Canterbury and York; sir Anthony Denny and sir William Herbert, kts., gentlemen of our privy-chamber; sir Edward North, kt., chancellor of our court of augmentations and revenues of our crown; sir Edward Montague, kt., chief justice of our common pleas; sir Edward Wotton, kt.; sir Edmund Pekham, kt., cofferer of our household; sir Thomas Bromley, kt., one of the justices for pleas before us to be holden; and sir Richard Southwell, kt.

And furthermore we are contented and pleased, and by these presents do give full power and authority to our said uncle, from time to time, until we shall have accomplished and be of the full age of eighteen years, to call, ordain, name, appoint, and swear such, and as many other persons of our subjects, as to him our said uncle shall seem meet and requisite to be of our council; and that all and every such person or persons, so by our said uncle, for and during the time aforesaid to be called, named, ordained, appointed, and sworn of our council, and to be our counsellor or counsellors, we do by these presents name, ordain, accept, and take our counsellor and counsellors, and of our council, in like manner and form as if he, they, and every of them, were in these presents by us appointed, named, and taken to be of our council, and our counsellor or counsellors, by express name or names. And that also of our forenamed counsellors, or of any others which our said uncle shall hereafter at any time take and chuse to be our counsellor or counsellors, or of our said council, he our said uncle shall, may, and have authority by these presents, to chuse, name, appoint, use, and swear of privy-council, and to be our privy-counsellor or counsellors, such and so many as he from time to time shall think convenient.

And it is our further pleasure, and also we will and grant by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, that whatsoever cause, matter, deed, thing, or things, of what nature, quality, or condition soever the same be; yea, though the same require, or ought by any manner, law, statute, proclamation, or other ordinance whatsoever, to be specially, or by name, expressed or set forth in this our present grant or letters patents, and be not herein expressed or mentioned, specially which our said uncle, or any of our privy-counsellor or counsellors, with the advice, consent, or agreement of our said uncle, have thought necessary, meet, expedient, decent, or in any manner-wise convenient to be devised, done, or executed, during our minority, and until we come to the full age of eighteen years, for the surety, honour, profit, health, or education of our person; or for the surety, honour, profit, weal, benefit, or commodity of any of our realms, dominions, or subjects; and the same have devised, done, or executed, or caused to be devised, executed, or done, at any time since the death of our most noble father of most famous memory; we are contented and pleased, and will and grant, for us, our heirs and successors, by these presents, that the same cause, matter, deed, thing and things, and every of them, shall stand, remain, and be (until such time our said uncle, with such and so many of our foresaid counsellors as he shall think meet to call unto his assistance, shall revoke and annihilate the same) good, sure, stable, available, and effectual, to all intents and purposes, without offence of us, or against us, or of or against any of our laws, statutes, proclamations, or other ordinances whatsoever; and without incurring therefore into any danger, penalty, forfeit, loss; or any other encumbrance, penalty, or vexation of his or their bodies, lands, rents, goods, or chattels; or of their, or any of their heirs, executors, or administrators, or of any other person or persons whatsoever, which have done or executed any cause, matter, deed, thing or things, now, or any time since the death of our said father, by the commandment or ordinance of our said uncle, or any of our counsellors, with the advice, consent, or agreement of our said uncle.

And further, we are contented and pleased, and will and grant, for us, our heirs and successors, by these presents, that whatsoever cause, matter, deed, thing or things, of what nature, quality, or condition soever the same be, or shall be; yea, though the same require, or ought by any manner, law, statute, proclamation, or other whatsoever ordinance to be specially and by name expressed and set forth in this our present grant and letters patents, and be not herein specially named or expressed, which our said uncle shall at any time, during our minority, and until we shall come to the full age of eighteen years, think necessary, meet, expedient, decent, or in any wise convenient to be devised, had, made, executed, or done in our name, for the surety, honour, profit, health, or education of our person, or which our said uncle, with the advice and consent of such and so many of our privy-council, or of our counsellors, as he shall think meet to call unto him from time to time, shall at any time, until we come unto the full age of eighteen years, think necessary, meet, decent, expedient, or in any wise convenient to be devised, had, made, executed, or done in our name, for the surety, honour, profit, weal, benefit, or commodity of any of our realms, dominions, or subjects, or any of them, he our said uncle and counsellors, and every of them, and all and every other person or persons, by his our said uncle's commandment, direction, appointment, or order, or by the commandment, appointment, direction, or order of any of our said counsellors, as our said uncle agree, and be contented, to and with the same, shall and may do or execute the same without displeasure to us, or any manner of crime or offence to be by us, our heirs or successors, laid or imputed to him our said uncle, or any of our said counsellors, or any other person or persons therefore, or in that behalf, and without any offence of or against our laws, statutes, proclamations, or other whatsoever ordinances; and without incurring therefore into any damages, penalty, forfeit, loss, or any other encumbrance, trouble, or vexation of his, or any of their bodies, lands, tenements, goods, or chattels; or of his or their, or any their heirs, successors, assigns, executors, or administrators. And therefore we will and command, not only all and every our judges, justices, sergeants, attorneys, solicitors, sheriffs, escheators, bailiffs, and all other our officers, ministers, and subjects, that now be, or hereafter shall be, in no wise to impeach, appeal, arrest, trouble, vex, injure, or molest in our name or otherwise, our said uncle, or our said counsellors, or any of them, or any other person, for any cause, matter, deed, thing, or things, which he or they, or any of them, have done, or shall do, execute, or cause to be executed or done as aforesaid; but also we require, and nevertheless straitly charge and command, by these presents, all and every our officers, ministers, and subjects, of what estate, degree, or condition soever he or they be, or shall be, to be obedient, aiding, attendant, and assisting to our said uncle and counsellors, and to every of them as behoveth, for the execution of this charge and commission given and committed unto our said uncle and council as aforesaid, as they tender our favour and their own weals, and as they will answer unto us at their uttermost perils for the contrary. In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patents; witness ourself at Westminster, the 13th day of March, in the first year of our reign,

The Form of bidding Prayer before the Reformation.

The Bodes on the Sunday.

[Out of the "Festival," printed An. 1509.]

YE shall kneel down on your knees, and lift up your hearts, making your prayers to Almighty God, for the good state and peace of all holy church, that God maintain, save, and keep it. For our holy father the pope, with all his true college of cardinals, that God for his mercy them maintain and keep in the right belief, and it hold and increase, and all misbelief and heresy be less and destroyed. Also ye shall pray for the Holy Land, and for the holy cross, that Jesus Christ died on for the redemption of men's souls, that it may come into the power of Christian men the more to be honoured for our prayers. Also ye shall pray for all archbishops and bishops; and especially for the archbishop of Canterbury, our metropolitan, and for the bishop of N., our diocesan, that God of his mercy give to them grace so to govern and rule holy church, that it may be to the honour and worship of Him and salvation of our souls. Also ye shall pray for abbots, priors, monks, canons, friars, and for all men and women of religion, in what order, estate, or degree that they stand in, from the highest estate unto the lowest degree. Also ye shall pray for all them that have charge and cure of Christian men's souls, as curats and parsons, vicars, priests, and clarks; and in especial for the parson and curat of this church, and for all the priests and ministers that serve therein, or have served therein; and for all them that have taken any order, that Almighty God give them grace of continuance well for to keep and observe it to the honour and health of their souls. Also ye shall pray for the unity and peace of all Christian realms, and in especial for the good estate, peace, and tranquillity of this realm of England, for our liege lord the king, that God for his great mercy send him grace so to govern and rule this realm that God be pleased and worshipped, and to the profit and salvation of this land. Also ye shall pray for our liege lady the queen, my lord prince, and all the noble progeny of them; for all dukes, earls, barons, knights, and esquires, and other lords of the king's council which have any rule and governance in this land, that God give them grace so to counsel, rule, and govern, that God be pleased, the land defended, and to the profit and salvation of all the realm. Also ye shall pray for the peace, both on land and on the water; that God grant love and charity among all Christian people. Also ye shall pray for all our parishes, where that they be, on land or on water, that God save them from all manner of perils; and for all the good men of this parish, for their wives, children, and men, that God them maintain, save, and keep. Also ye shall pray for all true tithers, that God multiply their goods and increase; for all true tillers that labour for our sustenance, that till the earth; and also for all the grains and fruits that be sown, set, or done on the earth, or shall be done, that God send such weather that they may grow, encrease, and multiply, to the help and profit of all mankind. Also ye shall pray for all true shipmen and merchants, where-soever that they be, on land or on water, that God keep them from all perils, and bring them home in safety, with their goods, ships, and merchandises, to the help, comfort, and profit of this realm. Also ye shall pray for them that find any light in this church, or give any behests, book, bell, chalice, or vestment, surplice, outer-cloth, or towel, lands, rents, lamp or light, or any other adornments, whereby God's service is the better served, sustained, and maintained in reading and singing; and for all them that thereto have counselled, that God reward and yield it them at their most need. Also ye shall pray for all true pilgrims and palmers, that have taken their way to Rome, to Jerusalem, to St. Katherine's, or St. James's, or to any other place, that God, of his grace, give them time and space well for to go and to come, to the profit of their lives and souls. Also ye shall pray for all them that be sick or diseased of this parish, that God send to them health, the rather for our prayers; for all the women which be in our Lady's bands, and with child, in this parish, or in any other, that God send to them fair deliverance; to their children right shape, name, and christendom; and to the mothers, purification; and for all them that would be here, and may not, for sickness or travail, or any other lawful occupation, that they may have part of all the good deeds that shall be done here in this place, or in any other. And ye shall pray for all them that be in good life, that God them hold long therein; and for them that be in debt or deadly sin, that Jesus Christ bring them out thereof, the rather for our prayers. Also ye shall pray for him or her that this day gave the holy bread, and for him that first began and longest holdeth on, that God reward it him at the day of doom; and for all them that do well, or say you good, that God yield it them at their need, and for them that otherwise would that Jesus Christ amend them: for all those, and for all Christian men and women, ye shall say a Pater Noster, Ave Maria, Deus misereatur nostri, Gloria Patri, Kyrie Eleison, Christe Eleison, Kyrie Eleison, Pater Noster, Et ne nos. Sed libera, Versus, Ostende nobis, Sacerdotes, Domine saluum fac Regem, Saluum fac Populum, Domine fiat Pax, Domine exaudi, Dominus vobiscum, Oremus, Ecclesia tue quesumus, Deus in cuius manu, Deus qui sanctorum, &c. Furthermore, ye shall pray for all Christian souls, for archbishops and bishops' souls, and in especial for all that have been bishops of this diocess; and for all curats, parsons, and vicars' souls, and in especial for them that have been curats of this church, and for the souls that have served in this church. Also ye shall pray for the souls of all Christian kings and queens, and in especial for the souls of them that have been kings of this noble realm of England; and for all those souls that to this church have given book, bell, chalice, or vestment, or any other thing by which the service of God is better done, and holy church worshipped. Ye shall also pray for your father's soul, for your mother's soul, for your godfathers' souls, for your godmothers' souls; for your brethren and sisters' souls, and for your kindred's souls, and for your friends' souls, and for all the souls we be bound to pray for; and for all the souls that be in the pains of purgatory, there abiding the mercy of Almighty God, and in especial for them that have most need and least help, that God of his endless mercy lessen and minish their pains by the means of our prayers, and bring them to his everlasting bliss in heaven. And also of the soul N., or of them that upon such a day this week we shall have the anniversary; and for all Christian souls ye shall devoutly say a Pater Noster and Ave Maria, Psalmus de profundis, &c., with this collect Oremus; Absolve quesumus Domine animas famulorum tuorum Pontificum, Regum, Sacerdotum, Parentum, Parochianorum, Amicorum, Benefactorum nostrorum, et omnium fidelium defunctorum, ab omni vinculo delictorum; ut in Resurrectionis Gloria inter sanitos et electos tuos resuscitati respirent, per Jesum Christum Dominum nostrum. Amen.

PLEASE it your grace my lord protector, and you right honourable lords of the king's majesty's council, to understand that I have received your letter of the 4th of this month, by which ye will me to search all mine old registers and ancient places to be sought, where anything may be found for the more clear declaration to the world of the king's majesty's title to the realm of Scotland, and to advertise you with speed accordingly: and also to signify unto you what ancient charters and monuments for that purpose I have seen, and where the same are to be sought for. According unto which your letters, I have sought with all diligence all mine old registers, making mention of the superiorities of the kings of England to the realm of Scotland, and have found in the same of many homages made by the kings of Scots to the kings of England, as shall appear by the copies which I do send to your grace and to your lordships herewith. Ye shall also find in the said copies the gift of the barony of Coldingham, made to the church of Duresm by Edgar the king of Scots; which original gift is under seal, which I showed once to my lord Maxwell at Duresm, in the presence of you my lord protector. I find also a confirmation of the same gift by king William Rufus in an old register, but not under seal, the copy whereof is sent herewith. The homages of kings of Scotland which I have found in the registers, I have sent in this copy. I send also herewith the copy of a grant made by king Richard the First unto William king of Scots and his heirs, how, as oft as he is summoned to come to the parliament, he shall be received in the confines of the realm of Scotland, and conducted from shire to shire unto his coming to the parliament; and what the king doth allow him for his diet every day unto the court; and also what diet and allowance he hath, being at the parliament, both in bread and wine, wax and candle, for his time of his abode there; and of his conduct in his return home.

And where king William, king of Scots, made homage to king Henry the Second, and granted that all the nobles of his realm should be his subjects, and make homage to him, and all the bishops of his realm should be under the archbishops of York; and the said king William delivered to the said king Henry the castles of Roxburgh, Edinburgh, and the castle of Barwick, as is found in my register; and that the king of England should give all abbeyes and honours in Scotland, or at least they should not be given without his counsel. I do find, in the confirmation of the same, out of the old registers of the priors of Duresm, homage made by the abbots, priors, and prioresses of Scotland, to king Edward the First, in French, which I do send herewith. Also I do send herewith, in French, how king Edward the First was received and taken to be supream lord in Scotland, by all those that pretend title to the crown of Scotland, as next heirs to the king, that was then dead without issue, and the compromise of them all made unto the said king Edward the First to stand to his judgment, which of all them that did claim should have the crown of Scotland: the transcript of which compromise in French was then sent by the said king Edward, under the seal of the king's exchequer in green wax, to the prior of Duresm, to be registered for a perpetual memory that the supremacy of Scotland belonged to the kings of England, which yet the chapters of Duresm have to shew; which thing he commandeth them to put in their chronicles.

And touching the second part of your letter, where you will me to advertise you what I have seen in the premisses; so it is that I was commanded by mine old master, of famous memory, king Henry the Eighth, to make search among the records of his treasury, in the receipt for solemnities to be done at his coronation in most solemn manner; according to which commandment I made search in the said treasury, where I fortun'd to find many writings for the supremacy of the king to the realm of Scotland; and among others also a writing, with very many seals of arms of Scots, confessing the right of the supremacy to the king of England; which writings I doubt not may be found there.

I have also sent a copy of a book myself have of homages made to the kings of England by the kings of Scotland, which the chancellor of England in king Henry the Seventh's days had gathered out of the king's records; which I doubt not, but out of the king's records and ancient books, the same may be found again by my lord chancellor and the judges.

Furthermore, your grace, and you the right honourable lords of the council, shall understand, that in making much search for the premisses, at the last we found, out of the registers of the chapters of Duresm, when it was a priory, the copy of a writing, by which king Edward the Second doth renounce such superiority as he had in the realm of Scotland, for him and his heirs, to Robert king of Scots then being, as will appear by a copy of the same which I do send you herewith, making mention, in the end of the said writings, of a commission that he gave to Henry the lord Percy, and to William the lord Souch, under his letters patents, to give his oath upon the same. And after the said writing we found also in the said book a renunciation of the said king Edward, of a process that he had commenced before the bishop of Rome, against Robert king of Scots and his subjects, for breaking their oath to him, as will appear by the copy thereof, which I do send also herewith. And touching the said renunciation of king Edward the Second to the superiority of the realm of Scotland, I have often heard it spoken of by Scots, but I did never see the form of it in writing until I see it now; which thing it is not unlikely but the Scots have under the seal of the said king Edward. Whereunto answer is to be made, that a king renouncing the right of his crown cannot prejudice his successors, who have, at the time of their entry, the same whole right that their predecessors had at their first entry, as men learned in the civil law can by their learning shew.

And furthermore, search is to be made in the king's records in the treasury, whether homages have been made sithence king Edward the Second's time; that is to say, in the times of king Edward the Third, king Richard the Second, king Henry the Fourth, king Henry the Fifth, and king Henry the Sixth. In which times if any homage can be found to be made, it shall appear the same renunciation to have taken none effect in the successors, and ancient right to be continued again. For after king Edward the Fourth and king Henry the Sixth strove for the crown, I think none homage of Scotland will be found; for then was also lost Gascoigne and Guienne in France. It is also to be remembered, that when the body of king Henry the Fifth was brought out of France to be buried at Westminster, the king of Scots then being came with him, and was the chief mourner at his burial; which king of Scots, whether he made any homage to king Henry the Fifth in his lifetime, or to king Henry the Sixth at his coronation, it is to be searched by the records of that time.

This is all that can be found hitherto, by all the most diligent search that I could make in my records here; and if any more can be found, it shall be sent with all speed.

And thus Almighty preserve your grace, and your honourable lordships, to his pleasure and yours.

Your grace's most humble orator at commandment,
CUTH. Duresme.

The Oath given to the Scots who submitted to the Protector.

[Ex Libro Concilii, Fol. 139.]

You shall bear your faith to the king's majesty, our sovereign lord Edward the Sixth, &c., till such time as you shall be discharged of your oath by special license. And you shall, to the uttermost of your power, serve his majesty, truly and faithfully, against all other realms, dominions, and potentates, as well Scots as others. You shall hear nothing that may be prejudicial to his majesty, or any of his realms or dominions, but, with as much diligence as you may, shall cause the same to be opened, so as the same come to his majesty's knowledge, or to the knowledge of the lord protector, or some of his majesty's privy-council. You shall, to the uttermost of your possible power, set forwards and advance the king's majesty's affairs in Scotland, for the marriage and peace.

NUMBER XII.

The Protestation of the Bishop of London, made to the Visitors when he received the King's Majesty's Injunctions and Homilies.

[Ex Libro Concilii, Fol. 110.]

I do receive these injunctions and homilies, with this protestation, that I will observe them, if they be not contrary and repugnant to God's law, and the statutes and ordinances of this church.

The Submission and Revocation of the same Bishop, made before the Lords of the King's Majesty's Council, presently attending upon his Majesty's Person; with the Subscription of his Name thereunto.

WHEREAS I, Edmund bishop of London, at such time as I received the king's majesty's, my most dread sovereign lord's, injunctions and homilies at the hands of his highness' visitors, did unadvisedly make such protestation, as now, upon better consideration of my duty of obedience, and of the ill example that may ensue to others thereof, appeareth to me neither reasonable nor such as might well stand with the duty of an humble subject; forasmuch as the same protestation, at my request, was then by the register of that visitation enacted and put on record; I have thought it my bounden duty, not only to declare before your lordships that I do now, upon better consideration of my duty, renounce and revoke my said protestation, but also most humbly beseech your lordships, that this my revocation of the same may likewise be put in the same Records for a perpetual memory of the truth: most humbly beseeching your good lordships, both to take order that it may take effect, and also that my former unadvised doings may, by your good mediations, be pardoned of the king's majesty.

EDMUND London.

NUMBER XIII.

Gardiner's Letter to Sir John Godsalue concerning the Injunctions.

[Ex MS. Col. C. C. Cantab.]

Mr. Godsalue, after my right hearty commendations, with like thanks for the declaration of your good mind towards me (as you mean it) although it agreeth not with mine accompt, such as I have had leisure to make in this time of liberty, since the death of my late sovereign lord (whose soul Jesu pardon); for this have I reckoned, that I was called to this bishoprick without the offence of God's law, or the king's in the attaining of it. I have kept my bishopric these sixteen years, accomplished this very day that I write these my letters unto you, without offending God's law, or the king's, in the retaining of it, howsoever I have of frailty otherwise sinned. Now if I may play the third part well, to depart from the bishopric without the offence of God's law, or the king's, I shall think the tragedy of my life well passed over: and in this part to be well handled is all my care and study now, how to finish this third act well; for so I offend not God's law nor the king's, I will no more care to see my bishopric taken from me, than myself to be taken from the bishopric. I am by nature already condemned to die, which sentence no man can pardon, nor assure me of delay in the execution of it; and so see that of necessity I shall leave my bishopric to the disposition of the crown from whence I had it, my household also to break up, and my bringing up of youth to cease, the remembrance whereof troubleth me nothing. I made in my house at London a pleasant study that delighted me much, and yet I was glad to come into the country and leave it; and as I have left the use of somewhat, so can I leave the use of all to obtain a more quiet; it is not loss to change for the better, honesty and truth are more leef to me than all the possessions of the realm, and in these two to say and do frankly, as I must, I never forbear yet; and in these two, honesty and truth, I take such pleasure and comfort, as I will never leave them for no respect, for they will abide by a man, and so will nothing else. No man can take them away from me but myself; and if myself do them away from me, then myself do undo myself, and make myself worthy to lose my bishopric, whereat such as gape might take more sport than they are like to have at my hands. What other men have said or done in the homilies I cannot tell, and what homilies or injunctions shall be brought hither I know not; such as the printers have sold abroad, I have read and considered, and am therefore the better instructed how to use myself to the visitors at their repair hither, to whom I will use no manner of protestation but a plain allegation, as the matter serveth, and as honesty and truth shall bind me to speak; for I will never yield to do that should not beseech a Christian. Bishops ought never to lose the inheritance of the king's laws due to every Englishman for want of petition. I will show myself a true subject, humble and obedient, which repugneth not with the preservation of my duty to God, and my right in the realm, not to be enjoined against an act of parliament: which mine intent I have signified to the council, with request of redress in the matter, and not to compel me to such an allegation, which, without I were a beast, I cannot premit: and I were more than a beast, if after I had signified to the council truth and reason in words, I should then seem in my deeds not to care for it. My lord protector, in one of such letters as he wrote to me, willed me not to fear too much; and indeed I know him so well, and divers others of my lords of the council, that I cannot fear any hurt at their hands, in the allegation of God's law and the king's, and I will never defame them so much to be seen to fear it. And of what strength an act of parliament is, the realm was taught in the case of her that we called queen Anne, where all such as spake against her in the parliament-house, although they did it by special commandment of the king, and spake that was truth, yet they were fain to have a pardon, because that speaking was against an act of parliament. Did you never know, or hear tell of any man, that for doing that the king our late sovereign lord willed, devised, and required to be done, he that took pains, and was commanded to do it, was fain to sue for his pardon, and such other also as were doers in it: and I could tell who it were. Sure there hath been such a case, and I have been present when it hath been reasoned, that the doing against an act of parliament excuseth not a man, even from the case of treason, although a man did it by the king's commandment. You can tell this to your remembrance, when you think further of it, and when it cometh to your remembrance, you will not be best content with yourself, I believe, to have advised me to enter the breach of an act of parliament, without surety of pardon, although the king command it, and were such indeed as it were no matter to do it at all. And thus I answer the letters with worldly civil reasons, and take your mind and zeal towards me to be as tender as may be; and yet you see that the following of your advice might make me lose my bishopric by mine own act, which I am sure you would I should keep, and so would I, as might stand with my truth and honesty, and none otherwise, as knoweth God, who send you heartily well to fare.

NUMBER XIV.

The Conclusion of Gardiner's Letter to the Protector, against the Lawfulness of the Injunctions.

[Cotton Libr. Vesp. D. 18.]

Whether the king may command against the common law, or an act of parliament, there is never a judge, or other man in the realm, ought to know more by experience, of that the lawyers have said, than I.

First, my lord cardinal had obtained his legacy by our late sovereign lord's request at Rome; yet being it was against the laws of the realm, the judges censured the offence of premunire; which matter I bore away, and take it for a law of the realm, because the lawyers said so, but my reason digested it not.

The lawyers, for the confirmation of their doings, brought in a case of my lord Typtoft, an earl he was, and learned in civil laws; who being chancellor, because in execution of the king's commission, he offended the laws of the realm, he suffered on Tower-hill: they brought in the examples of many judges that had fines set on their heads in like case, for transgression of the laws by the king's commandment; and this I learned in this case.

Since that time being of the council, when many proclamations were devised against the carriers out of corn; when it came to punishing the offenders, the judges would answer, it might not be by the laws, because the act of parliament gave liberty, wheat being under a price: whereupon at the last followed the act of proclamations, in the passing whereof were many large words.

When the bishop of Exeter and his chancellor were by one body brought into a premunire, I reasoned with the lord Audley, then chancellor, so far, as he bade me hold my peace, for fear of entering a premunire myself: but I concluded, that although I must take it as of their authority that it is common law, yet I could not see how a man authorised by the king, as since the king's majesty hath taken upon him the supremacy, every bishop is, that man could fall in a premunire.

I reasoned once in the parliament-house, where was free speech without danger; and there the lord Audley, chancellor, then to satisfy me, because I was in some secret estimation as he knew. Thou art a good fellow, bishop, (quoth he,) look the act of supremacy, and there the king's doings be restrained to spiritual jurisdiction: and in another act, no spiritual law shall have place contrary to a common law, or an act of parliament. And if this were not (quoth he), the bishops would enter in with the king, and by means of his supremacy order the law as you listed; but we will provide (quoth he) that the premunire shall never go off your heads. This I bare away there, and held my peace.

Since that time, in a case of jewels, I was fain, with the emperor's ambassador Chapinius when he was here, and in the emperor's court also, to defend and maintain by commandment, that the king's majesty was not above his laws, and therefore the jeweller, although he had the king's bill signed, yet it would not serve, because it was not obtained after the order of the law, in which matter I was very much troubled. Even this time twelvemonth, when I was in commission with my lord great master, and the earl of Southampton, for the altering of the Court of Augmentations, there was my lord Montague, and other of the king's learned council, of whom I learned what the king might do against an act of parliament, and what danger it was to them that meddled. It is fresh in my memory, and they can tell whether I say true or no; and therefore being learned in so notable causes, I wrote in your absence therein, as I had learned by hearing the common lawyers speak (whose judgment rule these matters) howsoever my reason can digest them. When I wrote thereof, the matter was so reasonable, as I have been learned by the lawyers of the realm, that I trusted my lords would have staid till your grace's return.

A Letter from the Duke of Somerset to the Lady Mary, in the beginning of King Edward's Reign.

[Cotton Libr. Faust. C. 2.]

Madam, my humble commendations to your Grace premised;

These may be to signify unto the same, that I have received your letters of the second of this present, by Jent your servant, acknowledging myself thereby much bound unto your grace; nevertheless I am very sorry to perceive that your grace should have or conceive any sinister or wrong opinion in me and others, which were by the king, your late father, and our most gracious master, put in trust as executors of his will, albeit the truth of our doings being known to your grace, as it seemeth by your said letter not to be. I trust there shall be no such fault found in us, as in the same your grace hath alleged; and for my part, I know none of us that will willingly neglect the full execution of every jot of his said will, as far as shall and may stand with the king our master's honour and surety that now is: otherwise I am sure that your grace, nor none other his faithful subjects, would have it take place; not doubting but our doings and proceedings therein, and in all things committed to our charge, shall be such as shall be able to answer the whole world, both in honour and discharge of our consciences. And where your grace writeth, that the most part of the realm, through a naughty liberty and presumption, are now brought into such a division, as if we executors go not about to bring them to that stay that our late master left them; they will forsake all obedience, unless they have their own will and phantasies, and then it must follow that the king shall not be well served, and that all other realms shall have us in an obloquy and derision, and not without just cause. Madam, as these words written or spoken by you soundeth not well, so can I not persuade myself, that they have proceeded from the sincere mind of so virtuous and so wise a lady, but rather by the setting on and procurement of some uncharitable and malicious persons, of which sort there are too many in these days, the more pity: but yet we must not be so simple so to weigh and regard the sayings of ill-disposed people, and the doings of other realms and countries, as for that report we should neglect our duty to God, and to our sovereign lord and native country, for then we might be justly called evil servants and masters; and thanks be given unto the Lord, such hath been the king's majesty's proceedings, our young noble master that now is, that all his faithful subjects have more cause to render their hearty thanks for the manifold benefits showed unto his grace, and to his people and realm, sithence the first day of his reign until this hour, than to be offended with it; and thereby rather to judge and think that God, who knoweth the hearts of all men, is contented and pleased with his ministers, who seek nothing but the true glory of God, and the surety of the king's person, with the quietness and wealth of his subjects. And where your grace writeth also, that there was a godly order and quietness left by the king our late master, your grace's father, in this realm at the time of his death; and that the spirituality and temporality of the whole realm, did not only, without compulsion, fully assent to his doings and proceedings, especially in matters of religion, but also in all kind of talk, whereof, as your grace wrote, ye can partly be witness yourself; at which your grace's sayings I do something marvel: for it may please you to call to your remembrance what great labours, travels, and pains his grace had before he could reform some of those stiff-necked Romanists or papists: yea, and did not they cause his subjects rise and rebel against him, and constrained him to take the sword in his hand, not without danger to his person and realm? Alas, why should your grace so shortly forget that great outrage done by those generations of vipers unto his noble person only for God's cause? Did not some of the same ill kind also, I mean that Romanist sect, as well within his own realm as without, conspire oftentimes his death, which was manifestly and oftentimes proved, to the confusion of some of their privy assisters. Then was it not that all the spirituality, nor yet the temporality, did so fully assent to his godly orders, as your grace writeth of? Did not his grace also depart from this life before he had fully finished such orders as he minded to have established to all his people, if death had not prevented him? Is it not most true, that no kind of religion was perfected at his death, but left all uncertain, most like to have brought us into parties and divisions, if God had not only helped us? And doth your grace think it convenient it should so remain? God forbid. What regret and sorrow our late master had, the time he saw he must depart, for that he knew the religion was not established as he purposed to have done, I and others can be witness and testify; and what he would have done further in it, if he had lived, a great many know, and also I can testify: and doth your grace, who is learned, and should know God's word, esteem true religion, and the knowledge of the Scriptures, to be new-fangledness and fantasie? For the Lord's sake turn the leaf, and look the other while upon the other side, I mean, with another judgment, which must pass by an humble spirit through the peace of the living God, who of his infinite goodness and mercy grant unto your grace plenty thereof, to the satisfying of your conscience, and your most noble heart's continual desire.

NUMBER XVI.

Certain Petitions and Requests made by the Clergy of the Lower House of the Convocation, to the most Reverend Father in God the Archbishop of Canterbury his Grace, and the residue of the Prelates of the Higher House, for the furtherance of certain Articles following.

[Ex MS. Dr. Stillingfleet.]

First; That ecclesiastical laws may be made and established in this realm by thirty-two persons, or so many as shall please the king's majesty to name and appoint, according to the effect of a late statute made in the thirty-fifth year of the most noble king, and of most famous memory, king Henry VIII. So that all judges ecclesiastical, proceeding after those laws, may be without danger and peril.

Also that according to the ancient custom of this realm, and the tenour of the king's writ for the summoning of the parliament, which be now, and ever have been, directed to the bishops of every diocese, the clergy of the lower house of the convocation may be adjoined, and associate with the lower house of the parliament; or else, that all such statutes and ordinances as shall be made concerning all matters of religion and causes ecclesiastical, may not pass without the sight and assent of the said clergy.

Also, that whereas by the commandment of king Henry VIII., certain prelates and learned men were appointed to alter the service in the church, and to devise other convenient and uniform order therein; who according to the same appointment, did make certain books, as they be informed: their request is, that the said books may be seen and perused by them, for a better expedition of divine service to be set forth accordingly.

Also, that men being called to spiritual promotions, or benefices, may have some allowance for their necessary living, and other charges to be sustained and borne, concerning the same benefices, in the first year wherein they pay the first fruits.

Whether the clergy of the convocation may liberally speak their minds without danger of statute or law.

NUMBER XVII.

A second Petition to the same purpose.

[Ex MS. Dr. Stillingfleet.]

Where the clergy, in this present convocation assembled, have made humble suit unto the most reverend father in God my lord archbishop of Canterbury, and all the other bishops, that it may please them to be a mean to the king's majesty, and lord protector's grace, that the said clergy, according to the tenour of the king's writ, and the ancient laws and customs of this noble realm, might have their room and place, and be associated with the commons in the nether house of this present parliament, as members of the commonwealth, and the king's most humble subjects. And if this may not be permitted and granted unto them, that then no statutes or laws concerning the Christian religion, or which shall concern especially the persons, possessions, rooms, livings, jurisdictions, goods, or chattels of the said clergy, may pass nor be enacted, the said clergy not being made privy therunto, and their answers and reasons not heard. The said clergy do most humbly beseech an answer and declaration to be made unto them, what the said most reverend father in God, and all other the bishops, have done in this their humble suit and request, to the end that the said clergy, if need be, may chuse of themselves such able and discreet persons, which shall effectually follow the same suit in the name of them all.

And whereas in a statute ordained and established by authority of parliament at Westminster, in the twenty-fifth year of the reign of the most excellent prince king Henry VIII., the clergy of this realm submitting themselves to the king's highness, did knowledge and confess, according to the truth, that the convocations of the same clergy have been, and ought to be assembled by the king's writ, and did promise farther, in Verbo Sacerdotii, that they never from thenceforth would presume to attempt, allege, claim, or put in use, or enact, promulge, or execute any new canons, constitutions, ordinances, provincials, or other, or by whatsoever other name they shall be called in the convocation, unless the king's most royal assent and license may to them be had to make, promulge, and execute the same. And his majesty to give his most royal assent and authority in that behalf, upon pain of every one of the clergy doing the contrary, and being thereof convict, to suffer imprisonment, and make fine at the king's will. And that no canons, constitutions, or ordinances shall be made or put in execution within this realm, by authority of the convocation of the clergy, which shall be repugnant to the king's prerogative royal, or the customs, laws, or statutes of this realm; which statute is oftsoons renewed and established in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of the most noble king, as by the tenour of both statutes more at large will appear. The said clergy being presently assembled in convocation, by authority of the king's writ, do desire that the king's majesty's license in writing may be for them obtained and granted, according to the effect of the said statutes authorising them to attempt, entreat, and commune of such matters, and therein freely to give their consents, which otherwise they may not do upon pain and peril premised.

Also the said clergy desireth, that such matters as concerneth religion, which be disputable, may be quietly and in good order reasoned and disputed among them in this house, whereby the verities of such matters shall the better appear, and the doubts being opened and resolutely discussed, men may be fully persuaded with the quietness of their consciences, and the time well spent.

NUMBER XVIII.

A Paper offered to Q. Elizabeth, and afterwards to K. James, concerning the Inferior Clergy's being brought to the House of Commons.

[Ex MS. Dr. Borlace.]

Reasons to induce her Majesty, that Deans, Archdeacons, and some other of her grave and wise Clergie, may be admitted into the Lower House of Parliament.

1. In former times, when causes ecclesiastical were either not at all, or else very rarely treated of in that assembly, the clergy were thought men most meet to consult and determine of the civil affairs of this realm.

2. The supreme authority in church causes is not newly granted, but reunited and restored to the crown; and an order is by law already established, how all abuses in the church are to be reformed: so as no cause concerning religion may be handled in that house without her majesty's special leave, but with the manifest impeaching of her prerogative royal, and contempt of the said order.

3. If it shall please her highness to give way to this course, that church-matters be there debated, and in part concluded: how much more necessary is it now than it was in former times, that some of the clergy should be there present at the same!

4. * It doth not appear why they were excluded, but as it is thought either the king, offended with some of them, did so grievously punish the whole body, or else the ambition of one of them meeting with the subtily of an undermining politic, did occasion this causeless separation.

5. They are yet to this day called by several writs, directed into their several dioceses under the great seal, to assist the prince in that high court of parliament.

6. Though the clergy and the universities be not the worst members of this commonwealth, yet in that respect they are of all other in worst condition: for in that assembly every shire hath their knights, and every incorporate town their burgesses, only the clergy and the universities are excluded.

7. The wisdom and justice of this realm doth intend, that no subject should be bound to that law whereunto he himself (after a sort) hath not yielded his consent; but the clergy and the universities may now be concluded by law, without their consent, without their just defence, without their privacy.

8. The many motions made so prejudicial to the state and being of the clergy and universities, followed now with so great eagerness in that house, would

* In the same paper written over to be presented to K. James, this article is thus varied. It is thought the clergy falling into a preunire, and so not in the king's protection, it did afterwards please the king to pardon them, but not to restore them. So began this separation, as far forth as can be collected; then the wisdom of a great politician, meeting with the ambition of as great a prelate, wrought the continuance of the said separation, under this pretence, that it should be most for the honour of him and his clergy, to be still by themselves in two assemblies of convocation, answerable in proportion to the two houses of parliament. There are many other inconsiderable amendments made by bishop Ravie's own hand.

then be utterly silenced, or soon repressed, with the sober and sufficient answers of the clergy present.

9. It would much repair the reputation and credit of the clergy, which now is exposed to great contumely and contempt, as generally abroad in this land, so particularly in that house. And whoso is religious and wise may observe, that the contempt of the clergy is the high way to atheism and all profaneness. Men are flesh and not spirit, led by ordinary outward means, and not usually overwrought by extraordinary inspirations; and therefore do easily despise their doctrine whose persons they have in contempt.

10. Look into the whole world, Christian or unchristian, and see if the civil state in every place be not supported and maintained by the dignity and authority of their clergies, subordinate and subjected unto them: as, on the contrary, where the clergy is base and contemptible, there grows an anarchy and confusion. It is conscience that works obedience to the temporal magistrate, not constitutions, nor constraint; the one may command it, the other may correct the breach of it, only religion effects a peaceable subjection.

11. It concerneth the clergy, most of all men in England, that the present state be continued, as now it is happily established without any alteration. Whereas some others in that house may think it would be good for them to fish in troubled waters, or that any change would be better to them than their present estate wherein they live so malecontent, through their own unthriftiness or malignity of nature, or perverseness of opinion.

12. If hereafter God in justice should plague us for our sins, by taking away the joy of our hearts, yet how greatly would it tend to his glory, the good of this land, and the honour of her blessed memory, if it shall please her majesty to leave a portion of the clergy interest in that house, where they may stand for the godly government established in her days, against all innovation of popery or puritanism!

13. In the mean time (which God in mercy grant may be for many generations) her majesty shall be sure of a number more in that assembly, that ever will be most ready to maintain her prerogative, and to enact whatsoever may make most for her highness' safety and contentment, as the men that next under God's goodness do most depend upon her princely clemency and protection.

14. It would much recover the ancient estimation and authority of that assembly, if it might be increased with men of religion, learning, and discretion; which now is somewhat imbraced by youths, serving men, and outlaws, that injuriously are crept into the honourable house.

15. And it is the more necessary that there were some more men of sobriety and judgment in that meeting, that might counterpoise the haste and headiness of others that have intruded themselves, especially considering that a cipher is as sufficient to promote a single figure of one into the place of ten, as the best man that giveth voice in that house, when they come to calculating.

NUMBER XIX.

A Letter of Martin Bucer's to Gropper.

[Ex MS. Col. C. C. Cantab.]

GRATIAM et Pacem Doctissime et Amicissime Vir. Quod tam sero respondeo ad tuas Literas, quamquam etiam occupationes Ministerii mei, tamen id magis in causa fuit, quod non satis liqueret, quomodo respondere conveniret, simul mœx in te Charitati, meoq; Ministerio, et præsentis temporis conditioni. Sed tamen quia Charitati Deus facile omnia secundat, et frugifera facit, hac incitatus nunc respondeo, et respondeo ex ejus dictatione.

Et primum de eo, quod te de meo adventu et Ministerio non præmonuerim. Quod per totam Germaniam increbuerat, etiam anteaquam Ego certus de vocatione ista essem, non putavi te latere posse. Mox etiam ut adveni et priusquam aliquid Ministerii inivissem, tuum colloquium expetii. Certe nihil maluissem quam a te ante omnia doceri et institui. Novit Christus quid tibi Tribuam.

Quod scribis te cupere meam conditionem sic esse ut Clero et Populo Vestræ Colonie Agrippinæ gratus esse et placere possem, nunc cum secus se res habeant, non esse quod tibi quid imputem. Tibi optime Gropere nihil hujus imputo, confido enim te, me, quo ipse loco habes, eo etiam studere apud alios collocare.

Sed cogitemus juxta, cui, Ego Clero istic, cui populo et cur gratus minus sim, et non placeam, Clerus et Populus Christi cum Domino suo, Personam nullam in invocantibus Christum, in iis præsertim, quos aliqua Religionis Nostræ opinio commendat, aversatur: quamvis deprehensi in contumelia Christi, in desolatione verbi ejus, in Scandalo objecto Ecclesie ejus; Lex nostra non Judicat quenquam nisi audierit prius ab eo, et cognoverit quid fecerit. Audiant, cognoscant, tum Judicent: si audire et cognoscere nolunt nec Judicare jure possunt. Vulgata est hæc Responsio, sed nosti etiam Jure Divino, Naturæ, et scripto ab hominibus niti.

Sed O Clerum, O fortem Domini, et habentes Christum sortem suam. Gratias ago Christo Domino nostro quod in me nihil deprehendit vester Clerus et Populus, cur me illo Jure abjicere, nedum prosequi queant. Assumpsit me Dominus, Servorum non est rejicere: posuit me in Ministerium suum Christus, depelli me eo nemo de Clero Christi sustulabit. Agnoscunt se invicem et amant, atq; in opere eodem promovent, quicunq; Christi Spiritu vivunt et aguntur, qui hunc non habent, Christi non sunt, quicquid ipsi se, vel alii eos vocent.

Displicet in me quod videor aliquid Canonum, sed humanitus tantum Conditorum, transgressus. Hoc si propter Ecclesiam Christi, vel ejus ædificationem vel ornatum displiceret, non tolerata fuissent tam diu, et hodie tolerarentur, tam horrendæ et Manifestæ Simonie, Sacrilegia, et vitæ totius tanta, adeoq; et Canonibus, et Divinis Legibus graviter damnata fuditas. Christi igitur veritas, et libertas in me istis displicet, non transgressio Canonum, quam in summis necessariis Sanctionibus penitus et tot jam sæculis pro ridiculo habent.

Consolabor itaq; me in Domino, Beati estis, cum vos odio habuerint homines, et a se excluderint, atq; convitiis proscederint et rejecerint nomen vestrum tanquam nefandum, Causa Filii hominis, Qui in Cœlis sedet. Pater videt profecto hosce conatus contra Regnum Filii sui, et brevi loquetur illis in ira sua. Avertat misericordia ejus, quæ sequuntur.

Deploranda profecto Cæcitas, non videre hanc Dei clarissimam Lucem, infanda stupiditas, ista Dei Judicia non sentire. Quotidie enim vident et audiunt ut collidantur, qui impingunt in hanc Petram Scandali, et ut commolat illa, in quos ipsa ceciderit, et tamen conantur adhuc rejicere hunc lapidem, quem Pater in Zion pro fundamento et angulo posuit. Sed dolent hæc et tibi, ac mecum ea deploras, provides enim quid ista malorum invehant, et adhuc invectura sint.

Audio plerosq; multo quam antea solitum fuit concionari purius, audivi etiam quosdam ipse, in quorum concionibus nihil reprehendendum audiebatur, aut quam multa desiderabantur. Nam pro Amplitudine Majestatis Christi, prædicanda Christi omnia sunt: hoc est summa perspicuitate, libertate et virtute, non enim ut multa præclara cogitemus, aut loquamur, sed ut Domino magis magisq; fidamus, nomen ejus celebremus: idq; verbis et factis omnibus, sacræ Concionationis habendæ sunt. Quare etiam opposita juxta se ponenda sunt ut magis illucescant, sed ad singularia Sermo dimittendus est ut plus moneat.

In Templo D. Columbæ, aiunt Idolo ejus Imaginis parari vestem majoris pretii quam Centum Florenorum. Si jam Pastor hujus Parochiæ Christum pure et ἐνεργῶς cum effectu prædicat, qui fert tam pudendam Idololatriam? Et si ornari statuum posse aliquo colore dicere conetur, quare non cum cultum præscribet, quem gratum Martyribus et S. Patres testantur, cultum qui Cruci Christi sit consentaneus: Sed sicut ipsi verbis Christo omnia tribuunt, factum autem querunt et prosequuntur tam multa contra Christum, ita faciunt etiam populum delectari nonnihil Saniore Doctrina. Omni autem Vita et Religione permanere in omnibus Superstitionibus et Vitæ impuritate in qua antea hærebat.

Jactatur magna populi devotio istis et erga Pastores suos reverentia, hoc autem gravius peccatur, cum illis Christus non quam simplicissime in omnibus etiam Ceremoniis prædicatur. Sed O spinas existimationis et commoditas mundialis, O fundum tenuem, et humorem malignum, in quo æstus Crucis enatus semen tam cito arefacit! Hæc de iis scribo ad quos pertinet.

De te non dubito Gloriam Christi et propugnationem Regni ejus tibi quoq; ut scribis, cordi esse: tamen te rogo per Christum id quod subjicis diligenter et coram Christo Domino excutias.

Sed nolui tamen sic urgere Causam Christi, ut dum promotam eam velim, magis remorer. Zelum oportet esse secundum scientiam. Recte hæc, si rite intelligantur. Sed scientia Spiritus, non Carnis, hic opus est. Causa Christi nec debet nec potest per se quidem urgeri nisi assiduis precibus, et modesta, leni, Religiosa, sed libera, sed clara, sed integra confessione et prædicatione Christi, eaq; quæ non verbis tantum sed etiam factis constet. Hoc si scimus et agimus, Zelum habemus secundum scientiam, et Causam Christi tantum promovere, et renorari non possumus. Nam Christo tradita est omnis potestas in Cœlo et in Terra, igitur nihil est Potestatis per se Pontifici, cucullatis et personatis, ac quibusvis titulis titulatis hominibus, qui scilicet tægerant liberam et puram Christi Prædicationem. Est quidem aliquando tacendum Evangelium Christi, sed apud canes et porcos, imo nec apud hos tacendum est, cum Gloria Christi agitur: sed animose confitendum est, quanquam non sit illis late explicandum, id est, Sanctum hoc projiciendum et Margaritæ istæ spargendæ.

Sunt qui ferre nos Lutheranos non possunt, et tamen a Regno Christi non abhorrent? Ubi quæso sunt et qui? Qui enim aliquid Christi habent, ii neminem odisse et condemnare sustinent, non auditum, non cognita causa; nam Filii Dei agnoscunt loquelam Christi, oves ejus sequuntur vocem ejus, per quemcunq; eam insonari fecerit.

Si Reformatio Ecclesie per istos illa queritur, indubie id quærent, ut Membra Christi omnia sub Capite Christo recolligantur et reconcinnetur et cooptentur. Quare nemo horum, qui vero Reformationis veræ studio tenentur, ullum hominem sub ullo titulo, quamvis odiosum invidia Crucis Christi, cuiquam imposuerit, ab hoc sancto opere instaurandi Ecclesias rejiciat, præsertim cum luce meridiana constet clarius, Pontificios nihil prorsus passuros mutari. Quid ergo? non queremus ut Patria nostra tam pernitiosis desidiis aliquando liberaretur, ut uno tandem ore Christum glorificemus.

Ne reseceamus vites, et uvas queramus a spinis. Valeat apud nos præjudicium Christi; quosque ille assumpsit, eos conservi ne repudiemus. Quid cuique datum sit facile videre est: arbor quemlibet ut plantata est, ut ingenium habet, ita fert fructum. Ne fugiamus Scandalum Crucis cum quo Christus est. Et si Christi nos non pudeat, nec servorum ejus nos pudeat. Paulus scribit Timotheo, ne pudeat te Testimonium Domini nostri, neque mei victi ejusque; ita dum nos negotia Domini agimus sinceriter, nec nostri quisquam, quantumlibet nos Mundus inter damnatos numeret, qui Christi sit, pudebit. Non est res ulla, ad quam quisquis eam sincere agit, magis crepetat adjuvari se, etiamsi fieri possit ab omnibus Creaturis, atque est negotium Reformationis Christianæ.

Irascentur quidam, tumultuabuntur graviter credo, et impediunt negotium Domini; hoc non credo, neque enim poterunt. Et ut Dominus eis gravissima contra Regnum suum facere concedat, tamen nobis Filiis Dei propterea nihil tacendum, nihil dissimulandum, nihil remittendum est in hac Causa Christi.

Jubes me non suspicari te sic mundo inescatum, ut refugas Crucem Domini ferre, si ita res postulet, et fructum facturum videre: de te profecto hoc bonis apud quos convenit semper Testor, te mihi multo plura in Causa Christi hactenus semper reipsa præstitisse, quam promisisses aut etiam verbis præ te tulisses: apud me quidem, cum contrarium nunc accidat a quodam, nisi te Christi membrum et præclaris dotibus ornatum suspicerem, crede, ita dedit mihi Dominus sublimia Mundi non mirari, tuam amicitiam et familiaritatem tantopere non quesivisses, nec tali studio colerem: sed valde oro Dominum det tibi videre ubi, quando et qua ratione fructum pro Regno facere possis; et animet te ac corroboret forti contemplatione Potestatis et Majestatis suæ, ut vere dicas, absit mihi gloriari nisi in Cruce Domini Nostri Jesu Christi per quem mihi Mundus Crucifixus est et ego mundo. Tantæ opes, honores, Curæ rerum sæcularium, tamen spinæ sunt, tamen onera sunt. Presbyter es Domini Nostri Jesu Christi, cujus præcipuum munus est prædicare Christum. Clericum veteres Sancti non patiebantur, vel tutelam pupillorum, vel curam viduarum suscipere, tam liberum volebant esse curis hujus Sæculi omnem Clericum: ut quantis tu ac etiam privatis causis, nec tamen semper Pupillarum et Viduarum prægravaris, id dolet indubie et tibi ipsi. Acceptabile Tempus nunc est et Dies Salutis, sed tempus breve, visitationem Nostram tempore agnoscamus et sequamur.

Hæc dum non datur commentari tecum coram, quia te vere diligo, quia colo sinceriter, cum hunc certum haberem nuncium, ad te scribere volui.

Quod magnificentum D. Cancellarium meis Verbis diligenter Salutasti, gratias ago, utinam autem et resalutare ille, vel hic cum fuit, quod usque; ad eam Diem quo iterum abiit clam me fuit, admittere me ad pium colloquium dignatus esset. Tamen rogo salutes illum officiose meis verbis.

Dominus Jesus qui solus et efficit et largitur omne bonum, donet ut omnia in ipso queramus, et ab ipso expectemus: Sic facile nos in ipso agnoscemus et complectemur, quicquid odiosorum Titulorum Diabolus et Membra ejus injiciant. In Christo enim nec Mas quidem et Fœmina, Judæus et Ethnicus, nedum Lutherani et Romani; sed omnes unum sunt. In hoc bene vale, et fac pro Christi Charitate ut tandem nos aliquando videamus, et Sancto Colloquio nos mutuo recreemus. Optime mi et colende atque vere dilecte Cordi meo Groppere. Bonn, pridie Calendas Februarii 1543.

Deditus Tibi in Domino,

M. BUCERUS.

Præcipuum oblitus eram, te per Christum rogo et obtestor, mone ad hunc me, versantem in Negotio Christi. Debes hoc Christo; et apud me tuto depones omnia nec unquam frustra monebis.

NUMBER XX.

Questions and Answers concerning the Divorce of the Marquess of Northampton.

[Ex MS. Dr. Stillingfleet.]

1. Quid dirimit Matrimonii Vinculum?
2. Quas ob causas dirimi poterit?
3. An dirimi poterit Conjugium a thoro, non a vinculo?
4. Quibus casibus possit sic dirimi?
5. An exceptio illa ("excepta Fornicationis causa") etiam in Lucae, Marci et Pauli locis, qui de his rebus tractant, est subaudienda?
6. An etiam Uxor, repudiata propter Adulterium, alteri poterit nubere?
7. An redire ad priorem maritum, repudiatæ Adulteræ liceat?
8. An Maritus, propter Adulterium, ab Uxore casta possit repudiari?

Ad primam Respondemus; Ipso Adulterii facto Matrimonii vinculum dirimi. Nam alioquin, ob solum Adulterium non liceret viro Uxorem repudiare: voluntas viri solliciti iudices, Iudices palam faciunt Ecclesiæ, virum licite talem repudiare Uxorem.

Ad secundam Resp. Quod ob solum causam stupri dirimitur Matrimonii vinculum: cujus ipso quidem facto, Conjugii dissolvitur nodus, et loquimur his, qui Sacrosancti Matrimonii jus agnoscunt.

Ad tertiam Resp. Quod non; quia Mulier quamdiu vixerit, "alligata est viro," Rom. vii, "item ne fraudetis vos invicem," 1 Cor. vii; item in eodem loco Uxori Vir debitam benevolentiam reddat similiter, et Uxor viro, "item Vir non habeat potestatem sui corporis," sed Uxor similiter; "nec Uxor habeat potestatem sui corporis, sed Vir."

Ad quartam patet in responsione ad tertiam.

Ad quintam Respondemus; quod exceptio ista, viz. "Nisi causa stupri;" est subaudienda in Luca, Marco, et Paulo: alioquin manifesta erit repugnantia inter Matthæum et eos.

Ad sextam Respond. Quod repudiata propter Adulterium, quia Uxor repudiantis desiit esse, ob idque libera est sicut aliæ omnes post obitum virorum potest alii nubere; sequo jure quo illæ juxta illud Pauli, "si non continent, contrahant Matrimonium," 1 Cor. vii. Ad septimam Respond. Quod non licet repudiatæ Adulteræ redire ad repudiantem, tanquam alligatæ ei Jugi vinculo Matrimonii.

Ultima Questio Nihil ad Nos.

NUMBER XXI.

Injunctions given by the King's Majesty's Visitors, to all and every the Clergy and Laity now resident within the Dewary of Dancastre.

[Ex MS. Dr. Johnson.]

Item. You shall not hereafter, in the pulpits or elsewhere, on the Sunday, or any other day, give knowledge to your parishioners when or what day of the week any of the abrogate holy days were solemnized or kept in the church, but omit the same with silence as other working days, for the utter abolishing of the remembrance thereof.

Item. You shall teach your parishioners, that fasting in the Lent, and other days, is a meer positive, that is to say, man's law; and by the magistrates, upon considerations, may be altered, changed, and dispensed with: and that therefore all persons having just cause of sickness, or other necessity, or being licensed thereto, may temperately eat all kinds of meat, without scruple or grudge of conscience.

Item. You shall every day that an high mass is said or sung at the high altar, before the same mass, read openly in your churches the English suffrages for the preservation and safeguard of the king's majesty's people, and prosperous success of his affairs.

Item. You shall every Sunday, at the time of your going about the church with holy water, into three or four places where most audience and assembly of people is, for the declaration of the ceremonies, say, distinctly and plainly, that your parishioners may well hear and perceive the same, these words:

“Remember Christ's blood-shedding, by the which most holy sprinkling, of all your sins you have free pardon.”

And in like manner, before the dealing of the holy bread, these words:

‘Of Christ's body this is a token, which on the cross for our sins was broken; wherefore, of his death if you will be partakers, of vice and sin you must be forsakers.’

And the clark, in the like manner, shall bring down the paxe, and standing without the church-door, shall say loudly to the people these words:

“This is a token of joyful peace, which is betwixt God and men's conscience: Christ alone is the peace-maker, which straitly commands peace between brother and brother.”

And so long as ye use these ceremonies, so long shall ye use these significations.

Item. The church-wardens of every parish church shall, some one Sunday, or other festival day, every month, go about the church, and make request to every of the parish for their charitable contribution to the poor; and the sum so collected shall be put in the chest of alms for that purpose provided. And forasmuch as the parish clark shall not hereafter go about the parish with his holy water as hath been accustomed, he shall, instead of that labour, accompany the said church-wardens, and in a book register the name and sum of every man that giveth any thing to the poor, and the same shall intable; and, against the next day of collection, shall hang up somewhere in the church, in open place, to the intent the poor having knowledge thereby by whose charity and alms they be relieved, may pray for the increase and prosperity of the same.

Item. The church-wardens, for the better relief of honest poverty, shall, upon sufficient surety found for the repayment of the same, lend to some young married couple, or some poor inhabitants of their parish, some part of the said alms, whereby they may buy some kind of stuff; by the working, sale, and gains whereof they may repay the sum borrowed, and also well relieve themselves; or else the said church-wardens to buy the stuff themselves, and pay the poor for their working thereof; and after sale of the same, to return the sum, with the gain, to the said chest, there to remain to such-like use.

Item. Forasmuch as heretofore you have not, by any means, diligence, or study, advanced yourselves unto knowledge in God's word and his scriptures, condingly, as appertaineth to priests and dispensators of God's testament; to the intent you may hereafter be of better ability to discharge yourselves towards God, and your offices to the world, you shall daily, for your own study and knowledge, read over diligently, and weigh with judgment, two chapters of the New Testament, and one of the Old, in English; and the same shall put in use and practice, as well in living as preaching, at times convenient, when occasion is given.

Item. Forasmuch as drunkenness, idleness, brawls, dissention, and many other inconveniences, do chance between neighbour and neighbour, by the assembly of people together at wakes, and on the Plough-Mondays; it is therefore ordered and enjoined, that hereafter the people shall use, make, or observe no more such wakes, Plough-Mondays, or drawing of the same, with any such assembly or rout of people, or otherwise, as hath been accustomed, upon pain of forfeiting to the king's highness 40s. for every default, to be paid by the owner of the plough and householder whereunto the said plough is drawn, or wakes are kept.

NUMBER XXII.

A Proclamation against those that do innovate, alter, or leave undone any Rite or Ceremony in the Church of their private authority; and against them which preach without License. Set forth the 6th day of February, in the second year of the King's Majesty's most gracious Reign.

[Ex Reg. Craumer. Fol. 111.]

THE king's majesty, by the advice of his most entirely beloved uncle, the duke of Somerset, governor of his most royal person, and protector of all his realms, dominions, and subjects, and others of his counsel; considering nothing so much to tend to the disquieting of this realm as diversity of opinions, and variety of rites and ceremonies concerning religion, and worshipping of Almighty God; and therefore studying all the ways and means which can be to direct this church, and the cure committed to his highness, in one and most true doctrine, rite, and usage; yet is advertised, that certain privat curats, preachers, and other lay-men, contrary to their bounden duties of obedience, do rashly attempt, of their own and singular wit and mind, in some parish churches, and otherwise, not only to persuade the people from the old and accustomed rites and ceremonies, but also themselves bringeth in new orders every one in their church, according to their phantasies; the which, as it is an evident token of pride and arrogance, so it tendeth both to confusion and disorder, and also to the high displeasure of Almighty God, who loveth nothing so much as order and obedience. Wherefore his majesty straitly chargeth and commandeth, that no manner of person, of what estate, order, or degree soever he be, of his private mind, will, or phantasie, do omit, leave undone, change, alter, or innovate any order, rite, or ceremony, commonly used and frequented in the church of England, and not commanded to be left undone at any time in the reign of our late sovereign lord, his highness' father, other than such as his highness, by the advice aforesaid, by his majesty's visitors, injunctions, statutes, or proclamations, hath already, or hereafter shall command to be omitted, left, innovated, or changed; but that they be observed after that sort as before they were accustomed, or else now sith prescribed by the authority of his majesty, or by the means aforesaid, upon pain that whosoever shall offend contrary to this proclamation, shall incur his highness' indignation, and suffer imprisonment, and other grievous punishments, at his majesty's will and pleasure. Provided always, that for not bearing a candle upon Candlemass-day, not taking ashes upon Ash-Wednesday, not bearing palm upon Palm-Sunday, not creeping to the cross, not taking holy bread or holy water, or for omitting other such rites and ceremonies concerning religion and the use of the church, which the most reverend father in God, the archbishop of Canterbury, by his majesty's will and commandment, with the advice aforesaid, hath declared, or hereafter shall declare, to the other bishops, by his writing under seal, as heretofore hath been accustomed to be omitted or changed, no man hereafter be imprisoned, nor otherwise punished, but all such things to be reputed for the observation and following of the same, as though they were commanded by his majesty's injunctions. And to the intent that rash and seditious preachers should not abuse his highness' people, it is his majesty's pleasure, that whosoever shall take upon him to preach openly in any parish, church, chappel, or any other open place, other than those which be licensed by the king's majesty, or his highness' visitors, the archbishop of Canterbury, or the bishop of the diocess where he doth preach, except it be bishop, parson, vicar, dean, warden, or provost, in his or their own cure, shall be forthwith, upon such attempt and preaching, contrary to this proclamation, be committed to prison, and there remain until such time as his majesty, by the advice aforesaid, hath taken order for the further punishment of the same. And that the premises should be more speedily and diligently done and performed, his highness giveth straitly in commandment to all justices of peace, mayors, sheriffs, constables, headboroughs, churchwardens, and all other his majesty's officers and ministers, and rulers of towns, parishes, and hamlets, that they be diligent and attendant to the true and faithful execution of this proclamation, and every part thereof, according to the intent, purport, and effect of the same. And that they of their proceedings herein, or if any offender be, after they have committed the same to prison, do certifie his highness the lord protector, or his majesty's council, with all speed thereof accordingly, as they tender his majesty's pleasure, the wealth of the realm, and will answer to the contrary at their uttermost perils. God save the king.

NUMBER XXIII.

An Order of Council for the Removing of Images.

[Regis. Cran. Fol. 32.]

AFTER our right-hearty commendations to your good lordship, where now of late, in the king's majesty's visitation, among other godly injunctions commanded to be generally observed throughout all parts of this his highness' realm, one was set forth for the taking down all such images as had at any time been abused with pilgrimages, offerings, or censings. Albeit, that this said injunction hath in many parts of the realm been well and quietly obeyed and executed, yet in many other places much strife and contention hath arisen, and daily ariseth, and more and more increaseth, about the execution of the same: some men being so superstitious, or rather wilful, as they would by their good wills retain all such images still, although they have been most manifestly abused; and in some places also, the images which by the said injunctions were taken down, be now restored and set up again; and almost in every place is contention for images, whether they have been abused or not. And whiles these men go about on both sides contentiously to obtain their minds, contending whether this or that image hath been offered unto, kissed, censured, or otherwise abused, parties have in some places been taken, in such sort, as further inconvenience is very like to ensue, if remedy be not provided in time. Considering, therefore, that almost in no places of the realm is any sure quietness, but where all images be wholly taken away and pulled down already; to the intent that all contention in every part of the realm for this matter may be clearly taken away, and that the lively images of Christ should not contend for the dead images, which be things not necessary, and without which the churches of Christ continued most godly many years, we have thought good to signify unto you, that his highness' pleasure, with advice and consent of us the lord protector and the rest of the council, is, that immediately upon the sight hereof, with as convenient diligence as you may, you shall not only give order that all the images remaining in any church or chappel within your diocess be removed and taken away, but also by your letters signify unto the rest of the bishops within your province, this his highness' pleasure, for the like order to be given by them, and every of them within their several diocess; and in the execution hereof we require both you and the rest of the said bishops to use such foresight as the same may be quietly done, with as good satisfaction of the people as may be. Thus fare your good lordship well. From Somerset House, the 21st of February, 1517. Your lordship's assured friends,

E. Somerset. Jo. Russell. Henricus Arundel.
T. Seymour. Anthony Wingfield. William Paget.

NUMBER XXIV.

The Copy of a Letter sent to all those Preachers which the King's Majesty hath licensed to preach, from the Lord Protector's Grace, and other of the King's Majesty's most honourable Council, the 13th day of May, in the second year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord King Edward the Sixth.

AFTER our right hearty commendations as well for the conservation of the quietness and good order of the king's majesty's subjects, as that they should not, by evil and unlearned preachers, be brought unto superstition, error, or evil doctrine, or otherwise be made stubborn and disobedient to the king's majesty's godly proceedings, his highness, by our advice, hath thought good to inhibit all manner of preachers, who have not such license, as in the same proclamation is allowed, to preach, or stir the people, in open and common preaching of sermons, by any means, that the devout and godly homilies might the better, in the mean while, sink into his subjects' hearts, and be learned the sooner, the people not being tossed to and fro with seditious and contentious preaching, while every man, according to his zeal—some better, some worse—goeth about to set out his own phantasie, and to draw the people to his opinion. Nevertheless it is not his majesty's mind hereby clearly to extinct the lively teaching of the word of God, by sermons made after such sort, as for the time the Holy Ghost shall put into the preacher's mind, but that rash, contentious, hot, and indiscreet preachers should be stopped; and that they only which be chosen and elect, be discreet and sober men, should occupy that place, which was made for edification, and not for destruction; for the honour of God, and peace and quietness of conscience to be set forward, not for private glory to be advanced; to appease, to teach; to instruct the people with humility and patience, not to make them contentious and proud; to instil into them their duty to their heads and rulers, obedience to laws and orders appointed by the superiors who have rule of God; not that every man should run before their heads have appointed them what to do, and that every man should chuse his own way in religion: the which thing yet being done of some men, and they being rather provoked thereto by certain preachers, than dehorted from it, it was necessary to set a stay therein; and yet forasmuch as we have a great confidence and trust in you, that you will not only preach truly and sincerely the word of God, but also will use circumspection and moderation in your preaching, and such godly wisdom as shall be necessary and most convenient for the time and place: We have sent unto you the king's majesty's license to preach; but yet with this exhortation and admonishment, that in no wise you do stir and provoke the people to any alteration or innovation, other than is already set forth by the king's majesty's injunctions, homilies, and proclamations; but contrariwise, that you do in all your sermons exhort men to that which is at this time more necessary; that is, to the emendation of their own lives, to the observance of the commandments of God, to humility, patience, and obedience to their heads and rulers; comforting the weak, and teaching them the right way; and to flee all old erroneous superstitions, as the confidence in pardons, pilgrimages, beads, religious images, and other such of the bishop of Rome's traditions and superstitions, with his usurped power; the which things be here in this realm most justly abolished; and straitly rebuking those who, of an arrogancy and proud hastiness, will take upon them to run before they be sent, to go before the rulers, to alter and change things in religion without authority, teaching them to expect and tarry the time which God hath ordained, to the revealing of all truth, and not to seek so long blindly and hidlings after it, till they bring all orders into contempt. It is not a private man's duty to alter ceremonies, to innovate orders in the church; nor yet it is not a preacher's part to bring that into contempt and hatred which the prince doth either allow or is content to suffer. The king's highness, by our advice, as a prince most earnestly given to the true knowledge of God, and to bring up his people therein, doth not cease to labour and travel by all godly means, that his realm might be brought and kept in a most godly and Christian order, who only may and ought to do it. Why should a private man, or a preacher, take this royal and kingly office upon him, and not rather, as his duty is, obediently follow himself, and teach likewise others to follow and observe that which is commanded? What is abolished, taken away, reformed, and commanded, it is easy to see by the acts of parliament, the injunctions, proclamations, and homilies; the which things most earnestly it behoveth all preachers in their sermons to confirm and approve accordingly; in other things which be not yet touched, it behoveth him to think that either the prince doth allow them, or else suffer them; and in those it is the part of a godly man not to think himself wiser than the king's majesty and his council, but patiently to expect and conform himself thereto, and not to intermeddle further to the disturbance of a realm, the disquieting of the king's people, the troubling of men's consciences, and disorder of the king's subjects.

These things we have thought good to admonish you of at this time, because we think you will set the same so forward in your preaching, and so instruct the king's majesty's people accordingly, to the most advancement of the glory of God and the king's majesty's most godly proceedings, that we do not doubt but much profit shall ensue thereby, and great conformity in the people the which you do instruct; and so we pray you not to fail to do. And having a special regard to the weakness of the people what they may bear, and what is most convenient for the time; in no case to intermeddle, in your sermons or otherwise, with matters in contention or controversion, except it be to reduce the people in them also to obedience, and following of such orders as the king's majesty hath already set forth, and no others, as the king's majesty and our trust is in you, and as you tender his highness's will and pleasure, and will answer to the contrary at your peril. Fare you well.

Queries put concerning some Abuses of the Mass; with the Answers that were made by many Bishops and Divines to them.

[Ex MS. Dr. Stillingfleet.]

Question 1.

Whether the Sacrament of the Altar was instituted to be received of one Man for another, or to be received of every Man for himself?

Answers.

The sacrament of the altar was not instituted to be received of one man for another, but to be received by every man for himself.—Canthuarven.

The sacrament of the altar was not instituted to be received of one man for one other, but of every man for himself.—Eboracen.

I think that the sacrament of thanks was not instituted to be received of one man for another, but of every man for himself.—London. Hereford. Cicestren. Worcester. Norwicen. Assaven.

The sacrament of the altar was instituted to be received of every man by himself, to make him a member of Christ's mystical body, and to knit and unite him to Christ our head; as St. Paul saith, 1 Cor. x. "Unus panis, et unum corpus, multi sumus omnes qui de uno pane participamus."—Duelm.

The sacrament of the altar was not instituted to be received of one man for another sacramentally, no more than one man to be christened for another: notwithstanding the grace received by him that is housled, or christened, is profitable and available to the whole mystical body of Christ, and therefore to every lively member thereof.—Sarisburien.

The sacrament (as they call it) of the altar was not instituted to be received of one for another, but of every man for himself: for Christ, the institutor of this sacrament, saith, with manifest words, "Take, eat," &c. Matt. xxvi. And also, John vi. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life." Nor the receiving of one man doth avail or profit any other, otherwise than by the way of example, whereby the people present are provoked to the imitation of the thing that is good.—Lincoln.

The sacrament of the altar was not instituted to be received of one man for another, but of every man for himself.—Elieen.

I think and suppose that the sacrament of the altar was instituted to be received of every man for himself; for so are the words of Christ, "Comedite et bibite," speaking to them present, and to every one of them.—Covent. et Litchfield.

The sacrament of the altar was not ordained or instituted to be received of one man alone, but of all, and for all, because it is the general and continual remedy, help, and succour of all, which maketh no let or stop of themselves, and their own unfaithful or sinful life.—Carlotten.

Of every man for himself.—Roffen.

The sacrament of the altar was not instituted to be received of one man for another sacramentally, no more than one man to be christened for another; but every man to receive it in faith and cleanness of life for himself.—Bristollen.

The sacrament of the body and blood of Christ was not instituted that one man should receive it for another, but every man for himself. "Probet autem seipsum homo, et sic de pane illo edat, et de populo illo bibat." 1 Cor. xi.—Meneven.

The sacrament of thanks was instituted to be received of every man for himself, and not of one for another.—Dr. Cox.

Of every man for himself.—Dr. Tyler.

Question 2.

Whether the receiving of the said Sacrament of one Man doth avail and profit any other?

Answers.

The receiving of the said sacrament by one man doth avail and profit only him that receiveth the same.—Cantuarien.

The receiving of the sacrament only availeth the receivers thereof, except it be by reason of such communion as is among the members of the mystical body of Christ.—Eboracen.

I think that the receiving of the said sacrament doth not avail or profit any other, but only as all other good works done of any member of Christ's church be available to the whole mystical body of Christ, and to every lively member of the same, by reason of mutual participation, and spiritual communion between them. And also it may be profitable to others, as an example whereby others may be stirred to devotion and to like receiving of the same.—London. Worcester. Hereford. Norwich. Ciestren. Assaven.

The receiving of the sacrament of one man doth profit another, as the health and good liking of one member doth in part strengthen the body, and other members of the same: for St. Paul saith, "Multi unum corpus sumus in Christo, singuli autem alter alterius membra," Rom. xii.; and 1 Cor. xii. "Si gaudet unum membrum, congruunt omnia membra." And in a mystical body, the good living of one man stirreth another to the same.—Dunelm.

The oblation made after the consecration in the mass is the offering unto the Father of the body and blood of Christ by the minister, with the commemoration of the Passion, and with thanksgiving for the same, and with the prayers of the minister and people, that it may be available to all Christian people.—Sarisburien.

The receiving thereof of one man doth not avail or profit any other, but as all good deeds profit the congregation, and as one member healed or taking nourishment profiteth another member.—Elien.

And I suppose also that the receiving of one man doth not avail or profit another, but as every good act or deed of one member doth profit to the whole body.—Covent. et Litchfield.

The receiving of the sacrament, as it noteth the act of him who receiveth, it may be that it neither availeth or profiteth him who receiveth nor any other, but also hurts the receiver, if he presume to take it rashly or unworthily. But as touching the thing which is sacred, offered, and distributed by the common minister in the mass, representing the Holy Church, or mystical body of Christ, and is received both of him and other that will, whatsoever the receiving or receiver be, it availeth and profiteth all present, absent, living, and dead.—Carlotten.

No; but as the receipt of wholesome doctrine, the receipt of the fear of God, the receipt of any godly gift that is profitable to any one member of Christ's mystical body, may be said generally to profit the whole body, because there is a mystical communion and a spiritual participation amongst all the members of Christ in all godliness; as there is in the natural body a natural participation of all natural affections, both good and evil.—Roffen.

It appeareth, by the words of St. Cyprian, Epist. vi. lib. 3, that it should be profitable and available to others; forasmuch as he wrote these words of the faithful Christians which departed this world in prison, and said, "Quamquam fidelissimus et devotissimus frater noster, inter cetera sollicitudinem et curam suam cum fratribus in omni obsequio operationis imperitur, qui nec illic curam corporum—scripsit ac scribat ac significat mihi dies quibus in carcere beati fratres nostri ad immortalitatem gloriose mortis exitu transeant et celebrentur, hic a nobis Oblationes et Sacrificia ob commemorationes eorum, quæ cito vobiscum, domine prosperante, celebrabimus. Ita enim docuit Apostolus Christi unius Panis et unum Corpus multi sumus omnes, qui de uno Pane, et de uno Calice participamus." 1 Cor. i. "Nec loquitur de his solis qui eo tempore Corinthi conveniebant, et Sacramentum ab unius Sacerdotis manu recipiebant; Verum potius de seipso tunc procul a Corintho agente, et Corinthiis ipsis omnibusq; in Christum credentibus ubi tandem constituti essent quos omnes significat unum esse Corpus qui toto orbe de uno Pane communicantes participant."—Bristoll n.

The sacrament profiteth him only that receiveth it worthily; like as it damnifieth him only that receiveth it unworthily. "Nam qui edit aut bibit indigne, judicium sibi ipsi edit ac bibit," 1 Cor. xi.—Meneven.

The receiving of the said sacrament doth avail and profit the receiver only, and none other, but by occasion to do the like.—Dr. Cox.

So much as the christening of one man profiteth another, which after my opinion profiteth nothing.—Dr. Tyler.

Question 3.

What is the oblation and sacrifice of Christ in the mass?

Answers.

The oblation and sacrifice of Christ in the mass is not so called because Christ indeed is there offered and sacrificed by the priest and the people (for that was done but once by himself upon the cross); but it is so called because it is a memory and representation of that very true sacrifice and immolation which before was made upon the cross.—Cantuarien.

The oblation and sacrifice of Christ in the mass is the presenting of the very body and blood of Christ to the heavenly Father, under the forms of bread and wine, consecrated in the remembrance of his Passion, with prayer and thanksgiving for the universal church.—Eboracen.

I think it is the presentation of the very body and blood of Christ being really present in the sacrament; which presentation the priest maketh at the mass, in the name of the church, unto God the Father, in memory of Christ's passion and death upon the cross; with thanksgiving therefore, and devout prayer, that all Christian people—and namely they which spiritually join with the priest in the said oblation, and of whom he maketh special remembrance—may attain the benefit of the said passion.—London. Worcester. Hereford. Norwich. Cicestren. Assaven.

The oblation and sacrifice of Christ in the mass is the presenting of Christ by the priest, in commemoration of his passion, being our eternal and permanent sacrifice, present in the sacrament by his omnipotent word left to us, to have his death and passion in remembrance, with giving thanks for the same, and prayer of the minister and them which be present, that the same may be available to the whole church of Christ, both quick and dead in the faith of Christ.—Dunelm.

Which oblation, commemoration of Christ's passion, giving of thanks and prayer, taketh effect only in them which by their own proper faith shall receive the same effect.—Sarisburien.

There is properly no oblation nor sacrifice, but a remembrance of the one oblation of Christ upon the cross, made once for all; a giving of thanks for the same, and the prayer of the public minister for the whole congregation; which prayer only taketh effect in them who by their own proper faith receive the benefit of Christ: and where many of those authors do say there is an oblation and sacrifice, they spoke so because in this sacrament we be admonished of the oblation and sacrifice of Christ upon the cross.—Lincoln.

If oblation be taken pro re oblata, then, as old ancient doctors write, it is Corpus et Sanguis, scil. Verum, et Corpus, scil. Mysticum. If ye take it pro actu offerendi, it is a commemoration and representation of Christ's death once suffered upon the cross, with thanksgiving for the same.—Elien.

I suppose the very oblation and sacrifice of Christ in the mass is this, that after the benediction—that is to say, the words of consecration spoken by the priest, and the divine working of Christ presently, by the which there is the very precious body and the precious blood of Christ present to be so received; then the priest offereth up the holy memory of our redemption to God the Father, most humbly praying, that as it was once offered up by Christ upon the cross, for the redemption of mankind, so it may take effect now, and at all times, especially in those that with a true faith, with a full trust and hope, shall so worthily receive it.—Covent. et Litchfield.

The oblation and sacrifice of Christ in the mass is even the same which was offered by Christ on the cross, ever and everywhere abiding and enduring, of like strength, virtue, and power. The difference is, that on the cross, Christ, being there both priest and sacrifice, offereth himself visibly, and in the mass, being likewise both priest and sacrifice, offereth himself invisibly, by the common minister of the church, who in the name and stead of the whole faithful congregation offereth and presenteth, as he bid and commanded by Christ.—Carlotten.

The representation and commemoration of Christ's death and passion, said and done in the mass, is called the sacrifice, oblation, or immolation of Christ: "Non rei veritate," as learned men do write, "sed significandi mysterio."—Roffen.

It is in giving thanks unto the Father, as Christ did himself at his supper, taking the bread and wine into his hands, and with the words of consecration consecrating the same, and then making presentation of the very body and blood of Christ unto God the Father, in the name of the church, in the memory of Christ's most painful passion and death, suffered upon the cross; and so worthily receiving the same, and with giving thanks again for the same at the latter end; as the Gospel saith, "Hymno dicto;" but what this hymn or prayer was, I find no mention.—Bristollen.

The oblation and sacrifice of Christ mentioned in the mass is a memorial of Christ's only sacrifice upon the cross, once offered for ever; "Unica enim Oblatione, perfectos efficit in perpetuum eos qui sanctificantur," Heb. x.—Meneven.

The oblation of the sacrifice of Christ in the mass is the prayer, the praise, the thanksgiving, and the remembrance of Christ's passion and death.—Dr. Cox.

There is no oblation, speaking properly; but some ancient doctors, and the use of the church, calleth the receiving of it, with the circumstances then done, an oblation; that is to say, a memorial and remembrance of Christ's most precious oblation upon the cross.—Dr. Tyler.

Question 4.

Wherein consisteth the Mass by Christ's institution?

Answers.

The mass, by Christ's institution, consisteth in those things which be set forth in the Evangelists, Matt. xxvi., Mark xiv., Luke xxii., 1 Cor. x. and xi.—Cantuarien.

The mass, by Christ's institution, consisteth in the consecration and oblation of the very body and blood of Christ, with prayer, thanksgiving, and receiving of the same; as appeareth in the Evangelists, Matt. xxvi. xxvii., Mark xiv. and xv., Luke xxii. and xxiii., John vi., 1 Cor. x. and xi., Acts ii.—Eboracen.

I think it consisteth principally in the consecration, oblation, and receiving of the body and blood of Christ, with prayers and thanksgiving; but what the prayers were, and what rites Christ used or commanded at the first institution of the mass, the Scripture declareth not.—London. Worcester. Hereford. Norwich. Cicestren. Assaven.

The mass, by Christ's institution, consisteth in those things which be set forth by the Evangelists, Matt. xxvi., Mark xiv., Luke xxii., and Paul, 1 Cor. x. xi. and xii., and Acts ii., with humble and contrite confession, the oblation of Christ, as before; the receiving of the sacrament, giving of thanks therefore, and common prayer for the mystical body of Christ.—Dunelm.

The mass, by Christ's institution, consisteth in those things which be set forth in the Evangelists, Matt. xxvi., Mark xiv., Luke xxii., 1 Cor. x. and xi., Acts ii. and xiii.—Sarisburien.

It consisteth in these things which be set forth, Matt. xxvi., Mark xiv., Luke xxii., 1 Cor. x. xi., Acts ii.—Lincoln.

The mass, by Christ's institution, consisteth in those things which be set forth in the Evangelists, Matt. xxvi., Luke xxii., and 1 Cor. x. xi., and Acts ii.—Elien.

The mass, by Christ's institution, only expressing the form of Christ by the Scripture, consisteth in the taking of the bread, and giving thanks to God the Father, in the benediction and consecration, in the receiving or distribution, and receiving of them, to whom the distribution is made by the hands of the priest: as the eldest authors affirm, in the renewing of the memory of our redemption by an undoubted faith, and for that to give most humble thanks; so calling to remembrance, as often as it is thus done, the inestimable benefit of our redemption. What thanks that Christ gave before this most holy action, or what thanks that he gave after it, by the general words of Matthew (chap. xiv.) "Hymno dicto," are not expressed: so that there appeareth, both before this most holy action and also after, to be a certain ceremony appointed by Christ more than is expressed. Moreover, by the doctrine of the apostle (1 Cor. xi.), it behoveth every man to be wise and circumspect, that he receive not this most blessed sacrament unworthily and unreverently, not making difference betwixt the receiving of the most blessed body of Christ, and other meats.—Covent. et Litchfield.

The mass, by Christ's institution, consisteth in consecrating, offering, receiving, and distributing of the blessed body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, according to that he himself did, willed, and commanded to be done. This we have manifested by the Evangelists, St. Paul, and St. Luke, in the Acts. But because Christ was, after his resurrection, long with his disciples, communing and treating of the kingdom of God, what should be done here to come thither, it may be well thought that whatsoever he or his Holy Spirit left with the apostles, and they with others, after which also the whole universal congregation of Christian people useth and observeth, most ancient and holy doctors in like form noteth, may likewise be said and taken as of Christ's institution.—Carliolen.

I am not able to say that the mass consisteth, by Christ's institution, in other things than in those which he set forth in the Evangelists, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, in the Acts, and 1 Cor. x. and xi.—Roffen.

As I take it, the mass, by Christ's institution, consisteth in those things and rites which be set forth unto us, in the 26th of St. Matthew, the 14th of St. Mark, and the 22nd of St. Luke; and also as mention is made in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. x. and xi., and Acts xi.; any other institution I read not of by Scripture.—Bristolten.

Christ's institution compriseth no more in the mass than the communion of the body and blood, to be ministred and received under both kinds, of bread and wine, according as is declared by the Evangelists, Matt. xxvi., Mark xiv., Luke, in the Acts ii.—Mewven.

The mass, by Christ's institution, consisteth in thanksgiving to the Father, in distributing of the body and blood of Christ to the congregation, to have the death and passion of Christ in remembrance, and in the end to laud and praise God.—Dr. Cox.

In giving of thanks to God the Father, and blessing and breaking it, and reverently receiving the holy sacraments, with all such rites and circumstances as Christ did in both the kinds.—Dr. Tyler.

Question 5.

What time the accustomed Order began first in the Church, that the Priest alone should receive the Sacrament?

Answers.

I think the use that the priest alone did receive the sacrament without the people, began not within six or seven hundred years after Christ.—Cantuarien.

The accustomed order that the priest alone should receive the sacrament began about the time of Zepherinus; who, when the common people had left their daily and frequent communion, ordained that they should communicate at the least once in the year—that was at Easter; which ordinance Innocentius the Third confirmed.—Eboracen.

I know no further order or commandment of the church, but what time the devotion of the people was so greatly decayed that they would not come to receive the sacrament, then the priests were compelled to receive it alone.—London. Worcester. Hereford. Norwicen. Cisteren. Assaven.

The custom began that the priest alone should receive the sacrament of necessity, when the people falling from devotion would not come to the communion, but cared more for their worldly business than for godly receiving the sacrament; for in the beginning they received it daily by frequent devotion; after, thrice a week; after, on the Sundays only; after, thrice in the year, at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsunday; after, only once in the year, at Easter, by coldness of devotion.—Duelm.

The time certain is not known; most men ascribe it unto Gregory, who was more than six hundred years after Christ; for that every bishop of Rome bringing in his portion (some Introitus, some Kyrie Eleison, some Graduale); the mass in the said Gregory's time was grown to the full quantity it is now of, and men's inventions began to step before and get ground of Christ's institution; but from the beginning it was not so, for Christ did not eat and drink alone at his last supper, but gave the bread and cup to all present. In the primitive church one did not eat alone, and the rest look on, but they did eat together and drink together, as it is to be seen Acts ii., 1 Cor. xi. And Anacletus writes thus: "Peraeta Consecratione omnes communicant, qui noluerit Ecclesiasticis caveat liminibus." De Conso. Dist. 1. Cum Episcopus, &c.—Lincoln.

The very time I know not, but is to be supposed that that custom crept into the church by negligence and slackness of the lay people, who would not so oft receive it as the priest would; for in the beginning the communion with the laity was quotidiane, which the priest observeth still unto this day, and not the laity; and there be canons that bindeth the priest to the receiving of it as oft as he doth consecrate; and the cause why the priests did not receive it after they had consecrated should seem to be, that there was none to receive it with them, which was the occasion of the making of those canons, as I suppose.—Elien.

Because Scripture saith, "Panis quem frangimus, nonne communicatio corporis est," &c. Likewise "de Chalice, cui benedicimus;" and also, "bibite ex eo omnes." And the canons said to be of the apostles, Can. x. and x., and of the Antiochian Council, Can. ii. Anacletus, in an epistle, commandeth the sacrament to be received of more than of the priest alone. Dionyse also declareth the same, and also long after Chrysost. St. Ambrose and St. Austin both complain of the slackness of some, and earnestly exhort the people to the receipt thereof. Therefore I suppose that custom that the priest should receive it alone, where it was celebrated openly, was not received in the church of Christ by the space of four or five hundred years at least after Christ.—Roffen.

I know no such order or commandment of the church, but what time the devotion of the people began greatly to decay, and would not come to receive the sacrament, then I think the priests were compelled to receive it alone.—Bristolten.

I suppose not long after the apostles' time the godly devotion of the people decaying, who at the beginning used to commune daily, and after that weekly, after that thrice in the year, and at last but once in the year, the priest was forced to receive the sacrament alone.—Dr. Cox.

Question 6.

Whether it be convenient that the same Custom continue still within this Realm?

Answers.

I think it more agreeable to the Scripture and primitive church, that the first usage should be restored again, that the people should receive the sacrament with the priest.—Cantuarien.

I would wish, that at every mass there would be some to receive the sacrament with the priest: nevertheless if none will come to receive it, I think it lawful and convenient, that the priests of this realm of England may say mass, and receive the sacrament alone.

RECORDS.

—London. Worcester. Hereford. Norwich. Cicestren. Assaen.

It were much convenient that people were exhorted to come to it oftener, if they could be brought thereto. Nevertheless if none will communicate, it is not meet that the priests stirred to communicate, or should forbear for coldness or lack of other men's devotion.—Dunelm.

Nothing can be better or more wisely devised than Christ did ordain, and the apostles, according to his ordinance, did use: we ought therefore to captivate our senses and understandings to the wisdom of Christ, and think that most convenient that to his ordinance is most correspondent: and as St. Paul notes, by eating all of one bread, and drinking all of one cup, we be put in remembrance, that we be all one body in Christ, and have received all one spirit. Nevertheless the slackness of some ought not to be prejudicial to the rest, nor the refusing of one to be impediment to another.—Lincoln.

If the laymen could be brought to it, it were better not to continue; but if they cannot, it is not convenient that priests, who would communicate for their own comfort, should be defrauded by other men's slackness.—Elien.

I suppose it were best, that that custom should be reformed unto the rule of Scripture, and unto the pattern of the primitive church.—Ruffen.

I think it were good, that at every mass there were some to receive the sacrament with the priest: nevertheless, if none will come to receive it, I think it lawful and convenient that the priest say mass, and receive the sacrament alone, when he is disposed, or by the Christian congregation desired.—Bristollen.

I think it not convenient that the said custom should continue, if by any godly mean the people might be brought to receive the sacrament with the priest.—Dr. Cox.

Question 7.

Whether it be convenient that Masses Satisfactory should continue, (that is to say) Priests hired to sing for Souls departed.

Answers.

I think it not convenient that satisfactory masses should continue.—Cantuarien.

I think that such of the schoolmen as do write of masses satisfactory, do define them otherwise than is declared in this question: nevertheless I think, that it is not against the word of God, but that priests praying in the mass, both for the quick and dead, and doing other things in the church about the ministration of the sacraments, may take a living for the same.—London. Worcester. Hereford. Norwich. Chichester. St. Asaph.

All priests saying mass be bound in the same to pray for the whole mystical body of Christ, quick and dead, though they be not hired thereto; and those that be deputed thereto, if they say mass, must do the same though they were not hired: and yet, as St. Paul saith, those that be partakers of spiritual things with others, ought to minister unto them temporal things in recompence, Rom. xv.—Dunelm.

St. Paul saith, Heb. x. that we are made holy by the offering of the body of Jesus once for all; and Heb. ix. that Christ, by his own blood, entred in once to the holy place, and found eternal redemption; which redemption and satisfaction, unless we think insufficient, it were meet masses satisfactory to be taken away, and not to count Christ and his apostles either unlearned or unloving teachers, and who could not or would not teach a thing so necessary. Nauclerus does write, that Gregory III. gave commandment to priests to pray and offer for the dead. And though ancient writers make oft mention of prayer for the dead, yet they never allow any hireling to that purpose. Legge August. ad Aurel. de coercenda temulentia.—Lincoln.

It is one thing to sing satisfactory, and another to be hired to sing mass for the souls departed: for the first importeth, that the mass should be a satisfaction for the sins of the soul departed; which is not so, but the second, that is, to sing or pray for the souls departed, is a laudable custom, and seemeth to have some ground in Scripture; which custom hath been always continued from the apostles' time, and hath been used in the mass, as appeareth by ancient doctors, Aust. Amb. Chrys. and others; and therefore this to continue I think it meet. But to say mass for money, thinking it a commutation or just compensation betwixt the prayer and the money that he is hired for, I think it soundeth to avarice and simonie; and yet, dignus est operarius mercede sua. Like as, Prædicans Evangelium sine sumptu debet ponere Evangelium, et tamen Dominus ordinavit his qui Evangelium annunciant de Evangelio vivere.—Elien.

If by this be meant, that any thing, or action either of the priest, should be a full and perfect satisfaction of sins venial and mortal; I know we read not of any such satisfactory, neither would I say that priests be hired after that common fashion and contracts of the world, to sing for souls departed, but rather that they, as they be ordered to do, do say and sing their mass, having in their remembrance, both generally and specially, as shall most appertain both to the living and the dead; and then, as they be worthy, must have their livings by the altar which they serve, as St. Paul at large declareth. But as for the full and perfect satisfaction of all manner of sins, that is to be attributed only to Christ, his passion and justification; yet after the mind of St. Austin, St. Jerom, with others, Pro non valde malis propitiations fiat et levioribus peccatis, cum quibus obligati defuncti sunt, possunt post mortem absolvi, &c.—Carlike.

That masses satisfactory should continue to be sung for souls departed, by priests hired thereunto, I think it not convenient.—Ruffen.

I think that the word of God, and St. Paul, meant that all priests may offer gifts and sacrifices unto God for the offences of the people, (as it is written in the 5th of the Hebrews.) Omnis Pontifex, &c. and may receive and take (ministring the sacrament and sacramentals in the church to the congregation) a living for the same.—Bristollen.

Masses to be said for satisfaction of sin, (since Christ is the only satisfaction for all sin,) is an abuse not to be continued: and priests to be hired only to sing for souls departed, seemeth to be a superfluous function in Christ's church.—Dr. Cox.

Question 8.

Whether the Gospel ought to be taught at the time of the Mass, to the understanding of the People being present?

Answers.

I think it very convenient that the gospel, concerning the death of Christ and our redemption, should be taught to the people in the mass.—Cantuarien.

It is expedient that the gospel be taught at the time of the mass, to the understanding of the people being present.—York.

I think it not necessary to have a sermon at every mass, but the oftener the same is done to the edifying of the people (so that the service of their vocation be not thereby defrauded), the more it is to be commended.—London. &c.

It is much convenient that the gospel be taught to the understanding of the people being present, when it may be. Howbeit, it is not so of the substance of the mass, but the mass may be done without it, and it is done at other times as well as at the mass.—Dunelm.

Christ distributing the sacrament to his disciples, does say, (as it is Luk. xxii.) “Hoc facite in meam commemorationem:” and if St. Paul doth thus write to the Corinthians, “Quotiescumq; manducabitis panem hunc ac Calicem bibitis, mortem Domini annuntiabitis donec veniet.” The glad tydings therefore, the great benefit that we receive by Christ’s death and sufferings (which we see as in a glass, in this holy sacrament), ought to be set forth and preached to the people, so oft as they come to the holy communion.—Lincoln.

That the gospel be read or taught at the time of the mass, that the people there present may understand; it is good and godly, and convenient it should be so.—Elien.

I think it expedient and necessary, that as the king’s most excellent majesty, his most dear uncle my lord protector’s grace, with the most honourable council beside, hath already appointed and enjoined to be done, that at all such times as the people (as they ought) be most gathered together, in the principal and high mass, the gospel be taught and declared to the best understanding of the people.—Carlotten.

The annunciation of Christ’s death and passion, and the benefit of the same, that the forgiveness of sins, to all the true and faithful believers therein, ought evermore to be set forth in the mass to the edification of the people; which thing cannot be done according to St. Paul’s mind and meaning, I Cor. xiv. as I suppose, except it be set forth to the people’s understanding.—Roffen.

I think it is not against God’s word, but the other the same is done to the edifying of the people, received with devotion, and intending redress of life thereby, the more it is to be affected and used.—Bristollen.

In the mass-time, it were convenient to have some doctrines, after the example of the primitive church, that at the blessed communion the people might be edified.—Dr. Cor.

Question 9.

Whether in the Mass it were convenient to use such speech as the people may understand?

Answers.

I think it convenient to use the vulgar tongue in the mass, except in certain secret mysteries, whereof I doubt.—Cantuarien.

It were convenient to use such speech in the mass as the people might understand.—Ebonacen.

To have the whole mass in English, I think it neither expedient, neither convenient.—London. Hereford. Cicestren. Worcester. Norwicen. Assaven.

It is convenient that the common Latin tongue to these west parts of Christendom be used in the mass, being the common-prayer of the whole church, namely, in the mysteries thereof, lest rude people should vilely prophane the holy mysteries thereof by contempt. Nevertheless certain prayers might be in the mother tongue, for the instruction and stirring of the devotion of the people, as shall be thought convenient.—Dunelm.

St. Paul would all things in the congregation, and public assembly, so to be spoken that they might edify; and in such a language, that the people present might say Amen to our thanksgiving. And long after the apostles’ times, all the people present did answer the priest (he speaking in a language that they did understand), like as the clerk or boy doth now answer (as he is taught) in a language that he understands not. Cypri habet de Cons. distinct. l. Ca. Quando.—Lincoln.

It was so used in Dalmatia in St. Hierom’s time, and in Sclavonia in Cyril’s time, who making suit to the court of Rome for the same, and the matter being debated in the consistory, and having many adversaries, suddenly there was heard a voice, as it were, from heaven; “Omnis Spiritus laudet Dominum, et omnis Lingua confiteatur ei.” Whereupon Cyrillus had his petition granted him.—Elien. Hæc jam mea est Opinio, sed, sic ut, auditis melioribus cedam.

This question was deeply searched and tried for, in the most excellent and of highest memory king Henry the Eighth his time, by the best clerks of his realm, in his presence; and then and there concluded, and upon that same by proclamation commanded, that Holy Scripture should not be evulgate in English. Yet after it was otherwise seen and provided for: therefore therein I would wish, that were most to the quiet edification of Christian people, and shall submit myself to my superiors and betters, submitting mine understanding to their judgments.—Carlotten.

I think it not only convenient that such speech should be used in the mass as the people might understand, but also to speak it with such an audible voice, that the people might hear it, that they be not defrauded of their own, which Saint Paul teacheth to belong to them; and also that they may answer, as Cyprian saith, the people did in his days, Habemus ad Dominum. Nevertheless, as concerning that part that pertaineth to the consecration, Dyonise and Basil moveth me to think it no inconvenience, that part should be spoken in silence.—Roffen.

If the mass should be wholly in English, I think we should differ from the custom and manner of all other regions: therefore if it may stand with the king’s majesty’s pleasure, I think it not good to be said all in English.—Perme Paulum Episcopum Bristolensem.

Question 10.

When the Reservation of the Sacrament and the hanging up of the same first began?

Answers.

The reservation of the sacrament began, I think, six or seven hundred years after Christ: the hanging up, I think, began of late time.—Cantuarien.

Polidore Virgil doth write, that Innocentius the Third decreed the sacrament to be kept, to be in a readiness for the sick. And Honorius the Third confirmed the same; adding, that it ought to be reserved in loco singulari, mundo, et signato. Commanding also the priests that they should often instruct the people reverently to bow down at the elevation-time, and when it is born to the sick. As for the hanging up of the sacrament over, or setting it upon the altar, is of a later time, not yet received in divers places of Christendom.—Lincoln.

Some Questions, with Answers made to them by the Bishops of Worcester, Chichester, and Hereford.*

The Question.

What or wherein John’s Fasting, giving Alms, being baptized, or receiving the Sacrament of Thanks in England, doth profit and avail Thomas dwelling in Italy, and not knowing what John in England doth?

* These queries were put by Cranmer to those bishops; but this paper is all in Bonner’s hand, with whom these three bishops agreed.—STRYPE’S CORRECT.

The Answer.

The distance of place doth not lett nor hinder the spiritual communion which is between one and another; so that John and Thomas, wheresoever they be, far asunder, or near together, being both lively members of Christ, receive either of other's goodness some commodity; although to limit what or wherein is unsearchable, and only pertaineth to the knowledge of God.—Worcester. Chichester. Hereford.

The Question.

Whether the said acts in John do profit them that be in heaven, and wherein?

The Answer.

Gaudium est in Cælo super uno peccatore penitentiam agente, &c.—Luc. xv.

The Question.

Whether it lieth in the said John, to defraud any member of Christ's body of the benefit of his fasting, alms-deeds, baptism, or receiving of the sacrament, and to apply the same benefit to one person more than to another?

The Answer.

Charity defraudeth no man of any such benefit that might come to him; and it lieth in God only to apply the same, and not in any man, otherwise than by desire and prayer; but the better the man is, the more available his prayer is to them for whom he especially prayeth.

The Question.

What thing is the presentation of the body and blood of Christ in the Mass, which you call the oblation and sacrifice of Christ, and wherein standeth it, in act, gesture, or words, and in what act, gesture, or words?

The Answer.

The presentation, &c. standeth in such words, prayers, supplications, and actions, as the priest useth at the mass, having the body and blood of Christ there present in the sacrament.

The Question.

Is there any rite or prayer not expressed in the Scripture, which Christ used or commanded at the first institution of the Mass, which we be now bound to use; and what the same be?

The Answer.

That Christ used rites and prayers at the institution and distribution of the sacrament, the Scripture declareth: but what rites and prayers they were we know not; but I think we ought to use such rites and prayers as the catholick church hath, and doth uniformly observe

The Question.

Whether in the primitive church there were any priests that lived by saying of mass, mattins, and even-song, and praying for souls only? And whether any such state of priesthood be allowed in the Scripture, or be meet to be allowed now?

The Answer.

There were priests in the primitive church which preached not, but exercised themselves in prayer for the quick and the dead, and other spiritual ministrations in the church; and accustomedly used common prayers both morning and evening; and such state of priesthood is not against the Scripture.

The Question.

For what cause it were not expedient nor convenient to have the whole mass in English?

The Answer.

This question is answered by Dyonise and Basil, De Spiritu Sancto; and also a uniformity of all churches in that thing is to be kept*.

* After these answers follows a reply by Cranmer in other queries; as, "If you cannot tell what and where the acts of John can profit Thomas, being so far distant from him that he can never hear of him; why do you then affirm that to be true which you cannot tell how, nor wherein it can be true?"

"Whether our prayers for all the souls departed do profit the apostles, prophets, and martyrs?"

"Whether they know all the actions of every man here in earth? and if not, how do they rejoice of those good actions which they know not?"

"Whether our evil deeds do them hurt, as our good deeds profit them?"

"Whether the presentation of the body and blood of Christ do stand in all the words and actions that the priest useth in the mass which now we do use?"

"Whereby is it known that in the primitive church were priests that preached not?"

"Why may not we as well alter the mass into the English tongue, or alter the ceremonies of the same, as we alter the communion to be under both kynds, that in other churches is uniformly ministred to the people under one kind; seeing that the uniformity of all churches requireth no more the uniformity in one than in the other?"—STAYNE'S CORRECT.

Paul's church at Rome; who so says this a whole year, shall deliver fifteen souls out of purgatory of his next kindred, and convert other fifteen sinners to good life; and other fifteen righteous men of his kind shall persevere in good life; and what ye desire of God ye shall have it, if it be to the salvation of your souls.

Folio 54.—To all them that before this image of pity devoutly say five Pater-nosters, and five Ave Marias, and a Credo, piteously beholding those arms of Christ's passion, are granted 32,755 years of pardon; and Sixtus the fourth pope of Rome hath made the fourth and the fifth prayer, and hath doubled his fore-said pardon.

Folio 61.—Our holy father Sixtus the 4th hath granted to all them that be in the state of grace, saying this prayer following immediately after the elevation of the body of our Lord, clean remission of all their sins perpetually enduring. And also John the 3d, pope of Rome, at the request of the queen of England, hath granted to all them that devoutly say this prayer before the image of our Lord crucified, as many days of pardon as there were wounds in the body of our Lord in the time of his bitter passion, the which were 5465.

Folio 65.—These five petitions and prayers made S. Gregory, and hath granted unto all them that devoutly say these five prayers, with five Pater-nosters, five Ave Marias, and a Credo, 500 years of pardon.

Folio 71.—Our holy father Pope Innocentius the 2d hath granted to all them that say this prayer devoutly

And it is well to believe, that through the invocation of the most excellent name of Jesu, S. Bernard obtained a singular ward of perpetual consolation of our Lord Jesu Christ. And these prayers written in a table that hanged at Rome in S. Peter's Church, nigh to the high altar there, as our holy father the pope evely is wont to say the office of the mass; and who that devoutly, with a contrite heart, daily say this orison, if he be that day in the state of eternal damnation, then his eternal pain shall be changed him in temporal pain of purgatory; then if he hath deserved the pain of purgatory, it shall be forgotten and forgiven, through the infinite mercy of God.

NUMBER XXVII.

And ye shall enquire of the lands, tenths, rents, and hereditaments thereof, and of the yearly value of the same, and of all the goods and ornaments of the same ; and of the yearly resolutes, deductions, and payments going forth of the same ; and shall make a true rental or book thereof, and shall certify the same particularly.

Also ye shall enquire of all the plate, jewels, ornaments, goods, and chattels, meerly and truly pertaining or belonging to all the aforesaid promotions or corporations, and to every of them severally, and shall make one true inventory thereof, with the value of the same, and of every parcel thereof, that is to say, in true weight of all parcels of plate, chalices, and other ; and the price or value of all other ornaments, goods, or chattels, and in whose hands or possession the same be or remain.

Also, finally, ye shall make ready and finish your certificate in writing, before the _____ of all and singular the premises, and of every article above-said severally, and not in gross, or in one whole article, as ye will answer and be sworn to the same : and that ye, and every of you, being resident or remaining within the said parish, shall sign and seal the same ; and ye shall send the same your certificate sealed unto us, at such day and place as hereafter shall be assigned unto you, by one of the most honest of the aforesaid church-wardens, and by all the incumbents of the chantries, chappels, hospitals ; guilds and promotions aforesaid, if there be but one incumbent in the said promotions, or any of them ; and if there be more incumbents than one in the said promotions, or any of them being of one foundation, that then one of the said incumbents, together with the said honest church-wardens, and other incumbents, being but one of one foundation, as is aforesaid. Foreseeing always, that your proceedings and certificate of the premises, and every part thereof, be executed, ordered, and done, with all diligence, substantially and truly, that the same may so appear unto us at our repair to view and survey the premises, as ye will then have condign thanks for the same, and avoiding your extream damage, which may ensue of the contrary.

The Protector's Letter to Gardiner, concerning the Points he was to handle in his Sermon.

[Ex MS. Col. C. C. Cantab.]

WE commend us unto you : we sent to you yesterday our servant William Cecil, to signify unto you our pleasure and advice, that you should, in this your next sermon, forbear to intreat upon those principal questions, which remain among the number of learned men in this realm, as yet in controversy, concerning the sacrament of the altar, and the mass ; as well for that your private argument or determination therein might offend the people, naturally expecting decisions of litigious causes, and thereby discord and tumult arise ; the occasions whereof we must necessarily prevent and take away ; as also for that the questions and controversies rest at this present in consultation, and, with the pleasure of God, shall be in small time, by publick doctrine and authority, quietly and truly determined. This message we send to you, not thinking but your own wisdom had considered so much in an apparent matter ; or at the least, upon our remembrance, ye would understand it and follow it with good will, consulting thereby your own quiet in avoiding offence, as observing our pleasure in avoiding contention. Your answer thereunto, our said servant hath declared unto us in this manner. Ye can no wise forbear to speak of the sacrament, neither of the mass ; this last being the chief foundation, as ye say, of our religion, and that without it we cannot know that Christ is our sacrifice ; the other being so spoken of by many, that if you should not speak your mind thereof what ye think, you know what other men would think of you ; in the end, concluding generally, that you will speak the truth, and that ye doubt not but that we shall be therewith content ; adding also, as our said servant reporteth unto us, that you would not wish that we ourselves should meddle or have to do in these matters of religion, but that the care thereof were committed to you the bishops, unto whom the blame, if any should be deserved, might well be imputed.

To this your answer, if so it be, we reply very shortly, signifying unto you our express pleasure and commandment, on our sovereign lord the king's majesty's behalf, charging you, by the authority of the same, to abstain in your said sermon from treating of any matter, in controversy concerning the said sacrament and the mass, and only to bestow your speech in the expert explication of the articles prescribed unto you, and in other wholesome matter, of obedience of the people, and good conversation and living ; the same matters being both large enough for a long sermon, and not unnecessary for the time. And the treaty of other, which we forbid you not meet in your private sermon to be had, but necessarily reserved for a publick consultation, and at this present utterly to be forborn for the common quiet.

This our express pleasure, wherein we know how reasonably we may command you, and you (we think) know how willingly ye ought to obey us. For our intermeddling with these causes of religion, understand you, that we account it no small part of our charge, under the king's majesty, to bring his people from ignorance to knowledge, and from superstition to true religion, esteeming that the chief foundation to build obedience upon : and where there is a full consent of others, the bishops and learned men, in a truth, not to suffer you, or a few other, with wilful headiness, to dissuade all the rest. And although we presume not to determine articles of religion by ourself, yet from God we knowledge it, we be desirous to defend and advance the truth, determined or revealed, and so consequently we will not fail, but withstand the disturbers thereof. So fare you well. From Sion, June 28, anno 1548.

Your loving friend,

E. SOMERSET.

Dr. Redmayn's Opinion concerning the Marriage of the Clergie.—An original.

[EX MS. Col. C. C. Cantab.]

I THINK that although the word of God does exhort and counsel priests to live in chastity, out of the number of the flesh and of the world, that thereby they may wholly attend to their calling; yet the bond of containing from marriage doth only lie upon priests in this realm, by reason of canons and constitutions of the church, and not by any precept of God's word, as in that they should be bound by any vow: which (in as far as my conscience is) priests in this church of England do not make.

I think that it standeth well with God's word, that a man which hath been, or is but once married, being otherwise accordingly qualified, may be made a priest.

And I do think, that forasmuch as canons and rules made in this behalf are neither universal nor everlasting, but upon considerations may be altered and changed; therefore the king's majesty, and the higher powers of the church, may, upon such reasons as shall move them, take away the clog of perpetual continence from priests, and grant that it may be lawful for such as cannot, or will not contain, to marry a wife; and if she die, then the said priest to marry no more, remaining still in the ministration.

JOHN REDMAYN.

NUMBER XXXI.

Articles of High Treason and other misdemeanours against the King's Majesty and his Crown, objected to Sir Thomas Seymour, Kt. Lord Seymour of Sudley, and High Admiral of England.

[EX LIBRO CONCILII, Fol. 236.]

1. WHEREAS the duke of Somerset was made governor over the king's majesty's person, and protector of all his realms and dominions, and subjects; to the which you yourself did agree, and gave your consent in writing; it is objected, and laid unto your charge, that this notwithstanding, you have attempted and gone about, by indirect means, to undo this order, and to get into your hands the government of the king's majesty, to the great danger of his highness' person, and the subversion of the state of the realm.

2. It is objected and laid to your charge, that by corrupting with gifts, and fair promises, divers of the privy chamber, you went about to allure his highness to condescend and agree to the same your most heinous and perilous purposes, to the great danger of his highness' person, and of the subversion of the state of the realm.

3. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you wrote a letter with your own hand; which letter the king's majesty should have subscribed, or written again after that copy, to the parliament-house; and that you delivered the same to his highness for that intent: with the which so written by his highness, or subscribed, you had determined to have come into the commons-house yourself, and there, with your fautors and adherents before prepared, to have made a broil, or tumult, or uproar, to the great danger of the king's majesty's person, and subversion of the state of this realm.

4. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you yourself spake to divers of the council, and laboured with divers of the nobility of the realm, to stick and adhere unto you for the alteration of the state, and order of the realm, and to attain your other purposes, to the danger of the king's majesty's person, now in his tender years, and subversion of the state of the realm.

5. It is objected, and laid under your charge, that you did say openly and plainly, you would make the blackest parliament that ever was in England.

6. It is objected, and laid to your charge, that being sent for by the authority, to answer to such things as were thought meet to be reformed in you, you refused to come: to a very evil example of disobedience, and danger thereby of the subversion of the state of the realm.

7. It is objected, and laid to your charge, that sith the last sessions of this parliament, notwithstanding much clemency shewed unto you, you have still continued in your former mischievous purposes; and continually, by yourself and other, studied and laboured to put into the king's majesty's head and mind, a misliking of the government of the realm, and of the lord protector's doings, to the danger of his person, and the great peril of the realm.

8. It is objected, and laid to your charge, that the king's majesty being of those tender years, and as yet by age unable to direct his own things, you have gone about to instill into his grace's head, and, as much as lieth in you, perswaded him to take upon himself the government and managing of his own affairs, to the danger of his highness' person, and great peril of the whole realm.

9. It is objected, and laid to your charge, that you had fully intended and appointed to have taken the king's majesty's person into your own hands and custody, to the danger of his subjects and peril of the realm.

10. It is objected, and laid to your charge, that you have corrupted with money, certain of the privy chamber, to perswade the king's majesty to have a credit towards you; and so to insinuate you to his grace, that when he lacked any thing, he should have it of you and none other body, to the intent he should mislike his ordering, and that you might the better, when you saw time, use the king's highness for an instrument to this purpose, to the danger of his royal person, and subversion of the state of the realm.

11. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you promised the marriage of the king's majesty at your will and pleasure.

12. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you have laboured and gone about to combine and confederate yourself with some persons: and specially moved those noblemen, whom you thought not to be contented, to depart into their countries, and make themselves strong; and otherwise to allure them to serve your purpose by gentle promises and offers, to have a party and faction in readiness to all your purposes, to the danger of the king's majesty's person, and peril of the state of the realm.

13. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you have parted, as it were, in your imagination and intent the realm, to set noblemen to countervail such other noblemen as you thought would let your devilish purposes, and so laboured to be strong to all your devices; to the great danger of the king's majesty's person, and great peril of the state of the realm.

14. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you had advised certain men to entertain and win the favour and good-wills of the head yeomen and ring-leaders of certain countries, to the intent that they might bring the multitude and commons, when you should think meet, to the furtherance of your purposes.

15. It is objected, and laid to your charge, that you have not only studied and imagined how to have the rule of a number of men in your hands, but that you have attempted to get, and also gotten, divers stewardships of noblemen's lands, and their manors, to make your party stronger, for your purposes aforesaid; to the danger of the king's majesty's person, and great peril of the state of the realm.

16. It is objected, and laid to your charge, that you have retained young gentlemen, and hired yeomen, to a great multitude, and far above such number as is permitted by the laws and statutes of the realm, or were otherwise necessary or convenient for your service, place, or estate, to the fortifying of yourself towards all your evil intents and purposes; to the great danger of the king's majesty, and peril of the state of the realm.

17. It is objected, and laid to your charge, that you had so travailed in that matter, that you had made yourself able to make, of your own men, out of your lands, and rules, and other your adherents, 10,000 men, besides your friends, to the advancement of all your intents and purposes; to the danger of the king's majesty's person, and the great peril of the state of the realm.

18. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you had conferred, cast, and weighed so much money as would find the said 10,000 men for a month; and that you knew how and where to have the same sum: and that you had given warning to have and prepare the said mass of money in a readiness; to the danger of the king's majesty's person, and great peril to the state of the realm.

19. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you have not only, before you married the queen, attempted and gone about to marry the king's majesty's sister, the lady Elizabeth, second inheritor, in remainder to the crown, but also being then let by the lord protector, and others of the council, sithence that time, both in the life of the queen, continued your old labour and love; and after her death, by secret and crafty means, practised to achieve the said purpose of marrying the said lady Elizabeth; to the danger of the king's majesty's person, and peril of the state of the same.

20. It is objected, and laid to your charge, that you married the late queen so soon after the late king's death, that if she had conceived streight after, it should have been a great doubt whether the child born should have been accounted the late king's or yours; whereupon a marvellous danger and peril might, and was like to have ensued to the king's majesty's succession, and quiet of the realm.

21. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you first married the queen privately, and did dissemble and keep close the same, inso much that a good space after you had married her, you made labour to the king's majesty, and obtained a letter of his majesty's hand, to move and require the said queen to marry with you; and likewise procured the lord protector to speak to the queen to bear you her favour towards marriage; by the which colouring, not only your evil and dissembling nature may be known, but also it is to be feared that at this present you did intend to use the same practice in the marriage of the lady Elizabeth's grace.

22. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you not only, so much as lay in you, did stop and lett all such things as, either by parliament or otherwise, should tend to the advancement of the king's majesty's affairs, but did withdraw yourself from the king's majesty's service; and being moved and spoken unto, for your own honour, and for the ability that was in you, to serve and aid the king's majesty's affairs, and the lord protector's, you would always draw back, and feign excuses, and declare plainly that you would not do it.

Wherefore upon the discourse of all these aforesaid things, and of divers others, it must needs be intended, that all these preparations of men and money, the attempts and secret practices of the said marriage; the abusing and perswading of the king's majesty, to mislike the government, state, and order of the realm that now is, and to take the government into his own hands; and to credit you, was to none other end and purpose, but after a tittle gotten to the crown, and your party made strong both by sea and land, with furniture of men and money sufficient, to have aspired to the dignity royal, by some hainous enterprise against the king's majesty's person; to the subversion of the whole state of the realm.

23. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you not only had gotten into your hands the strong and dangerous Isles of Silly, bought of divers men; but that so much as lay in your power, you travailed also to have Lunday; and under pretence to have victualled the ships therewith, not only went about, but also moved the lord protector, and whole council, that you might, by publick authority, have that, which by private fraud and falshood, and confederating with Sharington, you had gotten, that is, the Mint at Bristol, to be yours wholly, and only to serve your purposes, casting, as may appear, that if these traitorous purposes had no good success, yet you might thither convey a good mass of mony; where being aided with ships, and conspiring at all evil events with pirats, you might at all times have a sure and safe refuge, if any thing for your demerits should have been attempted against you.

24. It is also objected, and laid unto your charge that having knowledge that Sir William Sharington, kt. had committed treason, and otherwise wonderfully defrauded and deceived the king's majesty, nevertheless you both by yourself, and seeking counsel for him, and by all means you could, did aid, assist, and bear him contrary to your allegiance and duty to the king's majesty, and the good laws and orders of the realm.

25. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that where you owed to sir William Sharington, kt. a great sum of mony, yet to abet, bear, and cloak the great falshood of the said Sharington, and to defraud the king's majesty, you were not afraid to say and affirm before the lord protector and the council, that the same Sharington did owe unto you a great sum of mony, viz. 2800*l.* and to conspire with him in that falshood and take a bill of that feigned debt into your custody.

26. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you by yourself and ministers have not only extorted and bribed great sums of mony of all such ships as should go into island, but also as should go any other where in merchandise, contrary to the liberty of th' realm, and to the great discouragement and destruction of the navy of the same; to the great danger of the king's majesty, and the state of the realm.

27. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that here divers merchants, as well strangers as Englishmen, have had their goods piratously robbed and taken, you have had their goods in your hands and custody, daily seen in your house, and distributed among your servants and friends, without any restitution to the parties so injured and spoiled; so that thereby foreign princes have in a manner been weary of the king's majesty's mity, and by their ambassadors divers times complained; to the great slander of the king's majesty, and anger of the state of the realm.

28. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that here certain men have taken certain pirats, you have not only taken from the takers of the said pirats all the goods and ships so taken, without any reward, but have cast the said takers, for their good service done to the king's majesty, into prison, and there detained them a great time, some eight weeks, some more, some less, to the discouraging of such as truly should serve the king's majesty against his pirats and enemies.

29. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that divers of the head pirats being brought unto you, you have let the same pirats go again free unto the seas; and taking away from the takers of them, not only all their commodity and profit, but from the true owners of the ships and goods all such as ever came into the pirats' hands, as though you were authorized to be the chief pirat, and to have had all the advantage they could bring unto you.

30. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that where order hath been taken, by the lord protector and the whole council, that certain goods, piratically taken upon the seas, and otherwise known not to be wrecked nor forfeited, should be restored to the true owners, and letters thereupon written by the lord protector and the council; to the which letters, you yourself, among the other, did set to your hand; yet you, this notwithstanding, have given commandment to your officers, that no such letters should be obeyed; and written your private letters to the contrary, commanding the said goods not to be restored, but kept to your own use and profit, contrary to your own hand before in the council-chamber written, and contrary to your duty and allegiance, and to the perillous example of others, and great slander and danger of the realm.

31. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that where certain strangers, which were friends and allies to the king's majesty, had their ships, with wind and weather broken, and yet came unwrecked to the shore; when the lord protector and the council had written for the restitution of the said goods, and to the country to aid and save so much of the goods as might, you yourself subscribing and consenting thereto; yet this notwithstanding, you have not only given contrary commandment to your officers, but as a pirat have written letters to some of your friends to help, that as much of these goods as they could, should be conveyed away secretly by night further off, upon hope that if the same goods were assured, the owners would make no further labour for them, and then you might have enjoyed them; contrary to justice and your honour, and to the great slander of this realm.

32. It is objected, and laid unto your charge, that you have not only disclosed the king's majesty's secret council, but also where you yourself, amongst the rest, have consented and agreed to certain things for the advancement of the king's affairs, you have spoken and laboured against the same.

33. It is further objected, and laid unto your charge, that your deputy steward, and other your ministers of the Holt, in the county of Denbigh, have now, against Christmass last past, at the said Holt, made such provision of wheat, malt, beefs, and other such things as be necessary for the sustentance of a great number of men; making also, by all the means possible, a great mass of money; insomuch that all the country doth greatly marvel at it, and the more, because your servants have spread rumours abroad, that the king's majesty was dead; whereupon the country is in a great maze, doubt, and expectation, looking for some broil, and would have been more, if at this present, by your apprehension, it had not been staid.

The Lord Admiral's Answer to three of the former Articles.

To the first, he saith, that about Easter-tyde was twelve-months, he said to Fowler, as he supposeth it was, that if he might have the king in his custody as Mr. Page had, he would be glad; and that he thought a man might bring him through the gallery to his chamber, and so to his house: but this he said he spoke merrily, meaning no hurt. And that in the mean time after he heard, and upon that sought out certain precedents, that there was in England at one time, one protector, and another regent of France, and the duke of Exeter, and the bishop of Winchester, governors of the king's person; upon that he had thought to have made suit to the parliament-house for that purpose, and he had the names of all the lords, and totted them whom he thought he might have to his purpose to labour them. But afterwards communing with Mr. Comptroller at Ely-place, being put in remembrance by him of his assenting and agreeing with his own hand, that the lord protector should be governor of the king's person, he was ashamed of his doings, and left off that suit and labour.

To the second he saith, he gave money to two or three of them which were about the king. To Mr. Check he saith, he gave at Christmass-tide was twelve-months, when the queen was at Enfield, 40*l.*, whereof to himself 20*l.*, the other for the king, to bestow where it pleased his grace amongst his servants. Mr. Check was very loth to take it, howbeit he would needs press that upon him; and to him he gave no more, at no time as he remembereth, sith the king's majesty was crowned.

To the grooms of the chamber he hath at Newyears-tydes given money, he doth not well remember what.

To Fowler, he saith, he gave money for the king, sith the beginning of this parliament now last at London, 20*l.*

And divers times, he saith, the king hath sent to him for money, and he hath sent it. And what time Mr. Latimer preached before the king, the king sent to him to know what he should give Mr. Latimer, and he sent to him by Fowler 40*l.* with this word, that 20*l.* was a good reward for Mr. Latimer, and the other he might bestow amongst his servants; whether he hath given Fowler any money for himself he doth not remember.

To the third, he saith, it is true, he drew such a bill indeed himself, and proffered it to the king, or else to Mr. Check, he cannot well tell; and before that, he saith, he caused the king to be moved by Mr. Fowler, whether he could be contented that he should have the governance of him as Mr. Stanhope had. He knoweth not what answer he had; but upon that he drew the said bill to that effect, that his majesty was content, but what answer he had to the bill he cannot tell, Mr. Check can tell.

NUMBER XXXII.

The Warrant for the Admiral's Execution.

[Ex Libro Concilii, Fol. 247.]

March 17.

THIS day, the 17th of March, the lord chancellor, and the rest of the king's council, meeting in his highness' palace of Westminster, heard the report of the bishop of Ely, who by the said lords, and others of the council, was sent to instruct and comfort the lord admiral; after the hearing whereof, consulting and deliberating with themselves of the time most convenient for the execution of the said lord admiral, now attainted and condemned by the parliament, they did condescend and agree, that the said lord admiral should be executed the Wednesday next following, betwixt the hours of nine and twelve in the forenoon of the same day, upon Tower-hill. His body and head to be buried within the Tower. The king's writ (as in such cases as heretofore hath been accustomed) being first directed and sent forth for that purpose and effect. Whereupon calling to the council-chamber the bishop of Ely, they willed him to declare this their determination to the said lord admiral; and to instruct and teach him, the best he could, to the quiet and patient suffering of justice, and to prepare himself to Almighty God.

NUMBER XXXIII.

Articles to be followed and observed, according to the King's Majesty's Injunctions and Proceedings.

[Ex MS. Dr. Johnson.]

1. THAT all parsons, vicars, and curats, omit in the reading of the injunctions all such as make mention of the popish mass, of chantries, of candles upon the altar, or any other such-like thing.

2. Item. For an uniformity, that no minister do counterfeit the popish mass, as to kiss the Lord's table; washing his fingers at every time in the communion; blessing his eyes with the paten or sudary, or crossing his head with the paten, shifting of the book from one place to another, laying down and licking the chalice of the communion; holding up his fingers, hands, or thumbs, joined towards his temples; breathing upon the bread or chalice; showing the sacrament openly before the distribution of the communion; ringing or scrying bells, or setting any light upon the Lord's board at any time; and finally, to use no other ceremonies than are appointed in the king's book of common prayers, or kneeling otherwise than is in the said book.

3. Item. That none buy or sell the holy communion, as in trentals and such other.

4. Item. That none be suffered to pray upon beads, and so the people to be diligently admonished; and such as will not be admonished to put from the holy communion.

5. Item. That after the homily, every Sunday, the minister exhort the people, especially the communicants, to remember the poor men's box with their charity.

6. Item. To receive no corpse but at the churchyard, without bell or cross.

7. Item. That the common prayer, upon Wednesdays and Fridays, be diligently kept, according to the king's ordinances, exhorting such as may conveniently come to be there.

8. Item. That the curats, every sixth week at the least, teach and declare diligently the catechism, according to the book of the same.

9. Item. That no man maintain purgatory, invocation of saints, the six articles, bedrolls, images, reliques, lights, holy bells, holy beads, holy water, palms, ashes, candles, sepulchres paschal, creeping to the cross, hallowing of the font of the popish manner, oil, chrisme, altars, beads, or any other such abuses and superstitions, contrary to the king's majesty's proceedings.

10. Item. That within any church or chappel be not used any more than one communion upon any day, except Christmass-day and Easter-day.

11. Item. That none keep the abrogate holydays, other than those that have their proper and peculiar service.

12. Item. That the church-wardens suffer no buying nor selling, gaming, or unfitting demeanour, in church or churchyards; especially during the common prayer, the sermon, and reading of the homily.

13. Item. That going to the sick with the sacrament, the minister have not with him either light or bells.

A Paper written by Iuther to Buccer concerning Reconciliation with the Zuinglians. An Original.

PRIMO: Ut nullo modo concedamus de nobis dici, quod neutri neutros ante Intellexerunt: Nam isto Pharmaco non medebimur tanto vulnere: cum nec ipsi credamus utrimque hoc verum esse, et alii putabunt a nobis hoc fingi; ut ita magis suspectam reddemus causam, vel potius per totum dubiam faciemus; cum sit communis omnium, ut in tantis animorum turbis et scrupulis non expedit hoc nomine addere offendiculum.

Secundo: Cum hactenus dissenserimus, quod illi signum, nos Corpus Christi asseruerimus plane contrarii: Nihilominus mihi videtur utile, ut mediam, ut novam statuamus sententiam, qua et illi concedant Christum adesse vere, et nos concedamus panem solum manducari. Considerandum certe est, quantum hic fenestram aperiemus in re omnibus communi cogitandi et Orientium hinc fontes questionum et opinionum

*. Ut tutius multo sit illos simpliciter manere in suo signo, cum nec ipsi suam, nec nos nostram partem, multo minus utriq; totum orbem pertrahemus in eam sententiam; Sed potius irritabimus ad varias Cogitationes. Ideo vellem potius ut sopitum maneret dissidium in duabus istis sententiis, quam ut occasio daretur infinitis quæstionibus ad Epicurismum profuturis.

Istis salvis, nihil est quod a me peti possit: nam ut ego hoc dissidium vellem (testis est mihi Christus meus) redemptum Corpore et Sanguine meo. Sed quid faciam? Ipsi forte Conscientia bona sunt in altera sententia. Feramus igitur eos: si sinceri sunt, liberabit eos Christus Dominus. Ego contra captus sum bona mea Conscientia, nisi ipsi mihi sum ignotus, in eadem sententiam: ferant et me, si non possunt mihi accedere.

After this followeth the process and sentence of condemnation of one George van Parre, a Dutchman, for obstinately maintaining the like opinions; together with a petition imploring the execution thereof, and the assistance of the secular power, conform to the tenour of that above written, bearing date the 6th of April, Anno Dom. 1551.

The judges and commissioners of this process were, Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, Nicholas bishop of London, William May, Griffin Leyson, John Oliver, Miles Coverdale, Richard Lyell, John Gosnold, and Christopher Nevison.

His heresy that he believeth is, that "God the Father is only God; and that Christ is not very God, is non-heresy." And being asked by an interpreter, whether he would abjure the said opinion? he answered, "No."

NUMBER XXXVI.

A Letter from the Protector to Sir Philip Hobbey, concerning the Rebellions at Home.

[Cotton Libr. Galba. B. 12.]

KNOWING that all such as be ambassadors abroad are not only desirous of news, for the love they bear to their own country naturally, desiring often to hear of the estate of it, but also to confirm and confute such rumours as be spread in the parts where they lie, we have thought good to impart what sith our last letters hath chanced. The Devonshire men are well chastised and appeased; three other of their captains have voluntarily come in, and simply submitted themselves to sir Thomas Pomery, kt., Wise and Harrice, who before were fled, and could not be found; and the country cometh in daily to my lord privy seal by hundreds and thousands, to crave their pardon, and be put in some sure hope of grace. Burry, and some one or two more of their blind guides that escaped from the sword, have attempted, in the mean season, to stir up Somersetshire, and have gotten them a band or camp; but they are sent after, and we trust by this they have as they deserve. The earl of Warwick lieth near to the rebels in Norfolk, which faint now, and would have grace gladly, so that all might be pardoned; Ket, and the other arch-traitors. The number upon that is at a stay, and they daily shrink so fast away, that there is great hope that they will leave their captains destitute and alone, to receive their worthy reward; the which is the thing we most desire, to spare, as much as may be, the effusion of blood, and that namely of our own nation. In Yorkshire a commotion was attempted the week last past; but the gentlemen were so soon upon them, and so forwardly, that it was straight suppressed; and with weeping eyes, the rest upon their knees, they wholly together desired the gentlemen to obtain their pardons; the which the king's majesty hath so granted unto them as may stand with his highness' honour: so that for the inner parts (thanks be to the Almighty God!) the case standeth in good points. The causes and pretences of these uproars and risings are divers and uncertain, and so full of variety almost in every camp (as they call them), that it is hard to write what it is; as ye know is like to be of people without head and rule, and that would have that they wot not what. Some crieth, "Pluck down inclosures and parks;" some for their commons; others pretend the religion; a number would rule another while, and direct things as gentlemen have done; and, indeed, all have conceived a wonderful hate against gentlemen, and taketh them all as their enemies. The ruffians among them, and the souldiers, which be the chief doers, look for spoil; so that it seemeth no other thing but a plague and a fury amongs the vilest and worst sort of men: for except only Devoushire and Cornwall, and they not past two or three, in all other places not one gentleman, or man of reputation, was ever amongst them, but against their wills, and as prisoners. In Norfolk, gentlemen, and all serving-men, for their sakes, are as ill handled as may be; but this broil is well asswaged, and in a manner at a point shortly to be fully ended, with the grace of God.

On the other part of the seas, we have not so good news; for the French king taking now his time, and occasions of this rebellion within the realm, is come unto Bullingnois, with a great number of horsemen and footmen, himself in person; and as we are advertised of the letters of the 24th of this present, from Ambletue or Newhaven, the Almain camp, or Almain hill, a piece appertaining to the said Ambletue, was that day delivered to the French, by traitorous consent of the camp; their variance falling out, or feigned, between the captain and the souldiers, so that they are now besieged very near, and in a manner round. Howbeit they write, that they trust the piece itself of Newhaven will be well enough defended, God assisting them, who be in as good and stout a courage as any men may be, and as desirous to win honour, and give a good account of their charge. Thus we bid you heartily farewell. August 24, 1549.

The first part of this Letter is the recommending the Bearer, that they might find a good Marriage for him.

—THE pears were so well accepted in every place, where I had so many thanks for my distribution, that I intend by God's grace, to send down to you your frail again, to have an eching, either of more pears, or else of puddings, &c. ye do know what, &c. doth mean, by that Italian proverb, Dio me guarda da furia di villani, da conscientia di preti, da chi odi due messe nel giorno, da quasibuglie di medici da &c. di notarii, da chi jura per la conscientia mia. I do not write to sir John Burne, nor to my lady, for anything, their conscience is not over large; and the like is in Mr. Hornvale, and also my old acquaintance John Badger. But if amongst you I have no puddings, then must I say, as Messer, our priest of the hospital, said to his mad horse, in our last journey to Hostia, Al diavolo, al diavolo, ai tutti diavolli. Our Lord preserve you, and all yours, with desire to be recommended to all. Festo omnium Sancterum, in the marshalsea.

NUMBER XXXVIII.

Letters and Instructions touching Proceedings with the Emperor, to Sir William Paget, Knight of the Order, sent to the Emperor. 1549.

[Cotton Libr. Galba. B. 12.]

First, He shall communicate his instructions, and the cause of his coming with sir Philip Hobbey ambassador, resident with the emperor, and accompanied with him at his access to the said emperor, shall deliver his letters of credit; and for his credit shall utter his charge as followeth.

First, He shall declare what good will we have to the continuance of the amity, and the increase of the same, by such means as may be devised on either party; and how the reciproque hath been promised on their behalf.

Item. To the intent they may as well perceive our forwardness therein, as also the world see the same take effect indeed, he is sent to show what we have thought upon for this purpose; and also if they be of a like forwardness, to hear again what they think meet in that behalf; and upon this conference, either to conclude upon both our devices, or such one of them as shall be thought best for both parties.

Item. We think good, that the treaty already made between the emperor and the king's majesty of famous memory, deceased, be made perpetual, that is to say, confirmed by the prince, and the countries on both sides, whose commodity depend upon the same treaty.

Item. Before the confirmation, the treaty to be revised by him; and the ambassador, and certain other, to be appointed by the emperor, to the intent it may appear whether we have both one understanding of the words of the treaty.

Item. Where the debating to and fro of the amity with his ambassador here, occasion hath risen to talk of marriage between the infant of Portugal and the lady Mary; to which thing we perceive the emperor hath sithence been made privy; and that in case the emperor mind to treat further of that matter, he shall say he hath commission to hear and conclude thereof.

Item. To declare the state of our affairs in Scotland at this time; and forasmuch as the Scots have been very much aided with victuals, ammunitions, and other necessaries from his dominions, by reason whereof they are more stiff and unwilling to come to reason; the said comptroller declaring this consideration, shall do what he may to procure, that not only all safe-conducts granted by the emperor or the regent may be cassed; but also his consent, that if any his subjects traffique into Scotland, being common enemies, if they be taken beyond Barwick thitherward, it may be lawful for our men to take their goods as forfeit.

Item. To declare our proceedings with France at this time, and of our sending commissioners upon the French motion, who shall not conclude anything prejudicial to the amity or treaties already passed, or now to be passed, between us and the emperor, but shall depend wholly upon his proceedings there; so as if the emperor shall, upon consultation of his affairs, determine with us to do anything to France, we will frame our communications with the French thereafter: if otherwise than the said commissioners now sent to the French shall do accordingly.

Item. For making the treaty perpetual, we think convenient that the prince of Spain do confirm and sign the same, and the Low Countries comprised therein do also in their general parliaments or assemblies make like confirmation, and in their courts to make decrees thereof; and this, or such form as hath been used in those parts heretofore in like cases, to be done for their part: and for our part, the king to ratify it, the parliament to confirm it, and the courts of Chancery, King's Bench, and Common Pleas, to make decrees thereof.

Item. In the revising of the treaty, if any doubt rise for the understanding of it, which shall seem by his and the ambassador's discretion to be for the king's profit, to conclude upon it, if they will agree to the same; and if there arise doubt, which shall seem to their discretions against the king, then to advertise hither.

Item. For the case of the marriage, to declare at the first what was left by the king's majesty deceased; and yet nevertheless afterward to offer 100,000 crowns, or the revenue yearly which she hath now upon convenient dower. The said 100,000 crowns, or revenue, to be paid at Calais, if the marriage take place; she to be conveyed to Calais at the king's charges; the marriage to be made in the emperor's court, or elsewhere in the Low Country, by his appointment; and for her dowry to ask by the year to be paid in case of the infant's death, at Calais yearly, at the feasts of and the feast of and she to return into England with jewels, plate, household stuff, such as should be agreed upon. And thus far to enter for the first degree; and in case of further communication, to advertise and receive answer from hence.

Item. Touching our proceeding with France, to declare how we have continued in war with them and Scotland these four years alone without help; and that we think it expedient for us, upon this occasion now ministered by France, to give ear; in the which hearing, we mind to attribute much to the emperor's friendship; for loth we are to let slip from the king any one jot of his right, if the emperor will assist; but otherwise we must make such a bargain for the king, as we may with regard to his honour and surety. And in this point the comptroller shall press the said emperor to enter with us, and to put him in a remembrance of his quarrels, and all such other things as he can devise for this purpose; and to put him in hope generally, that we will enter gallantly with him. And if he descend to particulars for the form of the entry, to hear his opinion, and to advertise, and then proceed as answer cometh from hence; but specially to remember to set forth the comprehension of Bulloign for defence, upon a like reciproque, for so shall he be brought to think we mind not to conclude with France, and thereby stay such practices, as upon occasion of the said comptroller's going, either he with France, or France with him, might enter together. And so the commissioners sent to France may make the better bargain for the king. Marry, this point is not to be opened thoroughly, till he hear some likelihood that our commissioners in France break off without conclusion.

Item. The said comptroller shall essay, as of himself, whether they will accept Bulloign at the king's majesty's hands, for some other reasonable recompence.

Item. The said comptroller shall use his discretion, to open the points aforesaid to the emperor, Granvela or D'Arras, either at one time or several times, as to his discretion shall seem convenient; and shall address his packets to the commissioners for France lying at Calais, to the end they may see his proceedings, and send them over with speed, directing their charge the better hereafter.

NUMBER XXXIX.

An Account of a Conference the English Ambassadors had with the Emperor's Ministers, in a Letter to the Protector.

[Cotton Libr. Galba. B. 12.]

It may like your grace to be advertised, that upon the 20th of this present, came to the lodging of me the comptroller, monsieur D'Arras, and in his company the two presidents of the council, St. Maurice and Viglius; who, after a few words of office passed between them and us, entered the cause of their coming, saying, that the emperor having been informed of such conference as was passed this other day between me and Granvela, hath to declare his readiness to any thing that might satisfy his good will and affection to the intent of the king, sent as here to revisit the treatise, and see how we do agree upon the understanding of the same. I, the comptroller, answered, that it was not amiss, howbeit I had not so opened the matters, nor looked to have it passed in such order. But first to know the emperor's resolution, how he can be contented with the confirmation of the treaty, in the form that I had moved; and then that agreed upon, to proceed to the revisitation of the same. In good faith, (quoth D'Arras,) we did so understand it, and have so reported to the emperor, and this commission hath he now given us. Well, (quoth I,) seeing you are now here, and have brought the treaty with you for that purpose, we may do somewhat in it, and afterwards be advised farther, requiring, that in case anything should be found in the passages of the treaty meet to be considered, that we might, before further wading in the matter, know the emperor's resolution, touching as well the confirmation of the treaty, as in such things as now might be moved: which they thought reasonable. And so we began to read the treaty; and when we came to the sixth article, wherein it is provided for the common enmity in case of invasion, and by the establishment set forth, with what number the invasion must be made; and that both for the invasion, and the number the prince required to join, shall credit the letters of the prince requiring. I put this case, (quoth I,) for the understanding of this matter, that the king my master will signify by his letters to the emperor, that such a day the Scots, our common enemies, to the number of seven thousand men, with the aid of the French king, affronted the borders of England, comprehended in the treaty, and set above two thousand men into the realm to invade: who did indeed invade, and spoil, and burn, and take prisoners; and therefore would require the emperor, according to the treaty, to take the French king, who had aided his enemies, for his enemies; for so doth he, and so will use him for his enemies. Is not the emperor bound to do it? What say you, (quoth I,) how do you understand this article? It should seem yes, (quoth D'Arras,) but we will speak with the emperor in it, and bring you an answer. The words be plain, (quoth I,) and cannot be avoided.

Then in the seventh article, where it is said, that the prince requiring for his aid money instead of men, must, if the invasion made by the enemy cease, restore the money again which remaineth. And afterwards says, that though the invasion cease, yet if he will follow the enemy, he may use the aid for the time appointed in the treaty; saying in generality, (co casu subsidiis auxiliariibus, &c.) I asked, whether in those general words, they mean not the money as well as the men? Whereupon they seemed to doubt, and took a note thereof, to know the emperor's pleasure in the same.

In the ninth article, where it is treated for redress of injuries done by one subject to the other, there we fell into a brawl of half an hour, upon a question that I moved, viz. when they took justice to be denied? And their answer was, that we used none at all. And here at length, I fell into their manner of arresting of one whole nation upon a knave mariner's complaint.

And he, what thieves our nation was upon the sea, and lawless people, and that they never proceed to such extremities, but when their subjects had been in England and justice was denied. That hath never been seen, quoth I; but if any of your subjects think himself grieved, streight he runeth to monsieur le Protecteur; and he, by and by, setting all the king's affairs apart, must attend to the affairs of monsieur le Mariniure, or else home runeth he with open cry, that he cannot have justice in England, and you streight believe; and thereupon cometh these often blusters. And do you think it reason, that monsieur G. or you should attend to every private man's complaint; you should then have a goodly office. No, you send them to the ordinary justices, and so let that take place and way as it will; but you will never impeach yourself more with the matter. And reason, (quoth he,) but the cause is not alike with you in England, for there, (quoth he,) all things come to the lord protector's hand, there is none other judge or justice used or cared for in the realm; no, and his letters sometimes not esteemed, and that our subjects fear full often, and therefore of force they must resort to monsieur Protecteur. And this is not true, (quoth I,) and that monsieur Hobbey knoweth, my lord protector, nor none of the privy council, meddle with no private matters whosoever it be, but only meddle with matters of state, leaving all other things to the ordinary course of justice, except only many times to gratify your ambassador, and to show himself glad to nourish the amity, he troubleth himself with the complaints of your subjects, which, by St. Mary, by my advice, he shall do no more, seeing it is so little considered, but shall refer them to the common justice. Whither is that? (quoth he.) To the admiralty, (quoth I.)

Marry, a goodly justice, (quoth he,) for so shall the poor man's cause be tried before his adversary. And why not tried in our admiralty (quoth I) as well as in yours? Nay, (quoth he,) both be naught indeed; they were very ordinary courts at the beginning of the redress of matters upon the sea; but now they feel the sweet of the gain such, as they care little for justice, and here, as well for relief of poor men spoiled and robbed upon the seas, as to avoid arrests, and such other troublesome proceedings on either side, we fell to devising, and came to this point: If the princes for their parts, upon their advertisement to the emperor, and we to your grace, shall like it, that commission sufficient be given by the emperor, to two of his privy council, to hear and determine by their discretion, summary, et de pleno, all complaints by the king's subjects here for criminal causes upon the sea; and the king's majesty to do the like to two of his privy council, for the complaints in like case of the emperor's subjects.

And this was all passed in open conference, saying, that in the discourse for the confirmation in the treaty by the prince and their countries, as they seemed to shew the emperor's readiness (but yet not so resolved) that the prince should confirm the treaty, and that further any other thing should be done that he might reasonably do, to declare his good will to the entertainment and augmentation of his amity and affection to the king's majesty. So he alleged divers reasons why the emperor should not seek to his subjects to confirm his treaties with foreign princes. We alleged the example of the king, and the French king in times past; and what was said in that case at C. in the presence of himself de C. and Chap.

Whereunto he answered, that the state of France was more restrained than the emperor's; and that the French king could give no piece of his patrimony, nor bind his country, without the consent of his parliament at Paris, and the three estates; but he thought the king of England to have a greater prerogative; and the emperor, he was sure, had a greater prerogative; and so had all his ancestors, and therefore would be loth now to put himself so far in their danger: they were, he said, fifteen or sixteen parliaments, and if a thing should be proposed unto them, whereof they had never heard the like before, they would not only muse much at the matter, but they would have also the scanning of it; and what would come of it, the emperor could not tell, peradventure dash the matter, and so prejudice his prerogative with them. Yet now where he and his ancestors do, and have always passed treaties with other princes, and bind their subjects thereby without making them privy thereto, it would by this means come to pass, that from henceforth their subjects would look to be privy to every treaty, which were not convenient; marry, for the prince which shall succeed, to confirm the treaty, he thought the emperor could not take it but reasonable, and doubted not to bring a good answer in the same. So as we see for this point, it will come to the confirmation of the king and the prince, and upon any condition or interpretation of the treaty to them also, wherein we intend to go forwards, for so our instruction beareth us, unless that before the conclusion and shutting up of the matter, we hear from your grace to the contrary.

The things being thus far passed, and our open talk at a point, and they ready to depart, monsieur D'Arras taking occasion (as it seemed) to stay because of the rain, took me aside, and asked me if I would command him any other service. I answered, no service, but friendship, and the continuance of his good will to the king's majesty's affairs; whereunto he making large offers, I began to enter with him, how much your grace, and all the rest, reposed themselves in the friendship of the emperor, and the good ministry of his father and him, to the furtherance of the king's majesty's affairs, to whom, as in that behalf, they shewed themselves great friends, so did they, like good servants to their master, for the prosperous success of the affairs of the one, served the turn of the other, and the contrary. Whereupon I discoursed largely, as far as my poor capacity would extend, how necessary it was for the emperor to aid and assist us in all things, so as we are not oppressed by force, or driven, for want of friendship, to take such ways to keep us in quiet, as both we ourselves would be loth, and our friends should afterwards have, peradventure, cause to forethink.

I repeated first how we entred the wars for your sake; for the king might have made his bargain honourable with France, which no man knew better than I: how long we have endured the war, and how long alone; how favourable they are to our common enemies the Scots; how ungentle the French be to us, and by indirect means think to consume us, to make the emperor the weaker.

I recited the practices of the French with the Turk, with the pope, with the Germans, with Denmark; his aid of the Scots; and all upon intent to impeach the emperor when he seeth time, or at the least attending a good hour, upon hope of the emperor's death; the weaker that we be, the easilier shall he do it; if we forgoe any our pieces on this side, we must needs be the weaker; and that so we had rather do, than alone to keep war against Scotland and France. Wherefore if they will both provide for their own strength, and give us courage to keep still that which we have, the emperor must be content to take 13* into defence, as well as other places comprehended in the treaty; which, I said, we meant not, but upon a reasonable reciproque. What reciproque? (quoth he) roundly. Thereupon advise you reasonably (quoth I). O, (quoth he,) I cannot see how the emperor can honourably make a true treaty for that point, without offence of his treaty with France; and we mean to proceed directly and plain with all men (quoth he). Why (quoth I), we may bring you justly, by and by, with us, if we will advertise you, as I did even now put my case. Yea, if your case be true (quoth he); but herein we will charge your honours and consciences, whether the fact be so or no? for your grace shall understand that I talked in the matter so suspiciously, as though such an invasion had been made, and that you would require common enmity.

In fine, sir, after many motions and perswasions, and long discourses used on my behalf, to induce them to take 13 into defence. His refuge was only, that they would fain learn how they might honestly answer the French; albeit I shewed him some forms of answers, which he seemed not to like; yet in the end I said, he was a great doctor, and as he had put the doubt, so he was learned sufficiently, if he listed, to assail the same. He said, he would open these matters to the emperor, and trusted to bring me such an answer as I should have reason to be satisfied, and so departed; whereof, as soon as we have knowledge, your grace shall be advertised accordingly. And thus we beseech God, to send your grace well to do all your proceedings.

* This is a cipher, and stands, I suppose, for Bulloign.

NUMBER XL.

A Letter from Sir William Paget and Sir Philip Hobbey, concerning their negotiation with the Emperor's Ministers.—An Original.

[Cotton Libr. Galba. B. 12.]

It may like your grace be advertised, that yesterday at afternoon, monsieur D'Arras, accompanied with two presidents of the council, St. Maurice and Viglius, came unto the lodging of me the comptroller; and after some words of office passed on either part, D'Arras began to set forth the cause of their coming, saying, that the emperor having at good length considered and debated the things proposed and communed of between us since my coming hither, had sent them to report unto me his final answer and resolution to the same.

And first (quoth he) to your case, that at our being together for the revisitation of the treaty, ye put forth upon the sixth article for the common enmity in case of invasion, his majesty museth much, what ye should mean thereby, for seeing the case is not in ure, he thinketh, that doubting of his friendship, ye go about, by these means, to grope and feel his mind; which ye need not do, he having hitherto shewed himself ready in all things to shew the king, his good brother, pleasure, and to observe the treaty in all points to the uttermost; and if this case should happen to come in ure, then will he not fail to do whatsoever the treaty bindeth him unto, till when he can make no other answer therein.

As to your question, moved upon the sixth article of the treaty, viz. whether mony be not meant as well as men by these words, Subsidiis Auxiliariis? his majesty taketh the words to be plain enough, and thinketh they cannot be otherwise interpreted, than to be meant, as well for mony as men, for so doth he understand them.

Unto the order that was communed upon for the administration of justice on both sides, for matter of spoil or piracy upon the sea, his majesty having weighed what is best to be done therein further, he hath good cause first to complain of the over many spoils that your men have made on his poor subjects, and the small justice that hath been hitherto ministered unto them herein, whereof he hath continual complaints, and therefore he thinketh it were meeter, ere ever any further order shall be concluded upon, that his subjects were first recompensed of these wrongs they have sustained, and the matter brought to some equality, and his people put in as much good case as yours are; for I assure you (quoth he) the wrongs our men have sustained are many; among the rest, a poor jeweler, having gotten a safe-conduct of the king that dead is, to bring into England certain jewels, because after he had the king's hand and seal to the license, he had not the same sealed also with the great seal of England, his jewels were taken from him; and he, being not present (although it were so named in the sentence), condemned to lose them by the order of your law, contrary to all equity and justice: which seemeth strange, that the king's hand and seal should not appear to be sufficient for a greater matter than this. The treaties also provide, that the subjects of the one prince may frankly, without impediment, traffique and occupy into the other prince's country; but to shadow the matter with all, one, I cannot tell who, hath been agreed withal, and so the poor man and his heirs put from their right, which his majesty wisheth to be considered. And albeit he thinketh that the king your master, being under age, cannot himself, by the order of the law, conclude upon anything now in his minority, that shall be of due force and strength, able to bind him and his country when he shall come to his perfect age. Yet taking that his tutors be authorised thereto, by the common assent of your parliament, may go through and conclude upon these, or like things in his name, his majesty thinketh it will do well, when his subjects shall be recompensed of the wrongs they have hitherto sustained, that some order be devised for the administration of justice hereafter in like cases.

As touching the confirmation of the treaty, considering that the same was first made between the emperor and king Henry the Eighth, and not ratified by the king your master since his father's death, his majesty thinketh that he hath most cause to require the same: wherefore because (as I told you even now) he thinketh that these things, the king himself should conclude upon during his minority, cannot be of sufficient force, if his tutors shall be by the authority of your parliament enabled thereto, his majesty is content the treaty be confirmed by them in the king's name, and by the prince of Spain, in such form as shall be thought best for both parties.

As to the comprehension of Bulloign, ye must know, that we have a treaty with France as well as with you, which the emperor cannot, without some touch of his honour, break, without just grounds: and albeit his majesty would be loth to see the king, his good brother, forgoe either that peace, or any other jot of his right, yet can he not enter this defence, unless he would break with France out of hand; which in respect of his other affairs he cannot yet do, howbeit he will gladly assist his good brother in any other thing the best he may, and will not fail to shew him all the pleasure he can with regard to his honour; but with Bulloign he cannot meddle at this time. And here he staying; Is this the emperor's resolute and full answer, monsieur D'Arras? (quoth I). Yea, (quoth he); wherewith he prayeth the king, his good brother, to rest satisfied, and take it in good part. Albeit (quoth I) I have no commission to make any reply thereto, because it was not known to your grace what the emperor's resolution should be; yet in the way of talk I will be bold to say my mind herein. We have, monsieur D'Arras (quoth I), always esteemed the emperor's friendship, and desire the observation of the treaties, and the entertainment of the amity, as a thing necessary and common to both the parties: for the better establishment whereof, and that now and in this time some good fruit, to the benefit of both, might appear to the world to follow of the same, I was sent hither, which was the chiefeft cause of my coming: and because that the amity between both princes might be the firmer, and that all doubts being taken away, no cause of quarrel shall be left, we thought best to put you in mind of the confirmation and revisitation of the treaty, to the intent, that by the one, the world might see an establishment of our friendship by our deed; and that by the other, one of us might understand another, and consider whether any thing were to be added for the commodity of both parties, which I suppose standeth you as much upon to desire, as it doth us. And whereas ye say that the king's majesty, because he is under age, cannot conclude or go through with anything that shall be of sufficient force; I must needs tell you plainly, that ye touch his majesty's honour over-near herein, for we think that the majesty of a king is of such efficacy, that he hath even the same authority, and full power, at the first hour of his birth, that he hath thirty yeas after. And what your laws are, I know not; but sure I am, that by our laws, whatsoever is done by the king in his minority, or by his ministers in his name, is of no less force and strength, than if it had been done in time of his full age and years: if once the great seal of his realm have passed, there is no remedy but needs must he stand thereto. Marry, let the ministers take heed what they do, and look that they may be able to discharge themselves towards him of their doings, if he shall require account of them when he cometh to age, for it is they must answer him; but he must needs stand to whatsoever they have counseled him to agree unto during his minority. And to prove that our laws giveth him the same authority now, that he shall have when he cometh to his perfect age; if any man, either for instruction of learning, or any other cause, should presume to lay hands on, or touch his majesty in way of correction, he should by law be taken for a traitor. And if the matter were as ye take it, we should then be in a strange and evil case, for neither might we conclude peace, league, or treaty, nor make laws or statutes, during the king's minority, that should be of sufficient force to bind him and his to the observation of the same. But ye mistake the matter much; and therefore if the emperor mind to proceed to this confirmation, he may, or otherwise do as it shall please him.

And as touching my case, (quoth I), ye must understand, I did not move it without some just ground; for remembering that all your commissioners and all ours being together at Utrecht for the esclarcissement of the treaty, although the words of the treaty were plain enough, and could receive none other interpretation than was there plainly written, yet would ye needs understand the article for common enmity, in case of invasion, after your own minds. And whereas, by the words of the treaty, no mention is made of any number, and therefore with howsoever few in number the invasion be made, ought the invaders to be taken for common enemies? Your commissioners did nevertheless interpret the matter at their pleasure, and would needs prescribe a number of 8,000 men; under which number of invasion were made, the treaties in this case should not stand to any force. And like as ye put a doubt here, where none was to be found, so thought I, ye might do in other things were they never so plain; and that moved me to put this case, to see whether ye understood this point as ye ought to do, after the literal sense; and partly to know your minds therein, because perhaps the matter hath been already in ure. This, I say, was the occasion why I put further this question, and not for any mistrust of the emperor's friendship, whom I must confess we have always found our well-willer, and so we doubt not he will continue; and therefore I need not grope his mind herein, neither did I mean any such thing hereby.

As to your answer to the order of justice, I see not that the emperor hath so much cause to complain of lack of justice in his subjects' cases, as ye seem to set forth; for hitherto there hath not any man complained in our country, and required justice, unto whom the same hath been denied. And although some man abiding the order of our law, or having had some sentence that pleased him not, hath complained hither of delay or lack of justice, ye must not therefore, by and by, judge that he saith true, or that there is not uprightness or equity used in our country, for we have there, as ye have here, and elsewhere, ministers that are wise, and well learned in our law, and men of honesty and good conscience, who deal and proceed justly, as the order of the law leadeth them, without respect to favour or friendship to any man.

And as for the jeweller's case that ye moved, ye must understand, that as ye have laws here in your country for the direction of your common-wealth, so have we also in ours; whereby amongst the rest we do forbid, for good respect, the bringing in or transporting forth of certain things without the king's safe conduct or license. And although, as ye alleaged before, the treaty giveth liberty to the subjects of either prince to traffique into the other's country, it is not for all that meant hereby, that they shall not be bound to observe the law and order of the country whereunto they traffique: for this liberty is only granted for the security of their persons to go and come without impeachment, and maketh them not for all that lawless. And whereas further it is provided by our law, that in certain things to be granted by the king, the same grant must pass under the great seal; then if any of those things pass under any other seal, they be not of due force until they have also passed the great seal of England: wherefore if the jeweller, either by negligence or covetousness, of himself, or of those he put in trust, did not observe this order; but thereto contrary, for sparing a litle cost, did presume to bring in his jewels before his license came to the great seal; me thinketh neither he, nor any other, can have just cause to say that he was wronged, if according to our laws he were sentenced to lose the same: and yet, after he was thus condemned, more to gratify the emperor, than for that I took it to be so reasonable, I myself was a suitor to my lord protector's grace, for some recompence to be made to the jeweller's wife, whom we knew, and none other to be party: for she followed the suit, she presented the petitions, in her name were they made; and finally she, and none others, was by the emperor's ambassador commended unto us.

I have seen the sentence, (quoth he,) and do dislike nothing so much therein, as that the man is condemned, and named to have been present at the time of his condemnation, when indeed he was dead a good while before.

He was present, (quoth I,) in the person of his wife, who was his procurator, and represented himself; and I know, that those before whom this matter passed are men both learned and of good conscience, and such as would not have done herein anything against right and order of law.

The sentences that are given in our country by the justices and ministers, they are just and true, and therefore neither can we, nor will we revoke them for any man's pleasure, after they have once passed the higher court, from whence there is no further appellation, no more than you will here call back such final order as hath been in any case taken by your high court of Brabant. And the cause why we for our part misliked not this order of justice, was for the better establishment of the amity, and to avoid the continual arrests that are made on our poor men; to the end also that this sort of suiters might be the sooner dispatched, without troubling either my lord protector in England, or you here, when you are busied in other affairs of more importance.

And as concerning the comprehension of Bulloign, in good faith, because we thought that if the same should happen to be taken from the king's majesty by force, as I trust it shall not, the loss should be common, and touch the emperor almost as near as us! We thought good, for the better security thereof, to move this comprehension, which we take to be as necessary for the emperor as us. And though we are not so wise and well seen in your things as yourselves are, yet do we look towards you, and guess of your affairs afar off, and perhaps do somewhat understand the state of the same, whereof I could say more than I now intend. But ye say this is the emperor's resolution herein. We take it as an answer, and shall do accordingly. Marry, whereas you stick so much upon your honour, in breaking your treaties with the French, I remember monsieur Granvela, your father, at my being with him, did not let to say, that he had his sleeve full of quarrels against the French, whensoever the emperor list to break with them.

Yea, so have we indeed, (quoth he,) but the time is not yet come: we must temporise our things in this case as the rest of our affairs lead us.

Ye say well, (quoth I,) ye have reason to regard chiefly the well-guiding of your own things, and yet me thinketh some respect ought to be given to friends. But seeing this is your answer, I will reply no more thereto.

Yet one thing, monsieur D'Arras, (quoth I,) I moved to your father, which ye make no mention of, and I would gladly know your mind in, which is, the granting of safe-conducts to the common enemy: which the treaty, by plain and express words, forbideth either prince to do.

Indeed, monsieur Ambassador, (quoth he,) the words of the treaty are, as ye say, plain enough; and yet the matter were very strait, if it should be taken in such extremity; for hereafter, in time of war, ye might happen to have need of wood, canvas, or wine, and we of the like, and other necessities; and if in such cases the princes should not have prerogative to grant safe-conducts, it shall be a great inconvenience, and a thing not hereafter seen; howbeit the emperor for his part will not, I think, stick much hereupon, but observe the plain meaning of the treaty. Nevertheless, I cannot say anything expressly on his behalf herein, because monsieur Granvela spake nothing thereof. And yet did we move him of it, (quoth I,) and he bad us grant none, and the emperor for his part would not grant any. No more hath he done, (quoth he,) sithence his coming into this country, nor intendeth not hereafter. He needeth not, (quoth I,) for those that have been given out before are sufficient for a great while. Nay, that they are not, (quoth he,) for the longest was granted but for a year, and now are they expired; and whereas a while sithence, one presuming upon his safe-conduct came into this country to traffique, because the time thereof was expired, he was taken and imprisoned.

The said D'Arras, after this talk, touched further unto me two points, which the emperor, he said, desireth may be reformed. The first was, our merchants, contrary to our entercourse, do enhance the prices of their woolls, and will not sell at such prices as they are bound by the entercourse; wherewith the merchants here do find themselves aggrieved, and therefore the emperor desireth some order may be taken herein.

Whereunto I answered, that I understood not the matters, and yet I supposed our men did not this but upon some grounds and just occasion, by reason of other breach of order on their parts here. Howbeit I shewed him I would inform your grace thereof, and doubted not, but if anything were amiss on our parts, it shall be reformed; accordingly looking for the semblable on their behalf.

The other, he said, was, that our men have of late begun to build a bulwark, which standeth half on the king's majesty's ground, and half on the emperor's territory. And although monsieur de Rue have viewed the same, and perceiving the emperor to be wronged thereby, hath required our folks to proceed no further therein; yet cease they not to build still, which the emperor marvelleth much at, and thinks we would not take it well that he should attempt the like fortification upon the king's territory; and therefore requireth that some redress may be given in time therein.

I answered, that I knew not of this thing; howbeit, as I went homeward, I would inform myself of the case, and make report thereof to your grace, who I doubted not would take such order therein as should stand with reason.

And here monsieur D'Arras setting forth with many good words the emperor's amity towards the king, and his readiness to shew his majesty's pleasure in all things that he conveniently may; and that in case we proceed to any further treaty with France, he doubted not but we would have regard to them, according to our treaties; and that also, if we grew to any peace with the Scots, seeing that his majesty is entred in enmity chiefly for our sake, whereby his subjects have been sundry ways endangered, he trusteth he will have consideration to see that convenient recompence be made to them by the Scots, ere ever we go through with any conclusion; the rather, because the Scots have, and cease not still to offer, besides a large recompence, very great conditions, if his majesty would fall to any peace with them, which chiefly for our sakes he hath, and will refuse to do;—we answered hereunto generally, that the king's majesty, in such case, we doubted not, would have due respect to the emperor's amity, and proceed herein as appertaineth.

This was the substance of their cold answer, as your grace may see, of small effect, although interlaced with plenty of good words, which we also thought best to use towards them, and requite them with the like. And thus, after I had required of D'Arras a time to take my leave of the emperor, and his promise to procure the same as shortly as he might, we departed. And thus we beseech God to send your grace as well to do as we do wish.

The Council's Letter to the King against the Protector.—An Original.

MOST high and mighty prince, our most gracious sovereign lord. It may please your majesty to be advertised, that having heard such message as it pleased your majesty to send unto us by your highness' secretary, Sir William Petre, like as it was much to our grief and discomfort to understand, that upon untrue informations, your majesty seemed to have some doubt of our fidelities; so do we, upon our knees, most humbly beseech your majesty to think, that as we have always served the king's majesty, your most noble father, and your highness likewise, faithfully and truly, so do we mind always to continue your majesty's true servants, to the effusion of our blood and loss of our lives. And for the surety of your most royal person's safeguard, and preservation of your realms and dominions, have at this time consulted together, and for none other cause, we take God to witness. We have heretofore, by all good and gentle means, attempted to have had your highness' uncle, the Duke of Somerset, to have governed your majesty's affairs, by the advice of us, and the rest of your councillors; but finding him so much given to his own will, that he always refused to hear reason; and therewith doing sundry things as were, and be most dangerous, both to your most royal person, and to your whole realm; we thought yet again to have gently and quietly spoke with him in these things, had he not gathered force about him, in such sort, as we might easily perceive him earnestly bent to the maintenance of his old wilful and troublous doings. For redress whereof, and none other cause, we do presently remain here ready to live and die your true servants. And the assembly of almost all your council being now here, we have, for the better service of your majesty, caused your secretary to remain here with us, most humbly beseeching your grace to think in your heart, that the only preservation of your person, and your estate, for the discharge of our duties, enforceth us to devise how to deliver your grace from the peril your highness standeth in, and no other respect; for whatsoever is, or shall be said to your highness, no earthly thing could have moved us to have seemed to stand as a party, but your only preservation, which your majesty shall hereafter perceive, and (we doubt not) repute us for your most faithful servants and councillors, as our doings shall never deserve the contrary; as God knoweth, to whom we shall diligently pray for your majesty's preservation, and with our bodies defend your person and estate as long as life shall endure.

Articles offered by me the Lord Protector, to the King's Majesty, in the presence of his Highness' Council, and others his Majesty's Lords and Gentlemen, at Windsor, to be declared on my behalf, to the Lords, and the rest of his Highness' Council remaining at London.

[Cotton Libr. Caligula, B. 7.]

FIRST, That I do not, nor did not mean to apprehend any of them, or otherwise to disturb or molest them; but hearing tell of their such meetings and assemblies, and gathering of horsemen, and other powers, out of several countries, not being privy of the causes thereof, to avoid further inconveniences and danger which might ensue to your majesty's person, which by many rumours, certain intelligences, and sundry messages, was declared imminent unto your highness, and to me, the lord protector, was forced to seek this defence, as I at the first beginning declared unto your highness.

Secondly, that this force and power which here is assembled about your majesty at this present, is to do none of them which be there at London, or elsewhere, either in person or goods, any damage or hurt, but to defend only, if any violence should be attempted against your highness.

As for any contention and strife betwixt me, the lord protector, and the council there, I do not refuse to come to any reasonable end and conclusion, that should be for the preservation of your majesty, and tranquillity of the realm, if they will send any two of them with commission on their behalfs, to conclude and make a good end betwixt us.

And I most humbly beseech your majesty to appoint any two of such as be here about your majesty, to join with the same; and whatsoever those four or three of them shall determine, I do and shall wholly and fully submit myself thereunto. And that for more confirmation, if it shall be so thought good to the said persons, their agreement and conclusion to be established and ratified by parliament, or any other order that shall be devised. And I beseech your majesty, that at my humble suit, and by the advice of me, and other of your council here, for the better proceedings herein, and to take away all doubts and fears that might arise, to grant to them four, or any such two of them which they shall send for the purpose above-said, free passage for themselves, and with each of them twenty of their servants, to safely come, tarry here, and return at their pleasure. And I most humbly beseech your majesty, that this bill, signed with your majesty's hands, and ours, may be a sufficient warrant therefore. Given and exhibited at the castle of Windsor, Octob. 8, 1549.

Letters sent from the Lords at London, to the King's

[Ex Libro Concilii.]

MOST high and mighty prince, our most gracious sovereign lord, we have received, by Mr. Hobbey, your majesty's most gracious letters of the 8th of this instant, and heard such further matter as it pleased your majesty to will to be declared by him. And sorry we be, that your majesty should have these occasions to be troubled, especially in this kind of matter; the beginning and only occasion whereof, as we be well able to prove to your majesty, hath proceeded of the duke of Somerset. It is much discomfort to us all, to understand that your royal person should be touched with any care of mind; and most of all it grieveth us, that it should be perswaded your majesty, that we have not that care that becometh us of the pacifying of these uproars, and conservation of your majesty's commonwealth and state from danger; wherein whatsoever is informed your highness, we humbly beseech your majesty to think, we be as careful as any men living may be; and do not, nor (we trust) shall not forget the benefits received of your majesty's most noble father, nor any of our bounden duties of allegiance; the consideration, and the special care whereof, forced us to consult seriously, and to join in this sort: which thing, if we had not presently followed, not only your most royal person (whom Almighty God long preserve), but this your whole estate being already much touched, and in great towardness of ruin, was most like to come, in short time, to most imminent danger and peril; the causes whereof, as we do all well know, and can prove to have proceeded from the said duke, so if we should not earnestly provide for the same, we should not be able to answer to your majesty hereafter for not doing our duties therein; therefore do we nothing doubt, but your majesty, of your great clemency and good nature, will not think that all and every of us, being the whole state of your privy council, one or two excepted, should be led in these things by private affections, or would presume to write to your majesty, that whereof we were not most assured; and much more, we trust that your highness, of your goodness, will, without any jealousy or suspicion, think that most expedient, both for your own most royal person, and all your subjects, that by the body of your council may be thought expedient; to whom, and to no one man, your highness' most grave father appointed, by his last will and testament, the care of your majesty, and all your most weighty affairs. We cannot therefore but think ourselves much wronged, that your said most royal person is in this sort by the duke only detained and shut up from us, to all our great heaviness, and the great fear of all other your majesty's true subjects, and wonder of all the world: sooner may one man intend ill, than a multitude of us, who we take God to witness to be a thousand times more careful of your highness' surety, than for all our own lives. We trust also, that of your majesty's good nature, you will not think that wilfulness, which your whole council doth, or shall agree upon, for your majesty's surety and benefit; where the more agreeable we be, the better opinion we trust your majesty will conceive of us and our doings. It comforteth us much to see the great appearance of your majesty's natural clemency, even in these your young years; and the assured hope which we have thereof encourageth us to be persuaded, that you both do, and will conceive good opinion of us and all our doings; and that your majesty is, and so will continue, our gracious good lord, with whom (as we trust) we never deserve willingly to be called in the standing of any judgment with your

the end of this matter, touching the duke of Somerset, if he have that respect to your majesty's surety that he pretendeth; if he have that consideration of his duty to God that his promise and oath requireth; if he have that remembrance of the performance of your majesty's father's will, that to the effect of a good executor appertaineth; if he have the reverence to your law that a good subject ought to have, let him first quietly suffer us, your majesty's most humble servants and true counsellors, to be restored to your majesty's presence; let him, as becometh a true subject, submit himself to your majesty's council, and the order of your highness' laws; let the forces assembled be sent away, and then may we do our duties in giving our attendance upon your majesty; and after consult there with your majesty more freely, for such order as may be thought most meet for your grace's surety: by these means your majesty's subjects may be at quiet, and all occasions of stir taken away. And if the said duke refuse to agree hereunto, we must think him to remain in his naughty and detestable determination. The protectorship and governance of your most royal person was not granted him by your father's will, but only by agreement, first amongst us the executors, and and after of others. Those titles and special trust was committed to him during your majesty's pleasure, and upon condition he should do all things by advice of your council. Which condition, because he hath so many times broken, and notwithstanding the often speaking to, without all hope of amendment, we think him most unworthy those honours or trust. Other particular things, too many and too long to be written to your majesty at this time, may at our next access to your royal presence be more particularly opened, consulted upon, and moderated, for the conservation of your majesty's honour, surety, and good quiet of your realms and dominions, as may be thought most expedient.

Letters from the Lords at London to the Archbishop of Canterbury and Sir William Paget, &c.

[Ex Libro Concilii.]

My lords, after our most hearty commendations, we have received your letters by Mr. Hobbey, and heard such credence as he declared on the king's majesty's and your behalfs unto us. The answers whereunto, because they may at more length appear to you both, by our letters to the king's majesty, and by report also of the said Mr. Hobbey, we forbear to repeat here again; most heartily praying, and requiring your lordships and every of you, and nevertheless charging and commanding you in the king's majesty's name, to have a continual earnest watch, respect and care, to the surety of the king's majesty, our natural and most gracious sovereign lord's person; and that he be not removed from his majesty's castle of Windsor, as you tender your duties to Almighty God and his majesty, and as you will answer for the contrary at your uttermost perils. We are moved to call earnestly upon you herein, not without great cause, and amongst many others, we cannot but remember unto you, that it appeareth very strange unto us, and a great wonder unto all true subjects, that you will either assist or suffer his majesty's most royal person to remain in the guard of the duke of Somerset's men, sequestered from his own old sworn servants. It seemeth strange, that in his majesty's own house, strangers should be armed with his majesty's own armour, and be nearest about his highness' person; and those to whom the ordinary charge is committed, sequestered away, so as they may not attend according to their sworn duties. If any ill come hereof, you can consider to whom it must be imputed once; the example is very strange and perilous. And now, my lords, if you tender the preservation of his majesty and the state, join with us to that end: we have written to the king's majesty, by which way things may soon be quietly and moderately compounded. In the doing whereof, we mind to do none otherwise than we would be done to, and that with as much moderation and favour as honourably we may. We trust none of you have just cause to note any one of us, and much less all, of such cruelty as you so many times make mention of. One thing in your letters we marvel much at, which is, that you write that you know more than we know. If the matters come to your knowledge, and hidden from us, be of such weight as you seem to pretend; or if they touch, or may touch, his majesty or the state, we think you do not as you ought, in that you have not disclosed the same unto us, being the whole state of the council. And thus praying God to send you the grace to do that may tend to the surety of the king's majesty's person, and tranquillity of the realm, we bid you heartily farewell, &c.

An Answer to the former Letter.—An Original.

[Ex Libro Concilii.]

It may like your good lordships, with our most hearty commendations, to understand, that this morning sir Philip Hobbey hath, according to the charge given him by your lordships, presented your letters to the king's majesty, in the presence of us, and all the rest of his majesty's good servants here, which was there read openly, and also the others to them of the chamber, and of the household, much to their comforts, and ours also; and according to the tenours of the same, we will not fail to endeavour ourselves accordingly.

Now touching the marvel of your lordships, both of that we would suffer the duke of Somerset's men to guard the king's majesty's person; and also of our often repeating this word "cruelty;" although we doubt not but that your lordships have been thoroughly informed of our estates here, and upon what occasion the one hath been suffered, and the other proceeded; yet at our convening together (which may be when and where pleaseth you), we will, and are able to make your lordships such an account, as wherewith we doubt not you will be satisfied, if you think good to require it of us. And for because this bearer, master Hobbey, can particularly inform your lordships of the whole discourse of all things here, we remit the report of all other things to him, saving that we desire to be advertised, with as much speed as you shall think good, whether the king's majesty shall come forthwith thither, or remain still here; and that some of your lordships would take pains to come hither forthwith. For the which purpose, I the comptroller will cause three of the best chambers in the great court to be hanged and made ready. Thus thanking God that all things be so well acquited, we commit your lordships to his tuition.

Your lordships' assured loving friends,

T. Cant. William Paget. T. Smith.

Articles objected to the Duke of Somerset.

1. THAT he took upon him the office of protector, upon express condition that he should do nothing in the king's affairs but by assent of the late king's executors, or the greatest part of them.

2. That contrary to this condition, he did hinder justice, and subvert laws, of his own authority, as well by letters as by other command.

3. That he caused divers persons, arrested and imprisoned for treason, murder, manslaughter, and felony, to be discharged, against the laws and statutes of the realm.

4. That he appointed lieutenants for armies, and other officers, for the weighty affairs of the king, under his own writing and seal.

5. That he communed with ambassadors of other realms alone, of the weighty matters of the realm.

6. That he would taunt and reprove divers of the king's most honourable counsellors, for declaring their advice in the king's weighty affairs against his opinion; sometimes telling them that they were not worthy to sit in council, and sometimes that he need not to open weighty matters to them; and that if they were not agreeable to his opinion, he would discharge them.

7. That against law he held a court of request in his house, and did enforce divers to answer there for their freehold and goods, and did determine of the same.

That being no officer, without the advice of the council, or most part of them, he did dispose offices of the king's gift for money, grant leases, and wards, and presentations of benefices pertaining to the king; gave bishopricks, and made sales of the king's lands.

9. That he commanded alchymie and multiplication to be practised, thereby to abase the king's coin.

10. That divers times he openly said, that the nobility and gentry were the only cause of dearth; whereupon the people rose to reform matters of themselves.

11. That against the mind of the whole council, he caused proclamation to be made concerning inclosures; whereupon the people made divers insurrections, and destroyed many of the king's subjects.

12. That he sent forth a commission, with articles annexed, concerning inclosures, commons, highways, cottages, and such-like matters, giving the commissioners authority to hear and determine those causes, whereby the laws and statutes of the realm were subverted, and much rebellion raised.

13. That he suffered rebels to assemble and lie armed in camp, against the nobility and gentry of the realm, without speedy repressing of them.

14. That he did comfort and encourage divers rebels, by giving them money, and by promising them fees, rewards, and services.

15. That he caused a proclamation to be made against law, and in favour of the rebels, that none of them should be vexed or sued by any for their offences in their rebellion.

16. That in time of rebellion he said that he liked well the actions of the rebels, and that the avarice of gentlemen gave occasion for the people to rise, and that it was better for them to die than to perish for want.

17. That he said the lords of the parliament were loth to reform inclosures and other things, therefore the people had a good cause to reform them themselves.

18. That after declaration of the defaults of Bulloign, and the pieces there, by such as did survey them, he would never amend the same.

19. That he would not suffer the king's pieces of Newhaven and Blackness to be furnished with men and provision; albeit, he was advertised of the defaults, and advised thereto by the king's council, whereby the French king was emboldened to attempt upon them.

20. That he would neither give authority, nor suffer noblemen and gentlemen to suppress rebels in time convenient, but wrote to them to speak the rebels fair, and use them gently.

21. That upon the 5th of October, the present year, at Hampton-Court, for defence of his own private causes, he procured seditious bills to be written in counterfeit hands, and secretly to be dispersed into divers parts of the realm, beginning thus—"Good people,"—intending thereby to raise the king's subjects to rebellion and open war.

22. That the king's privy council did consult at London to come to him, and move him to reform his government; but he hearing of their assembly, declared, by his letters in divers places, that they were high traitors to the king.

23. That he declared untruly, as well to the king as to other young lords attending his person, that the lords at London intended to destroy the king; and desired the king never to forget, but to revenge it; and desired the young lords to put the king in remembrance thereof, with intent to make sedition and discord between the king and his nobles.

24. That at divers times and places he said the lords of the council at London intended to kill me; but if I die, the king shall die; and if they famish me, they shall famish him.

25. That of his own head he removed the king so suddenly from Hampton-Court to Windsor, without any provision there made, that he was thereby not only in great fear, but cast thereby into a dangerous disease.

26. That by his letters he caused the king's people to assemble in great numbers in armour, after the manner of war, to his aid and defence.

27. That he caused his servants and friends at Hampton-Court and Windsor to be apparalled in the king's armour, when the king's servants and guards went unarmed.

28. That he intended to fly to Guernsey or Wales, and laid post-horses and men, and a boat, to that purpose.

A Letter written by the Council to the Bishops, to assure them, that the King intended to go forward in the Reformation.

[Regis. Cran. Fol. 56.]

By the King.

RIGHT reverend father in God, right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas the book entituled, "The Book of Common Prayers, and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, after the use of the Church of England," was agreed upon, and set forth by act of parliament; and by the same act commanded to be used of all persons within this our realm. Yet nevertheless we are informed, that divers unquiet and evil-disposed persons, sithence the apprehension of the duke of Somerset, have noised and bruited abroad, that they should have again their old Latin service, their conjured bread and water, with such-like vain and superfluous ceremonies, as though the setting forth of the said book had been the only act of the said duke. We therefore, by the advice of the body and state of our privy council, not only considering the said book to be our act, and the act of the whole state of our realm assembled together

In parliament, but also the same to be grounded upon the Holy Scripture, agreeable to the order of the primitive church, and much to the re-edifying of our subjects, to put away all such vain expectation, of having the publick service, the administration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies again in the Latin tongue; which were but a preferment of ignorance to knowledge, and darkness to light, and a preparation to bring in papistry and superstition again; have thought good, by the advice aforesaid, to require, and nevertheless straitly do command and charge you, that immediately upon the receipt hereof, you do command the dean and prebendaries of your cathedral church—the parson, vicar, or curat, and church-wardens of every parish, within your diocess, to bring and deliver unto you, or your deputy, any of them for their church or parish, at such convenient place as you shall appoint, all antiphonals, missals, graylles, processionals, manuels, legends, pies, portasies, journals, and ordinals, after the use of Sarum, Lincoln, York, or any other private use: and all other books of service, the keeping whereof should be a lett to the using of the said Book of Common Prayers; and that you take the same books into your hands, or into the hands of your deputy, and them so to deface and abolish, that they never after may serve, either to any such use as they were provided for, or be at any time a lett to that godly and uniform order, which by a common consent is now set forth. And if you shall find any person stubborn or disobedient in not bringing in the said books, according to the tenour of these our letters, that then ye commit the said person to ward, unto such time as you have certified us of his misbehaviour. And we will and command you, that you also search, or cause search to be made, from time to time, whether any book be withdrawn or hid, contrary to the tenour of these our letters, and the same book to receive into your hands, and to use all in these our letters we have appointed. And further, whereas it is come unto our knowledge, that divers froward and obstinate persons do refuse to pay towards the finding of bread and wine for the holy communion, according to the order prescribed in the said book, by reason whereof the holy communion is many times omitted upon the Sunday: these are to will and command you to convent such obstinate persons before you, and then to admonish and command to keep the order prescribed in the said book; and if any shall refuse so to do, to punish them by suspension, excommunication, or other censures of the church. Fail you not thus to do, as you will avoid our displeasure.

Cardinal Wolsey's Letters to Rome, for procuring the Popedom to himself, upon Pope Adrian's death.

[Ex MS. Col. Cor. C. Cant.]

My lord of Bath, Mr. Secretary, and Mr. Hannibal, I commend me unto you in my right hearty manner; letting you wit, that by letters lately sent unto me from you my lord of Bath, and Mr. Hannibal, dated at Rome the 14th day of September; which letters I incontinently shewed unto the king's grace his highness; and I have been advertised, to our great discomfort, that the said 14th day, it pleased Almighty God to call the pope's holiness unto his infinite mercy, whose soul Jesu pardon: news certainly unto the king's grace and to me right heavy, and for the universal weal or quiet of Christendom, (whereunto his holiness, like a devout and virtuous father of holy church, was very studious), much displeasent and contrarious; nevertheless conforming ourselves to the pleasure of Almighty God, to whose calling we all must be obedient, the mind and intention of the king's highness, and of me both, is to put some helps and furtherances, as much as conveniently may be, that such a successor unto him may now, by the holy college of cardinals, be named and elected, as may, with God's grace, perform, atchieve, and fulfil the good and vertuous purposes and intents, concerning the pacification of Christendom; whereunto our said late holy father, as much as the brevity of the time did suffer, was, as it should seem, minded and inclined; which thing, how necessary it is to the state of Christ's religion, now daily more and more declining, it is facile and easy to be considered; and surely amongst other Christian princes, there is none which as ye heretofore have perfectly understood, that to this purpose more dedicated themselves to give furtherance, advice, and counsel, than the emperor and the king's grace, who as well before the time of the last vacation, as sithence, by mouth and by letters, with report of ambassadors and otherwise, had many sundry conferences, communications, and devices, in that behalf. In which it hath pleased them, far above my merits or deserts, of their goodness, to think, judge, and esteem me to be meet and able for to aspire unto that dignity; persuading, exhorting, and desiring me, that whensoever opportunity should be given, I should hearken to their advice, counsel, and opinion in that behalf; and offering unto me, to interpose their authorities, helps, and furtherances therein to the uttermost. In comprobation whereof, albeit the emperor, now being far distant from these parts, could not, nor might in so brief time, give unto the king's grace new or fresh confirmation of his purpose, desire, and intent herein; yet nevertheless my lady Margaret, knowing the inclination of his mind in this same, hath by a long discourse made unto me semblable exhortation; offering, as well on the emperor's behalf, as on her own, that as much shall by them be done, to the furtherance thereof, as may be possible. Besides this, both by your letters, and also by particular most loving letters of the Cardinals de Medicis, Sanctorum Quatuor, and Campegius, with credence shewed unto me on their behalf, by their folks here resident, I perceive their good and fast minds, which they, and divers other their friends, owe unto me in that matter. And finally, the king's highness doth not cease, by all the gracious and comfortable means possible, to insist, that I, for manifold, notable, urgent, and great respects, in any wise shall consent that his grace and the emperor do set forth the thing with their best manner. The circumstances of whose most entire and most firm mind thereunto, with their bounteous, godly, and beneficial offers for the weal of Christendom, which his grace maketh to me herein, is too long to release. For which causes, albeit I know myself far unmeet and unable to so high a dignity, minding rather to live and die with his grace in this his realm, doing honour, service, good or pleasure to the same, than now (mine old days approaching) to enter into new things; yet nevertheless, for the great zeal and perfect mind which I have to the exaltation of the Christian faith, the honour, weal, and surety of the king's grace, and the emperor, and to do my duty both to Almighty God and to the world, I referring everything to God's disposition and pleasure, shall not pretermitt to declare unto you such things as the king's highness hath specially willed me to signify unto you, on his grace's behalf who most effectually willett and desireth you to set forth the same, omitting nothing that may be to the furtherance thereof, as his special trust is in you.

First, ye shall understand, that the mind and entire desire of his highness, above all earthly things, is, that I should attain to the said dignity, having his perfect and firm hope, that of the same shall ensue, and that in brief time, a general and universal repose, tranquillity, and quietness in Christendom; and as great renown, honour, profit, and reputation to this realm as ever was; besides the singular comfort and rejoice that the king's grace, with all his friends and subjects, should take thereof; who might be well assured thereby, to compone and order their great causes and affairs, to their high benefit, commodity, and most advantage. For this, and other great and urgent causes, the pleasure of his highness is, that like-as ye my lord of Bath, and Mr. Hannibal, have right prudently and discreetly begun, so ye all, or as many of you as be present in the court of Rome, and continue your practices, overtures, motions, and labours, to bring and conduce this the king's inward desire to perfect end and effect.

And because it is not to be doubted, but that before the receipt of these my letters, ye, having former instructions, shall have far entred your devices in this matter, wherein the king's grace trusteth ye do lose no time or opportunity that possibly may be had; I shall therefore briefly and compendiously touch such this thing, as the king's highness would ye should substantially note in this behalf.

One is, that albeit ye both before, and also now, know the king's mind and desire herein, as is aforesaid, taking that for your foundation; yet nevertheless, forasmuch as it appeareth by your said letters, and otherwise, that the cardinal de Medicis, whose preferment (if this may not be had) both the king's grace and I tendereth above all other, mindeth to experiment what may be done for himself, great policy and dexterity is in your labours and communications to be used, so that ye may first, by great ensearch and enquiry, perfectly understand, as nigh as may be, the disposition, mind, affection, and inclination, as well of the said cardinal de Medicis, as of all the residue, if it be possible; which thing, well known, well pondered and considered, ye shall thereby have a great light to the residue of your business, wherein always ye must so order yourselves, that the matter appearing unto you much doubtful and uncertain, your particular practices (the desired intent peradventure failing) shall not be cause of displeasure or unkindness to be noted by any that may be elected; and for your introduction herein, the king's grace sendeth unto you at this time two commissions under his great seal, the one couched under general words, without making mention of any particular person; and in the other, his highness hath made mention of me by special name: besides that, ye shall receive herewith two letters from his grace to the college of cardinals, with the copies of the same; the one in special recommendation of me, and the other in favour of the cardinal de Medicis; beside such other particular letters in my recommendation to certain cardinals, and other, as by the copies of them herewith enclosed ye shall now perceive. After the receipt thereof, if the cardinals before that time shall not be entred into the conclave, ye taking your commodity, as by your wisdom shall be thought most expedient, shall deliver unto the cardinal de Medicis the king's letters, and mine to him addressed, shewing unto him, with as good words and manner as ye can, that for his great vertue, wisdom, experience, and other commendable merits, with the entire love and favour which the king's grace and I bear unto him, thinking and reputing him most meet and able to aspire unto the papal dignity before all other. Ye have commandment, commission, and instruction, specially and most tenderly, to recommend him unto the whole college of cardinals, having also the king's and my letters to them in his favour; upon which declaration ye shall perceive his answer to be made unto you in that behalf; whereupon, and by knowledge of the disposition of the residue, ye may perceive how to govern yourselves in the delivery of the rest of your said letters; for in case it may evidently appear unto you, that any of the cardinals, to whom the king's letters be directed, have firmly established their minds upon the said cardinal de Medicis, the more circumspection is to be used with any such in the delivery to him of the king's letters, and overture of the secretness of your minds touching me; considering, that if the king's intent might in no wise take effect for me, his grace would, before all other, advance and further the said cardinal de Medicis. Nevertheless, if either by his answer to be made unto you, or by other good knowledge, ye shall perceive that he hath so many enemies herein, that of likelihood he cannot attain the same, ye may be the more bold to feel his mind how he is inclined towards me; saying, as indeed the king's grace hath written unto him, that in case he should fail thereof, the king's highness would insist, as much as to his grace were possible, for me; which ye may say were in manner one thing, considering that both the cardinal de Medicis and I bear one mind, zeal, and study, to the weal and quiet of Christendom, the increase and surety of Italy, the benefit and advancement of the emperor's and the king's majesty's causes; and I being pope, he in a manner (whom I above all men love, trust, and esteem) were pope, being sure to have everything according to his mind and desire, and as much honour to be put unto him, his friends and family, as might be devised in such wise: that by these and other good words and demonstrations, ye may make him sure, as I think he be, that failing for himself, he with all his friends do their best for me; and seeing no likelihood for him, ye may then right-well proceed to your particular labour and practices for me, delivering the king's letters, both to the college of cardinals, and to the other, apart, as ye shall see the case then to require; and soliciting them, by secret labours, alleading and declaring unto them my poor qualities, and how I having so great experience of the causes of Christendom, with the entire favour which the emperor and the king's grace bear unto me; the knowledge also and deep acquaintance of other princes, and of their great affairs; the studious mind that I have ever been in, both to the surety and weal of Italy, and also to the quiet and tranquility of Christendom; not lacking, thanked be God, either substance or liberality to look largely upon my friends; besides the sundry great promotions, which by election of me should be vacant, to be disposed unto such of the said cardinals, as by their true and fast friendship had deserved the same; the loving familiarity also which they should find in me; and that of my nature I am not in great disposed to rigour or austereness, but can be contented, thanked be God, frankly, pleasantly, and courteously, to participate, dispose, and bestow, such things as I have, or shall come to my disposition, not having any such faction, family, or kinsman, to whom I might shew any partiality in bestowing the promotions and goods of the church; and, which is highest to be regarded, that is likely and in manner sure, that by my means, not only Italy shall be put in perfect surety for ever, but also a final rest, peace, and quiet, now most necessary, established betwixt all Christian princes; whereupon the greatest and most notable expedition might be made against the infidels that hath been heard of many years. For the king's highness in that case would be contented, and hath fully promised, God willing, to come in person, when God shall send time, unto Rome; whither also I should not doubt to bring many more of the Christian princes, being determined, if God should send me such grace, to expone mine own person in God's quarrel; by mean of which my presence many things should be stated, that for superiority and otherwise, in times past, hath been occasion of disagreement amongst princes: albeit peradventure the greatest respect shall not now be had hereunto, nor this be the best elective to win the cardinals' favour; wherein you must therefore use yourself by your wisdoms, as you shall see the time, season, and care to require; assuring them, for the removing of the doubt in changing of the see, or not speedy repair thither; that after the election once passed and notified to me, I would not fail, by God's grace, within three months to be in Rome; there, and in the parts thereabout, to remain during my life, whereof ye may make faithful assurance. By these, and other good means and promises on the king's behalf of large rewards, which his highness referreth to your discretion, and is contented to perform that which ye do therein, it is not to be doubted but that you shall obtain the favours of many of them; so as if respect may be had to the honour of the see apostolick, and the surety of Italy, the tranquillity of Christendom, the defence of the same against the infidels, the exaltation of the faith, the persecution of Christ's enemies, the increase and weal of the college of cardinals, with their advancement and promotion; gentle, frank, and liberal entertainment of them, and generally to the benefit of all holy church. The king's grace supposeth his mind and desire herein, with your good means, diligence, and solicitations, is not unlike to take good effect; wherein, for the more authority, and better conducting of your purpose, the pleasure of his grace is, that you join with the emperor's ambassadors, as far as you may see and perceive them to favour this the king's intent, like-as his grace thinketh, that according to the often conferences, communications, promises, and exhortations made by the emperor to me in this behalf, and according to my said lady Margaret's desire or offer, they have commandment to do. In the politick handling of all which matters, the king's highness putteth in you his special trust and confidence, so to order yourself in the premises, as you shall perceive to accord with the inward desire of his grace, and the state and disposition of the thing there; for which purpose his grace hath furnished you at this time, jointly or severally, with two sundry commissions, the one general for me, and in my favour, by the which you have ample authority to bind and promise, on the king's behalf, as well gift of promotions, as also as large sums of money to as many, and such as you shall think convenient; and as sure ye may be, whatsoever ye shall promise, bind his grace, and do in that behalf, his highness will inviolably observe, keep and perform, the other special, as afore letters to the college of two effects, the one for the cardinal de Medicis, and the other for me, with other particular letters in my favour; all which his pleasure is, that you shall use in manner and form aforesaid; that is to say, if you shall perceive the affair of the cardinal de Medicis to be in such perfect train that he is like to have the same dignity, ye then proceed to that which may be his furtherance, using nevertheless your particular labour for me, if you think it may do good, after such sort as ye shall not conceive any ingratitude or unkindness therein. And if you may see that the said cardinal de Medicis be not in such great likelihood thereof; then considering, that as the king's grace, and I think verily he will do his best for me, ye shall effectually set forth your practices for attaining and winning as many friends for me as possible may be, delivering your letters for the intent, as you shall see cause. Wherein you being now furnished for both purposes, and also having one of the commissions general and indifferent, without any person therein specially recommended, things be to be done or omitted, as you shall know to stand with the state or commodity of the affairs there, which the ground of the king's mind to you now declared shall be your best and perfect instruction; and as you shall do or know herein, so the king's grace desireth you often and speedily to advertise me, by your letters, having no doubt but that his highness will see your travels, diligence, and pains in this behalf, so to be considered, as you shall have cause to think the same well employed and bestowed.

And my lord of Bath, as you do know well, because Mr. Pace, at the time of the last vacation, was sent purposely from hence with commission and instruction for that matter; the king, and I, supposing that upon knowledge of this news, he being at Milan, would incontinently repair unto Rome, hath therefore made the aforesaid commissions, and also this letter to be directed unto you, jointly and severally willing you, in such substantial and discreet wise to proceed in that matter, not forbearing anything that may be to the furtherance thereof, as his grace, and my special trust, is in you; and thus most heartily fare you well. At my Mannor of Hampton Court, the 4th day of October.

The rest is the Cardinal's own hand.

My lord of Bath, the king hath willed me to write unto you, that his grace hath a marvellous opinion of you; and you knowing his mind as you do, his highness doubteth not but this matter shall be by your policy set forth in such wise, as that the same may come to the desired effect, not sparing any reasonable offers, which is a thing that amongst so many needy persons is more regarded than per-case the qualities of the person; ye be wise, and ye wot what I mean; trust yourself best, and be not seduced by fair words, and specially of those which (say what they will) desire more their own preferment than mine. Howbeit great dexterity is to be used; and the king thinketh that all the imperials shall be clearly with you, if faith be in the emperor. The young men, which for the most part being needy, will give good ears to fair offers, which shall be undoubtedly performed; the king willeth you neither to spare his authority or his good money, or substance. You may be assured, whatsoever you promise shall be performed; and our Lord send you good speed.

Your loving friend,
T. CARDINALIS EBORAC.

NUMBER XLIX.

A Memorial given by the King's Majesty, with the advice of his Highness' Council, to the Lord Russell, Lord Privy Seal; the Lord Paget of Beauchamp; Sir William Petre, Kt. and one of his Highness' two Principal Secretaries, and Sir John Mason Kt. his Majesty's Secretary for the French Tongue; being sent at this present in Commission, to treat and conclude upon a Peace, with certain Commissioners sent from the French King at this time for the same purpose.—An Original.

EDWARD R.—First, as touching the place of their meeting, the same to be at Calais or Bulloign, if it may be so brought to pass; otherwise to be at such convenient place, either within our dominion or the French: or some time in theone, and some time the other, as may be best agreed upon. In the appointing whereof, we would no ceremony to be so much sticked upon, as the same should be any occasion of hindrance to the good success looked for at this meeting.

Secondly, if the French commissioners shall require Bulloign, with the members, and all such grounds and lands as was of late conquered by our late father, of most noble memory, to be restored to the French king, we be pleased our said commissioners shall on our name agree and assent thereunto; so as the said French commissioners do, and will likewise covenant and agree, in the name of the said French king, to any of our requests hereafter ensuing.

First, our said commissioners shall demand, in recompence for Bulloign, and the members and grounds as aforesaid, that the treaties last made between our said father of famous memory, and the realm of Scotland, may in all things be performed; and the person of the young Scotch queen delivered to us, to the intent the marriage between us and her may be performed. They shall also demand, that the fortifications at Newhaven and Blackness may be utterly ruined, and no fortifications made from henceforth at any of those places. They shall also require the continuance of payment of our perpetual pension, and all the debts due unto us, by force of any former treaties, before the commencement of these last wars. And this for the first degree, which if it may not be obtained, then for

The second degree, we be pleased to accept for a recompence, if they will covenant for performance of the said treaties with Scotland, to deliver the Scotch queen, and continue from henceforth the payment of the perpetual pension.

But if that shall also be refused, then for the third degree, our said commissioners shall require the continuance of payment of our pension, the arrearages due by any former treaties between our said father and the late French king; and that the forts of Newhaven, Hambletue, and Blackness, may be utterly ruined, and no new fortifications commenced at any of the said places hereafter.

And if this may not be obtained, then for the fourth and last degree our pleasure is, that our said commissioners shall require the continuance of payment of our said pension, and all such debts as were due unto our said late father before the commencement of his last war.

In the debating and discoursing whereof, we will that our said commissioners shall employ themselves to their uttermost, to make as good and honourable a bargain for us, and to attain all or as much of the premises as they may; remembering unto the French commissioners, our great charges sustained in these last wars commenced by them contrary to the former treaties.

Touching the place, day, time, and other circumstances to be used, as well in the delivery of Bulloign, the Base Town, the Old Man, the Young Man, with the ground, territories, and members, to the said pieces, or any of them belonging; as also of payment of such sums of money as shall be agreed upon for the same; our said commissioners shall, by their good discretions, devise with the said French commissioners, all such ways as they can or may think most for our honour and surety: and such overtures or discourses as shall be made by the said French commissioners, touching the premises, our said commissioners shall advertise unto us or to our council.

And if any motion shall be made to have Scotland comprehended in this peace, our said commissioners shall say, that forasmuch as the Scots be common enemies to us and the emperor, we may not assent to the comprehension of them, without the emperor's consent; or at the least, without such respect to our treaties with the emperor and his subjects as the amity between us requireth. And therefore if the Scots will covenant to stand to our arbitrement and judgment for all such matters as be in difference between the said emperor and them, we will be pleased that the Scots shall be comprehended; and one such article, or of like effect, made for comprehension of them, as was made at the conclusion of the last peace. And if the delivery, or razing of any pieces, now by us possessed in Scotland, shall be required, we be pleased that our said commissioners travelling first by all ways and means they may, to induce the other commissioners to assent that all the said pieces, and the lands by us now possessed, may remain to us and our heirs and successors for ever, shall nevertheless, if that may not be received, assent in the end that Borthwickcraig, Lauder, and Dunglass, shall be restored upon a convenient recompence in money, so as the forts of Roxburgh and Haymouth, with their grounds adjoining, may be covenanted to remain to us and our successors for ever.

If the French commissioners shall make any motion of treaty for marriage between us and the lady Elizabeth, eldest daughter to the French king; our said commissioners excusing the present talk thereof, in respect of our young years, and for such other causes as they may think good, shall do all that they may to cut off that talk: but if they shall be much pressed therein in respect of such overtures as have been made already, our pleasure is that our said commissioners shall, by general words, entertain the talk of that matter; and thereof, and of such other matters as shall be proposed touching the same, advertise us, or our council.

In all the treaty it must be remembered, to reserve and have special regard to the preservation of our treaties with the emperor, and other our friends.

And if it shall seem expedient to our said commissioners, for the better expedition of our affairs committed to their charge, that a surceance or abstinence of wars be granted, as well on our behalf, as on the behalf of the French king, we be pleased that our right trusty and right well-beloved cousin, the earl of Huntingdon, our lieutenant-general of that side, shall, by the advice of our said commissioners, grant a surceance or abstinence for such time and in such manner and sort as by our said commissioners shall be thought best, so as the like be also granted on the behalf of the said French king.

Finally, our said commissioners shall advertise us, or our council attendant about our person, from time to time, of their proceedings; and further, do as we or our council shall appoint them, either by our letters or the letters of our said council accordingly.

Articles devised by the King's Majesty, with the advice of his Highness' Council, answering to certain doubts moved in the Letters, bearing date the 27th of February last past, sent from his Majesty's Commissioners, being on the other side the seas, for the Treaty of Peace.—An Original.

EDWARD R.—First, if the French deputies require to have Roxburgh and Aymouth to be rendred unto the Scots, we will that our commissioners shall, by all the best means they can devise, induce them to agree that the said two places may and shall remain to us. And in case the French will not so be persuaded, but require still to have them rendred, our pleasure is, that our commissioners shall stand most stify in the denial of it, so far forth, that they shall come to the breaking of that day's talk, rather than to condescend unto it. And in case that move not the French to relent of their request, our commissioners shall afterwards send to the French deputies to meet, or to talk again, and then they shall say, that rather than such a good work of peace should fail, they will grant to the razing and abandoning of both the said pieces; with special capitulation, that neither the Scots nor the French shall re-fortify, nor cause to be re-fortified, in neither of those two places; with the like covenant for our part, if the French deputies do require it.

Item. We are pleased, that the reserance of our rights and titles, mentioned in our former articles sent to our said commissioners, be in general words, so as severally general reserance be made, as well for our rights and titles as to Scotland, as for our matters with France.

Item. We are pleased, that for such sums of mony as shall be agreed upon to be paid unto us for the delivery of Bulloign, our said commissioners shall take hostages of the French, according to our former articles sent unto them in that behalf; the said hostages to remain there, till the whole and last sum so agreed upon be fully answered unto us. And likewise in case the French deputies will ask hostages for the sure delivery of the town of Bulloign, with the members, our said commissioners may agree to the assigning of such hostages as shall be thought sufficient for the same; which hostages nevertheless shall not be bound to remain or continue there any longer than till the said town is delivered, but shall thereupon be suffered to return home at their pleasure.

Item. Upon the conclusion between our commissioners and the French deputies for the delivery of Bulloign, our pleasure is, that the term of the delivery of the same be appointed, as short as may be conveniently, having consideration to a reasonable respite for the removing and safe conveyance away of the artillery, munition, armour, and goods belonging to us or our subjects, either by sea or by land, as shall be thought most commodious: and that our men, departing out of the town in the forenoon, the French shall abstain from entry into it till at three or four hours after, for avoiding the inconveniences which may chance upon the coupling of our men with the French.

Item. Forasmuch as our said commissioners, being upon the place, can better consider any other thing not touched in the premises, concerning the manner and fashion of the delivery of Bulloign, or retire of our men, artillery, and other things, other than we can do here, we are pleased to remit that to their wisdoms and discretions.

Item. As for Alderney and Sark, forasmuch as both those places are ours, reason would that the French should raze their fortifications at Sark, and the fortifications at Alderney, being lawfully done by us upon our own ground, to remain at our arbitrement. That in case the French deputies shall make no mention, neither of the one nor of the other, we are pleased that our commissioners shall also pass it over in silence; but if the French deputies shall mention the same, and without the razing the fortifications at Alderney, will not condescend to a peace, we are pleased, our commissioners shall conclude with them upon the razing and abandoning of the one and the other of the aforesaid fortifications; standing first as much in denial of the French deputies' demands herein as they may.

Injunctions given in the Visitation of the Reverend Father in God, Nicholas, Bishop of London, for an Uniformity in his Diocess of London, in the 4th year of our Sovereign Lord King Edward the Sixth, by the grace of God, King of England, &c.

[Regist. Ridl. Fol. 305.]

London, Anno Dom. 1550.

First, That there be no reading of such injunctions as extoltheth and setteth forth the popish mass, candles, images, chauntries: neither that there be used any superlataries, or trentals of communions.

Item. That no minister do counterfeit the popish mass, in kissing the Lord's board, washing his hands or fingers after the gospel, or the receipt of the holy communion; shifting the book from one place to another; holding up the forefingers; laying down and licking the chalice after the communion; blessing his eyes with the sudarie thereof, or patten, or crossing his head with the same, holding his forefingers and thumbs joined together toward the temples of his head, after the receiving of the sacrament, breathing on the bread or chalice; saying the Agnus before the communion; shewing the sacrament openly before the distribution, or making any elevation thereof; ringing of the sacrying bell, or setting any light upon the Lord's board; and finally, that the minister, in the time of the holy communion, do use only the ceremonies and gestures appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, and none other, so that there do not appear in them any counterfeiting of the popish mass.

Item. That none be admitted to receive the holy communion but such as will, upon request of the curat, be ready, with meekness and reverence, to confess the articles of the creed.

Item. That none make a mart of the holy communion, by buying and selling the receipt thereof for money, as the popish mass in times past was wont to be.

Item. Whereas in divers places some use the Lord's board after the form of a table, and some of an altar, whereby dissension is perceived to arise among the unlearned; therefore wishing a godly unity to be observed in all our diocess, and for that the form of a table may more move and turn the simple from the old superstitious opinions of the popish mass, and to the right use of the Lord's Supper, we exhort the curats, churchwardens, and quæstmen here present, to erect and set up the Lord's board, after the form of an honest table, decently covered, in such place of the quire or chancel as shall be thought most meet by their discretion and agreement, so that the ministers, with the communicants, may have their place separated from the rest of the people; and to take down and abolish all other by-altars or tables.

Item. That the minister, in the time of the communion, immediately after the offertory, shall monish the communicants, saying these words, or such-like: "Now is the time, if it please you, to remember the poor men's chest with your charitable almes."

Item. That the homilies be read orderly, without omission of any part thereof.

Item. The Common Prayer be had in every church upon Wednesdays and Fridays, according to the king's grace's ordinance; and that all such as conveniently may, shall diligently resort to the same.

Item. That every curat be diligent to teach the catechism, whensoever just occasion is offered, upon the Sunday or holyday; and at least every six weeks, once shall call upon his parishioners, and present himself ready to instruct and examine the youth of the same parish, according to the book of service touching the same.

Item. That none maintain purgatory, invocation of saints, the Six Articles, bedrowls, images, reliques, rubrick primars, with invocation of saints, justification of man by his own works, holy bread, palms, ashes, candles, sepulchre paschal, creeping to the cross, hallowing of the fire or altar, or any other such-like abuses and superstitions, now taken away by the king's grace's most godly proceedings.

Item. That all ministers do move the people to often and worthy receiving of the holy communion.

Item. That every minister do move his parishioners to come diligently to the church; and when they come, not to talk, or walk, in the sermon, communion, or divine service time, but rather at the same to behave themselves reverently, godly, and devoutly in the church; and that they also monish the churchwardens to be diligent overseers in that behalf.

Item. That the churchwardens do not permit any buying, selling, gaming, outrageous noise or tumult, or any other idle occupying of youth in the church, church-porch, or church-yard, during the time of common prayer, sermon, or reading of the homily.

Item. That no persons use to minister the sacraments, or, in open audience of the congregation, presume to expound the Holy Scriptures, or to preach before they be first lawfully called and authorised in that behalf.

God save the King.

NUMBER LIII.

Dr. Oglethorp's Submission and Profession of his Faith.

I DID never preach or teach openly anything contrary to the doctrine and religion set forth by the king's majesty, and authorised by his grace's laws, since the making and publishing of the same.

I suppose, and think his grace's proceedings (concerning religion) to be good and godly, if they be used accordingly, as his grace hath will'd they should, by his laws and instructions.

And further, I suppose the order and form of doctrine and religion now set forth by his grace, and used, in many things to be better and much nearer the usage of the apostolick and primitive church, than it was before-times: if it be used godly and reverently, accordingly as I think it to be meant by his grace's highness, and his most honourable council.

Namely, in these things, in prohibiting that none should commune alone, in making the people whole communicans, or in suffering them to commune under both kinds, in the catechisation of young chaplains in the rudiments of our faith, in having the Common Prayer in English, in setting forth the homilies, and many other things, which I think very good and godly if they be used as is aforesaid.

The lately-received doctrine concerning the sacrament, and namely the attribute of transubstantiation, I do not like, and I think it not consonant to the Scriptures and ancient writers, although I suppose that there is a certain and an ineffable presence of Christ's body there, which I can neither comprehend nor express, because it so far passes the compass and reach of my wit and reason, wherefore I think it ought to be both ministrated and received with a godly and reverent fear, and not without great premeditation and examination aforesaid, as well of the minister as of the receiver. 1550.

Your grace's poor well-willer, with his prayer and service, as he is bound,

OWING OGLETHORP.

A Letter from Dr. Smith to Archbishop Cranmer. An Original.

[EX MS. Col. Cor. Cant.]

RIGHT HONOURABLE AND MY SPECIAL GOOD LORD—I commend me to your grace most humbly, giving to the same thanks as I am bound, for your grace's kindness toward my sureties; for the which you have (and shall whiles I live) my good word and prayer. Ignatii Epistolæ adhuc extant in Gymnasio Magdalene. If it might please your lordship, I would very gladly see some part of your collection against my book, "De Cœlibatû Sacerdotum," which I wrote then to try the truth out, not to the intent it should be printed, as it was, against my will. Would God I had never made it, because I took then for my chief ground, that the priests of England made a vow when they were made, which now I perceive is not true.

My lord, I received my cap-case, &c.—Sed tribus nummorum meorum partibus sublatis; Quod damnun æquo animo est ferendum, quod furti revinci non possit, qui abstulit. My lord, I am glad that your grace is reported both gentle and merciful, of all such which have had to do with you for religion of this university. For my part, if ever I may do your grace's basest servant any pleasure, I will do it indeed. *Si aliter, atqui sentio, loquor, dispeream. Ignoscat hæc Honorandæ Dominatio tam divinum silentium mihi, quippe quod crebrioribus literis posthac pensabo. NUMBER LV.

Articles agreed upon by the Bishops and other Learned Men, in the Convocation held at London, in the year 1552, for the avoiding diversities of Opinions, and stablishing Consent touching True Religion.

Published by the King's authority.

With Marginal Notes of the Differences between these and those set out by Queen Elizabeth, anno 1562.

I.—Of Faith in the Holy Trinity.

THERE is but one living and true God everlasting, without body, parts, or passions; of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the Maker and Preserver of all things, both visible and invisible. And in the unity of this godhead, there are three Persons, of one substance, power, and eternity,—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

II.—The Word of God made very Man.

The Son, which is the Word of the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, of her substance: so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say the Godhead and Manhood, were joined together in one person, never to be divided, whereof is one Christ, very God and very man; who truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for actual sins of men.

The Son, which is the Word of the Father, begotten from everlasting of the Father, the very and eternal God, of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, &c.

III.—Of the going down of Christ into Hell.

As Christ died for us, and was buried; so also is it to be believed that he went down into hell: * for his body lay in the grave till his resurrection, but his soul being separate from his body, remained with the spirits which were detained in prison, that is to say in hell, and there preached unto them; as witnesseth that place of Peter.

IV.—The Resurrection of Christ.

Christ did truly rise again from death, and took again his body, with flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, wherewith he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth till he return to judge all men at the last day.

Of the Holy Ghost.

The Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, is of one Substance, Majesty, and Glory with the Father and the Son, very and eternal God.

V.—The Doctrine of the Holy Scripture is sufficient to Salvation.

Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, although sometimes it may be admitted by God's faithful people as pious, and conducing unto order and decency, yet is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of the faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation.

Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of the faith, or be thought necessary or requisite to salvation.

In the name of the Holy Scripture we do understand those Canonical Books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church; that is to say, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, 1st of Samuel, 2nd of Samuel, &c. And the other Books (as Hieron saith) the Church doth read for example of life, and instruction of manners, but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine; such are these following:—the 3d of Esdras, the 4th of Esdras, the Book of Tobias, the Book of Judeth, the rest of the Book of Hester, the Book of Wisdom, &c. All the Books of the New Testament, as they are commonly received, we do receive and account them Canonical.

VI.—The Old Testament is not to be rejected.

The Old Testament is not to be rejected, as if it were contrary to the New, but to be retained. Forasmuch as in the Old Testament, as in the New, everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ, who is the only Mediator betwixt God and man, being both God and man. Wherefore they are not to be heard, who feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises.

Although the law given from God by Moses, as touching ceremonies and rites, do not bind Christian men, nor the civil precepts thereof ought of necessity to be received in any commonwealth; yet notwithstanding no Christian man whatsoever is free from the obedience of the commandments which are called moral.

VII.—The Three Creeds.

The three creeds,—Nice creed, Athanasius' creed, and that which is commonly called the Apostles' creed, ought thoroughly to be received; † for they may be proved by most certain warrants of the Holy Scripture.

VIII.—Original Sin.

Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam, (as the Pelagians do vainly talk, and at this day is affirmed by some Anabaptists ‡,) but it is the fault and corruption of every man that naturally is engendred of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil; so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the Spirit; and therefore in every person born into this world it deserveth God's wrath and damnation. And this infection of nature doth remain, yea in them that are regenerated, whereby the lust of the flesh, called in Greek φρόνημα σάρκος, which some do expound the wisdom, some sensuality, some the affection, some the desire of the flesh, is not subject to the law of God. And although there is no condemnation for them that believe and are baptized, yet the apostle doth confess that concupiscence and lust hath of itself the nature of sin.

IX.—Of Free-Will.

We have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will and working with us when we have that good will.

The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and good works, to faith and calling upon God. Wherefore we have no power to do good works pleasant and acceptable unto God, &c.

X.—Of Grace.

The grace of Christ, or the Holy Ghost which is given by him, doth take from man the heart of stone, and giveth him a heart of flesh. And though it rendereth us willing to do those good works which before we were unwilling to do, and unwilling to do those evil works which before we did, yet is no violence offered by it to the will of man; so that no man when he hath sinned can excuse himself, as if he had sinned against his will, or upon constraint; and therefore that he ought not to be accused or condemned upon that account.

XI.—Of the Justification of Man.

Justification by faith only in Jesus Christ, in that sense wherein it is set forth in the homily of justification, is the most certain and most wholesome doctrine for a Christian man.

We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings. Wherefore, that we are justified by faith is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort, as more largely is expressed in the homily of justification.

* These words were left out.

Of Good Works.

Albeit the good works which are the fruits of faith, and follow after justification, cannot put away our sins, and endure the severity of God's judgment, yet are they pleasing and acceptable unto God in Christ, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively faith, inasmuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit.

XII.—Works before Justification.

Works done before the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of his Spirit, are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ; neither do they make men meet to receive grace, or (as the school authors say) deserve grace of congruity; yea rather, for that they are not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin.

XIII.—Works of Supererogation.

Voluntary works besides, over and above God's commandments, which they call works of supererogation, cannot be taught without arrogancy and impiety; for by them men do declare, that they do not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more for his sake than of bounden duty is required; whereas Christ saith plainly, When you have done all that are commanded to you, say, We are unprofitable servants.

XIV.—None but Christ without Sin.

Christ, in the truth of our nature, was made like unto us in all things, sin only excepted, from which he was clearly void, both in his flesh and in his spirit: he came to be a lamb without spot, who, by sacrifice of himself once made, should take away the sins of the world; and sin (as St. John saith) was not in him: but all we the rest (although baptized and born in Christ), yet offend in many things; and if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

XV.—Of the Sin against the Holy Ghost.

Not every deadly sin, willingly committed after baptism, is sin against the Holy Ghost, and unpardonable. Wherefore the grant of repentance is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after baptism. After we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace given, and fall into sin, and by the grace of God (we may) arise again and amend our lives. And therefore they are to be condemned which say, they can no more sin as long as they live here, or deny the * place of penance to such as truly repent.

XVI.—The Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost.

The blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is then committed when any man, out of malice and hardness of heart, doth wilfully reproach and persecute in an hostile manner the truth of God's word, manifestly made known unto him. Which sort of men, being made obnoxious to the curse, subject themselves to the most grievous of all wickednesses; from whence this kind of sin is called unpardonable, and so affirmed to be by our Lord and Saviour.

XVII.—Of Predestination and Election.

Predestination unto life is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) he hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret unto us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation, as vessels made to honour. Wherefore they which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God, be called according to

* Place of forgiveness.

† In Christ.

God's purpose, by his Spirit working in due season, they through grace obey the calling, they be justified freely, they are made sons of † adoption, they are made like the image of § the only begotten Jesus Christ; they walk religiously in good works; and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity.

As the godly consideration of predestination and election in Christ is full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons, and such as feel in themselves the working of the spirit of Christ, mortifying the works of the flesh, and their earthly members, and drawing up their mind to high and heavenly things, as well because it doth greatly establish and confirm their faith of eternal salvation, to be enjoyed through Christ, as because it doth fervently kindle their love towards God: so for curious and carnal persons, lacking the spirit of Christ, to have continually before their eyes the sentence of God's predestination, is a most dangerous downfall, whereby the devil doth thrust them either into desperation, or into wretchedness of most unclean living, no less perilous than desperation.

Furthermore, though the decrees of predestination be unknown to us, yet || must we receive God's promises in such wise as they be generally set forth to us in Holy Scripture; and in our doings, that will of God is to be followed, which we have expressly declared unto us in the word of God.

XVIII.—Everlasting Salvation to be obtained only in the Name of Christ.

They also are to be had accursed, that presume to say, that every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law, and the light of nature: for Holy Scripture doth set out unto us only the name of Jesus Christ, whereby men must be saved.

XIX.—All Men are bound to keep the Precepts of the Moral Law.

Although the law given from God by Moses, as touching ceremonies and rites, do not bind Christian men, nor the civil precepts thereof ought of necessity to be received in any common-wealth; yet, notwithstanding, no Christian man whatsoever is free from the obedience of the commandments which are called moral. Wherefore they are not to be heard which teach, that the Holy Scriptures were given to none but to the weak, and brag continually of the Spirit, by which they do pretend, that all whatsoever they preach is suggested to them, though manifestly contrary to the Holy Scripture.

XX.—Of the Church.

The visible church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly ministered, according to Christ's ordinance, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same.

As the church of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch have erred, so also the church of Rome hath erred, not only in their livings, and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith.

XXI.—Of the Authority of the Church.

It is not lawful for the church to ordain any that is contrary to God's word written; neither may it so expound one place of Scripture, that it be repugnant to another: wherefore although the church be a witness and keeper of Holy Writ, yet as it ought not to decree any thing against the same, so besides the same ought it not to enforce any thing to be believed for necessity of salvation.

The church hath power to decree rites and ceremonies, and authority in controversies of faith. It is not lawful for the church, &c.

Of the Authority of General Councils.

General councils may not be gathered together without the commandment and will of princes. And when they are gathered together, forasmuch as they be an assembly of men, (whereof all be not governed with the Spirit and word of God,) they may err, and sometimes have erred, even in things pertaining unto God. Wherefore things ordained by them, as necessary to salvation, have neither strength nor authority, unless it may be declared, that they be taken out of Holy Scripture.

XXIII.—Of Purgatory.

The doctrine of the school-men concerning purgatory, pardons, worshipping, and adoration, as well of images as of reliques, and also invocation of saints, is a fond thing vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather perniciously repugnant to the word of God.

XXIV.—No Man to minister in the Church except he be called.

It is not lawful for any man to take upon him the office of public preaching, or ministering the sacraments in the congregation, before he be lawfully called and sent to execute the same. And those we ought to judge lawfully called and sent, which be chosen and called to this work by men, who have publick authority given unto them in the congregation, to call and send ministers into the Lord's vineyard.

XXV.—All things to be done in the Congregation in such a Tongue as is understood by the People.

It is most fit, and most agreeable to the word of God, that nothing be read or rehearsed in the congregation, in a tongue not known unto the people; which Paul hath forbidden to be done, unless some be present to interpret.

It is a thing plainly repugnant to the word of God, and the custom of the primitive church, to have publick prayers in the church, or to minister the sacraments, in a tongue not understood by the people.

XXVI.—Of the Sacraments.

Our Lord Jesus Christ gathered his people into a society, by sacraments very few in number, most easy to be kept, and of most excellent signification; that is to say, baptism, and the supper of the Lord.

The sacraments were not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon, or to be carried about, but that we should duly use them: and in such only as worthily receive the same, they have a wholesome effect or operation; not as some say, Ex opera operato, which terms, as they are strange and utterly unknown to the Holy Scripture, so do they yield a sense which savoureth of little piety, but of much superstition: but they that receive them unworthily receive to themselves damnation.

The sacraments ordained by the word of God be not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession; but rather they be certain sure witnessess, effectual signs of grace and God's good will towards us, by the which he doth work invisibly in us; and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm our faith in him.

Sacraments ordained of Christ, be not only badges and tokens of Christian men's profession, but rather they be certain sure witnessess and effectual signs of grace and God's good will towards us, by the which he doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm our faith in him.

There are two sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the gospel, that is to say, baptism, and the supper of the Lord.

Those five commonly called sacraments, that is to say, confirmation, penance, orders, matrimony, and extreme unction, are not to be counted for sacraments of the gospel, being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures, but yet have not like nature of sacraments, with baptism and the Lord's supper, for that they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God.

The sacraments were not ordained of Christ to be gazed on, or to be carried about, but that we should duly use them. And in such only as worthily receive the same, they have a wholesome effect or operation; but they that receive them unworthily purchase to themselves damnation, as St. Paul saith.

Although in the visible church the evil be ever mingled with the good, and sometimes the evil have chief authority in the ministrations of the word and sacraments; yet forasmuch as they do not the same in their own name, but in Christ's, and do minister by his commission and authority, we may use their ministry both in hearing the word of God, and in receiving of the sacraments: neither is the effect of Christ's ordinance taken away by their wickedness, nor the grace of God's gifts diminished from such as by faith rightly do receive the sacrament, ministered unto them, which be effectual because of Christ's institution and promise, although they be ministered by evil men.

Nevertheless it appertaineth to the discipline of the church, that inquiry be made after * them, and that they be accused by those that have knowledge of their offences; and finally, being found guilty, by just judgment be deposed.

XXVIII.—Of Baptism.

Baptism is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are discerned from others that be not christened; but it is also a sign of regeneration, or new birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive baptism rightly are grafted into the church; the promises of forgiveness of sin, and of our adoption to be the sons of God by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed; faith is confirmed, and grace increased, by virtue of prayer unto God. The custom of the Church for baptizing young children is both to be commended, and by all means to be retained in the church.

The baptism of young children is in any wise to be retained in the church, as most agreeable to the institution of Christ.

XXIX.—Of the Lord's Supper.

The supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have amongst themselves one to another; but rather it is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death: insomuch that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ, and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ.

Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of bread and wine) in the supper of the Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ; but it is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, and hath given occasion to many superstitions.

But it is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions.

Since the very being of human nature doth require, that the body of one and the same man cannot be at one and the same time in many places, but of necessity must be in some certain and determinate place; therefore the body of Christ cannot be present in many different places at the same time. And since (as the

* Evil ministers,

Holy Scriptures testify) Christ hath been taken up into heaven, and there is to abide till the end of the world; it becometh not any of the faithful to believe or profess, that there is a real or corporeal presence (as they phrase it) of the body and blood of Christ in the holy eucharist.

The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the supper, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. And the mean whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the supper, is faith.

The sacrament of the Lord's supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped.

XXXIX.—Of the Wicked which eat not the Body of Christ in the Lord's Supper.

The wicked, and such as be void of a lively faith, although they do carnally and visibly press with their teeth (as St. Austin saith) the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ; yet in no wise are they partakers of Christ, but rather to their condemnation do eat and drink the sign or sacrament of so great a thing.

XXX.—Of both kinds.] The cup of the Lord is not to be denied to the lay-people: for both the parts of the Lord's sacrament (by Christ's ordinance and commandment) ought to be ministered to all Christian people alike.

XXX.—Of the one Oblation of Christ finished upon the Cross.

The offering of Christ once made, is a perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual, and there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone: wherefore the sacrifices of masses, in which it was commonly said that the priests did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, were fables*, and dangerous deceits.

XXXI.—A Single Life is imposed on none by the Word of God.

Bishops, priests, and deacons, are not commanded by God's law, either to vow the estate of a single life, or to abstain from marriage.

Therefore it is lawful for them, as for all other Christian men, to marry at their own discretion, as they shall judge the same to serve better to godliness.

XXXII.—Excommunicated Persons are to be avoided.

That person, which by open denunciation of the church, is rightly cut off from the unity of the church, and excommunicated, ought to be taken of the whole multitude of the faithful, as an heathen and publican, until he be openly reconciled by penance, and received into the church, by a judge that hath authority thereunto.

XXXIII.—Of the Tradition of the Church.

It is not necessary that traditions and ceremonies be in all places one and utterly alike; for at all times they have been divers, and may be changed according to the diversities of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's word. Whosoever through his private judgment willingly and purposely doth openly break the traditions and ceremonies of the church, which be not repugnant to the word of God, and be ordained and approved by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly, (that others may fear to do the like,) as he that offendeth against the common order of the church, and hurteth the authority of the magistrate, and woundeth the consciences of the weak brethren.

Every particular or national church hath authority to ordain, change, or abolish ceremonies or rites of the church, ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying.

* Blasphemous.

XXXIV.—Of the Homilies.

The homilies lately delivered and commended to the church of England by the king's injunctions, do contain a godly and wholesome doctrine, and fit to be embraced by all men; and for that cause they are diligently, plainly, and distinctly to be read to the people.

The second book of homilies, the several titles whereof we have joined under this article, doth contain a godly and wholesome doctrine, and necessary for the times; as doth the former book of homilies, which were set forth in the time of Edward the Sixth: and therefore we judge them to be read in churches by the Ministers, diligently and distinctly, that they may be understood of the people.

The Names of the Homilies.

Of the right use of the church. Of repairing churches. Against the peril of idolatry. Of good works, &c.

XXXV.—Of the Book of Common Prayer, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church of England.

The book lately delivered to the church of England by the authority of the king and parliament, containing the manner and form of public prayer, and the ministration of the sacraments, in the said church of England, as also the book published by the same authority for ordering ministers in the church, are both of them very pious, as to truth of doctrine, in nothing contrary but agreeable to the wholesome doctrine of the gospel, which they do very much promote and illustrate. And for that cause they are by all faithful members of the church of England, but chiefly of the ministers of the word, with all thankfulness and ass of mind, to be received, approved, and commended to the people of God.

The book of consecration of archbishops and bishops, and ordering of priests and deacons, lately set forth in the time of King Edward the Sixth, and confirmed at the same time by authority of parliament, doth contain all things necessary to such consecration and ordering. Neither hath it any thing that of itself is superstitious and ungodly; and therefore whosoever are consecrated and ordered according to the rites of that book, since the second year of the afore-named King Edward, unto this time, or hereafter shall be consecrated or ordered, according to the same rites, we decree all such to be rightly, orderly, and lawfully consecrated and ordered.

XXXVI.—Of the Civil Magistrates.

The king of England is, after Christ, the supreme head on earth of the church of England and Ireland.

The bishop of Rome hath no jurisdiction in this realm of England.

The civil magistrate is ordained and approved by God, and therefore is to be obeyed, not only for fear of wrath, but for conscience' sake.

Civil or temporal laws may punish Christian men with death for heinous and grievous offences.

It is lawful for Christian men, at the commandment of the magistrate, to wear weapons, and to serve in the wars.

The queen's majesty hath the chief power in this realm of England, and other her dominions, unto whom the chief government of all estates of this realm, whether they be ecclesiastical or civil, in all cases doth appertain, and is not, nor ought to be, subject to any foreign jurisdiction.

Where we attribute to the queen's majesty the chief government, by which titles we understand the minds of some slanderous folks to be offended, we give not to our princes the ministry, either of God's word, or of the sacraments; the which thing the injunctions lately set forth by Elizabeth our queen do most plainly testify; but that only prerogative which we see to have been given always to all godly princes in Holy Scriptures by God himself,—that is, that they should rule all estates committed to their charge by God, whether they be ecclesiastical or temporal, and restrain with the civil sword the stubborn and evil-doers.

The bishop of Rome hath no jurisdiction in this realm of England.

The laws of this realm may punish Christian men with death, &c.

XXXVII.—The Goods of Christians are not common.

The riches and goods of Christians are not common, as touching the right, title, and possession of the same, as certain Anabaptists do falsely boast. Notwithstanding every man ought, of such things as he possesseth, liberally to give alms to the poor, according to his ability.

XXXVIII.—It is lawful for a Christian to take an oath.

As we confess that vain and rash swearing is forbidden Christian men, by our Lord Jesus Christ, and James his apostle; so we judge that Christian religion doth not prohibit, but that a man may swear when the magistrate requireth, in a cause of faith and charity, so it be done according to the prophet's teaching, in justice, judgment, and truth.

ELIZABETH'S TIME.

XXXIX.—The Resurrection of the Dead is not past already.

The resurrection of the dead is not past already, as if it belonged only to the soul, which by the grace of Christ is raised from the death of sin, but is to be expected by all men in the last day; for at that time (as the Scripture doth most apparently testify) the dead shall be restored to their own bodies, flesh, and bones; to the end that man, according as either righteously or wickedly he hath passed this life, may, according to his works, receive rewards or punishments.

XL.—The souls of men deceased do neither perish with their bodies, nor sleep idly.

They who maintain that the souls of men deceased do either sleep, without any manner of sense, to the day of judgment, or affirm that they die together with the body, and shall be raised therewith at the last day, do wholly differ from the right faith and orthodox belief, which is delivered to us in the Holy Scriptures.

XLI.—Of the Millenarians.

They who endeavour to revive the fable of the Millenarians are therein contrary to the Holy Scriptures, and cast themselves down headlong into Jewish dotages.

XLII.—All men not to be saved at last.

They also deserve to be condemned, who endeavour to restore that pernicious opinion, that all men (though never so ungodly) shall at last be saved, when for a certain time, appointed by the divine justice, they have endured punishment for their sins committed.

NUMBER LVI.

Instructions given by the King's Highness to his right trusty and right well-beloved Cousin and Counsellor, Francis Earl of Salop, and Lord President of his Grace's Council, resident in the north parts; and to all others hereafter named and appointed by his Highness to be of his said Council, to be observed by the said Counsellors, and every of them, according as the same hereafter is declared.

[EX MS. Dr. Johnson.]

FIRST, his majesty much desiring the quietness and good governance of the people and inhabitants in the north parts of this realm of England, and for the good, speedy, and indifferent administration of justice to be there had, betwixt party and party, intendeth to continue in the said north parts his right honourable council, called, The King's Majesty's Council in the North Parts. And his highness knowing the approved wisdom and experience of his said cousin, with his assured discretion and dexterity in the execution of justice, hath appointed him to be lord president of the said council; and by these presents doth give unto him the name of lord president of the said council, with power and authority to call together all such as be, or hereafter shall be, named and appointed to be of the said council, at all times, when he shall think expedient: and otherwise by his letters to appoint them, and every of them, to do such things for the advancement of justice, and for the repression and punishment of malefactors, as, by the advice of such of the said council as then shall be present with him, he shall think meet, for the furtherance of his grace's affairs, and for the due administration of justice between his highness' subjects.

And further, his majesty giveth unto the said lord president, by these presents, a voice negative in all councils, where things shall be debated at length for the bringing forth of a most perfect truth or sentence, which his highness would have observed in all cases that may abide advisement and consultation, to the intent that doubtful matters should as well be maturely consulted upon, as also that the same should not pass without the consent and order of the said lord president.

And his highness willeth and commandeth, that all and every of the said counsellors, named and to be named hereafter, shall exhibit and use to the said lord president all such honour, reverent behaviour, and obedience, as to their duty appertaineth; and shall receive and execute in like sort all the precepts and commandments to them, or any of them, for any matter touching his majesty, to be addressed, or any process to be done or served in his grace's name.

And his highness' pleasure is, that the said lord president shall have the keeping of his grace's signet, therewith to seal letters, processes, and all such other things as shall be thought convenient by the said lord president, or by two of the council, being bound by those articles to daily attendance upon the said lord president, with his assent thereunto.

And to the intent the said lord president thus established, for the above-said purposes, may be furnished with such numbers and assistants, as be of wisdom, experience, gravity, and truth, meet to have the name of his grace's counsellors; his majesty, upon good advisement and deliberation, hath elected those persons whose names ensue hereafter to be his counsellors, joined in the said council in the north parts, with the said lord president; that is to say, the right trusty and well-beloved cousins, Henry earl of Westmoreland, Henry earl of Cumberland; his right trusty and well-beloved Cuthbert bishop of Duresm; William lord Dacres of the north; John lord Conyers; Thomas lord Wharton; John Hind, kt., one of his majesty's justices of the common pleas; Edmond Moleneux, kt., serjeant at law; Henry Savel, kt.; Robert Bowes, kt.; Nicholas Fairfax, kt.; George Conyers, kt.; Leonard Becquith, kt.; William Babthorp, kt.; Anthony Nevill, kt.; Thomas Gargrave, kt.; Robert Menel, serjeant at law; Anthony Bellasis, esquire; John Rockely, doctor of law; Robert Chaloner, Richard Morton, and Thomas Eymis, esquires.

And his highness, by these presents, doth appoint the said Thomas Eymis to be secretary to the said council, diligently and obediently to exercise the same room as he shall be appointed by the said lord president, or by two of the council, whereof the one to be of the quorum, with the assent of the lord president. And his highness' pleasure is, that the said lord president, and two others of the said council, being of the quorum, shall be sworn masters of the chancery, to the intent that every of them may take recognisance in such cases as by the said lord president, or by two of the said council, being of the quorum, shall be thought convenient, and the case so requiring. All which number of counsellors before specified, as his majesty doubteth not but that they, and every of them, according to his grace's expectation and trust reposed in them, will be, at all times, diligent and willing towards, and ready to do unto his grace such service as they can devise or imagine may be best to his contentation, and to the discharge of their duties towards his highness, leaving apart all respects and affections in all matters that may touch their nearest kinsman, friend, servant, tenant, or others, when the same shall come in question before the same lord president or council: so his grace trusteth that every of the same will have such regard to malefactors as appertaineth, and to bring all such unto the said lord president and council, when they shall be thereunto appointed, or may otherwise do it of themselves; informing the said lord president and council of their offences, as the same shall happen, in place where they have rule and authority, within the limits of their commission.

And forso much as it should be very chargeable to many of the said counsellors, if they should continually attend upon the said lord president and council, therefore his highness, of his grace's goodness, minding to ease that charge, and to instruct every of the said counsellors how to demean themselves for their attendance; that is, to wit, who shall be bound to continual attendance upon the same council, and who shall attend but at times most requisite, at their pleasures, unless the same lord president shall require them to remain for a time, for some weighty affairs or purposes; the which requests, in such cases, every of them shall accomplish. His majesty therefore ordaineth that his cousins, the earls of Westmoreland and Cumberland, the bishop of Duresm, the lord Dacres, the lord Conyers, the lord Wharton, sir John Hinde, sir Edmond Molineux, sir Henry Savell, sir Nicholas Fairfax, George Conyers, Anthony Nevil, knights; Robert Mennel, serjeant at law; Anthony Bellasis; John Rockbey, doctor of law, and Richard Norton, shall not be bound to continual attendance, but to go and come at their pleasures, unless they be required by the said lord president to remain with him for a time, for some weighty and great causes which then they shall accomplish.

And further, his grace's pleasure is, that they shall be present at such of the general sittings as shall be kept near unto their dwelling-places, and at other sittings and places, where they shall be commanded by the said lord president, all excuses set apart as appertaineth. And because it shall be convenient that a number shall be continually abiding with the said lord president, with whom he may consult and commit the charge and hearing of such matters as shall be exhibited unto him for the more expedition of the same, his highness, by these presents, doth ordain, that sir Robert Bowes, sir William Babthorp, sir Leonard Becquith, sir Thomas Gargrave, knights; Robert Chaloner, and Thomas Eymis, secretary, esquires, shall give their continual attendance on the said lord president, or at the least two of them; and that none of them, appointed to continual attendance on the said lord president, shall depart at any time from him, without his special license, and the same not to exceed above six weeks at one season.

And his highness, by these presents, for the better entertainment of the said lord president and council of both sorts, when they are, or any of them, shall be present, doth give a yearly stipend of 1000*l.* by the year to the said lord president, towards the furniture of the diet of himself and the rest of the said counsellors, with such number of servants as hereafter shall be appointed and allowed to every of them; that is, to wit, every knight, being bound to continual attendance, four servants; and every esquire, being bound to like attendance, three servants. And his highness ordaineth every of the said counsellors to sit with the said lord president at his table, or in some other place in his house, to be by him conveniently prepared for their degrees and behaviours; and their servants allowed, as is before said, to have sitting and diet in the said lord president's hall, or in some other convenient place in his house.

And further, his highness, of his mere goodness, and great benignity, for the better entreatment, as well of such of the said council as be not well able to forbear their own affairs, and attend upon the said council, without further help for the charge of the horse-meat and lodgings, when they shall attend in council to serve his highness, as for such others that might better themselves with their learning and policies, if they were not detained there about his grace's affairs, doth by these presents limit and appoint, to divers of the aforesaid counsellors hereafter named, certain particular fees, as ensueth; that is to say, to sir Robert Bowes, kt. in respect of his attendance, and towards his horse-meat and other charges, 100 merks yearly; to sir William Babthorp, kt. for the like, 50*l.* yearly; to sir Leonard Becquith, for the like causes, 100 merks yearly; to sir Thomas Gargrave, kt. for the like, 50*l.* yearly; to Robert Chaloner, esquire, for the like, 50*l.* yearly; to Richard Norton, esquire, for his fee, 40*l.*; to Thomas Eymis, secretary, for the like yearly fee, 33*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* And further, his grace doth appoint one messenger to serve the said council, who shall give continual attendance upon the said lord president, and have his meat, drink, and lodging in the said lord president's house, and to have yearly for his fee 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* And further, his grace's pleasure is, that the said 1000*l.* for the lord president, and all the said other fees, shall be paid yearly at the feasts of the Annunciation of our Lady, and St. Michael the Archangel, by even portions, of the revenues of his grace's lands in those parts; and that for that purpose an assignment and warrant to be made to the receiver-general of his grace's revenues there.

And to furnish the said lord president and council in all things with authority sufficient to execute justice, as well in causes criminal, as in matters of controversy between party and party, his majesty hath commanded and appointed two commissions to be made out, under his grace's great seal of England, by virtue whereof they shall have full power and authority, in either case, to proceed as the matter occurrent shall require.

And for the more speedy expedition to be used in all causes of justice, his majesty's pleasure is, that the said lord president and council shall cause every complainant and defendant that shall have to do before them, to put and declare their whole matter in their bill of complaint and answer, without replication, rejoinder, or other plea or delay to be had or used therein; which order the said lord president and council shall manifest unto all such as shall be counsellors in any matter to be intreated and defined before them; charging and commanding the said counsellors and pleaders to observe this order, upon such penalties as they shall think convenient, as they will eschew the danger of the same; and not in any ways to break it, without the special license of the said lord president, and that only in some special causes.

And further, his highness, by these presents, doth give full power and authority to the said lord president and council, as well to punish such persons as in anything shall neglect, contemn, or disobey their commandments, or the process of the council, as all other that shall speak seditious words, invent rumors, or commit such-like offences (not being treason), whereof any inconvenience might grow, by pillory, cutting their ears, wearing of papers, imprisonment, or otherwise at their discretions. And the said lord president and council, at their discretions, shall appoint counsellors, and other requisites, to poor suitors having no money, without paying fees or other things for the same. And his highness giveth full power and authority to the said lord president and council being with him, or four of them at the least; whereof the said lord president, sir John Hind, sir Edmond Molineux, sir Robert Bowes, sir Leonard Becquith, sir Anthony Nevill, sir Thomas Gargrave, knights; Robert Mennell and Robert Chaloner, to be two with the lord president, to assess fines of all persons that shall be convict or indicted of any riot, how many soever they be in number, unless the matter of such riot shall be thought unto them of such importance, as the same shall be meet to be signified unto his majesty, to be punished in such sort, by the order of his council attending upon his grace's person, as the same may be noted for an example to others. And his grace giveth full power and authority to the said lord president and council, or four of them at the least, whereof the lord president and two others bound to continual attendance to be three, to award and assess costs and damages, as well to the plaintiffs as to the defendants, by their discretions, and to award execution of their decrees and orders; and to punish the breakers of the same, being parties thereunto, by their discretions: all which decrees and orders, the secretary shall be bound incontinently, upon the promulgation of the same, to write, or cause to be written, in one fair book, which shall remain in the hands and custody of the said lord president.

And to the intent it may appear to all persons there what fees shall be paid and taken for all processes and writings to be used by the said council, his majesty therefore appointeth, that there shall be a table affixed in every place where the said Lord President and council shall sit, at any sessions; and a like table to hang openly, that all men may see it, in the office where the said secretary and the clerks shall commonly sit and expedit the said writings; wherein shall be declared what shall be paid for the same. That is to say, for every recognisance, wherein one alone or more standeth bounden, 12d. For the cancelling of every like recognisance, 12d. For the entering of every decree, 6d. For the copy of the same, if it be asked, 6d. For every letter, commission, attachment, or other precept or process sent to any person, 4d. For every dismission before the said council (if it be asked), 4d. For the copies of bills, and answers, and other pleas, for every ten lines, reasonably writ, 1d. For the examination of every witness, 4d. And his grace's pleasure is, that the examination of witnesses, produced in matters before the said council, shall be examined by such discreet person and persons as shall be thought convenient and meet by the said lord president, and two of the said council, bound to continual attendance; and that the said lord president, with such-like two of the said council, shall reform, appoint, and allow such persons to write bills, answers, copies, or other process in that court, as they shall think convenient, over and beside the said secretary and his two clerks; which clerks also the said lord president and council shall reform and correct, as they shall have cause and occasion. In which reformation and appointments, the said lord president shall have a voice negative.

And for the more certain and brief determination of matters in those parts, his majesty, by these presents, ordaineth, that the said lord president and council shall keep four general sittings or sessions in the year, every of them to continue by the space of one whole month; whereof one to be at York, another at Kingstons upon Hull, one at Newcastle, and another at Duresme; within the limits whereof, the matters rising there shall be ordered and decreed, if they conveniently so may be. And they shall, in every of the same places, keep one good delivery; before their departure from thence, his grace nevertheless referring it to their discretions, to take and appoint such other place and places for their said four general sittings, as they, or the said lord president, with three of the council, bounden to continual attendance, shall think most convenient for the time and purpose; so that they keep the full term of one month in every such place, if they may in any wise conveniently so do.

And forsomuch as a great number of his majesty's tenants and farmers have been heretofore retained with sundry persons by wages, livery, badge, or connyssance; by reason whereof, when his grace should have had service of them, they were rather at commandment of other men, than (according to their duties of allegiance) of his highness, of whom they have their livings; his majesty's pleasure and express commandment is, that none of his said council, nor others, shall by any means retain or entertain any of his grace's tenants or farmers in such sort, as they, or any of them, should account themselves bounden to do him or them any other service, than as to his highness' officers, having office, or being appointed in service there: unless the same farmers and tenants be continually attendant in the house of him that shall retain them. And the said lord president and council shall, in every their general sittings, give special notice and charge, that no nobleman, nor other, shall retain any of the said tenants and farmers, otherwise than is aforesaid; charging also the said farmers and tenants, upon pain of the forfeiture of their farms and holds, and incurring of his majesty's further displeasure and indignation, in nowise to agree to any such retainers, other than is beforesaid, but wholly to depend upon his highness, and upon such as his highness hath, or shall appoint to be officers, rulers, or directors over them.

And his grace's pleasure further is, that in every such sitting, and in all other places where the said lord president and council shall have any notable assemblies before them, they shall give strait charge and commandment to the people, to conform themselves in all things to the observation of such laws, ordinances, and determinations, as be made, passed, and agreed upon by his grace's parliament touching religion, and the most godly service, set forth in their own mother tongue, for their comforts: And likewise to the laws touching the abolishing of the usurped and pretended power of the Bishop of Rome, whose abuses they shall so beat into their heads, by continual inculcation, as they may smell and understand the same; and may perceive the same to be declared with their hearts, and not with their tongues only for a form.

And likewise they shall declare the order and determination taken and agreed upon, for the abrogation of certain vain holy days, being appointed by the Bishop of Rome to blind the world; and to persuade the same, that they might make saints at their pleasures; and thereby, through idleness, do give occasion of the increase of many and great vices and inconveniences: which points his majesty doth earnestly require and straitly command the said lord president and council to set forth with all dexterity, and to punish extremely, for example, all offenders in the same.

And his majesty willetth the said council, as he doubteth not but they will most earnestly set forth all such other things and matters, as for the confirmation of the people in those matters, and other the king's majesty's proceedings, and things convenient to be remembered, be, or shall be set forth or devised, and sent unto them for that purpose.

Further, his highness' pleasure is, that the said lord president and council shall, from time to time, make diligent inquisition of the wrongful taking in and inclosing of commons, and other grounds, and who be extreme therein ; and in taking and exacting of unreasonable fines and gressomes, and overing or raising of rents ; and to call the parties that have so evil used themselves therein before them ; and leaving all respects and affections apart, they shall take such order for the redresses of enormities used in the same, as the poor people be not oppressed ; but that they may live after their sorts and qualities.

And if it shall chance that the said lord president and council shall vary in opinion, either in the law, or for any order to be taken in any matter or fact before them, if the case be of very great weight and importance, then the opinion of the greater, or more part of the number of counsellors appointed to give continual attendance, shall take place, and determine the doubt ; and if they be of like number of counsellors, bounden to continual attendance, then that party whereunto the lord president shall give his assent shall be followed and take place. And if the case and matter be of great importance, and the question of the law, then the lord president and council shall signify the case and matter to the judges at Westminster, who shall, with diligence, advertise them again of their opinions therein. And if the matter be of great importance, and an order to be taken upon the fact, then the said lord president and council, attendant upon his person upon the same, whereupon they shall have knowledge again how to use themselves in that behalf.

And the said lord president and council shall take special regard, upon complaint of spoil, extortions, or oppressions, to examine the same speedily, that the party grieved may have due and undelayed remedy and restitution. And for want of ability in the offenders thereunto, they to be punished to the example of others. And if any man, of what degree soever he be, shall, upon a good, lawful, and reasonable cause or matter, and so appearing to the lord president and council, by information, or otherwise, demand surety of peace or justice against any great lord or nobleman of that country, the said lord president and council shall, in that case, grant the petition of the poorest man against the richest or greatest lord, being of the council or no, as they should grant the same (being lawfully asked) against men of the meanest sort, degree, and behaviour.

And forasmuch as it may chance the said lord president be sometime diseased, that he shall not be able to travel, for the direction of such matters as then shall occur ; or to be called to the parliament, or otherwise to be employed in the king's majesty's affairs, or about other business, for good reformation or order within this rule, or for other reasonable cause by his discretion ; to the intent therefore that the said council may be and remain ever full and perfect, and that they may be at all times in the same, one person to direct and use all things in such and the same order, sort, and form, as the said lord president should and might do, by virtue of the aforesaid's commissions, and these injunctions, his majesty's pleasure is, that when the said lord president shall be so diseased, absent, or letted, as is before said, that he cannot conveniently supply his room himself, that then he shall name and appoint one of the said commissioners, being appointed, to give continual attendance, to supply his room for that season, during his said disease, absence, or lett ; and shall deliver the signet to the person so appointed to keep, during the same time. And the king's highness, during the same time, giveth unto the said person so appointed the name of vice-president ; which name nevertheless he shall no longer continue, than during the time that the said lord president shall so be sick, absent, or letted, as is before said. And his majesty's pleasure is, that for the time only that any of the said council, as is before said, shall occupy the said room and place as a vice-president, that all the rest of the council shall in all things use him in like sort, and with like reverence, as they be bound by those injunctions to use the lord president himself ; whereunto his grace doubteth not but every of them will conform themselves accordingly.

And further, his majesty by these presents giveth full power and authority to the said lord president and council, that when the condition of any recognisance taken before them shall be fulfilled, they shall, in open court, cause the same to be cancelled for the discharge of the parties : provided that no recognisance be in any wise cancelled but before the lord president, or vice-president, and three others at the least, sitting in open court with him.

And further, his highness ordaineth, that no attorney shall take, in one sitting or sessions, for one matter, above 12*d.*, nor no counsellor above 20*d.*

The rest are wanting.

The Memorial of the Charge committed by the King's Majesty to Sir Richard Morison, Kt., his Majesty's Ambassador with the Emperor, the 24th September.—An Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Galba. B. 12.]

FIRST, you, Sir Richard Morison, shall, with all diligence, procure audience of our good brother the emperor ; and at your access to him, deliver our letters of credence herewith sent to you, with our most hearty commendations, and earnest declaration, that we be most glad to have understanding of his good estate and health. After the same delivery and salutation, you shall further say, that we understanding his good and honourable advancement towards his Low Countries, to the great comfort of the same ; and having also the same love and good-will towards the prosperous success of his said countries, that our late father and our other progenitors have had these many years passed ; have willed you expressly in our names to congratulate this his coming thitherward, and to shew him, that the good success which we wish to him, and his affairs and enterprises, is as much as we would to ourselves, and our own countries and patri-monies.

Item. When you shall have opened this much, with as good words as you may devise, ye shall begin to descend to this that followeth, using therein your earnestness and frankness, as ye shall see by the former sayings occasion given to you by our said brother's acceptance thereof, either by his good words, or other behaviour in his gesture. Ye shall say, that where we have lately understood of the great murders, spoils, and cruelties done and committed, both in Hungary, and upon the coasts of Naples, and in other parts of Italy, by the Turks, the old common enemy to the name and religion of all Christianity ; likeas, we cannot but from our very heart lament the same, so we will, for our part, as may be thought expedient for the weal-publick of Christendom, shew ourself willing to accord with our said good brother, and other Christian princes and states, for the repulse of the said Turk. And if any such good means may, by the great wisdom and policy of our said good brother the emperor, be thought good and devised to bring the same to some good purpose and effect ; we for our part will shew ourself so ready and well-willing thereto, as our said good brother shall well perceive, that we have not only that zeal to the conservation and surety of Christendom, which in a Christian prince is duly required ; but also such consideration and regard to our said good brother, and our ancient amity with the house of Burgundy, as to honour and reason appertaineth.

Thus much being declared in such good sort as you shall see occasion doth require, we would that you should stay and pause awhile, as it were, looking for some answer to be made hereto by our said good brother ; and if you shall perceive he taketh it in thankful part, then may you entertain the talk modestly, with such good words as may seem to your wisdom best to confirm our good affection to the continuance of the amity, and our great offence and grief, with the entry of the Turks in Christendom.

And if you shall perceive that the emperor doth in so good part receive this our overture, that he shall shew himself willing to enter any further talk, or devise for the further proceeding in the same, you may, as of yourself, shew your readiness and goodwill to do all that you any ways well may, as a good minister, for the bringing this purpose to some profitable effect ; which you may say, in your own opinion, shall the better take good entry and success, if, by some special man to be sent hither, we might understand more fully our said good brother's mind in this matter.

Item. If ye shall perceive that the emperor doth not regard this overture, either in not liking the matter itself, or not so regarding our amity as reason would, and as it is on our part offered, then may you use yourself more coldly, and diminish the declaration of our earnestness, in like sort as our said brother sheweth himself ; and conclude, that thus having done the message committed to your charge, you will leave the consideration hereof to him as he shall think good.

And if, in the opening of the premises, our said brother shall make any mention or interpretation against the French king, referring the Turk's invasions to the said French king as some occasion thereof ; and so shall demand, directly or indirectly, whether this our overture be meant to extend against the French king, or any others of Christian name that shall join in league or amity with the said Turks ; you may thereto say, that you had no more in charge presently than ye have said ; and therefore, for further opening of our mind therein, you think the same might be best had here.

And if at any time of this your talk, our said brother shall gather occasion to ask you, what we will do for giving aid against these invasions made by the French king upon the Low Countries ? you may answer, you have nothing to say therein, but that you think the answer that was declared to his ambassador here resident upon the letters sent to us from our good sister the queen of Hungary hath both been signified to him long before his time, and also as ye trust in reason contented her. And in this point, although ye know what was answered, yet would we not ye should enter into the dispute thereof, meaning in this and the rest of things to be treated with our said brother, that ye would rather procure the sending of some special man hither, than to treat anything by his ambassador here, who hitherto hath not appeared the fittest man to increase or enlarge the amity betwixt us and our said brother.

Finally, our pleasure is, that you shall, in the execution of this present charge, wholly extend your good policy and wisdom, to mark and well-advise all such words of moment, as the emperor shall utter to you in this talk, by what order, behaviour, gesture, or other passion of joy or grief the same shall be spoken, so as we may simply, plainly, and very orderly have the true declaration thereof from you ; wherein we desire so express and special a report of this matter, as upon the same we may better conceive what shall be expedient to be further done in this, and other our weighty affairs.

A Letter written by B. Ridley, setting out the sins of that time.

[Regist. Ridl. Fel. 239.]

To this well-beloved, the preachers within the diocess of London.

AFTER hearty commendations, having regard, especially at this time, to the wrath of God, who hath plagued us diversly, and now with extreme punishment of sudden death poured upon us, for causes certain, known unto his high and secret judgment, and as may seem unto man for our wicked living ; daily increasing unto such sort, that not only in our conversations the fear of God is, alas, far gone from before our eyes, but also the world is grown into that uncharitableness, that one, as it appeareth plainly, goeth about to devour another ; moved with insatiable covetousness, both contrary to God's word and will, and to the extreme peril and damnation of Christ's flock, bought so dearly with his precious blood, and to the utter destruction of this whole common-wealth, except God's anger be shortly appeased ; wherein, as according to my bounden duty I shall, God willing, in my own person be diligent and labour ; so I exhort and require you, first in God's name, and by authority of him committed unto me in that behalf, and also in the king's majesty's name, from whom I have authority and special commandment thus to do, that as you are called to be setters forth of God's word, and to express in your livings the same, so now in your exhortations and sermons you do most wholesomely and earnestly tell unto men their sins, Juxta illud annuncia populo meo scelera eorum, with God's punishments lately poured upon us for the same, now before our eyes ; and specially to beat down and destroy, with all your power and wit, that greedy and devouring serpent of covetousness, that doth so now universally reign : calling upon God for repentance, and provoking to common prayer, and amendment of life, with most earnest petitions, that hereby God's hands may be stayed, the world amended, and obedience of subjects and faithfulness of ministers declared accordingly. Thus I bid you heartily well to fare. From London, July 25, 1551.

Yours in Christ,

Bishop Ridley's Letter to the Protector, concerning the Visitation of the University of Cambridge.

[Ex Chartophylacæo Regio.]

RIGHT HONOURABLE—I wish your grace the holy and wholesome fear of God, because I am persuaded your grace's goodness to be such unfeignedly, that even wherein your grace's letters doth sore blame me, yet in the same the advertisement of the truth shall not displease your grace; and also perceiving that the cause of your grace's discontentation was wrong information, therefore I shall beseech your grace to give me leave to shew your grace wherein it appeareth to me that your grace is wrong informed.

Your grace's letters blameth me, because I did not (at the first, before the visitation began, having knowledge of the matter) shew my mind: the truth is, before God, I never had, nor could get any foreknowledge of the matter, of the uniting of the two colleges, before we had begun, and had entred two days on the visitation, and that your grace may plainly thus well perceive.

A little before Easter, I being at Rochester, received letters from Mr. secretary Smith, and the dean of Paul's, to come to the visitation of the university, and to make a sermon at the beginning thereof; whereupon I sent immediately a servant up to London, to the dean of Paul's, desiring of him to have had some knowledge of things there to be done, because I thought it meet that my sermon should somewhat have savoured of the same.

From Mr. Dean I received a letter, instructing me only that the cause of the visitation was to abolish statutes and ordinances, which maintained papistry, superstition, blindness, and ignorance; and to establish and set forth such as might further God's word and good learning; and else, the truth is, he would shew me nothing, but had me be careless, and said there was informations how all things was for to be done, the which, I take God to witness, I did never see, nor could get knowledge what they were, before we were entred in the visitation two days, although I desired to have seen them in the beginning.

Now, when I had seen the instructions, the truth is, I thought peradventure the master and company would have surrendered up their college; but when their consent, after labour and travel taken therein two days, could not be obtained, and then we began secretly to consult (all the commissioners thinking it best that every man should say his mind plainly, that in execution there might appear but one way to be taken of all), there when it was seen to some, that without the consent of the present incumbents, by the king's absolute power, we might proceed to the uniting of the two colleges, I did in my course simply and plainly declare my conscience, and that there only secretly, among ourselves alone, with all kind of softness, so that no man could be justly offended. Also, I perceive by your grace's letters I have been noted of some for my barking there; and yet to bark, lest God should be offended, I cannot deny; but indeed it is a part of my profession, for God's word condemneth the dumb dogs that will not bark and give warning of God's displeasure.

As for that that was suggested to your grace, that by my aforesaid barking I should dishonour the king's majesty, and dissuade others from the execution of the king's commission, God is my judge, I intended according to my duty to God and the king, the maintenance and defence of his highness' royal honour and dignity. If that be true, that I believe is true, which the prophet saith, Honor Regis Judicium diligit; and as the commissioners must needs, and I am sure will all testify, that I dissuaded no man, but contrariwise, exhorted every man (with the quiet of other) to satisfy their own conscience; desiring only, that if it should otherwise be seen unto them, that I might, either by my absence or silence, satisfy mine. The which my plainness, when some, otherwise than according to my expectation did take, I was moved thereupon (both for the good opinion I had, and yet have, in your grace's goodness; and also specially, because your grace had commanded me so to do) to open my mind, by my private letters, freely unto your grace.

And thus I trust your grace perceiveth now, both that anon, after knowledge had, I did utter my conscience; and also that the matter was not opened unto me before the visitation was two days begun.

If in this I did amiss, that before the knowledge of the instructions I was ready to grant to the execution of the commission, truly, I had rather herein acknowledge my fault, and submit myself to your grace's correction, then after knowledge had, then wittingly and willingly commit that thing wherunto my conscience doth not agree, for fear of God's displeasure.

It is a godly wish that is wished in your grace's letters, that flesh, and blood, and country, might not more weigh with some men than godliness and reason; but the truth is, country in this matter (whatsoever some men do suggest unto your grace) shall not move me; and that your grace shall well perceive; for I shall be as ready as any other first thence to expel some of my own country, if the report which is made of them can be tried true.

And as for that your grace saith of flesh and blood, that is, the favour or fear of mortal man. Yea, marry, sir, that is a matter of weight indeed, and the truth is, (alas! my own feebleness,) of that I am afraid; but I beseech your grace, yet once again, give me good leave, wherein here I fear my own frailty, to confess the truth.

Before God, there is no man this day (leaving the king's majesty for the honour only excepted) whose favour or displeasure I do either seek or fear, as your grace's favour or displeasure; for of God, both your grace's authority and my bound duty for your grace's benefits bind me so to do. So that if the desire of any man's favour, or fear of displeasure, should weigh more with me than godliness and reason, Truly, if I may be bold to say the truth, I must needs say, that I am most in danger to offend herein, either for desire of your grace's favour, or for fear of your grace's displeasure. And yet I shall not cease (God willing) daily to pray God so to stay and strengthen my frailty with holy fear, that I do not commit the thing for favour or fear of any mortal man, whereby my conscience may threaten me with the loss of the favour of the living God, but that it may please him, of his gracious goodness, (howsoever the world goes,) to blow this in the ears of my heart, Deus dissipavit ossa eorum qui hominibus placuerint. And this, Horrendum est incidere in manus Dei viventis. And again, Nolite timere eos qui occidunt corpus.

Wherefore I most humbly beseech your grace, for God's love, not to be offended with me for renewing of this my suit unto your grace, which is that whereunto my conscience cannot well agree; if any such thing chance in this visitation, I may, with your grace's favour, have license, either by mine absence or silence, or other-like means, to keep my conscience quiet. I wish your grace, in God, honour and endless felicity. From Pembroke-hall in Cambridge, June 1, 1549.

Your grace's humble and daily orator,

NICH. ROFFEN.

NUMBER LX.

The Protector's Answer to the former Letter.

[Ex Chartophylac. Regio.]

AFTER our right hearty commendations to your lordship, we have received your letters of the first of June, again replying to those which we last sent unto you. And as it appeareth, ye yet remaining in your former request, desires, if things do occur so, that, according to your conscience, ye cannot do them, that you might absent yourself, or otherwise keep silence. We would be loth anything should be done by the king's majesty's visitors, otherwise than right and conscience might allow and approve: and visitation is to direct things to the better, not to the worse; to ease consciences, not to clog them. Marry, we would wish that executors thereof should not be scrupulous in conscience, otherwise than reason would. Against your conscience it is not our will to move you, as we would not gladly do, or move any man to that which is against right and conscience; and we trust the king's majesty hath not in this matter. And we think in this ye do much wrong, and much discredit the other visitors, that ye should seem to think and suppose that they would do things against conscience. We take them to be men of that honour and honesty, that they will not. My lord of Canterbury hath declared unto us, that this maketh partly a conscience unto you, that divines should be diminished. That can be no cause; for, first, the same was meant before in the late king's time, to unite the two colleges together; as we are sure ye have heard, and sir Edward North can tell: and for that cause, all such as were students of the law, out of the new-erected cathedral church, were disappointed of their livings, only reserved to have been in that civil college. The king's hall being in manner all lawyers, canonists were turned and joined to Michael-house, and made a college of divines, wherewith the number of divines was much augmented, civilians diminished. Now at this present also, if in all other colleges, where lawyers be by the statutes or the king's injunctions, ye do convert them, or the more part of them, to divines, ye shall rather have more divines upon this change than ye had before. The King's college should have six lawyers; Jesus college some; the Queen's college, and other, one or two apiece; and as we are informed by the late king's injunctions, every college in Cambridge one at the least: all these together do make a greater in number than the fellows of Clare-hall be, and they now made divines, and the statutes in that reformed divinity shall not be diminished in number of students, but increased, as appeareth, although these two colleges be so united. And we are sure ye are not ignorant how necessary a study that study of civil law is to all treaties with foreign princes and strangers, and how few there be at this present to do the king's majesty's service therein; for we would the encrease of divines as well as you. Marry, necessity compelleth us also to maintain the science; and we require you, my lord, to have consideration how much you do hinder the king's majesty's proceedings in that visitation, if now you, who are one of the visitors, should thus draw back and discourage the other, ye should much hinder the whole doings; and peradventure that thing known, maketh the master and fellows of Clare-hall to stand the more obstinate; wherefore we require you to have regard of the king's majesty's honour, and the quiet performing of that visitation, most to the glory of God and benefit of that university; the which thing is only meant in your instructions. To the performing of that, and in that manner, we can be content you use your doings as ye think best, for the quieting of your conscience. Thus we bid you right heartily farewell.—From Richmond, the 10th of June, 1549.

Your loving friend,

E. SOMERSET.

A Letter of Cranmer's to King Henry the Eighth, concerning a further Reformation, and against Sacrilege.

[Ex Chartophylac. Regio.]

It may please your highness to be advertised, that forasmuch as I might not tarry myself at London, because I had appointed, the next day after that I departed from your majesty, to be at Rochester, to meet the next morning all the commissioners of Kent at Sittingbourn; therefore the same night that I returned from Hampton-Court to Lambeth, I sent for the bishop of Worcester incontinently, and declared unto him all your majesty's pleasure, in such things as your majesty willed me to be done. And first, where your majesty's pleasure was, to have the names of such persons as your highness, in times past, appointed to make laws ecclesiastical for your grace's realm; the bishop of Worcester promised me, with all speed, to enquire out their names, and the book which they made, and to bring the names, and also the book, unto your majesty, which I trust he hath done before this time.

And as concerning the ringing of bells upon Alhallow-day at night, and covering of images in Lent, and creeping to the cross, he thought it necessary that a letter of your majesty's pleasure therein should be sent by your grace unto the two archbishops, and we to send the same to all other prelates within your grace's realm. And if it be your majesty's pleasure so to do, I have for more speed herein drawn a minute of a letter, which your majesty may alter at your pleasure. Nevertheless, in my opinion, when such things be altered or taken away, there would be set forth some doctrine therewith, which should declare the cause of the abolishing or alteration, for to satisfy the conscience of the people: for if the honouring of the cross, as creeping and kneeling thereunto, be taken away, it shall seem to many that be ignorant that the honour of Christ is taken away, unless some good teaching be set forth withal to instruct them sufficiently therein; which if your majesty command the bishops of Worcester and Chichester, with other your grace's chaplains to make, the people shall obey your majesty's commandment willingly, giving thanks to your majesty that they know the truth, which else they would obey with murmuration and grutching. And it shall be a satisfaction unto all other nations, when they shall see your majesty do nothing but by the authority of God's word, and to the setting forth of God's honour, and not diminishing thereof. And thus Almighty God keep your majesty in his preservation and governance. From my manor at Beckisbourn, the 24th of January, 45.

Your grace's most bounden chaplain and beadsman.

Postscript.

I beseech your majesty that I may be a suitor unto the same, for your cathedral church of Canterbury, who to their great unquietness, and also great charges, do alienate their lands daily, and, as it is said, by your majesty's commandment. But this I am sure, that other men have gotten their best lands, and not your majesty. Wherefore this is mine only suit, that when your majesty's pleasure shall be to have any of their lands, that they may have some letter from your majesty, to declare your majesty's pleasure, without the which they be sworn, that they shall make no alienation. And that the same alienation be not made at other men's pleasures, but only to your majesty's use. For now every man that list to have any of their lands makes suit to get it into your majesty's hands; not that your majesty should keep the same, but by sale, or gift from your majesty, to translate it from your grace's cathedral church unto themselves.

The Draught of a Letter which the King was to send Cranmer against some superstitious practices.

To the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Forasmuch as you, as well in your own name as in the name of the bishops of Worcester and Chichester, and other our chaplains and learned men, whom we appointed with you to peruse certain books of service, which we delivered unto you, moved us, that the vigil and ringing of bells all the night long upon Alhallow-day at night, and the covering of images in the church in the time of Lent, with the lifting up the veil that covereth the cross upon Palm-Sunday, with the kneeling to the cross at the same time, might be abolished and put away, for the superstition, and other enormities and abuses of the same. First, forasmuch as all the vigils of Our Lady, and the apostles, and all other vigils, which in the beginning of the church were godly used, yet for the manifold superstition and abuses which after did grow, by means of the same, they be many years past taken away throughout all Christendom, and there remaineth nothing but the name of the vigil in the calendar, the thing clearly abolished and put away, saving only upon Alhallows-day at night; upon which night is kept vigil, watching, and ringing of bells all the night long. Forasmuch as that vigil is abused as other vigils were, our pleasure is, as you require, that the said vigil shall be abolished as the other be, and that there shall be no watching nor ringing but as be commonly used upon other holy-days at night. We be contented and pleased also, that the images in churches shall not be covered, as hath been accustomed in times past, nor no veil upon the cross, nor no kneeling thereto upon Palm-Sunday, nor any other time. And forasmuch as you make no mention of creeping to the cross, which is a greater abuse than any of the other; for there you say, Crucem tuam adoramus, Domine; and the ordinal saith, Procedant Clerici ad crucem adorandum nudis pedibus; and after followeth in the same ordinal, Ponatur Crux ante aliquod Altare, ubi a populo adoretur; which by your own book, called "A Necessary Doctrine," is against the second commandment. Therefore our pleasure is, that the said creeping to the cross shall likewise cease from henceforth, and be abolished, with the other abuses before rehearsed. And this we will, and straitly command you to signify unto all the prelates and bishops of your province of Canterbury, charging them, in our name, to see the same executed, every one in his diocese, accordingly.

*The Proclamation of Lady Jane Gray's Title to the Crown.

JANE, by the grace of God queen of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and of the church of England, and also of Ireland, under Christ in earth the supreme head. To all our most loving, faithful, and obedient subjects, and to every of them, greeting. Whereas our most dear cousin Edward the 6th, late King of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith; and in earth supreme head, under Christ, of the church of England and Ireland; by his letters patents, signed with his own hand, and sealed with his great seal of England, bearing date the 21st day of June, in the seventh year of his reign; in the presence of the most part of his nobles, his counsellors, judges, and divers other grave and sage personages, for the profit and surety of the whole realm, thereto assenting and subscribing their names to the same, hath, by the same his letters patents, recited, that forasmuch as the imperial crown of this realm, by an act made in the 35th year of the reign of the late king, of worthy memory, king Henry the 8th, our progenitor, and great uncle, was, for lack of issue of his body lawfully begotten; and for lack of issue of the body of our said late cousin king Edward the 6th, by the same act, limited and appointed to remain to the lady Mary his eldest daughter, and to the heirs of her body lawfully begotten: and for default of such issue, the remainder thereof to the lady Elizabeth, by the name of the lady Elizabeth his second daughter, and to the heirs of her body lawfully begotten; with such conditions as should be limited and appointed by the said late king of worthy memory, king Henry the 8th, our progenitor, our great uncle, by his letters patents under his great seal, or by his last will in writing, signed with his hand. And forasmuch as the said limitation of the imperial crown of this realm being limited, as is aforesaid, to the said lady Mary, and lady Elizabeth, being illegitimate, and not lawfully begotten, for that the marriage had, between the said late king, king Henry the 8th, our progenitor, and great uncle, and the lady Katherine, mother to the said lady Mary; and also the marriage had between the said late king, king Henry the 8th, our progenitor, and great uncle, and the lady Ann, mother to the said lady Elizabeth, were clearly and lawfully undone, by sentences of divorce, according to the word of God, and the ecclesiastical laws; and which said several divorcements have been severally ratified and confirmed by authority of parliament, and especially in the 28th year of the reign of king Henry the 8th, our said progenitor, and great uncle, remaining in force, strength, and effect, whereby, as well the said lady Mary, as also the said lady Elizabeth, to all intents and purposes, are, and been clearly disabled, to ask, claim, or challenge the said imperial crown, or any other of the honours, castles, manours, lordships, lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, as heir or heirs to our said late cousin king Edward the 6th, or as heir or heirs to any other person or persons whatsoever, as well for the cause before rehearsed, as also for that the said lady Mary, and lady Elizabeth, were unto our said late cousin but of the half-blood, and therefore by the ancient laws, statutes, and customs of this realm, be not inheritable unto our said late cousin, although they had been born in lawful matrimony ; as indeed they were not, as by the said sentences of divorce, and the said statute of the 28th year of the reign of king Henry the 8th, our said progenitor, and great uncle, plainly appeareth. And forasmuch also, as it is to be thought, or at the least much to be doubted, that if the said lady Mary, or lady Elizabeth, should hereafter have or enjoy the said imperial crown of this realm, and should then happen to marry with any stranger born out of this realm, that then the said stranger, having the government and imperial crown in his hands, would adhere and practise, not only to bring this noble, free realm into the tyranny and servitude of the bishops of Rome, but also to have the laws and customs of his or their own native country or countries, to be practised and put in ure within this realm, rather than the laws, statutes, and customs here of long time used ; whereupon the title of inheritance, of all and singular the subjects of this realm do depend, to the peril of conscience, and the utter subversion of the common-weal of this realm : whereupon our said late dear cousin, weighing and considering within himself which ways and means were most convenient to be had for the stay of the said succession, in the said imperial crown, if it should please God to call our said late cousin out of this transitory life, having no issue of his body ; and calling to his remembrance, that we, and the lady Katherine, and the lady Mary, our sisters (being the daughters of the lady Frances, our natural mother, and then, and yet, wife to our natural and most loving father, Henry duke of Suffolk ; and the lady Margaret, daughter of the lady Elianor, then deceased, sister to the said lady Frances, and the late wife of our cousin Henry earl of Cumberland) were very nigh of his grace's blood, of the part of his father's side, our said progenitor, and great uncle ; and being naturally born here, within the realm ; and for the very good opinion our said late cousin had of our said sisters' and cousin Margaret's good education, did therefore, upon good deliberation and advice herein had, and taken, by his said letters patents, declare, order, assign, limit, and appoint, that if it should fortune himself, our said late cousin king Edward the Sixth, to decease, having no issue of his body lawfully begotten, that then the said imperial crown of England and Ireland, and the confines of the same, and his title to the crown of the realm of France ; and all and singular honours, castles, prerogatives, privileges, preeminencies, and authorities, jurisdictions, dominions, possessions, and hereditaments, to our said late cousin king Edward the Sixth, or to the said imperial crown belonging, or in any-wise appertaining, should, for lack of such issue of his body, remain, come, and be to the eldest son of the body of the said lady Frances, lawfully begotten, being born into the world in his life-time, and to the heirs males of the body of such eldest son lawfully begotten ; and so from son to son, as he should be of vicinity of birth of the body of the said lady Frances, lawfully begotten, being born into the world in our said late cousin's life-time, and to the heirs male of the body of every such son lawfully begotten. And for default of such son born into the world in his life-time, of the body of the said lady Frances, lawfully begotten ; and for lack of heirs males of every such son lawfully begotten, that then the said imperial crown, and all and singular other the premises, should remain, come, and be to us, by the name of the lady Jane, eldest daughter of the said lady Frances, and to the heirs males of our body lawfully begotten, and for lack of such issue, then to the lady Katherine aforesaid, our said second sister, and the heirs male of her body lawfully begotten, with divers other remainders, as by the same letters-patents more plainly and at large it may and doth appear. patents, that is to say, on Thursday, which was the 6th day of this instant month of July, it hath pleased God to call unto his infinite mercy our said most dear and entirely beloved cousin Edward the Sixth, whose soul God pardon ; and forasmuch as he is now deceased, having no heirs of his body begotten ; and that also there remaineth at this present time no heirs lawfully begotten, of the body of our said progenitor, and great uncle, king Henry the Eighth ; and forasmuch also as the said lady Frances, our said mother, had no issue male begotten of her body, and born into the world, in the life-time of our said cousin king Edward the Sixth, so as the said imperial crown, and other the premises to the same belonging, or in any-wise appertaining, now be, and remain to us, in our actual and royal possession, by authority of the said letters patents : we do therefore by these presents signify, unto all our most loving, faithful, and obedient subjects, that like- as we for our part shall, by God's grace, shew ourself a most gracious and benign sovereign queen and lady to all our good subjects, in all their just and lawful suits and causes ; and to the uttermost of our power, shall preserve and maintain God's most holy word, Christian policy, and the good laws, customs, and liberties of these our realms and dominions ; so we mistrust not but they, and every of them, will again, for their parts, at all times, and in all cases, shew themselves unto us, their natural liege queen and lady, most faithful, loving, and obedient subjects, according to their bounden duties and allegiance, whereby they shall please God, and do the things that shall tend to their own preservation and sureties ; willing and commanding all men, of all estates, degrees, and conditions, to see our peace and accord kept, and to be obedient to our laws, as they tender our favour, and will answer for the contrary at their extreme perils. In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patents. Witness ourself, at our Tower of London, the tenth day of July, in the first year of our reign.

God save the Queen.

NUMBER II.

A Letter sent by Queen Katherine, to the Lady Mary her Daughter.

[EX MS. Norfolkianis in Col. Cresham.]

DAUGHTER, I heard such tidings this day, that I do perceive (if it be true) the time is near that Almighty God will provide for you, and I am very glad of it, for I trust that he doth handle you with a good love ; I beseech you agree to his pleasure with a merry heart, and be you sure, that without fail he will not suffer you to perish, if you beware to offend him. I pray God, you good daughter, to offer yourself to him ; if any pangs come to you, shrive yourself, first make yourself clean ; take heed of his commandments, and keep them as near as he will give you grace to do, for then are you sure armed. And if this lady do come to you, as it is spoken, if she do bring you a letter from the king, I am sure, in the self-same letter, you shall be commanded what you shall do. Answer you with few words, obeying the king your father in every thing, save only that you will not offend God, and lose your soul, and go no further with learning and disputation in the matter ; and wheresoever, and in whatsoever company you shall come, obey the king's commandments, speak few words, and meddle nothing. I will send you two books in Latin, one shall be, "De Vita Christi," with the declaration of the gospels ; and the other, "The Epistles of St. Hierome," that he did write always to Paula and Eustochium, and in them trust you shall see good things. And sometimes, for your recreation, use your virginals, or lute, if you have any. But one thing specially I desire you, for the love that you owe unto God and unto me, to keep your heart with a chaste mind, and your body from all ill and wanton company, not thinking or desiring any husband, for Christ's passion; neither determine yourself to any manner of living, until this troublesome time be past, for I dare make you sure that you shall see a very good end, and better than you can desire. I would God, good daughter, that you did know with how good a heart I do write this letter unto you: I never did one with a better, for I perceive very well that God loveth you; I beseech him of his goodness to continue it: and if it shall fortune that you shall have nobody to be with you of your acquaintance, I think it best you keep your keys yourself, for whosoever it is, so shall be done as shall please them. And now you shall begin, and by likelihood I shall follow, I set not a rush by it, for when they have done the uttermost they can, then I am sure of the amendment. I pray you recommend me unto my good lady of Salisbury, and pray her to have a good heart, for we never come to the kingdom of heaven but by troubles. Daughter, wheresoever you become, take no pain to send to me, for if I may I will send to you.

By your loving mother,

KATHERINE THE QUEEN.

NUMBER III.

A humble Submission made by Queen Mary to her Father. Anno 1536.—An Original.

[Cotton Libr. Otho. C. 10.]

Most humbly prostrate before the feet of your most excellent majesty, your most humble, faithful, and obedient subject, which hath so extremely offended your most gracious highness, that mine heavy and fearful heart dare not presume to call you father, nor your majesty hath any cause by my deserts, saving the benignity of your most blessed nature, doth surmount all evils, offences, and trespasses, and is ever merciful and ready to accept the penitent, calling for grace in any convenient time. Having received, this Thursday at night, certain letters from Mr. Secretary, as well advising me to make my humble submission immediately to yourself; which because I durst not, without your gracious license, presume to do before, I lately sent unto him; as signifying that your most merciful heart, and fatherly pity, had granted me your blessing, with condition, that I should persevere in that I had commenced and begun, and that I should not oft-soons offend your majesty by the denial or refusal of any such articles and commandments, as it may please your highness to address unto me, for the perfect trial of my heart and inward affection. For the perfect declaration of the bottom of my heart and stomach:

First, I acknowledge myself to have most unkindly and unnaturally offended your most excellent highness, in that I have not submitted myself to your most just and virtuous law. And for mine offences therein, which I must confess were in me a thousand fold more grievous than they could be in any other living creature, I put myself wholly and entirely to your gracious mercy, at whose hand I cannot receive that punishment for the same that I have deserved.

Secondly, to open mine heart to your grace, in these things which I have heretofore refused to condescend unto, and have now written with mine own hand, sending the same to your highness herewith, I shall never beseech your grace to have pity and compassion of me, if ever you shall perceive that I shall privily or apertly vary or alter from one piece of that I have written and subscribed, or refuse to confirm, ratify, or declare the same, where your majesty shall appoint me.

Thirdly, as I have, and shall, knowing your excellent learning, virtue, wisdom, and knowledge, put my soul into your direction; and by the same hath, and will in all things from henceforth direct my conscience, so my body I do wholly commit to your mercy and fatherly pity, desiring no state, no condition, nor no meaner degree of living, but such as your grace shall appoint me: knowledging and confessing, that my state cannot be so vile, as either the extremity of justice would appoint unto me, or as mine offences have required or deserved.

And whatsoever your grace shall command me to do, touching any of these points, either for things past, present, or to come, I shall as gladly do the same, as your majesty shall command me. Most humbly therefore beseeching your mercy, most gracious sovereign lord and benign father, to have pity and compassion of your miserable and sorrowful child, and with the abundance of your inestimable goodness so to overcome mine iniquity towards God, your grace, and your whole realm, as I may feel some sensible token of reconciliation, which, God is my judge, I only desire, without other respect; to whom I shall daily pray for the preservation of your highness, with the queen's grace, and that it may please him to send you issue.—From Hunsdon, this Thursday, at eleven of the clock at night.

Your grace's most humble and obedient daughter and handmaid,

MARY.

NUMBER IV.

Another of the same strain, confirming the former. An Original.

[Cotton Libr. Otho. C. 10.]

Most humbly, obediently, and gladly lying at the feet of your most excellent majesty, my most dear and benign father, and sovereign lord, I have this day perceived your gracious clemency and merciful pity to have overcome my most unkind and unnatural proceedings towards you, and your most just and virtuous laws. The great and inestimable joy whereof, I cannot express, nor have anything worthy to be again presented to your majesty for the same your fatherly pity extended towards me, most ingratly on my part abandoned, as much as in me lies, but my poor heart, which I send unto your highness to remain in your hand, to be for ever used, directed, and framed, whiles God shall suffer life to remain in it at your only pleasure, most humbly beseeching your grace to accept and receive the same; being all that I have to offer, which shall never alter, vary, or change, from that confession and submission which I have made unto your highness, in the presence of your council, and other attending upon the same; for whose preservation, with my most gracious mother the queen, I shall daily pray to God, whom oft-soons I beseech to send you issue, to his honour, and the comfort of your whole realm.—From Hunsdon, the 26th day of June.

Your grace's most humble and obedient daughter and handmaid,

MARY.

Another Letter written to her Father, to the same purpose.—An Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Otho. C. 10.]

My bounden duty most humbly remembered to your most excellent majesty: whereas I am unable and insufficient to render and express to your highness those most hearty and humble thanks for your gracious mercy and fatherly pity, surmounting mine offences at this time extended towards me, I shall prostrate at your most noble feet, humbly and with the very bottom of my stomach, beseech your grace to repute that in me, which in my poor heart remaining in your most noble hand, I have conceived and professed towards your grace, whiles the breath shall remain in my body; that is, that as I am now in such merciful sort recovered, being more than almost lost with mine own folly, that your majesty may as well accept me justly your bounden slave by redemption, as your most humble, faithful, and obedient child and subject, by the course of nature planted in this your most noble realm; so shall I for ever persevere and continue towards your highness, in such uniformity and due obedience, as I doubt not but, with the help of God, your grace shall see and perceive a will and intent in me, to redouble again that hath been amiss on my behalf, conformably to such words and writings as I have spoken and sent unto your highness, from the which I will never vary during my life, trusting that your grace hath conceived that opinion of me, which to remember is mine only comfort. And thus I beseech our Lord to preserve your grace in health, with my very natural mother the queen, and to send you shortly issue, which I shall as gladly and willingly serve with my hands under their feet, as ever did poor subject their most gracious sovereign.—From Hundson, the 8th day of July.

Your grace's most humble and obedient daughter and handmaid,

MARY.

NUMBER VI.

A Letter written by her to Cromwell, containing a full Submission to the King's Pleasure, in all the Points of Religion.—An Original.

[Cotton Libr. Otho. C. 10.]

GOOD Mr. Secretary, how much am I bound unto you, which have not only travelled, when I was almost drowned in folly, to recover me before I sunk, and was utterly past recovery, and so to present me to the face of grace and mercy; but also desisteth not sithence, with your good and wholesome counsels, so to arm me from any relapse, that I cannot, unless I were too wilful and obstinate, (whereof now there is no spark in me,) fall again into any danger. But leaving the recital of your goodness apart, which I cannot recount; for answer to the particularities of your credence, sent by my friend Mr. Wriothsley; first, concerning the princess, (so I think I must call her yet, for I would be loth to offend,) I offered, at her entry to that name and honour, to call her sister; but it was refused, unless I would also add the other title unto it; which I denied not then more obstinately than I am now sorry for it, for that I did therein offend my most gracious father and his just laws. And now that you think it meet, I shall never call her by other name than sister. Touching the nomination of such women as I would have about me; surely, Mr. Secretary, what men or women soever the king's highness shall appoint to wait on me, without exception, shall be to me right-heartily, and without respect, welcome; albeit, to express my mind to you, whom I think worthy to be accepted for their faithful service done to the king's majesty, and to me, sithence they came into my company, I promise you, on my faith, Margaret Baynton and Susanna Clarencieux have, in every condition, used themselves as faithfully, painfully, and diligently, as ever did women in such a case; as sorry when I was not so conformable as became me, as glad when I inclined anything to my duty as could be devised. One other there is that was sometime my maid, whom, for her virtue, I love, and could be glad to have in my company, that is, Mary Brown, and here be all that I will recommend; and yet my estimation of this shall be measured at the king's highness, my most merciful father's pleasure and appointment, as reason is.

For mine opinion touching pilgrimages, purgatory, reliques, and such-like, I assure you I have none at all, but such as I shall receive from him that hath mine whole heart in keeping, that is, the king's most gracious highness, my most benign father, who shall imprint in the same touching these matters, and all other, what his inestimable virtue, high wisdom, and excellent learning shall think convenient, and limit unto me; to whose presence I pray God I may once come ere I die, for every day is a year till I may have the fruition of it. Beseeching you, good Mr. Secretary, to continue mine humble suit for the same, and for all other things whatsoever they be, to repute my heart so firmly knit to his pleasure, that I can by no means vary from the direction and appointment of the same; and thus mostly heartily fare you well.—From Hundson, this Friday, at ten of the clock at night.

Your assured loving friend, during my life,

MARY.

Letter of Bomber's, upon his being restored to his Bishoprick.—An Original.

To my most loving and dearly beloved friends, my cousin Thomas Shirley, the worshipful Richard Leechmore, and Roger Leechmore his brother.

IN most hearty wise I commend me unto you, as-certaining, that yesterday I was, by sentence, restored again to my bishoprick, and reposed in the same, even as fully as I was at any time before I was deprived; and by the said sentence, my usurper, Dr. Ridley, is utterly repulsed; so that I would ye did order all things at Kidmerly and Bushley at your pleasures, not suffering Sheeps-head, or Ships-side, to be any medler there, or to sell or carry away anything from thence; and I trust, at your coming up now at the parliament, I shall so handle both the said Sheeps-heads, and the other Calves-heads, that they shall perceive their sweet shall not be without sour sauce. This day is looked that Mr. Canterbury must be placed where is meet for him; he is become very humble and ready to submit himself in all things, but that will not serve; in the same predicament is Dr. Smith, my friend, and the dean of Paul's, with others. Commend me to your bed-fellows most heartily, and remember the liquor that I wrote to you for; this bearer shall declare the rest, and also put you in remembrance for beeves and mutons for my house-fare. And thus our blessed Lord long and well keep you all.—Written in haste, this 6th of September.

Assuredly all your own,

The Conclusion of Cardinal Pole's Instructions to Mr. Goldwell, sent by him to the Queen.—An Original.

[Cotton. Libr. Titus. B. 2.]

FOR the conclusion of all that is comprised in your instruction, as that the which containeth the whole sum of my poor advice and counsel, it pleaseth her grace to ask of me, you shall say, that my most humble desire is, that in all deliberation her grace shall make touching the maintenance of her state, the same will ever well ponder and consider, what the providence of God hath shewed therein, above that which hath been shewed in her predecessors, kings of this realm, in this one point; which is to have the crown, not only as a king's daughter and heir, but hath ordered, that this point of right inheritance shall depend as it doth, of the authority he hath given to his church, and of the see of Rome, which is the see apostolick, approving her mother to be legitimate wife of king Henry the Eighth; whereby she is bound, afore God and man, as she will show herself the very daughter of the said king Henry the Eighth, right heir of the crown; so also to shew herself right daughter of the church, and of them that be resident in the see apostolick, who be the right heirs to Peter; to whom, and his successors, Christ, chief head of the church in Heaven and in earth, hath given in earth to bear his place, touching the rule of the same church, and to have the crown thereof; which well considered and pondered, her grace shall soon see how in her person, the providence of God hath joined the right she hath by her father in the realm, with the right of the church, that she cannot prevail by the one, except she join the other withal; and they that will separate these two, take away not only half her right, but her whole right, being not so much heir, because she is king Henry's only daughter, without issue male, as she is his lawful daughter, which she hath by the authority of the church.

Which thing, prudently and godly considered, she cannot but see what faithful counsel this is, that above all acts that in this parliament shall be made, doth advertise her grace to establish that, the which pertaineth to the establishing of the authority of the church, and the see of the same; what rendering to him that is right successor to Peter therein, his right title of head in the church in Earth, without the which she cannot be right head in the realm; and this established, all controversy is taken away; and who will repine unto this, he doth repine unto her right of the crown.

Wherefore this is my first advice, that this point, above all other, should be entreated and enacted in the parliament; and so, I know her grace's full mind was, and is, that it should be: but she feareth difficulties, and hereupon dependeth, that her grace asketh my poor advice, how these difficulties may be taken away.

Unto this you may say, that they must be taken away by the help of him, that by his high providence, above man's expectance, hath given her already the crown. Which will have as well this second act known, of the maintenance thereof to depend of him, as the first in attaining thereto. And to have his help, the mean is by humble prayer, wherein I would advertise her highness, not only to give herself to prayer, but also, by alms to the needy, excitate the minds of others to prayer; these be the means of most efficacy; and with this to take that ardent mind, to establish the authority of the church, casting away all fear of man, that she took to have her crown; and not so much for her own sake, as for the honour of God which gave her the crown. And if any difficulty should be feared in the parliament herein, leave the honour to take away the difficulty thereof to none other, but assume that person to herself, as most bound thereto; and to propone that herself, which I would trust to be of that efficacy, that if inwardly any man will repugn; outwardly the reasons be so evident for this part, that joined with the authority of her person, being proponent, none will be so hardly, temerarious, nor impious, that will resist. And if in this deliberation it should seem strange to put forth these matters in the parliament, as I have said in the instructions, without communicating the same with any of her council, I would think it well her grace might confer it with two of the chiefest that be counted of the people most near her favour, one spiritual, and another temporal; with declaring to them, first, how touching her conscience afore God, and her right afore the world, she can never be quiet until this matter be established touching the authority of the church, requiring their uttermost help in that, as if she should fight for the crown, her majesty may be sure, she putting the same forth with that earnest manner, they will not lack to serve her; and they may serve quickly in the parliament, after her grace hath spoken to prosecute and justify the same, with efficacy of words, to give all others example to follow her grace; leaving this part unto them, that if the name of obedience to the pope should seem to bring, as it were, a yoke to the realm, or any other kind of servitude beside, that it should be profitable to the realm, both afore God and man, that her grace that bringeth it in again, will never suffer it, nor the pope himself requireth no such thing. And herein also, that they say, that my person being the mean to bring it in, would never agree to be an instrument thereof, if I thought any thralldom should come thereby, they shall never be deceived of me. And if they would say beside, I would never have taken this enterprize upon me, except I thought by the same to bring great comfort to the country; wherein the pope's authority being accepted, I would trust, should be so used, that it might be an example of comfort, not only to that country, but to all other that have rejected it afore, and for that cause hath been ever since in great misery.

This is the sum of all my poor advice at this time in this case; whereof I beseech Almighty God so much may take effect, as shall be to his honour, and wealth to her grace, and the whole realm besides. Amen.

A Copy of a Letter, with Articles sent from the Queen's Majesty unto the Bishop of London; and by him and his Officers, at her gracious Commandment, to be put in speedy execution with effect in the whole Diocess, as well in places exempt, as not exempt whatsoever, according to the Tenour and Form of the same.

Sent by the Queen's Majesty's Commandment, in the Month of March, Anno Dom. 1553.

By the Queen.

RIGHT reverend father in God, right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. And whereas heretofore, in the time of the late reign of our most dearest brother, king Edward the Sixth, (whose soul God pardon) divers notable crimes, excesses, and faults, with divers kinds of heresies, simony, advoutry, and other enormities, have been committed within this our realm, and other our dominions; the same continuing yet hitherto in like disorder, since the beginning of our reign, without any correction or reformation at all; and the people, both of the laity and clergy, and chiefly of the clergy, have been given to much insolence and ungodly rate, greatly to the displeasure of Almighty God, and very much to our regret and evil contentation, and to the no little slander of other christian realms, and in a manner to the subversion and clear defacing of this our realm. And remembering our duty to Almighty God, to be to foresee, as much as in us may be, that all vertue and godly living should be embraced, flourish, and encrease. And therewith also, that all vice and ungodly behaviour should be utterly banished and put away; or at the least wise, so nigh as might be, so bridled and kept under, that godliness and honesty might have the overhand: understanding, by very credible report, and publick fame, to our no small heaviness and discomfort, that within your diocess and jurisdictions, as well in not exempted as in exempted places, the like disorder and evil behaviour hath been done and used; like also to continue and encrease, unless due provision be had and made to reform the same, (which earnestly in very deed we do mind and intend) to the uttermost all the ways we can possible, trusting of God's furtherance and help in that behalf. For these causes, and other most just considerations us moving, we send unto you certain articles of such special matter, as among other things be most special and necessary to be now put in execution by you and your officers, extending to the end by us desired, and the reformation aforesaid; wherein ye shall be charged with our special commandments, by these our letters, to the intent you and your officers may the more earnestly and boldly proceed thereunto, without fear of any presumption to be noted on your part, or danger to be incurred of any such our laws, as by your doings, of that is in the said articles contained, might anywise grieve you, whatsoever be threatened in any such case; and therefore we straitly charge and command you, and your said officers, to proceed to the execution of the said articles, without all tract and delay, as ye will answer to the contrary.—Given under our signet, at our palace of Westminster, the 4th day of March, the first year of our reign.

Articles.

1. That every bishop, and his officers, with all other having ecclesiastical jurisdiction, shall, with all speed and diligence, and all manner and ways to them possible, put in execution all such canons and ecclesiastical laws, heretofore in the time of king Henry the Eighth used, within this realm of England, and the dominions of the same, not being direct and expressly contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm.

2. Item. That no bishop, or any his officer, or other person aforesaid hereafter, in any of their ecclesiastical writings, in process, or other extra-judicial acts, do use to put in this clause or sentence, Regia Auctoritate fulcitus.

3. Item. That no bishop, or any his officers, or other person aforesaid, do hereafter exact or demand in the admission of any person to any ecclesiastical promotion, orders, or office, any oath touching the primacy, or succession, as of late in few years passed hath been accustomed and used.

4. Item. That every bishop, and his officers, with all other persons aforesaid, have a vigilant eye, and use special diligence and foresight, that no person be admitted or received to any ecclesiastical function, benefit, or office, being a sacramentary, infected or defamed with any notable kind of heresy, or other great crime; and that the said bishop do stay, and cause to be stayed, as much as lieth in him, that benefices, and ecclesiastical promotions, do not notably decay, or take hinderance, by passing or confirming of unreasonable leases.

5. Item. That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do diligently travel for the repressing of heresies, and notable crimes, especially in the clergy, duly correcting and punishing the same.

6. Item. That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do likewise travel for the condemning and repressing of corrupt and naughty opinions, unlawful books, ballads, and other pernicious and hurtful devices, engendering hatred among the people, and discord amongst the same: and that school-masters, preachers, and teachers, do exercise and use their offices and duties, without teaching, preaching, or setting forth any evil corrupt doctrine; and that doing the contrary, they may be, by the bishop and his said officers, punished and removed.

7. Item. That every bishop, and all the other persons aforesaid, proceeding summarily, and with all celerity and speed, may and shall deprive, or declare deprived, and amove, according to their learning and discretion, all such persons from their benefices and ecclesiastical promotions, who contrary to the state of their order, and the laudable custom of the church, have married, and used women as their wives, or otherwise, notably and slanderously disordered or abused themselves; sequestering also, during the said process, the fruits and profits of the said benefices, and ecclesiastical promotions.

8. Item. That the said bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do use more lenity and clemency with such as have married, whose wives be dead, than with other, whose women do yet remain in life. And likewise such priests, as with the consents of their wives, or women, openly, in the presence of the bishop, do profess to abstain, to be used the more favourably; in which case, after penance effectually done, the bishop, according to his discretion and wisdom, may, upon just consideration, receive, and admit them again to their former administration, so it be not in the same place, appointing them such a portion to live upon, to be paid out of their benefice, whereof they be deprived, by discretion of the said bishop, or his officers, as they shall think may be spared of the said benefice.

9. Item. That every bishop, and all persons aforesaid, do foresee, that they suffer not any religious man, having solemnly professed chastity, to continue with his woman, or wife: but that all such persons, after deprivation of their benefice, or ecclesiastical promotion, be also divorced, every one from his said woman, and due punishment otherwise taken for the offence therein.

10. Item. That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do take order and direction, with the parishioners of every benefice, where priests do want, to repair to the next parish for Divine Service; or to appoint, for a convenient time, till other better provision may be made, one curat to serve Alternis Vicibus, in divers parishes; and to allot to the said curat, for his labour, some portion of the benefice that he so serveth.

11. Item. That all and all manner of processions of the church be used, frequented, and continued, after the old order of the church, in the Latin tongue.

12. Item. That all such holydays and fasting days be observed and kept, as was observed and kept in the late time of king Henry the Eighth.

13. Item. That the laudable and honest ceremonies which were wont to be used, frequented, and observed in the church, be also hereafter frequented, used, and observed.

14. Item. That children be christened by the priest, and confirmed by the bishops, as heretofore hath been accustomed and used.

15. Item. Touching such persons as were heretofore promoted to any orders, after the new sort and fashion of orders, considering they were not ordered in very deed, the bishop of the diocess finding otherwise sufficiency and ability in those men, may supply that thing which wanted in them before, and then, according to his discretion, admit them to minister.

16. Item. That by the bishop of the diocess an uniform doctrine be set forth by homilies, or otherwise, for the good instruction and teaching of all people; and that the said bishop, and other persons aforesaid, do compel the parishioners to come to their several churches, and there devoutly to hear divine service, as of reason they ought.

17. Item. That they examine all schoolmasters and teachers of children, and finding them suspect in any ways to remove them, and place catholick men in their rooms, with a special commandment to instruct their children, so as they may be able to answer the priest at the mass, and so help the priest to mass as hath been accustomed.

18. Item. That the said bishop, and all persons aforesaid, have such regard, respect, and consideration of and for the setting forth of the premises, with all kind of vertue, godly living, and good example, with repressing also and keeping under of vice and unchristiness, as they and every of them may be seen to favour the restitution of true religion; and also to make an honest account and reckoning of their office and cure, to the honour of God, our good contentation, and the profit of this realm, and dominions of the same.

Another Commission to turn out the rest of them.

MARY, by the grace of God, &c. To the right reverend fathers in God, our right trusty and right well-beloved counsellors, Stephen, bishop of Winchester, our chancellor of England; Cuthbert, bishop of Duresm; Edmond, bishop of London; Robert, bishop of St. Asaph; George, bishop of Chichester; our almoner; and Anthony, bishop of Landaff, greeting. Whereas John Tailour, doctor of divinity, naming himself bishop of Lincoln; John Hooper, naming himself bishop of Worcester and Gloucester; John Harley, bishop of Hereford;—having these said several pretended bishopricks given to them by the letters-patents of our late deceased brother, king Edward the Sixth, to have and to hold the same during their good behaviours, with the express clause, (quamdiu se bene gesserint.) have sithence, as hath been credibly brought to our knowledge, both by preaching, teaching, and setting forth of erroneous doctrine, and also by inordinate life and conversation, contrary both to the laws of Almighty God and use of the universal Christian church, declared themselves very unworthy of that vocation and dignity in the church.

We minding to have these several cases duly heard and considered, and thereupon such order taken with them as may stand with justice and the laws, have, for the special trust we have conceived of your wisdoms, learning, and integrity of life, appointed you, four, three, or two of you, to be our commissioners in this behalf: giving unto you four, three, or two of you, full power and authority to call before you, if ye shall think so good, the said John Tailour, John Hooper, John Harley, and every of them. And thereupon, either by order of the ecclesiastical laws, or of the laws of our realm, or of both, proceed to the declaring the said bishoprics to be void, as they be already indeed void. To the intent some such other meet personages may be elected thereunto, as for their godly life, learning, and sobriety, may be thought worthy the places. In witness, &c. Apud Westm. 15 die Martii.

A Letter of the Queen's, to the Justices of the Peace in Norfolk.

MARY THE QUEEN—Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. And whereas we have heretofore signified our pleasure, both by our proclamation general, and by our letters to many of you, particularly for the good order and stay of that our county of Norfolk, from rebellions, tumults, and uproars; and to have a special regard to vagabonds, and to such as did spread any vain prophesies, seditious, false, or untrue rumours, and to punish them accordingly; we have nevertheless, to our no small grief, sundry intelligences, of divers and sundry lewd and seditious tales, forged and spread by certain malicious persons, touching the estate of our person; with many other vain and slanderous reports, tending to the moving of sedition and rebellion, whose fault, and passing unpunished, seemeth either to be winked at, or at least little considered, which is to us very strange. We have therefore thought good, effects, to require and command you, to be not only more circumspect in the good ordering of that our county, according to our trust conceived of you, but also to use all the best means and ways ye can, in the diligent examining and searching out, from man to man, the authors and publishers of these vain prophesies, and untrue bruits, the very foundation of all rebellions: and the same being found, to punish them as the quality of their offence shall appear to you to deserve; whereby the malicious sort may be the more feared to attempt the like, and our good loving subjects live in more quiet. And for our better service in this behalf, we think good that ye divide yourselves unto several parts of that our county, so that every of you have some part in charge, whereby ye may the better butt out the malicious; and yet nevertheless to meet often together for the better conferring herein. And that ye signify your doings, and the state of that shire, by your general letters, once every month at least, to our privy council. And like-as we shall consider such of you to your advancements, whose diligence shall set forwards our service in this part, so shall we have good cause to note great negligence and fault in them that shall omit their duty in this behalf.—Given under our signet, at our manor of St. James, the 23rd of May, in the first year of our reign.

And the said bishop withal, desireth all people to understand, that whatsoever opinion, good or bad, hath been received of him, or whatsoever usage or custom hath been heretofore, his only intent and purpose, is to do his duty charitably, and with that love, favour, and respect, both towards God and every christian person, which any bishop should shew to his flock in anywise.

An Address made by the Lower House of Convocation to the Upper House.

[Ex MS. Col. Col. C. Cant.]

RIGHT REVEREND FATHERS IN GOD—We the clergy of the province of Canterbury, of the lower house, do most humbly pray your good lordships, that touching the submission and order of the lands and possessions which sometimes did appertain to divers bishops, cathedral churches, and to the late suppressed monasteries, priories, colleges, chauntries, and free chapels and other churches within this realm, and be now in the possession of the temporality, that it may please your good lordships, by your discreet wisdoms, to foresee and provide, that by this our grant, nothing pass which may be prejudicial or hurtful to any bishop, or other ecclesiastical person, or their successors, for or concerning any action, right, title, or interest, which by the laws of this realm are already grown, or may hereafter grow or rise to them, or any of them, and their successors, for any lands, teneuments, pensions, portions, tithes, rents, reversions, service, or other hereditaments, which sometime appertained to the said bishops, or other ecclesiastical persons, in the right of their churches, or otherwise, but that the same right, title, and interest, be safe and reserved to them, and every of them and their successors, according to the said laws.

And further, whereas in the statute passed in the first year of Edward the Sixth, for the suppressing of all colleges, &c., proviso was made by the said statute in respect of the same surrender, that schools and hospitals should have been erected and founded in divers parts of this realm, for the good education of youth in vertue and learning, and the better sustentation of the poor; and that other works, beneficial for the common-weal, should have been executed, which hitherto be not performed, according to the meaning of the said statute, it may please your good lordships to move the king's and the queen's most royal majesty, and the lord cardinal, to have some special consideration for the due performance of the premises; and that as well the same may the rather come to pass, as the church of England, which heretofore hath been honourably endowed with lands and possessions, may have some recovery of so notable damages and losses which she hath sustained.

It may please their highness, with the assent of the lords and commons in this parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, to repeal, make frustrate and void, the statute of mortmayn, made in the seventh year of Edward the First, otherwise intituled "De Religiosis," and the statute concerning the same, made the fifteenth year of king Richard the Second. And all and every other statute and statutes at any time heretofore made concerning the same. And forasmuch as tithes and oblations have been at all times assigned and appointed for the sustentation of ecclesiastical ministers; and in consideration of the same, their ministry and office, which as yet cannot be executed by any lay person, so it is not meet that any of them should perceive, possess, or enjoy the same; that all impropriations, now being in the hands of any lay person or persons, and impropriations made to any secular use, other than for the mainte-

A Letter of the Queen's, recommending the promotion of Cardinal Pole to the Popedom ; written to the Bishop of Winchester, the Earl of Arundel, and the Lord Paget, then at Calais.—An Original.

MARY THE QUEEN—Right reverend Father in God, right trusty and right well-beloved Counsellor ; and right trusty and right well-beloved Cousin and Counsellors, and right trusty and well-beloved Counsellors, We greet you well. And where we do consider that Christ's Catholick Church, and the whole state of Christendom, having been of late so sundry ways vexed, it should greatly help to further some quiet stay and redress of that is amiss, if at this time, of the pope's holiness election, some such godly, learned, and well-disposed person may be chosen to that place, as shall be given to see good order maintained, and all abuses in the church reformed ; and known besides, to the world, to be of godly life and disposition. And remembering, on the other side, the great inconveniency that were like to arise to the state of the Church, if (worldly respects being only weighed in this choice) any such should be preferred to that room, as wanting those godly qualities before remembered, might give any occasion of the decay of the catholick faith ; we cannot, for the discharge of our duty to God and the world, but both earnestly wish, and carefully travel, that such a one may be chosen, and that without long delay or contention, as for all respects may be most fittest to occupy that place, to the furtherance of God's glory, and quietness of Christendom. And knowing no person in our mind more fit for that purpose than our dearest cousin the lord cardinal Pole, whom the greatest part of Christendom hath heretofore for his long experience, integrity of life, and great learning, thought meet for that place, we have thought good to pray you, that taking some good occasion for that purpose you do, in our name, speak with the cardinal of Lorraine, and the constable, and the rest of the commissioners of our good brother, the French king, praying them to recommend unto our said good brother, in our name, our said dearest cousin, to be named by him to such cardinals as be at his devotion, so as the rather, by his good furtherance and means, this our motion may take place. Whereunto if it shall please him to give his assent, like-as upon knowledge thereof, we shall, for our part, also labour to set forwards the matter the best we may ; so doubt we not, but if this our good purpose take effect, both he, and we, and the rest of all Christendom, shall have good cause to give God thanks, and rejoice thereat. Assuring him, that if we had in our conscience thought any other person more fit for that place than our said dearest cousin, we would not, for any private affection, have preferred his advancement, before God's glory, and the benefit of Christendom : the furtherance whereof is (we take God to record) the only thing we seek herein, which moveth us to be the more earnest in this matter. The overture whereof we have taken in hand (as you may assure them on our honour) without our said dearest cousin's other knowledge or consent. And because we need not to remember the wisdom, sincerity of life, and other godly parts, wherewith Almighty God hath endowed our said dearest cousin, the same being well enough known to our said good brother, and his said commissioners, and the rest of the world ; we do refer the manner of the opening and handling of the rest of the matter unto your own wisdoms ; praying you, we may understand from you, as soon as ye may, what answer ye shall have received herein at the said commissioners hands.

An Order prescribed by the King and Queen's Majesties, unto the Justices of Peace of the County of Norfolk, for the good government of their Majesties' loving Subjects within the same Shire.—March 25, 1555.—An Original.

PHILIP R., MARY the Queen.—First, the said justices of the peace assembling themselves together, and consulting by what good means, good order and quietness may be best continued, shall after divide themselves into eight, ten or twelve parts, more or less, as to their discretions, having regard to the quantity of the shire, and number of themselves, shall seem most convenient; endeavouring themselves, besides their general care, that every particular number may give diligent heed, within their limits appointed to them, for conservation of quietness and good order.

Item. The said justices of the peace shall not only be aiding and assisting unto such preachers as be or shall be sent unto the said county, but shall also be themselves present at sermons, and use the preachers reverently, travelling soberly with such, as by abstaining from coming to the church, or by any other open doings, shall appear not persuaded to conform themselves, and to use such as be wilful and obstinate more roundly, either by rebuking them, or binding them to good hearing, or committing them to prison, as the quality of the persons, and circumstance of their doings, may seem to deserve.

Item. Amongst all other things, they must lay special weight upon those which be preachers and teachers of heresy, or procurers of secret meetings for that purpose.

Item. The said justices of the peace, and every of them, must by themselves, their wives, children, and servants, shew good example; and if they shall have any of their own servants faulty, they must first begin to reform them.

Item. The said justices of the peace, and every of them, shall, as much as in them lieth, procure to search out all such as shall by any means spread false tales or seditious rumours, causing them, when they shall be known, to be further apprehended and punished according to the laws.

Item. They shall procure to have in every parish, or part of the shire, as near as may be, some one or more honest men, secretly instructed, to give information of the behaviour of the inhabitants amongst, nigh, or about them.

Item. They shall charge the constables, and four or more of the most honest and catholick of every parish, with the order of the same parish, unto whom idle men, vagabonds, and such as may be probably suspected, shall be bound to give a reckoning how they live, and where they shall be come from time to time.

Item. They shall have earnest regard to the execution and keeping of the statutes against rebellious vagabonds and reteinours, ale-houses, and for keeping of the statute of huy-and-cry; and shall give order for keeping of good and substantial watches, in places convenient, the same to begin the 20th day of April next.

Item. As soon as any offenders for murder, felony, or other offences shall be taken, the said justices of the peace shall cause the matter to be forthwith examined and ordered, as to justice shall appertain, according to the tenour of the commission of Oyer and Terminer, addressed presently unto them for that purpose.

Finally, The said justices of peace shall meet and consult together, at the sessions, at the least once every month, and more often, as occasion may require, conferring among themselves upon the state of all particular parts of the shire, and taking such order for all misorders, as to their wisdoms may seem requisite.

A Letter written by the King and Queen, requiring the Bishop of London to go on in the Prosecution of the Heretics.

[Regist. Bon. Fol. 363.]

PHILIP R., MARY the Queen.—Right reverend father in God, right trusty and well-beloved, We greet you well. And where of late we addressed our letters unto the justices of the peace within every of the counties of this our realm, whereby, amongst other instructions given therein, for the good order and quiet government of the country about, therein they are willed to have a special regard unto such disordered persons, as, forgetting their duties towards Almighty God and us, do lean to any erroneous and heretical opinions, to shew themselves conformable to the catholick religion of Christ's church; whom, if they cannot by good admonition and fair means reform, they are willed to deliver unto the ordinary, to be by him charitably travelled withal, and removed (if it may be) from their naughty opinions; or else, if they continue obstinate, to be ordered according to the laws provided in that behalf: understanding now, to our no little marvel, that divers of the said disordered persons, being by the justices of the peace for their contempt and obstinacy brought to the ordinaries to be used as is aforesaid, are either refused to be received at their hands, or if they be received, are neither so travelled with as christian charity requireth, nor yet proceeded withal according to the order of justice, but are suffered to continue in their errors, to the dishonour of Almighty God, and dangerous example of others. Like-as we find this matter very strange, so have we thought convenient, both to signify this our knowledge, and therewith also to admonish you, to have in this behalf such regard henceforth to the office of a good pastor and bishop, as when any such offenders shall be by the said justices of peace brought unto you, ye do use your good wisdom and discretion, in procuring to remove them from their errors, if it may be, or else in proceeding against them (if they shall continue obstinate) according to the order of the laws; so as through your good furtherance, both God's glory may be the better advanced, and the commonwealth the more quietly governed.

Sir T. More's Letter to Cromwell, concerning the Nun of Kent.

[Ex MS. Norfolkian in Col. Gresham.]

RIGHT WORSHIPFUL.—After my most hearty recommendation, with like thanks for your goodness, in accepting of my rude long letter, I perceive, that of your further goodness and favour towards me, it liked your mastership to break with my son Roper, of that, that I had had communication, not only with divers that were of acquaintance with the lewd nun of Canterbury, but also with herself; and had, over that, by my writing, declaring favour towards her, given her advice and counsel; of which my demeanour, that it liketh you to be content to take the labour and the pain to hear, by mine own writing, the truth, I very heartily thank you, and reckon myself therein right deeply beholden to you.

It is, I suppose, about eight or nine years ago sith I heard of that housewife first; at which time the bishop of Canterbury that then was (God assoil his soul) sent unto the king's grace a roll of paper, in which were written certain words of hers, that she had, as report was then made, at sundry times spoken in her trances; whereupon it pleased the king's grace to deliver me the roll, commanding me to look thereon, and afterwards shew him what I thought therein. Whereunto, at another time, when his highness asked me, I told him, that in good faith I found nothing in these words that I could anything regard or esteem; for seeing that some part fell in rithm, and that, God wots, full rude also; for any reason, God wots, that I saw therein, a right simple woman might, in my mind, speak it of her own wit well enough. Howbeit, I said, that because it was constantly reported for a truth, that God wrought in her, and that a miracle was shewed upon her; I durst not, nor would not, be bold in judging the matter. And the king's grace, as me thought, esteemed the matter as light as it after proved lewd.

From that time, till about Christmas was twelvemonth, albeit that continually there was much talking of her, and of her holiness, yet never heard I any talk rehearsed, either of revelation of hers, or miracle, saying that I heard say divers times, in my lord cardinal's days, that she had been both with his lordship, and with the king's grace, but what she said, either to the one or to the other, upon my faith, I had never heard any one word. Now, as I was about to tell you, about Christmas was twelvemonth, Father Risby, friar observant, then of Canterbury, lodged one night at mine house; where, after supper, a little before he went to his chamber, he fell in communication with me of the nun, giving her high commendation of holiness, and that it was wonderful to see and understand the works that God wrought in her; which thing, I answered, that I was very glad to hear it, and thanked God thereof. Then he told me, that she had been with my lord Legat in his life, and with the king's grace too; and that she had told my lord Legat a revelation of hers, of three swords that God hath put in my lord Legat's hand, which if he ordered not well, God would lay sore to his charge. The first, he said, was the ordering the spirituality under the pope, as Legat. The second, the rule that he bore in order of the temporality under the king, as his chancellor. And the third, she said, was the meddling he was put in trust with by the king, concerning the great matter of his marriage. And therewithal I said unto him, that any revelation of the king's matters I would not hear of, I doubt not but the goodness of God should direct his highness, with his grace and wisdom, that the thing should take such end as God should be pleased with, to the king's honour, and surety of the realm. When he heard me say these words, or the like, he said unto me, that God had specially commanded her to pray for the king; and forthwith he brake again into her revelations concerning the cardinal, that his soul was saved by her meditation; and without any other communication went unto his chamber. And he and I never talked any more of any such manner of matter, nor since his departing on the morrow, I never saw him afterwards, to my remembrance, till I saw him at Paul's Cross.

After this, about Shrovetide, there came unto me, a little before supper, Father Rich, friar observant of Richmond; and as we fell in talking, I asked him of Father Risby, how he did. And upon that occasion, he asked me, whether Father Risby had any thing shewed me of the holy nun of Kent; and I said, yea; and that I was very glad to hear of her virtue. I would not, quoth he, tell you again that you have heard of him already; but I have heard, and known, many great graces that God hath wrought in her, and in other folk by her, which I would gladly tell you, if I thought you had not heard them already. And therewith he asked me, whether Father Risby had told me any thing of her being with my Lord Cardinal; and I said, yea: Then he told you, quoth he, of the three swords: Yea, verily, quoth I. Did he tell you, quoth he, of the revelations that she had concerning the king's grace? Nay, forsooth, quoth I, nor if he would have done, I would not have given him the hearing; nor verily no more I would indeed, for sith she hath been with the king's grace her self, and told him, me-thought it a thing needless to tell me, or to any man else. And when Father Rich perceived that I would not hear her revelations concerning the king's grace, he talked on a little of her virtue, and let her revelations alone; and therewith my supper was set upon the board, where I required him to sit with me; but he would in no wise tarry, but departed to London. After that night I talked with him twice, once in mine own house, another time in his own garden at the Friars, at every time a great space, but not of any revelations touching the king's grace, but only of other mean folk, I knew not whom of, which things, some were very strange, and some were very childish. But albeit, that he said, he had seen her lie in her trance in great pains, and that he had at other times taken great spiritual comfort in her communication; yet did he never tell me that she had told him those tales her self; for if he had, I would, for the tale of Mary Magdalene which he told me, and for the tale of the Hostie, with which as I have heard she said she was houseled at the king's mass at Calice: If I had heard it of him, as told unto himself by her mouth for a revelation, I would have both liked him and her the worse. But whether ever I heard the same tale of Rich or of Risby, or of neither of them both, but of some other man since she was in hold, in good faith I cannot tell; but I wot well when or wheresoever I heard it, me thought it a tale too marvellous to be true, and very likely that she had told some man her dream, which told it out for a revelation. And in effect, I little doubted but that some of these tales that were told of her were untrue; but yet sith I never heard them reported as spoken by her own mouth, I thought nevertheless that many of them might be true, and she a very vertuous woman too; as some lyes be peradventure written of some that be saints in heaven, and yet many miracles indeed done by them for all that.

After this, I being upon a day at Sion, and talking with divers of the fathers together at the grate, they shewed me that she had been with them, and shewed me divers things that some of them misliked in her; and in this talking, they wished that I had spoken with her, and said, they would fain see how I should like her. Whereupon, afterward, when I heard that she was there again, I came thither to see her, and to speak with her my self. At which communication had, in a little chappel, there were none present but we two: in the beginning whereof, I shewed that my coming to her was not of any curious mind, any think to know of such things as folk talked, that it pleased God to reveal and shew unto her, but for the great virtue that I had heard so many years, every day more and more spoken and reported of her; I therefore had a great mind to see her, and be acquainted with her, that she might have somewhat the more occasion to remember me to God in her devotion and prayers: whereunto she gave me a very good virtuous answer, that as God did of his goodness far better by her than she, a poor wretch, was worthy, so she feared that many folk yet beside that spoke of their own favourable minds many things for her far above the truth, and that of me she had many such things heard, that already she prayed for me, and ever would; whereof I heartily thanked her. I said unto her, Madam, one Helen, a maiden dwelling about Totnam, of whose trances and revelation there hath been much talking, she hath been with me of late, and shewed me that she was with you, and that after the rehearsal of such visions as she had seen you shewed her, that they were no revelations, but plain illusions of the devil, and advised her to cast them out of her mind: and verily she gave therein good credence unto you, and thereupon hath left to lean any longer unto such visions of her own: whereupon she saith she findeth your words true, for ever since she hath been the less visited with such things as she was wont to be before. To this she answered me, Forsooth, sir, there is in this point no praise unto me, but the goodness of God, as it appeareth, hath wrought much meekness in her soul, which hath taken my rude warning so well, and not grudged to hear her spirit and her visions reproved. I liked her, in good faith, better for this answer, than for many of these things that I heard reported by her. Afterward she told me, upon that occasion, how great need folk have, that are visited with such visions, to take heed, and prove well of what spirit they come of; and in that communication she told me, that of late the devil, in likeness of a bird, was flying and fluttering about her in a chamber, and suffered himself to be taken; and being in hands, suddenly changed, in their sight that were present, into such a strange ugly-fashioned bird, that they were all afraid, and threw him out at a window.

For conclusion; we talked no word of the king's grace, or any great personage else, nor in effect of any man or woman but of herself and myself; but after no long communication had, for or ever we met, my time came to go home, I gave her a double ducat, and prayed her to pray for me and mine, and so departed from her, and never spake with her after. Howbeit, of a truth, I had a great good opinion of her, and had her in great estimation, as you shall perceive by the letter that I wrote unto her. For afterwards, because I had often heard that many right worshipful folks, as well men as women, used to have much communication with her; and many folk are of nature inquisitive and curious, whereby they fall sometimes into such talking, and better were to forbear, of which thing I nothing thought while I talked with her of charity, therefore I wrote her a letter thereof; which sith it may be peradventure that she brake or lost, I shall insert the very copy thereof in this present letter.

These were the very words.

Good madam, and my right dearly-beloved sister in our Lord God, after most hearty commendation, I shall beseech you to take my good mind in good worth, and pardon me, that I am so homely as of myself, unrequired, and also without necessity, to give counsel to you, of whom, for the good inspirations and great revelations that it liketh Almighty God of his goodness to give and shew, as many wise, well-learned, and very virtuous folk testify, I myself have need, for the comfort of my soul, to require and ask advice. For surely, good madam, sith it pleased God sometime to suffer, such as are far under and of little estimation, to give yet fruitful advertisement to such other as are in the light of the Spirit so far above them, that there were between them no comparison; as he suffered his high prophet Moses to be in some things advised and counselled by Jethro, I cannot, for the love that in our Lord I bear you, refrain to put you in remembrance of one thing, which in my poor mind I think highly necessary to be by your wisdom considered, referring the end, and the order thereof, to God and his Holy Spirit, to direct you. Good madam, I doubt not but that you remember that in the beginning of my communication with you, I shewed you, that I neither was, nor would be, curious of any knowledge of other men's matters, and least of all of any matter of princes, or of the realm, in case it so were, that God had, as to many good folks before-time, he hath any time revealed unto you such things, I said unto your ladyship, that I was not only not desirous to hear of, but also would not hear of. Now, madam, I consider well that many folk desire to speak with you, which are not all peradventure of my mind in this point; but some hap to be curious and inquisitive of things that little pertain unto their parts; and some might peradventure hap to talk of such things as might peradventure after turn to much harm; as I think you have heard how the late duke of Buckingham moved with the fame of one that was reported for an holy monk, and had such talking with him, as after was a great part of his destruction, and disheriting of his blood, and great slander and infamy of religion. It sufficeth me, good madam, to put you in remembrance of such things, as I nothing doubt your wisdom, and the Spirit of God shall keep you from talking with any person, specially with high persons, of any such manner things as pertain to princes' affairs, or the state of the realm, but only to commune and talk with any person, high and low, of such manner things as may to the soul be profitable for you to shew, and for them to know. And thus, my good lady, and dearly beloved sister in our Lord, I make an end of this my needless advertisement unto you, whom the blessed Trinity preserve and increase in grace, and put in your mind to recommend me and mine unto him in your devout prayers.—At Chelsey, this Tuesday, by the hand of your hearty loving brother and beadsman,

THOMAS MORE, Kt.

At the receipt of this letter, she answered my servant, that she heartily thanked me: soon after this there came to mine house the prior of the Charterhouse at Schene, and one brother Williams with him, who nothing talked to me but of her, and of the great joy that they took in her virtue, but of any of her revelations they had no communication. But at another time brother Williams came to me, and told me a long tale of her being at the house of a knight in Kent, that was sore troubled with temptations to destroy himself; and none other thing we talked of, nor should have done of likelihood, though we had tarried together much longer, he took so great pleasure, good man, to tell the tale, with all the circumstances at length. When I came again another day to Sion, on a day in which there was a procession, some of the fathers asked me how I liked the nun; and I answered, that, in good faith, I liked her very well in her talking; howbeit, quoth I, she is never the nearer tried by that, for I assure you, she were likely to be very bad, if she seemed good, ere I should think her other, till she happened to be proved naught; and in good faith, that is my manner indeed, except I were set to search and examine the truth, upon likelihood of some cloaked evil; for in that case, although I nothing suspected the person myself, yet so less than if I suspected him sore, I would, as far as my wit would serve me, search to find out the truth, as yourself hath done very prudently in this matter; wherein you have done, in my mind, to your great laud and praise, a very meritorious deed, in bringing forth to light such detestable hypocrisy, whereby every other wretch may take warning, and be feared to set forth their own devilish dissembled falsehood, under the manner and colour of the wonderful work of God; for verily this woman so handled herself, with help of that evil spirit that inspired her, that after her own confession declared at Paul's Cross, when I sent word by my servant unto the prior of the Charterhouse, that she was undoubtedly proved a false deceiving hypocrite; the good man had had so good opinion of her so long, that he could at the first scantily believe me therein. Howbeit it was not he alone that thought her so very good, but many another right good man besides, as little marvel was upon so good report, till she was proved naught.

I remember me further, that in communication between father Rich and me; I counselled him, that in such strange things as concerned such folk as had come unto her, to whom, as she said, she had told the causes of their coming ere themselves spake thereof; and such good fruit as they said that many men had received by her prayer, he, and such other as so reported it, and thought that the knowledge thereof should much pertain to the glory of God, should first cause the things to be well and sure examined by the ordinaries, and such as had authority thereunto; so that it might be surely known whether the things were true or not, and that there were no letters intermingled among them, or else the letters might after hap to aweigh the credence of these things that were true. And when he told me the tale of Mary Magdalen, I said unto him, Father Rich, that she is a good virtuous woman, in good faith, I hear so many good folk so report that I verily think it true; and think it well-likely that God worketh some good and great things by her; but yet are, you wot well, these strange tales no part of our creed; and therefore, before you see them surely proved, you shall have my poor counsel, not to wed yourself so far forth to the credence of them, as to report them very surely for true, least that if it should hap that they were afterwards proved false, it might minish your estimation in your preaching, whereof might grow great loss. To this he thanked me for my counsel, but how he used it after that I cannot tell.

Thus have I, good Mr. Cromwell, fully declared to you, as far as myself can call to remembrance, all that ever I have done or said in this matter, wherein I am sure that never one of them all shall tell you any further thing of effect; for if any of them, or any man else, report of me, as I trust verily no man will, and I wot well truly no man can, any word or deed by me spoken or done, touching any breach of my legal truth and duty toward my most redoubted sovereign, and natural liege lord, I will come to mine answer, and make it good in such wise as becometh a poor true man to do; that whosoever any such thing shall say, shall therein say untrue: for I neither have in this matter done evil, nor said evil, nor so much as any evil thing thought, but only have been glad, and rejoiced of them that were reported for good; which condition I shall nevertheless keep toward all other good folk, for the false cloaked hypocrisy of any of these, no more than I shall esteem Judas the true apostle, for Judas the false traitor.

But so purpose I to bear myself in every man's company, while I live, that neither good man nor bad, neither monk, friar, nor nun, nor other man or woman in this world, shall make me digress from my truth and faith, either towards God, or towards my natural prince, by the grace of Almighty God; and as you therein find me true, so I heartily therein pray you to continue toward me your favour and good-will, as you shall be sure of my poor daily prayer; for other pleasure can I not do you. And thus the blessed Trinity, both bodily and ghostly, long preserve and prosper you.

I pray you pardon me that I write not unto you of mine own hand, for verily I am compelled to forbear writing for a while, by reason of this disease of mine, whereof the chief occasion is grown, as it is thought, by the stooping and leaning on my breast, that I have used in writing. And thus, oft-soons, I beseech our Lord long to preserve you.

NUMBER XXII.

Directions of Queen Mary to her Council, touching the Reformation of the Church, out of her own Original.

[Ex MS. D. G. Petyte.]

FIRST, That such as had commission to talk with my lord cardinal at his first coming, touching the goods of the church, should have recourse unto him, at the least once in a week, not only for putting these matters in execution, as much as may be, before the parliament, but also to understand of him which way might be best to bring to good effect those matters that have been begun concerning religion, both touching good preaching. I wish that may supply and overcome the evil preaching in time past; and also to make a sure provision, that no evil books shall either be printed, bought or sold, without just punishment. Therefore I think it should be well done, that the universities and churches of this realm should be visited by such persons as my lord cardinal, with the rest of you, may be well assured to be worthy and sufficient persons to make a true and just account thereof, remitting the choice of them to him and you. Touching punishment of hereticks, methinketh it ought to be done without rashness, not leaving in the mean while to do justice to such, as by learning would seem to deceive the simple; and the rest so to be used, that the people might well perceive them not to be condemned without just occasion, whereby they shall both understand the truth, and beware to do the like. And especially in London I would wish none to be burnt, without some of the council's presence, and both there and every-where good sermons at the same. I verily believe that many benefices should not be in one man's hand, but after such sort as every priest might look to his own charge, and remain resident there, whereby they should have but one bond to discharge towards God; whereas now they have many, which I take to be the cause that in most part of this realm there is over-much want of good preachers, and such as should with their doctrine overcome the evil diligence of the abused preachers in the time of schism, not only by their preaching, but also by their good example, without which, in mine opinion, their sermons shall not so much profit as I wish. And like-as their good example, on their behalf, shall undoubtedly do much good, so I account myself bound, on my behalf also, to shew such example, in encouraging and maintaining those persons, well-doing their duty, (not forgetting, in the mean while, to correct and punish them which do contrary,) that it may be evident to all this realm how I discharge my conscience therein, and minister true justice in so doing.

Injunctions by Hugh Latimer, Bishop of Worcester, to the Prior and Convent of St. Mary House, in Worcester, 1537.

Hugh, by the goodness of God, Bishop of Worcester, wisheth to his brethren, the prior and convent aforesaid, grace, mercy, peace, and true knowledge of God's word; from God our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ.

FORASMUCH as in this my visitation I evidently perceive the ignorance and negligence of divers religious persons in this monastery to be intolerable, and not to be suffered; for that thereby doth reign idolatry and many kinds of superstitions, and other enormities; and considering withal that our sovereign lord the king, for some part of remedy of the same, hath granted, by his most gracious license, that the Scripture of God may be read in English, of all his obedient subjects; I therefore, willing your reformation in most favourable manner, to your least displeasure, do heartily require you all, and every one of you, and also in God's behalf command the same, according as your duty is, to obey me as God's minister and the king's, in all my lawful and honest commandments; that you observe and keep inviolably all these injunctions following, under pain of the law.

First. Forasmuch as I perceive that some of you neither have observed the king's injunctions, nor yet have them with you, as willing to observe them; therefore ye shall from henceforth both have and observe diligently and faithfully, as well special commandments of preaching as other injunctions given in his grace's visitation.

Item. That the prior shall provide, of the monastery's charge, a whole Bible in English, to be laid fast chained in some open place, either in their church or cloister.

Item. That every religious person have, at the least, a New Testament in English, by the feast of the nativity of our Lord next ensuing.

Item. Whensoever there shall be any preaching in your monastery, that all manner of singing and other ceremonies be utterly laid aside in his preaching time; and all other service shortened, as need shall be; and all religious persons quietly to hearken to the preaching.

Item. That ye have a lecture of Scripture read every day in English amongst you, save holydays.

Item. That every religious person be at every lecture, from the beginning to the ending, except they have a necessary lett allowed them by the prior.

Item. That every religious house have a layman to their steward, for all former businesses.

Item. That you have a continual schoolmaster, sufficiently learned, to teach your grammar.

Item. That no religious person discourage any manner of layman or woman, or any other, from the reading of any good book, either in Latin or English.

Item. That the prior have at his dinner or supper every day a chapter read, from the beginning of the Scripture to the end, and that in English, wheresoever he be in any of his own places, and to have edifying communication of the same.

Item. That the convent sit together, four to one mess, and to eat together in common, and to have Scripture read in like wise, and have communication thereof; and after their dinner or supper, their reliques and fragments to be distributed to the poor people.

Item. That the convent and prior provide distributions to be ministered in every parish, whereas ye be parsons and proprietaries, and according to the king's injunctions in that behalf.

Item. That all these my injunctions be read every month once in the chapter-house, before all the brethren.

A Letter of Ann Bolleyn's to Gardner.

[Ex Chartophylac. Regio.]

MR. STEPHENS, I thank you for my letter, wherein I perceive the willing and faithful mind that you have to do me pleasure, not doubting but, as much as is possible for man's wit to imagine you will do. I pray God to send you well to speed in all your matters, so that you would put me to the study how to reward your high service: I do trust in God you shall not repent it, and that the end of this journey shall be more pleasant to me than your first; for that was but a rejoicing hope, which ceasing, the lack of it does put me to the more pain, and they that are partakers with me, as you do know: and therefore I do trust that this hard beginning shall make the better ending.

Mr. Stephens, I send you here cramp-rings for you and Mr. Gregory, and Mr. Peter, praying you to distribute them as you think best. And have me recommended heartily to them both, as she, that you may assure them, will be glad to do them any pleasure which shall lie in my power. And thus I make an end, praying God send you good health.—Written at Greenwich the 4th day of April,

By your assured friend,

NUMBER XXVI.

A Letter of Gardiner's to King Henry the Eighth, concerning the Divorce.—An Original.

[Ex Chartophylac. Regio.]

PLEASETH it your majesty to understand, that besides all other means used to the pope's holiness, for attaining and achieving your highness' purpose and intent, such as in our common letters to my lord legate's grace, and my several letters to the same be contained at length. I have also a-part shewed unto the pope's holiness, that which your highness shewed me in your gallery at Hampton-Court, concerning the solicitation of the princes of Almayn, and such other matter as should and ought to fear the pope's said holiness; adding also those reasons which might induce the same to adhere expressly to your highness, and the French king, and so to take the more courage to accomplish your highness' desires: using all ways possible to enforce him to do somewhat, being a man of such nature as he never resolveth any thing but by some violent affection compelled thereunto. And considering we can speed no better at his hands, it agreeth with that your majesty, of your high wisdom before perpended, that his holiness would do nothing which might offend the emperor, unless he first determined himself to adhere to your highness, and the French king, and so to declare himself, containing himself no longer in neutrality; which he will not do: Ne the state of the affairs here considered, it were for his health so to do, unless the leagues otherwise proceeded than they yet do, or that his holiness would determine himself to leave these parts, and establish his see in some other place; forasmuch, as here being, he is daily in danger of the imperials, like as we have signified by our other letters. His holiness is in great perplexity and agony of mind, nor can tell what to do: he seemeth in words, fashion, and manner of speaking, as though he would do somewhat for your highness; and yet, when it cometh to the point, nothing he doth: I dare not say certainly, whether it be for fear, or want of good will, for I were loth to make a lie of him, or to your highness, my prince, sovereign lord and master. Finally, I perceive this by the pope, and all other here, that so your highness' cause were determined there by my lord's legates, they would be glad thereof; and, as I think, if the emperor would make any suit against that which shall be done there, they would serve him as they now do your highness, and so drive off the time, for they seem to be so minded, as in this cause they would suffer much, but do very little: wherefore if my lord Campegius will set apart all other respects, and frankly promise your highness to give sentence for you, then must be your highness' remedy short and expedite; nor shall there want wit, by another means, to meet with such delays as this false counterfeit Breve hath caused. For with these men here your highness shall by no suit profit; which thing I write unto your highness, as of my most bounden duty I ought to do: there shall every day rise new devices, and none take effect, but long delays, and wasted time: wherefore doing what I can yet to get the best, although we be fully answered therein, I shall do what I can to get the commission amplified as much as may be, and at the least, to extend to the reprobation of the brief, if I can, for I dare promise nothing to your majesty at this man's hands; and that which shall be obtained, if any be obtained, shall be, according to your highness' pleasure, sent by Mr. Bryan.

And whereas your highness, in your gracious letters directed to me and my colleagues, marvelleth that I have not ere this advertised the same, of such bulls as your majesty willed me to impetrate here; I thought verily, that forasmuch as the same be to be impetrate at the pope's hand, and that we signified unto your majesty, by our letters, of the pope's great sickness, and how we could not have access unto the same, that it had been superfluous for me, in my letters, to make any mention of the said bulls: signifying unto your highness now, that having those matters as it becometh me to have in good remembrance, I have not yet broken with the pope's holiness in them, nor thought good to interrupt the prosecution of your highness' matter, with the pursuit of those, saying that I spake a word to the pope's holiness, de Ecclesiis Cathedralibus, and his holiness said nothing could be done till the Cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor be recovered. In other things I speak not; for our audience with the pope's holiness hath been so scarce, that we thought it little enough to spend the same in your highness' principal matter.

And to advertise your highness what counsel is here conducted for the defence of your majesty's cause, the same shall understand that this court, as it hath suffered in all other things, so it is also much appeyed in learned men, and of them that be, we dare not trust every one, ne Causa Majestatis vestrae illis denudata, they should, prodere illam Adversariis; wherefore counselling, as yet only with two, the one called Dominus Michael, the other Dominus Sigismundus; we perceiving nothing to be solicited openly on the other side, and that here as yet hath been no need to dispute openly, have communicate your highness' matter to no more. And as for that article, Quod Papa non possit dispensare, the pope himself will hear no disputations in it; and so he might retain your highness' good mind, he seemeth not to care for himself, whether your highness' cause be decided by that article or no, so he did it not: but surely it appeareth, as a man may gather by his fashion and manner, that he hath made his account no further to meddle in your highness' matter, neither with your majesty, nor against the same, but follow that shall be done by his legates there. Wherefore if my lord Campegius would promise your majesty to give sentence frankly and apertly, having proprium Judicem, I would trust, being there with such consultations as I should bring from hence to say somewhat to this breve there, Apud illos et ista est Sacra Anchora Majestatis vestrae, for from hence shall come nothing but delays; desiring your highness not to show this to my lord Campegius, nor my lord's grace.

Mr. Gregory sendeth presently unto your highness the promise made by the pope's holiness, concerning your highness' cause, at such time as I went to Venice for his cause, which promise in the first three words, viz. Cum nos justitiam ejus Causae perpendentes, &c. doth make as much, and more, for the maintenance of that shall be done in your highness' cause, than if the commission decretal, being in cardinal Campegius's hands, should be shewed: and this your highness at your liberty to show to whom of your council it shall please your grace, thinking, in my poor opinion, that it were not the best therefore to move the pope in that matter again in this adverse time.

I most humbly desire your majesty, that I may be a suitor to the same for the said Mr. Gregory; so as by your most gracious commandment, payment may be made there to his factors, of such diets as your highness alloweth him: for omitting to speak of his true, faithful, and diligent service, which I have heretofore and do now perceive in him here; I assure your highness, he liveth here sumptuously and chargeably, to your highness' honour, and in this great scarcity must needs be driven to extremity, unless your highness be a gracious lord unto him in that behalf.

Thus having none other matter whereof privately to write unto your majesty besides that is contained in our common letters to my lord legate's grace, desiring your highness that I may know your pleasure what to do in case none other thing can be obtained here, I shall make an end of these letters, praying Almighty God to preserve your most noble and royal estate, with a short expedition of this cause, according to your highness' purpose and desire.

From Rome, the 21st day of April.

Your highness' most humble subject,

Servant, and daily orator.

The Writ for the Burning of Cranmer.

[Rot. Pat. 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. 2 Par.]

PHILIP and MARY, &c.—To our right trusty Nicholas, archbishop of York, lord chancellor of England, greeting. We will and command you, that immediately upon the sight hereof, and by warrant of the same, ye do cause to be made a writ for the execution of Thomas Cranmer, late archbishop of Canterbury; and the same so made, to seal with our great seal of England, being in your custody, according to the tenor and form hereafter following.

Philippus et Maria Dei Gratia, &c.—Majori et Balivis Civitatis Oxon. Salutem. A Commission to Bonner, and others, to search and raze Records.

[Rot. Pat. 3 & 4 Phil. & Mar. 12. Par.]

PHILIP and MARY, &c.—To the right reverend father in God, Edmond, bishop of London; and to our trusty and well-beloved Henry Cole, doctor of divinity, and dean of the cathedral church of St. Paul, London; and Thomas Marten, esq. doctor of the civil law, greeting. Where is come to our knowledge and understanding, that in the time of the late schism, divers and sundry accoimpts, books, scroles, instruments, and other writings, were practised, devised, and made, concerning professions against the pope's holiness, and the see apostolick: And also sundry and divers infamous scrutinies were taken in abbeyes, and other religious houses, tending rather to subvert and overthrow all good religion, and religious houses, than for any truth contained therein; which writings, and other the premises, as we be informed, were delivered to the custody and charge of divers and sundry registers, and other officers and ministers of this our realm of England, to be by them kept and preserved. And minding to have the said writings, and other the premises, brought to knowledge, whereby they may be considered and ordered, according to our will and pleasure. And trusting in your fidelities, wisdoms, and discretions, we have appointed and assigned you to be our commissioners; and by these presents do give full power and authority unto you, or two of you, to call before you, or two of you, all and singular the said registers and other officers and ministers within this our said realm, to whose hands, custody, knowledge, or possession, any of the said accoimpts, books, scroles, instruments, or other writings concerning the premises, or any part thereof, did, or is come; giving strait charge and commandments to them, and every of them, to bring before you, or two of you, at their several appearance, all and singular the said accoimpts, books, writings, and other the premises whatsoever: And them, and every of them, to charge by oath, or otherwise, to make a true certificate and delivery of all and singular the said premises, to the hands of you, or two of you; commanding you, or two of you, to attend and execute the premises, with effect, by all ways and means, according to your wisdoms and discretions.

And of all and singular your doings therein, our pleasure and commandment is, ye shall make certificate unto the most reverend father in God, and our dearest cousin Reginald Pole, lord cardinal, archbishop of Canterbury, metropolitan and primate of England, with diligence, to the intent that further order may be taken therein as shall appertain; charging and commanding all and singular justices of peace, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, constables, and all other our officers, ministers, and subjects, to be aiding, helping, assisting, and at our commandment in the due execution hereof, as they tender our pleasure, and will answer to the contrary at their perils.

A Letter written by the Monks of Glassenbury, for the new founding of that Abbey.—An Original.

[Ex MS. Nob. Illustr. Com. de Huntington.]

To the right honourable the lord chamberlain to the queen's majesty.

RIGHT HONOURABLE—In our most humble wise your lordship's daily beadsmen, sometimes at the house of Glassenbury, now here monks in Westminster, with all due submission, we desire your honour to extend your accustomed virtue, as it hath been always heretofore propense to the honour of Almighty God, to the honourable service of the king and queen's majesty; so it may please your good lordship again, for the honour of them, both of God and their majesties, to put the queen's highness in remembrance of her gracious promise, concerning the erection of the late monastery of Glassenbury, which promise of her grace hath been so by her majesty declared. That upon the same, we your lordship's daily beadsmen, understanding my lord cardinal's grace's pleasure to the same, by the procurement hereof, our reverend father abbot hath gotten out the particulars; and through a warrant from my lord treasurer, our friends there have builded, and bestowed much upon reparation. Notwithstanding all now standeth at a stay, we think the cause to be want of remembrance, which cannot so well be brought unto her majesty's understanding, as by your honourable lordship's favour and help. And considering your lordship's most godly disposition, we have a confidence thereof to solicit the same, assuring your lordship of our daily prayers while we live, and of our successors during the world, if it may so please your good lordship to take it in hand.

We ask nothing in gift to the foundation, but only the house and site, the residue for the accustomed rent, so that with our labour and husbandry we may live here a few of us in our religious habits till the charity of good people may suffice a greater number; and the country there being so affected to our religion, we believe we should find more help amongst them, towards the reparations and furniture of the same, whereby we would happily prevent the ruin of much, and repair no little part of the whole, to God's honour, and for the better prosperity of the king and queen's majesties, with the whole realm; for, doubtless, if it shall please your good lordship, if there hath ever been any flagitious deed since the creation of the world, punished of God, in our opinion the overthrow of Glassenbury may be compared to the same, not surrendered, as other, but extorted; the abbot preposterously put to death, with two innocent virtuous monks with him; that if the thing were to be scanned by any university, or some learned counsel in divinity, they would find it more dangerous than it is commonly taken: which might move the queen's majesty to the more speedy erection; namely, that being an house of such antiquity, and of fame through all Christendom, first begun by St. Joseph of Arimathea, (who took down the dead body of our Saviour Christ from the cross) and lieth buried in Glassenbury: and him most heartily we beseech with us, to pray unto Christ for good success unto your honourable lordship, in all your lordship's affairs; and now especially in this our most humble request, that we may do the same in Glassenbury for the king and queen's majesties as our founders, and for your good lordship, as a singular benefactor.

Your lordship's daily beadsmen of Westminster,
John Phagau. John Nott.

NUMBER XXXI.

A Letter from Sir Edward Carne from Rome, shewing how the Pope dissembled with him concerning a general Peace.—An Original.

[Ex Chartophylac. Regio.]

PLEASETH it your most excellent majesty to be advertised, that Francis the post arrived here upon Corpus Christi day with your majesty's most gracious letters, as well for the expedition of the bishopricks of Winchester and Chester, as also for his holiness beside; with your most gracious letters of the 30th of March to me: according to the purport whereof I sued for audience at his holiness' hands the next day following; whereof I had answer, that I should come to his holiness, viz. the 6th of this; and being with his holiness, after the delivery of your majesty's most gracious letters, with your majesty's humble commendations. After he had read your majesty's letter, in the presence of the most reverend lord cardinal Morone, he said how much he was bound to that blessed queen, and most gracious and loving daughter, that had written to him so gratefully and humbly, saying, that he would keep that letter to be read openly in the consistory, before all the most reverend lords his brethren, and said that he was much bound to his legate there, to make that good report of him to your majesty. Whereupon I declared unto him your majesty's pleasure, according to my instructions, with such thanks and congratulations as your pleasure was I should use to his holiness, with the rest of my instructions, leaving no part thereof undeclared and spoken: whereunto he said, that his affection to that blessed queen (making a cross upon your majesty's name contained in the letter) was not neither could be as much as the goodness of her majesty required; but this your majesty should be sure of, he said, that his good affection and good-will should not only continue, but increase to the utmost, to the satisfaction of your majesty in all that may lie in him.

And as touching the peace to be had perfectly, betwixt the emperor's majesty and the king's most excellent majesty, and the French king, he was wondrous glad to hear that your majesty's furtherance should not want in helping to bring the truce, late concluded, to a perfect peace. And of his part, he said that he sent two legates for that purpose, for his discharge towards God; or else, he said if he should overpass, and not declare unto them the great necessities of the commonweal of all Christendom to have a perfect peace, God would impute his silence therein unto him, being appointed over his flock here as he is; for he said, it is more than time to be doing therein, considering that the realm of Polonia doth so waver, and that the king there neither can nor dare, being compassed with naughty sects round about him, do anything against them. And likewise the king of Romans about him. They call upon his holiness for help, and some provision for amendment, which thing he cannot do without a general council, which, he said, cannot be well done, unless the said peace be made; for though there be an abstinence from war, yet the grudge of the doings heretofore, and the incertainty of peace, will be an occasion to keep men of war, and the one shall be in mistrust of the other, in such sort as the passages cannot be sure for those that should come to the said council: therefore he will travel, as much as is possible for him, to have a peace, without the which it will not be possible to do any good in the council. His holiness is minded to have the general council here in St. John Lateranense, and thinks it the most meetest place, for divers considerations which he declared ; for it is the head church of Christendom, and there hath been divers times many wholesome and holy councils in times past. And for that this city is Communis Patria, and free to all the world to resort to freely, trusting that all necessities shall come hither, both by sea and land. And also forasmuch as in divers councils begun in times of his predecessors, little good could be done ; and men thought that more good might have been done, if the pope had been present himself in the said councils ; therefore his holiness would be present himself in this council ; which he cannot, being in a manner decrepit for age, in case it were kept far hence, he not being able to travel for age, unless it be kept here, where he trusteth to be himself in person. And for to conclude this matter, in such sort as the necessity of Christendom requireth, he hath dispatched the two legates, de Latere suo, at this present, wherein he knoweth that your majesty may do more than any others, and doubteth not but your majesty will so do. Concluding that God hath preserved your majesty to help all the world ; whereunto I said, that there should not want neither good-will, neither any other thing that your majesty might do for the furtherance thereof.

As touching the provisions of Winchester and Chester, it shall be done with all the speed that may be. And his holiness hath promised all the favour that he can conveniently shew for your majesty's sake. It must have somewhat longer time, for that the process made there by my lord legate's grace for to try the yearly value of Winchester, must be committed to certain cardinals, for to report in the consistory before the new tax can be made ; but there shall be no time lost, for it shall be diligently solicited.

Also concerning the pension to my lord cardinal's grace, of a thousand pounds sterling yearly, the pope his holiness will assign it according to your majesty's pleasure ; so that all shall be done therein with all the speed that may be, God willing ; wherein the most reverend lord cardinal Morone, who rejoiceth much in your gracious letters sent to him, to his great comfort, doth travel, as he is most ready always, in all that toucheth your majesty, or any of your most noble realms.

As concerning the occurrents here, since my last letters of the fifteenth of the last, be none other, but that the cardinal de Caraffa, departed here-hence towards France, the fourteenth of the last, with divers antiquities to be presented to the French king. Some say here, that part of his charge is to move the French king to take the dukedom of Paleano in his protection, as he hath Parma and Mirandula. There be a great number of workmen already gone to fortify Paleano, Neptuno, and Rocca, the Papa, and certain captains appointed and gone farther also.

The legate to the emperor's majesty, and the king's majesty, departed the 30th of the last.

The ambassador of Polonia is returned toward his master. His petition, as I am informed, to his holiness, was, to have license for priests to marry, and all lay-folk to receive the communion sub utraque specie, in the realm of Polonia, and certain dismes upon the clergy, to be spent against the Turk. His answer, as I hear, was, in general, with relation of all such matters to the general council.

Also there came hither four ambassadors very honourably from the state of Genua, with the obedience of that state to his holiness : which ambassador did visit me, declaring the good-will, amity, and service, that the said state bare towards the king, and your most excellent majesty, desiring me advertise your majesty thereof.

The 24th of the last, the pope's holiness kept the anniversary of his coronation : I was warned to be at the chapel, by the officers appointed for that purpose. Also one of his holiness' gentlemen was sent to invite me to dine with his holiness that day. At my coming to the court, the ambassador of Portugal being there, at his holiness coming forth, would have kept the place, amongst all the ambassadors, from me, that I was wont to stand in, that is, next the French ambassador ; and next to me would be the ambassador of Polonia. I came to the ambassador of Portugal as gently as I could ; and for that he would not give me my place, I took him by the shoulder, and removed him out of that place, saying, that it was your majesty's ambassador's place always. Beneath me he would not stand, neither next me he should not, for the ambassador of Polonia, who claimed next to me : whereupon the Portugal went and complained to the duke of Paleano, who went straight to the pope ; and after him went the said ambassador of Portugal to him himself. His holiness willed him to depart thence. He desired that I should depart likewise. And thereupon the duke came to me, saying, that the pope his pleasure was I should depart also. I asked him why. He said, that his holiness, to avoid dissention, would have me to depart. I told him I made no dissention ; for if the other would keep his own place, and not usurp upon the place that always the ambassadors of England in times past were wont to be in, he might be in quiet, and suffer me to be in quiet likewise, and not to seek that seemed him not. All this year he never sought it till now—why now, I cannot tell ; but he may be sure he shall not have it of me, unless your majesty command it. Also the master of the household with his holiness said that I was invited, and that Portugal was not, but came upon his own head.

I am much bound to the marquess ; he was very angry with the Portugal, being his brother, to attempt any such thing against your majesty's ambassador, and sent to me as soon as he heard of it. Indeed he was not there ; I kept my place for him, sending him to seek his place in such sort that all the ambassadors thought it well done, and others that were indifferent said no less. I told the duke that I would not lose a jot of your majesty's honour for no man. For it is the place of ambassadors of England nigh a thousand years before there was any king in Portugal.

Other occurrents here be none. And thus I beseech Almighty God to conserve your most excellent majesty in long and most prosperous life.

From Rome, the 9th of June, 1556.

Your majesty's most humble subject and poor servant,
EDWARD CARNE.

And also to enquire, hear, and determine, all and singular enormities, disturbances, misbehaviours, misdemeanours, and negligences, done, suffered, or committed, in any church, chapel, or other hallowed place within this realm. And also for and concerning the taking away, or the withholding of any lands, tenements, goods, and ornaments, stocks of money, or other things belonging to any of the same churches and chapels, and all accompts and reckonings concerning the same. And also to enquire and search out all such persons as obstinately do refuse to preach the blessed sacrament of the altar, to hear mass, or come to their parish, or other convenient places, appointed for divine service ; and all such as refuse to go in processions, to take holy water, or holy bread ; or otherwise do misuse themselves in any church, or other hallowed place, wheresoever any of the same offences have been, or hereafter shall be, committed within this our said realm. Nevertheless our will and pleasure is, that when, and as often as any person or persons hereafter to be called or convented before you, do obstinately persist or stand in any manner of heresy, or heretical opinions, that then ye, or three of you, do immediately take order, that the same person, or persons, so standing or persisting, be delivered and committed to his ordinary, there to be used according to the spiritual and ecclesiastical laws. And also we give unto you, or three of you, full power and authority to enquire and search out all vagabonds and masterless men, barretors, quarrellers, and suspect persons, vagrant, or abiding within the city of London, or ten miles' compass of the same ; and all assaults and affrays done and committed within the same city and compass. And further, to search out all wastes, decays, and ruins of churches, chancels, chapels, parsonages, and vicarages, in whatsoever diocess the same be within this realm. Giving to you, or any three of you, full power and authority, by virtue hereof, to hear and determine the same, and all other offences and matters above specified and rehearsed, according to your wisdoms, and consciences, and discretions ; willing and commanding you, or three of you, from time to time, to use and devise all such politic ways and means, for the trial and searching out of the premises, as by you, or three of you, shall be thought most expedient and necessary ; and upon enquiry, and due proof had, known, perceived, and tried out by the confession of the parties, or by sufficient witnesses, before you, or three of you, concerning the premises, or any part thereof, or by any other ways or means requisite, to give and award such punishment to the offenders, by fine, imprisonment, or otherwise ; and to take such order for redress and reformation of the premises, as to your wisdoms, or three of you, shall be thought meet and convenient. Further willing and commanding you, and any three of you, in case you shall find any person or persons obstinate or disobedient, either in their appearance before you, or three of you, at your calling or assignment ; or else in not accomplishing or not obeying your decrees, orders, and commandments, in any thing or things touching the premises, or any part thereof, to commit the same person, or persons, so offending, to ward, there to remain, till they be by you, or three of you, enlarged and delivered. And we give to you, and any three of you, full power and authority, by these presents, to take and receive, by your discretions, of every offender, or suspect person, to be convented or brought before you, a recognizance or recognizances, obligation or obligations to our use, of such sum or sums of money, as to you, or three of you, shall seem convenient, as well for the personal appearance before you of any such suspect person, or for the performance and accomplishment of your orders and decrees, in case you shall think so convenient, as for the sure and true payment of all and every such fine and fines, as shall hereafter be by you, or three of you, taxed or assessed upon any offender that shall be before you, or three of you, duly convinced, as is aforesaid, to our use, to be paid at such days and times, as by you, or three of you, shall be sealed, limited, or appointed : and you to certify any such recognizance, or obligation, as being taken for any fine or fines, not fully and wholly paid before you, under your hands and seals, or the hands and seals of three of you, into our court of Chancery, to the intent we may be therefore duly answered, as appertaineth.

And furthermore, we give to you, or three of you, full power and authority, by these presents, not only to call afore you all and every offender and offenders, and all and every suspect person and persons in any of the premises, but also all such and so many witnesses as ye shall think meet to be called ; and them, and every of them, to examine and compel to answer, and swear, upon the holy evangelist, to declare the truth in all such things, whereof they or any of them shall be examined, for the better trial, opening, and declaration of the premises, or of any part thereof.

And furthermore, our will and pleasure is, that you, or three of you, shall name and appoint one sufficient person to gather up and receive all such sums of money as shall be assessed or taxed by you, or three of you, for any fine or fines, upon any person or persons, for their offence; and you, or three of you, by bill, or bills, signed with your hands, shall and may assign and appoint, as well to the said person for his pains in receiving the said sums, as also to your clerk, messengers, and attendants upon you, for their travel, pains and charge to be sustained for us about the premises, or any part thereof, such sum and sums of money for their rewards, as by you, or three of you, shall be thought expedient. Willing and commanding you, or three of you, after the time of this our commission is expired, to certify into our exchequer, as well the name of the said receiver, as also a note of such fines as shall be set or taxed before you, to the intent, that upon the determination of the account of the same receiver, we may be answered, that that to us shall justly appertain. Willing and commanding also all our auditors, and other officers, upon the sight of the said bills, signed with the hands of you, or three of you, to make to the said receiver due allowance, according to the said bills upon his account. Wherefore we will and command you, our said commissioners, with diligence to execute the premises, with effect: any of our laws, statutes, proclamations, or other grants, privileges, or ordinances, which be or may seem to be contrary to the premises, notwithstanding.

And moreover we will and command all and singular justices of peace, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, constables, and all other our officers, ministers, and faithful subjects, to be aiding, helping, and assisting to you, at your commandment, in the due execution hereof, as they tender our pleasure, and will answer to the costs, at their utmost perils.

And we will and grant, that these our letters patents shall be a sufficient warrant and discharge for you, and any of you, against us, our heirs and successors; and all and every other person or persons whatsoever they be, of, for, or concerning the premises, or any parcel thereof, or for the execution of this our commission, or any part thereof.

In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patents, and to continue and endure for one whole year next coming after the date hereof. Witness ourself at Westminster, the 8th day of February, the third and fourth years of our reign.

[Cotton. Libr. Titus. B. 2.]

MR. POPE, after our very hearty commendations, ye shall understand, that amongst divers other devilish practices, attempted from time to time, by Dudley, Ashton, and other traitors in France, for the disturbance of the quiet of the realm; they have now lately sent over one Cleyberdo, who (if I the lord chancellor be not deceived in the man) was, whilst I was president in Wales, indicted of a burglary, and should have been, if he had not escaped by the means of certain his complices, who took him from the sheriff's man, as well for the said burglary, as for divers other notable robberies, and other offences, made sure enough from attempting this enterprize now. This man being sent by the foresaid traitors into the extreme parts of Essex and Suffolk; where naming himself to be earl of Devonshire, he hath, by spreading abroad of slanderous letters and proclamations, abused the lady Elizabeth's grace's name; procuring thereby, as much as in him lay, to stir the king and queen's majesties' subjects in those parts to rebellion, as by the copies of the said letters and proclamations, which we send unto you herewith, may at better length appear unto you. And albeit the people there have shewed themselves so true and obedient subjects, as immediately upon the understanding of this enterprize they did of themselves, and without any commandment, apprehend as many of the attempters of this devilish practice as they could come by, whereby their good-will and truth to the king and queen's majesties doth well appear. Yet because this matter is spread already abroad, and that peradventure many constructions and discourses will be made thereof, we have thought meet to signify the whole circumstance of the cause unto you, to be by you opened unto the lady Elizabeth's grace, at such time as ye shall think convenient; to the end it may appear unto her how little these men stick, by falsehood and untruth, to compass their purpose; not letting, for that intent, to abuse the name of her grace, or any others: which their devices nevertheless are (God be thanked) by his goodness discovered from time to time to their majesties' preservation, and confusion of their enemies. And so bid you heartily well to fare.—From Eltham, the 30th of July, 1556.

NUMBER XXXIV.

A Letter from Sir Edward Carne, concerning the Suspension of Cardinal Pole's Legatine Power.—An Original.

[Ex Chartophylac. Regio.]

PLEASE it your most excellent majesties, according as I advertised your highness in my letters of the 8th of this; so I have informed all the cardinals that be here of the congregation of the inquisition, as the most reverend lord cardinal Morone advised me, informing them of the good proceedings and reformations made by the most reverend lord cardinal's grace there, as well in Clero as in Populo; not only in things appertaining ad cultum Dei, but also in other, pertaining to the common-weal of Christ's church, in such sort as Christ's religion doth so prosper there, that there is good hope all things should come to their perfection in time. And for that purpose his grace had called there a synod of the clergy of the realm, where many good ordinances, for the maintenance of the premises been past already; and many ready in hand for to pass, and not fully ended nor perfected: which should be staid, in case the legacy should be there-hence revoked, which might turn to the great danger and damage of many in that your majesty's realm, in case due reformation throughout and perfectly were not made: Therefore I desired them, that when the matter were moved amongst them, so to weigh it, as such a good beginning, that through your majesty's goodness hath been there, be not brought by their doings here, into no worse terms, than your majesties, with no little pain, have always travelled to bring it unto: adding besides divers cases that daily might fall, which could not be holpen without the authority of this see: and that men newly reduced to the unity of the church, would rather stand in their naughty doings, whose examples might be noisome to many, than repair hither for any help; but having the legate there, would gladly seek help at his hands being present amongst them.

And likewise for reduction of your majesty's realm of Ireland to the unity of the church, which whethe it were past or no I doubted, and ended thoroughly and if it were, yet were it most expedient that there should be reformation, as well in Clero as in Populo, which could not well be, in case the legacy continue not there. This is the effect of the points that I informed them upon, who all thought it most expedient that the legacy should continue there, and would not fail to stay, as much as might lie in them, for these considerations above rehearsed; and thought, being of such importance, that if my lord's grace were not there already, it were most expedient that he should be sent thither, rather than to be revoked; and hereof as well Cardinal Morone as all the other would needs I should move his holiness.

Whereupon the 12th of this, I went to the pope himself, upon pretence to give him thanks for the provision of the church of Chichester, and of the most gracious and honourable report that he made in the consistory the same time, of your highness my sovereign lady the queen; where his holiness declared a much goodness and virtue of your majesty, that he and his see could not, he said, shew so much favour to any of yours as the same required. As undoubtedly, as far as I could here, he doth, whensoever he hath occasion to speak of your majesty, so reverently as more could not be; who prevented me, and said, that he was glad that I was come unto him, and trusted that God had sent me thither: for there had been with him, the day before, Cardinal Pacheco, who shewed him of the good inclination of your majesty, my sovereign lord, to have peace with him and the church. And that also he had received a letter from the most reverend lord cardinal's grace there-hence, who had spoken with your majesty, and found the same so well inclined to have peace with his holiness, as might be desired; which his holiness said he liked very well, and held up his hands beseeching Almighty God to continue your majesty in that good mind. And then he began to declare, how that God provided, and always confirmed you, the queen's majesty, not only to do good to that realm, but to all Christendom also; in whom his holiness had such hope, that the same will so help with the king's majesty, that peace may follow betwixt the church and him: and he of his part coveted nothing more, as it should appear, if the king's majesty would treat of it; yea, he said, though he should sustain great damage thereby, he will win his majesty if he can.

And where his majesty is informed, that his holiness would hear none of those that were sent to him from his majesty, as Francisco Pacheco, and one citizen of Naples; he said, that he never heard that either the said Francisco, or the said citizen, had any letter or word to him from his majesty; if they had had, he, as he said, who giveth audience daily to as many as do seek it at his hands, without denial, would have heard them, or any that had been sent from his highness; and this, he said, all that be about him can testify, and called God to record of it. And yet, he said, that the king's majesty is informed of the contrary; whereupon, he said, that his majesty was brought in belief, that it was sufficient for his highness to offer himself to be heard, and seeing he could not, he was discharged towards God, and so lay the fault in his holiness; from the which error, so his holiness named it, he would and wished that his majesty should be brought: for his holiness caused to be enquired of them, whether they had any letters, or any thing to say of his majesty's behalf to him, and could hear of none; wherefore his holiness desired me to write to your majesty, and to signify the same to your highness; and of his holiness' behalf to pray you to advertise the king's majesty, that therein was no lack of his holiness; saying, if his majesty had sent to him, he would have gladly heard him; or if it may please his majesty yet to send, no man will be more glad thereof than he: and said further, that God, who had called him to that place, knew that he always hath been of mind to have a general council for a reformation throughout Christendom, and in such place as had been meet for it; and doubted not but that he would have seen Christendom in such order, that such enormities as do reign in many parts should have been reformed, if these wars had not troubled him: saying therewith, that the power of the church is not able to maintain wars of itself, but that God had provided aid elsewhere; but if he can have peace, he will embrace it, he said, though it were to his loss. And prayed me to desire your majesty, of his behalf, to put to your good help towards it. To whom after thanks first given to his holiness for the said good opinion that he had of your majesty, and also of the provision made of the said church of Chichester, I said, that I was glad to hear of that good inclination of his holiness to peace; and said, that I would gladly signify to you, the queen's majesty, according to his holiness' pleasure: and that I had heard of divers that his holiness would not give audience to such as you my sovereign lord had sent to him; whereof I was sorry, and yet nevertheless trusted that betwixt his holiness and your majesty should be as great amity as appertaineth; and had not so good hope thereof, since this war began, as now hearing his holiness to be so well inclined to it; not doubting but all the world should perceive no lack of your majesty's behalf, as far as any reason required.

Whether this be done for a practice to please, lest any stir be there, against the Frenchmen, which is most feared here, I am not able to say, for there lacketh no practice in this court that they think may serve for their purpose. The truth is, that there is jarring betwixt the pope and the French now; with whom the pope is nothing contented, neither they with him, as it is credibly reported here. All the Italians that the pope had in the French camp be all gone; the French handled them very ill and vile, and especially Don Antonio de Caraffa, the pope's nephew: so that it is thought here, that the pope will turn the leaf, if any were here of your behalf, the king's majesty, that had authority to treat with his holiness; and if it please your majesty to send any hither for that purpose, by the opinion of all your majesty's well-willers here, there can come but good of it.

After this communication, I lamented to his holiness greatly of one thing that I had heard his holiness pretended to do: and forasmuch as your majesty had placed me here with his holiness, and that the case was such that it touched the maintenance of the common-wealth of Christian religion within your majesty's realm there so much, that of duty I could do no less but open it to his holiness, trusting that the same, who had always shewed himself most ready, with all benignity, to do for you, the queen's majesty, and your realm, would so continue still: which thing was, I said, that his holiness would revoke his legate there, which should be too great a prejudice to the church of that realm, to be done before all things were truly established there, and opened unto his holiness all the considerations before rehearsed, whereof I had informed the cardinals in as ample manner as I could. Then, he said, that there was nothing that he could do for you, the queen's majesty, or your said realm, but he would do it most gladly, unless occasion should be given there-hence that he might not. And as touching the revocation of the legate in England, he said, that it was done already, and not for to provide any thing within that realm, but only for because it was not convenient that any legate of his should be within any of the king's majesty's realms or dominions; and therefore he revoked his nuncios from Naples, from Spain, and all other parts of the king's majesty's realms and dominions, and of England therefore: nevertheless, he said, if you the queen's majesty would write to him for the continuance of his legate there, he would restore him to his former authority, or any thing else that your majesty should think expedient for him to do. Then, I said, it would be long time before answer can come from England hither; and if his revocation should be once known in England, what would come of it I doubted. Therefore I besought his holiness not to suffer it to pass, for if it be once known abroad, it shall be a great comfort to the wicked, and discomfort to the good, whereby many inconveniences might ensue. Then, he said, That that is done cannot be undone. I said, that his holiness had not so far gone in his decree, but that he might moderate it, that it need not extend to England. And then I told him, that he had shewed me, that in all his proceedings, he would have your majesty's realm of England separated from all other the king's majesty's realms, and now had set it as far further as any of the other; therefore, I said, his holiness should consider it, and that the decree in nowise should extend thither. Then, he said, that it could not stand with the majesty of the place that he sat in, to revoke any part of the decree solemnly given in the consistory, in the presence of all the cardinals. I said, that his holiness, with his honour, might well do it; considering that when he gave the decree, he was not informed of such inconveniences that might ensue thereof; and now being informed by me, his holiness had not only a just cause to revoke it, but also of congruence ought to do it; considering that his holiness had the cure of all men's souls: and if any inconveniency should follow through his holiness' doings, it could not be chosen but his holiness must answer for it; where his holiness suffering all things to proceed in his due course, as it hath been begun, all dangers that have been before rehearsed might be avoided; therefore now his holiness had a good cause to stay his decree in that behalf: all which he took in good part, and said thus, I must needs do for that realm what I can, and therefore to-morrow is the congregation of the inquisition, and then the matter shall be propounded, where, he said, he would do what he could; and willed me to resort to the Cardinal St. Jacobo to inform him, that he might procure it there. I said, I would; indeed I had been with the said cardinal before, and had informed him fully; nevertheless I went to him again, to shew him the pope's pleasure therein; who said, he would do his duty therein. Indeed that matter occupied the pope and the cardinals all that congregation time. The next morrow, as the cardinals said, the conclusion was, that the pope would make answer to me himself. Indeed he thought to take counsel of the said congregation before I had been with them about the same decree, but not to revoke any part thereof, but to have their advice in framing of it. So that if I had not gone to him, the decree had gone forth, with the intimation thereof, and the inhibition; but being with his holiness this evening, to know what was to be had herein; his holiness, after a long oration, in commendation of you the queen's majesty, he said, that in case your most excellent majesty would write to him for the continuance of his legate, for such causes as should seem good to the same, the legate to be yet expedient therein, he would appoint my lord's grace there to continue, but he could in nowise revoke his decree made in open consistory. I laid many things that his holiness might do it, and that divers of his predecessors had done it, upon causes before not known; with divers examples that I shewed him in law; that at the last, he said plainly, he would not revoke his decree; but for because of my suit, he said he was content to stay, and to go no further till your majesty's letters do come; and charge the datary, and his secretary Berigno, that they send forth no intimation of his decree of the said revocation, without his special commandment; where-else he said, the intimation had been sent forth with an inhibition also: and so all is stayed, that nothing here-hence shall go forth till your pleasure, the queen's majesty, be known therein; which the pope doth look for: until which intimation the legacy there doth continue.

Occurrents here be no other, but that the 10th of this, the late made Duke of Paleano departed here-hence towards the duke's camp, which doth lie yet in the siege of Civitella, within your majesty's realm of Naples. They that seem to bear their good wills here towards your majesty, do say here that they may lie there long before they take it, for they cannot hurt it much with battery. And they say, the Counts de Sancto Flore, and de Sarne, be within the town with two thousand soldiers; many of the Frenchmen be slain there. Nevertheless, others do say, that it standeth in danger of taking; for because the Frenchmen have gotten a hill, from the which they do beat sore into the town, and have withdrawn certain waters from them of the town, and do undermine it; the most part here thinketh they shall lose their labour, for it is very strong.

The gallees of Marseilles arrived at Civita Vecchia six or seven days past, and brought twelve ensignes more of French soldiers to reinforce the French army; and as far as I can learn, they return again to fetch more, always to refresh their camp with fresh soldiers, in the lieu of such as be perished: of the which twelve ensignes the French ambassador chose out three, which he hath sent to the Duke of Guise, well furnished; the rest he discharged, but all the other that came be gone to the camp, to such captains as will retain them there, for such of the other as be slain, or otherwise perished. Don Antonio de Caraffa doth not as yet return to the camp, neither intendeth to go as I hear. I heard say, that the Duke of Alva was within sixteen miles of the Frenchmen, with a great army of horsemen and footmen; what he doth is not spoken of here, for there is none that can pass to them, or from them hither; there is such strait keeping and dangerous passing.

Here be ill news from Piedmont, for they say here the Frenchmen in those parts have taken Cherasto, a very strong town in Piedmont, which I trust be not true. The common report is here, that if the Frenchmen be not withstended in time, they will do much hurt in Italy.

The pope doth set forth a bull for money, that one of every hundred shall be paid of the value of all the lands that be within the church's dominions, which they say will draw to two or three millions, if it be paid.

And having no other at this present, I beseech Almighty God to conserve both your most excellent majesties in long and most prosperous life together.

From Rome, the 15th of May 1557.

Your majesty's most humble subject and poor servant,
EDWARD CARNE.

Instructions sent by the Privy Council, representing the State of the Nation to King Philip, after the loss of Calais.

[Cotton. Libr. Titus. B. 2.]

FIRST, to say, That we be most bounden unto his majesty for his good affection towards this realm ; and his gracious disposition and offer, to put this force to the field this year, being else otherwise determined for the recovery of that honour and reputation which this realm hath lost by the loss of Calais.

To say, That this offer of his majesty we should not only have, upon our knees, accepted, but also in likewise have sued first for the same.

And so undoubtedly we would have done, if other respects hereafter following, which we trust his majesty will graciously understand, had not been (to our great regret) the lett thereof.

First, We do consider that if we should send over an army, we cannot send under 20,000 men ; the levying and sending over whereof will ask a time ; before which time, considering also the time the enemy hath had (being now almost a month) to fortify and victual the place, it is thought the same will be in such strength as we shall not be able alone to recover it.

We do consider how unapt and unwonted our people be to lie abroad, and specially in the cold : and what inconveniency might follow also at their hands (besides the loss of charges) if their hope for recovery of Calais should not come to pass.

The charge of this army (if it should go over) would stand the realm in one hundred and seventy thousand pounds at the least, for five months, which sum (having regard to other necessary charges for the defence of the realm, both by land and by sea, which the people only have in their heads, with a wan hope of the recovery of Calais) neither, we doubt, will be granted of the people ; nor if it were, can be conveniently levied in time to serve the turn.

Great garrisons continually, and an army for defence against the Scots and Frenchmen by land, must of necessity be maintained, the charge whereof will be one way and another (go the next way we can) ere the year go about, an hundred and fifty thousand pounds.

The defence of the sea-coast and the isles, and the setting forth of an army by sea, will cost the realm in a year (all things accounted) above two hundred thousand pounds ; and yet all will be too little that way if the Danes and the Swedes, which we very much doubt, should be our enemies.

The sums amounting in the whole to five hundred and twenty thousand pounds, besides provision of ammunition, which will be chargeable ; and furniture of ordnance, whereof we have great lack, by the loss of Calais and Guisnes.

We see not how it can be levied in one year to save us, unless the people should of new have strange impositions set upon them, which we think they would not bear.

The queen's majesty's own revenue is scarce able to maintain her estate.

The noblemen and gentlemen, for the most part receiving no more rent than they were wont to receive, and paying thrice as much for everything they provide, by reason of the baseness of the money, are not able to do as they have done in times past.

The merchants have had great losses of late, whereby the clothiers be never the richer.

The farmers, graziers, and other people, how well-willing soever they be taken to be, will not be acknowledge of their wealth, and by the discontentment of this loss be grown stubborn and liberal of talk.

So that considering our wants on every side, our lack of money at home ; our want of credit, by reason of this loss abroad ; the scarcity of captains and leaders of our men, which be but few ; the unwillingness of our people to go abroad, and leave their things at home, without a certain hope of recovering their loss ; the need we have to defend home (looking as we do to be assaulted both by land and by sea) how desirous soever we be to recover Calais, and well-willing to serve his majesty (either for that purpose or in any other thing wherein it shall please him to employ us), we see not how we can possibly (at the least for this year) send over an army ; nor until we may be assured of fewer enemies than we fear to have cause to doubt ; and have time to bring such as be ill men amongst our people, and now be ready (against their duties) to make uproars and stir amongst ourselves, to order and obedience.

Wherefore, in most humble wise, upon our knees, we shall beseech the king's majesty to accept, in gracious part, this our answer, which we make much against our hearts, if we might otherwise chuse. And as for our own persons, we shall bestow, with all that ever we have, to the death, where and however it shall please him, submitting ourselves to his majesty's judgment in this matter, and to the execution and doing of that whatsoever, either his majesty, or any other man, shall devise to be done, better than we have said in this answer, and more for the honour and surety of their majesties and commonwealth of this realm. Feb. 1, 1577.

Sir Thomas Pope's Letter concerning the Answer made by the Lady Elizabeth to a Proposition of Marriage sent over by the Elected King of Sweden.

[Ex MS. D. G. Petyt.]

FIRST, after I had declared to her Grace how well the queen's majesty liked of her prudent and honourable answer made to the same messenger; I then opened unto her grace the effect of the said messenger's credence; which after her grace had heard, I said the queen's highness had sent me to her grace, not only to declare the same, but also to understand how her grace liked the said motion. Whereunto, after a little pause taken, her grace answered in form following:—"Master Pope, I require you, after my most humble commendations to the queen's majesty, to render unto the same like thanks, that it pleased her highness, of her goodness, to conceive so well of my answer made to the same messenger, and here withal, of her princely consideration, with such speed to command you, by your letters, to signify the same unto me, who before remained wonderfully perplexed, fearing that her majesty might mistake the same; for which her goodness, I acknowledge myself bound to honour, serve, love, and obey her highness, during my life: requiring you also to say unto her majesty, that in the king my brother's time, there was offered me a very honourable marriage or two, and ambassadors sent to treat with me touching the same; whereupon I made my humble suit unto his highness, as some of honour yet living can be testimonies, that it would like the same to give me leave, with his grace's favour, to remain in that estate I was, which of all others best liked me or pleased me. And in good faith I pray you say unto her highness I am even at this present of the same mind, and so intend to continue, with her majesty's favour; and assuring her highness I so well like this estate, as I persuade myself there is not any kind of life comparable unto it. And as concerning my liking the said motion made by the said messenger, I beseech you say unto her majesty, that to my remembrance, I never heard of his master before this time; and that I so well like both the message and the messenger, as I shall most humbly pray God, upon my knees, that from henceforth I never hear of the one nor of the other; assure you, that if it should eft-soons repair unto me, I would forbear to speak to him. And were there nothing else to move me to mislike the motion, other than that his master would attempt the same without making the queen's majesty privy thereunto, it were cause sufficient." And when her grace had thus ended, I was so bold as of myself to say unto her grace (her pardon first required), that I thought few or none would believe, but that her grace could be right-well contented to marry, so there were some honourable marriage offered her by the queen's highness, or her majesty's assent. Whereunto her grace answered: "What I shall do hereafter I know not; but I assure you, upon my truth and fidelity, and as God be merciful unto me, I am not at this time otherwise minded than I have declared unto you,—no, though I were offered the greatest prince in all Europe. And yet perchance the queen's majesty may conceive this rather to proceed of a maidenly shamefastness than upon any such certain determination."

NUMBER I.

The Device for Alteration of Religion, in the first Year of Queen Elizabeth: offered to Secretary Cecil.

[Ex MSS. Nob. D. Grey de Ruthen.]

Question 1.

WHEN the queen's highness may attempt to reduce the church of England again to the former purity, and when to begin the alteration?

Answer.

At the next parliament; so that the dangers be foreseen, and remedies provided; for the sooner that religion is restored, God is the more glorified, and as we trust, will be more merciful unto us, and better save and defend her highness from all dangers.

Question 2.

What dangers may ensue thereof?

Answer 1.

The bishop of Rome, all that he may, will be incensed, he will excommunicate the queen's highness, interdict the realm, and give it in prey to all princes that will enter upon it; and stir them up to it by all manner of means.

2. The French king will be encouraged more to the war, and make his people more ready to fight against us, not only as enemies, but as heretics: he will be in great hope of aid from hence, of them that are discontented with this alteration, looking for tumults and discords: he will also stay concluding of peace, upon hope of some alteration.

3. Scotland also will have the same causes of boldness, and by that way the French king will seem soonest to attempt to annoy us. Ireland also will be very difficultly stayed, in the obedience, by reason of the clergy that is so addicted to Rome.

4. Many people of our own will be very much discontented, especially all such as governed in the late queen Mary's time, and were chosen thereto for no other causes, or were then most esteemed for being hot and earnest in that other religion, and now remain unplaced and uncalled to credit, will think themselves discredited, and all their doings defaced, and study all the ways they can to maintain their own doings, destroy and despise all this alteration.

5. Bishops, and all the clergy, will see their own ruin; and in confession, and preaching, and all other means and ways they can, will persuade the people from it; they will conspire with whomsoever will attempt and pretend to do God a sacrifice, in letting the alteration, though it be with murder of Christian men, and treason. Men which be of the papists' sect, which of late were in a manner all the judges of the land; the justices of the peace chosen out by the late queen in all the shires, such as were believed to be of that sect, and the more earnest therein, the more in estimation; these are most like to join and conspire with the bishops, and clergy. Some, when the subsidy shall be granted, and money levied, (as it appeareth that necessarily it must be done,) will be therewith offended, and like enough to conspire and arise, if they have any heed to stir them to do it, or hope of gain or spoil.

6. Many such as would gladly have alteration from the church of Rome, when they shall see peradventure that some old ceremonies be left still, for that their doctrine, which they embrace, is not allowed and commanded only, and all other abolished and disapproved, shall be discontented, and call the alteration a cloaked papistry, or a mingle-mangle.

Question 3.

What remedy for the same dangers? what shall be manner of doing of it? and what is necessary to be done before?

Answer 1.

First, for France, to practise a peace; or if it be offered, not to refuse it: if controversy of religion be there amongst them, to kindle it. Rome is less to be feared, from whom nothing is to be feared, but evil will, cursing, and practising. Scotland will follow France for peace, but there may be practice to help forward their division, and especially to augment the hope of them who inclined them to good religion. For certainty, to fortify Berwick, and to employ demulcances, and horsemen, for safety of the frontiers, and some expenses of money in Ireland. The fourth divided into five parts.

1. The first is of them, which were of queen Mary's council, elected or advanced to authority, only or chiefly for being of the pope's religion, and earnest in the same. Every augmentation or conservation of such men in authority or reputation is an encouraging those of their sect, and giveth hope to them that it shall revive and continue, although it hath a contrary shew: lest seeing the pillars to stand still untouched, it be a confirmation of them that are wavering papists, and a discouraging of such as are but half inclined to this alteration. Dum in habio vest animus, parvo momento huc illuc impellitur. This must be searched by all law, so far as justice may extend, and the queen's majesty's clemency not to be extended, before they do acknowledge themselves to have fallen into the lapse of the law. They must be abused of authority, discredited in their countries, so long as they seem to repugn the true religion, or to maintain the old proceedings; and if they should seem to allow and bear with the new alteration, yet not lightly to be credited, quia neophiti; and no man, but he loveth that time wherein he did flourish, and when he can, and as he can; those ancient laws and orders he will defend and maintain, with whom and in whom he was in estimation and authority, and a doer; for every man naturally loveth that which is his own work and creature. And contrary, as these men be based, so must her highness' old and sure servants, who have married with her, and not been in the late storm advanced, with authority. For that, that the world may see that her highness is not kind, not unmindful. And throughout all England, such persons as are known to be sure in religion, and her cause shall be slack, yet their own consciences should cause to be vigilant, careful, and diligent for the conservation of her estate, and maintenance of this alteration; and in all this she shall do but the same that the late queen Mary did to establish her

2. The second is, the bishops and clergy, being in manner all made and chosen, such as were thought the stoutest and mightiest champions of the pope's church, who in the late queen Mary's time, taking from the crown, impoverishing it, by extorting from private men, and all other means possible, per fas et nefas, have sought to enrich and advance themselves. These, her majesty being inclined to use much clemency, yet must seek, as well by parliament as by the just laws of England, in the præmunire, or other such penal laws, to bring again in order; and being found in the default, not to pardon, until they confess their fault, put themselves wholly to her highness' mercy, abjure the pope of Rome, and conform themselves to the new alteration; and by these means, well handled, her majesty's necessity of money may be somewhat relieved.

3. The third is to amend, even as all the rest above, by such ways as queen Mary taught, that no such as were, may be in commission of peace in their shires; but rather men meaner in substance, and younger in years, so that they have discretion to be put in place. A sharp law made and extended against assemblies of people, without authority. Lieutenants made in every shire, one or two men known to be sure of the queen's devotion. In the mean time, musters and captains appointed, young gentlemen, which do favour her highness. No office of jurisdiction or authority to be in any discontented man's hands, so far as justice or law may extend.

4. The fourth is to be remedied otherwise than by gentle and dulce handling; it is by the commissioners, and by the readiness and good will of the lieutenants and captains, to repress them, if any should begin a tumult, or murmur, or provide any assembly, or stoutness, to the contrary.

5. The fifth; for the discontentation of such as could be content to have religion altered, but would have it to go too far, for fear the strait laws upon the promulgation of the book, and severe execution of the same, at the first, would so repress them, that it is great hope it shall touch but a few: and better it were that they did suffer, than her highness and commonwealth should shake or be in danger; and to this they must well take heed that draw the book. And herein the universities must not be neglected, and the hurt which the last visitation in queen Mary's time did be amended: likewise such colleges, where children be instructed to come to the university, as Eton and Winchester, that as well the increase hereafter, as this present time, may be provided for.

Question 4.

What may be done of her highness, for her own conscience, openly, before the whole alteration? or if the alteration must tarry longer?

Answer.

This consultation is to be referred to such learned men as be meet to shew their minds therein, and to bring a plot or book hereof ready drawn to her highness; which being approved by her majesty, may so be put in the parliament-house. To which for the time it is thought that these are apt men, Dr. Bill, Dr. Parker, Dr. May, Dr. Cox, Mr. Whitehead, Grindall, Pilkington, and sir Thomas Smith, to call them together, and to be amongst them: and after the consultation with these, to draw in other men of learning, and grave and apt men for your purpose and credit, to have their assents. As for that is necessary to be done before, it is thought to be most necessary that a strait prohibition be made of all innovation, until such time as the book come forth, as well that there should be no often changes in religion, which would take away authority in the common people's estimation, as also to exercise the queen's majesty's subjects to obedience.

Question 5.

What orders be fit to be in the whole realm, as in the interim?

Answer.

To alter no further than her majesty hath, except it be to receive the communion, as her majesty pleaseth, at high feasts; and that where there be more chaplains at the mass, that they do always communicate with the executor in both kinds. And for her highness' conscience, till then, if there be some other devout sort of prayer or memory said and the seldomer mass.

Question 6.

What noblemen be fit to be made privy to those proceedings before it be opened to the whole council?

Answer.

The marquess Northampton, the earl of Bedford, the earl of Pembroke, lord John Gray.

Question 7.

What allowance the learned men shall have for the time they are about to review the Book of Common Prayers, and order of ceremonies and service in the church; and where they shall meet?

Answer.

Being so many persons as must attend still upon it, two messes of meat is thought yet indifferently to suffice for them and their servants. The place is thought most meet, either in some set place, or rather at sir Thomas Smith's lodging in Cannon-row. At one of those places must provision be laid in, of wood, of coal, and drink.

NUMBER II.

Dr. Sands' Letter to Dr. Parker, concerning some Proceedings in Parliament.—An Original.

[Ex MS. Col. C. C. Cantab.]

YE have rightly considered that these times are given to taking, and not to giving; for ye have stretched forth your hands further than all the rest. They never asked us in what state we stand, neither consider that we want; and yet in the time of our exile were we not so bare as we are now brought: but I trust we shall not linger here long, for the parliament draweth towards an end. The last book of service is gone through with a proviso to retain the ornaments which were used in the first and second year of king Edward, until it please the queen to take other order for them; our gloss upon this text is, that we shall not be forced to use them, but that others in the mean time shall not convey them away, but that they may remain for the queen. After this book was past, Boxall* and others quarrelled with it, that according to the order of Scripture, we had not gratiarum actio; for, saith he, Christus accepit panem, gratias egit, but in the time of consecration we give no thanks. This he put into the treasurer's head, and into count de Soreus' head; and he laboured to alienate the queen's majesty from confirming of the act, but I trust they cannot prevail. Mr. Secretary is earnest with the book, and we have ministered reasons to maintain that part. The bill of supreme government, of both the temporality and clergy, passeth with a proviso, that nothing shall be judged hereafter which is not confirmed by the canonical Scriptures and four general councils. Mr. Lever† wisely put such a scruple into the queen's head, that she would not take the title of supreme head. The bishops, as it is said, will not swear unto it as it is, but rather lose their livings. The bill is in hand to restore men to their livings; how it will speed I know not. The parliament is like to end shortly, and then we shall understand how they mind to use us. We are forced, through the vain bruits of the lying papists, to give up a confession of our faith, to shew forth the sum of that doctrine which we profess, and to declare that we dissent not amongst ourselves. This labour we have now in hand, on purpose to publish that, so soon as the parliament is ended; I wish that we had your hand unto it. Ye are happy that ye are so far from this tossing, and gross alterations and mutations; for we are made weary with them; but ye cannot rest long in your cell, ye must be removed to a more large abbey: and therefore in the mean time take your pleasure, for after ye will find but a little, Nihil est statutum, de conjugio sacerdotum, sed tanquam relictum in medio. Lever was married now of late; the queen's majesty will wink at it, but not establish it by law, which is nothing else but to bastard our children. Other things another time. Thus praying you to commend me to your abesses, I take my leave of you for this present hastily, at London, April ult. 1559. Yours, EDWIN SANDS.

* He was dean of Windsor and Peterborough in queen Mary's time.

† A minister at Frankfort, much commended by Calvin to be followed as an example.

NUMBER III.

The first Proposition, upon which the Papists and Protestants, disputed in Westminster Abbey. With the Arguments which the Reformed Divines made upon it.

[Ex MS. Col. C. C.]

It is against the word of God, and the custom of the primitive church, to use a tongue unknown to the people in common-prayers and administration of the sacraments.

By these words (the Word) we mean only the written word of God, or canonical Scriptures.

And by the custom of the primitive church, we mean, the order most generally used in the church for the space of five hundred years after Christ; in which times lived the most notable fathers, as Justin, Irenæus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Basil, Chrysostom, Hierome, Ambrose, Augustine, &c.

This assertion, above-written, hath two parts.

First, That the use of a tongue not understood of the people, in common prayers of the church, or in the administration of the sacraments, is against God's word.

The second, That the same is against the use of the primitive church.

The first part is most manifestly proved by the 14th chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, almost throughout the whole chapter; in the which chapter St. Paul intreateth of this matter, ex professo, purposely: and although some do cavil, that St. Paul speaketh not in that chapter of praying, but of preaching; yet it is most evident to any indifferent reader of understanding, and appeareth also by the exposition of the best writers, that he plainly there speaketh not only of preaching and prophesying, but also of prayer and thanksgiving, and generally of all other publick actions which require any speech in the church or congregation.

For of praying, he saith, "I will pray with my spirit, and I will pray with my mind; I will sing with the Spirit, and I will sing with my mind." And of thanksgiving (which is a kind of prayer), "Thou givest thanks well, but the other is not edified; and how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen to thy giving of thanks, when he understandeth not what thou sayest?" And in the end, ascending from particulars to universals, concludeth, that all things ought to be done to edification.

Thus much is clear by the very words of St. Paul; and the ancient doctors, Ambrose, Augustine, Hierome, and others, do so understand this chapter, as it shall appear by their testimonies, which shall follow afterwards.

Upon this chapter of St. Paul we gather these reasons following:

1. All things done in the church, or congregation, ought to be so done as they may edify the same.

But the use of an unknown tongue in public prayer, or administration of sacraments, doth not edify the congregation;

Therefore the use of an unknown tongue, in public prayer, or administration of the sacraments, is not to be had in the church.

The first part of this reason is grounded upon St. Paul's words, commanding all things to be done to edification.

The second part is also proved by St. Paul's plain words. First, By this similitude: "If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall be prepared to battle? Even so likewise, when ye speak with tongues, except ye speak words that have signification, how shall it be understood what is spoken? for ye shall but speak in the air," that is to say, in vain, and consequently without edifying.

And afterward, in the same chapter, he saith, "How can he that occupieth the place of the unlearned say Amen to thy giving of thanks: seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest? For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not edified."

These be St. Paul's words, plainly proving that a tongue not understood doth not edify.

And therefore both the parts of the reasons thus proved by St. Paul, the conclusion followeth necessarily.

2. Secondly; nothing is to be spoken in the congregation in an unknown tongue, except it be interpreted to the people that it may be understood. "For," saith Paul, "if there be no interpreter to him that speaketh in an unknown tongue, taceat in ecclesia, let him hold his peace in the church." And therefore the common prayers, and administration of sacraments, neither done in a known tongue nor interpreted, are against this commandment of Paul, and not to be used.

3. The minister, in praying or administration of the sacraments, using language not understood of the hearers, is to them barbarous, an alien, which of St. Paul is accounted a great absurdity.

4. It is not to be counted a Christian common-prayer, where the people present declare not their assent unto it by saying Amen; wherein is implied all other words of assent.

But St. Paul affirmeth, that the people cannot declare their assent, in saying Amen, except they understand what is said, as afore.

Therefore it is no Christian common-prayer, where the people understandeth not what is said.

5. Paul would not suffer, in his time, a strange tongue to be heard in the common-prayer in the church, notwithstanding that such a kind of speech was then a miracle, and a singular gift of the Holy Ghost, whereby infidels might be persuaded and brought to the faith: much less is it to be suffered now among Christian and faithful men, especially being no miracle, nor especial gift of the Holy Ghost.

6. Some will peradventure answer, that to use any kind of tongue in common-prayer, or administration of sacraments, is a thing indifferent.

But St. Paul is to the contrary; for he commandeth all things to be done to edification: he commandeth to keep silence, if there be no interpreter. And in the end of the chapter he concludeth thus: "If any man be spiritual, or a prophet, let him know, that the things which I write are the commandment of the Lord." And so, shortly to conclude, the use of a strange tongue in prayer and administration is against the word and commandment of God.

To these reasons, grounded upon St. Paul's words, which are the most firm foundation of this assertion, divers other reasons may be joined, gathered out of the Scriptures, and otherwise.

1. In the Old Testament, all things pertaining to the public prayer, benediction, thanksgiving, or sacrifice, were always in their vulgar and natural tongue.

In the second book of Paraleipomenon, cap. xxix., it is written, "that Ezechias commanded the Levites to praise God with the Psalms of David, and Asaph the prophet;" which doubtless were written in the Hebrew, their vulgar tongue. If they did so in the shadows of the law, much more ought we to do the like; who, as Christ saith, must pray in spiritu et veritate.

2. The final end of our prayer is, (as David saith.) "ut populi convenient in unum, et annuncient nomen Domini in Sion, et laudes ejus in Hierusalem."

But the name and praises of God cannot be set forth to the people, unless it be done in such a tongue as they may understand.

Therefore common-prayer must be had in the vulgar tongue.

3. The definition of public prayer, out of the words of St. Paul; "Orabo spiritu, orabo et mente." "Publicè orare, est vota communia mente ad Deum effundere, et ea spiritu hoc est, linguâ testari." Common-prayer is, to lift up our common desires to God with our minds, and to testify the same outwardly with our tongues. Which definition is approved of by St. Augustine de Magist. c. 1. "Nihil opus est (inquit) loquutione, nisi forte ut sacerdotes faciunt, significandæ mentis causâ, ut populus intelligat."

4. The ministrations of the Lord's last supper, and baptism, are, as it were, sermons of the death and resurrection of Christ.

But sermons to the people must be had in such language as the people may perceive, otherwise they should be had in vain.

5. It is not lawful for a Christian man to abuse the gifts of God.

But he that prayeth in the church in a strange tongue, abuseth the gift of God; for the tongue serveth only to express the mind of the speaker to the hearer. And Augustine saith, de Doct. Christ. lib. 4, cap. 10: "Loquendi omnino nulla est causa, si quod loquimur non intelligunt, propter quos, ut intelligant, loquimur." There is no cause why we should speak, if they for whose cause we speak understand not our speaking.

6. The heathen, and barbarous nations of all countries and sorts of men, were they never so wild, evermore made their prayers, and sacrifice to their gods, in their own mother-tongue; which is a manifest declaration, that it is the very light and voice of nature.

Thus much upon the ground of St. Paul, and other reasons out of the Scriptures; joining therewith the common usage of all nations, as a testimony of the law of nature.

Now, for the second part of the assertion, which is, "that the use of a strange tongue, in publick prayer, and administration of sacraments, is against the custom of the primitive church;" which is a matter so clear, that the denial of it must needs proceed either of great ignorance, or of wilful malice.

For, first of all, Justinus Martyr*, describing the order of the communion in his time, saith thus: "Die Solis urbanorum et rusticorum cætus fiunt, ubi apostolorum, prophetarumque; literæ, quoad fieri potest, præleguntur: deinde cessante lectore præpositus verba facit adhortatoria, ad imitationem tam honestarum rerum invitans. Post hæc consurgimus omnes, et preces offerimus, quibus finitis, profertur (ut diximus) panis, vinum et aqua, tum præpositus quantum potest preces offert, et gratiarum actiones; plebs vero amen accinit." Upon the Sundays assemblies are made both of the citizens and countrymen; whereas the writings of the disciples and of the prophets are read as much as may be. Afterwards when the reader doth cease, the head minister maketh an exhortation, exhorting them to follow so honest things. After this we rise all together, and offer prayers; which being ended, (as we have said,) bread, wine and water, are brought forth; then the head minister offereth prayers and thanksgivings as much as he can, and the people answereth Amen.

These words of Justin, who lived about 160 years after Christ, considered with their circumstances, declare plainly, that not only the Scriptures were read, but also that the prayers, and administration of the Lord's supper, were done in a tongue understood.

Both the liturgies of Basil and Chrysostom declare, that in the celebration of the communion, the people were appointed to answer to the prayer of the minister, sometimes "Amen;" sometimes, "Lord have mercy upon us;" sometimes, "and with thy spirit;" and, "we have our hearts lifted up unto the Lord," &c. Which answers they would not have made in due time if the prayers had not been made in a tongue understood.

And for further proof, let us hear what Basil* writeth in this matter to the clerks of Neocesarea; "Cæterum ad objectum in psalmodiis crimen, quo maximè simpliciores terrent calumniatores," &c. "As touching that is laid to our charge in psalmodies and songs, wherewith our slanderers do fray the simple, I have this to say, that our custom and usage in all churches be uniform and agreeable. For in the night, the people with us riseth, goeth to the house of prayer: and in travel, tribulation, and continual tears, they confess themselves to God; and at the last rising again, go to their songs or psalmodies, where being divided into two parts, sing by course together, both deeply weighing and confirming the matter of the heavenly saying; and also stirring up their attention and devotion of heart, which by other means be alienated and plucked away. Then appointing one to begin the song, the rest follow; and so with divers songs and prayers, passing over the night at the dawning of the day, all together, even as it were with one mouth and one heart, they sing unto the Lord a new song of confession, every man framing to himself meet words of repentance.

"If ye will flee us from henceforth for these things, ye must flee also the Egyptians, and both the Libyans, ye must eschew the Thebans, Palestines, Arabians, the Phenices, the Syrians, and those which dwell besides Euphrates. And to be short, all those with whom watchings, prayers, and common singing of psalms are had in honour."

These are sufficient to prove, that it is against God's word, and the use of the primitive church, to use a language not understood of the people, in common-prayer and ministration of the sacraments.

Wherefore it is to be marvelled at, not only how such an untruth and abuse crept at the first into the church, but also how it is maintained so stiffly at this day; and upon what ground these that will be thought guides and pastors of Christ's church are so loath to return to the first original of St. Paul's doctrine, and the practice of the primitive catholic church of Christ.

The God of patience and consolation give us grace to be like-minded one towards another in Christ Jesus, that we all agreeing together may, with one mouth, praise God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen†.

The Answer of Dr. Cole to the first Proposition of the Protestants, at the Disputation before the Lords at Westminster.

[EX MS. Col. C. C. Cantab.]

Est contra Verbum Dei, et consuetudinem veteris Ecclesiæ Linguâ Populo ignotâ uti in publicis precibus, et Administratione Sacramentorum.

MOST HONOURABLE,—Whereas these men here present have declared openly, that it is repugnant and contrary to the word of God to have the common prayers and ministration of the sacraments in the Latin tongue here in England, and that all such common-prayer and ministration ought to be and remain in the English tongue; ye shall understand, that to prove this their assertion, they have brought in as yet only one place of Scripture, taken out of St. Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. xiv., with certain other places of the holy doctors; whereunto answer is not now to be made: but when the book which they read shall be delivered unto us according to the appointment made in that behalf, then, God willing, we shall make answer, as well to the scripture as other testimonies alleged by them, so as all good men may evidently perceive and understand the same scripture to be misconstrued, and drawn from the native and true sense; and that it is not St. Paul's mind there to treat of common-prayer, or ministration of any sacraments. And therefore we now have only to declare and open before you briefly (which after, as opportunity serves in our answer, shall appear more at large) causes which move us to persist and continue in the order received, and to say and affirm, that to have the common-prayer or service with the ministration of the sacraments in the Latin tongue is convenient and (as the state of the cause standeth at this present) necessary.

Second Section.

1. And this we affirm, first, because there is no scripture manifest against this our assertion and usage of the church. And though there were any, yet it is not to be condemned that the church hath received. Which thing may evidently appear in many things that were sometime expressly commanded by God and his holy apostles.

2. As for example (to make the matter plain) ye see the express command of Almighty God, touching the observation of the Sabbath-day, to be changed by authority of the church (without any word of God written for the same) into the Sunday. The reason whereof appeareth not to all men; and howsoever it doth appear, and is accepted of all good men, without any controversy of Scripture; yea, without any mention of the day, saving only that St. John in his Apocalypse nameth it Diem Dominicam: in the change whereof all men may evidently understand the authority of the church, both in this cause and also in other matters, to be of great weight and importance, and therein esteemed accordingly.

3. Another example we have given unto us by the mouth of our Saviour himself, who washing the feet of his disciples, said, "I have herein given you an example, that as I have done, even so do you." Notwithstanding these express words, the holy church hath left the thing undone, without blame: not of any negligence, but of great and urgent causes, which appeareth not to many men, and yet universally without the breach of God's commandment (as is said) left undone. Was not the fact also, and, as it seemeth, the express commandment of Christ our Saviour, changed and altered, by the authority of the church, in the highest mystery of our faith, the blessed sacrament of the altar? For he ministereth the same (as the Scripture witnesseth) after supper. And now if a contentious man would strain the fact to the first institution, St. Augustine answereth (not by Scripture, for there is none to improve it, but indeed otherwise) even as the apostles did, Visum est Spiritui Sancto, ut in honorem tanti sacramenti, in os Christiani hominis prius inret corpus Dominicum quam exteri cibi. It is determined (saith St. Augustine) by the Holy Ghost, that in the honour of so great a sacrament the body of our Lord should enter first into the mouth of a Christian man before other external meats. So that notwithstanding it was the fact of Christ himself, yet the church, moved by the Holy Ghost (as is said), hath changed that also, without offence likewise. By the which sentence of St. Augustine manifestly appeareth that this authority was derived from the apostles unto this time; the which same authority, according to Christ's promises, doth still abide and remain with his church.

4. And hereupon also resteth the alteration of the sacrament under one kind, whenas the multitude of the Gentiles entered, the church, instructed by the Holy Ghost, understood inconveniences, and partly also heresy to creep in through the ministration under both kinds; and therefore, as in the former examples, so in this now (the matter nothing diminished neither in itself nor in the receivers, and the thing also being received before, by a common and uniform consent, without contradiction), the church did decree, that from henceforth it should be received under the form of bread only; and whosoever should think and affirm that whole Christ remained not under both kinds, pronounced him to be in heresy.

5. Moreover, we read in the Acts, whereas it was determined in a council holden at Hierusalem by the apostles, that the Gentiles should abstain from strangled and blood, in these words, Visum est Spiritui Sancto, et nobis, &c.—"It is decreed by the Holy Ghost, and us" (say the apostles), "that no other burden be laid upon you than these necessary things, that ye abstain from things offered up unto idols, and from blood; and from that is strangled, and from fornication." This was the commandment of God (for still it is commanded, upon pain of damnation, to keep our bodies clean from fornication), and the other, joined by the Holy Ghost with the same, not kept nor observed at this day.

6. Likewise, in the Acts of the Apostles it appeareth, that among them in the primitive church all things were common. They sold their lands and possessions, and laid the money at the feet of the apostles, to be divided to the people as every man had need; inso-much that Ananias and Sapphira, who kept back a part of their possession, and laid but the other part at the apostles' feet, were declared, by the mouth of St. Peter, to be tempted by the devil, and to lie against the Holy Ghost, and, in example of all other, punished with sudden death. By all which examples, and many other, it is manifest that though there were any such scripture which they pretend, as there is not, yet the church wherein the Holy Ghost is always resident may order the same, and may therein say as truly, Visum est Spiritui Sancto, et nobis, as did the apostles; for Christ promised unto the church, that the Holy Ghost should teach them all truth, and that he himself would be with the same church until the world's end. And hereupon we do make this argument with St. Augustine, which he writeth in his epistle ad Januarium, after this sort,—Ecclesia Dei inter multam paleam multaque Zizania constituta, nulla tolerat; et tamen quæ sunt contra fidem vel bonam vitam non approbat, nec tacet, nec facit.

To this major we add this minor; but the catholic church of God neither reproveth the service or common-prayer to be in the learned tongue, nor yet useth it otherwise.

Therefore it is most lawful and commendable so to be.

Third Section.

Another cause that moveth us to say and think, is, that otherwise doing (as they have said) there followeth necessarily the breach of unity of the church, and the commodities thereby are withdrawn and taken from us; there follows necessarily an horrible schism and division.

In alteration of the service into our mother-tongue, we condemn the church of God which hath been heretofore, we condemn the church that is present, and namely the church of Rome.

To the which, howsoever it is lightly esteemed here among us, the holy saint and martyr Irenæus saith, in plain words, thus: Ad hanc ecclesiam propter potentiores principatitatem, necesse est omnes alias ecclesias convenire; hoc est omnes undiq; fideles. It is necessary (saith this holy man, who was nigh to the apostles, or rather in that time; for he is called ἀρχαίος ἀποστόλων) that all churches do conform themselves and agree with the see or church of Rome; all churches, that is to say (as he declareth himself), all Christian and faithful men. And he allegeth the cause why it is necessary for all men to agree therewith (propter potentiores principatitatem), for the greater pre-eminence of the same, or for the mightier principality.

From this church, and consequently from the whole universal church of Christ, we fall undoubtedly into a fearful and dangerous schism, and therewith into all incommodities of the same.

That in this doing we fall from the unity of the church, it is more manifest than that we need much to stand upon. St. Augustine, Contra Cresconium Grammaticum, putting a difference between Heresis and Schisma, saith, Schisma est diversa sequentium secta heresis autem schisma inueteratum.

To avoid this horrible sin of schism, we are commanded, by the words of St. Paul, saying, Observate vos ut id ipsum dicatis omnes et non sin in vobis schismata.

And that this changing of the service out of the learned tongue is doing contrary to the form and order universally observed, is plain and evident to every man's eye.

They are to be named heretics (saith he) which obstinately think and judge in matters of faith otherwise than the rest of the church doth. And those are called schismatics which follow not the order and trade of the church, but will invent of their own wit and brain other orders, contrary or diverse to them which are already by the Holy Ghost universally established in the church. And we being declined from God by schism, note what follows:—there is then no gift of God, no knowledge, no justice, no faith, no works, and finally, no virtue that could stand us in stead, though we should think to glorify God by suffering death (as St. Paul saith), 1 Cor. xiii. Yea, there is no sacrament that availeth to salvation in them that willingly fall into schism, that without fear separate and divide themselves from the sacred unity of Christ's holy spouse the church, as St. Augustine plainly saith—Quicumque ille est, qualiscumque ille est, Christianus non est qui in ecclesia Christi non est: that is, whosoever he be, whatsoever degree or condition he be of, or what qualities soever he hath, though he should speak with the tongues of angels—speak he never so holily, show he never so much virtue, yet is he not a Christian man that is guilty of that crime of schism; and so no member of that church.

Wherefore this is an evident argument; every Christian man is bound, upon pain of damnation, by the plain words of God, uttered by St. Paul, to avoid the horrible sin of schism.

The changing of the service-book out of the learned tongue, it being universally observed through the whole church from the beginning, is a cause of an horrible schism, wherefore every good Christian man is bound to avoid the change of the service.

Now, to confirm that we said before, and to prove that to have the common-prayer and ministration of the sacraments in English, or in other than is the learned tongue, let us behold the first institution of the west church, and the particulars thereof.

And first, to begin with the church of France:—Dionysius, St. Paul's scholar, who first planted the faith of Christ in France; Martialis, who (as it is said) planted the faith in Spain; and others which planted the same here in England, in the time of Elutherius; and such as planted the faith in Germany and other countries; and St. Augustine, that converted this realm afterwards, in the time of Gregory, almost a thousand years ago: it may appear that they had interpreters, as touching the declaration and preaching of the gospel, or else the gift of tongues; but that ever, in any of these west churches, they had the service in their own language, or that the sacraments other than matrimony were ministered in their own vulgar tongue; that does not appear by any ancient historiographer. Whether shall they be able ever to prove that it was so generally, and thereby by continuance, in the Latin, the self-same order and words remain still; whereas all men do consider, and know right well, that in all other inferior and barbarous tongues great change daily is seen, and specially in this our English tongue, which in quovis seculo fere, in every age, or hundred years, there appeareth a great change and alteration in this language.

For the proof whereof there hath remained many books of late in this realm (as many do well know), which we, that be now Englishmen, can scarcely understand or read. And if we should so often (as the thing may chance, and as alteration daily doth grow in our vulgar tongue), change the service of the church, what manifold inconveniences and errors would follow we leave it to all men's judgments to consider. So that hereby may appear another invincible argument, which is, the consent of the whole catholic church, that cannot err in the faith and doctrine of our Saviour Christ, but is (by St. Paul's saying) the pillar and foundation of all truth.

Moreover, the people of England do not understand their own tongue better than Eunuchus did the Hebrew; of whom we read in the Acts, that Philip was commanded to teach him; and he reading there the prophecy of Esay, Philip (as it is written in the 8th chapter of the Acts) enquired of him whether he understood that which he read or no. He made answer saying, Et quomodo possum, si non aliquis ostenderit mihi; in which words are reproved the intolerable boldness of such as will enterprise without any teacher; yea, contemning all doctors to unclasp the book, and thereby, instead of eternal food, drink up deadly poison. For whereas the Scripture is misconstrued, and taken in a wrong sense, that it is not the Scripture of God, but as St. Hierom saith, writing upon the Epistle to the Galatians, it is the scripture of the devil: and we do not contend with hereticks for the Scripture, but for the true sense and meaning of the Scripture.

We read of ceremonies in the Old Testament, as the circumcision, the bells and pomegranates; of Aaron's apparel, with many other and kinds of sacrifices, which all were, as St. Paul saith unto the Hebrews, justitia carnis; and did not inwardly justify the party before God, that objected, in protestation of their faith in Christ to come; and although they had the knowledge of every fact of Christ, which was signified particularly by those ceremonies. And it is evident and plain that the high-priest entered into the inner part of the temple (named Sanctum Sanctorum), whereas the people might not follow, nor was it lawful for them to stand, but there where they could neither see nor hear what the priest either said or did, as St. Luke, in the first chapter of his Gospel, rehearseth in the history of Zachary.

Upon conference of these two testaments may be plainly gathered this doctrine, that in the school of Christ many things may be said and done the mystery whereof the people knoweth not, neither are they bound to know. Which things, that is, that the people did not hear and understand the common prayer of the priest and minister, it is evident and plain, by the practice of the ancient Greek church, and that also that now is at Venice, or elsewhere.

In that east church, the priest standeth, as it were, in a tralice, or closet, hanged round about with curtains, or veils, apart from the people. And after the consecration, when he sheweth the blessed sacrament, the curtains are drawn, whereof Chrysostom speaketh thus: Cum vela videris retrahi, tunc superne caelum aperiri cogita; When thou seest the veils or curtains drawn open, then think thou that heaven is open from above.

It is also here to be noted, that there is two manners of prayings, one public, another private; for which cause the church hath such considerations of the public prayer, that it destroyeth not nor taketh away the private prayer of the people in time of sacrifice, or other divine service; which thing would chance, if the people should do nothing but hearken to answer and say Amen. Besides, the impossibility of the matter; whereas in a great parish every man cannot hear what the priest saith, though the material church were defaced, and he left the altar of God, and stood in the midst of the people.

Furthermore, if we should confess that it were necessary to have common prayer in the vulgar tongue, these two heresies would follow upon it; that prayer profiteth no man but him that understandeth it, and him also that is present and heareth it; and so, by consequent, void was the prayer for St. Peter in prison, by the church abroad.

Now consider the practice of this realm.

If we should grant the service to be in English, we should not have that in the same form that it is in now, being in Latin; but belike, we should have that, as it was, of late days: the matter of which service is taken out of the Psalms, and other part of the Bible, translated into English, wherein are manifest errors and false translations, which all are by depravation of God's Scripture, and so verè mendacia. Now, if the service be so framed, then may men well say upon us, that we serve God with lies.

Wherefore we may not so travel and labour to alter the form of our common prayer, that we less the fruit of all prayer, which by this barbarous contention no doubt we shall do. And the church of God hath no such custom, as St. Paul allegeth, in such contentions. And may not the whole world say unto us, as St. Paul said unto the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xiv.,—

An à vobis Verbum Dei processit, aut in vos solos pervenit? As though the whole church had been ever in error, and never had seen this chapter of St. Paul before: and that the Holy Ghost had utterly forsaken his office, in leading that into all truth, till now of late, certain, boasting of the Holy Ghost, and the sincere word of God, hath enterprised to correct and overthrow the whole church.

Augustinus (lib. i.), contra Julianum Pelagium, à Græcis pro suâ heresi profugum, querentem, ad hunc modum, respondit: Puto (inquit) tibi eam partem orbis debere sufficere, in quâ primum apostolorum suorum voluit Dominus gloriosissimo martyrio coronari. Et idem paulo post: Te certe (Julianum alloquitur) Occidentalis terra generavit, Occidentalis regeneravit ecclesia. Quid ei quaris inferre, quod in eâ non invenisti, quando in ejus membra venisti? Imò, Quid ei quaris auferre, quod in eâ tu quoque accepisti? Hæc ille.

A number of authorities out of the doctors we could rehearse, that maketh for the unity of the church, and for not disturbing the quiet government of the same, which all impugn this their first assertion by way of argument. But because they have framed their assertion so that we be compelled to defend the negative (in the probation whereof the doctors use not directly to have many words); therefore, of purpose we leave out a number of the sayings of the doctors (which all, as I said before, would prove this first matter by way of argument) lest we should be tedious, and keep you too long in a plain matter.

And therefore now to conclude, for not changing the divine service, and the ministration of the sacraments from the learned tongue (which thing doth make a schism, and a division between us and the catholic church of God), we have brought in the Scripture that doth forbid all such schism. And also the consent and custom of the whole church, which cannot err, and maketh us bold to say as we do; with other things, as ye have heard, for confirmation of the same. And in answering to the first matter, we intend (God willing) to say much more; beseeching Almighty God so to inspire the heart of the queen's majesty, and her most honourable council, with the nobility of this realm, and us that be the pastors of the people in these causes, that so we may dispose of the service of God as we may therein serve God: and that we do not, by altering the said service from the uniform manner of Christ's church, but also highly displease God, and procure to us infamy of the world, the worm of conscience, and eternal damnation, which God forbid: and grant us grace to acknowledge, confess, and maintain his truth. To whom be all glory. Amen.

NUMBER V.

The Declaration of the Proceedings of a Conference begun at Westminster, the last of March, 1559, concerning certain Articles of Religion; and the breaking up of the said Conference, by default and contempt of certain Bishops, Parties of the said Conference.

[Ex Chartophylac. Regio.]

THE queen's most excellent majesty having heard of diversities of opinions in certain matters of religion amongst sundry of her loving subjects, and being very desirous to have the same reduced to some godly and christian concord, thought it best, by advice of the lords, and others of her privy council, as well for the satisfaction of persons doubtful, as also for the knowledge of the very truth, in certain matters of difference, to have a convenient chosen number of the best learned of either part, and to confer together their opinions and reasons; and thereby to come to some good and charitable agreement. And hereupon, by her majesty's commandment, certain of her said privy council declared this purpose to the archbishop of York, being also one of the said privy council, and required him, that he would impart the same to some of the bishops, and to make choice of eight, nine, or ten of them; and that there should be the like number named of the other part; and further also declared to him (as then was supposed) what the matters should be: and as for the time it was thought upon; and then after certain days past, it was signified by the said archbishop, that there was appointed (by such of the bishops to whom he had imparted this matter) eight persons; that is to say, four bishops and four doctors, who were content, at the queen's majesty's commandment, to shew their opinions, and, as he termed it, render account of their faith in those matters which were mentioned, and that specially, in writing: although, he said, they thought the same so determined, as there was no cause to dispute upon them. It was hereupon fully resolved, by the queen's majesty, with the advice aforesaid, that according to their desire, it should be in writing on both parts, for avoiding of much alteration in words. And that the said bishops should, because they were in authority of degree superiors, first declare their minds and opinions to the matter, with their reasons, in writing. And the other number, being also eight men of good degree in schools, (and some having been in dignity in the church of England,) if they had anything to say to the contrary, should the same day declare their opinions in like manner. And so each of them should deliver their writings to the other to be considered what were to be improved therein; and the same to declare again in writing at some other convenient day; and the like order to be kept in all the rest of the matters.

All this was fully agreed upon with the archbishop of York, and so also signified to both parties; and immediately hereupon divers of the nobility, and states of the realm, understanding that such a meeting and conference should be, and that in certain matters, thereupon the present court of parliament consequently following, some laws might be grounded, they made earnest means to her majesty, that the parties of this conference might put and read their assertions in the English tongue, and that in the presence of them, the nobility, and others of her parliament-house, for the better satisfaction and enabling of their own judgments to treat and conclude of such laws as might depend thereupon. This also being thought very reasonable, was signified to both parties, and so fully agreed upon. And the day appointed for the first meeting to be the Friday in the forenoon, being the last of March, at Westminster-church, where both for good order, and for honour of the conferences by the queen's majesty's commandment, the lords and others of the privy council were present, and a great part of the nobility also.

And notwithstanding the former order appointed and consented unto by both parties, yet the bishop of Winchester, and his colleagues, alleging, that they had mistaken that their assertions and reasons should be written, and so only recited out of the book, said, their book was not then ready written, but they were ready to argue and dispute, and therefore they would for that time repeat in speech, that which they had to say to the first proposition.

This variation from the former order, and specially from that which themselves had by the said archbishop in writing before required, (adding thereto the reason of the apostle, that to contend with words is profitable to nothing but to the subversion of the hearers,) seemed to the queen's majesty somewhat strange; and yet was it permitted, without any great reprehension, because they excused themselves with mistaking the order, and argued, that they would not fail, but put it in writing, and according to the former order, deliver it to the other part.

And so the said bishop of Winchester and his colleagues appointed Dr. Cole, dean of Paul's, to be their utterer of their minds, who partly by speech only, and partly by reading of authorities written, and at certain times being informed of his colleagues what to say, made a declaration of their meanings and their reasons to the first proposition.

Which being ended, they were asked, by the privy council, if any of them had any more to be said; and they said, no. So as then the other part was licensed to shew their minds, which they did accordingly to the first order, exhibiting all that which they meant to propound in a book written. Which, after a prayer and invocation made most humbly to Almighty God for the enduing of them with his Holy Spirit, and a protestation also to stand to the doctrine of the catholick church, builded upon the Scriptures, and the doctrine of the prophets and the apostles, was distinctly read by one Robert Horn, bachelor in divinity, late dean of Duresm. And the same being ended, (with some likelihood, as it seemed, that the same was much allowable to the audience.) certain of the bishops began to say contrary to their former answer, that they had now much more to say to this matter; wherein, although they might have been well reprehended for such manner of cavillation, yet for avoiding any more mistaking of orders in this colloquy, or conference, and for that they should utter all that which they had to say, it was both ordered, and thus openly agreed upon of both parts, in the full audience, that upon the Monday following the bishops should bring their minds and reasons in writing to the second assertion, and the last also, if they could, and first read the same; and that done, the other part should bring likewise theirs to the same; and being read, each of them should deliver to other the same writings. And in the mean time the bishops should put in writing, not only all that which Dr. Cole had that day uttered, but all such other matters as they any otherwise could think of for the same; and as soon as might possible, to send the same book, touching the first assertion to the other part; and they should receive of them that writing which master Horn had there read that day; and upon Monday it should be agreed what day they should exhibit their answer touching the first proposition.

Thus both parts assented thereto, and the assembly was quietly dismissed. And therefore upon Monday the like assembly began again at the place and hour appointed; and there, upon what sinister or disordered meaning is not yet fully known, (though in some part it be understood,) the bishop of Winchester, and his colleagues, and specially Lincoln, refused to exhibit or read, according to the former notorious order on Friday, that which they had prepared for the second assertion; and thereupon, by the lord keeper of the great seal, they being first gently and favourably required to keep the order appointed, and that taking no place, being secondly, as it behoved, pressed with the more earnest request, they neither regarding the authority of that place, nor their own reputation, nor the credit of the cause, utterly refused that to do.

And finally, being again particularly every one of them apart, distinctly by name required to understand their opinions therein; they all (saving one, which was the abbot of Westminster, having some more consideration of order and his duty of obedience than the other) utterly and plainly denied to have their book read, some of them as more earnestly than other some, so also some others more indiscreetly and irreverently than others.

Whereupon giving such example of disorders, stubbornness, and self-will, as hath not been seen and suffered in such an honourable assembly, being of the two estates of this realm, the nobilities and commons, besides the persons of the queen's majesty's most honourable privy council, the same assembly was dismissed, and the godly and most christian purpose of the queen's majesty made frustrate: and afterwards, for the contempt so notoriously made, the bishops of Winchester and Lincoln, who have most obstinately disobeyed both common authority and varied manifestly from their own order, specially Lincoln, who shewed more folly than the other, were condignly committed to the Tower of London; and the rest, saving the abbot of Westminster, stand bound to make daily their personal appearance before the council, and not to depart the city of London and Westminster, until further order be taken with them for their disobedience and contempt.

NUMBER VI.

An Address made by some Bishops and Divines to Queen Elizabeth, against the use of Images.

[EX MSS. C. C. C. Miscellanea B.]

To the Queen's most Excellent Majesty.

WE knowing your gracious clemency, and considering the necessity of the matter that we have to move, the one doth encourage us and the other compel us (as before) to make our humble petition unto your highness, and to renew our former suit, not in any respect of self-will, stoutness, or striving against your majesty, (God we take to witness) for with David we confess that we are but as canes mortui, aut pulices, in comparison. But we do it only for that fear and reverence which we bear to the majesty of Almighty God, in whose hands to fall 'tis terrible; for it lieth in his power to destroy for ever, and to cast both body and soul into hell-fire. And lest in giving just offence to the little ones, in setting a trap of errors for the ignorant, and digging a pit for the blind to fall into, we should not only be guilty of the blood of our brethren, and deserve the wrathful Væ, and vengeance of God, but also procure, to our reclaiming consciences, the biting worm, that never dieth, for our endless confusion. For in what thing soever we may serve your excellent majesty, not offending the divine majesty of God, we shall, with all humble obedience, be most ready thereunto, if it be even to the loss of our life; for so God commandeth of us, duty requireth of us, and we with all conformity have put in proof. And as God, through your gracious government, hath delivered unto us innumerable benefits, which we most humbly acknowledge, and with due reverence daily give him thanks; so we doubt not, but that of his mercy he will happily finish in your majesty that good work which of his free favour he hath most graciously begun; that following the examples of the godly princes which have gone before, you may clearly purge the polluted church, and remove all occasions of evil. And for so much as we have heretofore, at sundry times, made petition to your majesty concerning the matter of images, but at no time exhibited any reasons for the removing of the same. Now, lest we should seem to say much, and prove little, to allay consciences without the warrant of God, and unreasonably require that for the which we can give no reason, we have at this time put in writing, and do most humbly exhibit to your gracious consideration, those authorities of the Scriptures, reasons, and pithy persuasions, which as they have moved all such our brethren as now bear the office of bishops to think and affirm images not expedient for the church of Christ, so will they not suffer us, without the great offending of God, and grievous wounding of our own consciences, (which God deliver us from,) to consent to the erecting or retaining of the same in the place of worshipping; and we trust, and most earnestly ask it of God, that they may also persuade your majesty, by your regal authority, and in the zeal of God, utterly to remove this offensive evil out of the church of England, to God's great glory, and our great comfort.

[Here follow the reasons against them, of which I have given a full abstract in the History, and therefore do not set them down here, for they are very large. The address concludes in these words.]

Having thus declared unto your highness a few causes of many which do move our consciences in this matter, we beseech your highness, most humbly, not to strain us any further, but to consider that God's word doth threaten a terrible judgment unto us, if we, being pastors and ministers in his church, should assent unto the thing, which in our learning and conscience, we are persuaded doth tend to the confirmation of error, superstition and idolatry*; and finally, to the ruin of the souls committed to our charge †, for the which we must give an account to the Prince of pastors at the last day. We pray your majesty also, not to be offended with this our plainness and liberty, which all good and Christian princes have ever taken in good part at the hands of godly bishops.

St. Ambrose, writing to Theodosius the emperor, useth these words: "Sed neque imperiale est libertatem dicendi negare, neque sacerdotale quod sentiat non dicere ‡."

And again; "In causa vero Dei quem audies, si sacerdotem non audies, cujus majoris peccatur periculo? Quis tibi verum audebit dicere, si sacerdos non audeat §?"

These, and such-like speeches of St. Ambrose, Theodosius and Valentinianus, the emperors, did take in good part; and we doubt not but your grace will do the like, of whose, not only clemency, but also beneficence, we have largely tasted.

We beseech your majesty also, in these and such-like controversies of religion, to refer the discusment and deciding of them to a synod of the bishops, and other godly learned men, according to the example of Constantinus Magnus, and other Christian emperors, that the reasons of both parties being examined by them, the judgment may be given uprightly in all doubtful matters.

And to return to this present matter; we most humbly beseech your majesty to consider, that besides weighty causes in policy, which we leave to the wisdom of the honourable counsellors, the establishing of images by your authority shall not only utterly discredit our ministeries, as builders of the thing which we have destroyed, but also blemish the fame of your most godly brother, and such notable fathers as have given their lives for the testimony of God's truth, who by public law removed all images.

The almighty and ever-living God plentifully endue your majesty with His Spirit and heavenly wisdom, and long preserve your most gracious reign, and prosperous government over us, to the advancement of His glory, to the overthrow of superstition, and to the benefit and comfort of all your highness's loving subjects. Amen.

Ten Letters written to and by Dr. Parker, concerning his promotion to the See of Canterbury.—An Original.

[Ex MSS. Reverendis. D.D. Gul. Arch. Cant.]

AFTER my right hearty commendations, these are to signify unto you that for certain matters touching yourself, which I trust shall turn you to good, I would wish that you should repair hither to London, with as convenient speed as you can, where you shall find me at Burgeny-house, in Paternoster-row, if it be not over-long ere you come. And if it chance that I be returned into Suffolk before your coming, then I would you should make your repair unto my brother-in-law, sir William Cecil, the queen's secretary, declaring unto him that I appointed you to wait upon him to know his pleasure touching such matters as he and I did talk of concerning you. Thus wishing you well to do, I bid you heartily farewell.

you, I was right heartily sorry that I molested you with so long a letter, into which fault, for that I will not fall again at this present, I shall use the fewer words. Sir, if I may know at what time I might, in your return down, wait on your worship at Burgeny, or at Newmarket, I will, by God's grace, so appoint myself to be there first, the rather for that I would not give occasion to have your journey either protracted, or yet diverted out of the right line thereof. In the mean time I shall beseech God to restore your strength, that ye may the sooner be restored to the commonwealth, which in this apparent necessity of worthy persons, I fear, feeleth God's hand in this his visitation to be burdenous. I would wish ye were not much stirring abroad in the distemperance of the air, so contrarious to the state of men's bodies, once pierced with this insolent quartane, as experience sheweth. I think the spring-time, as in natural respects, must be expected, though Almighty God be bound to no time. Thus I heartily commend you to His gracious protection, this 20th of December.

Your most bounden assuredly to command,

A Letter written to him by Secretary Cecil.—An Original.

AFTER my hearty commendations. The queen's highness minding presently to use your service in certain matters of importance, hath willed me so to signify unto you, to the end you should forthwith, upon the sight hereof, put yourself in order to make your undelayed repair hither unto London; at which your coming up, I shall declare unto you her majesty's further pleasure, and the occasion why you are sent for; and hereof praying you therefore in nowise to fail, I bid you well to fare.

Another Letter of the Lord Keeper's to him.—An Original.

AFTER hearty commendations, these are to signify unto you, that ye may assure yourself, that you shall have anything that I can do for you touching the request of your letters, or any other matter being in my power: I do think that ye have received, ere this, a letter from Mr. Secretary, willing you to come up immediately, if your health will suffer, for certain weighty matters touching the queen's service; so as I trust, by your presence, all things to your own contentation shall come the better to pass. If this letter be not come to your hands, and therewith you be not able to come, it shall be behoveful for you to signify so much, because I have been willed also to haste your coming up. Thus right heartily fare ye well. Written the 4th of January, 1558, by Dr. Parker's Answer.—A Copy.

RIGHT WORSHIPFUL—After my duty of commendations. Where of late I received your letters to this effect, that I should repair up unto you at London, upon occasion, as ye wrote, which may turn me to good, so judged by a late conference with the right worshipful sir William Cecil, secretary to the queen's majesty, of long time my special good friend and master, ye shall understand that my quartane hath so much distempered the state of my health, that without apparent danger, I cannot as yet commit myself to the adventure of the air, as by divers essays I have attempted of late, to my greater pain and further hinderance; whereupon, if your opportunity might so serve, I would most heartily pray your worship to signify so much. And further, yet in confidence of your old good heart to me, I would be a suiter to you, as I was once to sir John Cheek, my entire good friend and patron, to the said sir William Cecil, that where he was desirous, by his mediation, to do me good (as here you use to call it) even as I was then framed in mind, so am I at this day. I would be inwardly heavy and sorry that his favourable affection should procure me anything above the reach of mine ability, whereby I should both dishonest myself, and disappoint the expectation of such as may think that in me which I know is not; but specially I might clog and cumber by conscience to Godward, before whom I look every day to appear to make mine answer, which I think, and as I trust, is not far off: notwithstanding though I would most fain wear out the rest of my life in private state, yet concerning that very small talent credited unto me, I would not so unthankfully to God ensue my quiet, that I could not be content to bestow it, so it were there, whether my heart and conscience afore this time and daily yet doth incline me: I mean, to be no further abled, but by the revenue of some prebend (without charge of cure or of government), to occupy myself to dispense God's word amongst the simple strayed sheep of God's fold, in poor destitute parishes and cures, more meet for my decayed voice, and small quality, than in theatrical and great audience: which walk, and wish I would to be near their quarters, where we both were born, by occasion whereof I might have opportunity to wait other-while on you at Redgrave, whither I have vowed my first journey, immediately upon my strength recovered, by the occasion of your friendly request of your letters ye sent me. And if I might be yet bolder with you, as I was with the said sir John Cheek, to disclose my desire of all places in England, I would wish to bestow most my time in the university, the state whereof is miserably at this present, as I have had intelligence from time to time thereof. And if in any respect I could do service, as a weak member of the commonwealth, I think I might do it with them, having long acquaintance and some experience in the doings thereof; which judgment had the said sir John Cheek towards me: and therefore to set me on work, had once, by the favour of the said Mr. Secretary, procured to have me named to the mastership of Trinity College, which yet chanced not to that effect, God otherwise determining the matter in his providence. But to tell you my heart, I had rather have such a thing as Bennet-College is in Cambridge, a living of twenty nobles by the year at the most, than to dwell in the deanery of Lincoln, which is 200 at the least. Now, sir, ye may see herein, yet my ambition in writing thus much, but I shall pray you to accept the circumstances, which ye may better insinuate to Mr. Secretary, than I dare be bold, by my rude letters, to molest his favourable goodness, or yet prescribe to your, or his worship, wisdom and prudence. In conclusion, at the reverence of God, I pray you, either help that I be quite forgotten, or else so appointed, that I be not entangled now of new with the concourse of the world, in any respect of publick state of living, whereby I shall have an unfeigned signification of your very good will to me indeed, and be bound to pray for you during my life.

Some of your scholars at Cambridge, enjoying the benefit of your liberal exhibition, have sent your worship now their letters; some be sick and absent.

Thus reprising the quiet of my mind, and having good hope in your friendliness to the consideration aforesaid, I wish you a full recovery of your health, and a continuance in God's grace and favour, with all your family.

Your beadsman to command, M. P.

A long Letter of Dr. Parker's, excusing himself from the offer of the Archbishoprick of Canterbury.—An Original.

RIGHT HONOURABLE—My duty presupposed. It is an old-said proverb, Ubi quis dolet ibidem et manum frequenter habet, beseeching you, for God's sake, the rather to bear the importunity of this my hand-writing, supposing that this may be one of the last solicitations that I shall molest you with.

Sir, your signification uttered to me at my first coming to you at London, concerning a certain office ye named to me, did hold me in such carefulness all my time of being there, with the recurring of a dull distemperance, set in my head by the dregs of my quartane, and as yet not remedied, whereby I had no disposition to my book; beside some other displeasing cogitations concerning the state of this time, made me have so little joy of my being at London, as I had never less in my life: most glad when my back was turned thereunto. But to come near to my intent of writing, I shall pray to God, yea, bestow that office well, ye shall need care the less for the residue. God grant it chanceth neither on an arrogant man, neither on a faint-hearted man, nor on a covetous man; the first shall both sit in his own light, and shall discourage his fellows to join with him in unity of doctrine, which must be their whole strength; for if any heart-burning be betwixt them, if private quarrels stirred abroad be brought home, and so shall shiver them asunder, it may chance to have that success which I fear in the conclusion will follow. The second man should be too weak to commune with the adversaries, who would be the stouter upon his pusillanimity. The third man not worth his bread, profitable for no estate in any Christian commonwealth, to serve it rightly.

For my part, I pray God I never fall into his indignation and wisdom; it were not for a subject to deserve his prince's displeasure, and sorry would I be to discontent Mr. Secretary and you, for whose worshipful favours I count myself more bound to pray to God, and to wish well to them for all the men in the realm beside. I speak it sincerely, without flattery; for though I have little wit, yet I can discern betwixt men who delight to be flattered, and who not, though I would not consider how dishonest it were for me to use it. But, sir, except ye both moderate and restrain your overmuch good-will in the former respect to me-ward, I fear, in the end, I shall dislike you both, and that your benevolencies should, by occasion of my obstinate untowardness, jeopard me into prison; yet there shall I bear you my good heart, which I had rather suffer in a quiet conscience, than to be intruded into such room and vocation, wherein I should not be able to answer the charge to God nor to the world—wherein I should not serve the queen's honour, which I wish most heartily advanced in all her wise and godly proceedings; nor yet should I live to the honour of the realm, and so finally should but work a further displeasing contemplation to my good friends who preferred me.

This, this is the thing that makes me afraid, my lord, though I passed not on mine own shame and rebuke; and therefore, by God's favour, and your good helps, I never intend to be of that order, better or worse, higher nor lower: Non omnia possumus omnes; et tutissimum est ut quisque hanc artem exerceat in qua educatus, et ad quam natura homines formavit. And as for other furnishings, I am too far behind. When I came first up to London, I had thirty pounds in my purse, not ten shillings more, whereof I have wasted a good part; and if I were placed, as some of my friends wish to me, what would that do to begin, or to furnish my household? And I hear how the citizens of Norwich pray for the soul of their last bishop; for when upon his departure they seized his goods, to answer his debts to them, straightway came the queen's officers and discharged them all, which yet were not able, for all his spare hospitality, to pay half that he owed.

Furthermore, to come to another consideration, of a further imperfection, which I would have dissembled to you and others, but it cannot be but I must open it to you, my assured good master and friend, in secrecy, whose old good will maketh me the less abashed, to be so homely with you at this time. In one of my letters I made a little signification of it, but peradventure ye did not mark it. Sir, I am so in body hurt and decayed, coram Deo non mentior, that whatsoever my ability were, either of worldly furniture or inward quality, and though my heart would right feign serve my sovereign lady, the queen's majesty, in more respects than of my allegiance, not forgetting what words her grace's mother said to me of her not six days before her apprehension, yet this my painful infirmity will not suffer it in all manner of services. Flying in a night, for such as sought for me, to my peril, I fell off my horse so dangerously, that I shall never recover it; and by my late journey up, and my being there at London, not well settled, it is increased to my greater pain. I am fain sometime to be idle when I would be occupied, and also to keep my bed when my heart is not sick.

This was one cause why I was importune to you for that room, whereof I made mention in my former letters, by the which I might be able, by the portion of that stipend, in this my impoverishment, to wear out my life tolerably, and should not by that be occasioned to come up to any convocations, as having no voice in that house; and peradventure being there, I might be a mean for the fewer matters of disturbance, to come up to Mr. Secretary, now chancellor there, to molest him, more than should need, whose gentle affability might provoke some inconsiderate men not to regard his other greater affairs. And yet though I were so placed, I would not forswear London, or the court either, at times, as could stand with my ability and health of body, if my service could be any ways acceptable, and were agreeable to the proportion of my capacity.

Sir, because I may not dissemble with you, I have told you all; now do with me what ye will. I might be ashamed to spend so many words in a cause private of myself; but yet because ye must be partner of some lack, if I answered not the expectation, I could no less do but make you privy beforehand. I pray you think not that the prognostication of Mr. Michael Nostre Dame reigneth in my head. I esteem that fantastical hotch-potch not so well as I credit Lucianus' book "De veris Narrationibus;" nor yet all other vain prophecies of Sands, more than I regard sir Thomas More's Book of Fortune's Answers upon the chance of three dice casting. I would I saw no more cause to fear the likelihood of God's wrath deserved, for dissolute life, to fall upon the realm, by the evidence of his true word, and by God's old practices: and yet no man considereth his ire already begun, Dum non sinit viros dolosos dimidiare dies suos. I shall pray to God to defend you and your family, and that ye may revolve in mind Christ's serious admonition,—Quid proderit homini, si totum mundum lucretur, si anima sua detrimentum patiatur. Et non in abundantia cujusquam, est vita hominis ex his qua possidet.*

* Mat. xvi.—Luc. xi.

PART II.—BOOK III.

Sir, my duty of heart maketh me bold with you, not otherwise meaning before God, but thanking him many times that Mr. Secretary and you may have the doing of things in this greedy world, and that ye have so good credit, and ready access to the queen's majesty, to comfort her good inclination, whom I beseech the God of Heaven to preserve with her council, yea, and with the seniority of her spiritual ministers also, against whom I see a great charge set before them, to overcome that, must specially go through their hands by diligent watching, upon the unruly flock of the English people, if they were not so much acloyed with worldly collections, temporal commissions, and worldly provisions. I speak this the rather in this respect, which I thought good to put to your understanding; at my last being at London, I heard and saw books printed, which be spread abroad, whose authors be ministers of good estimation; the doctrine of the one is to prove, that a lady woman cannot be, by God's word, a governor in a Christian realm. And in another book going abroad, is matter set out to prove, that it is lawful for every private subject to kill his sovereign, ferro, veneno, quocunque modo, if he think him to be a tyrant in his conscience, yea, and worthy to have his reward for his attempt: Exhorruui cum ista legerem. If such principles be spread into men's heads, as now they be framed and referred to the judgment of the subject, of the tenant, and of the servant, to discuss what is tyranny, and to discern whether his prince, his landlord, his master, is a tyrant, by his own fancy, and collection supposed, what lord of the council shall ride quietly-minded in the streets, among desperate beasts? what master shall be sure in his bed-chamber? it is the surest way for every man to serve God truly in his vocation, to deserve the rather his protection: and then both the devil and man, foreign and intestine, shall have their malices retorted upon themselves again. But thus goeth the devil about to dull the heretical stomachs of princely men, to do good in their turn of time, to serve God and the common-wealth. They say that the realm is full of anabaptists, Arrians, libertines, free-will men, &c. against whom only I thought ministers should have needed to fight in unity of doctrine. As for the Romish adversaries, their mouths may be stopped with their own books, and confessions of late days; I never dreamed that ministers should be compelled to impugn ministers; the adversaries have good sport betwixt themselves, to prognostick the likelihood. Some protestants peradventure, perceiving how men nip them to disable them, to keep any learned man in house to confer with, and to beat down these seditious sects, if any inconvenience, for want of preaching, shall fall, they may chance to say a verse of David's psalter, Lalabitque justus, cum viderit vindictam, et manus suas lavabit in sanguine peccatoris, as not caring for their assurances, who abase them so low: and some peradventure have cast already their starting shifts, and make provision against all adventures. Well, I pray God all be conscience to God, that is sometimes so pretended: men be men, yea, after the school of affliction, men be men, hypocrisy is a privy thief, both in the clergy and in the laity. To make an end of such conference, which I would gladly have told you presently, but I could not wait so much leisure in you, and opportunity; and loth I was to have begun my tale, and not to have ended it, by reason of interruption by others. But as for the principal occasion of my writing, howsoever it may dislike you, yet shall I evermore acknowledge my duty to you, yea, though now ye give me quite up: I reverence you so much, that I had rather ye disliked me utterly by times, with your less repentance, rather than ye and other of my loving friends should bear any envy, or any displeasent unthankfulness, and so too late to repent for your commending of me, (if a persuasion in an appearance, is not surely grounded to be seen,) when experience should have shewed the trial. And therefore I write it to you in time again, after the signification of my very first letters to prevent you, for I know ye may, with a few words, remedy all the towardness yet concluded.

And think not, I pray your honour, that I seek mine private gain, or my idle ease, put me where you will else; and if, as far as my power of knowledge and of health of body will extend, I do not apply myself to discharge my duty, let me be thrust out again like a thief. I thank God my conscience condemneth me not, that I have been aforesaid any great gatherer; and now, for the upholding of two or three years more of life, to heap unproportionably, I count it madness; and more than this purpose, by God's grace, I dare promise nothing: and as for such few folks which I may leave behind me, they shall not say by me, I trust, that happy be these children whose fathers go to the devil for their sake. Your lordship knoweth with what patrimony I began the world with, and yet have hitherto lived with enough, yea, when all my livings were taken from me, yet God, I thank him, ministered to me sufficiently, above the capacity of my understanding or foreseeing. And thus commending your good lordship to that merciful governance, I pray your honourable wisdom to put this scribbling out of the way, from every man's sight and intelligence.

Right honourable, after my duty of commendations to your lordship, I am bold now to send you a fancy of my head, expressed in these few leaves; which if I had compact in a letter, it would have seemed over-long, and being comprised in leaves, may appear to be but a very little book of one sheet of paper, which yet I so devised, upon consideration of your business, which will not suffer you to be long detained in matters impertinent, and therefore ye may turn in the leaf and read it at divers leasures, if your lordship shall vouchsafe the reading. And thus wishing you joy of heart, which I feel to be a great treasure in this world, as the want, a grievous torment; I pray God preserve your honourable goodness, with my good lady your wife. If ye see ought in my quire worth reformation, ye know I am disciplinable, and have read, quod meliora sunt vulnere diligentis, quam fraudulenta oscula odentis: wherefore reserving mine unreasonable determination, as you shall know, I shall yield myself wholly conformable to your honour, ubi, quomodo, quando, aliquid, vel tandem nihil. Of an occasion lately ministered, I have sent my letters to Mr. Secretary concerning another matter, primo Martii.

Your assured orator,

M. P.

A Letter written to him by the Lord Keeper concerning it.—An Original.

THAT before this time I have not sent you answer to your last letters; the cause hath been, for that I could by no mean understand to what end the matter mentioned in those letters would grow unto; but perceiving this day, by a resolution made in the queen's highness' presence, that your friends shall very hardly deliver you of the charge written of in the same letters, I thought it good to make you privy thereunto; and therewith to advise you, to commit to the judgment of your friends, your ability and disability to serve, where and when you shall be called. If I knew a man to whom the description made in the beginning of your letter might more justly be referred than to yourself, I would prefer him before you; but knowing none so meet indeed, I take it to be my duty to prefer you before all others, and the rather also, because otherwise I should not follow the advice of your own letter. The rest, which is much, I defer until our next meeting. It is like, that ere it be long, you shall receive letters, subscribed by me and others jointly. Thus right heartily farewell.—From the court, the 17th of May, 1559.

Yours assuredly, N. BACON.

An Order sent to him, requiring him to come up to London.

AFTER our hearty commendations. These be to signify unto you, that for certain causes, wherein the queen's majesty intendeth to use your service, her pleasure is, that you should repair up hither with such speed as you conveniently may; and at your coming up, you shall understand the rest. Thus right heartily fare ye well.—From the court, the 19th of May, 1559.

Your loving friends, N. BACON.

A second Order to the same Effect.—An Original.

AFTER our hearty commendations. Where before this time we directed our letters unto you, declaring thereby, that for certain causes, wherein the queen's majesty intendeth to use your service, you should repair hither with all convenient speed, whereof we have as yet received none answer; and therefore, doubting lest by the default of the messenger, the letter be not come to your hands, we have thought good again to write unto you, to the intent you should understand her highness' pleasure is, that you should make your repair hither with all speed possible. Thus right heartily farewell.—From the court, the 28th day of May, 1559.

Dr. Parker's Letter to the Queen, excusing himself. An Original.

PLEASETH it your most honourable majesty to be gracious lady to my poor suit, which at this time extreme necessity compelleth me to make, both in respect of my constrained conscience to Almighty God, as also in the regard of my duty which I owe to your noble estate, and most high authority. So it is, most gracious and sovereign lady, where I have understanding of your most favourable opinion toward me, your grace's most simple subject, concerning the archbishoprick of Canterbury; in consideration whereof, I ought, and do acknowledge my most bounden duty to be a faithful orator for your grace during my life. Yet calling to examination my great unworthiness for so high a function, which mine disability I might allege at length in particularity, but for molesting your grace's most weighty affairs, I am bold thus, by my writing, to approach to your honour to discharge me of that so high and chargeable an office, which doth require a man of so much wit, learning, virtue, and experience than I see, and perfectly know can be performed of me worthily, to occupy it to God's pleasure, to your grace's honour, and to the wealth of your loving subjects beside. Many other imperfections in me, as well for temporal ability for the furnishing thereof, as were seemly to the honour of the realm; as also of infirmity of body, which will not suffer me to attend on so difficult a cure, to the discharge thereof, in any reasonable expectation. And where, most gracious lady, beside my humble duty of allegiance to your princely dignity, I am otherwise, for the great benefits which sometime I received at your grace's honourable mother's benevolence (whose soul I doubt not but is in blissful felicity with God), most singularly obliged, above many other, to be your most faithful beadsman, both in thanking Almighty God for his fatherly protection hitherto over your noble person, and also furthermore to pray for the continuance of your fortunate reign in all godly prosperity. So I am right sorry, and do lament within myself, that I am so basely qualified inwardly in knowledge, and outwardly in extern sufficiencies, to do your grace any meet service, as I would wish could be acceptable, and to your grace's expectation: assuring your noble estate, that in any other smaller vocation, under the degree of such chargeable offices, and more agreeable to my infirmity, if it shall be so seen, to your high wisdom, and merciful liberality, I shall endeavour myself to attend thereon; referring yet myself wholly to your grace's pleasure, rather than by just allegation of my unworthiness, the loyal duty of my faithful heart should be any ways suspected to your reverend majesty.

Your grace's poor subject,

MATTHEW PARKER.

Cambridge, Jan. 11, 1674.—We whose names are hereunto subscribed, having seen the original, whereof this writing is a perfect copy, and considered the hand, and other circumstances thereof, are fully persuaded that it is a true and genuine record of the rites and ceremonies of archbishop Parker's consecration, and as ancient as the date it bears. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands, the day and year above written.

Hen. Paman, Orat. Publicus; Hen. More, D. D.; Ra. Widdrington, S. T. D. & D. Marg. P.

C. C. C. C.—We, the master and fellows of Corpus Christi College, in the University of Cambridge, do hereby declare and certify, that this writing, being a narrative of archbishop Parker's consecration, in Lambeth Chapel, is faithfully transcribed from the original record in our college library: and that we are fully satisfied that the said record is as ancient as the date it bears, and the occasion to which it doth refer. Nor can we doubt, but the plain and evident tokens of antiquity which it carries, will as much satisfy any ingenuous persons who shall have a sight thereof: which therefore we shall readily afford to those who shall repair to the college for that purpose.

The Rules to be observed in Translation of the Bible.

1. THE ordinary Bible read in the church, commonly called the Bishops' Bible, to be followed, and as little altered as the truth of the original will permit.

2. The names of the prophets, and the holy writers, with the other names of the text, to be retained, as high as may be, accordingly as they were vulgarly used.

3. The old ecclesiastical words to be kept, viz. the word church not to be translated congregation, &c.

4. When a word hath divers significations, that to be kept which hath been most commonly used by the most of our ancient fathers, being agreeable to the analogy of the faith.

5. The division of words to be altered either not at all, or as little as may be, if necessarily so require.

6. No marginal notes at all to be affixed, but only for the explanation of the Hebrew or Greek words, which cannot, without some circumlocution, so briefly and fitly be express in the text.

7. Such quotations of places to be marginally set down, as shall serve for the fit reference of one scripture to another.

8. Every particular man of each company, to take the same chapter or chapters, and having translated or amended them severally by himself, where he thinketh good, all to meet together, confer what they have done, and agree for their parts what shall stand.

9. As any one company hath dispatched any one book in this manner, they shall send it to the rest, to be considered of seriously and judiciously, for his majesty is very careful in this point.

10. If any company, upon the review of the book so sent, doubt or differ upon any place, to send them word thereof; note the place, and withal send the reasons; to which if they consent not, the difference to be compounded at the general meeting, which is to be of the chief persons of each company at the end of the work.

11. When any place of special obscurity is doubted of, letters to be directed, by authority, to send to any learned man in the land, for his judgment of such a place.

12. Letters to be sent from every bishop, to the rest of his clergy, admonishing them of this translation in hand; and to move and charge as many as being skilful in the tongues, and having taken pains in that kind, to send his particular observations to the company, either at Westminster, Cambridge, or Oxford.

13. The directors in each company to be the deans of Westminster and Chester for that place; and the king's professors in the Hebrew or Greek in either university.

14. These translations to be used when they agree better with the text than the Bishops' Bible, viz., Tindall's, Matthew's, Coverdale's, Whitchurch's, Geneva.

15. Besides the said directors before mentioned, three or four of the most ancient and grave divines, in either of the universities, not employed in translating, to be assigned by the vice-chancellor, upon conference with rest of the heads, to be overseers of the translations, as well Hebrew as Greek; for the better observation of the 4th rule above specified.

NUMBER XI.

A Declaration of certain principal Articles of Religion, set out by the order of both Archbishops, Metropolitans, and the rest of the Bishops, for the Unity of Doctrine to be taught and holden of all Parsons, Vicars, and Curates, as well in testification of their common Consent in the said Doctrine, to the stopping of the mouths of them that go about to slander the Ministers of the Church, for diversity of Judgment: as necessary for the instruction of their People, to be read by the said Parsons, Vicars, and Curates, at their Possession-taking, or first entry into their Cures. And also after that, yearly, at two severall times; that is to say, the Sundays next following Easter-day, and St. Michael the Archangel, or on some other Sunday, within one month after those Feasts, immediately after the Gospel.

FORASMUCH as it appertaineth to all Christian men, but especially to the ministers and the pastors of the church, being teachers and instructors of others, to be ready to give a reason of their faith when they shall be thereunto required: I for my part now appointed your parson, vicar, or curate, having before my eyes the fear of God, and the testimony of my conscience, do acknowledge and require you to assent to the same.

I.—First, That there is but one living and true God, of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the maker and preserver of all things. And that in unity there be three persons of one substance, of equal power and eternity; the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

II.—I believe also, that in the which Scriptures holy canonical Scriptures are contained, by the which we are obtained all things necessary unto salvation; that there be no other gods, nor any other gods, which also, all errors and heresies may sufficiently be reprov'd and convicted; and all doctrine and articles necessary to salvation established. I do also most firmly believe and confess all the articles contained in the three creeds; the Nicene creed, Athanasius' creed, and our common creed, called the Apostles' creed; for these do briefly contain the principal articles of our faith, which are at large set forth in the Holy Scriptures.

III.—I do acknowledge also that church to be the spouse of Christ, wherein the word of God is truly taught, the sacraments orderly ministered, according to Christ's institution, and the authority of the keys duly used. And that every such particular church hath authority to institute, to change, clean, to put away ceremonies, and other ecclesiastical rites, as they be superfluous, or be abused; and to constitute other, making more to seemliness, to order, or edification.

IV.—Moreover, I confess, that it is not lawful for any man to take upon him any office or ministry, either ecclesiastical or secular, but such only as are lawfully thereunto called by their high authorities, according to the ordinances of this realm.

V.—Furthermore, I do acknowledge the queen's majesty's prerogative and superiority of government of all estates, and in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as temporal, within this realm, and other her dominions and countries, to be agreeable to God's word, and of right to appertain to her highness, in such sort as is in the late act of parliament expressed, and sithence by her majesty's injunctions declared and expounded.

VI.—Moreover, touching the bishop of Rome, I do acknowledge and confess, that by the Scriptures, and word of God, he hath no more authority than other bishops have in their provinces and diocesses: and therefore the power which he now challengeth, that is, to be the supreme head of the universal church of Christ, and so to be above all emperors, kings, and princes, is an usurped power, contrary to the Scriptures and word of God, and contrary to the example of the primitive church; and therefore is, for most just causes, taken away and abolished in this realm.

VII.—Furthermore, I do grant and confess, that the book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Holy Sacraments, set forth by the authority of parliament, is agreeable to the Scriptures, and that it is catholic, apostolick, and most for the advancing of God's glory, and the edifying of God's people: both for that it is in a tongue that may be understood of the people, and also for the doctrine and form of administration contained in the same.

VIII.—And although, in the administration of baptism, there is neither exorcism, oil, salt, spittle, or hallowing of the water now used; and for that they were of late years abused, and esteemed necessary; where they pertain not to the substance and necessity of the sacrament, they be reasonably abolished, and yet the sacrament full and perfectly ministered, to all intents and purposes, agreeable to the institution of our saviour Christ.

IX.—Moreover, I do not only acknowledge, that private masses were never used amongst the fathers of the primitive church; I mean, publick ministration, and receiving of the sacrament by the priest alone, without a just number of communicants, according to Christ's saying, "Take ye and eat ye," &c.; but also that the doctrine that maintaineth the mass to be a propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead, and a mean to deliver souls out of purgatory, is neither agreeable to Christ's ordinance, nor grounded upon doctrine apostolick. But contrary-wise, most ungodly and most injurious to the precious redemption of our saviour Christ, and his only-sufficient sacrifice offered once for ever upon the altar of the cross.

X.—I am of that mind also, that the holy communion, or sacrament, of the body and blood of Christ, for the due obedience to Christ's institution, and to express the virtue of the same, ought to be ministered unto the people under both kinds; and that it is avouched by certain fathers of the church, to be a plain sacrilege to rob them of the mystical cup for whom Christ hath shed his most precious blood, seeing he himself hath said, "Drink ye all of this." Considering also, that in the time of the ancient doctors of the church, as Cyprian, Hierom, Augustine, Gelasius, and others, six hundred years after Christ and more, both the parts of the sacrament were ministered to the people.

Last of all.—As I do utterly disallow the extolling of images, reliques, and feigned miracles; and also all kind of expressing God invisible in the form of an old man, or the Holy Ghost in form of a dove; and all other vain worshipping of God, devised by man's fantasy; besides or contrary to the Scriptures; as wandering on pilgrimages, setting up of candles, praying upon beads, and such-like superstition; which kind of works have no promise of reward in Scripture, but contrary-wise, threatenings and maledictions: so I do exhort all men to the obedience of God's law, and to the works of faith, as charity, mercy, pity, alms, devout and fervent prayer, with the affection of the heart, and not with the mouth only; godly abstinence and fasting, chastity, obedience to the rulers and superior powers, with such-like works, and godliness of life commanded by God in his word; which, as St.

Paul saith, "hath promises both of this life, and of the life to come;" and are works only acceptable in God's sight.

These things, above-rehearsed, though they be appointed by common order, yet do I, without all compulsion, with freedom of mind and conscience, from the bottom of my heart, and upon most sure persuasion, acknowledge to be true and agreeable to God's word. And therefore I exhort you all, of whom I have cure, heartily and obediently to embrace and receive the same; that we all joining together in unity of spirit, faith, and charity, may also at length be joined together in the kingdom of God, and that through the merits and death of our saviour Jesus Christ. To whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all glory and empire, now and for ever. Amen.

Imprinted at London, in Paul's Church yard, by Richard Jugge, printer to the Queen's majesty.

Cum Privilegio Regiæ Majestatis.

Sir Walter Mildmay's Opinion concerning the keeping of the Queen of Scots (October 26, 1569) at Windsor Castle.—An Original.

The question to be considered on is, whether it be less perilous to the Queen's Majesty, and the realm, to retain the Queen of Scots in England, or to return her home into Scotland?

In which question, these things are to be considered. On the one side, what dangers are like to follow if she be retained here; and thereupon, if so avoiding of them, it shall be thought good to return her, then what cautions and provisions are necessary to be had.

On the other side are to be weighed the dangers like to follow if she be returned home; and thereupon, if for eschewing of them, it shall be thought good to retain her here, then what cautions and provisions are in that case necessary.

Dangers in retaining the Queen of Scots.

Her unquiet and aspiring mind never ceasing to practise with the queen's subjects. Her late practice of marriage between the duke of Norfolk and her, without the queen's knowledge. The faction of the papists, and other ambitious folks, being ready and fit instruments for her to work upon. The commiseration that ever followeth such as be in misery, though their deserts be never so great. Her cunning and sugared entertainment of all men that come to her, whereby she gets both credit and intelligence. Her practice with the French and Spanish ambassadors, being more near to her in England than if she were in Scotland; and their continual solicitation of the queen for her delivery, the denial whereof may breed war. The danger in her escaping out of guard, whereof it is like enough she will give the attempt. So as remaining here, she hath time and opportunity to practise and nourish factions, by which she may work confederacy, and thereof may follow sedition and tumult, which may bring peril to the queen's majesty and the state. Finally, it is said, that the queen's majesty, of her own disposition, hath no mind to retain her, but is much unquieted therewith, which is a thing greatly to be weighed.

Cautions if she be returned.

To deliver her into the hands of the regent, and the lords now governing Scotland, to be safely kept. That she meddle not with the state, nor make any alteration in the government, or in religion. That by sufficient hostages it may be provided, that neither any violence be used to her person, nor that she be suffered to govern again, but live privately, with such honourable entertainment as is met for the king of Scots mother. That the league, offensive and defensive, between France and Scotland, be never renewed. That a new and perpetual league be made between England and Scotland, whereby the queen's majesty may shew an open maintenance and allowance of the king's authority and estate, and of the present government, so as the Scots may wholly depend on her. That the regent and the lords of Scotland do make no composition with the Scots queen, neither suffer her to marry, without consent of the queen's majesty. That the faults whereof she hath been accused, and her declining and delaying to answer that accusation, may be published to the world, the better to discourage her factious party both here and in Scotland.

Dangers in returning her.

The manner how to deliver her home, with the queen's majesty's honour and safety, is very doubtful. For if she be delivered in guard, that came hither free, and at liberty, how will that stand with the queen's honour, and with the requests of the French and Spanish kings, that have continually solicited her free delivery, either into Scotland or France? or if she die in guard, either violently or naturally, her majesty shall hardly escape slander. If, again, she be delivered home at liberty, or if being in guard she should escape, then these perils may follow:

The suppressing of the present government in Scotland, now depending upon the queen's majesty, and advancing of the contrary faction depending upon the French. The alteration of religion in Scotland. The renewing of the league, offensive and defensive, between France and Scotland, that hath so much troubled England. The renewing of her pretended claim to the crown of this realm. The likelihood of war to ensue between France, Scotland, and us, and the bringing in of strangers into that realm to our annoyance, and great charge, as late experience hath shewed. The supportation that she is like to have of the French and Spanish kings. And though peace should continue between England and Scotland, yet infinite injuries will be offered by the Scots queen's ministers upon the borders, which will turn to the great hurt of the queen's majesty's subjects, or else to her greater charges to redress them; for the change of the government in Scotland, will change the justice which now is had, unto all injury and injustice. The likelihood she will revoke the earl Bothwell, now her husband, though unlawful, as it is said, a man of most evil and cruel affection to this realm, and to his own countrymen: or, if she should marry another that were a-like enemy, the peril must needs be great on either side.

And albeit to these dangers may be generally said, that such provision shall be made, by capitulations with her, and by hostages from the regent, and the lords of Scotland, as all these perils shall be prevented:

To that may be answered.

That no fact which she shall do here in England will hold, for she will allege the same to be done in a foreign country, being restrained of liberty. That there is great likelihood of escape, wheresoever she be kept in Scotland; for her late escape there sheweth, how she will leave no way unsought to achieve it; and the country being, as it is, greatly divided, and of nature marvellously factious, she is the more like to bring it to pass. Or if the regent, by any practice, should yield to a composition, or finding his party weak should give over his regiment, then what assurance have we, either of amity or religion? That the regent may be induced to do this, appeareth by his late secret treaty with the duke of Norfolk, for her marriage, without the queen's majesty's knowledge. And though the regent should persevere constant, yet if he should be taken away directly, or indirectly, (the like whereof is said, hath been attempted against him,) then is all at large, and the queen of Scots most like to be restored to her estate, the factions being so great in Scotland, as they are; so as the case is very tickle and dangerous to hang upon so small a thread as the life of one man, by whom it appeareth the whole at this present is contained.

And touching the hostages, though that assurance might be good to preserve her from violence in Scotland, yet it may be doubted how the same will be sufficient to keep her from escaping or governing again, seeing, for her part, she will make little conscience of the hostages if she may prevail; and the punishing of the hostages will be a small satisfaction to the queen's majesty for the troubles that may ensue. And for the doubt of her escape, or of rebellion within this realm, it may be said, that if she should not be well guarded, but should be left open to practise, then her escape and the other perils might be doubted of; but if the queen's majesty hold a stricter hand over her, and put her under the care of a fast and circumspect man, all practice shall be cut from her, and the queen's majesty free from that peril. And more safe it is for the queen to keep the bridle in her own hand, to restrain the Scottish queen, than in returning her home to commit that trust to others, which by death, composition, or abusing of one person, may be disappointed.

And if she should by any means recover her estate, the doubt of rebellion there is not taken away, but rather to be feared, if she have ability to her will. And if she find strength, by her own or foreign friends, she is not far off to give aid, upon a main land, to such as will stir for her; which, so long as she is here, they will forbear, lest it might bring most peril to herself, being in the queen's hands. The like respect no doubt will move foreign princes to become requesters, and no threateners, for her delivery.

And where it is said that the queen's majesty cannot be quiet so long as she is here, but it may breed danger to her majesty's health. That is a matter greatly to be weighed; for it were better to adventure all, than her majesty should inwardly conceive anything to the danger of her health. But as that is only known to such as have more inward acquaintance with her majesty's disposition, than is fit for some other to have; so again it is to be thought, that her majesty being wise, if the perils like to follow in returning her home were laid before her, and if she find them greater than the other, she will be induced easily to change her opinion, and thereby may follow to her majesty's great satisfaction and quietness.

Cautions if she be retained.

To remove her somewhat nearer the court, at the least within one day's journey of London, whereby it shall be the more easy to understand of her doings.

To deliver her in custody to such as be thought most sound in religion, and most void of practice.

To diminish her number, being now about forty persons, to the one half, to make thereby the queen's charges the less, and to give her the fewer means of intelligence.

To cut from her all access, letters and messages, other than such as he that shall have the charge shall think fit.

To signify to all princes the occasion of this strait guard upon her, to be her late practice with the duke of Norfolk, which hath given the queen cause to doubt; further assuring them that she shall be used honourably, but kept safely from troubling the queen's majesty or this state.

That she be retained here until the estate of Scotland be more settled, and the estate of other countries now in garboil be quieted, the issue whereof is like to be seen in a year or two.

NUMBER XII.

A Letter written by the Earl of Leicester to the Earl of Sussex, concerning the Queen of Scots; taken from the first draught of it, written with his own hand.

[Ex MSS. Nob. D. Evilin.]

MY GOOD LORD—I received your letter in the answer of mine; and though I have not written sooner again to your lordship, both according to your desire and the necessity of our cases at this time, yet I doubt not but you are fully advertised of her majesty's pleasure otherwise. For my own part, I am glad your lordship hath prospered so well in your journey, and have answered in all points the good opinion conceived of you.

And touching her majesty's further resolution, for these causes, my lord, I assure you, I know not well what to write. First, I see her majesty willing and desirous, as reason is, to work her own security, and the quietness of her state, during her time, which I trust in God shall be far longer than we shall live to see end of. And herein, my lord, there be sundry minds, and among ourselves, I must confess to your lordship, we are not fully agreed which way is best to take. And to your lordship I know I may be bold, beside the friendship I owe you, the place you hold presently doth require all the understanding that may be, to the furtherance of her majesty's good estate; wherefore I shall be the bolder even to let you know as much as I do, and how we rest among us.

Your lordship doth consider, for the state of Scotland, her majesty hath those two persons, being divided, to deal with, the queen of Scotland, lately by her subjects deprived, and the young king her son, crowned and set up in her place. Her majesty, of these two, is to chuse, and of necessity must chuse which of them she will allow and accept, as the person sufficient to hold the principal place. And here groweth the question in our council to her majesty, Which of these two are most fit for her to maintain and join in amity with? To be plain with your lordship, the most in number do altogether conceive her majesty's best and surest way is, to maintain and continue the young king in this his estate, and thereby to make her whole party in Scotland, which by the settling of him, with the cause of religion, is thought most easiest, most safest, and most probable for the perpetual quieting and benefit to her own estate, and great assurance made of such a party, and so small charges thereby, as her majesty may make account to have the like authority and assured amity in Scotland as heretofore she had in the time of the late regent.

The reasons against the other are these shortly.

The title that the queen claimeth to this crown; the overthrow of religion in that country; the impossibility of any assurance for the observing of any pact or agreement made between our sovereign and her. These be causes your lordship sees sufficient to dissuade all men from the contrary opinion. And yet, my lord, it cannot be denied, upon indifferent looking into the matter on both sides, but the clearest is full enough of difficulties. And then, my lord, is the matter disputable; and yet I think verily, not for argument sake, but even for duty and conscience sake, to find out truth, and safest means for our sovereign's best doing. And thus we differ. The first you have heard touching the young king.

On the other side, this it is thought, and of these I must confess myself to your lordship to be one: and God is my judge whether it be for any other respect in this world, but that I suppose and verily believe it may prove best for her majesty's own quietness during her time.

And here I must before open to your lordship indeed her majesty's true state she presently stands in; which, though it may be granted the former advice the better way, yet how hardly it layeth in her power to go thorow withal you shall easily judge. For it must be confessed, that by the taking into her protection the king and the faction, she must enter into a war for it: and as the least war being admitted, cannot be maintained without great charge; so such a war may grow, France or Spain setting in foot, as may cause it to be an intolerable war. Then being a war, it must be treasure that must maintain it. That she hath treasure to continue any time in war, surely, my lord, I cannot see it: and as your lordship doth see the present relief for money we trust upon, which either failing us, or it rising no more than I see it like to be, not able long to last, where is there further hope of help hereafter? For my own part I see none. If it be so, then, my lord, that her majesty's present estate is such as I tell you, which I am sure is true, how shall this council stand with security, by taking a party to enter into a war, when we are no way able to maintain it? for if we enter into it once, and be driven, either for lack or any other way, to shrink, what is like to follow of the matter your lordship can well consider? the best is, we must be sorry for that we have done, and perchance seek to make amends, where we neither would nor should. This is touching the present state we stand in. Besides, we are to remember what already we have done; how many ways, even now together, the realm hath been universally burdened.

First, for the keeping of new bands, after the furnishing of armour, and therein how continually the charge sooner hath grown than subsidies paid.

And lastly, the marvellous charge in most countries against the late rebellion, with this loan of money now on the neck of it. Whether this state doth require further cause of imposition or no, I refer to your lordship? And whether entering into a further charge than her majesty hath presently wherewithal to bear, it will force such a matter or no, I refer to wiser to judge.

And now, my lord, I will show you such reasons as move me to think as I do. In worldly causes men must be governed by worldly policies; and yet so to frame them as God, the author of all, be chiefly regarded. For him we have received laws, under which all men's policies and devices ought to be subject; and through his ordinance, the princes on the earth have authority to give laws, by which also all princes have the obedience of the people; and though in some points I shall deal like a worldly man for my prince, yet I hope I shall not forget that I am a Christian, nor my duty to God.

RECORDS.

Our question is this—whether it be meet for our sovereign to maintain the young king of Scotland and his authority, or, upon composition, restore the queen of Scots into her kingdom again? To restore her simply we are not of opinion; for so I must confess a great oversight, and doubt no better success than those that do object most perils thereby to ensue. But if there be any assurances in this world to be given, or any provision by worldly policy to be had, then, my lord, I do not see but ways and means may be used with the queen of Scots, whereby her majesty may be at quiet, and yet delivered of her present great charge. It is granted and feared of all sides, that the cause of any trouble or danger to her majesty, is the title the queen of Scotland pretends to the crown of this realm. The danger we fear should happen by her is not for that she is queen of Scotland but that other the great princes of Christendom do favour her so much as in respect of her religion, they will in all causes assist her; and specially, by the colour of her title, seen justly to aid and relieve her, and the more lawfully take her and her causes into their protection. Then is the title granted to be the chief cause of danger to our sovereign. If it be so, whether doth the setting up the son in the mother's place, from whence his title must be claimed, take away her title in the opinion of those princes, or no, notwithstanding she remain prisoner? It appeareth plainly, no; for there is continual labour and means made, from the greatest princes, our neighbours, to the queen's majesty, for restoring the queen of Scotland to her estate and government, otherwise they protest open relief and aid for her. Then though her majesty do maintain the young king in his present estate, yet it appears that other princes will do the contrary; and having any advantage, how far they will proceed men may suspect. And so we must conceive, that as long as this difference shall continue, by the maintaining of these two, so long shall the same cause remain, to the trouble and danger of the queen's majesty. And now to avoid this whilst she lives, what better mean is there to take this cause away, but by her own consent, to renounce and release all such interest or title as she claimeth, either presently or hereafter, during the life of her majesty and the heirs of her body? Albeit, here may two questions be moved.

First, whether the Scots queen will renounce her title, or no?

Secondly, if she will do so, what assurance may she give for the performance thereof?

To the first, it is most certain she hath, and presently doth offer, wholly and frankly, to release and renounce all manner of claims and titles, whatsoever they be, to the crown of this realm, during her majesty's life, and the heirs of her body.

And for the second, she doth likewise offer all manner of security and assurances that her majesty can devise, and is in that queen's possible power to do, she excepteth none.

Then must we consider what may be assurances, for here is the difficulty. For that objections be that princes never hold promises longer than for their own commodity, and what security soever they put in they may break if they will. All this may be granted; but yet that we must grant also, that princes do daily treat and deal one with another, and of necessity are forced to trust to such bonds and assurances as they contract by. And as there is no such surety to be had in worldly matters, but all are subject to many casualties, yet we see such devices made, even among princes, as doth tie them to perform that, which if they might conveniently chuse they would not. And in this matter of the queen of Scotland, since she doth offer both to leave the cause of the difference that is between the queen's majesty and her; and also to give all surety that may be by ourselves devised to observe the same; I do not see but such means may be devised to tie her so strongly as though she would break, yet I cannot find what advantage she shall get by it. For beside that I would have her own simple renunciation to be made by the most substantial instrument that could be devised, the assent of some others should confirm the same also. Her own parliaments at home should do the like with the full authority of the whole estates. They should deliver her son and such other principal noblemen of her realm for hostages as the queen's majesty should name. She should also put into her majesty's hands some one piece or two of her realm, and for such a time as should be thought meet by her majesty, except Edinburgh. The queen's majesty might also, by ratifying this by a parliament here, make a forfeiture, if the queen of Scotland should any way, directly or indirectly, go about to infringe this agreement of all such titles and claims that did remain in the queen of Scotland, after her majesty and her issue, never to be capable of any authority or sovereignty within this realm. These I would think to be sufficient bonds to bind any prince, specially no mightier than she is. And this much more would I have, that even as she shall be thus bound, for the relief of her title to the queen's majesty and her issue, so shall she suffer the religion received and established in Scotland already, to be confirmed, and not altered. In like sort, the amity between these two realms to be such, and so frankly united, as no other league with any foreign prince should stand in force to break it. For I think verily, as the first is chiefest touching her majesty's own person, so do I judge the latter—I mean the confirmation of the religion already there received—to be one of the assuredst and likeliest means to hold her majesty a strong and continual party in Scotland. The trial hereof hath been already sufficient, when her majesty had none other interest at all but only the maintenance of the true religion, the same cause remaining still the same affection in the same persons that do profess it, I trust, and it is like will not change. And though the Scots queen should now be settled in her kingdom again, yet is she not like to be greater or better esteemed now than heretofore, when both her authority was greater, and her good-will ready to alter this religion, but could not bring it to pass. No more is it like, these further provisions being taken, she shall do it now. And the last cause also is not without great hope of some good success; for as the oppression of strangers heretofore had utterly wearied them of that yoke, so hath this peaceable time, between them and us, made them know the liberty of their own, and the commodity of us their neighbours.

This, my lord, doth lead me to lean to this opinion, finding thereby rather both more surety, and more quietness, for my sovereign's present time, having, by the contrary, many occasions of trouble cut off, and the intolerable charge eschewed, which I cannot find by any possible means her majesty able to sustain for any long time.

Thus hastily I am driven to end my long cumbersome letter to your lordship, though very desirous to impart my mind herein to your lordship.

AN APPENDIX

CONCERNING SOME OF

THE ERRORS AND FALSEHOODS IN SANDERS' BOOK OF THE ENGLISH SCHISM.

It has been observed of thieves, that by a long practice in that ill course of life, they grow so in love with it, that when there is no advantage to be made by stealing, yet they must keep their hand in use, and continue their address and dexterity in it: so also liars, by a frequent custom, grow to such a habit, that in the commonest things, they cannot speak truth, even though it might conduce to their ends more than their lies do. Sanders had so given himself up to vent reproaches and lies, that he often does it for nothing, without any end but to carry on a trade, that had been so long driven by him that he knew not how to lay it down. He wrote our history merely upon the reports that were brought him, without any care or information about the most public and most indifferent things: but not content to set down those tattles, he shews his wit in refining about them, and makes up such politics and schemes of government, as might suit with those reports, and agree with his own malice. His work is all of a piece, and as it was made out in the former volume, how ignorantly and disingenuously he writ concerning king Henry the Eighth's reign; so I shall add a further discovery of the remaining parts of his book, which will sufficiently convince, even the most partial readers, of the impudence of that author; who seems to have had no other design in writing but to impose on the credulity and weakness of those who he knew were inclined to believe every thing that might cast blemishes on a work against which they were so strongly prejudiced as the reformation of this church: since a field which they so often reaped, and with whose spoils their court was so enriched, was no more at their devotion. So they are ever since concerned in interest to use all the ways they can think on to disgrace a change that was so fatal to them. But as the reformation of this church has hitherto stood, notwithstanding all their designs against it; so it is to be hoped, that the history of it will be hereafter better understood, notwithstanding all the libels and calumnies by which they have endeavoured to represent it, in such black and odious colours to the world.

Sanders says, page 176, "King Edward was in the ninth year of his age when he came to the crown."

This is of no great consequence, but it shews how little this author considered what he writ, when in so public a thing as the king's age, he misreckons a year, for he was born the 12th of October 1537; so in January 1547 he was in the tenth year of his age.

2. He says, page 176, "King Edward was not only declared king of England and Ireland, but made supreme head of the church;" and upon that runs out to shew how incapable a child was of that power.

This is set down in such terms, as if there had been some special act made for his being supreme head of the church, distinct from his being proclaimed king, whereas there was no such thing; for the supremacy being annexed to the crown, the one went with the other: and it being but a civil power, might be as well exercised by the king's governors, before he came to be of age, as the other rights of the crown were.

3. He says, page 177, "The earl of Hartford was made by himself duke of Somerset."

This was done by order of the whole council, in pursuance of king Henry's design, proved by those witnesses that were beyond exception: and that king having by his will charged his executors to fulfil those things which he intended to do, this was found to be one of them.

4. He says, page 178, "The duke of Somerset made himself the only governor of the king and protector; none daring to oppose it openly but Wriothsley, whom king Henry, when he was dying, had made lord chancellor."

The protector was advanced to that dignity by the unanimous consent of the whole council; to which the lord chancellor consented, and signed the order about it, the original whereof is yet extant; for though he argued against it before it was done, yet he joined with the rest in doing it: nor was he made chancellor by king Henry at his death, but two years before.

5. He says, page 178, "On the 27th of February, two days before the king was crowned, the protector persuaded the king to create many new peers; who were all hereticks, except Dudley earl of Warwick."

Our author, by this shew of exactness, would persuade the reader, that he had considered dates, and the smallest particulars, with the care that became an historian: but he little thought that any would come after him and examine what he said. By this account the king must have been crowned the 1st of March, but it was done February 20, and the peers were created on the 16th of February, four days before. They were not all hereticks, for he forgot that Wriothsley was at the same time made earl of Southampton, which he afterwards insinuates was done upon another account. But all those creations were in pursuance of king Henry's designs, and in obedience to his latter will.

6. He says, page 178, "They forced Wriothsley to resign his office, and turned both him and the earl of Arundel out of the council because they were catholicks."

Wriothsley was turned out upon no account of religion, but for putting the great seal to a commission that was against law, (according to the opinion which the judges declared under their hands,) without any warrant from the council; himself acknowledging the justice of the sentence. The earl of Arundel was not turned out of the council; on the contrary, in the patent by which the protector held his office, that passed after the chancellor was removed, he is named to be one of the privy-council.

7. He says, page 179, "The protector would needs force all the clergy to submit in every thing to the king's orders;" and sets down the form in which the king writ to archbishop Cranmer.

In this nothing was done but what was begun by king Henry, and to which all the clergy, even his beloved Bonner not excepted, had formerly submitted. So this was no new thing set up by the protector, it being only the renewing the bishops' patents in the new king's name: and this was no part of the reformation, for it was done only to awe the popish bishops, but was soon after laid aside. What he sets down as a letter of king Edward's to Cranmer, is the preamble of the patent he took out. So little did this writer know the things that truly make to the advantage of the cause which he designed to assert.

8. He says, page 180, "The new protector, among the first things he did, restrained all preaching, and silenced all the bishops and pastors: so that none were licensed to preach but the Lutherans and Zuinglians."

The first injunctions set out in the king's name, required all bishops to preach at least four times a year in their diocesses; and to keep learned chaplains who might be able to preach, and should be often much employed in it. And thus matters stood the first year of this reign. In the beginning of the second year, upon complaints made of the rashness of some preachers, a proclamation was put out, that none should preach without a license from the king, or the archbishops, or the bishop of the diocess; except incumbents in their own parishes. Afterwards there was, for some little time, a total prohibition of preaching, but that was to last for a short while, till the book of common prayer, which was then a preparing, should be finished. This was equally made on both hands; for the prohibition was universal, without exception: so falsely has our author stated this matter; which one would think he ignorantly drew from what queen Mary did, applying it to this reign; for she, upon her coming to the crown, did prohibit all preaching, excepting only such as were licensed to it by Gardiner, under the great seal.

9. He says, page 181, "Latimer was turned out of the bishopric of Worcester, by king Henry, upon suspicion of heresy."

Latimer did freely resign his bishoprick, upon the passing of the act of the six articles, with which he could not comply with a good conscience.

10. He says, page 182, "The protector put Cox and Cheek about the king, that they might corrupt his mind with heretical doctrines."

These were put about him three years before, by king Henry's order; as that young king himself informs us in his journal.

11. He says, page 184, "The heads of the colleges were turned out, and the catholick doctors were forbid to preach."

I do not find one head of a college in either university was turned out*; for though they generally loved the old superstition, yet they loved their places much better. And indeed the whole clergy did so readily conform themselves to every change that was made, that it was not easy to find colours for turning out Bonner and Gardiner. All preachers had the liberty of their own pulpits, except for a very little while.

* Day, provost of King's, was not turned out, as has been said by Mr. Wharton, for he resigned, though perhaps not altogether voluntarily, though his resignation is said to be voluntary. But Rowland Swinburn, master of Clare Hall, was certainly turned out by the king's visitors, as appears from a Journal of the Visitation, MS. C. C. C., nor can there be any doubt but Gardiner was turned out at Trinity Hall, where his successors, Haddon and Mowse, are styled masters de facto.

—ANON. CORRECT.

12. He says, page 184, "They decried the school-divinity, and the works of Lombard, Aquinas, and Scotus, and so threw all learning out of the schools."

They could not do that more than Sir Thomas More, Erasmus, and other popish writers had done before them; who had expressed their scorn of that way of treating divine matters, so copiously, that it was no wonder it was much despised. Those writers had, by a set of dark and barbarous maxims and terms, so intangled all the articles of faith, and imposed on the world, by an appearance of saying somewhat, when really they said nothing: and pretending to explain religion, they had so exposed it, that their way of divinity was become equally nauseous and ridiculous.

13. He says, page 186, "Bucer and Peter Martyr, being brought out of Germany, did corrupt the universities; and entertained the youth with discourses of predestination, reprobation, and a fatal necessity of things."

This was so far from being much taught, that on the contrary, in one of the articles of religion, the curious enquiries into those abstruse points was by public authority forbid. Bucer and Martyr read for most part in the chairs, upon the mass, and the other corruptions of the popish worship. They also declared St. Austin's doctrine about grace, but I do not find they ever meddled with reprobation.

14. After a long invective, which is to pass as a piece of his wit and poetry, he says, page 190, "Bucer was inclined to become a Jew, and was descended from Jewish parents; and that the lord Paget had heard him say, that the corporal presence was so clear in the Scripture that no man could deny it who believed the gospel; but for his part, he did not believe all that was said in the New Testament concerning our Saviour."

This is as suitable to our author's honesty as can be: Bucer was never accused of this by any of his enemies as long as he lived. No man in that age writ with a greater sense of the kingdom of Christ than he did. And for the story of the lord Paget, we have nothing for it but the author's word; and poets must make circumstances, as well as more signal contrivances, to set off their fables. But there was no occasion for Bucer's saying this, since he never declared against the corporal presence; but was for taking up that controversy in some general expressions. So it was not suitable to his opinion in that matter for him to talk so loosely of the Scriptures. And is it credible that a story of this nature should not have been published in queen Mary's time, and been made use of, when he was condemned for an heretick, and his body raised and burnt? But our author, perhaps, did not think of that.

15. He says, page 191, "Peter Martyr was a while in suspense concerning the Eucharist, and stayed till he should see what the parliament should appoint in that matter."

P. Martyr argued and read in the chair against the corporal presence four years before the parliament meddled with it: for the second Common Prayer Book, which contained the first publick declaration that the parliament made in this matter, was enacted in the fifth year of king Edward; and Peter Martyr, from his first coming to England, had appeared against it.

16. He said, page 193, "The first parliament under king Edward, appointed a new form to be used in ordaining priests and bishops; who till that time had been ordained according to the old rites, save only that they did not swear obedience to the pope."

This is a further evidence of our author's care in searching the printed statutes; since what was done in the fifth year of this reign he represents as done in the first. His design in this was clear; he had a mind to possess all his own party with an opinion that the orders given in this church were of no force, and therefore he thought it a decent piece of his poem to set down this change as done so early: since if he had mentioned it in its proper place, he knew not how to deny the validity of the orders that were given the first four years of this reign, which continued to be conferred according to the old forms.

17. He said, page 193, "The parliament did also at the same time confirm a new Book of Common-Prayer and of the Administration of the Sacraments."

This is of a piece with the former; for the act confirming the Common Prayer Book, which is also among the printed statutes, passed not in this session of parliament, but in a second session, a year after this. These are indications sufficient to shew what an historian Sanders was, that did not so much as read the public acts of the time concerning which he writ.

18. He says, page 193, "They ordered all images to be removed, and sent some lewd men over England for that effect; who either brake or burnt the images of our Saviour, the Blessed Virgin, and the Saints; therein declaring against whom they made war; and they ordered the king's arms, three leopards, and three lilies, with the supporters, a dog and a serpent, to be set in the place where the cross of Christ stood: thereby owning that they were no longer to worship Jesus Christ, whose images they broke, but the king, whose arms they set up in the room of those images."

In this period there is an equal mixture of falsehood and malice. 1. The parliament did not order the removal of images; it was done by the king's visitors, before the parliament sat. 2. The total removal of images was not done the first year, only those images that were abused to superstition were taken down, and a year after the total removal followed. 3. They took care that this should be done regularly, not by the visitors, who only carried the king's injunctions about it, but by the curates themselves. 4. They did not order the king's arms to be put in the place where the cross had stood. It grew indeed to be a custom to set them up in all churches, thereby expressing, that they acknowledged the king's authority reached even to their churches; but there was no order made about it. 5. I leave him to the correction of the heralds, for saying, the king's arms are three leopards, when every body knows they are three lions, and a lion, not a dog, is one supporter, and the other is a dragon, not a serpent. 6. By their setting up the king's arms, and not his picture, it is plain they had no thought of worshipping their king, but did only acknowledge his authority. 7. It was no less clear, that they had no design against the worship due to Jesus Christ, nor that inferior respect due to the Blessed Virgin and Saints; but intended only to wean the people from that, which at best was but pagantry; but as it was practised, was manifest idolatry. And the painting on the walls of the churches the Ten Commandments, the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, with many other passages of Scripture that were of most general use, shewed, they intended only to cleanse their churches from those mixtures of heathenism that had been brought into the Christian religion.

19. He says, page 193, "They took away the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ, that they might thereby give some colour to the converting of the sacred vessels to the king's use."

They took away no part of the institution of Christ, for they set it down in the act past about it; and recited all the words of the first institution of the sacrament; they only condemned private masses, as contrary to Christ's institution. They did not convert the holy vessels to the king's use, nor were they taken out of the churches till five years after this; that the necessities of the government, either real or pretended, were alleged to excuse the taking away the superfluous plate that was in churches: but this was not done by act of parliament, but by commissioners empowered by the king, who were ordered to leave in every church such vessels as were necessary for the administration of the sacraments.

20. He says, page 193, "The parliament ordered the prayers to be in the vulgar tongue; and upon that he infers, that the Irish, the Welch, and the Cornishmen, were now in a much worse condition than before; since they understood no English, so that the worship was to them in a tongue more unknown than it had formerly been."

The parliament made no such order at this time: the Book of Common Prayer was set out first by the king's authority, and ratified by the subsequent session of parliament. There was also a design which though it was then accomplished, yet it was done afterwards, of translating the liturgy into these tongues: but still the English was much more understood by all sorts of men among them, than the Latin had been.

21. He says, page 194, "The office of the communion, appointed by this parliament, differed very little from the mass, save that it was in English."

The error of the parliament's appointing the new offices runs through all he says on this subject. But in the new office of the communion, the idolatry of worshipping, carrying about or exposing the sacrament, was laid aside. The trade of particular masses for private occasions, the prayers to the saints, the denying the people the chalice, with a great many of the rites and gesticulations formerly used, were all laid aside; so that there were great changes made. Every thing was not done at once, but they began with the abuses that did most require a reformation, and went on afterwards to the changing of lesser things.

22. He says, page 194, "Sir Ralph Sadler took the wife of one Matthew Barlow; so, upon pretence of his being dead, his wife married Sadler: but her first husband coming home, he sought to have his wife again. It was brought into the parliament in king Henry's time, and now it was enacted, that she should be Sadler's wife; he being the richer and greater man. So against the laws of the gospel, a wife, while her husband was yet alive, was adjudged to a second husband."

This is, as far as I can learn, a forgery from the beginning to the end: and it seems Sadler, that was a privy-councillor in queen Elizabeth's time, did somewhat that so provoked Sanders, that he resolved to be revenged of him and his family, by casting such an aspersion on him. I find no footsteps of any such story; sure I am, there is nothing concerning it in the records of this parliament. And for the business of the dissolution of marriages for adultery, absence, or any other cause, there was so great and so strict an enquiry made into it after the parliament was ended, in the case of the marquess of Northampton, that it is clear it was the first of that sort that was examined; and might perhaps, after it was confirmed in parliament, in the fifth year of this reign, have been made a precedent for other cases; but this of Sadler, in the first parliament, is a contrivance of our author's. It is not improbable, that when afterwards it was judged that the marriage-bond was dissolved by adultery, they might likewise declare it dissolved, upon voluntary and long absence, since St. Paul had said, "that a brother or a sister were not under bondage in such cases."

23. He says, page 196, "Gardiner, Bonner, Tonstal, Heath, and Day, were much grieved at the changes that were made: yet they complied in many things, till being required to deliver some blasphemous doctrines in their sermons, they refusing to give obedience in that, were deprived; but were afterwards condemned to perpetual imprisonment under queen Elizabeth; and all which were the effects of God's displeasure on them for complying with king Henry in his schism."

I shall grow tedious if I insist on all the falsities that do occur in this period. First, only Gardiner and Bonner were questioned and deprived for their sermons: Tonstal was deprived for misprision of treason; Heath and Day were judged by lay-delegates; so it is like their offences were also against the state. 2. There was nothing enjoined Bonner or Gardiner to preach, upon which they were censured, but that the king's authority was the same when he was under age that it was afterwards; which is a point that belongs only to the laws and constitutions of this government: and so there was just reason to impute their silence in that particular, when they were commanded to touch upon it in their sermons, to an ill design against the state. 3. Three of these bishops did concur in all the changes that were made the first four years of this king's reign, and both preached and wrote for them; and even Bonner and Gardiner did not only give obedience to every law or injunction that came out, but recommended them much in their sermons. 4. These did not suffer perpetual imprisonment under queen Elizabeth; Gardiner and Day died before she reigned, and so were not imprisoned by her. Heath was never put in prison by her, but lived at his own country house; and Tonstal lived at Lambeth in as much ease, and was treated with as much respect, as if it had been his own house; so that Bonner was the only man that was kept in prison; but that was believed to be done in kindness to him, to preserve him from the affronts which otherwise he might have met with from the friends of those he had butchered.

24. He says, page 197, "The lady Mary never departed from her mother's faith and constancy."

It appears, by many of her letters, that she complied with everything that had been done by her father; so it seems she was dispensed with from Rome, to dissemble in his time; for otherwise her constancy had very likely been fatal to her, but she presumed on the mildness of her brother's government, to be more refractory afterwards.

25. He says, page 198, "The king was sorry when he understood how hardly his sister had been used by the council."

It was so far otherwise, that when the council, being much pressed by the emperor to connive at her having mass, were resolved to give way to it; the king himself was so averse to it, thinking it a sin in him to consent to the practice of idolatry, that the council employed the bishops to work on him, and they could hardly induce him to tolerate it.

26. He says, page 200, "The visitors carried with them over England, Bibles of a most corrupt translation, which they ordered to be set up in all the churches of England."

In king Henry's time, it had been ordered, that there should be a Bible in every church; so this was not done by the visitors in this reign, as may appear by the injunctions that were given them, which have been often printed.

27. He says, page 200, "The visitors did everywhere enquire whether all the images were broken down; and if the altars were taken away, and communion tables were put in their rooms; and if all the old offices were destroyed."

Here he confounds in one period what was done in several years. In the first year the images that had been abused by pilgrimages were ordered to be removed. In the second year, all images were taken down without exception. In the third year the old books of the former offices were ordered to be destroyed. And in the fourth year, the altars were turned to communion tables; so ignorantly did this author write of our affairs.

28. He says, page 201, "The visitors did everywhere encourage the priests to marry, and looked on such as did not marry as inclined to popery."

The marriage of the clergy was not so much as permitted till near the beginning of the third year of this reign; and then it was declared that an unmarried state was more honourable and decent; so that it was recommended, and the other was only tolerated; and so far were they from suspecting men to be firm to the reformation that were married, that Ridley and Latimer, the most esteemed next to Crammer, were never married: nor was any ever vexed for his not being married, as he falsely insinuates.

28. He says, page 202, "The protector bore great hatred to Gardiner and Tonstal, both because they opposed the hereticks, and because they had been made equals to him, if not preferred before him, by king Henry's will, in the government during the king's being under age."

This is another of our author's figures. Gardiner was not mentioned in king Henry's will, neither as an executor nor so much as a counsellor; and by it none were preferred to another, all being made equal. And for Tonstal, he continued still in a firm friendship with the protector, and was so well satisfied with the first changes that were made, that he was complained of as well as Crammer, by Gardiner, in the letters which he writ to the protector.

29. He says, page 202, "The protector made a speech about religion before the king, and therefore he put, first Gardiner, then Tonstal, and at another time, the bishops of London, Chichester, and Worcester, in prison."

Gardiner and Bonner were indeed imprisoned some time, during the protector's government; the latter was also deprived while he was protector. But Tonstal was not put in prison till two years after, and it was at the time of the duke of Somerset's total fall, and by the same person's means that wrought his ruin; from which it appears he was always a firm friend to the duke of Somerset. The bishops of Worcester and Chichester were also brought in trouble, long after the government was taken out of the protector's hands.

30. He says, page 202, "They were all deposed from their degree."

They were not deposed from their degree, but deprived of their bishopricks; for they having accepted commissions, by which they held their sees, only during the king's pleasure, they might well be deprived by a sentence of the delegates. But had they been to be deposed, and thrust from their order, it must have been done by a synod of bishops. They were deprived, as many bishops were under the Christian emperors, by selected synods that sat in the court, and judged of all complaints that were brought before the emperors.

31. Page 204. "He reckons up the judgments of God upon the hereticks, and says, the protector made kill his brother, and Dudley took him away."

This is a way of writing familiar enough to our author, to represent things in such a manner as might fill the reader with horror, as if these persons had been secretly murdered, whereas the one was condemned in parliament, the other by a judgment of his peers.

32. He says, page 204, "King Edward died not without suspicion of being poisoned by Dudley and the duke of Suffolk, who aspired to the crown."

It was never suspected that the duke of Suffolk had any hand in poisoning the king, nor could I ever see any reason to conclude that he was poisoned; but neither of these dukes aspired to the crown; the one resigned any pretension he could ever have to his daughter; and the other intended only that his fourth son should reign.

33. He said, page 205, "The protector's lady claimed the precedence of the queen dowager, and upon the denial of it, conspired the ruin of the admiral."

All this is a contrivance of the enemies of that family; for as it had been absurd for the duchess of Somerset to have disputed precedence with the queen dowager, so in that whole matter it is plain the admiral began with his brother, and conspired his ruin; and the protector was often reconciled to him, and forgave him many faults, till it appeared that his ambition was incurable.

34. He says, page 205, "There being no ground of any accusation against him, the duchess of Somerset got Latimer to accuse him of treason in a sermon."

The articles upon which he was condemned shew what matter there was against him. Latimer did never accuse him of treason; but being a man of great plainness of speech, he reflected on him as ambitious, and not sincere in the profession of religion: and when it was suspected that the duchess of Somerset had set him on to make these reflections, he did vindicate her in a most solemn manner. Nor is there any reason to think that how indiscreet soever he might be in preaching in such a sort, that he did it to flatter or to aspire by such means, for he refused to accept of any preferment, though the house of commons interposed to have him repossessed of the see of Worcester.

35. He says, page 205, "At the same time that he was beheaded, the queen dowager died."

She died in September 1548, and he was beheaded in March following; and one of the articles against him was, that after her death he intended to have married the king's sister Elizabeth; and it was suspected, that to make for that he had poisoned her.

36. He says, page 206, "The men of Devonshire and Cornwall did, with one consent, take up arms for the faith."

In one thing he says true, that this rebellion was set on by the priests, and made on the account of religion; but the brutal cruelty of those rebels shewed it was not for the faith, but in compliance to their priests and leaders, that they rose.

37. He says, page 209, "The clergy finding that their being married was generally an ingrateful thing, procured an act of parliament, declaring that there was no human law against their marriages; and this was all they were concerned in, for they cared little for the law of God."

This is a genuine piece of our author's wit. If the parliament meddles in declaring what is the law of God, he accuses them for meddling in things without their sphere: and if they only declare what is the law of the land, he says they have no regard to the law of God: so he is resolved, do what they will, they shall not escape his censure. But in this he shews his ignorance as well as his malice. The lawfulness of the marriage of the clergy was inquired into with such exactness, that scarce anything can be added since to what was then written on that argument. It was made out that there was no law of God against it: it was also proved that there was no general law made by the primitive church about it, but that it was a part of the yoke that the popes laid on the clergy, to engage them more zealously in their concerns. It was at first carried in the convocation that they might lawfully marry; then an act of parliament passed permitting it: of all which our author takes no notice. Then three years after, some that were ill-affected to them, taking advantage from the words of the statute, as if the permission had only been such a conniving at it as had been formerly to the stewards, a second act passed confirming those marriages, and the issue by them.

38. He says, page 210, "The catholick doctors in the universities grew more courageous in the defence of the faith, and so desired a publick dispute concerning the corporal presence."

They were so courageous, that as soon as any change was made, they all complied most obsequiously to it, as will appear both by Ogleshorp and Smith's submissions. But while the changes were under consultation, they seeing it could bring them into no trouble, were very stout; but as soon as they were to lose or suffer anything for their consciences, then they grew as tractable as could be. In such a zeal, let him glory as much as he will.

39. He says, page 210, "Smith did often challenge Peter Martyr to a public dispute at Oxford; but he declined it, till Dr. Cox, a man of a lewd life, was sent to moderate in the dispute, and till Dr. Smith was banished the university."

Smith did once challenge Peter Martyr to a dispute, to which he presently consented, upon two conditions; the one was, that a license should first be obtained of the king and council, and delegates be appointed by them to make a just report of the dispute: the other was, that it should be managed in the terms of Scripture, and not in the school terms: they were both more proper for matters of divinity, and more easily understood by all people. Upon this the council sent down delegates; and then Smith, who intended only to raise a tumult in the schools, withdrew himself, and fled beyond sea, but was never banished. His calling Dr. Cox a man of a lewd life, is one of the flowers he stuck in to adorn the rest. All the writers of that age make honourable mention of him; he was first set about this king by his father, and continued with him in all the turns of affairs, and did so faithfully discharge that high trust, that it appears he must have been a very extraordinary man. This was so well known to the whole nation, that in the beginning of queen Mary's reign he met with more than ordinary favour. This, considering the hatred which the popish party bore him, is a clear evidence of his great worth, and that they were afraid to be severe to a man so universally esteemed.

40. He says, page 210, "Cox saw he was so much pressed by the doctors that disputed with him, and the hearers did so hiss him down, that he broke off the dispute, giving Peter Martyr a high commendation for his learning, and exhorting the rest to live peaceably. Peter Martyr afterwards printed the disputation falsely, but by the judgment of the university he was doubly baffled, both that he refused to dispute with Smith, and that he did acquit himself so ill with those doctors that disputed with him."

It is probable the hearers might have been set on to hiss, but the printed disputation will decide this matter, and shew who argued both more nervously and more ingenuously. We have no reason to believe it was falsely printed, unless we will take it on this author's word; for I do not find the popish doctors did, either at this time, or afterwards in queen Mary's reign, when the presses were all in their hands, publish anything to the contrary of what P. Martyr printed; so that he neither refused to dispute with Smith, nor was he baffled by those that undertook it. Smith fled, and the rest were clearly worsted. And for the university, there was no judgment passed by them, unless he means the rudeness and clamours of some that might be set on to it.

41. He says, page 211, "The dispute with Bucer at Cambridge had the same effect."

It had so indeed; the printed relation shews the weakness and disingenuity of the popish disputants, and that was never contradicted.

42. Page 211. He gives account of many other disputes, and of Gardiner's book, under the name of Marcus Constantius, which he says was a full confutation of all the books then written for the contrary opinion. He also mentions the sermons and imprisonment of Crispine, Moreman, Cole, Seaton, and Watson.

These other disputes could be no more than private conferences; but I can give no account of these, having met with them in none of the writers of that time. As for Gardiner's book, such as will compare it with Cranmer's book, which it pretends to answer, will soon see in it the difference between plain, simple reasoning on the one side, and sophistical cavilling on the other. But for the sufferings of that party, there is no great reason to boast of them; for they universally complied with everything that was commanded: even the lady Mary's chaplains did it, in the churches where they were beneficed. Nor do I find any one man turned out of his cure for refusing to conform; but it was found some of these did privately say mass, either in the lady Mary's chapel, or in private houses, and did secretly act against what they openly professed; and it was no wonder if such dissemblers were more severely handled. But there was no blood shed in the quarrel, so that if the popish party made such resistance as our author pretends they did, it very much commends the gentleness of the government at that time, since they were so mercifully handled. It was far otherwise in queen Mary's time.

43. Page 212. He runs out in a discourse of the sufferings of his party, of their zeal and constancy; and particularly mentions Story, who, he says, suffered martyrdom, under queen Elizabeth. "He had said in the parliament, 'Wo to thee, O land, whose king is a child;' and this drew so much hatred on him, that he was forced to fly out of England."

What the zeal and constancy of the party was, may be gathered from what has been already said. This Story did say these words in the house of commons, and was, by order of the house, sent to the Tower: for though it was a text of Scripture that he cited, yet the application carried with it so high a reflection on the government, that it well deserved such a censure: but upon his submission, the house of commons sent an address to the protector that he and the council would forgive him, which was done, and he was again admitted to the house: so that he was not forced on this account to fly out of England. And for his martyrdom under queen Elizabeth, the record of his trial shews the ground of that sentence: he had endeavoured all he could to set on many in queen Mary's time to advise the cutting off queen Elizabeth: his ordinary phrase was, "It was a foolish thing to cut off the branches of heresy, and not to pluck it up by the root." He knowing how faulty he had been, fled over to Flanders in the beginning of her reign: and when the duke of Alva was governor there, he pressed him much to invade England; and gave him a map of some of the roads and harbours, with a scheme of the way of conquering the nation. He had also consulted with magicians concerning the queen's life; and used always to curse the queen when he said grace after meat. These things being known in England, some got him to go aboard a ship in Flanders, on another pretence, and presently set sail for England; where yet the government was so gentle, that two years past before he was brought to his trial: and then the defence he made was, that he was not accountable for what he had done in Flanders, it not being in the queen's dominions; and that he was not her subject, having sworn allegiance to the king of Spain. But this being contrary to his natural allegiance, which he could never shake off, he was found guilty of treason, and was there executed. These are our author's martyrs, and are of a piece with his faith.

44. "In the room of the bishops that were turned out," he says, page 216, "there were put some apostate and lustful (that is, as he explains it, married) monks, Scory, Bird, Holgate, Barlow, Harley, Coverdale, and Ridley;" on whom he bestows many such epithets, as may be expected from him.

This is such a piece of history as one can hardly meet with any thing like it. 1. Bird was made bishop of Chester by king Henry, and was the first that sat in that see, it being of that king's foundation. 2. Holgate was put in the see of York by king Henry, when it was void by Lee's death. 3. Barlow was also put in Bath and Wells by the same king, it being likewise void by the death of Knight. 4. Coverdale was put in the see of Exeter, upon Veysey's free resignation, he being then extreme old. 5. Harley was also put in Hereford, upon the former bishop's death. 6. Ridley and Harley were never married, nor Coverdale, for ought I can find*: so exact is our author in delivering the history of that time.

45. He says, page 216, "Poinet, that was made bishop of Winchester in Gardiner's room, besides one wife to whom he was married, took a butcher's wife from him; but the butcher sued for his wife, and recovered her out of his hands:" and to make this pass the better, he adds a jest of Gardiner's about it, that he had said, "why might not he hope to be restored to his bishopric, as well as the butcher was to his wife?"

The falseness of this story is clearly evinced by the answer that Dr. Martin set out in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, to a book that Poinet had writ in the defence of the married clergy. Martin's answer is writ with so much spite, and so many indecent reflections, that though it is not reasonable to believe all he says, yet it is almost a certain argument, that this story concerning Poinet is a forgery; since if it was a thing so public as our author makes it, Martin must have heard of it, especially living in Gardiner's house: and it is not to be imagined that if he did know it he would have concealed it: so this, and the jest that hangs upon it, must pass as one of the flourishes of our author's pen.

46. He says, page 217, "Hooper, that used formerly to rail at the luxury of the catholic bishops, being made a superintendent himself, for so the Zuinglians called their bishops, enjoyed at once two bishopricks, Worcester and Gloucester."

* Coverdale was married; he and Machabeus married two sisters. Fox, vol. iii. p. 182. Hollingshed, vol. II. p. 1309. speaks of Coverdale's wife twice in one page. Eight of the protestant bishops in this reign were married. Parkhurst, Epigram. Juv. pp. 56, 165, 166.—ANON. CORRECT.

The Zuinglians had no superintendents, for ought I can find; nor was Hooper ever called superintendent, but bishop. He was made bishop of Gloucester, which had been before king Henry the Eighth's time a part of the bishoprick of Worcester. And now these sees came to be united; so that Hooper had not two bishopricks, but one that had been for some years divided into two: he only enjoyed the revenue of Gloucester, for Worcester was entirely suppressed.*

47. He says, page 219, "On the 9th of July, the money was cried down one fourth part; and forty days after another fourth part: so that the whole nation was thereby robbed of the half of their stock."

This king's counsellors found the coin embased; and they were either to let it continue in that state, to the great prejudice of the state of the nation, or to reduce it to a just standard; so our author condemns them for correcting what they found amiss. But no wonder he that quarrels with them so much for reforming of religion, should be likewise offended with them for reforming the coin.

48. He says, page 222, "The duke of Somerset was condemned, because he had come into the duke of Northumberland's chamber with intention to have killed him, and was thereupon beheaded."

This was indeed said to be the cause of his death; but it is not mentioned in the record, in which it is only said, that he intended to have seized on the duke of Northumberland, without adding that he designed to have killed him.

49. He says, page 223, "The two younger sisters of lady Jane Gray were married to the eldest sons of the earls of Pembroke and Huntington."

This error is of no great consequence, but it shews how much our author was a stranger, even to the most public actions: for the youngest sister to the lady Jane was married to one Keys that was groom-porter. The earl of Huntington's son married the duke of Northumberland's daughter.

50. He says, page 223, "Soon after the marriages, the king began to sicken, and to fall in decay."

The king had been ill four months before these marriages were made: and it is probable his sickness made them be the more hastened.

51. He says, page 223, "Dudley was very desirous to have the lady Mary in his power, not being much concerned about the lady Elizabeth, for she being descended of Ann Boleyn, he did not much consider her."

It was natural for Dudley to desire rather to have the elder sister in his power than the younger; who could not claim to the crown but after the other: but it appeared by the submission of the whole nation to queen Elizabeth, though still professing popery, that she was every whit as much considered as her sister had been formerly.

52. He says, page 224, "Lady Mary having been sent for by Dudley's order, understood, when she was not far from London, that the king was expiring; and that she would be in great danger if she came in court; upon which she turned back."

Queen Mary had not been sent for by Dudley's order, the council had writ to her, that the king being ill desired her company: the news sent her from court was, that the king was dead; so she was desired to stir no further: and upon that retired to her house in the country.

53. He says, page 224, "Twenty days after that, she heard the king was dead; whereupon she made proclaim herself queen."

* Worcester was not entirely suppressed; for he was entitled bishop of Worcester, and enjoyed a great part of the revenues of Gloucester and Worcester, and kept great hospitality with them.—STRYPE'S CORRECT.

The discovery of the former error clears this; for she immediately gathered the people of Suffolk about her, and gave them her royal word that they should enjoy their religion as it had been established in king Edward's time; but though they were the first that proclaimed her queen, and came about her to defend her right, they were among the first that felt the severities of her reign.

54. He says, page 225, "Mary queen of Scots was married to the dolphin of France."

She was then but a little past ten years old, and was not married to the dolphin till five years after this.

55. He says, page 229, "Queen Mary, as soon as she came to the crown, without staying for an act of parliament concerning it, laid aside the prophane title of being head of the church."

We may expect as true a history of this reign as we had of the former, when in the first period of it there is so notorious a falsehood. She held two parliaments before she laid aside that title; for in the writ of summons for both, she was styled supreme head of the church; and all the reformed bishops were turned out by virtue of commissions which she issued out as supreme head. There was also a visitation made over England by her authority; and none were suffered to preach but upon licenses obtained under her great seal; so that she both retained the title and power of supreme head a year after she came to the crown.

56. He says, page 229, "She discharged the prisoners she found in the Tower; recalled the sentence against cardinal Pool, and discharged a tax due to her by the subjects."

The queen did free the prisoners of the Tower at her coming to the crown, and discharged the tax at her coronation: but for recalling the sentence against cardinal Pool, that being an act of parliament, she could not recall it; nor was it done till almost a year and an half after her coming to the crown.

57. He says, page 229, "She took care of the coin, that her subjects might suffer no more by the embasing it; so that they all saw the difference between a catholic and heretical prince."

I do not find any care was taken of the coin all her reign; and the bringing that to a just standard is universally ascribed to queen Elizabeth. If there was a public joy upon her coming to the crown, it did not last long; and there was a far greater when she died. This observation is much more proper to the beginning of queen Elizabeth's reign, who began and continued to reign with so great and so uninterrupted a felicity, that none but a writer like our author would have made such a remark on the beginnings of this reign.

58. He says, page 230, "She overcame Wiat's rebellion, rather by her own faith, than by any force she had about her."

This is to make the reader think she defeated Wiat as Gideon did the Amalekites; but Wiat brought up not above 3000 men, and she had thrice that number about her. It was a desperate attempt, and that which was rather the effect of a precipitated design, than of prudent counsel.

59. He says, page 230, "She put her sister in the Tower, when it had appeared to the senate (which in his style is the parliament) that she had been engaged in Wiat's conspiracy."

This is said to cover her barbarous cruelty towards her sister; the matter never came before the parliament, and there was no ground ever given to justify the suspicion. It is true, Wiat hoping to have saved his life, by so foul a calumny, accused her : but when he saw he must die, he vindicated her openly on the scaffold. It is certain, if they could have found any colours to have excused severe proceedings against her, both the queen and the clergy who governed her were much inclined to have made use of them.

60. He says, page 231, "The queen was more ready to pardon crimes against herself, than offences against Christ and religion."

The more shame for those who governed her conscience, that made her so implacable to all whom she esteemed hereticks; since the Christian religion came not into the world, as the Author of it says of himself, "to destroy men's lives, but to save them:" yet she was not so merciful as he would represent her; witness her severities against her sister, and against Cranmer, even after he had signed the recantation of his former opinions.

61. He says, page 231, "Though some of the bishops were guilty of treason, yet she would not have them to be tried by the temporal laws, and referred even Cranmer himself to the spiritual jurisdiction."

Cranmer was tried for treason by virtue of a commission issued out by the queen; and all the other reformed bishops were turned out by delegates, empowered for that end by the queen's commissions.

62. He says, page 231, "Cranmer was condemned of treason in the parliament."

He was found guilty of treason by a jury of commissioners, and thereupon condemned by a commission of Oyer and Terminer; and not by the parliament. It is true, the parliament did afterwards confirm the sentence.

63. He says, page 231, "Before he was condemned, he feigned himself a catholic, and signed his retraction seventeen times with his own hand: but the bishops discovering his hypocrisy, degraded him and delivered him to the secular arm, upon which he was burnt at Oxford."

The popish party have but too great advantages against Cranmer in this last part of his life; so it was needless for our author to have mixed so much falsehood with this account: but he must go on in his ordinary method, even though it is not necessary for any of the ends he had set before himself. Cranmer stood out above two years and an half, in all which time he expressed great constancy of mind, and a readiness to die for that faith which he had before taught: nor would he fly beyond sea, though he had many opportunities to do it, and had reason enough to apprehend he could not escape at home. Upon his constant adhering to his former doctrines, he was condemned, degraded, and appointed to be burnt; and then the fears of death wrought that effect on him that he did recant, which he signed thrice: but the queen being set on revenge, would needs have him burnt after all that: so there was no discovery made of his hypocrisy, nor was there a sentence past upon it; but he, for all his recantation, was led out to be burnt: and then he returned back to his former doctrines, and expressed his repentance for his apostacy, with all the seriousness and horror that was possible.

64. He says, page 231, "The laws for burning hereticks were again revived, and by them not only Cranmer, but some hundreds of the false teachers were burnt."

A man's inclinations do generally appear in the lies he makes: so it seems our author wished it had been as he relates it was; but so far it was from this number, that there was not above a quarter of an hundred of the ministers burnt, (there were some hundreds of others burnt,) so ignorant was he of our affairs.

65. He says, page 232, "The queen did at first command all the strangers that were hereticks to leave the kingdom; upon which above 30,000, as was reckoned, went out of England."

The greatest number of the strangers were the Germans, and of these not above 200 went away, as themselves published it; but our author was generous and free-hearted, so that he would make the exiles to bear some proportion to the ministers that were burnt; and as he made some hundreds of the one, so 30,000 was but a moderate number to be exiled: 200 would have sounded pitifully in such a heroic work.

66. He says, page 232, "It was brought under debate, whether Peter Martyr should be burnt; but because he came into England upon the publick faith he was let go; yet his wife's body was raised out of the church-yard, and cast into a dunghill; and Bucer and Fagius's bodies were burnt."

It could not be debated whether Peter Martyr should be burnt; for the laws of burning were not made till a year after he went out of England: and the raising his wife's body, and the burning the other bodies, was done almost four years after this; though our author relates it as done at the same time.

67. He says, page 232, "The queen at first could not repeal the laws then in force for heresy; but she suspended them all, and exhorted her subjects to return to the catholic rites, upon which the people did universally return to them."

The queen could neither repeal nor suspend the laws then in force; and she did neither. When she was in Suffolk, she promised the religion established by law should not be changed: when she came to London, she declared she would force no consciences; but soon after she added a limitation to this, "till the parliament should order it." After that, all people were encouraged to set up the mass everywhere, and it did spread into most parts of the kingdom: but this was done both against law and the queen's royal word.

68. He says, page 232, "All pulpits were opened to catholic preachers, and the hereticks were not suffered to preach."

This he relates as if it had been the effect of the people's zeal; but it flowed from a proclamation of the queen's, that none should preach unless he obtained a license under the great seal, which was as high an act of supremacy as ever her father did.

69. He says, page 232, "She made first of all funeral rites to be performed for her brother, after the form of the catholics, though he had died in heresy; and intended to have had such rites for her father, but being better instructed, she found it could not be done, for him that had been the chief author of the schism, and of all the evil that followed it."

King Edward was buried according to the rites of the English liturgy; so that the funeral rites were not according to the old forms. It is true, the queen had in her own chapel such rites for him. As for her father, some of the writers of that time say, it was much pressed, to have his body at least raised and carried out of the consecrated ground, if not burnt: and in this she is said to have stood upon the dignity of a crowned head, and the decency of a daughter's duty to her father's ashes; so that she would not consent to so barbarous a thing.

70. Page 233. He condemns those, who having been defiled with heresy, and thereby under censures, did, notwithstanding that, administer the sacraments, and do the other offices of priesthood, before they were reconciled to the see of Rome. This, he says, was such a sin, that it may be reckoned one of the causes of that queen's dying so soon; and he sets down as a caution for the future, that if we should come to be again reconciled to that see, we might not relapse into the like error.

This was indeed cardinal Pool's advice, that the whole kingdom ought to have been put under an interdict, and that all holy offices were to cease, till they were reconciled to the see of Rome; but the whole clergy, not only many, as he says, being involved in those censures, if they had stayed for officiating till they had been reconciled to the see of Rome, perhaps it had not been done at all.

71. He says, page 233, "The queen, partly by her authority, partly by the concurrence of the parliament, got the ancient way of the service to be again restored, the hereticks not daring to oppose it much."

All that was done in the first parliament, was the restoring things to the same state they had been in when king Henry died; which was indeed the setting up that they called schism by law. It was no wonder those he calls hereticks could not oppose it much; when so many of their bishops had been turned out and imprisoned; others were violently thrust out of the house of lords, and the elections of the members of parliament had been so managed, that in many places force was used, and false returns were made in other places.

72. He says, page 234, "Only one that was bolder than the rest, threw a dagger at him who preached the first catholic sermon at St. Paul's: and another discharged a pistol at another, preaching in the same place."

This, one would think by his relation, was done after the parliament had set up the mass again; whereas it was soon after the queen came to the crown, long before the parliament; and that of the pistol was some months after the parliament. But if he had designed to deliver a true history to the world, he should have added, that upon the tumult that was raised against the preacher, he prayed Mr. Bradford and Mr. Rogers (two afterwards burnt for the reformed religion) to speak to the people, and persuade them to be quiet; upon which they both exhorted the people to behave themselves more peaceably and reverently; and Bradford went into the pulpit, that he might be the better heard; and so near was he to the danger, that the dagger pierced his sleeve; yet these two were had in such esteem that the tumult was quieted; and they carried the preacher safe home. One of them being to preach in the afternoon, exhorted the people to be peaceable and quiet, and severely condemned the tumult that had been in the morning. But such was the gratitude and justice of the popish party, that it was pretended, because they had appeased the tumult, that therefore they had also raised it: so they were upon that pretence put in prison, where they lay a year and a half, till the laws for burning were revived, and were then burnt for heresy.

73. He says, page 235, "Commendone was sent by order from the pope into England, who obtained a writing from the queen wherein she promised obedience to the see of Rome; upon which Pool was appointed legate."

It is no wonder our author understood not the affairs of the reformation aright, when he was so ill informed about the transactions of his own party. Commendone was not sent by the pope to England. The legate at Brussels sent him over from thence without staying for orders from Rome.

74. He says, page 239, "William Thomas, clerk of the council, had conspired to kill the queen; for which he justly suffered."

Of this I find nothing on record; so it must depend on our author's credit, which is not infallible.

75. He says, page 239, "The imposture of Elizabeth Crofts was set up by the persuasion of many of the hereticks: and when it was discovered she confessed she had been set on to it by other, and by one Drake in particular; but they all fled."

In the account that was then published of that imposture, Drake only is accused for it: what he was does not appear to me, for I have never found him mentioned but on this occasion; so there was no reason to transfer the private guilt of this conspiracy on a whole party, as our author does; though upon his credit one of our writers has also done it.

76. He says, page 243, "Those in whose hands the church lands were, had great apprehensions of their being forced to restore them, because the queen had restored all the lands that were in her hands, and had again converted the collegiate church of Westminster into an abbey; but to prevent the ill effects that might have followed on this, the cardinal did, in the pope's name, absolve them from all censures for possessing those lands, and that was confirmed by letters sent over from the pope."

He observes the order of time very exactly, when he sets the queen's restoring the church-lands, and founding the Abbey of Westminster, as the occasions of the fears the laity were in, of being forced to restore the rest of the church-lands; and of the cardinal's absolving them from all censures for keeping them still in their hands. The order in which this was done was thus; in November 1554, in the act of reconciliation with the see of Rome, there was a special proviso made for the church-lands, which the cardinal confirmed in the pope's name. In the year after that the queen gave up into the cardinal's hands all the church-lands that belonged to the crown; and two years after, she founded the Abbey of Westminster; so little influence had these things on the other that were done before. But he was grossly mistaken when he said the pope approved all: for he, in plain terms, refused to ratify what the cardinal had done; and soon after set out a severe bull, cursing and condemning all that held any church-lands.

77. He says, page 244, "All the bishops being sensible of their schismatical way of entering into their sees, did desire and obtain a confirmation from the pope. Kitchin, bishop of Landaff, only excepted, who afterward relapsed into heresy under queen Elizabeth;" and says, "it is likely the want of this confirmation made him be more easily overcome."

This our author wrote, being a thing very probable; and seldom do his authorities for what he asserts rise higher. It was also a pretty strain of his wit, to make the omitting of it fall singly on the only bishop that conformed under queen Elizabeth. But it is certain there was no such thing done at all; for if any had done it, Bonner was as likely as any other; since as none had been more faulty in king Henry's time, so none studied to redeem that with more servile compliances than he did; yet there is nothing of this recorded in his register, which continues entire to this day.

78. He said, page 246, "The state of the universities was restored to what it had been, and Oxford in particular, by Petrus a Soto's means, who was in the opinion of all much preferred to P. Martyr."

He that gathered the antiquities of Oxford, though no partial writer on this occasion, represents the state of that university very differently; that there were almost no divines in it, and scarce any public lectures. But when Sanders writ his poem, the Spanish councils were so much depended on by him and his party, that it was fit to put that complement on the nation concerning Petrus a Soto. Whether it was true or false, was a circumstance which he generously overlooked for most part.

79. He says, page 248, "Queen Elizabeth had done many things in queen Mary's time, both against her person and government."

He knew this was so false, that there was never a circumstance or a presumption brought against her but the information which Wiat gave, hoping thereby to save himself; and yet he denied that on the scaffold. If there had been any colour to have justified the taking away her life, both the queen and her counsellors were as much inclined to it as our author himself was.

80. He says, page 248, "King Henry said in parliament, she was not and could not be his daughter, for a secret reason he had revealed to the archbishop of Canterbury."

This was aptly enough said by a writer, that had emancipated himself from the laws of truth and veracity, to appeal to such a story; yet to have made it pass the better, he should have named other circumstances; for such a thing cannot be easily believed, since after Ann Boleyn's death, the king continued to treat Elizabeth still as his daughter; so that when she writ to his next queen she subscribed daughter: she was in all things educated with the care and state that became a king's child; and was, both by act of parliament and by his will, declared to be so. Now to think that such a king would have done all this after he had in parliament declared that she could not be his child, is a little too coarse to be believed, and so should have been supported with more than ordinary proofs.

81. He says, page 248, "She came to the crown merely by virtue of the act of parliament, without being legitimated."

In this, she and her sister were upon the same level; for neither of them were declared legitimate; so this was not to be objected to the one more than to the other sister.

82. He says, page 249, "Queen Mary being declared by act of parliament in the beginning of her reign legitimate, and her mother's marriage being declared good, Elizabeth was thereby of new illegitimated; yet she never repealed the laws against her title; but kept the crown merely upon the authority of an act of parliament, without having any regard to her birth."

Queen Mary came to the crown being in the same condition, and was either a lawful queen before that act was made, or else that act was of no force if it had not the royal assent given by a lawful queen. So queen Elizabeth was as much queen before any such act could have passed as afterwards: and therefore since it was not necessary for the securing her title, it was a sign of her tenderness of her father's memory, to which queen Mary had no regard, not to revive the remembrance of things that must have turned so much to his dishonour as that would have done.

83. He says, page 250, "Queen Mary not being able to prevent her sister's succession, sent a message to her on her death-bed, desiring her to pay her debts, and to preserve the catholic religion; both which she promised, but performed neither."

This is said without any proof, and is not at all probable; but is an ornament added to set off the one and blemish the other. Queen Mary's sickness was concealed as much as was possible. A week before her death, they were burning heretics as busily as ever; and by the managing affairs in the parliament, it appears there was great care taken to conceal the desperate condition she was in: so it is not likely that any such message was sent by her to her sister.

And thus far have I traced our author in the history he gives of the reigns of king Henry the Eighth, Edward the Sixth, and queen Mary, and have discovered an equal measure of ignorance and malice in him: but he was the fitter to serve their ends who employed him, and were resolved to believe him, how false or improbable soever his relation might be. We see what use they have made of him ever since that time. His friends were so sensible of the advantage their cause received from such a way of writing, that they resolved to continue down the history through queen Elizabeth's reign, in which, we are told, Sanders himself made some progress; but that not being done to such a perfection as Rishton and others intended to bring it, they undertook it; and have written so skillfully after the copy Sanders had given them, that if it is possible, they have outdone him in these two particular excellences of writing histories—in which he was so great a master,—impudence, and falsehood as to matter of fact. In one thing they had manifestly the better of him, that they writing of what fell out in their own time, could not be ignorant of the truth of things; whereas he writing of what was done before he was born, or when he was but a child, might have said many things more innocently, delivering them as he had them by report. But this excuse cannot fit them, who did knowingly, and on design, prevaricate so grossly in matters of fact: a little taste of these I shall give, only so far as I have carried down the history of this queen; for to examine all the faults they have committed would require a new volume; but from the taste I shall give the reader, he will easily know what judgment to pass on the whole work.

As for the decency of the style, the first period gives an essay of it, in which the author promises such a description of the queen's reign, that "this lioness shall be known by her claws:" and for his sincerity in writing, the whole preface is one indication of it, in which he accuses the queen for acting against the laws of nature and religion in assuming the supremacy; and represents it so, that the reader must needs think she was the high-priest of England, that ordained bishops and ministers, and performed all other holy offices: whereas she was so scrupulous in this point, that as she would not be called the supreme head of the church, so she made it be declared, both in one of the articles of religion set forth in the beginning of her reign, and afterwards in an act of parliament, what was the nature of that supremacy which she assumed; making it both a part of the religion, and the law of the land. By these it was declared, "that they gave her not the ministry of God's word, or of the sacraments; but only that prerogative which was given by God himself in the Scriptures to godly princes; that they should rule all committed to their charge by God, whether they be ecclesiastical or temporal, and restrain with the civil sword the stubborn and evil doers." If men were not past shame, they could not, after such an express and public declaration, put on the confidence of writing as this author does. I shall follow him in some more steps, and doubt not but I shall convince the reader, that he was the fittest man that could be found to have writ a continuation of Sanders's history.

1. He says, page 255, "Henry the Second of France, in a solemn assembly, did, after queen Mary's death, declare the queen of Scotland, his daughter-in-law, queen of England and Ireland."

This was neither done in a solemn assembly, nor presently after queen Mary's death; nor was it done by Henry the Second. The queen of Scotland did, by her uncle's advice, assume that title, without any public act: and it was not done till they understood that Philip was moving for a dispensation in the court of Rome for marrying queen Elizabeth ; king Henry did only connive at it, but neither ordered it nor justified it, when the queen's ambassador complained of it. An author that is so happy in his first period as to make three such mistakes, is likely to give us an excellent history.

2. He says, page 255, "The archbishop of York, and all the other bishops, one only excepted, refused to anoint her."

This was one of the most extraordinary things that ever was in any government, that the bishops refusing to crown the queen, were not only not punished for it, but continued to hold their bishoprics still : and the archbishop of York was continued a privy-councillor many months after this. This is none of the claws of the lioness, but rather a slackness and easiness of clemency that deserves censure, if it had not been that the queen resolved to begin her reign with the most signal acts of mercy that were possible.

3. He says, page 256, "Cecil and his friend Bacon raised vast estates to themselves, and involved the government into vast difficulties, and brought the queen's revenue into great, or rather inextricable confusion."

This may pass among foreigners, and perhaps be believed ; but we at home, that when we wish for happy times, and excellent counsellors, do naturally reflect on the days of that glorious queen, and her wise councils, will not be much wrought on by it. The revenue was never better managed, the undertakings of the government were never greater, and the charge was never less. This gives a character of those ministers beyond all exception. Sir Nicholas Bacon never raised himself above that quality which he brought with him into the court. And Cecil was not advanced above the lowest rank of nobility, though he was in the chief ministry above thirty years ; and though they both left good estates behind them, yet far short of what might have been expected after so long a course in such great and high employments.

4. He says, page 257, "There was an oath enacted in the parliament for the queen's supremacy ; and those who refused to swear it, for the first offence were to forfeit their benefices, and all their goods, and to be prisoners for life ; the second offence was made treason."

Such a false recital of a printed act, deserves a severer animadversion than I shall bestow on it. The refusing that oath did infer no other punishment but the forfeiture of benefices and offices ; and the parties so refusing were subjected to no other danger, nor was the oath to be put to them a second time. It is true, if any did assert the authority of any foreign potentate, that was more penal : yet that was not as our author represents it : for the first offence there, was a forfeiture of one's goods ; or in case of poverty, one year's imprisonment : the second offence brought the offender within a premunire : and the third was treason.

5. He says, page 258, "The change that was made, of the title of supreme head, into that of supreme governor, deceived many ; yet others thought that the queen might have thereby assumed an authority for administering the sacraments ; but to clear all scruples, she in the first visitation ordered it to be thus explained, that she thereby pretended to no more power than what her father and brother had exercised."

In the first visitation ordered by the queen, there was an injunction given explanatory to the oath of supremacy ; declaring that she did not pretend to any authority for the ministry of Divine service in the church, and challenged nothing but what had at all times belonged to the crown of England ; which was a sovereignty over all manner of persons under God : so that no foreign power had any rule over them ; and so was willing to acquit such as took it in that sense of all the penalties in the act. So that it is plain she assumed nothing but the royal authority, and was ready to accept of such explications as might clear all ambiguities.

6. Page 259. He reckons, among the laws that were made, this for one, that "bishops should hold their sees only during the queen's pleasure, and exercise no other authority but only as they derived it from her."

The laws he reckons were those made by king Henry now revived : but this law is falsely recited in both the parts of it : for the bishops were to hold their sees, as all others do their freeholds, without any dependence on the queen's pleasure ; and were to exercise their jurisdiction in their own names, and according to the ecclesiastical laws, and were not forced to take commissions to hold their bishoprics during the queen's pleasure, as had been done both in king Henry and king Edward's time.

7. Page 263. After a long discourse against the queen's supremacy, he says, "the laws concerning it, and other points of religion, did pass with great difficulty in the house of lords, all the bishops opposing them, and those noblemen in particular who had gone to Rome upon the embassy queen Mary sent thither did very earnestly dissuade it."

It is true, all the bishops did oppose them, though both Tonstal, Heath, Thirleby, and some others had consented to and written for king Henry's supremacy ; which was (at least as to the manner of expressing it) of a higher strain than that to which the queen did now pretend. They had also submitted to all the changes that had been made in king Edward's time. For the temporal lords, none dissented from the act of supremacy but the earl of Shrewsbury and the viscount Montacute, so the opposition was small where so few entered their dissents ; and of these, only the viscount Montacute had been at Rome, sent thither by queen Mary. It is true, the marquess of Winchester, and the lords, Morley, Stafford, Dudley, Wharton, Rich, and North, dissented from the bill for the Book of Common Prayer, and some other acts that related to the reformation ; but these being but few in number, were far short of those that were for them : and it is clear the queen left the peers wholly to their freedom, since the marquess of Winchester, notwithstanding his dissent, continued to hold that great office of lord treasurer, in which he had been put in king Edward's time, and in which he had kept all queen Mary's reign, till his death, fourteen years after this ; this may perhaps be justly censured, as looking too like a remissness in the matters of religion, when he that dissented to the reformation was yet so long employed in the greatest trust in the kingdom ; but certainly this is none of the "claws to know the lioness by."

8. He says, page 263, "The queen gave the earl of Arundel some hopes that she would marry him, and so persuaded him to consent to the laws now made ; but afterwards slighted him, and declared "she would live and die a virgin."

The journals of parliament shew how false this is ; for the address was made to the queen, persuading her to marry ; to which she made the answer set down by our author on the 6th of February, and the act of supremacy, with the other acts concerning religion, passed in April thereafter ; so that the queen, after so public a declaration of her unwillingness to marry, could not have deluded the earl of Arundel with the hopes of it.

9. He says, page 263, "She wrought on the duke of Norfolk, by promising him a dispensation in the business of his marriage, which he could not obtain of the pope."

It is not like the duke of Norfolk was denied any such dispensation from Rome, nor are there any dispensations granted in England for marrying in the forbidden degrees: cousin-germans are the nearest that may marry. The obtaining a license for that at Rome is a matter of course, so the fees are but paid; and the law allows that to all in England. Nor are there any dispensations in matrimonial matters except concerning the time, the place, or the asking of bans; and it is not likely these were ever denied to any at Rome. As for his long excursion concerning that duke's death, it not falling within the compass of my history, I shall not follow him in it.

10. He says, page 266, "The protestants desired a public disputation: so the queen commanded the bishops to make ready for it; they refused it a great while, since that seemed to make the faith of the church subject to the judgment of the ignorant laity; but at last they were forced to yield to it, and the points were, communion in both kinds, prayer in a known tongue, and the like."

The act of council has it otherwise: by it we see that the archbishop of York, being then a privy-councillor, did heartily agree to it, and undertook that the rest of his brethren should follow the orders that were made by the council concerning it; though it is not to be denied but some of the bishops were secretly dissatisfied with it, as they had good reason, since a public disputation was like to lay open the weakness of their cause, which was never so safe as when it was received in gross, without descending to troublesome enquiries concerning it. The communion in both kinds was not one of the articles.

11. He says, page 266, "Bacon, a layman, was judge, the archbishop of York sitting next to him, only for form's sake."

Bacon was not judge; the whole privy-council were present to order the forms of the debate; and he, as the first of that board, did only give directions, according to the order that had been formerly agreed on.

12. He says, page 226, "On the 3rd of April they disputed, but there was nothing done with order or justice; the time was spent in declamations, while the profane judge directed all things at his pleasure, so that it came to nothing."

It is true, the order was broken; but it had been unkindly done of our author to tell by whom. The papists refused the first day to give their reasons in writing, as had been agreed on before, and as was accordingly done by the reformed; and upon the second day they refused to proceed, unless, contrary to what had been concluded, the reformed should read their papers first: so the disputation broke up, it appearing evidently that the one side were not afraid of a public hearing, but that the other were.

The Conclusion.

I pursue these calumnies no further, because I cannot offer a confutation of them without a larger digression, since I break off my history in the second year of this reign, so that I cannot refer the reader to those more copious accounts given by me, as I have done in the former remarks, where a short hint was sufficient. And I do not judge it worth the while to enter into such a full search of these matters as a confutation would require, only to expose Rishton. These evidences which I have given of his ignorance and injustice will satisfy impartial readers; and I am out of hopes of convincing those that are so wedded to an interest, that they are resolved to believe all that is said of their side, how improbable soever it may appear, or how slenderly soever it may be proved.

And now I hope the reformation of this church appears in its true colours, and the calumnies by which its adversaries have endeavoured so long to disgrace it, are so evidently confuted, that they will be no more supported by their own side, nor so tamely assented to by any that in their hearts may perhaps love the reformation, and yet are too easily prevailed on to drink in the prejudices that are raised by the confidence with which those slanders have been vented. Now, the matter is better understood, and though at this distance, and after the rasure of records made in queen Mary's reign, it must be acknowledged that there are many things either quite past over or so defectively related by me, that this work wants that perfection which were to be desired. Yet notwithstanding all these disadvantages, besides the faults of style, method, or way of expression which may be more justly put to my account, though having done it in the best manner I could, I have little to answer for but the presumption of undertaking a design too high for me to perform with that life and perfection that such a subject required; and even in that I rather submitted to the authority of others who engaged me in it, than vainly fancied myself able to accomplish it; but after all those allowances that are necessary, of which there can none be more sensible than myself, I am not out of hope but this work may have some good effect on such as shall read it impartially and with candour; and that those who are already of our church shall be induced to like it the better, when they see what the beginnings of our reformation were: and those who are not of our communion may the more easily be brought into it, when they see by what steps and upon what reasons the changes were made: and if this success follows my poor endeavours, I shall think my time and pains have been well employed.

I am apprehensive enough of the faults I may be guilty of; but I shall now give the reader such an assurance of my readiness to correct them, as soon as I am convinced of them, that I hope if anything occurs to any that deserves censure, they will communicate it first to myself; and if I do not, upon better information, retract what I have written, then I shall allow them to make it public in what manner they please. And it may be presumed I will not be for the future unwilling to do this, by the following account of the mistakes which I made in the former part, communicated to me by Mr. Fulman*, of whom I made mention in the preface. With these I conclude this work.

* The corrections sent to the author by Mr. Fulman and others have been in this edition either given in the form of notes, or embodied in the text.—Ed.

The First Letter of Cardinal Wolsey, to King Henry, about his Election to the Popedom upon Adrian's Death.

[From the Originals lent me by Sir William Cook.]

SIR, it may like your highnesse to understand I have this houre received letters from your orators resident in the court of Rome, mentioning how the xvth day of this instant moneth it pleased Almighty God to call the pope's holynesse to his mercy, whose soul our Lord pardon. And in what trayn the matters there were at that time for election of the future pope, your highnesse shall perceive by the letters of your said orators, which I send unto the same at this tyme, wherby appeareth that mine absence from shall be the onely obstacle (if any be) in the of me to that dignity ; albeit there is no great semblance that the college of cardinals shall consent upon any being there present, because of the sundry factions that be among themselves, for which cause, tho afore God, I repute myself right unmeet and unable to so high and great dignity, desiring much rather to demure, continue and end my life with your grace, for doing of such service as may be to your honour and wealth of this your realm, than to be X popes ; yet nevertheless, remembering what mind and opinion your grace was of, at the last vacation, to have me preferred thereunto, thinking that it should be to the honour, benefit, and advancement of your affaires in time coming : and supposing verily that your highnesse persisteth in the same mind and intent, I shall devise such instructions, commissions, and other writings, as the last time was delivered to Mr. Pace for that purpose: and the same I shall send to your grace by the next post, whom it may like to do farther therein as shall stand with your gracious pleasure, whereunto I shall always conform my self accordingly. And to the intent it may appear farther to your grace what mind and determination they be of towards mine advancement, which, as your orators wrote, have now at this present time the principal authority and chief stroke in the election of the pope, making in manner "Triumviratum," I send unto your highnesse their several letters to me addressed in that behalf, beseeching our Lord that such one may be chosen as may be to the honour of God, the weal of Christ's church, and the benefit of all Christendom. NUMBER VIII.

The Second Letter of Cardinal Wolsey to the King, about the Succession to the Popedom.

SIR,—It may like your grace to understand that ensuing the tenor of my letter sent unto your highnesse yesterday, I have devised such commissions and letters to be sent unto your counsellors the bishop of Bath, Mr. Richard Pace, and Mr. Thomas Hanibal, jointly and severally, as at the last time of vacation of the papall dignity were delivered unto the said Mr. Richard Pace, for the preferment either of me, or that failing of the cardinal de Medici unto the same, which letters and commissions if it stand with your gracious pleasure to have that matter set forth, it may like your highnesse of your benign grace and goodness to signe, so to be sent to the court of Rome in such diligence as the importance of the same, with the brevity of the time, doth necessarily require. And to the intent also that the emperor may the more effectually and speedily concurre with your highnesse for the furtherance hereof, albeit I suppose verily that ensuing the conference and communications which he hath had with your grace in that behalf, he hath not pretermitted before this time to advance the same, yet nevertheless for the more acceleration of this furtherance to be given thereunto, I have also devised a familiar letter in the name of your grace to be directed unto His majesty, which if it may please your highnesse to take the payne for to write with your own hand, putting thereunto your secret sign and mark, being between your grace and the said emperor, shall undoubtedly do singular benefit and furtherance to your gracious intent and vertuous purpose in that behalf. Beseeching Almighty God that such effect may ensue thereof as may be to his pleasure, the contentation of your highnesse, the weal and exaltation of your most royal estate, realm, and affaires; and howsoever the matter shall chance, I shall no lesse knowledge my self obliged and bounden farr above any my deserts unto your highnesse, then if I had attained the same, whereunto I would never in thought aspire, but to do honour, good, and service unto your noble person and this your realm. And thus Jesu preserve your most noble and royal estate. At the More, the first day of October, by

The Third Letter of Cardinal Wolsey; giving an Account of the Election of Cardinal Medici to the Popedom.

SIR,—After my most humble and lowly recommendations, this shall be onely to advertise your highnesse that after great and long altercations and contrariety which hath depended between the cardinals in the conclave, they at the last fully resolved and determined (the faction of France abandoned) to elect and choose either my lord cardinal de Medici or me, which deliberation coming to the knowledge of the nobles and citizens of Rome, they alledging that the affairs of Italy being in the trayn as they then were, it should be to the extreme danger thereof to choose a person absent, which could not ne might in time come to put remedy unto the same, made sundry great exclamations at the conclave-window, whereby the cardinal's being in fear not only of the inconvenience like to ensue unto Italy, but also of their own persons, albeit they were in manner principally bent upon me, yet for eschewing of the said danger and murmur, by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, without further difficulty or businesse the sixth day of the last month in the morning elected and chose the said cardinal de Medici, who immediately was published pope, and hath taken the name of Clement VII. Of which good and fortunate news, sir, your highnesse hath much cause to thank Almighty God: forasmuch as not onely he is a perfect and faithful friend to the same, but that also much the rather by your means he hath attained to this dignity. And for my part, as I take God to record, I am more joyous thereof than if it had fortuned upon my person, knowing his excellent qualities, most meet for the same; and how great and sure a friend your grace and the emperor be like to have of him, and I so good a father, by whose assumption unto that dignity, not only your and the said emperor's affairs, but also of all Christendom shall undoubtedly come to much better and more prosperous perfection: like as upon the first knowledge thereof the Frenchmen be clearly departed from Milan, and passed a river towards France called Ticino, trusting that the next news which shall come from thence shall be of their arrival at home, wherin as I shall have further knowledge, so I shall advertise your highnesse thereof accordingly; and thus Jesu preserve your most noble and royal estate. At my poor house besides Westminster the vith day of December, by

Your most humble chaplayn,

T. CAR'LIS. EBOR.

CATERUM Theologus quidam frater hoc dicto in Sacerdotes ac Monachos adeo est exhilaratus, ut jam ipse quoque cæperit ludere, homo aliqui prope ad torvitatem gravis. At ne sic quidem, inquit, extricaberis à mendicis, nisi nobis quoque prospereris fratribus. Atqui, inquit, parasitus, hoc jam curatum est. Nam Cardinalis egregie prospexit vobis quum statueret de coerhendis, atque opere exercendis erroneis. Nam vos estis errone maximi. Hoc quoque dictum, quum conjectis in Cardinalem oculis, eum viderent non abnuere, cæperunt omnes non illibenter arripere, excepto fratre. Nam is (neque equidem miror) tali perfusus aceto, sic indignatus est, atque incanduit, ut nec à conviciis quidem potuerit temperare: Hominem vocavit nebulonem, detractorem, susurroneum, et filium perditionis, minas interim terribiles citans è scriptura sacra. Jam scurra serio scurrari cœpit. Et erat planè in sua Palæstra. Noli, inquit, irasci bone frater, scriptum est, in patientia vestra possidebitis animas vestras. Rursum frater (referam enim ipsius verba) non irascor, inquit, furcifer, vel saltem non pecco. Nam Psalmista dicit, Irascimini et nolite peccare. Admonitus deinde frater à Cardinale suaviter, ut suos affectus compesceret. Non domine, inquit, ego loquor nisi ex bono zela, unde dicitur, zelus domus tuæ comedit me. Et canitur in ecclesiis, Irrisores Helizei, dum descendit domum Dei, zelum calui sentiunt, sicut fortasse sentiet iste derisor, scurra, ribaldus. Facis inquit Cardinalis, bono fortassis affectu, sed mihi videris facturus, nescio an sanctius, certe sapientius, si te ita compares, ne cum homine stulto et ridiculo, ridiculum tibi certamen instituas. Non domine inquit, non facerem Sapientius nam Solomon ipse Sapientissimus dicit: Responde stulto secundum stultitiam ejus, sicut ego nunc facio, et demonstro ei foveam in quam cadet, nisi bene præcaveat. Nam si multi irrisores Helizei, qui erat tantum unus caluus, denserunt zelum calui, quanto magis sentiet unus derisor multorum fratrum, in quibus sunt multi calui? Et etiam habemus bullam Papalem, per quam omnes qui derident nos sunt excommunicati.

[Cotton. Library, Vitellius, B. 9. P. 146.]

We dayly and howerly musing and thinking on your grac's gret and secrete affayre, and howe the same may come to good effecte and desired ende, aswel for the deliverance of your grace out of the thrauld, pensif, and dolorous lif that the same is in, as for the continuance of your helth and the suertie of your realme and succession, considering also that the pope's consent, or his holines deteyned in captivite, the auctorite of the cardinals nowe to be convoked into France equivalent thereunto, must concurre for approbation of such processe as I shal make in that behalf; and that if the queene shal fortune, which it is to be supposed she will doe, eyther appele or utterly decline from my jurisdiction (one of the said auctorites is also necessarily requisite) I have noon other thought ne studye but howe in avaylable maner the same may be attayned. And after long discussion and debating with my self, I finally am reduced and resolved to two points: the oon is, that the poppe's consent cannot be obtayned and had in this case, oonles his delyveraunce out of captivite be first procured; the other is, that the cardinals canne nothing doe in this behalfe, oonless there be by them consultation and order taken, what shall be doon in administratione rerum ecclesiasticarum durante dicta captivitate summi pontificis.

As touching the restitution of the pope to libertie, the state of the present affaires considered the most prompt, sure, and reedy waye is, by conclusion of the peace betwixt the emperor and the French king: for the advancement and setting forward whereof I shall put myself in extreme devour, and by al possible meanes induce and persuade the said French king to strayne himself and condescende to asmuch of the emperour's demands as may stande with reason and suertie of his and your grac's affayres; moving him further, that forasmuch as the emperour taketh your highnes as a mediator making fayre demonstration in words, that he wil at your contemplation and arbitre, not oonly declare the botom of his mynde concerning his demaund, but also remitte and relent in the same, he wil be contented that your grace forbering the intimacion of hostile maye in the managing of the said peace and inducyng the emperour to reasonable conditions, be so taken and reputed of him, without any outward deblaration to the contrary untill such tyme as the conducyng of the said peace shalbe clerely desperate: whereby if the said French king canne be induced thereunto, maye in the meane season use the benefit of their entercourse in the emperour's Lowe-Countries: not omitting nevertheles for the tyme of solliciting the said peace, the diligent zeal and effectual execution of the sworde by Monseur de Lautrek in the parties of Italy: wherby your grac's said mediation shal be the more set by and regarded.

And in case the said peace cannot be by these means brought to effecte, wherupon might ensue the pope's delyveraunce, by whose auctorite and consent your grac's affayre shuld take most sure, honorable, effectual, and substancial ende, and who I doo not, considering your grac's gratitude, wold facylly be induced to doe all things therein that might be to your grace's good satisfaction and purpose, thienne and in that case there is noone other remedy but the convocation of the said cardinals, who, as I am enformed, will not nor canne conveniently convene in any other place but at Avinion, where the administration of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction hath been in semblable cases heretofore exercised. To the which place, if the said cardinals canne be induced to come, your highnes being soo contented, I purpose also to repare, not sparing any labour, travayl, or payne in my body, charges or expense, to doe service unto your grace in that behalfe, according to my most bounden dutie and hartly desyre, there to consulte and devise with them for the governance and administration of the auctorite of the church during the said captivite, which shall be a good grounde and fundament for the effectual execution of your grac's secrete affayre.

And for asmuch as thus reparing to Avinion I shall be nere to the emperour's confines, and within an hundred myles of Perpinian, which is a commodious and convenient place to commex and treat with the emperor's persone, I think in my poor opinion that the conducting of peace by your grace's mediation not being desperate, nor intimation of hostile made on your behalfe, it should much conferre aswell for the delyverance of the poepe as for concluding of the peace between the French king and the emperor, if his majestie canne be soe contented that a meating might be between him, my lady the French kinge's modre, and me at the said Perpinian; to the which—

A Letter written by King Henry VIII. to Cardinal Wolsey, recalling him home.

[Among S. W. Cook's Papers.]

MY LORD,—This shall be to thank you of your great paines and travaile which you have sustained since your departure hence, for our busynesse and causes: wherin you have done to us no little honour, pleasure, and profit, and to our realm an infinite goodness; which service cannot be by a kind master forgotten, of which fault I trust I shall never be accused, specially to youward which so laboriously do serve me. Furthermore, because as yet since the pope's captivity we never sent to salute him, nor have no man resident there to advertize us of the affaires there; and also lest the queene should prevent us by the emperor's means in our great matter; we think it meet to send this bearer thither, of whose truth and sincerity we have had long proof, praying you to give him such instructions and commissions as shall be for our affairs there requisite; and that with convenient diligence, to the intent our affairs there may have some stay. No more at this time, but that greatly I desire your return home, for here we have great lack of you, and that you give full credence to my secretary this bearer. Written with the hand of your loving sovereign lord and friend,

NUMBER XIV.

A Letter from Rome by Gardiner to King Henry, setting forth the Pope's Artifices.—An Original.

[Paper-Office.]

PLEASETH it your majestie to be advertised that endeavoring our selfs to the best of our powers al joyntely and I my self aparte applying al my poore wit and lernyng to atteyne at the pope's hande sum parte of the accompyshement of your highnes' desires, finally have nothing prevayled; but now see it called in question, whether the auctorite given to the legats there shulde be revoked or noe. The circumstance wherof, and what hath been doon and said therein, your highnes shall understande by our commen letters which we have written to my lorde legat's grace, but to saye as I conjecture I think that matier was moved but for a stop of our other suts, and that it is not earnestly ment: and albeit there is mencion of the queen in that matier as thowe she should have a procter for the same, yet the pope, two dayes before, in an other communication, said that the emperor had advertised him, how the queen wolde do nothing in this matier, in saying nor speaking to any man for the let, delaye, or hindrance of this matier, but as your highnes shall wil and command her to doe; and that the emperor said, he would therefore more earnestly looke unto the cause himself. I marveled much when the pope said this, and me thought he spoke it as though he wolde we shuld signifie the same unto your highnes, and I noted it the more, for because your highness had commanded me to enquire out who shuld be here the queen's proctor; and it semed spoken for the nones, as to put me out of doubt therof. But whither the pope hath this written out of Spayne or out of Englande, I wot not what to saye. But it seemed strange to us to rede in cardinal Campegnis's letters, that neyther he nor Campanus made on the pope's behalfe any promyse to your highnes, but only in general terms, cqsidering that upon these special terms de plenitudine potestatis, and trust that the pope wolde use that in your highnes' cause, I was sent hither, like as in my instructions is conteyned: which failing, your highness I doubt not right well remembreth how master Wolman, Mr. Bell, and I showed your highnes such things as wer to be required, not to be impetrable: my trust is that your highnes wil accept in good part my true harte and good will, which according to my most bounden duty shall never want, but be holly applied where your highnes shall command without respeck or regard of any other lvyng creature, being very sory to see your highnes' cause handled in this sorte. But your highnes hath so much vertue in you, wherof God is to be thanked, as may suffice to converte other men's faults into goodness, to your highnes gret glory, renowne, and immortal fame: which is all that canne be said after my poor witt herin, considering that your highnes hath been not well handled, nor according to your merits by the pope, or sum other: it becometh not me to arrecte the blame certainly to any man. And the pope shewith cardinal Campegnis's letters for his discharge, which thing your highnes shall much better judge and consider by your high wisdom thenne I canne write, most humbly desiring your highnes that being in these termes with the pope's holynesse, we may know of your highness what to say further.

As touching the bulles to be here impetracte for your highness, I have spoken with the pope's holynes, and he is content in all points to grant as I required him, saying in that matier de animadversione in clericos, to the which he wolde not absolutely assent, but said he wolde with the cardinal Sanctorum quatuor devise that shuld be to your highnes' satisfaction: wishing then that he might grante as easly our other petitions, which he knoweth your highnes to have more to harte, as he may these, adding by and by that he would for the welth of Christendom, the queen wer in her grave: and as he thought the emperor wolde be thereof most glad of al: saying also that he thought like as the emperor hath destroyed the temperaltis of the church, soe shall she be the cause of the destruction of the spiritualties. Making exclamation of his misfortune in whose persone these two adversites shuld chaunce, and upon the occasion of that familie. Whenne we speak with him, we think we shuld have all things, and in the ende his counsaill denyeth all: by reason the cardinall Sanctorum quatuor hath been sick, and is every other day sikely, and for the most parte when the cardinall is hol the pope is sike, we have yet no expedition of the said bulles, trusting that your highnes will have consideration of these letts, accordingly praying Almighty God to preserve your most noble and royall estate. From Rome the 4th daye of Maye.

BY THE KYNG.—Trusty and well-beloved, we grete you well. And wheras in the matter of matrimony between us and the queene, upon consultation had with the grettest clerks of Christendom, as well withoute this our realme, as within the same, they have in a grete nombre affermed unto us in writing, and therunto subscribed their names, that, “ducere uxorem fratris mortui sine liberis sit prohibitum jure Divino et naturali,” which is the chefe and principall point in our cause. We therefore desire to knowe and understand your myndes and oppynions in that behalf, and nothinge dowtinge, but like as ye have always founde us to you and that our universitie, favourable, benevolent, and glad to extend our auctoritie for your wealth and benefite, whan ye have required the same, ye will now likewise not omytt to doo any thyng wherby ye shulde mystre unto us gratuite and pleasour, and specially in declaration of the truth, in a cause so near touching us your prince and souveraine lorde, our soule, the wealth also and benefite of this our realm, have sent hither purely for that our purpose, our trusty and right well-beloved clerks and counsaillors, mayster doctor Gardyner our secretary, and mayster Fox, who shall on our behaulf further open and declare unto you the circumstances of the premiss: wherfore we will and require you, not oonly to gyve ferme credence unto them, but also to advertise us by the same under the comen seale of that our universitie of such oppynion in the proposition aforesayd, as shall be ther concluded, and by the consent of lerned men shall be agreed upon. Quoniam auditis, perpensis, ac post publicam super dicta quæstione disputationem matura deliberatione discussis, hæc in quæstione prædicta alterutram partem statueret et convellere possint; Illa nobis probabiliora, validiora, veriora, etiam et certiora, ac genuinum et syncerum Sacræ Scripturæ intellectum præ se ferentia, Interpretum etiam sententiis magis consona visa sunt, quæ confirmant et probant, jure Divino et naturali prohibitum esse, ne Frater uxorem fratris mortui sine liberis accipiat in conjugem: Illis igitur persuasi, et in unam opinionem convenientes, ad Quæstionem prædictam ita respondendum decrevimus, et in hiis scriptis, nomine totius universitatis respondemus, ac pro Conclusionem nobis solidissimis rationibus et validissimis argumentis comprobata affirmamus, quod ducere uxorem Fratris mortui sine liberis, cognitam à priori viro per Carnalem copulam, nobis Christianis hodie est prohibitum jure Divino ac naturali. Delivered by me W. B. Vicechancellor in the Chamber of Presence, post vespers.

Your Universitie of Cambridge have them most humbly commended unto your grace, and here they have sent unto your highness their letters. Than kisse them and so deliver them.

Furthermore as touching your request expressed in your letters dyrected unto them by Mr. Secretary and Mr. Fox, your most wise counsaillers in the accomplishing of the same, they have done their devors, and here in writing under their comon seale, they have sent unto your grace ther sentence, desyring the same to accept, and to take it in parte and good worthe. And if they had any thing ellys to gratify your grace wythall, their lettres and their studies, your highness should be suer therof to the uttermost of their powers.

M. S. C. C. C. Given to the college by Dr. Jegon, master.

To the Right Worshipfull Master Doctor Edmonds, Vicar of Alborne in Wiltshire.

My duty remembered, I hartly commend me unto you, and I let you understand, that Dominica Secunda ad afternoon, I came to Wyndsor, and also to part of Mr. Latymer's sermon, and after the end of the same I spake with Mr. Secretary, and also with Mr. Provost, and so after even-song I delivered your letters in the Chamber of Presence, all the court beholding. The king with Mr. Secretary did there read them, but not the letters of determination, notwithstanding that I did there also deliver them, with a proposition. His highness gave me there great thanks, and talked with me a good while. He much lauded our wisdomes and good conveyance in the matter, with the great quietness in the same. He shewed me also what he had in his hands for our university, according unto that that Mr. Secretary did express unto us, &c. So he departed. But by-and-by he greatly praised Mr. Latimer's sermon, and in so praising said on this wise: This displeaseth greatly Mr. Vicechancellor yonder. Yon same, said he unto the duke of Norfolk, is Mr. Vicechancellor of Cambridge, and so pointed unto me. Then he spake secretly unto the said duke, which after the king's departure came unto me, and welcomed me, saying amongst other things, that the king would speak with me on the next day; and here is the first act. On the next day, I waited until it was dinner time; and so at the last Dr. Butt came unto me, and brought a reward, twenty nobles for me, and five marks for the younger proctor which was with me; saying that I should take that for a resolute answer, and that I might depart from the court when I would. Then came Mr. Provost, and when I had shewed him of the answer, he said, I should speak with the king at after-dinner for all that, and so brought me into a privy place, where as he would have me to wait at after-dinner. I came thither and he both, and by one of the clock the king entered in. It was in a gallery. There were Mr. Secretary, Mr. Provost, Mr. Latimer, Mr. Proctor, and I, and no more: the king there talked with us until six of the clock. I assure you he was scarce contented with Mr. Secretary and Mr. Provost that this was not also determined, An Papa possit dispensare, &c. I made the best, and confirmed the same that they had shewed his grace before, and how it would never have been so obtained. He opened his minde, saying, that he would have it determined at after Ester, and of the same was counsailed a while.

I pray you therefore study for us, for our business is not yet at an end, An Papa potest dispensare cum Jure Divino, &c. Much other communication we had, which were too long here to recite. Thus his highness departed, casting a little holy water of the court: and I shortly after toke my leave of Mr. Secretary and Mr. Provost, with whom I did not drink, ne yet was bidden, and on the morrow departed from thence, thinking more than I did say, and being glad that I was out of the court, where many men, as I did both hear and perceive, did wonder at me. And here shall be an end for this time of this fable.

All the world almost crieth out of Cambridge for this act, and specially on me; but I must bear it as well as I may. I have lost a benefice by it, which I should have had within these ten dayes. For there hath one false in Mr. Throckmorton's gift, which he hath faithfully promised unto me many a time, but now his mind is turned and alienate from me. If ye go to the court at after-Ester, I pray you have me in remembrance there, as ye shall think best. But of this no more.—Mr. Latymer preacheth still, quod amuli ejus graviter ferunt. I am informed that Oxford hath now elected certain persons to determine the king's question. I hear say also that Mr. Provost was there in great jeopardy. Other tidings I have none at this time, but that all the company be in good health, and heartily saluteth you. And thus fare you heartily well. At Cambridge, in Crastino Dominic. Palmarum.

Your own to his power,

WILLIAM BUCKMASTER.

The king willed me to send unto you, and to give you word of his pleasure in the said question.

NUMBER XVII.

Three Letters written by king Henry to the University of Oxford, for their opinion in the cause of his Marriage.

[Ex MS. D. Kennet.]

Letter I.

BY THE KING.—Trusty and well-beloved subjects, we greet you well. And whereas we have, for an high and weighty cause of ours, not only consulted many and substantial well-learned men within our realm and without, for certaine considerations our conscience moving, we think it also very convenient to feel the minds of you amongst you in our university of Oxford, which be erudite in the faculty of divinity, to the intent we may perceive of what conformity ye be with the others, which marvelously both wisely and substantially have declared to us their intent and mind: not doubting but that ye, for the allegiance and fidelity that ye are bound unto us in, will as sincerely and truly without any abuse declare your minds and conscience in this behalf, as any of the other have done. Wherefore we will and command you, that ye not leaning to wilfull and sinister opinions of your own several minds, not giving credence to misreports and sinister opinions or perswasions, considering we be your sovereigne leige lord, totally giving your true mind and affection to the true overture of divine learning in this behalf, do shew and declare your true and just learning in the said cause, like as ye will abide by; wherein ye shall not only please Almighty God, but also us your leige lord. And we for your so doing shall be to you and our university there so good and gracious a sovereigne lord for the same, as ye shall perceive it well imploied to your well fortune to come; in case you do not uprightly according to divine learning hand your selves herein, ye may be assured, that we, not without great cause, shall so quickly and sharply look to your unnaturall misdemeanour herein, that it shall not be to your quietness and ease hereafter. Wherefore we heartily pray you, that according both to duty to God and your prince, you sett apart all untrue and sinister informations, and accommodate yourselves to the meer truth as it becommeth true subjects to do; assuring you that those that do, shall be esteemed and set forth, and the contrary neglected and little set by. Trusting that now you know our mind and pleasure, we shall see such conformitie among you, that we shall hereof take great consolation and comfort, to the great allevation of our conscience; willing and commanding you among you to give perfect credence to my lord of Lincolne, our confessor in this behalfe and matter: and in all things which he shall declare unto you or cause to be declared in our behalfe, to make unto us either by him or the authentick letters full answer and resolution, which your duty's well remembred, we doubt not but that it shall be our high contentation and pleasure. Given under, &c.

Letter II.

BY THE KING.—Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. And of late being informed, that a great part of the youth of that our university, with contentious factions and manner, daily combining together, neither regarding their duty to us their sovereigne lord, nor yet conforming themselves to the opinions and orders of the vertuous, wise, sage, and profound learned men of that university, wilfully to stick upon the opinion to have a great number of regents and non-regents to be associate unto the doctors, proctors, and batchelors of divinity, for the determination of our question; which we believe hath not been often seen, that such a number of right small learning, in regard to the other, should be joined with so famous a sort, or in a manner stay their seniors in so weighty a cause: which as we think should be no small dishonour to our university there, but most especially to you the seniors and rulers of the same, assuring you that this their unnatural and unkind demeanour is not only right much to our displeasure, but much to be marvelled of, upon what ground and occasion they being our meere subjects, should shewe themselves more unkind and wilfull in this matter, than all other universities, both in this and all other regions do. Finally, we trusting in the dexterity and wisdom of you and other the said discreet and substantial learned men of that university, be in perfect hope, that ye will conduce and frame the said young persons unto good order and conformity, as it becommeth you to do. Wherefore we be desirous to hear with incontinent diligence, and doubt you not we shall regard the demeanour of every one of the university, according to their merits and deserts. And if the youth of the university will play masteries, as they begin to do, we doubt not but that they shall well perceive, that non est bonum irritare crabrones. Given under, &c.

Letter III.

To our Trusty and Well-beloved the Commissary-Regents and Non-Regents of our University of Oxon.

Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. And whereas by sundry our letters, sent and delivered at sundry times by the hands of our counsellors unto you, with credence declared unto you by the same, we have only required and made instance unto you, for the obtaining of that which at the least desire of any Christian man ye be bound and obliged to do; that is to say, to declare and shew your opinions and sentence in such a doubt, as upon the dissolution and determination whereof dependeth the tranquility, repose, and quiet of our conscience, we cannot a little marvell that you neither having respect to our estate, being your prince and soveraigne lord; nor yet remembering such gratuities and benefits as we have always shew'd unto you, as well to the particular wealth of diverse as to the common body of that our university, without any correspondency shew'd on their behalfe againe, have hitherto delay'd and deferr'd not only to send us your determination and resolution to our demand and question, but also refused to take order, or enter into any way or meane, whereby you might declare or shew unto us, that ye be of mind and determination to endeavour your selfe for an accomplishment of our desire in that behalfe. And so much the more marvell we at this your manner of delays, that our university of Cambridge hath within far shorter time not only agreed upon the fashion and manner to make answers unto us effectually, and with diligence following the same; but hath also eight days since sent unto us their answers under common seale, plainly determining, "prohibitionem esse Divini et naturalis juris, nē frater uxorem fratris etiam mortui sine liberis ducat uxorem." For the searching of the truth in which matter, if ye had before this time condescended upon the manner and fashion convenient in that behalfe, we could then have taken any delay afterward, upon any other cold pretence made, but in good part: whereas now the refusing to agree upon any such order, and denying to do that which should be but the entrie into the matter for declaration of your forwardness, good will, and diligence: we can't otherwise think of you, but that you neither behave your selves towards us, as our merits towards you have deserved, as good subjects to a kind prince and soveraigne lord; as by the learning ye professe, ye be obliged and bound. Wherefore revolving this in our mind, and yet nevertheless considering you to be there by our authority and grant, as a body politique, in the ruling whereof in things to be done in the name of the whole, the number of the private suffrages doth prevaile, and being loth to shewe our displeasure, whereof we have so great cause ministered unto us, unto the whole in general; whereas the fault perchance consisteth and remaineth but in light and willfull heads; for the tender consideration we bear to learned men, and the great desire we have to nourish, maintaine, and favour those that are good; have thought convenient to send unto you these letters by our trusty and right well-beloved clarke and counsellor, Mr. Edwarde Fox, trusting verily that ye which be heads and rulers there, well considering and weighing your duties in the accomplishment of our request, for the searching the truth in such a cause, as touching your prince and soveraigne lord, our soul, and the wealth of this our realme: and your great lack and blame with just cause of high displeasure to be worthily conceiv'd by us in the denyall and slack doing thereof, will so order and accomodate the fashion, and passing such things as should proceed from that university in this case, as the number of the private suffrages given without reason, prevaile not against the heads, rulers, said sage fathers, to the detriment, hindrance, and inconvenience of the whole. But so to examine, try, and weigh the opinions and minds of the multitude, as the importance of the matter doth require: wherein we doubt not but your body is established in such wise, that there be left waies and means to the heads and rulers how to eschew and avoid such inconveniences, when they shall chance: as we trust ye that be heads and rulers for the comprobation and declaration of particular good minds, ye will not faile to do accordingly, and so by your diligence to be shew'd hereafter, to redeem the errors and delays past. The favour we beare to the maintenance of learning, we would be very glad, as our said well-beloved councillor can shew unto you on our behalfe; unto whom we will you give firme credence. Given under our signet at our castle of Windsor.

Copy of the King's Letters to the Bishop of Rome.

[Ex MSS. Rymeri.]

ETS; videamus vel temporum vel Hominum iniquitate fieri, ut postulata nostra, quantumvis equa ac naturali ratione subnixā, parum expediatur, nihil etiam proficere, in causa nostra justissima, Charissimi fratris et Consanguinei ac perpetui Confederati nostri, Christianissimi Regis Amicissimas preces; Nobilium autem nostrorum intercessionem non modo contemni, sed etiam derideri, quod eos equo animo non laturos existimamus. Denique re ipsa nihil prestari quod nos afflictos atque vexatos sublevet; hæc omnia, licet apertius cernamus quam velimus, tum autem ex Oratoribus nostris quos apud vos habemus, tum à vestro isthic Oratore cognoscamus; est tamen spei opinionisque nostræ tam diversus exitus ut subinde cogitantibus nobis ac memoria repetentibus omnes causæ nostræ circumstantias, porro autem singula Conferentibus que precesserunt queque secuta sunt, fidem factorum, dictorum atque responsorum vestræ Sanctit. in hac causa nostra quam aliqui certam et firmam, fide dignorum Oratorum et vestrorum et nostrorum relatio constituit, ipsa ratio Communis labefactet atque convellat; atque in re certissima tam dubium reddit ut certo interdum non credamus Sanct. vest. fecisse que fecisse cognoscimus quum ea facere non debuisset in-telligamus. Nam ut omittamus ea quæ longius precesserunt, quod nuperime efflagitavimus de dandis in Anglia Judicibus, quis credidisset Sanctitatem vestram negare voluisse; longe aliter sperabamus nos. Aliter certe credidit Christianissimus Rex qui nobiscum una id petiit: Aliter crederent sui Consilarii, quorum suasu id fecit: Secus crederent nobiles nostri omnes, et omnes omnium ordinum primi viri. Qui ad nostra postulata suas literas adjunxerunt, et quem non ad id adigerit ratio ut crederet Sanctitatem vestram facturam Dei respectu quod debuisset, et in principum gratiam quod inculpate potuisset: debuisset certe permittere sacrosanctis olim Consiliis id definiendum, ut controversia illic terminetur ubi primum nata est. Illic enim Judices et propius vident et cernunt certius: Ut Gloriosissimo Martyri Cypriano placuit. Et Divus Bernardus ad Eugenium scribit bene facis tu quod appellationum negato Suffragio remittis negotia ad cognoscentes et qui noscere citius possunt: ubi enim certior et facilius notio, ibi decisio tutior et expeditior esse potest: potuisset autem Sanctitas vestra nam olim se potuisse ostendit cum Judices ad nos in Angliam mitteret quos postea revocavit. Quod si debuisset quidem quod negari non poterit, et potuisset etiam ut quidem factis antea suis de consilio suorum declaravit, quis dubitaret de voluntate siquidem ut deberet ipsam liberam rectam et certam tenere Sanctitas vestra, non ad aliena arbitria accomodatam ac humanis respectibus inservientem quod res ita se habet ut habet fuerunt aliquando vices nostri, nunc ut videmus aliorum sunt: Non in Lege Domini, sed in rerum vicissitudine meditandem est, ut de vestræ Sanctitatis Manu aliquid auxilii expectemus, sed auxilium nostrum à Domino certum est, et in Domino sperantes non infirmabimur. Nam in conspectu omnium, acta probant voluntatem Sanctitatis vestræ totam Cæsari addictam esse: Illius nutu flecti, ad illius arbitrium attemperari. Si quid petimus, si quid rogamus, quod officii vestri esset, prima ratio est, ut ne quid Cæsari displiceat. Quem ceteri amici habeamus, tamen dominantem in illo naturæ affectum ut improbare omnino non possumus, ita in hac causa nostra iniquiorem nobis non sine causa refugere debemus et recte gravissimam nobis injuriam factam et vestro officio indignissimum dedecus admissum videmus, ut cum Cæsar se in hac causa interposuerit, etiam cum se opposuerit definitioni appellatione interposita, cum se partem publice professus sit, vestra Sanctitas tamen eundem semper consultorem adhibeat: ad illius imperium figat, ac refingat, differat, proroget, mutet et statuat quodcumque temporis rationi opportunum videatur. Et si quid ab adverso dicitur statim creditur: Si quid nos proposuerimus omnino rejicitur, scilicet creditur nunc Regiæ Regnum nostrum Angliæ non esse tutum locum in quo causa iudicetur: Et creditur unicæ allegationi sine testibus contra tam preclara et aperta documenta quæ nos in diversum edidimus, non verbis et assertionibus que fingi possunt, sed rebus ipsis et factis quæ non mentiuntur. Nos enim quanta cum libertate atque impunitate audivimus omnes in nos, liberius etiam quam oportuit, quod videbatur proferentes, nemini unquam aliam opinionem extorsimus, quam que animo videretur suo: diversum à nobis sentientes etiam in cæteris, favore et prosequimur et prosequi sumus. Et tamen, post tot argumenta securitatis, et cum nullum signum adhuc apparuerit cur timere quisquam à nobis merito deberet, credit vestra Sanctitas nudam Regiæ allegationem in diversum. Quo tempore dubitari potuit qualiter essemus laturi quod ageretur et quanta cum equanimitate passuri quod fieret, si quid contra nos fieret. Missi sunt ad nos Judices in Angliam, a Sanctitate vestra, hunc vero cum id amplius factitari non potest, non modo dubitatur sed creditur diversum ejus, quod nos probavimus. Probavimus autem nos Regnum nostrum locum esse tutum in quo causa nostra iudicetur viz. cum hæctenus summam omnibus dicendi libertatem permiserimus. Regina vero tantum allegat diversum, et si quas probationes attulerit, vanæ sint oportet et falsæ nec verisimiles. Quæ quum ita sint, aliud tamen cur Judices non dederit, non respondit Sanctitas vestra, nisi quod Regina allegavit locum suspectum. Et quis crederit Sanctitatem vestram ista nobis respondisse, nec aliud dixisse ne Judices daret in partibus: certe referentium credulitate exigit res vero ipsa negat. Si sequamur quod antea diximus eam persuasionem ut credamus Sanctitatem vestram voluntatem suam ita Cæsari addixisse, ut non ex animi vestri summa prudentia præditi sententia sed ex Cæsaris affectu respondere contendant. Que res facit ut iterum atque iterum repetitis literis Sanctitatem vestram adeamus, expressuri nimirum si quid aliud moverit Sanctitatem vestram cur nostris ultimis desideris non annuerit cupidi etiam literis vestris intelligere cui causæ potissimum, denegando innixa sit. Sic enim expressius et certius mentes invicem et animi nostri sententias communicabimus: Si in causis hiisce gravioribus et postulata et responsa scriptis mandaverimus. Itaque petimus denuo hiis literis a Sanctitate vestra ut causam nostram in Anglia datis Judicibus, illis quos inter oratores tanquam indifferentes et equissimos nominabimus, decidi patiar, atque permittat. De Judicibus autem nullam ut accipimus facit difficultatem Sanctitas vestra, tantum de loco Questio fuit, quum sacra Consilia jam definierunt et Sanctus etiam Cyprianus et Divus Bernardus ut prædiximus, utique convenientissimum affirmant, ut in eo loco causa terminetur ubi primum nata est. Durum certe esset probare nudam Regiæ allegationem de loco suspecto, contra ea Argumenta quæ nos ostendimus. Et facile videt prudentia vestra non levem nobis notam iniuri, ut ea infamia aspergamur, quasi in causa tanti Sacramenti suspecti habere, ne eam ex equo et bono Divinarum legum præscripto intra Regni nostri litem terminari pateremur: Suspicio talis crimen esset etiam in infimo homuncione famosum, in principe viro tanto magis angetur facinoris atrocitas, quanto sublimius consurgit fastigium dignitatis: Nec possumus certe pati, nedum equanimitate ferre, ut de suspicionem tam gravi immerito accusemus, ac sine teste etiam à vestra Sanctitate inique condemnemur. Quæ si communis Patris et Boni pastoris officio fungeretur, in eo potius laboraret ne quid temere cuiquam fiat, et ne sine omni sua culpa ledatur nec immerito notetur. Atque hoc nimirum est Christi vices in Terris gerere, conservandæ Charitatis exempla prebere, ita suum vindicare ne quid alteri detrahatur, ex equo et bono omnia disceptare, plane, simpliciter, et aperte agere, promissa prestare non obliquo ductu, alio tendere quam quo cursum aperte institueras. Hac omnia non ascribimus Sanctitati vestræ, nec de occultis Sacræ Literæ permittunt iudicare, et nos semper temeraria iudicia fugimus, nec in alium libenter admittimus, quod in nos ipsos fieri equanimitate non ferremus. Sed si vestræ Sanctit. oratores, si vestri nuntii, vestri Magistratus, auctore Sanctitate vestra faciunt quod faciunt, cuius Rei certum iudicium Conscientiæ vestræ sit, clara certe verisimilitudo interim elucet: sed si Auctor est vestra Sanctitas, si Conscia est, si facta probat, immo si non improbat aperte, non corrigit: Graviora sunt his que supra memoravimus quæ in Sanctitatem vestram dici possunt, nam quum Sanctitas vestra omnibus modis primum conata est impedire ne quis in Cauca nostra suam sententiam libere proferret, ac deinde post multas longas et varias preces, Justitiæ Administrandæ necessitate adacta, ut suum cuiquæliberum iudicium permitteret, scribendi et dicendi quod suæ Conscientiæ videretur, literis tandem in publicum missis permisit, omnibus liberam in Causa nostrascribendi facultatem: Magistratus interea vestri, vestro etiam nomine, multis gravissime minati sunt, si quis scriperint in Potestatem vestram. Hoc Bononiæ et aliis in locis permultis factum scimus. Cæsaris vero Oratores ubique in Italia, ac vestris presertim ditionibus, contempto vestræ Sanctitatis edicto, indies incessant Terrores, Minas, et cætera quæque Terrimenta inculcare; sciente et volente, vel saltem non impediante sed connivente Sanctitate vestra, his qui in Causa nostra scriperunt ac scriberent, ni revocent atque recantent. Et, qua Conspiratione nescimus effectum est, ut Literarum nostrarum nec liber sit commeatus nec tutus. Christianissimus verò Rex nobis significavit, quomodo Orator vester qui apud illum est, de Causa nostra etiam nomine Sanctitatis vestræ, ut quidem asseruit, in verba pronuntiavit nec veritus est tanto Principi audacter et impudentemteri; ut diceret Causam nostram contra omne jus et fas intendi, nullo jure aut ratione niti. Quæ verba, si ex animi vestri sententia protulit, non semper ex animi sui sententia, et scripsit et locuta est Sanctitas vestra, quæ Causam nostram aliquando justissimam appellavit. Quod si temeritas illius hominis à Sanctitatis vestræ sinceritate remota est, quod libentius vellemus, tamen quum eo munere fungatur, in quo ad mandatorum præscripta agere videatur, saltem aliqua ratione diluenda suspitio est: sicque illis agendum, quos Splendor Dignitatis reddit conspicuos; ne ullam scandalum occasione præstent, his quos in obsequio et amicitia continere cupiant. Nobiscum autem ita agat Sanctitas vestra, ut Naturæ Præcepta non transiliat; si suum sibi integrum servari cupiat, ne nostrum attingat, ne recipiat appellationes ad se in Causa nostra: Et si quas receperit, ne contra justitiam eas tueri studeat; sed secundum justitiam, eas in Regnum remittat; ne exercere conetur inhibitiones suas, in hac Causa contra nos, aut subditos nostros, quos illis modis non convenit deterreri. Sinat Leges et Prerogativas nostras Regniæque nostri Angliæ, nec tempore nec auctoritate vestris cedentes, sua vi procedere: Inhibitiones istas, si quas fecerit, quod non credimus, maturiori Consilio revocet quæ factæ sunt, et cum alieni juris præjudicio, ne deinceps emitat. Summatim autem quod petitur; hoc est, ut ne ad se, neve ad Curiam Romanam, Causæ illius Cognitionem deferri patiatur, quæ intra Regni nostri Limites debet terminari. Nec credat Sanctitas vestra, ut cum Leges certas et fixas habeat hoc Regnum nostrum Angliæ, ne Causæ quæcumque; Regiam Personam, aut Rempubli- cam quouomodo tangentes, extra Regni Limites Judiciis tractentur; vel permissuros nos eas nobis regnantibus infringi et violari; vel passuros Regni nostri Nobiles, tam grave præjudicium huic Regno inferri. Breviter site nil moveat Persona rogantis, moveat saltem Causa rogandi. Rogamus enim nos, quia Naturæ et Rationi consonum est, ut quod nostrum est nobis illibatum conservare studeamus. Rogamus autem Auctoribus Sacrosanctis Consiliis, hoc est, vestris Legibus; viz. ut in sua cujusque Provincia Causa terminetur. Rogamus ex sententia Divorum Cypriani et Bernardi, quibus hoc, ut supra diximus, equum visum est. Denique rogamus, quod Leges nostræ diversum non patiantur, et nos à Contentionibus abhorremus. His certè non annuere non potest Sanctitas vestra, si illum Charitatis fervorem habeat, quem et Titulus Dignitatis præ se fert, et nos etiam habemus. Veruntamen, si hæ Causæ Rogandi Sanctitatem vestram moverint, ut concedat quod justum est, eatenus tamen apud nos valebunt, ne de Sanctitatis vestræ manu patiamur quod injustum est: Nec quisque facile patitur auferri, quod suum est. Et nos etiam in aliena illibenter irruimus, sed à Contentione non abest detrimentum: Et nullius ferè compendio semel natæ Controversiæ transiguntur: Quid animi habeat Sanctitas vestra, quid autem nobis respondere decreverit, rogamus ut per Literas velit significare.

NUMBER XIX.

A Letter of Gr. Cassali, from Compiegne.—An Original.

[Cotton Library, Vitellius, B. 13.]

SERENISSIME et Invictissime Domine mi Supreme, Salutem. Compendium Regem Christianissimum, quemadmodum sibi placere ipse mihi dixerat, sum subsequutus. Cum ejus Majestati duo adhuc agenda supererant: Primum, quia meorum Literis certior factus sum, brevi Pontificem cum Cæsare conveniturum, Literæ ad duos Cardinales, qui Parisiis sunt, ab hoc Rege Christianissimo conscribendæ videbantur; quibus illis mandaret, quo celerius poterint magnis itineribus in Italiam festinent. Itaque veluti à Rege postulavi, ut hujusmodi Literæ exarentur. Deinde valde existimabam necessarium, cum hoc Principe agere, ut duobus Cardinalibus daret in mandatis, ut ante omnes Cardinalis de Monte meminissent. Eique Pensionem annuam, saltem trium millium aureorum, ex quadraginta millibus, quæ mihi dixerat velle in Cardinales distribuere assignarent. Et Rex quidem hoc etiam scribi ad duos Cardinales jussit Secretario Vitandri: Quicum ego postmodo super iis Pensionibus Sermonem habui, cognovique sic in animo Regem habere, ut duo Cardinales quum Romæ fuerint, videant, qui potissimum digni hac Regia sint Liberalitate, in eoque, quum quid in Regno Galliæ Ecclesiasticumicare contigerit, ex meritis unius cujusque Pensione conferantur. Tunc autem nihil in promptu haberi quod Cardinali de Monte dari possit: Verum Regis nomine illi de futuro esse promittendum, quod mihi certe summopere displicuit; et Secretario Vitandri non reticui, ostendens Pollicitationes hujusmodi centies, am Cardinali de Monte factas fuisse; et modo si terum fiant nihil aliud effecturas, nisi ut illius Viri quasi ulcera pertractent id quod Vitandri verum esse fatebatur, pollicitusque est se, quum Rex à Venatu rediisset, velle ei suadere, ut Cardinalem de Monte aliqua presentii Pensione prosequatur; qua quidem te nihil conducibilis aut oportunus fieri posset.

Illud autem novi, quod meorum Literis ex urbe significatur, ad Guronum perscribi. Et D. Benettum ad Dominum Duem Norfolciæ scribere arbitror his Literis, quæ hic mihi reddita sunt, et cum presentibus mitto. Quod autem et Rege Christianissimo cognovi illud est. Constituisse Cæsarem, superioribus diebus, relinquere Ferdinando Fratri viginti millia Peditum, Equitum decem millia; ita ut ipse solveret de suo Stipendia sex millibus Boemorum, et duobus millibus Militum navalium: Quatuor vero millibus Germanorum darentur Stipendia à iberis Germaniæ Civitatibus. At reliquis qui Itatorum erant octo millia, nihil certi Stipendij decernerat; credens illos, quemadmodum in Italia plerumque venire consuevit, aut exigua re, aut ad summum limidio Stipendio acquieturos. Ex decem Equitum millibus, duo millia ex Flammingis, Ordinibus relinquebant. In cæteros Stipendium à Pontifice, ut in illam diem factum fuerat, statuebat. Sed enim Itali Milites, male se tractari existimantes, tumultu factotaliam versus abierunt; quod quum reliqui cognovissent, alij alio domos suas omnes discesserunt. Hujus autem seditionis Crimen in Petrum Mariam Rubeum Comitem Sancti Secundi collatum fuit: Idque quoniam discedentes milites ipsius comitis nomen clamantes ingeminabant: Illum igitur Cæsar comprehendijussit: Et Cardinalem Medices quoque legatum ut ejusdem affinem culpæ detineri, ac paulo post dimitti imperavit: qui primo quoque tempore per equos dispositos abiens Venetias se contulit: Atque hanc quidem rem Pontifex, ut debuit, iniquo animo tulisse dicitur; et de adeo insigni contumelia cum Cæsarianis omnibus est conquestus. Verum, illi quibus modis potuerunt, Cæsarem excusarunt, rogaruntque ut placato sit animo donec Cæsarem ipsum audiat, qui ostendat quicquid fecit in ipsius Pontificis, beneficium fuisse. De conventu Pontificis Cæsarisque pro certo ferre habetur Bononiæ futurum: Et ut ex litteris colligi potest, jam nunc Cæsar Italiam cum duodecim milibus pedum ingressus est: Et Pontifex ab urbe Bononiam versus discedet. Romani enim venerat Petrus Cona Cæsaris legatus ad Pontificem deducendum: Qua de re quum hic certior factus essem, ad Franciscum fratrem meum, qui Romæ est, scripsi, ut Cardinalem de Monte, et alterum amicum nostrum adiret, rogaretque velint cum Pontifice agere, ut quoniam ita festinanter Bononiam contendit, neque ipsos secum ducere potest, promittat se nihil antequam Romam redierit in causa Majestatis vestræ facturum, quum præsertim absque ipsis nihil recte in tanto negotio confici possit. Præterea fratri meo ut idem nonnullis aliis Cardinalibus diceret mandavi: quod si viderit non posse id a Pontifice impetrari, ab ipsis contendat ut Pontificem omnino sequantur, neque ætas decrepita illos moretur, sed quoquo modo sese deferri faciant: Neque velit Cardinalis de Monte, quemadmodum alias fecit, absente Pontifice legatum in urbe remanere, præsertim si, quod firme ab omnibus creditur, Pontifex Bononiæ usque in mensem Martium aut Aprilem est commoraturus. Sed nunc quod scribam omittendum non est. Quum Calctio discedens equum consedissem, Secretarius qui illic erat Nuntii Pontificii, se litteras habere à Nuntio mihi dixit, quibus respondebat ad quandam partem suarum litterarum, que illi meis verbis significarat, velle se omnino ad Pontificem scribere, ne quicquam in causa Majestatis vestræ ante reditum meum ageret, ea enim me allaturum, que sibi rationabiliter placere possent, dummodo nihil super causa factum fuisset. Responsum autem Nuntii illud erat, se in eam sententiam ad Pontificem scripsisse, et de ea ita scripsisse, ut mihi polliceretur, nihil ante quam ego redierim in Majestatis vestræ causa innovatum fore: enimvero me rogavit ut aliquid boni, et quod nostris placere posset afferrem, ne ipse mentitus esse videretur.

Sed de pensione in Cardinalem de Monte conferenda, quoniam postmodo Rex Christianissimus quemadmodum mihi promiserat scribere recusavit, et me rogavit ut adventum magni magistri expectarem, quid sequutum sit Majestas vestra ex Domino Wintoniensis cognosceret, ad quem de hac re abunde scripsi. Felix sit et optime valeat Majestas vestra. Compendii Die xvj. Novemb. M.D. xxxij.

Regia Majestatis.

A Representation made by the Convocation to the King before the Submission.

[Cotton Library, Cleop. F. I.]

FIRST, as concerning such constitutions and ordinances provincial as be to be made hereafter by us, your most humble subjects, we having our especial trust and confidence in your most excellent wisdom, and your princely goodness and fervent zeal to the promotion of Gods honour and Christen religion, and specially in your incomparable learning far exceeding in our judgments the learning of all other kings and princes that we have reed of, and doubting nothing but that the same shall still continue and daily encrease in your majestie, do offer and promise hereunto the same that from henceforth during your highness natural life which we most hertily beseech Almighty God long to preserve, we shall forbear to enact, promulge, or put in execution, any such constitution or ordinance so by us to be made in time coming, unless your highness by your royal assent shall license us to make, promulge, and execute such constitutions, and the same so made shall approve by your highness autorite.

Secoude, whereas your highness honorable commons do pretend that diverse of the constitutions provincial, which have ben heretofore enacted be not only much prejudicial to your highness prerogative royal, but also overmuch onerous to your said commons, we your most humble subjects for the considerations aforesaid, be contented to referr and commit all and singular the said constitutions to the examination and judgment of your grace only: and which soever of the same shall finally be found, thought, and judged by your graces most high wisdom prejudiciall and overmuch onerous as is pretended, we offer and promise your highness to moderate or utterly to abrogate and annull the same, according to the judgment of your grace. Saving us to allowe all such immunities and liberties of this church of England, as hath been granted unto the same by the goodness and benigntie of your highness, and of others your most noble progenitors, with all such constitutions provincial as do stand with the laws of Almighty God and Holy Church, and of your realm heretofore made, which we most humbly beseech your grace to ratifie and approve by your royal assent, for the better execution of the same in times to come, amongst your graces people. Providing also that until your highness pleasure herein shall be further declared unto us, all manner of ordinaries may execute their jurisdictions in like manner and form as they have used the same in times past.

[Cleop. E. 6. P. 252.]

AFTER full due recommendation unto your good mastership, like it the same to wete, that yesterdaie was here with me Mr. Doctor Lee, and shewed unto me the kings most gracious pleasure and your advertisements for my going northwards to the convocation at York. So it is, as I doubt not the said Mr. Doctor Lee knoweth and conceiveth, that I have not a little been sik and diseased, but greatly grieved with a rewme in myn hed, and a catarr fallen into my stomake, by reason whereof, I have had, and yet have a contynuall great cough, I am in truste that my diseas and sicknes is in declination, supposing thereby the sooner to have recovery, and this daye have sent for my horses into Nottingham shir, and truste with the helpe of God to be at York soone after the begynning of the said convocation. Many yeres afore-passed, I have ever been redy to go when I have ben commanded, and yet I have as good a will as ever I had, but myn olde body is now soe ofte cloggd with infirmitie and unweildenes, that it will not aunswer to the effect of my desire and good mynde, yet nevertheles with the good helpe and counsell also of Mr. Bartlot, I shall doe asmuch as I may to make me soe strong as it will be, and have had communycaion at large with the said Mr. Doctor Lee, touching our intended business. I am very glad that he shall be at York at this season, for at the laste convocation where as was graunted unto the kings highness the great some of mony to be paide in heryeres, with the recognising his grace to be supremum Caput, &c. I had very litle helpe, but my self, albeit the kings highness said that he wolde have sent other bookes after me, which came not: soe that therefore the kings causes were the longer in treating and reasonyng or they came to good effect and conclusion; the prelates and clergie there woll not in any wise give firme credence to reporte of any acts that be paste here, onles the same be shewed unto them authentically, either under seale, or otherwise, or the kings most honourable letters addressed accordingly, these two things in myn oppynnyon, must both be done, for without the same, the prelat and clergie of the north parties being farre from knowledge of the kings most high pleasure, woll not for any credence, be hastie to proceed to any strainge acts, but woll esteem their reasons and argyng, to be as effectuell as others be. I write the more at large unto you herryne, bycause, as it shall please you, and as ye shall seem good, the matters that now be intended, may be put in order. Glad I would have been to have comen nowe unto you my self, but I assure you, I dare not as yet come into the open ayre, soe soone as I may, it shall be my firste pilgrimage by the grace of God, who ever preserve you myn one good master. At Maribone this Monday the xxth daye of Aprill.

A Letter of Bonner's upon his reading the King's Appeal to the Pope.—An Original.

[Colton Library, Vitellius B. 14. Fol. 75.]

To the king. From Edmund Bonner at Marseilles.

PLEASETH it your highnes to be advertised, that sythen my last letters sent unto the same of the ivth of this present by Thadens the Curror wherein I declared in what termes were the proceedings here, I was commaunded by my lord of Winchester, and other your highnes ambassadoures here, to intimate unto the popes person, if the same were possible to do, all suche provocations and appelles which your highnes heretofore had made unto the generall councill, and sent thither to be intimated accordinglie. Whereupon desiring Mr. Penyston to take the pains with me unto the popes palace for the expeditions of an acte concerning your highnes, and he right glad and very well content to do the same: I repayred with hym thither the viith of this present, in the mornyng, and albeit that at the begynnyng some resistence and contradiction was made that we shold not come unto the pope, which as then was in manner full readye to come unto the consistorie; and therefore not accustomed with other business to be interrupted, yet in conclusion we came to that chamber where the pope stode bytwene two cardinales, de Medices, and Lorayne, redie apparelled with his stole towards the consistorie. And incontinently upon my comyng thither, the pope, whos sight is incredulous quick, eyed me, and that divers tymes, making a good pause in one place, in which tyme I desired the datary to advertise his holines that I desired to speke with him. And albeit the datarie made no litle difficultie therein thinking the tyme and place not most convenient, yet perceyvyng that upon refusal I wool have goon furthwith to the pope, he advertised the pope of my said desire. And his holynes dismissing as then the said cardinals, and letting his vesture fall went to a wyndowe in the said chamber calling me unto him, at what tyme (doying reverence accustomed) I shew'd unto his holynes how that your highness had given me expresse and straye commandment to intimate unto hym, how that your grace had first solomly provoked, and allso after that appealed unto the generall councill, submitting your self to the tuition and defence thereof, which provocation and appelles I said I had under authentike writings then with me to shewe for that purpose. Declaring that your highnes was moved thus to doo upon reasonable causes and grounds expressed in the said provocation and appelles, and yet nevertheless soo tempering your doynes that beyng a good and catholike prince, and proceeding thereafter, your grace mynded not any thing to say, doo, or goo about agynst the Holie Catholique and Apostolique Church, or the authority of the see, otherwise then was the office of a good catholike prince, and chausing soo to doo indeed intended in tyme and place according, catholiquely to reforme and await the same. And herewithall I drew out the said writing shewing his said holynes that I brought the same for proof of the premisses, and that his holynes might see and perceive all the same, adding hereunto that your highnes used these remedies not in any contempt either of the church, the see, or of his holynes, but only upon causes expressed in the said writings. Desiring also his holynes that although in tymes passed it liked hym to shewe unto me much benevolence and kyndnes, wherbie I must and did accompte my self greatly bounden unto the same, yet considering the obligations a subject must and doth of right beare chiefly unto his sovereyne lord, he woud take al my doynes in good parte, and not to ascribe any unkyndnes unto me in this behalfe, but only to consider that a subject and servant must do his masters commandment. The pope havyn this for a brekefast, only pulled downe his head to his shoulders after the Italian fashion, and said that because he was as then fully ready to goe to the consistorie he would not tarye to hear or see the said writings; but willed me to come at after noone, and he would gladly gif me audience to all the same, and other things that I would propose or do, whereupon his holynes departing streight to the consistorie, I returned to your said ambassadors, telling them what I had doon, and what answer I had. That after noone I and Mr. Penyston (whom I entended aswel in the popes answeres, as also in other my doinge, to use as a wittnes if the cause should soe require,) repayred to the palace, and bycause that audience was assigned unto many, and among others unto the ambassador of Millan, I tarried there the space of an howre and halfe, and finally was called unto the pope's secret chamber, where (taking with me Mr. Penyston) I founde his holines having only with hym Godsadyne of Bononie; the pope perceyving that I had brought one with me, looked much upon hym, and a great deale the more, in my opinion, bycause that in the morning I did speak with his holines alone, Mr. Penyston albeit beyng in the said chambre, and seying what I did, yet not resorting nye unto his said holines. And to put the pope out of this fantasie, and somewhat to colour my entent, I tolde his holynes that the said Mr. Penyston was the gentelman that had brought unto me commission and letters from your highnes, to intimate unto his holynes the provocation and appeal forsaid; the pope percease not fully herewith satisfied, and supposing that I would (as I indeede entended) have recorde upon my doynes, said, that it were good for him to have his datarie, and also other of his counsell, to hear and see what were done in that behalfe, and thereupon called for his datarie, Symonetta, and Capisuchi. In the mean whyle, they beyng absent, and sent for, his holynes leaning in his wyndow towards the west syde, after a little pawse turned unto me, and asked me of my lord of Winchester how he did, and likewise afterward of Mr. Brian; but after that sort that we thought he would make me believe that he knew not of his being here, saying thos words; How doth Mr. Brian, is he here now: and after that I had answered hereunto, his holynes not a little seeming to lament the death of Mr. Doctor Bennet, whom he said was a faithfull and good true servant unto your highnes, enquired of me whether I was present at the time of his death, and falling out of that, and marvelling, as he said, that your highness would use his holynes after such sorte, as it appears ye did: I said that your highnes no less did marveyll that his holynes havyn found so much benevolence and kyndnes at your handes in all tymes passed, would for acquittal shewe such unkyndnes as of late he did, as well in not admitting your excusator with your lawfull defences, as also pronouncing agynst your highnes: and here we entered in communication upon two poyntes, oon was that his holynes having committed in tymes passed, and in moost ample forme, the cause into the realm, promising not to revoke the said commission, and over that to confirm the processe and sentence of the commissaries, beyng two cardinales and legates of his see, should not especially at the poynt of sentence, have advoked the cause from their hands, reteyning it at Rome, but at the lest, he should have committed the same to some other indifferent judges within your realme, making herein that it could not be reteyned at Rome: this argument was either his holynes would have the matter examyned and ended, or he would not: if he would, then either he would have it examined and ended in a place whither your highness might personally come, and else bende to send your proctor, or else in that place whither your highnes nother could or ought personally to come unto; ne yet bounde to sende a proctor; if he intended in a place whither your highnes might personally come, and elles bound to send a proctor he intended well and ought to have provided accordingly. If he entended that the matter shuld be examyned and ended in that place wher your highnes neither could nor ought personally to come, nor yet bounde to send a proctor then his holynes did not well and justly. Seying that ether your highness shuld therbie be compelled to make a proctor in matter of such importance agynst your will; or enforced to a thing unto you impossible, or elles to be left without defence, having just cause of absence. And for as much as Rome was a place whither your Highnes could not ne yet ought personally come unto, and alsoe was not bound to send thither your proctor: I said therefore that his holynes justly shuld not have reteyned the matter at Rome. The second point was that your highnes cause beyng in the opinion of the best learned men in Christendome approved good and just, and so many wayes known unto his holynes; the same shuld not soe long have reteyned it in his hands without judgment: his holynes answering to the same, as touching the first poynt, said that if the queene (meanynge the late wife of prince Arthure, calling her alway in his conversation, the queen) had not given an oath "perhorruscentiæ et quod non sperabat consequi Justitiæ complementum impartibus," refusing the judges as suspect, he would not have advoked the matter at all, but been content it shuld have been examyned and ended in your realm; but seying she gave that othe and refused the judges as suspect, appealing also to his courte, he said he might and ought to hear her, his promise made to your highnes, which was qualified, notwithstanding. And as touching the seconde poynt, his holynes said that your highnes only was the defaut thereof, bycause ye woulde not send a proxie unto the cause, without which he said the same coude not be determyned, And albeit I replied aswell against his answer to the first poynt, saying that his holynes cou'd ne yet thereupon retaine the matter at Rome, and proceed against your highnes there, and likewise against the seconde poynt, saying that your highnes was not bounde to sende any proxie, yet his holynes seeing that the datarie was come in upon this last conclusion, said only that al these matters had been oft, and many tymes fully talked upon at Rome, and therefore willed me to omittle further communication thereupon, and to proccede to the declaration, and doing of such things, that I was specially sent for: whereupon making protestation of your highnes mynde and intent towards the church, and see apostolique, not intending any thing to doe in contempt of the same, I exhibited unto his holynes the commission which your highnes had sent unto me under your private seale (the other sent by Frances the curor not beyng then come) desiring and asking according to the tenour thereof, and his holynes delivering it to the datarie commanded hym to rede it, and hereing in the same thes wordes, "Gravaminibus et injuriis nobis ab eodem sanctissimo Patre illatis et comminatis," began to loke up after a new sorte and said, "O questo et multo vero," this is much true, meanyng that it was not true indee. And verily sure not only in this but also in many partes of the said commission as they were red he shewed hymself grevouslie offended: inso-much that when those wordes, "Ad sacro-sanctum concilium generale proxime jam futurum legitimum et in loco congruenti celebrandum," were red, he fell in a marvelous great cholere and rage, not only declaring the same by his gesture and manner, but also by wordes: speaking with great vehemence, and saying, "Why did not the king" (meanyng your majestie) "when I wrote to my nuncio this you passed to speke, unto hym for this generall councill, giff no answer unto my said nuncio, but referred hym for answer therein to the French king; at what tyme he might perceive by my doying (he said) that I was very well disposed and much spake for it: the thing so standing, now to speke of a general council, O good lord. But well! his commission, and all other his writings cannot be but welcome unto me, he said, whiche last wordes we thought he spake willing to hide his cholere, and make me belyve that he was nothing angrie with this doyngs, where in very dede I perceived by many arguments that it was otherwise: and one among another was taken here for unfaillible with them: that knoweth the popes conditions, that he was contynually folding up and unwynding of his handkercheffe, which he never doth but when he is tykled to the very hert with great cholere. And albeit he was lothe to leave conversation of this generall council to ease his stomack, yet at the last he commanded the datarie to rede further: which he did. And by and by, upon the reding of thos clauses, "si oportat Rever. Patribus, &c. and post and his holynes eftsones chafed greatly; finally saying, "Questo e boon fiatto," this is but well doon. And what tyme that clause "Protestando," &c. and also that oother, "Nos ad ea Juris et facti remedia," was red by the datarie, he caused hym to rede theym again: which doon, his holynes not a litle chafyng with hymself asked what I had moore. And then I repeting my protestation, did exhibit unto him your highnes provocation, which incontinently he delivered to the datarie to rede. and in this also he founde hym self much greived, notyng in the begyn-nyng not onoly those wordes " Archiepiscopo Eboracensi," but also thus, " Citra tum revocat. quorum cumque procuratorum:" at which he made good pawse, conjectering therebie as I toke it, that ther were proctors made which might exercise and appear in your name if your highnes had ther with be contented. The datarie reding fether and comyng to those wordes " quod non est nostræ intentionis" &c. his holynes with great vehemence says, that thoughle your highnes in your protestation had respect to the church and anthorite of the see apostolique, yet you had noon to hym at al; whereunto I answered and said it was not soe, as his holynes should perceyve in the other writings. But of truth say what I say woold ther was in manor never a clause in the said provocation that soe pleased him, but he woold wryng and whrist it to the worst sense; as in annotations upon the margynes aswell of provocation as also appellations, I shall fully declare unto your highness; which yet nevertheles at this time bycause it cannot be perfect at the departure of this byrer I doo not send it to your highnes. As the datarie was reding this provocation, came in Symoneta, and even at those wordes, " Sed deinde publico eantur judicio." Wherin the pope snarling and sayeing that publicum, Symoneta said no such was never had. Symoneta said, now sryc they spake of that archbishop, I suppose, that made that good process the cause depending afore your holynes in the consistorie. A said the pope aye a worshipful processe and judgment. And as he was chafyng hereupon, ther came oon of his chamber to tell hym that the French king did comme to speke with his holynes: and incontinently hereupon the pope made great hast to mete hym; and even at the very doore they mette together, the French king makyng very lowe curtisie, putting of his bonet, and keeping it of, till he came to a table in the popes chamber. And albeit I much dout not that the French king knew right well what doyngs was in hand, advertised thereof by oon Nicolas his secretarie and also of the popes pryvey chamber, yet his grace asked of the pope what his holynes did. And the same gave answer and said, " Questi signori Inglesi sono stati qua per intimare certi provocationi et appellationi e di fare altre cose." Theis gentlemen of England be here to intimate certeyn provocations and appelles and to do other things. Whereupon they two secretly did fall in conversation; but what it was I cannot tell: the French kinge his back was against me, and I understood not what he said. Trouth it is, when the French king had spoke a longe tyme and made ende of his tale, the pope said those wordes, " Questa e per la bonta vostra," this is of your goodnes. Proceeding fether in conversation and laughing meryly together they so talked the space of three quarters of an hower, it beyng then after six of the clock in the nyght, and in conclusion the French kinge making great reverence toke his leave, but the pope went with him to the chamber dorre, and albeit the French king woold not have suffered hym further to have goon, yet his holynes following hym out of the doore toke hym by the hande and brought him to the doore of the seconde chamber, where making great ceremonies the oon to the other, they departed, the pope returnyng to his chamber, and seyng me stande at doore, willed me to enter with hym. And so I did havyng with me Mr. Penyston. And then and ther the datarie red out the rest of the provocation: interrupted yet many tymes by the pope, which ofte for the easement of his mynde made his interpretations and notes, especially if it touched the mariage which of late your highnes made with the queene that now is, or the processe made by the archbishoppe of Canturburie.

The provocations red, with muche a doo, I under protestations forsaide did intimate unto him the two apelles, made also by your highnes to the generall counsell afor my lord of Winchester, which his holynes delyvered to his datarie commanding hym to rede them, notyng and marking well all manner and contentes thereof: and noo lesse offended therbie then he was with the oother. In the redyng whereof came in the cardinal de Medices, which stooode bare headed contynually during the redyng thereof, casting down his hede to the grounde, and not a litle marvelling, as it appered unto me, that the pope was so troubled and mourned. When this was doon, his holynes said that forasmuch as this was a matter of great weyght, and importance, towching alsoe the cardinals, he woold consulte and deliberate with them hereupon in the consistorie, and afterwarde gif me answer therein. I contented therewith, desired farther his holynes that forasmuch as he had hard all the provocacions and apelles, seying also the original writings thereupon, that I might have thym again; because I said I must aswell to the cardinales as alsoe to other judges and persons havyn interest, make intimation accordingly. His holynes in the begynnyn was precise that I should in noe wise have thym; but they to remain with hym. Nevertheles afterward perceyving that I much stode upon it, he answered and said that like wise as concernyng the provocacions and apelles with my petition concernyng the same, he entended to gif me answer after that he had consulted with the cardinales in the consistorie, so alsoe he entended to doo accordyng redelyvering of the said writings. And hereupon departed from him about eight of the clocke in the nyght, havyn remayned afar mor then three howers, I repayred to my lord of Winchester and other your highnes ambassadors here, telling them what I had doon, and what answer alsoe was giften unto me.

On the morowe following which was Saatterday, albeit ther was consistorie yet the same was extraordinarie, chiefly for the declaration of the newe cardinales, the bishop of Beziers, the bishop of Langres, the great maysters Newew, and the duke of Albanie his brother. And in the said consistorie as far as I could learn ther was nothing specially spoken or determyned concernyng the said provocacions and apelles, or answer to be given unto the same. Upon Sunday the ixth of this present at after noone havyn the said Mr. Penyston with me I repayred to the palace, and spake ther with the datarie to knowe when I should have answer of the pope, and he told me that the day following shuld be the consistorie, and that the pope after the same woold gif me answer, and albeit that the said datarie thus said unto me, yet willing to be sure, I induced on Carol de Blanchis my great acquaintance and one of the chieff cameraries with the pope, to enquire of his holynes when I should receive and have answer to the provocacions and apelles, with other things purposed afor by me unto his holynes. And his holynes gave unto hym to be declared unto me the self same answer that the datarie afor had gyven unto me, whereupon I departed for that day.

Apon Monday the xth of this was ordinary consistorie, and thider I, having with me the said Mr. Penyston, repayred. Tarieng ther alsoo unto the tyme that all were commaunded furth, sayvng the cardinals: and understanding then aftsones by the datarie that I must come agayne at afternoone for answer, I did for that tyme departe, resorting at afternoon unto the palace, and after that I had taried ther ij howers, in the chamber next unto the pope, which all that tyme continually was occupied in blessing of bedes, giving his blessing, and suffering the ladies and nobles of the court to kiss his foot: I was called in unto hym, ther beyng ther only in the chamber cardinal Salviati and the datarie. At my comyng he said unto me, "Domine doctor quid vultis?" and I told his holynes that I looked for answer accordyng as his holynes had promised me afor. And then he said that his mynde towards your highnes always hath been to mynister justice, and do pleasure unto you, albeit it hath not been so taken. And he never unjustly grieved your grace that he knoweth, nor entendeth hereafter to doo. And as concernyng the appellacions made by your highnes unto the general counsel, he said that forasmuche as ther was a constitution of pope Pius his predecessor, that did condemne and reprove all such apelles, he therfor did reject your grace appeales as frivolous, forbidden, and unlawful. And as touchyng the generall counsel, he woold doo his best deligence therein that it should take effect; repetyng agayn how in tymes passed he had used always diligence for that purpose, writing therein to all Christen princes, your highnes yet not answering thereunto, but remitting his nuncio to the French king. Which notwithstanding he saith he woold yet do his duty, and procure the best he can that it shall succede, nevertheles adding that he thought when it were well considered, that the king of England ought not, nor had autorite to call any general counsel, but that the convoking thereof apperteyned unto his holynes. Finally concluding, that for his part he woold alwayes do his dutie as apperteyned. And as concernyng the restitution of the publicke writings made upon the provocation and apelles forsaide, he said he woold not restore theym, but woold kepe theym, and that safely. Saying therewithal, that I might have when I woold, "ab Episcopo Vintoniensi," and other afor whom they were made, as many as I woold. And albeit that I shewed hym his own lawe to be, that he coued not decayne them, yet he saying that it was but "de lana caprina," and refusing to make redeliverie therof, commanded the datarie only to gif me the answer in writinge, and soo bade me fare well.

Goyng with the datarie to his chamber for that purpose, I perceyved ther that the answer was alrede writ, howbeit that it was not touchyng so many thinges as the pope had by mouth afore declared unto me, ne yet subscribed with the dataries hande, accordyng to the accustomed maner. And requyryng the datarie to make it perfect, and delyver it unto me subscribed with his hande; he willed me to come the day folowyng early in the mornyng, and I shuld have it. Whereupon I departed, and came in the mornyng to the dataries chamber in the palace, but he was goon afor to the pope. Wherefor repayryng to the popes chamber and fynding him ther, I requyred the said answer in writing. And he goyng with me to his chamber, delyvered me for answer the self-same that was written the day befor, adding only in the ende these words, "Et hæc ad præsens, salvo Jure, latius et particularius si videbimus respondendi;" subscribing the same with his own hande, keepyng one other copie with hymself. Which had, without hope of any other as then, I repaired to my lord of Winchester, and other your highne ambassadors, to shew them all the same.

And by this your highnes may now perceyve, whether that the pope will staye process upon any your provocacions or apelles, howsoever they be made, or after what sorte they be intymated unto hym, and also whether that unto such tyme he receive inhibition from the general counsel, his process shall be taken in lawe as nought. I feare that at his returne to Rome, he will doo much displeasure, if by some good policy he be not stay'd. The original answer delivered unto me by the datary, forsaide I doe at this tyme send unto your highnes, only retaynyng with me the copie thereof.

And syne albeit your graces commandement, declared by your letters dated at Chatham the xth of August last passed, sent unto me seemed to be, that devising some busyness of my own, I shuld folowe alwayes and be present where the pope resorteth, still residing and demouring, noting, marking, and enserching what is doon, and gyving your highnes diligent advertisement thereof, as the case and importance of the mater shuld require; yet for as much as in this late congress, ther was nothing in maner doon by the pope at the contemplation of any in your highnes favour, and that the appellations and provocations of your highnes being intimated, it is not like any thing of great moment to be looked for, especially all things standing as they do; I not knowing your highnes fether determinat pleasure, and thinking that by reason of the premisses, your highnes would not that I shuld fether interprise in that behalf, have therfor (the pope beyng goon towards Rome from hence the twelfth of this present) taken my journey towards Lyons the thirteenth of the same, your highnes ambassadors by reason of the departure of the French kinges soc alsoe doying: and from thence I intend towards your graces realme, unless I receive your commands to the contrarie.

To declare unto your highnes, in what perplexitie and anxietie of mynde I was in until that this intimation was made, what zeale and affection I have borne therein, how glad I wouold have been such things might have comen to pass, which your highnes so much hath desired, and generally of all my doyns here, without fear or displeasure of any man, it shall not be needful. Partely bycause I trust your highnes dowlth not thereof, and partely bycause the bearer hereof, untill Mr. Brian, to whom I moost accompte ny self much bounden unto, will I suppose at large declare all the same, with other things here doing; of whom your highnes I doute not shall perceyve that although the Frenchmen were made pryvee of our doyns concernyng the intimation, and in maner willing the same, two or three dayes afor the popes departure, yet now for excuse they saye that all their matters and yours also be destroyed therby. And thus most humble I recommend me unto your highnes, heseeching Almighty God to conserve the same in felicity many yeares. From Marseilles, the xliith of Novembre, 1533.

Your highnes moost bounde subject and poore servant,

Cranmer's Letter, for an Appeal to be made in his name.—An Original.

[Cotton Library, Cleop. E. 6. P. 234.]

IN my right hartly maner I commend me to you. So it is (as ye know right well) I stande in drede, lest our holy father the pope, do entende to make some maner of prejudicial processe against me and my church, and therefore having probable conjectures therof, I have provoked from his holyness to the general counsell, accordingly as the king's highness and his counsell have advised me to do; which my provocation and a procuracie under my seale, I do send unto you herwith, desiering you right hartely to have me commended to my lord of Winchester, and with his advise and counsell to intimate the said provocation, after the best maner that his lordship and you shall think most expedient for me. I am the bolder thus to write unto you, because the king's highnes commanded me thus to do, as ye shall (I trust) further perceive by his graces letters, nothing doubting in your goodness, but at this myne owne desier ye will be contented to take this peynes, tho' his highness shall perceae forget to write unto you therin: which your peynes and kindness (if it shall lye in me in tyme to come to recompense) I will not forget it with God's grace, who presearve you as my self. From Lambeth, the xxijd day of November.

NUMBER XXV.

A Minute of a Letter sent by the King to his Ambassador at Rome.

[Ex MS. Rymeri.]

TRUSTY and right-welbeloved, we grete youe wel. And for asmuch as not only by the relation and reaporte of our trusty chaplain maister doctor Boner, but also by certayne letters writtyn by Sir Gregory, afore the dispeche of doctor Boner, upon the lvely communications had by the pope to the emperor, in justification and favour of our cause; by which it appeareth unto us, that his holyness favoring the justice of our great cause, maketh countnance and demonstracion now to shew himself more propense and redy to the administration of justice to our contentation therin, thenne he hath been accustomed in tymes past: discending for demonstration herof as you take it to those particularities folowyng, whyche sir Gregory hath also sent by way of instructions to Bonner: that is to say, that in case we will be content to sende a mandate requiring the remission of our cause into an indifferent place, he wold be content to appoint locum indifferente, and a legate and two auditors from thence, ad formand' processum, reserving always the judgement therof to himself; or else if we wold consent and be agreeable, inducing also our good brother and perpetual allye the French king to be also content to conclude and establish for iij or iiij yeres, a general trux; that then the popes holyness is pleased, if we and our said good brother wol agree therunto, to indiete with al celeritie a general counsail, wherunto his holynes wouold remyt our cause to be finished and determyned. Which overtures being also proponed and declared unto us by the popes nuncio here, be set forth by him, and also in a letter to hym, as thoughte they had been by the said sir Gregory in our name desired of the popes holyness, and by him assented to, for our contentacion and satisfaction, in that behalf: wherof we doo not a litle mervayl, considering that we of late never gave unto the said sir Gregory or any other, any suche commission or instructions for that purpose, but fully to the contrary. Nevertheless forasmoch as bothe by the relation of our said chaplain and by the purporte and effecte of the fore said letters, instructions, and also by the behaviour of the popes ambassadour here, and by such overtures as he on the popes behalfe hath made unto us, we nowe considering the benevolent and towarde mynde of his said holines expressed and declared in the same, have moche cause to conceive in our mynd, as we doo indede, good hope, that he depely pondering the justnes of our said cause, wil now take more respecte to put us in more quietnes therein, thenne we had any expectation heretofore: and therfor our pleasure is that you discretly relating to his holynes in what good parte we doo accepte and take his overtures and persuasions, doo gyve unto him our right hartly thanks for the same, adding therunto that we veraylie trust and be now of that opinion that his holynes calling to his remembrance the manifold commodities, profits, and gratuities heretofor shewed by us, to him, and the see apostolique, demanding nothing for reciprocation of friendship and mutual amitie to be shewed at his hand, but only justice in our great matior, according to the lawes of God, and the ordenances of the holy counsailes, for the encrease of vertue, extirpation of vice, and quiet of al Christendom, established by our forfathers, wil now in discharge of his duetie towards God, shewing unto us correspondence of friendship according to our deserts, putting aparte all shadowes of delayes, more benivolently extende his good wil and gratuitie towards us in the acceleration and speedye finishing of our said cause, thence those overtures doo purporte, whyche if it come so to pass, hys holines may be wel assured to have us and our realme as benevolent and loving towards him and the see apostolique as hath at any tyme hertofore been accustomed. And as concerning the general trux for three or four yeres, albeit we do inwardly conside the greate good therof, and be of our oune nature asmoche inclined therunto as any prince christened, and on thother side asmoche desirous to avoyde contencion, wherupon manytymes ensueth extremitye, to the hurte of many; yet nevertheless two things at this tyme enforceth us to absteyne and forbere sodenly to consent to the same: one is, that we being afflicted, troubeled, and encumbered in our oune conscience, and our realme therby greatly perplexed, cannot sodenly resolve our self to innovate or renewe any perfite establishment of peax with other, tyl we may be satisfied and have pure and syncere peax in our owne harte: and cause saying that it is wonly wyll and kynd stubbernes with oblivion of former kyndnes, whyche occasions the lette of the spede finishing of our cause, whyche ye may say that hys holynes yf it please hym may soon redres, havyn so good gronds for our part as he haveth, yf he wyl hartely therto applye hym, and then summe good effecte myght happen to come therof. An other cause there is also that we being moost perfetly by an indissoluble amyte and league unite and knyt unto our good brother and perpetual allye the French king, maye not in any wise, nor wil put our consent to any such request without the knowledge and assent of our said good brother, and other our and hys confederates; and notwithstanding yf hys holynes thynketh that myne endeavour and labour herin may do hym any gratyue and pleasure, or confer to hys purpose in any thyng, he advertesyng us therof, shall well persayve that there shall lack no goode diligens in us, to set forthe suche thyngs as may stonde with our honour, and be also pleasant to hym, he shewyng to us summe corespondnes of kyndnes in thys our just and wayghte cause. And as touching our consent to the indiction of a general counsaile, though sundry respects and considerations at the tyme nowe present, move us to thinke it not necessary, and that we nothing doubt but our cause being remytted to the same, we shuld withal convenient celeritie, that begonne have our desired end therin; yet we being nowe in veray good hope that the popes holynes at the last digesting thoroughly the justness of our cause, wil so use us in the same, that according to trouth and equitie good and speedye successe therof shall folowe in other admytting the excusatory, or else in remyttting bothe the knowledge of the fact and finall discion of the cause into thys realme where it was begon, accordyng to the olde sanctions of generall concilles and divers of his predecessours assent, and as he hymselfe confesseth in hys commyssion giffyn unto the cardinall for thys pourpose; we have now also suspended therfor our assent and consent therunto uppon two respects, wherof the first requireth a necessary suspencion of our said consent, forasmoch as the same dependeth uppon the assent of our said good brother and other our confederates, and that the oon of us without the other canne ne wille in any wise consent to any acte of such highe importance as this is, which toucheth the hole bodye of Christendome. The seconde is, that in our opinion which our pleasure is ye with good dexteritie declare unto hys holynes the good respecte had of the state of the worlde, and of the time present; it were not expedient for the pope himself to consent therunto, considering that temperour is in maner compelled by the importuntye of the Germaynes and the Lutheran secte to cause the pope to indict the said council. And howe the said Germaynes be mynded towards him and the see apostolique, we doubt not but his holynes dothe depely pondre and conside. But ye shal saye unto the popes holynes on our behaulf, that finding him towards us good and kinde, brefely expedyteyng our cause as affore is rehersy'd, wherof we now perceyve some lightly wood, and perceyving him to contynue and perseve earnestly mynding the spedy ende and determynation therof, for our satisfaction, we canne do no lesse for reacquital therof, thenne to procure and practise by al wayes and meanes, aswell with our said good brother as with al other our allies, confederates and friends, to do all things that maye be moost for the surety of his holynes and the comodities of the see apostolique, whyche we shall not faylle to do, yf he wyl dysclose to us the menys how far. As touching the sending of a mandate to require that the cause might be harde in an indifferent place, with reservation of the sentence to himself, ye shall signifie unto hys holynes that albeit we well considering hys towarde mynde for the spedy finishing of our said cause, if we were a private person wold nothing mistrust to consent to his said overtures, ne the good effects that might ensue of the same; yet nevertheless this persuasion soo toucheth contrarye to generall concilles, to the libertie, regalitie, and jurisdiction of all prynces, and most especially to our prerogatyffe royall, privileges of our realme, wherof we be hed and sovereign; within the whiche, by the anciant lawes of the same, al causes of matrymonye the: bygon and solemnized, cummyng after in question, ought to have their original commencement, and synall discusse and discion by the English churche. Whyche thyngs well consideryd, he havyn also regarde to hys othe, in the resayte of hys dygnitie, whych he ther actually gyffeth for observance both of the generall conselles, and the antique laus of the faders of the chyrch; considering also with himself, how we at the tyme of our coronation, be likewise obligyd by othe to support and maintayne the immunities and pryncely liberties of our realme and croone, whych to contrary, I make my self sure hys holynes well informyd, will never requyre, syns it is prolybite bothe by Gods precept, and lawe of nature, by these words Quod tibi non vis fieri, alteri ne facias. Wherfore we fermely trust, that hys holynes, pondering and wayng in the balance of hys just hart and equal judgement, these most urgent both resons and causes, with the respect of hys duty to God, in minystryng justice and equitie; and considering also the obligation, whych we as king thought not wordy, but by his election, be bonde to our realme, Scilicet defendere Privilegijs Coronæ et Regni, wyl not at thys tyme thinke any unkindnes in us, thought that thys hys request, scilicet, to send a mandate, or to have it in any other place than in thys realme determynyd by us, at thys tyme be not acceptyd. For surly it so byghtly toucht the prerogatyffe riall of thys realme, that thought I wer myndyd to do it, yett must abstayne without the assent of our court of parliament, whyche I thynke verely wyl never coudescent to it. Nevertheles, ye may shew unto hys holynes, that for thys offerr we ascribe non unkyndnes to hym, but rather take it in good part; considering that by hys ambassadour wee doo persayve, that hys mynde was to gratify and do pleasure herin to us, thys overture procedyng oppon Gregory's motion, werin to speke of that sort, I ensure you of us he had non commission, but rather to the contrary. And so we wyl ye shew the pope; assuryng forther hys holynes, that we be ryght sory that thys overture was no more resonable, or consonant to our honour. For surly in all resonable thyngs we wold gladly shew our selfe benivolent to hym, as long as we persayve any maner of gratuite in hym. More ye may say, that we thynte that we nor our realme have hytherto gyven any occasion to his holynes, wherby he shuld be moved at the contemplacion of any privie person, to attempte the violation of the immunities and libertics of thys our realme, or to bring the same in any publique contention, wherby he may compell us in the mayntenance of them, to shew and declare meny thyngs peraventure it unknowne prejudiciall and hurtfull to the papall dyngnitie, as it is now usyd, which not compellyd we intende not to do. Yet an other gret reson as we think you may shew hys holynes, gederyd owght of his own law, whych is thys: I beyng a commune parson, am not boundyn in re arduâ, as thys is to appere in hys court, and I beyng not bounden to appere, am not bounde to sende a proxtour. Wherefore his owne lawe shewyth evydently, that thys mater owght not to be determyned by hys court, but per Anglicanam Ecclesiam; for yf hys court were juge, I shuld be obligyd to appere there. And ye shal further understand, that we have conceived by certain lettres lately sent unto us by the said sir Gregory de Cassalis, that the popes holynes, amongs other persuasions, in the furtherance of our cause shewed unto hym, that the laweis being of the contrary parte of our cause, doo agree, that the pope in our cause may not dispense, without an urgent cause. Which opinion hys holynes thinketh moche more dothe avaunce the goodnes of our matier, thenne the general opinion of the devynes and lawyers on our parte, which doo affirme that the pope in noo wise maye dispense. Whiche matier being also persuaded by his holynes to themperour, who declared, that at the tyme of the dispensation there was extreme warres betwene our derest father of noble memory, whose soule God pardon, and king Ferdinando, father to the quene. And for pacieng therof, the said dispensation was obteyned; wherupon the mariage ensued: which bereth a visage of an urgent cause, if it were true, as it is not. And therefore, as wel for the satisfaction of the pope's holynes in that behaulf, as for a clere resolution of the doubte by his holynes proponed, whether the quene were cognita by our brother prince Arthure, or noo; our pleasure is, that ye shal signifie to his holynes, that in the league betwene our said derest father, and the said Ferdinando, renoveled and concluded, sealed and signed with the said king Ferdinando, and the quene his wif hands, wherupon the dispensation for the mariage betwene us and the quene was obteyned, appereth noo maner of cause. But playnly declaring the said two princes to be thenne and afor more perfetly established, unyted, and confederate in frendship and amytie, thenne eny other prince of Christendom, setteth forthe the cause of the dispensation and agreement for the said mariage, to be only for contynuaunce and augmentation of their said amytie, and for the vertuose modestie and other qualities of the quene. In which league is also playnly mencyoned and expressed in two places therof, that the mariage betwene our said brother and her was solemnized and perfetly consummate; wherby, and by the depositions of a great number of noble and honorable personages, which hertofore by their othes have been examyned upon the same, manifestly and playnly appereth to al indifferent herers, without doubt therof, that the quene was carnally known by our said brother prince Arthur; and the same dispensation soo proceeding, without urgent cause to be reputed invalida. The transumpt of which league autentiquely transmued, we sende unto youe herewith, to thintent ye may the better perceyve the effecte of the same. And finally, ye shall further signifie to his holynes, that of the good successe of this our cause dependeth the suretie of our succession, and therupon ensueth the rest, peax, and tranquillitie of al our realme, and by the protracting thereof many perilous daungers maye and is like to ensue to the same, which above all things we and our realme ought to have respect unto. Wherfor it is more convenient and consonant to reason and equitie that this our said cause shuld be determyned by them, to whose dammage or commoditie the successe of the cause may ensue, and not by hys holynes, which canne have no certain knowledge of the state of the same. And yet nevertheles, if his holynes remytting the final discusse of the principal cause to our English church, as apperteineth, will after that, of his gratuite ratifie and confirme suche sentence as they shal determyn in the same, shal therby not only adquire Christen obedience of us and our people, moche to his commoditie and contentacion, and also profitable to the see apostolique, but also pacifie the contradiction, to the rest and quietnes of al Christendom. Willing you by thise and other discrete persuasions, as ye can with al diligence and dexteritie to allure his holynes, being now somewhat attempred and disposed to do us good, to condiscend to more benivolent gratuities, than as yet is set forth by the said overtures; and to ascertain us with all diligence and celeritie, what towardnes ye shal perceyve in him in this behaulf, not mynding that ye shall declare this as our resolute answer. But upon other and further overtures, and after more deliberation and consultation upon these weighty causes, we wil study and enserche, by al honourable wayes and meanes that we canne, to concur with the towardly minde of his holynes, if he earnestly wil applie himself, and perscver in suche opinion as may be for the acceleration of thende of our said cause: willing you, with all diligence and dexteritie, to put your good endeavour to the same; and likewise to procure the said sir Gregory, according to our expectation in that behaulfe.

NUMBER XXIX.

An Order for Preaching, and bidding of the Beades in all Sermons to be made within this Realm. 1535.

[Cotton Library, Cleop. E. 5. P. 286.]

FIRST, whosoever shall preach in the presence of the king's highnes, and the queen's grace, shall in the bidding of the beades, pray for the hole Catholike church of Crist, aswell quick as ded, and speyciallie for the catholique church of this realme; and first as we be most bounden for our covering lord king Henry the VIIIth, being ymediately next unto God, the onelie and supreme hed of this catholike church of England, and for the most gracious lady queen Anne his wife; and for the lady Elizabeth, daughter and heire to them both, our pryncesse, and no farther.

Item. The preacher in all other places of this realme then in the presence of the king's saide highnes, and the queen's grace, shall in the bidding of the beads, pray first in manner and form, and worde for worde as is above ordeyned and lymyted; adding thereunto in the seconde parte, for all archebiskopes and bishopes, and for all the hole clergie of this realme; and speciallie for suche as shall please the preacher to name of his devotion; and thirdly, for all dukes, earls, marques, and for all the hole temporaltee of this realme; and speciallie for suche as the preacher shall name of devocyon: and fygallie for the soules of all them that be ded, and speciallie of such as it shall please the preacher to name.

Item. It is ordeyned that every preacher shall preach ones in the presence of the greatest audience against the usurped power of the bishop of Rome, and so after at his lybertee: and that no man shall be suffered to defend, or maytene the foresaid usurped power: Ferthermore, to keep unyte and quyetnes in this realme, it is ordeyned that no preachers shall contende openly in pulpet one against another, nor uncharytable deprave one another in open audience; but if any of them be greved one with another, let them complayne to the king's highnes; or to the archbishops, or bishops of the dioces where such chauce shall happen, and there to be remedied if there be cause why; and if the complaynt be not trew, the complayner to be punished.

Item. Also to forfende that no preachers for a year, shall preach neyther with, nor against purgatory, honouring of saynts, that priests may have wives; that faith onelie justifieth; to go on pilgrimages; to forge miracles; considering these things have caused discession amongst the subjects of this realme alrede, which thanked be God is now well pacified.

Item. That from hensfourth all preachers shall purelie, syncerelie, and justlie preache the Scripture, and worde of Christe, and not myxe them with man's institutions, nor make men believe that the force of Goddes law, and man's law is like; nor that any man is able, or hath power to dispenche with Godes law.

Item. It is also ordened that the declaration of the sentence which hath ben used in the church four tymes in the year, shall not from henceforth, neyther be published, nor esteemed in any point contrary to the præynce and jurisdiction royall of our king and his realme, or laws and liberties of the same; and any so doing to be competently punyshed by the bishop of that dioces where it shall fortune him to be, or inhabit: and this thoroughout the realme and domynyons of our soveraigne, shortlie the bishops to sett order in.

Item. It is also ordened that the colects for the preservation of the king and queen by name, be from henceforth comunely and usualle used and sayed in every cathedrall church, religious house, and peroche church, in all their high masses thorough out all the realme and domynyons of our king and soveraigne.

Item. It is fether ordeyned that wheresoever the king's just cause of matrimony hath eyther ben detracted, and the incestious and injuste set fourth, or in places where as it hath not ben dilated, that in all those places till the people be fully satisfied and justlie instructe, all manner of preachers whatsoever they be, happening to come into any such parte of the realme, shall from henceforth open and declare the mere veryte and justnes of this later matrymony, as nigh as their learning can serve them, and according to the trew determynacions of a greate number of the most famous and esteemed universities of Christendom; according also to the just resolution and diffinicyon of both the convocaciones of this realme, concurring also in the same opynyon, by the hole assent of parliament, our prynce, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commones of this realme; wherefore now they must declare this matier, neyther doubtful nor disputable, but to be a thing of mere veryte, and so to be allowed in all men's opynyons.

Item. It is fether ordeyned that the foresaid preachers shall also declare the false and injuste handlinge of the bishop of Rome, pretending to have jurisdiction to judge this cause at Rome; which in the first hering thereof did both declare and confesse in word and writing the justnes thereof to be uppon our soveraignes side, insomuch as by a decretall delyvered to the legate here then sitting for the same cause, he did clearly determyne that if prince Arthur was our princes brother, and then of competent age allowed in the law when he married the lady Katharine, she being so likewise, and that as far as presumptions can prove carnall-copulation ensued between them; that these proved, before the said cardinales and legates (which in dede were accordingly to the lawes justlie proved) that then the unjust copulacion between our soveraigne and the said lady Katheryn, was neyther lawful, nor ought to be suffered, and so, eo facto, pronounced in the foresaide decretall, the nullite, invalidate, and unlawfulness of their pretensed matrimony, which was by his law sufficient judgement of the cause; which decretall by his commandment, after and because he would not have the effect thereof to ensue, was, after the sight thereof, imbesided by the foresaid cardinals: and one which then was here his cubicular, contrary to all justnes and equitye, wherein he hath done our soveraigne most extreme wrong.

Secondly, contrary to all equite and determination of generall counsailes, he hath called the cause (which ought to be determynd here) to Rome, where our soveraigne is neyther bounde to appere, nor send proctor: and yet hath he deteyned wrongfully the cause there these three or four years at the instance of the other partie, which sued to have it there, because they knowe he durst not displease the emperor, who maketh himself a partie in it, as by the sequele it doth evydentlie appere, and so could our prince gett no justice at his hande, but was wrongfully delayed to no small hinderance, both to his succession, and this his realme, emymente daunger.

Thirdlie, Where it is a naturall defence that the subject ought, and may defende his naturall soveraigne, or master, both in word and deed, and ought thereto to be admytted, this foresaid bishop of Rome, contrary to this equite in nature, hath rejected our soveraigns excusator, contrary both to his own lawes (which he most setteth by) and also Gods law, which he ought to prefer. Upon which cause, and other great injuries, our soveraigne did appeale to the generall counsaile; notwithstanding the which, he hath contrary to all justice proceded, ad ulteriora, wherein by a generall counsaile he is dampned as an heretick; yet thus injuriouslie from the begynnynge hitherto, he hath handled our princes cause and matier there.

Fourthly, the said bishope of Rome syns our princes appeale, hering of the laws and acts of parliament which we then went about, and that our king having just ground (the premisses considered) would provide according to his bounden duetie, both for the suretie of his succession and realme, gave out a sentence in maner of excommunication and interdiction of him and his realme, in which when he was spoken to for the iniquite and unjustnes thereof by our princes agents, he and his counsaile: could nor did otherwise excuse them (the facte being so contrary to all lawes and right) but that the faulte was in a new officer late come to the court, which for his lew'd doing should grevously be punyshed, and the processe to cesse. This they promised our princes agente. which notwithstanding, was set up in Flanders to the great injurie of our prynce, and for parcalite to the other parte, as it may well appear by the foresaide sentence.

Fyvethe, the said bishope of Rome sought all the ways possible with fair words and promises both by his ambassadors and our soveraigns owne, which by any meanes could be invented, to have abused our prynce and soveraigne; which when he saw that by none of his crafts our prince would be no longer abused with them, then sewed he to the French king, to be a mediator between our soveraigne and him: declaring to him and his counsaile that he would gladly do for our soveraigne, allowing the justnes of his cause; so that they would fynd the means that our soveraigne would not proceed in his acts and lawes till that were proved. And that he would meet with him at Mercelles for the fynishing thereof, for at Rome he durst not do it for fear of the emperor. The good French king admynshed our prince hereof, offering to him to do all pleasure and kyndnes that lay in him in this cause, trusting that if the bishop of Rome came ones to Marcelles, he should give sentence for our soveraigne in his just cause, and therefore prayed our prince to be content with that meting, in which he would labor for it effectuously, and so he did: to the which our prince answered, that touching the meting he was content, but touching the forbering of making lawes, he prayed his good brother to hold him excused, for he knew well ynough both the crafte and delays of the bishop of Rome; by which from thencforth he would never be abused: and that likewise he fered that he would abuse his good brother, which so indede after followed; for after he had gotten the maryage of the duke of Orleans, he then promised the French king to give judgment for our maister, so he would send a proxie, which the said bishop of Rome knew well before, that he neyther would, nor was bound to do; yet notwithstanding his subtill ymagnacions, his promise was to the French king, that our prynce sending a proctor, should there before his departure have judgment for him in the principall cause; for he openly confessed fether, that our maister had the right: but because our prince and maister would not prejudicate for his jurisdictione, and uphold his usurped power by sending a proctor, ye may evydentlie here see that this was onelie the cause why the judgment of the bishop of Rome was not given in his favour; whereby it may appere that there lacked not any justnes in our princes cause, but that ambition, vaine-glory, and to much mundanytee, weare the letts thereof: wherefore, good people, I exhorte you to sticke to the trueth, and our prince according to our bounden dueties, and dispise thes noughtie doings of this bishop of Rome; and charytably pray that he and all others, abusers of Christs worde and workes, may have grace to amend.

NUMBER XXX.

Instructions given by the Kinges Highnes, to his Trusty and Well-beloved Servant William Pagett, one of the Clerkes of his Signet, whom his Highnes sendeth at this Tyme unto the Kinge of Pole, the Dukes of Pomeray and of Pruce; and to the Cities of Dantiske, Stetin, and Conynburgh, for the Purposes ensuing.—An Original.

[Cotton Libr. Vitell. B. 14. Fol. 66.]

HENRY R.—First the said Pagett takeinge with him the kinges highnes letters of credence to the princes aforesaide, with the coppies of certeine other bookes and writings prepared for his dispatch, shall with all diligence, taking his journey from hence, repaire unto the said princes, as to his wisdom shall be thought best for the expedicion of his journey most convenient. After his arrival there, taking the best opportunity he can for his audience, and deliverie of the kinges highnes said letters, with his highnes most hartly recommendations: the said Pagett shall say that the kinges highnes consideringe not only the olde love, and perfect friendship, which hath now of long tyme been contracted, and by mutual offices of amity, established between his highnes and the said princes;

but also the singular affection, and entire zeal, which his highnes by sondry and manifold arguments, hath and doth daily perceiue to be in them, to the searchinge, furtheringe, defence, and mainteininge of the sincere truth, and right understanding of God's word, and the justice of his lawes, and the extirpacion of such inuerterate, old, and corrupt errors, customes, and abusiones, whereby Christes people have beene now of longe tyme seduced, and kept more bound, thrall'd, and captiue vnder the yoke of the bishops of Rome, then ever the Jewish people were vnder the ceremonies of Moyses lawe; his highnes hath sent nowe presently the said Pagett vnto the said princes, and to every one of them severally, as aforesaid, to open and declare on his highnes behalfe the great desire which his highnes hath, to do all things for his part; whereby not only the friendship may be nourished and encreased, but alsoe the common cause of all christend men may be reduced to such ende as shall be agreeable to the due order of Christs faith, and his precepts, and lawes giuen vnto us by his worde and spirit, and expressed in his gospell. And for as much as the chiefe pointe, and the greatest demonstration of true friendship, is freindes to communicate and breake friendly each to other, "et deponere in sinum amici," the whoall estate of their causes, and what things be pleasaunt and acceptable vnto them, or contrary, wherein they find themselves grieved, wronged, or injured; the said Pagett shall further say that the kings highnes hath giuen him in commaundment to open and declare vnto the same severally the whoall progresse of his great and weighty cause of matrimony, with the intolerable wronges and injuries don vnto his highnes in the same by the bishop of Rome, called the pope: and in what termes the same nowe consisteth. And finally by what waies and means his highnes purposeth and intendeth nowe to defende his said most just and right wise cause and to resist the malicious attemptes of the said bishop of Rome.

And for his entry into the matter, the said Pagett shall note and regarde two principall and specciall pointes; that is to say, the justice of the king's cause, and the order and processe which hath bin used therein. And as concerninge the first pointe, the said Pagett shall shewe howe the king's highnes hath so used himself, as no man may lawefully complaine of the same. For as touchinge the justice of his highnes cause, that is to say, the declaration of his marriage with the princess dowager to be nought, of noe moment nor effecte; but against the lawe of God's nature and man, and therefore indispensable by the pope, and in no wise available; the said Paget shall shewe, howe the king's highnes hath don therein as much as becommeth a Cristian prince to doe for discharge of his conscience: and hath founde soe certaine, soe evident, soe manifest, soe open and soe approved truth therein, as whereunto he ought of necessity to give place, and to allowe and receive the same; not as a matter doubtfull and disputable, but as a plaine and discussed verity, of the true understanding of God's worde and lawe, which all Cristian men must follow and obey, and to all worldly respecte preferre and execute. In attaininge the knowledge whereof, if his highnes had used his owne particular judgment and sentence, or the mind only and opinion of his own naturall subjecte, altho' the same might in his owne conscience have sufficed; yet his highnes would not have much repugned, if some other had made difficulty to assent in the same, untill further discussion had bin made thereuppon. But now, for as much as beside the king's owne certaine understandinge, and the agreement of the whoall clergie of both provinces of his realme, vnto the same; his highnes hath alsoe for him the determinations of the most famous universities of Christendom, which be indifferent to pronounce and give sentence in this his cause, and therewith alsoe the evident wordes of God's lawe; his highnes hath thought himself, in honour and duty to the obligation of God's commandements, obliged necessarily to imbrace and receive the same; and there, by the consent of his nobles spirituall and temporall, and with the singular contentation, reioyce and comforte, of all his commons and subjecte. And finally, by the judgement and decree of the archbishops of Canterbury, most solemnly and autentiquely passed in that behalfe, hath nowe, for the discharge of his owne conscience, which was before merueilleously grieved and offended with the opinion of incest matrimony, and for the avoideinge of extreame dangers of his succession, and the ruine of his realms, which was by reason thereof imynent and manifestly apparent to insue, divorced and seperated himself from the yoake and bande of that unlawfull marriage, which was of longe time usurped and continued betwene his highnes and the said princess dowager, and hath espoused and married to his lawfull wife, the noble lady, dame Ann marques of Pembroke, whose approved and excellent vertues, that is to say, the purity of her life, her constant verginity, her maidenly and womanly pudicity, her sobernes, her chastenes, her meekenes, her wisdom, her descent of ancient right noble and high parentage, her education in all good and lawfull shewes and manners, her aptnes to procreation of children, with her other infinite good qualities, more to be regarded and esteemed then the only progeny, be of such approved excellency, as cannot be but most acceptable vnto Almighty God, and deserve his high grace and favour to the singular weale and benefitte of the king's realme and subjects. Albeit in case any objection shall be made hereunto by the said princes, or any of their concill, "de Ratione Scandali," by reason that the king's highnes hath not observ'd in all pointes the common order and manner of the pope's lawes, the said Paget shall, thereunto replying and answering, founde themselves first vpon the most stedfast grounds of Scripture, viz. "Quia iusto Lex non est posita; sed ubi Spiritus Dei, ibi Libertas est: Et si Spiritu Dei ducimini, non estis sub Lege. Hoc est, Spiritus Sancti et Conscientiæ in motum sequentes, sub Lege primaque privata: cedere debet, nequaquam sumus constituti. In prohibitis autem Lege Divinâ, parendum est Conscientiæ, in aliis vero Ecclesiæ: Et qui Lege privatâ ducitur, nulla ratio exigit ut Lege publica constringatur." And thereuppon the said Paget shall inferre, that although in the lawe, every man's private conscience be but a private court, yet it is the highest and supreme court for judgement or justice, condemninge or approvinge of mens actes and deedes in the sight of God; accordinge to the saying of St. Paule to the Romanes, "Gentes que Legem non habent, sibi ipsis sunt Lex; qui ostendant Opus Legis scriptum in Cordibus suis; simul attestante ipsorum Conscientia, ex Cogitationibus eorum, inter se aut accusantibus aut excusantibus, in eo die quo iudicabit Deus occulta hominum." And therefore the said Paget shall say, that beinge the king's highnes said cause fully examined, discussed, and resolved in his owne conscience; and being also the same court of his conscience inlightened and instructed, first by the spirite of God, who possesseth and directeth the hartes of princes, and afterward established and confirmed by such wayes as is before expressed; pronounced and declared, to be discharged before God from the contracte of his said first matrimony, and be at liberty to exercize and enjoy the benefitte of God, for procreation of children, and the lawfull use of matrimony, necessary for the relief of man's infirmity. No man ought to inveigh at this his doinge, but rather to interpretate the same into the best parte, in that that the king's highnes had more regarde unto the weale of his soul, than to any ceremonies of mens laws, which themselves decree and ordeine: that noe man is bounde to obey them, or any other man's precept, of what dignity or preheinance soever he be, if the same do "militare, contra Deum et Conscientiam offendat: Primum etenim quaerendum est regnum Dei, &c. Et quid prodest hujusmodi, si universum mundum lucretur, animæ vero suæ detrimentum patiat, &c.?" He may also further say, that the king's highnes knoweth well, that respect is to be had unto the world, and doubteth not but that it is alsoe sufficiently declared and showed by his actes and proceedings, howe much he hath laboured and travailed therein; but sithence that these thinges, although in their outward visage be worldly, yet inwardly they touch and concerne the perill of soule, noe man being "sinceri et candidi pectoris," can arrester any blame unto the king's highnes, in that he hath after soe long travaile, labour, and studye, with intollerable coste and charges, without any fruite sustained in that behalf, be enforced and constrained rather to followe and accomlishe the determination of his own conscience, and the law of the same, consonant and agreeable in this case to the law of God, and therefore superior and excellenge all lawes of man, then to indure in perpetuall sute, and continuall trouble of body and mynde, doeing injurie to nature, and incomparable damage to his realme; not doeing soe much as in him is, to provide for the same. And to the intente the said Paget may with the more efficacy declare unto the said princes, the ungodly and unlawful demeanours of the pope, in the whoall progresse of the king's highnes said cause, handling his highnes by the space of vij years, and more, in delays and dalliance; and how for friendship and justice, he hath always ministred unto him unkindness and notable injurie: by reason whereof, the king's highnes hath bin thus constrained to doe as he hath don: the said Paget shall understande, how that first in the beginninge of his highnes greate cause, his grace beinge daily iniquited and molested with the scruple of incest and unlawfull matrimony, did send unto the said bishop, as unto him which presumed upon him the title and name of Christ's vicar in Earth; and which had the keyes of knowledge and power, to discern the very worde of God from the worde of man; to the intent that he, according to his office and duty, should have ymediatly dissolved that doubt and scruple, which his highnes in conscience had before conceived, and should have restored him incontinently to the quietnes and rest of the same. Upon which insynuation, the saide bishop of Rome refusing to take any knowledge of the king's said cause of matrimony, but would the king should take a commission, and commissioners to be sent into this his grace realme, to whom the said bishop would give sufficient authority, to decerne, knowe, judge and determyne the said cause; then pretending, that it might in noe wise by the order of the lawes be intreated at Rome, but only within the king's owne realme. And so he delegated his wholl power to the cardinal Campegius, and the cardinal of York. Giveinge alsoe unto them, one other speciall commission, in forme of a decretall: wherein the said bishop of Rome pronounced and gave sentence, that the king's highnes matrimony was utterly nought and unlawfull; and that therefore his highnes might "convolare ad secundas Nuptias;" and the children procreated in the seconde marriage were lawfull. And in this open commission, he gave alsoe unto the said legate full authority to determyne this matter, and to give sentence for the king's highnes; and yet secretly he gave them instructions, to bring the said commission decretall, and not to proceede by vertue thereof, or of any other commission, unto any final end or sentence, but to suspend and put over the same. And at the time of sendinge of the said commission, he sent alsoe down unto the king's highnes, a briefe written with his owne bande; wherein he did alsoe approve the justice of the king's cause, in like maner as he did in his commission decretall; and promised unto the king's highnes, "quam sanctissimè sub verbo Pontificis," that he would never afterwarde advocate the said cause out of the realme of Englande, but would suffer it to have the due course and order of intrateinge of the same, within the king's highnes realme; which his sentence and promise notwithstanding, yet the said bishop of Rome, contrary to his own conscience and knowledge, what was the very truth and justice in the king's highnes cause; and to the intente he might molest and trouble the same, decreed out sundry citations, whereby he would needes enforce the king's highnes to appeare at Rome in his own person, to the subversion of him, his dignity, and the privileges of his realme; or else to constreine him in the exhibition of a proxie there: the iniquity of both which things, is so evident and notable, "ut nulla rerum facie defendi queat." For it is a common principle of the lawe, "Quoties autem citatus ex Privilegio, vel aliqua alia Materia, in voce expressa, venire non tenetur, in eo casu nec tenetur aliquam sui copiam facere, neque Se, neque Procuratorem sistere." It is also notorious, that the liberties and prerogatives of the king's realme, to the observation whereof he is bounde by his oath at his coronation; and that alsoe the priviledges of princes, beinge publique persons, besides other great and urgent causes, doe necessarily let the king's person to appeare at Rome, and lawfully defendeth and excuseth his absence from thence. And besides all this, that his highnes ought not to be cited to Rome; it is enacted by the holy councilles of Nice, of Affrique, and of Melevitan; and it is agreeable alsoe to all lawes, reason, and equity, that kings should not be compelled to repair to Rome at the pope's callinge, ne be bounden in a matter of so highe weight and consequence as this is, to send out of their realmes and dominions, their writings, instrumentes, and muniments, conteynenge the secretyes of their affaires, or to make and trust a proctor in soe farr distant parts, and in a matter of such gravity and importance, to abide and fulfill that which the said proctor shall agree unto there. And hereunto the said Paget may adde, howe this matter toucheth the dignity of all Christian princes very highly, to suffer themselves to be so yoaked with the said bishop's authority. And that it is time for princes, nowe that the same bishop maketh this enterprise upon them, to inserche and knowe the grounde and bottome of his and their authorities, for what and the pope would cite and call all Christian princes to appere before him at Rome; that is to say, to cause them to abandon and forsake their owne realmes, and neglect the cure and office committed unto them by God, and to answer there upon such matters, as the pope should for his pleasure object against them? "Esset quidem illud durum; sed tamen si vellet Pontifex, hæc posset facere, qua etenim ratione unum constringere; omnes etiam Reges cogere posset:" and so it should be always in the pope's authority and libertie, to remove and depose what kings it pleased him from his crowne, and to rule and govern all kingdomes after his own arbitre and pleasure: one other notable iniquity is also in that the pope, by his citation would needs enforce the kinges highnes to appear at Rome; forasmuch as Rome is by all laws a place unlawful, yea, and thereto most suspect and unsure, not only for the kinges highnes owne person, being the principale parte, but alsoe for the person of his proctor, if he should send any such thither; and especially for the self cause to be intreated there: now, it is a principle in the lawe, "quod citando ad locum non tutum, et precedendo Index facit inique quia legibus id prohibentibus necnon antiquissimis consiliis et Pont' Romanorum definitionibus repugnantibus id facit non solum inique sed etiam nulliter facit:" and yet further, the pope not satisfied with these injuries and wronges don unto his highnes, yea, and to justice itself, in manner as is above rehearsed; but being then, and at such tyme as the said citations were published, resident at Rome, one doctor Kerne, the kinges subject, understandinge how his highnes was called there to appeare to one Cappisucchi deane of the Rota, to make answer unto the princes dowagers complainte, and exhibiting reasonable causes, and lawful matters excusatory why his grace should not be bound either to appeare at Rome, or to sende a proctor thither; which things he did as the kinges subject, and as one who by law of nature is bounden to defende his kinge and sovereigne lord; and by all laws admitted to alledge that in defence of him that is absent, which in equity ought to preserve him from condemnacion; yet this notwithstandinge, the said Cappisucchi, "idque approbante Pontifice," not regarding nor consideringe the matters soe by the said doctor Kerne alleadged, but demanding whether he had any proxie from the kinges highnes for such purpose or noe; the said Cappisucchi, for default of such proxie, (which was not necessary in this case) rejected the said doctor Kerne from the office of an excusator there, and proceeded in the principall cause, by reason whereof the said doctor Kerne appelled to the pope, alleadginge injurie to be don not only to the kinges highnes, but alsoe unto himselfe, for that such matter as he (havinge intereste in) did alleadged was not considered nor regarded, but processe made notwithstanding, to which appellation the said Cappisucchi gave an ambiguous and doubtful answer, promiseinge afterward to open his said answer and sentence more plainely, and to give determinate resolutions therein, which nevertheles he would not doe, albeit he was diverse tymes required and pressed thereunto, but soe passed he the tyme and suddenly returned to processe; whereupon the said doctor oftentimes appealed and put upp againe a supplication to the pope for the admission of the said appeal, by reason whereof the said matter was reasoned in the signature, where although by noe lawe it would be shewed why the said doctor Kerne ought not to be admitted to alleage the said matters excusatory in the defence of the kinges highnes; yet they gave their voices there as the pope saide, that doctor Kerne should not be heard without the kinges proxie; wherunto when Dr. Kerne replied, sayinge that whatsoever they decreed or saide, yet there was no lawe to maintayne and bear it: it was answered again by the said bishope, called pope, that he might judge all things after his own conscience. And upon this resolution, without any other decree given, or at least notified and declared, they proceeded in the principal cause, intendinge by this injurie and wronge to enforce the kinges highnes to the exhibition of a proxie there, to his high prejudice, and the derogation of the libertyes and prerogatives of this realme, and to the pernicious example of the like to be done unto other princes in tyme comeing. And although at the same time the kinges ambassadors there resident did shewe unto the pope the determinacion of the universities of Paris and Orleans, with the opinions and sentences of the best and most famous learned men of Italy and Fraunce, deternynning all with one consent, that these the popes doeinges were meere injuries and wronges, and contrary to his own lawes, wherein it is contained, "Quod Pontifex Romanus non potest cogere aliquem Principem Christianum ut Romam veniat, ut in Causa Matrimonii ibidem respondeat. Aut in eorum gratiam procuratorem constituat et quod subditus cujuscunque Principis poterit sine mandato et satisfactione ejusdem absencie sine non comparentie allagere et quod debeat ad id admitti: quodque propositis per eundem justis Causis absencie non poterit contra absentem Principem ulterius procedi. Sed quod omnis talis processus si quis contra eundem factus fuerat sit jure ipso facto nullus." Yet he continuynge still in the discussinge and disputacion of the same points: and perceyvinge well the kinges highnes adversaries to be in the wronge parte, did still nevertheless rejecte the said Mr. Kerne from the lawful defence of the kinges highnes, and ceased not to make processe against his grace in the principall cause, to the expresse wronge and injurie of his highnes, and soe continuynge still in accumulatteinge from tyme to tyme new griefes and injuries against the justice of the kinges cause; and sending out very slanderous griefes against the kinges highnes, with diverse other unseeminge and ungodly demeanors used by him and his ministers in the discusse and doinge of the said injuries. Finally to accomplish his longe and indurate malice, he decreed and determined to publishe out against the kinges highnes, the sentence of excommunication, and soe the kinges highnes, being advertised of the said determinacion and purpose, and mynding to use his lawefull and naturall defence of provocation and appellation against the same. After that his highnes had soe made authentiquely his said provocation and appellation from the pope to the generall counsell, which shall be nowe next indicted, and lawefully congregated; and alsoe caused the same to be intimated unto the pope by one of his subjects, the said pope would in no wise admitte the same, "et deferre hujusmodi Appellacioni," but pretendinge for his defence a certaine bull made by pope Pius, and that he was superior to all generall counsailes, did most arrogantly and contemptuously rejecte the kinges highnes said appellacions, alleadginge the same to be nought; and they were heretiques and traytors to his person, which would appeal from him to any generall counsell, or would attempt to doe any thing whereby his authority should be seene to be inferior unto the authority of generall counsells.

The iniquity of all which things bringe thus opened unto the said princes, and sett forth by the said Pagett, with the best persuasions he can devise for that purpose, he shall further shewe unto the same, that thence it is now evidently seene that the said bishop of Rome for the defence of his own corrupt affections of glorie and ambition, regardeth not what injurie he doth to Christian princes, yea, and to abuse and subject so much as in him is, not only contrary to the trueth, but alsoe to the due order both of God and mans lawes, sheweinge himself therein rather to be the child of wrath and discorde, then the imitator and follower of Christ; it shall nowe apperteyne unto the office of every good Christian prince on tother side, to have more spirituall regarde to the preservation of their one estate and dignity, and the maintenance of God's lawes, then they have had in times past. And to study nowe by all means rather to confounde and destroy these presumptions of men, which forge themselves such a throne and power as soundeth greatly to the blasphemy of Christ and his very spouse the church, then to suffer the same any further to encrease.

And forasmuch as the kinges highnes not only for want of justice in his said cause at the popes hande, but also for the defence of those extreme injuries, which the said pope hath enforced unto him and the justice of his cause, and for the maintenance of his estate royal, with the lawes and privileges of his realme, conforme and agreeable to the lawe of God, is nowe utterly determined, havinge God and his word upon his party, to resist and withstand the said bishops malicious attempts and reduce the said popes power, "Ad justos et legitimos mediocritatis sue modos," so as within this his highnes realme, he shall not be suffered to exercise any other power and jurisdiction, then is granted unto him by expresse Scripture. The said Paget shall shewe unto the said princes; that the kinges highnes trustinge not a little to their greate vertue, wisdom, and oulde amity, hath commaunded him not only to open and declare unto the said princes the wholl circumstances of all the premisses, and of what mynd and disposicion the kinges highnes is nowe towarde the said pope, and the court of Rome: but alsoe to exhorte and instantly to require the same on the kinges highnes behalf, that it shall please them to adhere and sticke with the kinges highnes in his said righteous cause to the repaire of the said injuries at such tyme as the same shall be intricated in the general counsell. And in the mean season to give unto his highnes their assistance and best advice how he shall procede to the accomplishment of his desired purposes, according to such articles, as be written in a certaine scedule and be delivered unto the said Paget, and signed with the kinges highnes hand, which he shall also exhibite and shewe unto the said princes; and to every of them, as by his wisdom he shall perceive may be most beneficiall unto the kinges highnes affaires: and to require also the said princes and potentates, that in case there be any articles, causes, or matters in those parties touchinge any abuses, evil customes, or opinions, which for the common-wealth of Christendom, and the maintenance of Gods worde the said prince and potentate, or any of them, shall think necessary and requisite to be reformed and redressed, the said Paget shall say that the kinges mynde and full determination is, his highnes beinge advertised of the specialities of the same, either by the letters of the said Paget, or otherwise by letters of the same princes, or by the messengers, servants, or orators of them, or any of them, will not faile, but like as the same his highnes at this time declareth his griefes, and desireth their assistance in this his suit and righteous causes and quarrels, even so likewise his highnes will not only right thankfully and kindly admitte the same causes, to his most favourable audience; but alsoe will with all effecte and sincerity to him possible, indevour himself both to the extirpacion and puttinge away of the said abuses and evil customes soundinge against Gods worde and lawes, and also further doe that thing that may lye in him for reformation thereof, and establishinge the good intentes and purposes of the said princes, as most specially may be for the maintenance of Gods word, the faith of Christ, and wealth of Christendome, like as unto the office of a very Christian prince, and the perfectnes of amity and friendship contracted betweene his highnes and the said princes shall apperteine. Finallie, for as much as it is doubtfull of what minde, intention, and purpose, the said princes be or at least some of them, that is to witte, whether they be soe dedicated to the popes devotion, that there is no likelihood of any good success touchinge the kings purposes to be don or gotten at their hande, the said Paget shall first and before the delivering of the kinges said letters to any of the said princes, and declaration of this his charge, by all dexterity, wayes and means to him possible insearch, inquire, and knowe the disposicion and inclination of the said prince, and of every of them severally, and soe thereafter accordinge to their wisdomes and discretions to deliver or retaine the kinges said letters, with declarations or without declarations of their said charge, as to their wisdomes shall be thought most necessary and requisite for atchievinge of the king's highnes purposes in this behalf.

NUMBER XXXI.

Propositions to the King's Counsell; marked in some places on the margin in King Henry's own Hand. 1533.—An Original.

[Cotton Library, Cleop. E. 6, p. 319.]

FIRSTE, To sende for all the bishops of this realme, and speccyalle for such as be nerest unto the courte, and to examyne them aparte, whether they, by the lawe of God, can prove and justefie that he that now is called the pope of Rome is above the general counsell, or the generall counsell above him? Or whether he hath gyven unto him by the law of God any more auctoryte within the realme, than any other foreign bishop?

2. Item. To desire, with all the bishops of this realm, to set forth, preach, and cause to be preached to the king's people, that the said bishop of Rome, called the pope, is not in auctoryte above the generall counselle, but the generall counsell is above him, and all bishops. And that he hath not, by God's lawe, any more jurisdiction within this realme, than any other foreign bishop (being of any other realme) hath. And that such auctoryte as he before this hath usurped within this realme, is both against Godes law and also against the generall counsells. Which usurpations of auctorite onlie hath grown to him, by the sufferance of princes of this realme, and by none auctoryte from God.

3. Item. Therefore that order be taken, for suche as shall preach at Paul's Cross from henceforthe, shall contynually, from Sunday to Sunday, preach there, and also teache and declare to the people that he that now calleth himself pope, nor any of his predecesours, is, and were but only the bishops of Rome; and hath no more auctorite and jurisdiction, by Godes lawe, within this realme, than any other foreign bishop hath—which is nothing at all. And that such auctoryte as he hath claymed heretofore, hath been onlie by usurpation and sufferance of prynces of this realme. And that the bishop of London may be bounde to suffer none other to preach at Paul's Cross, as he will answer, but such as will preach and set forth the same.

9. Item. Proclamations to be made thorough out the realme, conteyning the hole acte of appeles: and that the same acte may be impressed, transumed, and set up on every church dore in England, to the intent that no parson, vycar, curate, nor any other of the king's subjects shall make themselves ignorant thereof.

10. Item. The king's provocation and appellations, made from the bishop of Rome unto the general counsell, may also be transumed, impressed, published, and set up on every church dore in England, to the intent that if any censures should be fulmynate against the king or his realm, that then it may appear to all the world, that the censures be of none effecte; considering that the king hathe already, and also before any censures promulged, bothe provoked and appealed.

11. Item. Like transumpt to be made, and sent into all other realmes and domynions, and specially into Flanders, concerning the king's saide provocations and appellations; to the intente the falshode, iniquite, malice, and injustice of the bishop of Rome may thereby appere to all the world: and also to the intent that all the world may know, that the king's highnes standing under those appeles, no censures can prevayle, nor take any effecte against him and his realme.

For to send letters 13. Item. To sende exploratours to my lord Dacres, and espies into Scotland, and to see my lord of Northumberland and perceyve their practises, and what folk, and sir T. they intend there, and whether they Clifford. will confeder themselves with any other outwarde prynce.

A Letter against the Pope's Authority, and his Followers, setting forth their treasons.—An Original.

[Cott. Libr. Cleop. E. 6, p. 214.]

BY THE KING.

HENRY R.—Trusty and right welbeloved, we grete you well. And wheras heretofor, as ye know, both upon most just and vertuose fundations, grownded upon the lawes of Almighty God and holly Scripture, and also by the deliberate advice, consultation, consent and agreement, as well of the bishops and clergie as by the nobles and comons temporall of this our realme, assembled in our high court of parliament, and by auctoritie of the same, the abuses of the bishop of Rome, his auctoritie and jurisdiction, of long time usurped against us, have been not only utterly extirped, abolished and secluded; but also the same our nobles and comons, both of the clergie and temporalitie, by another severall acte and upon like fundation for the publique weale of this our realme, have united, knyt, and annexed to us and the corone imperiall of this our realme, the title, dignitie, and stile of Supreme Hed in earthe, immediatly under God, of the church of England, as undoubtedly evermore we have been. Which things also the said bishops and clergie, particularly in their convocations, have holly and enterly consented, recognised, ratified, conferred and approved autentiquely in writing, both by their speciall othes, profession and writing, under their signes and seales. So utterly renouncing all other othes, obedience, and jurisdiction, either of the said bishop of Rome, or of any other potentate, we late you witt, that perpendyng and consideryng the charge and commission in this behalf given unto us by Almighty God, together with the great quietnes, rest and tranquillite, that hereby may ensue to our faithful subjects, both in their consciences and other wise to the pleasure of Almighty God, in case the said bishops and clergie of this our realme should sincerely, truly, and faithfully sett forth, declare and preach unto our said subjects, the very true word of God, and without all manner or color of dissimulation, hypocrisis, manifest, publishe, and declare the great and innumerable enormities and abuses which the said bishop of Rome, as well in title and stile as also in auctoritie and jurisdiction, of long tyme unlawfully and unjustly hath usurped upon us, our progenitors, and all other Christen prynces, have not only addressed our letters general to all and every the same bishops, straitly charging and commanding them, not only in their proper persons, to declare, teach, and preach unto the people, the true, mere, and sincere word of God; and how the said title, stile, and jurisdiction of supreme hed, apperteyneth unto us, our corone and dignitie royall. And to gyve like varynyng, monition, and charge, to all abbots, priors, deanes, arche deacons, provosts, parsons, vicars, curats, scole masters, and all other ecclesiastical persons within their dioces, to do the semblable in their churches every Sunday and solemn feast, and also in their scoles; and to cause all maner of prayers, orisons, rubrics, and canons in masse books, and all other bookes used in churches, wherein the said bishop is named, utterly to be abolished, eradicat, and rased out in such wise, as the said bishop of Rome, his name and memorie for evermore (except to his contumely and reproche) may be extinct, suppressed, and obscured ; but also to the justices of our peas, that they, in every place within the precinct of their commissions, do make and cause to be made diligent serche wayse and especially, whether the said bishops and clergie do truly and sincerely, without any maner cloke, or dissimulation, execute and accomplish their said charge to them comytted in this behalf ; and to satisfie us and our counsell, of such of them that should omitt or leave undone any parte of the premisses, or elles in the execution therof, should coldely, fainedly use any maner of synister addition, interpretation or cloke, as more plainly is expressed in our said letters. We considering the great good and furdurance that ye may do in these matters in the parts about you, and specially at your being at sises and sessions ; in the declaration of the premisses, have thought it good, necessary, and expedient to write these our letters unto you ; whom we esteeme to be of such singuler zeale and affection towards the glory of Almighty God, and of so faithfull and loving harte towards us, as ye woll not only, with all your wisdome, diligences, and labours, accomplish all such things as might be to the preferment and setting forward of Gode's worde, and the amplification, defence, and maintenance of our said interests, right, title, stile, jurisdiction, and auctoritie, apperteyning unto us, our dignitie, prerogative, and corone imperiall of this our realme, woll and desire you, and nevertheles straitely charge and command you, that laying aparte all vain affections, respects, and carnal considerations ; and setting before your eyes the mirror of truth, the glorie of God, the right and dignitie of your soveraigne lord ; thus tending to the inestimable unitie and commo- ditie both of yourself, and all other our loving and faithfull subjects, ye do not only make diligent search within the precinct of your commission and aucto- ritie, whether the said bishops and clergie doe truly, sincerely as before, preach and teach, and declare to the people the premisses, according to their duties, but also at your said setting in sises and sessions ye do persuade, shewe, and declare unto the same people the tenor, effect, and purpose of the premisses in such wise, as the said bishops and clergie may the better not only do thereby, and execute their said duties, but that also the parents and rulers of families may declare, teach, and informe their children and servants in the specialties of the same, to the utter extirpacion of the said bishop's usurped authority, name, and jurisdiction ; for ever shewyng and declaring also to the people at your said sessions the treasons trayterously comytted against us and our lawes by the late bishop of Rochestre and sir Thomas Moore, knight, who thereby, and by diverse secrete practices of their malicious myndes against us, intended to semynate, engender, and brede amongs our people and subjects most mischievous and sedicious opynyon, not only to their own confusion, but also of divers others who lately have condignely suffered execution according to their demerites, and in such wise dilating the same with persuacions to the same our people, as they may be the better fixed, established, and satisfied in the truth, and consequently, that all our faithfull and true subjects may therby detest and abhorre, in their harts and deede, the most recreant and traiterouse abuses and behavours of the said malicious malefactors as they be most worthy, and fyndyng any defaulte, negligence, or dissimulacion in any manner of person or persons, not doyng his dutie in this partie, ye immediately doe advertise us and our counsel of the defaulte, manner, and facion of the same, lating you witt, that consider- ing the greate moment, weight, and importance of this matter, as wherupon dependeth the unity, rest, and quietnes of this our realme, yf ye should, contrary to your duties and our expectations and trust, neglect, be slake, or omytte to doe diligently your duties in the true performance and execution of our mynde, pleasure, and commandment as before, or wold halte or stumble at any person, or specialtie of the same, be ye assured that we, like a prince of justice, well so punish and correct your defaulte and negligence thereyn, as it shall be an example to all others, how contrary to their allegiance, othes, and duties, they do frustrate and deceive, and disobey the just and lawfull commandment of their soveraign lord, in such things, as by the true, hartie, and faithfull execution whereof, they shall not only prefer the honour and glory of God, and sett forth the majesty and imperiall dignitie of their soveraign lord, but also importe and bring an inestimable unitie, concorde, and tranquillitie of the publike, and common state of this realme : whereunto both by the lawes of God, and nature, and man, they be utterly obliged and bounden, and therefore fail ye not most effectually, earnestly, and entierly to see the premisses done and executed upon paine of your allegiance ; and as ye woll advoyde our high indignacion and displeasure at your uttermost perils. Given under our signet at our manor, besids Westminster, the xxvth day of June.

A Proclamation against Seditious Preachers.

[Cott. Libr. Cleop. E. 6.]

BY THE KING.

HENRY VIIIth.—Right trusty and well-beloved cousyn, we grete you well, and where it is comen to our knowledge that sundry persons aswel religious, as secular priests and curats in their parishes, and divers places within this our realme, do daily, asmuch as in them is, sett forth and extolle the jurisdiction and auctoritie of the bishop of Rome, otherwise called pope, sowyng their sedicious, pestylent, and false doctryne, praying for him in the pulpyt, and makyng him a God, to the great deceyte, illudgyng and seducyng of our subjects, bryngyng them into errors, sedicion, and evil opynyons, more preferring the powers, lawes, and jurisdiction of the said bishop of Rome, then the most holly lawes and precepts of Almighty God. We therefore myndyng not only to provide for an unitie and quietnes, to be had and continued amongs our said subjects, but also covetyng and desyryng them to be brought to a profession and knowledge of the mere verity and truth, and no longer to be seduced, nor blynded with any such supersticious and false doctryne of any earthly usurper of God's lawes, woll therefore and command you, that wher and whensoever ye shall fynde, perceive, know, or here tell of any such sedicious personnes, that in such wise do spreade, teach, or preach, or otherwise sett forth any such opynions and pernicious doctryne, to the exaltacion of the power of the bishop of Rome : brynging therby our subjects into error, grudge, and murmuration, indelaydly do apprehend and take them, or cause them to be apprehended and taken, and so committed to warde, there to remayne without bayl or maynprize, untill upon your advertisement thereof unto us, or our council, ye shall know our further pleasure in that behalfe. Given under our signet at our manor of Grenewich, the xii day of April.

NUMBER XXXIV.

A Letter of the Archbishop of York's, setting forth his Zeal in the King's Service, and against the Pope's Authority.

[Cott. Lib. Cleop. E. 6, p. 236.]

PLEASE it youre highnes to understande, that the viiith daye of June, I received by the hands of sir Francis Bygott, your moste honorable letters; by tenor whereof I perceive, that your highnes is enformed, and so doth take it, that wher as the same your highnes, as well by convocations of your clergies of both provinces, as by your highe courte of parliament is declared the supreme hed in yerthe of the church of England, and also by the clergie of the said convocations, it is avowed, that the bishop of Rome by God's lawe hathe no more jurisdiction within this realme than any other foreign bishope; and therefore ordre taken by your highe courte of parliament, by the consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commens in the same assembled, as well for the unitynge and knittenge of your sayde style and title of supreme hed to your imperiall crowne, as for the abolishment of the saide bishope of Rome's autoritie and jurisdiction, yet I nevertheless, nodre remembering my consent given to the same, by my subscription and profession, signed with my hande, and sealed with my seal, have not done my dewe endeavourment to teache the same, nor cause to be taught within my diocese and province; so that the foresaid truths myght be imprinted and rooted in the harts of the ignorant people your highnes' subjects, wherefore your highnes commandeth me, not onlie to preache the forsaide things in my person, and also to commande others to preache the same, but also to give commandment in your highnes' name, to all maner of prelates and ecclesiastical persons within my diocese and province, to declare and cause to be declared everie Sunday; and therewith to open to the people your highnes' just and raysonable cause, movinge the same to refuse and to exclude out of your realm all the jurisdiction and autoritie of the said bishop of Rome; and fethermore your highnes commandeth me to cause all collectes and places of the masse-booke wher anie mention is made of the saide bishope of Rome to be rased out, and nodre the sayd collectes, nor any other thing, wherbie the said bishop's autoritie is magnified, to be had anie more in use, but to be utterlic suppressed with silence; and besides this, your highnes, in the same your most honorable letters, giveth order for scole-masters, how they shall instill and inculke the forsaide truths into the harts of theyre disciples, to the intent, that so beeing enplanted and rooted in tender aige, they may so alwaies continue. In moste humble maner prostrate, I beseech your highnes to take in good parte my answer. I trust your highnes is not unremembered, that about this tyme the last year, anoune after my return from your highnes, my lord of Canterburie by your commandment sent to me a booke, wherein was an order for preacheing, and in the same forme devised, as well for preachers as curats, for the beads; in which forme, your highnes' style of supreme hedde is mentioned, and fether in the same booke, your highnes hath given commandment, that every preacher sholde afore Easter last past ones in solempe audience declare the usurped jurisdiction within this realme of the bishope of Rome, and your highnes' just causes to decline from the same; and also to open and declare such things, as myght avowe and justifie your highnes' refusall of marriage with the princes doager, and lawfull contract of now with your most dear wife queen Ann, and in the same an order also given for the suppression of the generall sentence; after the recepte of which booke, the Sunday next following, which was then the second Sunday after Trinitie Sunday, I went from Cawood to York, and ther in my own person declared as well your highnes' cause touching the matrimonie, as also your refusall of the pope's jurisdiction, furnishinge both so at length, that I trust that nothing that needed to be opened and spoken was left unspoken: and to the intent, that I wolde have the thing the more spred abroad, I forthwith, upon the recepte of the forsaide booke, sent to York to publishe ther, that I wolde be ther Sundaye followinge, and cawsed the churches to make an order of theyre service, in suche tyme, as everie man myght have oportunities to be at the sermon, and speciallic required the mayer and his bretherne, and your faithfull chaplaine and servants Mr. Magnus and sir George Lawson to be ther, and ther and than afore a great multitude, and as it is to be supposed in that multitude werr a great number of sundry parts of the contree, which never lack in that citie, it may be thought ther was the greater number, because it was noysed that I sholde preache, takenge occasion of theses words in the gospell of that daye, "Uxorem duxi ideo non possum venire," so I uttered, explained, declared, and opened both the forsaide matters, and the injuries doon to your highnes by the bishope of Rome Clement, that your saide chapleyn and servants, Mr. Magnus and sir George Lawson, thought that the audience was satisfied. These ij bec my witnesse hearin, with a very great multitude besides them, that I nothinge fayne heerin. As for your highnes' title of supreme hed, I touched not than, for somutche, as no order was given than, but onlie to meke mention therof in the prayers; and it is well known to all that have herde me preache ever sins my first commynge into my diocese, that for more speed of tyme, and more utterance of mater, I never have made prayours in any sermond, but proceeded forward without stoppe, nor have anie thinge, or not muche, rehersed in Latin, but English it in course, for the same purpose. Also upon the receipt of the same booke, forthwith I commanded my officers and others that coule write, to make out a great number of the snide books, and cause to be delivered to everie preacher within my dyocese a hole booke, chargege them, to doe according to the instruction therof, and generallie everie curate a booke comprisenge as muche as touched theyre charge, and if he were a preacher, he had the hole. And I assured your highnes, I have not yet herde, but that every one of the said curats foloweth theyre books in everie poynte; and speciallic praye for your highnes as chief hedde of the church, and all other things observe in the same; and yet I have done my diligence to herken and know if it were otherwise. And I doe not know but all the preachers have done theyre dutie; and to the great number of them I spake my selfe, and delivered them books, and charged them. And fether, I charged all curatts and others, that they sholde suffer no man to preache in theyr churches; to the intent, that all that would preache should be constrained to come to me, that I might deliver them the forsaide instructions. And never yet anie had licence of me to preache, but he had suche a book delivered hym. To every house of fryars, and other religiouse houses, wher anie preachers werr, I gave books; and likewise to all that I knewe, or coule learne to be within my dyocese, with charge that they sholde folow the booke. When anie religiouse men came to me for counsell, I told them what I had done, and gave them counsell to doe the same. Of divers sorts have come to me, both Observants and Cartusians, and others. Opon Good Frydaye last past, I charged the treasurer of Yorke, that he sholde leave out the collect "pro Papa." Lykewies I charged the deacon that songe the hymne "Exultet Angelica," in the halowinge of the paschall, that he sholde leave out mention therein made "de Papa." The trueth of all these things may be examined and known, if it shall so please your highnes: by wiche it shall appear, I trust, that I ame not in suche blame as your highnes imputethe to me; enforced by them, peradventure, that be not my friends. Your highnes somewhat knoweth me. I have been allwayes open and plain, and hidreto I dare avowe I never deceived you, nor herafter shall in any thing that I take upon me, as my lernynge and conscience woll serve. And now, after the receipte of your most honorable letters by sir Francis Bygott, I forthwith caused letters to be made to my lord of Duresme and Carlisle, and to all archedeacons, gevinge to them (on your highnes' behalf) streight commandement, to follow truelie and syncerlie theeffecte of suche commandements, as your highnes hath given me in your most honourable letters; and have charged all archedeacons to see, that all things, according to the tenor of your saide most honorable commandment, bee done without delaye; and have charged them to deliver books to all curats and others, of the olde instructions, putting to them all that is nowe increased in these your highnes' last most honorable letters: so that I trust, all things shall bee done according to your highnes' commandment, with all speed, efficacie, and diligence, whereunto I shall hearken. And for my parte, I have (on Sunday last past, which next followed the receipte of your highnes' most honourable letters) declared all things comprised in the same; so that, I trust, the audience was satisfied. I caused the citie to be warned afore, and diverse of the contree were present. And your faythfull chapleigne and servants, Magnus and sir George Lawson, I specially required to be ther; as in deed they werr, and can reoport what they think therof. Ther werr also present the abbot of Saincte Maries of Yorke, the treasurer of Yorke, sir Francis Bygott; these werr there, your servants and chapleignes, and many others. I trust your highnes shall never fynde in me, but that I promise I shall fulfill, and all things doe with good haste, that I may doe, at your highnes' commandment, God not offended. And most humble prostrate, I besече your highnes to be so graciouse, good Lord, not to beleive any complaints of me, afore you have herde my answer. The tyme is now suche, that some men think they doo highe sacrifice, whan they may bring into your highnes' displeasure such a poor priest as I am: but I trust in our Lorde, that your highnes dothe not soe take it, and that our Lorde woll continue your highnes' graciouse mynde towards your poore preests and chapleignes; and that he shall sende to them, that cawleslie provoke the grevouse displeasure of your highnes against our saide preests, better grace hereafter. For which, and for the continuall keeping of your highnes in his governaunce, I shall, as I am most bounde, continuallie praye. From Bishops-Thorpe, the xivth of June, 1535.

Your highnes most humble preest and headman,
EDWARDE EBOR'.

NUMBER XXXV.

A Letter of Cromwell's to the King's Ambassador in France, full of Expostulations.

[Ex MS. Rymeri.]

August the 23d.

SIR,—After my most heartie recommendations, these shall be to advertise you, that the 17th day of this moneth I receyved from you a packet of letters, which indelayedlie I delyvred unto the king's highnes, and conferred with his grace. Theeffecte both of your letters, and all others within the saide packet, being directed aswell to his highnes as to me. And after his highnes had with me perused the hole contents thoroughlie of your saide letters, perceyving not onelie the lykelyhood of the not repairee into Fraunce of Philip Melanchthon, but also your communications had with the French king, upon your demaunde made of the king's highnes' pencions, with also your discrete answers and replications made in that behalf; for the which his majestee gyveth unto you his hertie and condigne thanks. Ye shall understande, that his highnes comaunded me to make you answer in this wise folowing. First, as touching the king's money, his highnes doubtith not, but seeing both the French king, and also the grete mayster, have promised you it shall be depeched; ye will, as the case shall requyre, not cease to call upon them till it be depeched. And fether considering, that the said French king, upon youre saide demaunde of the saide pencions, so sodaynelye fell into communication with you, aswell of his frendshipp and humanyte shewed to the king's highnes; alledging, that he at all tymes hath answered for the king's highnes, specially being last at Marcells with pope Clement, with other thyngs, as in your saide letters appereth. As also concernyng the executions lately done here within this realme, the king's highnes not a little mervailleth thereat, and thinketh it good, that as of your self ye take some occasion at convenient tyme and oportunte to renovate the saide communication, both with the French king, or at the leest with the grete maister; saying unto them, that where the saide French king alledgeth, that he hath at all tymes answered for the kyng's highnes in his cause; and specially to the saide pope Clement at Marcells; affirmyng his procedyngs to be just and upright concernyng the matrymony, as ye do wryte in that. Albeit the king's highnes' proceedings, in all his affaires within this realme, being of such equyte and justnes of themself as they be, nedeth not any defence or assistance ayenst pope Clement, or any other foreyn power, having Godde's worde and lawes only sufficient to defende him; yet in that that the saide French kyng hath, as he sayeth, answered at all tymes on the king's parte, he hath don nothing but the parte of a brother, in justifying and vereyfing the trueth; and so continuing, shall do as appertenyth to a prynce of honour, which the king's highnes doubtith not he hath, and will doe only in respecte to the veryte and trewth, besid the amyte betwixt them both justlye requyryng the same. And concernyng the executions don within this realme, ye shall sey to the saide French kyng, that the same were not so marvelous extreme as he alledgeth. For touching Mr. Moore and the bishop of Rochester, with suche others as were executed here, their treasons, conspiracies, and practises secretly practysyd, aswell within the realme as without, to move and styrrer discension, and to sowe sedycion within the realme, intending thereby not onelie the destruction of the kyng, but also the whole subversion of his highnes' realme, being explained and declared, and so manifestly proved afore them, that they could not avoyde nor denye it: and they thereof openly detected, and lawfully convicted, adjudged, and condempned of high treason, by the due order of the lawes of this realme, it shall and may well appere to all the worlde, that they having such malice roted in their herts agenst their prynce and sovereigne, and the totall destruction of the comen weale of this realme, were well woerthie, if they had had a thousand lyses, to have suffered ten tymes a more terrible deth and execution then any of them did suffer. And touching suche wordes as the saide French king spake unto you, concerning how Mr. More dyed, and what he saide to his daughter going to his judgement, and also what exhortations he should gyve unto the kyng's subjects, to be trew and obedient to his grace, assuring you that there was no such thing, whereof the grete master promysed you a double at length : in that the king's pleasure is, that ye shall not onelie procure the saide double, and send it hither, but also sey unto the saide French king, that the king's highnes cannot otherwise take it but verye unkyndly, that the saide French king, or any of his counsaile, at whose hands he hathe so moche meryted, and to whom he hathe mynstered so many grete benefits, pleasures, and commodytæes, shoulde so lightly gyve eare, faith, and credence, to any such vayne brutes and fleeing tales ; not havyn first knowlege or advertisement from the king's highnes here, and his counsaile, of the veryte and trewth ; affirming it to be the office of a freinde, hering any suche tales of so noble a prynce, rather to have compressed the bruters thereof to sylence, or at the leest not permitted to have dyvulged the same, untill such tyme as the king's majestee being so dere a frende had ben advertesed thereof, and the trewth knownen, before he shoulde so lightly beleve or alledge any suche reporte. Which ingrate and unkynde demeaure of the saide French king, used in this behalf, argueth playnly not to remayn in his brest such integryte of herte and syncere amyte towards the king's highnes and his proceedings, as his highnes always heretofore hathe expected and loked for : which thing ye may propone and alledge unto the saide French king, and the grete master, or to one of them, with suche modestie and sobrenes, as ye thinke they may perceyve that the king's highnes hathe good and just cause in this parte, somewhat to take their light credence unkyndly. And whereas the saide French king sayeth that touching such lawes as the king's holynes hathe made, he will not medle withall ; alledging it not to be mete, that one prynce should desire another to chaunge his lawes ; sayeing that his be too olde to be chaunged. To that ye shall say, that such lawes as the king's highnes hath made here be not made without substauycall grounds, by grete and mature advise, counsaile, and deliberation of the hole polycie of this realme, and are in dede no new lawes, but of grete antiquyte, and many yeres passed, were made and executed within this realme, as now they be renovate and renewed onlie in respecte to the comen weale of the same. And it is not a little to his highnes' mervule, that the saide French king ever would counsaile or advise him, if in case hereafter any such like offenders should happen to be in this realme, that he should rather banysh them, than in such wise execute them. And speyciallie considering, that the saide French king himself, in comonyng with you at the tyme, not only confessed the extreme execucyons and grete bruyllie of late dou in his realme, but also that he now intendeth to withdraw the same, and to revoke and call home agayn suche as be out of his realme: the king's highnes, therefore, the more straungely taketh his saide advise and counsaile, supposing it to be neither thoffice of a frend, nor of a brother, that he would determyn himself to call home into his realme agayn his subjects being out of the same, for speking agenst the bishop of Rome's usurped auctorite, and counsaile the king's highnes to banyshe his traytours into straunge parts, where they myght have good occasion, tyme, place, and opportuynyte to wourke their feats of treason and conspiracie the better agaynst the king's highnes and this his realme : in whiche parte ye shal somewhat engreve the matier after suche sorte as it may well appere to the saide French king, that not only the king's highnes might take those his counsailes and communications both straungely and unkyndely, thinking the same not to procede of mere amyte and friendship, but also using such polycie and austeryte in proponyng the same with the said French king, and the grete maister, taking such tyme and opportuynyte as may best serve for the same, as they may well perceyve the king's highnes' proceedings here within the realme, both concerning the saide execucyons and all other things to be onely grounded uppon justice and the equyte of his lawes, which be no new lawes, but ancycet lawes made and established of many yeres, passed within this realme, and now renovate and renewed as it is aforsaide, for the better order, weale, and suretie of the same. And ye may further say, that if the French king and his counsaile well consyder, as they ought to do, that it were moch better to advance the punyshment of traytours and rebels, for their offences, then to ponyshe such as do speke agenst the usurped auctorite of the bishop of Rome, who daylie goeth unto suppress and subdue kyngs and prynces, and their auctoritee gyven to them by Godde's worde ; all which matiers the kinge's pleasure is, that ye shall take tyme and occasion, as ye talkyng agayn with the French king, or the grete maister may declare your mynd, as before is prescribed unto you : adding thereunto such matier with such reasons, after your accustomed dexteryte and discretion, as ye shall thinke most expedient, and to serve best for the king's purpose, defence of his proceedings, and the profe of the French king's ingratitude, shewed in this behalf ; not doubting in your wisdom, good industrie, and discrete circumspection, for thordering and well-handelling of the same accordinglie.

And touching Melanchton, considering there is no likelehood of his repayree into Fraunce, as I have well perceived by your letters, the king's highnes therfore hathe appointed Cristofer Mount, indelaiedlie to take his journey where Melanchton is : and if he can, to prevente monsieur de Langie in suche wise, as the said Melanchton his repayree into Fraunce may be stayed and dyverted into England, not doubting but the same shall take effecte accordinglie.

And as to Mr. Heynes, the king's pleasure is that he shall go to Parys, there to lerne and dissipre the oppynyons of the lerned men, and their inclinations and affections aswell towards the kyng's highnes proceedings, as to the bishop of Rome his usurped power and auctorite, after such sorte as the king's saide highnes hathe now wrytten to hym, by his gracious letters addressed both to him and the said Cristofer Mount, dyrecting them what they shall doe in all thyngs commytted to their charge at this tyme, as I doubt not they will put there unto their devoires for the accomplishment of the king's pleasure as apperteyneth. And thus makyng an ende, prayeng you to use your discretion in the proponing of the premisses to the French king, and the grete master, or the one or both of them, using the same as a medecyn, and after such sorte, that as nere as ye can, it be not moch displeasently taken, advertesing the king's highnes from tyme to tyme of the successes therof ; and of all other occurraunts as the case shall require. I shall for thys tyme bid you most hertelie farewell, &c.

Thornebery, the 23d day of August.

The Engagement sent over by the French King to King Henry, promising that he would adhere to him, in condemning his First, and in justifying his Second Marriage.

FRANCISCUS DEI GRATIA Francorum Rex Christianissimus, omnibus et singulis presentes Lecturis et Audituris salutem. Non honoris solum nostri, verum etiam officii et pietatis ratio illud à nobis efflagitat, ut non modo fortunas, sed etiam fidem, auctoritatem, gratiam, et studium omne nostrum adhibeamus, ne cum amici longe charissimi, et de nobis optimè meriti, injuria, justitia etiam et veritas negligantur. Hinc est quod cum Serenissimus et Inuictissimus Princeps Henricus Dei Gratia Angliæ Rex, Fidei Defensor, Dominus Hiberniæ, et Secundum Deum, Supremum in Terris Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Caput, Charissimus Frater ac Consanguineus et perpetuus Confederatus noster, vigore ejusdem dispensacionis à bonæ memoriæ Julio papa, illius nominis secundo, cum nobili Muliere Catherina, preclaræ memoriæ Ferdinandi et Elisabeth Hispaniarum Regum, Filia, ac preclaræ memoriæ Illustris Principis Arthuri, dicti sereniss. Regis Henrici Fratris Naturalis et Legitimi, relicta, Matrimonium olim de facto contraxerit, et ex eadem in eodem pretensio Matrimonio, Filiam adhuc superstitem Mariam nomine susceperit, cumque idem Serenissimus Rex dicti incesti Matrimonii conscientia motus, à prefata Domina Catherina diverterit, ac justissimus gravissimisque de Causis, nobis etiam satis cognitis et perspectis, ad id inductus, Matrimonium cum Clarissima et Nobilissima Domina Anna nunc Angliæ Regina, rite, legitime et realiter mieri, contraxerit, et in facie Ecclesiæ solemnizaverit, et Preclarissimam Dominam Elizabeth Angliæ Principem ex eadem et in eodem Matrimonio Procreaverit, et susceperit, cumque preterea super illius Dispensationis et Matrimonii viribus ac justitia, necnon super dictæ Domine Mariæ Legitimitate et natalium defectu, multæ gravesque questiones subortæ fuerint, in quibus tractandis ac in judicio et veritate discutiendis, nos bene multis Argumentis perspeximus, non eam (quam oportuit) equitatis rationem ab ipso Pontifice Romano habitam fuisse; et multa sive temporum iniquitate sive hominum vitio contra omne jus phasque in premissis et circa ea definita. Voluimus in hac Causa tam gravi integerimos quosque Regni nostri viros, ac non modo in Sacra Theologia Peritissimos, verum etiam juris Ecclesiastici Callentissimos consulere: quibus etiam Mandavimus ut quid in tota hac Causa Secundam Deum et conscientiam sentirent, fideliter nobis referrent atque responderent. Ac denique cum non solum multi ex Reverendissimis Romanæ sedis Cardinalibus inter quos imprimis fuit Cardinales ille quondam Aucumtans, verum etiam nuper bonæ memoriæ Clemens Papa Septimus, ex certa et deliberata Animi sui Sententia, cum nobis ipsis Marsiliæ tunc existentibus, tum alias sæpe Oratoribus nostris tunc Romæ agentibus, palam ac vivæ vocis sue oraculo confessus sit, et expresse declaravit se sentire, dictam Dispensationem et Matrimonium cum dicta Domina Catherina contractum, fuisse et esse nulla prorsus, et de jure invalida, quodque eadem sic fuisse et esse per suam sententiam definitam seu finale decretum, declarasset, pronunciasset, et definitivisset si privati quidam affectus et respectus humani non obstitissent. Nos igitur Franciscus Francorum Rex antedictus, ut justum veritati suffragium serentes, simul et justissime charissimi Fratris nostri Causæ patrocinemur, notum facimus et in publicam testationem deduci volumus, per presentes, quod nos primam quidem dictam dispensationem quæ a dicto Julio Secundo ut predicatur emanavit, nullam prorsus ac minus validam, et ex dictis causis inefficacem irritam et inanem fuisse semper, et esse, deinde ipsum Matrimonium quod ejusdem Dispensationis virtute cum dicta Domina Catherina olim de facto contractum fuit, incestuosum, nullum ac omnino illegitimum, ac naturali Juri et Divinæ contrarium fuisse et esse, ac pro incestuoso, nullo minusque legitimo haberi debere: denique dictam Dominam Mariam ex eo Matrimonio ut premititur susceptam, prorsus illegitimum et ad succedendum in Paterna Hereditate prorsus inhabilem fuisse et esse, et pro tali haberi censerique debere, reputamus, acceptamus, judicamus, asserimus, censemus et affirmamus. Quodque non solum omnia et singula quæ dictus Serenissimus Rex et Charissimus Frater noster, pro confirmando et stabilendo hujusmodi Matrimonio suo quod cum prefata Illustrissima Domina Anna Angliæ Regina contraxit, necnon predictæ Domine Elisabeth Filie suæ, ac aliorum liberorum qui ex hoc Matrimonio procreabuntur, Legitima et Hereditaria in Regnum suum Successione, statuit, ordinavit, aut promulgavit, justissimis fundamentis innitantur et subsistant, verum etiam quod omnia et singula sententiæ, censuræ, decreta, alii quicumque processus et judicia contra præmissa, ac eorum occasione pro bonæ memoriæ Clementem nuper Pontificem Romanum, aut alium quemcumque Judicem, sive aliam Auctoritatem quam-

NUMBER XXXVII.

Cranmer's Letter to Cromwell; justifying himself, upon some Complaints made by Gardiner.—An Original.

RIGHT worshipful, in my moste hartie wise I commend me unto you, most hartely thankyng you, for that you have signified unto me by my chapleyn master Champion, the complaynte of the bishope of Wynchester unto the king's highnes, in two thyngs concernyng my visitation. The one is, that in my stile I am written, "Totius Angliæ Primas," to the derogation and prejudice of the king's highe power and authoritie, beyng supreme hedde of the church. The other is, that his dioces (not paste five yeres agon) was visited by my predecessor, and muste from hensfurthe paye the tenth parte of the spirituallties, accordyng to the acte granted in the last session of this parliament; wherfore he thinketh, that his dioces shuld not be charged with my visitation at this tyme. Fyrste, as concernyng my stile, wherin I am named Totius Angliæ Primas. I suppose, that to make his cause good (which els in dede were nawghte), he doth myxe it with the kyng's cause (as ye knowe the man lacketh neither lernyng in the lawe, neither witty invention, ne crafte to sett furth his matiers to the best), that he myght appere not to maynteine his own cause, but the kyng's; agaynst whose highnes, he knoweth right well, that I may maynteine no cause; but gyve place, and lay both my cause and self at my prince's feet. But to be playne, what I think of the bishope of Winchester, I cannot persuade with my self, that he so much tendereth the king's cause, as he dothe his own, that I shuld not visite him: and that appereth by the very tyme. For if he cast no farther but the defence of the kyng's grace's authoritie, or if he entended that at all, why moved he not the matier, before he receyved my monytion for my visitation; whiche was within four myles of Winchester delyvered unto hym the 24th day of April last, as he came up to the court? Moreover, I do not a little marvaile why he shuld now fynde faute, rather than he did before, when he took the bishop of Rome as cheff hedd: for though the bishope of Rome was taken for supreme hedd, notwithstanding that, he had a great nombre of primates under hym; and by having his primates under hym, his supreme authoritie was not less esteemed, but much the more. Why then may not the kyng's highnes, beyng supreme hedde, have primates under hym, without any dymynshyng, but with the augmentyng of his said supreme authoritie. And of this I doubt not at all, but that the bishope of Winchester knoweth as well as any man lyving, that in case this said stile, or tytyle, had byn in any poynt impediment or hinderance to the bishop of Rome's usurped authority, it would not have so long ben unreformed as it hath byn. For I doubt not, but all the bishopes of England would ever gladly have hadd the archbishop's both authoritie, and the title taken away, that they myght have byn equal together; which well appereth by the many contentions agaynst the archbishops, for jurisdiction, in the courte of Rome; which had ben easily brought to pass, if the bishops of Rome had thought the archbishops' titles and stiles to be any derogation to their supreme authority. All this notwithstanding, yf the bishops of this realme passe no more of their names, stiles and titles, than I do of myn, the kyng's highnes shall sone order the matter between us all. And if I saw that my stile were agaynst the kyng's authoritie (wherunto I am specially sworne) I would sew my self unto his grace, that I myghte leave it; and so wolde have don before this tyme. For, I pray God never be mercyfull unto me at the generall judgement, if I perceyve in my hert, that I sett more by any title, name, or stile that I write, than I do by the paryng of an apple, farther than it shall be to the setting furthe of God's worde and will. Yet I will not utterly excuse me herin, for God must be judge, who knoweth the botome of my harte, and so do not I my self: but I speake forsomuch as I do fele in my harte, for many evill affections lye lurkyng thier, and will not lightly be espied. But yet I would not gladly leave any juste thyng at the pleasure and sute of the bishop of Winchester, he beyng none otherwise affectionate unto me than he is. Even at the begynyng furst of Christ's profession, Diotrefes desyred "gerere Primatum in Ecclesia," as saith St. John in his last Epistell. And syns, he hath had more successours than all the apostles hadd, of whom have come all their glorious titles, stiles, and pompes into the churche. But I would, that I, and all my brethren the bishopes, wold leave all our stiles, and write the stile of our offices, callyng our selves "Apostolos Jesu Christi": so that we toke not upon us the name vaynly, but were so even in dede; so that we myghte ordre our dioces in suche sorte, that neither paper, parchemente, leade nor waxe, but the verie Christian conversation of the people, myght be the letters and seales of our offices, as the Corinthians were unto Paule, to whome he said, "Litteræ nostræ, et Signa Apostolatûs nostri vos estis."

Now for the seconde; where the bishope of Winchester allegeth the visitation of my predecessour, and the tenth parte now to be paid to the kyng. Truth it is, that my predecessour visited the dioces of Winchester, after the decease of my lord cardynall, as he did all other dioces (Sede vacante); but els I thynke it was not visited by none of my predecessours this forty yeres. And notwithstanding that, he hymself not considering their charges, at that tyme charged them with an newe visitation, within lesse than half a yere after; and that agaynst all righte, as doctour Incent hath reported to my chancellour, the clergie at that tyme paying to the kyng half of their benefices in fyve yeres, whiche is the tenth parte every yere, as they paid before, and have paid syns, and shall pay still for ever by the laste acte. But I am verie gladd, that he hath now some compassion of his dioces, although at that tyme he had verie smale, when he did visite them the same yere that my predecessour did visite. And also other bishops, whos course is to visite this yere, kepe their visitation, (where I did visite the last yere) notwithstanding the tenth parte to be paid to the kyng's grace. Howbeit I do not so in Winchester dioces, for it is now the third yere syns that dioces was visited by any man, so that he hath the leste cause to complayne of any bishop, for it is longer syns his dioces was visited than the other. Therefore where he layeth to aggravate the matter, the charge of the late acte graunted, it is no more agaynste me, than agaynst all other bishops that do visit this yere, nor makyth no more agaynst me this yere, than it made agaynst me the laste yere, and shall do every yere hereafter. For if ther were true men, in accomptyng and paying the kyng's subsidie, they are no more charged by this newe acte, than they were for the space of ten yeres past, and shall be charged ever hereafter. And thus to conclude, yf my saide lorde of Winchester's objections shuld be allowed this yere, he myght (by such arguments) both disallowe al maner of visitations that hath be down thes ten yeres past, and that ever shall be don hereafter. Now I pray you, good maister Secretary, of your advice, whither I shall ned to writte unto the kyng's highnes herin. And thus our Lorde have you ever in his preservation. At Otteforde, the xiith daye of Maye. Your own ever assured

A Letter of Barlow's to Cromwell, complaining of the Bishop and Clergy of St. David's.

PLEASETH your good mastership, with compassion to advertise the complaynt and unfayned peticions of your humble oratour, disquietly vexed without cause or any pretenced occasion, motioned of your said oratour's parte: whereas the qucen, of her graciouse bounte, advouched me not unworthy the priorship of Haverford West, under her grace's foundation, syns the tyme of my ther continuall residence; considering the hungry famyne of heryng the word of God, and desolate scarcete of true preachers, I have endeveryd my self, with no small bodily danger against Antichrist, and all his confederat adherents, sincerely to preach the gossell of Christ; whose verite, as it is invincible, so it is incessantly assailed of faithles false perversers; by reason wherof, they which of dutie ought to fortifie me in mayntenynge the truth, maliciously have conceived a malevolent mynde, causes to maligne against me in such wise, that I was forced (from their tyranny) to appele unto the kyng his honourable counccills; as plainly apperith by the untrue, surmised articles, falsely contrived by the black freer of Haverford West; which thoughte I presented to your mastership, as the acte of his onely doing, yet was it the mayntenans of the bishop, and his ungodly spirituall officers; which is evident by the reward of the bishop to the freer, at his departyng also by his letters directed to Mr. Dean of the Arches, and to doctor Huys, diligently to sollicite that I myght be suppressed in my just matter: and where they sithe perceive that (praise be to God) under the favour of your righteouse equite, they cannot prevaile against me as they willfully would, yet cease they not wrongfully to vex such as pertayne to me, troblyng them with tyranny for my sake, no such tyranny deserving. As, where of late I sent a servant home about certain busines; immediatly after his comyng, the bishop's officers ascited hym to apperance, ransacking his house, forced him to deliver such books as he had; that is to say, an Englishe Testament, the Exposition of the vth and vith chapters of Matthew, the Tenn Commandments, and the Epistle of Saynte John; violently with holding them with vehement reproches, and clamorouse exclamations against heretikes: as if to have the Testament in English were horrible heresie, to no litle dismayng and ferefull discomfort of the sincere favorers of God's word. Moreover, they charged in the kyng's name, the maire of Tynby, in payne of fyve hundredth markes, to put in warde the said poore man, his wiff, and a certain honest widdowe of inculpable fame, with whom they were at host, laying certain articles to their charge which they never thought nor spake, and after most shamefull rumors raysed upp to their dyffamation, with slanderouse wonderment of the towne, all crayfty means assayed to bryng in false wites, when no accuser would appear openly; as a true certificant under the town's seal largely doth testify; the above-mencioned officers without any charitable satisfaction to the said parties wrongfully imprisoned, bad the maire do with them as he listed; and so thens departyng made their advaunt in places where they came of their valyant actes against hereticks, meaning thereby the favourers of Christ's gossell: in consideration whereof, it may please your singular goodnes to provide a redress, that from the terour of such tyrannes, the king's faythfull subjects your porre oratoures maye peaceable live according to God's lawes, without any suche unchristen empeschlment, and combrose vexations.

Furthermore unfayndly to ascertain your maistership in what perilous case greatly lamentable the king's faithfull subjects, the poore Resians in the dioces of Saynt David, your suppliant oratours are miserably ordered under the clergy, requireth a farre larger processe then here maye conveniently be comprised: for though we have semblably to other dioceses, in outwarde auctorite and exterior ceremonies a bishope, a suffrigan, archdeacons, deanes, commissaries, and other bishoplike officers, intituled with spirituall names; also a multitude of mounks, cannons, freers, and secular pristes; yet among them all, so many in number, and in so large a dioces, is there not one that sincerely preacheth God's word, nor scarce any that hartely favorith hit, but all utter enemies ther agaynst, whose stubbornne resistance cannot last without foward rebellion against the king's graciouse actes established upon the verite of God's word. And concerning the enormous vices, the fraudulent exactions, the mysordered lying, and heathyn idolatry, shamefully supported under the clergies jurisdiction, which by sequels of their blynd willful ignorance, do consequently follow, no dioces, I suppose, more corrupted, nor so far out of frame, without hope of reformation, except your lordship shall see a redresse, in whom, under the kyng's grace, the trust of all those that meane well onely consistyth. Fynally they abused fashiones at length to discover at your commandment; I shall be ready with such certente of truth, that no advirsary shall be able to make contrary denyall; which so performed, it may then please your good mastershippe to licence me to departe, under the lawfull favour of your protection; without the which, nether can I without perell repair home, nor there in safte contynue, among so odiousse adversaries of Christ's doctrine, by whose tyranny, that I may not be unjustly opprest, I most humbly beseeche your assistant aide, howbeit no farder then the write of Scripture will justifie my cause; nether for no carnall commodite of any worldly preferment, but all onely for the advancement of Christ's gospell, to the honour of God, who evermore graciously preseeve your mastershippe in honourable felicitye.

Your humble oratour,

Prior of Haverford-West.

A Letter of Dr. Legh's, concerning their Visitation at York.

[Cott. Lib. Cleop. E. 4, p. 104.]

To Mr. Cromwell, Chief Secretary.

RYGHT worshipful sir, my dewty pre-supposed, this is to advertise you, that master doctor Layton and I, the xith day of January, war with the arch-bishop of Yorke, whom we according to your pleasure and precepts have visyted: injoyning him to preach and teach the word of God (according to his bownd dewty) to his cure committed unto him, and also in the knowledge concerning the prerogative power the king's grace have, and to see others here in his jurisdiction being induyd with good qualities, having any respect either to God's goodnes, vertue, or godlines, to performe the same, injoyning moreover to him to bring up unto you his first, second, and third foundations, wheruppon he enjoyeth his office, and prerogative poore, with the graunts, privilegis and concessions given to him, and to his see apperteyning; the which whan that you have red them, and knowe in all points the hole effect of them, I doe not doubt, but that ye shall see and rede many things worthy reformation. By the knowledge whereof, I suppose the king's highnes and you will be glad, and do think it mete that every bishope war in likewise orderyd: then shuld they, them under the governaunces edifye much in Christ in his doctrine and teachings: and then the poor ignorant persons now by blindnes and ignorance sedusid, might thereby be brought to light and knowledge, wherby they should profit much, the welthe of their own soules, and the commynaltye: and it should be greatly expedient to the conservation of their fidelite toward their prince, and to his grace's succession now begotten, or hereafter to be begotten. Now that I have enforced your mastership of our acts and deeds, done to a good ende, as our opinion serve us, that shall lie in your circumspecte prudencye and wisdom to order all things, as ye shall think to your approved discretion most mete, and to the farderans of the glory of God, and preservation of the common wealthe, most expedient and necessary. For in the same jurisdictions given heretofore either augmented or diminished, to be ministred to their bishops as wall be thought to your wisdom most convenient; I do not dought but it shall be much profitable, and commodious both to the king's highnes, and to your mastership, as knoweth God, who ever preserve your mastership. From Yorke the xiiith day of January.

Yours ever assured,

THOMAS LEGH.

A Letter of Tonstall's upon the King's ordering the Bishops to send up their Bulls.—An Original.

[Cott. Lib. Cleop. E. 6, p. 246.]

RIGHT honorable, in my humble maner I recommend me unto your good mastership. Advertising the same, that I have of late receivd a letter from master doctor Layton, declaring unto me that ye willyd him to write unto highnes hath directed his letters missives to all and singular his bishops in this his realme, to appere before his grace immediately after the feast of the Purificacyon next cominge, to the intent that they shall deliver up unto his grace's handes all their bullys of confirmation, or such other like, as they have had from Rome at any time heretofore; yet his grace consideringe my late departure thens, for my more ease and quietnes, is well content that I make mine abode here, so that I write unto his grace a letter, therein declaringe that I will be content to doe as other bishops do in this behalf, and to gife up into his handes all suche bullys as his grace's pleasure is to have of me. Advertising me further, that your mastership, as my great frende hath promised to the king, that I will accomplishe the king's desire and pleasure herin: for whiche your most great kindnes not only shewed unto me many times heretofor, but also nowe renewid at this time, with making of such assurance for me to the king's highnes I most humbly thanke your mastership. Advertising the same, that forasmuch as I could not perceive by any part of master Layton's letters to what intent the king's highnes wold have the said bulles delivered into his handes; and if in my letter to be written unto his grace I shuld mistake his entent, I shuld not only thereby offende his grace, which I would be as lothe to doe as any subject within his realme, but also make him to be displeasid with my kinsman, that so blindly had written unto me, and peradventure with your mastership for usinge him for your secretary in this behalf: considering with my self the hole effect of the same, better to be to have my bulles into his hands, thought that most best to send up the said bulles there to be ready to be delivered at his grace's will and pleasure: humbly beseechinge your mastership to move the king's highnes to be good and graciouse soveraigne lord unto me, and to consider if I shuld nowe in my age leif my bishopric, which I trust his grace of his goodnes meanith not to make me to doe, by demanding of my bulles to be delivered into his handes, that shuld not only disapoint me of my liffinge, but many other my servants his subjects, that have their liffinge only by me, who if I shuld leve my promotion shuld be thereby destitute of succour; which being my special trust that his grace of his inestimable goodnes will have respect unto, and that my mind herein, not to lefe my promotion, is neither ambitiousse nor unreasonable, nor contrary to his grace's entent, I have sent up the said bulles there to be redye, whiche thinge^e sens that is more then I was willed to doe by master Layton's letter. I have forborne to wryte unto his grace that I wold do that, seinge I do indeede accomplishe his graco's pleasure. Praynge humbly your mastership upon advertisement geffen to the king's highnes, hereof to know his will and pleasure what he will have to be done, and the same so knowne to declare unto this bearer William Redmayn, who therupon shall deliver the said bullis into your hands, or to whom the king's grace will appoynt to receyve them, yf the king's will and pleasure be to have them. Which I doe undoubtedly trustinge that the kinge's highnes will be as good to me, as he is to other bishops of his realme beinge in like case, seinge I had them by him, and did renounce all things conteynd in them contrary to his prerogative royall, at suche time as I presented to his grace his bull unto him, as that will appere by the othe of my homage remayninge with the said bull in the king's records now beyng in your keeping, as all bishops ever have been accustomed to doe by the laws of this realm heretofore used. The bulls that I do send remayning in my handes concerning my bishopryche be v. in number, the other were delyvered to whom they were directed: one to the king's highnes, an other to my lord cardinal, then being my metropolitan, whose soul God pardone, an other to my late lord of Rochester to take my othe to the bishop of Rome, which I think was sent up to Rome with the othe as hath been accustomed to be done. And so those that I nowe send did remayne still in my handes. And other bulles then these have I noon, humbly beseeching your mastership in all mine affayrs to be good master unto me, and to be meane unto the king's highnes to be good and graciouse souveraine lorde unto me, and I shall according to my most bounden dewty, daily pray for the preservation of his royall estate longe to endure; and likewise I shall contynewe daily beedman to your mastership, whom Almighty Jhesu preserve in long life and good healtie to his pleasure and yours. From Aukelande the xxixth day of January.

Your mastershipes humble beedman,

NUMBER XLII.

A Letter of the Archbishop of Yorke's, concerning the Suppression of the Monasteries.

[Cott. Lib. Cleop. E. 4, p. 239.]

RIGHT honourable, after my hertiest commendation. According to your request made to me in your letters, I have furthwith upon the receipte of the same, sent commandment to certayne monasteries for beeing with me to Yorke, where I was than; and now I have given commandment to all archdeacons, to warne all monasteries, of less yearly value than two hundred pound, being within their archdeaconries, that they shall nothing imbecille, ne alien: and if they have, that they shall agayne call such things aliened, or imbecilled, to their hands. Some that were noted to have received some goods of suche monasteries, I called and warned, that they shold in no wise meddle with any such goods; and that if they had any such, that they shold restore them: and furthermore, if any such goods shall be offred to them, that they shold give me warning. And forbecause most resorte for such propose is to the citie of Yorke, I have warned the majour of Yorke, and other of his brodren thereof, and speciallie the maister of the Mynt, upon their peril and daunger, that they receive no goods of any such monastries. And fether herin I entend to do from time to time, as I shall see nede, and daily do warn such as do resort to me, that they meddle not with any such goods, that by them this commandment may be the more published, as I trust it shall be now by the archdeacons officials, which be nowe all abrode, and have speciall commandment to sett furthe this propose.

Sir, I entierlie pray you to be good to me, for two places of the patronaige of the archbishops of Yorke, that if you shall thinke upon such considerations as I alledge, that I have reason to sue for them, as you woll help me with your good word, that they be not suppressed. The one of them named Sancte Oswalde's, is not of foundation a monasterie of religious men, but is "Libera Capella Archiepiscopi." No man hath title in it but the archbishop: the prior therof is removable at my pleasure, and accomptable to me; and the archbishops may put ther, if he woll, seculer prestes, and so wold I have done at my entre, if I had not ther found one of myne acquayntance, whom I judged meete to be there under me. And moreover, the archbishops of Yorke had it given to them by William Rufus, in exchange for reconpense, as well of lands as jurisdiction, taken from them at the coming in of William Conqueror, as appereth in my registres, and other old books. And in the same it appereth, that the said chapell enjoyeth all privileges, like as all other the kinge's free chapells; for it was some tyme "Libera Capella Regia:" and for the defence of the said privileiges, and jurisdiction ther, my predecessours have alwaies had writts from the king, agaynst all disturbers; because it is no other but "Libera Capella," and some tyme was the kinge's.

The other is called Hexham, upon the borders of Scotland, and was some tyme "Sedes Episcopalis;" and many holie men, some time bishops, ther be buried in that church, saincts of name. And wise men, that knowe the borders, think, that the lands therof, although they were ten tymes asmuch, cannot contrevaille the damage, that is like to ensue, if it be suppressed. And some waye, there is never a house between Scotland and the lordshipp of Hexham; and men feare, if the monasterie go down, that in processe all shall be waste muche within the land. And what comfort that manasterie is daylie to the contre ther, and speciallie in tyme of warre, not onlie the contre men do knowe, but also many of the noble men of this realme, that hath done the king's highnes service in Scotland. I dout not, but that the land of that monasterie is better than two hundred pound by year; as likewise the archbishop's lands, war much better if they laye in a quiet place. Some of my predicesours have had ther 1300 marcs by year, and now it is (communibus annis) undre 250. I entierlie pray you, if you think that I have reason, send for these two, that you woll help me to save them. And as for Hexham, I think it is necessarie to be considred, as (I think) they that knowe the borders woll saie.

Sir, according to the king's commandment, I have generally given commandment, that no prechers shall be suffred, that withoute discretion preche novelties, and (as you right wiselie consider'd) do rather sowe seeds of dissention, than do any good: and some such as I have heard to use such preaching, I have discharged; and yet they preach: but I make processe agaynst them; and some of them say, they will get licence of the kyng to preach. If they obtaine any such licence, I then am discharged for them that have such licence. But I trust, that you woll suffer no such licence to pass, but that I shall knowe therof: and what your pleasure is than, if they preach such novelties, I pray you I may know by this bearer. Some say, they have licence of my lord of Canterbury; but, I trust, they have no such, and if they have, none shall be obeyde here, but onlie the kyng's and yours. And this in my hertiest maner. Fare you well. From Cawed, the xxiiid of April 1536.

Instructions for sending Barnes and others to Germany.—An Original.

[Cott. Lib. Cleop. E. 6, p. 330.]

MASTER SECRETARY,—After our most hartie commendations, ye shall understand, that having received the letters sent unto you from sir John Wallop, and shewed the same unto the king's majestie, his pleasure thereupon was, that we shuld dispatch these our letters incontinently unto you, concerning the accomplishment and doing of these things ensuing. First, his grace's pleasure, that you shall immediatly (upon the receipt herof) despatch Barnes in post, with Deryk in his company, into Germany, commanding him to use such diligence in his jorneye, that he may and it be possible, meet with Melancton before his arryval in France: and in case he shall so meet with him, not only to dissuade his going thither; declaring how extremely the French king doth persecute those that will not grante unto the bishop of Rome's usurped power and jurisdiction; using in this parte all persuasions, reasons and means, that he can devise, to empech and let his said jorney thither; laying unto him how much it shold be to his shame and reproch to vary and go nowe from that true opinion wherin he hath so long continued; but also, on the other side, to persuade him all that he may, to convert his said jorney hither, shewing as well the conformitie of his opinion and doctrine here, as the nobilitie and vertues of the king's majestie, with the good entaynement which undoubtedly he shall have here at his grace's hands. And if percase the said Barnes shall not meet with him before his arryvall in France, then the said Barnes proceeding himself forth in his jorney towards the princes of Germany, shall (with all diligence) returne in post to king's highnes the said Deryk, with advertisement of the certaintie of the said Melancton cummyng into France, and such other occurants as he shall then know. And if the said Deryk be not now redy to go with him, the king's pleasure is, that ye shall, in his stede, appoint and sende such one other with the said Barnes as you shall think meet for that purpose.

And when the said Barnes shall arrive with the said princes of Germany, the king's pleasure is, he shall (on his grace's behalf) aswell perswade them to persist and continue in their former good opinion, concerning the deniall of the bishop of Rome's usurped autoritie, declaring their own honour, reputation, and suretie, to depend therupon; and that they now may better mayntain their said just opinion therein then ever they might, having the king's majestie (one of the most noble and puissant princes of the world) of the like opinion and judgment with them; who having proceeded therein by great advise, deliberation, consultation, and judgments (of the most part) of the great and famous clerks in Christendome, will in no wise relent, vary, or alter in that behalf. Like as the said Barnes may declare and shew unto them, by a booke made by the dean of the chaple, and asmany of the bishop's sermons as you have. Whiche booke you shall receive herwith: the copie wherof, and of the said sermons, you must deliver unto the said Barnes, at his departure, for his better remembrance, and just occasion. To whom also his grace's pleasure is, you shall shew as muche of master Wallop's letter (which we send you also again) as you shall see drawn and market with a penne in the margent of the same. As also exhorte and move them, in any wise to beware how they commit any of their affaires to the order, direction, or determination of the French king, considering he and his counsell be altogether papist, and addict and bent to the maintenance and conservation of the bishop of Rome's pretended auctoritie. Furthermore, the king's pleasure is, ye shall, upon the receipt herof, immediatly cause Mr. Haynes, and Christopher Mount, in post to repair into France, to sir John Wallop, in as secrette maner as they canne; as commyng like his friend, to visit him, and not as sent by the king. And in case they shall (by him or otherwise) lerne and know that Melancton is there arryved; then his grace woll that the said Haynes and Mount shall (in such sort as they be not much noted) reasorte unto him: and for the desuading of the contynuance there, or the alteration of his opinion, and the alluring of him hither, to use suche reasons and persuasions as be before written, with suche other as they canne further devise for that purpose. To the which Haynes and Mount, the king's pleasure is, ye shall delvery like copies of the said dean's booke, and bishop's sermons, to be shewed unto the said Melancton, or otherwise used, as may be most expedient for the atchievment of the king's purpose in that behalfe.

Ye shall also understande that the king's pleasure is, ye shall write to sir John Wallop, and send unto him therwith like copies, willing him, in case he shall have certain knowledge that the articles be true (written in these his letters) concerning the French king's sending into Germany, for the contynuance of the bishop of Rome's pretended supremacy, to repair with the said copies to the French king; and not only to set the same forth, with such reasons as he canne devise in that parte, shewing how much it shall be against his honour, both to give himself subject to the said bishop, and to move other to do the semblable; but also to declare unto him that the king's highnes (remembering his old friendly promises, concerning the mayntenance of his cause, and of his proceedings touching the same) cannot but think it a little strange that the said French king (seeing his majestie hath, in his doings touching the said bishop of Rome, moved neither his nor any prince's subjects) will move and styr the Germanes to descend upon a contrary opinion, both to themselves and to his grace in this behalfe: and that his majestie must nedes think his amytie muche touched in that he shulde move any state or coutrey, to do that thing which is so much against the king's highnes and his own promise, using all the wayes he canne to disuade him from the dishonorable obedience of the said bishops, soe moving him to inclyne to the king's just opinion touching the same.

Finally, the king's pleasure is, ye shall write an other letter to the bishop of Aberden, signifieng that the king's majestie taketh it very unkindly that the king his nephew wold now embrace without his advice or counsail, being his derest freinde and uncle, and now in leage and amytee with him, the marriage of M. de Vandom's daughter, wherunto he would give non care at his grace's overture hertofoe made of the same; in your said letter, imputing a greate negligence therein to the said bishop, and other of his master's counsail, seeing their master sheweth not, in the doing therof, suche amytie towards the king's highnes as the friendship between them doth require: and to make an ende, his grace woll in no wise that Barnes or Haynes shall tary for any further instructions of the bishope of Cantorbury, or any other, having his grace determyned to sende the same after, by Mr. Almoner and Hethe; but that he, Mr. Haynes, and Mount, shall withall possible diligence departe immediatly in post, without longer taryeng thence for this their dispatche shall be necessary, soe as their abode empeche not the king's purpose touching the said Melancton: and thus fare youe most hartly well, from Langley in much haste, this Monday at iij of the clock, at after noone.

Your lovyng friend, T. NORFOLK.
GEORGE ROCHEFORD.

NUMBER XLIII.

The Smalcaldick League.

By the grace of God, we John Frederich duke of Saxony, high marshall of the empire of Rome, and prince elector, lantgrave of Turingie, and marquis of Misne, aswell in our own name as in the name of the noble prince John Ernest, likewise duke of Saxonye, our most beloved brother, Philippe, Ernest, Francis, brethren dukes of Brunswick and Lunenburg; Ulrich duke of Wortenberg, and in Deck, erle in Montbel-yard; Philipp lantgrave of Hessen, erle of Catts in Dietz, Zigenham and Nyer; Berminus and Philip, dukes of Stetin, Pomern, Cassaburn, Wenden, princes of Rug, erles in Guskau; Wolfgang John, George, and Joachim, brethren princes in Anhalt, erles of Ascanion, and lords in Bernburg; Gebhard and Albert, brethren, erles and lords in Mansfeld; the consules, decurions, tribunes, senate, and people of the within-named cities of the High-Germany, Saxon, and Hanse, or on the see—that is to say, Argentina, Augusta, Frankford, Constantia, Ulme, Esling, Rentling, Memingia, Linde, Bibrac, Isua, Magdeburgh, Breme, Brunswick, Goslaria, Hamibria, Gottingia, Embeck, Hamburga, Lubeck, and Myndia, do profess by these our letters, in the name of us, our heyres and successors, and do signifie to all men that seen the state of this season, is every where very perillouse, and appereth so, that many men are about and practisc to disturbe, such as do cause and suffer the syncere doctrine of the gossell to be preached and taught in their dukedoms, provinces, cities, and territories (by the grace of God), and which (abolishing all abuses) doe studie to bring in ceremonies consenting to the word of God: and efforce them selfs to divert them from Christ's doctrine; yea, by force and violence; and seen also that the office of every Christian magistrat is not only to suffer that the syncere worde of God be preached to his subjects; but also, with all his studye, care, and sollicitude to provide (to his power) that the wholesome doctrine of the gossell and the truth, onse known and professed, be not violently extorted, and they deprived of the same; for this cause we doe knowledg that it is our most duetie and necessitie, of the offices of our magistrat, in case nowe or hereafter it shuld happen, that any man wold attempt and assay to divert us, or our subjects, by force or dede, from the worde of God, and the truth known; and to bring in again and restore the ungodlie ceremonies and abuses already abolished (which God by his good clemence woll forbyd, as we trust that no man woll attempt such thing), for to represe such violence and perill from the bodys and souls of us and our subjects, by the grace of God, and for to excuse and avoid the same to the praise of God, to the augmentation of the syncere doctrine of the gossell, and to the conservation of the uniform estate, tranquillite, and honestie publick, in the empire, for the love of the nation of Alemayne; and also for the commendation, honour, and good of our dukedoms, provinces, lordships, and cities, onely to provide for the cause of our defence and tuicion; the which is permitted to every man, not onely by the lawe of nature and of men, but also by the law written. Therefore we have assembled and concluded to give and be bound eche to other of a Christian, lawfull and friendly leage and confederation, and by the vertue, fource, and reason of this our letters, we agree, conclude, and bynde our selfs eche to other upon a confederation, with the conditions that followeth, that is to say, that all and every of us shall be bound to favour eche other hartely and truely, and to warne eche other of all imminent danger, and to avoid it; and that noon of us, openly or secretly, shall willingly give passage to the enemy, or adversaries of the other, nor to warn or support them.

And because this confederation is onely made for cause of our tuicion and defense, and not to the entent that any of us shall move warr, if ther shall happen any of us, whatsoever he be, to be violently assawted for the word of God, the doctrine of the gossell and our faith, or for such other causes as do depend of the word of God, the doctrine of the gossell, or our faith, or be annexed thereunto; or if under any other pretext or colour, there shuld be any violence attempted against any of us, and that we the rest, which shuld not then be invaded myght thinke and judge that such werr, or violence, shuld be moved for the cause of the word of God, or of the religion; and that he to whom the werr or violence is imminent, wold permit it to our knowledge, arbitracion, and decisoon; that then we all the rest of this confederation, and every of us, that be comprehended in this Christen confederacion shall be bound to take no lesse to herte, and take in hand as diligently to provide for the same, incontinently as such persons that be invaded, shall require our help, or that we shall knowe it (with all our power), as though we shuld be assawted our selfs, and for our own proper cause: and therefore without any delaye, and without any decepte or gyle, without taryeng for any other, with all our might and power, we shall be bound to succour, defend, and helpe him that shall he assawted, after such form and maner as for the qualitie and circumstances of the thing and the tyme it shall be adjudged most util and most commodiouse to the rest of us; and like as the fidelite and charite to be given and shewed to the neighbors upon his conscience and salut shall teach him, and that we shall truely administer and deale oon with another. And that in such case never oon of us shall agree, compound, or make any transaction or trewes without the assent and will of the rest.

Also that this our Christen confederation shall be taken and understanden to be in no wise prejudicial or hurtfull to the emperor's majestie, our clementissime lord; nor to any state of the empire, or any other: but onely for the conservation of the doctrine and truth of the gossell, and of the peace and tranquillite in the empyre and Alemany's nation, and to withstand wrongfull violence from us and our subjects and allies; and onely in case of defence, and in such case as every of us may bear and suffer the just knowlege and decision of his own cause as is aforesaid, and none other wise; and if any man wol be joyned to this our confederacion, which is not comprehended in it already, so that he be dedicate to the worde of God, and shall permitte the syncere doctrine of the gossell, conformable to our confession, exhibited to the emperor's majestie, and to all the orders of the empire in the assemble at Augsburg, freely to be preached, taught, and kept in his lands, province, and dominions, and woll constantly styck to the same doctrine, he or they ought to be ascribed and receyved in this confederation, by the assent and will of us all.

And bycause that Christen confederacion, which shall be finished the Sunday invocavit, the year of our Lord 1537, hath lasted the other six years last past, between us, excepted us Ulrich, duke of Wertemberg, &c. and us Bernim and Philipp, dukes of Pomeran; us John, George, and Joachim, princes of Anhalt; and the cities of Augsburgh, Frankford, Kempt, Hamibra, and Mynda; we, at their friendly and diligent petition, have receyved them into this our confederation, and we do bynde our selfs eche to other agyn, that this Christen leage shall be proroged and extended, begynning from the said Sunday invocavit 1537, by the space of ten yerres next ensuyng, as this Christen leage by the ten yerres next ensuyng ought to be kept and proroged constantly, syncerely, and bona fide, by us and every of us, without any frawde or malign.

And if it shall happen us to entre werre with any man for the doctrine of the religion, or any other cause depending of the same that shuld not be finished within the space of the said ten yerres, yet nevertheless, although the said time of ten yerres be utterly expired, yet the said expedition shall be contynued and prosecuted, and the werre brought to an ende; and that then it shall not be lawfull for any of the confederates to exempte him of the same, nor hope upon exemption, and from that tyme it shall be lawfull for the confederats to protract and prolong this confederation, if they shall so think good.

We the foresaid electors and princes, erles and magistrats of cities by interposition of our feith instead of an other do promise and take upon us, for us, and for our heires constantly and perpetually to observe and performe all and singular the premisses truly and syncerely as it behoveth princes and good men. And that we shall nor doe, nor procure any thing in any wise to be done against this leage and confederation: but in all points shall deale and procede truly and syncerely without any frawde or malengin. And for more credence and confirmacion of all and every those things, every of us the said electors, princes, erles, and cities, in the name of us our highnes and successors, have caused our seales wittingly and willingly to be sett to these presents, which have been given the yere of the nativite of our Savyor Jesus Christ, 1536.

NUMBER XLIV.

Propositions made to the King, by the German Princes.[Paper O^{ff}ice.]

The Petition and Request of the Right Noble Princes, Duke John Frederike, Elector of Saxe, and Philip the Lantgrave of Hesse, to the most Noble Kyng of England; exhibited at Smalcaldia, to the most Reverende Bishop of Hereford, and other the Ambassadors of the Kyng's most Royall Majestie, upon the present Day of the Natyvyte of our Lord, Anno Dom. 1536.

1. Item. THAT the said most noble king wolde set fourth the Evangelie of Christe, and the syncere doctrine of the faith after such sort as the princes and states confederates have confessed in the dyet of Augusta, and the same defended, according to their appologie and purgation made: except parse some things therein shall seme, by the common assent of the said most noble kyng, and the said princes, necessarie to be changed or reformed by the word of God.

2. Item. That the saide most noble king, joyning with the said princes and stats confederats, wold maynteyne and defende the saide doctrine of the Evangelie, and the ceremonys conforme to the same, at the future generall counsaill, if it shall be pious, catholique, free and mere Christien.

3. Item. That neither the saide most noble king, without the express consent of the said princes and stats confederats, nor the same princes and stats confederats, without the express consent of the saide most noble king, shall assent nor agree to any indiction or appoyntment of a generall councill, which the bishop of Rome, that now is, or hereafter shall be, or any other, by whatsoever pretended autorite, doth, or shall make and appoynt: nor yet shall consent to any place, where the future generall counsaill shall be had, nor to the counsaill it self; but that all those thyngs may be ordered and done, by the mutuall assent and counsaill of the said most noble king and princes confederat. Provided nevertheless, that if it shall appere certeynly, by just arguments and reasons, such a Christien, free, generall counsaill, to be indicted and appoynted, as the confederats, in their answer to the bishop of Rome's ambassador, named Peter Paule Verger, do desire, that such a councill be not to be refused.

4. Item. If it shall happen that (the saide most noble king, and princes, and stats confederats, not agreeing upon the place, nor the indiction of the counsaill) the bishop of Rome, and other princes conjoynd with hym in that cause, will nevertheless procede to the celebration of a counsaill, or rather of the appoyntment of the place wherunto the saide most noble king, and princes, and stats confederat shall not agree; that then, and in that case, aswell the saide king, as the said princes and stats confederat, shall chieftie (to their power) endeavor and compass, that the same indiction may be utterly avoyded, and take noon effecte.

5. Item. And furthermore, that they shall make, and semblably procure to be made, by their clargy, their publick and solempne protestacions, wherby they shall testefie and declare, both the synceryte of their faith, and also that they do utterly dissent from such manner of communication and indiction; and that they will not be bounde to the decrees or constitutions of the same counsaill (if any such counsaill do folowe in dede), nor in any manner of wise obey the same hereafter.

6. And also, that they shall not at any tyme obey, nor suffer to be obeyed by any of theirs, any decrees, mandats or sentences, bulles, letters, or briefs, which shall procede, or be fulmyne from such a counsaill, so indicted and celebrate eyther in the name of the bishop of Rome himself, or of any other potentate whatsoever; but shall have and repute all such maner of rescriptes, decrees, bulles and breves, as voyde, inane and frustrate; and shall declare, that so they ought to be reputed and taken. And also for the remotion of all slaunder, shall procure their bishopes and preachers, to declare the same to the people really, and with effect.

7. Item. That the said most noble king, like as by the grace of God he is associated to the said princes and stats confederat in the doctrine of Christ, and the defence of the same; so also he woll vouchesauf, upon honourable conditions, to be associate unto the leage of the same princes and stats, so as his most nobel majestie may obtaine the place and name of defensor and protector of the said leage.

8. Item. The neyther the said most noble king, nor the saide princes and stats confederat, shall knowlledge, maintain nor defend, at any tyme hereafter, that the primacie, or that the monarchie of the bishop of Rome, may at this day take place, or ever shall, by God's lawe; nor shall consent nor graunt, that it is either utile or expedient to the comen welth of Christendom, that the bishop of Rome shuld have premyence afore all other bishops, or in any maner of wise have any jurisdiction at all, in the realmes, kyngdoms, or domynions of the saide king and princes.

9. Item. If it shall happen, that war, or any other contencion, either for the cause of religion, or for any other cause besides this cause, shall be inferred or moved against the said most noble king, his realmes, domynions or subjects, by whatsoever prince, state or people, or also against the said right noble princes or stats confederat; that in that case, neither of the said parties shall give ayde, helpe, nor socours against the other partie, nor shall assist the prince, nor the people so invading or movyng warre, neither with counsaill, helpe nor favour, dyrectly nor indirectly, prively nor apertely.

10. Item. That the said most noble king would vouchsaufe, for the defense of the said leage and most honest and holie cause, to conferre to and with the said princes, giving suretie (as within is added) to lay fourth and contribute one hundredth thousande crownes. Which money, it shall be lawful to the confederats to use and employ wher nede shall be, in cause of defense, for the moytee or halfe parte therof. The other moytee they shall take of the same money, which they have leyd fourth, and contributed to the same sum.

11. And if nede shall be of contynuall and dayly defence, for the contynuance of the warre, or invasion of adversaries; in that case, forasmuch as the princes and confederates be not only bound unto further collacion and contribucion of money, but also to the mutual defence with their bodies and goods; it may please the saide most noble king, not to be greved in so urgent a cause of necessity, also to contribute more, that is to say, two hundredth thousande crownes; which money, nevertheless, for the halfe parte, the confederates may employe together with their own money. And if it happen the warre to be soner ended, then that that shall remain, shall be justly reserved, and (the tyme of the confederation fynshed) shall be restored to the saide most noble kinge.

12. Which if the said most noble king will do, the princes do promise themselves, with their sufficient sureties, to assure not onlie that they shall not convert this money to any other use than to the defence of the leage and cause of religion, together with their owne money which they in such a confederation do contribute, but also that entirely and faithfully they shall paye and restore unto the said most noble king the same summ, which either when ther shall be no need of defence, or (after the defence) shall remain and be left, in case it shall not be employed to that use.

13. Item. That for as much as the ambassadors of the said most noble king shall now for a tyme remayne in Germanye, and, with the lerned men in holy letters, dispute and commun of certeyn articles; the princes do desire, that they woll shortly inquire, and knowe their most noble king's mind and resolution, in the conditions of the said leage; and when they shall be certified, to signifie the same unto us the elector of Saxe, and lantsgrave of Hesse.

14. Which when they have done, the princes will send in their (and the stats confederats' names) ambassadors to the said most noble king, and amongst them one excellently lerned, not onely to conferre with his royall majestie upon the articles of Christ's doctrine, and to deliberate upon the ceremonies, and other things in the church, to be changed, ordered and reformed, but also to comment and conclude upon all the articles, of the which we have spoken with the king's most royall majesty, in the name of the confederats.

NUMBER XLV.

The Answer of the King's most Noble Majestie of Englande, to the Peticions and Articles lately addressed to his Highnes, from the Noble Prynces, John Frederike Duke of Saxe, Elector, &c. and Philip Lantsgrave van Hesse, in the names of them, and all their Confederates.

[Paper Office.]

1. THE said most noble king answereth, That his majestie will, and hathe of long tyme mynded to set fourth the Evangelic of Christe, and the trew syncere doctrine of the same, out of which springeth and floweth our trew faith, whiche to defende he is most redy both with life and goods; but to say, that he being a king reckened somewhat lerned, (though unworthy,) having also so many excellent well lerned men within this realme, thinketh it mete to accept at any creature's hands the observing of his and his realme's faith, thonlye grounde wherof remayneth in Scripture, surely he doth not; and requiereth his entier frends herewith not to be greved: but his highnes is right well contented, and much desirith, that for nyute in faith and articles, to be made uppon the same, it wolde please his saide confederats and frends, to sende hither some of their best lerned men, to conferre and conclude, with him and his lerned men, to the intente to have a parfaiete concorde and unyon in faith amongst us. In which his highnes doubteth not, but at such tyme as when their depts shall come, they shall fynde the most towardnes in the king, and in his realme.

To the seconde, his highnes answereth, that he is content to employ himself, joyntly with the said confederats, in all generall counsailes, they being "Catholici et Liberi, in loco etiam omni parte tuto," for the defence of their mere and trew doctryns of the gospell, according to their desires. But as touching the ceremonies, there may be different rites, and such dyversite used in dyvers domynions, "fere per totum mundum," that it will be harde to conclude anye certentie in them. Wherfore his highnes thinketh it mete, that the order and limitacion of them shoulde be left to the arbitrees of the governours of everye domynion, supposing that every of them can tell what is most comodious for his owne domynions.

To the thirde, his majestie answereth, that he is contented, that neyther his highnes (without the express consent of the said princes and stats confederate), nor the same princes and stats confederate (without the express consent of his highnes) shall assent nor agree to any indiction of a generall counsaile, or to any generall counsaile, which the bishop of Rome that now is, or that hereafter shall be, or any other by whatsoever pretended auctorytee, doth, or shall make, enter, presume, or begynne, or cause to be made, entered, presumed, or begon, but that they neyther shall consent to any place of the future counsaile, nor to the counsaile selfe, except it be by their mutual consents assented and agreed unto; provyded nevertheless, that if it shall appear certainly by just arguments and reasons both to his majestie and the said confederats, that a Chrestien free counsaile may be indicted, "in loco etiam omni parte tuto," that then that counsaile shall not be by him, or them, refused.

The 4th, 5th, and 6th articles his highnes is content to accept in every point, according to their own devises.

To the 7th his grace answereth, that he doth moste fully accepte their good overture therein, by the which they declare their good inclynacion and hertie good will towarde his highnes; nevertheles, his majestie desireth them to take in good parte, that he doth not accepte the saide name and place, till he be throughlie agreed with them upon the articles before rehearsed; which ones agreed on, his highnes entendeth most thankfully to accept the same.

The 8th article his majestie is content to accepte according to their own desire.

9th, Also his highnes agreeth, so that they will adde therunto, that in that case of warre, neyther partie shall suffer or permytte any of their subjects or servants to serve them, that in such wise shall by any warre molest any of them.

To the 10th his majestie answereth, that for the warres already by past, he being in no confederacion with them, thinketh it very strange, and somewhat unreasonable, that they should of his highnes require any ayde or assistance; but in case that this confederacion now spoken of do take effecte, and that the contynuance of warres seme to be necessary, by their mutual consents, for the supporting of their faith against their adversaries, and therefore the confederats being also bound to contrybute for their parts, every man for his porcion as shall be thought necessary amongst us; his highnes will be content for his parte, in declaracion of his loving harte to them, to contribute 100,000 crowns, the tyme, and place, and facion, for the employment of the same, ones bytween his grace and them agreed on; provyded that in case that eyther there shall be no warre made to any of the parts for the same, or that it shall be sooner ended then shall be looked for, that then the hole, or that part left and remayning, shall be fully and trewly bonâ fide restored unto his highnes, whensoever he shall demande or require the same.

The 11th his majestie doth accepte, according to their owne offer.

The 12th his highnes also agreeth unto.

To the 13th (two lines torn out) agreed unto the most part of the articles, they will now according to their own offer, with all speed and diligence, send hither their ambassadors plenaryly instructed to comon, agree, and conclude with his majestie in all things that shall be comoned of, and treated betwixt his highnes and them.

NUMBER XLVI.

The Answer of the King's Ambassadors, made to the Duke Saxon, and the Landgrave of Hesse.

[Cott. Lib. Cleop. E. 4, p. 104.]

FIRST, that his highnes, aswell by his ambassadors as their letters from Smalkald, doth perceive two things; the one is their gratitude and benevolence towards his majestie, and that they desire the continuance between their progenitors inviolably observed to be increased; the other is not only their great constance in the setting forth of the trueth of the gospel that was darkened afore, but also that they exhorte his grace to the defence of the same, which be most acceptable to his highnes, and thanketh them aswell for his behalfe, as also for the behalfe of all Christendom, knowing the grante benefite of God in giving the sayd princes such stedfastness and strength; and that his majestie willed to be shewed unto them that their wondrous vertues have so ravished and drawn his mind to thair love, that his highnes feled a grante encrease to thair unitie, in such wise, that he is determined fully never to passe the occasion, without correspondence of love, nor any occasion that he shall think may conduce in any wise to their good myndes and godly proceedings, and for to declare his minde to the articles of your petition.

The 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 8th, 9th, 11th, 12th, and 13th articles do please his majesty well ynough; and although there be some things in them that his grace would grante easely to no manner princes, were they never so grante; yet nevertheles his highnes, for his affection towards them, thinking that they meane nothing ells but the reformation of the church, which his majestie for his parte desireth much, and desireth to joyne with them in the same; in these articles his majestie desireth that only the 3d and 4th article be more amply declared; that is to say,

The 3d article by these wordes: Item, That nether the king's highnes without the assent of the princes and stats confederate, nor they without his grace's assent, shall agree to the indiction of any counsaile, that the bishop of Rome, that now is, or any other whatsoever auctoryte, may pretende: and that also nether of the said parties shall agree upon the place of a councile to be had, without the agreement of the other expressly to be given, but that the same be done by the mutuell assent of his grace, the said princes and estats. Provided nevertheles, that if all they shall perceive a lawfull and Christien free concile to be indicted in some sure and indifferent place, that then nether of them both parties shall refuse the saide concile.

To the 9th article his highnes would have added, that nether of both parties shall permitt any of their servants or subjects to be in solde against the other part, nor to helpe directly, or indirectly, such as wolde invade or enterprise against them.

As to the 1st, 2d, 7th, and 10th articles, his grace answered, to the 10th his majesty sayeth, that he doubteth not but the said confederats do well think and know that his grace is moved in his mind by no more private necessitie, that he or his realm have, nor any private profite to joyne with the said confederats in leage and defense, for he and his realme is in good peace; and knoweth not that the bishop of Rome, the emperour, or any other prince pyketh any quarrel with him, and that much lesse warre; and although his grace feared some hostilitie of them, nevertheles by the death of a woman, all calumnies be extincted; and to the entent the confederats might know his grace's good affection towards them, and to the reformation of the church, and abolition of abuses, his grace signifieth unto them, that he woll in no wise refuse thair petition, but willingly contribute for his parte 100,000 crownes for the defence of the leage, in case that the confederation between the said confederats and his grace to be made, shall be brought to any effect. And for other appendaunces of this article, as touche sufficient suertie, Item, that the half of the monaye by them contributed shuld be spent, or ever they touched his grace's monaye. Item, concerning the forme and maner to deposite and spend the same. Item, to make his highnes prevey of the same, that on thair behalfe shall be contributed, and of the necessitie where abouts it shold be spent; and that all things may be done by common advise and assent, because the same do require long treatie; therefore his grace referreth the same to his orators, and to such of thairs as by the 13th article they desire to send, his grace desireth the said princes to send them fully instructed, and with sufficient power and auctorie to treat with his highnes, not doubting but they shall have reasonable and friendly answer.

To the 1st, 2d, and 7th articles his majesty hath veray acceptable and agreeable, the honour they have thought to deferre unto him, as above all princes, to call him to be protector and defender of their religion, which is a declaration of the certain benevolence and trust that they have in his majestie; and although his majestie knoweth what envy and danger foloweth such title, yet nevertheless his highnes is so desirous to do them pleasure, and to the glory of the gospell, his grace is content to accept the same honour, after that between his and thair orators' agreement, shal be had upon the 1st and 2d articles, for it shuld not be sure nor honourable for his majestie, before they shall be with his grace agreed upon certain concorde of doctrines, to take such a province upon his highnes; and forasmuch as his majestie desireth much that his bishops and learned men might agree with theirs, but seen that it cannot be, ones certain things in their confession and apologie shuld by their familiar conferencies be mitigate, his grace therefore would the orators and some excellent learned men with them shuld be sent hither, to conferre, talke, treatate and comon upon the same, according to the 13th article.

Now that his highnes by the same answers sheweth unto them his good harte, trusting that they will be of correspondence, therunto his majestie desireth three things of them of no great coste nor difficultie.

First, that in case any king, prince, or other, would invade his majestie or dominions for the same, or for the cause of the religion, that then they woll furnishe him at thair expences 500 horsemen armed of all peeces, or 10 ships well arrayed for the warre, to serve his majestie by the space of four hole monethes by land or by sea, and that it shall be at his grace's choyse to have horsemen or shippes, and that such as his grace shall chuse, shall be sent to him, within a month after the requisition thereof.

Second, That besides the same, that they shall retheyn at his majesties costs and chardges, such number of horsemen and footmen as his highnes shall require; so that the horsemen passe not the number of two thousand, and the footmen the number of five thousand, or for the said footmen, 12 ships in good order furnished with men, harneys, ordynances, victuells and other things necessarie; and that the king's majestie maye hyre them, retheyne at his wages as long as it shall please his grace; and it shall be as his majesties choyse to have the said 12 ships, or the said number of horsemen and footmen, and that such as his majestie shall choyse maye be redye within two moneths after his requisition.

Third, That the sayd confederats woll take upon them in all conciles hereafter, and every where ells, to promote and defend the opinion of the reverend fathers, Dr. Martin, Justus Jonas, Cruciger, Pomeran, and Melancthon, in the cause of his grace's marriage.

Crommer's Letter to Cromwell, complaining of the Ill-Treatment of the Ambassadors from Germany.

[Cott. Lib. Cleop. E. 5. p. 212.]

MY very singular good lorde, in my most hertie wise I recommend me unto your lordship. And where that the oratours of Germany, when thei granted to tary one moneth, required that we should go furth in their booke, and entreate of the abuses, so that the same myght be set furth in wryting as the other articles arr: I have syns effectuously moved the bishops therto, but they have made me this answer; that thei knowe, that the king's grace hath taken upon hymself to answer the said oratours in that behalf, and therof a booke is alredie devised by the king's majestie; and therefore they will not meddell with the abuses, lest thei should write therein contrarye to that the king shall write. Wherefore thei have required me to entreate now of the sacraments of matrimony, orders, confirmation, and extreme unction; wherein thei knowe certeynly that the Germanes will not agree with us, excepte it be in matrymony onely. So that I perceyve, that the bishops seek only an occasion to breke the concorde; assuring your lordship, that nothing shall be done, unles the king's grace special commandment be unto us therein directed. For they manifestly see, that they cannot defend the abuses, and yet they wold in no wise grant unto them. Farther, as concernyng the oratours of Garmanye, I am advertised, that thei are very evill lodged where thei be: for besides the multitude of ratts, daily and nyghtly runnyng in thair chambers, which is no small disquietnes; the kechyn standeth directly against their parlar, where they dayly dine and sup; and by reason therof, the house saveth so yll, that it offendeth all men that come into it. Therefore, if your lordship do but offer them a more commodious house to demore in, I doubt not, but that they accept that offer most thankfully, albeit I am suer that they will not remove for this tyme. And wheras of late I did put your lordship in remembrance, for the suppression of the abbey of Tudberye; now I beseech your lordship, not only that commissionours may be sent unto that house, but also in likewise unto the abbey of Rocoester, or Crookedsom; beseeching your lordship to be good lorde unto this berer Frances Basset, my servant, for his preferment unto a leace of one of the said houses; not doubting but you shall prefer a right honest man, who at all tymes shall be able to do the king's grace right good service in those partes, and also be at your lordship's commandment during his life. Thus Almighty God have your good lordship in his blessed tuytion. At Lambeth, the xxijid daye of Auguste.

A Letter, giving Pace an Account of Propositions made to King Henry by Charles the Vth.

[Paper Office.]

TRUSTY and right wel-beloved, we grete you well, lating you wit, that on Tuesday last passed, repaired to our maner of Greenwich unto us, the emperor's ambassador here resident, and on his master's behalf, pretending a desire to renew the old amytie that hath been between us, testified nevertheles by letters of credence sent from the said emperor to our trusty and right wel-beloved counsaier, Thomas Cromwell, our principal secretary, which of long season hath been interrupted, made unto us for the advancement of suche a renovation certain overtures: the first was, that he wold be a means to have a reconciliation between us and the bishop of Rome: an other, that we wold ayd him with some contributions in his entended voyage against the Turk: the third, that forasmuch as by a certain leage passed between us, it is covenanted and agreed, that in case either of us shuld be invaded in any of our realmes, dominions, or seigniories, which we have in possession, the other shuld ayd in such form, as in the said leage is expressed, at the costs and expences of the prince requiring the same, and that there is a greete appearance that the French king wil now invade him in the duchie of Millain, we wold grant him such ayd for his defence against the said French king, as in the said leage is limited. To the said masse and substance of his credence, tending to a renovation of amytie, ye shall understande our answer was, that albeit the interruption and disturbance therof, hath proceeded holly on the emperor's behalf, who for our friendship in suche wise heretofore shewed unto him, in making him king of Spayn, in making him emperor, whenne the empire was at our dispoicion, in lending him our money, that he may only thank us for the honour he is now advanced unto, hath nevertheless for his reciproque shewed unto us, all the ingratitude he could devise, both in contempnyng, as it were, a friendship, when we have done more for his satisfaction in our proceedings then needed, and in procuring what displeasure and injury he could against us, at the bishop of Rome's hand, as by credible reports we have knownen and lerned; yet such is our zeal to unytie, concord, and quiet amongs Christian princes, and such is our princely nature, that as we canne continue our displeasure to no man, if he do ones remove the cause therof: so if he which is a prince of honor, and a personage whom we ones chose, and thought worthie for his vertue and qualites to be advanced, will by his express writing, eyther desire us to put his doings towards us in oblivion, or by the same purge himself, and declare that such things as we have noted unkindnes in at his hande, hath been unjustly, and without his desert, imputed unto him, we shall embrace his overture touching this renovation; but we plainly said and offered, that seing we had susteyned the injury, we could not be a suiter for the reconciliation, nor treat with his master of such appendents for aydes, as be before expressed, or any such like, unless our amyties shuld be first symple, and without all manner of conditions renoveled; which parte, if he will first accomplish, he shuld not need to doubt, but to all his reasonable desires to be made after, he shall have as friendly and reasonable answer, as between friends in the highest degree of friendship can be required. Touching the bishope of Rome, we declare unto him, that as we have not proceeded uppon so sleight and slender grounds, as we wold revoke, alter, or change any peece of our doings; having in all causes made our foundacions uppon the laws of God, nature, and honestie, and established all our works made uppon the same, by the consent of all the states of our realme, in open and high court of parliament, so considering there hath been some means made unto us by the bishop himself for such a reconciliation, which we have not yet embraced, it shuld not be expedient to have it compassed by any other means; nor we could take as in good parte, or think that the emperor shuld earnestly mind a reconciliation, and a renovation of our amyties, if for the satisfaction of the bishop of Rome our enemye, he shuld move us to alter any one thing that we have here determyned contrary to his purpose, and pretended autoritie. To his request for aid against the Turk, was answered, that we could give no certain resolution, because the affaires of Christendom be not quiet, but in case their may ensue between christen princes an universall reconciliation, concord, and agreement, we shall not fayle in that matter to doe for our parts, that to the office of a christien prince appertaineth: finally to his desire for ayd against the French king, we said it shuld be convenient that our amytie shuld be first renewed, and certainly established, before we shuld treat of any suche appendants; and theine being an indifferent friend to both, we might frankly travail to conserve peas and unities; or els friendly to staye him that wold do wrong; but tyl such time as that foundation were made, we could neyther in this appendant, nor any suche like make any direct answer. And forasmuch as not only for your instruction, but also for that we be much desirous to know in what parte they take our answer there, we thought convenient to advertise you of the premysses, our pleasure is, that ye shall aswell in your conferences with the emperor, pretending only a generall knowledge of certain of the overtures made by his orators here, both maintain our answers to the same, with such reasons as ye canne devise for that purpose, and of your self exhort him not to pretermyt this goodly occasion, so graciously beganne, commenced, and entred, extolling our princely harte, nature, and courage, with our most gentle inclynation, to the satisfaction of our friends desires, in all reasonable things, wherunto they shall not press us; which kind of constraint doth for most parte more hurte in the stay of good purposes, then can be, after with repentance when the tyme is past eftsoons redoubled. As in semblable maner move monsieur Grandevile of your self, as a personage whom ye repute, addicte to the advancement of our honor, to desire the emperor to consider what good may ensue to him, and to the hole state of Christendom, if we may joyne again in perfitte amytie; and that it were great pitie, and purchase greater losse than might be after recovered, to suffer this goodly meane and entree to passe without certain fruit and effect, by the putting to it of such appendants and conditions, as ye knowe, what soever we will after do, at the contemplation of friendship, yet our nature and courage will not bear to be newe loden and charged withall; specially considering that we have suffered the injury; and with these and suche like words, as we woll that ye shall endeavor your self of your self to pryke them forward to the renovation of our amytie, without adding therunto any conditions, Soe ye shall repayr to the court and to Grandevile as ye may conveniently, to give them occasion by your being in their eyes, to enter communication with you of these matters; wherby you shall the better also perceyve wherunto they will bend, which our pleasure is, you shall from tyme to tyme signify unto us, as ye may have any certain matter worthie our knowlege.

IMPRIMIS, to declare to his grace myn hole entent and purpose yn wrytyng the booke, wherein takyn my testimony off God, they only seyth the hart of man, was only the manifestation off the treuth in that mattier, that by master Secretaries letters I tooke as a commandment to shew my sentence herein, which wrote the same to me by his gracy's pleasure, that I shuld by writing declare myn opinion; and this is the very cause I dyd wryght; for otherwise, I thynk I had never sett pennic to booke in so lyttyl hope of persuasion, and in such a matter as the tyme was so lykely nott to be all the best accepted.

Further to declare after I was onys entred into the mattier, haveng sent to me the books of them that have wrytten yn the contrary part, wherin I saw the trouth nervyolouslye suppressyd and cloked, with all colours that could be invented sett upon the untrew opinion, seyng besyde what acts folowed of the same so sore and greivouse, both in the sight of God, and judgment of the rest of Christendom, out of that realme, that except those colours were takyn away, and treuth purely sett forthe, wythe declaration of the inconvenient acts, yt might soon torne to the utter danger of his grace's bothe honour afore God and man, and utter destruction, as yet semyth, of the quyettnes of the realme; this made me wyth all both wytt and lernyng that God had gyven me, to endeavour to expresse so the trouthe, and declare the qualytes off those acts that folowed of the sinister opinion, that I doubt not whosoever reade the booke that wole knowe the trouthe, shuld never after need to fall into daungier, for ignorance of the true sentence.

And this I did with this hope, having this ever fixid in my harte, that howsoever bys grace was by perverse occasion brought from those opinions which was for his honore most to maynteyne, that he was brought thereto as God suffereth those that be in his favour, and whom he hath electe to eternal felicytie, notwithstanding to faull some tyme into offensys dampnable, to the entent they myght better know where they have their trew lyght and savegarde which comythe of God, and nothyng off them self: as ytt is not unknorne that scripture mentioneth the both of Davyd and Solomon's faulles, which bothe in conclusion were recoveryd by the mercye of God againe, and Solomon, notwithstanding the gyft of wysedome that God had gyven him, fell so sore that he was utterly tornyd from God, and gyven to idolatrye. This I consydreng in those elect personys off God, and judging verely though he his grace was by God permyttd to faull from the trew doctrine of Christ, yett as God saved Davyd by those meanes, to send a prophete unto him to show hym the trewth, which as soone as he had hard told hym, forthwyth fell to repentance, and so was taken to the grace off God againe, and recoveryd to his greater honour, than he was yn afore his faul;

the same trust I had in his grace, whiche made me put my uttermost studye and labour, calling for help of God, to manifest the trueth, where I doubt not but God hath hard my prayer, that for knowledge of the trewe sentence, there can be no doubt; and I cannot but greatly trust, that his grace hereynge and assenting, as king David did to the same after his errour, shall be recoveryd by God to higher honour and grace, then ever he was afore God suffered him to faull.

In this declaration of this treuth, because not only afore God were great peryll, but also in this world present afore man, many soore daungers myght happen, in case his grace did remayne and continew yn his sentence so dyvers from the rest of the Christen princes; this causyd me, calling to my mynd what daunger might follow bothe of his people at home, whose myndes experience showethe cannot be quietlyd wythe this innovations touching opinions in religion; and also of outward power of those prynces to whose honour yt ys judged to apparteyne to defend the lawes of the church, against all other princes or nations that doyth impugne them, for these considerations to the entent the daunger hereoff now not unknown, I have in the same booke, sometye in my own person, brought all such reasons wherebye justly either the people, or oughtward prynce might be instigate against his grace, foloweng the dyvers trade from other Christyan princes that he hath begone. Which reasons and discourses conteynd in the booke vehemently sett forthe, yf they shuld be redd apart without consideracyon of my fynall purpose, which by all means entendencyd to sett afore hys graces yien, not only the treuthe off that was to be folowed, butt the daungers that were moste lykelye to ensue, both at home and abroad, yf they were not folowed, he shall think by what vehemencye and sore reprehension he seyth in the wrytyng, that I am the greatyst adversaraye of his grace's honour that ever any hitherto hath bene: but God knoweth my entent, and he that redyth the hool booke together shall knowe the same, how my very purpose and ende was to save him from great dyshonour and peryll, both in this world and that to come, which were nothing possyble to examine, not knoweng what they were, and what were lykely to happen to be sayd or done against his grace: which foloweng all probablytie the book doth expresse, and for the better understanding of both my opinion and sentence that I follow in the book, touching the declaration of the trueth, and of my utter fynall purpose in the hole matter, thys chidly I wole desyr his grace, bycause of the prolyxite thereof, which shuld be to muche for his grace to rede hymselfe, that that wole please hym to apoynt some lernyd and said man to rede over the book, and that done to declare his judgment, bound first wyth an othe off hys fydelytie, first to God, and afterwards to his grace to show hys judgment without affection of any part: and yf his grace wold gyve this charge to the bishop of Dyrrium, whome I judge to be the saldyst and most grounded in lernyng, with faythful hart to his grace, above any other that I knowe, puttyng the same charge unto him by another; I think his grace shuld thereby best and most truly be enformed; and so when he hath made his relation, afterward his grace may prove other menes judgments as it shall please him.

Furthermore to declare unto his grace how my full purpose and mynd was, touching the hole booke that never no part thereof shuld a come abroad in any manes hands, afore his grace had seen ytt: and to folowe in this booke the same manner of secretnes that I did in the other which I deliveryd to his grace concerning his matrymonye, but by what meanes in one part of this book I have been frustrate of my entent; this you may declare by mouth, knowing the hole matter.

Fynally, with all humbylnes to desyre his grace, in the name of his most faythfull servant, and most tender of his honoure and welthe, that where as by the judgement of all wise men, God of hys mercy and love toward his grace, and for a greate warnyng to retourne to hym, hath detected the iniquite of her, which hath bene the oryginal cause and occasion of althys bothe errours and dangers his grace hath cost hymself in, that now his grace will correct himself to take the same, as yt ys a favourable admonition of God, and to follow their sentencies and counsell, which (next unto theyr conseyence toward God) hath had none other cause, butt only pure love and fydelytie to his honour and welth: which causyd them, against their owne private welthe, wyth greate daunger besyde, ever to dyssent from that matrymonye; judgeng ever as ytt was most lykely, both great dishonour, great daungiers and perylls, both spiritually and outwardly, to followe thereof.

And now, yf God hath manifested the same to the recovery of hys grace welth, allways that his grace wyl accept thys warnyng to retourne to the unytie of his church, in that sentence and mynd that the rest of Christiane prynces do; wherein I dare be bolde to saye, yf God showe this great benignitie and mercy unto him, for to make him returne; for surely God's hand that must be; and whensoever that shall be herd, that shall be taken for one of the greatyst myracles that hath been showed this many agys, with the most certyn sygne of special favour that ever was showed from God to any prynce: then first of all this shall follow, that when as now all Christendome calling for a generall counsell, yf that follow, ether his grace must wyth dyshonour and damage flee to obey thereunto, or with more daunger answer there to such causes as wold be layde unto him. Yf he do returne, thys first shall follow, by that meanys that shulde be founde, that no prince Chrysten, whosoever he were, shold appere there with more honour then shuld his grace. And whereas it was for the innovation that he hath made in the church, to be the occasyon of ruyne of one of the feyrest membre of the church, if God make him torne; the conclusion wyl be brought to this, that hys faull shall be the happyest faull that was unto the church many yeres; which may be brought to be a redye and highe way to the reformation of the hole, to the more manifestation of the honour of God: so that fynally the ende shall be in every man's opinion that marketh the hole processe, that God suffred his grace to faulle, to make hym ryse wyth more honour to the greater welth not only of his own realme, but of the hole church besyde.

Your faithfull servant,

thynke, but that ye be unkynd, to be against him and |
 hys realme, who hath been always for you and yours. |
 What discomford shold it be to my lady your modyr, |
 in hir age to see you swarve from your prince and | contre in opinion. What discomford shold it be to | my lord your brother, to see you off whom he shold |
 have comford, use your learning to his discomford ! |
 What discomford shold it be to all your other frendys | to see you off obstinate opinion against all your coun- |
 trey, you may by your wisdom consider. Whom all |
 ye may comfort, and chiefly your self, in conformyng |
 you to the truthe grounded upon the stablishment off |
 the holly church of Christendome sens the begynnyng. |
 And beyng the supporting of this monarchie inventyd |
 off late days by ambition, wheroff the old fadyrs | never hard tell. St. Gregorie wryteth sore against | the bishop of Constantiople off his time who went | about a lyke monarchie, affirmyng noone such to be | in the church of Christ. Saint Cyprian wryteth, |
 " qui omnes Apostoli erant pares honoris et potestatis." |
 Consilium Ephesinum affirmyth the same, which can- | not agree with thys late found monarchie. At the | reverence of God truste not your self to much herein, |

 ye shall fynd the truth in searchyng fordyr, yff ye |

 I beseeche you have in your remembrance that I wrote |

 and I shall move the king's hyghness that your boke |
 sent to hym may be kept secret. And in conformyng | your self to the opinion off your contre and off the | truth, I doubt not but ye shall be acceptyd of the | king's hyghness as well, as ever ye wer, and mych |
 bettyr because ye shew in your boke the intier hert |
 that ye bere hym, as his grace by wisdom can, mych | better consider than I can write unto you. And that | ye may so do I pray the Holy Ghost to illuminat you. |
 And if ther be pleasure that I may do for you or | borne but a meane affectyion myght a been sufficyent to alienate also my mynde from thence, where I sawe what soever I dyd for the best, to be ever accepted in the worste parte. But this I wyll not have yowe take for my proffe off my mynde, but to procede off the kyng's displeasure toward me ; the lesse I knowe the cause to be, the further I was from all imaginacyon to suspect that hys grace should be so incensy'd against my personne ; that for to have me in his hands, he wold be content to breke and vyolate both Godd's law and mann's, to dystourbe all commercement betwene contreye and contreye, between man and man, and thys I would never a thought : but fyndyng

 the same to be so in dede, I could not but fynde wythall, howe hys grace was bent with all to my utter undoynge ; agaynst the which yff I remayne in my old purpose to procure hys wealthe and honour, he that wyll seke other proffs after thys, or wyll not be content with thys declaracyon off a mann's mynde, he declareth with all that wythe no proffe he wyll be content, but wyll have him one off hys enemies whither he wyll or no. And off this mynde off the kyng toward me I had furst knowledge at myne arryvenge in France, off the whiche to shewe yowe the first motion of my mind herein, I was more ashamyd to hear for the compassion I had to the king's honour, then movyd by any indygnacyon, that I comyng not only as imbassador, but as legate, yn the hyghest sort of embassage that ys used amongst the Chrysten princes, a prynce off honour shold desyer off another prince off like honour, betraye thynne ambassadour, betray the legate, and give him into my ambassadour's hands to be brought unto me. This was the dishonourable request, as I understand, of the king ; which (as I said afore) to me suerly, regarding my own part, I promes'd you was no great displeasure, but rather (if I shall say truth) I toke pleasure herein ; and said furthwith to my company, that I never felt my self in full possession to be a cardinall, as when I herd those tydings ; wherby it pleased God to send lyke fortune to me, as it did to those hedds of the church, whose persones the cardynalls do represent, which was to be persecutyd moste of them, whose wealthe they labouryd for most busyly. In this case lyved the apostells : and the same now beyng happenyd to me, afore God I promise I felt no displeasure, but rather was glad thereof, specially consedyryng herebye I hadd the better occasyon to declare and justyfie my minde more then ever I had afore, which was ever my minde : but touchyng the thyng, if we had no other religion, but lyved as paganes and infidells, yet jus gentium should ever teache us what demand this was, the lawe of nature alone myght declare how abhomyable ytt were to grante to such a request, and no less to desyer ytt.
 This I rehearse now to this intent, that you might the sooner perceive, that if there had been but one sparke of a mynde alienate from the kyng, thys were able to set the same in such a fyre, that furst consideringe how all regarde off honour was sett aparte, and the law that maintaineth the commercement between man purposyd to be violate, so ytt myght torne to my undoing. Furst of all of my part, I shuld abstayne from all commercement with that part, other by word, writing, or dede; secondorylye, procure by all honest wayes, if I wolde not by dishonest, to repay this malignytie, to the uttermoste damage I could devise toward them, of whose malygne minde toward me I had so greate experience: and yet after all this, furst of all, youe may see forthwythe by wrytyng att this tyme, I doe nott abstayne from the furst acte to practyse and entreate, wyth them that hath bene authors hereof, and to practyse yett to hys honour and wealthe, whiche wold utterlie extinguishe both in me. And if I be herd herin, to put the same also in execution; which thing though I do suerlie of my owne purpose and mynd, yet some occasion hereof, howe it cometh otherwise I will not denye, nor kepe close, which is this; that whereas the bishope of Verona, that was sent of me to the Frenche court, to intimate those affaires, that for the wealthe of Christendome the pope had committed unto me, to entreate with his majestie, in his retourne passyng by Abbeville, where were lodged my lorde of Wynchester, and Mr. Bryan; whereas we could not but gretlie narvayle of this acte of the kyng toward me, my hole legation purposing no other but his honour and welthe: and desiereng therefore to conferre the same with the embassadours, for better declaracyon of the truthe of the matters, to be known as they were: my lord of Wynchester, and Mr. Bryan, both abstaynenge for respect from all communycation, yet sending unto him theyre secretarye, after the bishope had in parte declared the effect of my legacie, that touched then any part the kyng, yet semed to be open to bothe parties, that all the king had done agaynst me, was of the sinistre and false reports of other, that by false conjecture of things they knewe not, had ill enfourmed the king of my purpose in comyng into these partes, which the secretarys thought onys clered and declaryd, other by letters or messengers, the kyng wold turne his mynde, as his grace sawe the deds to justifie themselves. This the bishope of Verona (at his retourne) showed me; which I accepted in that parte to be trewe also, that all came of evill enformacion. And that his grace being assertyned of my mynd, as it is and ever hath bene, it were not unpossyble then some part to knowledge rather my gratitude, than to machynate anye thing contrary. And that it might be so known, for all parts yet cannot be but well; but as I shewed the bishope, by letters I had attempted often the same, but all could not prevail: my messengers I had sent often for that purpose, could never be admitted to have audience with the kyng. And without one of these wayes were founde, there could no conclusion be had in these mattyers, wherein reasonyng with him, I asked him, if for the love and service that ever he hath born to the kyng, and showed indede when he was in that place where his service might be in steade to the kyng, and love also he hath ever to me, having assured knowledge of all my affayres and purposes, not only these laste, but all synyth my departing from the realme, whether he could be content (the kyng's pleasure first known) to acquiet the kyng's mynde in this behalfe, by going to his grace, and enforming him of the hole; wherein, afore God, he shuld do a dede moste charitable. Wherin also I did allege unto him, for to bind him withall; bycause after such demonstracyon of the kyng's mynde made unto me, few men wold be content to practyse wyth his grace, in any thing belonging unto me. For this cause, I did rehearse the more thyngs to enduce him hereunto, and amongst other, this chieflie, the purpose of his comyng with me, which (afore God) was this: that the pope, intending by all meanes of benignitie to practise with the king, haveng the Frenche kyng so joined in amytye with the kyng, and with his sanctitie also; devyseng for a mete instrument betwene bothe. Yf any personne, for this degre newlye taken, were not accepted, the bishop of Verona was thought moste meetest, being for his old deserts to both princes, as long as he was in that place where he might do them serviceable pleasure, as it was to be thought grateful to them both, and counted (for his goodness) the best bishop of Italye. So that all thynges consydered, in matters of the church to entreate with these princes, none was thought like: wherupon the pope bounde him to take thys jorneye with me, for this purpose. And this bond, amongst other I rehearsed unto him, when I moved him to go unto the kyng. To the which, he made answer: yf there were none other bond nor respect in this matter but of God, knowing my matters as he doth, and seeing what inconvenients might followe, if they were not at laste well accepted, besyde the servyce he hath ever owed to the kyng, and love toward me, knowing what comfort that might be to all parties, if my trewe and faythfull dealings were well intimate to the kyng, he wold be content at all tymes the waye onys founde afore, howe with commodytie he might come to the kyng's presence, to take this charge upon hym. Thys, my lorde, you may now perceive, that if I had any part that mynde, that the kyng's procureng against me doth shewe to be persuaded I have, yt could not be possible I could have any confidence to attempt any medlyng wythe his grace under suche maner: but because nor my confydence, nor affecyonate mynde, yt is not taken awaye, therefore this I do declare unto you by these letters, to the intent you maye intimate the same to hys grace. And now you see by a great proffie what my mynde is, you may also see how all suspytion may not alonye be clearyd, many things apeacyd that peradventure might torne to greater trouble, but also many things be brought to light, to the kyng's more assurdy honour and wealthe, than any thing is I thinke thought of hitherto make for the same. For all this I dare promise to follow, if the bishop be herd with that mynde, as he is sent, and content for to go. Other declaration of my mynde by letters I entende not to make, than my letters agreyng with my acts sent afore do make testimonye; and that the bishope, which is preve to all, may better declare presentlye. But this I will saye, if I hare in any parte that mynde, the kyng's acte agaynst me doth show his grace is persuaded I shold have, suerlye I wold never adone as I have done, in all my acts and processes by letters, made the kyng and you preve unto them. Thys I dyd at my furst comyng to Rome, and the cause of my legacy nowe, and the cause of my comyng to these parts. Such advyses rebels be not wont to give unto those from whome they rebel, but specially at Rome, being there when the tyme was troublesome for the kyng in his realme; lettynge them the sending furthe of the censures, which myght a caused more trouble; and sending at that tyme my servant purposelye, to offer my service, to procure by all meanes his honour, welth, quietness; animating besyde, those that were cheffe of my nerest kynne, to be constaint in his servyce. Thys rebels be not wont to do. And I know, at Rome, if any man had been premyate to do hym service, none could have done more; insomuch that men judged me half a rebell to God and my contrye, because I wold not assent to divers thyngs, that had made little to the kyng's quietness : but specially, having in my hand those wrytings, that put forth perddventure, might a caused most trouble of all. These instantly being desired of those, which had in a manner authorytie to commande, and yet ever finding meanes that they never came into their sight nor hands, and to this hower suppressing the same lykewise. If one that had mynd of rebellion wold do the same, be thinke you well : but, as I say, my purpose is not to justifie my mynde, by these letters, at this time, in more acts than one, which is of this present time. Nor if it be not justified of such a one as the bishop's, that knoweth them assuredly, I do nother entend hereafter to labour any more herein : afore God, and all men, that will be indifferent judges of the truthe, I will not doubt, at all tynes to justifie my self toward the king, I wold to God I could so well justifie my self afore God and the catholick church, for negligent service in this behalf, because I woulde not offend the kyng. Now I will say no more, but pray unto Almighty God, to put that in the kyng's mynde that may be most to his honour and wealthe, with grace to follow the same ; and to take from all other such occasion, why they shuld thynk, if they serve the kyng according to their conscience, they shuld be constrainyd to offend the kyng, and so herebye to separate the one from the other ; which surlye to no man shuld be more greffe than to me. But Goddes pleasure be fulfilled above all, to whome nowe I commit you. Written at Cambray, the second day of Maye.

PLEASITH hit your honor, with my moste humble dowtye, to be advertised, that where it hath pleasyd your lordship to be the verie meane to the king's majestie, for my preferment, most unworthie to be abbes of this the king's monasterie of Godystowe ; in the which offyce, I trust I have done the best in my power to the mayntenance of God's trewe honour, with all treuth and obedience to the king's majestie ; and was never moved nor desired by any creature in the king's behalfe, or in your lordship's name, to surrender and give up the house ; nor was never mynded nor intended so to do, otherwise than at the king's gracious commandement, or yours. To the which I do, and have ever done, and will submit my self most humble and obedientlie. And I trust to God, that I have never offendyd God's laws, neither the king's, wherebie that this poore monastrie ought to be suppressed. And this notwithstanding, my good lorde, so it is, that doctor London, whiche (as your lordship doth well knowe) was agaynst my promotion, and hathe ever sence borne me great malys and grudge, like my mortall enemye, is sodenlie cummyd unto me, with a greate rowte with him ; and here dothe threaten me and my sisters, sayeng, that he hath the king's commission to suppress the house, spyte of my tethe. And when he saw that I was contente that he shulde do all things according to his commission ; and shewyd him playne, that I wolde never surrender to his hande, being my awncient enemye ; now he begins to intreat me, and to invegle my sisters, one by one, otherwise than ever I harde tell that any of the kyng's subjects hathe been handelyd : and here tarieth and contynueth, to my greate cost and charges ; and will not take my answer, that I will not surrender, till I know the king's gracious commandement, or your good lordship's. Therefore I do moste humble beseeche you, to contynewe my good lorde, as you ever have bene ; and to directe your honorable letters to remove him hens. And whensoever the kyng's gracious commandement, or yours, shall come unto me, you shall find most reddie and obedyant to folloe the same. And notwithstanding that doctor London, like an untrew man, hath informed your lordship, that I am a spoiler and a waster, your good lordship shall knowe that the contrary is trewe. For I have not alienatyd one halporth of goods of this monasterie, movable, or unmovable, but have rather increasyd the same. Nor never made lease of any farme, or peece of grownde belongyng to this house ; or then hath bene in tymes paste allwaies set under convent seal for the wealth of the house. And therefore my verie truste is, that I shall fynde the kyng as gracious lorde unto me, as he is to all other his subjects. Seyng I have not offendyd. And am and will be moste obedyent to his most gracious commandment at all tymes. With the grace of Almighty Jesus, who ever preserve you in honour longe to indure to his pleasure. Amen. NUMBER LVI.

A Consolatory Letter to Henry VIIIth, from the Bishop of Durham, after the Death of Queen Jane.

[Cott. Lib. Titus B. 1. p. 121.]

PLEASE your highnes to understande that wher now of late it hath pleasyd Almighty God to take unto his mercy out off this present lyffe, the most blessed and vertuose lady, your grace's most dearest wyffe the queen's grace, whose soule God pardone, and newes thereof sorrowfull to all men, came into these partes, surely it cannot well be expressed, how all men of all degrees dyd greatly lament and mourne the death of that noble lady and princesse, taken out of this world by bringing forth of that noble joyt that is spronge of your majesty, and her, to the great joyt and inestimable comfote of all your subjects, consideringe withall that this noble fruit, my lord prince, in his tender age interying into this world, is by her death leftt a dear orphan, commencing thereby thys miserable and mortall lyffe, not only by weeping and waylinge, as the mysery of menkynde requireth, but also refte in the begynnyng of his lyffe from the comfote of his most dear mother. And abyett to hym by tenderness of his age, it is not known what he hath lost, yet we that do know and feel it, have much more cause to morne, seinge such a vertuose princesse who hath shewed so great hopes of much frute to come of her body, is so sudenly taken from us. But thys notwithstandinge your majesty whom thys chauncly most towcheth, must by your high wisdom consyder the misery of the mortal lyffe of mankynde, which no man born in this world, prince nor poore man, can exchue; seing it is the sentence of Almighty God, sayinge in the begynnyng aswel to the woman, "in dolore paries filios tuos;" as to the man, and by him to all his posterite, "pulvis es et in pulverem revertaris." In which mortal lyffe who soever is most vexyd and troubled, yf he take it patiently ys more accepte to God, and called in the scripture therby blessed; as it is written in the Book of Job, "beatus homo qui corripitur à Deo; in crepationem ergo Domini ne reprobet, quia ipse vulnerat et medetur, percutit et manus ejus sanabit." And it is written in the epistle of James lykewise, "beatus vir qui suffert tentationem, quum autem ille probatus fuerit, accipiet coronam vite." And as Saint Paul saies to the Hebrews, it is a sure tokyn that God favoureth them as his children, to whom he sendeth adversite, sayinge, "quem enim diligit Dominus castigat; flagellat autem omnem filium quem recipit. In disciplina perseverate, tanquam filiis vobis se offert Deus: Quin enim filius quem non corrigit Pater; quod si extra disciplinam estis, cuius participes facti sunt omnes, ergo adulterini et non filii estis." And abyett the disciplin of adversite be full of heviness for the tyme, yet it endeth alwayes in joy; as there folloeth, "omnis autem disciplina in presenti quidem non videtur esse gaudii sed mereris, postea autem fructum paratissimum exercitatis per eadem reddet justitiæ." And like as al men more do favour those their servants, that in a longe voiage do sustein more adversite, so Almighty God in thys lyffe (which all is but a voiage, for as Saint Paule saith, "non habemus hic manentem civitatem sed futuram inquirimus,") most accepteth those his servants, that so sustein most adversite patiently. And Saint Paule, consyderinge the instabile of this world, exhortheth all men to use al things therein as transitory, and not permanent both in prosperity and in adversite; for neither of both doth tary, but brively overpasse; sainge, "tempus breve est; reliquum est, ut qui habent uxores tanquam non habentes sint, et qui flent tanquam non flentes, et qui gaudent tanquam non gaudentes, et qui emunt tanquam non possidentes, et qui utuntur hoc mundo tanquam non utatur, preterit enim figura mundi hujus." Then sence prosperite is fugitive and taryeth not, let us not trust to yt, and sence adversite soon overpasse and abideth not, let us not esteem it for after it sustenyd patiently sure we be that joy shall succeed. Consyder yf it like your majestie how oft tynes sence your most noble regne began, God hath sent you diverse and many tymes great flowings of prosperite, and therfor yf God sum tymes do sende a droppe of adversite, sustein it by your high wisdom, with patient suffering, as I trust assuredly, and doubt not but your highnes wyl; assured you may be that God for your so doinge shal highly requite that far beyond your highnes' expectations. Grete cities, towns, and regions, al people in them, and princes of the same, oft do sustein adversite bycause the hole world is alway subject to mutabilite, and lyke as after lygth succeedeth darknes, and after somer cometh winter, so darknes taryeth not, but light doth folow, and winter gifeth place to the somer again; so that I doubt not but God willing this storme of sorowful season, shal by your majestie's wisdom after a tyme overpass, and the somer of joyful gladnes shal succeed, not only to your grace comfote, but to the comfote of all your subjects, much mornnyng at this tyme in their harts with your highnes. And when Almighty God hath taken from your grace, to your greate discomfote a moste blessed and vertuose lady, consyder what he hath given your highnes again to your comfote, and to the rejoyce of all us your subjects, our most noble prince, to whom God hath ordeined your majestie not only to be father, but also as the tyme now requireth, to supply the roome of a mother also. So that therby he shal hereafter have double cause to honour your highnes. As it is not to be doubted, but God grantyng him lyfe herafter he wyl do. In whom in the mean tyme, Almighty God of infinite mercy grant, that your grace putting away all sorrowful pensiveness, may to the comfote of your noble harte, long rejoyce, which shal be also to the high comfote of al the subjects of your grace's realme. And sence mornnyng can in no wise amend the matter, and thanks given to God may sooner over-blow this storm. Best shall be to conclude with Job, "Dominus dedit, dominus abstulit, sicut Domino placuit ita factum est. Sit nomine Domini benedictum." God gave your grace that noble lady, and God hath takyn her away as it pleased hym. So it is done, laude by gyven to hym: and for to consyder also, how Job exhortheth by his example, al men being in like case, to patience, sainge, "Si bona suscepimus de manu Domini, mala autem quare non sustineamus;" which your highnes for your great wisdom and learninge can much better consider, then I can advertise the same, unlesse sorrowfulnes for the tyme put it out of remembrance. Almighty God of his infinite mercy grant your grace spiritual comfote, and putting away al worldly hevynesse, ever to rejoyce in him, who have your majestie alway in his blessed protection to your hart's desire, with encrease of much honore. From your cite of Yorke the xii day of November.

By your most humble subject, servant and chaplein,

All curates and heades of congregacions, religiouse and oder, privileged and oder, shall everie holie day reade the gossell, and the epistle of that day out of the Englishe byble, plainly and distinctlie: and they that have such grace, shall make some declaracion odre, of the one, or of bothe, (if the time may serve,) every holie day.

Item. Every curate, resident and hable, shall make four solempe sermons in the yeaere, one everie quarter: not rescoent, havinge 5*l.* or 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* de claro, shall finde one solempe sermon for the instruction of the people, in the begynninge of lent, havng 10*l.* de claro, two solempe sermons; one in the begynning of lent, and othur at some othur time of the yere. Having 15*l.* three sermons; one in the begynninge of lent, thoder at two convenient tymes. Havinge 20*l.* four sermons; one at lent, thoder three, at three convenient times. Havinge 30*l.* de claro, five sermons; one at lent, and the oder four at convenient times. Having 40*l.* six sermons; one in the beginnunge of lent, and the oder five at convenient times. And as the cleare valed doth encrease, so mo sermons.

And yet nevertheles we now monishe, under the payne of the lawe, all parsons and vicars to be resident upon their curis, beinge within this dioces, afore the feaste of Christenmas next; ones they can and do shew, afore that day, a lawfull cause, why they may not, or shoulde not do so.

Item. All curates and oder, havinge charge of any congregacion, must diligentlie informe their flocke, accordinge to the king's highnes' injunctions, that they may in no wise yelde worshipp to any images, lowtinge or bowinge downe, or kuelinge to the aside images, ne offering to them any money, or wax lighte or unlighte, or any oder thing: for so muche, as offeringe is to made to God onlie, and to no creature under God. Neverthelesse they may still use lightes in the roode lofete, and afore the sacrament, and at the sepulture at Easter; accordinge to the king's injunctions: so that they none use to the honor or worshipp of any image, ne by the way of offeringe made, odre to any image, or to any sainte represented by the same.

Item. They must teache their flocke, that images be suffred onelie as bokes, by which our hertes may be kindeled to folow the holy steppes and examples of the saintes represented by the same; even as saintes lives be written, and muste be redde in written bookes, for the same purpose: and that, as we do not worships our booke when we have redde the saints's lifie; so likewise, we shall not worships the images, which is as the booke to them that cannot read in odre bokes.

Item. They must declare to thaire flocke, that although they see the image of the fadre represented as an olde man, yet they maye in no wise beleve, that the hevenlie father is any man, or that he haith a ny bodie or age; but that he is a nature and substauce, above all mesure passinge the capacite and understandinge, odre of mans witt or aungelles.

Item. Alle suche ymagies, to whiche any maner of resorte is usede, by waye of peregrinage or offeringe, they must depose and sequestre frome all sighte of men, and suffre them no more to be sett up.

And for that purpose, all curates and heades of congregacions, muste ons in a quarter rede their injunctions, in the church, in thaudience of all the people; aswell for the remembrance of their owne dewtie, as for ther citinge the people to knowe their dewtie. And we charge and commaunde all curates, and all oder of this dioces to whome it shall apperteigne, to have a copy of their injunctions, within fourtie days next followinge the puplicacion hereof. And when the same shall be imprinted, we charge them to have them so imprinted within sex days aftre the same shall come to thire knowledge, under payne of excommunication.

Item. They muste instructe their parochians, that they nothinge please God, but displease him; doeng workes onlie in thaire owne will and devotion, by man's tradicion, and leaving the workes by God commanded, undone.

Item. They muste instruct their flocke, that their confidence for thateyning of everlasting lief, must be only in God, and in his grace and marcy, and in the merits and redemption of our Saviour Jesu Christe: and that none of our workes, as ours, have any efficacie or vertue to save us, but only have their vertue and efficacie by the grace of God, and merits of Christ's passion.

Item. All curates must openly, in the church, teach and instruct the mydwiefes, of the very wordes and fourme of baptisme; to thentente that they may use them perfitye, and none odre: in time of nede, that is to say; that they, naming the child, must say these words, "John, or Thomas, or Agnes, I baptize thee in the name of the Fader, the Sonne, and the holie Gost:" and that saying thies wordes, they must cast water upon the child. For which purpose they must have ready at hand a vessel of cleane water.

Item. They must often upon the holidays, and specially at times of marriage, warn their parochians, that they in no wise make any privie contract of marriage, but afore two or three sufficient witnes required to be present for that purpose: and that afore they make any contract, they do their best endeavour to know wheder there be betwene them any lawfull impediment, odre by Godds lawe, or any odre ecclesiastical yet used, afore they enter to make any contract.

Item. That the fadres, and oder freyndes, constrayne not them that be under their correccion and governance, to marry agenst their willes, ne afore they have discretion to consider what the bounde of marriage meaneth.

Item. All curates and oder heddes of congregacions must never cease to imprinte in the hertes of their flocke the two commaundments which our Saviour calleth the fulnes of the lawe; that is, the love of God above all thing, and their love of thye neighbore as thy self: and likewise the sayd curates must continually engrave in the hertes of their flocke the two preceptes of the lawe of nature; that is, do as thou wolde be done unto, and do not that thou woldest not to be done unto the.

Item. They muste alway emploie them self to mainteyn charitie and peace in our Lorde Jesu amongs their parochians, and to avoide all rancor and dissention amongs them.

Item. They must instructe their flocke, that in those dayes which be observed and kept for holidayes, they must utterlie withdrawe themselves frome all worldlie and fleshlie busines and occupacions, and houses of gammes and playes; speciallie frome all synne; and entierlie and hollie employ themselves to goostelie works, behoveable for manis soule: and that therefore taverns, victailing-houses, may not thyes dayes be used and exercised, and speciallie in the tyme of divine servicie, onles necessitie oderswise require for them that travaile in journey.

Item. All houses of religion, colleges, hospitalls, and all oder havng any benefices appropriated unto theme, shall, according to the value of their benefices, have in their churches appropried certain sermons every year; as in like ordinance for curates as afore is comprised.

Item. All curates and oder havng benefices appropriated by them self yf they can, or by oder preachers ons every quarter, must teache and instruct the people of their dewtie of fathfull and loyall obedience to our soverand lord the king, declaring that they be bounden to yield entier and perfect obedience to his highnes by Goddes lawe, expresse under the payn of dampnation everlasting: and that to make any styrrng, gathering of people, or commocion, withoute his expresse commandment, is to breke, not only Goddes commandment and lawe, but also all natural and politique order, in which the heed governethe the membres, and not the membres the heed, in which also all the members, aswell by nature as by good policie, employe them selfe and indaunger them self for the preservation and mayntenance of the heed.

All which injunctions by thauritorie which we have under God, and our souveraigne lord the kynge, we charge all to whom it appertenyth to observe and kepe under the paynes lymyted in the same, and under the paynes of suspencion and sequestracyon of the frutes of theyre beneficies and promocyons ecclesiasticall, and oder paynes arbitrary, as we shall thynke convenient and reasonable.

NUMBER LVIII.

Injunctions given by the Bishoppe of Coventre and and Lycheffelde throughc out his Diocesse.

And that the bishop of Rome, and his predecessours, did ever heretofore usurp upon the kynges of this realme, in the using any maner of jurisdiction or auctorite within the same. And that ye shal exhorte every Sunday al your parishioners, to the due obedience of our prince and souveraigne lorde, his heires and successors, kynges of Englande.

Item. That every person or proprietary of any parishe churchc within my diocesse, shal on thisside the feast of Pentecoste nexte comnyngc, provide a boke of the hole Byble, bothe in Latin and also in Englishe, and laye the same in the quiere, for every man that will, to loke and reade thereon: and shal not discouragc, but earnestly comforte, exhorte, and admonishe every man to rede the Bible in Latin or Englishe, as the very worde of God, and the spiritual food of man's sowle, whereby they maye the better knowe their deutytes to God, to their souveraigne lord the kinge, and their neighbour: alwaye gently and charitably exhorting them to use a sober and a modeste haviour in the readyngc and inquisition of the true sence, and that in no wise they stiffely or egerly contende, or strive with one another about the same, but referre the declaracion of those places that be in controversie, to the judgement of them that be better learned.

Item. I decree and ordeyne that all monasteries, collegiate churches, and al persons to whom any benefices be impropried within my diocesse, shal from henceforth four times in the year at the leaste, that is, one tyme every quarter cause one sermon to be preached, purely, sincerely, and according to the true scripture of God, in al such churches where they, or any of them, receive any profytes or commodities, upon peyne of sequestration of their frutes.

Item. I require and exhorte you, in our souveraigne lorde's name, and as his gracie mynister, I straitly charge and commaunde you, to declare and publishe every Sondaye in the pulpet at high masse tymes, the Pater Noster, Ave, and Crede in Englishe, distinctly, and in suche wyse as the people maye lerne the same. And that four tymes in the quarter ye declare to your paryshoners, the seven deadly synus, and the Ten Commaundments, so as the people therby may not only lerne how to honour God, their prince, and parentes; but also how they shall avoide sinne and vice, and to lyve veruouesly, folowinge Goddes lawes and his commaundments.

Item. That ye bothe in your preachings, secret confessions, and al other workes and doings, shall excite and move your parishioners unto such workes as are commaunded expressly of God: for the whiche God shall demaunde of them a straye reckeninge; as the Articles of the Fayth, the Ten Commaundments, and al other workes which men do of their own will or devotion, to teache and instruct your parishioners, that they are not to be estemed, in comparison of the other. And that for the not doinge of any wilfull workes, God wyll not aske any accompte.

Item. That ye, nor any of you, sufre no fryer or other religious man, to have any cure or servyce within your churches or cures, excepte they be lawfully dispensed withal, or licensed by the ordinary.

Item. That ye, and every one of you, doo your dyligence, and endeavour your selves to your best industries and labour, to instructe and teache aswell chyl dren as all other your people, both men and women, of that your parishe, the Pater Noster, Ave, and Crede, and the Ten Commaundments in Englishe, and that ye or any of you do admyt no man nor woman to receyve the sacrament of the Aultare, untyl that ye have harde them recite and declare at the leaste, the same Pater Noster, Ave, and Crede in Englishe, without boke.

Item. That ye, and every of you, shal two tymes in a quarter declare to your parishioners the bande of matrimony, and what great danger it is to al men, that use theyr bodies, but with such persones as they lawfully may by the law of God; and to exhorte in the said tymes your parishioners, that they make no pryve contractes of matrimonie, but that they call two honest menne to recorde the same, as they wyll avoide the extreme payne of the lawes used within the kinge's realme by his gracie auctoritie.

Item. Where some frowarde persons, partly for malice and disdaine, neglecte their curates, and such as have the cure and charge of their soules, and partly to cloke and hyde their lewde and naughtie livinge, as they have used all the yere before, use at lent to go to be confessed to the fryers, and such other religious houses: therefore I wyl you to declare, and shew to your parishioners that no testimoniall, brought from any of them, shall stande in any effect: nor any such persones shall be admitted to Goddis bourde, unto they submit themselves to be confessed to their owne curates, onlesse for certayne arduate and urgent considerations of conscyence, they be, or shall be otherwise lausfully dispensed or lycensed withal, either by me or my deputies.

Item. Whereas unyversally reigneth this abhominable, detestable, and dyvelishe use and custome, that upon the holy dayes, in the tyme of divine servyce and preachyng, that youthe and other unthriftes, resorteth to ale-houses, and there use unlawfull games, blasphemie, dronkenness, with other enormities: so that good people thereat be offended, and no punishment hadde as yet: therefore I wil and commaunde you to declare to suche that kepe alehouses or taverns within your parishes, that at suche they suffre no more such unlawfull and ungodly assemblies; nor to receive suche persons to bollynge and drynkinge at such seasons in their houses, under peine of the kinges high displeasure, and to be punished for so doinge.

Item. Ye shall teache and instructe your paryshoners, at the least twelve tymes in the yere, the essential maner and forme of christeninges in English, and that the mydwife may use it in tyme of necessitie: commaunding the woman, when the tyme of birthe draweth nere, to have at all seasons a vessell of cleane water for the same purpose.

Item. Where I am credibly informed, that certain priestes in my diocesse, go in habite dissimuled more liker of the temporalite than of the clergie, whiche may and dothe minister occasion to suche light persons when they come in places, and to persons not known, to be more licentious, bothe of their communication and actes, to the great sclaunder of the clergie: therefore frome hensforthe I charge and commaunde, that in cities, towns, and villages, and in all other places, they weare mete, convenient, and decent apparrell, wherby they may be known of the clergie: as they and every one of them will avoide the penaltie of the lawes.

Item. I desire, require, and exhorte you and every of you, in the name of God, that he firmly do observe and kepe these all and singular mine injunctions. And that ye and every one of you that are priestes, having cure or not cure, as well beneficed, as not beneficed within my diocesse, do gette a copie of these injunctions, to the intente ye maye observe, and cause to be observed the contentes of the same.— God save the king.

NUMBER LIX.

Injunctions given by the Bishop of Salysbury, throughout his Diocess.

INJUNCTIONS made by me Nycolas Shaxton, bishop of Sarum, at mine ordinarie visitacion, done in tharchdeaconry of Dorset, in the yere of our lord God 1538, and in the 30th yere of the reign of our soveraigne lord King Henry the Eighth, by the Grace of God, King of Englande and of France, Defender of the Faythe, lord of Ireland, and Supreme Hede here in ert, next under God, of the Church of England. All which and singular injunctions, by thautorite given to me of God and the kinge, I exhorte, and also commaunde all parsons, vicares, curates, chauntry prestes, and other of the clergy whatsoever they be, to observe, kepe, and perform, as concerneth every one of them, upon pain of inobedience, and also of all such lawes and statutes as may be laid against them, for breaking or violating of the same at any time hereafter.

Fyrst. Whereas beneficed men, having and taking cure of souls at the byshop's hands, do absent themselves from their said cures without licence or counsell of the said byshop, nor leavinge there able curates to discharge the said cures: I monyshe all such prempertorily, either to be personally upon their said cures, by Myghelmas nexte cunningge, or els to present unto me, or my deputies, such curates, as upon myne examinacion, shall be abled and admitted to serve and discharge the said cures, in thabsence of the said beneficed men. And that neither any French, or Irish preest, which cannot perfily speke the Englysh tongue, serve no cure in this dyocesse, after the terme before specified.

Item. That all such having cures, do every Sonday and holiday continually, recite, and sincerely declare in the pulpet, at the high masse tyme, in the English tonge, both the epystle and gospell of the same daye, (if ther be time thereto) or elles the one of them at the leest; and also to set forthe the king's regall power to be supreme heade, and highest power, under God, in ert, of the church and realme of Englande: and to abolshe the byshope of Rome's usurped power. And furthermore, to declare openly and distinctly the Ten Commaundements, the Articles of our Beleve, the Pater-Noster; and finally, bydde the beades, according to the king's ordinaunce, and none otherwise.

Item. That everie prebendary, or proprietary of any paryshe-churche, whose annuall fruytes extendeth to 20*l.* shall make, or cause for to be made fourte times in the yere, (that is to saye, every quarter) one sermon there. And if the fruytes be 15*l.* three sermons; if but 10*l.* two sermons; and if it be under that, he shall make one sermon at the leest, over and besydes the gyving of distributions, almes, or other comfortable and bodily, or charitable socour amonge the poore parochians there, according to theire appropriacions, or rate of their prebends.

Item. That ye suffre no man to preache, excepte he be especially licenced by his ordinary, or els the king's highnes' auctorite: nor that ye permit any friere, or other wearing a religiouse habyte, to have any service in your churches, neither to serve chauntry, nor trentall, neither any brothered service; and that no preeste saye two masses upon one daye, excepte Chrystmas daye only.

Item. That everie beneficed man, whose benefice is taxed at ten pounce, or above, have (before Whytson-tide next) the holie bible; and all other preestes, beneficed or not beneficed, at the leest have the New Testament, both in Latyn and in English; and that everie one of them rede over and studie everie daye one chapiter at the leest, by order as they stande in the boke unto the ende, conferringe the Englysh and Latyn together. And if, by occasion of a lawfull let, it be undone one daye, be it supplied with two chapters the nexte day, &c. so that one daye with another he faile not to study one chapter.

Item. That every one of you procure diligentlie before Myghelmas nexte, to have copies of the king's injunctions made in his last visitacion; and then to kepe and observe them effectually, upon paine therein mencioned.

Item. That every one having cure of souls, parson, vicar or curate, admitted, do perfily con without boke the two whole gospells of Matheu and Johan, and the epistles of Paule to the Romayns, Corinthians, Galathians, and other as they stande, with the Actes of the Apostles, and the Canonical Pistles, after the rate, to con every fournyghte one chapter without the boke, and the same to kepe still in memory; over and besides, to rede and studie every day one chapter within the boke, as is above expressed. And that the 28th chapter of Deuteronomie be openly red in the church every quarter, in stede of the general sentence.

Item. That everie curat, the first Sonday of every moneth in the yere, do openly (in the pulpet) exhorte and charge his parochians, in no wise to make any pryve or secrete contract of matrimony; but that they utterly deferre it, untill such time as they may have two or three honest men, to hear and record the words and maner of their contract, as they will avoide thextreme paine of the lawe, if they do the contrarye.

Item. That none of you discourage any person from reding of the Holy Scripture, but rather animate and encourage them therto; so that it be done of them without braging or arrogancy, but onelie to lerne therby to live vertuously, folowing the lawes of God, and giving good examles and holsome counsell to other that be ignorant.

Item. That not only such as have cure of soules, but also chauntry preestes, do hensforth their true diligence to instruct and teach children, until they can reade Englyshe; taking moderatly, for their labours, of their frendes that be able to paye, which shall so put them to learning.

Item. That yonge people be taught their Pater Noster, Crede, and Tenne Commandments in Englyshe; so that none of them be admitted to receive the Sacrament of the Aulter, until he or she can, and do perfectly say and rehearse in Englyshe unto the curate, the Pater Noster, Crede, and Tenne Commandements, distinctly, wheresoever they be shryven, either at their parische-churche, or els where. And in case any of them be obstinate to do, as is aforesaide, let them be detect immediatly after Ester, unto their ordinary.

Item. That preaching be not left off for any other maner of observances of the church, as processions, or exequies of the deade.

Item. That at your preching time, ye diligentlie see that youre parochians be present, and take hede therunto; and that none presume to be at an alehouse, tavern, or els where, at the preching-time, but onelie at the church, attendyffly hearing, as becometh good Christen people. And if any be disobedient, let them be first warned to amend; and afterward, if they amend not, detect them to their ordinary.

Item. That ye suffre no night-watches in your churches or chapells, neither decking of ymages with gold, silver, clothes, lights, or herbs; nor the people knele to them, nor worship them, nor offre candles, otes, cake-bread, chese, wolle, or any such other things to them: but he shall instruct and teach them, how they ought and may use them; that is to say, only to beholde, or loke upon them, as one loketh upon a boke; wherby mens mindes be stirred and kendled some times to vertue and constancy, in faithe and love towards God, and sometimes to lament for their sinnes or offences. For otherwise there might be peril of ydolatrie, especially of ignorant lay-people, if they either in hert, or outward gesture worship them, or give honour to them, which ought onlie to be given to God, the Lord of all Saintes.

Item. Ye shall instruct your parochians, not to be envious about workes invented by their own folishe devocion, as to go about in idle pylgrimage, and say with vain confidence this prayer, and that prayer, with other superstitious observacions, in fastings, prayeng, and kepinge of olde folysh customs, which be not found commaunded or counseled, in any parte of Holy Scripture. But ye shall instruct them, and exhorte them, to know and do all such things, as be commaunded or commended in the Holy Scripture to be done; that is to say, to know and believe all the articles of our faith, contained in the Crede, to kepe inviolably the Tenne Commaundementes, to performe the workes of mercy, after every mannes power and habilitie, to be in love and charite eche with other, and one to beare with other in his weaknes or infirmitie, and not to be vengeable for any offence.

Item. That every curate do at all times his best diligence, to reduce such as be at discord, to peace, love and charite, and one to forgive an other, how often so ever they be offended.

Item. That every curate, not only in his preaching; but also at all other times necessary, do perswade, exhorte, and warn the people, whatsoever they be, to beware of swering, and blasphemey of the holy name of God, or any part of Christ's precious body or blode. And also to beware and abstaine from cursing or banning, chidinge, scoldinge, bakbiting, slaundering, lyinge; and from adultery, fornicacion, glotony, drunkenness, sorcere, witchcraft: and if they be notoriously faulty in any of these, then to detect them, that they may be corrected in example of other.

Item. That every curat instruct his parochians, and especially the midwives, the essencial maner and forme how to christen a child in time of nede; commaunding the women, when the time of byrthe draweth nere, to have a vessell of cleane water redy for the same purpose, charging also the said midwives, to beware that they cause not the woman, being in travaile, to make any folishe vowe, to go in pilgrimage to this ymage, or that ymage, after her deliveraunce, but only to call on God for helpe. Nor to use any girdels, purses, mesures of our lady, or such other superstitious things, to be occupied about the woman while she labourerth, to make her beleve to have the better sped by it.

Item. That none of you do magnifie and extol, praise, maintaine, or otherwise set forth, the superfluous holidayes abrogated by the kinge, with the advise of his ecclesiastical convocacion.

And finally, forasmoch as all Christen men ought earnestly to covet and desiere their soules helthe, and the very meane therof is to obtaine the true knowledge of God's worde, which is the fedyng of the soul: I exhort, desier, and, asmoche as I may I require, that in every honest paryshe-churche within my diocesse of Sarum, either of their church-boxe, or of stockes given for mainteining of lightes before ymages, (with the which I dispence for this better use,) or els by waye of collection among themselves, there be ordeined and bought an Englyshe bible before Whitsondaye next, to be chained to a deske in the body of the church; where he that is letterdy may rede, and other unlearned may hear, holsome doctrine and comfort to their soules, and avoid idelnes and other inconveniences, whereunto the fraile disposicion of man is some inclined.

Forasmoch as intollerable supersticion, and also abhominable ydolatrie, have no small time ben used in this my diocesse, by the occasion of suche thinges as be set forth and commended unto the ignorant people, under the name of holy reliques, being in veray dede vaine thinges, as I my self of certeine, which be alredie comen to myne handes, have perfitte knowledge: namely, of stinking bootes, mucky combes, ragged rochettes, rotten girdles, pyl'd purses, great bullock's horns, lockes of heere, and filthy ragges, gobbetts of wodde, under the name of parcells of the holy cross, and such pelfrie, beyond estimation; and besides the shamfull abuse of such as peradventure be true reliques in dede, whereof nevertheles certain profe is none, but only that so they have bene taken, judged and esteemed, ye and so called without monumentes had of them in any autentike forme of writing. Therefore in remedy herof, I hertelie prais you all and singular my said brethren of the clergie in my said diocese; and nevertheles by thauctorite that I have under God and the kynges's highnes, and in their names I commaunde you, and everyche of you, that you send al suche your reliques (as they be called) one and other unto me at myne house at Ramesbury, or other where, togyther with such wrytings as ye have of the same, to thintent that I and my counsel may explore and try them what they be, and those that be esteemed and judged to be undoubtedly true reliques, ye shal not fayle at convenable tyme to have againe with certayne instruction how they ought to be used; that is to say, as memorialis of them whose reliques they be, in whom and by whom Almighty God did worke all that ever they vertuously wrought; and therefore onely he ought in them all to be glorified, lauded, and praysed; so that he which rejoiceth may in the Lorde rejoyse; to whom be all honour and glorye, for ever and ever. Amen.

Item. That the bell called the pardon, or ave bell, whiche of longe tyme hath been used to be tolled three tymes after, or before divine service, be not hereafter in any parte of my diocesse any more tollyd.

I exhorte, desire, require, and also (as ferre as I maye) commaunde you and all and every of you to provide you copies of these injunctions, and firmly to observe and perform them, and every of them, as ferre as they concerne you, and that for your welthe and my discharge to God and the kyng, of whom I have min auctorite in this behalf.

God save the kyng.

The Petition of Gresham, Lord Mayor of London, to the King, for the City Hospitals.

[Cott. Lib. Cleop. E. 4. p. 222.]

MOST redowted, puyasant, and noble prince. My most dradd, beloved, and naturall soveraigne lorde, I your poore humble and most obedient servaint, daily considering, and ever more and more perceivyng, by your vertuous begynninge and charitable proceedings in all your causes, your persone, and majestie royall, to be the elected and chosen vessel of God, by whom not only the very and true worde of God is, and shall be sett forth, and according to the trewgh and verytie of the same; but also to be he whom God hath constituted and ordeyned, both to redresse and reforme all crimes, offences, and enormities, beyng repugnant to his doctrine, or to the detryment of the common welth, and hurt of the poor people beyng your natural subjects; and farther to forsee, and vigilantly to provide for the charitable reformation of the same. Which thinke hath, and yet doth encourage me, and also my bounden dewtie obligeth me, in especiall beyng most unworthy your levetenant, and mayer of your cytie royall of London, to enforme and advertise your most gracious highnes of one thing in especiall, for the ayde and comfort of the poor, syke, blynde, aged, and impotent persons being not able to help themselves, nor having no place certain where they may be refreshed or lodged at, tyll they be helpen and cured of their diseases and sicknes. So it is most gracious lorde, that nere, and withyn the cytie of London, be iij hospitalls, or spytells, commonly called Seynt Georges spytell, Seynt Barthilmewes spytell, and Seynt Thomas spytell, and the new abbey of Tower-hill, founded of good devotion by auncient fathers, and endowed with great possessions and rents, only for the releffe, comforte, and helping of the poor and impotent people, not beyng able to help themselves, and not to the mayntenance of chonons, priests, and monks, to live in pleasure, nothing regarding the miserable people lying in every street, offending every clene persone passyng by the way, with theyre fylthy and nasty savours.

* No. 69 contained two passages accidentally omitted in the first part, and which in this edition have been restored to their proper place.—Ed.

Wherefore may it please your merciful goodness enclnyed to pity and compassion, for the reliefe of Christ's very images, created to his own similitude, to order by your high autorite, as supreme head of this church of England, or otherwise by your sage discretion, that your mayor of your cytie of London, and his brethren the aldermen for the tyme being, shall and may, from henceforth, have the order, disposicion, rule, and gouvnaunce, both of all the lands, tenements, and revenewes apperteynyng, and belongyn to the said hospitalls, gouvners of theym, and of the ministers which be, or shall be withyn any of them; and then your grace shall facillie perceyve, that where now a small number of chonons, preests, and monikes, be founde for theyr own profit only, and not for the common utilitie of the realme, a great number of poore needy, syke, and indigent persons shall be refreshed, maynteyned, and comforted, and also healed and cured of their infirmities, frankly and freely by physicians, surgeons, and podycaries, which shall have stipende and salarie only for that purpose; so that all impotent persons not able to labour shall be releved, and all sturdy beggars not willing to labour shall be punished: for the which doying your grace shall not alonely merit highly towards God, but shewe your selfe to be more charitable to the poor, then your noble progenitor kyng Edgar, foundour of so many monasteries; or kyng Henry the Thyrd, renewer of Westmynster; or kyng Edward the Thirde, foundour of the New Abbey: or kyng Henry the Fifte, foundour of Syon and Shene; but also shall have the name of conservatour, protectour, and defendour of the poor people, with their contynnual prayer for your health, welthe, and prosperitie long to endure.

Your humble and most obedient servant,

RYCHARD GRESHAM.

A Part of a Proclamation, chiefly concerning Becket.

[Cott. Lib. Titus. B. 1.]

And whereas his most royall majestie, heretofore most prudently considering, as well the great and manifold supersticions and abuses which have crept in the harte and stomake of many his true, simple, and unlearned subjects, for lacke of the sincere and true application, and the declaring of the true meaning and understanding of holy Scriptures, Sacraments, rites and ceremonies; as also the sondry strifes and contentions, which have and may growe amonges many of his saide loving subjects, for lacke of the very perfect knowledge of the true entent and meaning of the same; hath divers times most straitly commanded all and singular his archbishops, bishops, and other ministers of the clergie of this his noble realme, in their sermons and preaching, plainly, purely, sincerely, and with all their possible diligence, to set forth first to the glorie of God, and trouthe of his most blessed word; and after, the true meaning and end of the said sacramentalls and ceremonies; to the entent that all supersticious abuses and idolatries being avoided, the same sacramentalls, rites and ceremonies, might be quietly used, for such only intent and consideration, as they were first instituted and meant. His majestie having knowledge, that this his most godly and most vertuose commandment, hath not been executed according to his trust and expectation; therefore straitly eftsones chargeth and commandeth, all his said archbishops and bishops of this his realme, not only in their own persons, with more diligence to preach, teach, open and set forth, to his people and loving subjects within their cures, committed to them by his highnes for that purpose, as often as they conveniently maie, the word of God sincerely and purely; declaring such difference between things commanded by God, and the rites and ceremonies aforesaid, and the use of them, in such wise as his people, being under their cures by his highnes to them committed, maie be brought to the true knowledge of their lively faith to God, and obedience to his highnes, with their love and charity also to their neighbours: but also his highnes straitly chargeth and commanded, all archdeacons, deans, provosts, parsons, vicars, curates, and other ministers, and every of them, in their own persons, within their cures, truly and diligently to do the same. And further, in all their said sermons and collations, to stirre and exhorte the people to charitie, love and obedience; and also rede and heare with simplicitie, and without any arrogancie, the very gospell and holie scripture, and to conforme, by earnest deeds, their mindes and willes unto the same; avoiding all manner of contencion, strife and occasions, upon pain not only to incurre his majestie's indignacion, but also for their slucknesse and negligence in the executing of their cures and charges committed unto them by his highnes, to be imprisoned and punished at his majestie's pleasure.

Item. Forasmuch as it appeareth clearly, that Thomas Becket, sometime archbishope of Canterbury, stubbornly to withstand the holosome lawes established against the enormities of the clergy, by the king's highnes' most noble progenitor, king Henry the Second, for the common welth, rest, and tranquillity of this realme; of his froward mind, fled the realme into France, and to the bishop of Rome, mainteneur of those enormities, to procure the abrogation of the said lawes, whereby arose much trouble in this said realm. And that his death, which they untruly called martirdome, happen'd upon a reskewe by him made: and that, as it is written, he gave opprobrious wordes, to the gentlemen which then counsailed him to leave his stubbornnes, and to avoid the commotion of the people, risen up for that reskewe. And he not only called the one of them bawde, but also toke Tracy by the bosome, and violently shoke and plucked him in such manner, as he had almost overthroned him to the pavement of the church. So that upon this fray, one of their company perceiving the same, struck him, and so in the throng Becket was slain. And further, that his canonisation was made only by the bishop of Rome, because he had been a champion to mainteine his usurped authority, and a bearer of the iniquity of the clergie. For these, and for other great and urgent causes long to recite, the king's majestie, by the advice of his counsell, hath thought expedient to declare to his loving subjects, that notwithstanding the said canonization, there appeareth nothing in his life and exteriour conversation, whereby he should be called a saint, but rather esteemed to have been a rebel and traitor to his prince. Therefor his grace straightly chargeth and commandeth, that from henceforth the said Thomas Becket shall not be esteemed, named, reputed, nor called a saint, but bishop Becket: and that his images and pictures, through the hole realme, shall be put down and avoided, out of all churches, chappelles, and other places. And that from henceforth, the days used to be festivall in his name, shall not be observed; nor the service, office, antiphones, colletes, and praiers in his name redde, but rased and put out of all the bookes. And that all other festivall daies already abrogate, shall be in no wise solemnised, but his grace's ordenance and injunctions thereupon, observed; to the intent his grace's loving subjects shall be no longer blindly led, and abused, to committ idolatrie, as they have done in times passed; upon paine of his majestie's indignacion, and imprisonmente at his grace's pleasure.

Finallie, his majestie willeth, and chargeth all his said true, loving, and obedient subjects, that they, and every of them for his parte, shall keepe and observe all and singular the injunctions made by his majestie, upon the paine therein contened, and further to be punished at his gracios pleasure.—God save the king.

BY THE KING.

HENRY R.—Trusty and welbeloved, we grete you well. And whereas we, chiefly and principally regarding and tendring the quiet, rest, prosperite and tranquillite of our nobles and commons, and ther conservacion no less than our own, directed lately our letters unto you, and other justices of our peace throughout this our realme, conteing our admonition and gentill warening, to have such special regard to the dewties of your office, according to the trust we have reposed in you, that not only for thimportance it is both unto us and our commonwelthe, ye shall see our dignitie of supremacie of our church (wherwith it hath pleased Almighty God, by his most certain and undoubted word, to endowe and adorn our auctorite and crown imperiall of this our realme) to be set forth, and impressed in all our subjects' herts and mindes; and forse, that the maynteners of the bishop of Rome's usurped and fayned auctorite, with all his papistical supersticions and abuses, with which he hath in times past abused the multitude of our subjects; of whose yoke, tyranny and skornfull illusion, we have, by God's providance, deliver'd this our realm, and other his satellyts, which secretly did uphold his faction, shall be by you diligently serched, enquired and tried out, and so brought to our justice, to receive condign punishment, according to their demerits; but also that tale-tellers about the cuntries, and spreaders of rumors, and false inventors of news, to put our people in fears, and to styrrer them to sedicion, should be apprehended and punished, to the terrible example of others. Also, that vagabonds, and valyant beggers, shall be avoided, and have worthy correction: and for the same purpos, to keep watches, and to see commun justice with indifferencie, and without corruption, to be observed and ministred unto all our subjects; like as by the purport and contents of our said letters, ye may more amply perceive. We have been credibly informed, that sundrie of you have for a time so well done your dewties, and endeavored your selfs fulfilling our said admonicions, and causing the evil doers to be punished according to ther demerits, that our loving subjects have not been disquieted of a long season, untill now of late, that some ungracious, cankred, and malicious persons, have taken boldnes tattempt with sundry divelish persuasions, to move and seduce our true subjects; using false lyes, and most untrewre rumors. And amongst them, we understand, sundry parsons, vicars and curates of this our realme, to be cheef; which (to bring our people to darkness) of their owne perverse minde, not only to blinde our commons, do rede so confusely, hemmyng and hacking the word of God, and such our injunctions as we have lately set forth, that almost no man can understande the trewe meanyng of the said injunctions, and also secretly have suborned certain spreaders of rumors and false tales in corners, which do interpret and wrast our trewe meanyng and intencion of our said injunctions, to an untrewse sense : for whereas we have ordayned by our said injunctions, for the avoiding of sundry strives, processis and contentions, rising upon aege, lineall descents, title of inheritance, legitimation, or bastardy, and for knowledge whether any person is our subject born or no : also for sundry other causes, that the names of all children christen'd from henceforth, with their birth, their father's and mother's names; and likewise all marryages and burials, with the time and date thereof, should be registred from tyme to tyme in a booke in every parish-church, safely and surely to be kept. They have brutid and blowen abrode, most falsely and untreuly, that we do intend to make sum new examinations, at all christnyngs, weddings, and buryalls; the which in no wise we never meanyd, or thought upon. Alledging, for to fortify and colour their false and manyfest lyes, that therein we go about to take away the liberties of our realm; for conservation whereof, they fayne, that bishop Becket of Canterbury, which they have tofore called saint Thomas, dyed for : where in deede ther was never such thyng don nor ment in that tyme, nor since : for the said Becket never swarwed nor contended with our progenitor, king Henry the Second; but only to let, that those of the clergie shuld not be punished for their offences, nor justified by the courts and lawes of this realm; but only at the bishop's pleasure, and after the decrees of Rome. And the causes why he dyd, were upon a wyllfull reskow and fraye, by him made and begon at Canterbury; which was nevertheles afterward alledged to be for such liberties of the church, which he contended for, during his life, with the archbishop of Yorke; yea, and in case he should be absent, or fugitive out of the realme, the king shuld not be crowned by any other, but constrained tabyde his retorne. These, and such other detestable and unlawfull liberties, nothing concerning the comun wele, but only the partie of the clergie, the said Thomas Becket most arrogantly desired, and traytorously sewed, to have contrary to the lawes of this our realme. To the which most false interpretations, and wrasting of our trewe meanyng, they have joynd such myschevouise lyes, and false tales, for marking of catalis, and others lyke sedyciouse devises, whereupon our people were lately styrryd to sedicion and insurrection, to their utter ruyne and destruction, onles Allmighty God, who by his divine providence gave unto us habundance of force, (as he allwayes doth unto rightfull prynces) had so with clemencie illumyned us, that whereas we, with the edge of the sword, and by our lawes might have overthrowen and destroyed them, their wives, children, and posterite for ever; we nevertheles, as ye can right well remember, extended upon them at that time our benygn and mercifull pardon. Those miserable, and papistical, superstitiouse wretches, nothing regarding the same, nor caryng what daunger and myscheef our people shuld incurre, have both raysed the said old rumors, and forged newe sedyciouse tales, intending (as much as in them lyeth) a newe commocion, and all to satisfye their cankered herts. Wherefore, and for the immynt daunger to you, and to all our good subjects, and trouble that might ensue, onles good and earnest provision to repress them be taken thereupon : we desire and pray you, and nevertheles straitly charge and command you, that within the precynct and lymyt of your charge, ye shall not only endeavour your selfs, and employ your most diligence, to inquire and fynde out such canker'd parsons, vicars and curats, which do not truely and substantially declare our said injunctions, and the very word of God, but mombie confusely, saying that they be compelled to rede them, and byd their parishioners nevertheles to do as they did in times past, to live as their fathers, and that the old fashion is the best, and other craftie sedyciouse parables; but also with your most effectuall vigillance do inserche and try out such sedyciouse tale-tellers, and spreaders abroade of such bruts, tydings, and rumours, touching us in honour, or suretie, the state of our realm, or any mutation of the lawes, or customes thereof, or any other thing which might cause any sedition, and the same with their setters-forth, maynteners, counsaylers, fautors, and adherers with all diligence to apprehend and commytte to ward, or prison, without bayl or mynprise till evidence to be given against them, at the arrival of our justice in that country, or otherwise upon your advertisement to us, or to our counsell, to be given, to our further pleasure known, they may be punished for their sedyciouse demerits according to the lawe, to the fearful example of all others : employing and indevoring your self therunto, so earnestly, and with such dexteritie as we may have cause to think that ye be the men which above all thing desire the punishment of evil doers and offenders, and that will let for no travail to set forth all things for the common peas, quiet, and tranquility of this our realme : and like as the daunger is immynt no les to your self and your neighbours then to other, so ye of your own mind shuld procure and see with celeritie our injunctions, laws, and proclamations, as well touching the Sacramentaries and Anabaptists, as others, to be set forth to the good instruction and conservation of our people, and to the confusion of those which would so craftely underminde our common wealth, and at the last destroy both you, and all other our loving subjects, although we should give unto you no such admonishon : therefore fayle ye not to follow the effect, admonishon and commandment both in our said letters, and in these presents, and to communicate the whole tainour of these, to and with such justices of our peas, your neighbours, and other in that district, and to give unto them the trew copie therof, exhorting them likeas by these we desire and pray, and nevertheles straitly charge and command you, and every of you, that you will shew your diligence, towardnes, and good inclination to see every thing for his parte, put in execution accordingly, as ye and they tender our pleasure, and will deserve our condigne thanks, given under our signet at our manner of Hampton-court, the . . . day of Decembre, in the 30th year of our reign.

nature, given more to pleasure, good chere, and pastime, than to abstynance, studye, and lerning, shall easily be brought from their books to follow the appetite and example of the said prebendaries, being their hedds and rulers. And the state of prebendaries hath been so excessively abused, that when learned men hath been admitted unto such room, many times they have desisted from their good and godlie studies, and all other vertuous exercise of preaching and teaching: wherefore if it may so stand with the king's gracious pleasure, I would wish that not only the name of a prebendarie were exiled his grace's foundations, but also the superfluous conditiones of such persons. I cannot deny but that the beginning of prebendaries was no lesse purposed for the maintenance of good learning and good conversation of living, than religious men were: but for as much as both be gone from their first estate and order, and the one is found like offendour with the other, it maketh no great matter if they perish both together: for to say the truth, it is an estate which St. Paule, reckoning up the degrees and estates allowed in his time, could not find in the church of Christ. And I assure you, my lord, that it will better stand with the maintenance of Christian religion, that in the stede of the said prebendaries were 20 divines at 10*l.* a peece, like as it is appointed to be at Oxford and Cambridge; and 20 students in the tongues and French, to have 10 marks a peece; for if such a number be not there resident, to what intent should so many reders be there. And surely it were great petie that so many good lectures should be there redde in vain: for as for your prebendaries, they cannot attend to applie lectures for making of good chere. And as for your 20 children in grammar, their master and their husher be daily otherwise occupied in the rudiments of grammer, then that they have space and time to hear the lectures. So that to these good lectures is prepared no convenient auditorie. And therefore, my lord, I pray you let it be considered what a great losse it will be to have so many good lectures redde without profite to any, saving to the 6 preachers; farther, as concerning the reader of divinitie and humanitie, it will not agree well, that one man should be reader of both lectures. For he that studieth in divinitie must leave the reading of profane authors, and shall have as much to doe as he can to prepare his lecture to be substantially redde. And in like manner he that redeth had not need to alter his studie, if he should make an erudite lecture. And therefore in mine opinion, it would be office for ii sundry learned men. Now, concerning the dean and others, to be elected into the college, I shall make a bill of all them that I can here of in Cambridge, Oxford, or elsewhere, mete to be put into the said college, after my judgment: and then of the hole number, the king's highnes may choose the most excellente, assuring you, my lord, that I know no man more mete for the dean's room in England, then doctor Crome, who by his sincere learning, godly conversation, and good example of living, with his great soberness hath done unto the king's majestie as good service, I dare say, as any priest in England. And yet his grace daily remembreth all others that doth him service, this man only except, who never had yet, besides his gracious favour, any promotion at his highnes' hands. Wherefore, if it will please his majestie to put him in the dean's room, I do not doubt but that he should shew light to all the deans and ministers of colleges in this realm. For I know that when he was but president of a college in Cambridge, his house was better ordered than all the houses in Cambridge besides. And thus, my lord, you have my finale advice concerning the premisses, which I

A Letter of Thomas Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, to Cromwell, upon the New Foundation at Canterbury.—An Original.

[Cott. Libr. Cleop. F. 1.]

MY VERY SINGULAR GOOD LORD,—After my most hartie commendations, these shall be to advertise your lordshippe that I have received your letters, dated the 27th of November: and therewith a bill concerning the divise for the new establishment to be made in the metropolitan church of Canterbury, by which your lordshippe requireth my advice thereupon by writing, for our mutual consents. Surely, my lord, as touching the books drawn, and the order of the same, I think that it will be a very substantial and godly foundation; nevertheless, in my opinion, the prebendaries, which will be allow'd 40*l.* a peece yearly, might be altd to a more expedient use: and this is my consideration, for having experience, both in tymes past, and also in our daies, how the said secte of prebendaries have not only spent their time in much idleness, and their substaince in superfluous belly chere, I think it not to be a convenient state or degree to be mainteyned and established: considering firste, that commonly a prebendarie is neither a learner nor teacher, but a good viander. Then by the same name they look to be chief, and to bere all the hole rule and preheminance in the college where they be resident: by means whereof, the younger of their own referr unto the kinge's grace's judgment, to be allowed or disallowed at his highnes' pleasure. Sending unto your lordshipp herewithall the bill again, according to your request. Thus, my lord, most hartely fare you well.

AND also newes here; I assure you, never prince shew'd himself so wise a man, so well lerned and so catholick, as the kinge hath done in thys parlyment. With my penne I cannot expresse his marvelous goodnes; which is come to such effecte, that we shall have an acte of parliament, so spirituall, that I think none shall dare saye, in the blessed sacrament of the aulter, doth remayne eyther bred or wyne after the consecration; nor that a pryst may have a wife; nor that it is necessarie to receive our maker "sub utraque specie;" nor that private masses should not be used as they have be; nor that it is not necessarie to have auricular confession. And notwithstanding my lord of Canterbury, my lord of Ely, my lord of Salisburie, my lord of Worcester, Rocoester, and saint Davyds defended the contrary longe tyme, yet finally his highnes confounded them all with Goddes lerning. Yorke, Duram, Winchester, London, Chichester, Norwiche, and Carlile, have shewed themselves honest and well lerned men. We of the temporalitie have been all of one opynion, and my lord chancellor and my lord pryve seale, as good as we can devise. My lord of Cant' and all theis bishopes have given their opinion, and came into us, save Salisburie, who yet contynneth a lewed fole. Fynally, all England have cause to thank God, and most hartlie to rejoyse of the king's most godlie proceedings.

A Letter of the Visitors sent to examine the Abbott of Glastonbury.

[Ex MSS. D. Tanner.]

PLEASE hyt your lordship to be advertised, that we came to Glastenbury on Fryday last past, about tenn of the clock in the forenoone: and for that the abbot was then at Sharpam, a place of hys, a myle and somewhat more from thabhey, we, without any delay, went unto the same place; and there, after certain communication, declaring unto hym theeffect of our coming, examined him upon certain articles. And for that his answer was not then to our purpose, we advised him to call to his remembrance that which he had as then forgotten, and so declare the truth. And then came with him the same day to the abbey, and there of new proceeded that night to search his study for letters and books: and found in his study secretly laid, aswell a written book of arguments, against the divorce of his king's majestie, and the lady dowager: which we take to be a great matter. As also divers pardons, copies of bulls, and the counterfeit life of Thomas Bequet in print. But we could not find any letter that was materiall. And so we proceeded again to his examination, concerning the articles we received from your lordship, in the answers whereof, as we take it, shall appear his canker'd and traitorous heart and mind against the king's majestie, and his succession; as by the same answers, syned with his hand, and sent to your lordship by this bearer, more plainly shal appear. And so, with as fair words as we could, we have conveyed him from hence into the Tower, being but a very weak man, and sickly. And as yet we have neither discharged servant nor monk; but now the abbot being gone, we will with as much celerity as we may, proceed to the despatching of them. We have in money 300*l.* and above; but the certainty of plate and other stuffe there, as yet we know not, for we have not had opportunity for the same; but shortly we intend (God willing) to proceed to the same; whereof we shall ascertain your lordship, so shortly as we may. This is also to advertise your lordship that we have found a fair chalice of gold, and divers other parcels of plate, which the abbot had hid secretly from all such commissioners as have bine there in times past; and as yet he knoweth not that we have found the same: whereby we think, that he thought to make his hand, by his untruth to his king's majestie. It may please your lordship to advertise us of the king's pleasure, by this bearer, to whom we shall deliver the custody and keeping of the house, with such stuff as we intend to leave there, convenient to the king's use. We assure your lordship it is the goodliest house of that sort that ever we have seen. We wold that your lordship did know it as we do; then we doubt not, but your lordship would judge it a house mete for the king's majesty, and for no man else: which is to our great comfort; and we trust verily that there shall never come any double hood within that house again. Also this is to advertise your lordship that there is never a one doctor within that house, but there be three batchelors of divinity, which be meanly learned, as we can perceive. And thus our Lord preserve your good lordship.

From Glastenbury, the 22d day of September.

Yours to command,

RICHARD POLLARD. THOMAS MOYLE.

Cromwell's Letter to the King when he was committed to the Tower.

[Cott. Lib. Titus, B. 1.]

MOST gracyous king, and most mercyfull soverayng, your most humble, most obbeysand, and most bounden subject, and most lamentable servant and prysouer, prostrate at the feet of your most excellent majesty, have herd your pleasure by the mouth of your comptroller; which was, that I should wrytte to your most excellent highnes suche things as I thought mete to be wrytten, considering my most myserable state and condicyon. For the which your most haboundant goodnes, benignte and lycens, the Immortal God, Three and One, rewarde your majesty. And now, most gracyous prynce, to the matter. Fyrst, wher I have been accused to your majesty of treason, to that I saye, I never in all my lyfe thought willingly to do that thing that might or should displease your majesty, and much less to doe or saye that thing, which of itself is so highe and abominable offence, as God knoweth, who, I doubt not, shall reveale the trowth to your highnes. Myne accusers your grace knoweth; God forgive them. For as I ever have had love to your honour's person, lyfe, prosperite, health, wealth, joye, and comfort, and also your most dear and most entyerly beloved son, the prynce his grace, and your proceedings. God so helpe me in thys mine adversyte, and confound me if ever I thought the contrarye. What labours, paynes, and travailes I have taken, according to my most bounden deutie, God also knoweth. For if it were in my power, as it is God's to make your majesty to live ever young and prosperous, God knoweth, I would, yf it had been, or were in my power, to make you so riche as ye myght enriche all men, God helpe me, as I would do it yf it had been, or were in my power, to make me so puissant, as all the worlde should be compellyd to obbey you, Christ he knowyth I would; for so am I of all other most bounde; for your majesty hath been the most bountifull prince to me, that ever was king to his subjects: ye, and more like a dear father, your majesty not offended, then a master. Such hate been your most grave and godly counceyles towards me at sundrye tymes: in that I have offended I ask your mercy. Should I now for suche exceeding goodnes, benignite, liberalite, and bounty, be your traytor, nay then the greatest paynes were lityll for me. Should any faction, or any affection to any poynt, make me a traytor to your majesty, then all the devylls in hell confounde me, and the vengeance of God light appon me, yf I should ons have thought it. Most gracyous soverayng lord, to my remembrance, I never spake with the Chancellor of the Augmentations and Throgmorton together, at one tyme. But yf I did, I am sure, I spake never of any such matyer; and your grace knoweth what maner of man Throgmorton hath ever been towards your grace proceedings: and what master channeler hath been towards me, God and he best knoweth. I will ne can accuse hym. What I have been towards hym, your majesty right well knoweth. I would to Christ I hadd obeyed your often most gracious, grave counceyles and advertisements, then it had not been with me as now it is: yet our Lorde, if it be his will, can do with me, as he did with Susan, who was falsly accused. Unto the which God, I have only commytted my soule, and bodye and goods at your majestie's pleasure, in whose mercye and pyete I do hollye repose me: for other hope than in God and your majesty I have not. Syr, as to your common welth, I have, after my wytt, power, and knowledge, travayled therin, having had no respect to persons (your majesty only except, and my duty to the same) but that I have done any injustice or wrong willfully, I trust God shall be my witness, and the world not able justlye to accuse me: and yet I have not done my duty in all things as I was bounde. Wherefore I aske mercy. That I have herde of any combinations, conventicles, or such as were offenders of your laws, I have (though not as I should have done) for the most parte revealed them, and also caused them to be punished; not of malise, as God shall judge me. Nevertheless, sir, I have medelled in so many matiers under your highnes, that I am not able to answer them all. But one thing I am well assured of, that wittingly and willingly, I have not had will to offend your highnes. But harde it is for me, or any other medling as I have done, to live under your grace, and your laws, but we must dailye offende: and wher I have offended, I most humbly aske mercy and pardone at your gracious will and pleasure. Amongst other things, most gracious soveraigne, master comptroller shewed me, that your grace shewed hym that within these 14 days ye committed a matter of great secrecy, which I did reveal contrary to your expectation: syr, I do remember well the matter, which I never revelid to any creature: but this I did, sir, after your grace hade opened the matter, fyrst to me in your chamber, and declared your lamentable fate, declaring the things wich your highnes saylyked in the queen; at which time I shewed your grace that she often desired to speak with me, but I durst not: and ye said why should I not, alleging that I might do much good in goeing to her, and to be plain with her in declaring my mind: I theruppon taking opertuntye, not being little greyed, spake prevely with her lord chamberlayn, for which I aske your grace mercie, desiryng him, not naming your grace to him, to finde some means that the queen might be inducid to order your grace pleasantie in her behaveour towards you, thinking therbie for to have hade some faults amended to your majestie's comfort; and after that by general words, the said lord chamberlain, and other of the queen's counsayle being with me in my chamber at Westminster, for lycens for the departure of the strange maydens, I then required them to counsayle their mistresse to use all pleasantnes to your highnes: the which things undoubtedly were bothe spoken before your majesty committed the secret matter unto me, onlie of purpose that she might have been inducid to such pleasant and honorable fassions, as might have been to your grace's comfort, which above all things, as God knoweth, I did most covit and desire: but that I opened my mouth to any creature after your majesty committed the secrecie thereof to me, other than only to my lord admyrall, which I did by your grace's commandment, which was upon Sunday last in the morning, whcm I then founde as willing and glad to seek remedye ffor your comfort and resolution, and saw by him that he did as much lament your highnes' fate as ever did man, and was wonderfullie grieved to see your highnes so troubled, wishing greatly your comfort; for the attaining whereof, he said your honour salvyd, he would spend the best blood in his body, and if I would not do the like, ye, and willingly die, for your comfort, I would I were in hell, and I would I should receyve a thousand deths. Sir, this is all that I have done in that matter; and if I have offended your majesty therin, prostrate at your majesty's feet, I most lowlye aske mercy and pardon of your highnes. Sir, ther was also laide unto my charge at mine examination, that I had retained contrarye to your lawes; and what exposicion may be made uppon retaynours, I know not, but this will I saye, if ever I retayned any man but such onlye as were my howshold servants, but against my will, God confound me. Most gracious soveraigne, I have been so called on and seywd by them that said they were my friends, that constrained therunto I retayned thair chyldren and friends, not as retayners, for their fathers and parents did promise me to finde them, and so toke I them, not as retayners, to my great charge, and for none evil, as God best knoweth, interpret to the contery who will. Most humbly beseeching your majesty of pardon, if I have offended therin; and I do knowledge my self to have been a most miserable and wretched sinner; and that I have not, towards God and your highnes, behaved my self as I ought and should have done; for the which mine offence to God, whiles I live I shall continually call for his mercy, and for mine offences against your grace, which God knoweth wer never malicious nor willfull: and that I never thought treson to your highnes, your realme, or posterite: so God helpe me, either in word or dede; nevertheles, prostrate at your majesty's feet in what thing soever I have offended; I appell to your highnes for mercy, grace, pardon, in such wise as shall be your pleasure; beseeching the Allmightie Maker and Redeemer of this world, to send your majesty continuall and long helth, welthe, and prosperitie, with Nestor's yeres to reigne, and your most dear son, the prince's grace, to prosper always, and contenev after you: and they that would contrarye, short life, shame, and confusion:

writin with the quaking hand, and most sorrowfull harte, of your most sorrowful subject, and most humble servant and prisoner, this Satyrday, at the Tour of London.

The fifth question :—Whether this word sacrament be, and ought to be, attributed to the seven only ; and whether the seven sacraments be found in any of the old authors ?

The sixth question :—Whether the determinate number of seven sacraments be a doctrine, either of the Scripture or of the old authors, and so to be taught ?

The eighth question :—Whether confirmation, cum Chrismate, of them that be baptized, be found in Scripture ?

The ninth question :—Whether the apostles lacking a higher power, as in not having a Christian king among them, made bishops by that necessity, or by authority given by God ?

The tenth question :—Whether bishops or priests were first ? And if the priests were first, then the priest made the bishop.

The eleventh question :—Whether a bishop hath authority to make a priest by the Scripture, or no ? And whether any other, but only a bishop, may make a priest ?

The twelfth question :—Whether in the New Testament be required any consecration of a bishop and priest, or only appointing to the office be sufficient ?

The thirteenth question :—Whether (if it fortuneth a Christian prince learned, to conquer certain dominions of infidels, having none but temporal learned men with him), if it be defended by God's law, that he and they, should preach and teach the word of God there, or no ? And also make and constitnte priests, or no ?

The fourteenth question :—Whether it be forefended by God's law, that (if it so fortune that all the bishops and priests of a region were dead, and that the word of God should remain there unpreached, and the sacrament of baptism, and others unministred), that the king of that region should make bishops and priests to supply the same, or no ?

The fifteenth question :—Whether a man be bound by authority of this Scripture (quorum remisistis) and such like, to confess his secret deadly sins to a priest, if he may have him, or no ?

The sixteenth question :—Whether a bishop or a priest may excommunicate, and for what crimes ? And whether they only may excommunicate by God's law ?

The seventeenth question :—Whether unction of the sick with oil, to remit venial sins, as it is now used, be spoken of in the Scripture, or in any antient authors ?

An Answer to the former Queries ; with some Remarks on them, in the King's Hand, written on the Margin : together with some Persons' Names ; but these are not written by the King.

[Cott. Lib. Cleop. E. 5.]

Why then should we call them so ?

1. SCRIPTURE useth the worde ; but it defineth it not.

2. In them is founde no proper definition, but a general declaration of the worde, as a token of an holly thinge.

3. So named only matrimony ; in effects moo ; and at the last 7, as we finde in the scripture expounded.

Why these seven to have the name, more then the rest ?

4. Auctors use the word sacrament, to signifie any mysterye in the Old and New Testament ; but spirituallly benote matrimonie, chrisme, "impositio baptisime, euckarist, manuum, ordo."

Arch-bp. Cant. St. David's.

Why then hath the church so long erred, to take upon them so to name them ?

5. The worde, bycause it is general, is attribute to other thenne the seven ; but whether it ought specially to be applied to the One only, God knoweth, and hath not fully revealed it soe as it hath been received.

6. The thing of al is found, but not named al sacraments, as afore.

7. The doctrine of scripture is to teach the thinge, without numbring or namyng the name "Sacrament," saving only the matrimony.

Arch-bp. Cant.

Old auctors number not precisely.

Then penance is changed to a new name, the absolution of penance. I read that without it we cannot be saved after relapse, but not so of absolution ; and penance to sinners is commanded, but absolution of open crimes is left free to the asker.

8. Scripture speaketh,

(1.) Of baptism manifestly.

(2.) Of the holy communion manifestly

(3.) Of matrimony manifestly.

(4.) Of absolution manifestly.

(5.) Of bishops, priests and deacons, ordred "per impositionem manuum cum oratione," expressly.

Laying on of hands being an old ceremony, is but a small proof of Confirmation.

6. Laying of the hands of the bishop after baptism, which is a parte of that is done in confirmation is grounded on Scripture.

Arch. Cant. S. Davids, Cox.

7. Unction of the sick, with prayer, is grounded in Scripture.

Then show where.

Arch-bp. Cant. S. David's.

The thing of confirmation is found in Scripture ; the name "confirmation" is not there.

The answer is not direct, and yet it proveth nither of the two parts to be grounded in Scripture.

Of Chrisma Scripture speaketh not expressly ; but it hath been had in high veneration, and observed synnes the beginning.

Where is this distinction ? Now, since you confess that the apostles did occupate the one part, which you now confess belongeth to princes, how can you prove that ordering is only committed to your bishops ?

9. The calling, naming, appointment, and preferment of one before an other, to be bishop or priest, had a necessite to be don in that sort, a prince wanting. The ordering appereth taught by the Holy Gost in the Scripture, "per manuum impositionem cum oratione."

Ubi hoc ?

10. Bishops, or not after.

Arch-bp. Cant.

S. David's, Cox.

Arch. Cant. vide.

11. Scripture warranteth a bishop (obeying high power as his prince Christianed) to order manuum sitionem cum Oratione :” and so it hath been from the beginning.

12. Of other Scriptures speaketh not.

“Manuum impositionem cum oratione” is required, which is a consecration; so as only appointing is not sufficient.

13. It is to be thought, that God in such case assisting the perfection of such an enterprise, would further teach and inspire the conscience of such a prince, what he should and might doe, more then is yet openly taught by the Scripture : which, in that case, were a good warrent to follow. For a secret vocation supplieth where an open wanteth.

14. Sinnes the beginning of Christe’s church, wherin Christ himself made distinction of ministers, the order hath had a derivation from one to another, “per manuum impositionem cum oratione.” How it should begin again of another face, where it faileth by a case, Scripture telleth not; no doctor writte of it, that I have rede.

Arch. Cant. 15. Bounde ordinarily.

Arch. Cant. 16. They may, being before of their Bp. St. David’s. prince auctorised to minister for open, publique, dedly synne.

Of excommunication by others, we rede not in the New Testament.

16. The thing is in Scripture, and in auncient authors, according wherunto the use should be : how it is in dede used, is a matter of fact, and not of lernyng.

Against the 15th article these names are set down :
Yorke. Duresme. Carlisle. Winchester. Curwen.
Simon. Oglethorp. Edgworth. Day. Redman.
Robinson.

And a little below :

Canterbury. Hereford. Rochester. Westminster.
S. David’s. Laton. Tresham. Cox. Crayford.

But these lists are not in the king’s hand.

Answers to these Queries.

[Cott. Lib. Cleop. E. 5.]

1. SCRIPTURE sheweth not what it is : but useth the worde sacrament in Latyn, for the worde misterium in Greek.

2. Sacrament, by the authours is called, “Sacri Rei Signum,” or “Visibile Signaculum, Sacrosanctum Signaculum, Visibile Verbum, Visibilis Forma Invisibilis Gratiae;” and perfytt diffinition we fynde noone.

3. In scripture we fynde no determynate number of sacraments.

4. There be very many in the most general signification; and there is no precise, or determinate number of sacraments in the auncent authours.

5. Not only to the seven; but to many more. We fynde in the olde auctours, matrimony, the holly communion, baptisme, confirmation, ordre, penance, and extrem unction. In penance, it is doubted of the name of sacrament.

6. As touching the determinate numbere of seven only, we fynd neyther in the scripture, nor auncient auctours, any such doctrine that ther shulde be seven onely.

7. Of baptisme, scripture speaketh, that by it synnes be remitted.

Of eucharista; that we be united by it to Christe, and receive thereby spirituall nurrishment, to the comforte of our soules, and remission of our synnes.

Of matrimony; that the acte of it is made lawfull, and without synne; and grace given, wherby to directe ordinarily of the lustes and appetites of the fleshe.

Of penance; that by it we be restored again to the favour of God; from which we did fall by synne.

Of ordre; that by it, grace is given to mynistr effectually in preacheing the worde of God, and ministration of the sacraments.

Of confirmation, (which is conteyned in scripture, speaking “de Impositione Manuum post Baptisma”) it appeareth by scripture, how thereby encrease of grace is given.

Of inunction of the sick, scripture speaketh, that by unction of the sick, and prayer of the prestes, comforte is given to the sicke, and synnes be forgiven him.

8. “Impositionem Manuum post Baptisma,” which we call confirmation, we rede in the scripture : but that it was don chrismate, we fynde not in the scripture expressed. But in the old auctours, we fynde, that chrisma hath been used in the sayd confirmation.

9. Making of bishops hath two partes; appointment, and ordering. Appointment; whiche the apostles, by necessity, made by common election, and sometye by their own severall assignement, could not then be don by christen princes; because at that tyme they were not : and now, at these dayes, appertaineth to christian princes and rulers. But, in the ordering, wherin grace is conferred, as afore the apostels did folowe the rule taught by the Holly Ghoste, “Per Manuum Impositionem, cum oratione et Jejunio.”

10. Christe made his apostles first, which were of his making bothe prestes and bishops; but whether at one time, some doubt.

After that, the apostels made bothe bishops and prestes : the names wherof in the scripture be confounded.

11. A bishop having auctorite of his christian prince to give orders, maye, by his ministerye geven to him of God in scripture, ordeyne a preste. And we rede not, that any other, not being a bishope, hathe, sence the beginning of Christ’s church, ordered a preste.

12. Onely appointment is not sufficient, but consecration, that is to saye, imposition of handes, with fasting and prayour, is also required. For so the apostles use to order them that were appointed; and so have been used continually : and we have not rede the contrary.

13. In that necessite, the prince and his lerned men shulde preache and teache the word of God, and baptize. But as for making and constituting prestes, the prince shall and may thenne do, as God shall thenne by inspiration teache him : which God hath promised to do allwayes to his church, in revling and teaching every necessary knowledge, where any doubt requiring dissolution dothe arryve.

14. The answer to the other question next before, dissolveth this.

15. He that knoweth himself gylty of any secrete deadly synns, must, if he will obtaine the benefite of absolution ministred by the preste, confesse the same secrete synnes unto him.

Absolution to be ministred by a preste, if a convenient preste may be had, is necessarie.

Absolution by a preste, is the surest waye, if he may be conveniently had.

16. Bishops and prestes auctorised by the prince, may excommunicate, by Gode’s lawe, for publique and open crimes : but that other thenne bishops or prestes may excommunicate, we have not rede in scripture. Some scolemen saye, that other thenne prestes, or bishops deputed therunto by the church, maye excommunicate; because it is an acte "Jurisdictionis," and not "Ordinis."

17. We fynde it spoken of in scripture, and in olde authors.

NUMBER LXXII.

The Examination of Q. Katherine Howard.

BEING again examined by my lord of Canterbury of contracts and communications of marriage between Deerham and me: I shall here answer faithfully and truly, as I shall make answer at the last day of judgment; and by the promise that I made in baptism, and the sacrament that I received upon Alhallowes-day last past. First, I do say, that Deram hath many times moved unto me the question of matrimony; wherunto, as far as I remember, I never granted him more than before I have confessed: and as for these words, "I promise you I do love you with all my heart," I do not remember that ever I spake them. But as concerning the other words, that I should promise him by my faith and troth, that I would never other husband but him, I am sure I never spake them.

Examined what tokens and gifts I gave to Deram, and he to me: I gave him a band and sleeves for a shirt. And he gave me a heart's-ease of silk for a new-year's-gift, and an old shirt of fine holland or cambricke, that was my lord Thomas' shirt, and my lady did give it him. And more than this, to my remembrance, I never gave him, nor he to me, saving this sommer ten pounds about the beginning of the progresse.

Examined whether I did give him a small ring of gold upon this condition, that he should never give it away. To my knowledge I never gave him no such ring, but I am assured upon no such condition.

Examined whether the shirt, band, and sleeves of my own work. They were not of my work; but, as I remember, Clifton's wife of Lambeth wrought them.

And as for the bracelet of silkwork, I never gave him none; and if he have any of mine, he took it from me.

As for any ruby, I never gave him none to set in ring, nor for other purpose. As for the French Fenel, Deram did not give it me, but he said there was a little woman in London with a crooked back, who was very cunning in making all manner of flowers. And I desired him to cause her to make a French fenel for me, and I would pay him again when I had money. And when I was first come into court, I paid him as well for that as for divers other things, to the value of five or six pound. And truth it is, that I durst not wear the said French fenel, until I had desired my lady Breerton to say that she gave it me.

As for a small ring with a stone, I never lost none of his, nor he never gave me none.

As for velvet and satten for billyments, a cap of velvet with a feather, a quilted cap of sarcenet, and money, he did not give me, but at my desire he laid out money for them, to be paid again. For all which things I paid him, when I came into the court. And yet he bought not for me the quilted cap, but only the sarcenet to make it of. And I delivered the same to a little fellow in my lady's house, as I remember, his name was Rose, an embroiderer, to make it what work he thought best, and not appointing him to make it with freer's knots, as he can testify, if he be a true man. Nevertheless, when it was made, Deram said, What wife here be freer's knots for Fraunce.

As for the indenture and obligation of an hundred pound, he left them in my custody, saying, that if he never came again, he gave them cleerly unto me. And when I asked him whether he went, he said he would not tell me until his return.

Examined whether I called him husband, and he me wife. I do answer, that there was communication in the house that we two should marry together; and some of his enemies had envy therat, wherefore he desired me to give him leave to call me wife, and that I would call him husband. And I said I was content. And so after that, commonly he called me wife, and many times I called him husband. And he used many times to kiss me, and so he did to many other commonly in the house. And, I suppose, that this be true, that at one time when he kissed me very often, some said that were present, they trowed that he would never have kissed me enough. Whereto he answered, "Who should lett him to kiss his own wife?" Then said one of them, "I trowe this matter will come to passe, as the common saying is." "What is that?" quoth he. "Marry," said the other, "that Mr. Deram shall have Mrs. Katherine Howard." "By St. John!" said Deram, "you may guesse twice and guesse worse." But that I should wink upon him, and say secretly, "What and this should come to my lady's ear?" I suppose verily there was no such thing.

As for carnall knowledge, I confess as I did before, that divers times he hath lyen with me, sometime in his doublet and hose, and two or three times naked; but not so naked that he had nothing upon him; for he had always at the least his doublet, and as I do think, his hose also: but I mean naked, when his hose were put down. And diverse times he would bring wine, strawberryes, apples, and other things, to make good cheer, after my lady was gone to bed. But that he made any special banquet, that by appointment between him and me, he should tarry after the keyes were delivered to my lady, that is utterly untrue. Nor I never did steale the keyes myself, nor desired any person to steale them, to that intent and purpose to lett in Deram, but for many other causes the doores have been opened, sometime over night, and sometime early in the morning, as well at the request of me as of other. And sometime Deram hath come in early in the morning, and ordered him very lewdly, but never at my request nor consent.

And that Wilks and Baskerville should say, what shift should we make, if my lady should come in suddenly. And I should answer, that he should go into the Little Gallery. I never said that if my lady came he should go into the Gallery, but he hath said so himself, and so he hath done indeed.

As for the communication of my going to the court, I remember that he said to me, that if I were gone, he would not tarry long in the house. And I said again, that he might do as he list. And further communication of that matter, I remember not. But that I should say, it grieved me as much as it did him, or that he should never live to say thou hast swerved, or that the tears should trickle down by my cheeks, none of them be true. For all that knew me, and kept my company, knew how glad and desirous I was to come to the court.

As for the communication after his coming out of Ireland, it is untrue. But as far as I remember, he then asked me if I should be married to Mr. Culpepper, for so he said he heard reported. Then I made answer, What should you trouble me therewith, for you know I will not have you; and if you heard such report, you heard more then I do know.

KATHERINE HOWARD.

NUMBER LXXIII.

A Letter of Sir W. Pagel's, of his treating with the Admiral of France.

[Paper-Office.]

PLEASE it your most excellent majestie to be advertised that the 16th of this present, I received letters from my lordes, and others of your majestie's privy counsaill, conteyning such several conferences as your majestie, and certain of your said counsaill, have had with the French ambassador there sithens my last dispeche. And yesterday havinge the furst opportunitye to speke with the admiral, I said unto him, that albeit it was likelyhode that the king his master's ambassader then in England, did from time to time advertise them of the processe of the matier now in treatie; yet your majestie, reputed him to be a man of honour and singular verſue, and such a one, as with right judgment doth consider the hole state of his master's causes, with the circumstances: and therefore conceiving no little affection towards him, had commanded me to signifie unto him, to the intent he might know certainly the plainnes of every thing, what communication had now last been had with their ambassador there. For the which, rising from his seate, and making a gret and humble reverence; after that he had given thanks unto your majestie, and with two or three great othes declared his affection towards you; I entred the accomplishment of your majestie's commandment. And when I had declared unto him from point to point at length, and word by word (for it was a lesson meet to be learned without book) as is conteyned in the said letter, aswel the communicacion had with your counsaill at the furst congresse, and such kingly and philosophical conference as your majestie had with him your self; as also the seven points uttered by your majestie's counsaill at their last assemblies; and finally, the epiloge of all together pronounced of your said counsaill as of themselves; which he herd all together, not without twenty sighes, and casting up his eyes; for I marked him when he was not ware of it; accrossing himself, and gyving a gret sigh, he saide: as for the amytye which ought to be between our masters, how much I have travailed, and do travaile for the confirmation of it, God is my judge; and almost all the world knoweth that I am an English-French man, and that next after my master, I esteem the king your master's finger more than I do any prince's body in all the world, and would be glad to give all the goods I have in the world, that this matter went through between them; for I perceive by my master that he will not lyve alone, and yet I am sure he will seek no new friendship, nor accept none offred, until the king your master have refused this. As touching this matter, I knowe they be two princes of such honour, and of wise conduct in all their things; that though this marriage had never been spoken of, they would have continued friends according to their treaties; and this overture was never opened, neither for confirmation, nor for encrease of amitie between them; for greater cannot be, but marriage and commiction of blood with blood, doth unite and knit generation to generation, and posteritie; the benefit whereof how great it will be; how many inconveniencies may thereby be avoided by processe of time; the wisest man may soner think then be able to express. But, alas! said he, what is two hundred thousand crownes to give in marriage with so great a king's daughter to Monsieur Dorleans. Four hundred, five hundred thousand is nothing to him; Monsieur Dorleans is a prince of great courage; Monsieur Dorleans doth aspire to great things, and such is his fortune, or els I am wonderfully deceived. It will grieve my master much when he shall here of this basse offer, as we have not herd yet from our ambassador; I marvail therof not a little; nay, to tell you plainly, as one friend shuld tell another, there is farre gretter offers, if we would herken unto them, we might have in redy money with the daughter of Portugal, four hundred thousand ducates, with the increase that bath grown of it sithens her father's departure, which will amount to asmuch and more. At the furst breaking of this matter, it was said the man must desyre the woman; now that we have desired her, you will give nothing with her; for what is two hundred thousand crowns; and herewithall giving a great sigh, stayed. And I because I perceived his tale such as was meet to be answered, said unto him, Monsieur l'Admiral, I have no more to say unto you on my master's behalf, then I have said unto you already. But for because you have made a long discourse as it were somewhat replying to that that I have reported; if it shall like you to give me leave to say myn own fantasie, as a man that would this thing shuld take effect, if it may be equally done, I woll saye it. Yes (quoth he), with all my hart: why shuld not we talke together friendly, as two that be servants to two great friends; and I neither to take your words to be spoken as of an ambassader, nor you to take my words to be spoken of him that holdeth the place about his master that I do? Sir (quoth I), as touching the benevolence you bear unto my master, you may think it well employed; as well for that my master (I think) conceineth like opinion of you in that parte, as also for that you have proved my master alwayes to be a perfaiet friend unto your master. And to saye to you frankelly myn opinio: albeit I am no man at home, neither of great place nor of great counsaile, yet have I bene of court: and men, you knowe, of like sorte, whennu they mete together, will be oftentimes talking of matiers that they have litle to do in, and bable of heresayes. And I being one of that sorte, have many tymes herd that my master hath been allwayes much affected unto your master, and hath shewed towards him great kindnes, when that if he would have taken offers for the contrary, he might have had inestimable benefites. Yea, and that he hath been so well mynded unto your master, that neither the maner of your truce taken with the emperor, nor your strangenes at the emperor's being here, nor Pole's passage, nor the conveying of Brancester, nor the reteyning of the hosyer that called himself Blancherose, nor Cowbridge, nor nothing els could alienate him from you, such hath been his friendship towards you. And therefore (I said), if you love him, vous avez raison. And if you have set furth this marriage for love, let it appere. Is not two hundred thousand crowns a faire offer? I graunt you well, that Monsieur d'Orleans aspireth to gret things, and is of great courage: and reason it is, for he is a great king's sonne; and such a king, as both may and must, if he will have his courage mainteyned, give him wherewithall. It is not reason that my master shuld mainteyn his courage. My master hathe a sonne of his own, whom I trust he shall live to see a man of courage, and will, I doubt not, provide him thereafter. And as for his daughter, he doth consyder her as reason requyeth. Had king Lowys any more with one of my master's systers than three hundred thousand crownes; and the king of Scotta, with another, any more than one hundred thousand? If our friendship be advisible unto you (for that was his terme), as you say it is, secke it by reasonable meane, I doubt not but you shall obtaine it; and ask reasonably with her, and it shall be granted you to.

By my truth (quoth he), and so we doe. Doe you so (quoth I)? I have allwayes noted you a man of reason, and so reported you. Turn the case (quoth I). Would you remitt eight hundred thousand crownes, discharge an hundred thousand a year, for the marriage of your daughter? Yea, by my trowth would I (quoth he); for the eight hundred thousand crowns I compte nothing: and as for the pension, she shuld have redubled here in France; and we would be amys to amys, and enemies to enemies: I meane, pour la defence de nostre estats (quoth he). Par nostre Dame (quoth I), you shall not be myn auditour. Here is all the matier (quoth I): you take a wrong pathe; you compte these eight hundred thousand crownes nothing; and we, if it were wayed in an indifferent ballance, think they should waye down tenne hundred thousand. We have a saying in England, "a penny at a time is worth a pound." He that should lend me three or four hundred crowns at my nede, should do me even more pleasure then to offer me tenne hundred when I neded not: so much esteme I money lent at such a tyme. Consyder our parte (quoth he), and we must knowlege it great: consyder your parte (quoth he), it is nothing. The payn is past, and not to be reckened upon. You say not much amiss (quoth I) if we had an evil debter; but our debter is riche ynough, and a good debter. And though he have been bold of a long respite with his friend, yet he will pay it (quoth I). I doubt not (quoth he) but the princes will observe their treaties. My master hath, and will, I am sure (quoth I); and so I think will yours. I wot not what to say (quoth he). Marrye (quoth I), do that that I have said heretofore: aske reasonably for the dote, and make a reciproque for the rest, if you would be eased of it. Marke this; for it is to be embraced, and a great marriage to Monsieur d'Orleanns. By my trowth (quoth he), the dote you have offered is nothing; and if I wer as king Lewys and the king of Scotts wer, I would rather take your daughter in her kyrtel, and more honour wer it for me, then, being Monsieur d'Orleanns, to take her with eight hundred thousand crowns. But I wote not what you meane by that reciproque. Marry (quoth I), it is to do something again of like goodnes to the thing that you desire to have done unto you. As (quoth I) you desire to have our daughter, and for her you will give your sonne, there is one for an other. Your sonne is the reciproque of our daughter. You would have two hundred thousand crownes with her; the reciproque of that must be a like jointer. Here is sonne for daughter, dowery for dote. Now, if you will be discharged of 600,000 crowns, what other thing, that is as good, shall we have for that, and also for our pension? Devise a reciproque. O! Monsieur l'Ambassadeur (quoth he), I understand your reciproque well. The king your master is a gentle prince, and a great prince; and what grive should it be to him, to lett passe eight hundred thousand crowns, and ywys we be not able to pay them. In faith (quoth I), seing he hathe borne so long with you for all, he will be contented to bear with you somewhat longer for sum: and if you will give some in hand, I think he will give you terms for the rest. Ah Monsieur l'Ambassadeur (quoth he)! and shoke his head. As for the pension (quoth he), you shall have a reciproque here, a dowery mete for it. Nay (quoth I), your relative agreeeth with a wrong antecedent: my master is the antecedent, and the reciproque must be to him, and not to Monsieur d'Orleans, for he should have the benefite by it. Nay (quoth he), it is your master's daughter, and it is no more but for your master to give from himself to his daughter. Ywys, the queen of Navarre's daughter is a greater marriage; and as for the eight hundred thousand, if I were a right man, and able to give, I would paye a great pece of it my self, er it shuld stick. What the queen of Navarre's daughter is, I know not (quoth I); but if you might have my master's daughter upon these conditions, you might say, you had such a marriage as was never herd of. And here we stay'd both. At the last (quoth he), sudenly, when it was told me yesternight that you sent to speke with me, I thought it was for these matiers: and all this night I have turned and tossed, and thought upon them. I would God it had never been spoken of, if it take not effect. And evyn now cummyth into my head the overture that the king your master made ones unto me. What overture was that (quoth I)? Marry (quoth he), the overture of the marriage of the lady Elizabeth, his daughter; you to have had recompence for the perpetual pencion upon Monsieur de Vandome's lands: and for the pencion vyager, to have bene converted to a estate. Without any other recompence (quoth I)? Yes (quoth he). We shuld have bene enemys to enemys, and left the bishop of Rome. That was sumwhat (quoth I); and yet not a reciproque; because you shuld not have given as good as you tooke. But then, was none arrage (quoth I)? And here he paused again. I will tell you my fantasy (quoth he); but you shall promise me by your faith that I shall never heare of it again. I will speke it unto you, as a friende to a friende; and peradventure neither of both parties will like it. Sir (quoth I), you shall never take dishonour by things you shall say to me. What (quoth he) if the overture shuld take effect in one parte? As how (quoth I)? Marry (quoth he), the arrage to be remitted, for the marriage of your daughter; and because you think it great, we to becum friends to friends, and enemys to enemys, and so to enter warre together: and of that, that shuld be conquered by commyn expenses, to lay out first a recompence for your pencion vyager, and the perpetual pencion to be supplied, as the king your majesty devised. How like you this devise (quoth he)? Mary (said I), if you will heare a fool's answer, I like it not; for what need we to fight for that we have already? Mary (quoth he), then you should have it in perpetuum. What if you desyed this for a reciproque? Mary (quoth I), peradventure my master might purchase more land another waye than that might cost him. Why shuld we desire warre (quoth I); we have no quarrell? It is true (quoth he); but we would be the authors: and if you covenanted to be enemye to enemye, would you not joyne warre with us? By my trowth, sir (quoth I), you be entred now into a deep matier, which passeth my capacite. It is a great matier indeed (quoth he); but I talk with you privement, neither because I would have you to declare this to your master, nor for that I will declare it to myne: and yet both you and I may use meanes to the same ende. Well (quoth I), I see you make cursey at the matier, and would have a great commodity, and yet are loth to offer for it; but I say unto you as a friend, aske, and offer reasonably, and go roundly to worke, and make an ende of it; for I fear I may say to you, if you will not, others will. Yea (quoth he), we know the emperor practiseth with you, as he doth with us; and that the bishop of London hath brought him three fayre palfreys from the king your master for a present. I name no man (quoth I); but whether the emperor practiseth with you, I report me to his offers and his demands. I think he practiseth with us both (quoth he) onely to dissever us; for with your master he will not joyne, onles he will returne again unto the pope: for so his nuntio told the chancelor, and the chancelour told the queen of Navarre, who fell out with him upon the occasion of that conference, and told him he was ill ynough before, but now sithens he hath gotten the marke of the beast (for so she called it, because he was lately made priest), he was worse and worse. But to my purpose (quoth he); I think the emperor practiseth with us both; he seeketh nothing els but to disseuer us. You speake of his offers and his demaunds (quoth he); knowe you what they be? No (quoth I): and yet, indeed, I did cume by the knowledge of them within 24 howres before. Mary (quoth he), he would make the duke of Orleans king of Naples, and give us the seigneury of Flanders. They be faire offers (quoth I); but what be his demaunds? Wherat he smiled. By my trowth (quoth he), I will tell you:—he desireth a reuocation of the title of Milan and Navarre, and the restitution of Piedmont and Savoy. What say you to it (quoth I)? The king my master, will none of it (quoth he); for he thinketh that the next war that shuld fall, being so great distance between father and sonne, the emperor would sende the duke of Orleans to his father une Baton blanche. I have herd saye (quoth I) the duke of Cleves also laboureth now sore to have his wife home, and smyled therewith. Why (quoth he), heare you any thing? Yea, mary (quoth I); I hear saye the emperor is in great practise with the duke of Cleves; and that he hath made him half a promise, that for to have Gelders quietly, he and his wife will renounce the title of Navarre. Which indeed I had never herd. But musing upon the word before, it came into my head at that time, and chauncyng then to speake it, I stricke the admirall into a great dumpe. Wherin, when he had pawed a great while, I said, sir, I desease you. No, no, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur (quoth he): she is too young and sickly to go out of this country. When Monsieur de Cleves (quoth he) hath done the king sume good service, and declared himself to all the world to be pour le Roy, then shall he have his wife. You know what you have to do, sir (quoth I); but seeing you see the world so full of practises, it is good dealing with them that meane plainly. Yo say trowth (quoth he); and so it is:—we knowe the emperor doth nothing but practise with us, as he doth with your master; and we knowe how he offereth your master to accord hym with the pope, without breache of his honour, and that it shall be at the pope's suite. I am pryvee (quoth I) of no suche matiers; but if the emperor desyre my master's friendship, I cannot greatly blame him, consyderinge he knoweth, partly by his own experience, and partly by evident tokens towards other men, my master is a friendly friend. And as for the bishop of Rome (quoth I), if he sue to be restored to my master's favour again, I think it will be herd for him to obeyn it, for vertue and vice cannot stand together in one predicament. Call you him Vice (quoth he)—he is the very diuel. I trust once to see his confusion. I have begune to pick him a little; I trust to pick him better: every thing must have a tyme and a beginning. But when begin you (quoth I)? I think (quoth he), er it be ought long, the king, my master, will conuerte all the abbeis of his realme into the possession of his laye gentlemen, and so go furth by litle and litle (if you will join with us), to overthrow him altogether:—why may not we have a patriark here in France? Which purpose, I think, he doth perceive; and his legate, therefore, now in Almayn, offred that for a reformation there should be a council called, and appointed the place either Mantua, Verona, or Cambray: he had as lief be hanged (quoth he) as have a general council; and even then will that be his sentence. I would fayne see you ones begyne somewhat (quoth I). A Monsieur le Ambassadeur (quoth he)! I am shrewdely matched. Why so (quoth I)? is not your master a king, and if he mynde that you speake of, who can match you? He favereth wondrous well (quoth he); but every thing I saye must have a tyme: who was a greater champyon for the pope then was your master, now who is more contrary? If they might ones (quoth he), speke together, I think it will be one of the grettest benefites that ever came to Chrisendome, but that cannot well be, until these matiers cum to some nerer point. The faulte is not in us (quoth I) that it is not at a nerer point. Nor it shall not be long of us (quoth he); but peradventure sum of your master's counsail moveth him more to the emperor's friendship. And what is that friendship in comparison of this friendship! England is a kingdome perpetuel, and so is France. Our masters, their children, their succession, maye joyne for ever. We be under one clyme, and of one complexion: we be at hande one to another. The emperor is but one, and when he is dead, sum Almayn may be emperor, I wot not who. Truth it is, Spayne is a kingdome; but what is that alone! As for Flanders, it shall be our friend, if we joyne together. And as for Italy, when the emperor is dead, who shall be master, trowe you? And if the emperor might live allways, what is his friendship? He careth not if friend, father, and all together shuld sinke, so as his insatiable desyre to reign might be satisfied: did he not suffer two of his brethren-in-lawe to perishe for lacke of fifty thousand crowns; furst the king of Hungarye, and after the king of Denmark, whom he might have restored with ten thousand crowns? He is a covetous man, saving the honour of a prince, and yet he is now base ynough, and therefore let us take him while he is lowe, before he take his breth. Sir (quoth I), you are a man of a great trade, and knowe to discourse of things better then I am able to conceive. If you esteem the effect of this matier so necessary for you, and the emperor's friendship such as you speke of, take then a direct waye for the compassing of it; and if you have any thing in your stomachs that you would have uttered, but not to many, let your ambassadour utter it to sum one, and lett him utter it not coldly, but frankly; and that is the next waye to make an ende. Would God, Monsieur le Ambassadeur (quoth he), it laye in mye hande, it shuld then be some at an ende! Put to your good will (quoth I), in an honest cause God will help you. I marvaile much (quoth he) we here not from our ambassader there. So do I (quoth I); by lykelyhod he is ill at ease, or his man is sike by the way, or some other like matier. When send you to England (quoth he)? I have no great matiers to write of (quoth I); and yet I am determined within a day or two to send into England, for I have appointed my bank to be made at Paris, but now I must sende to have it changed to Lyons, because I here say the king goeth thither. I pray you (quoth he) conveye a letre to our ambassadeur in England, which I will send to you to-morrow, which I promised him. And brake our communication; and so ready to depart, and standing, I asked him whither the ambassadeur was come to the king out of Almayn, or no? He asked me which ambassador? I told him for aid against the Turk. No, no (quoth he); thinketh men my master is so unwise, to aid the emperor and king Ferdinand for the defence of Hungarye, their private dominion? Should my master mainteyn their state at his dispens, which keep his state from him? not but if it wer to defend Almayn, my master would help the best he could. What doth the king your master?

gyveth he any ayde? I know not (quoth I) that any hath been yet asked. If any be, I think his majesty will make a reasonable answer. And thus we departed.

Sir, your majestie hath heard truely reported the diverse communication and varietie of matier that hath passed between the admirall and me : wherin, when I cōsider myn accustomed protestations, me thinketh he shuld take none advantage of me ; and on the other side, when I remember the simplenes of my wit with the scarcitie of myn experience, joyning therewithall their proceeding with other your majestie's ambassadeurs heretofore, whose saing they reaporte at will for their purposes ; I cannot but tremble, fearing that sumthing may have passed me to hotely, sum what to coldly, sumthing spoken more then neded, or sumthing left out that shuld have been spoken. But sure you are my sayntuary, and my trust is only in your equanimitie ; whom I beseech most humbly of your gracious and favourable interpretation, and of your benignitie, to cōsider that this is the first tyme that ever I came in arenam ; and he with whom I am matched is an old player ; nevertheless, if I had experience, or wit to judge a man, I would think him by his words and countenance to be none imperiall, and an utter enemye to Rome ; and yet I must note a practise in him, for that he hath promised me twise one shuld be sent over, and none is yet sent. And besides that, wheras he hath told me heretofore, that no man knew of this last treatye but he and Madame Destampes, adding yesterday the queen of Navarre. I know of the demands the ambassadeur hath made there, by other meanes then by your majestie's signification : but your majestie knoweth him farre better, I am sure, than my foolishhe wit can comprehend. And therefore I leave to your most excellent wisdom the judgment of his proceedings, the circumstance wherof your majestie knoweth without addition or diminucion of any thing, as nere as I could carye it away.

As touchin the occurents of this court, it may please your majestie to be advertised, that the emperor's grand escuyer passed by Paris eight days agone into Flanders, and came not att the court.

It is said here that the emperor is in great practise with your majesty, for the marriage of the lady Mary, your majestie's daughter, which they think here the rather to be true, for that you have sent the bishop of London to be ambassador there, whom they note here to be an imperial, saing commonly that the marriage between France and England is dashed.

Certain merchants of Lyons, and Monsieur Langey, a partener with them, have sentence for them of threescore and tenne thousand crowns against the state of Florence, and reprisalls out for execution.

Salmaiti and Anteriori, two Florentynes, having their houses in Lyons, who were fideiussores de solvendo indicato, be fled into the emperor's dominion, into Bresse.

The Florentynes take the matier greivously, and think there is no justice in France ; for they had moved theyr case before in all the universities and courts of Italy, and thinking it out of doubt, offred to put it to the judgement of France, wherof now they repent them, and will in no wise stand to it. And to advertise your majesty of the case briefly : the state of Florence bought of certain marchants of Lyons a quantitie of wheat to such a sūme, to be delivered at Florence before such a day. The wheat arryved not before eight daies after the tyme appointed. The Florentines, constreyned by necessity, provided themselves other ways, and say the bargain is voyde. The Lyonnois alledge tempestatem for the lett, and say that emptio is contractus bonæ fidei, and that therefore the Florentynes must fulfill their bargayn ; and so, leaving their wheat there, went their wayes.

Error is founde in the admirall's processe, and the sentence revoked ; wherby the application of his lands to the crown, and the amende pecuniaire that he shuld have made to divers townes here in Bourgoyn is adnichilated, and he restitutus in integrum.

I thinke your majestie heareth from your agent at Venice, that James Bey, sumtyme a Christian man, is coming from the Turcke in ambassade to Venice ; and, as I think, by this time arryved there, if the empereur have not intercepted him, who hath layed wayte for him in Ragusa : his cumyng is nothing pleasant to the Venycians ; the cause therof being as the Venycians conjecture, the same that I have written to your majestie before ; that is to saye, passage through their country, or to be enemyes to enemyes, or to redeem the same with sum great sumes of money, if nothing els be asked.

Seignior Horacio being heretofore accustomed to be lodged at the court, or near as the place required, is lodged now four leaggs of, and yet the king lyeth in a great town ; wherof the nuntio's secretarye, complainyng to the admirall, the admirall answered him in coler, he had one gyven him, and he refused it ; we cannot give him here a palais, as though he were at Paris and turned his back, and would talk no longer with the secretarye.

I sende unto your majestie herewith an other charte of Algiers, set furth after a sorte, with the emperor's assiege before it ; the plate wherof varietly from the other I sent your majestie before : and yett I trust your majestie will take the same in good part ; for as they came to my hands, being sent to such personages as they wer ; thone to the French king, and this to the duke of Ferrare ; I thought it my duety to sende both unto your majestie, leaving unto your excellent wisdome the judgment, whither this, or the other be true, or neither of them bothe.

I sende also unto your majestie a litle book, both printed here in Paris, conteynyng the conclusion of their dyet in Almayn against the Turk ; whither the same be true or no, I doubt not but your majestie knoweth by such advertisements as you have out of those partes. And thus having nothing els to write unto your majesty at this time, I beseeche God to send you most prosperously and long to reigne. From Chabliz in Bourgoyn, the 19th of April.

Your majestie's most humble, faithful, and obedient subject, servant, and daily oratour,

WILLIAM PAGETT.

Postscript.

AFTER I had written to your majesty this letter, redy to send the same furthwith ; and deferring the dispeche onely uppon attendance of the admirall's letter, to be conveyed into England ; because the same came not, I sent the same night one to the courte, which is four long leaggs hens to the admirall to know his minde therin ; which messenger he returned to me with this letter herinclosed, written and defaced as your majestie seith the same ; upon motion wherof, I was at his lodging the next day, by eight in the morning, but I found him not there. At my cumming a letter was delivered me from certain of your majestie's privy counsaill, the tenor wherof, both before and sithens I have observed as far as my wit can extend, like as your majestie rather by your great judgment, and gracious interpretation of my discourses, then by my simple writtings may gather. Anone cummeth monsieur Admirall, accompanied with monsieur Longeville, governour to the duke of Orleans, and with more solemnitie than was wont to be, took me with them to the church, to passe the tyme (they said) untill the king wer up. Monsieur Longeville left the admirall and me walking, and entring communication after this sorte. Monsieur le Ambassadeur, I have been bold to put you to this great payne this morning; but this matier troubleth me so sore, that I am at my wittes end: by _____* I could not sleep for it all this night. We have received letters from our ambassadeur in England, conteyning the same discourses that you have declared, which my master is sorye to heare; mervailing that the king, his good brother, would offer that summe to his sonne with his daughter, that some of his gentlemen would not accept. The pope offred to monsieur de Guyses sonne, with his nepce, two hundred thousand crownes, and he refused it. To see us so farre asunder, after so long a traitye, by _____† it greveth me. For you must understand, that all which be of counsaile about my master, be not of one opinion. And upon the recepte of our last lettres, it was said to me, we told you wherto the enterprise of this matier would cum at length: but surely I have never repented me, nor myn affection can never diminishe, for the friendship that hath been showed on your parte, aswell in commyn, as to my particuler. And as for the pope's and the emperor's eyes and falsetes, we know well ynough. Wherefore, for the love of God, let us growe to some friendly point. After I had declared unto him for some recompense of his affection, what good affection I beare to France; I said unto him, monsieur l'Admirall, you knowe, we commun now privately, and therefore you shall hear my private opinion. Seing that you knowe other men's proceedings with you to have been so indirect as you speake of, and (as your self hath confessed unto me oftentimes) that the king's majestie, my master, hath been so perfect and sincere a friende unto you at all tymes; embrace this friendship, consyder this friend, and think that he is to be desyred rather with one hundred, than any other with tenne hundred. You said, your master will not live alone. Ywys, my master may have company enough, if he would slippe out of the couple from you. Ye (quoth he), I know; but so will not every man of this counsaile knowe, their faulseties. True it is (quoth he) your friendship hath been much, and we do recognise it, and think our selfs in obligation to requite it. But we can do no more than we can do. But to come to a point; the matier consisteth in these termes. Within these two yeres, we shall owe you a million; after the which tyme, we must pay you during the king your master's life (God grant it to be long) a hundred thousand crownes yearly, and afterward fyfty thousande perpetually, you saye. As for the pencions (quoth he) there may be somewhat sayde for things that shude be done by treaties: for our defence, things shuld have been done; shipps and men, and I wot not what. And he began to hack and to hume. Monsieur le Admirall (quoth I) speke out plainly: for if you have any thing to say in that parte, I can answer. Well, well (quoth he) let those things passe: you can clayme no pencion yet these two yeres. And herewithall the king sent for him. With whom, after masse, he went to the standing in a forest hereby; promising me to return ymedyately after dyner, and praying me hartely to tary his return. monsieur le Admirall (quoth I), in his eare, if you talk with the king, your master, of this matier, deduce him to conformitie. I speake for the affection I beare unto you: for I may say to you, there be others that woee harder thenne you, and yet hitherto we have not given like eare. But you know, a man may droppe water so long upon a stone, that it may sooke in. And herewith, monsieur Longeville took me at his hand by and by, and had me to monsieur D'Orlean's lodging, where I had an exceeding gret feast and chere. About two of the clock the admirall sent for me; and after our meting, every man avoided out of the chamber. Monsieur le Ambassadeur (quoth he) let us devise some good meane, to joyne these two princes together. Then must you (quoth I) go another way to worke. Devide your treatye into two partes: treat a marriage, and treat the redemption of the reste you desyre. Well, be it (quoth he): but I understand not yet very well your reciproque; (and here he began to be plaisant in his countenance, and to set his wordes merily:) and yet (quoth he) our ambassador writteth of the same terme, but I wot not what. You will not (quoth I) understande it: but you must learn it; for els I feare (wherof I would be wondrous sorye) that this matier will not go forwarde. Let me hear again (quoth he). I told him even the same lesson, that is declared in the former parte of this letter. It is not (quoth he) a hundred thousand crownes, or two hundred thousand, that can enriche my master, or impoverishe yours: and therefore, for the love of God (quoth he), let us go roundly together. We aske your daughter (quoth he): for her, you shall have our sonne, a gentyl prince (quoth he), and set him out to sale. We aske you a dote with her; and for that after the som you will give, she shall have an assignment after the custome of the country here. And as for the rest (quoth he), what reciproque demande you? what will you, that we do for you? As for the rest of the money (quoth I), take order for the payment of it; and for the pencions, devise a reciproque. Devise you (quoth he) what you will have us to do for it. Nay (quoth I), offer you first, for it passeth my capacitye, and reason is so, for the first commodity shall be yours. It is no mattier (quoth he), we will offer first, and you shall aske nexte: or you shall offer first, and we shall aske nexte; all is one. But I will now, as I did laste daye, speke unto you after myn passion, after myn own affection; for I would all the world knew I am not imperial. And here, with many qualifications and termes, he set forth his passion and affections. You will give us your daughter, and a summe with her (it maketh no matier what); howbeit, I trust, your gentle prince will aske no money of us. And as for the reciproque of the rest † and therewith stayed. Well (quoth he), to speake frankly to you myn affection; will you enter the warre with us against the emperor; and be enemye to enemye, for the defence of all such states as we have at this present, and of such as we shall conquere together; or of such as shall be comprised in treaty; the king, your master, to sett upon land in Flanders, tenne thousand Englishmen, and we tenne thousand Frenchmen; pay the wages of five thousand Almayns, and we of asmany; finde two thousand horsemen, and we three thousand; finde a certain number of shipps, and we as many. And yett shall the king, my master, chaffe the emperor in other places, he was never so chaffed: and spende a hundred, yea two hundred thousand crowns a month other wayes. And of such lands as shall be conquered, the pencion first to be redoubled, and the rest to be divided equally. What a thing will it be to your master, to have Graveling, Dunkirk, Burburg, and all those quarters joining to his Calais? Mary (quoth I), all the craft is in the catching. And here I put him a foolish question; What if you spent your money, and conquered nothing? Mary (quoth he), then should the pencion stand still as it standeth. Monsieur le Admirall (quoth I), these matiers you talk of, be of too great importance for my witt; and I have also no commission to medle in them. But to saye my fantasie, I knowe of no quarrel that my master hath against the emperor. ———* (quoth he), why say you so? Doth he not owe your master money? Hath he not broken his leages with him in 600 points? Did he not provoke us, and the pope also, to joine for the taking of your realme from you, in preye for disobedience? And hath he not caused even now the pope, to offer a council at Mantua, Verona, Cambray, or Metz (which place he added now last); the chief cause wherof, is to pick you? A pestilence take him, fause dissembler (quoth he): saving my dutie the majestie of a king. If he had you at such an advantage, as you maye now have him, you shuld well knowe it at his hande. And here he went furth at large against the bishop of Rome, and the emperor; discoursing what commoditie shuld ensue of this warre; and that he would have it in any wise beginne this yere, now that the emperor wer so lowe; and had, as he saithe, for all his millions, never a sols. And that he would the matier should take effect shortly; for the yere goith awaye: reckening how many moneths wer now lost mete for the warre: and how the conquests should be fortified in the winter; and the warre recommenced in the sommer. And that theis chiefe points resolved, his master shuld (if your majestie would) turne into Picardy, to enterievu. And a great discourse, sir, passing min experience, shewing themselves by his wordes and countenance wonderfully gredy of present warre: which when he had ended; What say you, monsieur le Ambassadeur (quoth he)? will you saye nothing to me in this matier? Sir (quoth I), and told him trueth, I wote not what to saye. Why do you not (quoth he)? Open the bottom of your stomack to the king, my master (quoth I) by your ambassadour there, by whom you have begun and treated this matier. And also I noted in our other conference, that you would not have these discourses reported again of your mouth. Monsieur (quoth he), this is indeed but my devise. Howbeit, to speake frankly to youe, I have spoken nothing therin, but I thinke to perswade my master to it: and write so to the king, your master (quoth he), and also the hole devise. That shall be as you will (quoth I). Nay (quoth he), I pray you to write, so as you write as devised of me; and repeted the overture hole together, as is before expressed. Sir (quoth I), seing you require me, I will write it, so that you will promise me to confirme my tale by your ambassadour there. Yes (quoth he), and clapt his hande in mine. But I pray you (quoth he) send one in diligence, that no tyme be lost. Will you not write (quoth I)? Yes (quoth he): but your post will be there before ours. And so departed.

Sir,—I beseeche your majestie most humble on my knees, graciously to accept my good will, albeit my witt be not able to serve you in so great an affaire; and to pardon me, of your most gracious goodnes, if any thing have been said, more or less thenne was meet to have been spoken for the advancement of your purposes: of my faulte wherin, if it should please your majestie to advise me of, I should have the more witt another time, and take the better hede in a semblable case. For surely, sir, I have an exceeding good will to serve you; and if my witt wer as good, I am assured I should serve well, and that knoweth God: to whom I pray daily, for your prosperous and long continuance. From Chabliz, the 22d of April.

Your majestie's most humble, faithful, and obedient subject, servant, and daily oratour, Bishop Thirleby's Letter concerning the Duke of Norfolk and his Son.—An Original.

[Paper Office.]

I WOULD write unto you my harte (if I coulede) against those two ungracious, ingrate, and inhumane "non homines", the duke of Norfolk and his sonne. The elder of whom I confess I did love, for that I ever supposed hym a true servant to his master; like as both his allegiance, and the manifold benefits of the king's majestie bounde him to have been; but nowe when I sholde begun to wright to you herin, before God, I am so amused at the matter, that I know not what to say; therefore I shall leave them to receyve for their deads, as they have worthily deservyd; and thank God of his grace that hath openyd this in tyme, so that the king's majestie may see that reformed: and in this point, wher Almighty God hath not onlye alone, but often and sondry tymes hertofore, not now letted the malice of such as hate imagenyd any treason against the king's majestie, the chiefe comforte, wealth, and prosperite of all good Englishmen next unto God; but hath so wonderfully manifest, that in suche tyme that his majestie's high wisdom myght let that malice to take his effecte, all good Englishmen cannot therefore thanke God enough. And for our parts, I pray God, that we may, through his grace, so contynue his servants, that hereafter we be not founde unworthy to receyve suche a benefyte at his hands. On Christmas even, about 10 of the clocke after noon here arryved Somerset, with the letters of the king's majestie's most honourable counsell, dated the 15th of December, at Westminster, wherby I perceyved the malicious purpose of the said two ungracious men: and for the execution of the king's majestie's commandment declared in the same letters, I syud immediately for audience to the emperor, who entred this town within halfe an houer after Somerset was come. The emperor praid me of pacience, and to declare to the secretarie Joyse, that I wolde saie to him. For he said he had determyned to repose him selfe for 3 or 4 days; and had therefore for that tyme refused audience to the nuntio, the ambassadour of France, and the ambassadour of Venice, which had sued for audience. On Christmas-day on the morning, at nine of the clocke, Joyse came to my lodginge, to whom I declared as well as I coulede the great benefits theis ungracious men had receyved at the king's majestie's hands, and how unkindly and traytorously they went about to searve him, with the rest as myn instructions led me. The king's majestie, my master (taking the same affection to be in the emperor, his good brother, towards him, that his highnes hath to the emperor, "ut amicorum omnia sint communia, gaudere cum gaudentibus, flere cum flentibus"), hath commanded me to open this matter to the emperor: that as naturally all men, and much more princes, ought to abhorre traytors, and specially suche as had receyved so great benefites as theis men had; so his majestie might rejoyce that the king's highnes, his good brother, had founde forthe this matter, or the malice coulede be brought to execution. Secretary Joyse said that he would advertise the emperor herof accordingly, and after a little talke of the haughtiness of the earle of Surrey, and a few salutations, he bade me fare well. When I asked him for monsieur de Grandvela, to whom I said, that I wolde tell this tale, for that I doubted not but that he, and all honest men wolde abhorre such traytors: he said that he was not yet come, but he wolde this day advertise him herof by his letters; for I wright (quoth he) daily to him. Albeit that this be the hole, and the effecte of that I have done in the execution of the king's majestie's commandment, declared in my said lord's letters, yet I will as my dutie is, answer a-part their said letters to the king's majestie : herin I dare not wright. For, to enter the matter, and not to detest that as the cause requireth, I think it not convenient. And again on the side, to renew the memorie of these men's ingratitude (wher with all noble and princely harts above all others be sore wounded) I thinke it not wisdome. Therefore I beseeche you hartely, amongst other my good lords, there to make my most humble excuse to his majestie for the same. This ungracious matter that hath happened otherwise then ever I could have thought, hath caused you to have a longer letter than ever I had bene accustomed to wright. Ye shall herwith receyve a scedule of courte newis, whiche havynge lernyd while I wrote this, secretary Joyse hath prayed me to sende the letter herwith enclosed to the emperor's ambassador in England, whiche I pray you to cause to be delivered, and hartely fare you well. From Halebourne the Christmas-day at night, 1546.

Your assured loving friend,

THO. WESTM'.

Herewith ye shall also receyve the copie of my letters of the 19th of this month, sent by Skipperus, &c.

NUMBER LXXV.

A Letter of the Duke of Norfolk's, after he had been examined in the Tower.

[Cott. Lib. Titus, B. l. p. 94.]

My very good lords, whereas at the being here with me of my lord great chamberlayne, and Mr. Secretary, they examynd me of divers thyngs, which as near as I can call to my remembrance were the effects as here after doth ensue.

First, whether ther was any cypher betwene me, and any other man: for answer wherunto, this is the truth, there was never cypher betwene me and any man, save only such as I have had for the king's majestie, when I was in his service. And as God be my judge, I do not remember that ever I wrote in cypher, but at such time as I was in France; my lord great master that now is, and my lord of Rochford being in commission with me; and whether I wrote any then, or not, as God help me, I am sure not remember; but and I wrote any thing, I am sure both their hands were at it: and the master of the horse privy to the same. I do remember that after the death of the bishop of Hereford, Fox, it was shewed me that the said bishop had left a letter, which I had sent him amongst his writings, which being found by a servant of his, that is now with master Deny, who shewed the same to the bishop of Durham that now is, he caused him to throw the same in fier; as I do remember, it was my said lord bishop of Dureham that advised him to burn it: and as I also do remember, the matter that was conteyned therein, concerned lewde speaking of the northern men after the time of the comotion against the said Cromwell: if there had been any thyng concerning the king's majesty's affairs, neyther the bishope nor he, were he now alyve, would not have concealed the same; and whether any part of that was in cypher or not, as I shall answer to God, I do not remember.

Theeffect of another question there asked me, was, as near as I can call to my remembrance, whether anie man had talked with me, that and ther were a good peace made betwene the king's majestie, the emperor, and the French king, the bishope of Rome would brek the same againe by his dispensation? and whether I enclined that waies, or not, to that purpose?

As God help me now, at my most nede, I cannot call to my remembrance, that ever I heard any man living speak like words. And as for mine inclinations, that the bishope of Rome should ever have authority to do such thing; if I had twentie lives, I would rather have spent them all against him, then ever he should have any power in this realme: for no man knoweth that better than I, by reding of stories, how his usurped power hath increased from time to time. Nor such time as the king's majestie hath found him his enemy, no living man hath, both in his harte and with his tounge, in this realme, in France, and also to many Scottish jantlemen, spoken more sore against his said usurped powre, then I have done, as I can prove by good witnes.

Also my said lord and Mr. Secretary asked me, whether I was ever made privy to a letter, sent from my lord of Wynchester and sir Henry Knevet, of any overture made by Grandville to them, for a way to be taken between his majestie and the bishope of Rome; and that the said letters should have come to his majestie to Dover, I being there with him. Wherunto this is my true answer: I was never at Dover with his highnes since my lord of Richmond died, but at that time, of whose death word came to Syttingborne: and as God be my helpe, I never heard of no such overture, save that I do well remember, at such time as sir Francis Biryen was sore sike, and like to have died, it was spoken in the council, that my lord of Winchester should have said, he cou'd devise a way how the king's majestie might have all things upright with the said bishope of Rome, and his highnes' honour saved. Suche were the words, or much like. Wherupon, as I had often said in the councill, one was sent to the said sir Francis, to know if ever he heard the said bishope speake like words, which he denied: and as I do remember, it was sir Rauf Sadeler that was sent to the said sir Francis. And to say that ever I heard of any such overture made by Grandville, or that ever I comoned with any man concerning any such mater, other than this of the bishope of Winchester, as God be my help I never dyd; nor unto more then this, I was never pryve.

Now, my good lords, having made answer according to the truth of such questions as hath been asked me, most humblie I beseeche you all to be mediators for me to his most excellent majestie, to cause such as have accused me (if it might be with his high pleasure) to come before his majestie, to lay to my charge afore me, face to face, what they can say against me: and I am in no doubt, so to declare my selfe, that it shall appeare I am falsly accused. And if his pleasure shall not be, to take the paine in his royall person, then to give you commandment to do the same. My lords, I trust ye think Cromwell's service and mine hath not be like; and yet my desire is, to have no more favour shew'de to me than was shew'de to him, I being present. He was a fals man; and sewerly I am a trefwe poore jantleman.

My lords, I think suerlie there is some fals man, that have laid some great cause to my charge, or els I had not be sent hither. And therefore, eftsonys most humblie I beseeche to finde the names, if they and I may not be brought face to face, yet let me be made privy what the causes are; and if I do not answer truely to every point, let me not live one howre after: for sewerlie I would hide nothing of any questions that I shall know, that doth concern my self, nor any other creature.

My lords, there was never gold tried better by fier and watter than I have been, nor hath had greater enemys about my soveraign lord, than I have had, and yet (God be thanked) my trowth hath ever tried me, as I dout not it shall do in theis causes. Suerly if I knew any thought I had offended his majestie in, I would suerly have declared it to his person.

Upon the Tuysdaye in Whitsonweek last past, I broke unto his majestie, most humbly beseeching him to helpe, that a marriage might be had between my daughter and sir Thomas Semour; and wheras my son of Surey hath a son and divers daughters; that with his favour, a crosse marriage might have been made between my lorde great chamberline and them. And also wher my son Thomas hath a son, that shall (be his mother) spend a thousand marks a yere, that he might be in like wise inaried to one of my said lord's daughters. I report me to your lordships, whether myn intent was honest in this motion, or not. And wheras I have written, that my truth hath been severly tried, and that I have had great enemies. First, the cardinal did confes to me at Asser, that he had gone about fourteen years to have destroyed me; saying, he did the same by the setting upon of my lord of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, and my lord Sands, who said often to him, that if he found not the means to put me out of the way, at length I should seurely undo him.

Cromwell, at such tyme as the marquis of Exeter suffred, examined his wife more streitly of me then of all other men in the realme, as she sent me word by her brother, the lord Montjoy. He hath said to me himself, many times, my lord, ye are an happy man, that your wife knoweth no hurt by you; for if she did, she would undo you.

The duke of Buckingham confessed openly at the bar (my father sitting as his judge), that of all men living, he hated me most, thinking I was the man that had hurt him most to the king's majestie: which now (quoth he) I perceive the contrary.

Rice, who had married my sister, confessed, that (of all men living) he hated me most; and wished many times how he might find the meanes to thrust his dagger in me.

What malice both my necys, that it pleased the king's highnes to marrie, did bere unto me, is not unknown to such ladies as kept them in this sute; as my lady Herberd, my lady Tirwit, my lady Kynston, and others, which heard what they said of me. Who tried out the falshod of the lord Darcy, sir Robert Constable, sir John Bulmer, Aske, and many others, for which they suffer'd for? But only I. Who shewed his majestie of the words of my mother-in-law, for which she was attainted of misprision? But only I. In all times past unto this time, I have shewed my self a most trewe man to my sovereign lord. And since these things done in tymes past, I have received more proffight of his highnes then ever I did afore. Alas! who can think that I, having been so long a trewe man, should now be false to his majestie? I have received more proffight than I deserved: and a poore man, as I am, yet I am his own near kinsman. For whose sake should I be an untrew man to them? Alas, alas! my lords, that ever it should be thought any ontrathe to be in me.

Fynally, my good lords, eftsonys most humble I beseech you to show this scrible letter to his majestie, and all joyntly to beseech his highnes to grante me the petitions that are conteyned in the same; and most especyally to remyt out of his most noble gentile hart such displeasure as he hath conceyved against me: and I shall, dewryng my lyff, pray for the continuence of his most royall estate long to endure.

By his highnes' poor prisoner,

Instructions given by Luther to Melancthon, 1534; of which one article was erroneously published by me in my 11d. Vol., and that being complained of, the whole is now published.

Cogitationes meæ sunt: (viz. Lutheri.)

PRIMO ut nullo modo concedamus de nobis dici, quod neutri neutros antea intellexerint. Nam isto pharmaco non medebimur tanto vulneri, cum nec ipsi credamus utrumque verum hoc esse, et alii putabunt à nobis hoc fingi, et ita magis suspectam reddemus causam, vel potius per totum dubiam faciemus, cum sit communis omnium. Et in tantis animorum turbis, et scrupulis non expedit hoc nomine addere offendiculum.

Secundo, cum hactenus dissenserimus, quod illi forsam signum, nos Corpus Christi asseruerimus, novum. e contrarii in Sacramento. Nihil minus mihi videtur utile, quam ut medium et novam sententiam statuamus: Qua et illi concedant Corpus Christi adesse verè, et nos concedamus panem solum manducari. Ut enim conscientiam taceam, considerandum est certe; Quantam hic fenestram aperiemus in re omnibus communi cogitandi: Et orientur hic fontes quæstionum et opinionum: Ut tutius multo sit illos simpliciter manere in suo signo: Cum nec ipsi suam nec nos nostram partem, multo minus utrique totum orbem pertrahemus in eam sententiam: Sed potius irritabimus ad varias cogitationes. Ideo vellem potius ut sopitum maneret dissidium in duabus istis sententiis, quam ut occasio daretur infinitis Quæstionibus ad Epicurismum profuturis.

Tertio, Cum stent hic pro nostra Sententia, primum Textus ipse apertissimus Evangelii, qui non sine causa movet omnes Homines, non solum pios: Secundo, Patrum dicta quam plurima, quæ non tam facile possunt solvi; nec, tuta Conscientia, aliter quam sonant, intelligi, cum bona Grammatica textui fortiter consentiat. Tertio, quia periculosum est statuere, Ecclesiam tot annis per totum Orbem caruisse vero Sensu Sacramenti; cum nos fateamur omnes, mansisse Sacramenta et verbum, etsi obruta multis abominationibus.

Quarta, Dicta Sancti Augustini de Signo, quæ contraria nostræ Sententiæ videntur, non sunt firma satis contra ista jam tria Dicta. Maximè, cum ex Augustini Scriptis clarè possit ostendi, et convinci, eum loqui de Signo præsentis Corporis, ut illud, contra Adamantum, non dubitavit Dominus appellare Corpus suum, cum daret Signum Corporis sui: vel de Signo Corporis Mystici, in quo valde multus est, præsertim in Joanne: Ubi copiosè docet, manducare Carnem Christi, esse in Corpore mystico; seu, ut ipse dicit, in Societate, Unitate, Charitate Ecclesie: Istit enim Verbis utitur.

Quinto, Omnium est fortissimus Augustinus, quod dicit, Non hoc Corpus, quod videtis, manducaturi estis, &c. Et tamen Conscientia memor apertorum Verborum Christi (Hoc est Corpus meum) hoc dictum S. Augustini facilè sic exponit: Quod de visibile Corpore loquatur Augustinus, sicut sonant verba (Quod videtis) ita nihil pugnat Augustinus cum claris verbis Christi: Et Augustinus infirmior est, quam ut hoc uno dicto tam incerto, imo satis consono, nos noveat in contrarium sensum.

Sexto, Ego S. Augustinum non intelligo aliter (sic et ipse Patres ante se forte intellexit) quam quod contra Judæos et Gentes docendum fuit, apud Christianos non comedi Corpus Christi visibiliter, et more corporali. Hac ratione Fidem Sacramenti defenderunt. Rursus contra Hypocritas Christianorum docendum fuit, quod Sacramentum non esset salutare accipientibus, nisi spiritualiter manducarent, id est, Ecclesiæ essent uniti et incorporati. Et hac ratione Charitatem in Sacramento exegerunt. Ut ex Augustino clarè accipi potest; qui, absque dubio, ex prioribus Patribus, et sui Seculi usu, ista accepit.

Septimo, Istis salvis, nihil est quod à me peti possit. Nam et ego hoc dissidium vellem (Testis est mihi Christus meus) redemptum non uno Corpore et Sanguine meo: Sed quid faciam? Ipsi forte Conscientia bona capti sunt in alteram Sententiam. Feramus igitur eos. Si sinceri sunt, liberabit eos Christus Dominus. Ego contra captus sum bona certè Conscientia (nisi ipse mihi sim ignotus) in meam Sententiam. Ferant et me, si non possunt mihi accedere.

Si verò illi Sententiam suam, scilicet de Præsentia Corporis Christi cum Pane, tenere velint, et petierint nos invicem tamen tolerari; ego planè libenter tolerabo, in spe futuræ Communionis. Nan interim communicare illis in fide et Sensu non possum.

Deinde, Si politica Concordia queritur, ea non impeditur diversitate Religionis: Sicut novimus posse Conjugia, Commercium, aliaque politica constare, inter diversæ Religionis Homines: Primo Corinth. 7. Christus faciat, ut perfectè conteratur Satan sub nostris pedibus. Amen.

Nostra autem Sententia est, Corpus ita cum Pane, seu in Pane esse, ut verè cum Pane manducetur: Et quæcunque motum vel actionem Panis habet, eandem et Corpus Christi. Ut Corpus Christi verè dicatur ferri, dari, accipi, manducari, quando Panis fertur, datur, accipitur, manducatur; id est, Hoc est Corpus meum.

The Lady Mary's Letter to the Lord Protector, and to the rest of the King's Majesty's Council, upon their suspecting some of her Household had encouraged the Devonshire Rebellion.

[Ex MS. D.G. Cooke.]

MY LORD,—I have received letters from you, and others of the king's majesty's council, dated the 17th of this present, and delivered unto me the 20th of the same, whereby I perceive ye be informed, that certayn of my servants should be the chief stirrers, procurers, and doers in these commotions, which commotions (I assure you) no less offend me, than they do you and the rest of the council. And you write also, that a priest and chapleyn of mine, at Sampford Courtney in Devonshire, should be a doer there. Of which report I do not a little marvel; for to my knowledge, I have not one chapleyn in those parts. And concerning Pooley, my servant, which was sometime a receiver, I am able to answer, that he remaineth continually in my house, and was never doer amongst the commons, nor came in their company. It is true that I have another servant of that name dwelling in Suffolk; and whether the commons have taken him or no, I know not, for he resorteth seldom to my house. But by report they have taken by force many gentlemen in these quarters, and used them very cruelly. And as touching Lionell, my servant, I cannot but marvel of that bruit, specially because he dwelleth within two miles of London, and is not acquainted within the shire of Suffolk or Norfolk; nor at any time cometh into these parts, but when he waiteth upon me in my house, and is now at London about my businesse, being no man apt or meet for such purposes, but given to as much quietness as any within my house.

My lord, it troubleth me to hear such reports of any of mine, and specially where no cause is given, trusting that my household shall try themselves true subjects to the king's majesty, and honest, quiet persons; or else I would be loath to keep them. And where you charge me that my proceedings in matters of religion should give no small courage to many of those men to require and do as they do: that thing aspeareth most evidently to be untrue, for all the rising about these parts is touching no point of religion; but even as ye ungently, and without desert, charge me, so I, omitting so fully to answer it, as the case doth require, do and will pray God, that your new alterations and unlawful liberties be not rather the occasion of these assemblies, than my doings, who am (God I take to witness) inquired there-with. And as for Devonshire, no indifferent person can lay their doings to my charge; for I have neither land nor acquaintance in that country, as knoweth Almighty God, whom I humbly beseech to send you all as much plenty of his grace as I would wish to my self. So with my hearty commendations, I bid you farewell. From my house at Kennynghall, the xxth of July.

Your friend to my power,

MARY.

Rogavit quoque Senatam, ut Concionatores Populo Interim quam compositissimis et coloratissimis verbis possent, proponerent, quod major pars recusarunt, dicentes se hoc Scriptum laudare nulla ratione neque constantia posse, quod communi suffragio damnassent, duo tamen se id facturos receperunt, quod et factum audivi ad S. NUMBER IV.

A part of a letter of Hooper's to Bullinger, giving an Account of the Cruelty of the Spaniards in the Netherlands.

[Ex MS. Tiguri.]

Nos 14 Aprilis relicta Colonia, iter versus Antwerpiam, per Campiniam Brabantinam, sterilem ac arenosam, institimus. 18. ejusdem, venimus omnes, Dei Gratia, salvi et incolomes Antwerpiam. 20. Die, Precibus Oratoris Regis nostri, qui apud Cæsarem nunc agit, compulsus, Bruxellam me contuli, unâ cum Joh. Stumphio, ut videret mollitiem ac miserias Aulæ, præterea servitutem Civium Bruxellensium, qui jam Hispanorum Imperium, atrocinum ac furtum, violationem Filiarum, Uxorum impudicitiam, minas denique ac plagas perditissimæ Gentis ferre coguntur; ut Statum ac Conditionem suæ Patriæ altius consideraret, ardentius pro illo oraret, ac diligentius suos admoneret, ut alienis malis edoctos cautions redderet. Cæsarem non vidimus, quod raro Cubiculum suum egreditur, nec Filium, qui Pascha suum egit extra Civitatem, in Monasterio quodam. Ducem Saxonie Jo. Stumphius vidit per fenestram. Ego bis sui in Ædibus illius valde humaniter acceptus à suis Germanis, qui ei adhuc inserviunt, ad numerum 30. Voluit Dux, bis vel ter, me admittere ad Colloquium; sed impeditit semper primi Capitanei Hispanorum præsentia. Vivit constanter in sua Fide. Non valet, quantum ad Valetudinem Corporis spectat, de liberatione illius nulla penitus affulget spes, nisi quod absit, Religionem suam mutet: non malè sperat de Verbo Dei. Catus Landgravius Captivus detinetur Auldenardi, septem milliariibus à Gandavo: Homo omnibus numeris miser et inconstans: nunc omnem Obedientiam Cæsari, ac Fidem pollicetur; Missam, ac cætera impia sacra, obvis ulnis amplectitur, nunc Cæsarem, cum suo interdicto, execratur ac detestatur. Dominus misereatur illius; miserè affligitur, ac meritis poenas perfidie suæ jam luit. Et vidimus, præterea Lazarum Scuendi proditorem illum, quem nostis. De Brandenburgensi, ac aliis Germanis, Hispanorum mancipiis, nihil opus est quod scriberem. Legatus Papæ, pre totam Quadragesimam, in sua Aula est concionatus, quàm impiè non scribam. Hoc tamen pro certo scio, non bene convenire inter Papam et Cæsarem, nec inter Gallum ac Cæsarem. Uterque valde sibi timet à Cæsare: Cæsar vicissim à fulmine Papæ maximè timet. Jam agitur seriò inter illos, an Concilium Generale Tridenti, an Bologniæ fit celebrandum. Papa urget, mandat, rogat ac jubet, ut Cæsar consentiat de Bologniæ: Is renuit, negat ac pernegat, omnibus modis: et potius dicit se omnes Amicitias cum Papa definere, quàm illum locum, Bologniam scilicet, admittere: Quid monstri in hoc, ex parte Papæ, lateat, facillè divinare licet. Diffidit Regno suo valde; nam hoc didici ab Oratore nostro, quòd si Cæsaris Confessor esset mediocriter pius, esset maxima spes, quod brevi in Cognitionem Christi induceretur. Nam apertè mihi retulit, et Cæsarem, et Consiliarios suos omnes regi, impelli, duci ac trahi, per Confessorem, qui omnia Papæ suasu et concilio agit. Et facile credo: Nam ante septem Menses, cum Cæsar adhuc erat in superiore Germania, fuit derelictus à suo Confessore, quod crudelius vult se vivere in pios Viros, et in integrum Papatum restituere. Cæsar obtulit ei Episcopatum in Hispania, ad 20. Millia Coronatorum per Annum: neglexit Cæsaris Liberalitatem, et Cæsarem ipsum hæc Verbis, Ecclesie Christi me solum debeo, sed non Tibi, non Dono tuo, nisi Ecclesie mavis majori studio inservire. Jam de Cæsaris animo ergo Helvetiam. Omnes in hoc consentiunt illum vestræ libertati hostiliter invidere, propterea nullum non movere lapidem, ut rumpat inter vos concordiam: si hac via res non succedat, omnia aget pollicitationibus. Cavete igitur, ne lactet vos inani spe. Denique absque dubio vos aggredietur hostili manu, non ut sic vincat, vel multos ex suis exponat periculo, sed ut vobis incutiat timorem. Rogo itaque ut unanimiter ac mutuò vos diligatis, Deum timete, sanctè vivite, strenuè pugnatè, ac expectatè Victoriæ à Deo, qui procul dubio vobis aderit ac defendet. Adhuc putem vobis non immineri periculum, sed sitis semper parati: et absit procul omnis securitas, ne obruat inopinantes. Adhuc Cæsar bene scit, se non posse pro Voto uti rebus Germaniæ. Doluit illi sæpius (ut accepi à Viris fide dignis), aliquid tentasse in Religione: quidem si Germanis permisisset liberam maximè fuisse in re illius. Aiunt Cæsarem brevi profecturum, Gandavum et à Gandavo iterum petiturum Bruxellam, vel ascensurum versus Spiram. Copias militum habet probe Bremam ac civitates maritimas, sed otiosas: Nihil proficiunt res, à civibus multum timetur, indies magis ac magis Civitates suas mununt et comeatum habent ad quinque annos, non multum Cæsaris gratiam amplius ambiunt. Quam graves exactiones à suis Cæsar jam exigit credo se non ignorare. Dicam tamen tristem ac deplorandam Orationem, quam effudit pia mulier, hospita nostra in Campinia: Si inquit ferre potuerim in sinu meo magnam ac jam nunc molestam turbam liberorum meorum, fugerem ac per stipem victum quererem, nam Cæsare ac Regiæ exactores labores sudores nostri exantlant. Hac ex parte Angli etiam jam valde laborant, concessa est Regi quinta pars omnium bonorum. Sed adhuc de Helvetia verum. Heri 25. Aprilis invitatus ad prandium à quodam cive Antverpensi, qui optimè novit Helvetiam, ac sæpe in omnibus civitatibus Helvetiorum exposuit merces suas, is mihi retulit, se frequenter vidisse in aula Cæsaris ex eo quod Cæsar superiorem partem Germaniæ reliquerit, publicos Ministros Civitatis Lucernanæ, nam bene novit illos ex colore vestium, metuendum est, ne arcana patriæ per lujusmodi patefiant, vel aliquid majus malum lateat.

[The rest of the letter relates to private concerns.]

NUMBER VI.

A Letter of Peter Martyr’s to Bullinger, of the State of the University of Oxford, in the Year 1550, June 1.

[Ex MS. Tiguri.]

S. D. LITERIS tuis vir eximie mihi que in Christo plurimum observande, longè antea respondiisse debeeram, ad quod faciendum, non solum institutum officium inter amicos, verum etiam quod suavissimæ fuerunt et bene comitatæ aliis symmistarum epistolis jucundissimis: vehementer extimulabar sed quando reddite sunt adversa valetudine nonnihil afflictabar: et statim ut convalui, ea mole negotiorum penè sum oppressus, ut quod maximè cupiebam facere non licuerit, cujusmodi autem fuerint hæ occupationes paucis expediam. Præter quotidianas Interpretationes Pauli, quod totum ferme hominem sibi vendicatis, si velit in eis pro dignitate versari, accessit ex legibus modò latis à Regia

Majestate, huic Academiæ novum onus. Quippe decretum est, ut frequenter publicæ Disputationes de Rebus Theologicis habeantur, hoc est alternis hebdomadis, quibus mihi præcipitur, ut et intersim et præsim. Deinde in hoc Regio Collegio ubi dego, singula quaque septimana, Theologicæ Disputationes agitantur, quæ cum ad illas audiendas aditus omnibus patet, identidem publicæ dici possunt, hisque sum constitutus pariter, atque aliis censor. Est itaque cum adversariis perpetuè luctandum, et quidem pertinacissimis, quò fit, ut velim nolim facillè cogar, alias non rarè seponere literas, et vocationi cui sum obstrictus, totum tempus mihi concessum transmittere. Verum certè scio boni consules, nec in malam partem capias (quæ tua est humanitas) quod à contempnitione profectum non esse animadvertes. Gaudeo quas scriperam literas, abs te hilari lætoque animo fuisse susceptas: neque vulgares ago gratias, quod tuum præsidium, si quid me possit cojuvare, tam promptè atque alacriter offers. Recompenset Deus istum Animum, ut ego illum sincera charitate complector! Hic verò scitò negotium religionis procedere non quidem eo successu, eoque ardore quo velim, sed tamen plus quàm nostra peccata mereantur, et aliquantio felicius, atque mihi ante quatuor menses polliceri ausus essem. Permulta certè sunt quæ nobis obstant, cumprimis adversariorum copia, concionatorum inopia, et eorum qui profitentur Evangelium crassa vitia, et quorundam præterea humana prudentia, qui judicant religionem quidem repurgandam sed ita vellent demutari quam minimè fieri possit, quod cum Animo sint et judicio civiles, existimant maximos motus republicæ fore perniciosos. Verum tu ipse certus, cum innumere corruptiones, infiniti abusus, et immensæ superstitiones in ecclesia Christi passim inoleverint, fieri non posse ut justa habeatur instaurationi nisi quæ deflexerunt in vitium, ad suos genuinos ortus purissimos fontes et inadulterata principia revocentur. Satan astutè sanctos conatus aggreditur, vellet enim hoc prætextu q. numerosissimos papatus relinquere reliquias. Partim ne homines ejus facillè obliviscerentur, partim verò ut reditus ad illum faciliior maneret. At vicissim inde Consolationis hausimus, quod Regem habemus verè sanctum, qui tanto studio Pietatis flagrat, ea est, hac ætate, prædictus Eruditione, eaque Prudentia jam nunc et Gravitate loquitur, ut omnes in admirationem stuporemque se audientes, convertat. Quamobrem, orandum est Deus contentissimis votis, et eum Regno et Ecclesiæ multò diutissimè conservet. Sunt et complures Heroes, Regni que Procures, bene admodum sentientes; et aliquos Episcopos habemus, non pessimos, inter quos est uti signifer Cantuariensis. Deinde in eorum Album cooptatus est Hooperus, magna porrò bonorum omnium lætitia; utque audio, contigit ei Populus non malus: Me illum spero visurum, quando ad suum Episcopatum iter faciet. Nam si Gloucestriam se conferet, quæ est ejus Ecclesiæ, per nos hac transibit. Quo autem pacto duci potuerit, ut fieret Episcopus, referrem pluribus, nisi comperitissimum haberem, illum ipsum (quæ est ejus in te observantia) omnia fusissimè scripturum. Est alius præterea Vir bonus, Michael Coverdallus, qui superioribus annis sgebat in Germania Parochum: Is multum in Devonia, et prædicando, et interpretando Scripturas, laborat; eum te probè nôsse arbitror, qui Excestrensis Episcopus fiet. Nilque potest commodi, ut et utilius fieri ad Religionis Repurgationem, quam si homines hujus farinæ ad Ecclesiæ Administrationem impellantur. Contulit etiam se huc Dominus Alasco, quum ejus Phrysia Imperatorum Interim admisit, utque olfacio, Londini Germanorum Ecclesiæ præerit; quod mihi vehementer placet. Dedit nunc apud D. Cantuariensem. Accepisti jam quo loco nostræ Res in Anglia sint, quæ adhuc nonnihil melioris spei efficit; Pax ista, cum Rege Gallorum facta, quæ videtur indies magis corroborari. Solum nonnulli verentur, ne in bonorum perniciem, quod jactitare incipiunt Papietæ celebretur Concilium: Verum si sapierimus et hoc genus Cogitationum, in Deum rejiciamus. Sermones quos edidisti, fuerunt hoc tempore utiles moniales, qui ut ex mediis Scripturis sanctis recitati sunt, ita et grati fuerunt; et spero, non absque fructu legentur. Johannem ab Ulmis, et Stumphium, quos mihi commendasti, eâ quâ possum Charitate complector; atque ipsi vicissim me colunt, et observant: ad me ventitant sæpius; et si quid vel scribendum, vel aliud agendum, mea causa sit, præstare non detrectant, sed lubenti volentique animo faciunt; qua de causa, illis non parum debeo. Sed audio, Stumphium ad vos delatum esse, quod contra quàm vestris Legibus liceat, nescio quod ab Anglis Stipendium accipiat; id verò certò scias, falsum esse. Vixit hic aliquandiu in nostro Collegio, sed sua pecunia; quod posthac non illi fraudi sit, utque ulla specie mali absteat: Hic dicessit, et in Oppido, apud Civem Bibliopolam, divertit. Modò quod superest, tuos, tuorumque Preeca, quanta possum cum instantia imploro; quo progrediatur in hoc Regno Domini Opus, atque tandem Corda Patrum in Filios, et Corda Filiorum in Patres suos, nostro Ministerio revoceur. The King's Mandate to the Bishop of Norwich, sent with the Articles to be subscribed by the Clergy.

BY THE KING.

RIGHT reverende father in God, right trustie and well-beloved, we grete you well: and because it hath pleased Almighty God in this latter time of the world, after long darkenes of knowledge to reveale to this his Church of England; whereof we have under Christ the chief charge in Earth; a sincere knowledge of the gospel, to the inestimable benefit of us and our people, redeemed by our saviour Christ. We have thought it mete, and our dutie for the pure conservation of the same gospel in our church, with one uniforme profession, doctryne, and preachinge, and for the avoyding of many perilous and vain opinions, and errors, to sende unto you certayne articles, devised and gathered with great study, and by council, and good advice of the greatest lerned parte of our byshoppes of this realm, and sundry others of our clergy; which articles we wyll and exhort your self to subscribe, and in your preachings, redings, and teachings, to observe and cause to be subscribed and observed, of all other which do, or hereafter shall preache, or reade, within your dioces. And if any person, or persons, having benefice within your dioces, shall from henceforth, not only refuse wylfully to sett their hands to these articles, but also obstinatly exhort their parrochians to withstande the same, and teache the people in a contrary way; our pleasure is, that beinge duly proved, ye shall advertise us, or our counsaile of the hoole mattier, fully to thintent suche further ordre may by direction from us, or our said counsaile, to be taken as the case shall require, and shall stande with justice, and th'ordre of our lawes. And further, that when, and as often as ye shall have any manner of person presented unto you to be admitted by yowe as the ordinary to any ecclesiastical ordre, ministry, office, or cure, within your dioces, that ye shall before you admit him, conferre with him in every theis articles. And finding him therto consentinge, to cawse him subscribe the same in one legier book to be fourmed for that purpose, which maye remayne as a registre for a concorde, and to let him have a copie of the same articles. And if any men in that case shall refuse to consent to any of the said articles, and to subscribe the same, then we will and command you, that neither ye, nor any for you, or by your procurement in any wise shall admitt him, or allowe him as sufficient and mete to take any ordre, ministry, or ecclesiastical cure. For whiche yower so doinge, we shall discharge yowe from all maner of penalties, or daungers of actions, suits, or ptees of premonicees, "quare impedit," or such lyke. And yet our meaning is, that if any partie refuse to subscribe any of these articles, for lack of learning and knowledge of the trowth, ye shall in that case by teachinge, conference, and prouf of the same by the scriptures, reasonably and discretely move, and perswade him therto before yow shall peremptorilye judge him as unhable and a recusant. And for the tryall of his conformitie, ye shall according to your discrecion prefix a time and space convenient to deliberate and give his consent, so that be betwixt three weks and six weks, from the time of his first accessse unto yowe. And if after six weks he wyl not consent and agree wyllinglie to subscribe, then ye may lawfullye, and shall in any wysc refuse to admytt or enhable him. And where there is of late sett fourthly by our authoritie a catechisme for the instruction of younge scolers in the feare of God, and the trowe knowledge of his holy religion, with expresse commaundment from us to all scole maisters to teache and instruct their scolars the said catechisme, making it the beginning and first foundation of ther teaching in ther scholes: our pleasure is, that for the better exequution of our said commaundment, ye shall yearlye, at the least once visit, or cause to be visited, every schole within your saide dioces, in which visitacion yt shall be enquired both howgh the scole maister of every such schole hath used himself in the teaching of the said catechisme: and also howgh the scolars do receyve and follow the same, making playne and full certificate of the offenders, contrary to this our ordre, and of their severall offences, to the archbishop of that province, within the monethes from tyme to tyme after every such offence. Yeoven undre our signet at the manor of Grenewich, the 1xth daye of June, the virth yeare of our reign.

Queen Mary's Letter to the Earl of Sussex, to Care of Elections in Parliament.

[Ex MSS. Petyti.]

MARY THE QUEEN.—Right trusty and welbeloved cosen, we greet you well. And where for diverse causes, tending principally to the advancement of God's glory and the commonwealth of this our realme, we have thought convenient to call our high court of parliament on the 12th of the next moneth, as by our writ of summons, sent unto you for that purpose, ye may at better length perceive; likeas for your own part, wee doubt not but ye wil be ready to assist us with your best advice and counsaill for the furtherance of our good purpose, in such matters as are to be treated of in our said parliament; so to the end the same may be more gravely debatet, and circumspectly handled, to the honour of Almighty God, and general comodity of our loving subjects, wee have thought convenient specially to require and pray you to admonish on our behalfe such our good and loving subjects as by order of our writs have the elections of knights, citizens, or burgeses, within our rule, to choose of their inhabitants, as being eligible, by order of our lawes, may be of the wise, grave, and catholick sort. Such as indeed mean the true honour of God, with the prosperity of the commonwealth. The advancement whereof wee, and our dear husband the king, doe chiefly professe and intend, without alteration of any particular man's profession, as amongst other false rumours, the hinderers of our good purposes and favorers of heresies, do utterly report. And to the end wee may the better confer with you about these matters that are to be treated of in our said parliament, our pleasure is, you do put your self in a readiness to make your repair hither, so as ye may be with us against the feast of All-Saints at the furthest. Given under our signet at our palace of Westminster the 6th of October, the iid year of our reigne.

Cardinal Pole's First Letter to Queen Mary.

[Ex MS. penes me.]

BENEDICTA Manus Omnipotentis Dei, quæ non solum Majestatem tuam in alto Throno, et Possessione Regni collocavit (quod multos Annos ad eam spectabit, et ab omnibus bonis optabatur, atq; inter Sacras Preces petebatur a Divina Clementia): Sed etiam eò res deduxit, ut non modo res ipsa, verum etiam ratio ipsius rei conficiendæ omnes Amicos incredibili lætitiâ perfundat, et precipuè Pium Animum tuum, quia sine sanguine res peracta est, prope cum magna clades esset timenda propter fraudes Adversariorum, quæ non parvis viribus erant suffultæ ad eam justissima Successione privandam; atque cum propter longum sibi divinitus concessum ad suas insidias subtendendas, putarant se ad finem optatum cum scelere suscepti consilii pervenisse, sine novis auxiliis, sed solis viribus quas Spiritus Dei excitavit in Animis mortalium, effectum esset Divina Providentiâ, ut brevi momento Temporis irriti ac delusi sint omnes Mortalium apparatus: Ita conversi sunt, qui Humanæ Malitiæ militabant ad protegendum Honorem Dei, Majestatis tuæ incolumitatem, ac totius Regni salutem.

Si quis itaque miratur cur tua Majestas nullis externis Viribus, paucis etiam subditis audentibus ejus partes amplecta, potuerit Regnum ita Usurpatum adversus tantam Hominum malitiam et Potentiam recuperare; aut siquis rogaret, quo modo factum est istud? Res ipsa respondere poterit; Spiritus Sanctus supervenit in corda Hominum, qui ea ratione tibi Regnum restituere voluit; atque hoc uno Exemplo non solum vestris Populis, sed Universis Christianis, et Barbaris Nationibus Manifestum fit, quia nullum fit Consilium, nec Prudentia, nec Fortitudo contra Dominum Deum, et quod excelsus dominetur, in Regno Hominum, et cui voluerit, et quando voluerit dabit illud. Ejus Divinæ Providentiæ in rebus Humanis Credulitas (Præcipium nostræ Religionis Fundamentum) si unquam in istud Regnum introduci, et confirmari debuit, per ullam Manifestam Experimentiam; hoc maxime tempore introduci necesse est, quo propter impiorum tam diuturnam Autoritatem, ita erat in Animis Hominum debilitata et in eorum Animis præsertim, qui prudentiores, sapientioresque putabantur, ut penitus videretur extincta. Cum Divinæ itaque Bonitatis placuerit, ita evidentibus signis suam potentiam in tua Majestate extollenda, tunc cum à suis inimicis, et à multis aliis prorsus oppressa putabatur, declarare; hoc est cur maximè omnes Boni et Pii Gloriantur, et quod tibi magis gratum esse certò scio, quam Regiam Dignitatem. Atque, si ulla fœmina debuit Deum laudare iis Verbis suse Sanctissimæ Matris, cujus nomen refert, quibus ea usa est ad exprimendam lætitiã propter Divinã Providentiã ad sui, Humanicę generis salutem, cum Spiritu Sancto repleta inquit, Magnificat Anima mea Dominum, cum iis quę sequuntur; tua Majestas justissima de Causa eum Psalmum canere potest; cum in se ipsa sentiat, quod omnes vident, ut Divina Bonitas respexit Humilitatem ancillę suę: Et fecit potentiam in brachio suo, statim deposuit Potentes de sede ex exaltavit humiles. Hoc dictum de Divina Providentiã erga Majestatem tuam semper manifestius in Administratione cognoscetur tua, cum incremento illo lætitię, quod desideratur ad honorem et laudem Divinę Majestatis. Enimvero mea erga Deum, et suam Ecclesiam Pietas, et erga Majestatem tuam me cogit ut unum tibi in memoriam revocem initio regnandi; quod est cum ita singulare Beneficium à Deo acceperis, diligenter consideres è quibus radicibus perturbationes pullularint, rerum adjustitiam pertinentium et ad verę Religionis cultum; quippe cum illę indies cum tanta ruina succreverint, in isto Regno Privata et Publica, quanta non ignorantur: atque si hoc ita feceris; percipies perfectò Principium et Causam omnium malorum tunc pullulasse, cum perpetuus humani generis Adversarius Patri tuo persuasit impurum Concilium; ut divortium fieret Matris tuę optimę Reginę, atque illi magnę in Deum, in ipsam, in te in seipsam injurię, majus additum est scelus, quod à Matre Spiritus divortium fecit omnium Christianorum; à Sancta Catholica Obedientiã et ab Apostolica Reverentiã. Ex hoc iniquo et impio semine tot pestiferi fructus nati sunt, ut ita Regnum corruerint, ut nullum neque justitię neque Religionis vestigium apperuerit: Tanquam relegatę sint amba, quando Reverentiã, et Obedientiã Ecclesię ejecta fuit; neque prius sunt reditura, quam Divina Obedientiã in Animum recepta sit eorum, qui rebus præferunt. Hoc facile tua Majestas illi servo suo potest credere, qui omnium viventium plura, et istã Majestatis vestrę Causã passus est: Neque ullam defendendę Causę tuę rationem prætermisi, ubi aliquid extaret remedium, quo toties molestiis sublevarem. Quod nisi mei labores eum finem consecuti sint, quem semper desideravi; sæpius vel vitam ipsam periculis exponens; tamen nunc multo magis lætor, quam si ipse adjutor fuisset; cum apertissimè cognoverim, Divinę Providentię in Majestatem tuam propensam voluntatem: Nam perfectò noluit Deus ulla humanã manu te adjuvari, neque Cæsaris, neque ullius Principis: Quamvis nunquam cessavit Pontifex Cæsarem ad opem ferendam adhortari: Neque mea defuit diligentia, utrisque ad hoc pium opus sollicitantibus, sed Divinitus Res protracta est donec statutum tempus à Deo adventarit, quo Divinã manu sublevareris. Interim usus est Deus eadem ratione, qua erga carissimos et dilectissimos uti consuevit, quos nutrit, et educat in omni calamitatum, ærumnarumque genere: Ut gratię suę semen altiores radices in corde ipsorum posset extendere, meliusque floreat, ac nobiliores fructus producat, cum visum fuerit in pristinam felicitatem revocare. Istud nunc omnes boni expectant, atque ego in primis, cui major concessa est dotes Animi tui, quę Divinitus tibi concessę sunt, à teneris cognoscendi. Ea res me multò etiam magis impellit, ut Majestati tuę id significem de re tanta, quanta est Ecclesię Obedientiã, me magis etiam sollicitum esse, quàm antea, qua mente sis erga Religionem, et quo pacto affecta: nam cum circiter trecenta millia passuum distam ab Urbe Roma, nuper ad me de rebus Britannicis est delatum; per literas summi Pontificis certior factus sum, te ad summum imperium esse provectum, et quod ego sim delectus Legatus à Sancta sede Apostolica ad Majestatem tuam et ad Cæsarem, atque ad Galliarum Regem, ut tibi gratularer pro Victoria Dej in hac Causa ipsius Dei: Sed quia quanti res sit intelligo, censui non inutile fore, si Majestatis tuę mentem quo pacto Deus moverit, prius percunctatus fuero: Cujus causã præsentem nuncium cum meis literis mitto: Neque istud quidem, quia de optime voluntate tua subdubitem, quoniam te semper gratam, erga Deum suisse cognovi, et acceptorum non immemorem, legumque divinarum observantissimam, inter quas Obedientiã Apostolicę sedis continetur, cui reliquit, nisi quia nus Causę suę favere turpi, et iniquo ejus desiderio assentiri. Sed quoniam tot annos tanta facta est mutatio, tantęque malitia conata est evellere ex Animis Hominum penitusque restinguere hanc ipsam Obedientiã et Observantiã, mihi visum est non absurdum fore, si ex te ipsa percunctarer, quod tempus, aut quę ratio aptior, commodiorque videretur futura ad ipsius Vicarii Christi Legatione perfungendum, idque ad istius Regni Beneficium et Consolationem, cujus Fælicitas et Quies semper magis oppressa fuit, ex qua Sancta Obedientiã expugnari cœpta est, coactaque solum vertere. Decevi igitur prius responsum expectare, quod ut expectationi meę optimã respondeat, ab Omnipotente Deo suppliciter peto, omniumque piorum spei, quam habent de Majestate tua conceptam, idque ad confirmationem, et incrementum Fælicitatis tuę, et istius Regni. Quod si mihi benignam audientiam concesseris, spero futurum Dei optimi maximi Beneficio, ut intelligas in hac ipsa Obedientiã Ecclesię consistere, et collocatum esse fundamentum et stabilimentum omnium bonorum ipsius Regni. Sic igitur rogans Omnipotentem Deum, ut pro sua infinita Misericordiã Majestatem tuam fortunet in ipso imperio, in quo collocavit, finem faciendū. Cænobio Megazeni Benaci. Eidus Sextilis. 1553.

OPTIME sobrine Pole, in Christo Observandissime; accepi literas tuas, quas tuus familiaris mihi reddidit, ex quibus intellexi perpetuam tuam optimam voluntatem erga hoc Regnum, Patriam tuam nimirum, et erga Legitimos Hæredes, cum summa lætitię significatione ob ea, quę placuerunt Divinę Clementię Omnipotentis Dei in ostendenda sua erga me vera, justissima, infinitaq; Misericordiã; propter quam me tibi etiam non parum debere sentio, cum monitis amantissimos præterea in literis addideris: Quod si nullum naturę vinculum inter nos intercederet, quod certè maximum intercedit; tamen vel hæc unã de Causa maximas tibi deberem gratias, quod me tam amenter moueris; atque ego dabo operam pro viribus, ut monitis tuis satisfaciã, quippe cum neq; unquam fuerim, nec sim, neq; ut Divinę Misericordię confido unquam futura sim Catholicę abhortionis in tuis literis contentõ adversaria. Quod attinet ad meam Obedientiã, et debitam Observantiã erga spousam Christi, et Matrem Divinam, suam Catholicam et Apostolicam Ecclesiam, harum literarum lator poterit te commodè docere: Is non poterit explanare quanta sit Animi mei molestia, propterea quod non possim Animi mei Sententiã, in hac re prorsus patefacere; sed cum primum data erit facultas sinceritatis Animi mei erga Divinum cultum explicandę, Obedientię; quid Sentiam exequendę, faciã te per literas certiozem. Quod spectat ad Coronationem, idem Nuncios omnia plaucè explicare poterit, multaq; alia quibus illum adesse volui; cum mirificè Omnipotentis Dei Misericordiã confidam, futurum ut hæc Comitia omnia statuta abrogent, unde omnium calamitatum hujusce Regni semina pollularunt. Spero autem futurum ut delictorum veniam à summi Pontificis Clementia obtineam, cui te rogo, ut meo nomine humillimè gratias agas pro sua multiplici in me Bonitate, ut in eadem persistat Clementia, omnemque præteritorum commissorum Oblivionem concedat; hunc igitur spe postulationis non irritæ futuræ operâ tuâ; quando tantum Benevolentiæ, et fraternæ Charitatis, mihi pignus obtulisti: Me itaque plurimum Sancto Patri, ac tibi commendans, finem facio scribendi.

NUMBER XXIII.

A Letter from Cardinal Morone to Cardinal Pole, telling him how uneasy the Pope was to see his going to England so long delayed; but that the Pope was resolved not to recal him.

Al Cardo. Polo.

REV. E ILL. SIG. MIO OSS'MO.—Avanti la partita mia di Roma hebbi la Lettera di V. S. Reverendissima dell' 25 di Maggio in risposta delle mie, che gli havevo scritto pur alli 6 di Maggio, quando vennero li primi avisi del Nuncio, dopo che V. S. Reverendissima fu ritornata alla Corte dal Viaggio di Francia, hebbi ancora l' altra di 28 del Medesimo, con la Querela Christiana, che ella fa contra di me, anzi per dir meglio con la Dottrina che V. S. Reverendissima con Sancta Charità querelandosi m' insegna, sopra la quale non m'occorre dir altro, se non che ella ha gran Ragione, et che io l'ho fatto torto a scriverle in quel modo, di che in una parte mi pento, e spero che ella mi habbi perdonato; nell' altra mi allegro, havendo havuto occasione di Guadagnar questa sua altra Lettera, e dato a lei occasione di esplicarsi in questo modo in Lettere come ha fatto, e ne ringratio Dio prima, e poi lei ancora, che si sia degnata mandarmi Lettera cossi grata, la qual potrà servire a più d' un proposito.

La prima di 21, fù in summa comunicata da me a Nostro Signore parendomi necessario charir bene sua Sanctità, si per Giustificazione delle attoni passate di V. S. Reverendissima come per non lasciar, che sua Sanctità stesse nella disperatione dimostrata gia della cose d' Inghilterra, e della bonta del mezzo della Persona sua: e benche S. Sanctità non avesse pazienza secondo l' ordinario suo di leggere, o di udir la Lettera, nondimeno le dissi talmente la summa, che mostrò restare satisfattissima, e disse esser più che certa, che quella non haveva dato causa ne all' Imperatore, ne ad altri d' usar con lei termini oosi estravaganti. E quanto alla Revocatione di V. S. Reverendissima, sempre persisteva che non si potesse fare senza grand indignità sua, e dishonor della Sede Apostolica, e carico dell' Imperatore inteso, e di V. S. Reverendissima, e gran pregiudicio del Regno d' Inghilterra: e benche dicesse di scrivere alla Cæsarea Majestà, nondimeno non si risolveva in tutto, com anco non si risolveva nella materia delli beni Ecclesiastici, sopra la qual sua Sanctità ha parlato molte volte variamente; e nel rescrivere alla Regina d' Inghilterra, ed al Principe di Spagna, come V. S. Reverendissima haverà inteso da M. Francisco Stella, ed intenderà hora dall' Ormaneto, il qual sarà portator di questa, e tandem vien' espedito in tutti li punti quasi conformi al bisogno, ed al desiderio suo.

Io son venuto a star qui a Sutrio sin le prime acque d'Agotto, che poi piacendo a Dio ritornerò a Roma. E le cause della partita mia V. S. Reverendissima hora l' intenderà dal prefato Ormaneto, non essendo stato opportuno scriverle prima; non ho havuto altro scrupolo se non partirmi, restando il Negocio, e l' Espeditioni dell' Ormaneto cossi in pendente. Ma conoscendo la sufficienza, e la diligenza, e la buon' Introdutione, che hanno quelli Ministri di V. S. Reverendissima giudicando, non poterui far di più di quel che già più volte haveva fatto, pensai che esse haveriano potuto supplire meglio di me, come hanno di poi fatto.

Non occorre al presente che io le scriva più a lungo venendo il detto M. Nicolò informato, che non e bisogno affaticarla in leggere mie Lettere. Resta solo che Iddio conduca esso, e M. Antonio a salvamento essendo il viaggio in ogni parte da qui in Fiandra tanto pericoloso, dopo che io preghi, che sua Majestà Divina prosperi e felicità V. S. Reverendissima, ad Honor e Gloria sua in quell' Attioni, che ha per mani, come son certo farà, e che quella mi ami, e mi comandi al solito, perche come ho detto, faccio conto, s' altro non mi interviene, avanti che di quella possi haver risposta da lei, poter' esser di ritorno a Roma, e con questo faccio fine, e baciandole humilmente la mano in buono Gratia di V. S. Reverendissima mi raccomandando. Di Sutrio, alli 13 di Luglio 1554.

NUMBER XXIV.

A Letter from Ormanet to Priuli, giving an account of what passed in an Audience the Bishop of Arras gave him.

A Monsieur Priuli.

CLARIS. E MOLTO REV. SIG. MIO.—Questa mattina assai per Tempo io gionsi al Campo, et ancor che io poco sperassi d' haver commodo audienza da Monsieur d'Arras, stando si sul Marchiare, nondimeno l' hebbi con la Gratia di nostro Signore Iddio, assai commoda e grata, e fui gratiosamente visto da Signoria alla quale feci intendere tutto quello, che mi era stato commesso da Monsieur Illustrissimo. La Risposta fù che l' Imperatore havevo molto a cuore queste cose della Religione, e che non haverebbe mai mancato d' aiutare questa sant' impresa come ha sempre atto in simili occasioni con pericoli fin della Vita, ma che quanto all' opportunità del tempo, la quale era stata il principio e fundamento del mio Ragionamento, a lui pareva, che si fosse caminato alquanto prosperamente, non si sapendo altro dopo la venuta del Rè d' Inghilterra, che la Celebration' e solennità del matrimonio, e che pur sarebbe stato a proposito, innanzi che s' andasse più oltre, veder che camino pigliavano le cose del Regno, e che dovendosi dar conto a sua Majestà di quello, perche io ero stato mandato, esso giudicava necessario che si fosse venuto più al particolare circa due cose, la forma delle facultà d' intorno questi beni (che gran differenza sarebbe se fosse stata commessa la cosa o al S. Cardinale, o alli Serenissimi Principi) e poi il modo che volea tener sua Sig. Reverendissima circa questo assetto, e qui esso tocco che fosse stato bene vedere la Copia delle Faculta. A la cosa del tempo io risposi che per questa opera era sempre maturo, immò che non se ne doveua perdere momento per il pericolo dell' anime, oltre che dovendosi dar principio a quest' impresa col far capace ogn' uno di quello, che veramente fosse il ben suo, e persuaderlo ad abbracciarlo, il qual' Officio spetta principalmente al Signior Legato, non si vede che a far questo il tempo non sia sempre maturo, soggiogendo che S. Majestà non dovrebbe mai lasciar passar l' occasione di questa venuta del Principe suo figliuolo in dar compimento a questa riduzione, percio che facendosi hora, l' honor di questa impresa sarebbe stato attribuito a lui. Quanto al particolare delle facultà, dissi che havendo detto a S. Signoria che questo assetto era stato commessa all' arbitrio di S. Signoria Illustrissima mi pareva d' haver soddisfatto assai, e che del modo del procedere ella non era ancora risoluto, non si potendo pigliare in una cosa tale alcuna resolutione se non sul fatto, e dopo che ella fosse stata presente, per la necessaria informazione di molte cose che corrono in questa materia, circa la quale toccai alcuni altri punti, che S. Signoria Reverendissima intenderà più lungamente alla mia venuta. La conclusione fù che esso non mancherebbe d' informar sua Majestà del tutto, e per far ogni buon officio in questo, e qui mi disse dell' animo che haveva sempre havuto d' aiutar queste cose della Religione, e del desiderio che teneva di servir sempre S. S. Illustrissima ringratiandola che l' adoperasse io. Circa l' aspettar la risposta di S. Majestà mi disse che non potendo esso far' all' hora questo officio per la partita del campo, io me ne venissi a Valentiana, dove havuta la resolutione da S. Majestà mi farebbe chiamarè: e che non mi pigliassi altro affanno di questa, e così me non son venuto quà con questo disegno, di dar tempo tutto dimane a S. Signoria di far quest' officio, e posdimane non essendo chiamato ritornarmene a sollicitare l' espeditione. Io ho voluto dar questo conto di quello che fin' hora e passato acciò che non ritornando io, a quel tempo che fossi stato aspettato, non si stesse in qualche sospension d' animo. Sua Majestà sta gagliarda, e cavalca, e va personalmente vedendo l' essercito, e le cose come passano, il qual' essercito hoggi innanzi mezzo giorno e partito da Dolci quattro leghe lontano di quà, ed e andato ad un altro viaggio chiamato lieu S. Amando lontano da quello una legha, e più vicino al campo Francese, il quale questa mattina e partito da Crevacore e venuto una legha più in quà. Bascio la mano a Mons. Illustrissimo e mi raccomando a V. S. da Valentiano. L'ultimo di Luglio 1554.

The Letter that the Bishop of Arras wrote to Cardinal Pole upon that Audience.

Al Card. Polo.

ILL. E REV. SIG. MIO OSS' MO.—Trovomi con due Lettere di V. S. Illustrissima nella prima delle quali elle si rallegra della felice arrivata del Principe N. S. adesso Rè d' Inghilterra in quel Regno, e del consumato Matrimonio la Lettera del medesimo per S. Majestà Cesarea ho data io medesimo, alla quale e piaciuto sommamente l' officio tanto amorevolmente da V. S. Illustrissima: di poi arrivò assai presto il suo Auditore portator di questa, venuto da Roma, dal quale ho inteso quanto V. S. Reverendissima li haveva commesso di riferirmi sopra le Lettere Credentiali, che egli mi ha portato, di che tutto ho fatto relatione a S. Majestà Cesarea, la quale mi ha comandata risponderle quello che esso suo Auditore le potrà riferire, non giudicando S. Maestà conveniente, che V. S. Reverendissima pigli il camino d' Inghilterra fin tanto, che consultato il tutto con quelli Serenissimi Re, come fa con un corriero expresso partito hoggi, s' intenda da loro il stato presente delle cose di la e quello che conforme a questo quel Regno potrà al presente comportare, accio che inteso il tutto S. Maestà possa meglio risolversi alla risposta che ella haverà a dare a V. S. Reverendissima su quella che di sua parte ha proposto il detto suo Auditore: non dubitando punto che come suo Maestà e V. S. Illustrissima hanno il zelo, che esse ed ambidoi i Rè hanno alle cose delle Religione, che terranno per certo, che non lascieranno preterir punto di quello che convenghi al rimedio d' esse nel punto Regno; caminandovi contal moderazione, che in luogo di farvi del bene, non si troncasesse per sempre il camiuo al remedio. E senza più a V. S. Illustrissima bacio humilmente la mano. Dall' exercito Cesarea appresso Buchain li iij d' Agosto 1554.

Cardinal Pole's Answer to the Bishop of Arras his Letter.

A Monsr. d' Arras.

MOLTO ILL. REV. SIG.—Dalla Lettera di V. S. e dalla relatione del mio Auditore ho inteso quanto e piaciuto a sua Maestà farmi per hora sapere della mente sua, intorna il negotio della mia legatione in Inghilterra, riservandosi a darmene maggior resolutione, quando haverà inteso da quelli Serenissimi Principi il presente stato delle cose di la, perliche haveva spedito subito un corriero; lo mio sono molto rallegrato, vedendo che in mezzo di la, perliche urgenti negotii della guerra S. Maestà habbia havuto tanta cura e sollicitudine di questa causa di Dio, la quale quando sia ben conclusa, non dubito le porterà seco ogni buon successio in tutto il resto; starò a spettando quello che piacerà a S. Maestà di farmi sapere, poiche haverà havuto risposta d' Inghilterra, ne altramente pensai prima mi convenisse fare. Ed in questo mezo pregarò la bontà d' Iddio, che cossi faccia ben intendere a tutto il corpo di quel Regno questo tempo, nel quale sua Divina Maestà lo visita con la gratia sua, come son certo intendino benissimo i capi loro, accio che non si habbita a dir contra di essi, miluus cognovit tempus suum, populus autem hic non cognovit tempus visitationis sue, ma havendo Iddio data gratia e quei Catholici Principi, a i quali tocca far' intendere ed eseguir' a gli altri, quello che in questa causa con l'honor di S. Maestà farà di salute, ed universal beneficio di tutti, spero che le Maestà loro non siano per mancare di far' in ciò quello, ch' ogn' uno aspetta dalla pietà loro, essendo massimamente eccitati, et aiutati, ed in ciò dall' authoritè e prudentia di sua Maestà Cesarea: havendo inteso che a V. S. faria stato di satisfatione veder copia del Breve della facultà concessami da N. Sr. circa la dispositione di i beni ecclesiastici, io glie la mando con questa, pregandola sia contenta farmi intendere dalla ricevuta, e molto la ringratio dell' amorevolezza sua verso di me, e della cortesia usata al detto mio Auditore. SERENISSIME REX,—Cum maximè antea lætatus essem, cognito ex fama ipsa, et litteris meorum optatissimo Majestis tuæ in Angliam adventu, et fœlicissimis nuptiis, quæ cum Serenissima Regina nostra summo omnium gaudio et gratulatione celebratæ sunt: tamen hanc meam lætitiarum magnoperè cumularunt Serenitatis tuæ litteræ a Domino Comite de Horne, cum is in castris apud Majestem Cæsaream remansisset, heri missæ ad me per nobilem Virum D. de Sto. NUMBER XXVIII.

A Letter of Cardinal Pole's to the Pope, giving an Account of a Conference that he had with Charles the Vth, concerning the Church Lands.

BEATISSIME PATER,—E molto tempo che non havendo cosa d' importanza, non ho scritto a V. Santità per non molestarle: facendole col mezo del mio Agente intendere tutto quello che occorreva; e benchè hora jo non habbia da dirle quanto desiderarei, nondimeno mi e parso conveniente scriverle, e darle conto del raggiamto prima havuta con Monsieur d' Arras e poi di quel che ho negotiato con sua Maestà. Mons. d' Arras alli ex che fu il giorno istesso che sua Maestà torno, essndomi venuto a visitare, trovandosi all hora meco Monsieur il Nuncio, mi disse, che sua Maestà havea veduta la Lettera che io mandai ultimamente per l' auditor mio, e che ella era benissimo disposta verso questo negotio della Religione in Inghilterra come si conveniva e si poteva credere per la sua Pietat, ed anche per l' interesse, che ne sequeria de quel Regno e de questi Paesi per la congiuntione che e tra loro. Si che quanto a questa parte di disporre sua Maestà non accader far altro. Ma che era ben necessario, che io venissi a particolari, ed atrattar de gli impedimenti, e della via di rimoverli: Sopra che sua Maesta mi udiva molto volentieri, jo risposi che veramente non era da dubitare del buono e pronto animo di sua Maesta, e che io ni era stato sempre persuassissimo. Na che quanto pertineva all'ufficio mio per esser io stato mandato da V. Santita per far intendere l'ottima sua mente verso la salute di quello Regno, e la prontezza di porgere tutti quei remedii che dall' autorita sua potesser venire; a me non toccava far altro, che procurar d'haver l'adito: E che ad esse Principi, quali sono sul fatto, e hanno il governo in mano, le apparteneva, far intendere gli impedimenti, che fussero in contrario: E tornando pur esso Monsieur d'Arras che bisognava che io descendessi alli particolari, io replicai che in questa causa non conveniva in modo alcuno che si procedesse come si era fatto in quella della pace; nella quale ciascuna delle parti stava sopra di se non volendosi scoprire, ma solo cercando di scoprirne, l'altra, per rispetto de gli interesse particolari; perciò che questa e una causa commune e nella quale V. Santita e sua Maesta Cesarea, e quei Principi hanno il medesimo fine, e noi ancora come ministri. Confermo cio esser vero quanto al tratar della pace, con dire in effetto in tratar del negotio della pace io mi armo tutto. Ma pur tuttavia tornava a dire, che io dovessi pensare e ragionar in particolare, con sua Maesta di quest' impedimenti. E Monsieur il Nuncio al hora voltatosi a me disse, che in effetto era bisogno venire a questi particolari: E cosi al sine restammo che ognuno ci pensasse sopra.

Alli xi poi nell' andar da S. Majesta, Monsieur d'Arras torna a replicarmi il medesimo; nell' audientia di S. Maesta, nella quale si trovo presente Monsieur il Nuncio, e Monsieur d'Arras, poiche mi fui relegato con sua Maesta, che havendo liberato questi suoi paesi della Molestie della Guerre, doppo tanti travagli e d' animo e di corpo fusse tornato piu gagliarda e meglio disposita che quando si parti; in che si videva che il Signior Iddio haveva preservata e preservata, a maggior cose in honor di S. Divina Maesta a beneficio commune. Sua Maesta confermo sentersi assai bene, e disse dele indispositione che haveva havuta in Arras e altre cose in simil proposito: Entrai poi a dire della Lettera, che io haveva scritta a S. Maesta della risposta che Monsieur d'Arras mi haveva fatta, che era stata di rimettersi al breve. Retorno di sua Maesta qui e dissi che se havessi a tratter questo negotio con altro Principe, della Pietà del quale non fussi tanto persuaso, quanto io sono certo di quella di sua Maesta dimostrata da lei con tanti segni, e nella vita sua privata, e nell' attioni publiche, cercarei de essortarlo per tante vie quante si potria ad abbracciar, e favorir questa cosi santa causa. Ma che non essendo bisogno fare questo con S. Maesta, e tanto piu per esser in questa causa con honor d' Iddio, congiunto anco il beneficio di S. Maesta e del Serenissimo Re suo figliuolo, solo aspettava da lei ogni ajuto per remover gli impedimenti, che soffero in questo negotio: I quali per quanto io poteva considerare sono di duo sorti: Uno pertinente alla Doctrina Catolica, nella quale non poteva esser in alcun modo indulgente, per esser cosa pertinente alla fide ne poteva sanar altrimenti questo male, che con introdurre de nuovo la buona Doctrina. L' altro impediment essendo de i beni, gli usurpatori di quale, sapendo la severita delle Leggi Ecclesiastiche, temevano per questa causa di ritornar al Obedienza della Chiesa disse dissi che in questa parte V. Santita poteva, et era disposta ad usar la sua benignita et indulgenza: E primo quanto alle Censure e pene incorse, ed alle Restitutione de frutti percetti, che era di grand' importanza, V. Santita haveva animo nell' una nell' altra di questo due cose d' usar ogni indulgenza, rimitendo liberamento il tutto: Ne pensava d' applicar parte alcuna de detti beni a se, ne alla Sede Apostolica, come multi temevano: benche di Raggione lo potesse fare, per le ingiurie e danni ricevuti; ma che voleva convertir il tutto in sevitio d' Iddio, ed a Beneficio del Regno, senza haver pur una minima consideratione del suo privato interesse: E confidandosi nella Pietà di quei Principi, voleva far loro quest' Honore di far per mezzo del suo Legato, quelle gratie che paressero convenienti secondo la proposta ed intercessione delle loro Maesta, a quelle Persone che esse giudicassero degne d' essere gratificate, ed atte ad ajutar la Causa della Religione. Sua Maesta respondendo ringratia prima molto V. Santita mostrando di conoscere la sua bona mente, e con dire, che ella in vero haveva fatto assai: Poi disse che per gli impedimenti ed occupazioni della guerra, non haveva potuto attendere a questo negotio, come faria stato ij suo desiderio: Ma che hora gli attenderia; e che haveva gia scritto e mandato Inghilterra, per intendere meglio in questa parte il stato delle cose, ed aspettava in breve risposta: E che bisognava ben considerare fin dove si potesse andare nel rimover questo impedimento d' beni; il quali esso per l'esperienza che haveva havuto in Germania, conosceva esser il principale. Perchioche quanto alla Doctrina, disse, che poco se ne curavano questo tali, non credendo ne all' una ne all' altra via: Disse anche che essendo stati questi beni dedicati a Dio, non era da concedere cosi ogni cosa, a quelli che li tenevano: E che se bene a lei io dicessi fin dove s'estendesse la mia facultà, non pero si haveva da far intendere il tutto ad altri: E che sarà bisogno veder il breve della facultà, per ampliarle dove fusse necessario: Alche io risposi haverlo gia fatto vedere a Monsieur d' Arras, il quale non disse altra: E dubitando io che questa non fusse via di maggior dilazione dissi a S. Maesta, che devendosi come io intendeva e come S. Maesta doveva saper meglio, fare in breve il Parlamento, era d' avvertire grandemente, che non si facesse senza Conclusione nella causa dell' obediencia della Chiesa; che quando altrimenti si facesse, sarebbe d' un grandissimo scandalo a tutto il Mondo, e danno alla detta causa: E che se bene la Regina a fare un cosi grande atto, haveva giudicato haver bisogno della congiunzione del Re suo Marito, come che non esse bonum Mulierem esse solum, se hora che Iddio ha prosperito e condotto al fine questa santa congiunzione, si differisse piu l' essecutione di questo effetto, che dove esser il Principio ed il Fundamento di tutte le loro Regie attioni, non restarebbe via di satisfar a Dio, ne a gli Huomini: E dicendo S. Maesta che bisognava anco haver grand rispetto alla mala Dispositione de gli interessati, e quanto universalmente sia abborrito questo nome d' obediencia della Chiesa, e questo cappel rosso, e l' habito ancora de i Religiosi. Voltatosi all' hora a Monsieur Nuncio e in tel proposito parlando de frati condotti di Spagna dal Re suo figliuolo, che fu consigliato far loro mutar l' habito, se bene cio non si feci, ne si conveniva fare: con dire anco di quanto importanza fusse il tumulto del Popolo, ed in tal proposito toccando anche de i mali officij, che non cessavano di fare per ogni via i nemici esterni. Io risposi che volendo aspettare che tutti da se si disponessero, e che cessasse ogni impedimento, saria un non venir mai a fine, perchioche, gli interessati massimamente, altro non vorriano se non che si continuasse nel presente stato, con tenere et godere esse, tutto quello che hanno. In fine fu concluso che si aspettasse la riposta d' Inghilterra, col ritorno del Secretario Eras, che saria fra pochi di, e che in questo mezzo io pensassi, e conferissi di quelle cose con Monsieur d'Arras. V. Beatitudine puo con la sua prudenza vedere in che stato si trovi questa causa; e come sarà necessario, che qui si trattino le difficulta sopra questa beni; e per non tediaria con maggior lunghezza, quel di piu che mi occurreria dirle V. Santita si degnira intendere dall' Agente mio, alla quale con la debita reverenza bacio i santissimi piedi preghando il Sig. Iddio, che la conservi longamente a Servizio della sua Chiesa. Di Bruxelles alli 13 d'October, 1554.

NUMBER XXIX.

A Part of Mason's Letter to Queen Mary, concerning Cardinal Pole.

CARDINAL POOLE having been sent to these quarters for two purposes, th'one for the meanning of a cyvill peas between the French king and the emperor, and the other for the helping to conclude a spirituall peas, as he termeth yt, in the realme of England: perceyving neither of them both to come to such a pass as his good mynde doth desyre, dothe begynne, as me semeth, to be owte of comfort: and being in manner clerely in dispayre of th'one, yf he receive not shortlye some likeliadde of the other, being very of so much tyme spent wythout frute, begynneth in that case to talk of his return to Italy. If he return without the seing of his cuntry, lyke as he shall retourne a sorrowful man, so shall the realme have lost the fruition of such a one, as for his wysdome, joynd with learning, vertue, and godlynes, all the world seeketh and adoureth. In whom it is to bee thought, that God hath chosen a speciall place of habitation. Such is his conversation, adorned with infinite godly qualities above the ordinary sorte of men. And whosoever within the realme lyketh him worst, I wold he might have with him the talke of one half howre: it were a right stony harte, that in a small tyme he could not soften. If it be his fortune to depart, without shewing the experience herof in the realme, his going away shall be, in myne opinion, like the storrye of the gospell, of such as dwelt in regione Geresenorum, who uppon a fonde feare, desyred Christe, offering himself unto them, "ut discedere a finibus illorum."

Thus, most humbly desyryng your grace to pardone my bolde and presumptious meddling in matters passing my capacitye. I commit the same to the tuicion of Almighty Godde.

Your Grace's most humble, faithful, and obedient subject,

JOHN MASON.

NUMBER XXX.

A Letter of Cardinal Pole's to Philip the IIId, complaining of the Delays that had been made, and desiring a speedy admittance into England.

SERENISSIME REX,—Jam Annus est, cum istius Regiæ domus fores pulsare cæpi, nedum quisquam eas mihi aperuirit. Tu vero, Rex, si quæras, ut solent qui suas fores pulsare audiunt, quisnam pulset? Atque ego hoc tantum respondeam, me esse qui, ne meo assensu Regia ista domus ei clauderetur, quæ tecum simul eam nunc tenet, passus sum me Domo et Patria expelli, et exilium viginti annorum hac de causa per tuli. An si hoc dicam, non vel uno hoc nomine dignus videar, cui et in Patriam reditus, et ad vos aditus detur? At ego, nec meo nomine, nec privatam Personam gerens pulso, aut quidquam postulo, sed ejus nomine ejusque personam referens, qui Summi Regis et Pastoris Hominum in Terris vicem gerit. Hic est Petri Successor; atque adeo ut non minus verè dicam, ipse Petrus, cujus Authoritas et Potestas, cum antea in isto Regno maximè vigeret ac floreret, postquam non passa est jus Regiæ domus ei adimi, quæ nunc eam possidet, ex eo per summam injuriam est ejecta. Is Regias per me fores jampridem pulsat, et tamen quæ reliquis omnibus patent ei uni nondum aperiuntur. Quid ita ejus ne pulsantis sonum an vocantis vocem non audierunt, qui intus sunt? Audierunt sane, et quidem non minore cum admiratione Divinæ Potentiæ et Benignitatis erga Ecclesiam, quam olim Maria illa affecta fuerit, cum ut est in Actis Apostolorum, Rhode ancilla ei nunciasset Petrum quem Rex in vincula conjecerat, ut mox necaret, et pro quo Ecclesia assidue precabatur è carcere liberatum ante ostium pulsantem stare. Ut enim hoc ei cæterisque qui cum illa erant magnam attulit admirationem, ita nunc qui norunt eos qui Petri Authoritatem Potestatemque; in isto Regno retinendam esse contendebant, in vincula Herodiano Imperio coniectos, et crudelissime interfectos fuisse, quin etiam Successorum Petri nomina è libris omnibus sublata in quibus preces Ecclesiæ pro eorum incoluntate ac salute continebantur, qui inquam hæc norunt, facta ad omnem Memoriam Petri Autoritatis à Christo traditæ penitus ex Animis Hominum delendam, qui fieri potest ut non maximè admirentur hoc Divinæ Benignitatis et Potentiæ pignus ac testimonium: Petrum nunc quasi iterum è carcere Herodis liberatum, ad Regiæ domus fores unde hæc omnia iniquissima in eum edicta emanarunt, pulsantem stare, et cum hoc maximè mirandum est, tum illud non minus mirum, Maria Regina domum hanc teneri: Sed cur illa tamdiu foras aperire distulit. De ancilla quidem illud Mariæ Scriptum est, eam Petri Voce audita præ nimio gaudio suæ quasi oblitam, de aperiendo non cogitasse: Remprius, ut Mariæ aliis; qui cum ea erant nunciaret, accurrisset, qui cum primo an ita esset dubitasset, mox cum Petrus pulsare pergeret aperierunt, neque illum domo recipere senti veriti, etsi maximam timendi causam habebant, Herode ipso vivo et regnante. Hic vero quid dicam de Maria Regina, gaudeo ne eam an timore esse prohibitam quominus aperuerit; presertim cum ipsa Petri Vocem audierit, cum certo sciat eum ad domus suæ januam jamdiu pulsantem stare: Cum admirabilem Dei in hac re potentiam agnoscat, qui non per Angelum, ut tunc Petrum è carcere Herodis, sed sua manu eduxit, dejecta porta ferrea quæ viam ad Regiam ejus domum intercludebat: Scio equidem illam gaudere, scio etiam vero timere; neque enim nisi timeret tam diu distulisset. Verum si Petri liberatione gaudet, si rei miraculum agnoscit, quid impedimento fuit quo minus ei ad januam lætunda occurrerit, eumque meritas Deo gratias agens introduxerit. Herode presertim mortuo, omnique ejus imperio ad eam delato? An fortassis Divina Providentia quæ te dilectum Petri Filium et ei Virum destinavit, illum timore aliquo tantisper affici permisit, dum venisses, ut utriusque ad rem tam præclaram et salutarem agenda, opera atque officium conjungeretur: Equidem sic antea hunc Mariæ Regiæ conjungis tuæ timorem, quod etiam ad eam Scripsi sum interpretatus: Ac propterea ad te nunc, Virum ejus, Virum Religionisissimum, scribo, et abs te ipsius Petri Christi Vicarii nomine postulo, ut illi omnes timoris causas prorsus excutias: Habes vero expeditissimam excutiendi rationem, si consideres eique proponas, quam indignum sit si dum te illa Corporis sui sponsum accerserit, cum non deessent quæ timenda viderentur, tamen omnem timorem sola vicerit, nunc te tanto Principi illi conjuncto, timore prohiberi quominus aditum ad se aperiat sponsæ animæ suæ, mecum una et cum Petro tamdiu ad fores expectantis: qui presertim tot et tam miris modis custodem ejus se, defensoremque; esse declaravit. Noli enim, Rex, putare, me aut solum ad vestram Regiam domum, aut uno tantum Petro committatum venisse; cujus rei hoc quidem tibi certum Argumentum esse potest, quod tamdiu persevero pulsans:

Nam sive ego solus venissem, solus jampridem abiissem, querens et expostulans quæ aliis omnibus pateant, mihi uni oclusas esse fores; sive una mecum solus Petrus, jampridem is quoque discessisset, meque secum abduxisset, pulvere pedum excusso, quod ei preceptum fuit a Domino ut faceret quotiescunque ejus nomine aliquo accedens non admitteretur. Cum vero nihil ego, quod ad me quidem attinet conquerens, perseverem, cum Petrus pulsare non desistat, utrumque scito ab ipso Christo retineri, ut sibi sponso animæ utriusque vestrum aditus ad vos patefiat. Neque enim unquam verebor dicere, Christum in hac Legatione, qua pro ejus Vicario fungor, mecum adesse: Quamdiu quidem mihi conscius ero me nihil meum, me non vestra, sed vos ipsos toto animo omnique studio quærere. Tu vero, Princeps Catholicæ, cui nunc Divina Providentia et Benignitate additum est alterum hoc præclarum Fidei Defensoris cognomen, quo Reges Angliæ Apostolica Petri Autoritate sunt aucti atque ornati, tecum nunc considera quam id tuæ Pietati conveniat, cum omnibus omnium Principum ad te Legatis aditus patuerit, ut tibi de hoc ipso cognomine adepto gratularentur, solum Successoris Petri qui hoc dedit, Legatum, qui propterea missus est ut te in solio Regni Divina summi omnium Regis quam affert pace et gratia, confirmet, non admitti? An si quidquam hic ad timorem proponitur, quominus eum admittis non multo magis Christi hac in re metuanda esset offensio, quod ejus Legatus qui omnium primus audiri debuit, tamdiu fores expectet, cum cæteri Homines qui multo post venerunt, nulla interposita mora, introducti auditique; sint et honorifice dimissi. At hic conqueri incipio; conqueror quidem, sed idcirco conqueror, ne justam tuæ Majestati causam de me conquerendi præberem, quam sane præberem, si cum periculi, quod ex hac cunctatione admittendi Legati à Christi Vicario missi, nobis vestroque Regno impendit, Reginam sæpe admonuerim, nihil de ea re ad Majestatem tuam scriberem; quod officium cum tibi à me pro eo quo fungor munere maximè debeatur, id me satis persolutorum esse arbitror, si his Literis ostendero quantum periculi ei imminet, cui illud vere dici potest, distulisti Christum tuum. Is autem Christum differt, qui Legatum missum, ab ejus Vicario, ad requirendam Obedientiam Ecclesiæ, ipsi Christo debitam, ex quo nostra omnium pendet salus, non statim admittit. Differs vero, tu Princeps, si cum accertitus fueris, ut pro munere Regio viam ad hanc Divinam Obedientiam in tuo isto Regno restituendam munias, ipse alia agas.

The Lord Pagel's and the Lord Hastings's Letter concerning Cardinal Pole.—An Original.

[Paper Office.]

It maie please your most excellent majesty to be advertised, that arriving here upon Sunday last in the forenoone, we had audience of the emperor's majesty in the afternoone, notwithstanding that the same had that daie received the blessed Sacrament, wherby we noted a great care in him, for the expedicion of us hence again: after dew commendation made unto him by us, on your majestie's behalfe, and the causes of our comyng declared unto him with suche circumstances, as by the tenure of our instructions, we have in charge to open unto him, he rejoiced verey much to here the same; and first giving unto you both most hartly thanks for your commendations, and then inquiring very diligently of your good prosperities and wellfares, and specially (madame) of the state of your majestie's persone, he roused himself with a merry chere, and said, that among many great benefits, for the which he thought himself most bounden unto God, this was one of the greatest, that it had pleased him to hold his blessed hand over that realme; and so taking occasion to reherse in what good estate, and great reputation, he knew the realme of England had bene in the beginning; and afterward in to what calamities the same fell into, much (he said) to his regret; he gave God thanks, not only for the great miracles which he had shewed upon your majesty to make you his apt minister for the restoring of that kingdome to the auncient dignitie, welth, and renowne, but also for that it hath pleased him to give you so sone, so certaine a hope of succession; wherof like as he hath cause for his parte (he said), to rejoyce and take great comforte, so hath all England greater cause to think themselves most bounden unto God, to please him, and to serve him for the same: these tydings, he said, of the state of your majestie's person (madame) with the reoport that we had made unto him of the great conformite, and hole consent of the noble men, and others in their proceedings before your majesties, touching the receiving of my lord cardinal into England, and their earnest submissions to the obedience, and union of the catholique church, were so pleasant unto him as if he had bene half deade, yet they shuld have been ynoughe to have revived him again. These and many other suche like wordes he used to declare the joy, and contentment of his minde, for the good successe of this matter. In the mayning wherof there, if any thing (said he) shuld fortune, wherin his advise might be thought requisite, your majesties shuld not onley find the same ready, but also in any other thing that laie in him, which might serve to your honors, and the benefite of the realme: to this when we for our parts had joined such talk, as to this purpose semed to our poor witts convenient, declaring your godly dispositions in this mater, how much you reposed your self upon his great wisdom and experience; what confidence you had in his fatherly love, and friendly affections towards your majesties, and the benefite of your realms: we toke our leaves of his majesty, and repaired furthwith unto my lord cardinal, whose gladnes of our comyng we shall not need with many words to declare unto your majesty; nor yet what speech he used to set furth, how much he was bounden unto your majesties for your gracious dispositions towards him, and how much both you and he were bounden to Almighty God, for the bending of your harts this waies, for your majesties shall and maie perceive the same more plainly by himself at his comyng unto your presence. This under your majestie's corrections we maie be bold to write unto you, that we believe verely that whensoever he shall be in England, the same shall fare the better for him, for he is the man of God, full of all godlines and vertue, ready to humble himself to all facions that may do good; and therefore he is contented, not only to come into England in such sort as your majesties have appointed, not as a legate, but as a cardinal, and ambassador to your majesties, but in any other sort whatsoever it be, that your majesties will apoint; he assuring your majesties, that touching the matter of possessions, all things shall come to passe, on the pope's behalfe, in such sort as every man there shall have cause to be contented. Yesterday night he toke his leave of the emperor, and so did we also. This daie he repairerth onwards his journey, to an abbaye two miles hence, whither he hath used much to resorte, the tyme of his abode here. To-morrow at night to Dendermount; Thursday to Gawnt; Friday to Bruges; Saturday to Newport; Sunday to Dunkirke; Monday to Calice (for his weake body can make no great journies); and his estate also is to be considered. In this journey we shall not faile to do him all the honour and service we can, aswell for that we take it to be our special charge, as for that also his great vertues have wonne us, and bind us to the same: we have written now, besides our speaking at our passing by, to the lord depute of Calice, for all things to be in a redines for his transportation; so as we trust we shall not have occasion to tarry long there. And thus we beseeche Almighty God to preserve both your majesties long, and long to live together to your own good contentments, and to the great comfort and benefit of us your poor subjects. From Bruxells the 13th of November in the morning, 1554.

Your majesties most humble, faithful, and obedient servants,

An Original Letter of Mason's, of a Preacher that pressed the Restitution of Church-Lands.

[Paper-Office.]

AFTER most hartie commendations, I have sent to my lords at this present the emperor's commissaries answer made at the diet, to a letter lately sent from the French king to the said diet, of the circulls of Germanye assembled at Francfort. And forasmuche as yt chanced me, at the closing up of my letre, to have the sight of an other answer made to the saied letre, by some bearing good will to the emperor's affaires, I thought good to coppinge it, and to send it unto you; albeit by the reading therof, yt may appere yt was made by some man rather to assaye his witte, and to declare his affection, then of intent to answer perticularly the matier. It was this morning told me by one of the emperor's counsell, who misliked muche the matier, that a preacher of ours, whose name he rehersed, betithe the pulpet jolyly in England, for the restitution of abbaye lands. If it be so meant by the prince, and be thought convenient so to be, then doth he his duetie; but yf contrarely, yt be neither meant nor thought convenient, it is a strange thing in a well-ordered commonwelth, that a subject shall be so hardie to crye unto the people openly such learning, as wherby ycar winter works maye in the somer be attempted with some storme. And wer the thing fitt to be talked of, yet were the princes and the counsell, who might remedy it, meter to be spoken with therin then the multitude, who therby may receive an yll impression, and an occasion of lewd thinking, and lewde talking, and lewd doing also, if it may lye in their powers; and that is all, that of sowing thies maters amongs them can ensue. These unbridled preachings were so much to be misliked in the yll-governed tyme, as good men trusted, in this good governance, it should have been amended. And so maye it be, when it shall please my lords of the counsell as diligently to consider it, as it is more then necessarie to be loked unto. The partye, me thinketh, might well be put to silence, if he were asked, How, being a monk, and having professed and vowed solelymply wilfull poverty, he can with conscience keep a deanery and three or four benefices? I heare, by the report of other ambassadors here, of the return of the realme to the unities of Christen church, wherof all good men have much cause to rejoyse. I would have been glad to have been able, at the least, to have confirmed the news by some certaine knowledge: but being the ordinarie of ambassadors of England, to knowe least of all others of the matiers of the realm, I must content my self; trusting that, as I am informed, the ambassador ther hath lost his name: for that it is not thought necessarie the father to have an ambassador to the sonne, so shall with tyme, this office on this side being no more needfull then it is, be discharged also. Or if myne abode shall be longer, then wold I att lesure be a suter to you, to be a mean for besure to come over for three weeks, or a month, to see the king's highnes, and to doe his majesty my duty, and so to return. I mean no haste, but as matter and occasion may serve hereafter. Thus I committ you to the keeping of Almighty God. At Brussels, the 12th day of December, 1554.

Domini Episcopi et officiales præfati, necnon omnes Curati seu alii ad id deputati, habeant Librum in quo nomen et cognomen Parochianorum reconciliatorum inscribantur: et postea sciatur qui fuerint reconciliati et qui non.

Idem Domini Episcopi et Officiales Octava Paschatis clapsa poterint facere visitationem Civitatis primo, deinde Diocesis et se qui non fuerint reconciliati, poterint eos ad se vocare, et cognoscere propter quas ab erroribus suis nolint recedere, et si in eis obstinate perseverarint, tum con' eos procedent.

Quibus Die et loco Productus fuit in Judicium Joannes Hooper Clericus de et super Hæretica pravitate, Publicè et Notoriè infamatus: cui dictus Reverendus Pater palam proposuit, quod cum ipse Superiori Die eoram eodem Hooper. Consilio Dominorum Regis et Reginæ ad hoc specialiter destinatis evocabatur et exhortatus fuerat, ut agnoscens transactæ Vitæ suæ et Perversæ Doctrinæ Errores et Hereses, rediret cum cæteris ad unitatem Ecclesiæ Oblataque fuerat ei sic volenti preteritorum Erroratorum et facinorum suorum condonacio. Ipseque Johannes tunc indurato animo sic redire renuerit. Propterea in Presentiarum in Publicum justitiæ forum ad respondendum Articulis Hæretica pravitate concernen' eoram eodem Reverendo Patre Auctoritate sua Ordinarie sedente evocatus fuit. Offerens preterea Publice tunc et ibidem quod si adhuc se reconciliare vellet, libenter in gremium Sanctæ Matris Ecclesiæ reciperetur. Et ipse Johannes Hooper non solum facere renuit, verum etiam in nonnullas Blasphemias impudenter perripit. Et deinde Dominus Episcopus, &c. inter cæteros complures Articulos, et Capita, hos sequentes eidem Johanni Hooper specialiter objecit.

In Primis, Quod Tu Johannes Hooper, existens Presbyter et Religiosus, Regula à Jure approbata expressè professus, quandam Mulierem de facto, cum de jure non debuisti, in Uxorem, sive Conjugem accepisti; et cum illa, tanquam Uxore et Conjuge tua cohabitasti in nephariis et illicitis cum ea amplexibus cohabitando, Matrimoniumque; pretensa hujusmodi licita, et de jure divino valida fuisse, et esse, tam infra Dioc' Winton', quam alias quamplures Dioc' hujus Regni Angliæ, asseruisti, prædicasti, docuisti, Librisque; editis publicasti et defendisti, et sic asseris et credis in præsentia. Et ministramus conjunctim, et de quolibet.

Ad quem quidem Articulum respondet et fatetur, Se Presbyterum et Religiosum professum, quandam Mulierem in Uxorem legitime accepisse, et cum eadem tanquam cum Uxore legitima cohabitasse: Et quod hujusmodi Matrimonia, in locis prædictis, licita, et de Jure divino valida fuisse, et esse, asseruit, prædicavit, docuit, et Libris editis publicavit et defendit; sicque; asserit, credit, et defendere paratus est in præsentia, ut dicit.

Secundo, Quod Tu Joannes Hooper, in locis prædictis, asseruisti, prædicasti, docuisti, et Libris editis publicasti et defendisti; sicque; credis, tenes, asseris et defendis, Quod propter Culpam Fornicationis, sive Adulterij commissam, Personæ legitime conjugatæ, possunt ex Verbo Dei, ejusque; Auctoritate ac Ministerio ab invicem pro Adulterio à Vinculo Matrimonij separari et divorciari: Sicque; licebit Viro aliam accipere in Uxorem; et Mulieri similiter, alium accipere in Maritum.

Ad quem quidem Articulum respondit affirmativè, Quodque paratus est defendere contenta in eodem, contra omnes Adversarios, esse vera, de Jure divino et humano.

Tertio, Quod Tu, locis prædictis, asseruisti, tenuisti, publicasti, libris editis docuisti et defendisti; sicque credis, asseris, tenes, et defendis in præsentia, Quod in Eucharistia, sive Sacramento Altaris, verum et naturale Christi Corpus, et verus et naturalis Christi Sanguis, sub speciebus Panis et Vini verè non est: Et quod ibi est materialis Panis, et materiale Vinum tantum, absque veritate et præsentia Corporis et Sanguinis Christi.

Ad quem quidem Articulum, sub hoc contemptu verborum, respondit; viz. "That the very natural body of Christ is not really and substantially in the Sacrament of the Altar: saying also, that the mass is the iniquity of the devil; and that the mass is an idol."

Præmissis expeditis, Dominus assignavit eidem Johanni Hooper, ad comperendum in hoc loco crastina die, inter Horas 8m et 9m ante Meridiem, ad vidend' ulteriorem Processum, &c. Quibus Die et Loco, inter Horas assignatas, eoram dicto Reverendo Patre, Winton' Episcopo, &c. assistentibus sibi Reverendis Patribus, &c. in nostra Notariorum prædictorum Præsentia, rursus comperuit dictus Johannes Hooper, quem Dominus Episcopus Wintoniensis, multis rationibus, ad se reconciliandum, suavit et exhortavit: Dictus tamen Johannes Hooper, in Pertinacia et Malicia sua perseverans, perripit in Blasphemias, dicendo etiam publicè, "That matrimony is none of the seven sacraments: and that if it be a sacrament, he can prove seven-score sacraments." Deinde Dominus Episcopus, perspecta ejus pertinaci duritia, tandem tulit contra eum Sententiam definitivam, in Scriptis condemnando eum pro Hæretico et Excommunicato: Et consequenter eum tunc ibidem tradidit Curiæ Seculari, atque; in manus Davidis Woodroff, et Willielmi Chester, Vicecomit' Civitatis Londini; qui eundem Johannem Hooper tunc secum abduxerunt. Super ejus Sententiæ Prolatione et Lectura, idem Reverendus Pater requisivit nos Notarios, &c. ad conficiendum Instrumentum, Testesque; subscript' ad perhibendum Testimonium, &c. Præsentibus tunc ibidem Nobilibus et Egregiis Viris, &c. et aliis quampluribus, in Multitudine copiosa tunc ibidem congregatis, &c.

The Queen's Letter, ordering the Manner of Hooper's Execution.

[Cott. Libr. Cloop. E. 5.]

RIGHT trusty and well-beloved, &c. Whereas John Hooper, who of late was called bushop of Worcester and Gloucester, is, by due order of the lawes ecclesiastique, condemned and judged for a moste obstinate, false, detestable heretique, and committed to our secular power, to be burned according to the holosome and good lawes of our realme in that case provided. Forasmuche as in those cittyes, and the diocese therof, he hath in tymes paste preached and taught most pestilent heresyes and doctryne to our subjects there: we have therefore geven order, that the said Hooper, who yet persisteth obstinate, and hath refused mercy when it was graciously offered, shall be put to execution in the sayd cytie of Gloucester, for the example and terror of suche as he hath there seduced and mistaught, and bycause he hath doone moste harme there. And wolle that you, calling unto you some of reputation dwelling in the shire, such as ye thinke best, shall repayre unto our said cytye, and be at the said execution, assisting our mayor and shrieves of the same cytie, in this behalf. And forasmuche also as the said Hooper is, as heretiques be, a vain-glorious person, and delyteth in his tongue, and having liberty, may use his sayd tongue to perswade such as he hath seduced, to persist in the miserable opinion that he hath sown among them: our pleasure is therefore, and we require you to take order, that the said Hooper be neither, at the tyme of his execution, nor in goyng to the place therof, suffred to speak at large; but thither to be ledde quietly, and in sylence, for eschuyng of further infection, and such inconvenience, as may otherwise ensue in this parte. Whereof fayle not, as ye tender our pleasure.

A true copy of an old paper in my custody, which seems to be the first draught of a letter from the queen to the lord Chandois, &c. who went to see execution done on bishop Hooper.

GRATIAM et Pacem à Domino. Literas tuas, Compater Charissime, datas Tigur' 10 Octobris, 11 Decembris accepi. Fuere mihi per jucundæ, quia plene Consolationis. Ex quibus, Animum, Amorem, et Pietatem tuam erga me pristinam, facili intellexi. Habeo tibi Gratias immortales, quod hisce Temporibus difficillimis, nostri non te caput oblivio: Semper te, ob eximias tuas Virtutes, et præclara Dei in te Dona, præ cæteris amavi. Et quod à me, uti scribis, hactenus per annum integrum nullas acceperis Literas; hoc accedit, non quia non scripserim, sed quas scripseram parum candidis reddendas commisi. Nec omnes quas ad me miseris accepi, sed vel in Curia Tabellarij perire, vel invidia malorum fuerunt interceptæ. Idem accidit et Literis et Libello Domini Theodori. Nam de Concione Domini in monte, quam mihi destinavit, nihil intellexi, usque ad aliquot dies post mortem Sanctissimi Regis nostri Edwardi. Et id quidem in Confinibus Valliæ, in bibliotheca pij cujusdam Viri, quem Ecclesiis quibusdam Decanum constitui. Sed quas nunc scripsisti omnibus Conceptivis meis Fratribus, legendas curabo mitti. Incolunitatem et Constantiam vestræ Ecclesiæ, vobis omnibus gratulor: Et Deum precor, propter Filium suum Jesum Christum, illam, contra Tyrannidem Antichristi semper muniat, ac defendat. Apud nos, in integrum, vulnus quod accepit, sanatum est; et pro Capite Ecclesiæ denuò habetur, qui Membrum Ecclesiæ Christi non est. Ab aliis, Res nostras, et Statum Reipublicæ intelliges. Versamur in maximis periculis, quemadmodum hactenus, jam per sesquiannum fermè. Indies hostes Evangelij magis ac magis negotium facessunt. In carcere æorsim servamur, et omni ignominiarum fastidio afficimur: Mortem quotidie minitantur; quam nihili facimus. Ferrum et flammam, in Christo Jesu, fortiter contemnimus. Scimus cui credimus; et certi sumus, quod animas nostras deposituri sumus bene faciendo. Interim adjuvate nos vestris Precibus, ut qui in nobis bonum opus incepit, perficiat usque in finem. Domini sumus; faciat quod videatur bonum in oculis suis. Rogo, ut subinde digneris Literis tuis Uxorem meam, modestissimam et piam mulierem consolari; et exhortari, ut studiosè Liberos nostros, Rachelem Filiolam tuam, optimæ indolis adolescentulam, ac Filium Danielem piè educat, in Cognitione et Timore Dei. Præterea, tuæ Pietati jam mitto duos Libellos legendos, judicandos, ac corrigendos, si quæ occurrant, Verbo Dei parum Convenientia: Cui Titulum feci, "Hyperæspisium de vera Doctrina et Usu Cœnæ Domini;" quem Senatui Angliæ dedicavi hoc nomine, ut publice, in Curia Parlamenti, adversariis nostris respondeamus. Alteri Titulum feci, "Syntagma, de falsa Religione dignoscenda et fugienda." Et rogo, ut quam citissimè fieri possit, imprimantur. Hic, apud omnes pios et doctos, uterque Liber est approbatus. Scripsi præterea multas Literas alias ad Episcopos, ut Libros in Parlamento promoverent, et illos imprimi etiam cupio, ut omnes intelligant, quam iniquè et injustè nobiscum agitur. Non opus est, ut multa hac de re scribas: Ex ipsis Libellis et Literis, faciliè intelliges quid volo. Et si Froscoverus vester aliis gravioribus Libris impediatur imprimendis; rogo, ut Basileam mittat, ad D. Operinum, qui valdè castè imprimit, et omnia nitidè in lucem emittit. Hoc faciet, scio, modò Libelli tuis Literis ad se veniunt commendati: Quod ut facias, vehementer oro. Nihil est quod mihi metuatis, quasi propter Libellos atrocios et severius hostes Evangelij sævient: Habeo Salutis meæ fidelissimum Custodem, et Propugnatores, Patrem nostrum Celestem, per Christum Jesum, cui meipsum totum commendavi: Illius Fidei ac Tutelæ meipsum commendo; si dies meos elongaverit, faxit, ut sint ad Gloriam Nominis sui; sin huic brevi et flagitiosæ Vitæ finem voluit, æque duco, Fiat Voluntas illius. Quia furtim scribo, breviores et perturbatores Literas tuæ præstantiæ facio, quas boni consule quæso. Raptim ex Carcere xi Decembris 1554. Saluta officiosè castam tuam Conjugem, cum tota tua Familia, domi et foris, ac alios omnes et nosti.

Tuæ præstantiæ ut debeo Studiosissimus

NUMBER XXXVIII.

A Letter of Mason's, concerning a Treaty began with France, and of the Affairs of the Empire.

AFTER my hearty commendations. Your last was of the xxxiij of the last month, and my last to you wer of the viiij of this present. By these you shall understand that the emperor hath appointed Monsieur de L'Allain, governor of Hennalt; Monsieur de Bonningcourt, governor of Arthoys; the bishop of Arras; the president of the counsel here, named Viglius; and the president of the counsel of Malynes; to resort to Gravelyngh, for the trefyng of a peaxe with soch others as may lyke the Frenche kynge to send to Ardres; wherof the constestable, and the cardinal of Lorraine, he hath already appointed. But by reason of the death of the pope, I thinke the cardinal of Lorraine goeth an other way. In whose place ys to be thought some other shall be appointed, with the others, to answer to the nombre assigned by the emperor. The cardynal and my lord chawncelor came out of hand to Callais to be mediator on the queen's behalf, to bring these prynces, yf their will be, to some composition. O Lorde, assist them so with his grace, as Christendome may have a treatyng tyme. The ivth of this month the king and queen went to Hampton-Court to keep their Easter; whether Easter done they retorne to London, or goo to Wyndesor, the certentye ys not yet known. Bolls of Cambridgeshire, and sir Peter Mewtas, remayne still in prison. The first in the Tower, and thother in the Flete, and lyle words made of them; so yt is thought the suspition was more vehement then founde to be of any grete ground. The dean and prebendaries of Westminster have laidsore lawe to defend th'alteration of the church into an abbay; in which matter Dr. Cole sheweth hymself very stowte, alleging that monks have no institution of Christ, wherein prestis have the advantage of them, &c. What thende will be yt is not known; but yt is feared they shall be put to chose, whether they will depart with their wills, or against their wills.

The emperor hath, by reason of his long unseasonable cold, ben very ill handled of his gowte, wherof he is now indifferently well amended.

The princes of Almayne do moche myslyke the arryving of cardinal Moron at Augusta; for the satisfaction of whom the emperor hath given full auctoryte to the kynge his brother, as so ys the cardinal lyke to retayne, "con la picca in sacco." The duke of Alva ys not yet departed owt of England; neither yet in the way, so far as I can yet here, albeit his baggage and a good number of his company are arrived at Callais. On Tuesday last, the ambassadors, or agents, name them as you will, of Cremona, Novaria, and Lodi, passing between Dover and Callais, hitherword, wer taken by a French shallop; but it is thought they shall shortly be set at libertye, as well for that they were publycke persons, and not subjects to the emperor, as for that they were taken out of an English vessel. Their money and baggage is saved, whatsoever is become of their persons. Thus for lack of other matter I bid you most hartely well to fare. From Bruxells the xivth day of April, 1555.

Your own most assuredly,

JOHN MARONE.

NUMBER XXXIX.

A Translation of Charles the Vth's Letters, resigning the Crown of Spain to King Philip.

[Paper-Office.]

To our counselours, justyces, the nobilyte, curats, knights, and squiers; all kinde of ministers, and offycers; and all other our learn'd men within that our town of Tolledo, greeting. By such letters as I have from time to tyme taken order to be wrytten unto you, since my departing out of the kingdome of Spain, you have fully bene advertised of the successes of myne affayres; and namely how that for religion's sake I enterprised the warre of Almayne, upon the great desire I had, as reason was; and according to my bounden dewty to reduce, and to returne agayne those countreys into the unitye of the church, procuring and seeking by all the means I could, to sett peas and quietnes in all the estates of Christendome, and do what might be done for the assembling and assisting of a general counsaile, bothe for the necessarye reformation of many things; and so draw home also therby, with lesse difficultye, such as had separated themselves, and were swerved from the Catholike faith of Christ. Which my great desyre having brought, by God's goodnes, to a very good point; the French kinge suddenly, without all reasons, or any good foundation, alluring to hisayde the Allmaynes, and making a league with them, agaynst their othes and fydelities, brake with me, and opened the warre agaynst me, bothe by sea and the land. And not satisfied herewith, he procured the coming of the Turques' armye to the notable damage of Christendome; and namely of our estates and seigneuries; wherby I was forced and dryven to bring an armye to my no little trouble, aswell by my great payns taken in myne own persone in the felde, as by my travel otherwise; which thereupon I was constrained to endure, in the treating and maynaying of sundry urgent and great matters daylie and contynually falling out upon the same, which were the greate and in effect the only occasions of the greate and painefull infirmity and indisposition of my body, which I have since had these yeres passed, and yet have, wherby I find my self so encumbered, and so destitute of healtie, that not onely have I been, or am able by myne own persone, to discharge such a travel, and to use such a diligence in resolutions, as was requysite; but have also, which I do confesse, been a lett and an hindrance to sundry things wherof I have had and now have a greate conseyne. And I wold to God I had sooner taken therein such an order as I now am determyned to take: which nevertheles for many considerations I could not well doe, in the absence of the high and mighty prince the king of England and Naples, and my right dear and right well-beloved sonne: for that it was necessary many things to be first communicated unto him, and to be treated with him. And for this purpose, after the marriage put in dew execution with the high and excellent princesse the queen of England, I lastly took order for his coming hither: and within a short tyme after, I took order to resigne, and to renounce unto him, lyke as I have done all those my estates, kingdomes, and seigneuries, of the crown of Castella and Leon, with all their membres and appertennes, in such sorte as more fully and more amply is conteyned in such instruments as I have signed and agreed unto of the date of these presents; trusting that with his greate wysedome and experience, wherof I have hitherto had a right greate prooffe in all such things as have been passed and handled by him for me, and in my name, he will now for himself, and in his own name, govern, order, defend, and mainteyne the same with peas and justice. And not doubting but that according unto your olde and comendable loyaltye, fayth, love, and obedyence, which you have borne, and do beare, both to him and to me; wherof for my parte I have had always large experyence by your deeds, you will serve him and obey him as apperteyneth to my trust and your duties, for the good-will borne to you so many yeeres. Commanding you, nevertheles, and straightly charging you that displaying and setting upp banners, and doing all other ceremonies and solemnities requysite, and which have been accustomed to have been done in like cases, for the dew execution of the purpose above sayed, in the same manner and sorte as yf God had taken me unto his mercy, you doe obey, serve, and honour, from henceforth the saide king, accomplishing his will and pleasure in all such things as he shall by word and writing command you, as you ought to do to your true and natural lord and king; even as you have, and ought to have, during my reigne passed to you from me: wherin besydes that you shall doe your dueties, and do that as you are bound to doe, you shall doe unto me acceptable pleasure. Given at Brussells the 17th of Januarie, 1556.

NUMBER XL.

A Remembrance of those Things that your Highnes's pleasure was I shold put in writing, as most convenient, in my pore judgment, to be commoned and spoken of by your Majestie, with your counsell, called to your presence thys afternoone.

[Written in the hand of Cardinal Pole.—Titus, B. 2, P. 177.]

FIRST of al, that your majestie shold put them yn remembrance of the charge the kyng's highnes gave them at his departure; which beyng reduced to certen articles, and put in writing, it seemeth wel if some of the lords for ther sudden departure after ther charge had not the same in writing, that it were rehersed and given unto them with exhortation to employ al ther diligence for the due execution therof.

And whereas amongst other charges, thys was one, that those that be named in the first parte counsellours, were al to be present in the courte, thys first your highnes may require them that they do observe: specially beside, for the weight of the matters that be now in hand; the tyme besyde being so shorte, after the parliament to examyn them. And that the kyng's plesure ys, as the matters be proposed in the counsell, afore the further execution of them, to be ynformed therof, to knoe his pleasure theryn. And amongst other, hys majestie beyng in expectation to know the utre resolution of the counsell, twichyng those matters that be to be intreatyd in thys parliament. Thys ys that your majestie looketh of them thys day, to send with all spede to the kyng's highnes.

And wheras for the dylation of the kyng's comyng, your majestie thought it well to put in consulte, whether it were better therfor to make a dilation and prorogation of the parliament to Candelmas, beyng thought bey ther opinion, that for necessite of money that is to be demanded in the parliament, and otherwyse can not be provided, the prorogation of that should be much dispendiose. Your majestie not disallowing ther deliberation; but consydering wyth all the great need of money for to be had, for the discharge of the present necessite, which requyreth present provision of money, as is for the settynge forth of the ships, as wel for the emperor's passage to Spain, as for the kyng's return.—And besyde thys, for the payment of that is dew at Calise, as for your credyte wyth the merchants approchyng the day of payment; and for the dett of Ireland also, of al these it may please your majestie to know thys day of your counsell what is don.

And bycause the most ordynarie and just way, touching the provision of money to pay your highnes' detts, is to call in your own detts; which charge hath been specially committed afore, and is principally considered and renewed in the writing the kyng's highnes left tuchyng such affayres, that his counsell shold presently attend into, wher be ther names also that same: the charges speciall therfore, your majestie shall do wel this day to charge them with the same; that with all diligence they attend to the prosecution therof, givynge them all autoryte that shal be necessary for them, to make the most spedy expedition theryn. Wylling them withall, that they never let pass one week, but in the end of the same, at the least, your majestie may know specially of that is coming yn, and that order is taken for the rest.

Also yf it pleasyd your majestie in general, for all matters whych be intreated in the counsell, which requyre commission and execution, to give thys order, that those that have had commission to execute any matter, let never passe the weke, but they ynforme the counsell what execution is made of ther commysions: and that the counsell themselves should never begyn entretance of new matters the second week; but that they have information first, what is done in those which wer commytted to be executyd the week afore; I think it should help much to the spedy expedition of all causes. Thys ys my poore advyse, remitted al to the godly and prudent judgment of your majestie.

A Letter to the Ambassadors concerning the Restitution of Calais.

[Paper-Office.]

AFTER our right hartly commendations to your good lordships, by our last letters of the 4th of this month, we signified unto you our well lykynge of your opinions, to have the matter touching Calleys moved in the parliament: and that we being also of the same mynde our selfs, ment to propose the case there with all the expedition we might, and to make you answer of that sholde be farther resolved therein, as shortly as we could. Since which tyme, upon consultation had amongst our selfs, how the matter shold best be opened and used there: and being of opinion, as we have byn from the begynning, that it were not convenient to have the same broken to the hole house, but only to the nobilitie, and some other of the best and gravest sort; we thought it also necessarie, before we proceeded any farther, both to declare our opinions unto the Queen's majestie, and to understande her highness's good pleasure and resolution therein. Whose majestie, upon the opening thereof unto her, thought mete for good respects, we sholde fyrst write unto the King's highnes to such effect, as by the coppie of our letters presently addressed to his majestie, for that purpose (which you shall receive herewith), you may at better length perceyve; and then understanding his highnes' answer, sholde either goe forwarde with our former deliberacion, or otherwise use the matter, as we sholde see cause. Wherefore, lyke as we have thought good to give your lordships knowledge by these, so when we shall have receyved the King's majesties answer herein, we will not fayle to signify unto you with diligence, what shall be farther resolved touching this matter. And in the mean tyme, we byd your good lordships right hartely well to fare.

The Queen's majestie remaineth yet still both sicke and very weak; and although we hope of her highnesses amendment, for the which we daylye praye, yet are we dryven both to feare and mistrust the worst; which we besече Almighty God to remedye, when it shall lyke hym.

After that we had written the letters inclosed to the King's majestie, we receyved yours of the 4th of this instant; by the which we do understande, that the French commissioners contynue still of the same mind that they were at your meeting with them, not to leave the possession of Callais. By your sayd letters appeareth also, that the King's majestie tolde you, that his commissioners were agreed with the French well nere upon all matters; and that his highnes nevertheless wolde not agree to any conclusion, but that the Queen's majestie sholde be fyrst satisfied for the matters of this realme.

After that we had considered the effect of these your letters, considering of what importance the leaving of Callice is for this realm; howe much it wolde touche the honour of their majesties, and of this crowne, that so many restitutions being made on bothe sydes, this sholde be suffred to passe unrestored; and fynally, howe yll the subjects of this realme will digest this matter, if there sholde any suche thing be agreed unto; we neither can of our selfs well consider what to answer, nor think mete to propose it to the parliament, untill we may yet once agayne heare from you. And where policy fayleth, we are compelled to use playnes. You knowe these warres wherein Calice is lost, began at the King's majesties request, and for his sake. We do consider, that other his majesties frends and confederats be restored to things taken many yeres past. And what may be judged in this realme, if this peas be concluded, and Calice left in the French king's hands, so many other restitutions being made, it may be easely considered. On the other syde, his majesties commissioners being so nere an agreement for all other matters, muche were to be indured for the welthe of Christendome.

And it hath byn consideryd here, howe much this realme is travayled and spent already with these warres.

These things being amongst us consideryd, knowing his majesties gracious disposition and favour towards this realme, we think good your lordships doe plainly open these considerations to hym, in such good sorte as you may think good. And fyrst to desyre to understande his majesties disposition playnely, if you may for Calice: the remainyng whereof in the French king's hands, doth as much importe for his Lowe Countries as for this realme.

And secondly, that it may please his majesty to gyve us his good advise for our further doings, and manner of proceeding in this matter; wherein albeit our meaning is to use the advise of the rest of our nobilitie and parliament, yet do we stay that to do, untill we have answer again from you, and understande his majesties playne and determinate answer therein. And we doe hartely pray your lordshippes to use your accustomed good wisdomes in the good opening of the premisses, and to send us answer as soon as you may.

November the 8th, 1558.

Minute from the counsell unto the Earle of Arrundell, and the rest of the commissioners beyonde the sees.

NUMBER XLIII.

A Letter of the Ambassadors concerning Calais.—An Original.

[Paper-Office.]

AFTER our right heartie commendacions to your good lordships, by Francisco Thomas the post, we have receyvid two letters from your lordshippes. The first of the 29th of the last month; and the later, of the first of this present. With other letters directed to the king's majestie; upon the receipt wherof, we having mette together, and consulted upon the contentes of the same, datermynd to open to the kinge's majestie by our letters, the matters wherof your lordships wrote unto us; for his majestie is not in these parties heere, but is at Bruxelles, or beyond. The copy of our letter to his majestie in that behalfe, we send your lordshippes heerwith. And where your lordshippes wryte unto his majestie, that by our letters doth appeare that the French king by no means will leave the possession of Callais: and that he would rather hazard his crown, then to consente to the restitution of it: true it is, that we wrote to your lordshippes, that the French commissioners yn their conference with us, and with the king's commissioners, have ever refused to consent to the restitution of Callais. And that the French have declared to one of the king's commissioners, that the French king, for to hazard his crowne, will not forgo Callais. And albeit that for because of the good face sett upon that matter by the French commissioners, we somewhat mistrusted, that that which they spoke was the king their maisters detyrminacion: yet indeede did we not affirm it to be so. No, nor did not then utterly despayre, but that the French, yf they wer kept somewhat shorte, would at the length relent; for elles to what purpose had it been agreed and appointed, that both the king's and the French king's commissioners shuld retourne to their maisters, to declare what hath been done already, and to know what their maisters' further pleasure was theruppon? And forasmuch as we have ever been of opynion, that yf the king's majestie refuse to conclude any thing with them, without the restitution of Callais, that may the sooner induce the French to agree to it. And likewise yf they perceyve the king's majestie, or his mynisters, not so earnest therein, but that by a bragge of the French; they will the sooner gyve over, and stande the more fayntely for the restitution of it; that will make the French the bolder, and to stand the more earnestlye in their refusal. Therefore we have not thought it meet to use anye kynde of wordes to the king, wherby his majestie might by anye means thinke that the queen's highnesse, and the realme of England, coude be contente to conclude a peace without the restitution of Callais. Aswell for because our instructions importe that, as also trustinge that that wold move his majestie and his commissioners to be the more careful for the restitution of it. And seeinge that his majestie, and his commissioners, have ever sayde, that they will conclude nothing without the queen's highnes be first satisfied; yt seemed to us, that if her highnes, and your lordshipes, did stande earnestlye in the repetition of Callais, that the French at this time must either forsake Callais, or elles the peace. And in case this occasion to redemaunde Callais be now forsloune, God knoweth when ever England shall have the lyke again. And where your lordshipes wryte, that the king's commissioners beeinge so neere to agree with the French upon the hole, much wer to be endured for the wealth of Christendom; it is even so indeede as your lordshipes wryte. Mary that all other shuld have restitution of their owne, and poor England that beganne not the fraye, bear the burthen and the losse for the rest; and specially of such a jewel as Callais is, we feare will seem verry harde and strange to all the realme. And yet yf the losse of Callais might purchase a sure peace to Christendom, that wer yet some colour why somewhat the rather to agree to it. But yf we may be so hold to saye playnely our mindes unto your lordshipes; we not only thinke not that, that the leaveinge Callais to the French shall purchase Christendom a sure peace; but rather ar persuaded that nothing can more evidentlye shew, that the French entend no peace to contynue, speciallye with England, then the retention of Callais, yf they earnestlye and finallye persist thereon. Your lordships do right well understande what advantage the French have to annoy us by Scotland, which now is much ruled by France. And in case any peace be made, then shall the French have good tyme and leasure to establish and order their matters so yn Scotland, specially considering the mariage of the Dolfyn, and the queen of Scotts, is now done; that Scotland shall be every whittle as much at their commandment as any part of France is. And what the French pretend unto by that mariage, is not unknowne to your lordshipes.

If now Callais shall remain yn their hands too, wherby neither England shall have the commoditie to offende their enemies, nor to succour their friends, nor lykewyse to receyve succour from their friends at their need, but by verry uneasy means: yea, and wherby England shall in a manner be excluded from knowledge of all things done both by their enemies and by their frends; or at the least, the knowledge therof shall not come, but so late that it will searve to little purpose. And that Callais lyeth so commodiouslye to be a scourge for England, as it was before king Edward the Third took it: which caused him to adventure himself, and his son the prince, to come but with a meane armye from Normandye into France, and thence through all Picardy, to go to beseege Callais: he beinge contynuallye poursewed by his enemyes with greate armyes, with the which he was enclosed and compassed about, and finallye constrained more than once to fight it out, and specially at Crecy, where his enemye's armye was thrise as greate as his, and to lye so longe at the seege before Callais, as he did. This scourge of England, so well knowne by experyence then, and therefore so dearly bought by king Edward the III, and now not yet known for lacke of experyence; yf the French shall retayne yn their hands, they having likewyse Scotland on the other side, how dangerous this shall be to England, is easy to be considered. These, and other considerations, make us to be of oppynion, that leaving Callais to the French, they will be content to delyver you a peece of parchemyn sealed with a little wax; but that they meane anye continuance of peax we cannot be perswaded, no more then king Francis did by a nombre of peeces of parchemyn sealed, which he sent to king Henry the VIIIth: nor the French king that now is, did, by the parchemyne sealed, which he sent to king Edward the VIth. And whereas now the king's majesties contreys ar in warre with France as well as England: if the peace be ones made, the French will soon seek occasion to fall out with England againe; and then may it perhaps chauce so, that Spaine will not think it necessarye for them to venture yn warre againe with France. Whereas now the king's majestie cannot honorablye, nor entendith not (as he himself hath declared and said) to make any peace without us. So that the premisses considered, we cannot for our parts thinke that Christendom shall be restored to a good peace, though we forsake Callais, but that then we shall be more oppressed with war than before. And in case we must needs have war, as good it seemeth to contynue in it yet for a while, being conjoynded to the king's majestie, who beareth the chief burthen and charges of it; then shortelye after to begynne a new, and to stand in danger to have all the burthen lye on our neckes. And then should we know what a jewell we had forsaken, when we did agree to forgo Callais; and that by the retention of Callais, the French meant nothing less then the quietnes of Christendom.

We have thought it our dutie to declare to your lordshipes what our oppynion is heerin. Which nevertheless we pray your lordshipes to accept yn good parte.

I the bishop of Ely returned to Cercamp, according to the king's majesties appointment; where I have contynued till now that I came hither to consult upon these matters with my colleagues. And all this while hath there nothing ben done yn our matters for England; but the other commissioners have been busye contynuallye. And as far as I can learn, they are not yett all agreed upon the matters of Piedmount, nor of Corsica, nor Siena. Yea, and as I heere, the French begyne now to call the matters of Navarre in question; and to ask restitution thereof; yn so much, that some begyne to thinke contrary to that hath ben commonlye thought hitherto; that the ende of this matter will be, that all shall departe, "re infecta."

After he had writtten thus farre, I, the earle of Arundall, receyved a letter from the bishope of Arras, of the 17th of this present; wherin amonge other things he writteth thus: "Monsieur Levesque de Ely vous aura dit en quels termes nous estions à son Parlement en ce Purgatoire. Et hier les François nous declarerent qu'en toutes choses condescendront ils plustot que de venir à ce de Calais: ne qu'il leur eschappe: et nous leur declarasmes derechef au contraire que sans satisfaire à Royaume d'Angleterre nous ne traiterons en façon quelconque avec eux, et fut nostre depart sur ce stil qu'il y a plus d'apparence de rompre que de conclusion."

So that by this lykewise it may seme that they agree not best: but whether that be for Callais onelye, we doubt much. And thus we bid your good lordshipes most hartely well to fare. From Arras the 18th of November, 1558.

Your good lordshipes' most assuredly,
ARUNDELL. THOMAS ELYE. N. WOTTON.

Juellus ad Martyrem.

S. P.—De prima illa nostra Profectione, et de novis omnibus, quæ tum ferebantur Basileæ, scripsi ad te per D. Simlerum nostrum. Quinto postridie vix pervenimus Argentinam; tantoper miseri coacti sumus hæere in luto. Hic omnes nostros invenimus incolumes, et cupidissimos tui. Quid Sandus, Hornus, alique nostri fecerint in Anglia, nihil adhuc audivimus. Neque id sanè mirum. Profecti enim Argentinam ad Vicesimum primum Decembris, vix Vicesimo post die potuerunt pervenire Antuerpiam, quod Rhenus constructio glacie, illorum Navigationem impediret. Hoc tantum audimus, Reditum illorum Reginae esse gratisimum; idque illam non obscurè præ se ferre. Si Episcopi pergant porro ut cæperunt, erit brevi magna Vilitas Episcopatum. Certum enim est, Christophersonum, Rabulam illum Cicestrensem, esse mortuum; quod idem de Watsono quoque; Lincolnensi nunciatur: Quod si ita est, vacant hoc tempore Episcopatus quatuordecim. Whitus tuus, in funere Mariae, quemadmodum ad te scripsi cum essem Basileæ, habuit ad Populum insanam, et turbulentissimam Concionem; Omnia potius tentanda esse, quam ut quicquam de Religione immutaretur. Bonum factum, si quis exules reduces interfecerit. Accusatus est Seditionis à Marchione Vintorienſi Thesaurario, et Hetho Archiepiscopo Eboracensi. Londinensis jussus est, reddere Hæredibus D. Ridlæi, quæcumque illis per vim et injuriam eriperat. Vocabitur brevi ad Cause dictionem; interim jubetur, se domi continere, tanquam in carcere. Regina edixit, ne quis habeat Concionem ad Populum, neve Papista, neve Minister Evangelij. Id alij factum putant, quòd cum unus tantum esset Minister Verbi tum temporis Londini, Benthamus, tantus esset numerus Papistarum. Alij, quòd audita una tantum Benthami publica Concione, Populus inter se creperit litigare de Ceremoniis: Et alij Genevenses esse vellent, alij Francofordiani. Quicquid est, utinam ne nostri Homines nimium prudenter et politicè versari velint in Causa Dei. Multi putant D. Coquam fore Magnum Cancellarium; Hominem bonum quidem, et piùm, uti nôsti; sed illi muneris, meo judicio, non aptissimum. Eliensis hæret adhuc apud Philippum, dum aliquid de ista præclara Pace, si Deo placeat, transfigatur; quæ qualis, aut quam firma, et diuturna futura sit, Θεῶν ἐν γούνασι κείται. D. Isabella, spero, vocabitur in Angliam. Video enim alios quoque nostros Homines, de ea re seriò cogitare. D. Zanchius etiam scribet ad Reginam: Erat scripturus ad totum Parliamentum, nisi ego dissuasisset; id enim mihi videbatur alienum. Cranmerus Puer relictus est Argentinæ apud Abelum, ut mæe Fidei committeretur: Ego ab Abelo mutuo sumpsi Coronatos pueri nomine. Oro Julium, ut Sarcinam et Pecuniam, quam reliquimus numeratam apud te, ad illum mittat Argentinam. Ille tibi curabit cautionem, eamque vel deponet apud D. Zanchium, vel, si mavis, ad te mittet. Bene vale, mi dulcissime Pater, et plus quam Animi dimidium mei. Nolo ad te omnia; oportuit enim me etiam ad D. Bullingerum aliquæ scribere: Cui ego Viro, pro summa ejus erga me Humanitate, debeo omnia. Sed ea, quæcumque sunt, non dubito, tibi cum illo fore communia.

D. Hetonus, D. Abelus, D. Springhamus, D. Parkhurstus, te plurimùm salutant, et cum tibi cupiant omnia, nihil tamen magis cupiunt hoc tempore quam Angliam. Saluta D. Muraltum, Hermannum, Julium, Juliam, et omnes tuos meosque, meo nomine.

D. Fr. Beti, et D. Acontius, sunt nunc Argentinæ: Uterque te plurimùm salutant. Ego D. Beti reddidi Literas D. Isabellæ: Id obsecro, ut illi significes. Argentinæ, 26. Januar.

At nunc multò magis et tibi et mihi gratulor, Vir doctissime, et Frater in Christo observande, quòd ea Tempora Angliæ vestræ, per Dei Clementiam, reducta esse audimus; quando sub Reginae piissimæ Tutela, piis Hominiibus, Deum vere colendi Libertas restituetur, et Amicorum Literæ tutò hinc inde ferri et referri poterunt. Agnosimus in his admirabilem Dei Sapientiam et Bonitatem, qui Ecclesiæ suæ Arcummas latis vicibus temperare solet, ne tentationum fluctibus toti obruamur. Faxit idem ille, ut Spei fidelium, quam de Angliæ Regno jam omnes conceperunt, satisfiat. Quod eò magis futurum puto, si quotquot illic in aliquo Dignitatis gradu collocati estis, Ecclesiæ et Religionis Curam ad vos cum primis pertinere memineritis, nec illorum admiseritis Consilia, qui cum Papatum nec honestè defendi, nec totum retineri posse vident, ad artes convertuntur, quibus Religionis Formam mixtam, incertam et dubiam fingunt, et eandem, sub Evangelicæ Reformationis prætextu, Ecclesiæ obrudunt; ex qua deinde facilis est ad Papticam Superstitionem et Idolomaniam transitus. Quod non eò scribo, quòd tales apud vos esse sciam, sed quòd ne tales sint metuo. Jam enim annis aliquot in Germania, magno Ecclesiarum malo experti sumus, quantum ejusmodi Homines valeant. Eò quòd illorum Consilia, carnis judicio, Modestix plena, et ad alendam concordiam, cum primis idonea esse videantur, et credibile est, publicum illum humanæ Salutis hostem, apud vos quoque sua sabella inventurum, quorum opera Papatûs semina retinere studeat. Quibus Scripturæ sanctæ, et Verbi Divini annis, constanter resistendum fuerit, ne dum circa prima initia, aliquam mediocrem animorum offensionem declinare studemus; multa ad tempus duntaxat duratura admittantur, quæ postea vix ullo studio, et non absque gravissimis tentationibus omnino tolli possunt. Exempla hujus mali Germanicæ Ecclesiæ multa viderunt, quorum consideratione edocti, suspecta habemus quæcumque cum syncera Verbi Doctrina, aliqua ex parte pugnant. Nec me alia ratione, ut hæc moneam, adduci credas, quam quòd Angliæ vestræ, ob veterem Consuetudinem, cujus vel sera Recordatio mihi etiam hodie jucundissima est, mirificè faveo. De Rebus nostris certiosem te reddet Parkhurstus, noster Frater, et Hospes meus dilectissimus, quem tibi commendatissimum esse velim. Sustinuit ille jam toto quinquentennio, graves exilij molestias; inter quas tamen, admirabilem Fidei Constantiam, et Patientiam incredibilem conjunxit. Nunc spe læta plenus, in Patriam contendit, ut Ecclesiæ renascentis Causam pro suo talento adjuvet. Nec dubito, quin bonam operam præstiturus sit, cum Scripturarum Cognitionem habeat præclaram, et Veritatis studiosissimus sit, et à Contentionibus abhorreat, quarum studiosi vix aliquem in Ecclesia fructum faciunt. Optimè ergo feceris, si tua Authoritate illum juves, et pro virili provehas. Mihi verò nihil jucundius fuerit, quàm si ex tuis Literis intelligam, nostræ Amicitie memoriam penes te adhuc salvam esse, quæ certè in animo meo nunquam intermori poterit. Vale, Vir præstantissime. Tiguri, 16 Januarij, 1559.

NUMBER XLVI.

A Letter of the Earl of Bedford's to Bullinger, from Venice.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

TIT.—Doctissimo Viro Domino Bullingero, Sacræ Theologiæ Professori eximio Tiguri.

CUM meus in Te Amor singularis, et perpetua Observantia, quæ te semper Religionis Causâ sum persecutus, tum tua erga me incredibilis Humanitas, multis modis à me perspecta, cum Tiguri fuerim, (Bullingere Doctissime) fecerunt, ut hasce Literas animi erga Te, mei pignus certissimum, et veluti Tabulas obsignatas mei in Te perpetui amoris quas extare volui, huic adolescenti ad Te darem. In quibus ita tibi gratias ago, propter tuam Humanitatem, ut etiam me tibi relaturum pollicear, si quâ in re tibi unquam gratificari queam. Atque hæc ita à me dicta velim accipias, non sicut Homines qui hodie verborum quandam speciem inducunt, et officiosam formam, magis id adeo ut videantur, quàm quod esse velint id quod præ se ferant: sed potius, ut ab animo sincero, et prorsus tibi devinctissimo profecta, certissimum tibi persuadeas. Itaque, si quid tuâ Causâ unquam facere possim, (quod quàm exiguum sit non ignoro) illud tamen, quantumcumque erit tuum erit totum. Sed de hoc satis, et fortasse superque, præsertim etiam cum adhuc mihi statutum sit, (si alia non intervenerint, quæ inceptum iter aliò evadere possint) ut vos obiter invisam in Angliam reversuro. Ubi id vivâ voce confirmare, quod hic nudis verbis solummodò declarare possum. Juvenis, qui has Literas perfert mihi, nunciavit de obitu Conradi Pellicani, (quem Honoris Causâ nominò) quod ut audivi, sanè quam pro eo ac debui, graviter molestèque tuli, non tam suâ, quam Ecclesiæ universæ Causâ. Is enim hujus vitæ Curriculum, in curis, vigiliis, assiduis studiis, literatis Hominibus promovendis, gloriosissimè confecit, ac denique moriendo quemadmodum vivebat ad meliorem vitam in Cælum translatus est. At illa multum desiderabit plurimis nominibus, virum absolutissimum: Itaque, ut illius Causa lætor, ita hujus vicem non possum non magnopere dolere. At hujus mæstitiæ causam tui (ut spero et opto) præsentia faciliè mitigabit, quem Ecclesiæ, bonisque omnibus, diù incolument Deus Opt. Max. per suam Misericordiam esse velit. Venet. 6 Calend. Maias.

Tui Nominis Studiosissimus,
F. BEDFORD.

Domino Gesnero, et Domino Gualthero, meis amicissimis diligenter à me, quæso, Salutem dicito.

NUMBER XLVII.

A Letter of Jewel's to Peter Martyr, of the State he found Matters in when he came to England.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

S. P.—Tandem tamen aliquando, Quinquagesimo, videlicet, Septimo post Die, quam solvissemus Tiguro, parvenimusque in Angliam. Quid enim necesse est multa ἠπορημαδεῖν, apud te præsertim, qui rem potius ipsam quæras, et longos istos logos non magni facias?

Interea verò, Deum immortalem, quæ illa Vita fuit, cum et Aqua, et Terra, et Cælum ipsum nobis indignaretur, et omnibusque modis reditum nostrum impediret? Quid quæris? Omnia nobis toto illo tempore odiosissima, et adversissima acciderunt. Verùm hæc antea ad te, et ad D. Bullingerum fusius, cum adhuc hærerem Antwerpæ. Nunc accipe cætera. Quamquam hic, ut verè dicam, arte opus est et myrothecûs: Non tam quidem, quod mihi nunc ornanda, et polienda sint nova, quæ nescio an ulla sint hoc tempore. Scio tamen à te plurima expectari, quàm quòd recantanda sint vetera. Illa enim ferè omnia, quæ ego ad te jam antea scripsi ex itinere, multò tùm erant alia, et longè auditu jucundiora, quàm quæ postea re ipsa inveni domi. Nondum enim ejectus erat Romanus Pontifex: nondum pars ulla religionis restituta: eadem erat ubique missarum proluviæ: eadem pompa, atq; insolentia Episcoporum. Ista tamen omnia nunc tandem mutare incipiunt, et pene ruere. Magno nobis impedimento sunt Episcopi: qui, cum sint, ut scis, in superiori Conclavi inter primores, et proceres, et nemo ibi sit nostrorum Hominum, qui illorum fucos, et mendacia possit, coram dicendo refutare, inter Homines Literarum, et rerum imperitos soli regnant, et paterculos nostros facile vel Numero, vel Opinione Doctrinæ circumscribunt. Regina interea, etsi apertè faveat nostræ Cause, tamen partim à suis, quorum Consilio omnia geruntur, partim à Legato Philippi Comite Ferio Homine Hispano, ne quid patiatur innovari mirificè deterretur. Illa tamen quamvis lentius aliquantò, quàm nos velimus, tamen et prudenter, et fortiter, et piè persequitur institutum. Et quamvis hactenus Principia, paulo visa sunt duriora, tamen spes, est aliquando rectè fore. Interea, ne Episcopi nostri queri possint se potentia tantum, et lege esse victos, res revocata est ad Disputationem, ut novem ex nostris, Scoraeus, Coxus, Withedus, Sandus, Grindallus, Hornus, Elmer, Ghestus quidam Cantabrigiensis, ex ego, cum quinque Episcopis, Abbate Westmonasteriensi, Colo, Cheadseo, Harpessfeldo, de his rebus coram Senatu colloquamur. Prima nostra assertio est: in publicis precibusq; et Administratione Sacramentorum alia uti Lingua, quàm quæ à Populo intelligatur, alienum esse à verbo Dei, et à consuetudine Primitiva Ecclesiæ. Altera est; quamvis Ecclesiam Provinciale, etiam injussu Generalis Concilii, posse vel instituere, vel mutare, vel abrogare Ceremonias, et Ritus Ecclesiasticos, sic ubi id videatur facere ad Edificationem. Tertia sacrificium illud propitiatorium, quod Papista fingunt esse in Missa, non posse probari ex Sacris Literis. Prædie Calendarum Aprilis instituitur Prima conflictatio. Episcopi interim, quasi partâ Victoriâ, jamdudum Magnificè Triumphant. Ubi Froshoverus ad nos venit, scribam de his rebus omnia disertius. Regina te gerit in oculis. Literas tuas tanti fecit, ut eas iterum, tertiosq; cupidissimè relegerit. Librum tuum, ubi advenit, non dubito, fore multò gratiorem. Oxonii à tuo discessu duæ præclaræ virtutes incredibiliter auctæ sunt, inscitia, et contumacia: Religio, et spes omnis Literarum, atq; ingeniorum funditus periit. Brochas Episcopus Glocestriensis bestia impurissimè Vitæ, ex multò impuriore Conscientiæ, paulò antequam moreretur, miserabilem in modum exclamavit, sese jam se ipso judice esse damnatum. Faber tuus præclarus, scilicet, Patronus castitatis deprehensus est in adulterio: Ex ea Causa, quod alioqui vix solet fieri, cum Maria adhuc viveret, novò more, nullo exemplo jussus est cedere Lectione Theologica. Bruernus similis, sed longè flagitiosiori de scelere coactus est relinquere Professionem Lingue Hebraicæ. De Martiali nihil Scribo, ne Chartas contamirem. De Westono audiasti antea. Sed quid istos, iniques, Commemores? Ut intelligas, quibus judicibus oportuerit B. Cranmerum, P. Ridleum, P. Latimerum condemnari. De Scotis, de Pace, de Bello nihil. Ternas ad te dedi Literas ex itinere : quæ utrumq; ad te pervenerint, nescio. Sed quoniam longè absumus, longius, ó Deum Immortalem, et diutius multò, quàm vellem, Literæ nostræ interdum ventis et fortunæ committendæ sunt. Vale, mi Pater, et Domine in Christo Colendissime, Saluta D. Bullingerum, D. Gualterum, D. Simlerum, D. Gesnerum, D. Lavaterum, Julium, Juliam, Martyrillum, D. Hermannum, et convictores tuos Trevicenses. Omnes nostri te salutant. Londini 20 Martii, 1559.

JO. JUELUS.

Istæ sunt Primæ, quas ad te scribo, ex quo redii in Angliam. Ita posthac subscribam omnes, ut scire possis, si quæ forte intercederint.

NUMBER XLVIII.

A Letter of Jewel's to Bullinger, concerning the State of Things in the beginning of this Reign.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

S. P.—GRATISSIMÆ erant mihi Parkurstoque meo literæ tuæ, ornatissimè vir, vel quòd à te sint, cui quantum debeamus, nunquam possumus oblivisci, vel quo suavitate, et humanitatis erga nos tuæ, quam toto nos tempore exilii nostri experti sumus maximam, altissima vertigia retinerent. Atque utinam possumus aliquando pietatis tuæ partem aliquam compensare. Quicquid erit, animus certe nobis nunquam deerit; quod nos hortaris, ut strenuè ac fortiter nos geramus, erat ille aculeus non tantum non ingratus nobis sed etiam penè necessarius. Nobis enim in hoc tempore non tantum cum adversariis, sed etiam cum amicis nostris, qui proximis istis annis à nobis defecerunt et cum hostibus conjurarunt, jamque acris multò, et contumacius resistunt, quàm ulli hostes, quodque molestissimum est, cum reliquiis Hispanorum, hoc est cum teterrimis vitiiis, superbia, luxu, libidine luctandum est. Facimus quidem nos, fecimusque quod potuimus. Deus bene fortunet, et det Incrementum. Sed ita hactenus vivimus, ut vix videamur restituti ab exilio. Ne dicam aliud: ne suum quidem adhuc restitutum est cuiquam nostrum. Quanquam, et si molestia nobis est ista tam diuturna expectatio, tamen non dubitamus, brevi rectè fore. Habemus enim Reginam et prudentem, et piam, et nobis faventem et propitiam. Religio restituta est in eum locum, quo sub Edwardo rege fuerat, ad eam rem non dubito, tuas, reipublicæque vestræ literas et exhortationes multum ponderis attulisse. Regina non vult appellari aut scribi, Caput Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ: graviter enim respondit, illam dignitatem soli esse attributam Christo: nemini autem mortalium convenire. Deinde illos titulos tam foedè contaminatos esse ab Anti-christo ut jam non possint amplius satis piè à quoquam usurpari. Academix nostræ ita afflictæ sunt, et perditæ, ut Oxonii vix duo sint, qui nobiscem sentiant, et illi ipsi ita abjecti et fracti, ut nihil possint. Ita Soto fraterculus, et alius, nescio quis, Hispanus Monachus, omnia ea, quæ D. Petrus Martyr pulcherrimè plantaverat, everterunt à radicibus, et vineam Domini redegerunt in solitudinem. Vix credas tantam vastitatem afferri potuisse tam parvo tempore. Quare et si magnam aliqui voluptatem capturus sim, si vel canem Tigurinum videre possem in Anglia, tamen non possum esse Author hoc tempore, ut juvenes vestros aut literarum aut religionis causâ ad nos mittatis, nisi eosdem remitti velitis ad vos, impios et barbaros. Rogavit me nuper D. Russelius quâ maxime re tibi, aliisque tuis fratribus, et Symmisti gratum facere. Hoc videlicet, sensit, vellè se Humanitatis vestræ, quam semper prædicat et hospitii causa aliquid ad vos dono mittere. Ego verò nihil tibi tuisque fore gratius, quàm si religionem Christi studiosè ac fortiter propagaret et papistarum insolentiam imminueret. Quod ille et recepit se facturum, et certè facit, quantum potest. Venerunt hodie Londinum Legati Regis Galliæ, qui gratulantur de pace; Princeps legationis est juvenis Memorancius. De nuptiis Regiæ adhuc nihil. Ambit quidem filius Johannis Frederici, et frater secundus natu Maximiliani. Vulgi tamen suspicio inclinat in Pikerimum hominem Anglum, virum et prudentem et pium, et regia corporis dignitate præditum. Deus bene vertat, quicquid erit. Istæ primæ sunt, quas ad te seorsim scripsi, ex quo redii in Angliam: sed quoniam, quæ scripsi ad D. Martyrem, scio illum propter summam inter vos conjunctionem tecum habuisse communia non dubito, quæcunque ad illum scripsi, eadem ad te quoque scripta dicere. Bene vale mi pater, et Domine in Christo colendissime. Saluta optimam illam mulierem uxorem tuam: D. Gualterum, D. Simlerum D. Zuinglium, D. Lavaterum. Si quid unquam erit, in quo possim, aut tibi aut tuis esse voluptati, aut usui, polliceor tibi non tantum operam, studium, diligentiam, sed etiam animum et corpus meum. 22 Maij, Londini, 1559.

NUMBER XLIX.

A Letter of Jewel's to Peter Martyr, concerning the Disputation with the Papists at Westminster.

[Ex MS. Tigur.]

Idem ad P. Martyrem.

S. P.—DE illis disputationibus inter nos, et Episcopos, quas proximis Literis Scripsi indictas fuisse in ante Calendas Aprilis quid factum sit, paucis accipe. Sic enim visum est continuare Orationem sine proemio. Primum ergo, ut omnis causa jurgiorum et otiosæ contentionis tolleretur, Senatus decrevit, ut omnia utrinque de scripto legerentur, et ita describerentur tempora, ut primo die assertiones tantum utrinque nudæ proponerentur: Proximò autem conventu, ut nos illis responderemus, et illi vicissim nobis. Pridiè ergò Kal. April. cum magna expectatione, majori credo frequentia convenissimus Westmonasterii, Episcopi, pro sua fide, nec scripti, nec pecti quicquam attulerunt, quod dicerent, se non satis temporis habuisse ad res tantas cogitandas: Cum tamen habuissent plus minùs decem dies, et interea copias auxiliares Oxoniè et Cantabrigiæ, et undiq; ex omnibus angulis contraxissent. Tamen me tot Viri viderentur frustra convenisse, D. Colus subornatus ab aliis venit in medium, qui de prima questione, hoc est, de peregrina Lingua, unus omnium nomine peroraret. Ille verò cum omnibus nos contumeliis et convitiis indignissimè excepisset, et omnium seditioum authores et faces appellasset, et suppositione pedum, projectione brachiorum, inflexione laterum, crepitu digitorum, modò dejectione modò sublatione superciliorum, (nòsti enim hominis vultum et modestiam) sese omnes in partes et formas convertisset, huc postremò evasit, ut diceret, Angliam ante mille trecentos Annos recepisse Evangelium. Et quibus, inquit, Literis, quibus annalibus, quibus monumentis constare potest, Preces tum publicas in Anglia habitas, fuisse Anglicè. Postea cum in illo Circulo sese satis jamdiu jactavisset, adjectis seriò, et vero vultu, atque etiam admonuit, ut omnes hoc tanquam quiddam de dictis melioribus diligenter attendere, atque annotarent, Apostolos ab initio ita inter sese distribuissè operas, ut alij Orientis Ecclesias instituerent, alij Occidentis. Itaque Petrum et Paulum, in Romana Ecclesia, quæ totam propè Europam contineret, omnia Romano sermone, hoc est, Latinè docuisse. Reliquos Apostolos in Oriente, nullo unquam alio Sermone usus fuisse, nisi Græco. Tu fortasse ista rides: Atqui ego neminem audivi unquam, qui solenniùs et magistratiùs insaniret. Si adfuisset Julius noster, centies exclamasset, "Poh! Horum Knave." Verùm ille, inter alia, nihil veritus est, mysteria ipsa et penetralia, atque adyta prodere Religionis suæ. Non enim dubitavit graviter et seriò monere, etiamsi alia omnia maximè conveniunt, tamen non expedire, ut Populus, quid in sacris ageretur, intelligat. Ignorantia enim, inquit, Mater est veræ Pietatis, quam ille appellavit Devotionem. O Mystica sacra, atque Opertanea Bonæ Dæi! Quid tu me putas interim de Cotta Pontifice cogitasse? Hoc videlicet illud est, In Spiritu et Veritate adorare. Mitto alia. Cum ille jam calumniando, convitiando, mentiendo magnam partem illius temporis, quod nobis ad disputandum datum erat, exemisset; nos postremò nostra pronunciamus de scripto, ita modestè, ut rem tantum ipsam diceremus, nihil autem laceremus adversarium, postremò ita dimissa est Disputatio, ut vix quicquam esset in toto illo Conventu, ne Comes quidem Salopiensis, quin Victoriam illius diei adjudicaret nobis. Postea inita est Ratio, ut proximo die Lunæ, de secunda Quæstione eodem modo diceremus; utque die Mercurij, nos illorum primi Diei Argumentis responderemus, et illi vicissim nostris.

Die Lunæ, cum frequens Multitudo, ex omni Nobilitate cupidissima, audiendi convenisset, Episcopi, nescio pudoreve superioris diei, an desperatione victoriæ, primùm tergiversari, habere se quod dicerent de prima Quæstione, nec oportere rem sic abire. Responsum est à Senatu, Si quid haberent, id tertio post die, prout ab initio convenerat, audiri posse: nunc hoc potius agerent, neve turbarent Ordinem. Dejecti de hoc gradu tamen huc evaserunt, si dicendum omnino sit, nolle se priores dicere; se enim in Possessione constitisse: nos, si quid vellemus, priori loco experiri-mur. Magnam enim se facturos injuriam causæ suæ, si paterentur, nos posteriores discedere cum applausu Populi, et aculeos Orationis nostræ recentes in auditorum animis relinquere. Senatus contra, Hanc ab initio institutam fuisse Rationem, ut illi, quod dignitate priores essent, priori etiam loco dicerent; nec eam nunc mutari posse. Mirari verò se, quid hoc sit Mysterij, cum omnino necesse sit, alterutros priores dicere; alioqui enim nihil posse dici: Et præsertim, cum Colus in primis Disputationibus etiam injussus, ultrò prior ad dicendum prosiluerit. Postremò, Cum altercationibus magna pars temporis extracta esset, nec Episcopi ullo pacto concedere vellent de secundo loco, ad extremum sine Disputatione discessum est. Ea verò res incredibile dictu est, quantum immineret Opinione Populi de Episcopis: Omnes enim cæperunt jam suspicari, quod nihil dicere voluissent, ne potuissent quidem illos quicquam dicere. Postero die, Vitus Vintoniensis, amicus tuus, et Watsonus Lincolnensis, de tam aperto contemptu et contumacia, damnati sunt ad Turrim: Ibi nunc castrametantur, et ex infirmis præmissis concludunt fortiter. Reliqui jubentur quotidie, præsted esse in Aula, et expectare quid de illis Senatus velit decernere. Habes ἐντελευθέρων, et pene quam tamen, quò melius rem omnem intelligeres, descripsi pluribus, fortasse, quam oportuit. Benè vale, mi pater, Decus meum, atque etiam Animi dimidium mei. Si quid est apud vos novarum rerum, hoc tempore, id malo esse proximarum Literarum Argumentum. Saluta plurimum, meo nomine, venerandum illum Virum, et mihi in Christo Dominum colendissimum, D. Bullingerum, D. Gualterum, D. Simlerum, D. Lavaterum, D. Wolphium, D. Gesnerum, D. Hallerum, D. Frisium, D. Hermannum, et Julium tuum meumque. Nostri omnes te salutant, et tibi omnia cupiunt. NUMBER I.

A Letter of Jewell's to Peter Martyr, of the Debates in the House of Lords; and of the State of the Universities; and concerning the Inclinations to the Smalcaldick League.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

S. P.—ACCEPTI ternas à te Literas, omnes eodem fermè tempore: Quæ cum multis de causis mihi essent, ut certe debebant, jucundissimæ, vel quòd essent à te, vel quòd Rerum tuarum Statum significarent, et amorem erga me tuum: Tamen nullà alià causà mihi visæ sunt jucundiores, quàm quòd officium meum requirerent, meque vel oblivioni vel tarditatis, blande ac tacitè accusarent; quorum alterum magnitudo tuorum erga me meritorum, alterum negotia mea non sinunt. Scripsi quidem ego ad te ternas Literas, ex quo redij in Angliam; quas tamen video, cum tu illas tuas scriberes, nondum ad te pervenisse. Et fieri potest, ut sæpe sit, ut aut hæreant uspiam, et ignave atque otiosè imitentur Religionem nostram, aut etiam perierint in itinere. Sed quicquid est, nulla potest in ea re magna jactura fieri. Erant enim pene inanes, quòd non multum adhuc esset, quod aut tu audire libenter velles, aut ego scribere. Nunc agitur Causa Pontificis, et agit utrinque fortiter. Episcopi enim sudant, ne quid errasse videantur: atque ea Causa moratur, et impedit Religionem. Difficile est enim Cursum incitare. Fecnamus, Abbas Westmonasteriensis, opinor, ut auctoritatem addent Professioni suæ, cum peroraret in Senatu, Nazaræos, Prophetas, Christum ipsum, et Apostolos conjecit in Numerum Monachorum. Nemo Causam nostram acriùs oppugnat, quam Eliensis. Is et locum suum in Senatu, et ingenium retinet. Episcoporum prædia redacta sunt in fiscum: illis ex permutatione dabuntur Sacerdotia, quæ antea attributa erant Monasteriis. Interim de Scholis, et cura Literarum magnum ubique Silentium. Regina de te honorificè et loquitur, et sentit. Dixit nuper D. Russello, se velle te accersere in Angliam; id enim ille, alique urgent, quantum possunt. Sed nisi et seriò, et cupidè, et honorificè petaris, nunquam ero auctor, ut venias. Nihil equidem magis, aut miserius cupio, quam te videre, et dulcissimis illis Sermonibus tuis frui, sive (quod ò utinam aliquando contingat) in Anglia, sive etiam Tiguri. Verùm quantum video obstabit desiderio nostro, inauspicata illa ex Saxia ac Saxonibus damnata περσβία. Nostra enim nunc cogitat Fœdus Smalcaldicum. Scribit autem ad illam quidam è Germania, illud Fœdus non posse ullo pacto coire, si tu ad nos venias. Illum autem quandam, si addo aliquando fuisse Episcopum, si nunc esse exulem, si hominem statum, si vetera-torem, si aulicum, si Petrum, si Paulum, magis eum fortasse nôris, quam ego. Sed quicquid est, nos Articulos omnes Religionis, et Doctrinæ nostræ exhibuimus Reginæ, et ne minimo quidem apice discessimus à Confessione Tigurinâ. Quanquam Amicus tuus Inventum illud, nescio quod, suum tuetur mordicus, et nobis omnibus mirificè succenset. Adhuc nemini nostrum ne de obulo quidem prospectum est. Itaque ego nondum abjicio insignia illa, quæ mihi fixi Tiguri, Librum et crucem. Goodmannum audio esse apud nos; sed ita, ut non ausit venire in publicum. Sed quanto satius fuisset sapuisse in tempore? Si velit agnoscere errorem, nihil erit periculi. Verum, ut homo est satis acer, et in eo, quod semel suscepit, nimium pertinax, non nihil vereor, ne nolit cedere. Libri tui nondum venerunt: id ego tanto magis miror, quòd tot Angli jam pridem redierint Francofordiâ. Munus tuum ubi advenit, non dubito Reginæ fore gratissimum. Illud ego, quoniam tu ita jubes, quamvis alioquin sit per se ornatissimum, tamen si dabitur facultas, verbis ornabo meis. De illo autem Libro, quem tu seorsim ad me misisti, equidem non invenio, quibus verbis tibi agam gratias. Itaque malo, et huic humanitati tuæ, et superiorum tuorum erga me meritum magnitudinem ultrò succumbere. Certè etsi te nunquam ex animo eram dimissurus, tamen hæc commonefactione, et mncemosyno excitatus, tanto acrius et reverentius colam, quoad vixerò, Nomen tuum. Alij tui Libri jam pridem allati sunt à Bibliopolis, et emuntur cupidissimè. Omnes enim libenter videre capiunt, quibus Venabulis illa Bestia confossa sit.

Benè vale mi Pater, et Domine in Christo Colendissime. Saluta D. Bullingerum, D. Bernardinum, D. Gualterum, D. Simlerum: Dicerem et Frenchamum, nisi illum putarem jamdudum aut in Balneo esse, aut in via. Hoc enim Anni tempore, cum auditur Cuculus, vix solet esse apud se. Londini, 28 Apr. 1559.

Tui Cupidissimus, Tuoque; Nomini Deditissimus,

NUMBER LI.

A Letter of Jewel's to Peter Martyr of the State of Affairs both in England and Scotland.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

Ejusdem ad Eundem.

HACTENUS minus frequenter ad te scripsi, mi Pater, quod multa me negotia publica, privataque impedirent. Nunc soribo, non quod plus nunc otii sit, quam antea, sed quod minus posthac futurum sit multò, quam nunc est. Alterum enim jam pedem in terra habeo, alterum penè sublatum in equum. Mox enim ingredior longinquam et difficilem legationem constituendæ religionis ergò per Redingum, Abindonam, Glocestriam, Bristolium, Thermas, Welliam, Exonium, Cornubiam, Dorcestriam, Sarisburiam. Ambitus itineris nostri erit plus minus septingentorum milliariu: vix ut quartò demum mense putem nos esse redituros. Quare ne me interea putares esse mortuum, etsi ante duodecim dies, nescio quid, ad te scripserim de rebus communibus, tamen non alienum fore duxi, si nunc quoque paucis te quasi in degressu salutarem. Res nostræ satis nunc sunt in proclivi: Regina optimè animata: Populus ubique sitiens religionis. Episcopi, quàm ut relinquunt papam, quem toties jam antea abjurarunt, malunt cedere rebus omnibus. Nec tamen id religionis causa faciunt, quam nullum habent, sed constantiæ, quam miseri nebulones vocari jam volunt conscientiam. Sacrifici jam tandem mutata religione passim abstinent à cætu sacro, quasi piaculum summum sit, cum populo, Dei quicquam habere commune. Est autem tanta illorum nebulonum rabies, ut nihil supra. Omnino sperant, et prædicant, esse enim, ut scis, genus hominum prædictiosum, et valdè deditum futuritionibus ista non fore diuturna. Sed, quicquid futurum est, nos agimus Deo Optimo Maximo gratias, quòd res nostræ eò jam tandem loco sint, quo sunt. In Scotia fervent omnia. Knoxus cinctus mille satellibus agit conventus per totum regnum. Regina vetula coacta est sese includere in præsidium. Nobilitas conjunctis animis, et viribus restituit ubique religionem invitis omnibus. Monasteria passim omnia æquantur solo, vestes scenicæ calices sacrilegi, idola, altaria comburantur: ne vestigia quidem prisæ superstitionis et idolatriæ relinquantur. Quid quæris? Audisti sæpè, σκωβιστὶ πειν: hoc verò est σκωβιστὴ ἐκκλησιᾶστων. Rex Galliæ, qui nunc est, scribit se Regem Scotiæ, et hæredem Angliæ, si quid Reginæ nostræ, quod Deus avertat, contingat humanitus. Sed mirari non debes, si nostri homines molestè ferant: et quo res eruptura tandem sit, Θεοῦ ἐν γούρασι κείται. Fortassè, ut sit, communis hostis conciliabit nobis vicinum Scotum. Quod si sit, etsi accedant etiam nuptiæ, sed desino divinare. D. Hetonus te salutatur, idque non minus amice, quàm si illi pater esses. Aliquot nostrum designatur Episcopi. Coxus Eliensis, Scoreus Erfordiensis, Alanus Roffensis, Griadalus Londinensis, Barlovus Chichestrensis, et ego minimus Apostolorum Sarisburiensis. Quod ego onus prorsus decevi excutere. Interea in Academiis mere est ubique solitudo. Juvenes diffugiunt potius, quàm ut velint in religionem consentire. Sed comites jamdudum expectant, et clamant, ut veniam. Vale ergo, vale, mi Pater, et dulcissimum decus meum; saluta venerandum virum et mihi mille nominibus in Christo Colendissimum. D. Bullingerum, ad quem etiam seorsim scriberim, si esset otium. Saluta D. Gualterum, D. Simlerum, D. Lavaterum, D. Hallerum, D. Gesnerum, D. Trisium, D. Hermanum. Habeo quinque pistolettos aureos à D. Barth. Compagno ad venerandum senem D. Quanquam hoc, quæso te, ut illi significes, præter istos aureos, nihil adhuc confectum esse. Res aulicæ, quantum video, ita sunt difficiles, ut nesciam, an quicquam possit exprimi. Regina jam abest procul gentium in Cantio, ut agi nihil possit. Vale, mi Pater, vale. Quantum ego tibi optare possum, tantum vale. Et Julium tuum, Annaque et Martyrillum meo nomine. NUMBER LIII.

A Declaration made by the Confederate Lords of Scotland, to the Queen of England; of their taking arms against the Queen Dowager of Scotland, and the French.

[Cott. Lib. Calig. b. 10. fol. 24.]

It may be, that on the French parte it will be saide, that it behoveth them to subdue the rebellion in Scotland; and to that end only bringe all this power thither: first it may be, and that truly saide, the begynning and ground, yea, and the proceeding hitherto being truly considered, is no rebellion. For true it is, that when the French kyng had long sought to compass the yonge queene of Scotland, and to have her caryed owt of Scotland into Fraunce, there was great difficultie made yn it by the Scots, and att length brought to passe only by the continuall travayle of the mother, being dowager queene; partly by corruption with money, partly by authoritie, partly by fayre promises; and yet was the matter thus ended, that before her person coulde be transported thence, assurance was made by treaty, by othe, by parlement, by the great seal of Fraunce, by the seal of the dolphyn, that Scotland should not be otherwyse governed but by the lawes, by the nobilitie, by the people of the land; that the offices of the land shuld remayne in the nation of Scotland; that no garrisons should be kepte by the French. After that tyme much labour and practise was made by the queene dowager to procure the favour of the nobilitie of Scotland, to accorde to the mariadge of the queene with the dolphyn; and fynally that obtayned in a parlement in Scotland, and was the crowne assigned to the queen, and the heirs of her body; and for default therof, to the duke of Chastellerault, and his hires, and so he declared the seconde person. Then also was on the parte of Fraunce othes taken, chartres delyvered under the greate seale of Fraunce, and confirmed by the yong queene under her seal, and by the dolphin under his seale, that Scotland shuld be governed by the counsayle of the land; that no liberties shuld be violated; that Edinburg Castell shuld be delivered to the lord Arskin to be kept, for the preservation of the rights of the realme; and Dunbritton Castell shuld be delyvered to the duke for his interest as heyre apparent. These things were done, and duplicates made of the grants of Fraunce. One parte delyvered to be kept in Edenburgh Castell in the treasury; the other delyvered to the duke: hereupon an ambassade was sent in Anno 1558, of 8 persons, 2 bishops, 2 earles, 4 lords of Scotland, and the mariadge then concluded in Fraunce; which done thur, was attempted that the ambassade shuld returne home, and in parlement obtayne, at the yong queene's request, that the crown of Scotland might be given to the dolphin her husband; which matter, the ambassade so much misliked, and utterly refused; alledging that it could never be obtayned; that in the end they were thus abused, yt was devised they should retourne, and procure that a matrimoniall crowne shuld be granted to the kyng: by which words they weare made believe there was a great difference; and yet they could not lyke the matter, but required leave to retourne home, and they would doo that they might. In their departure at Deepe, their nombre was made in one night sodenly lesse by one bishope, 2 erles, and 2 barons, and so departed home the other three, much amased at the matter. At theyr return, the dowager queene practised all the ways she could in parlement to obtayne this purpose; which she sought by two ways: one by rewarding those who had not received favour of the duke in the time of his governaunce, partly for the favour they bare at that time to England, parte for other respects; and so sett an enmitie betwixt the duke and them. One other way, she offered to certayne of the lords a permission to lyve freely accordyng to their conscience in religion; and at length she became very stronge, and in parliament obtained this matrimoniall crowne, with these conditions, that the duke's right shuld not be empayed therby. Thus proceded she towards her purpose, and daily usurped against the liberties and promises made. She spared not to begin with the greatest. She committed to prison the chancellor of the realme, the erle Huntley, being one of the principal frends to the duke. She took a great fyne of him, and took the seale from hym; committed that to one Rubay, a Frenchman, an advocate of Paris. Not content therwith, she committed the sayd erle to prison, untill she had put hym to a great ransome, which she took of hym: and to flatter hym, gave hym the name of chancelor, and put the office in Rubaye's handes. Nexte to this, she hath taken the office of the comptroller of the hole realme, to whom belonged the charge of the whole revenues of the crowne; and hath also committed it to another Frenchman, a servant of her owne, named Vulemore. She hath also sequestered all matters of counsaill of the governaunce of the land, from the Scottish men borne, and retayned all the secreties to French men. But these weare but small thynges, yff greater had not followed. Having peace with England, she kepte all the garrisons of French men still in the countrey, who lyved upon discretion, which was a new offence to Scotland. Wages they had none out of France at all: the revenue of the crowne, which was not greate, was sent into Fraunce; and to paye the French band a new device was made. She procured out of Fraunce a certayne nombre of franks, being altogether in a certayne coyne of sowces, which had bene, for their emtiness, decried and barred in Fraunce two yeres before, and were but bullion: these she made currant in Scotland, to paye the soldiours. She also erected a mynte, and therin abassed a grete quantite of the Scottish money, and therwith also payed her soldiours. In that mynte also, she permytted certayne of the principalls of the French to coyne their owne plate, to their owne most advantage: which matter both did notable great hurt in all Scotland, and much offended the realme.

Now follows the practises of the queene with diverse noblemen, to becom parties agaynst the duke: meanes was made, fyrst to have wonne the lord Arskin, to deliver the castell of Edinburgh; next, to have stolen it: but this prevailed not. In this season, and before also, which had much exasperated the people of the land, the queene gave away abbeyes, that fell voyd, to French men: som to her brother, the cardinal Guyse, som to other. And generally, she hath kept in her hands these three hole yeres almost all the ecclesiastical dignities that have fallen voyde; saving such as were of any value, which she gave to French men. Generally she governed all things so, as she never would in any matter followe the counsell of the lordes and nobilitie, which, at her first coming to the regiment, were appoynted to be of counsell. Agaynst these her doynge, many intercessions were made by the nobilitie, both joyntly together in good companies, and advices also gyven aparte, by such as were sory to see that this governaunce would be so dangerous, as it could not be borne: but nothing avayled. And then followed a practise, of all other most dangerous and strange, and, for a personage of honor, a great indignity. The principall matter that was coveted by the queene, was to have cutt away the duke and his house, and to make a party agaynst hym; by persuasion, this was devised. The lord James, being a bastard, son of the last kyng, a man of great courage and wysdom; and certayne erles and barons of the realme; in whom were considered these two thynges—no great love towards the duke, nor certayne ceremonies of the churche; and yet being men of courage, were borne in hand by the queene, that she her selfe would beare with theyr devotion in religion, and upon condition that they would joyne with her governaunce agaynst the duke, for the favour of Fraunce, they shuld lyve freely accordyng to their conscience in religion, without any impedymment. Herupon they were somewhat boldned, and therby incurred the censures of the churche, and were also, by a private lawe of the land, ignorantly in danger of treason: wherupon processe was made, they endangered. And then was it tyme for the queene to tempt them to forget theyr country, and become French. But when no inticement could prevayle, then began she to threaten them with the lawe, and would nedes declare them traytors. This matter the queene pursued, taking it for a great advantage. But, for their defence, the nobilitie of the realme made much labour. Nothyng would stave the queene; but forthwith she produced her garrisons to the feld, proclaymed them traytors, gave away their lands, entred with men of war into a principal towne, called St. John's Towne, changing the provost of the towne agaynst the wyll of the burgesses; and left there four bands of men of warre, to fortefie her new provost. And she fynding the whole realme much offended herwith, and charging her dayly with misgovernance, and violating the liberties of the realm, and her power there not sufficient to procede, as she ment, to conquer the land; she sent for the duke, and the erle Huntley, and pretended in this necessitie a new good will to them, who travayled for her, and stayed all the adverse part in quietness: and then she promised all matters to be stayed and redressed at parlement the next spring: and promised also diverse other thyngs, for the benefite of the land. And then the duke and the erle Huntley tooke upon them to make a quiet with the adverse part. And whiles this was in doying, the duke's sonne and heyre was sought and sent for, to the courte in Fraunce; from whence he was certainly advertised by diverse of most secret knowledge, that his ruine shuld follow, and that he should be accused, and executed for matters of religion. At the length he abode, untill certayne of good authoritie were depeched from the court, to bring hym eyther quick or dead. Before their comming, he escaped, without daunger: and they toke his yonger brother, a child, abowt fifteen yeres of age, and commytted him to prison. In this tyme, thyngs being well appeased in Scotland, and every noble man returned to theyre countrees, by the duke's meanes principally, who shewed most favour to the queene, and had gaged his fayth to the nobilitie of Scotland, for keeping of all thynges in quiet, untill the parlement; there arrived certayne bands of souldiours out of Fraunce into Leethe, whose comming made such a change in the queene, as she newly caused the towne of Leeth to be fortified, being the principall porte of the realme, and placed twenty-two enseignes of souldiours, with one band of horsemen, therin. Herupon the nobilitie challenged the duke, who had nothing to saye, but entreated the queen, by his most humble letters, to forbear these manner of doinges, wherin he could not prevayle. The force of the French was then increased, Leeth fortified, all ammunition carried into the towne, nothyng left to the Scotts, whereby either well to defend themselves, or to annoye the towne. Beside this, out of Fraunce there came dayly French powre by sea; yea, ther went allso, not denyed by the queen's majestie of England, captayns by land through England. Well, at the length, the duke, and all the nobilitie made new intercession by theyr letters, that she would forebare this fortification; for otherwise her purpose of conquest would appeare to the whole realm; wherupon would grow great disquiet. But her comforth grew so greate owt of France, that she despised all requestes. And thus came the matter to the termes which the French courted; for now thought they it would be but 3 or 4 dayes' work to subdue Scotland: wherunto nevertheless besydes theyre owne powre, she entretayned two or three meane lords, such as lay betwyxt Leeth and Barwick, which was the erle Bothwell and lord Setan, who be the only two, of all the nobilitie of Scotland, that keepeth company with the queen; and yet, as they do notify themselves by their doyngs, have their harts with their countrymen. And nowe the duke and the rest of the nobilitie, with the barons and burgeses of the realme, fynding no hope of remedy at her hands, but perceyving an eminent danger to the realme, which could not be avoyded by any entreaty, assembled themselves, as regrating the afflicted realme. They began depely to consider, on the one part, the right of their sovereign lady, being married to a strange prince, and out of her realme, in the hands of Frenchmen only, without counsell of her own natural people; and therewith the mortalitie of her husband, or of her self, before she cold have issue: and on the other side, what the dowager, being a French woman, systar to the house which ruleth all in France, had done, attempted, and dayly persisted in ruining unnaturally the liberties of her daughter, the queen's subjects, for ambition, to knitte that realme perpetually to France, whatsoever becam of her daughter; and so to execute their old malace upon England, the stile and title wherof they had already usurped; were in the end constrained to constitute a counsaile, for the governaunce of the realme, to the use of their soverayn lady: and therewith humbly to signifie to her the reasonable suspension of the dowager's authoritie; which to mayntayn, they have of themselves, as natural subjects, convenient strength, being sore oppressed with the French powre; which until this presant day they do, as they povers can endure, being very mean and unable that to do, compared to the meane force of France: so as although they have been of long tyme occasioned thus to doe; and now for safety, as well of their sovereign's right as of the ancient right of the crown, have been forced to spend all ther substance, to hazard their lives, their wives and children, and country: yet can they not longer preserve themselves and the realm from conquest, by this power that is now arrived in Scotland, and is in readiness to be sent thither before next spring. And therefore they have communicated their hole cause to certayn of the queen's majestie's ministers upon the borders, and seek all the ways they can, how they might, without offence of hir majesty, committe their just and honorable cause to the protection of hir majesty; onely requiring this, that theyr realme may be saved from the conquest by France, and the right of their sovereign lady preserved, with all other rights of their nation of Scotland depending thereupon.

NUMBER LIV.

A short Discussion of the Weighty Matters of Scotland, Aug. 1559.—In Sir W. Cecil's Hand.

[Cott. Lib. Calig., B. 10.]

QUESTION, Whether it be mete that England should helpe the nobilitie, and Protestants of Scotland, to expell the French: or no?

That No.

- I. It is against God's law to ayd any subjects against their naturall prince, or their ministers.
- II. It is dangerouse to doo it; for if the ayd shal be no other than maye be kept in secretie, it cannot be great; and so consequently it shall not suffice. If it shall be open, it will procure warres, and the end therof is uncertain.
- III. It maye be dowted that when money spent is, and aide shall be given, the French maye compownd with the Scottes, and pardon that error, to joyne both in force ageynst England; which is more easy to be beleved, because they had rather make a shamefull composition with Scotland, than suffer it to be rejoyned, and united to the crown of England.
- IV. It may be dowbted, that to staye the progress of religion, ageynst the see of Rome, the empcor, the king catholicke, the pope, and the potentates in Italy, the duke of Savoye, will rather conspyre with the French king, than to suffer theis two monarchies to be joyned in one manner of religion. And in this part may be doubted that many, aswell Scottes as English, that can lyke very well to have these two kingdomes perfectly knitt in Amytje, will not allowe them to be knitt in a lyke religion.

That Yea.

- I. First, It is agreeable, both to the law of God and nature, that every prynce, and publyck state, shuld defend it self; not only from perrills presently sene, but from dangers that be probably sene to come shortly after.
- II. Secondly, Nature and reason teacheth every person, politick, or other, to use the same manner of defence, that the adversary useth in offence.

Upon theis two prynciplees agreed will evidently follow, that England both maye, and ought to ayde Scotland to kepe owt the Freuche.

1. First, The crowne of England hath a good title to the superioryte of Scotland; and ought to defend the libertyes thereof, as thempcor is bound to defend the state of Millane, or of Boheme, being held of the empyre. And to prove this superioryte, remaine undowted proofes under seale, of sondry homagees done to this crowne by the kings of Scotland successively. Of their accesces to the parlements of England. Of the episcopall jurisdiction of the see of York over Scotland: In consideration wherof, if it may appere that the French meane to subdue Scotland,

* The earl of Aran always signs thus, for the title of Aran was in his father at that time.

† This seems to be the lord James, afterwards made earl of Murray.

‡ The earl of Huntley's son. § Cannot be read. Probably the earl of Atholl's son.

and so to exempt that realme from the amytye of England, it semeth that England is of duety, and in honour bound to preserve the realme of Scotland from such an absolute dominion of the French.

2. Item. Beside this interest that England hath in the crowne of Scotland, for the quiet possession, wheras France hath onely by there warres kept the realme of England*. It is most manifest that France cannot any wise so redely, so puissantly, so easely, offend, yea, invade, and put the crown of England in daunger, as if they may recover an absolute authorite over Scotland: And before that be proved, it semeth not out of order, though not very nedefull to make manifest that the French ar to be taken as enemyes in will, though not in manifest words.

How long time they have bene enemyes to England, how bricke, how false, how double their pacts of peace have bene, the storyes be witnesses, theis seven hundred yeres. Was there ever king of England, with whom they have not made warres? And now of late, upon what occasion they made peace with England, is too manifest. It was by reason of wearyness and povertye, which was such, as the late French king forbore not to expresse in his letters to the queen of England, mentioning the invasions made in Bryttaine by sea. And indede this is to be received as a principle, that France cannot be poor above one or two yeres, nether can so long be out of wars. The revenues of the French crown are thyngs unknown: the insolency of the French nation, being in hope of victory, is not unknown. The long old hatred of the House of Guise, which now occupyeth the king's authorite, agaynst England, hath been often well understood.

And, to come nerer to the matter; it is manifest many wayes what manner a platt that House hath made, to bereave the queen's majesty of hir crowne. In Queen Mary's tyme, the French did not let to divulge ther opinions agaynst this lawful title of the queen's majesty; and, as it was well known, had not Almighty God favored the Queen's Majesty to come to the Crowne with such universall joy of hir people, the French had proclaimed ther title both in France and Scotland.

And likewise in the treaty of the peace at Chasteau in Cambresis, it appeared what they would have compassed, when they pressed the Burgundians to conclude with them, and over-paes the treaty with England—alludging, that they could not tell how to treat with England, but to the prejudice of ther right: the dauphiness, his daughter, then having right to the crown of England. How bold they wold have been, if at that tyme she had been queen of France and her husband king, as he now is? For then the wisdom of the constable governed the rashness of the Guisians.

Sence the peace concluded, whilst the French king lived, what means they made at Rome to have made the Queen's majesty to be declared illegitimate, is manifest; and so as it is known that the same sentence is brought into France, under the Pope's bulls. Likewise, at the confirmation of the peace betwixt Spain and France, at the solemnities even when the French king was slayne, it appereth, what manifest injurie and dishonour they did to the Queen's Majesty, to assign the arms of England and Ireland to the French queen, and that in all their pageants: And being admonished thereof by the ambassador, wold nether make collorable excuse nor leave it, but both continued therein, and also to despise the queen's majesty's ambassador, and ratification of the peace with the stile. M. Meulas served them with silver vessel stamped with the same usurped armes. How lightly they have esteemed the queen's majesty in all this tyme appereth: for here they be bound by treaty to deliver 4 hostages; notwithstanding that they have been pressed therto, they have sent but three,— wherof one or two be such as if they had not been here; but, whether the queen's majestie had not suffered the dishonour, to have one of her subjects murdered, and no redress therof, but, as it appered, when they had committed the murder, they disdained, and quarrelled against such as did but seke to understand the offenders.

Now the very cause why they stay the prosecution hereof is this, their interruption and parboylls unlooked for in Scotland, which doth so occupy them as they nether can ne dare to utter ther former malicious purpose until that be ended.

But surely, besid there old cankered malyce to this realm, this matter so inflameth the house of Guise, that they will not forbear one day longer than of mere necessity they shall be constreyned, to bord this realm with that fayned tytle, and to avance the same. It is known that they have sent a great seale into Scotland with the armes, and very stile and title of England and Ireland, and what more manefest arguments can be to shew what they mean and intend then these. In princes practices it is mere childshness to tarry until the practices be set abroad, for then were it as good to tarry till the trumpet sound wars. All things have there causes preceeding before, but nothing hath his causes preceeding more secretly than the practices of princes; and of all other none is so conning as the French.

It followeth to be considered, that now the French have no convenient way to invade England but by Scotland; by Carlisle they were accustomed, by sea is not so convenient for them, the same being too chargeable for them to assayle: wherefore if it be sene that they will persue their purpose, and that by Scotland, then reason must force England, to confess that to avoyd this danger so apparant, can no way be devised, but to help that the French have not such rule and overhand in Scotland as that they may by that realm invade England.

Lastly, It is to be considered how dangerouse it is for England to be invaded by the way of Scotland.

First, If the French shall present to England a battle, either they will do it with strangers, or French and strangers. If they win, which God forbid, they put in hazard this crown; and though they lese, yet do they not put there own kingdom of France in danger. And therefore it is double the danger for England, to venter battle upon the frontiers of England, to a battle upon the marches of Calais, or Bulloyness.

A Conclusion.

It seemeth the weightiest matter to be considered, that either hath, or can chance to England, what is presently to be done for the aid of Scotland; for if it shuld be nedefull the delay will adventure the whole: and if loss come it is unrecoverable. Wherefore it were good that the cause were well and secretly weighted: first, by discreet and wise men, that have experience, affected to the English nation, special love to the queens majesties person; and that done, to send by some colour for the nobilitie, and to consult with them, or ells to send some trusty persons with credit to understand their minds.

* A word seems wanting; probably "in danger."

AT Edinburgh, the twintie seventh of Apryll, the year of God aue thousand fyve hundred threescore years: we whaes names are underwritten, haif promittit and obliedged our selves faithfully, in the presence of our God, and be thir presents promitts, that we altogether in general, and every one of us in special, be himself, with our bodie, goods, friends, and all that we may do, sall set forwart the reformation of religion, according to Goddes worde; and procure, be all means possible, that the true preaching of Goddes word, may haif free passage within this realme, with dew administration of the sacraments, and all things depending upon the said worde. And sicklyke deiply weighing with our selves the misbehaviour of the Franche ministers heir, the intolerable oppressions committed be the Franchmen of weir upon the puir subjects of this realme, be meynenance of the queen dowriare, under collour and pretence of authority; the tyranny of their captains and leaders, and manifest danger of conqueist, in whilk this countrie presently stands; be reason of diverse fortifications on the sea-coast, and other novelties of late attemptat be them; promitts that we sall als weell every one with others, as altogether with the queen of England's armie, presently come in for our deliverance, effectually concurr and joyn together, taking one fold and plain part of the expulsion of the said strayingars, oppressors of our liberty, furth of this realme, and recovery of our ancient freedoms and liberties; to the end in tyme coming we may, under the obedience of our king and queen our soverains, be only reulyt be the laws and customes of the countrie, and by the men of the land: and that never any of us all haiff pryvy intelligence, be writing, or message, or communication, with any of our said enemys or adversars in this cause, bot be the advyce of the rest, at leist of fyve of our numbers: attour, that we sall tender this present cause, as if it were the cause of every one of us in particular; and that the cause of every one of us now joyred together, being leifal and honest, shall be all our causes in general. And he that is enemy to the cause forsaid sall be enemy to us all: in so far, that whatsomever person will plainly resist thir our godly interprysis, and will not concurr as aue guid member of this common weill, we sall fortify the authority of the counsell, to reduce them to their duty: like as we sall fortify the said authority of the counsale in all things tending to the furtherance of the said cause. And giff any particular debate, quarrell, or contraversee sall aryse, for whatsomever cause, by-gain, present, or to come, betwixt any of us, (as God forbid,) in that case we sall submit our selves and our said questions to the decision of the counsale, or to arbitrators to be named be them. Provyding allwayes, that this be not prejudicial to the ordinar jurisdiction of judges: but that men may persue their actions by ourdour of law, civilly or criminally, befor the judges ordinars, giff they please.

A Letter of Jewel's to Peter Martyr, setting forth the Progress that Superstition had made in Queen Mary's Reign.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

Juells ad Martyrem.

S.P.—TANDEM tamen aliquando Londinum redij, confecto molestissimo itinere, confecto corpore. Tu fortasse me, quod nihil scriberem, putabas esse mortuum. Ego verò interea tres totos menses longinqua, et perdifficili Legatione distinebar. Cum essem Britolij, redditæ mihi sunt Literæ tuæ, quas secum Randolphus noster adduxerat; ita amicè scriptæ, itaq; suaves, ut mihi omnem illam molestiam itinerum, atque occupationum prorsus exciperent ex Animo. Tanquam cuim si præsens adfuisses, ita tum mihi videbar tecum colloqui. Randolphus, antequam ego redirem, abierat in Gallias: Itaque ego miser, privatus sum bona parte suavitatis tuæ, quam tu illi præsens præsentì verbis commendaveras. Literas meas in itinere intercidisse, video: Quas enim ego octavas dederem, eas video ad te vix quintas pervenisse. Sed de Legatione, iniqua, illa vestra quid tandem factum est? Accipe ergo uno verbo, quod mihi exploratu perlongum fuit. Invenimus ubique animos multitudinis satis propensos ad religionem; ibi etiam, ubi omnia putabantur fore difficillima. Incredible tamen dictu est, in illis tenebris Mariani temporis, quanta ubique proruperit Seges, et Sylva Superstitionum. Invenimus passim votivas Reliquias supersticiosas Divorum, clavos, quibus fatui Christum confixum fuisse somniabant; et, nescio quas, Portiunculas Sacræ Crucis. Magarum et veneficarum numerus ubique in immensum excreverat. Ecclesiæ Cathedrales nihil aliud erant, quam speluncæ latronum, aut si quid nequius, aut fœdius dici potest. Si quid erat obstinate militie, id totum erat in Presbyteris, illis præsertim, qui aliquando stetissent à nostra Sententia. Illi nunc, credo, ne parùm considerate videantur mutasse voluntatem, turbant omnia: Sed turbent, quantum velint. Nos tamen interim, illos de gradu, et de Sacerdotiis exturbavimus. Hardingus, Homo constans, locum mutare maluit, quam sententiam. Sidallus subscripsit quidem, sed constanter; hoc est, per invitus. Smithæus autem tuus; quid ille? inquires. An potest à Nazareth quicquam proficisci boni? Mihi crede, ut veterem illam suam Constantiam retineret, nunc tandem etiam quinto recantavit. Fatuus, cum videret Religionem esse immutatam, mutata veste, statim fugam ornaverat in Scotiam. Sed cum hæreret in finibus, captus est, et retractus ex itinere. Ibi statim Homo gravis, et Columen atque Antistes Religionis, accessit ad nos, reliquit omnes suos, et repente factus est Adversarius infestissimus Papistarum. I nunc, et mega Transubstantiationem. Papistarum acies penè sua sponte ceciderunt. O, nisi nobis deesset operæ, non male de Religione sperari posset. Difficile enim est curram agere sine jumento, præsertim adverso monte. Heri, ubi primum Londinum redij, audivi ex Episcopo Cantuariensi, te invitari ad nos, et tibi Lectionem illam tuam veterem asservari. Quid sit, nescio: Hoc tantum possum affirmare, neuinem adhuc delectum esse, qui Oxonij doceat sacras Literas. Equidem te, mi Pater, videre percipio, et præsertim in Anglia. Quid enim ni cupiam, quem toties quopie etiam nunc videre Tiguri? Sed novi tuam Prudentiam: Nosti Genium, et Ingenium Insularum. Ea, quæ nunc videmus, esse inchoata, utinam sint boni Principia. Nihil est hodie illâ Scholâ desperatum. Putabis te, cum ibi esses, penè luisse operam: Ita in lætissima aliquando Segete, nunc infelix Lolium, et steriles dominantur avenæ. Liber tuus de Votis, ut alia tua omnia, avidissimè distrahitur. Omnes nunc expectamus, quam mox editurus sis alias Commentationes in Librum Judicum, et in duos Libros Samuelis. Omnes enim nunc nostri sciunt, te illos Libros habere præ manibus, et velle edere. Suecus, et Carolus Ferdinandi F. mirificissimè ambiunt. Sed Suecus impensè : Ille enim, modo impetret, montes argenteos pollicetur. Sed illa fortasse Thalamos propiores cogitat. Alanus noster obiit diem suum, postquam designatus esset Episcopus Roffensis. Ex Scotiâ hoc tempore nihil audimus, quod tibi possit videre novum. Docetur Evangelium, Ecclesiæ assiducè colliguntur, et omnia prisæ Superstitionis Monumenta convelluntur. Galli tamen sperant, se posse et Regnum, et Religionem retinere. Quicquid futurum est, scribam ad te aliàs pluribus. Instat nunc Annus sexagesimus, de quo mihi tu solebas aliquando ex Torquato quodam Stato, nescio que, mirifica predicare. Faxit Deus, ut verum et solidum Gaudium gaudeamus, ut aliquando Orbi terrarum patefiat ὁ ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἀπολείας, et in omnium oculos incurrat Evangelij Jesu Christi Veritas. Vale, mi Pater, et Uxorem tuam meis verbis resaluta, Mulierem mihi quidem ignotam, sed nunc ex tuis Literis, et Abeli nostri Prædicatione, notissimam. Gratulor et te illi, et illam tibi.

Saluta D. Bullingerum, D. Gualterum, D. Bernardinum, D. Hermannum, Julium, Juliam, Martyrillum. Frenshamum meum longum valere jubeo. Puto enim illum jam solvisse à vobis, et esse cum Christo. Omnes nostri te salutant, tibi que omnia precantur. Londini, 2 Novembr. 1559.

Tuus ex Animo, Jo. JUELLUS.

D. Etonus instantissimè rogavit, ut te suo Nomine salutarem. Si posset ipse Latinè scribere, non uteretur manu mea. Crede mihi, Nemo de te aut sæpius, aut honorificentius loquitur. Uxor etiam ejus Salutem, et tibi dicit, et Uxori tuæ.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

Idem ad Eundem.

BIDUO, postquam ex longo et perdifficili itinere rediissem, et lassus de via, atq; anhelans, nescio quid, ad te scripsissem, redditæ mihi sunt à te literæ ternæ eodem tempore : Quarum suavissimâ lectione ita sum exhilaratus, ut omnem illam superiorum dierum molestiam prorsus abjecerim ex animo. Etsi enim quoties de te cogito, quod certò assiducè, et in singulas Horas facio, et nisi facerem, ingratus essem, ipsa cogitatione, et memoriâ tuî nominis perfundor gaudio, tamen cum literas tuas ad me scriptas lego videor mihi esse Tiguri, et te videre coram, et tecum amœnissimè colloqui : Quod equidem, mihi crede, pluris æstimo, quam omnes opes Episcoporum. De Religione quod scribis, et veste scenica, ô utinam id impetrari potuisset. Nos quidem tam bonæ causæ non defuimus. Sed illi, quibus ista tantoperè placuerunt, credo, sequuti sunt inscitiam presbyterorum : Quos, quoniam nihil aliud videbant esse, quam stipites, sine ingenio, sine doctrina, sine moribus, veste saltem comica volabant populo commendari. Nam ut alantur bonæ literæ, et surrogetur seges aliqua doctorum hominum, nulla, ô Deus bone, nulla hoc tempore cura suscipitur.

Itaque quoniam vera via non possunt, istis ludicriis ineptiis teneri volunt oculos multitudinis. Sunt quidem istæ, ut tu optimè scribis reliquæ Amorehæorum. Quis enim id neget ? Atque utinam aliquando ab imis radicibus auferri, et extirpari possint, nostræ quidem nec vices ad eam rem, nec voces deerunt. Quod scribis esse quosdam, qui nullam adhuc significationem dederint suæ erga te voluntatis, subfalcio equidem quos dicas. Sed, mihi crede, non sunt eo numero, aut loco, quò tu fortasse putas, quoque omnis Israel illos sperabat fore. Nam si essent. Non scripserunt haecenus ad te, non quòd noluerint, aut tui obliiti fuerint, sed quòd puduerit scribere, nunc uterque laborat gravissimè, è quartana, sed quoniam est naturâ tristori, multò gravius. Inge-muisti, pro tua erga communem causam pietate, cum audires nihil prospectum esse cuiquam nostrum. Nunc ergo rursus ingeme. Nam ne adhuc quidem quicquam. Tantum circumferimus inanes titulos Episcoporum, et à Scoto, et Thoma defecimus ad Occamistas et Nominales. Sed, ut scis, magna sunt momenta regnorum. Regina ipsa et causæ favet, et nobis cupit. Quamobrem, etsi satis dura sunt ista initia, tamen non abjicimus animos, nec desinimus sperare lætiora. Facilè intereunt, quæ facilè maturitatem assequuntur. De Libro tuo, memini me, antequam discederem Londino, ad te scripsisse pluribus. Sed illæ literæ fortasse, ut fit, perierint itinere. Hoc etiam adscripsi, Reginam ultrè et cupidè legisse, Epistolam, et apud ipsam, atq; in universam doctrinam, atque ingenium tuum mirificè predicasse : Librumque illum tuum ab omnibus bonis tanti fieri, quanti haud scio an aliud quicquam in hoc genere. Nihil autem tibi haecenus donatum esse, hei mihi, quod ego dicam ? Pudet me, nec scio, quid respondeam. Tamen Regina sedulò sciscitata est nuntium, quid ageres, ubi viveres, quâ valetudine, quâ conditione esses, an posses per ætatem iter facerè. Omnino velle se omnibus modis te invitari in Angliam, ut, qui tua voce coluisses Academiam, eandem nunc dissipatam, et miserè habitam eadem voce irrigares. Postea tamen, nescio quo pacto, Deliberationes Saxonicae, et Legationes Segulianæ ista Consilia peremerunt. Tamen quicquid est, nihil est hoc tempore celebris, quam Petrum Martyrem invitari, et propediem venturum esse in Angliam. O utinam res nostræ aliquando stabilitatem aliquam, et robur assequantur. Cupio enim, mi Pater, te videre, et suavissimis Sermonibus, et amicissimis Consiliis tuis frui. Quem ego diem si videro, vel potius, uti spero, ubi videro quas Samarabrinas, aut Sarisburias non contemniam ? Vale dulcè decus meum, atque animi plusquam dimidium mei. Saluta uxorem tuam optimam mulierem meo nomine. Deus faxit, ut feliciter pariat, et pulchra faciat te prole Parentem. Saluta D. Bullingerum, D. Gualterum, D. Lavaterum, D. Simlerum, D. Gesnerum, D. Frisium, Julium, Juliam, et Martyrillum, D. Hermannum tuum, meumque. Nostri omnes te salutant. Londini, 5 Novemb. 1559.

S. P.—ETSI ante non ita multos dies ad te scripsissem, et hoc tempore nihil hic sit, quod tu magnopere scire velis, tamen, quoniam te ita velle non dubito, illud ipsum, nihil malo scribere, quam istum nuntium, quem fortè audieram velle Coloniam proficisci, inanem à me dimittere. Religio apud nos eo loco est, quo jam antea ad te scripsi sæpius. Omnia docentur ubique purissimè. In ceremoniis et larvis passim plusculum ineptitur. Crucula illa argenteola male nata, malè auspicata, adhuc stat in larario Principis. Me miserum: Res ea facile trahetur in exemplum. Spes erat aliquando tandem ereptum iri. Idque ut fieret, nos omnes dedimus diligenter, et adhuc damus operam. Sed jam quantum video conclamatum est. Ita prorsus obhæsi sunt animi. Nimis prudenter ista mihi videntur geri, nimisq; mysticè. Et quo tandem res nostræ casuræ sint, Deus viderit. Ἴπποι βαδύποδες morantur currum. Cæcilius causæ nostræ impensè favit. Episcopi adhuc designati tantum sunt: Interim prædia pulchrè augment fiscum. Academia utraque, et ea præsertim, quam tu non ita pridem doctissimè atq; optime coluisti, miserrimè nunc disjecta jacet, sine Pietate, sine Religione, sine Doctore, sine spe ulla Literarum. Multi de te cogitant primarii, et tibi non ignoti viri, et te primo quoque tempore, vel invitis omnibus Seguleiis, accersitum cupiunt. Ego vero, qui tibi, si quis alius mortalium, et animo, atq; unicè cupio, author sum, ut si voceris, quod tamen inter ista arma futurum vix puto, tamen ne quid præcipites. Novi ego Prudentiam tuam: Et tu vicissim, spero, Observantiam erga te meum. Equidem hoc possum verè affirmare, neminem esse Hominem, cui spectus tuus jucundior futurus sit; quam mihi. Tamen ut sunt res nostræ fluxæ, incertæ, instabiles, utque uno verbo dicam, insulares, magis te salvum audire absentem cupio, quam præsentem videre cum periculo. Sed ista parùm opportunè. Literas enim silere æquum est inter arma. Nos terra mariq; juvamus vicinam Scotum. Nosti enim, Tum tua res agitur paries cum proximus ardet. Gallum adventurum aiunt cum omnibus copiis. Et fortassè non minoribus excipietur. Londini, 16 Novemb. 1559.

Nos, in ipsius animi nostri sensus diligenter inquirendo, non Invenimus in nobis Voluntatem ullam deserendi hanc Solitariam Vitam, sed potius, juvante Deo, libentem animi Inductionem in eadem diutius porro vita perseverandi: nos certe necessario eo eam ipsam causam eo in his literis utemur sermone, qui cum corde nostro omnino consentiat, quem ut amanter accipiet, et benevole interpretetur vestra Majestas, admodum rogamus. In quo nostro sermone, si novum aliquid inesse videatur, quod facile potest accidere, si ætas nostra cum reliquis conditionis nostræ rationibus consideretur. Nullum tamen nos novum hoc tempore, aut subitum Consilium suscipere, sed vetus potius retinere videri jure debemus; cum tempus quidem fuit, quo tempore consensusse ad præclara sane et honorata Connubia eripere nos potuisset, è certis quibusdam magnis mœroribus et periculis: De quibus rebus non amplius dicemus; nos tamen nec discriminis mala, nec libertatis cupiditate moveri potuimus, ut animi nostri Voluntatem ullo modo ad eam rem adduceremus. Itaque haud volumus, Ejusdem ad Eundem.

OMNI Pater, quid ego ad te scribam? Rei non multum est, temporis verò multò minùs; sed quoniam te scio delectari brevitate, te auctore scribam brevius. Nunc ardet Lis illa Crucularia. Vix credas in re fatua quantum homines, qui sapere aliquid videbantur, insaniunt. Ex illis, quos quidem tu noris, præter Coxum, nullus est. Crastino die instituetur de ea re Disputatio. Arbitri erunt è Senatu selecti quidam viri. Actores inde Cantuariensis et Coxus; hinc Grindallus Londinensis Episcopus, et ego. Eventus èν κριτῶν γούνασι κριταί. Rideo tamen, cum cogito, quibus illi, et quàm gravibus, ac solidis rationibus defensuri sint suam Cruculam. Sed quicquid erit, scribam posthac pluribus. Nunc enim sub iudice lis est; tamen quantum auguror, non scribam posthac ad te Episcopus. Eò enim jam res pervenit, ut aut Cruces argentæ et stannæ, quas nos ubique confregimus, restituende sint, aut Episcopatus relinquendi.

Sed quid ago? destituit tempore, et obruor negotiis, et invitus cogor finem facere. Tamen hoc scire debes, Vitum, amicum tuum summum, et popularem Episcopum Vintoniensem, et Oglethorpum Carliolensem, et Bainum Litchfieldensem, et Tonstallum Saturnum Dunelmensem, ante aliquot dies esse mortuos. Samsonus ruri agit longè gentium; Parkhurstus in Regno suo. Itaque mirum videri non debet, si ad vos scribant infrequentius.

Saluta, quæso, Reverendissimum Patrem D. Bullingerum, D. Bernardinum, D. Wolphium, D. Hermannum, et Julium: Ad quos ego omnes libenter scriberem hoc tempore, si esset otium. Saluta optimam illam Mulierem, Uxorem tuam, et Annam, et Martyrillum tuum. Etonus, Etona, Abelus, Abela, Grindallus, Sandus, Scoræus, Falconerus, Elmenus, te salutant, et cum tibi omnia cupiant, nihil magis cupiunt, quàm Angliam. Quamquam, ut adhuc sunt Res nostræ, crede mihi, pulchrum est esse Tiguri. Benè vale, mi Pater, benè vale. Londini, 4 Februarij, 1560.

Edwinus Wigornensis ad Martyrem.

Salutem in Christo.

QUOD nullas tam diu, Vir Reverende, Literas ad te dederim, non officij quidem erga te mei oblitus, aut quid tua de me mereatur Humanitas leviter perpendens, id feci, sed negotiorum multitudo obrutus, scribendi munus pro tempore invitus intermisi, quod cum Tabellarij jam sese offert opportunitas, diutius differendum non censeo. Sub Augusti initium, cum Literas ad te dedissem, in partes Angliæ boreales, ad abusus Ecclesiæ tollendas, et Ritus Pietati et veræ Religioni consonantes, eidem restituendos, tanquam Inspector et Visitor, ut vocant, cum Principis Mandato dimissus; et illic ad Novembri usque initium, assiduè in obeundo quod mihi creditum erat munere, non sine maximis cum Corporis tum Animi Laboribus versatus, Londinum tandem redij. Ubi novæ rursus Curæ advenientem acceperunt, majorque negotiorum moles humeros premebat: Opera enim mea in Episcopatu Wigorniensis administrando à Principe requirebatur, tandemque reluctanti, Episcopi munus imponitur. Volui quidem ut antea Carliolensem, ad quem nominatus eram, hunc etiam Episcopatum omnino recusare; at id non licuit, nisi et Principis Indignationem mihi procurare, et Christi Ecclesiam quodammodo deserere voluissem. Sub hac, Literas tuas, omni humanitate plenissimas, Burcherus mihi tradidit; quibus, per eundem, quum hinc discederet, respondere distuli; partim, quod Res Angliæ tum temporis non ita mutata, sed in eodem quasi gradu consistentes, exiguum scribendi materiam suppedabant; partim verò, quod novum illud Onus (sic enim verius quam Honos dici potest) novis Curis et Negotiis me mirum in modum distrahebat. En diuturni Silentij mei causam habes, Vir plurimum observande. Eucharistiæ Doctrina hæcenus Dei Beneficio non impugnata, nobis salva et incolumis manet, mansuramque speramus. Pro viribus enim et ipse, et alij Fratres Co-episcopi, illam quoad vixerimus, Deo juvante tuebimur. De Imaginibus, jampridem nonnihil erat Controversiæ. R. Majestas, non alienum esse à Verbo Dei, immò in commodum Ecclesiæ fore putabat, si Imago Christi crucifixi, unà cum Maria et Joanne, ut tales, in celebriori Ecclesiæ loco poneretur, ubi ab omni Populo facillimè conspiceretur. Quidem ex nobis longè aliter judicabant; præsertim cum omnes omnis generis Imagines, in proxima nostra Visitatione, idque publica Autoritate, non solum sublata, verum etiam combustæ erant: Cumque huic Idolo, præ cæteris, ab ignara et superstitiosa plebe Adoratio solet adhiberi. Ego, quia vehementior eram in ista re, nec ullo modo consentire poteram, ut lapsus Occasio Ecclesiæ Christi daretur; non multum aberat, quin et ab Officio amoverer, et Principis Indignationem incurrerem. At Deus, in cujus manu Corda sunt Regum, pro Tempestate Tranquillitatem dedit, et Ecclesiam Anglicanam ab hujusmodi offendiculis liberavit: tantum manent in Ecclesia nostra Vestimenta illa Papistica, Capas intellige, quas diu non duraturas speramus. Quantum, ex eo quod te tuæque præsentia jam destituitur, Anglia detrimenti capiat, hic Ecclesiæ et Religionis negotium, diligenter et sepiusimè apud eos, quibus Republicæ Cura imminet, commemorare soleo. Nescio tamen quomodo animis eorum, in alias res gravissimas intentis, nihil hæcenus de te accersendo statutum video. Semel sat scio Reginæ in animo fuit, ut te vocaret: Quid verò impedivit, puto te facillè te colligere posse. Causa Christi multos semper habet adversarios; et qui optimi sunt, pessimè semper audiunt. Sacramentum illud Unitatis, magnas facit hodie divisiones. Novum tibi Conjugium gratulor: Precor ut felix faustumque sit; quemadmodum et mihi ipsi opto, qui eam Conjugij Legem nuper subij. Mirus hic belli apparatus est, partim ad propulsandam Gallorum vim, si fortè dum Scotiam sibi subjugare contenter, nostras fines invaserint, partim ad auxilium Scotis contra Gallos ferendum, sicubi Pacie fœdus nobiscum initum violaverint Galli. Det Deus, ut omnia in Nominis sui Gloriam, et Evangelij Propagationem cedant. Hæc priusquam me Wigorniam recipiam, quo brevi profecturum me spero, Literis tibi significanda duxi. Fœsius verò scripsissem, nisi quod sciam Fratrem nostrum Juellum, Episcopum Sarisburiensem, sæpe et diligenter de rebus nostris omnibus te certiore facturum. Si qua in re tibi gratificari queam, crede mihi, mi Honorande Petre, me semper uteris quoad vixero; immò etiam post Vitam, si fieri potest, pro arbitratu tuo.

Saluta quæso plurimum meo nomine, Clarissimum Virum D. Bullingerum. Debeo ipsi Literas, imò omnia ipsi debeo; et tantum solvam quantum possim, si quando offerat sese Occasio. Saluta Uxorem tuam, Julium cum Julia, D. Hermannum, Paulum et Martyrillum meum; quibus omnibus omnia felicia precor. Vale, Humanissime, Doctissime, ac Colendissime D. Petre. Argent. Dec. 17.

Ego te per Christum rogo, mi Pater optime, ne graveris mihi quàm citissimè respondere ad hæc pauca. Quomodo nobis agendum sit in Titulo illo, vel concedendo, vel denegando. Supremum Caput post Christum Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, &c. Universa Scriptura videtur hoc soli Christo tribuere, ut Caput Ecclesiæ vocetur. Secundo, Si Regina me ad aliquod Munus Ecclesiasticum, dico, ad Ecclesiam aliquam regendam vocaret; an salva Conscientia recipere possim, quum, hæc mihi videantur sufficere excusationis loco, ne in id consentirem. 1. Quod propter Disciplinæ Ecclesiasticæ defectum, Episcopus, vel Pastor, non possit suo fungi Officio. 2. Quod tot sint civilia Gravamina, Episcopatu, vel Pastori imposita, ut puta, primorum (ut dicimus) Frugum, i. e. Redituum primi Anni, tum Decimarum, ad hæc in Episcopatibus tot et tanta, insumenda sunt in equis alendis, in armis, in aulicis, quæ semper præstò debent esse; et ut tu nosti, ut quam minima pars Episcopatum relinquatur, ad necessaria Episcopo munia obeunda, nempe ad Doctos alendos, ad Pauperes pascendos, aliaque facienda quæ illius Ministerium reddant gratum. 3. Ut hoc ad Episcopos præcipuè referatur, quod nunc scribo, tanta est in eorum electione degeneratio à primâ Institutione, neque Cleri enim, neque Populi consensus habetur, tanta superstitiosi ornatus Episcopalis vanitas, ne dicam indignitas, quanta vix puto bene ferri possit, si modo omnia nobis facienda ad id quod expedit. Quod ad me attinet, non hæc scribo quasi talia sperarem; immò Deum precor ex animo, ne unquam talia mihi contingant onera; sed à te fidissimo meo Parente consilium peto, quo possim Instructor esse, si talia mihi obtingant. Ego sic responderem, Me quidem paratum esse in aliquo quocunque velit illa, inservire Concionandi munere, cæterum Ecclesiam Regendam me non posse suscipere, nisi ipsa prius justa Reformatione Ecclesiasticorum munerum, facta, Ministris Jus concedat omnia secundum Verbum Dei administrandi, et quantum ad Doctrinam, et quantum ad Disciplinam, et quantum ad bona Ecclesiastica. Si autem quæ sit illa Reformatio, quam peto, interrogetur; ex prioribus tribus Articulis, poteris tu conjicere, quæ ego petenda putem. Simpliciter, mi Pater, apud te solum depono Cordis mei secreta; teque per Christum rogo, ut mea secretò apud te solum teneas, et mihi quam citissime rescribas, quid mihi hic faciendum putes: Adde etiam quæ addenda putas, ut urgeatur illa Reformatio, et aliquid de ipsa Reformatione. Literas tuas ad Hætonum mitte: Ille curabit ad me transferri. Cæterùm, te per Christum rogo, ut quanta poteris festinantia scribas. Ego brevi iturus sum versus Angliam. Habemus Papistas, Anabaptistas, et plurimos Evangelicos Adversarios, et Doctrinæ et piæ Reformationi: Contra hos, ut tueatur, Gloriam Christi, promoveatque Vexillum Christi, quis idoneus? O mi Pater, pro me roga Deum incessanter.

A Second Letter of Sampson's, expressing great uneasiness that matters were not carried on as he wished.

[Ex MSS. Tiguri.]

Idem ad Eundem.

QUAS scripsisti Literas quarto Novembris, accepi tertio Januarij. Jam unum Annum egi in Anglia, non ita quietum; vereor autem, ne sequens Annus plus molestiarum mihi pariat. Non tamen solus timeo mihi, sed omnes nobis timeamus. Nec tamen audeo scriptis mandare, quæ imminere nobis videntur mala. Vos ergo Sanctissimi Patres, Teque imprimis, D. Petre, Pater et Præceptor Clarissime, per Jesum Christum obtestor ut strenuè Deum deprecari velitis: Hoc, hoc, inquam, contendite, ne Veritas Evangelij vel obfusceatur, vel evertatur apud Anglos. Gratias tibi ago, suavissime Pater, quod tam sis diligens in scribendo. Satisfecisti tu, satisfecit et D. Bullingerus mihi, in Quæstionibus; utrisque immortalis Deus noster rependat. Consecratio Episcoporum aliquorum jara habita est: D. Parkerus Cantuariensis, D. Cox Eliensis, D. Grindall Londinensis, D. Sands Vigorniensis, notos tibi nomino: Unus alius, Wallus, etiam est Episcopus, sed tibi ignotus. Sequuntur brevi, D. Pytkyntonus Vintoniensis, D. Benthamus Coventrensis, et tuus Juellus Sarisburiensis, brevi, inquam, ut audio, sunt isti consecrandi (ut nostro utar vocabulo). Ego in limine hæreo, neque enim vel egressus, vel ingressus datur. O quam vellem egredi. Deus ipse novit, quam hoc aveam. Episcopi sint alij; ego vellem aut Concionatoris solius, aut nullius munus subire: Domini fiat Voluntas. O mi Pater, quid ego sperem, cum exulet ex Aula Verbi Ministerium; admittatur autem Crucifixi Imago, cum accensis Luminaribus. Altaria quidem sunt diruta, et Imagines per totum Regnum. In sola Aula, Crucifixi Imago cum Candelis retinetur. Et miser Popellus id non solum libenter audit, sed et sponte imitabitur. Quid ego sperem, ubi tres ex Novitiis nostris Episcopis, unus veluti sacer Minister, secundus loco Diaconi, tertius Subdiaconi loco, Mensæ Domini astabunt, coram Imagine Crucifixi, vel certè non procul sito Idolo, cum Candelis, ornati aureis Vestibus Papisticis, sicque sacram Domini Cænam porrigebant, sine ulla Concione? Quæ spes boni, cum à multis istis Idololatriæ Reliquiis Religionem nostri petere volunt, et non à viva Dei Voce sonante? Quid sperem ego, cum concionaturus sinjungi debeat, ne Vitia asperè tangantur; cum Concionatores, si quid dicant quod displiceat, non ferendi putantur. Sed quomodo capit æstus iste animi, silendum est: Vix capita nostræ imminentes Miseriæ tetigi. Deus æternæ, nostri misere, per Christum Deum et Salvatorem nostrum. Unicam hanc à vobis Quæstionem pro-ponam solvendam: Mi Pater, te volo uti Mediatore apud D. Bullingerum, et D. Bernardinum. Hæc est: Num Imago Crucifixi, cum accensis Candelis, in Mensa Domini posita, num, inquam, sit inter Adiaphora ponenda. Si non sit, sed pro re illicita et nefaria dudenda, tum hoc quæro, si Princeps ita injungat omnibus Episcopis et Pastoribus, ut vel admittant in suas Ecclesias imaginem cum Candelis, vel Ministerio Verbi cedant, quid hic faciendum sit? Annon potius deferendum Ministerium Verbi et Sacramentorum sit, quam ut hæ Reliquiæ Amœrorum admittantur? Certè vident nonnulli ex nostris aliquo modo huc inclinare, ut hæc pro Adiaphoris accipi vellent. Ego omnino puto, potius abdicandum Ministerium, si modo id injungatur. Jam te rogo, mi Pater, tuas hic partes unica vice age; hoc est, ut quàm diligentissimè et citissimè me certiore facias, quid vestra pietas hic censet, quæque sit omnium vestrum sententia tui inquam D. Bullingeri, et D. Bernardin. Hujus Autoritas, ut audio, maxima est apud Reginam. Quod vellet aliquando scribere, hortatum illam, ut strenuè agat in Christi negotio: Testor ex animo, quod certe sciam (Fidenter dico) quod verè Filia Dei sit. Opus tamen habet ejusmodi Consiliariis qualis ille est: nam quod Augustinus Bonifacio dixit, id ferè in omnibus Principibus verum est; nempe, quòd plures habeant qui Corpori, paucos qui Animæ consulant. Quod autem ab illo contendo vellem, et à vobis petere si auderem. Ego tamen hæc in re vestræ me subijcio prudentiæ. Callet ut nòti Linguam Italicam, Latinè et Græcè etiam bene docta est. In his linguis si aliud scribatur à vobis, vel à Domino Bernardino, omnino puto rem gratissimam vos facturos Regiæ Majestati, et operam navaturos Anglicanæ utilissimam. Deus vos spiritu suo ducat in perpetuum. Bene vale; Et rescribe unica hæc vice quam poteris festinanter. Saluta meo nomine officiosissimè D. Bullingerum, tuamq; uxorem. Saluta Julium. Que jam scripsi, tantùm apud D. Bullingerum et D. Bernardinum promas. Nollem enim ego rumores spargi meo nomine. Imò nec hoc vobis scriberem, nisi sperarem aliquid inde boni eveniturum. Forsan vel scribetis (ut dixi) vel saltem bonum mihi dabitis consilium in proposita Quæstione. Agite vos pro vestra pia prudentia. Iterum vale. Raptiam. 6 Januar.

Tuus ex Animo,

THO. SAMPSON.

Si quid scribatur Regi Majestati, vel à te vel à Domino Bernardino, vel D. Bullingero, non quasi vos ab alio incitati fueritis scribendum, ut vos melius nostis, &c. Salutatur te ex animo noster Chamberus. Mea Uxor quartana vexatur. Giana bene valet. Puto etiam Hætonum cum sua bene valere. Rure ago inter Rusticos, Christum pro meo modulo tractans. Tu pro me Deum roga. Literas tuas Sprengiamus, vel Abelus ad me perferri curabit.

Archbishop Parker's Letter to Secretary Cecil, pressing the filling the Sees of York and Durham, then vacant.—An Original.

[Paper Office.]

AFTER salutations in Christ to your honore, this shal be instantly to desire you to make request to the queen's majestie, that some bishops myght be appoynted in the north: you wold not beleve me to tell howe often it is requyred at dyverse men's hands, an howe the people there is offended that thei be nothing caryd for: alasse ther be peple rude of ther owne nature, and the more had nede to be loked to, for retheyning those in quyet and cvyllitie. I feare that whatsoever is nowe to husbandly saved, wil be an occasion of furdur expence in keeping them down, yf (as God forfend) ther shuld be to much Iryshe and savage. Paradventur, Terence councelleth not amyse,—“pecuniam in loco negligare summum interdum lucrum.” I know the queen's highnes' disposition to be graciously bent to have her peple to know and fear God; why shuld other hynder her good zeale for mony sake as yt is most commonly judged? If such as have ben named to Yorke and Duresme be not acceptable, or of themselves not inclyned to be bestowed ther, I wold wishe that some such as be placed already, wer translated thither. And in myn opinion, yf you wold have a lawyer at Yorke, the bishop of St. David's, Dr. Yonge, is both wytty, prudent, and temperate, and man-like.

The bishop of Rochester were well bestowed at Durisme nye to his own contrye, wher tho ther ij bishopryks might be more easily provided for, and lesse inconvenience, though they for a tyme stood voyde: and if to the deanry of Durisme, to joyne with him wer Mr. Skyenner apoynted, whom I esteem learned, wise, and expert. I think you cowd not better place them; nowe yf eyther of them, or any of us all shall be feared to hurt the state of our churches, by exercising any extraordinary practising, for packing and purchasing; this feare myght sure be prevented. We have olde presidents in law practised in tymes past, for such parties suspected to be bownd at their entrye to leave ther churches in no worse case by ther defaults then thei fownd them, and then what wold you have more of us? I have afortyme weryed you in this sute, and yet I see these strange delays determyned. I shal not cease to trouble you therin: if ye here me not for justyce sake, for the zeale ye must beare to Christes deare soulys, importunyte shall wyne one day I dout not: for I see yt hath obtained even a “Judicibus iniquis quarto magis a misericordibus:” thus concluding, I shall offer my prayer to God that ye may fynd grace in your sollicitations to the queen's majestie for the comfort of her peple, and discharge of her owne soule. At Lambeth this 16th of October.

Your to my uttermost power,

A Letter of Bishop Jewel's to Peter Martyr, concerning the Council of Trent, the Lord Darnly's going to Scotland, with an account of his Mother.

Idem ad Eundem.

SALUTEM plur. in Christo. Gratissimæ mihi fuerunt Literæ tuæ, mi Pater, non solum quod essent à te, cujus omnia mihi debent esse, ut sunt gratissima, verum etiam quod omnem statum renascentis in Gallia Religionis luculentissimè describerent: Quodq; ego me, cum eam legerem, et te ita propè abesse scirem, propius etiam aliquantò te audire, et propius tecum colloqui arbitrarer. Nam quamvis res Gallicæ ad nos rumoribus, ut fit, et nuntiiis adferebantur, tamen et certiores, et multò etiam jucundiores visæ sunt, quod à te scriberentur, ab illo præsertim, quem ego scirem partem illarum fuisse maximam. Quòd scribis, illos, qui rerum potentiunt, omnino velle Mutationem in Religione aliquam fieri, non tam studiò et amore pietatis, quàm quòd Papistarum ineptias videant nimis esse ridiculas, quodq; non putent populum aliter posse in officio contineri; quicquid est, quancunq; causa ista fiant, modò prædicatur Christus, εἶτε προφάσει, εἶτε ἀληθείᾳ, καὶ ἐν τούτῳ καιρῷ, καὶ παραβῆναι. Tamen fieri non potest, quin disputatio illa vestra multùm et Evangelium promoverit, et adversarios adfixerit. Quod autem scribis, Interim quoddam à quibusdam, et Farraginem Religionis quæri, Deus id avertat: Scio omnes in Republ. magnas mutationes odiosas et graves esse: Et multa sæpè à Principibus, temporis causa, tolerari. Atq; illud fortasse ab initio non fuit incommodum. Nunc verò, postquam erupit Lux omnis Evangelii, quantum quidem fieri potest, vestigia ipsa erroris una cum ruderibus, atq; aiunt, cum pulvisculo auferenda sunt. Quod utinam nos in ista λυσσολα, obtinere potuissemus: Nam in dogmatibus prorsus omnia ad vivum ressecavimus, et ne unquam quidem latum absumus à doctrina vestra. De ubiuitate enim nihil est periculi. Ibi tantum audiri ista possunt, ubi saxa sapiunt.

Apud nos, de Religione omnia sunt pacata. Episcopi Mariani servant Turrim, et antiquum obtinent. Quod si Leges æquè nunc vigerent, atq; olim, sub Henrico, facillè succumberent. Est Genus Hominum contumax et indomitum: Ferro tamen et metu vincitur. Edidimus nuper Apologiam de mutata Religione, et Discessione ab Ecclesia Romana. Eum ego Librum, etsi dignus non est qui mittatur tam procul, tamen ad te mitto. Est multis in locis vitiosus, qualia sunt ea ferè omnia, quæ apud nos excuduntur; tanta est Typographorum nostrorum Negligentia. Regina nostra prorsus decrevit, nolle mittere ad Consilium: quod, an ullum, aut uspiam sit, nos nescimus. Certè si uspiam, aut ullum est, perarcanum, et valdè obscurum est. Nos nunc cogitamus publicare Causas, quibus inducti ad Concilium non veniamus. Ego quidem sic statuo et sentio, istis Congressionibus et Colloquiis, nihil posse promoveri hoc tempore, nec Deum velle uti istis mediis, ad propagandum Evangelium. Regina nostra, magno nostro cum dolore, innupta manet; neq; adhuc quid velit sciri potest. Tametsi, quò Suspicionis nostræ inclinent, satis te jamdudum scire arbitror. Succus diuturnus procus, et valdè assiduus, nuper admodum dimissus est. Ille, acceptà repulsâ, minatur, quantum audio, in Scotiam: Ut, cum apud nos hærec non possit, saltem possit in Vicinia. Est Mulier quedam Nobilis, Domina Margareta, Neptis Henrici Octavi, Mulier supra modum infensa Religioni, supra etiam Rabiem Marianam. Ad ejus filium, juvenem, plus minùs octodecim annos natum, summa rerum judicatur spectare, si quid Elisabethæ, quod nolimus, quodque Deus avertat, accidat. Ejus Mulieris Maritus, Leonesius Scotus, proximis istis diebus connectus est in Turrim. Filium, aiunt, vel ablegatum esse à Matre, vel profugisse in Scotiam. De eo, ut solet fieri, Sermo est multiplex. Regina Scotiæ, ut scis, innupta est: Potest inter illos convenire aliquid de Nuptiis. Quicquid est, credibile est, Papistas aliquid moliri: Sperant enim adhuc nescio quid non minùs quàm Judæi Messiam suum. Nuntius Pontificis hæret adhuc in Flandria: Nondum enim impetrare potest fidem publicam, ut tutò veniat in Angliam. Episcopus Aquitanus, Legatus Philippi, astutus, et callidus Veterator, et factus ad Insidias, satagit quantum potest, ejus Causa; saltem, ut audiatur; ne tam procul frustrâ venerit. Sperat enim uno Colloquio aliquid, nescio quid, posse fieri. Est Puella quedam Nobilis, Domina Catherina, Ducis Suffolchiensis Filia, ex Sanguine Regio, eoq; nominatim scripta ab Henrico Octavo in Testamento, ut si quid accidisset, quarto loco succederet. Ex eo, Comes Herfordiensis, Juvenis, Ducis Somersetensis Filius, suscepit Filium, et multi putant ex Stupro, sed ut ipsi dicunt, ex legitimis Nuptiis. Se enim clam inter se contraxisse, et advocato Sacrificatore, et paucis quibusdam arbitris, junxisse Nuptias. Ea Res turbavit animos multorum.

Nam si sunt veræ Nuptiæ, Puer, qui susceptus est, alitur ad Spem Regni. O nos miseros, qui non possumus scire, sub quo Domino victuri simus. Deus nobis Elizabetham, spero, diu vivam et incolumem conservabit. Id nobis erit satis. Tu, mi Pater, ora Deum, ut Rempublicam nostram, et Ecclesiam conservet. Vale, mi Pater, vale. Vale, dulce Decus meum.

Saluta meo Nomine Uxorem tuam, D. Bullingerum, D. Gualterum, D. Lavaterum, D. Zwinglium, D. Hallenum, D. Wikium, D. Gesnerum, D. Frisium, D. Wolphium, Julium, Juliam, et Martyrillum.

Instructions to the Queen's Commissioners treating in Scotland.—An Original.

[Paper Office.]

AFTER our right hartly commendations, we have receyved your letters of the 11th of this month, and by the same do understande at good length your proceedings with the French commissioners hitherto, and in the end of the death of the dowager of Scotland : for your advertisementes whereof we give unto you, on the queen's majesties behalf, most hartly thanks : and like as her highnes doth well allowe your opinion for the signifying unto king Phillippe's ambassadors, that we be entred into treaty with the French, and are in very good way towards accorde, and fade not things alltogether so harde to be brought to composition as was supposed; so hath her majestie taken order, that one shall be out of hande sent to declare the same unto them, with signification also what her highnes hath harde of the dowager's death. As touching the other points of your letter wherin you require her highnes' resolution: we have considered the same, and upon reporte of our opinions to the queen's majestie, her highnes hath resolved as followeth: fyrst, in case the Frenche commissioners upon the understanding of the dowager's death will nedes presse to returne back againe without following their commission; her highnes in that case is pleased, that after you shall have provoked them by such good meanes as you can best devise, to contynue; if in the ende they will nedes breake of, and returne, you shall agree they may so do, and thereupon consulting with our very good lorde the duke of Norfolk, and imparting the state of the case unto the lords of Scotland, to take order by their good advice, howe the purpose intendyd for expelling the French, and assuring of that realme, according to that hath byn heretofore determined, may best and most spedely be brought to passe, which in case the French breake of from treatte, her majestie wolde sholde be gon thorough withall without any longer delay, or loss of time; the rather for that it appeareth by all advertisements, that the French seeke nothing so much as to wyn tyme, and draw forth matters in length to serve theyr purpose wythall; which must not be endured: And where your desire to know what you shall doe if the French commissioners that be with you will require the presence of some of theyr colleagues in the town; her highnes thinketh, as you doe, that the same is in no wise to be grauntyd, nor the said commissioners that be in Lyth to be suffered to issue, or treatte of this matter otherwise then is prescribed by your instructions. As touching the last point, where ye desire to know what shall be done, in case the said French commissioners shall require assistance of such Scottysshemen as were of the French faction: her highnes thinks fyt, yf the same shall be demanded, that the lords of Scotland be made privie thereunto; and in case they and you shall not see some reasonable cause of the contrary, her majestie thinketh, and so do we also, that it may without daunger be grantyd, wherin nevertheless you may use your good discretions as you shall see may best stand with the advancement of his highnes' service. And forasmuche as one Parrys, an Iresheman, who hath (as we think you doe well enough remember) byn a fugitive out of this realme nowe a long time together, is as we understande come from the French, and hath now yelded himself into the lorde Greye's hands: we hartely pray you, in case you may conveniently, to talk with the said Parrys, and understand of him what he can say touching the practises that hath byn attemptyd in Ireland, or any other thing concerning the state of the queen's majestie, or her realme; and to lett us know what he is able to say therein, to the intent if his meaning and doing shall appere unto you to deserve the same, we may be sutors unto her highnes for his pardon, and for suche farther consideration of hym, as his doing shall deserve. And thus we wish you most hartely well to fare. From Grenewich the 15th of June, 1560.

*The Commission of the Estates to move Queen beth to take the Earl of Arran to her Husband.—

THE lords of parliament, and others under-written, havand consideration how the kingdome of England is joynt with this, Be an dray march, how puissant it is; what incommodity we and our forefathers have felt, be the continual weirs betwix the tuo nations; and be the contrar, how profitable there amyty may be to us, what welth and commodity we may obtain therthrow; hes thought good divysed and ordained, that the occasion presently opened up to us shal be followed, that is, sute made to the queen of England in the best manner, that it may please her majesty, for establishing of one perpetual friendship, to joine in marriage with the carll of Arran; being of the lawfull blood of this realme, and failzieing of succession of the queen, our soverain ladies body, next his father, the duke's grace of Chastellerault declared be act of parliament, second person of the realme, air apparrant to the crown; and for that purpose that honourable persons be sent in ambassate, fra them yn behalf of the estates. And to the effect, the sute may be made in the most honourable manner, and to her majesty's best contentation, they have devised that presently in plane parliament it shal be devised, that certain ambassadours be sent to her majesty, fre the estates, to give her hienes thanks for the guid will she has ever born to this realme, sen she came to her crown, and desire she hes that it may continue a free kingdom in thantiant liberty, sufficiently of late declared, be her support liberally granted for the relief therof; and for the guid quietnes we presently enjoy, purchast to us be her majesty's means and labours; and they are withall to desire of her heeness to give strait commandments to her wardains, and officers upon the borders, to continue with ours, for suppressing of broken men, and stanching of thift, with sic other things as are necessar for the common weel of this realme: and that the states give power to the lords of articles, and others underwritten, to devise sic commision and instructions as are necessar, for that purpose, to be sealed, and subscribed be six of the principals of every estate, whilk sal be as sufficient, as gif it were subscribed and sealed be the hail estates; and thereafter the lords of articles, and ours under specified, to devise the instructione and commision tuching the heid of the marriage.

NUMBER LXIX.

The Queene's Majesties Answer declared to her Counsell concerning the Requests of the Lords of Scotlande.—In Sir W. Cecil's Hand.

[Cott. Lib. Calig. B. 10. fo. 133.]

Her Majestie reduced the answer into three points.

1. THE first was, That where the three estats had sent the lords of Scotland to present their hartly thanks to her majestie for the benefits received this last yere by her majestie's ayde given to them. Her majestie is very glad to perceave her good will and chardgs so well bestowed as to see the same thankfully accepted and acknowledged; and findeth the same to have been seasonable planted that produceth so plentiful fruct, with the which her majestie doeth so satisfie herself, as if at any time the like cause shall happen wherin her friendship, or ayde, shall, or may profit them for their just defence, the same shall not be wantings. And although in former times it appeared that sondry benefits bestowed upon divers of the nobilitie here by her majestie's most noble father, had not such success, nor was answered with like thankfulness: yet her majesty doth nowe evidently see the cause thereof to be for that the meanenings of her father's benefits were interpreted, and supposed to be to the discomoditye of the land, and these her majesties be evidentlye sene to bend directlye to the safetye of that realme. And so the diversitie of the bestowing hath made the diversitie in the operacion and acceptation of them.

The 8th of

2. The second point is, where the same estates have by their parlyament accorded, that suty should be made for the mariage with her majesty of the earl of Arrayne; her majesty cannot interpret that motion to come but both of a good meaneing of the same estaits, pretendinge thereby to knit both theis kingdomes presently in amytie, and hereafter to remaine in a perpetuall amytie; and of a great good will of the same estates towards her majesty, offeringe to her the best and choicest person that they have, and that not without some daunger of the displeasure of the French kinge in so doinge: for answer hereunto, her majesty findeing herself not disposed presently to marry, (although it may be that the necessitie and respect of her realme shall hereto hereafter constrain her,) wished that the earle of Arrayne should not forbear to accept such mariage as may be made to him for his own weill and surety; and that all other means be used to the continuance of amytie firmly betwixt these kingdomes; whereunto her majesty thinketh many good reasons ought to induce the people of both realmes, and in a manner to continewe as good amytie therby, as by mariage: for it appeareth, that if every nobleman of Scotlande will well consider how necessarye the friendship of this realme is to that, for the preservation of their liberties; they shall chiefly for safeguard of themselves joyne together in concord with this realme, and so every one particularly minding his own suretye, of consequence the love and amytie shall be universall; by which means her majesty thinketh the amytie may be well assured, though no marriage be obtayned. And as to the person of the earle of Arrayne, her majesty surely hath heard a verie good report of him, and thinketh him to be a noble gentleman of great woordnesse, and so thinketh surely that he shall prove hereafter.

3. Thirdly and lastly, her majesty thancketh the said lords for their paines and travell; and although she doubteth nether of their wisdom, nor of the providence of the estates at home in Scotland, yet for demonstracion of her hearty good will, her majesty cannot forbear to require them not to forget the practises that be past, by such as before tyme sought the subversion of them; and nowe much more will doe it, if there maye be left any entry for corruption, be reward, or other scope of practise. And therefore her majesty wisheth, that they all do persist, first in a good concorde, makinge their causes come amongst themselves; and not to dissever themselves in any factions, but to foresee well things before they chauce: for that her majesty thinketh this prove verie true, that darts foreseen, hurt verie little, or not at all. And for her majesty's parte, there shall no reasonable thinge be neglected, that may furder this comun action of defence of both the realmes, against any common enemye.

PLEASETH it your majesty. The same may remember, that at my lord of Bedford's being in this court, he and I demanded of you, on the behalfe of the queen's majesty, our mistress, your good sister and cousyne, your ratification of thaccord lately made at Edingborough in Scotland. Wherunto you made answer, amonge other things, that your counsell being not about you; namely your uncle, my lord cardinal of Lorraine, by whom you are advised in your affaires, and also for that your majesty had not heard from your counsell in Scotland, from whom you looked to hear them verie shortlye; you could make us no direct answer therein. But that heering from them, and having consulted with your counsell heere; you would satisfie her majesty in the same. Sins whiche tyme, her majesty having knowledge of the coming to you of the lord James, your brother, who passed lately through England hitherwards, by whom (her majesty judgeth) you will be advised, bothe in respect of his ranke and estimation in your realme of Scotland, and also for that he hathe the honour to be your majesty's brother, and of good credite with you: and nothing doubting of your consultation with my said lord cardinall, and others of your counsell heere sins that tyme; her majesty hathe presentlie commanded, and authorized me to put your majesty in remembrance therof againe; and to renew the demande of your confirmation of the said late accord. Therefore I have presently depechid to you this gentleman, bearer heerof, her majesty's servant: by whom, I beseeche you, to let me understand your resolute answer in that behalfe. And upon knowledge of your pleasure, to delyver me the said ratification; and of the tyme and place, I will not faile (God willing) to resort, whither your majesty will appoint me to come for that purpose.

By demanding of this ratification, as the queen's majesty, my mistress, your good sister, dothe shew the great desyre she hathe, to lyve from hence forth in all assured good love, peas and amytie with you, and your realme; so, in her oppynion, there is nothing that can argue your reciproke good will, to answer to the lyke for your parte agayne, so much as the stablishing the same by this knot of frendship which God hath appointed, and hath been chief worker therein, for both your quyetnesses and comforts; being now the onlie refuge of you both. altogether so harde to be brought to composition as was supposed; so hath her majestie taken order, that one shall be out of hande sent to declare the same unto them, with signification also what her highnes hath harde of the dowager's death. The Commission of the Estates to move Queen Elizabeth to take the Earl of Arran to her Husband.—Taken from the Original now at Hamilton.

THE lords of parliament, and others under-written, havand consideration how the kingdome of England is joynt with this, Be an dray march, how puissant it is; what incommodity we and our forefathers have felt, be the continual weirs betwixt the tuo nations; and be the contrar, how profitable there amytye may be to us, what welth and commodity we may obtain therthrow; hes thought good divysed and ordained, that the occasion presently opened up to us shal be followed, that is, sute made to the queen of England in the best manner, that it may please her majesty, for establishing of one perpetual friendship, to joine in marriage with the earl of Arran; being of the lawfull blood of this realme, and failzieing of succession of the queen, our soverain ladies body, next his father, the duke's grace of Chastellerault declared be act of parliament, second person of the realme, air apparrant to the crown; and for that purpose that honourable persons be sent in ambassate, fra them yn behalf of the estates. And to the effect, the sute may be made in the most honourable manner, and to her majesty's best contentation, they have devised that presently in plane parliament it shal be devised, that certain ambassadours be sent to her majesty, fre the estates, to give her hieness thanks for the guid will she has ever born to this realme, sen she came to her crown, and desire she hes that it may continue an free kingdom in thantiant liberty, sufficiently of late declared, be her support liberally granted for the relief therof; and for the guid quietnes we presently enjoy, purchast to us be her majesty's means and labours; and they are withall to desire of her heeness to give strait commandments to her wardains, and officers upon the borders, to continue with ours, for suppressing of broken men, and stanching of thift, with sic other things as are necessar for the common weel of this realme: and that the states give power to the lords of articles, and others underwritten, to devise sic commision and instructions as are necessar, for that purpose, to be sealed, and subscribed be six of the principals of every estate, whilk sal be as sufficient, as gif it were subscribed and sealed be the hail estates; and thereafter the lords of articles, and ours under specified, to devise the instructione and commission tuching the heid of the marriage.

The Queenes Majesties Answere declared to her Counsell concerning the Requests of the Lords of Scotlande.—In Sir W. Cecil's Hand.

[Cott. Lib. Calig. B. 10. fo. 133.]

Her Majestie reduced the answeere into three points.

1. THE first was, That where the three estats had sent the lords of Scotland to present their hartly thanks to her majestie for the benefits received this last yere by her majestie's ayde given to them. Her majestie is very glad to perceave her good will and chardgs so well bestowed as to see the same thankfully accepted and acknowledged; and findeth the same to have been seasonable planted that produceth so plentiful fruct, with the which her majestie doeth so satisfie herself, as if at any time the like cause shall happen wherin her friendship, or ayde, shall, or may profit them for their just defence, the same shall not be wantinge. And although in former times it appeared that sondry benefits bestowed upon divers of the nobility here by her majesty's most noble father, had not such success, nor was answered with like thankfulness: yet her majesty doth now evidently see the cause thereof to be for that the meaning of her father's benefits were interpreted, and supposed to be to the discommodity of the land, and these her majesties be evidently seen to bend directly to the safety of that realm. And so the diversity of the bestowing hath made the diversity in the operation and acceptance of them.

2. The second point is, where the same estates have by their parliament accorded, that they should be made for the marriage with her majesty of the earl of Arrayne; her majesty cannot interpret that motion to come but both of a good meaning of the same estates, pretending thereby to knit both their kingdoms presently in amity, and hereafter to remain in a perpetual amity; and of a great good will of the same estates towards her majesty, offering to her the best and choicest person that they have, and that not without some danger of the displeasure of the French king in so doing: for answer hereunto, her majesty finding herself not disposed presently to marry, (although it may be that the necessity and respect of her realm shall hereafter constrain her,) wished that the earl of Arrayne should not forbear to accept such marriage as may be made to him for his own will and surety; and that all other means be used to the continuance of amity firmly betwixt these kingdoms; whereunto her majesty thinketh many good reasons ought to induce the people of both realms, and in a manner to continue as good amity thereby, as by marriage: for it appeareth, that if every nobleman of Scotland will well consider how necessary the friendship of this realm is to that, for the preservation of their liberties; they shall chiefly for safeguard of themselves joyne together in concord with this realm, and so every one particularly minding his own surety, of consequence the love and amity shall be universall; by which means her majesty thinketh the amity may be well assured, though no marriage be obtained. And as to the person of the earl of Arrayne, her majesty surely hath heard a verie good report of him, and thinketh him to be a noble gentleman of great worthinesse, and so thinketh surely that he shall prove hereafter.

3. Thirdly and lastly, her majesty thanketh the said lords for their pains and travell; and although she doubteth nether of their wisdom, nor of the providence of the estates at home in Scotland, yet for demonstration of her hearty good will, her majesty cannot forbear to require them not to forget the practises that be past, by such as before tyme sought the subversion of them; and now much more will do it, if there may be left any entry for corruption, be reward, or other scope of practise. And therefore her majesty wisheth, that they all do persist, first in a good concord, making their causes come amongst themselves; and not to disserve themselves in any factions, but to foresee well things before they chance: for that her majesty thinketh this prove verie true, that darts foreseen, hurt verie little, or not at all. And for her majesty's parte, there shall no reasonable thing be neglected, that may further this common action of defence of both the realms, against any common enemy.

NUMBER LXXII.

An Original Letter of the Ambassador's to the Queen, upon that Affair.

[Paper-Office.]

It maye please your majestie to be advertised, that haveing written this other Lettre, and being ready to have depeched it to your majestie; Mr. Somer, your highnesses servant, arryved heere from Nanci in Lorraine, from the queene of Scotland, with answer to my lettre, which (by your majesties commandment) I wrote to her, in such sorte, as I have advertised by my former, and therewith sent to your majestie the copies of my lettres to the saide queen and cardinall of Lorraine. Which her answer being by lettre (having also said as much by mouth to Mr. Somer), together with the said cardinall's answer; I send your majestie herewith. And though your majesties said servant used the best speech as he coude, to get some direct answer of her, accordinge to her late promesses, putting her in remembrance of her words to my lord of Bedford, and to me at Fontainebleau: yet other answer nor direction, then is conteyned in her lettre, coude he not gette of her. And seinge she hath defferred to make me further answer, till my next meetinge with her, which she rekenith shall be at Reims, at the French king's sacre, as appeareth by her said lettre; where, she and the cardinall told Mr. Somer, she mynded to be the 8th of Maye; for that it is said the sacre shall be the 15th; and for that your majestie hath commanded me, for some respects, not to be at it; I know not when I shall have the oportunitie and meanes to speake with the said queen for her answer. Therefore seing I cannot be at Reims (as indeede, besyeds your majesties commandment, myne indisposition of my bodye will not suffer me to come there) and also for that (as I heere) the said queen myndeth not to come into these partes this good while; if it wold please your majestie, to send hither your lettres of credit directed unto her, therby to authorize Mr. Somer, your majesties said servant, to demande and receive her answer therin, in myne absence, by reason of my sicknesse; I take it, your majestie shall the sooner have her direct answer. If your majestie finde this good, it may please the same, to send such your lettres hither, with good speed, that the answer may be had, before she departe agayne from Reims.

And though I thinke verily, that her answer will be such as I have already advertised your majestie she made to my lord James (which is means to draw the tyme still into greater length), yet the same, or anye other, being made to your majestie by her self; you shall the better know how to procede with her in the matter afterwards.

The said queen of Scotland was accompaigned at Nancy with the dowager of Lorraine (whom they call there Son Altezze) the duke and duchesse of Lorraine, monsieur de Vaudemont, the cardinales of Lorraine and Guyse, and the duke d'Aumalle. One of the chiefest causes of her going thither from Joinville (being 18 Lorraine leagues of) as I heere, was to christen monsieur de Vaudemont's yong sonne, borne lately at Mallegrange, a quarter of a league from Nancy.

I wrote to your majestie, by my letters of the 23d of this present, that the queen of Scotland wold authorize my said lord James, (as she had told him her self) to have the speciall charge of the government of the affaires in Scotland, till her comminge thither; and wold, for that purpose, give him commission under her seale. For which comission, and other letters, he left a gentleman of his with the said queen, to bring it after him to this towne. The gentleman is returned from the queen with her letters, but hath brought no commission: and I understande, that she hath now changed her mynd in that point; and will appoint none to have authorize there, till she come her self. And as to such sutes and requestes, as are made to her for benefices, and such other things as are to be bestowed; she will not dispose of any of them, nor make other answer therin, till her comminge thither. Which (it is thought) she dothe, to bestowe the same upon some such as she shall see worthy of her favour and prefermente, and upon others, to winne them the sooner to her devotion. The speciall cause why she hath changed her opinion for my lord James (as I heere) is; for that she coude by no means dis-swade him from his devotion and good opinion towards your majestie, and the observation of the league between your majestie and the realme of Scotland. And also for that she, nor the cardinall of Lorraine, coude not winne nor divert him from his religion; wherin they used verie great meanes, and perswasions. For which respects, the said lord James deserveth to be the more estymid of your majestie. And seeing he hath dealt so plainly with the queen his souveraine, on your majesties behalf, and shewed himself so constant in religion, that neither the feare of his souveraine's indignacion coude waver him, nor great promesses winne him; your majestie may (in myne opinion) make good accompt of his constancy towards you: and so deserveth to be well enter-tayned and made of, by your majestie, as one that may stand you in no small steade, for the advancement of your majesties desire. Sins his being heere, he hath dealt so frankly and liberally with me, that I must beleeve he will so contynue after his return home. And in case your majestie wold now in tyme, liberally and honorably consider him with some good means, to make him to be the more beholding to your majesty; it wold, in my simple judgment, serve your majestie to great purpose. He departeth hence homeward about the 4th of Maye, by the way of Diepe, and myndith to land at Rye: wherof I thought good to advertise your majestie, that it may please the same to give order, for him and his company to be receyved and accommodated as apertenith: which will be well bestowed upon him, for the good reporte he made of his late reception there, and of the great favour your majestie shewed him at his coming hitherwards.

I understand that the queen of Scotland maketh accompt to fynd a good partie in her realme, of such as are of her religion. And amongst other, the earle of Huntley hath promysed, that having the duke on his side, he, with such other as he holdeth assured, will be able enough to make head to the contrary parte. And so hath he promised to bring greate things to passe there, for the queen's purpose and affection.

I understand (and so gather partly by my said lord James' own words) that soone after his retourne home into Scotland, he shall marye the earle marshall's daughter.

As I have written heertofore to your majestie, that this realm was in danger of great unquietnes amonge themselves for religion; so the 28th of April, the same beganne to appeare in this towne. Certain gentlemen, and others, about a hundred, assembled together in a private house in the suburbs, where they had a sermon, and psalmes singing, as is used in all assemblies. Wherewith the people offended, assembled to great numbers, forced the walles of a garden joining to the house; made a great breach with such tooles as they coude gett, and would have entred with violence to have wrought their cruaulty uppon the gentlemen.

The other seing none other remedye, their perswasions serving to litle effect with such an unruly sorte, defended themselves with such weapons and harguebouzes, as they had provided against all events, and so slew 7 or 8 of the assaillants, and defended the house till the justice and court of parliament of this town appeased and retrayed the people. And the night following, the defendants shifted themselves away thence, without farther harme; hitherto nothing elles is done heerupon. What will ensue, it is to be feared. In the mean time, the people murmure greatly at the slaughter. And the other parte are not a litle moved generally, to be so assaulted and molested, contrary to the king's edicts, which permitte all men to live according to their consciences, so they give none occasion of slander or offence to the people, or publique preaching, and that command all men not to reproach or injury the one, the other, for their living in that sorte. Between these two partyes the justice is so litle feared, and pollycy hath now so litle place, that greater things are to be feared, unlesse better and speedyer order be provided to appease all, then I can see towards.

I understand that the queen of Scotland hath hitherto no great devotion to Ledington, Grange, and Balnaves, wherof I am nothing sorry. But she mindeth to use all the best meanes she can to wynde them to her, which she trusteth well to compass.

And wheras I have advertised your majestie that the baron de la Garde shulde cary this king's order to the king of Sweden: I understand now, that it is to the king of Denmarke, and not to the other.

Having written thus farre, I understand, that wheras it was determined that the king shuld have departed the 28th of Aprill from Fontainbleau towards Reims to his sacre: the same is retarded, by reason that the queen mother is fallen sicke of a catarre. So that both his departure from thence, and the time of his sacre is now uncertain, and dependith wholly upon the said queen mother's recovery.

Though I take it that your majestie hath received from your ministers in Germany the pope's demand of the princes protestants of Germany, and their answer therunto; yett having recovered the same here, I thought in my duety to send it to your majestie as I do heerewith. And thus I pray God long to preserve your majestie in health, honnour, and all felicitie. From Paris the first of Maye, 1561.

Your majesties humble and most obedient subject and servant,

N. THROKMORTON.

SALUTEM Plurimam in Christo.—Redditæ mihi sunt non ita pridem Literæ tuæ, Scriptæ Tiguri ad quintum diem Martii: Quæ quamvis essent et querulæ, tamen mihi perjuvandæ videbantur; non tantum quod à te essent, cujus omnia scripta dictaque mihi semper visa sunt honorifica, sed etiam quod officium meum ita obnixè requirerent, et meam in scribendo negligentiam et scordiam excitarent. Ego verò, mi Pater, et Domine Colendissime etai minùs fortasse ad te sæpè scribo quàm velim, tamen quoties occasio aliqua offertur, ne hoc quidem officium intermitto. Binas enim dedi nuper

Quæ si adhuc, ut sit, subsistant fortè in itinere, tamen expediet sæ aliquando, et postremò uti spero, ad te pervenient. Ego interim de te cogitare, et honorificè ut debeo, de te loqui nunquam desino. De Gallicis rebus ad te scribere hoc tempore, esset fortasse putidum: Omnia enim ad vos etiam sine ventis et navibus afferentur. Sanctissimus nihil relinquet intentatum. Flectere si nequeat superos, Acheronta movebit. Videt enim jam non agi de reduvitiis, sed de vita et sanguine. Utinam ne nostri sese patiantur circumveniri. Dux Guisanus, ut, nescio qua spe moderandæ Religionis, et recipiendæ Confessionis Augustanæ, moratus est Principes Germanicæ, ne se admiserent huic bello; ita omnibus modis persuadere conatus est Reginæ nostræ, non agi nunc in Gallia negotium Religionis; esse manifestam conjurationem, causam esse Regis, cui illam, cum Regium locum teneat, non oporteat adversari. Intereà id egit, ut Neptis sua, Regina Scotiæ, ambiret gratiam, atque amicitiam Reginæ nostræ, et munuscula mitteret, et nescio quas fides daret: Velle se, hac æstate honoris causa venire in Angliam; et æternum amicitiaæ Fœdus, quod nunquam postea convelli possit, velle sancire. Misit ea adamantem maximi pretii, gemmam pulcherrimam, undique vestitam auro, et commendatam pulchro et eleganti carmine. Quid quæris? Putabant festivis colloquiis, et venationibus, et blanditiis, animos nostros abduci facilè posse à strepitu bellico, et consopiri. Interea, Regina nostra, cum subodorata esset rem omnem, et quid ageretur intelligeret; neque enim id erat adeò difficile, mutare Consilium de protectione, à Guisanis paulatim alienari, et ad Principem Condensensem non obscure inclinare. Tulit id Guisanus indignè, Consilia sua non procedere; accepit contumeliosè Legatum nostrum, proposuit Edicta publicè, Reginam Angliæ insidias facere Regno Galliarum, et solam istos tumultus concitasse. Ista, Regina nostra patienter ferre non potuit, nec sanè debuit. Statim apertè agere, Legatum, uti audio, revocare, militem scribere, navibus omnibus undecunque, atque ubicunque essent, et suis et alienis vela tollere, ne quis exire posset, et quid ageretur nuntiare. O si ea id antea facere voluisset, aut si nunc Principes Germaniæ hoc exemplum sequi vellent. Facilius, et minori jactura, Sanguinis Christiani tota res posset transigi. Et Regina quidem misit hoc tempore in Germaniam, ad Principes; et nunc in Aula Legatæ à Guisano, cum novis, ut opinor, blanditiis, ut nos moretur et impediatur. Sed non ita erit facile, spero, imponere videntibus. Res Scotiæ de Religione satis sunt pacatæ. Regina sola Missam suam retinet inivitis omnibus. Incredibilis fuit hoc anno toto, apud nos, cœli atque aëris intemperies. Nec Sol, nec Luna, nec Hyems, nec Ver, nec Æstas, nec Autumnus, satisfecit officium suum. Ita affatim, et penè sine intermissione pluit, quasi facere jam aliud Cœlum non queat. Ex hac contagione nata sunt monstra: infantes fœdum in modum deformatis corporibus, alii prorsus sine capitibus, alii capitibus alienis; alii trunci sine brachiis, sine tibiis, sine cruribus; alii ossibus solis coherentes, prorsus sine ullis carnibus, quales ferè imagines mortis pingi solent. Similia alia complura nata sunt è porcis, et equabus, è vaccis, è gallinis. Messis hoc tempore apud nos Angustius quidem provenit, ita tamen ut non possimus multum conqueri. Dico Die Sabbati Decimo Tertio Die Februarii, in Inferiori Domo Convocationis Cleri Provinciae Cant' post meridiem hora constituta convenerunt frequentes Dominus Proloquutor cum cæteris nominatis ubi post Divini numinis implorationem Legebantur quidem Articuli approbandi vel reprobandi a cætu quorum Articulorum tenor talis est.

1. That all the Sundays of the year and principal feast of Christ be kept holy-days, and other holy-days to be abrogate.

2. That in all parish churches, the minister in common-prayer turn his face towards the people, and there distinctly read the divine service appointed, where all the people assembled may hear and be edified.

3. That in ministring the sacrament of baptisme, the ceremonie of making of the crosse on the child's forehead may be omitted, as tending to superstition.

4. That for as much as divers communicants are not hable to kneel during the time of the communion, for age, sicknes, and sundry other infirmities; and some also superstitiously both kneel, and knock; that the order of kneeling may be left to the discretion of the ordinarie, within his jurisdiction.

5. That it be sufficient for the minister, in time of saying of divine service, and ministring of the sacraments, to use a surplice: and that no minister say service, or minister the sacraments, but in a comely garment or habit.

6. That the use of organs be removed.

Bishop Horne's Letter to Gualter, concerning the Controversy about the Habits of the Clergy.

[Ex MSS. Figur.]

Robertus Hornus Gualtero.

LITERAS tuas, mi Gualtere primas, quàm amanter et jucundè acceperim, vel hinc existinare debes, quòd de Tigurinæ Reipublicæ Statu, in cuius Fide ac Liberalitate exul collocatus fueram, tum de tui reliquorumque amicissimum, et de me optimè meritorum valetudine cognoscebam. Accedebat tua in Johannis Evangelium Lucubratiō, scribendi, ut tu ais, Occasio, quam ita probo, ut ad veram Scripturarum Scientiam et Pietatem conferre multum iudicem, et non solum à Tyronibus, quibus tu potissimum studes, sed ab ipsis Professoribus legendam existimem. In Fœdere Gallico et Helvetico, perspicatim Tigurinam probo, quæ astutias Gallicas, Religionis prætextu adumbratas, olfecit et patefecit. Bernenses etiam Vicinos vestros spero, suasu vestro ab inhonesto fœdere assensum cohibebituros. De Peste, quæ Regionem Tigurinam invasit, opinionem habeo, quòd impiorum causa etiam ipsi pij affliguntur. Quà percussus Pater Bullingerus, quòd periculum evasit, debemus putare eum qui duriora Tempora sustulit, felicioribus esse à Domino reservatum. Tuam domum à contagione tutam, divinæ Clementiæ quæ laboribus tuis voluit otium, ascribo. Res nostræ ita se habent, quòd ut vos vicinas Gallicas, sic nos intestinas Papiasticas timemus Insidias. Primates Papiastici in publicis custodiis, reliqui exilium affectantes, scriptis quibusdam in vulgus disseminatis, sese in gratiam, nos in odium vocant. Ansam minutam sanè et ejusmodi nacti. Controversia nuper de quadratis Pileis et Superpelliciis, inter nos orta, exclamârunt Papiæ, non esse quam profitemur, unanimem in Religione Fidem; sed variis nos opinionibus duci nec in una sententia stare posse. Auxit hanc Calumniam publicum Senatus nostri Decretum, de profiganda Papiastica impietate, ante nostram Restitutionem sancitum; quo sublata reliqua fece, usus Pileorum quadratorum et Superpelliciorum Ministris remanebat. Ita tamen ut superstitionis opinione careret, quòd disertis Decreti verbis cavetur. Tolli hoc Decretum non potest; nisi omnium Regni Ordinum, quorum conspiratione atque consensu, nobis penes, quos tunc non fuit sciendi vel abrogandi Auctoritas, Pileis et Superpelliciiis uti, vel aliis locum dare injunctum est. Usi his sumus, ne numera Christiana, per nos deserta, occuparent adversarij. Sed cum jam hæc Res in magnam Contentionem inter nostros deveniret, noster Grex pusillus etiam in duas abierit partes; altera, ob illud Decretum deserendum Ministerium, altera non deserendum putet. Peta abs te, mi Gualtere, quod de hac Controversia, quæ nos unâ vexat, senseris ut quam primo tempore scribas. Speramus certè proximis comitiis, illam Decreti partem abrogaturos. Sed si id obtineri non poterit, quoniam magna ope clam nituntur Papistæ, Ministerio nihilominus divino adhærendum esse judico; ne deserto eo, ac à nobis ea conditione repudiato, sese insinuarent. Quâ de re, Sententiam, mi Gualtere, expecto tuam; An hæc, quæ sic facimus, salva Conscientia facere possimus. De vestra etiam Ecclesia ita sum sollicitus, ut quoniam multos fideles Ministros ex peste interisse suspicor, per tuas Literas scire vellem eorum Nomina qui jam supersunt. Dominus Ihesus, magnus Gregis sui Custos, Vos, et Universam suam Ecclesiam custodiat. In eodem vale. Datum è Fernomiano Castro, 16 Calendis Augusti, 1565.

Tuus in Christo,

ROB. WINTON.

[Ex MSS Tigur.]

Bullingerus Horno, de Re Vestitaria.

(Eadem iterùm recurrit, aliâ Manu.)

Reverendissimo Patri in Christo, Domino Roberto Horno, Episcopo Wintoniensi (in Angliâ) Vigilantissimo; Domino suo plurimùm Observando, Salutem.

QUÆ de Controversia de Vestitu Ministrorum, inter vos exorta, scribis, Reverende in Christo Pater, prius etiam ex Johannis Abeli, communis nostri Amici, Literis intellexeram, quibus nuper respondi. Doluit mihi vehementer, et adhuc dolet, hanc occasionem adversariis datam esse, quâ inter se committerentur, qui apud vos puriorem Veritatis Doctrinam prædicant. De Causa verò non libenter pronuntio, cum illius Circumstantias omnes fortassis non norim. Ne tamen abs te, et aliis amicis requisitus, officio deesse videar; hic repetere volui, quæ nuper in literis ad Abelum datis comprehendi. Probo Zelum eorum, qui Religionem ab omnibus sordibus Pasticis repurgatam volunt. Scio enim illud Prophetæ, quo Deus monet, ut scortationes à facie simul et uberibus removeamus. Interim vestram quoque probo Prudentiam, qui, ob vestitum, Ecclesias non putatis deserendas. Etenim cum finis ministerii sit ædificatio et conservatio Ecclesiæ, magna circumspectione nobis opus est, ne ab hoc declinemus; dum causam per se bonam et sanctam defendimus. Nec modo videndum est qualis jam sit Ecclesiæ conditio, quam deserere statuimus, sed quæ; futura sit nobis ab illa digressio. Si meliorem fore certum est, abire licet. Sin verò deteriorem fore, non aut malis atque insidiis operariis locum demus. At quantum ego conjicere possum, hoc unum quærunt adversarii vestri communes, ut vobis ejectis, ut Papistas vel ab his non multum diversos Lutheranos Doctores et antistites surrogent. Quod si fiat, non modo Ecclesiasticus ordo omnis turbabitur et crescet Cæremoniarum Ineptissimarum numerus, verum etiam Idola reducentur (quæ à Lutheranis defendi scimus) ἀπολάτρευται circa Sacram Domini cænæ instaurabitur, privata absolutio et sub hac confessio auricularis paulatim subrepet, et infinita alia fient, quæ et Publicè turbas dabunt, et privatim multos pios in periculum adducent. Nam non dubito vas in vestro ministerio eò usque profecisse ut plurimos habeatis in toto Regno nobiles, cives, agricolas, omnis denique ordinis et loci Homines, qui de Religione optimè sentiant, et Doctrinam omnem abominantur, quæ superstitionibus et idololatriæ fenestras aperit, et quibus intolerabile erit Tyrannidem in Ecclesia denuò stabiliri, quæ Populi infelicis conscientias gravet. Hi certè, si vos ab Ecclesiæ gubernaculis discedatis, adversariorum libidini subjicientur, qui examina et inquisitiones cum publicas tum privatas adversus eos instituent, hæreseos et seditiosis accusabunt, et per hos totam causam Religionis, Regiæ Serenissimæ et totius regni proceribus suspectam atque invivam reddent. Horum ergo artibus et improbitati prudenter occurrendum fuerit, ne illis sponte demus, quod jam annis aliquot magno studio et labore quæsierunt. Quod si quis me rogat, an ergò eos probem, qui decreta ejusmodi ut primi fecerunt, vel nunc observata volunt, quibus sordes Pasticæ salventur? Ingenuè et libere respondeo, illos mihi non placere. Nam aut imprudenter nimis agunt, si ex nostrorum numero sunt: Aut malo dolo Ecclesiarum Libertati insidias struunt. Etsi feces istas tanquam ad Dei cultum et conscientiarum animæque salutem necessarias vobis obtruderent, quidvis potius ferendum esse judicarem, quàm ut Ecclesiæ pium Populum ab ingenua fidei professione abstrahi per illos pateremini. Sed cum in decreto illo disertis verbis (ut tu scribis) cautum sit, quadratos pileos cum superpelliceis absque omni superstitionis opinione retineri debere, simul vestris quoque Conscientiis cautum esse puto. Licebit enim vobis, ni fallor, facti vestri rationem reddere, superstitionis opinionem ex omnium animis removeere et protestatione uti, quæ scandalum omne è medio auferat. Interea Serenissima Regina et Illustrissimi Proceres Regni edoceantur, moveantur et excitentur, ne Reformationem tanta cum laude et magna cum totius orbis admiratione institutam, fecibus et sordibus ejusmodi inficiant atque polluant, neve vicinis Ecclesiis Scoticis et Gallicis aliquam præbeant dissensionis suspitionem. Scio à quibusdam quæstiones moveri multas de regum et magistratus autoritate, an quid hujus ille in Ecclesia statuere, et an horum decretis ministri obedire debeant? At ego Disputationes illas in hac Causa non ita necessarias puto, cum (ut modo dixi) superstitionis opinio per ipsius decreti verba excludatur. Et cavendum est, ne coram populo de magistratus autoritate disputando, alicujus turbæ auctores, simus. In comitiis verò Regni Publicis, ista tractari debent legitime, et qui per occasionem privatim Reginam et Principes Officii admonere possunt, ii suis partibus minime deesse debent. Hæc Reverende in Christo pater, habui quæ nunc scriberem, quia meam in hac Causa sententiam audire cupiebas. Nolim ego alicujus Conscientiam gravare, sed cavendum puto nedum nobis aut existimationi nostræ privatim consulimus, Ecclesias totas in gravius aliquod periculum adducamus. Et meam hanc sententiam à Pauli mente non dissentire puto, qui omnia omnibus fieri solitus fuit, ut quàm plurimos lucrifaceret: Et qui Timotheum circumcidere voluit, ne Judæos illius loci à Religione Christiana alienaret, et illius ministerio commodius uti posset: Qui tamen alibi nihil prorsus dandum esse putavit iis, qui in circumcissione salutis meritum collocabant. Sed non errabant in ejusmodi controversiis, quotquot sedificationem Ecclesiæ suorum consiliorum atque actionum scopum atque finem constituerunt. De rebus nostris non est quod scribam. In anni superioris lue ita nobis prospexit Dominus, ut neminem ex ministrorum numero amiserimus. In agro unus et alter obiit. Volitatur nunc et nonnihil pestis in Urbe nostra, sed non sævitura videtur. Sumus in manu Domini, ejus voluntas fiat. Ad vigesimum Novembris Electorum Principum conventus erit Wormatiæ in quo de pace per Germaniam constituenda deliberabitur et quædam de Episcopis et eorum Reformatione tractabuntur quæ maximi momenti erunt. Deus optimus maximus suo Spiritu omnium mentes et Consilia regat ad sui nominis gloriam et Ecclesiæ incolumentem. Uxorem tuam honestissimam matronam, mea plurimum salvere jubet. Vale Pater in Christo Reverende. Tiguri, 3 Novembris, Anno 1565.

Bullinger's Answer to Humphreys and Sampson on the same Subject.

Ornatissimis D. Laurentio Humfredo, et D. Thomæ Sampsoni, Anglis, Dominis meis et Fratribus in Christo.

DOMINUS Jesus benedicat vobis, Viri Ornatissimi et Fratres Charissimi, ac servet vos ab omni malo. Accepi literas vestras, ex quibus intellexi te lamentari, conquiri, quod meæ responsio data ad tuam quæstionem in via videtur amissa. Ego verò, mi Frater tunc non vidi, neque nunc video, quorsum oportuerit copiosiores scribere Literas. Tu enim rogabas tunc duntaxat, quæ esset mea de re vestiarum, de qua contenditur in Anglia, sententia? Ad hanc quæstionem brevibus tibi respondendum putavi, nam brevibus meam Sententiam dicere potui; dum sciebam beatæ memoriæ D. Pet. Martyrem et Oxoniæ et hic eandem quæstionem tractavisse sæpius et fusius, quibus quod adjicerem non habebam. Memini verò in Literis ad te Sampsonem Fratrem datis, meæ quidem Sententiæ factam tum quidem fuisse mentionem, et ut iterum uno et altero verbo quod sentio dicam: Nunquam probaverim, si vestrum jubeamini exequi Ministerium, ad aram Crucifixi imagine operatum magis quam ornatam, et in veste Missatica hoc est in alba et in Copa quæ à tergo quoque ostendet Crucifixi imaginem. Attamen ex Literis allatis ex Anglia intelligo, nulla nunc est de ejusmodi vestitu contentio, sed quæstio est, an liceat Ministris Evangelicis portare pileum rotundum vel quadratum et vestem albam, quam vocant superpellucium, qua Minister ornatus, à vulgo discernatur? Et an oporteat Ministerium vel stationem sacram citius relinquere, quam hujusmodi uti vestibus? Respondi ad hanc quæstionem præteritis nundinis Reverendo Viro D. Rob. Horn. Vintoniensi Episcopo et quidem brevibus repetens verba D. Martyris. Scripserat eidem paulò ante Symmysta et affinis meus charissimus D. Rod. Gualtherus. Cujus exemplum hisce inclusum ad vos et ad alios Fratres nostros mitto. Ergo si nos audire vultis, nostràmque judicium de re vestiarum expetitis, sicut ultimas vestris ad me Literis significabatis, en habetis in illa Epistola meum judicium. Cui si acquiescere non potestis, dolemus sanè quam vehementissimè, et cum nullum aliud nobis amplius supersit Consilium, Dominum, qui in omnibus et semper respiciendus est, ex animo et incessanter oramus, ut ipse sua gratia atque potentia rebus succurret afflictis.

Quæstiones tu Humanissimè Frater, proposuisti, plures verò ejusdem Argumenti Sampsonus contexit. Licet verò pro mea simplici ruditate nunquam proba-verim vel in tot distrahi quæstiones et nodis injectis in precatoribus, quæ aliqui simpliciores per se, brevibus et satis perspicue expediti potuerant, aliquid tamen annotabo ad singulas, ut hac quoque in re vobis Dominis meis observandis et Fratribus charissimis, quantum per meam possum infantiam attamen retusam magis quam acutam, inserviam. Vos autem oro, ut benignè hæc à me pro vestro amantissimo accipiatis et de his animo judicetis purgato affectibus atque tranquillo. A contentionibus abhorreo prorsus, et nihil magis supplex peto à Domino, quam ut ab Ecclesia amoveat contentiones, quæ ab initio et semper plurimum nocuere veræ Pietati et Ecclesiam pacatam et florentem lacerarunt.

Cùm quæritur, an debeant Ecclesiasticis leges præscribi vestiarum, ut iis distinguantur à Laicis? Respondeo ambiguitatem esse in verbo debere. Si enim accipiat pro merito et quod ad salutem pertineat acquirendam, non arbitror hoc velle vel ipsos Legum Auctores. Si verò dicatur posse hoc fieri decori, ornatusque vel dignitatis et ordinis gratia, ut sit similis quædam observantia, aut tale quid intelligatur, quale illud est, quod Apostolus vult, Episcopum vel Ministrum Ecclesiæ Κόσμιον, compositum inquam vel ornatum esse, non video, quid peccet, qui veste hujusmodi induitur, aut qui hujusmodi veste uti jubet.

2. An Ceremonialis cultus Levitici Sacerdotii sit revocandus in Ecclesiam? Respondeo. Si pileus et vestis non indecora Ministro qui Superstitione caret jubeatur usurpari à Ministro, nemo sanè dixerit verè Judaismum revocari: præterea repeto hic, quod ad hanc Quæstionem video respondisse D. Martyrem, qui cum ostendisset Sacramenta veteris legis fuisse abolita quæ nemo debeat reducere in Ecclesiam Christi, quæ habeat Baptisma et cœnam Sacram, subjecit: Fuerunt nihilominus in lege Levitica Actiones aliquot ita comparatæ, ut propriè Sacramenta dici non possent: faciebunt nostræ ad decorem et ordinem et aliquam commoditatem, quæ ut luminis naturæ congrua et ad nostram aliquam utilitatem conducentia ego et revocari, et retineri posse judico. Quis non videt Apostolos pro panè et convictu credentium faciliiori mandasse gentibus, ut à Sanguine et præfocato abstinerent? Erant hæc citra controversiam Legalia et Levitica. Decimas quoque hodie multis in locis Institutas esse ad alendos Ministros, nemo nostrum ignorat. Psalmos et Hymnos cani in sacris cœtibus manifestum est, quod Levitæ quoque usurparant. Utque hoc non omittam. Dies habemus factos in memoriam Dominicæ Resurrectionis et alia: An verò illa omnia erunt abolenda quia sunt vestigia legis Antiquæ? Vides ergo non omnia Levitica sic esse antiquata, ut quædam ex iis usurpari non possint: Hæc ille.

3. An vestitum cum Papistis communicare liceat? Resp. Nondum constat Papam discrimen vestium induxisse in Ecclesiam, imò discrimen vestium constat Papa esse longè vetustius. Nec video, cur non liceat vestitu non superstitioso sed politiore et composito, communicare cum Papistis. Si nulla re cum illis communicare liceret, oporteret et templa omnia deserere, nulla accipere stipendia, non uti Baptismo, non recitare Symbolum Apostolorum et Nicœnum, adeoq; abjicere orationem Dominicam. Neque vos mutatis ab eis ulla ceremonias. Res vestiarum ab initio Reformationis nunquam fuit abolita, et retinetur adhuc non lege Papistica, sed vi edicti Regii, ut res media et politica.

4. Ita sanè, si ut in re civili utamini Pileo aut Veste peculiari, non hoc redolet Judaismum, neque Monachismum; nam hi volunt videri à civili vita separati, et constituunt meritum in peculiari sua Veste. Sic Eustathius, Sebastie Episcopus, damnatus est, non simpliciter propter peculiarem Vestem, sed quòd in Veste Religionem constitueret. Noti sunt Gangrens. Conc. Canones, Laodiceini, et VI. Synodi. Quòd si ex plebe nonnulli sunt persuasi, redolere hoc Papismum, Judaismum et Monachismum, admonentur, et rectè de tuis instruantur. Quòd si importunis quorundam clamoribus, hac de re ad vulgus profusis, multi inquieti redduntur, videantur qui hoc faciunt, ne graviora sibi onera imponant, Regiamque Majestatem irritent, denique multos fideles Ministros in discrimen adducant, ex quo vix emergere queant.

5. An qui Libertate sua hactenus acquieverunt, vi Regij Edicti, hac Servitute, implicare se et Ecclesiam salva Conscientia possint? Respondeo; Cavendum ego censeo, ne odiosius disputetur clametur et contendatur de re vestiaria, atque importunitate hac detur occasio Regiæ Majestati, ut liberum amplius illis non relinquat, qui libertate hactenus usi sunt; sed clamoribus non necessariis irritata, mandet sumere vestes illas Ecclesiasticas, vel cedere statione sua, Mirum sanè mihi videtur (meam sententiam, viri Ornatissimi, et fratres Charissimi, dixerim) quòd vobis persuadentis, salva conscientia vos et Ecclesiam servituti vestiarie subjicere non posse, et non potius expenditis si in re politica et indifferenti uti nolitis et perpetuè contentatis odiosius, cujusmodi servituti et vos et Evangelicos subjiciatis, qui statione vestra cedentes, lupis exponitis Ecclesias, aut saltem parum idoneis doctoribus, qui non æquà ac vos ad docendum populum sunt instructi. An verò Ecclesias in libertatem asseruistis, quando occasione datis, Ecclesiam pluribus etiam gravioribus quoque oneribus opprimendi? Num ignoratis, quòd multi querant, quomodo erga Evangelicam prædicationem sitis affecti et quales vobis successuri sint, quid de illis sperandum sit?

6. An Vestitus Clericalis res sit indifferens? Videtur sanè res indifferens, cum sit civilis; Decoris, Ornatus, Ordinisque habeat rationem, in quo Cultus non constituitur.

Hæc, brevis, ad tuas volui respondere, Doctissime et Dilectissime mi Frater Laurenti. Jam venio etiam ad D. Sampsonis nostri Questiones; in quibus exponendis, fortè ero brevior.

1. An Vestitus peculiaris, à Laicis distinctus, Ministris Ecclesiæ unquam fuerit constitutus; et an hodie, in Reformata Ecclesia, debeat constitui? Respondeo: In veteri Ecclesia, fuisse peculiarem Presbyterorum Vestitum, apparet ex Historiâ Ecclesiasticâ Theodoretii, Lib. ii. c. 27, et Socratis, Lib. vi. c. 22. Pallio in sacris usos esse Ministros, nemo ignorat, qui veterum Monumenta obiter inspexit. Ideò antea admonui, diversitatem Indumentorum non habere suam originem à Papa. Eusebius rectè testatur, ex vetustissimis Scriptoribus, Johannem Apostolum Ephesi Petalum, seu Laminam gestasse Pontificalem in Capite: Et de Cypriano Martyre testatur Pontius Diaconus, quòd cum jugulum carnicif præbere vellet, ei prius birrum dedisse, Diacono verò dalmaticam, atque sic ipsum in lineis stetisse indutum. Præterea, Vestis candidæ Ministrorum meminit Chrysostomus: Ac certum est, Christianos, cum à Gentilismo ad Ecclesiam converterentur, pro Toga induisse Pallium. Ob quam rem, cum ab infidelibus irriderentur, Tertullianus Librum de Pallio conscripsit eruditissimum. Alia hujusmodi plura proferre possem, nisi hæc sufficerent. Mallem quidem nihil invitis injici Ministris, et eos ea uti posse consuetudine qua Apostoli. Sed cum Regia Majestas Pileum tantummodò et candidam injicit Vestem, in qua Cultum (quod sæpe jam repetitum est) non constituit; eademque res apud veteres, dum meliores adhuc essent res Ecclesiæ, usurpatae sint absque superstitione et culpa; optarem, bonos Ministros in his, non ut in prora et puppi, quemadmodum dicitur, totum constituere Religionis perfectum: Sed dare aliquid tempori, et de re indifferenti non odiosius altercari, sed modestè indicare, hæc quidem ferri posse, sed proficiendum cum tempore. Propiores enim esse Apostolicæ simplicitati, qui discrimina illa ignorent, aut non urgeant, interim tamen à Disciplina in amictu non sunt alieni.

2, 3. An Vestium Præscriptio conveniat cum Christiana Libertate? Resp. Res indifferentes admittere aliquam Præscriptionem, adeoque Coactionem, ut sic dicam, quoad usum et non quoad virtutem; ut aliquid scilicet, quod natura sit indifferens, ut nimirum Conscientiæ obtrudatur, et ita animis injiciatur Religio. Tempora certè et Loca sacrorum Cœtuum, certè habentur inter indifferentia; et tunc si hic nulla sit Præscriptio, quanta obsecro confusio conturbatioque oriretur?

4. An ullæ Ceremoniæ novæ, præter expressum præscriptum Verbi Dei, cumulari possint? Resp. Me non probare, si novæ cumulantur Ceremoniæ: Sed aliquas institui posse non negârim, modò in eis non statuatur Dei Cultus, sed instituatur propter Ordinem et Disciplinam. Christus ipse Enceñiorum Ceremoniam, vel Festum servavit, nec tamen lege præceptum legitimus hoc Festum. In summa, Propositionum, vel Questionum de re vestiaria, potior pars de eo disputat, an de Vestibus Leges in Ecclesia condi vel debeant, vel possint? Ac Questionam revocat ad genus. Quidnam, videlicet, de Ceremoniis statuere liceat? Ad has Propositiones paucis respondeo: Me quidem malle nullas Ceremonias, nisi rarissimas, obtrudi Ecclesiæ: Interim fateor, non posse statim Leges de his, fortè non adeo necessarias, aliquando etiam inutiles, damnari impietatis, turbasque et schismata excitare in Ecclesia, quando (videlicet) superstitione carent, et res sunt sua natura indifferentes.

5, 6. An Ritus Judeorum antiquatos revocare, Religioniq; Idololatrarum propriè dicatos, in usus Reformatarum Ecclesiarum liceat transferre? De hac Questione antea respondi, ubi disserui de Leviticis Ritibus. Nolim verò Ritus idololatraticos, non repurgatos ab Erroribus, transferri in Ecclesias Reformatas. Rursus verò et ex adverso queri potuerat: An recepti Ritus, remota Superstitione, propter Disciplinam et Ordinem, retineri sine peccato non possint?

7. An Conformatio in Ceremoniis necessariò sit exigenda? Respondeo, Conformationem in Ceremoniis, in omnibus Ecclesiis fortè non esse necessariam. Interim, si præcipiatur res non necessaria, rursus tamen non impia, ob eam Ecclesia non videtur derenda. Non fuit in Ritibus Conformitas in omnibus, in Ecclesiis vetustioribus: Quæ tamen conformibus utebantur Ritibus, eas non vituperabant Conformitate carentes. Facile autem credo, Viros prudentes atque politicos, Conformationem Rituum urgere, quòd existiment hanc facere ad Concordiam, et quòd una sit Ecclesia totius Angliæ; in qua re, si nihil impij videatur, non video, quomodo ejusmodi non malis institutis vos hostiliter objiciatis?

8. An Ceremoniæ, cum aperto scandalo conjunctæ, retineri possint? Respondeo, Scandalum vitari oportere. Videndum interim, ne sub scandalo nostras Affectiones contegamus: Non ignoratis aliud quidem datum, aliud verò acceptum, et ultrò accersitum esse scandalum. Non disputo nunc, An Vos, sine grandi scandalo dato, deserere possitis Ecclesias, pro quibus Christus mortuus est, propter rem indifferentem.

9. An ullæ Constitutiones ferendæ in Ecclesia, quæ natura sua impiæ quidem non sunt, sed tamen ad Ædificationem nihil faciunt? Resp. Si Constitutiones impietate carent, quas vobis imponere vult Regia Majestas, ferendæ sunt potius, quàm deserendæ Ecclesiæ. Si enim Ædificatio Ecclesiæ hac in re potissimum est spectanda; deserendo certè Ecclesiam, plus destruxerimus Ecclesiam, quàm Vestes induendo. Et ubi abest Impietas, nec læditur Conscientia, ibi cedendum non est, licet aliqua imponatur Servitus. Interim verò quæri rursus poterat, An sub Servitute justè referamus rem vestiarum; quatenus facit ad Decorem et Ordinem?

10. An in Reformatis Ecclesiis à Principe præscribendum in Ceremoniis, sine voluntate et libero consensu Ecclesiasticorum? Resp. Si Voluntas Ecclesiasticorum semper sit expectanda Principi, nunquam fortè sapientissimi et piissimi Reges, Asa, Ezechias, Josaphat et Josiah, alijque Principes boni, Levitas et Ministros Ecclesiarum redegebunt in ordinem. Quamvis nolim prorsus excludi Episcopos à Consultationibus Ecclesiasticorum. Nolim rursus eam sibi potentiam vindicare, quam sibi usurparunt contra Principes et Magistratus in Papatu. Nolim item tacere Episcopos, et consentire ad iniqua Principum instituta.

11, 12. Postremæ Questiones duæ propiùs ad rem ipsam accedunt: An consultis Ecclesiæ sic inservire; an propterea Ecclesiastico munere rejeci? Et, an boni Pastores, jure ob hujusmodi, Ceremonias neglectas à Ministerio avocari possint? Resp. Si in Ritibus nulla est Superstitio, nulla Impietas, urgentur tamen et imponuntur bonis Pastoribus, qui mallent illos sibi non imponi: Dabo sanè, et quidem ex abundantia, onus et servitute ipsis imponi; sed non dabo ideo justissimis ex causis, Stationem vel Ministerium propterea esse deserendum, et locum cedendum lupis, ut antea dictum est, vel ineptioribus Ministris. Præsertim, cum maneat libera Prædicatio, possit obtrudere servitus, et multa hujusmodi alia, &c.

Dixi quæ videbantur mihi dicenda de propositis Questionibus, non nescius alios pro sua eruditione, longè elegantius meliusque potuisse excussisse; sed quia ita voluistis, ut responderem, feci quod potui, liberum aliis relinquens de his et calamum et judicium. Quod superest, nullius ego his Conscientiam urgere volo, examinanda propono; moneoque, ne quis in hac Controversia, ex Φιλονεικία, sibi faciat Conscientiam. Hortor item vos omnes, per Jesum Christum, Dominum meum, Ecclesiæ suæ servatorem, Caput et Regem, ut probè quisque apud se expendat: Utra nam re plus edificarit Ecclesiam Christi, si propter Ordinem et Decorem Vestibus utatur, ut re indifferenti, et hæcenus ad concordiam utilitatemque Ecclesiasticam non nihil facienti; an verò propter rem vestiarum deserere Ecclesiam, occupandam postea, si non à lupis manifestis, saltem à Ministris minus idoneis et bonis? Dominus Jesus det vobis videre, sapere, et sequi quod facit ad Gloriam ejus, et Ecclesiæ Pacem et Salutem.

Valete in Domino, unà cum omnibus fidelibus Ministris. Orabimus sedulo pro vobis Dominum, ut ea sentiatis et faciatis, quæ sancta sunt et salutaria. D. Gualtherus amicissimè vos salutatur, et omnia felicia vobis precatur. Faciunt hoc ipsum reliqui etiam Ministri. Tiguri, Calendis Maji, Anno Domini MDLXVI.

Vester ex animo totus,

HEINRYCHUS BULLINGERUS, Sen.
Tigurinæ Ecclesiæ Minister.

Admonitum te volo, chare mi Sampson, ne quid D. Bibliandri edas, nam quæ habetis excerptæ sunt ab Auditoribus ejus, et non sunt scripta à D. Bibliandro. Habent autem Hæredes ejus Commentaria, ejus manu scripta in Biblia, vel in vetus Testamentum. Indignissimè enim ferunt, si quid sub ejus nomine ederetur, quod ipse non scripsisset. Interim gratias ago humanitati tuæ, quòd de his nos fecisti certiores. Et Literæ tuæ 16 Febr. scriptæ, demùm mihi traditæ sunt 26 Aprilis.

NUMBER LXXVIII.

Humphreys and Sampson's Letter to Bullinger, insisting on the Question.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

Laurentius Humfredus, et Thomas Sampson, Bullingerò.

Cum diligentia tua clarissimo Viro, in scribendo nobis probatur: Tum verò ex Literis illis quidem humanissimis incredibilis tuus erga nos amor et Ecclesiæ nostræ singularis cura et concordie ardentissimum studium apparent. Questiones aliquot misimus P. T. in quibus jus et quasi cardis totius Controversiæ sita esse videbatur. Quibus est à P. T. accuratè responsum, nobis tamen quod bona cum venia tua dicimus, non est satisfactum plenè. Primò respondet P. T. Ministris præscribi posse leges Vestiarum ut iis colore te forma à Laicis distinguantur: Esse enim civilem observationem et Apostolum velle Episcopum esse κόσμιον. Cum hæc questio de Ecclesiasticis Hominiibus proposita sit et ad Ecclesiasticam politiam spectet: Quomodo habitus Ministrorum singularis et clericalis civilem rationem habere possit, non videmus. Ut Episcopum κόσμιον esse debere fatemur; sic ad ornatum mentis non ad cultum corporis cum Ambrosio referimus. Et ut in vestitu honestatem, dignitatem, gravitatem requirimus: Sic decorum ab hostibus Religionis nostræ peti negamus. Secundo respondes Hypotheticè, si pileus et vestis non indecorus Ministro, et quæ superstitioe carent, jubeatur usurpari à Ministris Judaismum propterea non revocari. At qui esse potest vestis simplicis Ministerio Christi conveniens, quæ Theatro et Pompeæ Sacerdotii Papistici serviebat? Neque enim (quo nostri P. T. persuadent) pileus quadrus et vestitus externus solummodo exiguntur sed et etiam sacras vestes in templo adhibentur, superpelliceum, seu alba chori vestis, et capa revocantur.

Judaismi μυήματα quedam esse et simulacra non modo Papistæ ipsi in suis Libris clamitant, sed P. T. non semel ex Innocentio docuit. D. Martyris præceptoris nostri colendissimi testimonio libenter subscribimus. Sed quæ ille affert exempla ad decorum et ordinem pertinent, hæc Ecclesiam deformant, ὀβραζλαν perturbant, concedentiam omnem evertunt: Illa luminis naturæ congruunt; hæc prodigiosa et monstrosa sunt: Illa juxta Tertulliani regulam meras necessitates et utilitates habebant: Hæc inepta prorsus et supervacanea et inutilia sunt, nec ædificationi nec ulli bono usui conducentia sed verius ut ejus Martyris nostri verbis utamur, cultui, quem hodie quotquot pii sunt execrantur, splendide inservierunt. Vestium Ecclesiasticarum discrimen hodiè receptum Papisticum esse inventum ipsi Papistolæ Gloriantur, Othonis Constitutiones loquuntur, Liber Pontificalis ostendit, oculi et ora omnium comprobant. Usus Decimarum Stipendii, Baptismi, Symboli, et ante Papam natum divino instituto inolevit. Et cum Augustino quicquid in aliqua Hæresi Divinum ac Legitimum reperimus, id et approbamus ad retinemus, non inficiamus. Hoc autem quia erroris illius ac disensionis proprium est, veraciter cum eodem arguimus et certamus. Quod addis, rem vestiarum ab initio reformationis non fuisse abolitam, in ea rursus vestri minime vera retulerunt. Multis enim in locis Serenissimi Regis Edvardi VI. temporibus absque superpelliceo cæna D. pure celebrabatur: Et Copæ quæ tum lege abrogata est nunc Publico decreto restituta est. Hoc non est Papium extirpare, sed denuo plantare, non in Pietate proficere sed deficere. Vestitum Sacerdotalem civilem esse ais: Monachismum, Papismum, Judaismum redolere negas. De superpelliceo quid blaterent Papistæ habitus

Clericorum apud eos quanti fiat, et quo Religioni dicatus sit Prudentiam tuam ex libris eorum intelligere non dubitamus. Deinde Monachatum ac Papiam sapit illa ambitio et Pharisæica peculiaris, vestitus præscriptio; cui illi hodiè non minus quam olim Morechi suæ cucullæ tribuunt. Neq; verò simul ac semel irrupit sanctitatis et meriti opinio, sed paulatim et sensim irrepit. Quod ne hic quoque fiat, quod veremur, idcirco non ab re cunctamur, et principis obstare conamur. Cum Eustathio non facimus, qui in veste religionem collocabat, imò his, qui singulares et religiosas vestes sui Sacerdotii indices superstitionis requirunt adversamur. Idem etiam de Canone Concilii Gangrensis et Laodiceï et Synodi VI. dicendum, et libertate in qua hactenus stetimus, discedere servitutis autoramentum quoddam esse iudicamus. Neq; hic nos rimati sumus, non odiosè contendimus, acerbas contentiones semper fugimus, amicas consultationes querimus; lupis non cedimus, sed coacti et pulsati loco inviti et gementes discedimus. Fratres et Episcopos Domino suo stare et cadere permittimus, eandem erga nos æquitatem ad frustra petimus. In ritibus nihil est liberum; nec ad hoc nobis R. M. irritata est: Sed aliorum suavis ducta est: at nunc demum non quod Ecclesiæ expedit, sed quod aliquo modo licet, constituitur: et quod omninò impium non est, id sanum et salubre, id sacrosanctum, id ratum habeatur. Ceremonias et vestes sacerdotum, cum religionis testes, et professionis notæ sunt, non civiles esse: et ab hostibus omnium consensu mutuò corrogatæ, non decore haberi: et Anathemate divino notatæ et piis omnibus invisæ et malis ac infirmis admirabiles, sine quibus nec nos ministros esse, nec Sacramenta ritè administrari credunt, in rebus indifferentibus numerari nec possunt nec debent. Habebant Patres antiqui suas vestes, sed nec Episcoporum omnium proprias, nec à Laicis distinctas. Exempla D. Joan. et Cypr. singularia sunt. Sisinius hæreticus erat, nec aut laudatus aut nobis imitandus proponitur. Pallium omnium erat Christianorum commune, ut Tertull. in illo libro refert, et T. P. alibi notavit. Chrysostomus candidæ vestis meminit, sed obiter: nec commendat sed reprehendit: et fuerit nec sacerdotum an aliorum Græcorum linea aut lanea alba in munda nondum constat. Certè ad populum Antiochenum ab eodem, et ab Hieronymo opponitur sordidæ et apud Blondum de pallio laneo sit mentio. Quare ex ambiguo nihil concludi potest. Vestium præstationem non congruere cum Christiana libertate Bucerus est testis, qui discrimina vestium propter præsentem abusum in Ecclesiis Anglicanis, propter pleniorum declarationem detestationis Antichristi, propter pleniorum professionem Libertatis Christianæ, propter tollendas inter fratres dissensiones omninò tollendo esse censuit. His enim verbis usus est in Epistola ad D. Alasco, qui totus noster fuit. Cedendum quidem est tempori sed ad tempus: sic ut progrediamur semper, regrediamur nunquam. Absit ut nos vel Schismata in Ecclesia altercando odiosius feramus vel fratribus hostiliter nos opponendo Cæmerinam moveamus: absit (optime Bull.) ut res natura indifferentes impietatis damnemus: Absit ut sub scandalo nostras affectiones contegamus, vel ex φλονεϊκία conscientiam faciamus. Hæc sex et fermentum papisticum (nobis crede) omnis dissensionis est seminarium: Illud tolli et sempiternâ oblivione obrui ac sepeliri cupimus, ne ulla extant Antichristianæ superstitiones vestigia. In Papatu primatus et supercilium semper nobis displicuerunt: Et tyrannus in Ecclesia Libera placebit? Libera Synodus apud Christianos controversiarum nodos hactenus solvit: Cur nunc ad unius aut alterius arbitrium referentur omnia? Ubi hæc votorum et vocum regnat libertas, Ibi valet et viget veritas. Breviter sic habeto rectum, primum hæc nobis potissimum fidem facere, Autoritatem Scripturarum, simplicitatem ministerij Christi, puritatem ecclesiarum primarum et optimarum quæ brevitas studio commemorare supersedemus. Ex altera verò parte legem nullam, nullum decretum generale, vel Dei optimi maximi, vel repurgatæ alicujus ecclesiæ, vel universalis consilij (quæ August. regula est) legere nobis hactenus contigit vel audire. Præterea illud comperimus, hæc quæ adducta sunt hactenus, exempla particularia esse, et universale non confirmare. Ad hæc statuimus, non quicquid est licitum ullo modo, obtrudendum, sed quod Ecclesiam ædificat omni modo, esse introducendum; nec quod alicui licet, id statim licere omnibus. Doctrinam castam et incorruptam (Deo sit laus) habemus: in cultu, religionis parte non infirma cur claudicabimus? cur mancum Christum potius, quam totum, quam purum ac perfectum recipimus? Cur à Papistis hostibus, et non à vobis fratribus reformationis exempla petimus? Eadem est nostrarum ecclesiarum confessio: eadem doctrinæ et fidei ratio: cur in ritibus et ceremoniis tanta dissimilitudo? tanta diversitas? Signatum idem: cur signa adeò variant ut dissimilia vestris, similia papisticis existant? Idem dux et Imperator Christus: cur in Ecclesiis nostris vexilla hostilia eriguntur? quæ si homines Dei si ullo zelo præditi essemus, jamdudum detestati et demoliti fuisset. Nos de semper optimè sensimus: illorum fastum candidè interpretati sumus: cum nos olim crucem cum ipsis ex osculantes et nunc eundem Christum prædicantes, idem jugum suavissimum una ferentes ferre non possunt? Cur in carceres conjiciunt? cur propter vestem persequuntur? Cur victu ac bonis spoliant? Cur libris publicè traducant? Cur causam malam posteritati, edito scripto commendant? Verterunt etiam in idioma nostrum Schedulas aliquot D. Buceri, P. Martyri, et nunc tuas privatas ad nos Literas nobis invitis et insciis in Publicum emisserunt. Unde dum suam causam agunt, suum honorem vendicant, nec Ecclesiæ nostræ, nec Fratribus suis, nec dignitati tuæ, nec seculo alteri consulunt. Quo autem P. T. intelligat, non levem aut ludicram, sed magni ponderis esse controversiam. Nec de pilco solum, aut superpelliceo certari, sed de re gravissima nos conqueri, Stipulas aliquot, et quisquilias Papisticæ Religionis mittimus, ex quibus facile, quæ est tua prudentia, reliqua conicias: Et remedium aliquod, quæ est tua Pietas, primo quoque tempore excogites. Oramus autem, D. nostrum Jesum Christum, ut hos tumultus et turbas consopiat, gloriam suam asserat, operarios in vineam extrudat, quo Messis lacta et uberrima proveniat. Teque oramus, ut Consilio Paterno, Scripto Publico, Literis Privatis Agas, Satagas, facias, efficias, ut vel hæc mala tollantur, vel boni Viri nondum persuasi tolerantur, ne quos Doctrinæ firmissimum Vinculum copulavit, Ceremonia Romana disjungat. Salutem dicas Gualtero, Symlero, Lavaturo, Wolphio, Dominis colendis, quibuscum si contuleris, et nobis et Ecclesiæ universæ gratissimum feceris. D. Jesus suo Tugurio, vestro Tyguro benedicat. Julij Anno 1566. Hæc paucis et raptim, et non tam respondentem, quam admonendi Causa, quæ in hanc Sententiam dici possent infinita sunt. Tu nunc non quid fiat, aut fieri possit, sed quid fieri debeat pronuncia.

Tuæ Paternitatis Studioosissimus,

LAURENTIUS HUMFREDUS.

A Paper of other things complained of besides the Heads.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

1. Aliquot Maculæ quæ in Ecclesia Anglicana adhuc hærent. In Præcibus publicis et si nihil impurum, est tamen Species aliqua Superstitionis Papisticæ. Quod non modò in matutinis et vespertinis, sed in sacra etiam Cœna videre est.

2. Præter Musicæ sonos fractos et exquisitissimos, Organorum usus in Templis invalescit.

3. In Administratione Baptismi, Minister infantem alloquitur, ejus nomine sponsores, parente absente, de Fide, de Mundo, Carne, Diabolo deserendo respondent, Baptizatus cruce signatur.

4. Mulierculis etiam domi baptizandi potestas facta est.

5. In Cœna Dominica sacræ vestes, nempe Capa et Superpelliceum adhibentur; communicantibus Genuflexio injungitur; pro pane communi, placentula Azima substituitur.

6. Extra Templum, et Ministris in universum singulis, vestes Papisticæ præscribuntur; et Episcopi suum lineum, rochetum vocant, gestant et utrique pileos quadros, lirippia, togas longas à Papistis nutuo sumptas circumferunt.

7. De nervo autem Religionis, Disciplina, quid dicemus? Nulla est, nec habet suam virgam Ecclesia nostra: Nulla Censura exercetur.

8. Conjugium Ministris Ecclesiæ, publicis Regni Legibus, concessum et sancitum non est; sed eorum Liberi, à nonnullis, pro spuriis habentur.

9. Solennis Desponsatio fit, more rituque Papistico, per Annum.

10. Mulieres adhuc cum velo purificantur.

11. In regimine Ecclesiastico, multa Antichristianæ Ecclesiæ vestigia servantur. Ut enim olim Romæ, in foro Papæ, omnia fuerunt venalia; sic in Metropolitanæ Curia, eadem ferè omnia prostant: Pluralitates Sacerdotiorum, Licentia pro non residendo, pro non initiando Sacris, pro esu carniū diebus interdictis, et in Quadragesima, quo etiam tempore, nisi dispensetur et numeretur, nuptias celebrare piaculum est.

12. Ministris Christi libera predicandi potestas adempta est: Qui jam concionari nolunt, hi rituum innovationem suadere non debent, sed manus subscriptione Ceremonias omnes approbare coguntur.

13. Postremò, Articulus de spirituali manducatione, qui disertis verbis oppugnabat, et tollebat realem Præsentiam in Eucharistia, et manifestissimam continebat veritatis explanationem, Edwardi VI. temporibus excusus, nunc apud vos evulgatur mutilatus et truncatus.

Bullinger's Answer to their Letter, declining to enter further into the Dispute.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

Præstantissimis Viris, D. Laurentio Humfredo, et D. Thomæ Sampsoni, Anglis, Dominis meis Colendis, et Fratribus Charissimis.

EPISTOLAM illam vestram, Domini colendi et Fratres charissimi, quæ meæ respondentis de re vestiariâ scriptæ, accepimus et legimus. Cujus quidem hæc summa est, Vobis per nostram nondum esse satisfactum. Prævidimus hoc futurum, Fratres: Ideoq; mox ab initio, si bene meministis, in Epistola mea hæc præmisimus verba. Ergo, si nos audire vultis, nostrumque Judicium de re vestiaria expenditis, sicut ultimis ad me Literis vestris significabatis, en habetis in illa (Gualtheri) Epistola meum judicium. Cui si acquiescere non potestis, dolemus sanè quam vehementissimè, et cum nullum aliud nobis supersit consilium, Dominum, qui in omnibus et semper respiciendus est, ex animo et incessanter oramus, ut ipse sua gratia atque potentia, rebus graviter afflictis, &c. His jam nihil ampliùs addere nec possumus, nec volumus. Respondere quidem ad vestra objecta possemus, sed nolimus ullam novis et nunquam terminandis Disputationibus, scriptis vel rixis dare occasionem. Toties scripsit Martyr beatæ Memoræ, cum adhuc viveret in Anglia, sed subinde aliæ atque aliæ suggerebantur, repetebanturque Quæstiones, ut videam ægre ullis verbis Scriptivæ satisfieri posse. Rogati à vobis fraterno amore suasimus, quod nobis coram Domino videbatur ecclesiæ fore fructuosum. Diximus nobis quidem videri utilius ad tempus uti istis vestibus et cum oviculis creditis manere, quàm rejectis illis pariter et ecclesias deserere. Uterius progressi non sumus, neque ulla papistica sordes ac superstitiones probavimus: de quibus in illis disputationem ne suscepimus quidem, quippe ignari, quæ inter vos controvertentur, et de quibus nunc quoque scribitis. De re magni ponderis esse apud vos controversiam, nec de pileo solum aut superpelliceo certari, sed de re gravissima vos conqueri. Licet quidem epistola illa nostra ad vos privatim de re vestiaria conscripta, inscisi nobis à quibusdam sit edita, speramus tamen pios et prudentes viros, nostra, neque in comitiis neque extra comitia eò detorsuros, quasi videamur ea nunc approbare et restituere velle, quæ pij omnes libris nostris edocti, dudum nos reprobare norunt. Susimus vobis, sicut et ante nos et una nobiscum D. Martyr, quod nobis quidem videbatur, pro hoc tempore Argumento vel re, recipiendam vobis, ceu honestum et utile. Hoc quia hactenus placere non potuit, committimus nos totum Deo Negotium, petimusq; ut nobis non sitis ingrati, sed nihilominus amici, pergentes amare nos, vestri amantes in Domino, quem ex Animo oramus ut ipse, qui Fidelis est Custos Ecclesiæ suæ. Dissidium hoc infelix, inter vos exortum, compoiat et Ecclesiæ suæ Tranquillitatem reddat. Memineritis Fratres, obsecramus, per Dominum Jesum, à Ministris Ecclesiarum non tantùm requiri, ut sint fidelis Sermonis tenaces, sed ut simul sint prudentes domus Dei dispensatores, rationem habentes familie, temporumque; et ut patienter, per Charitatem, plurima sustineant, concordiam veram in Domino foveant, deniq; per omnia Ecclesiam in pace conservent, nimiaq; sua vehementia, morositate aut importunitate, bonum quidem sed non prudentem volendo, non incommodent piis et pietati. Dominus Jesus concedat vobis Spiritum suum sanctum, et dirigat vos in viis suis. Valete Fratres.

Bullinger and Gualter's Letter to the Earl of Bedford, pressing him to find a Temper in that Matter.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

Illustrissimo Principi, Domino Francisco Russello, Comiti Bedfordiensi, &c.

Cum anno superiori intellexissemus apud vos, Illustrissime Princeps, contentionem aliquam de Habitu

Ministorum exortam esse, vehementer timebamus, ne ea ulterius progressa, aliquid majoris mali daret Ecclesie: Et ideo à viris piis et cordatis requisiti, consilium dedimus, quod tunc nobis tutum et pium videbatur. Monuimus enim Ecclesiarum Ministros, ne ob rem non adeo magni momenti ab Ecclesiis discederent, et eas lupis et superstitionis seductoribus vexandas relinquere. At non felellit nos gravioris periculi metus, quem nos tunc concepissemus. Audimus enim, jam non de solo vestitu apud vos contendi, sed insuper multa alia obtendi piis Ministris; quæ merum Papatum redolent, imò in Antichristi Schola primum fabricata sunt, et proinde salva pietate recipi aut dissimulari non possunt. Dolorem autem nobis non levem parit, quòd Epistolam quam privatim ad amicos pauculos ea de re dedimus, typis excusam esse fertur, et quod multi nostrum de re illa vestitaria iudicium ad alia usque extendunt, quæ Controversa esse tunc nesciebamus, et quæ à nobis nunquam probari poterunt. Et sane justissimi doloris causa est, nostri nominis autoritate pios Fratres gravari, quibus consilium et consolationem afferre, potius quam molestiam exhibere studuimus. Magis tamen utimur scandali consideratione, quod inde exortum esse non dubitamus. Auget præterea tristitiam nostram infelix Ecclesie Anglicane conditio; quam cum semper amaverimus, non possumus non sanguinariis Fidei purioris hostibus totis animis commoveri, quòd quæ vixdum liberata nonnil florere cæperat, nunc intestinis dissidiis labefactatur. Et quia de tua virtute, Illustrissime Princeps, nobis satis constat, et non pauca extant tuæ Pietatis argumenta, ad tuam Excellentiam Literas dandas esse putavimus, de qua pij quàm rimi spem non mediocrem conceperunt. Rogamus autem ut apud Serenissimam Reginam, et in Comitibus (quæ brevi futura audimus) apud regni proceres, causam Ecclesie pro more tueri pergat, neque suum patrocinium piis Fratribus neget: qui etsi aliqua in re peccarunt, veniam tamen merentur, quando illis ferventi pietatis zelo commotos fuisse; constat et hoc unum querere, ut Ecclesiam ab omnibus Papticis sordibus respurgatam habeant. Neque illi modo nobis digni videntur, quos pij Principes propugnent; sed tota hæc causa ejusmodi est, ut qui in illa agenda studium et industriam adhibent, eo facto demùm testentur, se Principum nomine dignissimos esse. Dignatus est illustres viros ob honore Dominus, ut Ecclesie ejus nutritij dicantur, quæ sanc laus omnem hujus mundi gloriam atque dignitatem longè superat. Erunt autem fideles nutritij, si Ecclesiam non modò ex hostium manibus eripiant, verbi Prædicationem instaurent, et Sacramentorum usum legitimum restituant; verùm et caveant, ne quæ Christo adduci debet Sponsa incontaminata, ullo superstitionum fuce defœdetur, aut ullis Ritibus à simplicitate Christiana, alienis à fide sua suspectam reddat. Et notum est illud Hoseæ, qui Ecclesiam Israeliticam monebat, ut scortationes non ab uberibus modò, verùm et à facie removeret. Quare etiam atque etiam Excellentiam tuam rogamus, ut quod hactenus fecit, nunc imprimis facere pergat, et sua Autoritate apud Serenissimam Reginam et Regni Proceres efficere student, ne cum magna totius orbis admiratione instituta Ecclesie Anglicanæ Reformatio, novis sordibus et postliminio reductis infelicis Papatûs reliquiis, deformetur. Nam si id fiat, non modo inconstantiæ nota multis in Regno vestro florentissimò inuretur, verumetiam infirmi offenduntur, et vicini Scotie, Gallie et Flandriæ Ecclesiis scandalum præbebitur sub cruce adhuc laborantibus, cujus poenæ in auctores ejus proculdubio redundabunt. Imò ex vobis exemplum ament vicini veritatis Evangelicæ hostes; ut ipsi quoque in suis locis, liberiore verbi Dei cultum novis tyrannicæ superstitionis legibus circumscribant. Liberiùs hæc dicimus, Illustrissime Princeps, non quòd de tua pietate quicquam dubitemus, sed id partim tua humanitate incredibili freti faciamus, partim rei necessitate adducti tuæ Excellentie, et multis aliis de hac causa cogitandi materiam et occasionem amplioem præbere cupimus. Precamur autem Deum optimum maximum, ut Ecclesie suæ miseratus, pacem illi restituat, et T. E. tuique; similes Principes suo Spiritu regat, suo favore prosegat, et potenti brachio servet, ad sui Nominis Gloriam, et Ecclesie suæ Conservationem. Tiguri, 11 Sept. Anno 1566.

Bullinger and Gualter's Letter to Bishop Grindal and Bishop Horn, for quieting the Dispute.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

Reverendis in Christo Patribus, D. Edmundo Gryn-dallo Londoniensi, et D. Roberto Horno Wintoniensi, in Anglia Episcopis, Dominis nostris Colendissimis et Fratribus Charissimis.

REVERENDI in Christo Patres, Domini Honorandi, et Fratres Charissimis,—Rumore perlatum est ad nos, confirmato eodem nonnullorum Literis Fratrum aliunde ad nos allatis, Epistolam illam meam, quam mense Maio, privatim Scripsimus ad Honorandos Fratres nostros D. Humfredum et Sampsonem, vobisque Dominis nostris et Fratribus Charissimis, certo Consilio exposito à nobis in Epistola ad vos data communicavimus, Typis excusam atque publicatam esse, eaque ipsa illos confirmari, qui jam multos Ecclesiarum Ministros pios et doctos exauthorarunt, non quidem ob rem vestariam, de qua illa nostra Scripta est Epistola, sed alios complures ob articulos, apud vos controversos. De quibus in Epistola illa nostra nullam instituimus Disputationem, quas tamen omnes dicimur contra exauthoratos defendere atque approbare. Nos quidem incendium inter vos exortum non augere, sed extinguere studio vestri Sancto sumus conati, et non probare vel improbare articulos de quibus nihil nobis constabat. Proinde luculenta nobis fiet injuria, si nostra Epistola raperetur eo quasi eos etiam articulos, quos tunc ignoravimus, cum de re vestitaria scriberemus, approbare videremur. Summa sententiæ nostræ erat, Ecclesias Christi Sanguine redemptas, minimè esse deserendas propter pileos et vestes, res indifferentes, cum non propter cultum ullum, sed propter ornatum politicè usurpari jubeantur. Nunc verò audimus (utinam rumore falso) requiri à Ministris novis quibusdam subscribant articulis, aut statione sua cedant. Articulos verò esse hujusmodi, tantum in temporis figuratum, et peregrina lingua, unà cum strepitu organorum esse retinendum, Mulieres in casu necessitatis privatim posse, et debere baptizare infantulos. Magistrum quoque infantem oblatum baptismo rogare debere quæstiones, olim catechumenis propositas. Baptizantes item Ministros usurpare exufflationes, exorcismos, crucis characterem, oleum, sputum, lutum, accensos cæreos, et hujus generis alia: Docendum esse Ministris in perceptione Cœnæ Domini, opus esse genuflexione (quæ speciem habat adorationis) nec panem frangendum esse communiter, sed culibet communicaturo crustulam ori ejus esse inserendam à Ministro. Neque verò modum Spiritualis manducationis, et præsentie Corporis Christi in Sacra Cœna explicandum, sed relinquendum in medio. Præterea dicitur, ut quondam Romæ

NUMBER LXXXIII.

A Letter of Bishop Grindal, and Bishop Horn, giving a full account of their sense of all the Matters complained of in the Church of England.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]—N. B. Ex Præcipuis.

Edmondus Londinensis, et Robertus Wintoniensis, Bullingero Heinricho, et Rodolpho Gualtero.

ERUDITAS vestras Literas ad Humfredum, et Sampsonem, commodissimas, cum ad nostras de vestibus animorum dissensiones, tum verborum altercationes atq; pugnas sedandas, quam libentissimè accepimus: Acceptas non sine certo Consilio, parentes tamen Fratrum nominibus, Typis excudi atq; publicari curavimus, indeq; fructum amplissimum quidem, quemadmodum sperabamus, præcepimus. Nam sanis quidem viris, univrsam Evangeliorum institutum et finem spectantibus, multum profuere: Ministros certè nonnullos qui de deserendo Ministerio propter rem vestiarum, quæ jam sola controversa ac causa contentionis apud nos fuerat, cogitarant, persuasos ne Ecclesias fraudari suâ operâ sinerent propter tantillum, confirmatosq; reddidere, et in vestram sententiam retraxere: Plebem autem quæ per importunos quorundam clamores concitata in varias partes distrahebatur, piosq; Ministros contumeliâ afficiebat, quasi concordia quadam illis placavere ac leniere temperantia: Morosis vero et nihil preterquam quod ipsi stauerant preferre valentibus, etai non satisfacere, eo tamen eis profuere, ut pios convitiis minus proscindere, pacemq; Ecclesiæ salutarem sermonibus suis morologis non adeo audacter fœdare, velint aut possint. Ex hiis quosdam esse exauthoratos, etsi sua ipsorum culpa, ut gravius in illos nos dicamus, fatemur et dolemus. Verum illud æquiori animo ferendum putamus, quod non sint multi sed pauci, et pij, certè non adeo docti. Nam solus Sampsonus inter eos qui exauthorati sunt, et pius pariter ac Doctus est habendus. Humfredus verò ac Doctiores omnes in sua hactenus statione manent. Quod si vestra Epistola Typis excusa ac publicata fuisset, ut qui exauthorarunt, confirmarentur: si qui exauthorati sunt, propter alios articulos apud nos controversos et non ob rem solam vestiarum de gradu fuissent dejecti suo: si deniq; illa Epistola quæ verbis adeo exquisitis ac perspicuis solam controversiam vestiarum pertractat, ut alio transferri non possit ad approbandos articulos vobis ignotos, nec dum apud nos Dei gratia controversos (nam nulli nobis cum Fratribus articuli in contentionem hactenus venerunt nisi hic solus vestiarius) reperetur: Luculenta profectò vobis, quos amamus, colimus, et in Domino Honoramus, fuisset injuria: sicut nobis manifesta adhibita est calumnia ab hiis qui Authores fuerunt vanissimi rumoris, quo ad vos perlatum fuit, à Ministris Ecclesiæ requiri novis quibusdam subscribant articulis, aut statione sua cedant. Summa controversiæ nostræ hæc est: nos tenemus Ministros Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ sine impietate uti posse vestium discrimine publica autoritate jam præscripto, tum in Administratione Sacra, tum in usu externo, præsertim cum ut res indifferentur proponantur, tantum propter ordinem ac debitam legibus Obedientiam usurpari jubeantur: et omnis Superstitionis Cultus ac Necessitatis quod ad Conscientias attinet, opinio, legum ipsarum præscripto et sincerioris Doctrinæ Prædicatione assidua quantum fieri potest amoveatur, rejiciatur, ac omnino condemnetur. Illi contra clamitant vestes has in numerum τῶν διαφορῶν, jam haud quaquam esse ascribendas, impias esse, Papisticas ac Idolatricas: et propterea, omnibus piis uno consensu Ministerio cedendum potius, quàm cum ista Panniculariis Papisticis, sic enim loquuntur, Ecclesiæ inservire: licet Doctrinam sincerissimam prædicandi nec non omnimodos Errores seu abusus sive in Ritibus, sive in Doctrina, sive in Sacramentis, sive in Moribus, per sanam Doctrinam subaccusandi, exagitandi, condemnandi, summam habeamus Libertatem. Istud istorum immaturum Consilium accipere non possumus: quomodo nec impetuosa eorum Adhortationes, quibus Pacem Ecclesiæ indesinenter pro suggestu disturbant, Religionemq; nostram universam in Periculum trahunt, ferre debemus. Nam istiusmodi suis celeusmatibus, serenis, Reginæ Animum alioqui ad optimè merendum de Religione propensum, irritari, prohi dolor, nimium experti sumus: Procerum quorundam Animos, ut de aliis taceamus, ægros, imbecilles, vacillantes, hiis vulnerari, debilitari, abalienari, certò certius scimus. Equis dubitare possit, quin Papistæ hujusmodi Occasionē nacti virus suum pestilentissimum eructabunt, evoment in Evangelium Jesu

Christi, ejusq; Professores omnes; in spem erecti, jam Opportunitatem se habere suam sibi ereptam Helenam recuperandi. Quodsi inconsulto nostro Consilio acquiesceremus, ut omnes cunctis viribus impetum in vestes Legibus Constabilitas, contra Legem faciamus, perimamus, ac dealeamus omnino, aut simul omnes Munia exuamus. Papisticum profectò, vel saltem Lutherano-papisticum haberemus Ministerium, aut omnino nullum. Illud autem Deum Optimum Maximum testamur, Fratres in Christo honorandi; neque culpa evenisse dissidium hoc nostra, nec per nos stare quò minùs istiusmodi vestes è medio tollerentur: Imò sanctissime, licet, juremus, laborasse nos hactenus quanto potuimus studio, fide, diligentia, ut id effectum daremus, quod fratres fuscant, et nos optamus. Verùm in tantas adducti angustias, quid faciendum? (multa vobis, qui prudentes et ad pericula Ecclesiis impendenda perspicenda estis sagaces, conjicienda relinquimus) nisi ut cum non possumus quod velimus, velimus in Domino quod possumus. Hactenus rem controversam et plenam dissensionis inter nos, ut se habet, exposuimus. Nunc vero quod reliquum est, accipite: Falsissimum omnino est ille rumor, si tamen rumor dicendus sit (novimus enim prudentiam vestram, ac modestiam, et laudamus) de receptione, subscriptione, et approbatione novorum istorum Articulorum quos recensetis. Nec magis sunt veraces, qui sive scriptis suis Epistolis, sive verbis coram, hoc prætextu vobis fucum facere, nobis autem calumniam inurere sunt conati. Pleriq; enim omnes isti Articuli falsò nobis objiciuntur; perpauci recipiuntur: Horum omnino nulli, Fratris sua subscriptione approbandi obtruduntur. Cantum in templis figuratum, unà cum strepitu organorum, retinendum non affirmamus imò prout decet, insectamur. Peregri nam linguam, exufflationes, exorcismos, oleum, sputum, lutum, accensos cereos, et ejus generis alia, ex Legum prescripto nunquam revocanda, penitùs amisit Ecclesia Anglicana. Mulieres posse aut debere baptizare infantulos, nullo modo prorsus assentimur. In Cœnæ Dominicæ perceptione, panem communiter frangere, cuilibet communicaturo non ori inserere, sed in manus tradere: Modum spiritualis manducationis, et presentie Corporis Christi in sacra Cœna, explicari Leges jubent, Usus confirmat, Oblatratores nostri Anglo-Lovanienses nefariis suis scriptis testantur. Uxores Ministrorum non arcentur à suis Maritis; cohabitant, et eorum Conjugium apud omnes (semper Papistas excipimus) habetur honorabile. Denique non minùs falsum est quod oblatrant, penes solos Episcopos omnem esse Ecclesiasticæ gubernationis potestatem, etsi primas illis dari non negamus. Nam in rebus hujusmodi Ecclesiasticis in Synodo deliberari solet. Synodus autem indicitur, Edicto Regio, eo tempore quo habetur totius Regni Parliamentum, ut vocant. Adsunt Episcopi, adsunt etiam totius Provinciæ Pastores doctiores quique, qui triplo plures sunt quàm Episcopi. Hij seorsum ab Episcopis de rebus Ecclesiasticis deliberant, et nihil in Synodo statuitur, aut definitur, sine communi eorum ac Episcoporum, aut majoris saltem illorum partis, consensu et approbatione: tantùm abest ut Pastoribus non permittatur in hujusmodi rebus Ecclesiasticis suam dicere sententiam. Recipimus quidem, seu potius toleranter ferimus, donec meliora Dominus dederit, interrogationes infantum, et crucis characterem in Baptismo, in Cœnæ perceptione genuflexionem; et Regiam Facultatum Curiam, quam Metropolitanam vocant. Quæstiones istiusmodi non adeò accommodè infantibus proponi, etsi ex Augustino videantur emendicatæ, publicè profitemur, ac sedulò docentur. Crucis Characterem frontem jam baptizati infantis notare; etsi Minister palàm conceptis verbis, profiteatur signatum esse Cruce infantulum, solummodò in signum quòd in posterum illum non pudebit fidei Christi crucifixi, idque ex vetustiori Ecclesia videatur transumptum, tamen non defendimus. Genuflexionem in sacræ cœnæ perceptione, quoniam ita Lege constitutum est, permittimus: Ea tamen expositione, seu potius cautione, quam ipsi genuflexionis auctores, viri sanctissimi ac Martyres Jesu Christi constantissimi, adhibuerunt, diligentissimè populo declarata, promulgata, inculcata. Quæ sic ad verbum habet: Etsi in Libro Præcum statutum sit, ut communicantes genuflectendo sacram accipiant communionem, id tamen eo trahi non debere declaramus, quasi ulla adoratio fiat aut fieri debeat, sive Sacramentali pani ac vino, sive ulli reali et essentiali presentie ibi existenti, naturalis carnis et sanguinis Christi. Nam Sacramentalis panis et vinum permanent in ipsis suis naturalibus substantiis, et propterea non sunt adoranda: Id enim Idololatria horrenda esset, omnibus Christianis detestanda. Et quantum ad corpus naturale ac sanguinem salvatoris nostri Christi attinet, in Cœlo sunt et non sunt hic. Quandoquidem contra veritatem veri naturalis corporis Christi est, pluribus quàm uno inesse locis, uno atque eodem tempore. Facultatem Curia, undecunque est allata, Regia est, non Metropolitanam. Is enim prudens Pater, doctus et ad syncerissimam Religionem propagandam optimè affectus, omnimodas Romanas fæces prorsus eluere peroptat, conatur, satagit. Et licet omnes hujus Fiscalis Curia, sicut etiam alios nonnullus abusus è medio tollere non possumus, eos tamen carpere, contumeliis insequi, ad tartara usque, unde prorpererunt, detrudere non desistimus. Nobis credite, fratres venerandi: Unicum licet Ministro omnibus istiusmodi articulis, cum modestia et sobrietate contradicere. Pastores verò articulos istos nobis falsò impositos, recipere aut approbare nolentes, statione sua haudquaquam dejicimus. Pergite ergo nos amare, admonere, juvare, ut incendium inter eos exortum, solummodo pro re vestiaria, extingatur. Nosque operam dabimus, quantum fieri possit, quemadmodum in proximis Comitibus fecimus, et si nihil obtinere potuimus; ut omnes errores et abusus ad amussim verbi Dei corrigantur, emendentur, expurgentur. Commendamus vos Fratres Gratia Domini nostri Jesu Christi, quem oramus ut vos incolentes, vestrasque Ecclesias in pace quam diutissimè conservet. Salute nostro nomine Fratres ac Symnistas Tigurinos omnes.

Londini, 6 Februarij, Anno Dom. 1567.

Vestrum omnium Amantissimus,

Obsecro et ego vos, Fratres mihi plurimum observandi, (ignoscatis mihi) quod Literis vestris ad me privatim scriptis, hactenus non responderim; nec pro doctissimis vestris Commentariis ad me transmissis, ullas hactenus gratias retulerim. Neque illud ipsum mihi vitio vertant Wolvius et Lavaterus; quos quæso, meo nomine, plurimum salutate, et me apud illos excusate. Scio enim Officij mei rationem hoc ipsum efflagitasse; et vos, illosque, meas Literas desiderasse, non dubito. Efficiam posthac, scribendo vos omnes expleam, et Officio non desim meo. Salutem etiam à me dicite, oro, D. Simlero, Zuinglio, Halero. Vivite omnes, ac valete in Christo.

A Letter of Jewell's to Bullinger, concerning the Debates in Parliament relating to the Succession, and the Heats in the Disputes about the Vestments.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

Johannes Juellus Henrico Bullingero.

S. P. in Christo. Proximæ Literæ meæ, Ornatisime Vir, cum Londinum tardiusculè venissent, et Francofordiam ad Nundinas proficisci non possent, re infecta, domum ad me reversæ sunt. Quod non nihil vereor, ne nunc quoque in istas accadat. De prolixis et pereruditis illis tuis ad me Literis proximis, prolixè tibi ago gratias. Nunc mihi de Synodo illa Francofordiensi, ut de re obscura, et controversa, egregiè satisfactum esse, et fateor et gaudeo. Res nostræ Ecclesiasticæ, publicæ privateque, eo loco nunc sunt, quo fuerunt. Lovanienses nostri clamant, et turbant, quantum possunt: Et habent fautores, etsi non ita multos, plures tamen multò quam velim. Et quanvis complures sint, et in universum in omnes scribant, tamen nescio, quo meo fato, omnes in me feruntur unum. Itaq; dum illis respondeo, ne me esse otiosum putes. Habuimus, proximis istis Mensibus, Comitium totius Regni: Illis ego, propter Valentudinem, interesse non potui. Scriptæ sunt Leges de Religione, quibus Papistarum obstinata malitia, atq; insolentia in officio continentur. Actum etiam est de Successione; hoc est, cui Familiæ Jus Regni debeatur, si quid Elizabethæ Reginae humanitas acciderit, quod nolimus. Ea Contentio mensem unum, atque alterum omnium animos occupavit; cum Regina ea de re agi nollet: Reliqui omnes vehementer cuperent, et utrinque magnis viribus, et studiis pugnaretur. Quid queris? Efficì postremò nihil potuit: Regina enim, ut est fœmina imprius prudens et provida, Hærede semel designato, suspicatur, aliquid sibi creari posse periculi. Nosti enim illud, plures Orientem Solem adorant, quam Occidentem. De Religione, Causa illa vestiaria magnos hoc tempore motus concitavit. Reginae certum est, nolle flecti: Fratres autem quidam nostri ita ea de re pugnanti, ac si in ea una omnis nostra Religio versaretur. Itaq; Functiones abjicere, et Ecclesias inanes relinquere malunt, quàm tantillum de sententia decedere. Neq; aut tuis aut D. Gualtheri doctissimis scriptis, aut aliorum piorum Virorum monitis moveri volunt. Agimus tamen Deo gratias, qui non patitur nos inter nos, hoc tempore, gravioribus Quæstionibus exerceri. Unus tantum quispiam è nostro numero, Episcopus Gloucestrensis, in Comitium apertè, et fidenter dixit, probari sibi Lutheri sententiam de Eucharistia; sed ca seges non erit, spero, diuturna. In Hibernia, nonnihil hoc tempore tumultuatur. Insula ea, uti scis, paret nostris Regibus. Johannes quidam Onclus, spurius, conscripsit nuper militem, et nostros insolenter provocavit. Sed plus in ea re moræ est, quàm periculi. Is enim longè abdit sese in paludes, et solitudines; quo noster miles consequi facile non possit. E Scotia vero, (quid ego dicam? aut tu, quid credas?) horrenda atq; atrocita nuntiantur. Ea quamvis ejusmodi sint, ut credo, vix possit, tamen ex Aula usq; ad me scribuntur, et passim jactantur, et creduntur ab omnibus. Regem juvenem, aiunt, proximis hisce admodum diebus, unà cum uno famulo, quem habuit à cubiculis, interfectum esse domi suæ, et exportatum foras, et relictum sub dio. Crede mihi, horret animus ista commemorare. Si ista vera sint, ne sint; tamen sint, quid causæ fuerit, aut quibus ille insidiis petitus sit, faciam te posthac, ubi omnia rescivero, de rebus omnibus certiozem. In Præsentia, nec ea, quæ ita constanter jactarentur, reticere potui, nec ea quæ comperta non haberem, nimium fidenter affirmare. Julium nostrum, audio, Tiguri esse mortuum: Mitto tamen ad illum viginti Coronatos Gallicos, si vivit, ut illi cedant; sin autem, quod nolim, est mortuus, ut in Epulum Scholasticum insumantur. Si esset otium, scriberem ad D. Lavaterum, ad D. Simlerum, ad D. Wolphium, ad D. Hallerum, et alios: Imprimis vero ad D. Gualtherum; ad quem, hactenus homo ingratus, nunquam scripsi. Quæso, ut hosce omnes, atque etiam in primis D. Rodolphum, et D. Henricum tuos, meo nomine plurimum valere jubeas. Vale, mi Pater, et Domine in Christo Colendissime.

A Letter of Jewell's to Bullinger, of the State Affairs were in, both in England, Ireland, Scotland, and the Netherlands.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

SALUTEM Plurimam in Christo Jesu—Quid ego dicam, Doctissime Vir et Clarissime Pater? Et pudet et dolet, pudet primum, non scripsisse sæpius, deinde dolet, eas ipsas quoque scripsi, non potuisse ad vos venire, obsecro tamen te, ne putes mihi aut Scholam Tigurinam, aut Rempubicam, aut illam vestam Humanitatem tantam tam citò ex Animo elabi potuisse. Equidem vos omnes in oculis, et in sinu gero, et te imprimis. Mi Pater, lumen jam unicum ætatis nostræ. Quod autem ad Literas attinet, equidem, præterquam anno illo superiore cum peste, et lue omnia ubique clausa essent, cæteroque nunquam intermissi scribere, ad te, ad Lavaterum, ad Simlerum, et ad Julium. Quod nisi facerem, videri, vix possem, non dico officii, sed ne Humanitatis quidem rationem ullam retinere. Et de aliis quibus meis Literis superioribus, quid factum sit, nescio. Proximas autem audio in navali conflictu exceptas fuisse à Gallis, atque ablatas Caletum. Sed Missa ista facio. Nunc accipito de rebus nostris, quos tibi, pro tua pietate, magis cordi esse, sat scio. Primum de Religione omnia domi Dei Optimi Maximi Beneficio pacata sunt. Papistæ exules turbant, et impediunt quantum possunt et evulgatis libris, nescio, quo meo, fatone, dicam, an merito, me petunt unum, idque terni maximis clamoribus uno tempore. Illis omnibus dum unus respondeo, tu me ne putes esse otiosum. Offeratur mihi inter alia, causa illa Ubiquitaria, quam ego in senis illius nostri Tubingensis gratiam, ut potui, utque res tulit, de industria ornavi pluribus: Sed nostra lingua, utpote nostris Hominibus. Si quidem otium erit, partem aliquam transferam, et ad vos mittam. De illo autem sene, equidem non video quid debeam statuere. Ita mihi videtur, magis magisque in singulos dies delirare. Legi enim novum Menandri phasma, quod nunc nuper dedit: Et tibi, et de illo Libro, et de omnibus Literis tuis, et de omni tua Humanitate, ago gratias. Respublica domi, forisque, terra, marique tranquilla est. Pacem habemus cum Gallis constitutam. Flandrica etiam illa turba jam tandem consiluit. Mercatores utrinque commean, Flandri ad nos, et nostri vicissim ad illos. Grave-lanus, cujus unius nequitia hæc omnia cæpta sunt, id egit, ut, turbatis, atque impeditis emporiis, cum neque iuvahi quicquam, neque exportari posset, attonitis mercatoribus, et oppidano vulgo, quod verè è lanificio victum quærit, ad otium, atque inopiam redacto, popularis aliquis motus, et seditio domestica sequeretur. Ita enim sperabat Religionem unà posse concuti. Sed Deus ista consilia convertit potius in authorem. Nostri enim in officio, uti par erat, remanserant. Flandricum autem vulgus, digressis nostris Mercatoribus, et Emporio Embædæ constituto, eam rem indignè ferre, atque etiam tantum non tumultuari. Hiberni, uti te audisse scio, nobis parent, et nostis utuntur legibus. In illam insulam, Papa ante aliquot admodum dies immisit Hominem sceleratum, et callidum, cum mandatis, qui huc illuc concursaret. Erat enim Hibernus, qui gentem feram et silvestrem contra Nebulo statim primo appulsu comprehenditur, et excussus, et vincetus ad nos mittitur. Ita sacerrimus Pater prorsus decrevit, cum flectere non possit superiores, Acheronta movere. In Scotia ita ut volumus. Regina sola Missam illam suam retinet, invitis omnibus. Parkhurstus, Hoperus, Sampson, Sandus, Leverus, Chamberus valent, et officium faciunt. Biennium jam est, quod ego illorum quenquam viderim. Vale, mi Pater. Dominus Jesus te quam diutissimè servet superstitem, et incolumem. Saluta D. Gualterum, D. Lavaterum, D. Simlerum, D. Lupum, D. Hallerum, D. Gesnerum, D. Frisium, D. Zuinglium, D. Wikium; ad quos singulos darem literas si esset otium, vel potius nisi prorsus obruer Negotiis.

Nunc Patres illud petimus, et in Christo contendimus etiam atque etiam, (quod vos ultrò benignissimè polliciti estis) ut Londinensis, Wintoniensis ac Cantuariensis Episcoporum animos exacerbatos molliatis, et si non amplius aliquid potestis, saltem hoc tantum exoretis: Ut et in Fratres nostros in Anglia remanentes mitiores esse velint, et feces ex suis Ecclesiis removens, si non adjuvare, at saltem tolerare, et ipsorum factis connivere velint. Atque vos Reverendis Nordovicensi, Wigorniensis, et Dunelmensi Episcopis, in vestris Epistolis, pollicitis justas sue pietatis laudes persolvatis: Atque illis, simul et Fratribus Ministris studentibus repurgationi Ecclesiarum, animos pergendi in proposito addatis. Hæc, si pro vestra summa Dignitate (ut confidimus) impetraverimus, non modò non fatigabimus alias Ecclesias novis precibus, sed et nos, omneaque; verè pii, omnia vobis ob pacem et concordiam, vestra opera, Ecclesie paratam debebimus; et Deus optimus maximus vobis, per Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, æternam Coronam tribuet. Intercessionales pro Tolerantia. Londinensi, Wintoniensi, et Norwicensi, Episcopis in Anglia.

REVERENDI Viri Domini Colendissimi, et Fratres in Domino Charissimi. Dominus Jesus benedicat vobis et servet vos ab omni malo.—Quo vehementius favemus vobis Reverendi Domini et Fratres Charissimi, eò dolemus gravius desidere vos à Fratribus aliquot, Viris Doctis, in Anglia gradu suo dejectis. Atque ideo dilectioni nostræ dabitis, quod frequentius eadem de re aures vestras obtundimus. Vidimus et accepimus vestram in hanc causam excusationem: Interim Angli exules ad nos veniunt, qui affirmant Londinensis Ecclesie Doctores, nec non aliarum in Anglia Ecclesiarum, in Mariana persecutione probatos Homines, quorum fide diligentia Ecclesie Anglicanæ in sævissimis istis tempestatibus conservatæ sint, nunc pelli, nec pelli tantum, sed gravi etiam persecutione premi, adeoque et in tetras retrudi carceres. Addunt plures esse in Hibernia Ecclesiarum Ministros, qui non aliter sentiant aut faciant, quam illi ipsi qui in Anglia sustinent persecutionem. Illos autem Episcopi sui Beneficio, et apud Regiam M. interventu agere in summa tranquillitate. Unde isti colligunt, si Episcopi qui in Anglia sunt apud R. Majestatem intercederent, fore ut et ipsi tranquillè sibi commissas possit retinere et gubernare Ecclesias. Et quod hac in causa præcipuum est. Episcopos non differi meliorem habere causam afflictos et dejectos. Nam agnoscere eos Ecclesiam rectius constitui et constitutam gubernari sine illis caremoniis ritibusve et institutis, quam cum illis, adeò ut ipsismet afferatur optio, malint ipsi sibi Ecclesiam deligere sine illis, quam illis oneratis sibi dari. Id quod inde quoque colligescat manifestissimè, quod in Regni Comitibus, non semel Episcopi petierint, à R. M. ut tollantur illa et purgator ornatiorque aut minus saltem onerata fiat Ecclesia. Que cum ita sint reverendi Domini et Fratres Charissimi, incitabit vos ipsos haud dubiè vestra pietas ad consulendum, quomodo fieri possit commodè et maturè, ut Fratribus istis afflictis consulatur, et ne ita gravi persecutione premantur, quin potius R. Maj. Clementia tolerentur, donaque in ipsis utilia Ecclesie, per abdicationem non extinguantur. Non est autem quod multis rationibus aut exemplis vos aliqui peritissimos omnis pietatis et æquitatis, urgeamus: tantum hoc oramus per Dominum, ut si apud R. M. afflictis afflictionem vel imminuere, vel prorsus adimere potestis, pro Christiana Charitate, illis omnem vestram fidem impendatis operam; et nostram hanc fraternam admonitionem boni consulatis, solitoque amore nos vestri amantissimos prosequi pergatis. Valet. Honorandi Domini.

Res Scotiæ nondum etiam satis pacatæ sunt: Nobiles aliquot primi nominis apud nos exulant. Alij domi remanserunt, et sese, si vis fiat, ad resistendum parant, et ex arcibus suis excursiones interdum faciunt, et ex Papistarum agris agunt, feruntque quantum possunt. Regina ipsa, etsi animo sit ad Papismum obfirmato, tamen vix satis exploratum habet, quo se vertat: Nam de Religione adversariam habet magnam partem, et Nobilitatis, et Populi: Et, quantum quidem nos possumus intelligere, numerus indies crescit. Submisit proximis istis mensibus Philippus Rex, Abbatem quandam Italum cum auro Hispanico, hominem vafrum, et factum atque instructum ad fraudes, qui et Regem et Reginamq; iuaret veterario Consilio, et impleret omnia tumultibus. Rex novus, qui semper hactenus abstinuisset à Missis, et ultrò accessisset ad Conciones, ut se Populo daret, cum audiret navem illam appulsuram postredie, factus repente confiditor, sumptis animis, noluit longius dissimulare. Accedit ad Templum; jubet sibi de more dici Missam. Eodem ipso tempore, D. Knoxus, Concionator in eodem oppido, et in proximo templo, magna frequentia clamare in Idolomanias, et in universum Regnum Pontificium, nunquam fortius. Interea, navis illa Philippica jactata tempestatibus, et ventibus fluctibusq; concussa, et fracta, convulso malo, ruptis lateribus, amissis gubernatoribus, vectoribus, et rebus omnibus inanibus, et lacera, et aquæ plena, refertur in Angliam. Hæc ego divinitus non dubito contigisse, ut Rex fatuus intelligat, quàm sit auspicatum audire Missas. È Galliis multa turbulenta nunciuntur. Domus illa Guisana non potest acquiescere sine aliquo magno malo: Verum ista vobis multò propiora sunt, quàm nos. [Cott. Libr.]

The Nobilitie, Gentillmene, Barons, with Superintendants, Ministers and others, professing the evangell of Jesus Christ, within this realm: To the King's and Queen's Majestie, and the Christian estat of yis realme presentlie met into Parliament, wisheth the fere of God, with the spirit of righteous judgment.

FORASMUCKILL as in the convention of the kirke, halden at Edenburge the 25th day of June last past, certayn gentelmen then were directed to the queen's majestie, with certaine articles concerning the religion, desiring her majestie's answer therupon: To the whilks howbeit her majestie than gave sum particular answer, nocht the less her majestie remitted the ferder answer to this present parliament. And therefore wee, of our dewty, can doe noe lesse nor crave the full answer of the said articles in this present parliament, conforme to the queen's grace own appointment. And also in respect that in the parliament, halden at Edinburge the 10th of July, 1560 years, it was determined and concluded, the masses, papistrie, and papis jurisdiction, to be simply abolyshit and put away out of this realme, and Christ's religion to be reteined universally and approvit. And in like manor, in respect that the queen's majestie, by many divers and sundry proclamations, hes ratyfyt and approvyt Christ's religion, quhilke she fand publickly resaved in this realme at her arrivall, and spetially upon the fiftene daye of September last at Dunde: The kinge and queen's majestie, with the advyse of thair secreat counsaill, promiset as well be the act of secreat counsaile, as by divers and sundry proclamations mad therupon, publickly in the principall burghis of this realme, to establish in this present parliament the religion of Christ, quhilke thei fund publickly and univarsally standing at the arrivall in Scotland; and all acts, lawes and constitutions, comon, civill, or municipiall, prejudiciall to the same, to be abolished and put away, as the said acts and proclamations mair fullelye proports. Desiringe thairfore the premisses to be considered, together with the said articles, and the queen's majestie's answers to the same, with the kirke's replie thareupon as followis.

THE ARTICLES.

Theis are the articles, which the nobilitie, barons, gentlemen, burgeois, and other professors of Christ's evangell, crave with all humilitie at the queen's majestie, and her honorable consaile, within this realme of Scotlande.

Imprimis, That the papistical and blasphemous mass, with all papistree, idolatry, and pope's jurisdiction, be universallie suppressed and abolished throwgout this whole realme, not only in the subjects, but also in the queen's majestie own person, with punishment against all persons, that shall be deprehendet to transgresse and offend in the same: and that the sincere word off God, and Christ's true religion, nowe presently received, might be established, approved, and ratified througout thole realme, aswel in the queene's majestie owne person, as in the subjects, without any impedyment: and that the people be astricted to resort, upon the Sondaies at least, to the praiers and preaching of Gode's worde, like as they were astricted before to resort to the idolater's masse: and theis heads to be provided by act off parliament, with the consent of the estates, and ratifycation of the queen's majesty.

Secondlie, That seur provision be appointed for sustentation of the mynistrye, aswel for the tyme present, as for the tyme to come; and that suche persons as are publicklye admytted in the mynistrye, may have there livings assigned unto them, in the townes where they travell, or at the least next adjacent thereto: and that they have not occasion to crave the same at the hands of any other. And that the benefices nowe vacant, or that have vaked sithence the monethe of Marche, anno 1558, or that hereafter shall happen to vake, be disponed to qualified and learned persons, able to preche Godde's worde, and to discharge the vocation concernynge the mynysterye, by tryall, and admission of the superintendents: and that no bishopricke, abbaty, priorye, deaconrye, provostrye, or enye other benefyce having many churches annexed thereto, be disponed altogether at any tyme to come, to eny one man: but at the least, the churches thereof be severallye disposed, and to several persons, so that every man having charge may serve at his owne church, according to his vocation. And to this effect, that the glebbis and manses be given to the mynistrye, that they may make residence at there churches, wherethrough they may discharge there consciences, conform to there vocation, and also that the churches may be repaired accordinglye; and that a lawe be made and established hereupon by act of parliament, as said is.

Thirdlie, That none be permytted to have charge of scooles, colleges, or universities, or yet privatly or publickly instruct the youth, but such as shall be tryed by the superintendents, or the visitors of the church, found sound and able in doctrine, and admitted by them to there charges.

Fourthlie, For sustentacion of the poore, that all lands founded to hospitalitie of old, be restored again to the same use: and that all lands, anuell rents, or any other emoluments pertayninge any wayes somtyme to the friers of whatsoever ordre they had been of, or annuall rents, altarage, obits perteyninge to the priests, be applyit to the sustentacion of the poor, and uphold of scoles in the townes, and other places whear theye lie.

Fifthlie, That all sic horrible crymes, as now abound in this realme, without any correction, to the great contempt of God and his holye worde, sic as ydolatrie, blasphemy of Gode's name, manifest brekinge of the sabbath day, with wichcraft, sorcery and enchantment, adultery, incest, manifest whordome, menceance of bordells, murther, slaughter, reyse and spulze, with many other detestable crymes, may be severely punished; and judges appointed in every province or dioces, for execution therof, with power to doe the same, and that by act of parliament.

Last, That som order be devysit and establishit, for the ease of the poore laborers of the ground, concerninge the reasonable payment of thair teyndis, and settinge of thair teyndis to an over yair heads, without yaire own advyse and consent.

The Queen's Majestie's Answer to the Articles, presentit to her highnes by certaine Gentlemen, in the name of the hall last Assemblee of the Kirke.

To the first, desiringe the masse to be suppressed and abolscht, as well in the head as members, with punyshment, against the contradonears; as also that religion now professed to be establish be acte of parliament. It is answerit, first, for the part of her majestie selfe, that hir highnes is yet na wyse perswadit in the said religion, nott yett that any impietie is in the masse; and therefore beleves that her lovinge subjects will noe wayes presse her to receive any religion agaynst her conscience: quilk suld be to her continuall trouble, be remorse of conscience, and ther through an perpetuall inquietnes. And to deal plainly with her subjects, her majestie neather will, nor may leave the religion, qucharin she hes ben noryscht, and upbrought, and believes the same to be well grounded; knowinge, besides the grudge of conscience, gyf she receve any change in her owne religion, that she should leave the friendship of the king of France, the ancient allia of yis realme, and of other great princes hir frinds and confederats: quha wold take the same in evil part. And of quhom she may luke for there great support in har necessities and havfand no other consideration that may contraven the same. She will be loth to put in hasard the losse of all her frinds in an instant; prayinge all her lovyng subjects, seing they had experience of hir goodnes, that she has neither in tymes by past, nor yet means hereafter to prease the conscience of any man, but that they may worshippe God in sick sort as they ar perswadit to be the best, that they will allwayes notht presse hir toffend hir awne conscience. As to the establishment in the body of the realme, these your selfis knawis as appears well by your articles, that the sam can nocht be done, be thonly consent of hir majestie, but requires necessarily the consent of the thre estates in parliament. And therefore soe some as the parliament holds, that thing quhilke the thre estates agree upon amongst your selves, hir Majestie shall grant the same unto you. And alwais sall make you suer yat na man shall be troblit for using your selves in religion accordinge to your consciences: so that no man shall have cause to doubt that for religious causes men's lyves, or heritags, shall be in haserid.

To the second article, that her majestie thinks it no wayes reasonable that she shuld defraud hir selfe of sa greate a parte of the patrimony of the crowne, as to put the patronages of the benefices furth of her owne hands. For her own necessity, in beringe of her, and comon charges, will require the retention of ane gude part in her own hands: nochtlyelles her majestie is well pleasit that consideracion being had of hir owne necessity, and quhat may be sufficient for the reasonable sustentacion of the ministers, and special assignation be made to you, in places maist commodius and with the quihik her majestie shall not intromitt, but sofer the same to run to tham.

The answer of the rest of the articles is referred to the parliament.

The Kirk's Reply to the Queen's Majestie's Answers aforesayd.

First, whar her majestie answers that she is not persuadit in the religion; neather that she understands any impietie in the masse, hot that the same is well grounded, &c. This is no smale greafe to the Christian harts of her godlie subjects; consideringe that the trompet of Christ's evangell hes ben sa lange blawin in this countrie; and his mercy sa plainly offerit in the same: that her majestie yet remaynes unperswadit of the trewth of this our religion; for our religion is not ells, but the same religion quhilke Christ in the last days revelit, fra the bossome of his father: quharof he mad his apostells messengers, and quilkhe they preachit and establsyt amongst his faithfull to continu till gaine cominge of the lord Jesus: quilk differs from the impietie of the Turks, the blasphemy of the Jewes, and vaine superstition of the papists, in this: that onlie our religion hes God the Father, his only Sonne our Lord Jesus, his Holy Spirit speakinge in his prophets and apostles, for authors therof: and the doctrine and practice for ground of the same. The quhilke assurance no other religion upon the face of the yearth can justly alleage, or plainly prove; yea, quatssoever assurance the papists hes for their religion, the same hes the Turk for mayntenance of the Alcarone; and the Jewys far greter for the defence of their cerimonies; quibidder it be antiquity of tyme, consent of people, authority of princes, great number or multitud consentinge together, or any other sike like cloks, that they can pretent. And therefore as we are dolorous that her majestie in this our religion is not perswadit, so maist reverently wee require in the name of the Eternal God, that her highnes wald embrace the meanes quharby she may be perswadit in the trewth. Quhilke presently we offer unto her grace, aswell by preachinge of his worde, quhilke is the chiefe means appointed be God to perswade all the chosen children of his infailable veritie. As be publick disputacon against the adversaries of this our religion, descivers of her majestie, whensoever it shall be thought expedient to hir grace. And as to the impietie of the masse, we dare be bauld to affirme, that in that idoll there is great impietie, ye it is na thinge ells but a messe of impiete, fra the beginninge to the endinge. The author, or sayer, the action it selfe, the opinion therof conteanit, the hearers of it, gasars upon it, avoure it pronouncis blasphemy, and comytts maist abhominable ydolatrie, as we have ever offerit, and yet offer our selves maist manifestly to prove. And quhar hir majestie estesmes that the change of hir religion should dissolve the confederacy and allyance that she hes with the kinge of France, and other princes, &c.

Assuredly Christ's true religion is the undowtld means to knit up surly perfect confederacy and friendship, with him that is king of all kings; and quha hes the harts of all princes in his hands. Quhilke aucht to be more precious unto her majestie, nor the confederacy of all the princes of the yearth; and without the quhilke, neather confederacy, love, or kindnes, can long endure.

Concerning her majesties answer to the second article, quhar as she thinks yt no ways reasonable to defraud hir selfe of hir patronage of the benefices, quhilke her majestie estesmes to be a portion of hir patrimony. And that hir majesty is myndit to retaine an gud parte of the benefices in her own hands to support her comon charges: as to the first point, our mind is not that hir majestie, or any other patrone of this realme, shuld be defraudit of their just patronages, but we mean that quhen soever hir majestie, or any other patrone dois present any personage to any benefice, that the parson presently shuld be tryed and examined by the learned men of the kirke, sic appertaineth, as the superintendaunts appointit there to. And as the presentation of the benefices appertayne to the patrons, so ought the collation therof by lawe and reason appertayne to the church; of the quhilke collation, the kirk shuld not be defrauded, mair nor the patrons of their presentation; for otherwise, if it shall be lawful to the patrons absolutely to present, quhom that please, without triall or examination, quhat than can abyde in the kirke, the kirke of God, but mere ignorance without all ordre. As to the second parte concerning the retention of a gude parte of the benefices in her majestie's owne hands, this point abhorris sa far fra gud conscience, as well of God's law, as fra the publicke ordre of all comon laws; that we ar loth to open up the ground of the matter, be any long circumstances. And therefore maist reverently we wish that hir majestie wold consider the matter with her selfe, and with her wise counsell, that how soever the patronages of the benefice may appertayne to her selfe, yet the retention therof in hir own hands undisponing them to qualifyfyt Persones, is both ungodly, and also contrary to all polyticke order, and finall confusion to the pure saules of the comon people: quha be this means shuld be instructif of their salvation. And quhar hir majestie concludis in her second answer, that she is content that an sufficient and reasonable sustentacion of the ministers be provydat to tham, by assignacion in placis most commodious and easiest to tham; consideracion beinge had of hir owne necessitie. As we are altogether desirous that hir gravis necessitie be relevit, so our duty craves that we should notefie to your grace the true order that shuld be observed in this behalfe, quhilke is this, the teynds are properly to be reputed to be the patrimony of the kirke, upon the quhilks befor all things they that travells in the ministry thairof, and the pore indigent members of Christ body are to be sustenit. The kirks also repaired, and the youthead brought up in gud letters: quhilks things be aud done, than other necessitie reasonable might be supportede accordinge as her majestie, and her godlie counsaile could think expedient. Allways we cannot but thank her majestie most reverently, of her liberrall offer, of assignacions to be made to the ministers for their sustentacion. Quhilke not the lesse is so generally conceived that without mare speciall condiscendinge upon the particularity therof, no expectacion is able to follow therupon. And so to conclud with her majestie at this parliament, we desire most earnestly the performance of the said articles, beseching God that as they are reasonable and godly in thamselvis; so your majestie's hart, and the estates jointly convenit, may be inclynit and perswadit to the performance therof.

NUMBER XC.

The Supplication to the Queen's Majestie of Scotlande.

[Cott. Lib. Calig. b. 10.]

To the queen's most excellent majesty, her grace's humble subjects, professing the evangell of Christe Jesus within this realme, wisheth longe prosperitie, with the spirit of righteous judgment.

It is not unknown unto your majestie, that within this realme the evangell of Jesus Christ was lately so planted, the trewe religion so established; idolatry, to wit, the masses, and all that therto appertenyth, together with the usurped and tyrannicall power of that Romaine Ante-Christ, called the pope, so suppressed, aswel by the mighty power and hand of God, as by just lawes and deceres of parliament, that none within this realme durst in publick have gainsaid the one, nor mayntenet the other. It is further known that such as in whose hands, God of his mercye had prospered the begynninge of this his worke, were going forwarde to an exact and perfect reformation, concerninge the policy of the church, accordinge to the word of God, and sustentacion of them that travell in the same. But this nowe our most just and godlie begynnings have nowe bene staid and trobled nere the space of 4 yeres, to the great grief of all godlie hartes within this realme. Shortlie after your grace's arrival was that idol the masse erected up again: and there after were wicked men enemyes to Christ Jesus, and his holy evangell, reposed in the places wich they never possessed, and were admitted to receive the fruts, that by no just lawe can apperteyne to them: and that under color they shold pay ther thirds to your majesties comptroller, and such as he shold depute for the receiving of the same; to thend, as we understand, that our mynysters and mynistrye might have bene planted and sustanid accordinge to God's commaundment. And abeyt we were plainly forwarned that suche begynnynges wold not have eny happy ende; yet the love that we bare to the tranquillitie of your realme, and esperance and hope that we had, that God of his mercye wold molyfy your highnes' hart, to heere his blessed evangell publicly preched, we quyetly past over many things that were in our harts, as also many tymes by our supplicacions unto your majestie, we desired to have bene redressed: but howe litle we have profyted to this daie, bothe great and small amongst us begynne now to consider. For laws we see violated, idolatrye increased, your highnes owne gates (against proclamacions) made patent to the foolish people, to comytt idolatrye: the patrymony of the church we see bestowd upon persons most unworthie, and to other uses then was at first intended: and thereby, the tyranye of that Romaine Antichrist to be intruded upon us againe; our mynisters brought to extreme povertie; some of them troubled in ther function, some prechers hurt, and no redresse maide. Fornicacion, adulterye, incest, murther, sorcerers, bewythers, and al impietie, so to abounde universallie within this your highnes' realme, that God cannot lunge spaire to stricke the heade and the members, onless speedye repentance followe. We therefore, nowe contynuing in our former humble sewte, most humbly requere of your majestie a speedye reformation of the innormyties aforesaid, and a favorable answer of our just petycions; as more fullye your majestie please receive in articles; most humbly beseeching your highnes to have this opynion of us, that as to this daie your grace have founde nothinge in us, but dewe obbedyence to your majestie's lawes and auctoritie, which we have given, because we are thonly part of your people that treuly fear God, so to esteame of us, that God, his Christ Jesus, and his trewe religion which we professe (and by his grace shal be), to us more dear then lives, possessions, or respect of prosperitie. And therefore yet againe we the hole bodye, professing Christ Jesus within this realme, humbly crave of your majestie, that ye give us not occasion to thinke that ye entende nothinge but the subversion of Christ Jesus his true religion, and in the overthrowe of it, the destruction of us the best part of the subjects of this your grace's realme: for this before the world we plainly professe, that to that Romaine Antichrist we will never be subyeect, nor yet suffer (so far as our power may suppress it) any of his usurped auctoritie to have place within this realme. And thus with all humble and dewtfull obbedyence, we humbly crave your grace's favorable answer, with these our appointed commissions.

A Letter of Parkhurst, Bishop of Norwich, to Bullinger, concerning the state of affairs in Scotland, and the Killing of Signior David.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

SALVUS sis in Christo, optime Bullingero. Secundo Februarij scripsi ad te, et unâ cum Literis misi viginti Coronatos, vel decem Coronatos et Pannum pro toga: nam hoc Abeli arbitrio permisi. Tuas accepi 23 Maij. Paulô post Londinensis Episcopus, exemplar Responisionis tue ad Literas Laurentij Humphredi, et Thonæ Sampsonis, ad me misit. Quæ scripsisti, typis apud nos excuduntur, et Latinè, et Anglicè. Accepi præterea, 12 Julij, Confessionem Fidei orthodoxæ, c. pulcherrimum libellum. Mense Martio, Italus quidam, vocatus Senior David, Necoromantie artis peritus, in magnam gratiam apud Reginam Scotiæ, è Reginæ cubiculo (illa præsentè) vi extractus, et aliquot pugionibus confossus, miserè periit. Abbas quidam ibidem vulneratus, evasit ugrè, sed paulô post ex vulnere est mortuus. Fraterculus quidam, nomine Black (niger Visularius) Papistrarum antesignanus, eodem tempore in Aula occiditur: sic niger hic Nebulo, nigra quoq; morte peremptus, invitus nigrum subitò descendit in orcum. Consiliarij, qui tum simul in unum cubiculum erant congregati, ut de rebus quibusdam arduis consultarent, audientes has cædes (nam prius nihil tale sunt suspicati) alij hac, alij illac, alij è fenestris sese proturbantes certatim aufugerunt, atque ita cum vitæ periculo, vitæ consulebant suæ. Regina Scotiæ Principem peperit: et cum antea Maritum (nescio quas ob causas) non tanti faceret, jam plurimi facit. D. Jacobum, suum ex parte fratrem, quem antea exosum habuit, nunc in gratiam recepit, nec solum illum, sed omnes (utinam verum esset) proceres evangelicos, ut aúdio. Evangelium quod ad tempus sopiebatur, denudò caput exerit. Cùm hæc scriberem, ecce Scotus quidam è Patria profugiens, Vir bonus et doctus, narravit mihi, Reginam ante decem hebdomadas Puerum peperisse: nec dum esse baptizatum. Rogo causam. Respondet, Reginam velle Filium in summo Templo, cum multarum Missarum Celebratione tingi. At Edinburgenses id omnino non permittunt: nam mori potius malunt, quàm pati, ut abominandæ Missæ in suas Ecclesias iterum irrepant. Metuunt Edinburgenses, ne illa è Gallia auxiliares vocet Copias, ut facilius Evangelicos opprimat. Oremus Dominum pro piis Fratribus. Mandatis dedit cuidam pio Comiti, ut Knoxum apud se manentem, ex ædibus ejiciat. Dominus illam convertat, vel confundat. Plura scribere non possum; diu ægotavi, nec dum plene convalui. Est hæc scribendo debilitata manus.

Vale, Charissime mi Bullingero. Salutem queso adscribas omnibus, atque adeo omnibus Piis, meo nomine. Dominus sua dextra protegat Ditionem Tiguriorum. Raptim Ludhamiæ, 21 Augusti, 1566.

NUMBER XCII.

A Letter of Grindall's to Bullinger, giving an Account of the State of Affairs both in England and Scotland; and of the Killing of Signior David.

[Ex MSS. Tigur.]

Salutem in Christo.

Clarissime D. Bullingero, ac Frater in Christo Charissime.

D. JOHANNES ABELUS tradidit mihi Literas tuas D. Wintoniensi, Norvicensi, et mihi communiter inscriptas, unâ cum scripto vestro de re vestiarum: Quorum ego exemplaria ad D. Wintoniensem et Norvicensem statim transmissi. Quod ad me attinet, ago tibi maximas gratias, tum quod nostrarum Ecclesiarum tantam curam geris, tum quod me, hominem tibi ignotum, participem facis eorum, quæ ad nostros de rebus controversis scribuntur. Vix credibile est, quantum hæc Controversia, de rebus nihili, Ecclesias nostras perturbaret, et adhuc aliqua ex parte perturbat. Multi ex Ministris doctioribus, videbantur Ministerium deserturi. Multi etiam ex Plebe, contulerunt Consilia de Seccessione à nobis faciendâ, et occultis coetibus cogendis; sed tamen, Domini benignitate, maxima pars ad saniozem mentem rediit. Ad eam rem Literæ vestræ, plenè Pietatis ac Prudentiæ, plurimùm momenti attulerunt: Nam eas latinè, atque anglicè, Typis evulgandas curavi. Nonnulli ex Ministris, vestro judicio atque autoritate permoti, abjecerunt priora Consilia de deserendo Ministerio. Sed et ex Plebe quamplurimi mitius sentire ceperunt, postquam intellexerunt nostros Ritus, à vobis (qui iisdem non utimini) nequamquam damnari Impietatis, quod ante publicatas vestras Literas, nemo illis persuasisset. Sunt tamen, qui adhuc manent in priore Sententiâ; et in his, D. Humfredus et Sampsonus: Nihil verò esset facilius, quàm Regiæ Majestati eos reconciliare, si ipsi ab instituto discedere vellent. Sed quum hoc non faciunt nos apud Serenissimam Reginam ista contentione irritam, nihil possumus. Nos, qui nunc Episcopi sumus, in primo nostro reditu, priusquam ad Ministerium accessimus, diu multumque contendebamus, ut ista de quibus nunc controvertitur, proors amoverentur. Sed cùm illa de Regina et Statibus in Comitibus Regni impetrare non potuimus, communicatis Consiliis, optimum judicavimus, non deserere Ecclesias, propter Ritus non adeo multos, eosque per se non impios; præsertim quum pura Evangelij Doctrina nobis integra ac libera maneret, in qua ad hunc usque diem, (utcuque multi multa in contraria moliti sunt) cum vestris Ecclesiis, vestraque Confessione nuper dedita, plenissimè consentimus. Sed neque adhuc pœnitit nos nostri Consilij; Nam interea, Domine dante incrementum, auctæ et confirmatæ sunt Ecclesiæ, quod alioqui Eccehollis, Lutheranis, et Semi-papistis, prædæ fuissent expositæ. Istæ verò istorum intempestivæ Contentiones de Adiaphoris, (si quid ego judicare possum) non œdificant, sed scindunt Ecclesias, et discordias seminant inter Fratres. Sed de nostris Rebus hactenus. In Scotia non sunt res tam bene constitutæ, quàm esset optandum. Retinent quidem Ecclesiæ adhuc puram Evangelij Confessionem; sed tamen videtur Scotiæ Regina omnibus modis laborare, ut eam tandem extirpet. Nuper enim effecit, ut sex aut septem Missæ Papisticæ, singulis diebus in Aula sua publicè fierent, omnibus qui accedere volunt admissis, quum antea unica, eaque privatim habitæ, nullo Scoto ad eam admissis, esset contenta. Præterea, quum primum inita est Reformatio, cautum fuit, ut ex bonis Monasteriorum, quæ fisco adjudicata sunt, stipendia Evangelij Ministris persolverentur: At ipsa jam integro triennio nihil solvit. Joannem Knoxum, regia urbe Edinburgo, ubi hactenus primarius fuit Minister, non ita pridem ejecerit, neque exorari potest ut redeundi facultatem concedat. Publicè tamen, extra Aulam, nihil hactenus est innovatum; et Proceres Regni, Nobiles item, ac Cives, multò maxima ex parte Evangelio nomen dederunt, multa, magnaque Constantiæ indicia ostendunt. In his, præcipuus unus est, D. Jacobus Stuardus, Murraciæ Comes, Regiæ Frater, Nothus, Vir pius, ac magnæ apud suos Authoritatis. Perscribitur ad me ex Scotia, Reginæ cum Rege pessimè convenire. Causa hæc est: Fuit Italus quidam, nomine David, à Cardinale Lotharingo Reginæ Scotiæ commendatus. Is quum Reginæ à secreta atque intimis esset Consiliis, ferè solus omnia administrabat, non consulto Rege, qui admodum juvenis et levis est. Hoc malè habebat Regem. Itaque facta Conspiratione cum Nobilibus quibusdam, et Aulicis suis, Italum illum Reginæ opem frustra implorantem ex ipsius conspectu arripi, et statim indicta causa multis pugionibus perfodi, atque interfici curavit. Hujus facti immanis memoriam Regina, tametsi nuper Filium Regi peperit, ex animo deponere non potest. Hæc paulò verbosius de Scotia, ex qua fortassis rarò ad vos scribitur.

Oro ut D. Gualterum, ac reliquos Collegas tuos, meo nomine salutes. Dominus te, nobis et Ecclesiæ suæ, quàm diutissimè conservet.

SCOTIA jam in novos motus incidit. Henricus nuper Scotiæ Rex (uti te audivisse existimo) Decimo Februarii elapsi, in hortu quodam, hospitio suo adjacente, inventus est mortuus: De genere mortis nondum convenit apud omnes. Alii dicunt incensis vasis aliquot pulveris tormentarii, quæ sub cubiculo in quo dormiebat ex industria reposita fuerant, sedes eversas atq; ipsum in hortum proximum projectum fuisse.

Alii verò intempesta nocte vi extractum è cubiculo, et postea strangulatum, ac tum demum incenso pulvere sedes disjectas fuisse affirmant. Hujus cædis apud omnes suspectus erat Comes quidam nomine Bothwellius. Huic Comiti, postquam Uxorem Legitimam interveniente auctoritate Archiepiscopi S. Andree repudiasset: Decimo Quinto Maii nupsit Scotiæ Regina, atq; eandem ex Comite, Orchadam Duem creavit. Paulo ante hoc Matrimonium omnes fere Regni proceres, quum nullam in cædem Regis inquisitionem institui viderent, discesserunt ex Aula, et seorsum apud Sterlynum oppidum conventum habuerunt. In hoc conventu, certis inditiis nefandam hanc cædem à Bothwellio perpetratam fuisse, compertum est. Itaq; collecto exercitu ipsum comprehendere satagunt, Bothwellius verò dat se in fugam: Sed quo profugerit, adhuc nescitur.—Reginam alii aiunt obsideri in Arce quadam, alii verò in Arce Edinburgensi, tanquam necis mariti consciam, captivam detineri asserunt. Quomocunq; sit, infames illæ Nuptiæ, non possunt, non in aliquam diram Tragœdiam desinere. Sed de his omnibus expectamus indices certiora, de quibus, efficiam brevi ut cognoscas. De persecutionibus, Flandriæ nihil scribo, quod eas vos non latere existimem: Multa apud nos jactata sunt de obsessa Geneva, sed spero vana esse. Dominus Jesus pietatem tuam, nobis et Ecclesiæ incolumem conservet.

A Relation of Mary Queen of Scotland's Misfortunes, and of her last Will, in the Life of Cardinal Laurea, written by the Abbot of Pignerol, his Secretary. Printed at Bologna, Anno 1559.

ATQ; tunc in Scotia tam scelestum, tamque nefarium facinus commissum est, ut illud reminisci, nedum

larum (ut vulgò aiunt) morbo correptus, ne fortassis Uxorem contagione contaminaret, se in ædes à regis ædibus Edimburgi sejunctas receperat; ubi, simul ac

gratia esset comitatura: Quem morem superiores Reginæ observare semper consueverant. Vix Regina discesserat, cum ecce pulvis tormentarius, per cuni-culos subter fundamentum domus coniectus, totum edificium continuò dejecit, ipsumque Regem opprimit:
Quamvis nonnulli non ruina interemptum, sed, dum per posticum primo circa ædes auditò armorum strepitu vere dejectas fuisse malint. Planè constat, exangue nigram tantum modò circa collum maculam habuisse.

Indignissima hac Regis divulgata cæde, ingens omnes horror corripuit; quidem iniquos in Reginam sermones jacere; alij per injuriam libellos edere: Nonnulli Comitem Boduëllium, quem cædis nefariæ auctorem fuisse compererant, non sicarium, sed crudelissimum carnificem accusare, adeò interdum vulgus acutissimè indagare, atque odorari omnia solet. Boduëllius, licet Hæreticus, Reginæ tamen studiosissimus, fidelissimusque fore, ut Reginam ipsam in Matrimonium haberet, primò Uxori propriæ (quasi propter adulterium fieri divortium, aliâque ducere liceret) repudium misit, deinde Regi necem crudeliter machinatus est. Regina post, improbissimos de ea, Boduëllioque rumores dissipatos, verita ne quis populi motus in eorum perniciem fieret, Edimburgo statuit recedendum, ac se unâ cum parvulo filio ad munitam Strivelini arcem recepit; statuto prius (ut simile vero videtur) quid inter ipsam, et Boduëllium foret postea Transigendum. Nam paucis inde diebus egressa Regina, veniunt prodire simulat;

tum Boduëllius, veluti ex insidiis, ducentis stipatus equitibus, illam circumvenire, vimque ei intendere visus
est. Ergo Regina, unâ cum Boduëllio in arcem regressa, festim eam Orcadum Ducem, moxque Maritum eam esse declarat, verum Nuptiæ illæ neutiquam faustæ, ac diuturnæ fuerunt: Quippe quæ non Matrimonij dignitate, sed indigni facinoris socie-tate conjunctæ viderentur. Eo tempore, Moraviensis è Scotia aberat, præ cæteris tamen relicto Ledingtonio, qui novas, ut occasio daretur, turbas, novasq; rixas faceret. Huic quàm facillimum fuit sponte omnium in Reginam Boduëlliumque ira, accensos animos acrius inflammare. Raptim igitur, turbulenteque, Exercitu Edenburgi comparato, subitò Strivelinam versus Castra moventur. Id ubi Regina intellexit, secum Mulieres tantum, paucosq; aulicos Homines, adducens obviam produendum duxit, venienti debita cum reverentia assurrexerunt. Interrogati, quam de causa armati illuc accessissent, non alia respondisse feruntur, nisi ut atrocem injuriam à Boduëllio factam, ac crudelem, et indignam Regis necem, vimq; ipsimet Reginæ illatam vendicarent. At Regina noxam Boduëllij purgare;
nihil non ipsa assentiente commissum. Quo sermone adeò sunt commoti, et exarserunt, ut omnes illicò uno ore acclamaverint. Et tu igitur, Domina, apud nos Captiva eris. Nec mora, ad Arcem insulæ intra

NUMBER XCVII.

A Declaration of the Causes moving the Queene of England to give Aide to the Defence of the People afflicted and oppressed in the Lowe-Countries.

ALTHOUGH kinges and princes, souveraignes, owing their homage and service only unto the Almighty God, not bounde to yeeld account, or render the reasons of their actions to any others, but to God their only souveraine Lord: yet (though amongst the most ancient and Christian monarchies, the same Lordd God having committed to us the soveraigntie of this realme of Englande, and other our dominions, which wee holde immediatly of the said Almighty Lorde, and so thereby accountable only to his Divine Majestie) wee are, notwithstanding this our prerogative at this time, specially moved (for divers reeasons hereafter briefly remembred) to publish, not only to our owne naturall loving subjects, but also to all others our neighbours, specially to such princes and states as are our confederates, or have for their subjects cause of commerce with our countreis and people, what our intention is at this time, and upon what just and reasonable grounds we are moved to give aid to our next neighbours, the naturall people of the Lowe-Countreis, being by long warres, and persecutions of strange nations there, lamentable afflicted, and in present danger to be brought into a perpetual servitude.

First, it is to be understoode (which percase is not perfectly knowne to a great number of persons), that there hath been, time out of minde, even by the naturall situation of those Low-Countreis and our realme of England, one directly opposite to the other, and by reason of the ready crossing of the seas, and multitude of large and commodious havens respectively on both sides, a continuall traffique and commerce betwixt the people of England and the naturall people of these Lowe-Countries; and so continued in all ancient times when the severall provinces therof, as Flanders, Holland, and Zeland, and other countries to them adjoining, were ruled and possessed by severall lordes, and not united together, as of late yeeres they have been by enter-marriages; and at length by concurrences of many and sundrie titles have also been reduced to be under the government of their lordes that succeeded to the dukedome of Burgundie, whereby there hath been in former ages many speciall alliances and confederations, not only betwixt the Kinges of England our progenitours, and the lordes of the said countries of Flanders, Holland, Zeland, and their adherents; but also betwixt the very naturall subjectes of both countries, as the prelates, noblemen, citizens, burgesses, and other comminalties of the great cities and port townes of eicher countrie reciproquellie by speciall obligations and stipulations under their seales both of commerce and entercourse of merchantes; and also of speciall mutuall amitie to be observed betwixt the people and inhabitants of both parties, as well ecclesiastical as secular: and very expresse provision in suche treaties contained for mutuall favours, affections, and all other friendly offices to be used and prosecuted by the people of the one nation towards the other. By which mutuall bondes there hath continued perpetuall unions of the people's hearts together, and so by way of continuall entercourses, from age to age the same mutuall love hath bene inviolable kept and exercised, as it had been by the worke of nature, and never utterly dissolved, nor yet for any long time discontinued, howsoever the kinges, and the lordes of the countries sometimes (though very rarely) have been at difference by sinister meanes of some other princes their neighbours, envying the felicitie of these two countries.

Confederations both betwixt the kinges of England and the lordes of the Lowe-Countries, and also the subjectes of both countries.

The people of both the countries bound by special obligations enterechangeable, for mutuall favours and friendly offices.

And for maintenance and testimonie of these naturall unions of the peoples of these kingdoms and countries in perpetuall

Treaties extant of ancient time, betwixt the Kings of England and the Countie of Burgundie, for the commerce betwixt their countries.

and inheritour to the countie of Flanders by the Ladie Margaret his grandmother, which was above one hundred and forty years past; and the same also renewed by the noble duke Charles his sonne, father to the King of Spayne's grandmother, and husband to the Ladie Margaret, sister to our great-grandfather King Edward the IVth: and after that, of newe oftentimes renewed by our most noble and sage grandfather king Henrie the VIIth, and the archduke Philip, grandfather to the King of Spayne now being: and in later times often renewed betwixt our father of noble memorie king Henry the VIIIth, and Charles the Vth Emperour of Almaine, father also to the present king of Spaine.

In al which treaties, transactions, and confederations of amitie and mutual commerce, it was also at all times specially and principally contained the subjectes of either side, to shewe mutual favours one to the other.

mutuall favours and duties one to the other, and should safely, freely, and securely commerce together in everie their countries, and so hath the same mutuall and naturall concourse and commerce bene without interruption contynued in many ages, farre above the like example of any other countries in Christendome, to the honour and strength of the princes, and to the singular great benefite and enriching of their people, untill of late yeeres that the King of Spayne departing out of his Lowe-Countries into Spayne, hath bene (as is to be thought) cancelled by his counsellours of Spaniardes and strangers lately appointed governours in the Lowe Countries, to the violation of the liberties of the country.

chiefest governours of all his said Low Countries, contrary to the ancient lawes and customes thereof, having great plentie of noble, valiant, and faithful persons naturally borne, and such as the Emperour Charles and the king himselfe had to their great honours used in their service, able to have bene employed in the rule of those countries. But these Spaniardes being meere strangers, having no naturall regarde in their government to the maintenance of those countries and people in their ancient and naturall manner of peaceable living, as the most noble and wise Emperour Charles, yea, and as his sonne King Philip himself had, whilst he remained in those countries, and used the counsels of the states, and natural of the countries, not violating the ancient liberties of the countries: but, contrarywise, these Spaniardes being exalted to absolute government by ambition, and for private lucre have violently broken the ancient lawes and liberties of all the countries; and in a tyrannous sort have banished, killed, and destroyed, without order of lawe, within the space of the nobilitie and the people of the countries by Spanish government.

amidte, there are extant sundrie autentique treaties and transactions for mutual commerce, entercourse, and straight amitie of ancient times: as for example, some very solemnly accorded in the times of King Henrie the VIth our progenitour, and Philip the IId, Duke of Burgundie, and in expresse words, by conventions, concordes, and conclusions, that the naturall people and subjectes of either side, should shewe dueties one to the other, and should safely, freely, and securely commerce together in everie their countries, and so hath the same mutuall and naturall concourse and commerce bene without interruption contynued in many ages, farre above the like example of any other countries in Christendome, to the honour and strength of the princes, and to the singular great benefite and enriching of their people, untill of late yeeres that the King of Spayne departing out of his Lowe-Countries into Spayne, hath bene (as is to be thought) cancelled by his counsellours of Spayne, to appoynt Spaniardes, foreners, and strangers of strange blood, men more exercised in warres than in peaceable government; and some of them notably delighted in blood, as hath appeared by their actions, to be the chiefest governours of all his said Low Countries, contrary to the ancient lawes and customes thereof, having great plentie of noble, valiant, and faithful persons naturally borne, and such as the Emperour Charles and the king himselfe had to their great honours used in their service, able to have bene employed in the rule of those countries. But these Spaniardes being meere strangers, having no naturall regarde in their government to the maintenance of those countries and people in their ancient and naturall manner of peaceable living, as the most noble and wise Emperour Charles, yea, and as his sonne King Philip himself had, whilst he remained in those countries, and used the counsels of the states, and natural of the countries, not violating the ancient liberties of the countries: but, contrarywise, these Spaniardes being exalted to absolute government by ambition, and for private lucre have violently broken the ancient lawes and liberties of all the countries; and in a tyrannous sort have banished, killed, and destroyed, without order of lawe, within the space of the nobilitie and the people of the countries by Spanish government. And howsoever in the beginning of these cruel persecutions, the pretence thereof was for maintenance of the Romish religion, yet they spared not to deprive verie many Catholiques and ecclesiastical persons of their franchises and privileges: and of the chiefest that were executed of the nobilitie, none was in the whole countrie more affected to that religion then was the noble and valiant Count of Egmond, his singular victories in the service of the King of Spayne can be forgotten in the true histories, nor yet for the cruelties used for his destruction, to bee but for ever lamented in the heartes of the natural people of that countrie.

And furthermore, to bring these whole countries in servitude to Spayne, these foreine governours have, by long intestine warre, with multitude of Spaniards, and with some fewe Italians and Almaines, made the greater part of the said countries (which with their riches, by common estimation, answered the Emperour Charles equally to his Indias) in a manner desolate; and have also lamentably destroyed by sword, famine, and other cruel maners of death, a great part of the natural people, and now the riche townes and strong places being desolate of their natural inhabitants, are held and kept chiefly with force by the Spaniardes.

All which pitiful miseries and horrible calamities of these most rich countries and people, are of all their neighbours at this day, even of such as in ancient time have bene at frequent discord with them, thorowe natural compassion verie greatlly pitied, which appeared specially this present yere, when the Frenche kinge pretended to have received them to his protection, had not (as the states of the countrey and their deputies were answered) that certaine untimely and unlooked for complottes of the house of Guise, stirred and maintained by money out of Spayne, disturbed the good and general peace of Fraunce, and thereby urged the king to forbear from the resolution he had made, not only to aide the oppressed people of the Lowe Countries against the Spaniardes, but also to have accepted them as his owne subjectes. But in verie truth, howsoever they were pitied, and in a sort for a time comforted and kept in hope in Fraunce by the French king, who also hath oftentimes earnestly solicited us as queen of England, both by message and writinge to bee careful of their defence: yet in respect that they were otherwise more straightly knitte in ancient friendship to this realme then to any other countrie, we are sure that they could bee pitied of none for this long time with more cause and grief generally then of our subjects of this our realme of England, being their most ancient allies, and familiar neighbours, and that in such manner, as this our realme of England, and those countries have been by common language of long time resembled, and termed as man and wife. And for these urgent causes and many others, we have

The French King's offers to have aided and received to his subjection the oppressed People of the Lowe Countries.

by many friendly messages and ambassadors, by many letters and writings to the said king of Spayne our brother and allie, declared our compassion of this so evil and cruel usage of his natural and loyal people, by sundrie his martiall governours, and other his men of warre, all strangers to these his countries. And furthermore, as a good loving sister to him, and a natural good neighbour to his Lowe Countries and people, we have often, and often againe most friendly warned him, that if he did not otherwise by his wisdom and princely clemencie restraine the tyrranny of his governours, and crueltie of his men of warre, we feared that the people of his countries should be forced for safetie of their lives, and for continuance of their native country in their former state of their liberties, to seek the protection of some other foreyne lorde; or rather to yeeld themselves wholly to the soveraigntie of some mighty prince, as by the ancient lawes of their countries, and by speciall priviledges graunted by some of the lordes and dukes of the countries to the people, they do pretende and affirm, that in such cases of general injustice, and upon such violent breaking of their priviledges, they are free from their former homages, and at libertie to make choice of any other prince to bee their prince and head. The proof whereof, by examples past is to be seene and read in the ancient histories of divers alterations, of the lordes and ladies of the countries of Brabant, Flanders, Holland, and Zeland, and other countries to them united by the states and people of the countries; and that by some such alterations, as the stories do testifie, Philip the duke of Burgundy came to his tytyle, from which the king of Spayne's interest is derived: but the further discussion hereof, we leave to the viewe of degree in those countries, and most obedient subjects to the king, such as were the duke of Ascot, and the marques of Havery yet living, and of such others as had principal offices in those countries in the time of the emperor Charles, we yeilded at their importunate requests, to graunt them prests of money, only to continue them as his subjects, and to maintaine themselves in their just defence against the violence and cruelties of the Spaniardes their oppressours, thereby staying them from yielding their subjection to any other prince from the said king of Spayne: and during the time of that our aide given to them, and their stay in their obedience to the king of Spayne, we did freely acquainte the same king with our actions, and did still continue our friendly advices to him, to move him to commaund his governours and men of warre, not to use such insolent cruelties against his people, as might make them to despayre of his favours, and seeke some other lorde.

And in these kind of perswasions and actions wee continued many yeeres, not onely for compassion of the miserable state of the countries, but of a natural disposition to have the ancient conditions of straight amitie and commerce for our kingdomes and people to continue with the states and the people of the said dukedome of Burgundie and the appendants, and namely with our next neighbours the countries of Flanders, Holland and Zeland. For wee did manifestly see, if the nation of Spayne should make a conquest of those countries, as was and yet is apparantly intended, and plant themselves there as they have done in Naples and other countries, adding thereto the late examples of the violent hostile enterprise of a power of Spayne being fewe yeeres by the king and the pope into our realme of Ireland, with an intent manifestly confessed by the captaines, that those numbers were sent aforehand to cease upon some strength there to the intent with other greater forces to pursue a conquest thereof: wee did we say againe, manifestly see in what danger our selfe, our countries and people might shortly bee, if in convenient time wee did not speedily otherwise regard to prevent or stay the same. And yet notwithstanding our saide often requests and advices given to the king of Spayne, manifestly for his own weale and honour, wee found him by his counsell of Spayne so unwilling in any sort to incline to our friendly counsell, that his governours and chieftains in his Lowe Countries increased their cruelties towards his own afflicted people, and his officers in Spayne offered dayly greater injuries to ours, resorting thither for trafigue: yea, they of his counsell in Spayne, would not permit our express messenger with our letters to come to the king their master's presence: a matter very strange, and against the law of nations.

And the cause of this our writing and sending to the king, proceeded of matter that was worthy to be knowne to the king, and not unmete nowe also to be declared to the world, to shewe both our good disposition towards the king in imparting to him our grieves, and to let it appear howe evill we have bene used by his ministers, as in some part may appear by this that followeth. Although we coule not have these many yeres past any of our servaunts, whome we sent at sundrie times as our ambassadours to the king our good brother, as was mete, suffered to continue there without many injuries and indignities offered to their families, and divers times to their owne persons, by the greatest of his counsellours, so as they were constrained to leave their places, and some expelled, and in a sort banished the country, without cause given by them, or notified to us: yet we, minding to continue very good friendship with the king, as his good sister, did of long time, and many yeres give favourable allowance to all that came as his ambassadours to us; saving onely upon manifest daungerous practices, attempted by two of them to trouble our estate, whereof the one was Girald Despes, a very turbulent-spirited person, and altogether unskilfull and unapt to deale in princes' affaires being in amitie; as at his return into Spaine, he was so there also reputed: the other, and laet was, Bernardin de Mendoza; one whom we did accept, and use with great favour a long time, as was manifestly seene in our court, and we thinke cannot be denied by himself: but yet of late yeeres (we know not by what direction) we found him to be a secret great favourer to sundrie our evill-disposed and seditious subjectes, not onely to such as lurked in our realme, but also to such as fled the same; being notoriously condemned as open rebelles and traytours; with whome by his letters, messages, and secret counsels, he did in the ende devise, how with a power of men, partly to come out of Spayne, partly out of the Lowe Countries, whereof hee gave them great comforte in the kinge's name, an invasion might be made into our realme; setting downe in writing the manner howe the same should be done, with what numbers of men and shippes, and upon what coastes, portes and places of our realme, by special name: and who the persons should be in our realme of no small account, that should favour this invasion, and take part with the invadors; with many other circumstances, declaring his full set purpose and labours taken, to trouble us and our realme very dangerously; as hath bene moste clearly proved and confessed, by such as were in that confederacy with him : whereof some are fled, and now do frequent his companie in France ; and some were taken, who confessed at great length by writing, the whole course herein helde by the saide ambassador, as was manifestly of late time published to the worlde upon Francis Throgmorton's, a principall traitour's examination. And when we found manifestly this ambassadour so dangerous an instrument, or rather a head to a rebellion and invasion : and that for a yeere or more together, he never brought to us any letter from the kinge his master, notwithstanding our often requeste made to him, that he woulde by some letter from the king to us, let it appeare that it was the king's will, that he should deale with us in his master's name, in sundrie things that he propounded to us as his ambassadour ; which we did judge to be contrary to the kinge his master's will. We did finally cause him to be charged with these dangerous practices ; and made it patent to him, how, and by whom (with many other circumstances), we knew it ; and therefore caused him, in very gentle sort, to be content (with some reasonable time) to departe out of our realme, the rather for his own safety, as one in very deed mortally hated of our people. For the which we graunted him favorable conduct, both to the sea, and over the sea. And thereupon we did speedily send a servant of ours into Spaine, with our letters to the king, only to certify him of this accident, and to make the whole matter apparant unto him. And this was the messenger afore-mentioned, that might not be suffred to deliver our message, or our letters, to the king.

And beside these indignities, it is most manifest, how his ministers also have both heretofore many times, and now lately practised here in England, by meanes of certaine rebelles, to have procured sundry invasions of our realme, by their forces out of Spaine and the Lowe Countreys : very hard recompences (we may say) for so many our good offices. Hereupon we hope, no reasonable person can blame us, if we have disposed our selves to change this our former course, and more carefully to look to the safety of our selfe, and our people. And finding our owne dangers in deed very great and imminent, we have bene the more urgently provoked to attempt and accelerate some good remedy : for that, besides many other advices, given us both at home and from abroad, in due time to withstand these dangers ; we have found the general disposition of al our own faithfull people, very ready in this case, and earnest, in offering to us both in parliaments and otherwise, their services with their bodies and blood, and their aides with their lands and goods, to withstand and prevent this present common danger to our realme and themselves, evidently seene and feared, by the subverting and rooting up of the ancient nation of these Low Countries, and by planting the Spanish nation and men of warre, enemies to our countries, there so near unto us. And besides these occasions and considerations, we did also call to our remembrance our former fortunate proceeding, by God's special favor, in the beginning of our reigne, in remedying of a like mischief that was intended against us in Scotland by certaine Frenchmen, who then were directed onely by the house of Guise, by colour of the marriage of their neece, the queene of Scots, with the dolphin of France : in like maner, as the offsprings of the saide house have even now lately sought to attaine to the like unordinate power in France : a matter of some consequence for our selves to consider ; although we hope, the king (our good brother) professing sincere friendship towards us, as we profess the like to him, will moderate this aspiring greatnes of that house, that neither himself, nor the princes of his blood be overruled, nor we (minding to continue perfect friendship with the king, and his blood) be by the said house of Guise, and their faction, disquieted or disturbed in our countries. But now to return to this like example of Scotlande aforesaid, when the French had in like maner (as the Spanyardes have nowe of long time attempted in the Lowe Countries) sought by force to have subdued the people there, and brought them into a servitude to the crowne of France ; and also by the ambitious desires of the saide house of Guise, to have proceeded to a warre by way of Scotland, for the conquest of our crowne for their neece the queene of Scottes (a matter most manifest to the common knowledge of the worlde) : it pleased Almighty God, as it remaineth in good memorie to our honour and comfort, to further our intention, and honourable and just actions, at that time, in such sort, as by our aiding then of the nation of Scotland, (being sore oppressed with the French, and universally requiring our aide,) we procured to that realme (though to our great cost) a full deliverance of the force of strangers, and danger of servitude, and restored peace to the whole countrey ; which hath continued there ever since many yeres ; saving that at some time of parcialities of certaine of the noblemen, (as hath bene usual in that countrey, in the mynoritie of the yong king) there hath risen some inward troubles, which (for the most part) we have, in favour of the king and his governours, used meanes to pacifie :

The Reahn of Scotland restored to the ancient Freedom, and so possessed by the present King, by the Means only of the Q. of England.

so as at this day, such is the quietnes in Scotlande, as the king our dear brother and cousin, by name James the VIth, a prince of great hope for many princely respectes, raigneth there in honour and love of his people, and in very good and perfect amitie with us and our country. And so our actions, at that time, came to so good successe, by the goodnes of God, as bothe our own realme, and that of Scotland, hath ever since remained in better amitie and peace, then can be remembered these manie hundred yeeres before : and yet nothing heereby done by us, nor any cause justly given, but that also the Frenche kinges that have since succeeded (which have been three in number, and all brethren) have made and concluded divers treaties for good peace with us ; which presentlie continue in force on both parties, notwithstanding our foresaide actions, attempted for removing out of Scotland of the saide French forces, so transported by the onely direction of the house of Guise.

And therefore, to conclude for the declaration of our present intention at this time, we hope it shall of

The conclusion of all persons abroad be well interpreted, as wee knowe it will be of such as are not ledde by partialitie, that upon the often and continuall lamentable requestes made to us by the universall states of the countries of Holland, Zealand, Guelders, and other provinces with them united, (beeing desperate of the king of Spaine's favours) for our succours to be yeilded to them, onely for their defence against the Spaniards, and other strangers ; and therewith finding manifestly, by our often and importunate requests and advices given to the king of Spaine, no hope of reliefe of these their miseries, but rather an increase therof, by dayly conquests of their townes, and slaughter of their people (tho' in very truth, we cannot impute the increase of any late cruelties to the person of him that now hath the title of generall governor, shewing his naturall disposition more inclynable to mercie and clemencie, then it seemeth he can direct the heartes of the Spaniards under him, that have been so long trayned in shedding of blood, under the former Spanish governours) : and joyning therunto our owne danger at hand, by the overthrow and destruction of our neighbours, and access and planting of the great forces of the Spaniards so nere to our countries, with precedent arguments of many troublesome attemptes against our realme : we did therefore, by good advice, and after long deliberation, determine to sende certaine companies of souldiers, to ayde the naturall people of those countries ; onely to defende them and their townes from sacking and desolation, and thereby to procure them safetie, to the honour of God, whome they desire to serve sincerely, as Christian people, according to his holie word, and to enjoye their ancient liberties for them and their posteritie, and so consequently to preserve and contynue the lawfull and ancient commerce betwixt our people, and those countries and ours.

And so, we hope, our intention herein, and our subsequent actions will be, by God's favour, both

strangers, enemies of the country : yet therein considering we have no meaning at this tyme, to take and retaine the same to our owne proper use ; we hope that all persons will thinke it agreeable with good reason and princely policie, that we should have the gard and use of some such places, for sure access and recess of our people and souldiers in safety, and for furniture of them with victuals, and other things requisite and necessarie, whylest it shall be needfull for them to continue in those countries, for the aiding therof in these their great calamities, miseries, and imminent daunger, and untill the countries may be delivered of such strange forces as do now oppresse them, and recover their ancient lawfull liberties and maner of government, to live in peace as they have heeretofore done, and doe nowe most earnestly in lamentable manner desire to doe ; which are the very onely true ends of all our actions nowe intended, howsoever malicious tongues may utter their cankered conceits to the contrary, as at this day the worlde aboundeth with such blasphemous reportes in writings and infamous libels, as in no age the devil hath more abounded with notable spirites replenished with all wickednesse, to utter his rage against professors of Christian religion. But thereof we leave the revenge to God, the searcher of hearts, hoping that he beholding the sinceritie of our heart, wil graunte good successe to our intentions, whereby a Christian peace may ensue to his divine honour, and comfort to al them that love peace truly, and wil seeke it sincerely.

An Addition to the Declaration, touching the Slaunders published of her Majestie.

AFTER we had finished our declaration, there came to our hands a pamphlet written in Italian, printed at Milan, entituled "Nuovo Avviso," directed to the archbishop of Milan, conteyning a report of the expugnation of Antwerpe by the prince of Parma : by the which we found our self most maliciously charged with two notable crimes, no lesse hateful to the world then most repugnant and contrary to our own naturall inclination. The one, with ingratitude towards the king of Spaine, who (as the author saith), saved our life being justly by sentence adjudged to death in our sister's time : the other, that there was some persons procured to be corrupted with great promises, and that with our intelligence, as the reporter addeth in a parenthesis in these words (as it is said)—that the life of the prince of Parma should be taken away : and for the better proving and countenancing of this horrible lye, it is further added in the same pamphlet, that it pleased the Lord God to discover this, and bring two of the wicked persons to justice. Now, knowing how men are maliciously bent in this declining age of the world, both to judge, speak, and write maliciously, falsely, and unreverently of princes ; and holding nothing so dear unto us as the conservation of our reputation and honour to be blamelesse ; we found it very expedient not to suffer two such horrible imputations to pass under silence, least for lacke of answer, it may argue a kind of guiltines, and did therefore thinke that what might be alledged by us for our justification in that behalfe might be most aptly joined unto this former declaration now to be published, to lay open before the world the maner and ground of our proceedings in the causes of the Lowe Countries.

And for answer of the first point wherewith we are charged, touching our ingratitude towards the king of Spaine, as we do most willingly acknowledge that we were beholding unto him in the time of our late sister, which we then did acknowledge very thankfully, and have sought many ways, since in like sort to requite, as in our former declaration by our actions may appeare : so do we utterly denie as a most manifest untruth, that ever he was the cause of the saving of our life, as a person by a course of justice sentenced unto death, who ever carried our self towards our said sister in dutifull sort, as our loyaltie was never called in question, much lesse any sentence of death pronounced against us : a matter such, as in respect of the ordinarie course of proceeding, as by proccesse in lawe, by place of tryal, by the judge that should pronounce such sentence, and other necessary circumstances in like cases usual, especially against one of our qualitie, as it could not but have bene publique known, if any such thing had bene put in execution. This, then, being true, we leave to the worlde to judge howe maliciously and injuriously the author of the said pamphlet dealeth with us, in charging us by so notable an untruth with a vice that of all others we do most hate and abhorre. And therefore, by the manifest untruth of this imputation, men not transported with passion may easily discern what untruth is contained in the second, by the which we are charged to have bene acquainted with an intended attempt against the life of the said prince: a matter, if any such thing should have been by us intended, must have proceeded either of a mislyking we had of his person, or that the prosecution of the warres in the Lowe Countries was so committed unto him, as no other might prosecute the same but he.

And first for his person, we could never learne that he hath at any time, by acte or speach, done any thing that might justly brede a mislike in us towards him, much lesse a hatred against his person in so high a degree, as to be either privie or assenting to the taking away of his life: besides he is one of whom we have ever had an honourable conceite, in respect of those singular rare partes we alwaies have noted in him, which hath won unto him as great reputation as any man this day living carrieth of his degree and qualitie: and so have we always delivered out by speeche unto the world, when any occasion hath bene offered to make mention of him. Nowe, touching the prosecution committed unto him of the warres in the Lowe Countries, as all men of judgment know that the taking away of his life carrieth no likelihood that the same shall worke any ende of the said prosecution: so it is manifestly knowne that no man hath dealt more honourable then the saide prince, either in duely observing of his promise, or extending grace and mercie where merite and deserte hath craved the same: and therefore no greater impietie by any coulde bee wrought, nor nothing more prejudicial to ourselfe (so long as the king shall continue the prosecution of the cause in that forcible sort he now doeth) then to be an instrument to take him away from thence by such violent means, that hath dealt in a more honourable and gracious sort in the charge committed unto him, then any other that hath ever gone before him, or is likely to succeed after him.

Now therefore how unlikely it is that we having neither cause to mislike of his person, nor that the prosecution of the warres shoulde cease by losse of him, should be either authour, or any way assenting to so horrible a fact, we referre to the judgment of such as looke into causes, not with the eyes of their affection, but do measure and weigh things according to honour and reason. Besides, it is likely if it had bene true, that we had bene any way chargeable (as the author reporteth) the confessions of the parties executed (importing such matter as by him is alledged) would have been both produced and published; for malice leaveth nothing unsearched that may nourish the venime of that humour.

The best course, therefore, that both we and all other princes can holde in this unfortunate age, that overfloweth with numbers of malignant spirits, is through the grace and goodness of Almighty God, to direct our course in such sort, as they may rather shewe their willes through malice, than with just cause with desert, to say ill, or deface princes, either by speach or writing: assuring our selves that besides the punishment that such wicked and infamous libellours shall receive at the handes of the Almightye for depraving of princes and lawfull magistrates, who are God's ministers, they both are, and alwayes shall be thought by all good men, unworthie to live upon the face of the earth.

NUMBER I.

A Letter written to me by Anthony Wood, in Justification of his History of the University of Oxford; with Reflections on it, referred to Alphabetically.

SIR,—Your book of the Reformation of the Church of England, I have latelie perused, and finding my self mentioned therein, not without some discredit, I thought fit to vindicate my self so far in these animadversions following, that you may see your mistakes, and accordingly rectifie them (if you think fit), in the next part that is yet to publish.

P. 86. [But after he hath set downe the instrument, he gives some reasons, &c.]

The two first reasons (if they may be so called),^a were put in by another hand; and the other were taken from these three books following^b, viz. from Dr. Nicholas Harpesfelde's treatise concerning marriage, &c. which is a fair manuscript in folio; written either in the time of queen Marie, or in the beginning of queen Elizabeth, and 'tis by me quoted in my book, in the place excepted against. From Will. Forest's Life of Queen Catherine, written in the raigne of queen Marie, and dedicated to her. 'Tis a manuscript also, and written verie fairlie in parchment^c. From "An Apologie for the Government of the Universitie against King Henry the VIIth.," written by a master of arts, septimo Elizabethæ. 'Tis a manuscript also, and hath all the king's letters therin, written to the universitie about the question of marriage and divorce,

^a I could not know this: He publishes them, and is justly to be charged with them.

^b From such authorities what else was to be expected?

^c This, as Dr. Lloyd informs me, is Parson's book, an author of no better credit than the former; for he was a master of arts in Balliol College, in queen Elizabeth's time.—See Wood in Bal. Col.

with several passages relating to convocations concerning the said questions.

So that by this you see I do not frame those reasons out of mine owne head (as partial men might) but what other authours dictate to me.

Ibid. [Upon what designe I cannot easily imagine.]

No designe at all God-wot, but meerlie for truth's sake, which verie few in these dayes will deliver.

Ibid. [And as if it had been an ill thing, he takes paines to purge the universities of it, &c.]

It was an ill thing I think (I am sure it was taken so to be) for a prince by his letters to frighten^d people out of their conscience, and by menaces force them to say what must please him. But seeing the masters would not be frightened, and therefore they were laid aside (the matter being discussed by a few old timerous doctors and batchellors of divinity, who would say any thing to please the king, least danger should follow), they ought to be commended, or at least justified for keeping their consciences safe.

Ibid. [And without any proof gives credit to a lying story set downe by Sanders, of an assemblie called by night.]

Sanders is not my authour, for he says no such thing in his book De Schismate, of an assembly^e called ^d I do not find there was any frightening threatnings: none appear in the king's letters. If he had this from any good authors, he had done well to have quoted them. It is not honourable for the university, as it is not probable, to represent all the doctors and batchelours of divinity, as men apt to be frightened out of their consciences; and that only the masters of arts were impregnable. It is rather to be supposed that the one sort were carried away by faction; and that the others were guided by learning and conscience.

^e He says it was called "clam;" that could hardly be, but in the night: so this is no material difference. In the rest you agree with Sanders.

by night; my author for this is the Apologie before mentioned, which adds, that "when a regent of Baliol College (whom they called king Henry), heard that the commissarie, and his company, were going to dispatch this night work, denied the seale with his breeches about his shoulders, for want of a hood." See in Hist. et Antiq. Oxon. Lib. 1. p. 256. A^f. The truth is, the meeting was unseasonable, and their actions clancular; as being protested against by, and done without the consent of, the regents. And as for Sanders, though I cannot well defend him, yet many things in his book De Schismate, especially those relating to the universitie of Oxford, I find from other places to be true^g.

Ibid. [But it appears that he had never seen, or considered the other instrument, to which the universitie set their seale.]

The grand collection, or farrago, which Mr. Thomas Masters made (by the lord Herbert's appointment), in order to the writing of king Henry the VIIIth's life, I have seen and perused, but could not with all my diligence find that instrument (as you call it, yet we, an act, or decree) of convocation; neither in the three great folios, written by another hand, containing materials at large for the said life; neither in any of the registers, records, or papers, belonging to the universitie. So that for these reasons, and that because the lord Herbert says, "it was blurred, and not intended for the king"; and also not under seal (you say 'twas), neither passed in the house by the majority of votes; therefore did I omit it, as not authentick^h. I truly believe, or at least have good grounds to think, that it was only drawn up, and not proposed; for if it had, it would have been registered: there being nothing proposed, either in convocation or congregation, but is registred, whether denied or not. And the register of that time is most exactly kept; and nothing thence, as I can perceive, is torn out.

Ibid. [There seems to be also another mistake, in the relation he gives: for he says, those of Paris had determined in this matter.]

I sayⁱ so from Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, then chancellor of the university: who in his letters thereunto, desires the members "to make what expedition they could, to give in their answer to the king's question; forasmuch as Paris and Cambridge had done it already."—For this I quote the book of Epistles, in Archiv. Lib. Bod. MS. Epist. 197. Yet, I believe, the archbishop said this, to hasten the university of ^f I see no reason for this. The instrument set forth by the lord Herbert shews, that the persons deputed had good authority to set the university seal to their determination: and they were not tied to forms, but might have done it at any time.

^g Yes, such authors as you quote: you say you cannot well defend Sanders. It seems you would if you could. These are soft words concerning that scandalous writer.

^h All that you say here is only negative authority: but since the lord Herbert says he saw the original, though it is not in any of these collections, you must either believe it, or make him a liar: and if it was an original, it must either have been subscribed by the hands of the persons deputed; or must have had the seal put to it. The beginning of it shews it was not subscribed, for it is in the name of John Cuttisford, their commissary: so it must have been either in the form of a notary's instrument, or must have had the seal put to it, for he calls it an original. Perhaps the blurring of it might either be casual, or when it was brought to court the king might have made some alterations in it, that it might be renewed according to those corrections. * It might be casual; Lord Herbert says not that it was rascd out, &c.

ⁱ In this you had a warrant for what you wrote, but I had a better to correct it by.

* These words in Italica are in the bishop of Worcester's

Oxon the more; tho' probably it was not so. However, I am not to take notice of that, but to follow record as I find it. And that I do follow record throughout all my book, there is not one (I presume) of the senate of antiquaries can deny it: and therefore how there can be many things in my book (of my framing), that are enemies to the reformation of the Church of England, as was suggested by you to sir Harbottle Grimston (who thereupon made a complaint in open parliament, last April, against the said book), I cannot see^k. Truth ought to take place, and must not be concealed, especially when 'tis at a distance. And if our religion^l hath had its original, or base, on lust, blood, ruin and desolation (as all religions, or alterations in governments, have had from one or more of them), why should it be hidden, seeing it is so obvious to all curious searchers into record?^c

This is all from him that studies truth,

NUMBER II.

A Letter to Mr. Ausont, which was translated into French, upon his procuring for me a censure in writing, made in Paris upon the First Volume of my History of the Reformation.

Paris, the 10th of August, 1685.

SIR,—When I came last to Paris, I was told there was a censure of the first volume of my History of the Reformation, going about in writing. I was glad to hear of this, when I was upon the place, ready either to justify my self, or to acknowledge such mistakes as should be offered to me: for I am ready, upon conviction, to retract any thing that may have fallen from my pen, as soon as I see cause for it, with all the freedom and candor possible. I should be much more out of countenance to persist in an error, when I am convinced of it, than to acknowledge that in such a multitude of matters of fact, of which my history makes mention, I might have been misinformed in some particulars, and have mistaken others, which I was resolved to rectify, when discover'd, in another edition. This made me very desirous to see what it was that had been objected to me: and I am much obliged to you for procuring me a sight of it; for^m which I return you my most humble thanks.

When I had read it over and over again, I confess I was amazed to find that he who censured me so severely had read my book so slightly, and yet gives way to his passions with so little judgment and with less sincerity, that among all the things that he charges me with, there should not be one single particular, that might give me occasion to shew my readiness to retract what I had written.

What can be expected from a writer, who, after the list I had given of the many gross errors of which Sanders's History was made up, says, "that I have proved that he has failed in some circumstances that may seem to aggravate the matter more or less?" If any man will be at the pains to read what I have proved, of the falshoods of that author, and compare it with the mild censure here given; he will see cause to be ashamed of it, and will look for little sincerity, after so false a step made in the beginning. From this, he goes on to his main design, and runs out into an invective against k. Henry the VIIIth, for his incontinencies and other violences.

^k I do profess I do not remember that I ever mentioned your book to him: and sir Harbottle himself, when I asked him the question, said, he never heard me speak of it.

^l This is writ very indecently; neither like a divine nor a christian.

If I had undertaken to write a panegyric, or to make a saint of king Henry, he might have triumphed over me as much as he pleased. But I, who have neither concealed nor excused any of his faults, am no way concerned in all this.

There are only two things that I advance with relation to that prince.

The first is, that whatsoever his secret motives might have been, in the suit of the divorce, he had the constant tradition of the church on his side, and that in all the ages and parts of it; which was carefully searched into, and fully proved: so that no author elder than cardinal Cajetan could be found to be set against such a current of tradition. And in the disputes of that age with those they called hereticks, all that wrote of the popish side made their appeal always to tradition, as the only infallible expounder of Scripture; and it was looked on as the character of an heretick, to expound the Scripture by any other key or method. So that k. Henry had this clearly with him.

The other particular that I make remarks on is, that the Reformation is not at all to be charged with king Henry's faults: for, that unsteady favour and protection which they sometimes found from him, can signify no more to blemish them than the vices of those princes that were the great promoters of Christianity signify to cast a blemish on the Christian religion. Let the crimes of king Clovis, as they are related by Gregory of Tours, be compared with the worst things that can be said of king Henry; and then let any man see, if he finds so much falshood, mixed with so much cruelty, in so many repeated acts, and in such a number of years, in king Henry the VIIIth, as he will find in king Clovis. Nor do we see any hints of Clovis's repentance, or of any restitution made by him, of those dominions that he had seized on in so criminal a manner, to the right heirs; without which, according to our maxims, his repentance could not be accepted of God. And this was the first Christian king of the Franks.

I do not comprehend what his design could be, in justifying pope Gregory the VIIth's proceedings against the emperor, Henry the IVth, with so much heat. One that reads what he writes on this subject can hardly keep himself from thinking that he had something in his eye that he durst not speak out more plainly: but that he would not be sorry, if Innocent the XIth should treat the great monarch, as Gregory the VIIth did the emperor, and as Paul the IIIrd did king Henry the VIIIth. But whatsoever his own thoughts may be, I desire he would not be so familiar with my thoughts, as to infer this from any concession of mine; for I allow no authority to the bishops of Rome out of their own diocese. The additional dignity that they came to have, flowed from the constitution of the Roman empire; and since Rome is no more the seat of empire, it has lost all that primacy which was yielded to it merely by reason of the dignity of the city. So that as Byzance, from being a small bishoprick, became a patriarchal seat, upon the exaltation of that city; by the same rule, upon the depression of Rome, the bishops of that see ought to have lost all that dignity that was merely accidental. But suppose I should yield, according to the notion commonly received in the Gallican church, that the pope is the conservator of the canons; that will signify nothing to justify their deposing of princes, except he can shew what those canons were, upon the violation of which princes may be deposed. If he flies to the canons of the fourth council in the Lateran, those being made about 150 years after p. Gregory's proceedings against the emperor, will not justify what was done so long before these were made. When he thinks fit to speak out more plainly upon this head, it will be more easy to answer him.

As for the supremacy that king Henry the VIIIth assumed in ecclesiastical matters, he should not have condemned that so rashly as he does, as a novelty, till he had first examined the reasons upon which it was founded; not only those drawn from the Scriptures, but those that were brought from the laws and practices, both of the Roman emperors and of the kings of England. His thoughts or his pen run too quick, when he condemned the following those precedents as a novelty, without giving himself the trouble of enquiring into the practices of former ages.

He charges me with flying to the rasure of the registers in queen Mary's time, and to the burning of others in the fire of London, for proving several things for which I could bring no better vouchers; and for relying so often on a passionate writer. I suppose Fox is the person hereby pointed at.

When he applies the general censure to any particular in my work, I will then shew that it amounts to nothing. I often stop and show that I can go no further, for want of proof: and when I give presumptions from other grounds to shew what was done, I may well appeal to the rasure, or loss of records, for the want of further proof. But this I never do upon conjectures or slight grounds. And as for Fox, I make a great difference between relying upon what he writes barely upon report (which I never do) and relying upon some registers, of which he made abstracts. For having observed an exact fidelity in all that he took out of such registers as do yet remain, I have reason to depend on such abstracts as he gives of registers that are now destroyed. He might be too credulous in writing such things as were brought him by report; and in these I do not depend on him: but he was known to be a man of probity, so I may well believe what he delivers from a record, though that happens now to be lost.

The censure is next applied to Cranmer's character. He observes great defects in my sincerity, and (to let me see how civilly he intends to use me, he says he will not add) my want of judgment. I am sure he has shewed a very ill judgment in charging me so severely in so tender a point as sincerity, and using a reserve in another point, that does not touch me so much. I am accountable both to God and man for my sincerity; but I am bound to have no more judgment than God has given me; and so long as I maintain my sincerity entire, I have little to answer for, though I may be defective in the other: but I leave it to you to judge whether the defect was in his sincerity or his judgment, when he does not bring any one particular against Cranmer, but what he takes from me. So if I have confessed all his faults, and yet give a character of him that is inconsistent with these, I may be justly charged for want of judgment; but my sincerity is still untainted. When he reckons up his charges against Cranmer, he begins with this: that he was put out of his college for his incontinence. He was then a layman, under no vows, only he held a place of which he was incapable after he was married: now, what sort of crime can he reckon this marriage, I leave it to himself to make it out. His next charge is, that though I say he was a Lutheran, yet he signed the Six Articles, which he says, proves that he valued his benefice more than his conscience.

He wrote this with too much precipitation, otherwise he would have seen that Cranmer never signed those articles. He disputed much against them before they passed into a law: nor could he be prevailed on, though the king pressed him to it, to abstain from coming to the parliament while that act passed. He came and opposed it to the last; and even after the law was made, he wrote a book for the king's use against these articles. There was no clause in the act that required that they should be signed. Men were only bound to silence and submission. If he was at all faulty, with relation to that act, it was only in this, that he did not think himself bound to declare openly against it when it was published. From this he goes next to charge him for consenting to the dissolution of king Henry's marriage with Anne of Cleve, upon grounds plainly contrary to those upon which his first marriage with Catherine of Spain was dissolved. Since one pretence in the divorce of Anne of Cleve was, that it was not consummated, though in the other it was declared that a marriage was compleat, though not consummated. Whatever is to be said of this matter, the whole convocation was engaged in it. Gardiner promoted it the most of any. So the bishops who were so zealous for popery in queen Mary's time were as guilty as Cranmer. I do not deny that he showed too much weakness in this compliance. He had not courage enough to swim against the stream: and he might think that the dissolving a marriage, the parties being contented, was not to be much withstood. But my censurer is afraid to touch on the chief ground on which that marriage was dissolved; which was, that the king gave not a pure inward consent to it; for this touches a tender point of the intention of the minister in the sacrament, on which I did not reflect when I wrote my History. By the doctrine of the church of Rome, the parties are the ministers; so if the intention was wanting, there was no sacrament in this marriage. This having been the common doctrine of the church of Rome, some remnant of that might have too great an effect on Cranmer. But if the consenting to an unjust sentence, in a time of much heat and of a general consternation, is so criminal a thing, what will he make of Liberius, Felix, Ossius, and many more, whose names are in the Roman Calendar. The carrying this too far will go a great way to the justifying the Luciferians. Whatever may be in this, I had opened the matter of Anne of Cleve so impartially, that I deserve no censure on that account.

After he had attacked the matter of my history in these particulars, he falls next upon my way of writing. In this, I confess, I am not so much concerned; for if the things are truly related by me, I can very easily bear all the reflections that he can lay on my way of writing. But that he may censure me with a better grace, he bestows some good words on me. "He is not displeas'd with my preface, and the beginning of my work: but all these hopes were soon blasted; I fall into a detail of little stories, with which he was quite disgusted." Yet if he had considered this better, he would have been milder in his censure. My design was to show what seeds and dispositions were still in the minds of many in this nation, that prepared them for a reformation, in the beginning of King Henry's reign, before ever Luther had preached in Germany, and several years before that the king's divorce came to be treated of in England. I therefore judged it was necessary for me to let the reader know what I found in our registers of those matters: how that many were tried, and some condemned, upon those opinions that were afterwards reckon'd among the chief grounds of our separating from the Church of Rome. It seem'd a necessary introduction to my work, to open this as I found it upon record. My censurer blames me for not opening more copiously what the opinions of the Lollards and the Wickliffites were: he may see in these articles that I mention what the clergy were then charging them with, and what was confessed by those who were brought into their courts. I wrote in English for my own countrymen. There are many books that give a very particular account of Wickliffe and his followers: this being so well known, it was not necessary for me to run this matter up to its original; all that was incumbent on me was to show the present state of that party, and their opinions and sufferings, in the beginning of the reign of King Henry: so that a fair judge will not think that a few pages spent in opening this was too great an imposition on his patience, this having such a relation to my main design in writing. It is he, and not I, that has transgressed Polybius's rule: he considers these particulars as little stories, without observing the end for which I set them down, though I have made that appear so plainly, that I have more reason to complain of his sincerity than of his judgment.

His next exception is, that I give abstracts of the reasons on which the proceedings in the reformation were grounded. He thinks that in this I plead as an advocate, and do not write as a historian. I do believe there are few things in my history with which he is more displeas'd than this. I give no reasons of my own making, nor do I put speeches in the mouths of our reformers; though if I had done this, he knows that I could have said that I followed the precedents set me by the best writers of history both among the Greeks and the Romans. But since I was engag'd to write of a reformation of errors in doctrine, and of abuses in worship and government, I must have been very defective if I had not set out the reasons upon which those of that time went, as well as I related the series of what was done by them. Both Father Paul and Cardinal Palavicini, in the histories that they wrote of the council of Trent, have related the arguments used of all sides very copiously. In political matters the chief use and beauty of history is, the laying open the secret reasons of state upon which all parties have proceeded: and certainly those who write concerning matters of religion, ought to open all that comes in their way of the grounds on which any changes were made.

He thinks all the king's reasonings for the divorce were fully answered by Queen Catherine's reasons against it. But he does not consider that he is in a communion, in which tradition is set up as that which must decide all controversies. King Henry's arguments run all upon tradition, whereas the queen pretended to no tradition, but only brought arguments of another sort, which was the way of those called hereticks: but in that matter the king insisted upon tradition, the great topic of papists. He censures me for bringing a Jew on the stage after I had set out the opinions of the universities; but it seem'd very reasonable to show the notions that the Jews had of their own laws.

He returns again to reflections on the divorce of Anne of Cleve. It seems he had few things to reflect on, when in so short a paper he returns twice to the same matter. From her he passes to Anne Bullen; he fancies my whole design in writing was to establish her descent; but that I do not acquit her mother of the imputations Sanders had laid on her, nor herself of the amours in the court of France, and King Henry's ill commerce with her. If the crown of England had remained in a line derived from that queen, it might be supposed that some would have wrote on such a design; but that not being the case, there is little reason to think that any man would have given himself the trouble only on design to justify her title to the crown. I have made it fully out that a great part of Sanders's charge on her was an ill-invented calumny to bring her right to the crown in question; and by proving some part of his relation to be false, I have destroyed the credit of the whole. I cannot be obliged to prove the negative in every particular; the proof lies upon the affirmative, and the author of a train of defamation is sufficiently disproved, when it is apparent that some parts of his relation must certainly be false. If any of these slanders had been in any sort believed in that time, there is no reason to think but the pope or the emperor would have published them; for the court of Rome kept none of the measures of common decency with the king. Nor were these things objected to Anne Bullen after that her unhappy fate gave some colour to believe everything to her prejudice. Her brother and she did both at their death deny all criminal commerce together; nor was anything proved against them, only the testimony of a dead woman was alleged to destroy them.

His last charge relates to More and Fisher; but how this comes to support his censure of my manner of writing is not so clear. I seem in these matters to write like one that intended to raise their character, rather than to depress it: nor do I justify king Henry's violencies, but set them out as there is occasion for it. More knew a law was made, requiring the subjects to swear to the king as supreme head, under the pain of perpetual imprisonment; upon which he ought to have gone out of England, since he resolved not to take the oath. Fisher knew that the nun of Canterbury had in very indecent words foretold the king's death, and had not revealed it, as he ought to have done.

He says my history reflects much on the memory of king Henry. I did not undertake to write a panegyric on him, but only to write the history of that time: in doing this, as I have discovered the injustice of many scandals that have been cast on him, so I have not spared to lay open many ill practices, when I was obliged to do it, by that impartial sincerity to which I obliged myself when I undertook that work: though he charges me as biased by partiality, a censure I deserved not. But I do more easily submit to his charging me with my ignorance of law, and of ecclesiastical antiquity. Such general censures are little to be regarded: when he is at leisure to reckon up the particulars in which I have erred, I shall be very glad to be instructed by him. For though I have looked a little into law and ecclesiastical history, yet I value myself upon nothing but my sincerity. It is very easy to lay a detracting character in some general words upon any person. The artifice is so commonly practised, that it will not pass upon any but those who, by some prejudices, are prepared to take down everything that is boldly asserted. It seems that how great a mind soever he had to find fault, he could not find much matter for his spleen to work on, when in so short a paper he is forced to return in three several places to the article of the divorce of Anne of Cleve; and he shows such an inclination to censure, that I have no reason to think he would have spared me, if he had found greater matters to have objected to me. So all he says that seems to intimate that, must pass for words of course, which ought to make no impression.

NUMBER III.

Some Remarks sent me by an unknown Person.

KEILWAY's reports were published 1602, by Jo. Crook, who was afterwards a judge. He gives a character of Keilway, as a lawyer of good reputation; and that he was surveyor of the courts of wards in Queen Elizabeth's reign. It appears that the king's ordering the attorney-general to confess Dr. Horsey's plea, without bringing the matter to a trial, was plainly a contrivance to please the clergy, and to stifle that matter without bringing it to a trial, and so must have satisfied them better than if he had pardoned him. Little regard is to be given to Rastall, who showed his partiality in matters in which the pope's authority was concerned; for in his edition of the statutes at large, he omitted one act of parliament made in the second year of Richard the Second, cap. 6. which is thus abridged by Poulton. Urban was duly chosen pope, and so ought to be accepted and obeyed: upon which the Lord Coke, in his Institutes, p. 274, infers, that antiently acts of parliament were made concerning the highest spiritual matters; but it seems Rastall had no mind to let that be known. He was a judge in Queen Mary's time, but went beyond sea, and lived in Flanders in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and there he wrote and printed his book of Entries.

There is a very singular instance in the Year Book, 43 Edw. III. xxxiii. 6, by which it appears, that the bishop of Litchfield was sometimes called the bishop of Chester; for a quere impedit was brought by the king against him called bishop of Chester: the judgment given at the end of it is, that he should go to the great devil. This is a singular instance of an extraordinary judgment, there being no precedent like it in all our records.

In Brook's Abridgment, Tit. Præmunire, sect. 21, it is said, that Barlow had, in the reign of Edward the VIth, deprived the dean of Wells (which was a donative), and had thereby incurred a præmunire; and that he was forced to use means to obtain his pardon: so if he had not his bishopric confirmed by a new grant of it, he must have lost it in a judgment against him in a præmunire. And if he wrote any such book, it was in order to the obtaining his pardon. Brook was Chief-justice of the Common-Pleas, in the 1st of Queen Mary: but yet it is no ways probable that Barlow wrote any such book as is mentioned p. 270 of the second volume of the History of the Reformation, for he went out of England, and came back in the first of Queen Elizabeth. He assisted in the consecration of archbishop Parker, and was made bishop of Chester, which probably would not have been done if he had written any such book, unless he had made a public recantation of it, which I do not find that he did. So there is reason to believe that was a book put out in his name by some Papist, on design to cast a reproach on the Reformation. This is further confirmed by what I have put in the history; for by a letter of Sampson's it appears, that Barlow did feebly promise to be reconciled to the church of Rome: but it seems that was only an effect of weakness, since he quickly got beyond sea, into which the privy-council made an enquiry: that shows that he repented of that which was extorted from him.

There are in this paper some quotations out of Harmer's Specimen, on which general remarks are made, but particulars are not added. The writer of this has not thought fit to name himself to me, so I can give no other description of him but that he seems to be a person who has studied the law, and perused our historians carefully.
