OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOHN WARNER, CHAIRMAN

Chairman WARNER. The Committee on Armed Services meets today in the first of a series of hearings to receive testimony regarding the mistreatment of Iraqi prisoners by some—I repeat, some—elements and certain personnel of the Armed Forces of the United States in violation of U.S. and international laws.

Testifying before us today is the Secretary of Defense, the Honorable Donald Rumsfeld. He is joined by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Richard Myers; Acting Secretary of the Army, Les Brownlee; Army Chief of Staff, General Peter Schoomaker; and Central Command (CENTCOM) Deputy Commander, Lieutenant General Lance Smith. We welcome each of you today.

I have had the privilege of being associated with, and, more importantly, learning from, the men and women of the Armed Forces for close to 60 years of my life, and I can say that the facts I now have, from a number of sources, represent to me as serious an issue of military misconduct as I have ever observed. These reports could also seriously affect this country's relationships with other nations, the conduct of the war against terrorism, and place in jeopardy the men and women of the Armed Forces wherever they are serving in the world.

This mistreatment of prisoners represents an appalling and totally unacceptable breach of military regulations and conduct. Most significantly, the replaying of these images day after day throughout the Middle East, and indeed the world, has the potential to undermine the substantial gains towards the goal of peace and freedom in various operation areas of the world, most particularly Iraq, and the substantial sacrifice by our forces, as well as those of our allies, in the war on terror.

Let me be as clear as one Senator can be. This is not the way for anyone who wears the uniform of the United States of America to conduct themselves. This degree of breakdown in military leadership and discipline represents an extremely rare—and I repeat, rare—chapter in the otherwise proud history of the Armed Forces of the United States. It defies common sense. It contradicts all the values we Americans learn, beginning in our homes.

Members of the committee, as we conduct this hearing, I urge you that we take every care that our actions, our words, and our individual and collective conduct in this hearing not reflect unfairly on the 99.9 percent of our uniformed personnel who are performing remarkable tasks and, in some cases, making the ultimate sacrifice of life and limb to win the global war on terrorism.

Each of us on the committee has nothing but the strongest support for our brave men and women in uniform and their families. What we seek for the American people through this and following hearings, is only to strengthen and honor their efforts, not in any way to detract from them and their accomplishments.

I would point out that while some systems have failed, we are here today because of a courageous enlisted man and his lieutenant, whose American values compelled them to step forward and inform their superiors. They did the right thing. As this committee performs its constitutional duties in hearings and oversight, we are working in the same spirit as those two soldiers.

Questions before us today are: Who knew what, and when? What did they do about it? Why were Members of Congress not properly and adequately informed?

In my 25 years on this committee, I have received hundreds of calls, day and night, from all levels, uniformed and civilian, of the Department of Defense (DOD), when they, in their judgment, felt it was necessary. I'd dare say that other members on this committee have experienced the same courtesy. I did not receive such a call in this case, and yet I think the situation was absolutely clear and required it, not only to me, but to my distinguished ranking member and other members of this committee.

Members of the committee, our central task here today is to get all the facts in this difficult situation, no matter where they lead, no matter how embarrassing they may be, so that we can assess our response and, in the end, make sure that such dereliction of duty as in this case never happens again in the proud history of our country.

Senator Levin.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN

Senator LEVIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The abuses that were committed against prisoners in U.S. custody at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq dishonored our military and our Nation, and they made the prospects for success in Iraq even more difficult than they already are. Our troops are less secure and our Nation is less secure because these depraved and despicable actions will fuel the hatred and fury of those who oppose us.

General Taguba's investigation, as reported, paints an alarming picture of abuse and humiliation of Iraqi prisoners. It has enraged people here at home and throughout the civilized world. Humiliating and sexually abusing prisoners has nothing to do with the effective internment or interrogation of prisoners. In fact, such actions are counterproductive to those goals.

As we seek to bring stability and democracy to Iraq and to fight terrorism globally, our greatest asset as a Nation is the moral values that we stand for. Those values have been compromised.

To begin the process of restoring them, the people involved, who carried out or who authorized or suggested that we should "loosen prisoners up" or, "make sure they get the treatment" must be held accountable. So must anyone up the chain of command be held accountable who had command responsibility over the interrogation and security of prisoners, and who knew, or should have known, of these abuses and looked the other way.

General Taguba's finding that, "personnel assigned to the 372nd Military Police (MP) Company were directed to change facility procedures to set the conditions for military intelligence interrogations," is bolstered by pictures that suggest that the sadistic abuse was part of an organized and conscious process of intelligence-gathering. In other words, those abusive actions do not appear to be aberrant conduct by individuals, but part of a conscious method of extracting information. If true, the planners of this process are at least as guilty as those who carried out the abuses.

The President's legal counsel, Alberto Gonzalez, reportedly wrote, in a memorandum, that the decision to avoid invoking the Geneva Conventions "preserves flexibility" in the war on terrorism. Belittling or ignoring the Geneva Conventions invites our enemies to do the same, and increases the danger to our military service men and women. It also sends a disturbing message to the world that America does not feel bound by internationally accepted standards of conduct.

The findings of General Taguba's report, as reported on a public Web site, raise a number of disturbing issues. For example, how far up the chain was there implicit or explicit direction or approval or knowledge of these prisoner abuses? Why was a joint interrogation and detention facility at Abu Ghraib established in a way which led to the subordination of the MP brigade to the military intelligence unit conducting interrogation activities? What was the role played by the military intelligence, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), and any other intelligence units in requesting or suggesting abusive activities? How is it in our Nation's interest to have civilian contractors, rather than military personnel, performing vital national security functions such as prisoner interrogations in a war zone? When soldiers break the law or fail to follow orders, commanders can hold them accountable for their misconduct. Military commanders don't have the same authority over civilian contractors.

Finally, Secretary Rumsfeld and General Myers, I join our chairman in expressing deep dismay that when you briefed Senators in a classified session last week on events in Iraq, just hours before the story broke on television, you made no reference to the impending revelations. Executive branch consultation with Congress is not supposed to be an option, but a longstanding and fundamental responsibility.

It is essential that our Nation, at the highest levels, apologize directly to the victims and to the Iraqi people, as a whole, for these actions. But words alone are not sufficient. Prompt and decisive action, which establishes responsibility and holds people accountable, is essential here. It will also, hopefully, convince the world that our free and open society does not condone, and will not tolerate, this depraved behavior.

Chairman WARNER. I'll ask our witnesses to rise. [Witnesses sworn.]

The complete statements of all witnesses will be placed into the record. The committee will now receive the opening remarks of the Secretary, followed by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs. I'm not certain if others desire some recognition for opening remarks; if so, indicate to the chair. Then we'll go into a 6-minute round of questions by each member.

Mr. Secretary.

STATEMENT OF HON. DONALD H. RUMSFELD, SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Secretary RUMSFELD. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, in recent days there has been a good deal of discussion about who bears responsibility for the terrible activities that took place at Abu Ghraib. These events occurred on my watch. As Secretary of Defense, I am accountable for them, and I take full responsibility. It's my obligation to evaluate what happened, to make sure that those who have committed wrongdoing are brought to justice, and to make changes, as needed, to see that it doesn't happen again.

I feel terrible about what happened to these Iraqi detainees. They're human beings, and they were in U.S. custody. Our country had an obligation to treat them right. We did not, and that was wrong. So to those Iraqis who were mistreated by members of the U.S. Armed Forces, I offer my deepest apology. It was inconsistent with the values of our Nation. It was inconsistent with the teachings of the military to the men and women of the Armed Forces. It was certainly fundamentally un-American.

Further, I deeply regret the damage that has been done. First, to the reputation of the honorable men and women of the Armed Forces, who are courageously, responsibly, and professionally defending our freedoms across the globe. They are truly wonderful human beings, and their families and their loved ones can be enormously proud of them. Second, to the President, Congress, and the American people; I wish I had been able to convey to them the gravity of this before we saw it in the media. Finally, to the reputation of our country.

The photographic depictions of the U.S. military personnel that the public has seen have offended and outraged everyone in the DOD. If you could have seen the anguished expressions on the faces of those in our Department upon seeing those photos, you would know how we feel today.

It's important for the American people and the world to know that while these terrible acts were perpetrated by a small number of U.S. military personnel, they were also brought to light by the honorable and responsible actions of other military personnel.

There are many who did their duty professionally, and we should mention that, as well. First, Specialist Joseph Darby, who alerted the appropriate authorities that abuses were occurring. Second, those in the military chain of command who acted promptly, on learning of those abuses, by initiating a series of investigations—criminal and administrative—to assure that abuses were stopped and that the responsible chain of command was relieved and replaced.

Having said that, all the facts that may be of interest are not yet in hand. In addition to the Taguba Report, there are other investigations underway, and we'll be discussing those today. Because all the facts are not in hand, there will be corrections and clarifications to the record as more information is learned.

From the witnesses, you will be told the sequence of events and investigations that have taken place since the activities first came to light. I want to inform you of the measures underway to improve our performance in the future.

Before I do that, let me say that each of us at this table is either in the chain of command or has senior responsibilities in the DOD. This means that anything we say publicly could have an impact on the legal proceedings against those accused of wrongdoing in this matter. So please understand that if some of our responses to questions are measured, it is to assure that pending cases are not jeopardized by seeming to exert command influence, and that the rights of any accused are protected.

Now, let me tell you the measures we're taking to deal with this issue. First, to ensure we have a handle on the scope of this catastrophe, I will be announcing today the appointment of several senior former officials who are being asked to examine the pace, the breadth, the thoroughness of the existing investigations, and to determine whether additional investigations or studies need to be initiated. They're being asked to report their findings within 45 days of taking up their duties. I'm confident that these distinguished individuals will provide a full and fair assessment of what has been done thus far, and recommend whether further steps may be necessary.

[Clarifying information provided by the DOD follows:]

Charter for Independent Panel to Review DOD Detention Operations was signed on May 12, 2004. It allots a timeframe to provide advice "preferably within 45 days" after beginning the review. The panel has announced that it will present its final report on August 18, 2004, with the caveat that it could be modified at a later date to reflect the results of reports or investigations completed after that date.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Second, we need to review our habits and our procedures. One of the things we've tried to do in the DOD since September 11 is to try to get the Department to adjust our procedures and processes to reflect that we're in a time of war and that we're in the information age. For the past 3 years, we've looked for areas where adjustments were needed, and we've made a great many adjustments. Regrettably, we've now found another area where adjustments may be needed.

Let me be clear. I failed to recognize how important it was to elevate a matter of such gravity to the highest levels, including the President and the Members of Congress.

Third, I'm seeking a way to provide appropriate compensation to those detainees who suffered such grievous and brutal abuse and cruelty at the hands of a few members of the United States Armed Forces. It's the right thing to do.

I wish we had known more, sooner, and been able to tell you more, sooner. But we didn't. Today, we'll have a full discussion of these terrible acts, but first let's take a step back for a moment. Within the constraints imposed on those of us in the chain of command, I have a few additional words.

First, beyond abuse of prisoners, there are other photos that depict incidents of physical violence towards prisoners, acts that can only be described as blatantly sadistic, cruel, and inhuman. Second, there are many more photographs and, indeed, some videos. Congress and the American people and the rest of the world need to know this. In addition, the photos give these incidents a vividness—indeed, a horror—in the eyes of the world. Mr. Chairman, that’s why this hearing today is important. That’s why the actions we take in the days and weeks ahead are so important.

However terrible the setback, this is also an occasion to demonstrate to the world the difference between those who believe in democracy and in human rights, and those who believe in rule by terrorist code. We value human life. We believe in individual freedom and in the rule of law. For those beliefs, we send men and women of the Armed Forces abroad to protect that right for our own people and to give others, who aren’t Americans, the hope of a future of freedom. Part of that mission, part of what we believe in, is making sure that when wrongdoings or scandals do occur, that they’re not covered up, but they are exposed, they are investigated, and the guilty are brought to justice.

Mr. Chairman, I know you join me today in saying to the world, “Judge us by our actions. Watch how Americans, watch how a democracy, deals with wrongdoing and with scandal and the pain of acknowledging and correcting our own mistakes and our own weaknesses.”

After they have seen America in action, then ask those who teach resentment and hatred of America if our behavior doesn’t give the lie to the falsehood and the slander they speak about our people and about our way of life. Ask them if the resolve of Americans in crisis and difficulty and, yes, in the heartbreak of acknowledging the evil in our midst, doesn’t have meaning far beyond their hatred.

Above all, ask them if the willingness of Americans to acknowledge their own failures before humanity doesn’t light the world as surely as the great ideas and beliefs that made this Nation a beacon of hope and liberty for all who strive to be free.

We know what the terrorists will do. We know they will try to exploit all that is bad, and try to obscure all that is good. That’s their nature. That’s the nature of those who think they can kill innocent men, women, and children to gratify their own cruel will to power. We say to the world, “We will strive to do our best, as imperfect as it may be.”

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The prepared statement of Secretary Rumsfeld follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT BY HON. DONALD H. RUMSFELD

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee—thank you for the opportunity to testify today.

In recent days, there has been a good deal of discussion about who bears responsibility for the terrible activities that took place at Abu Ghraib. These events occurred on my watch. As Secretary of Defense, I am accountable for them. I take full responsibility. It is my obligation to evaluate what happened, to make sure those who have committed wrongdoing are brought to justice, and to make changes as needed to see that it doesn’t happen again.

I feel terrible about what happened to these Iraqi detainees. They are human beings. They were in U.S. custody. Our country had an obligation to treat them right. We didn’t do that. That was wrong.

To those Iraqis who were mistreated by members of the U.S. Armed Forces, I offer my deepest apology. It was un-American. It was inconsistent with the values of our Nation.

Further, I deeply regret the damage that has been done:

- First, to the reputation of the honorable men and women of our Armed Forces who are courageously, skillfully and responsibly defending our freedom across the globe. They are truly wonderful human beings, and their families and loved ones can be enormously proud of them.
- Second, to the President, Congress, and the American people. I wish we had been able to convey to them the gravity of this was before we saw it in the media;
- Third, to the Iraqi people, whose trust in our coalition has been shaken; and finally
- To the reputation of our country.

The photographic depictions of U.S. military personnel that the public has seen have unquestionably offended and outraged everyone in the Department of Defense (DOD).

If you could have seen the anguished expressions on the faces of those of us in the Department upon seeing the photos, you would know how we feel today.

We take this seriously. It should not have happened. Any wrongdoers need to be punished, procedures evaluated, and problems corrected.

It's important for the American people and the world to know that while these terrible acts were perpetrated by a small number of the U.S. military, they were also brought to light by the honorable and responsible actions of other military personnel. There are many who did their duty professionally and we should mention that as well:

- First the soldier, Specialist Joseph Darby, who alerted the appropriate authorities that abuses of detainees were occurring. My thanks and appreciation to him for his courage and his values.
- Second, those in the military chain of command who acted promptly upon learning of those activities by initiating a series of investigations—criminal and administrative—to ensure that the abuses were stopped, that the responsible chain of command was relieved and replaced, and that the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) was followed;
- Third, units singled out for praise in General Taguba's report for the care they provided detainees in their custody and their intolerance of abuses by others;
- Finally, the Central Command (CENTCOM) chain of command for taking action and publicly announcing to the world that investigations of abuse were underway.

The American people and members of the committee deserve an accounting of what has happened and what's being done to fix it.

Gathered today are the senior military officials with responsibility in the care and treatment of detainees.

The responsibility for training falls to the U.S. Army. The responsibility for the actions and conduct of forces in Iraq falls to the combatant commander. The ultimate responsibility for the DOD rests with me.

Each of us has had a strong interest in getting the facts out to the American people.

We want you to know the facts. I want you to have all the documentation and the data you require. If some material is classified, we will ensure members get an opportunity to see it privately.

Having said that, all the facts that may be of interest are not yet in hand. In addition to the Taguba Report, there are other investigations underway. We will make the results of these investigations available to you. But because all the facts are not in hand, there will be corrections and clarifications to the record as more information is learned. If we have something to add later, we'll do so. If we find something that we've said that needs to be corrected, we'll correct it.

From the other witnesses here, you will be told the sequence of events and investigations that have taken place since these activities first came to light.

What I want to do is inform you of the measures underway to remedy some of the damage done and to improve our performance in the future.

Before I do that, let me make one further note: As members of this committee are aware, each of us at this table is either in the chain of command or has senior responsibilities in the DOD. This means that anything we say publicly could have an impact on legal proceedings against those accused of wrongdoing in this matter. Our responsibility at this hearing, and in our public comments, is to conduct ourselves consistent with that well known fact. So please understand that if some of our responses are measured, it is to ensure that pending cases are not jeopardized by seeming to exert "command influence" and that the rights of any accused are protected.

Now let me tell you the measures we are taking to deal with this issue.

When this incident came to light and was reported within the chain of command, we took several immediate actions. These will be discussed in detail by others here today, but let me highlight them.

- General Sanchez launched a criminal investigation immediately.
- He then asked for an administrative review of procedures at the Abu Ghraib facility. That is the so-called Taguba Report.

These two investigations have resulted thus far in criminal or administrative actions against at least 12 individuals, including the relief of the prison chain of command and criminal referrals of several soldiers directly involved in abuse.

- The Army also launched an Inspector General (IG) review of detainee operations throughout Afghanistan and Iraq. That review continues.
- The Army has initiated an investigation of Reserve training with respect to military intelligence (MI) and police functions.
- General Sanchez also asked for an Army Intelligence review of the circumstances discussed in General Taguba's report and that is ongoing.
- I also asked the Navy IG to review procedures at Guantanamo and the Charleston Naval Brig.

As these investigations mature, we will endeavor to keep you informed. But there is more to be done.

First, to ensure we have a handle on the scope of this catastrophe, I will be announcing today the appointment of several senior former officials who are being asked to examine the pace, breadth, and thoroughness of the existing investigations, and to determine whether additional investigations need to be initiated.

[Clarifying information provided by the DOD follows:]

Charter for Independent Panel to Review DOD Detention Operations was signed on May 12, 2004. It allots a timeframe to provide advice "preferably within 45 days" after beginning the review. The panel has announced that it will present its final report on August 18, 2004, with the caveat that it could be modified at a later date to reflect the results of reports or investigations completed after that date.

They are being asked to report their findings within 45 days of taking up their duties. I am confident these distinguished individuals will provide a full and fair assessment of what has been done thus far—and recommend whether further steps may be necessary.

I will encourage them to meet with Members of Congress to keep them apprised of their progress. I look forward to their suggestions and recommendations.

Second, we need to review our habits and procedures. One of the things we've tried to do since September 11 is to get the DOD to adjust its habits and procedures at a time of war, and in the information age. For the past 3 years, we have looked for areas where adjustments were needed, and regrettably, we have now found another one.

Let me be clear. I failed to identify the catastrophic damage that the allegations of abuse could do to our operations in the theater, to the safety of our troops in the field, the cause to which we are committed. When these allegations first surfaced, I failed to recognize how important it was to elevate a matter of such gravity to the highest levels, including leaders in Congress. Nor did we anticipate that a classified investigation report that had not yet been delivered to the senior levels of the DOD would be given to the media. That was my failing.

In the future, we will take whatever steps are necessary to elevate to the appropriate levels charges of this magnitude.

Third, I am seeking a way to provide appropriate compensation to those detainees who suffered grievous and brutal abuse and cruelty at the hands of a few members of the U.S. military. It is the right thing to do. I'm told we have the ability to do so. So we will—one way or another.

One of the great strengths of our Nation is its ability to recognize failures, deal with them, and to strive to make things better. Indeed, the openness with which these problems are being dealt is one of the strengths of our free society. Democracies are imperfect, because they are made up of human beings who are, by our nature, imperfect. Of course, we wish that every person in our Government and our Armed Forces would conduct themselves in accordance with the highest standards of ethics. But the reality is some do not.

One mistake we have made during our initial investigation into these charges, for example, was failing to sufficiently call to your attention the information made public in the CENTCOM press release regarding the investigations they had initiated back in January. We also failed to sufficiently call your attention and brief you on the preliminary findings of the criminal investigation announced on March 20 by General Kimmitt. I am advised the Army has had periodic meetings to inform congressional staffs.

There are indications that the information provided was penetrating at some level, however. On January 20, for example, CNN reported that a criminal investigation division (CID) investigation was being conducted into allegations of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib, and mentioned the possible existence of photographs taken of detainees.

Nonetheless, I know that we did not fully brief you on this subject along the way and we should have done so.

I wish we would have known more sooner and been able to tell you more sooner. But we didn't. For that, I apologize.

We need to discuss a better way to keep you informed about matters of such gravity in the future.

The fact that abuses take place—in the military, in law enforcement, and in our society—is not surprising. But the standard by which our country and our Government should be judged is not by whether abuses take place, but rather how our Nation deals with them. We are dealing with them forthrightly. These incidents are being investigated and any found to have committed crimes or misconduct will receive the appropriate justice. Most of the time, at least, the system works.

None of this is meant to diminish the gravity of the recent situation at Abu Ghraib. To the contrary, that is precisely why these abuses are so damaging—because they can be used by the enemies of our country to undermine our mission and spread the false impression that such conduct is the rule and not the exception—when, in fact, the opposite is true.

Which is why it is so important that we investigate them publicly and openly, and hold people accountable in similar fashion. That is exactly what we are doing.

Questions

When we first were told about these activities and saw those photographs, I and everyone at this table was as shocked and stunned as you were.

In the period since, a number of questions have been raised—here in Congress, in the media, and by the public. Let me respond to some of them.

Some have asked: Why weren't those charged with guarding prisoners properly trained?

If one looks at the behavior depicted in those photos, it is fair to ask: what kind of training could one possibly provide that would stop people from doing that? Either you learn that in life, or you don't. If someone doesn't know that doing what is shown in those photos is wrong, cruel, brutal, indecent, and against American values, I am at a loss as to what kind of training could be provided to teach them.

The fact is, the vast majority of the people in the United States Armed Forces are decent, honorable individuals who know right from wrong, and conduct themselves in a manner that is in keeping with the spirit and values of our country. There is only a very small minority who do not.

Some have asked: Hasn't a climate allowing for abuses to occur been created because of a decision to "disregard" the Geneva Conventions?

No. Indeed, the U.S. Government recognized that the Geneva Conventions apply in Iraq, and the Armed Forces are obliged to follow them. DOD personnel are trained in the law of war, including the Geneva Conventions. Doctrine requires that they follow those rules and report, investigate, and take corrective action to remedy violations.

We did conclude that our war against al Qaeda is not governed precisely by the Conventions, but nevertheless announced that detained individuals would be treated consistent with the principles of the Geneva Conventions.

Some have asked: Can we repair the damage done to our credibility in the region?

I hope so and I believe so. We have to trust that in the course of events the truth will eventually come out. The truth is that the United States is a liberator, not a conqueror. Our people are devoted to freedom and democracy, not enslavement or oppression.

Every day, these men and women risk their lives to protect the Iraqi people and help them build a more hopeful future. They have liberated 25 million people; dismantled two terrorist regimes; and battled an enemy that shows no compassion or respect for innocent human life.

These men and women, and the families who love and support them, deserve better than to have their sacrifices on behalf of our country sullied by the despicable actions of a few. To that vast majority of our soldiers abroad, I extend my support and my appreciation for their truly outstanding service.

One final thought:

Today we'll have a full discussion of this terrible incident and I welcome that. But first, let's take a step back for a moment.

Within the constraints imposed on those of us in the chain of command, I want to say a few additional words.

First, beyond abuse of prisoners, we have seen photos that depict incidents of physical violence towards prisoners—acts that may be described as blatantly sadistic, cruel, and inhuman.

Second, the individuals who took the photos took many more.

The ramifications of these two facts are far reaching.

Congress and the American people and the rest of the world need to know this.

In addition, the photos give these incidents a vividness—indeed a horror—in the eyes of the world.

Mr. Chairman, that is why this hearing today is important. That is why the actions we take in the days and weeks ahead are so important.

Because however terrible the setback, this is also an occasion to demonstrate to the world the difference between those who believe in democracy and human rights and those who believe in rule by the terrorist code.

We value human life; we believe in their right to individual freedom and the rule of law.

For those beliefs we send the men and women in the Armed Forces abroad—to protect that right for our own people and to give millions of others who aren't Americans the hope of a future of freedom.

Part of that mission—part of what we believe in—is making sure that when wrongdoing or scandal occur that they are not covered up, but exposed, investigated, publicly disclosed—and the guilty brought to justice.

Mr. Chairman, I know you join me today in saying to the world: Judge us by our actions. Watch how Americans, watch how a democracy deals with wrongdoing and scandal and the pain of acknowledging and correcting our own mistakes and weaknesses.

After they have seen America in action, then ask those who preach resentment and hatred of America if our behavior doesn't give the lie to the falsehood and slander they speak about our people and way of life. Ask them if the resolve of Americans in crisis and difficulty—and, yes, the heartache of acknowledging the evil in our midst—doesn't have meaning far beyond their code of hatred.

Above all, ask them if the willingness of Americans to acknowledge their own failures before humanity doesn't light the world as surely as the great ideas and beliefs that first made this Nation a beacon of hope and liberty to all who strive to be free.

We know what the terrorists will do. We know they will try to exploit all that is bad to obscure all that is good. That is the nature of evil. That is the nature of those who think they can kill innocent men, women and children to gratify their own cruel will to power.

We say to the enemies of humanity and freedom: Do your worst, because we will strive to do our best. I thank you Mr. Chairman. My colleagues each have a brief statement.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Mr. Secretary.

You and I have had the privilege to know each other for many years. We've enjoyed a close working relationship. I want to say, I found that statement to be strong and, in every sense, heartfelt by you.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. General Myers.

STATEMENT OF GEN. RICHARD B. MYERS, USAF, CHAIRMAN, JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF

General MYERS. Mr. Chairman and Senator Levin, I would like to express my deep regret at being here under these circumstances. The incidents of prisoner abuse that occurred at Abu Ghraib prison are absolutely appalling. The actions of those involved are unconscionable and absolutely unacceptable.

Since Brigadier General Kimmitt's public announcement of the allegations back in January, the commanders' response to the problems highlighted in these investigations has been timely and thorough. Just as a backdrop, we must also realize that our commanders had been handling some enormous challenges in Iraq, including the fighting that had intensified in Fallujah and in Najaf, the temporary plus-up of troops, which was a decision that was pending, and the departure of the Spanish brigade, all at the same time that they were dealing with some of these reports. Despite these extraordinary events, our commanders did exactly the right thing in a timely manner. I have great confidence in them, as should the American public and the citizens of Iraq.

I've been receiving regular updates since the situation developed in January, and I've been involved in corrective actions and personally recommended specific steps. Again, I'm confident that the commanders are doing the right things.

One of the military's greatest strengths comes from the fact that we hold our service men and women accountable for their actions. Our military justice system works very well. I took an oath to support the Constitution, and with that comes the responsibility to ensure that all military members enjoy the full protections of our Constitution, to include the due process of a fair judicial system. After all, it is respect for the rule of law that we're trying to teach and instill in places like Afghanistan and Iraq. So, as the Secretary said, we are now in the middle of a judicial process regarding detainee abuse. Because of my position, I have to be careful to not say anything that can be interpreted as direction or pressure for a certain outcome in any of these cases.

Moreover, we have to understand that a fair judicial system takes time to work. I know you all understand that. No one is stalling or covering up information, but it's absolutely essential to protect the integrity of our judicial system. I have complete confidence in our military justice system. The accused will receive due process. Those found guilty will receive punishments based on their offenses.

When I spoke to Dan Rather, with whom I already had a professional association, concerning the "60 Minutes" story, I did so after talking to General Abizaid, and I did so out of concern for the lives of our troops.

The story about the abuse was already public, but we were concerned that broadcasting the actual pictures would further inflame the tense situation that existed then in Iraq, and further endanger the lives of coalition soldiers and hostages. Again, it's useful to remember the context here. We were in the midst of some very heavy fighting in Fallujah and other places in Iraq, and some 90 hostages had been taken. It was a very delicate situation that we were trying to resolve.

Since the story of the photographs was already public, I felt we were on good ground in asking him to hold off airing the actual photos. As we are now seeing, the photos are having a very real, very emotional worldwide impact. I would identify myself with the Secretary's remarks on having seen more of them than I wish to have seen. They have had quite an impact on me.

This situation is nothing less than tragic. The Iraqi people are trying to build a free and open society, and I regret they saw such a flagrant violation of the very principles that are the cornerstone of such a society.

I am also terribly saddened that the hundreds of thousands of service men and women who are serving, or who have served, so honorably in Iraq and Afghanistan and elsewhere would have their reputation tarnished and their accomplishments diminished by those few who don't uphold our military's values. I know our service men and women are all suffering unfairly with a collective sense of shame over what has happened. Their credibility will be restored day by day as they interact with the Iraqi people, and I'm confident that our dedicated service men and women will continue to prove worthy of the trust and respect of our Nation and of the world. We continue to be very proud of them. As always, I thank you, on their behalf, for your steadfast support.

Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, General. That was a good statement.

Secretary Brownlee, do you wish to—

Mr. BROWNLEE. I think General Smith's going next.

Chairman WARNER. You defer to General Smith?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Fine, thank you.

STATEMENT OF LT. GEN. LANCE L. SMITH, USAF, DEPUTY COMMANDER, UNITED STATES CENTRAL COMMAND

General SMITH. Senator Warner, Senator Levin, members of the committee, I wish to start by thanking you for the opportunity to testify before this committee concerning the mistreatment of Iraqi detainees.

The more than 250,000 soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines who have served in the CENTCOM area of responsibility (AOR) over the past year have faced numerous challenges in prosecuting the global war on terror and Operation Iraqi Freedom (OIF) and Operation Enduring Freedom (OEF). Throughout these operations, they have worked to better the lives of the people of Afghanistan and Iraq, to bring progress and stability to these countries. Their efforts, however, have been put at risk by the reprehensible actions of a few. These few have acted in a manner that is inconsistent with the proud history of the American soldier. There is no excuse for their actions, nor do I offer one. Their unprofessional and malicious conduct has caused considerable harm to our attempts to win the trust and confidence of the Iraqi people. Unfortunately, it has also facilitated the efforts of our enemy to malign our national intent and character, and gives weight to the charge of American hypocrisy.

When the allegations of abuse and improper conduct of U.S. forces against legally detained Iraqis were brought to light by a soldier on January 13, 2004, our leadership in Iraq prudently informed us of what they knew and immediately initiated a criminal investigation. That investigation has resulted in preferral of charges against six service members, three of which have, thus far, been referred to courts-martial, and we are still investigating further allegations of criminal misconduct.

At the request of the Commander, Joint Task Force 7 (CJTF-7) on January 24, CENTCOM directed the conduct of a broader administrative investigation, now known as the Taguba Report, with the mandate to make a comprehensive examination of our detainee operations in Iraq in order to detect any systemic problems, and, if problems were identified, to take necessary steps to rectify the situation and hold accountable all those responsible who failed in their duties. That investigation is near completion, and we have already made significant progress in implementing its recommendations, but we have more ahead of us.

Information flow up and down the chain of command was timely, and will continue to be. Commanders regularly brief their superiors as these investigations progress. The first public release of information on the Criminal Investigation Division (CID) investigation happened in January, and was reported by the media. The interim results of the Taguba Report were briefed to me in late March as the investigation made its way through command channels en route to approval by the Coalition Force Land Component Commander on April 6, and formal adverse administrative action by the CJTF on May 1. The investigation is ongoing.

Some have asked why it took so long for the allegations to make it up the chain of command. One needs to look at this as a legal proceeding. Once the allegations were made, the investigation was initiated immediately. Evidence was gathered, people were questioned, and a number were removed from their posts. As with any prosecution, materials and evidence were kept within the investigatory chain, for obvious reasons: to maintain confidentiality, to protect individual rights, and to allow the investigation to proceed without danger of exposure to those being investigated.

The actions of the chain of command in Iraq in conducting the investigations connected with detainee abuse or mistreatment have been swift, circumspect, and proper. They have carefully uncovered facts, analyzed evidence, and gauged the context of the situation, all the while under the stress of ongoing combat operations, and ever mindful of protecting the rights of the accused. Commanders are taking action both to ensure justice is done and to ensure that this kind of deplorable conduct is never repeated.

With regards to the question of whether this abuse is systemic, the investigations underway should better inform us on that. At this point, we don't know, and that's part of what we're trying to determine by conducting investigations. When we have answers, we will provide them.

The Taguba Report, in fact, highlights three units for praise for their performance of military detention duties. That is a hopeful sign that these abuses are not widespread, and I don't believe they are.

The vast majority of coalition and U.S. forces have shown great humanity and restraint in this, and have acted with courage and compassion. The situation at Abu Ghraib is not representative of the conduct of U.S. and coalition forces. It is a distasteful and criminal aberration, and will absolutely not be tolerated. We deeply regret that these egregious actions occurred, and we are taking the necessary steps to preclude similar incidents in the future.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, General.

Secretary Brownlee, we need to move on, but we certainly recognize that you might have a few opening remarks.

Mr. BROWNLEE. Okay, sir. I'll go fast, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you.

STATEMENT OF HON. LES BROWNLEE, ACTING SECRETARY OF THE ARMY

Mr. BROWNLEE. Chairman Warner, Senator Levin, and distinguished members of the committee, I appreciate the opportunity to be here today to offer testimony on actions taken by the Army in response to the appalling abuse of detainees at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. I join the Secretary of Defense in apologizing to those detainees who were abused there.

Let me begin by outlining the range of investigations into detainee abuse. From December 2002 to present, the CID has conducted, or is continuing to conduct, investigations into 35 cases of abuse or death of detainees held in detention facilities in the CENTCOM theater. Twenty-five of these are death cases, and 10 involve assault. The CID investigates every death in our custody.

Of the 25 death investigations, the CID has determined that 12 deaths were due to natural or undetermined causes, 1 was justifiable homicide, and 2 were homicides. The 10 remaining deaths are still under investigation.

Additionally, 42 other potential cases of misconduct against civilians occurred outside the detention facilities and are currently under investigation by the Army CID or by the responsible units.

On February 10, 2004, I directed the Inspector General (IG) of the Army to conduct a functional analysis of the Department's internment, enemy-prisoner-of-war (POW), and detention policies, practices, and procedures. I directed this inspection to determine if there might be systemic problems relating to the planning, doctrine, or training in the detention facilities operating within the CENTCOM theater. Phase 1 of this assessment is oriented on current operations in the CENTCOM AOR, with assessment-team visits to 16 detention facilities. Phase 2 of the IG assessment will encompass visits to defense facilities worldwide, including previously-visited facilities, to ensure compliance to established standards.

Preliminary findings indicate that leaders and soldiers are aware of the requirement and expectation to treat detainees humanely, and that it is their duty to report incidents of abuse. To date, the majority of the abuse cases indicate the underlying cause has been twofold: an individual failure to adhere to basic standards of discipline, training, and Army values; and leadership failures to provide oversight and enforce standards.

To date, the Army has taken numerous actions to improve the training for MPs and military intelligence (MI) soldiers. The Army is retraining select MP soldiers to serve as correctional specialists. We have incorporated detainee lessons learned from operations in both Iraq and Afghanistan into the MP school curriculum, and have deployed MP training teams to our combat training centers. In response to a request from the CJTF-7, the Army deployed integrated multi-discipline mobile training teams to oversee and conduct comprehensive training in all aspects of detainee and confinement operations in-theater.

Additionally, the Chief of the Army Reserve has directed his IG to conduct a special assessment of training for Reserve personnel on the law of war, detainee treatment, ethics, and leadership. All Reserve component MI soldiers are now required to mobilize at the intelligence school at Fort Huachuca so they can receive the latest instruction on tactical questioning before deploying.

Finally, the Army is improving the training of MP and MI personnel at our combat training centers by incorporating detainee holding situations into the tactical scenarios.

These improvements were initiated for the later-deploying OIF, or OIF-2 units, and will be fully implemented for all OIF-3 deploying units.

The reported acts of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib are tragic and disappointing, and they stand in sharp contrast to the values of our Army and the Nation it serves. For these incidents to reflect negatively on the courage, sacrifice, and selfless service of the hundreds of thousands of dedicated men and women who have volunteered to serve our Nation in uniform would be a tragedy, as well. Our soldiers, over 300,000 of whom are deployed in over 120 countries around the world, most in Iraq and Afghanistan, have provided the opportunity for freedom and democracy for over 46 million people who have never experienced it before, while, at the same time, providing protection to the American people.

Mr. Chairman, we will find out how and why this happened, and ensure that those individuals determined to be responsible for these shameful and illegal acts of abuse are held accountable for their actions.

I appreciate this opportunity to appear before you today. I thank you and the members of this distinguished committee for your continuing support of the men and women in our Army, and I look forward to answering your questions.

Chairman WARNER. Secretary Brownlee, your statement is very helpful, and a significant contribution to this hearing.

General Schoomaker.

STATEMENT OF GEN. PETER J. SCHOOMAKER, USA, CHIEF OF STAFF OF THE ARMY

General SCHOOMAKER. Chairman Warner, Senator Levin, distinguished members of the committee, I'll be brief.

As the Chief of Staff of the Army, I am responsible for training and equipping our soldiers, as well as growing our Army leaders. I am also responsible for providing ready and relevant land power capabilities to the combatant commanders and the joint team. Although not in the operational chain of command, I am responsible for our soldiers' training and readiness; therefore, I take it personally when any of them fall short of our standards.

To put it in perspective, what we are dealing with are the actions of a few, as has been pointed out. These are conscious actions that are contrary to all that we stand for. This is not a training issue, but one of character and values. Our Army values of loyalty, duty, respect, selfless service, honor, integrity, and personal courage are taught to our soldiers from the moment that they enter the training base. There's no question that potential consequences are serious, but we must not forget that these are a few among a great many others who are serving with great honor and sacrifice, as has been pointed out.

We must be careful how we proceed, as it will affect the morale and the safety of a great majority of our soldiers who are meeting the standards and are daily placing themselves in harm's way. I promise you, they, too, take this personally.

I am reminded that, in the report by Major General Taguba, he spoke of several soldiers and units who were challenged by the same set of demanding circumstances at the same place, and they did what was right. The inexcusable behavior of a few is not representative of the courageous and compassionate performance of the overwhelming majority of our soldiers who serve with pride and honor.

We are currently undergoing an extensive investigation of every allegation. The system works, and will result in fairness and justice. We will also learn and adapt. Our Army has already taken corrective actions. Our soldiers are performing with distinction, and I am proud of them all. We owe them our confidence. Our Army is taking this very seriously, and will meet the standards that our Nation expects, as we have for 229 years.

Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, General. That statement on leadership reflects your own strong record of leadership, and we're fortunate to have you at the helm of the United States Army today.

We'll proceed with questions now. Colleagues, recognizing that almost the full membership of the committee is present, the chair will have to cut the time to 5 minutes.

Mr. Secretary, I was particularly impressed by your phrase, "We're going to watch American democracy in action, as the President and all others address this problem swiftly, in accordance with the rule of law and American values." In the meantime, however, it's obvious to all of us that the impact of the facts of this case as they are unfolding is affecting our relationship with other nations, our foreign policy. So I ask you, what is that impact, as best you can assess it today? Second, will the impact of this situation affect, in any way, the transition that I and others support to take place on June 30? Will it have any impact on other nations in the coalition to consider their continued participation at this time, and the chances of adding additional nations? Lastly, does it have any impact on the force levels that you anticipate, together with your on-scene commanders of CENTCOM, in the near future?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Mr. Chairman, those are tough questions. I'm afraid no one has the ability to know precisely what will unfold. We have seen no shift in coalition countries, in answer to your first question.

About future coalition countries, I think the key determinative there is whether or not we are successful in getting an additional United Nations (U.N.) resolution, in which case I think we will get additional countries to participate. It certainly will not have any effect on the determination to have sovereign responsibility assumed by Iraqis by June 30.

I would just say one other thing. We have been enormously disadvantaged by false allegations and lies for the better part of a year—and, indeed, before that, with respect to Afghanistan—by terrorists and terrorist organizations alleging things that weren't true. So we have taken a beating in the world for things we were not doing that were alleged to be done. Now we're taking a beating, understandably, for things that did, in fact, happen.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, sir.

General MYERS. Mr. Chairman, if I could just add to that. I just returned from a North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) Military Committee meeting, and had the chance to talk to several of the countries that have major military units inside Iraq. They were very strong, in every case, about seeing this through, and seemed undeterred by any of the recent events. They were looking forward, and we were talking about the future and about their steadfastness in seeing this mission through.

Chairman WARNER. General, I direct my next question to you, because the Department of the Army has been in the forefront. CENTCOM, as we all know, is composed of officers—men, women—of all branches of the Services. I would anticipate that you have consulted with your colleagues, not only on the Joint Chiefs, but particularly in CENTCOM, and that you are making, or have made and will continue to make, an assessment as to the possible personnel increase in the number of men and women of the Armed Forces, most particularly in Iraq, and perhaps elsewhere in the world. This story continues to reflect very deeply the thinking and actions of others.

General MYERS. Mr. Chairman, absolutely we will. We should not underestimate that impact. It was that impact of the pictures—the report of pictures was already out there. But the actual pictures possibly coming out on a news program, that prompted my call to try to delay their release. I thought those pictures, at that particular time, would have a particularly bad effect on our troops, perhaps resulting in death to our forces.

I think we have a lot of troops in Iraq right now, after talking to General Smith and others, that are probably walking with—they're involved in combat, but they're walking with their heads just a little bit lower right now because they have to bear the brunt of what their colleagues up in Abu Ghraib did. It's going to take, as General Schoomaker said, good leadership and everything else we can do to get them back up on the net, because they are engaged in some very important work.

As I said in my statement, I continue to think that the way we'll win their trust will be soldier by soldier, patrol by patrol, like we're winning the war over there, and we're just going to have to stay at it.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you. My time is expired.

Senator Levin.

Senator LEVIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Secretary Rumsfeld, I was struck by one of the photographs from the prison depicting three naked prisoners in a lump on the floor being overseen by a number of soldiers, while other soldiers in the cell block were assisting or were going about their business without any apparent interest in or concern about the obvious abusive treatment. It occurred to me that the conduct that we were witnessing and watching was not the aberrant conduct of a few individuals, but was part of an organized and conscious process to extract information.

This picture reinforces the Taguba Report, which quotes Sergeant Davis as saying that he witnessed prisoners in the MI hold section, Wing 1A, “being made to do various things that I would question, morally.” He quoted the MI folks as saying, “loosen the guy up for us, make sure he has a bad night, make sure he gets the treatment.” He further stated that the wing belonged to MI, and it appeared that MI personnel approved of the abuses.

Now, in the Taguba Report itself, General Taguba says the following, and this is his finding, that “military intelligence interrogators and other U.S. Government agency interrogators”—which I assume includes CIA—“actively requested that MP guards set physical and mental conditions for favorable interrogation of witnesses,” and that personnel assigned to the MP company and brigade were “directed to change facility procedures to set the conditions for military intelligence interrogations.”

My question to you is, what were those changes that were made, and was it proper to make changes of the kind that General Taguba refers to?

Secretary RUMSFELD. The conclusions you seem to have drawn in your question, Senator Levin, are issues that I believe are probably all being addressed in an investigation that was initiated last month. I think it’s called the Fay Investigation—possibly you, General Smith, who have been involved in this, would want to comment.

General SMITH. Sir, there has been an investigation that was initiated in mid-April by Major General Fay, and it is to look into exactly those allegations.

Senator LEVIN. All right.

Secretary Rumsfeld, would you agree that people who authorized, or suggested, or prompted the conduct depicted in the pictures that we’ve seen, as well as those who carried out the abuses, must be held accountable? That anybody who authorized, knew about, prompted, or suggested, in the Intelligence Community or otherwise, that conduct must be held accountable? That’s my very direct question to you.

Secretary RUMSFELD. The pictures I’ve seen depict conduct and behavior that is so brutal and so cruel and so inhumane that anyone engaged in it or involved in it would have to be brought to justice.

Senator LEVIN. Would that include anybody who suggested it, prompted it, or hinted at it directly or indirectly? I just want to know how far up this chain you’re going to go. Are you going to limit this to people who perpetrated it, or are we going to get to the people who may have suggested it or encouraged it?

Secretary RUMSFELD. That is exactly why the investigation was initiated, and that is why it’s being brought forward. We’ll find what their conclusions are, and I’m sure they will make recommendations with respect to prosecution.

Senator LEVIN. But in terms of the standard, does anybody who recommended or suggested, directly or indirectly, that conduct in order to extract information—in your judgment, if that occurred, are they also violative of our laws and standards?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Certainly, anyone who recommended the kind of behavior that I've seen depicted in those photos needs to be brought to justice.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator.

Senator LEVIN. My time is up. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Senator McCain.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Secretary.

I come to this hearing with a deep sense of sorrow and grave concern. Sorrow after the shock and anger of seeing these pictures for the first time, that so many brave young Americans who are fighting and dying are under this cloud. I attended the memorial service of Pat Tillman, a brave American who sacrificed his life recently. He and others, unfortunately, at least in some way, are diminished by this scandal.

I'm gravely concerned that many Americans will have the same impulse I did when I saw these pictures, and that's to turn away from them. We risk losing public support for this conflict. As Americans turned away from the Vietnam War, they may turn away from this one unless this issue is resolved, with full disclosure, immediately.

With all due respect to investigations ongoing and panels being appointed, the American people deserve immediate and full disclosure of all relevant information so that we can be assured and comforted that something that we never believed could happen will never happen again.

Now, Mr. Secretary, I'd like you to give the committee the chain of command from the guards to you, all the way up.

Secretary RUMSFELD. I think General Myers brought an indication of it, and we'll show it.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you. I'd like to know what agencies or private contractors were in charge of interrogations. Did they have authority over the guards? What were their instructions to the guards?

Secretary RUMSFELD. First, with respect to the—— General MYERS. We did not bring it.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Oh, my.

General MYERS. Yeah, oh, my, sir.

Secretary RUMSFELD. It was all prepared.

General MYERS. It was, indeed.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Do you want to walk through it?

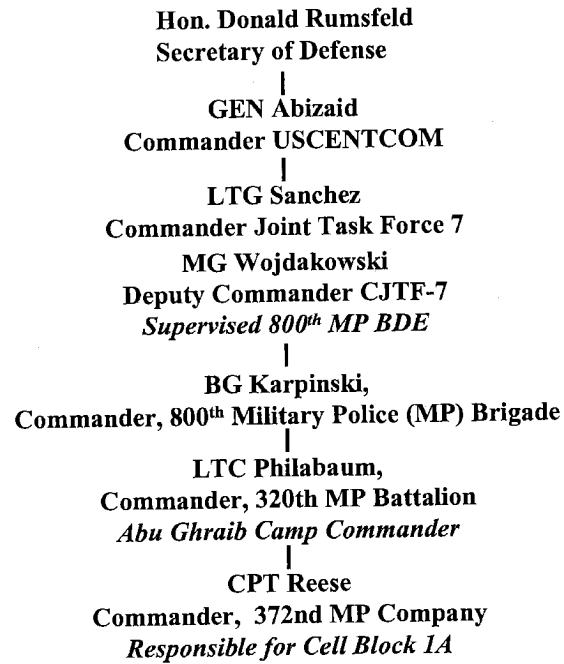

Senator MCCAIN. Well, anyway, who was in charge? What agency or private contractor was in charge of the interrogations? Did they have authority over the guards? What were the instructions that they gave to the guards?

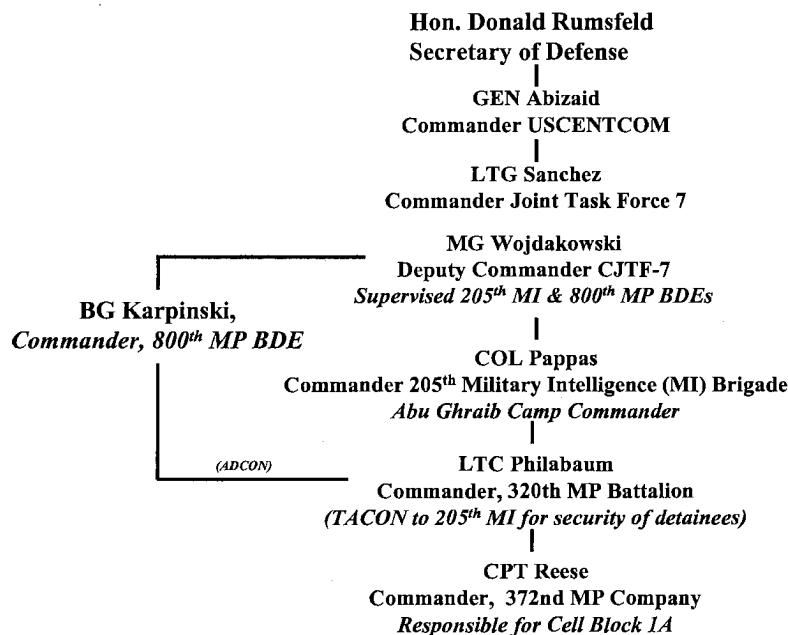

General MYERS. I'll walk through the chain of command and——

Senator MCCAIN. No, you can just submit the chain of command for the record, please.

[The information referred to follows:]

Operational Chain of Command (before 19 Nov 03)

Operational Chain of Command (after 19 Nov 03)

Secretary RUMSFELD. General Smith, do you want to respond?

Senator MCCAIN. No, Secretary Rumsfeld, in all due respect, you have to answer this question, and it could be satisfied with a phone call. This is a pretty simple, straightforward question.

Who was in charge of the interrogations? What agencies and private contractors were in charge of the interrogations? Did they have authority over the guards? What were the instructions to the guards? This goes to the heart of this matter.

Secretary RUMSFELD. It does, indeed. As I understand it, there were two contractor organizations. They supplied interrogators and linguists. I was advised by General Smith that there were maybe a total of 40.

Senator MCCAIN. Now, were they in charge of the interrogations?

General SMITH. Yes, sir. There were 37 interrogators that were—

Senator MCCAIN. I'm asking who was in charge of the interrogations.

General SMITH. They were not in charge. They were interrogators.

Senator MCCAIN. My question is, who was in charge of the interrogations?

General SMITH. The brigade commander for the MI brigade.

Senator MCCAIN. Did he also have authority over the guards?

General SMITH. Sir, he had tactical control over the guards, so he was—

Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Secretary, you can't answer these questions?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I can. I thought the purpose of the question was to try to make sure we got an accurate presentation, and we have the expert here who was in the chain of command.

Senator MCCAIN. I think these are fundamental questions to this issue.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Fine.

Senator MCCAIN. What were the instructions to the guards?

Secretary RUMSFELD. There are two sets of responsibilities, as your question suggests. In one set, you have the people who have the responsibility for managing the detention process. They are not interrogators. The MI people, as General Smith has indicated, were the people who were in charge of the interrogation part of the process. The responsibility, as I have reviewed the matter, shifted over a period of time, and the General is capable of telling you when that responsibility shifted.

[Clarifying information provided by the DOD follows:]

The overall responsibility for the Baghdad Central Confinement Facility (Abu Ghraib) was transferred from the 800th MP Brigade to the 205th MI Brigade by a CJTF-7 Fragmentary Order (FRAGO) on November 18, 2003. In accordance with the order, the units operating at Abu Ghraib came under the tactical control of the 205th MI Brigade for security of detainees and FOB protection. The MP, however, retained responsibility for detention operations.

Senator MCCAIN. What were the instructions to the guards?

Secretary RUMSFELD. That is what the investigation that I have indicated has been undertaken is determining.

Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Secretary, that's a very simple, straightforward question.

Secretary RUMSFELD. As the Chief of Staff of the Army can tell you, the guards are trained to guard people. They are not trained to interrogate, and their instructions are to, in the case of Iraq, adhere to the Geneva Conventions. The Geneva Conventions apply to all of the individuals there, in one way or another. They apply to the POWs, and they're written out, and they're instructed, and the people in the Army train them to that. The people in the CENTCOM have the responsibility of seeing that, in fact, their conduct is consistent with the Geneva Conventions. The criminals in the same detention facility are handled under a different provision of the Geneva Conventions. I believe it's the fourth, and the prior one is the third.

Detainees who are criminals, persons who attack the force and civilians who are security threats are called "civilian internees" and are protected persons under Geneva Convention IV. Geneva Convention IV applies to all categories of civilian personnel we have detained in Iraq.

Senator MCCAIN. So the guards were instructed to treat the prisoners, under some kind of changing authority, as I understand it, according to the Geneva Conventions.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Absolutely.

Senator MCCAIN. I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

To the people in the Middle East, and too often today, the symbol of America is not the Statue of Liberty, it's the prisoner standing on a box wearing a dark cape and a dark hood on his head with wires attached to his body, afraid that he's going to be electrocuted. Now, these incidents of torture and abuse have resulted in a catastrophic crisis of credibility for our Nation.

Since the beginning of the war, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has provided the Pentagon officials with reports of abuses at this prison, saying that some of them were tantamount to torture. They issued serious complaints during the inspection of the prison in October 2003 and at several other times.

The State Department and the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) appealed to you to stop the mistreatment of the military detainees. Secretary Powell raised this issue at Cabinet meetings and elsewhere, pleading with officials from your Department, Mr. Secretary, to see that detainees were properly cared for and treated, and your Department failed to act.

The military leadership put the troops in charge of the prison. They weren't trained to do the job, and they assigned far too few guards to the prison that were required to do the job right. They relied on the civilian contractors to perform military duties, as I understand it, including the interrogation of Iraqi prisoners. As Senator Levin pointed out, the top-level DOD officials directed guards at the prison to set physical and mental conditions for favorable interrogation of the detainees, a decision that directly resulted in the abuses.

The military leadership failed to respond in a systematic way even after it initiated the 35 criminal investigations into alleged mistreatment of detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan, 25 of these investigations involving deaths. I know that Secretary Brownlee referred to this.

In particular, in December 2002, military doctors at the Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan ruled that two Afghan men in U.S. custody died from blunt-force injuries. No one in the military has been held accountable for those homicides.

You and your senior leadership have shown, I believe, a disregard for the protection of the Geneva Conventions in detainee operations. In January 2002, you were asked why you believed the Geneva Conventions do not apply to detainees in Guantanamo. You replied that you did not have the slightest concern about their treatment, in light of what occurred September 11.

According to The New York Times, you have known about the graphic photographic evidence of abuse in the Abu Ghraib prison since mid-January. You told President Bush about these reports of abuse shortly thereafter. Yet, rather than work with Congress to deal with the problem together, you and other top DOD officials have apparently spent the last 3 weeks preparing a public relations plan.

Can you tell us what exactly you did tell the President about these reports of abuse in late January, and what did he say? What did you do about it, and why did month after month after month have to pass before anything happened? Then we find out that the pictures came out, and the President is, indeed, angry.

Secretary RUMSFELD. First, Senator Kennedy, your statement that other agencies of government were concerned about detainees and the DOD failed to act is simply not correct.

Senator KENNEDY. This wasn't brought to your attention by the State Department?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I'll respond. I did not say that. I said your statement that the DOD—

Senator KENNEDY. It was brought to you then by the State Department. We don't want to parse words. Was this brought to you by the State Department? I mentioned Secretary Powell. The question is whether this was brought to you, and when did you know it? You gave us a laundry list in your presentation about the timeline on it. I'm trying to find out, because it's been published that you were notified about this and advised to do something about it a series of times and nothing was done.

Secretary RUMSFELD. It's not correct to say nothing was done. You're making a set of conclusions that are just simply not accurate. We have had numerous discussions, interagency, on detainees. All in all, there have been some 43,000 people who were captured or detained in Iraq, of whom 31,850 have already been released. That is a big task for the Army to undertake. The actions of the ICRC—you said they came in and indicated concerns about the Abu Ghraib prison. That's correct. The prison officials began the process of making corrections, and General Taguba's report found that a number of those things were already underway, in terms of corrections. When he made his study, a number of additional things and corrections were made. So it seems to me that the ICRC report was helpful, and that the military command, as I understand it, undertook a series of corrections.

Now, with respect to when we were knowledgeable of this, the situation was this. Specialist Darby told the CID that he had information about abuses in the prison. I believe it was on the 13th or 14th of January. By the 15th or 16th, an investigation had been initiated, and CENTCOM's public affairs people went out and told everyone in the world that there were allegations of abuse, and they were being investigated. Again, by mid-March, when some criminal—I don't know the legal term, but some criminal actions were initiated—the CENTCOM's public affairs people went out again and announced that not only were there allegations of abuses, but they listed the types of abuses. This was to the world; everyone knew it. CNN was there asking questions. That is the time frame when General Myers and I were meeting with the President and discussing the reports that we had obviously heard because—they weren't hiding anything. They disclosed it to the world.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Roberts.

Senator ROBERTS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I mean, in no way, to diminish the seriousness of what has occurred here, but it seems very clear to me that the task before Congress is to determine whether or not these abuses are the result of flaws in the system or if this was a matter, as has been indicated, of individuals who simply broke the rules.

With that in mind, I'd like to know, Mr. Secretary, were any of the abuses that occurred in Iraq encouraged, condoned, or permitted by DOD regulations or policy? Were any local or unit-levels in effect that would have encouraged, condoned, or permitted these abuses?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Certainly not to my knowledge. When one looks at the abuses and the cruelty, the idea that you would have regulations that would permit, condone, or encourage that type of thing is just not comprehensible. General Smith is the deputy at CENTCOM, under General Abizaid, and he is responsible for the management of the guidance and instructions. He can respond if you'd like.

Senator ROBERTS. No, I think you've answered the question, at least to the degree that I want it answered right now. I want to move on.

I do have the privilege of being the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee. Three days ago, we had a hearing. We had the MI representatives there. We had the CIA there. They indicated, at that particular time, that they did not know and had no evidence of any direction on the part of intelligence personnel at this prison suggesting that they commit these abuses at the behest of the military interrogators, who asked the MP to "soften up" the detainees to prepare them for the interrogation. This gets back to the opening statement by Senator Levin and the question by Senator McCain.

Let me remind everybody that, as we speak, we have men and women in uniform engaged in combat in Najaf, and basically when we interrogate people, it is to get information from the prisoners, in terms of force protection and in terms of the mission in Iraq, to find out precisely what's going on. It's a very important mission. It was a closed hearing, but I said at the time that I would be stunned—and I've said it to the press—that anybody in MI would condone these kind of activities. This criteria is ingrained, in terms of their training. It's black and white.

So my question to you is—and I think it is going to result in the Fay Report here—is there any truth to the allegations made in the press and by some of the accused MPs that they did commit these abuses at the behest of the military interrogators?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I've read the same allegations and comments that you have. That is what the criminal investigations are looking at, among other things. We will, at an early date, know what the answers are to those questions.

Senator ROBERTS. Can you give me a time frame on when the Fay Report will be completed?

General SMITH. Sir, it should be completed in the next couple of weeks, if he does not ask for an extension. Part of the problem is, that unit has redeployed back to Germany, and so there is traveling back and forth involved.

Senator ROBERTS. That would help answer the question that was asked by Senator McCain as to actually who was "in charge" of that prison. I put the "in charge" in quotes. You had the intelligence, and then you also had the MPs, in terms of the maintenance of the unit, and then it seems to me that there's another command that you mentioned, in terms of the contractors.

I think Senator McCain's question is right on. Who was really in charge? I think you have a tri-part system here. Is that being fixed? Will that be recommended by the Fay Report?

General SMITH. Sir, that's already been fixed with the appointment of Major General Geoff Miller as the—— Senator ROBERTS. He's the person that straightened out Guantanamo Bay down in Cuba.

General SMITH. Sir, he is there doing that right now. He has been there since the middle of April.

Senator ROBERTS. I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator Byrd.

Senator BYRD. Mr. Chairman, thank you for calling this timely and important hearing. I apologize for my voice. I've been struggling with a bout of laryngitis.

I share your outrage over the atrocities that have emerged from the Abu Ghraib prison. I believe Congress has the responsibility to demand a public accounting and a public explanation from the leadership of the DOD. I'm sure this is only the beginning of a long and painful process, but I am glad that you've taken the first steps to begin a necessary public examination of the massive policy failure that led to this catastrophe.

Among the many aspects of this situation that are so troubling to me is why the President and his advisors are only now publicly condemning the prisoner abuses in Iraq, when apparently the DOD has known about them for months. I do not recall hearing a peep out of either of you, Secretary Rumsfeld or General Myers, about this before CBS broke the silence.

Why did it take the televised broadcast of graphic photos of prisoner abuse, a broadcast General Myers has acknowledged he tried to suppress, to galvanize the leadership of the DOD to express its outrage over the situation?

Why was a report that described sadistic, blatant, and wanton criminal abuses by American soldiers left to languish on a shelf in the Pentagon unread by the top leadership until the media revealed it to the world? Why wasn't Congress apprised of the findings of this report from the DOD instead of from CBS News?

Mr. Secretary, it was President Truman who was said to have displayed the famous sign on his desk, "The buck stops here." I served with President Truman. He was an honorable man. He did not shirk his responsibility.

I see a very different pattern in this administration. I see arrogance and a disdain for Congress. I see misplaced bravado and an unwillingness to admit mistakes. I see finger-pointing and excuses.

Given the catastrophic impact that this scandal has had on the world community, how can the United States ever repair its credibility? How are we supposed to convince not only the Iraqi people, but also the rest of the world, that America is, indeed, a liberator and not a conqueror, not an arrogant power? Is a presidential apology to the King of Jordan sufficient? I ask you that question.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Senator, the facts are somewhat different than that. The story was broken by CENTCOM, by the DOD, in Baghdad. General Kimmitt stood up, in January, and announced that there were allegations of abuses and that they were being investigated. He then briefed reporters. I think it was March 20. There's a timeline up here. By March 20, he went back out again and said that these had been filed.

The idea that this was a story that was broken by the media is simply not the fact. This was presented by CENTCOM to the world so that they would be aware of the fact that these had been filed. What was not known is that a classified report with photographs would be given to the press before it arrived in the Pentagon.

Senator BYRD. Mr. Secretary, we'll put my timeline in the record and compare it with yours.

HEADLINE: Bush Scolds Rumsfeld on Abuse Inquiry;

The Iraq scandal caught the president off guard, an official says. The Pentagon maintains it made the prison charges known to the White House.

BODY:

A clash erupted Wednesday between the White House and the Pentagon over the handling of the Iraq prison abuse investigation, with President Bush telling Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld that he felt personally blindsided by the scandal and should have been more fully informed about its severity.

Bush rebuked Rumsfeld during an Oval Office meeting, a senior administration official said Wednesday evening. Bush told Rumsfeld that the White House should have been informed about the photographs documenting some of the abuses, which began appearing in the news media late last week, the senior official said.

"The president wasn't satisfied when he saw those pictures on TV," the official said, referring to photographs of Iraqi prisoners stripped naked and being abused. "And he made that clear to Secretary Rumsfeld. They should have been brought to his attention, and he shouldn't have had to learn of them through the media."

The official said Rumsfeld agreed with Bush that the manner in which the information reached the president was "not satisfactory."

However, Pentagon officials contended that Rumsfeld and defense officials moved swiftly to make the seriousness of the charges known within the administration and at news briefings. They said a senior Pentagon official confirmed to a reporter in January the possibility of graphic photographs.

"This was attacked very aggressively," said Pentagon spokesman Lawrence Di Rita. "The White House notification was a symptom that everyone knew this was important. I think there was a good understanding that this was a big deal."

The divergent views of how the Pentagon handled the crisis were unusual in an administration known for discouraging the appearance of dissent and came as Congress moved forward on investigations of the abuse at the U.S.-run Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad. Some lawmakers have suggested that Rumsfeld's future may be in doubt.

"If it goes all the way to Rumsfeld, then he should resign," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.). "Who is in charge?"

Even some congressional Republicans were angry with the Pentagon for failing to prepare them for the abuse revelations. Gathering GOP frustration raises the stakes for Rumsfeld, who is scheduled to testify Friday before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

A Rumsfeld resignation would have an enormous political downside, a senior House Republican aide said. It would be viewed as an admission of failure in the middle of a war and an embarrassing concession to Democratic critics during Bush's reelection campaign, the aide said.

A senior aide to the Senate Republican leadership said he did not think that animosity toward the Pentagon had reached the point that Republicans would call for Rumsfeld's resignation, but that there was a clear sense that "some heads should roll at the Pentagon."

Senate Republicans were angry not only that the Pentagon withheld information about the prison problem for months, but that Rumsfeld did not mention it when he appeared at a closed-door briefing of the Senate on the day that CBS first aired the photographs documenting the abusive treatment of Iraqi prisoners.

Some saw the Pentagon's handling of the matter as in keeping with what lawmakers viewed as a general disdain for sharing information with Congress and consulting with it on military matters.

"Hubris is a dangerous disease," said one senior member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The president reprimanded Rumsfeld at a White House meeting that had been previously scheduled to discuss a request for $25 billion in new funding for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, the senior administration official said.

"Secretary Rumsfeld was not summoned exclusively on this [prisoner abuse] issue. But it was the top issue when they met," the official said.

The White House and Pentagon differed not on factual accounts but over questions of whether the severity of the abuses had been made clear and whether the potential for worldwide uproar over the publication of the photographs had been anticipated and addressed.

The abuses took place in Iraq between October and December, and the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, appointed Maj. Gen. Antonio M. Taguba to undertake an investigation of problems Jan. 31.

Taguba said he and his investigators looked at photographs but did not include them in addenda to his report. At the time, a criminal investigation by the Army Criminal Investigation Command already had been initiated, Taguba said.

Rumsfeld said Wednesday that Pentagon officials first learned of the abuses Jan. 13. A senior defense official said Rumsfeld was told of them a day or so later.

About that time, in January, officials said, Rumsfeld mentioned the prisoner abuse investigation to Bush at a regularly scheduled White House meeting.

At that session, White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said Wednesday, Bush was satisfied after the defense secretary gave him "a general sense" of the allegations and assured him that "there was an investigation underway."

McClellan said that neither Bush nor White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. could remember the date on which Rumsfeld told the president of the allegations and the ensuing investigation. Di Rita also was unable to specify the date.

On Jan. 16, the U.S. Central Command in Baghdad announced in a five-sentence news release that an inquiry had begun into "reported" incidents of detainee abuse. Rumsfeld this week said the U.S. had "issued a press release to the world."

The Jan. 16 release did not name the prison or give any details of the incidents, saying only that the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority was "committed to treating all persons under its control with dignity, respect and humanity."

Bush evidently was unaware of the details of the unfolding investigation and apparently did not know that Air Force Gen. Richard B. Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, asked CBS last month to delay broadcast of its "60 Minutes II" segment on the abuses.

"The precise nature of what occurred only came to light more recently," McClellan said, referring to Bush's statement Wednesday during interviews with two Arabic-language TV channels that he had learned of the details from media reports.

Rumsfeld said this week that he, too, had not seen the disturbing photographs before they were broadcast last week. When he had asked about the photographs, Rumsfeld said, he was told by Pentagon officials, "We didn't have copies."

Several experts and presidential scholars said they were surprised that the White House and senior Bush advisors, mostly notably Rumsfeld, did not seek to preempt the impact of the CBS broadcast by getting the information out on their own terms.

"It's extremely surprising that, once the word was passed to Rumsfeld, he didn't tell the president and his team so they could prepare to defend themselves," said former White House advisor David Gergen, who has served presidents of both parties.

"An aggressive White House would have preempted CBS and gotten the stuff out and say, 'By God, we're going to clean it up.'" said Gergen, who teaches at Harvard University. "Instead, it looks as if they've been sitting on the pictures and the whole story. They've made it much worse by sitting on this."

A senior Pentagon official acknowledged that some things could have been "done better." The official said that before the photographs were broadcast, Pentagon officials could have made public statements about the case.

Senator BYRD. My question is, is a presidential apology to the King of Jordan sufficient?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Senator, I guess that's for the President and Congress and others to decide. There have been many apologies. There have been apologies by every person at this table today. Any suggestion that there is not a full, deep awareness of what has happened and the damage it has done, I think, would be a misunderstanding.

The report that we're talking about is sitting right there on the floor. It is—I don't know—what, 2-foot high?

Senator BYRD. Did you read it?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I read the executive summary, which is 50 to 75 pages, and I looked at some of the annexes and appendices and references. I have been briefed on it in full, as have the people at this table, and you can be certain of that.

Senator BYRD. The ICRC claims that it made reports of prisoner abuse in Iraq throughout 2003. I understand that those reports are confidential, by mutual agreement. Secretary Rumsfeld, how do we know that there isn't a broader problem here? We have heard reports of prisoner abuse from more than just the Abu Ghraib prison. Will you ask the ICRC to waive its confidentiality agreement on those reports, and make public all pertinent reports on U.S. military-run prison facilities, including those in Iraq, Afghanistan, Guantanamo, and elsewhere?

Secretary RUMSFELD. We will certainly be happy to provide the committee with all the reports that we have. I think the issue of the ICRC allowing one of their reports to be made public is an issue for them, because they worry that they will not be told the truth when they go into countries where there are dictatorships and where people are systematically punished and tortured, and people do not want to talk to them if the ICRC gets a reputation for making their report public. So we will be happy to give you our reports, on a confidential basis that is respectful of the ICRC's stipulations.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator BYRD. May I just follow with a postscript?

Chairman WARNER. All right, Senator.

Senator BYRD. With all due respect to you, the matter is far deeper than that. The American people need to know what's in those reports. When the ICRC supplies the DOD with those reports, Congress should have that material.

Secretary RUMSFELD. We'd be happy to give it to you.

Senator BYRD. Very well, thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you.

Senator Allard.

Senator ALLARD. Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to thank you for holding this committee hearing. I know there was some discussion about the format and everything, but I think it's the right thing to do to have this as an open hearing. I want to also thank the panel for agreeing to come here and testify before us in an open hearing. That's the strength of America, that we're willing to come out in a public manner and talk about our strengths and weaknesses, and lay out how we're going to deal with those. As somebody who has participated in this, I think that we are sending a good message to the world that we are open; that we are not a perfect people, but we do our best. I just wanted to make that statement before I asked any questions.

The thing that I heard in your testimony, Mr. Secretary—and I think it needs to be elaborated on—is this issue of command influence. I know that as the facts become evident, that prosecutors of misconduct in the military have a real concern about command influence. I would like you to elaborate more on that, or maybe some other panel members might elaborate on that, and how that might affect a case for prosecution. You mentioned you had six courts-martial, I believe, and I wondered if you would share that with the committee.

Secretary RUMSFELD. We are continuously advised by lawyers, counsels, that there are two issues that create a tension. One is the importance of having integrity in the criminal prosecution process, and that people in the chain of command that conceivably, over time, would be called upon to make a judgment about the decisions at the lower levels do not inject themselves into that process early or in a way that would lead people to believe that their comments were influencing the outcome of some of those criminal decisions or other decisions. Therefore, people in the chain are in a difficult position. To the extent we have a discussion like this about what's taken place, we can be certain that the defense counsels for these people who are being accused, and are going to be criminally prosecuted, will say that these hearings and this discussion had an influence on the case. We don't want to have that be the case, and that's why we're being careful in what we say.

The other side of the coin is, we don't want someone's rights to be infringed upon, someone who is a defendant and may be innocent. A process could lead to a situation where their rights would not be fully protected. So we do have to be careful.

Senator ALLARD. If there are six courts-martial now, do you anticipate there will be more courts-martial? Have any of those in command been indicted?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I checked, and last year we had something like 18,000 criminal investigations opened, and we ended up with 3,000 courts-martial. So, at any given time, with a large organization like the DOD, there is always something happening.

There is no way in the world I could anticipate. But the investigations are open, the investigators are determined, and, to the extent they find information that leads them to believe that a court-martial is indicated, or non-judicial punishment of other types, they certainly will do so. They understand the gravity of this.

Senator ALLARD. I want to follow up on the ICRC report. Were they given full access? What main issues did that report raise?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I have the report somewhere here, and I'd be happy to let you see it. I'm reluctant to start discussing it, but I can say what I already said, that they found a number of things that they were concerned about, as they always do. It's helpful, I must say. The people then began to read it, agree or disagree, and make the changes. When General Taguba came in and made his report, he indicated that a number of the issues that had been raised last year by the ICRC had, in fact, been corrected by the command structure between the time that they were observed by the ICRC and the time that General Taguba's team arrived on the scene.

Senator ALLARD. Mr. Chairman, my time is expired. I do have a written statement for the record.

[The prepared statement of Senator Allard follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT BY SENATOR WAYNE ALLARD

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Let me first join you in welcoming our witnesses this morning to discuss the troubling issue of prisoner abuse involving our Armed Forces.

I am deeply saddened and distressed over these allegations. When we commit our military to fight our country's wars, we fully expect each and every American soldier to serve as the model soldier-statesman, a standard bearer for people everywhere. Our American forces are to be feared for their unmatched effectiveness and valor in combat. More importantly, they are to be respected and valued for their humanitarian and compassionate conduct when carrying out their duties.

We are at a delicate phase now, introducing to the Afghans and Iraqis the promises of a democracy and the better times ahead. A major part of our difficulty is the fact that these people simply do not yet know what democracy holds for them—they have yet to experience the freedoms and justice that Americans take for granted.

Today, we rely on our Armed Forces to set this stage, to help these emerging democracies take root. What is so disturbing is that these allegations erode, to the core, the basic principles of liberty we so desperately need to instill and uphold across this region.

Based on my preliminary readings, Mr. Chairman, I don't believe we will uncover systemic problems in our military of wanton disregard for either the rule of law or general human rights. Rather, I believe the committee will see, in painful detail, a case study of the extraordinary damage that can occur when we experience such a disastrous breakdown in military leadership and discipline. It is of small consolation that there were many solid, upstanding soldiers in the middle of this leadership void that maintained their military bearing, sought command attention for these violations, and carried-on in accordance with the high professional standards we all expect.

I find it extremely unfortunate that the activities of so few are now overshadowing the extraordinary accomplishments of so many. I visited both Afghanistan and Iraq earlier this year, and got to see firsthand many of our 130,000 uniformed service men and women undertaking heroic public works projects. General Smith's Central Command is engaged in building mosques, schools, hospitals, roadways, water, and sewage facilities, and other critical infrastructure desperately needed across the region. Now, however, we have a small minority of apparently misled, misfit commanders and soldiers casting a negative light over what should be, and what I hope will ultimately be, a proud accomplishment for our forces.

Mr. Secretary and Chairman Myers, I understand the scope of your job and responsibilities are enormous. I believe that comprehensive remedies to this situation need to be among your top priorities. Let's get out in the open the relevant information and answers we need to close this issue soonest. Let's get the solutions and preventive measures identified and in place soonest. Let's get the few soldiers and commanders—those that let us all down—before the appropriate judicial process and punish the guilty accordingly.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator Lieberman.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Secretary, the behavior by Americans at the prison in Iraq is, as we all acknowledge, immoral, intolerable, and un-American. It deserves the apology that you have given today, as well as the apologies that have been given by others in high positions in our Government and our military.

I cannot help but say, however, that those who were responsible for killing 3,000 Americans on September 11, 2001, never apologized. Those who have killed hundreds of Americans in uniform in Iraq, working to liberate Iraq and protect our security, have never apologized. Those who murdered and burned and humiliated four Americans in Fallujah a while ago never gave an apology to anybody. Wrongs occurred here by the people in those pictures and perhaps by people up the chain of command.

But Americans are different. That's why we're outraged by this. That's why the apologies were due. That's why I hope, as we go about this investigation, we do it in a way that does not dishonor the hundreds of thousands of Americans in uniform who are a lot more like Pat Tillman and Americans that are not known, like Army National Guard Sergeant Felix del Greco, of Simsbury, Connecticut, who was killed in action a few weeks ago. We shall not dishonor their service or discredit the cause that brought us to send them to Iraq, because it remains one that is just and necessary.

We have to get to the whole truth here, and nothing but the truth. We can't be defensive. We have to be aggressive about it. As Senator McCain said, we have to do it quickly so that we and you and, most of all, our soldiers can get back to fighting and winning the war on terrorism with determination.

As far as I'm concerned, we do have to know how this happened, and we have to know it so we can stop it from happening ever again. You've said that the behavior of those soldiers was fundamentally un-American. I agree with you. This goes way back to the first American declaration, the Declaration of Independence, where we said that every human being has those rights as an endowment of our Creator. That even goes to human beings who have been apprehended by our military, as they have been in Iraq, because they are suspected of being part of the terrorists, of the jihadists, of the foreign fighters, of the Saddam loyalists, who are killing Americans and Iraqis every day.

We know that people are flawed, and that's why we believe in the rule of law, to try to make us better and punish those who fall below appropriate humane standards.

In that regard, it seems to me when it comes to the treatment of prisoners and detainees in conditions of combat, the Geneva Conventions, adopted by the United States as the law of the land—and that have been implemented by U.S. Army Regulation 190–8. You made some controversial statements early on, after Afghanistan, that said the Geneva Conventions were “not relevant here,” that, “by and large”—and I'm quoting generally—“American military interrogators or prison guards would try to carry out the rights of prisoners and detainees according to the Geneva Conventions.” But I want to ask you today, as you look back to that, do you think you were right? Did anything replace the rules of the Geneva Conventions in Army Regulation 190–8? If not, why not?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Senator, the President of the United States made a determination in early 2002 that the Geneva Conventions’ provisions did not apply to our conflict with al Qaeda, although he concluded that Geneva Conventions did apply to the conflict with the Taliban. That was a decision by the President. He determined that Taliban detainees did not qualify as POWs under the third Geneva Convention criteria for POWs. He also made clear that it was, and will continue to be, America’s policy to treat detainees humanely and in a manner that was consistent with the Geneva Conventions. So the people were treated consistent to the Geneva Conventions, but he made a distinction with respect to al Qaeda.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Are these detainees, do you assume, members of al Qaeda? That is, the thousands that have been held in Iraq? Or are they in another status?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Oh, no, the President announced from the outset that everyone in Iraq who was a military person and was detained is a POW, and, therefore, the Geneva Conventions apply. Second, the decision was made that the civilians or criminal elements that are detainees are also treated subject to the Geneva Conventions, although it’s a different element of it. I think it’s the fourth instead of the third.

Senator LIEBERMAN. I appreciate that clarification, because I was not aware of that. Then you would say that all those held in prison, including those who were abused here, had the rights of POWs under the Geneva Conventions.

General MYERS. Absolutely.

[Clarifying information from the DOD follows:]

All detainees held in Iraq are protected under the Geneva Conventions. Enemy POWs are covered under Geneva Convention III. Civilians are protected under Geneva Convention IV. Those pictured in the photographs from Abu Ghraib are believed to be civilians.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Therefore, the fault clearly was that those we’ve seen, and hopefully not others, were either not properly trained, properly disciplined, or, in any case, not observing the law of the United States of America with regard to the rights of POWs.

General MYERS. If I may, I think that’s exactly right. It’s aberrant behavior. The Taguba Report, if you recall, looked at four installations where the 800th MP Brigade had operations. They found abuse in only one, and that’s Abu Ghraib. They found abuse in one.

Senator LIEBERMAN. My time’s up. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator Sessions.

Senator SESSIONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

These are, indeed, actions that go against the very core values of America. I want to say, however, that I believe the military responded properly immediately. I want to join with Senator Lieberman’s courageous and strong comments about how we do not need to dishonor the soldiers out there this very day, at risk of their lives, withholding firing weapons, being in hostile situations, taking chances with their own lives to protect the people of Iraq.

Yes, this is a serious problem, and we need to do something about it. Those who dishonored those soldiers need to be punished. But I feel very strongly that the military deserves a lot of credit here, and I want to go over this chart, General Myers, that you have there.

First, I want to say to Secretary Rumsfeld and all of you there, thank you for your leadership. Yes, you have some complainers in Congress, but we voted to send our soldiers to this effort. Nobody else authorized you to go. We voted to support it. I would also note that the terrorists aren't happy with you, either. I saw they put a $15 million bounty on your head, along with General Kimmitt and General Sanchez. I thank you for that service.

General MYERS. Senator Sessions, you want me to go through the—Senator SESSIONS. I would just like to ask you a little bit about it, because our time is short.

General MYERS. Right.

Senator SESSIONS. As I see it, back in August of last year you appointed an assessment team. Is that right? Long before this occurred.

General MYERS. Right. As I said in my opening statement, I think we ought to have a lot of confidence in our military leadership handling the detention situation in Iraq. It was on August 11 that General Sanchez was worried about detention and interrogation operations, and that resulted in General Miller going over there and submitting a report.

We pushed General Miller on them in August 2003 because he was so successful in Guantanamo—to look at our detention operations to make sure that we're doing it right, and also that it's well connected, that the intelligence is getting to the analysts and so forth, so we can win this.

Senator SESSIONS. Now, was this in response to any incident or was it on your own initiative?

General MYERS. That was our own initiative. That was a discussion between the Secretary and myself and our staffs.

You can see from the chart when the abuse took place. We were told of the abuse on January 13, 2004. The next day, the Army police, the CID, went on that particular case. We talked about the press.

Senator SESSIONS. No, let's slow down. On January 14, you started a criminal investigation based on the complaint of one soldier.

General MYERS. They did.

Senator SESSIONS. On January 16, Major General Kimmitt briefed the world about the investigation commencing. Is that correct?

General MYERS. Right, and he talked about abuse. As I remember it, he said there may be pictures involved with this abuse, as well. Then it was 3 days later where General Sanchez—based on that criminal investigation he had started—asked for an investigating officer who turned out to be General Taguba. The general was asked to look at this MP brigade that was responsible for detention operations in Abu Ghraib and those three other locations.

I know we need to do things quickly with full disclosure and everything. But this 15–6 Report, the Taguba Report, can result in administrative actions such as relief from command and other administrative admonishments to military personnel. So it has to be very thorough. That's why you'll see it was requested on January 16. It was not approved by General Sanchez until May 1. As you go through the various chains, the people that are implicated in wrongdoing have a chance to look at the report and rebut the report. That's part of this process that I think we owe it to our troops to uphold.

Senator SESSIONS. But, General Myers, on January 18, according to that chart, the 320th MP Battalion had leadership suspended. Is that correct?

General MYERS. That's correct.

Senator SESSIONS. That's a pretty dramatic action to take, is it not?

General MYERS. It is. But the first look by the Army CID, I think, gave them indications that things were not right.

Senator SESSIONS. Now, this wasn't by any pressure from the media or anyone else; this was the military's own decision that their high standards had been violated, and that strong actions should be taken.

General MYERS. This was General Abizaid, General Sanchez, and their folks, absolutely.

Senator SESSIONS. I know some on this committee have complained when you took strong action against the brigade commander publicly, the soldier who fired a weapon as part of an interrogation effort. He had a fine record. You took strong action on that case, and some of us in Congress complained you were too tough.

General MYERS. The standards are the standards, Senator.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator SESSIONS. We thank you for your service, all of you.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Reed?

Senator REED. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Let me begin by stating the obvious. For the next 50 years, in the Islamic world and many other parts of the world, the image of the United States will be that of an American dragging a prostrate, naked Iraqi across the floor on a leash. This is unfair to the honor and the courage to our soldiers, but, unfortunately, I think it's become a fact. This is disastrous.

Mr. Secretary, let me follow up on your proposed commission. As I understand your comments, this commission, or this group of people, will not have the authority to call witnesses to obtain material independent of your investigation. They will simply review what you're doing?

Secretary RUMSFELD. We will be happy to give you a copy of the draft charge to the individuals. They will have, I can assure you, the absolute full cooperation of the DOD.

Various organizations of the Department of Defense have investigated, or will investigate, various aspects of allegations of abuse at DoD Detention Facilities and other matters related to detention operations. Thus far these inquiries include the following:

- Criminal investigations into individual allegations
- Army Provost Marshal General assessment of detention and corrections operations in Iraq
- Joint Task Force Guantanamo assistance visit to Iraq to assess intelligence operations
- Administrative Investigation under AR 15-6 regarding Abu Ghraib operations

- Army Inspector General assessment of doctrine and training for detention operations
- Commander, Joint Task Force-7 review of activities of military intelligence personnel at Abu Ghraib
- Army Reserve Command Inspector General assessment of training of Reserve units regarding military intelligence and military police
- Naval Inspector General review of detention procedures at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the Naval Consolidated Brig, Charleston, South Carolina

I have been or will have been briefed on the results of these inquiries and the corrective actions taken by responsible officials within the Department.

It would be helpful to me to have your independent, professional advice on the issues that you consider most pertinent related to the various allegations, based on your review of completed and pending investigative reports and other materials and information. I am especially interested in your views on the cause of the problems and what should be done to fix them. Issues such as force structure, training of regular and reserve personnel, use of contractors, organization, detention policy and procedures, interrogation policy and procedures, the relationship between detention and interrogation, compliance with the Geneva Conventions, relationship with the International Committee of the Red Cross, command relationships, and operational practices may be contributing factors you might wish to review. Issues of personal accountability will be resolved through established military justice and administrative procedures, although any information you may develop will be welcome.

I would like your independent advice orally and in writing, preferably within 45 days after you begin your review. DoD personnel will collect information for your review and assist you as you deem appropriate. You are to have access to all relevant DoD investigations and other DoD information unless prohibited by law. Reviewing all written material relevant to these issues may be sufficient to allow you to provide your advice. Should you believe it necessary to travel or conduct interviews, the Director of Administration and Management will make appropriate arrangements.

I intend to provide your report to the Committees on Armed Services, the Secretaries of the Military Departments, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Commanders of the Combatant Commands, the Directors of the Defense Agencies and others as appropriate. If your report contains classified information, please also provide an unclassified version suitable for public release.

By copy of this memorandum, I request the Director of Administration and Management to secure the necessary technical, administrative and legal support for your review from the Department of Defense Components. I appoint you as full-time Employees of this Department without pay under 10 U.S.C. Article 1583. I request all Department of Defense personnel to cooperate fully with your review and to make available all relevant documents and information at your request.

Signed //Donald H. Rumsfeld//

Senator REED. Will they have the opportunity to call individuals to testify?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Indeed.

Senator REED. Thank you.

Secretary RUMSFELD. I wouldn't use the word "testify," but certainly they can call individuals.

Senator REED. Mr. Secretary, the Taguba Report indicated the principle focus of Major General Miller's team was on the strategic interrogation of detainees in Iraq. Among its conclusions in its executive summary was that CJTF-7 did not have authorities and procedures in place to effect a unified strategy to detain, interrogate, and report information from detainees/internees in Iraq. The executive summary also stated that detention operations must act as an enabler for interrogation.

Major General Miller was involved with Guantanamo, a DOD operation in another theater. He was sent to Iraq. I don't think major generals in the United States Army make up policies about strategic interrogation of detainees unless they've coordinated and communicated to the higher headquarters. Did you ever see, approve, or encourage this policy of enabling for interrogation? Did Secretary Cambone ever see, approve, or encourage this policy at either facility?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I don't recall that a policy came to me for approval. I think that what we have known since September 11 is that we had three issues with respect to people that were detained. One issue was to get them off the street so they can't kill again—more innocent men, women, and children. A second was the question of criminal prosecution for wrongdoing. The third was to interrogate and see if additional information could be found that could prevent future terrorist acts against our country or our forces or our friends and allies. So all of those things have been parts of it since the beginning. They're different functions, as you point out.

Senator REED. Is that Secretary Cambone's view, too? Did he either see, approve, or encourage—he's behind you. Can he respond?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Sure he can respond.

Mr. CAMBONE. Sir, the original—

Chairman WARNER. Would you identify yourself for the record, please?

Mr. CAMBONE. Yes, sir. My name is Steve Cambone. I'm the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence, Senator.

The original effort by Major General Miller was done with respect to Guantanamo, and had to do with, in fact, whether or not we had the proper arrangements in the facilities in order to be able to gain the kind of intelligence we were looking from those prisoners in Guantanamo. We had then, in Iraq, a large body of people who had been captured on the battlefield that we had to gain intelligence from for force-protection purposes, and he was asked to go over, at my encouragement, to take a look at the situation as it existed there. He made his recommendations.

Senator REED. Were the recommendations made to you, Mr. Secretary? Did you approve them?

Mr. CAMBONE. To me directly? No. They were made to the command.

Senator REED. But you were aware of the recommendations about enabling interrogation?

Mr. CAMBONE. I was aware of those recommendations. I was aware that he made the recommendation that we get a better coordination between those who are being held and those who were being interrogated.

Senator REED. Mr. Secretary, were you aware that a specific recommendation was to use MPs to enable an interrogation process?

Mr. CAMBONE. In that precise language, no; but I knew that we were trying to get to the point where we were assuring that when they were in the general population, those that were under confinement were not undermining the interrogation process.

Senator REED. So this was Major General Miller's own policy?

Mr. CAMBONE. No, sir, it was not a policy; it was a recommendation that he made to the command.

Senator REED. So General Sanchez adopted this policy, making it a policy of the United States Army and the DOD, without consultation with you on any specific—

Mr. CAMBONE. Sir, I don't think that's a proper rendering of it.

Senator REED. I don't know what the proper rendering is, but that seems to be at the core of this issue. Were you encouraging a policy that had MP officers enabling interrogations, which created the situation where these—

Mr. CAMBONE. No, sir.

Secretary RUMSFELD. May I comment? I think it is probably best put this way. They are different responsibilities, detaining and interrogating. However, they do need to be looked at together. They found, in Guantanamo, that how they are detained, in terms of the rhythm of their lives, can affect the interrogation process. So the linkage between the two is desirable if, in fact, you're concerned about finding more information that can prevent additional terrorist acts or, in the case of Iraq, the killing of our forces. So it's important that there be a linkage, a relationship. The way it can be put is that it has a bad connotation. Goodness knows, that's not desirable or a policy that General Miller would have recommended.

On the other hand, it can—

Senator REED. The policy seems to be to link—

Chairman WARNER. Senator, I have to ask if you would require the witnesses to provide further responses for the record.

Senator REED. Mr. Chairman, I will certainly ask for additional responses.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator REED. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Collins.

Senator COLLINS. Mr. Secretary, the vast majority of American troops performed their duties with compassion, fairness, and courage. This abuse makes the tasks which they've been assigned far more difficult and far more dangerous, and that troubles me greatly. Worst of all, our Nation, a Nation that, to a degree unprecedented in human history, has sacrificed its blood and treasure to secure liberty and human rights around the world, now must try to convince the world that the horrific images on their TV screens and front pages are not the real America, that what they see is not who we are.

That is why, Mr. Secretary, I'm so troubled by the Pentagon's failure to come forward to fully disclose this appalling abuse, to express outrage and concern, and to outline swift, tough, corrective actions. I believe that had you done that, it would have mitigated somewhat how this abuse has been perceived around the world, particularly in the Muslim communities. I'm not talking about issuing a press release from Baghdad. I'm talking about you personally coming forward and telling the world what you knew about this abuse.

In retrospect, do you believe that you erred in not coming forward, not just to the President and Congress—you've made very clear today that you regret not doing that—but to the world community? Would it have made a difference if it had been the Pentagon itself that had disclosed the full extent of this abuse, whatever you knew, and what actions you were going to take?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I think in my statement I responded in full to your question. I would characterize what was done in CENTCOM, by way of swift corrective action, as being just that—swift corrective action.

Second, I don't know quite how to respond to your question. The DOD announced that abuse was being charged, there were criminal investigations underway. No one had seen the photographs. They were part of a criminal investigation, and I say no one in the Pentagon had seen them. They were part of that CENTCOM investigative process. It is the photographs that give one the vivid realization of what actually took place. Words don't do it. The words that there were abuses, that it was cruel, that it was inhumane, all of which is true—that it was blatant—you read that, and it's one thing. You see the photographs, and you get a sense of it, and you cannot help but be outraged.

There are, at any given time, in the DOD, these 3,000 courts-martial underway—general courts-martial, some 1,200; criminal investigations, 18,000 last year. The importance of protecting the people charged, protecting their rights, and the importance of seeing that if, in fact, they're guilty, they don't get off because of command influence—so there's a pattern of not reaching down into those things, bringing them up, and looking at all the evidence before it ever arrives. In this case, it was released to the press.

Now, we announced the problem to the press. We did not release the Taguba Report to the press. That was done by someone, to release, against the law, a secret document. That's how it surprised everyone. It shocked Congress. It shocked me. It shocked the President. It shocked the country.

But to suggest that they had not taken tough, swift, corrective actions in CENTCOM, it seems to me is inconsistent with what took place.

Senator COLLINS. Mr. Secretary, that's not what I said. What I said is—and I have no doubt that the military is committed to swift corrective action—it's the disclosure of the abuse, and the promise to take those actions. That's where I feel the Pentagon fell short. I think that rather than calling CBS and asking for a delay in the airing of the pictures, it would have been far better if you, Mr. Secretary, with all respect, had come forward and told the world about these pictures and of your personal determination—a determination I know you have—to set matters right and to hold those responsible accountable.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Senator Collins, I wish I had done that, as I said in my remarks. We have to find a better way to do it, but I wish I knew how you reach down into a criminal investigation when it is not just a criminal investigation, but it turns out to be something that is radioactive, something that has strategic impact in the world. We don't have those procedures. They've never been designed. We're functioning with peacetime constraints, with legal requirements, in a wartime situation, in the information age where people are running around with digital cameras and taking these unbelievable photographs, and then passing them off, against the law, to the media, to our surprise, when they had not even arrived in the Pentagon. There isn't a person at this table, except General Smith, who had even seen them.

Chairman WARNER. You're free to amplify that for the record, if you wish, Mr. Secretary.

Senator Akaka.

Secretary Rumsfeld. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Secretary Rumsfeld, according to General Taguba's report, civilian contractors were found wandering around Abu Ghraib unsupervised and with free access to the detainee areas. I have two questions on that. What are the roles of the private contractors at this and other detention facilities in Iraq and Afghanistan? Who monitors and supervises these contracted employees?

Secretary RUMSFELD. The answer is that the civilian contractors, as I indicated, numbered something like 37 in this particular facility. They tend to be interrogators and linguists. They're responsible to MI personnel who hire them and have the responsibility for supervising them.

Mr. BROWNLEE. Sir, if I might?

Senator AKAKA. Secretary Brownlee.

Mr. BROWNLEE. In the theater, we have employed civilian contract interrogators and linguists. CENTCOM has done this. These people have no supervisory responsibilities at all. They work under the supervision of officers or noncommissioned officers (NCOs) in charge of whatever team or unit they are on. They, most of them, are retired military, and they are usually of the skill that they retired in, and that's what they're employed for. They assist in these processes, but they are not in a supervisory role. In fact, they would be forbidden from doing that, because it would be inherently governmental.

General SMITH. Sir, I might add to that. In this particular case, there is a "tiger team" that interrogates and goes through that process. One is an interpreter, normally; one is an analyst; and one is an interrogator. Where we have shortages in the military of interrogators and translators, we go to contractors to do that.

I gave the wrong numbers. The number of contractors we have with CACI for interrogators is 27. Then we have hundreds of translators that are under contract throughout the country, under Titan Corporation.

Senator AKAKA. Secretary Rumsfeld, the alleged abuse at this detention facility has been characterized as sadistic, blatant, wanton, and criminal abuse. So far, we have discussed allegations against military members. Are there allegations of abuse against contractors who are working with the military members? If so, are any of these allegations being investigated?

Secretary RUMSFELD. My recollection is—and I think it's okay to say this—that the investigations are ongoing, and that time will tell.

Go ahead, General.

[Clarifying information from the DOD follows:]

David Passaro, a CIA contractor, was indicted Thursday, June 17, 2004, in connection with the beating death of a prisoner in Afghanistan. Passaro is the first civilian to face criminal charges related to U.S. treatment of prisoners in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Information on two other CACI contractors (Steve Stepanowicz and John Israel) has been forwarded to the U.S. Attorney General's Office by the U.S. Army CID to determine whether evidence supports criminal charges against these two contractors.

An ongoing investigation is reviewing the MI operations and includes a review of the actions of civilian contractors involved in interrogation activities.

General SMITH. Yes, sir. There are two contractors that are being investigated under the investigation for the MI brigade, and that is from the recommendation of the Taguba Report.

Senator AKAKA. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I recently traveled to Iraq and Afghanistan, and I was so impressed with the professionalism of the men and women serving in our military who I had the opportunity to meet. I want to say that I am really proud of what they are doing there.

General Myers, General Taguba's AR 15-6 Report finds a general lack of knowledge, implementation, and emphasis of basic legal, regulatory, doctrinal, and command requirements within the 800th MP brigade and its subordinate units. Understanding that there is an issue with authority between the MP and MI units at Abu Ghraib, how is it that an entire brigade could be deployed to Iraq and not train for their mission?

Chairman WARNER. Senator, I'll have to ask that General Myers provide his response for the record.

Chairman WARNER. I thank you for your cooperation.

Senator AKAKA. Thank you very much. Mr. Chairman, I have a written statement that I would like to submit for the record.

Thank you for your responses.

[The prepared statement of Senator Akaka follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT BY SENATOR DANIEL K. AKAKA

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to take this opportunity to express my thoughts regarding the deplorable acts committed by soldiers at the Abu Ghraib prison. The graphic and disturbing acts that are depicted in these pictures are inexcusable. These actions have tarnished the heroic and patriotic acts performed by so many of our military members during this difficult war.

I recently traveled to Iraq and Afghanistan. I was so impressed with the professionalism exhibited by the men and women serving in our military who I had the opportunity to meet. Unfortunately, the rest of the world and the Nation will not see or hear about these outstanding individuals. Instead these pictures published on the front pages of newspapers around the world depict our military members as thugs.

This outcry has been exacerbated by the manner in which this situation has been handled. Members of Congress, even the President, according to media reports, learned about this situation from Dan Rather when "60 Minutes II" broadcast this story. I find this cloud of secrecy that continues to permeate the Department of Defense (DOD) disturbing and destructive. I find this cavalier attitude towards accountability and transparency to be a dereliction of duty and an abrogation of military and civilian control over the "post-war" situation.

I find it amazing that Secretary Rumsfeld stated as late as Monday, May 3, 2004, that he had not yet read the AR 15-6 Report written by Major General Antonio Taguba which was submitted in March 2004. I find it unconscionable that soldiers being deployed to a war zone would not be provided with proper training pertaining to the treatment of detainees under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) and the Geneva Conventions.

I am troubled by the apparent lack of accountability by DOD leadership. In my opinion, for these soldiers to be so cavalier and nonchalant as depicted in these photos, which had to have been taken by other detention facility personnel, tells me that such behavior was widespread and condoned in this prison.

I remain concerned with the lack of supervision and discipline in this brigade and even more concerned with the unsupervised and unlimited access private contractors had inside this facility. I remain disturbed by the dismissive attitude exhibited by the civilian leadership in the Pentagon towards this situation which has undermined our military and damaged our country's reputation.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Graham is next.

Senator GRAHAM. Mr. Secretary, have you seen the video?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I have not. The disk I saw that had photos on it did not have the videos on it. I checked with General Smith, and he indicates he does have a disk with the videos on it. I don't know if that means there are two disks with all these photographs, or if the photographs are the same, and one just doesn't have the video.

Senator GRAHAM. I mention that because I want to prepare the public. Apparently the worst is yet to come, potentially, in terms of disturbing events. We don't need to leave here thinking that we've seen the worst. There's more to come. Is that correct?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I indicated in my remarks that there are a lot more pictures and many investigations underway.

Senator GRAHAM. My colleagues, rightly, want it done quickly, but my concern is to do it right. I don't want to rush to judgment here and let some people go that deserve to be prosecuted. I would be very disappointed if the only people prosecuted are sergeants and privates. That would be very bad, and sad. So I want it done right, and the sooner, the better. I'll pick right over sooner.

I'm confused. General Smith, when did you first learn of these photos and see them yourself?

General SMITH. Sir, we knew that there were photos on January 14, because that's how the investigation started.

Senator GRAHAM. When did you see the photos?

General SMITH. CENTCOM headquarters received the photos towards the end of March. I first viewed the photos on May 6.

Senator GRAHAM. Who did you tell about the photos when you saw them?

General SMITH. Sir, that was part of the investigation, and that went forward.

Senator GRAHAM. Did it dawn on you that, when you saw these photos, "We're in a world of hurt. This is going to look bad"?

General SMITH. Certainly, sir. If those were released, we certainly—

Senator GRAHAM. General Myers, when you called CBS, had you seen the photos?

General MYERS. No, I hadn't.

Senator GRAHAM. What had you been told about what CBS was about to air, and by who?

General MYERS. They were going to air the photos. We didn't talk about that with CBS. In our discussions back in January, when they said there were photos, they described them up through the chain of command to the Secretary, and I just happened to be there. It was discussed several times. The general nature of the photos, about nudity, some mock sexual acts, and other abuse, was described.

Senator GRAHAM. When you were informed that these photos, even though you hadn't seen them, were going to come out, who did you tell about that, and when?

General MYERS. There were a lot of people that knew, inside our building. The people that had been working with the media knew that there were photos out there, and the media was trying to get their hands on them from January on. So they had been working that for 3 months.

Senator GRAHAM. At that time, is it fair to say you knew there was a story about to come out that was going to create a real problem for us?

General MYERS. At that time, my concern was the impact it could have on our forces in Iraq. My focus at the time was, if these photos are revealed right now, given the intensity of operations, what could be that impact on our troops? My conclusion was, this would be the worst of all possible times for these to come forward; realizing that eventually they were going to come forward.

Senator GRAHAM. Did you feel a need to inform Congress or the President or the Secretary of Defense about the potential damage this could do?

General MYERS. We had discussed the potential damage back in January, February, and March. As we marched through those events on that chart, a lot of those events were based on our concern with where this might lead.

Senator GRAHAM. Long story short, I do trust the people in uniform to get it right, and I want to take the time necessary to make sure the people who are responsible are brought to justice, and anybody innocently accused has their day in court. You are right about that, Secretary Rumsfeld.

Here's the problem. It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out the explosive nature of these photos, apart from court-martial, apart from legal proceedings. Most of us here found out about it on television. If we knew enough to say, "Don't air a show that's going to be bad," why did we not call the President and call senior Members of Congress to prepare us for what we were eventually going to see? That's the essence of my concern about all this.

General MYERS. Senator Graham, in my opinion we could have done a better job of informing Congress of these pictures and this situation.

Senator GRAHAM. That is a honest and fair answer.

Secretary Rumsfeld, people are calling for your resignation. Somebody is drafting an article of impeachment against you right now. I have my own view about people who want to call for your resignation before you speak, but I'll leave that to myself. Do you have the ability, in your opinion, to come to Capitol Hill and carry the message and carry the water for the DOD? Do you believe, based on all the things that have happened and that will happen, that you're able to carry out your duties in a bipartisan manner? What do you say to those people who are calling for your resignation?

Secretary RUMSFELD. It's a fair question. Certainly, since this firestorm has been raging, it's a question that I've given a lot of thought to. The key question for me is the one you posed, and that is whether or not I can be effective. We have tough tasks ahead. The people in the DOD, military and civilian, are doing enormously important work here, in countries all over the world. The issue is, can I be effective in assisting them in their important tasks? Needless to say, if I felt I could not be effective, I'd resign in a minute. I would not resign simply because people try to make a political issue out of it.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, gentlemen.

Senator Bill Nelson.

Senator BILL NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Secretary, when did you first see the photos?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Last night, at about 7:30. I had seen the ones in the press, I had seen the ones that are doctored slightly to suit people's taste. We had been trying to get one of the disks for days and days and days, and I'm told, by General Smith, that there were only a couple of these, that they were in the criminal investigation process. Dick Myers and I finally saw them last night.

Senator BILL NELSON. Mr. Secretary, when did you first find out about the abuses?

Secretary RUMSFELD. With everybody else, when they were announced by CENTCOM on January 16. They announced that they had a series of criminal investigations underway. They told the world, Congress, me, everyone else, that they were underway. Then they came back March 20 and said, "Not only are they underway, but now we have specific charges." Then they detailed some abuses. You read it, as I said, and it's one thing; you see these photographs, and it's just unbelievable.

Senator BILL NELSON. When did you first tell the President, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I don't know. Dick Myers and I see the President every week, and he recalls that sometime after we were apprised of it through the press, through CENTCOM's announcement, that it was brought up in one of our meetings. Do you recall?

General MYERS. I don't recall specifically, because I think the day it was brought up it was General Pete Pace that was standing in for me. But he remembers roughly when it was, within a week or so of when he was in that meeting and informed the President. They talked about it.

Senator BILL NELSON. Was this back in January, Mr. Secretary?

General MYERS. I think General Pace would say early February. It could have been late January.

Secretary RUMSFELD. I meet with the President once or twice a week. We cover 8, 10, 15 different points. General Myers or General Pace are generally there with me. I don't keep notes about what I do, and I just don't remember when it was.

Senator BILL NELSON. When you all had this discussion with the President, what did the President say that you should do about those abuses?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I don't know that I'm going to get into private discussions with the President. If I don't remember when it was, my guess is it was more an information item from us to him, where we were transmitting and saying, "Here's the problem." The problem, at that stage, was one-dimensional; it wasn't three-dimensional, it wasn't video, it wasn't color. It was quite a different thing.

As I indicated in my remarks, if there's a failure, it is me. It is my failure for not understanding and knowing that there were however many there are of these things that could eventually end up in the public and do the damage they've done. But I certainly never gave the President a briefing with the impact that one would have had, had you seen the photographs or the videos. Let there be no doubt about that. He was just as blindsided as Congress and me and everyone else.

Senator BILL NELSON. Mr. Secretary, what are your instructions from the President to inform him of matters such as this?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I don't know that I'm going to—we have had so many discussions, and clearly a Secretary of Defense has the responsibility to try to put himself in the shoes of the President and say, "What ought a President know about all the tens of thousands of things that are happening in the DOD at any given time?" We sit down every week, and General Myers and I go through all the things that we have going on, and we pick and choose. We say, "What are the things that are appropriate? What do we owe him so that he can provide the kind of leadership that this country deserves? What is it that the Department's doing now that we can get in his head and apprise him of so that he knows about that?" It may be a contingency plan, it may be a problem of personnel. It just runs the gamut.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Dole.

Senator DOLE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I certainly want to echo the sentiments of my colleagues and the American people by saying that I am extremely disappointed that any American, and especially one in uniform, would mistreat or humiliate another human being and commit such atrocious acts.

The acts depicted in those photographs shown around the world do not, in any way, represent the values of the United States of America or our Armed Forces. I know our military men and women serve their country with great honor.

The abuse of these Iraqi detainees is a serious issue, not just because it violated human rights; it also tarnished our Nation's credibility. Furthermore, the inflammatory actions of a few have provided our enemies with a lucrative venue to question American values and our true intentions in the war on terror. Unfortunately, a breakdown of discipline, combined with a handful of morally deficient individuals, has resulted in serious implications for our national security and the security of over 130,000 service members striving to accomplish our goals in Iraq.

Over the past year, through dedication and sacrifice and, I must emphasize, strong military leadership, our soldiers have made incredible breakthroughs. The United States and its allies have freed 50 million people from oppressive regimes, removed credible threats to our Nation's security, destroyed burgeoning terrorist incubators, and set two countries on the path to democratic and free market reform. In Iraq, 2,600 schools have been rehabilitated, and now more than 5½ million children are enriching their minds, free from the corruption of a repressive regime and its teachings.

Women now have a voice in their own government. All 240 hospitals in Iraq are open. More than 1,200 clinics have been established. On the streets and in the countryside each day, our military medical professionals offer assistance to the citizens of Iraq, in addition to caring for their own. After 30 years of being denied the most fundamental freedoms, today more than 170 independent newspapers are operating throughout Iraq, providing each member of that country an opportunity to participate in free and robust debate, and, yes, the opportunity to view those horrendous pictures.

Trust among the Iraqi people had slowly been established, bonds have been made, and, sadly for now, many of those bonds have been broken. This legislative body is absolutely correct in focusing on the root causes behind these instances of prisoner abuse, and doing everything within its power to ensure that such abuse never happens again. I would expect no less from the DOD. Transparency is of the utmost importance to our Nation's credibility and security.

Fundamental to our success in the global war on terror is winning the hearts and minds of freedom-loving people who are held captive by a violent few. We are not company to that violent element, and we denounce anyone who is.

Secretary Rumsfeld, the damage already done cannot be swept away, but it can be repaired. You touched briefly on your plan for a way ahead. Could you go into more detail on this plan? Will it require more or different troops, quicker processing of detainees, more Iraqi police involvement? You mentioned reparations. Could you please provide more details?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I don't think I used the word "reparations." I hope I used the word "compensation" for the detainees who were cruelly treated. I am told that we have lawyers who have looked into it, and we believe there are authorities where we can do that. It is my intention to see that we do it, because it is the right thing to do.

With respect to the processing of detainees, in Iraq a total of 43,671 were captured. We have released 27,796, and transferred 4,054. We currently detain something in the neighborhood of 11,821, which includes 3,842 of the so-called Majahedim-e Khalq Organization (MEK), who are really not detainees. They are in a separate status. So it's really closer to 7,000 or 8,000 that are currently detained.

The key is to process them as rapidly as possible. General Miller, who was out there and has been addressing all of these things, also believes a key element is to see that they are properly identified, and that their families know they're there, and why they're there, and that it isn't mysterious, and that we continue to process them. The only people that need to be retained, obviously, are the ones that are either criminals—and that's a different category, and a number of them are—or they are individuals who are terrorists and need to be kept off the street, or they have intelligence value. The people have to find out what it is they know so we can track down the remaining remnants of the Baathist regime and the Fedayeen Saddam people, and the people that are out killing Iraqis—not just Americans and coalition people, but are killing Iraqis every single day in that country.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator DOLE. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Ben Nelson.

Senator BEN NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Mr. Secretary and gentlemen, for being here today.

First of all, I appreciate the apologies. Clearly, the President's apology, I think, is an important step in moving forward, as are the apologies of all of you today, and, I think, the apology of the American people, for these unfortunate incidents.

I agree with my colleague from Connecticut that what this represents is so unfortunate that it somehow would adversely impact on the lives and the deaths of those who have served with such distinction for freedom in Iraq.

Last night, I heard Secretary Armitage say that, "We're in a bit of a hole." I think those are exact words. When you're in a hole, the first thing you have to do is stop digging. I hope that we have now gotten to the point where we've stopped digging, where we're not making matters worse.

Mr. Secretary, you're right when you say there are times when words just simply don't do it justice. Pictures, and perhaps symbols, are more important for expressing or conveying thoughts or images. In this case, I think tearing down the statue of Saddam, statues all over Iraq, was a symbolic gesture to say that there was a new era. I wonder if it wouldn't be just as important to join together to tear down Abu Ghraib as a statement that the torture chamber of Saddam that carried forth past and present is no longer, and create a memorial to freedom in the future, and the absence of tyranny of any kind.

But what I want to do is, I want to get to a question dealing with what seems to be an operative word today: "the few." I think perhaps there are sergeants and privates, as Senator Graham indicated, who have been involved in this activity. Obviously, the chain of command would be under consideration here. Criminal action will be taken. I suspect responsible action will be taken, in terms of the chain of command.

Is it the aberrant behavior of a few, or can we expect to have, out of the investigation, an indication that there was something more systemic? I know that we have a two-star Reserve general who has been in some way removed from duty, but isn't there, to date, some expectation that there was a severing of the chain of command somewhere along the line, through MI or other intelligence operations coming in? It's my understanding that there are reports that General Karpinski was banned from sections of her own prison system.

I am hopeful that we'll be able to get to the bottom of that with the reports. In the interim, is there anything that you might be able to enlighten us with right now?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Let me answer a couple of pieces, and let General Smith answer the last piece.

First, you say the first rule if you're in a hole is to stop digging. I've said today that there are a lot more photographs and videos that exist.

Senator BEN NELSON. I didn't mean that. Is anything progressing on today, beyond what we already know or what we're going to find out from past performance?

Secretary RUMSFELD. If these are released to the public, obviously it's going to make matters worse. That's just a fact. I looked at them last night, and they're hard to believe. So, be on notice. That's just a fact. If they're sent to some news organization, and taken out of the criminal prosecution channels that they're in, that's where we'll be, and it's not a pretty picture.

Second, there are people who were talking about the Abu Ghraib prison and tearing it down, and certainly that's something that the CPA and the Iraqi Governing Council (IGC) and the Iraqi government, the interim government that will take over by June 30, will be addressing and deciding. Frankly, from my standpoint, I think it's not a bad idea, but it's really up to the Iraqis.

Senator BEN NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Mr. Secretary.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Cornyn.

Senator CORNYN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Secretary, listening to the questions and the answers that have been given so far leads me to at least tentatively conclude that there are two major problems here. One is, first, the shock to our collective conscience at what we have seen human beings do to degrade and abuse other human beings. Second, the shock to our sensibilities as Members of Congress who have a collective responsibility to the American people, to see these pictures in the press. I believe that it was General Myers who talked about what we have seen as being a violation of American values. I agree with that, but I also want to talk about other American values. General Myers alluded to this when he talked about due process, and you mentioned the issue of command influence.

First, I would like to direct your attention back to the news release that CENTCOM issued on January 16, 2004, announcing this investigation. The second and third sentences, I want to direct your attention to specifically. This news release says, "This release of specific information concerning the incidents could hinder the investigation, which is in its early stages. The investigation will be conducted in a thorough and professional manner."

I think what the American people expect of all of us here is not only that we have high standards of conduct, which I know the military subscribes to, but we have the training, the oversight, the leadership, the accountability, and also the due process and desire to seek justice when it comes to holding people accountable for their crimes. I want to tell you that what you've described here, in terms of this chronology of investigation, gives me confidence that the DOD has taken this matter as seriously as it should have. Indeed, as you and others have said, not all the facts are in yet. But I do see on this chronology that, indeed, after this investigation, there have been criminal charges preferred against some who are guilty of these crimes. I would ask you, please, just to briefly talk about your obligation, in terms of seeing that the persons who are accused of these crimes get that due process, and to make sure that you maintain the integrity of the investigation by not dripping information out on this incident in a piecemeal basis over the course of the next few months.

Secretary RUMSFELD. You have your finger on the dilemma, on the tension that exists between assuring that you protect the rights of individuals that are in a serious, difficult criminal prosecution circumstance, and avoiding saying things that either would infringe on their rights or would enable them to escape punishment by virtue of being able to successfully allege that command influence was exercised in a way that prejudiced the decisions up the chain of command. So we have that problem. To the extent senior people in the DOD dive down in and start looking in criminal prosecutions in the early and mid-stages, the hue and outcry would be horrendous. On the other hand, if you have a situation where something like this is buried in there, along with 3,000 other courts-martial, and buried in there is something of this significance, we have to find a way to know that. Our country doesn't need those kinds of shocks, and the troops don't need it.

Chairman WARNER. Senator, I have to thank you. We must move on. The panel leaves here and goes over to the House Armed Services Committee.

Secretary RUMSFELD. We'll have to leave by about 2:30, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. That is correct. That was made clear, and I think we will have sufficient time to include our next Senator, Senator Bayh, followed by Senator Chambliss, Senator Clinton, Senator Pryor, and Senator Dayton.

Senator BAYH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, gentlemen, for being here today and, in addition to that, for serving our country. These are difficult times, and your service is not without some personal cost. I am going to assume some facts up here and then ask what I think may be two somewhat difficult questions.

I assume that you serve at the pleasure of the President. I assume that he sets a policy for our national security, in general, and for Iraq, in particular. I assume that he is engaged in overseeing the implementation of those policies and, like you, accepts responsibility for that implementation. This is a long way of saying, as Senator Byrd mentioned, that in our system we have a tradition of the buck stopping at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. As we're all aware, we're now engaged in a debate about who the occupant of that residence will be, come next January.

So in many respects, I view this as a question of presidential leadership. How does he react? How aggressively? Does he try and minimize the situation, or does he try and take dramatic steps to address the magnitude of the problem? As has been noted, he has apologized for what took place. As all of you have indicated, particularly you, Mr. Secretary, the criminal process will move forward. That is a hallmark of our system of justice.

One of the questions that's overhanging this proceeding today, and the situation in general, is, is that enough? So the difficult question I'd like to ask is to follow up on the question from Senator Graham. Mr. Secretary, I could tell that you struggled in answering his question, that this is something that's been on your mind. Your resignation has been called for. That's a pretty serious thing for any of us. You answered that if you ever concluded that you could not be effective in discharging your duties, you would step down, but that you would not do so as a part of a political "witch hunt," so to speak.

There's another aspect of this, though, I'd like to ask your opinion about. I know it's ultimately a decision for the President to make, but, in your opinion, even though you weren't personally involved in the underlying acts here, would it serve to demonstrate how seriously we take this situation, and, therefore, help to undo some of the damage to our reputation, if you were to step down?

Secretary RUMSFELD. That's possible.

Senator BAYH. I appreciate your candor.

My second question has to do with some comments that Senator Lieberman made, and I would like to associate myself with what I thought were very appropriate and moving comments by Senator Lieberman. I believe very strongly that our cause—and these are not words I use frequently—but that our cause is morally superior to our adversaries', both the terrorists we fight and those who now seek to undo the future of a free Iraq. There is growing concern by the supporters of this cause that this situation we're inquiring into today is part of a broader problem, that the effort may be bogging down, that we may be approaching a tipping point, that momentum needs to be regained if we're going to prevail.

I'd like to just read a couple of sentences from a column in yesterday's New York Times by Tom Friedman, who supported this endeavor in Iraq. He says, "We are in danger of losing something much more important than just this war in Iraq. We are in danger of losing America as an instrument of moral authority and inspiration in the world. This administration needs to undertake a total overhaul of its Iraq policy; otherwise, it is courting a total disaster for us all." He goes on to say how he hopes that such an overhaul can be undertaken, because we need to prevail in Iraq.

So my final question is, Mr. Secretary, do you believe we're on the right course presently, or is dramatic action necessary to regain the momentum so that we can ultimately prevail in what is a very noble and idealistic undertaking?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I do believe we're on the right track. It's a tough road. It's a bumpy road. It's always been bumpy going from a vicious dictatorship to something approximating a representative government that's respectful of its different varied religious and ethnic groups. That's not an easy path.

I am convinced that we are doing exactly what ought to be done, and that is to pass responsibility for that country to the Iraqis. I am convinced we're doing exactly what ought to be done in recognizing that they need to have the ability to provide for their own security, which is why so much effort's gone into developing police and civil defense corps and an army and border patrols and site-protection people.

They do not want Americans or coalition forces in their country over a prolonged period, and, goodness knows, we don't want to be there. The only proper way to pass it off is if they have their own security forces, which is why we're spending the money and making the effort. It's why General Abizaid and General Sanchez and General Petraeus now are over there working that problem. I think that we have a crack at doing it.

[Clarifying information from the DOD follows:]

LTG Petraeus was not in Iraq at the time of this hearing. LTG Petraeus was in Iraq from March 2003 to March 2004 as commander of the 101st Airborne Division and returned for a second tour in late May 2004 to train Iraqi Civil Defense Corps battalions.

Secretary RUMSFELD. I don't think it will be smooth. I think it will be rough. It will be bumpy. But if you don't take your hand off the bicycle seat, you're not going to be able to ride the bike, and we have to do that. We're going to do that.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Mr. Secretary, Senator Bayh.

Senator Chambliss.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Secretary, it's interesting that Senator Roberts and I had previously been talking about the fact that one thing that probably should be done is exactly what Senator Ben Nelson just recommended, and that's tear down that wall—and that wall is Abu Ghraib prison—to show another sign of the destruction of Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Secretary, there are different kinds of leaders. Different leaders even provide different kinds of leadership. One easy thing for a leader to do is sometimes hide behind the lower echelon in the chain of command. I just want to say to you, I've been prepared to be very critical of you if I needed to be critical today. But by your coming in here and making an admission, as a strong leader, that a mistake was made and that you're going to be doing whatever is necessary to correct that mistake, that shows just what kind of leader you are. Anybody who questions your effectiveness and your ability to lead the United States military has had their question answered today. So, for that, I commend you.

I commend you also for your selection of General Miller. I've been to Guantanamo twice. I was worried about what might happen down there with respect to those detainees. I had the privilege to observe several different interrogations. I think I was there the day that General Miller first arrived, as a matter of fact. I observed random interrogations down there. General Miller did correct a problem that existed. There were charges of abuse that were much slighter than these charges of abuse, and General Miller dealt with those swiftly and directly.

I am concerned, though, about a couple of different things. First of all, General Ryder did make his report following his visit to Abu Ghraib from the period of October 13 to November 6. We had a United States Army general doing an investigation of a prison and the activities that were ongoing in that prison during a point in time when these alleged atrocities took place. Now, my understanding from General Ryder is that he was never told about any of this while he was there. I don't understand that. I don't understand how the chain of command could be so faulty within that system to allow that to happen.

The only answer I ever got was that these atrocities occurred on the night shift. Well, the Army doesn't operate 12 hours a day. We operate 24 hours a day, and there is a failure in the chain of command that I hope you're in the process of addressing very directly from that standpoint.

Also, in response to Senator McCain, you made two comments—first of all, that guards are trained to guard people, not interrogate; and that guards are trained in the requirements of the Geneva Conventions. Now, I understand those are policies of the DOD, as well they should be. But the fact of the matter is, when you look at page 10 of the Taguba report, you find out that was not done in this case. These MPs simply were not trained in what they were supposed to be doing.

So, again, I hope your folks are moving in the direction of making that correction with respect, particularly, to reservists that are brought onboard. One obvious judgment is that the 800th MP Brigade was totally dysfunctional, from Brigadier General Karpinski on down, with few exceptions. On the surface, you could portray the 800th MP Brigade as a Reserve unit with poor leadership and poor training. However, the abuse of prisoners is not merely a failure of an MP brigade. It is a failure of the chain of command, Mr. Secretary.

I want to leave here today knowing and taking comfort in the fact that, as Senator Graham said, we're not going to just prosecute somebody with one stripe on their sleeve or four stripes on their sleeve, but you're going to carry this thing to whatever extent is necessary to ensure that there's no "good old boy" system within the United States Army. Irrespective of whether they have a stripe on their sleeve or four stars on their shoulder, we're going to get to the bottom of this, and we're going to make sure that corrective action is taken, and, where necessary, criminal action is taken, against anybody involved in the particular acts or in the shielding of this and the failure or negligence on their part of keeping this information from you, in a quick and swift manner.

Secretary RUMSFELD. I agree with everything you've said, and there's no question but that the investigations have to go forward. They have to be respectful of people's rights, but they have to be handled in a manner that reflects the gravity of this situation. It does not matter one whit where the responsibility falls. It falls where it does.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Thank you, Mr. Secretary.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

General SCHOOMAKER. Senator Chambliss, I'd like to—Chairman WARNER. General.

General SCHOOMAKER. Mr. Chairman, Senator Chambliss characterized our Army in a way that I don't agree with. It doesn't matter whether a soldier is on active duty, in the active component, in the Guard, or the Reserve; there's one standard. We expect that our leadership and our soldiers adhere to the same standard, and those are Army values, the Soldier's Creed, and the things that we all believe in. So I disassociate with your remarks there that, for some reason, because this was a Reserve unit there isn't a standard that's equal to everybody else's.

Senator CHAMBLISS. General, my remarks were not directed towards this unit being a Reserve unit; they just happen to be a Reserve unit. But the fact of the matter is that the Taguba Report says that this unit, which is a Reserve unit, did not receive training during their mobilization, and that was a fault in the system, and it's a fault because they are a Reserve unit.

General SCHOOMAKER. Yes, sir. We're going to look into that. We are looking into it, and if that's true, we're going to correct it.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Thank you.

General SCHOOMAKER. Nevertheless, they have one standard.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, gentlemen.

Senator Clinton.

Senator CLINTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think, Mr. Secretary, that you can discern from the questions that there are still many issues that we need further clarification on. I particularly look forward to the answer that you will provide to Senator Reed's last question, following up on his line of questioning concerning the enabling of interrogation by MPs. That is something which, based on Army regulations, was not to be either done or condoned.

But, Mr. Secretary, in January 2002, when you publicly declared that hundreds of people detained by U.S. and allied forces in Afghanistan do not have any rights under the Geneva Conventions, that was taken as a signal. It is clear, in looking through the number of investigations that are currently ongoing, that it wasn't just this particular battalion, but others that did not receive appropriate training and information about their responsibilities with respect to detention or the Geneva Conventions.

The atrocities that have been depicted in photographs were very graphically described verbally in the Taguba Report. It doesn't take a lot of imagination to read those descriptions and have one's stomach just turn, in disgust.

The focus on the pictures being released is, with all due respect, missing the point. The report was well known, and apparently discussed on numerous occasions, and obviously the release of the pictures to the entire world was devastating, but the underlying conduct and the failure of the command, both at the site and further up the chain, to act with the appropriate quick response is really at the heart of what the most serious problems we face here today are.

The information in the Taguba Report links the atrocities at Abu Ghraib to Camp Bucca. In fact, some of the same people, some of the same command, some of the same MPs were apparently involved. With respect to the recommendations at the end of General Taguba's report, they call for establishing the conditions with the resources and personnel required to prevent future occurrences of detainee abuse.

I would appreciate, since we don't have time in this round of questioning, to receive, for the committee, a report about exactly how that is being handled. What changes have been made? Is the Geneva Conventions training going on now? Are the appropriate rules being posted, in both English and Arabic? Certainly we would like an explanation as to the adequacy of the punishment that was meted out, because, with respect to who is being punished for what, there is a clear distinction, at least as reported by General Taguba, between enlisted personnel and those up the command.

But I'm also concerned by a related matter. Let me just quickly reference the case of Chaplain Yee, the Muslim Army chaplain from Guantanamo Bay who was arrested and placed in solitary confinement. Ultimately, all the charges were dropped, after his reputation was sullied. It's obvious that the information about this particular case came from Government sources. It was pushed out, and it was widely disseminated. So, Mr. Secretary, how is it that a case with no basis in fact gets such widespread publicity based on information from Government sources, while egregious conduct, like that at the Abu Ghraib prison, is cloaked in a classified report and is only made available when the investigation is leaked to the press?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Senator, first let me say, with respect to the question that Senator Reed raised, I can't conceive of anyone looking at the pictures and suggesting that anyone could have recommended, condoned, permitted, encouraged—subtly, directly, in any way—that those things take place.

Second, the decision that was made by the President of the United States, that you referred to, was announced. In the announcement, it was said that the al Qaeda in Guantanamo that were captured around the world, mostly in Afghanistan, would be treated in a manner consistent with the Geneva Conventions. That is a fact.

[Clarifying information from the DOD follows:]

The guidelines for handling al Qaeda detainees were in the President's February 7, 2002, directive, which states (in part): "As a matter of policy, the United States Armed Forces shall continue to treat detainees humanely and, to the extent appropriate and consistent with military necessity, in a manner consistent with the principles of Geneva."

Secretary RUMSFELD. You say the report was "well known." I don't know how you know that. All I know is, when it was made public, when somebody took a secret document out of prosecutorial channels and released it to the press, I do not believe it was yet anywhere in the Pentagon. Certainly I had not been given it, or seen it.

I quite agree with you. When you read the report, you do get an impression, as you suggested, that there is something much worse than what was in the press release, for example, in January, or the discussion in March by CENTCOM. But that was not something that had been moved past CENTCOM, to my knowledge. It may have been somewhere in the DOD, but certainly I had not received a copy. It was still in those channels.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Pryor.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Mr. Chairman, I'm going to have to remind you that we do have to leave at 2:30. I apologize for that. Normally I'd stay, but we're due in the House.

Chairman WARNER. That is my understanding, and we're within 6 minutes of finishing at the 2:30 deadline.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator PRYOR. Mr. Chairman, thank you.

I'm not sure my microphone's working today, for some reason, so I'll borrow this one over here.

In Arkansas, Mr. Secretary, we have an expression that says, "You cannot unring the bell." At this point, we know where we find ourselves, and that is, these photos—and, as you indicated, there may be more to come, and even videos—are now in the public domain. We all know that they will be used to undermine U.S. credibility for years to come, and that they put our soldiers at more jeopardy inside Iraq and other places today than they were just a few days ago.

In fact, this morning, I must tell you, I had trouble explaining the photographs and what's going on inside that prison, with my 10-year-old son. They're very hard to explain.

Mr. Secretary, let me say that there has been a pattern that I have to bring to your attention from our perspective. First, for months and months, we've asked, "Do you need more troops inside Iraq?" In the last few days, even though you've assured us many times, and many people at the Pentagon and the White House have said no, we now have learned that you do need them.

Second, we've asked, for weeks and weeks and weeks, maybe months—Senator Byrd could probably tell you more than I could about that—about whether you'll need a supplemental. Originally the answer was no, at least until very late in the year. Now it appears that you do need one.

We've been surprised on those two occasions. Now we're surprised today. Mr. Secretary, I must tell you that we do not like these types of surprises here in Congress. I don't want to sound glib in asking this question, but let me ask it anyway. We know the photographs are coming out, but do you anticipate anything else coming out in relation to this story that we need to know about today?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I'm certain there will be. You have six investigations going on. You can be absolutely certain that these investigations will discover things, as investigations do, and that they'll elevate other individuals for prosecution in criminal matters. You can be certain that there's going to be more coming out.

With respect to your other comments, the commanders on the ground, from the beginning, asked for and received all the troops they needed, all the troops they wanted, all the troops they asked for. They got them. You're right, General Abizaid called up and said, "Look, the situation in Iraq is difficult. I'd like to keep an extra 20,000 during this crossover period, and go from 115,000 to 135,000." We said yes. I went to the President, and the President said yes. The senior military advisor, General Myers, said he thought that was correct. You say you don't like surprises—my Lord, who likes surprises? Nobody in the world likes surprises. But the world's not perfect. Facts change on the ground. When facts change on the ground, commanders tell us. When commanders tell us, they get the troops they need.

Now, on the budget, you don't like surprises. Well, I don't either. It happens to be the case that more troops are needed, and more money is needed. It happens that it's a difficult thing for the military commanders to cash-flow, taking out of one account to sustain something that came up that was not anticipated. So the President said, "Fine." He did not want to ask for a supplemental. General Myers and I went in to him and said, "We think we need one. We think that that's not a good way to manage the DOD, by jerking money out of one account and sticking it in another account, trying to get preprogramming authority by Congress," and we said, "We believe that it's the appropriate thing to do." He didn't want to do it. He knew what he had said. But he said he'd do it. Now, that's not a surprise. It's just a fact.

Senator PRYOR. Mr. Chairman, thank you for your time.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator DAYTON. Mr. Secretary, were you aware, or did you authorize, General Myers to call CBS to suppress their news report?

Secretary RUMSFELD. I don't have any idea if he discussed it with me. I don't think he did.

Senator DAYTON. Over the last 2 weeks, calling CBS to suppress the news report, you don't—

Secretary RUMSFELD. "Suppress" is not the right word at all. It's an inaccurate word, I should say.

Senator DAYTON. General Myers, did you discuss it with the Secretary?

General MYERS. This had been worked at lower levels by the Secretary's staff and my staff for some time, and—

Senator DAYTON. That you would call CBS to suppress their news report.

General MYERS. I called CBS to ask them to delay the pictures showing on the CBS program "60 Minutes," because I thought it would result in direct harm to our troops.

Senator DAYTON. Is that standard procedure for the military command of this country, to try to suppress a news report at the highest level?

General MYERS. Senator Dayton, this is a serious allegation.

Senator DAYTON. It sure is.

General MYERS. It is absolutely—the context of your question, I believe, is wrong.

Senator DAYTON. I understand the context, General. You told us the context earlier. I have very limited time, sir. I just want to get—

General MYERS. Well, when I—

Senator DAYTON. —this is my question.

General MYERS. I want to take as much time as we need to straighten this out. This report was already out there. The news was out there about the abuse. The thing that I—

Senator DAYTON. General, if the news had been out there and we had all known about it—

General MYERS. Right. Let me just—

Senator DAYTON. —to extent of this—

General MYERS. Senator, please, let me—

Senator DAYTON. —we would have—

General MYERS. Senator—

Senator DAYTON. —had this hearing—

General MYERS. Senator, please—

Senator DAYTON. —months ago.

General MYERS. —let me—let me finish, Senator.

Chairman WARNER. Senator, I ask that the witness be allowed to respond to your question. They're very important questions.

General, would you proceed?

General MYERS. Thank you, sir. Thank you, Senator Dayton.

This was not to suppress anything. What I asked CBS to do was to delay the release of the pictures, given the current situation in Iraq, which was as bad as it had been since major combat ended. I thought it would bring direct harm to our troops, it would kill our troops.

We talked about it, and I said, "I know this report will eventually come out, but if you can delay it for some period of time it would be helpful."

Senator DAYTON. What period of time, sir?

General MYERS. I did it based on talking to General Abizaid, and his worry was like mine, and he convinced me that this was the right thing to do. This report has been around since January. What was new were the pictures. I asked for the pictures to be delayed.

Senator DAYTON. Did you discuss calling CBS to ask them to delay their report with the Secretary of Defense or the Vice President or the President?

General MYERS. Of course not.

Senator DAYTON. None of those. All right.

General MYERS. Of course not.

Senator DAYTON. I would just say, General, that I agree with your assessment of the consequences of this on our troops. That is the great tragedy of this. But attempts to suppress news reports, to withhold the truth from Congress and from the American people, is antithetical to a democracy.

General MYERS. You bet it is, and that's not what we've been doing.

Senator DAYTON. Whatever the intentions may be, sir, the result is always the same. It is, I think, terribly tragic that the President, who wants to expand democracy around the world, by actions of his own administration is undermining that democracy in the United States. As is always the result when people try to control information, delay it, manage it, and suppress it, it has that result. It's antithetical to a democracy.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Senator, throughout the history of this country, there have been instances where military situations have existed that have led governments to talk to members of the media and make an editorial request of them that they delay, for some period, disclosing some piece of information. It is not against our history. It is not against our principles. It is not suppression of the news. It's a misunderstanding of the situation to say it is.

Senator DAYTON. It is against our principles. It's against our principles when you come before 40 to 45 Members of the Senate 3 hours before that news report is going to occur, and don't mention one word about it, sir. That is antithetical to democracy and the Constitution, which gives the Senate and the House coequal responsibility for this country.

I want to just ask about the escalation of American forces, sir. You're bringing in, in response to all of this—and, yes, this is also important—this is the future of this Nation and the people who are over there. You're increasing the number of forces, the number of tanks over there. How can this do anything but escalate the level of violence, the opposition of the Iraqis, and intensify the hatred across the Arab world to the United States and create more atrocities? How can this have any result other than to put us deeper into this situation and make the conditions there worse for our forces and for our Nation and for the world?

Chairman WARNER. Senator, I'm going to ask that the witness respond to your important question for the record, and I thank you for your cooperation.

In fact, during late April/early May 2004 U.S. troop levels in Iraq were on their way down. There was a 2 week or so increase in troop levels during this period due to "overlap" as incoming forces replace troops rotating back to the United States.

Chairman WARNER. Mr. Secretary and witnesses, we've had a very thorough exchange of views. We've had a full and complete hearing. I wish to commend my colleagues. I wonder if you might indulge the Majority Leader for 1 minute.

Senator LEVIN. Mr. Chairman, could the answers for the record, which the Secretary has promised, be expedited, given the circumstances? Would that be all right?

Chairman WARNER. Yes, absolutely. That will be done.

Senator FRIST.

Senator FRIST. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Secretary, thank you for appearing before the Armed Services Committee today. It is important for this body, the United States Senate, to hear from you about the reprehensible incidents at Abu Ghraib prison. Needless to say, the individuals that committed these despicable acts must be held accountable. Justice must and will be served in a swift and fair and transparent matter.

We are all troubled by the fact that the actions of a few have tainted the efforts of all Americans who are serving so nobly abroad.

Mr. Secretary, I commend you for taking responsibility for what occurred at Abu Ghraib prison. If we're ever going to repair the damage done to our efforts in Iraq and to the reputation of the Armed Forces, it's important that we get all the facts out in a quick and a thorough manner.

The committees of jurisdiction here in the Senate will be conducting their own inquiries into this matter. We do look forward to regular updates from you and others on the panel and the DOD as your investigations proceed, as well as updates on any other actions you may take to ensure that justice is served and heinous acts never occur again.

Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Mr. Leader.

Secretary RUMSFELD. Thank you very much.

Chairman WARNER. The hearing is concluded.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SUSAN COLLINS

RED CROSS RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Senator COLLINS. General Schoomaker, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has said that it has had the opportunity to speak with the detainees about their treatment, and based on these discussions, it has repeatedly requested that U.S. authorities take corrective action to correct alleged abuses. The ICRC says that its recommendations were not taken seriously by the administration. Were ICRC recommendations taken seriously? If so, then how do you address these reports that many of the organization's recommendations were ignored?

General SCHOOMAKER. The ICRC visits to the detention facilities in Iraq and Afghanistan and reports generated from such visits fall under the responsibility of the U.S. Army Central Command (CENTCOM); therefore, I cannot speak to any specific allegations or incidents that fall within the CENTCOM area of responsibility (AOR). The ICRC provides their reports only to the chain of command of the detention facility that they are visiting. It is up to the commander of the detention facility to reply to the ICRC report and make corrective actions as he or she see fit; corrective actions will be conducted based on that commander's assessment of the current military situation, the availability of support, and other factors.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CARL LEVIN

THE RYDER REPORT

2. Senator LEVIN. General Myers, according to Seymour Hersh's article in The New Yorker magazine, General Ryder's report of November 5, 2003, on the prison system in Iraq found "system-wide" problems relating to human rights, training, and manpower issues. General Ryder reportedly recommended that procedures be established to "define the role of military police soldiers . . . clearly separating the actions of the guards from those of the military intelligence personnel." General Taguba is reported to find that "many of the systemic problems that surfaced during [Ryder's] assessment are the very same issues that are the subject of this investigation." Since the release of General Ryder's report on November 5, 2003, has the Army implemented General Ryder's recommendation to establish procedures separating the role of military police (MPs) from that of military intelligence personnel?

General MYERS. Major General Ryder conducted an assessment of detention and correction operations in Iraq and provided recommendations to CJTF-7 to improve those operations. The specific recommendation referred to above was to, "Determine the scope of intelligence collection that will occur at Camp Vigilant. Refurbish the Northeast compound to separate the screening operation from the Iraqi-run Baghdad Correctional Facility. Establish procedures that define the role of military police soldiers securing the compound, clearly separating the actions of the guards from those of the military intelligence personnel." CJTF-7 did take action on this recommendation concerning force protection responsibilities of military police soldiers securing the compound.

Further, CJTF-7, under Major General Miller's supervision, has defined the proper roles for military police and military intelligence personnel, and has ensured that they understand their respective responsibilities. The roles of the military police and military intelligence complement one another. The military police are responsible for custody and detainee control; the military intelligence has screening and interrogation responsibilities. Military police can assist the military intelligence by observing detainees and reporting on their associations and activities.

CJTF-7 initiated numerous additional improvements to detention operations based on Major General Ryder's recommendations. These included strict control of weapons in detention facilities, centralized planning for interrogation priorities, separation of high value detainees, augmentation of staffs with subject matter experts, employment of a detention mobile training team, certification of personnel on critical detention tasks, and multiple projects to improve living conditions for detainees and soldiers. Improved medical care, use of the Biometric Assessment Tool (BAT), and a review of theater release procedures also resulted from CJTF-7 action on Major General Ryder's recommendations.

3. Senator LEVIN. General Myers, will General Miller, who is in charge of detention operations in Iraq, take steps to ensure that the role of MP soldiers is defined and clearly separate from the role of military intelligence personnel at detention facilities?

General MYERS. Major General Miller has taken steps to ensure that both military police and military intelligence personnel understand their respective roles. Military police can assist military intelligence personnel by observing detainees and reporting on their activities and associations. This "passive" involvement of the military police is what MG Miller has advocated.

TAGUBA REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

4. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, General Taguba's report contained a number of recommendations resulting from his investigation. To what extent have the recommendations contained in the Taguba Report been adopted and implemented? Please address each of the specific recommendations in the three parts of the report.

General SMITH. The attached summary of MNF-I actions taken after the reports is responsive to this question.

RED CROSS VISITS TO ABU GHRAIB

5. Senator LEVIN. General Myers and General Smith, the ICRC report of February 2004 states that the ICRC was aware of abuses at Abu Ghraib prison for months prior to the period covered by General Taguba's investigation and had repeatedly asked U.S. authorities to take corrective action. What was the extent of the ICRC's access to the facilities at Abu Ghraib? Did it include the part of the facility where the abuses depicted in the photos are alleged to have occurred?

General MYERS and General SMITH. The ICRC Summary Report of February 2004 refers to an ICRC visit to the Abu Ghraib Correctional Facility conducted in October 2003, during the same period that many of the alleged abuses occurred. A written report related to the October 2003 visit was provided to CJTF-7 Staff Judge Advocate's office in November 2003. Both ICRC reports provide indications of detainee abuse, however, not to the extent depicted in the photographs. The CJTF-7 Staff Judge Advocate Office circulated the November report among relevant commands and staffs, proposed a draft response and, following discussions and meetings with leadership of the military intelligence and military police units involved, forwarded the draft document to the 800th Military Police BDE. A written response to the ICRC was signed by the Commander, 800th Military Police Brigade in December 2003 and delivered to the ICRC. A staff action plan was implemented for the next ICRC visit to Abu Ghraib in January 2004. During the October visit to Abu Ghraib and in subsequent visits, ICRC representatives did have access to the part of the prison where the abuses are alleged to have occurred.

6. Senator LEVIN. General Myers and General Smith, what specific steps were taken to correct the situation at Abu Ghraib in response to these ICRC requests?

General MYERS and General SMITH. The longstanding arrangement between the ICRC and the Department of Defense is that issues are discussed and resolved at the local level or at the lowest practicable level of command. At Abu Ghraib, the lowest practicable level of command would have been the 800 Military Police Brigade and 205 Military Intelligence Brigade, overseen by CJTF-7. Following receipt of the November ICRC report, a staff action plan was developed. Improvements in detention conditions were made by the commands following the October 2003 visit as noted by the ICRC in a subsequent visit in January 2004. Since January 2004, the Department of Defense has initiated numerous investigations regarding the treatment of detainees and instituted changes at every level to ensure improved conditions of detention facilities and appropriate treatment of detainees.

Included in these initiatives are significant organizational and policy changes. The Office of the Secretary of Defense has established an office, the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Detainee Affairs, which focuses on worldwide detainee operations. The Joint Staff has also expanded staff organizational responsibilities. As a result of a policy change, reports from the ICRC are forwarded expeditiously by commands to the Department of Defense, reviewed by these staffs and significant issues are brought to the attention of the leadership.

7. Senator LEVIN. General Myers and General Smith, there are reports of "ghost detainees" who were moved around within the facility in order to conceal them from ICRC inspection teams. Have you investigated these reports, and if so, what were your findings?

General MYERS and General SMITH. The allegations were investigated and other investigations are ongoing. Apparently there existed a practice in the fall of 2003 of allowing Other Government Agencies (OGA) to drop off detainees for up to a 72-hour hold without being processed and issued Internee Security Numbers (ISN) in accordance with Army and CJTF-7 procedures. CJTF-7 learned of this practice in early January 2004 and stopped it.

In other instances, the OGA detainees were in-processed and registered with the ICRC. Reports received indicate that ICRC representatives observed these detainees in cells marked with their Geneva Conventions status. The ICRC was not allowed to meet with certain detainees during visits because they were being interrogated. Under provisions of the Geneva Conventions, detainees may be held for a reasonable period of time without registering them with the ICRC for military necessity. This may include the time required to process detainees from point of capture to a detention facility.

All detainees currently in the custody of the Department of Defense have been registered with the ICRC.

8. Senator LEVIN. General Myers and General Smith, the ICRC told the Department of Defense (DOD) of the alleged abuses at Abu Ghraib months before a U.S. soldier notified his superiors in January of this year. What steps were taken to investigate, verify, address, or stop the abuses detailed by the ICRC?

General MYERS and General SMITH. An ICRC visit to the Abu Ghraib Correctional Facility was conducted in October 2003. A written report related to the October 2003 visit was provided to the CJTF-7 Staff Judge Advocate's office in November 2003. This ICRC report provided indications of detainee abuse, however, not to the extent depicted in the photographs. CJTF-7, the 800th Military Police Brigade and the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade staffed the report locally. Corrective actions were taken as noted by the ICRC during the January 2004 visit. I am not aware of any other reporting of ICRC findings to Department of Defense officials. To ensure visibility above the local level, the Department of Defense has implemented a policy that requires ICRC reports to be forwarded higher.

9. Senator LEVIN. General Myers and General Smith, other than Brigadier General Karpinski, was anyone else within DOD, the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), or other Federal agencies briefed about the abuses, detailed by the ICRC, at Abu Ghraib? Who were they and when were they briefed?

General MYERS and General SMITH. The November 2003 ICRC report gave indications of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib, but not to the level of abuse later revealed in the photographs. General Abizaid notified me on 13 January 2003 of the allegations of abuse at Abu Ghraib reported by a soldier in the 372d Military Police Company. I don't recall an ICRC report being mentioned during that conversation. I am not aware of briefings concerning the November ICRC report being conducted within the Department of Defense or any other Federal agency until after the investigation into the alleged abuses was opened in January.

10. Senator LEVIN. General Myers and General Smith, which senior administration officials have received the reports by the ICRC detailing abusive behavior at U.S. detention facilities in Iraq? When did they receive such reports? What actions were taken in response to such reports?

General MYERS and General SMITH. I personally was not provided copies or summaries of any ICRC reports detailing abusive behavior at U.S. detention facilities in Iraq. The ICRC generally provides working papers, reports, and observations to the lowest level organization that the ICRC believes can resolve the issues. In Iraq, the ICRC reports were provided to the detention facility visited, to the CJTF-7 staff, or in at least one instance to the CPA. The ICRC does not provide reports to the Joint Staff. The ICRC may on occasion provide information to the Department of State or to the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD). I am not aware of any senior officials in OSD, or in any other Federal agency, who may have received ICRC reports detailing abusive behavior at U.S. detention facilities in Iraq.

INFORMATION FLOW

11. Senator LEVIN. General Myers, USA Today reports that on January 13, 2004, General Abizaid made a phone call to you in which he "described the allegation of mistreatment" and told you about the pictures, saying 'here's what basically the pictures might show.' Is this an accurate accounting of this conversation?

General MYERS. Yes, it is accurate. The CENTCOM chain of command immediately recognized the significance of the allegations of abuse at Abu Ghraib. Determined to take proper action, a criminal investigation was immediately initiated and the matter was reported to the chain of command. General Abizaid contacted me telephonically and informed me that a soldier had reported the abuse. As I recall, he also informed me that the soldier provided photos of abusive acts that were significant, although I do not believe the acts depicted in the photos were precisely described. General Abizaid further informed me that the Criminal Investigation Division (CID) was investigating the report and that LTG Sanchez would direct a separate investigation into the matter.

12. Senator LEVIN. General Myers, at the hearing you said that you had meetings starting in January 2004, including with Secretary Rumsfeld, in which you discussed the detainee abuse situation at Abu Ghraib, and that you understood at that time the potential damage of the problem, and of photos you were aware of. Please provide the dates of the meetings you had at which you discussed this detainee abuse problem, and whether you discussed the photos and the potential for this issue to cause damage. When did you plan on informing the relevant congressional committees about this matter?

General MYERS. In January 2004, General Abizaid informed me of the allegations of abuse and the nature of the photographs. Subsequently, various meetings were held with the Secretary of Defense in January, February, and March, and a meeting with the President, Secretary Rumsfeld, and Vice Chairman Pace was held in mid-April. The abuse issue was one of many topics mentioned at these meetings. While we were advised of the allegations, we had not seen the photos. We were aware that reports of detainee abuse could potentially affect the world's opinion of the United States and impact our forces in Iraq, especially at a time when former regime elements had increased the tempo of their attacks. We were also aware that public discussion of the investigations into these allegations by senior leaders could be interpreted as direction or pressure for a certain outcome in these cases. It was our intent to provide information to the relevant congressional committees about this matter once the investigations were complete, the chain of command had the opportunity to make decisions, and we had sufficient information to release to the committees. This plan was preempted by unauthorized release of the photographs and Major General Taguba's report. As I stated in my 7 May testimony, we could have done a better job of informing Congress of the situation and the existence of the photographs.

NUMBER OF INVESTIGATIONS

13. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, during the week of May 3, General Casey, the Army Vice Chief of Staff, said that there were some 35 investigations under way relating to detainee abuses or deaths or similar allegations. On May 11, General Romig testified that the Army was tracking some 83 different detainee abuse cases in Iraq and Afghanistan. As of today, how many cases of abuses have been reported and how many investigations have been initiated? How many relate to abuse, and how many relate to deaths?

Secretary RUMSFELD. As of 7 May, a total of 56 cases of abuse had been reported and were being investigated. Of these 56 cases, 33 involve allegations of abuse and 23 involve deaths. These numbers will almost certainly change as more information becomes available and we will continue to brief the committee as additional findings arise.

14. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, how many people are under investigation in these cases? Is it more than the ones identified in the Taguba Report?

Secretary RUMSFELD. As of 7 May, a total of 122 people were under investigation in the 56 detainee abuse and death investigations. It is believed this number exceeds the number of individuals identified in the Taguba Report.

15. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, given the apparently large number of investigations, and based on the Taguba Report, this appears to be a systemic problem. Do you agree?

Secretary RUMSFELD. The Department of the Army Inspector General, after completing his inspection of detainee operations, concluded that the abuse of detainees does not appear to be a systemic problem. This conclusion was shared by the Schlesinger Panel, which noted that there was no "policy of abuse" at Abu Ghraib. This conclusion is also consistent with the findings of the Fay Report. We have other investigations in progress and will continue to brief the committee on additional findings.

CLASSIFICATION OF THE TAGUBA REPORT

16. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, the DOD has classified the Taguba Report. I have concerns about how this process was conducted. Why is the section detailing abuses classified while the names of the alleged perpetrators were not?

Secretary RUMSFELD. In preparing his report, I am advised that General Taguba relied upon material marked classified as sources of information. Under established classification guidance, General Taguba was required to carry that classification forward on all statements in his report that were derived from this source material. Additionally, his entire report is required to be marked at the highest classification level of any material in it. Consequently, while most portions of General Taguba's report were marked unclassified, the entire report was marked Secret NOFORN. We have, however, released large portions of that report and the several others that followed.

17. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, Section 1.7 of Executive Order 12958 states: "In no case shall information be classified in order to . . . conceal violations of law [or to] prevent embarrassment to a person, organization, or agency." What was the justification for classifying some of the report and not the portions naming the alleged perpetrators? Who was involved in the classification process and how was their decision reached? Do you believe that it was appropriate given the nature and content of the report?

Secretary RUMSFELD. See answer above.

READING OF THE TAGUBA REPORT

18. Senator LEVIN. General Myers, you testified that you had discussed the prisoner abuse issue with Secretary Rumsfeld in January. You called CBS in early April to request that they delay broadcast of the photos showing the abuse, which they did. Yet a week after CBS had broadcast the photos, you had still not read the Taguba Report, even though it had been completed in March. Given that you knew of the abuse problem in January, and you knew in early April that release of the photos could cause serious problems, why did you not read the Taguba Report as soon as it was completed?

General MYERS. While Major General Taguba completed his investigation on 12 March, required chain of command actions were not complete until the end of April. The appointing authority reviewed Major General Taguba's findings and recommendations and recommended appropriate actions on 6 April. In accordance with required procedures, adverse actions were referred to the individuals involved, providing them an opportunity to respond. The chain of command took final action on 30 April. The final report was not received in Washington, DC, until shortly thereafter, well after my conversation with CBS and after the unauthorized release of the photographs and Major General Taguba's report to the media.

19. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, at the hearing General Myers testified that he had discussed the detainee abuse problem with you in January, recognizing that it had the potential to cause serious problems. Yet you had not fully read the Taguba Report a couple days before the hearing. Given that you were aware of the serious nature of this abuse problem as early as January, why did you not read the Taguba Report as soon as it was completed?

Secretary RUMSFELD. The Taguba Report was initiated on 31 January 2004. An interim report was completed on 12 March and approved by LTG McKiernan on 6 April. LTG Sanchez approved the report's recommendations on 1 May, although the report was publicized by The New Yorker on 30 April. The full Taguba Report numbered in the thousands of pages. I received a briefing from MG Taguba on 6 May 04.

APRIL 28 SENATE BRIEFING

20. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, you briefed the Senate on April 28, 2004 on Iraq in a classified session. This was the same day that CBS broadcast the photos that General Myers had successfully requested be delayed. However, you never mentioned the detainee abuse scandal to the Senators at that briefing, even though you say you were aware of the seriousness of the issue and of the existence of photos showing the abuse. Given that you knew well before April 28 about the abuse scandal, that there were photos of the abuse, and that General Myers had called CBS in early April to request delay in broadcast of the photos, why did you not inform the Senate of the detainee abuse scandal, even as late as the date on which the photos were broadcast?

Secretary RUMSFELD. As I said in my testimony, one cannot truly appreciate the significance and ramifications of the allegations of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib until viewing the photographs. At the time of the April 28 briefing, I had not seen the photographs. The command had responded promptly and several criminal investigations were underway when these allegations came to light in January. Public announcements were made then, and again when certain individuals were identified for further investigations in March. Had I seen the photographs before April 28, they would have been part of my brief.

VIEWING THE PHOTOGRAPHS

21. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, during the hearing you said that you did not see the photos of the abuse until after they were broadcast by CBS, and they appeared in the news media. You also said that you did not have a chance to personally review the photos until the night before the hearing, May 6. Given that you knew of the abuse problem in January and knew of the existence of photos well before they were broadcast, and given that General Myers asked CBS to delay broadcast of the photos in early April, did you ever ask to see the photos before they were broadcast? If not, why not?

Secretary RUMSFELD. As I indicated in my testimony before the committee, hearing a description of abuse, or hearing someone's description of a picture of abuse, does not compare to actually seeing the photographs. It was not until I had seen the photographs that I appreciated the significance and broad ramifications of the abuse allegations. The criminal investigations then underway and publicly announced were appropriate responses to the allegations. The photos were part of a criminal investigation. It is not established practice to reach into criminal investigations higher in the chain of command to review evidence of a possible crime. As I testified, though, in the digital age, with 24/7 news coverage, we need to develop a process to elevate such items to senior officials more rapidly than the current processes allow.

22. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, given that you knew the nature of the abuse that was under investigation before the photos were broadcast, and that General Myers called CBS in early April to request that broadcast of the photos be delayed because they could cause serious problems, why did you say you did not understand that the photos of the abuse would be very disturbing until you had actually seen the photos? Is it not obvious, even without seeing the actual photos, that a photo of abuse would be very disturbing?

Secretary RUMSFELD. See answer above.

GENEVA CONVENTIONS

23. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, during your May 4, 2003, interview with Matt Lauer, when speaking about Iraq you stated that: "The decision was made that the Geneva Conventions did not apply precisely, but that every individual would be treated as though the Geneva Conventions did apply." You went on to state in the interview that "the United States Government, the lawyers, made a conscious decision and announced it to the world and announced it to all the people engaged in the detention process that these people would, in fact, be treated as though the Geneva Conventions did apply."

At the May 7, 2004, hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee, you stated that "the President announced from the outset that everyone in Iraq who was detained is a prisoner of war (POW) and therefore the Geneva Conventions apply. Second, the decision was made that the civilians or criminal elements that are detainees are also treated subject to the Geneva Conventions, although it's a different element of it. I think it's the fourth instead of the third." Furthermore, you replied "absolutely" when asked if "all those in prison had the rights of POWs."

How do you reconcile these statements? Do the Geneva Conventions apply for all detainees in Iraq or are detainees treated in a manner "consistent with" the Conventions?

Secretary RUMSFELD. The Geneva Conventions apply during all phases of Operation Iraqi Freedom. The plans for Operation Iraqi Freedom that were prepared by Commander, U.S. Central Command, and briefed to the President and me before outbreak of hostilities included provisions that clearly stated that enemy prisoners of war, retained persons, civilian internees will be handled and other detainee "operations will be conducted in compliance with the 1949 Geneva Convention and applicable U.S. military regulations." Further, component and supporting commanders were responsible under the plans for Operation Iraqi Freedom for "[e]nsuring treatment of all detained persons is in accordance with the Conventions and other applicable international law." The President directed these plans to be executed. Detention operations during all phases of Operation Iraqi Freedom are required to be conducted in accordance with the Geneva Conventions.

24. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, when did the President announce that the Geneva Conventions would apply for all detainees in Iraq? How was this announcement made public? What steps were taken to inform coalition forces about this decision? When were they made?

Secretary RUMSFELD. On March 24, 2003, shortly after Operation Iraqi Freedom began, White House spokesman Ari Fleisher, when asked if the Geneva Conventions applied in Iraq, stated that Iraq was a traditional conflict, "[a]nd we have always treated people humanely consistent with our international agreements. In the case of the fight in Iraq, there's no question that it's being done in accordance with the Geneva Conventions."

Prior to the commencement of Operation Iraqi Freedom, Commander, U.S. Central Command, prepared Operational Plan (OPLAN) 1003-V. Appendix 1 to Annex E of OPLAN 1003-V specifically addressed the treatment of the operational plan annex on enemy prisoners of war, retained persons, civilian internees, and other detainees. It outlined responsibilities, policies, and procedures with respect to the handling of detainees, and provided specific guidance that the Geneva Conventions applied to all persons held by U.S. forces. This means of promulgation is consistent with the usual manner in which commanders provide guidance to their subordinate commanders. The subordinate commands would review the OPLAN and draft their own orders. For instance, the CJSC EXORD itself does not specifically address the Geneva Conventions; rather, it refers back to OPLAN 1003-V.

In addition to the promulgation of this OPLAN and its annexes, commanders were responsible for ensuring that detainees were treated in accordance with the Geneva Conventions and applicable international law and that measures were implemented to ensure the forces were aware of and complied with the Law of War.

25. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, do you believe that the Interrogation Rules of Engagement (ROEs) utilized by the CJTF-7 comply with the Geneva Conventions? What is your legal basis for this understanding?

Secretary RUMSFELD. This matter was thoroughly reviewed by the Kern/Fay investigation. Further, General Sanchez, General Abizaid, and the CJTF-7 Staff Judge Advocate testified before the committee on the matter. I have no independent knowledge or assessment.

26. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Rumsfeld, did you personally review these ROEs prior to their being issued? If not, who did and when?

Secretary RUMSFELD. Neither I nor my staff was ever requested to review the CJTF-7 counter resistance interrogation policy. LTG Sanchez issued his October 12, 2003, policy guidance after consultation with U.S. Central Command staff. He has the authority to promulgate such policies, which were reviewed, as I understand, by the Commander of the U.S. Central Command.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR BILL NELSON

PRESIDENTIAL NOTIFICATION

27. Senator BILL NELSON. Secretary Rumsfeld, in your testimony you indicated that General Pace, Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, had notified the President about the abuse allegations in late January or early February. Could you provide the committee the date of that meeting and any details regarding what the President was told with respect to this case by General Pace?

Secretary RUMSFELD. During the period of time in question, I met with the President once, sometimes twice, weekly and either General Myers or General Pace would accompany me. I cannot recall with clarity at which particular meeting we notified the President of the abuse allegations, nor the details of what was conveyed.

APRIL 28 BRIEFING

28. Senator BILL NELSON. Secretary Rumsfeld, when you appeared before the Senate in a secure setting on April 28, why did you decide not to brief the Members on the abuse allegations and photographs at that meeting?

Secretary RUMSFELD. As I said in my testimony, one cannot truly appreciate the significance and ramifications of the allegations of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib until viewing the photographs. At the time of the April 28 briefing, I had not seen the photographs. The command had responded promptly and several criminal investigations were underway when these allegations came to light in January. Public announcements were made then, and again when certain individuals were identified for further investigations in March. Had I seen the photographs before April 28, they would have been part of my brief.

[Whereupon, at 2:36 p.m., the committee adjourned.]

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOHN WARNER, CHAIRMAN

Chairman WARNER. The committee meets today for the second of a series of hearings regarding the mistreatment of Iraqi prisoners by some elements, and certain personnel, few in number, I hope, of the Armed Forces, in violation of United States and international law.

Testifying before us today is Major General Antonio M. Taguba, U.S. Army, Deputy Commanding General for Support, Coalition Forces Land Component Command (CFLCC).

On January 31, 2004, General Taguba was appointed by General Sanchez, Commander, Combined Joint Task Force-7 (CJTF-7), to conduct a Procedure-15 investigation into allegations of prisoner abuse at the Abu Ghraib prison. General Taguba's report was received by this committee on Tuesday, May 4, and its related annexes were received yesterday, May 10. As members know, they are in the possession of the committee, and members and staff worked on those reports until very late last night.

Joining General Taguba are Lieutenant General Lance L. Smith, U.S. Air Force, Deputy Commander of Central Command (CENTCOM); and Dr. Stephen A. Cambone, Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (USDI).

We welcome our witnesses. General Taguba, I wish to personally commend you for your public service.

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Following the testimony of our witnesses, we'll receive testimony from a second panel of witnesses this afternoon, commencing at 2:30.

As I stated last week, this mistreatment of prisoners represents an appalling and totally unacceptable breach of military regulations and conduct. The damage done to the reputation and credibility of our Nation and the Armed Forces has the potential to undermine substantial gains and the sacrifices by our forces and their families, and those of our allies fighting with us in the cause of freedom.

This degree of breakdown in military leadership and discipline represents an extremely rare chapter in the otherwise proud history of our Armed Forces. It defies common sense, and contradicts all the values for which America stands. There must be a full accounting for the cruel and disgraceful abuse of Iraqi detainees, consistent with our laws and the protections of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ).

I'm proud of the manner in which the Armed Forces have quickly reacted to these allegations, undertaken appropriate investigation, and begun disciplinary actions. We are a nation of laws, and we confront abuses of our laws openly and directly.

We have had an apparent breakdown of discipline and leadership at this prison, and possibly at other locations. We think it important to confront these problems swiftly, assuring that justice is done, and take the corrective actions so that such abuses never happen again. At the same time, it is important to remember that our commanders and their troops in Iraq are confronted with a very difficult, dangerous, complex military situation. Defeating insurgents and terrorists who seek to deny freedom and democracy to all Iraqis and who threaten our troops is the highest priority. Our troops are working very hard and courageously sacrifice to achieve that mission. Intelligence obtained in the course of any military action, obtained in accordance with proper laws and professional procedures, is an essential element of any military campaign.

I was heartened by President Bush's words of support for our men and women of the Armed Forces, as he stated yesterday, in visiting the Department of Defense (DOD)—and I quote our President: "All Americans know the goodness and the character of the United States Armed Forces. No military in the history of the world has fought so hard and so often for the freedom of others. Today, our soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines are keeping terrorists across the world on the run. They're helping the people of Afghanistan and Iraq build democratic societies. They're defending America with unselfish courage. These achievements have brought pride and credit to this Nation. I want our men and women in uniform to know that America is proud of you, and that I'm honored to be your commander in chief."

Speaking for myself, I feel our President, our Secretary of Defense (SECDEF), Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (CJCS), and the other officers of our military have very correctly and properly addressed the seriousness of these issues, and I commend them.

We must not forget our overall purpose in Iraq. Success there is absolutely essential. Our men and women in uniform make a remarkable institution in this great America. From time to time it must heal itself, consistent with law and tradition, and that is what we're doing in this particular case. We have a responsibility here in Congress to help them do that, and that is precisely the purpose of these hearings.

Senator Levin.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN

Senator LEVIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Today's hearing continues the committee's examination of the events at Abu Ghraib detention facility and the effort to learn what led to the abuses of Iraqi prisoners so graphically depicted in the photographs that have shocked and disgusted the civilized world; and who may have authorized, encouraged, or suggested those despicable actions. Getting to the truth of what happened and who was responsible is important for our military men and women, for the American people, for the success of our mission in Iraq, and for a watching world.

General Taguba, while your report paints a disturbing picture of horrible abuses and leadership failures at Abu Ghraib, your report reflects an honest and detailed assessment of the situation there, and includes sensible recommendations on how to begin fixing those problems. I thank you for your professionalism in carrying out this service to our Nation.

The hearing we held last week barely scratched the surface of the issues that this committee must examine. It yielded little in the form of detailed information as to how these abuses could possibly have occurred and who was responsible for them, including those within and without the chain of command whose policy decisions created an environment in which the abuses could occur.

The despicable actions described in General Taguba's report not only reek of abuse, they reek of an organized effort and methodical preparation for interrogation. The collars used on prisoners, the dogs, and the cameras did not suddenly appear out of thin air. These acts of abuse were not the spontaneous actions of lower-ranking enlisted personnel who lacked the proper supervision. These attempts to extract information from prisoners by abusive and degrading methods were clearly planned and suggested by others.

Today, we begin what must be a determined pursuit of the answers to the questions:

Who organized the effort?

Who oversaw it?

Under what directives and policies were these actions implemented?

All of those up and down the chain of command who bear any responsibility must be held accountable for the brutality and humiliation they inflicted on the prisoners and for the damage and dishonor that they brought to our Nation and to the United States Armed Forces, which is otherwise filled with honorable men and women acting with courage and professionalism to bring stability and security and reconstruction to Iraq.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. I'll ask the witnesses to rise. [Witnesses sworn.]

In accordance with the time-honored traditions of our country of civilian control over the military, we recognize Secretary Cambone, who is speaking on behalf of the DOD.

Mr. Secretary?

STATEMENT OF HON. STEPHEN A. CAMBONE, UNDER SECRETARY OF DEFENSE FOR INTELLIGENCE

Secretary CAMBONE. Mr. Chairman, thank you.

Members of the committee, we're here today to continue the discussion on the terrible activities at Abu Ghraib, begun last Friday by the SECDEF, the CJCS, and other members of the panel.

Before going further, let me say that we are dismayed by what took place. The Iraqi detainees are human beings. They were in U.S. custody. We had an obligation to treat them right. We didn't do that. That was wrong. I associate myself, without reservation, to the sentiments expressed by the SECDEF. To those Iraqis who were mistreated by members of the U.S. Armed Forces, I offer my deepest apology. It was un-American, and it was inconsistent with the values of our Nation.

Now, a number of issues arose related to those events during the hearing last Friday, which, as Senator Levin has noted, were not fully engaged. I wanted to tick off a short list that we have been developing since then as a way of preparation in answer to the questions we know that you have.

But before I go through those, let me say, again, that we will give you this information today, to the best of our knowledge. We do not have, yet, all the facts related to this case. There are at least five other investigations ongoing, and we will need that information in order to come to a full understanding.

So, first, with respect to the application of the Geneva Conventions to detainees in Iraq, from the outset of the war in Iraq, the United States Government has recognized and made clear that the Geneva Conventions apply to our activities in that country. Members of our Armed Forces should have been aware of that. If they were not—if they were not—Lieutenant General Sanchez, the CJTF-7 commander, reminded them, on more than one occasion, that the forces under his command operated under that obligation.

Nevertheless, there clearly was a breakdown in following Geneva Conventions procedures at Abu Ghraib, and we are in the process of investigating why that happened.

As Major General Miller, who is now in charge of detainee operations in Iraq, remarked on Saturday, “The procedures established for interrogations in Iraq were sanctioned under the Geneva Conventions and authorized in U.S. Army manuals. All permissible”—permissible—“interrogation activities were within the requirements and boundaries of applicable provisions of the Geneva Conventions.” We are currently investigating why soldiers—some soldiers—at Abu Ghraib did not abide by those understood procedures and guidelines.

Early in the war on terrorism, long before the war in Iraq, the President made a determination that the Geneva Conventions did not apply to al Qaeda detainees. That decision was made because the Geneva Conventions govern conflicts between states, and the al Qaeda is not a state, much less a signatory of the Geneva Conventions. Moreover, the Geneva Conventions forbid the targeting of civilians, and require that military forces wear designated uniforms to distinguish them from noncombatants. Terrorists don’t care about the Geneva Conventions, nor do they abide by its guidelines. They deliberately target civilians, for example, and have brutalized and murdered innocent Americans. To grant terrorists the rights they so cruelly reject would make a mockery of the Geneva Conventions.

Nevertheless, President Bush did order—did order—that detainees held at Guantanamo be treated humanely and consistent with the Geneva Conventions’ principles. In fact, those detainees in the war on terror are being provided with many of the privileges typically afforded to enemy prisoners of war.

The notion that this decision in some way undermined the Geneva Conventions or created a poor climate is false. To the contrary, the administration made this decision with the objective of assuring that those who would claim protection under its auspices, and not act in keeping with its intent, did not abuse the Geneva Conventions. Far from disrespect, the decision was made out of a notion of respect. The notion of a departmental belief that the alleged climate created and led to abuse in Iraq is, therefore, not in keeping with clear and stated determination to adhere to the Geneva Conventions.

Second, Major General Miller’s recommendations. Major General Miller was sent to Iraq—it was late August 2003—based on his experience with the flow of information gained by interrogation at Guantanamo Bay. He was sent under Joint Staff auspices—and, as I said on Friday before this committee, with my encouragement—to determine if the flow of information to CJTF-7 and back to the subordinate commands could be improved. He laid out an approach to do this in a series of recommendations to General Sanchez. He had no directive authority in that visit.

One recommendation on detention operations was to dedicate and train a detention guard force subordinate to the joint intelligence commander that would, in the words of General Taguba's report and others, "set the conditions for the successful interrogation and exploitation of internees and detainees." In making this recommendation, Major General Miller was underscoring the need for military police (MP) and military intelligence (MI) personnel, both of whom serve different functions, to act in a fashion such that the one, MP, did not undermine the efforts of the other, MI, to discover, during interrogation, the information that was important to coalition forces and to the lives of Iraqi civilians. Consequently, he underscored the need for a legal review of his recommendations by a dedicated command staff judge advocate (SJA).

With respect to detention operations, Major General Miller noted that their purpose is to provide a safe, secure, and humane environment that supports the expeditious collection of intelligence. In addition, he observed that detention operations must be structured to ensure the detention environment focuses the internees' confidence and attention on their interrogators. He recommended training in building the teamwork the interrogator and detention staffs needed to accomplish the objectives.

The order placing the MP at Abu Ghraib under the tactical control of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade—and here, for more of the detail, I can defer to General Smith—but on November 19, 2003, General Sanchez issued an order effectively placing Abu Ghraib under the tactical control of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade. This order was within the authority of General Sanchez to give. As I say, Lieutenant General Smith might elaborate on the reasons that the order was given. But what it did is, it gave a senior officer responsibility for the facility. For the facility. We needed someone to take care of such matters as security, force protection, the internal security, living conditions for the troops, and other things. It did not give, as far as I understand it, the MI brigade commander the authority over MP operations. If I might note, if you look at General Karpinski's CNN interview last night, she makes comments to that effect.

Let me stress that the promulgation of the order in no way changed the rules governing the conduct of MP and military personnel in Iraq with respect to the laws of war, the Geneva Conventions, CENTCOM directions, or CJTF-7 directions and instructions.

Third, the role of contractors. Contractors may not perform interrogations except under the supervision of military personnel. There may have been circumstances under which this regulation was not followed. I cannot tell you that it was followed in all respects. This is a matter that General Fay is now examining. In addition, contractors may not supervise or give orders or direction to military personnel. While contractors are not under military discipline—another issue raised on Friday—they are subject to suspension from their contracts by the government for cause. Furthermore, criminal sanctions for any crimes a contractor may commit may be available in U.S. Federal Court and may be referred to U.S. Federal Court.

Fourth, with respect to the oversight of military intelligence criminal investigation in the operations of combatant commanders, I have, on page 8 of the statement that I prepared for you, listed the roles of the office I presently hold, that of the joint commands and that of the Services. I then go on and talk about oversight of criminal investigations and the role of the DOD Inspector General's (IG) office and the counterintelligence oversight.

On page 9, I begin the actions underway. The SECDEF reviewed those with you on Friday, and I will not take your time here unless the committee wishes to return to them, but to add one development since we were here last, and that is that the SECDEF is now preparing a personal message for the men and women of the Armed Forces, underscoring his dismay over the events at Abu Ghraib, expressing his confidence in the valor and professionalism of the men and women, stressing, once again, that the Geneva Conventions apply to our conflict in Iraq, and expressing his confidence in the ultimate success of our mission in Iraq.

Mr. Chairman, this is an occasion to demonstrate to the world the difference between those who believe in democracy and those who do not. We value human life. We believe in the right to individual freedom and the rule of law. For those beliefs, we send our men and women abroad to protect that right for our own people and to give millions of others hope for freedom in the future. Part of that mission is making sure that when wrongdoing or scandal occurs, it's not covered up, but exposed, investigated, publicly disclosed, and the guilty brought to justice.

I believe we can repair the damage done to our credibility in the region. If we hold true to our principles and continue to keep our commitments to the people of Iraq and Afghanistan, eventually the nobility of that mission will touch the hearts of more people in the Arab world. I am confident of this because of the outstanding service that has been rendered by the vast majority of the men and women of the U.S. Armed Forces.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The prepared statement of Secretary Cambone follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT BY HON. STEPHEN A. CAMBONE

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee. We are here today to continue the discussion on the terrible activities at Abu Ghraib begun last Friday by the SECDEF, the CJCS, Acting Secretary of the Army, Army Chief of Staff, and the Deputy Commander, CENTCOM, who is with us today.

Before going further, let me say that we are dismayed by what took place. The Iraqi detainees are human beings, they were in U.S. custody, we had an obligation to treat them right, and we didn't do that. That was wrong. I associate myself without reservation to the sentiments expressed by the SECDEF: "To those Iraqis who were mistreated by members of U.S. Armed Forces I offer my deepest apology. It was un-American, and it was inconsistent with the values of our Nation."

A number of issues related to those events arose during the hearing last Friday or have been the subject of public commentary before or since. I'd like to take a moment to address some of them.

First, with respect to the application of the Geneva Conventions to detainees in Iraq: From the outset of the war in Iraq, the United States government has recognized and made clear that the Geneva Conventions applied to our activities in that country. Members of our Armed Forces should have been aware of that.

If they were not, Lieutenant General Sanchez, CJTF-7 Commander, reminded the forces under his command of the obligation.

Nevertheless, there clearly was a breakdown in following Geneva Conventions procedures at Abu Ghraib, and we are in the process of investigating right now why that happened.

As Major General Miller, who is now in charge of detainee operations in Iraq, remarked on Saturday, the procedures established for interrogations in Iraq were sanctioned under the Geneva Conventions and authorized in U.S. Army manuals. All permissible interrogation activities were within the requirements and boundaries of applicable provisions of the Geneva Conventions.

We are currently investigating why some soldiers at Abu Ghraib did not abide by those understood procedures and guidelines.

Early in the war on terrorism, long before the war in Iraq, the administration made a determination that the Geneva Conventions did not apply to al Qaeda detainees.

That decision was made because the Geneva Conventions govern conflicts between states and the al Qaeda is not a state, much less a signatory of the convention. Moreover, the conventions forbid the targeting of civilians and requiring that military forces wear designated uniforms to distinguish them from noncombatants. Terrorists don't care about the Geneva Conventions nor do they obey its guidelines. They deliberately target civilians, for example, and have brutalized and murdered innocent Americans in their custody.

To grant terrorists the rights they so cruelly reject would make a mockery of the Geneva Conventions. Nonetheless, President Bush did order that detainees held at Guantanamo be treated humanely and consistent with the Geneva Conventions' principles. In fact, those detainees in the war on terror are being provided with many privileges typically afforded to enemy prisoners of war (EPW).

The notion that this decision in some way undermined the Geneva Conventions is false. To the contrary, the administration made this decision with the objective of assuring that those who would claim protection under its auspices and not act in keeping with its intent did not abuse the Geneva Conventions. Far from disrespect, the decision was made out of respect.

The notion of a departmental belief that the alleged climate created and led to abuse in Iraq is therefore not in keeping with clear and stated determination to adhere to the Geneva Conventions.

Second, Major General Miller's recommendations: Major General Miller was sent to Iraq based on his experience with the flow of information gained by interrogation at Guantanamo Bay. He was sent under Joint Staff auspices to determine if the flow of information to CJTF-7 and back to the subordinate commands could be improved. His report laid out an approach to do this in a series of recommendations to General Sanchez.

One recommendation on detention operations was to dedicate and train a detention guard force subordinate to the Joint Interrogation and Detention Center (JIDC) commander that "sets the conditions" for the successful interrogation and exploitation of internees/detainees. In making this recommendation, Major General Miller was underscoring the need for MP and MI personnel to act in a fashion such that the one did not undermine the efforts of the other to discover, during interrogation, information that was important to coalition forces and the lives of Iraqi civilians. Consequently he underscored the need for legal review by a dedicated command SJA.

With respect to detention operations, Major General Miller noted that their purpose is to provide a safe, secure, and humane environment that supports the expeditious collection of intelligence.

In addition, he observed that detention operations must be structured to ensure the detention environment focuses the internee's confidence and attention on their interrogators. He recommended training in building the teamwork between the interrogator and detention staffs to accomplish this objective.

Order placing MPs tactical operation (TACON) to MI: On November 19, 2003 General Sanchez issued an order effectively placing Abu Ghraib, under tactical control of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade. This order was within the authority of General Sanchez to give and Lieutenant General Smith might elaborate on the reasons this order was given. It gave a senior officer responsibility for the facility. This included force protection, internal security, living conditions for the troops, and so forth. It did not give the MI brigade commander authority over MP operations. Let me stress that its promulgation in no way changed the rules governing the conduct of the MP and MI personnel in Iraq with respect to the laws of war, the Geneva Conventions, CENTCOM direction or CJTF-7 directions and instructions.

Third, role of contractors: I am informed that contractors may not perform interrogations except under the supervision of military personnel. There may have been circumstances under which this regulation was not followed. This is a matter that General Fay will examine. In addition, contractors may not supervise or give orders or direction to military personnel. While contractors are not under military discipline, they are subject to suspension from their contract by the government. Furthermore, criminal sanctions for any crimes a contractor may commit may be available in U.S. Federal Court.

Fourth, with respect to oversight of MI, criminal investigation, and the operations of combatant commanders.

- Intelligence support—The USDI ensures that intelligence support across DOD meets warfighters' requirements. This includes ensuring the alignments of policies and programs with current operational requirements, oversight of certain special access programs and development of intelligence-related strategies and assessments. Joint commands provide oversight to "intelligence activities," consistent with their ongoing oversight responsibilities for "operations." Services have responsibility for policy, training, doctrine, and allocation of forces to joint commands. Services are also responsible for counterintelligence investigations and oversight.
- Criminal investigations—The DODIG oversees the military departments' criminal investigative missions. Within the DODIG's office, the office of Investigative Policy and Oversight develops and maintains DOD policy addressing investigative and law enforcement matters in DOD, as well as corresponding legislative issues. Specifically, the Oversight Directorate examines investigative and law enforcement operations and programs to assess effectiveness and efficiency, compliance with established policy and procedures, and need for new or revised policy applicable to investigations or law enforcement.

Actions taken or underway:

A. Lieutenant General Sanchez, Commander, CJTF-7, launched a criminal investigation immediately.

B. He asked Major General Taguba for an administrative review of procedures at the Abu Ghraib facility. These have resulted already in criminal or administrative actions against many individuals, including the relief of the prison chain of command and criminal referrals of several soldiers directly involved in abuse.

C. The Army has launched an IG Review of detainee operations throughout Afghanistan and Iraq, which continues.

D. The Army has initiated an investigation of Reserve training with respect to MI and MP function.

E. Lieutenant General Sanchez asked for an Army Intelligence review of the circumstances discussed in Major General Taguba's report.

F. The SECDEF has directed the Naval IG to review our operations at Guantanamo and the Charleston Naval Brig.

G. Several senior former officials, led by former SECDEF James Schlesinger, have been asked to examine the pace, breadth, and thoroughness of the existing investigations, and to determine whether additional investigations need to be initiated. They are being asked to report their findings within 45 days of taking up their duties, and the SECDEF will encourage them to meet with you to keep you apprised.

H. The SECDEF is preparing a personal message for the men and women of the armed forces underscoring his dismay at events at Abu Ghraib, expressing his confidence in the valor and professionalism, stressing once again that the Geneva Conventions applies to our conflict in Iraq and expressing his confidence in the ultimate success of our mission in Iraq.

This is an occasion to demonstrate to the world the difference between those who believe in democracy and human rights and those who believe in rule by the terrorist code. We value human life; we believe in their right to individual freedom and the rule of law. For those beliefs, we send our men and women of the Armed Forces abroad—to protect that right for our own people and to give millions of others the hope of a future of freedom. Part of that mission is making sure that when wrongdoing or scandal occurs it is not covered up, but exposed, investigated, publicly disclosed—and the guilty brought to justice.

I believe we can repair the damage done to our credibility in the region. If we hold true to our principles and continue to keep our commitments to the people of Iraq and Afghanistan, eventually the nobility of that mission will touch the hearts of more people in the Arab world. I am confident of this because of the outstanding service that has been rendered by the vast majority of the men and women of U.S. Armed Forces.

Thank you Mr. Chairman. My colleagues have some comments to make.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Secretary Cambone. General Smith, do you have a few opening comments?

STATEMENT OF LT. GEN. LANCE L. SMITH, USAF, DEPUTY COMMANDER, UNITED STATES CENTRAL COMMAND

General SMITH. Senator Warner, Senator Levin, members of the committee, sir, I'll stand by the comments that I made on Friday, but to add that, once again, on behalf of General Abizaid and all the men and women of CENTCOM, we regret very much that these events ever occurred, and apologize to those who are victims of the abuse.

I would like to assure you that, in every case where the investigations have had recommendations and findings, that we have either implemented the recommendations or are in the process of making the fixes necessary to alleviate the problems, sir.

That in all cases where we have had recommendations and findings, they have either been implemented or we are in the process of implementing fixes to ensure that those gaps that we had, either in policy, procedures, or leadership, are being fixed.

We, at the same time, have a number of investigations that are ongoing that should give us more answers to some of the questions that we all have about what actually went on in the Abu Ghraib prison, the most significant of which is the General Fay investigation over the MI brigade. We will continue to try and make every effort to ensure that we implement the proper procedures, policies, and practices to ensure that this never happens again, sir.

Thank you, Senator Warner.

Chairman WARNER. General Taguba, we welcome you.

STATEMENT OF MG ANTONIO M. TAGUBA, USA, DEPUTY COM-MANDING GENERAL FOR SUPPORT, COALITION FORCES LAND COMPONENT COMMAND

General TAGUBA. Thank you, sir.

Mr. Chairman, Senator Levin, members of the committee, good morning, all.

I am Major General Antonio M. Taguba, the Deputy Commanding General for Support, U.S. Army Central Command and Coalition Forces Land Component Command (CFLCC) that is headquartered in Camp Arifjan, Kuwait.

Let me continue, sir. On January 24, 2004, I was directed by Lieutenant General David McKiernan, the Commanding General. I sent CFLCC to conduct an investigation into the allegations of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib prison, which is also known as the Baghdad Central Confinement Facility. I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you today to discuss the purpose, the findings, and the recommendation of that investigation.

The purpose of the investigation, with specific instructions, were as follows:

First, inquire into all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the recent allegations of detainee abuse, specifically allegations of maltreatment at the Abu Ghraib prison.

Second, inquire into detainee escapes and accountability lapses, as reported by CJTF-7, specifically allegations concerning these events at the Abu Ghraib prison.

Third, investigate the training, standards, employment, command policies, internal procedures, and command climate in the 800th MP Brigade, as appropriate.

Finally, make specific findings of fact concerning all aspects of this investigation, and make recommendations for corrective action, as appropriate.

My investigation team consisted of officers and senior enlisted personnel who are military policemen, experts in detention and corrections, judge advocates, psychiatrists, and public affairs officers. At the onset, I did not have MI officers or experts in military interrogation on my team, because the scope of my investigation dealt principally with detention operations and not intelligence-gathering or interrogations operations.

However, during the course of my team's investigation, we gathered evidence pertaining to the involvement of several MI personnel or contractors assigned to the 205th MI Brigade in the alleged detainee abuses at Abu Ghraib. As stated in the findings of the investigation, we recommended that a separate investigation be initiated under the provisions of Procedure 15, Army Regulation 381-10, concerning possible improper interrogation practices in this case. Again, my task was limited to the allegations of detainee abuse involving MP personnel and the policies, procedures, and command climate of the 800th MP Brigade.

As I assembled the investigation team, my specific instructions to my teammates were clear: maintain our objectivity and integrity throughout the course of our mission in what I considered to be a very grave, highly sensitive, and serious situation; to be mindful of our personal values and the moral values of our Nation; to maintain the Army values in all of our dealings; and to be complete, thorough, and fair in the course of the investigation. Bottom line, we'll follow our conscience and do what is morally right.

As agonizing as this investigation was, I commend the exceptional professionalism of my teammates, their extraordinary efforts, and the outstanding manner by which they carried out my instructions. I also commend the courage and selfless service of those soldiers and sailors who brought these allegations to light, discovered evidence of abuse, and turned it over to the military law enforcement authorities. The criminal acts of a few stand in stark contrast to the high professionalism, competence, and moral integrity of countless active, Guard, and Army Reserve soldiers that we encountered in this investigation.

At the end of the day, a few soldiers and civilians conspired to abuse and conduct egregious acts of violence against detainees and other civilians outside the bounds of international law and the Geneva Conventions. Their incomprehensible acts, caught in their own personal record of photographs and video clips, have seriously maligned and impugned the courageous acts of thousands of U.S. and coalition forces. It put into question the reputation of our Nation and the reputation of those who continue to serve in uniform and who would willingly sacrifice their lives to safeguard our freedom.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak before you today, and I look forward to answering your questions.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, General. I must say that I was very heartened by your use of the phrase "Follow our conscience. Do what is morally right."

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. I think you've done that.

Colleagues, we'll have a 6-minute round. We take note that votes will start at 11:30, but it's the intention of Senator Levin and myself to continue this hearing on into approximately the 12:30 to 12:45 time frame, in hopes that further opportunity can be given to members for question.

Senator INHOFE. Mr. Chairman, will there be one round?

Chairman WARNER. We'll continue until 12:45, and we'll do our best given the votes. We will try to keep the hearing going during a portion of the votes. Thank you.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Secretary Cambone, my understanding is, and in my briefings with you—and I thank you for discussing these matters with me over the weekend—that your office has the overall responsibility for policy concerning the handling of detainees in the global war on terrorism. Is that correct?

Secretary CAMBONE. Not precisely, sir. The overall policy for the handling of detainees rests with the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy by directive.

Chairman WARNER. Wait a minute. Rests with—

Secretary CAMBONE. The Under Secretary of Defense for Policy by directive. My office became involved in this issue primarily from the perspective of assuring that there was a flow of intelligence back to the commands, and done in an efficient and effective way.

Chairman WARNER. Then I would presume that it would be incumbent upon this committee to get the Under Secretary for Policy over, and let him provide this committee with such knowledge that he has.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir, and that—his responsibilities—and I have talked with Mr. Feith about this—he issued any number of statements and directives, to the effect that detainees in Iraq, civilian or military, were to be treated under the provisions of the Geneva Conventions.

Chairman WARNER. Did you work with him in that?

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir, I was aware of that work, and knowledgeable of it, and endorsed it, of course.

Chairman WARNER. I'm trying to ascertain the degree to which the civilian authority in the DOD, under the SECDEF, be it yourself—

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER.—or the other under secretary, reviewed the procedures by which interrogations took place in our places of incarceration, and, most specifically, by those doing it in Iraq.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. You did review the procedures that were being followed for the interrogation of detainees in Iraq?

Secretary CAMBONE. We gave direction that the—the DOD gave direction that the Geneva Conventions were to be followed. The procedures for interrogation are established via the use of—and General Taguba and General Smith can clarify—but they are established on the basis of approved techniques for interrogation. There is a list of those, and you will find them in Army doctrine and manuals.

Chairman WARNER. Right.

Secretary CAMBONE. Those are approved for use by the commanding general. Any exceptions to those activities that he authorizes, he would then set terms and conditions for exceptions to his guidance. At the level of those techniques and so forth, they were signed out at the command level, and not in the DOD.

Chairman WARNER. Now, you've had time to reflect on this. In simple and plain words, how do you think this happened?

Secretary CAMBONE. With the caveat, sir, that I don't know the facts, it's, for me, hard to explain. I have spent a good deal of time over the last 10 days to 2 weeks looking at the various elements of this issue, and I think what we did have here was a problem of leadership with respect to the 372nd Battalion. That was the MP unit.

Chairman WARNER. Failure of leadership starting at what level?

Secretary CAMBONE. That is decidedly more difficult to say, sir. Again, in simple terms, you asked. There was clear direction moving down the chain from the SECDEF to General Abizaid to General Sanchez to those people who were in charge of the MP. That, in this case, is General Karpinski. She had, I think it's eight battalions—

General SMITH. Yes, sir.

Secretary CAMBONE.—eight battalions under her control, lodged at a large number of locations. She, as best I understand it, was not frequently present at Abu Ghraib.

Abu Ghraib, itself—and let's remember the time frame that we're talking about. We're coming out of the period of active combat operations. We have a large number of detainees who are being moved from a facility—

Chairman WARNER. I'm going to ask you to be brief, because I'm holding myself to my time.

Secretary CAMBONE. I understand, sir—moved them from temporary facilities into permanent facilities, the places being mortared and attacked frequently. The local commander was unable to bring order to that place. For that reason, I would argue, General Sanchez looked to Colonel Pappas, the head of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade, and gave him the responsibility, then, for taking care of Abu Ghraib as an installation.

Chairman WARNER. All right. Now, the reports that were developed by international organizations—the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and others—in my understanding, they came to your office for an assessment and a determination as to what was to be done in response to those reports.

Secretary CAMBONE. No, the reports that are at issue here is—the ICRC, the International Committee of the Red Cross—

Chairman WARNER. But you told me, I thought, over the weekend, that you—

Secretary CAMBONE. I've seen the report.

Chairman WARNER. You've seen them, and——

Secretary CAMBONE. I have seen it.

Chairman WARNER.—you took some steps to implement some of their recommendations?

Secretary CAMBONE. Steps were taken to implement their recommendations. I saw those reports well after they were issued. The one in question was issued on November 6, 2003. It was addressed, to my knowledge, to General Karpinski, and she replied, at her command level, on December 24, 2003, to the ICRC.

Chairman WARNER. Who else in the building had access to those reports? Did they reach the SECDEF's level?

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir, they did not. Those reports, those working papers—again, as far as I understand it—were delivered at the command level. The process is designed so that the ICRC can engage with the local commanders and make those kinds of improvements that are necessary in a more collaborative environment than in an adversarial one, and so they tend to try to work these problems at that level.

There was, sir, just for the record, another paper developed by the ICRC, which was delivered to the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) in February 2004. That paper is a historical paper. It is a review of activity from March or so of 2003 through the end of January.

Chairman WARNER. My time is running out. Sorry to cut you off. We've asked for those reports.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir. The SECDEF is going to give them to you, sir.

Chairman WARNER. General Taguba, in your orders were there any restrictions placed upon you by General McKiernan, Generals Sanchez or Abizaid, in the scope of your inquiry? In other words, were you given a free hand to do what you felt had to be done?

General TAGUBA. Sir, the scope, as I described to you, was related to the detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib. However, because there were detention operations under the purview of the 800th MP Brigade, we also looked at the operations at Camp Bucca, the high-value detention facility at Camp Cropper, and also the Mujahedin-e Khalq (MEK) facility at Camp Ashraf.

Chairman WARNER. I ask the same question to you. In simple, layman's language, so it can be understood, what do you think went wrong, in terms of the failure of discipline and the failure of this interrogation process to be consistent with known regulations, national and international? Also, to what extent do you have knowledge of any participation by other than U.S. military—namely, Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and/or contractors—in the performance of the interrogations?

General TAGUBA. Sir, as far as your last question—I'll answer that first—the comments about participation of other government agencies or contractors were related to us through interviews that we conducted, it was related to our examination of written statements and, of course, some other records.

With regards to your first question, sir, there was a failure of leadership——

Chairman WARNER. In other words, in the material that you've now submitted to the Senate, or the DOD has submitted, we will find in there all of your knowledge with respect to participation by other government agencies.

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. It's nine volumes and about 6,000 pages. We just got it yesterday.

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Can you give us a quick synopsis of participation by other U.S. Government agencies?

General TAGUBA. Sir, they refer to other government agencies as OGAs or MIs. When I asked for clarification, it's because of the way they wore their uniform. Some of them did not wear a uniform. So I would ask them to clarify further if they knew any of these people, and they gave us names as stipulated on their statements. They also gave us names of those who are of MI, uniform MI in—personnel in the U.S. Army. That was substantiated by the comments made to us by other witnesses as we conducted our interviews.

Chairman WARNER. All right. In simple words, your own soldiers' language, how did this happen?

General TAGUBA. Failure in leadership, sir, from the brigade commander on down, lack of discipline, no training whatsoever, and no supervision. Supervisory omission was rampant. Those are my comments.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator Levin.

Senator LEVIN. General Taguba, the ICRC said that the MI officers at the prison confirmed to them that these activities were all part of the MI process. Would you agree with the ICRC that coercive practices, such as holding prisoners naked for extended periods of time, were used, in their words, "in a systematic way" as part of a MI process at the prison?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I did not read the ICRC report.

Senator LEVIN. Would you agree with that conclusion?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir, based on the evidence that was presented to us and what we gathered and what we reviewed. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. Now, that's more than a failure of leadership. That's an active decision on the part of leadership. It's not just oversight or negligence or neglect or sloppiness, but purposeful, willful determination to use these techniques as part of an interrogation process. Would you include that in your definition of failure of leadership?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir, they were.

Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone told us a few minutes ago that the shift in command at the prison did not mean that the MI commander had command authority over the MPs. But your report says the opposite, that the decision to transfer that command to the MI commander did effectively put that commander in charge of the MP. Now, do you stick by your statement?

General TAGUBA. Is that to me, sir?

Senator LEVIN. Yes.

General TAGUBA. Sir, I did not question the order that was given to Colonel Pappas on the fragmentary order (FRAGO) that he received on November 19, 2003. That was not under my purview. I did ask him to elaborate on what his responsibilities were.

Senator LEVIN. Your report states that that change in command, “effectively made an MI officer rather than an MP officer responsible for the MP units conducting detainee operations at that facility.” Is that your conclusion?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir, because the order gave him TACON of all units that were residing at Abu Ghraib.

Senator LEVIN. All right. Secretary Cambone, do you disagree with that?

Secretary CAMBONE. TACON is——

Senator LEVIN. Do you disagree——

Secretary CAMBONE.—reflected here.

Senator LEVIN.—with what the General just said?

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. Pardon?

Secretary CAMBONE. I do. I do not believe that the order placing Colonel Pappas in charge gave him the authority to direct the MP’s activities in direct operational control (OPCON) conditions. Is that true, General?

Senator LEVIN. Thank you. No, it’s okay. Let me just keep going. You’ll have just a disagreement over that.

Secretary Cambone, in an article in last Sunday’s Washington Post, in April 2003 the DOD approved about 20 interrogation techniques for use at Guantanamo that permit reversing normal sleep patterns of detainees and exposing them to heat/cold sensory assault. The use of these techniques required the approval of senior Pentagon officials and, in some cases, of Secretary Rumsfeld, according to that article. These procedures, according to the Pentagon spokesman, Brian Whitman, are controlled and approved on a case-by-case basis. Then it says that the defense and intelligence officials said that similar guidelines had been approved for use on “high-value detainees in Iraq, those suspected of terrorism or of having knowledge of insurgency operations.” Is that true? Were those techniques adopted for Guantanamo? Were they then used or accepted or adopted for Iraq?

Secretary CAMBONE. They are command-level guidelines for the use in interrogation. They are, in some cases, the same; and, in many cases, not.

Senator LEVIN. They’re not the same in Iraq?

Secretary CAMBONE. Not the same.

Senator LEVIN. In Iraq. Can you give us a copy of the guidelines?

Secretary CAMBONE. I can do that.

[The information referred to follows:]

[Deleted.]

Senator LEVIN. Both. So there were specific guidelines for Guantanamo, and they were different from the guidelines for Iraq.

Secretary CAMBONE. I believe that they were, and I will give you the comparisons.

Senator LEVIN. All right. You’ll give those to the committee, then. Let me go to another issue.

There was an interview in the New York Times last week in which Major General Miller said that 50 techniques that the military officially uses in prisoner interrogations—including hooding, sleep deprivation, and forcing prisoners into stress positions—have been adopted. Are you familiar with those 50 techniques?

Secretary CAMBONE. As I said in my opening statement, there are those techniques in Army doctrine, yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. Those are 50 techniques?

Secretary CAMBONE. I don't know that it's 50, sir. There is a—
Senator LEVIN. But it includes stress positions?

Secretary CAMBONE. I believe they do.

[Subsequently, the witness provided the following information for the record:] It does not.

Senator LEVIN. All right, and is that something that you will also supply to the committee?

Secretary CAMBONE. We can supply the manual to you, yes, sir.

PREFACE

This manual provides doctrinal guidance, techniques, and procedures governing employment of interrogators as human intelligence (HUMINT) collection assets in support of the commander's intelligence needs. It outlines the interrogator's role within the intelligence collection effort and the supported unit's day-to-day operations. Details are presented on how interrogation assets accomplish their assigned collection mission.

Material in this manual applies to operations in low-, mid-, and high-intensity conflicts. Principles outlined are valid under conditions involving use of electronic warfare (EW) or nuclear, biological, or chemical (NBC) weapons.

This manual is intended for use by interrogators as well as commanders, staff officers, and military intelligence (MI) personnel charged with the responsibility of the interrogation collection effort. Unless otherwise stated, descriptions pertaining to duties, functions, and responsibilities of the G1, G2, G3, G4, and G5 apply to equivalent positions at other organizational echelons.

Interrogation is the HUMINT subdiscipline responsible for MI exploitation of enemy personnel and documents to answer the supported specific information requirements (SIR). These SIR responses, along with those of other MI disciplines, are correlated to satisfy the force commander's priority intelligence requirements (PIR) and intelligence requirements (IR).

During previous armed conflicts, interrogators contributed significantly to the overall intelligence collection effort. They revalidated and established keystone interrogation doctrine (for example, theater interrogation facility [TIF] operations) and documented valuable lessons learned. This knowledge became the genesis for evolving interrogation doctrine.

During Southwest Asia operations, interrogators organized and operated a massive document exploitation (DOCEX) effort. Interrogation units screened, interrogated, or debriefed 49,350 enemy prisoners of war (EPWs), and gathered enough captured enemy documents (CEDs) for DOCEX to fill 18 trailer trucks.

MI interrogation units are a proven and valued collection asset. This manual incorporates the operational experiences and lessons learned. It builds upon existing doctrine and moves interrogation into the 21st century.

These principles and techniques of interrogation are to be used within the constraints established by the following:

- The Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ).
- Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field of August 12, 1949, hereinafter referred to as GWS.

- Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War of August 12, 1949, hereinafter referred to as GPW.
- Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of August 12, 1949, hereinafter referred to as GC.

Doctrine in this publication conforms with and supports principles contained in FM 34-1.

This publication implements the following Standardization Agreements (STANAGs):

- STANAG 2033, Interrogation of Prisoners of War, Edition 6.
- STANAG 2044, Procedures for Dealing with Prisoners of War, Edition 5.
- STANAG 2084, Handling and Reporting of Captured Enemy Equipment and Documents, Edition 5.

This publication also complies with STANAG 1059 and Quadripartite Standardization Agreements (QSTAGs) 170, 523, and 528.

The use of the terms EPW, detainee, and source are interchangeable during interrogation process.

Unless this publication states otherwise, masculine nouns or pronouns do not refer exclusively to men.

The proponent of this publication is the US Army Intelligence Center. Send comments and recommendations on DA Form 2028 (Recommended Changes to Publications and Blank Forms) to Headquarters, US Army Intelligence Center, ATTN: ATSI-TDL-D, Fort Huachuca, AZ 85613-6000.

CHAPTER 1

MILITARY INTELLIGENCE MISSIONS AND INTELLIGENCE PREPARATION OF THE BATTLEFIELD

This manual is about interrogation operations. The purpose of this chapter is to define the interrogation mission and its critical elements; describe battlefield operations, IEW operations, and the intelligence processes, disciplines, and the mission, enemy, troops, terrain, and time available (METT-T) factors that shape and drive the interrogation process.

It also addresses the personal qualities and special areas of knowledge of the interrogator and the capabilities and limitations of interrogation. It includes information on the various levels of conflict, interrogation missions, intelligence preparation of the battlefield (IPB) and the intelligence cycle. The level of detail is structured to assist you in understanding the interrogation tactics, techniques, and procedures described in the remainder of the manual.

WARFIGHTING DOCTRINE

Battlefield operations demand seizing and maintaining the initiative. When operations are properly designed and executed, initiative accrues significant benefits from the outset of an operation to final victory. It permits attacking where, when, and what; while forcing the enemy to react and try to adapt to our operations.

To gain the initiative, the commander must—

- See the enemy early and determine the capabilities and intentions of the enemy.
- Find and track enemy follow-on echelons.
- Identify enemy high-value targets (HVTs), which, if successfully attacked, will contribute to the degradation of important enemy battlefield functions.
- Identify, locate, and develop the required targeting data for the attack of high-payoff targets (HPTs), which, if successfully attacked, will contribute to the success of friendly plans.
- Detect enemy weaknesses and develop the necessary data to support the exploitation of these weaknesses.
- Effectively use electronic warfare (EW) assets to support battlefield operations while protecting friendly use of the electromagnetic spectrum.

THE INTELLIGENCE CYCLE

Intelligence operations follow a four-phase process known as the intelligence cycle, which is shown at Figure 1-1. The intelligence cycle is oriented to the

- Determine the enemy's capability and guard against that capability.
- Protect friendly forces and operations from enemy intelligence collection operations.
- Ensure the enemy is defeated.
- Use the weather and terrain to friendly advantage.

The commander uses defensive and offensive operations to destroy enemy first-echelon forces and deep-attack to simultaneously delay, disrupt, and manipulate enemy follow-on forces. The commander anticipates, creates, and exploits windows of opportunity, using flexible battle planning, to gain the initiative through offensive operations.

By effectively employing maneuver and fire support assets, manipulating the enemy, and expertly using the weather and the terrain, the friendly commander can successfully defeat a superior enemy force. OPERATION DESERT STORM is an example of the successful application of this doctrine.

IEW support is vital to the successful planning and execution of battlefield operations at all echelons. Intelligence support at brigade and battalion levels focuses primarily on close operations, while at division it focuses on close and deep operations. Corps is the focal point for intelligence operations that support rear and deep operations.

commander's mission. Supervising and planning are inherent in all phases of the cycle.

The intelligence cycle is continuous. Although the four phases are conducted in sequence, all are conducted concurrently. While available information is processed and additional information is collected, the intelligence staff is planning and directing the collection effort to meet new demands. Previously collected and processed information (intelligence) is disseminated as soon as it is available or needed.

INTELLIGENCE DISCIPLINES

The IEW system includes three MI disciplines: signals intelligence (SIGINT), imagery intelligence (IMINT), and HUMINT. Intelligence interrogation falls within the realm of HUMINT.

SIGINT

SIGINT is derived from the intercept, analysis, and exploitation of threat communications and noncommunications radio-electronic emissions.

IMINT

IMINT is obtained from the analysis of radar, photographic, infrared, and electro-optical imagery.

HUMINT

HUMINT is obtained from information collected from human sources and consists of the following intelligence collection operations:

- Interrogation of EPWs, civilian detainees, insurgents, defectors, refugees, displaced persons, and agents or suspected agents.
- Long-range surveillance (LRS) patrols.
- Strategic debriefing.
- Controlled collection operations.
- Open-source exploitation, to include publications and broadcasts.
- Reports of contact from forward units.
- Observation and listening posts.
- Low-level source operations (LLSO).
- HUMINT liaison contacts.

After World War II, the US General Board on Intelligence surveyed 54 division G2s, 18 corps G2s, and 7

Army G2s. It concluded that 43 percent of all intelligence produced in the European theater of operations was from HUMINT, and 84 percent of the HUMINT was from interrogation. The majority of those surveyed agreed that interrogation was the most valuable of all collection operations.

HUMINT is vital in all combat operations, regardless of echelon or intensity of conflict. By nature, HUMINT lends itself to the collection of information about the enemy's thought processes and intentions. HUMINT can provide information on almost any topic of intelligence interest, including order of battle (OB) factors, as well as scientific and technical (S&T) intelligence subjects. During OPERATION DESERT STORM, interrogators collected information which helped to—

- Develop a plan to breach Iraqi defensive belts.
- Confirm Iraqi supply-line interdiction by coalition air strikes.
- Identify diminishing Iraqi troop morale.
- Identify a US PW captured during the battle of Kafji.

INTELLIGENCE AND ELECTRONIC WARFARE OPERATIONS

The intelligence cycle supports six tasks which are common to all echelons and which must be worked, at least in part, concurrently to satisfy the needs of the commander. The commander may have to prioritize these functions when resource and time constraints dictate.

INDICATIONS AND WARNING (I&W)

I&W identifies major shifts in enemy tactics, operations, and strategy which will set or change the terms of battle. They protect the commander from surprise and identify areas or times of risk by detecting enemy actions that are counter to planning assumptions.

- At the operational level, they identify potential enemy action and determine the need for a military response and the probability of hostilities.
- At the tactical level, they focus on the timing of hostilities rather than on their probability.

I&W prevent surprise and minimize risk through the early identification of enemy activities and capabilities.

INTELLIGENCE PREPARATION OF THE BATTLEFIELD

IPB integrates the environment with the enemy's fighting doctrine and actions. It reveals his capabilities and vulnerabilities and allows the commander to systematically predict his actions. It also allows him to understand the battlefield and how to synchronize all of his battlefield operating systems for maximum effect.

The results of IPB and staff wargaming are used to coordinate and synchronize the intelligence system regardless of the echelon at which it is performed or the intensity of conflict. IPB is more than preparation of the field of battle during hostilities. IPB considers the entire environment of conflict, supporting contingency as well as planning operations.

- At the strategic level, IPB focuses on all factors that contribute to military potential and includes political, economic, sociological, and S&T aspects of the enemy's ability and intent to conduct military operations.
- At the operational level, IPB identifies the enemy's political, economic or military center of gravity, the lines of operation, and the points in time and geography where the decisive engagements of a campaign will occur. It also predicts the courses of action (COAs) the enemy is likely to follow. This is done by incorporating political, economic, social, and geographical factors, as well as military factors (such as his military potential and ability to apply air, ground, and naval power).
- At the tactical level, IPB focuses on the details of the terrain, weather, and enemy. It predicts and prioritizes the enemy's COAs and synchronizes the application of combat power on identified decisive points.

In mid-intensity conflict (MIC) to high-intensity conflict (HIC), IPB focuses on the traditional aspects of terrain, weather, and enemy. Many of the factors evaluated in IPB at the strategic level are used during IPB for low-intensity conflict (LIC) at the operational and tactical levels.

Social, economic, and political factors that affect the environment of conflict are considered in IPB. The population must be examined in as much detail as the enemy and the terrain to understand what an enemy can or cannot do. Figure 1-2 shows the intelligence cycle using IPB.

SITUATION DEVELOPMENT

Situation development confirms or denies the enemy COAs predicted in IPB. It confirms predicted centers of gravity and decisive points and identifies enemy strengths and vulnerabilities. This enables the commander to make timely decisions and effectively apply his combat power.

TARGET DEVELOPMENT AND TARGET ACQUISITION

Target development and target acquisition provide targets and targeting data for attacks by fire, maneuver, and electronic means. They identify and locate those targets that will have the greatest impact on the campaign's decisive engagements. These include deep operational reserves, strategic and operational level command, control, and communications (C²) nodes, key lines of communication, and air and naval staging facilities throughout the enemy's depth that contribute to his combat potential.

At the tactical level, they address those HVTs that directly contribute to the application of combat power at decisive points on the battlefield.

BATTLE DAMAGE ASSESSMENT (BDA)

BDA provides the commander with the effect of friendly operations on the enemy. It focuses on the enemy's remaining military capabilities and potential. At the operational level, it also considers the

MISSION, ENEMY, TROOPS, TERRAIN, AND TIME AVAILABLE FACTORS

The METT-T factors are important to the commander when planning interrogation operations. METT-T determines how the commander will use interrogation assets. The effect of METT-T on interrogation missions is discussed below.

MISSION SUPPORT

The supported force's mission bears directly on how the interrogation element will be employed. In cordon and search operations, commanders may determine interrogators are best suited to screen the populace in order to identify insurgents and their supporters. In counter-drug operations, commanders may use interrogators to exploit documents and to train US and foreign agents in interrogation techniques. In all conflicts, the focus will be on EPW interrogation and CED exploitation.

The mission influences interrogation operations in other ways. For example, if the force's mission is offen-campaign's effects on the enemy's economy and operational infrastructure as well as his military force structure.

BDA is focused on providing effects of particular strikes and attacks, or a series of them. BDA is performed by the same collection assets used to satisfy the commander's intelligence and targeting priorities; therefore, BDA cannot be performed continuously without degradation of other capabilities, such as situation development and targeting. The commander must prioritize the BDA effort, identifying what he must know and when he must know it, just as he does for his PIR and targeting priorities.

FORCE PROTECTION

Force protection identifies friendly vulnerabilities and the enemy's efforts to exploit them. At the operational level, it includes the early identification of significant improvements in weapon lethality, the introduction of weapons of mass destruction into the conflict, or the commitment of terrorist or other unconventional forces into friendly rear areas.

Force protection goes beyond countering enemy intelligence and includes the protection of all forces that contribute to our combat power. At the tactical level, it emphasizes measures to counter the enemy's intelligence collection capabilities and to protect the force from enemy action.

sive, interrogation elements must be highly mobile, with secure communications to the supported G2 or S2. They must be constantly prepared to move forward with the element they are supporting. This limits time available for exploitation and dissemination.

On the other hand, if the mission is defensive, interrogation elements have more time to exploit individual sources. They may also have more flexibility to exploit EPWs or detainees and CEDs, to fulfill the commander's intent to construct operational graphics.

Collection requirements vary according to echelon. Strategic echelon requirements reflect the wide scope of interest of the theater and national command authority (NCA); whereas, tactical PIR and IR--and resultant SIR--reflect the immediate, more narrowly focused intelligence interest of the maneuver commander.

ENEMY

The enemy, and our knowledge of the enemy, can influence interrogator assignments and the complexity of the exploitation process. One factor which affects interrogation operations is the type of opposing enemy force. The techniques and procedures used to collect from insurgents in a LIC may differ from those used to collect from regular enemy forces in a MIC to HIC.

For example, an EPW from a regular forces unit may have undergone political indoctrination, but his commitment to his unit may not be as strong as that of the insurgent who is passionately committed to an ideal. Thus, interrogators may have more difficulty persuading the insurgent to talk.

Another factor affecting interrogation operations is our current intelligence holdings on the enemy force and the interrogator's understanding of the threat. Our intelligence holdings on the composition of a newly formed insurgent organization usually will not be as complete as holdings on the composition of a regular enemy force. Thus, the focus of interrogation efforts in the early stages of a LIC may be on enemy force composition; whereas, the focus in a MIC or HIC may be on enemy force missions or intentions.

Cultural aspects also affect interrogation missions. The employment of some basic interrogation techniques will differ based on the ethnic and cultural background of the enemy, and our failure to understand and adapt to this could hamper the collection effort.

TROOPS

The number, experience level, and language proficiency of interrogators affect the tactical employment of interrogation elements. Due to the limited number of interrogators at any echelon, interrogation element commanders have to pick from available interrogators. They must manage personnel to ensure the most experienced are used to the best advantage (for example, to exploit complex enemy documents) and select EPWs most likely to answer SIR.

Interrogation element commanders often have to contend with a mismatch between language-qualified personnel assigned to the unit and languages needed to perform the mission. They overcome the mismatch by acquiring local national (LN) interpreter support through the Assistant Chief of Staff, G1 (Personnel). They can also augment their interrogators by requesting other available linguists within the supported command to serve as interpreters.

DEFINITION OF INTERROGATION

Interrogation is the process of questioning a source to obtain the maximum amount of usable information.

Another troop-related factor which affects interrogation operations is the training of all soldiers on EPW handling and evacuation. EPW treatment during the early stages of capture is critical to the success of subsequent interrogations. The availability of military police (MP) support at brigade and above can enhance interrogation activities. Interrogation operations are more effective in a controlled environment where EPWs are adequately guarded.

TERRAIN

Terrain and weather are relevant to interrogator operations and affect site deployments, communications, and mobility. MP must ensure proper shelter and security for the EPW facility if it is collocated or immediately adjacent to the EPW collecting point or internment facility.

TIME AVAILABLE

Information collected through interrogation operations is valuable only if it is reported in a timely manner. Exploitation procedures may need to be adjusted to make the most use of time available. At the tactical level, interrogations will be brief, PIR driven, and reported in concise formats such as size, activity, location, unit, time, equipment (SALUTE).

At the operational and strategic levels, time will generally allow for a more expanded interrogation effort and flexible reporting format, such as the intelligence information report (IIR).

The challenge is for interrogators to be proficient linguists and skilled members of a highly organized collection activity. This ensures the acquisition of the maximum amount of pertinent information regardless of time available.

Like other intelligence assets, interrogators must serve the commander. Interrogation operations are of no value unless they contribute to the accomplishment of the supported commander's mission. To understand the interrogator's role in mission accomplishment, one must understand the interrogation process.

The goal of any interrogation is to obtain reliable information in a lawful manner, in a minimum amount of time, and to satisfy intelligence requirements of any echelon of command. Sources may be—

- Civilian internees.
- Insurgents.
- EPWs.
- Defectors.
- Refugees.
- Displaced persons.
- Agents or suspected agents.
- Other non-US personnel.

A good interrogation produces needed information which is timely, complete, clear, and accurate. An interrogation involves the interaction of two personalities—the source and interrogator. Each contact between these two may differ because of individual characteristics and capabilities of the participants. Furthermore, the circumstances of each contact and physical environment vary.

Other forms of intelligence interrogations include interviews, debriefings, and elicitations. There are certain principles which generally apply to all types of interrogations; namely, the objective, the prohibition against use of force, and security.

OBJECTIVE

Each interrogation must be conducted for a definite purpose. The interrogator must keep this purpose firmly in mind as he proceeds to obtain usable information to satisfy the assigned requirement, and thus contribute to the success of the unit's mission.

The objective may be specific—Establish the exact location of an ammunition storage facility. Or it may be general—Seek to obtain OB information about a specific echelon of the enemy forces.

In either case, the interrogator must use the objective as a basis for planning and conducting the interrogation. He should attempt to prevent the source from becoming aware of the true objective of the interrogation. The interrogator should not concentrate on the objective to the extent he overlooks or fails to recognize and exploit other valuable information extracted from the source.

For example, during an interrogation, the interrogator learns of the presence of a heretofore unknown, highly destructive weapon. Although this information may not be in line with his specific objective, the interrogator must develop this important lead to obtain all possible information concerning this weapon. It becomes obvious an interrogation objective can be changed as necessary or desired.

PROHIBITION AGAINST USE OF FORCE

The Intelligence Staff Officer (J2, G2, or S2) has responsibility for all command intelligence functions. He assists the commander by—

- Supervising the collection, evaluation, and interpretation of all intelligence information.
- Disseminating intelligence to appropriate higher, lower, and adjacent units.
- Assuming primary responsibility to ensure that all command intelligence functions are conducted in accordance with international, US, and other applicable law and policy. Specifically, the J2, G2, or S2 is responsible to ensure the GWS, GPW, and GC are not violated by intelligence personnel.

One of the significant means used by the intelligence staff is the interrogation of the following:

- EPWs.
- Captured insurgents.
- Civilian internees.
- Other captured, detained, or retained persons.
- Foreign deserters or other persons of intelligence interest.

These persons are protected by the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949, as they relate to captured wounded and sick enemy personnel (GWS), retained enemy medical personnel and chaplains (GWS), enemy prisoners of war (GPW), and civilian internees (GC). Captured insurgents and other detained personnel whose status is not clear, such as suspected terrorists, are entitled to PW protection until their precise status has been determined by competent authority.

In conducting intelligence interrogations, the J2, G2, or S2 has primary staff responsibility to ensure these activities are performed in accordance with the GWS, GPW, and GC, as well as US policies, regarding the treatment and handling of the above-mentioned persons.

The GWS, GPW, GC, and US policy expressly prohibit acts of violence or intimidation, including physical or mental torture, threats, insults, or exposure to inhumane treatment as a means of or aid to interrogation.

Such illegal acts are not authorized and will not be condoned by the US Army. Acts in violation of these prohibitions are criminal acts punishable under the UCMJ. If there is doubt as to the legality of a proposed form of interrogation not specifically authorized in this manual, the advice of the command judge advocate should be sought before using the method in question.

Experience indicates that the use of prohibited techniques is not necessary to gain the cooperation of interrogation sources. Use of torture and other illegal methods is a poor technique that yields unreliable results, may damage subsequent collection efforts, and can induce the source to say what he thinks the interrogator wants to hear.

Revelation of use of torture by US personnel will bring discredit upon the US and its armed forces while undermining domestic and international support for the war effort. It also may place US and allied personnel in enemy hands at a greater risk of abuse by their captors. Conversely, knowing the enemy has abused US and allied PWs does not justify using methods of interrogation specifically prohibited by the GWS, GPW, or GC, and US policy.

Limitations on the use of methods identified herein as expressly prohibited should not be confused with psychological ploys, verbal trickery, or other nonviolent or noncoercive ruses used by the interrogator in the successful interrogation of hesitant or uncooperative sources.

The psychological techniques and principles in this manual should neither be confused with, nor construed to be synonymous with, unauthorized techniques such as brainwashing, physical or mental torture, or any other form of mental coercion to include drugs that may induce lasting and permanent mental alteration and damage.

Physical or mental torture and coercion revolve around eliminating the source's free will, and are expressly prohibited by GWS, Article 13; GPW, Articles 13 and 17; and GC, Articles 31 and 32. Torture is defined as the infliction of intense pain to body or mind to extract a confession or information, or for sadistic pleasure.

Examples of physical torture include—

- Electric shock.
- Infliction of pain through chemicals or bondage (other than legitimate use of restraints to prevent escape).
- Forcing an individual to stand, sit, or kneel in abnormal positions for prolonged periods of time.
- Food deprivation.
- Any form of beating.

Examples of mental torture include—

- Mock executions.
- Abnormal sleep deprivation.
- Chemically induced psychosis.

Coercion is defined as actions designed to unlawfully induce another to compel an act against one's will. Examples of coercion include—

- Threatening or implying physical or mental torture to the subject, his family, or others to whom he owes loyalty.
- Intentionally denying medical assistance or care in exchange for the information sought or other cooperation.
- Threatening or implying that other rights guaranteed by the GWS, GPW, or GC will not be provided unless cooperation is forthcoming.

Specific acts committed by US Army personnel may subject them to prosecution under one or more of the following punitive articles of the UCMJ:

- Article 78 - Accessory after the fact.
- Article 80 - Attempts (to commit one of the following offenses).
- Article 81 - Conspiracy (to commit one of the following offenses).
- Article 93 - Cruelty and maltreatment.
- Article 118 - Murder.
- Article 119 - Manslaughter.
- Article 124 - Maiming.

- Article 127 - Extortion.
- Article 128 - Assault (consummated by battery; with a dangerous weapon; or intentionally inflicting grievous bodily harm).
- Article 134 - Homicide, negligent:
 - Misprision of a serious offense (taking some positive act to conceal a serious crime committed by another).
 - Soliciting another to commit an offense.
 - Threat, communicating.

See Appendix A for the text of these offenses.

While using legitimate interrogation techniques, certain applications of approaches and techniques may approach the line between lawful actions and unlawful actions. It may often be difficult to determine where lawful actions end and unlawful actions begin. In attempting to determine if a contemplated approach or technique would be considered unlawful, consider these two tests:

- Given all the surrounding facts and circumstances, would a reasonable person in the place of the person being interrogated believe that his rights, as guaranteed under both international and US law, are being violated or withheld, or will be violated or withheld if he fails to cooperate.
- If your contemplated actions were perpetrated by the enemy against US PWs, you would believe such actions violate international or US law.

If you answer yes to either of these tests, do not engage in the contemplated action. If a doubt still remains as to the legality of a proposed action, seek a legal opinion from your servicing judge advocate.

DEFINITION OF PRISONER OF WAR AND ENEMY PRISONER OF WAR

A PW is a US or allied person detained by an enemy power. An EPW is a person detained by US or allied powers. The first issue interrogators must deal with is who must be afforded PW treatment. Figure 1-3 paraphrases Article 4 of the GPW. In addition, the following personnel shall be treated as PWs: Persons belonging, or having belonged, to the armed forces of the occupied country, if—

The approaches, psychological techniques, and other principles presented in this manual must be read in light of the requirements of international and US law as discussed above.

Authority for conducting interrogations of personnel detained by military forces rests primarily upon the traditional concept that the commander may use all available resources and lawful means to accomplish his mission and to protect and secure his unit.

It is the stated policy of the US Army that military operations will be conducted in accordance with the law of war obligations of the US. The GWS, GPW, and GC establish specific standards for humane care and treatment of enemy personnel captured, retained, or detained by US military forces and its allies. Suspected or alleged violations of these standards will be reported, investigated and, if appropriate, referred to competent authority for trial or other disposition. Violations of the GWS, GPW, or GC committed by US personnel normally constitute violations of the UCMJ.

The commander is responsible for ensuring that the forces under his command comply with the GWS, GPW, and GC. Should violations occur in the conduct of warfare, the commander bears primary responsibility for investigating and prosecuting violations.

SECURITY

The interrogator, by virtue of his position, possesses a great deal of classified information. He is aware his job is to obtain information, not impart it to the source. He safeguards military information as well as the source of that information.

This becomes very clear when one considers that among those persons with whom the interrogator has contact, there are those attempting to collect information for the enemy. The interrogator is alert to detect any attempt made by the source to elicit information.

- The occupying power considers it necessary by reason of such allegiance to intern them; in particular, if—
- Such persons have made an unsuccessful attempt to rejoin the armed forces to which they belong and which are engaged in combat; or

FM 34-52

- Where they fail to comply with a summons made to them with a view to internment.

Obviously, there are many personnel who qualify for and require treatment as PWs. If there is any question whether a person should be treated as a PW, treat the individual as such. The determination whether an individual qualifies as a PW is a Staff Judge Advocate (SJA) function, but has a direct impact on the interrogation effort due to GPW requirements. It is especially important in LICs to distinguish between PWs and criminals.

PERTINENT ARTICLES OF GENEVA CONVENTIONS

Several articles of the GPW apply to interrogators and interrogation operations. The articles most commonly used by interrogators are shown in Figure 1-4.

TYPES OF SOURCES

The interrogator encounters many sources who vary greatly in personality, social class, civilian occupation, military specialty, and political and religious beliefs. Their physical conditions may range from near death to perfect health; intelligence levels may range from well below average to well above average; and security consciousness may range from the lowest to the highest.

Article 13--PWs must be humanely treated. Any unlawful act or omission by the Detaining Power causing death or seriously endangering the health of a PW in its custody is prohibited. PWs must always be protected, particularly against acts of violence or intimidation and against insults and public curiosity.

Article 14--PWs are entitled, in all circumstances, to respect for their persons and honor. Women shall be treated with all regard due their sex, and shall always benefit by treatment as favorable that granted men.

Article 15--The Power detaining PWs shall provide, free of charge, for the maintenance and medical attention required by their state of health.

Article 17--This article covers several requirements with direct impact on interrogation.

- Every PW, when questioned on the subject, is bound to give only his surname, first names and rank, date of birth, and army, regimental, personal or (SIC) serial number, or failing this, equivalent information. If he willfully infringes this rule, he may render himself liable to a restriction of the privileges (emphasis added) accorded to his rank or status.
- For example, this does not mean if a prisoner fails to give this information he loses status as a prisoner, only special privileges. An example might be an officer who fails to identify himself as such. An officer cannot be compelled to work (Article 49). An officer who fails to identify himself as such could lose this privilege.
- The questioning of PWs shall be carried out in a language they understand.
- No physical or mental torture nor any other form of coercion may be inflicted on EPWs to secure from them information of any kind whatsoever. EPWs who refuse to answer may not be threatened, insulted, or exposed to unpleasant or disadvantageous treatment of any kind.

Article 18--All effects and articles of personal use, except arms, horses, military equipment and documents, shall remain in the possession of PWs. They will also retain their metal helmets, gas masks, and like articles issued for personal protection. Effects and articles used for their clothing or feeding shall also remain in their possession, even if such effects and articles belong to their regulation military equipment.

- Badges of rank and nationality, decorations and articles having above all a personal or sentimental value may not be taken from PWs.
- Sums of money carried by PWs may not be taken away from them except by order of an officer, and after the amount and particulars of the owner have been recorded in a special register and an itemized receipt has been given, legibly inscribed with the name, rank, and unit of the person issuing said receipt.

Article 19--PWs shall be evacuated, as soon as possible after their capture, to camps situated in an area far enough from the combat zone for them to be out of danger. Only those PWs, who, owing to wounds and sickness, would run greater risks by being evacuated than by remaining where they are, may be temporarily kept back in a danger zone.

Article 33--Medical personnel and chaplains, while retained by the Detaining Power with a view to assisting PWs, shall not be considered as PWs. They shall, however, receive as a minimum, the benefits and protection of the Geneva Convention. They shall continue to exercise their medical and spiritual functions for the benefits of PWs.

Sources may be civilian internees, insurgents, EPWs, defectors, refugees, displaced persons, and agents or suspected agents. Because of these variations, the interrogator makes a careful study of every source to evaluate his mental, emotional, and physical state, and uses it as a basis for interrogation. He deals mainly with three categories of sources: cooperative and friendly, neutral and nonpartisan, and hostile and antagonistic.

COOPERATIVE AND FRIENDLY

A cooperative and friendly source offers little resistance to interrogation, and normally speaks freely on almost any topic introduced, other than those which tend to incriminate or degrade him personally. To obtain the maximum amount of information from cooperative and friendly sources, the interrogator takes care to establish and preserve a friendly and cooperative atmosphere by not inquiring into those private affairs which are beyond the scope of the interrogation. At the same time, he must avoid becoming overly friendly and losing control of the interrogation.

NEUTRAL AND NONPARTISAN

A neutral and nonpartisan source is cooperative to a limited degree. He normally takes the position of answering questions asked directly, but seldom volunteers information. In some cases, he may be afraid to answer for fear of reprisals by the enemy. This often is the case in LIC where the people may be fearful of insurgent reprisals. With the neutral and nonpartisan source, the interrogator may have to ask many specific questions to obtain the information required.

HOSTILE AND ANTAGONISTIC

A hostile and antagonistic source is most difficult to interrogate. In many cases, he refuses to talk at all, and offers a real challenge to the interrogator. An interrogator must have self-control, patience, and tact when dealing with him.

At lower tactical echelons, there is generally insufficient time available to effectively interrogate a hostile or antagonistic source. When time is available, and the

PERSONAL QUALITIES

An interrogator should possess an interest in human nature and have a personality which will enable him to gain the cooperation of a source. Ideally, these and other personal qualities would be inherent in an interrogator; however, in most cases, an interrogator can cultivate these qualities if he has the desire and is willing to source appears to be an excellent target for exploitation, the source should be segregated and approached in an effort to obtain his cooperation. Because of possible high stress and frustration levels that such a source may invoke in you, great care must be taken to maintain your self-control. No matter what the source says or does, you must abide by the provisions of the law of war as previously discussed.

The absence of the use of threats in interrogation is intentional, as threats in and of themselves constitute a form of coercion. Any attempt at enforcement of a threat would constitute an act prohibited by the GWS, GPW, or GC and is punishable under the UCMJ.

A hostile or antagonistic source may be best exploited at echelons where sufficient time and resources will generally be available.

The successful interrogator is a skilled professional who is able to rapidly evaluate sources of information and adapt his approaches and techniques accordingly. The interrogator extracts intelligence from two primary sources: human sources and material sources (primarily CEDs). The senior interrogator determines which of these sources may be most effectively exploited to meet the supported commander's PIR and IR.

CEDs (see Chapter 4) include any piece of recorded information which has been in the possession of a foreign nation and comes into US possession. This includes US documents which the foreign nation may have possessed. There are many ways to acquire a document; some are found in the possession of human sources, on enemy dead, or on the battlefield. There are three types of documents:

- Official (government or military) documents such as overlays, field orders, maps, and codes.
- Personal (private or commercial) documents such as letters, diaries, newspapers, and books.
- Identity (government or military) documents such as cards and books.

devote time to study and practice. Some desirable personal qualities in an interrogator are discussed below.

MOTIVATION

Motivation is the most significant factor to achieve success. Without motivation, other qualities lose their significance. The stronger the motivation, the more successful the interrogator. An interrogator may be motivated by several factors; for example:

- An interest in human relations.
- A desire to react to the challenge of personal interplay.
- An enthusiasm for the collection of information.
- A profound interest in foreign languages and cultures.

ALERTNESS

The interrogator must be constantly aware of the shifting attitudes which normally characterize a source's reaction to interrogation. The interrogator—

- Notes the source's every gesture, word, and voice inflection.
- Determines why the source is in a certain mood or why his mood suddenly changed. It is from the source's mood and actions the interrogator determines how to best proceed with the interrogation.
- Watches for any indication the source is withholding information.
- Watches for a tendency to resist further questioning, diminishing resistance, contradictions, or other tendencies, to include susceptibility.

PATIENCE AND TACT

The interrogator must have patience and tact in creating and maintaining rapport between himself and the source, thereby enhancing the success of the interrogation. The validity of the source's statements and motives behind these statements may be obtainable only through exercise of tact and patience. Displaying impatience may—

- Encourage the difficult source to think if he remains unresponsive for a little longer, the interrogator will stop questioning.
- Cause the source to lose respect for the interrogator, thereby reducing his effectiveness.

An interrogator, with patience and tact, is able to terminate an interrogation and later continue it without arousing apprehension or resentment.

CREDIBILITY

The interrogator must maintain credibility with the source and friendly forces. Failure to produce material rewards when promised may adversely affect future interrogations. The importance of accurate reporting cannot be overstressed, since interrogation reports are often the basis for tactical decisions and operations.

OBJECTIVITY

The interrogator must maintain an objective and dispassionate attitude, regardless of the emotional reactions he may actually experience or simulate during the interrogation. Without objectivity, he may unconsciously distort the information acquired. He may also be unable to vary his interrogation techniques effectively.

SELF-CONTROL

The interrogator must have exceptional self-control to avoid displays of genuine anger, irritation, sympathy, or weariness which may cause him to lose the initiative during the interrogation. Self-control is especially important when employing interrogation techniques which require the display of simulated emotions or attitudes.

ADAPTABILITY

An interrogator must adapt to the many and varied personalities which he will encounter. He should try to imagine himself in the source's position. By being adaptable, he can smoothly shift his techniques and approaches during interrogations according to the operational environment. In many cases, he has to conduct interrogations under unfavorable physical conditions.

PERSEVERANCE

A tenacity of purpose can be the difference between an interrogator who is merely good and one who is superior. An interrogator who becomes easily discouraged by opposition, noncooperation, or other difficulties will neither aggressively pursue the objective to a successful conclusion nor seek leads to other valuable information.

APPEARANCE AND DEMEANOR

The interrogator's personal appearance may greatly influence the conduct of the interrogation and attitude of the source toward the interrogator. Usually a neat, organized, and professional appearance will favorably influence the source. A firm, deliberate, and businesslike manner of speech and attitude may create a proper environment for a successful interrogation. If the interrogator's manner reflects fairness, strength, and efficiency, the source may prove cooperative and more receptive to questioning.

FM 34-52

However, depending on the approach techniques (see Chapter 3), the interrogator can deliberately portray a different (for example, casual or sloven) appearance and demeanor to obtain the cooperation of the source.

INITIATIVE

Achieving and maintaining the initiative are essential to a successful interrogation just as the offense is the key to success in combat operations. The interrogator must grasp the initiative and maintain it throughout the interrogation.

SPECIAL AREAS OF KNOWLEDGE

The interrogator must be knowledgeable on a variety of subjects in order to be effective in exploiting sources. Some of these areas are—

- Proficiency in the target language.
- Knowledge of the target country.
- International agreements.
- Enemy materiel and equipment.
- Armed forces uniforms.
- OB information.

In addition to these subjects, the interrogator should have a knowledge of basic psychology and neurolinguistics.

PROFICIENCY IN THE TARGET LANGUAGE

The interrogator must be proficient in one or more foreign languages to exploit both human sources and CEDs. According to the GPW, a prisoner must be questioned in a language he understands.

The more proficient an interrogator is with the target language, the better he will be able to develop rapport with his source, understand the nuances of the source's speech, and follow up on source leads to additional information.

The skilled linguist will be able to translate CEDs quicker and more accurately than the interrogator who is merely familiar with the target language.

KNOWLEDGE OF THE TARGET COUNTRY

The interrogator should be familiar with the social, political, and economic institutions; geography; history; language; and culture of the target country. Since many sources will readily discuss nonmilitary topics, the interrogator—

The source, especially if detained by military forces during tactical operations, normally has undergone a traumatic experience and fears for his life. This anxiety is usually intensified by the source's lack of knowledge and understanding of what is about to occur (fear of the unknown), or by the unfounded fear he will be tortured or executed.

The interrogator has a position of authority over the source. The source realizes this fact, and, in some cases, believes his future might depend upon his association with the interrogator.

- May induce reluctant prisoners to talk by discussing the geography, economics, or politics of the target country.
- May gradually introduce significant topics into the discussion to gain insight about the conditions and attitudes in the target country.
- Should keep abreast of major and current events as they occur in the target country to better understand the general situation, as well as causes and repercussions.

LAW OF WAR

The interrogator should understand US law of war obligations contained in the GWS, GPW, and GC regarding the treatment of EPWs, retained personnel, and civilian internees (see Figure 1-4).

ENEMY MATERIEL AND EQUIPMENT

The interrogator should be familiar with the capabilities, limitations, and employment of standard weapons and equipment so he may recognize and identify changes, revisions, and innovations. Some of the more common subjects of interest to the interrogator include the following:

- Small arms.
- Infantry support weapons.
- Artillery.
- Aircraft.
- Vehicles.
- Communications equipment.
- NBC defense.

ARMED FORCES UNIFORMS AND INSIGNIA

Through his knowledge of uniforms, insignia, decorations, and other distinctive devices, the interrogator may be able to determine the rank, branch of service, type of unit, and military experience of a military or paramilitary source. This knowledge is helpful during the planning and preparation and the approach phases discussed in Chapter 3.

OB INFORMATION

OB is defined as the identification, strength, command structure, and disposition of personnel, units, and equipment of any military force. Interrogation OB elements are separate categories by which detailed information is maintained. They are—

- Missions.
- Composition.
- Disposition.
- Strength.
- Training.
- Combat effectiveness.
- Tactics.
- Logistics.
- Electronic technical data.
- Miscellaneous data.

During the questioning phase, OB elements assist the interrogator in verifying the accuracy of the information obtained and can be used as an effective tool to gain

INTERROGATOR CAPABILITIES AND LIMITATIONS

HUMINT collection is capable of obtaining information pertinent to all six IEW tasks:

- Situation development.
- Target development and target acquisition.
- I&W.
- IPB.
- BDA.
- Force protection.

Interrogators are trained as linguists to question EPWs and civilian detainees and to exploit CEDs.

new information. Aids which may be used to identify units are—

- Names.
- Commanders.
- Home station identifications.
- Code designations and numbers.
- Uniforms and insignia.
- Guidons.
- Documents.
- Military postal system data.
- Equipment and vehicle markings.

UNDERSTANDING BASIC PSYCHOLOGY

An interrogator can best adapt himself to the EPW's or detainee's personality and control of their reactions when he understands basic psychological factors, traits, attitudes, drives, motivations, and inhibitions. For example, the timely use or promise of rewards and incentives may mean the difference between an interrogation's success or failure and future EPW or detainee exploitation.

NEUROLINGUISTICS

Neurolinguistics is a behavioral communication model and a set of procedures that improve communication skills. The interrogator should read and react to nonverbal communications. An interrogator can best adapt himself to the source's personality and control his own reactions when he understands basic psychological factors, traits, attitudes, drives, motivations, and inhibitions.

During their collection, interrogators attempt to obtain and report any information possessed by these targets that pertains to the IEW tasks. This persistence is determined by comparing the information obtained to the SIR contained in the interrogation element's collection mission.

Interrogators are capable of collecting information on political, economic, and a wide range of military topics. For the most part, interrogators attempt to organize their collection effort according to the OB elements analysts use. In addition to these elements, interrogators also obtain PIR-directed information on the missions assigned to enemy units. Appendix B discusses relevant questioning guides.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONSIDERATIONS

The environment in which interrogation operations are performed affects the degree of success achieved. There are primarily two areas, both having limitations, upon which the interrogators depend:

- The IEW process which gives direction and purpose to their collection efforts.
- The conduct of combat operations which provides them with collection targets; that is, EPWs, detainees, and CEDs.

If the IEW process or combat operations are not ideal, use what you can to capitalize on capabilities.

IEW Process

The IEW process can limit interrogators by assigning collection missions which are not suited to HUMINT collection capabilities; as well as by not disseminating copies of the following reports:

- Intelligence summary (INTSUM).
- Intelligence report (INTREP).
- Daily intelligence summary (DISUM).

CONFLICTS

HICs are conflicts between two or more nations and their respective allies, where the belligerents employ modern technology complemented by intelligence; mobility; firepower (to include NBC weapons); service support; and C³ resources.

MICs are conflicts between two or more nations and their respective allies, where the belligerents employ modern technology complemented by intelligence; mobility; firepower (without NBC); C³; and service support resources for limited objectives under definitive policy limiting employment of destructive power and geography involved.

LICs are political-military confrontations between contending states or groups below conventional war and above the routine, peaceful competition among states. They—

- Frequently involve protracted struggles of competing principles and ideologies.
- Range from subversion to the use of armed force.

- Periodic intelligence report (PERINTREP).
- Supplementary intelligence report (SUPINTREP).
- Other intelligence reports.

Combat Operations

Combat operations can limit interrogators by—

- Delaying evacuation of EPWs or detainees and captured documents, thereby limiting time available to exploit them.
- Allowing prisoners and documents to be mishandled, thereby decreasing their exploitation potential.
- Not providing the equipment, supplies, and secure communications needed for successful operations.

INHERENT LIMITATIONS

Interrogation operations are also limited by the very nature of HUMINT collection. EPWs or detainees and CEDs must actually have the desired information before interrogators can collect it. With EPWs or detainees, there is always the possibility knowledgeable individuals may refuse to cooperate.

The UCMJ, GWS, GPW, and GC set definite limits on measures which can be taken to induce an EPW or detainee to cooperate.

- Are waged by combining and employing political, economic, informational, and military instruments.
- Are often localized, generally in the Third World, but contain regional and global security implications.

LIC operational intelligence requirements are HUMINT intensive and demand detailed familiarity with the military, political, and front organizations of the insurgent enemy, and the environment in which he operates.

The interrogator's familiarity with the areas of operations (AOs) must include an understanding of the insurgency, its objectives, history, successes, and failures. This understanding is required not only on a general countrywide basis but also on an expanded basis within the interrogator's particular AO. Therefore, it is essential the interrogator grasps the importance the insurgent organization places on accomplishing political objectives as opposed to military successes.

One measure of the interrogator's effectiveness is his ability to apply appropriate interrogation techniques to the personality of the source. Interrogations associated with LIC operations dictate the need for skill in the full range of interrogation techniques so the interrogator can conduct the many types of interrogations demanded.

Warfighting doctrine IEW principles apply for LIC; however, intelligence indicators for insurgent activity are unique. Anything insurgents can do to influence and direct a society toward overthrowing its government is reflected by some action or indication, no matter how subtle. Some MI advisors may be required to assist paramilitary and nonmilitary elements in developing HUMINT sources and exploiting their information.

As US forces are committed to the LIC operation, interrogation support will more closely adhere to the traditional tactical environment. Typical LIC missions are—

- Counterinsurgency and insurgency support.
- Combatting terrorism.
- Peacekeeping and peacetime contingency operations.

HUMINT is a major LIC source because of the necessity to exploit the local populace and to know and understand enemy intentions. In LIC, interrogators exploit EPWs and CEDs. For example, in addition to conducting EPW operations at collecting points, interrogators may participate in cordon and search and roadblock operations, tactical check points, and low-level collection missions in conjunction with the supporting CI unit (see FM 34-60A(S)). Interrogators may also provide support to drug and law enforcement agency (DLEA) operations.

INTERROGATION MISSIONS

Interrogators perform various types of missions. As discussed previously, the two main missions are personnel and document exploitation. There are other functions for which interrogators are ideally suited because of their language and HUMINT training. These include—

- Linguist support to hostage negotiations, counterdrug, and special operation forces (SOF) operations.

- LLSO linguist support.
- Psychological operations (PSYOP) linguist support.
- Civil Affairs (CA) linguist support.
- Treaty verification and observer duties.

DRUG AND LAW ENFORCEMENT AGENCY OPERATIONS

Army interrogators may assist Federal law enforcement authorities and, where lives are endangered, state and local law enforcement authorities, after concurrence by the Army General Counsel and approval by the Secretary of Defense or his designee. (See AR 381-10, Procedure 12, and AR 500-51.)

Army interrogators may assist law enforcement agencies and security services or foreign governments or international organizations only in accordance with applicable law and policy, including any status of forces agreements. Such assistance will ordinarily constitute security assistance, which must be approved in accordance with AR 12-15.

Under no circumstances will interrogators assist any law enforcement authorities in any manner without prior approval by competent authority after a legal review of the proposal.

CHAPTER 2 COMPOSITION AND STRUCTURE

The interrogation architecture (interrogators and interrogation units) is a seamless system that supports operations from brigade to theater level. The dynamic warfighting doctrine requires interrogation units be highly mobile and have automation and communication equipment to report information to the supported commander.

Regardless of their employment level, interrogation units should be equipped with state-of-the-art automation equipment, necessary HUMINT software, and dedicated and secure communication equipment with skip echelon, digital, voice, facsimile, and optical scanning capability. This equipment enables interrogators to—

- Receive data base information.
- Manipulate that information.
- Incorporate it into their operational data bases.
- Produce tactical information reports.

By using secure communication equipment, interrogators are able to disseminate time-sensitive information to the supported commander as answers to his PIR which facilitates decision-making. The Prisoner of War Information System (PWIS) is a databased system maintained by the provost marshal's office at theater level. It has the capability to recall an EPW's evacuation audit trail.

This prisoner of war interrogation (IPW) communication and automation system facilitates transmission of EPW-derived information from brigade to theater; it precludes duplicated effort in EPW or CED exploitation.

The MI unit commander must ensure interrogators have the necessary equipment to accomplish their wartime mission. The MI unit commander retains overall responsibility for interrogators assigned to his unit. The manner in which these interrogators are controlled depends on how the MI unit is task organized for combat.

If interrogators are deployed in general support (GS) of the division, the MI battalion commander exercises control over them through his S3 and the battalion tactical operations center (TOC). If interrogators are deployed in direct support (DS) of a division's subordinate units, they are tasked by the commanders of those units through their S2s.

TACTICAL OPERATIONS CENTER

Normally, interrogators are a primary source of OB information. The interrogation element chief should ensure that he or someone appointed to this duty has daily personal contact with the division or corps collection management and dissemination (CM&D) section at the TOC. During these visits, all questions and information pertaining to OB and intelligence target priority lists can be discussed and later disseminated to various interrogators.

Interrogator elements must receive all reports and findings made by analysts; in turn, all interrogation reports should reach analysts. Direct contact must be maintained between these two elements, preferably in person or by telephone. This ensures access to important information which may arise between liaison visits.

TASKING RELATIONSHIPS

When interrogators are task-organized under the IEW company, the team leader directs the tasking. The DS and GS teams are under operational control (OPCON) to the IEW company when they are supporting that company. The officers responsible for tasking interrogation elements ensure the following steps are accomplished:

- Collection missions that reflect the capabilities and limitations of interrogators are assigned.
- INTREPs are integrated with information provided by other collectors during the IPB process.
- Copies of the INTSUM, INTREP, PERINTREP, DISUM, and SUPINTREP are disseminated to the interrogation element as they are published.
- Close contact is maintained with the interrogation element.

FM 34-52

INTERROGATOR TASK ORGANIZATIONS

Interrogators are not assigned by tables of organization and equipment (TOE) to units below division. However, MI parent units often task interrogators and place them in DS to brigades. For example, in a light division, there are usually enough interrogators assigned to send forward deployed interrogation teams, known as "GO" teams, to the brigades to complement light division operations.

EPW interrogation may be desirable at all echelons, but is not practicable due to limited numbers of interrogators available. As a minimum, there should be an interrogation element at the division central collection point, corps holding areas, and theater internment facility.

Interrogation elements at all echelons are task organized, and may not mirror the TOE organization in their parent unit.

DEPLOYMENT SITES

Interrogation assets are mobile enough to be shifted in response to new developments. The initial deployment of these assets are guided by the exploitation priority established by the commander. Operations are conducted at an echelon that will allow interrogators the best opportunity to satisfy their assigned collection mission. The areas discussed below should be considered when making the deployment decisions.

Number of Interrogators Available

The number of interrogators available limit the number of deployment sites that can be used. MI commanders at corps consider how many interrogators will be available for interrogation operations after augmentation has been provided to subordinate divisions. The number of interrogators also play a key role in deciding the level of intense or sustained collection operations they can conduct.

INTERROGATION BELOW DIVISION

The first interrogation could take place at brigade. Interrogation teams are attached temporarily to brigades in enemy contact when determined appropriate by the division G2. These teams come from the interrogation section of the parent division. Interrogation personnel are organic to separate brigades and armored cavalry regiments (ACRs). Interrogation at brigade level is strictly tactical and deals with information of immediate value.

Type and Intensity of Combat Operations

Intense collection employs all available interrogators with little or no provision for them to rest. The major disadvantage of intense collection is these interrogators become exhausted quickly. Interrogations amount to prolonged conversations under extreme stress. Once the available interrogators are exhausted, collection stops until they recover or additional assets arrive.

A severe decrease in interrogation effectiveness can be expected between 12 and 18 hours after the onset of intense collection, with 18 hours as the maximum time possible for intense collection. This kind of all-out effort can be justified when critical information must be obtained or confirmed quickly to forestall a major disaster. Similar problems can be expected during intense CED exploitation.

Sustained operations can be maintained indefinitely. They also allow the commander some rested interrogators to use on a contingency basis in a different location. Disadvantages of sustained collection are fewer sources are exploited over a given time and operations are slower.

Support Available

In making deployment decisions, the area where operations are to be conducted must provide the support required by the interrogation element. This support includes—

- MP coordination.
- Priority access to reliable means of secure communications.
- Adequate shelter and security.
- A flow of CEDs and sources to exploit.

Other information the EPW might possess is developed at higher levels. At brigade, the scope of interrogation changes from hour-to-hour as the tactical situation develops. These interrogations must be geared to cope with any tactical possibility at a moment's notice.

Interrogation personnel in DS to brigade will be collocated or immediately adjacent to the division forward EPW collecting point in the brigade support area (BSA). For MI units to receive S2 support, the collecting point and interrogation site will be collocated and accessible to the command post (CP).

DIVISION INTERROGATION ASSETS

An MI battalion is organic to each division. It provides combat intelligence, EW, and OPSEC support to light or heavy infantry and airborne or air assault divisions.

The MI battalion provides special support the G2 needs to produce combat intelligence. Interrogation personnel organic to the MI battalions compose the interrogation support element.

The intelligence and surveillance (I&S) company provides division CI, interrogation, and surveillance support.

The I&S company interrogation team manages the division's interrogation assets, including those interrogation teams attached from corps. Additional team duties are—

- Screen CEDs.
- Provide interpreter and translator support.
- Liaison with PSYOP and G5 personnel.

ORGANIZATION (LIGHT DIVISION)

In a light division, interrogators belong to the I&S Company, MI Battalion. Figure 2-1 shows this structure. Light division MI battalions have 25 interrogators subordinate to the I&S company. Two 5-man DS teams in the interrogation platoon ensure the platoon can provide support to two committed brigades.

Platoon Headquarters

Platoon headquarters provides C³ for the interrogation element. It consists of a platoon leader and sergeant. The platoon headquarters coordinates with—

- I&S company commander for personnel status, administrative support, and logistical support prior to deployment to the division support area (DSA).
- MI battalion S3 for intelligence tasking and deployment of interrogation assets.
- Division G2 for reporting, enemy situation updates, and PIR, IR, and SIR.
- DISCOM commander for DSA logistical and communications support, and interrogation element location in the DSA.

- MP company commander for division central EPW collecting point location, and EPW processing and evacuation procedures.
- Medical battalion commander for procedures to treat and clear wounded EPW for questioning.
- CI platoon leader for requirements and joint CI and interrogation procedures.
- MI company team leaders for deployment of DS interrogation teams.
- CA and PSYOP elements for requirements and processing of civilian detainees and refugees.

Operations Section

This consists of a section chief (warrant officer), non-commissioned officer in charge (NCOIC), and two 4-member interrogation teams. The operations section chief manages the interrogation effort to ensure interrogations respond to division intelligence requirements.

DOCEX Section

This consists of a section chief (warrant officer) and three document examiners. The DOCEX section may be used as an additional interrogation team when priority of exploitation and EPW capture rate dictate. The division G2 determines whether interrogation or document examination will have priority.

When three brigades are committed in an operation, the DOCEX section may be employed as a third brigade level team.

DOCEX assets may also function in an interrogation role when the number of EPWs at the division central collecting point requires additional division level interrogators or when the CED rate is very low.

Interrogation Teams

Each interrogation team consists of a team leader (warrant officer), NCO assistant team leader, and three team members. Teams are normally employed as part of the MI company teams which provide IEW support to the brigades.

ORGANIZATION (HEAVY DIVISION)

In a heavy division, interrogators are assigned to the I&S Company, MI Battalion. Figure 2-2 shows this structure.

ORGANIZATION (AIRBORNE OR AIR ASSAULT DIVISION)

In an airborne or air assault division, interrogators are assigned to the I&S Company, MI Battalion. Figure 2-3 shows this structure.

ORGANIZATION (ACR AND SEPARATE BRIGADE)

In an ACR or separate brigade, interrogators are assigned to the operations support platoon of the MI company. Figure 2-4 shows this organization.

SPECIAL FORCES GROUP

In a Special Forces Group (Airborne) (SFGA), interrogators are assigned to the Military Intelligence Detachment (MID). Figure 2-5 shows this structure.

Interrogation teams may be combined with the CI section when not conducting interrogation operations.

CORPS INTERROGATION ASSETS AND ORGANIZATION

At corps, interrogators are assigned to the MI Battalion (Tactical Exploitation) (TE). Figure 2-6 shows this structure. The CI interrogation company consists of a company headquarters, IPW and CI operation sections, CI and interrogation platoons, and a maintenance section.

There are also linguist battalions which augment and support Active Component (AC) units in time of hostilities.

ENEMY PRISONER OF WAR AND INTERROGATION FACILITIES

There are significant differences in EPW and interrogation facilities at each echelon; this is due to the numbers of EPWs, the missions of the various echelons, and the size of the interrogation elements.

EVACUATION AND GUARDING EPW

Initially, the capturing unit is responsible for evacuating and guarding EPWs. In brigade-size operations, battalions evacuate prisoners to brigade collecting points as the situation permits. In most cases, EPWs are evacuated rapidly using backhaul transportation from brigade collecting points to departure areas because they require food and guards, both of which are in short supply at brigade. EPW collecting points should be located close to supply routes to speed evacuation.

BRIGADE AND LOWER ECHELONS

At brigade level, EPWs can be detained in open fields, courtyards, gardens, jungle clearings, or similar sites if they are hidden from enemy observation. If necessary, these areas can be enclosed with barbed wire for more efficient EPW handling. Because EPWs seldom remain at a forward collecting point for more than a few hours, EPWs are not usually kept in a building or other shelter.

Interrogation facilities at battalion and brigade are kept to a minimum. Brigade interrogation personnel should be located adjacent to the brigade forward EPW collecting point in the BSA. The collecting point should be out of sight and sound of other BSA activities. It should be close to normal evacuation routes.

The distance between the collecting point and CP is important. When possible, the collecting point and interrogation site should be within walking distance or a few minute's driving distance of the CP.

Interrogators with battalions or brigades should have vehicles equipped with radios for rapid communication with their respective intelligence officers and other intelligence agencies.

DIVISION FACILITIES

The principal EPW tactical interrogation takes place at division. While the procedure is similar to that used at brigade, the interrogation scope is broader.

Previous interrogation reports received from brigade are reviewed. This information is expanded by further interrogations for tactical information to include all OB elements.

The interrogators at division level will prepare and disseminate summary interrogation reports. As dictated by the tactical situation, the interrogation facility at division may be augmented by corps interrogation personnel.

The division's central EPW collecting point is operated by division MP under the supervision of the division provost marshal. The interrogation section should be located immediately adjacent to the division's central EPW collecting point, normally along the main supply route (MSR) within or near the division support command (DISCOM).

The distance between the interrogation facility and G2 section (rear) is not as critical as at brigade level. Personal liaison between the interrogation and intelligence sections, although important, may not be required as frequently as at brigade.

At division, the G2 directs interrogation section collection efforts in conjunction with the CM&D section and the MI battalion commander, who serves as one of his principal assistants.

Compared to brigade facilities, division interrogation facilities are expanded. This is because the division interrogation section handles and interrogates more captured personnel, and interrogations are conducted in greater detail. When practicable, interrogations at division should be conducted in improvised interrogation rooms in buildings adjacent to the division collecting point. If possible, separate rooms should be available to permit several interrogations at once.

CORPS FACILITIES

The corps EPW holding area is established and operated by MP under the supervision of the corps provost marshal. The Corps Interrogation Facility (CIF) will usually be a more permanent type facility than at echelons below corps. It should consist of operations and interrogation areas with separate, enclosed interrogation booths or rooms. If possible, there should be a separate DOCEX area. Figure 2-12 shows a sample CIF.

The commander, CI Interrogation Company, MI Battalion (TE), MI Brigade (Corps), is the CIF commander. CIFs are the principal establishment for the exploitation of captured personnel and CEDs. Functions of the centers include—

- Conducting tactical and strategic interrogations based on the intelligence requirements and specific guidance of the corps G2 section.
- Screening to select sources suited for further exploitation at a higher echelon interrogation center.
- Screening of EPW and other sources of specific CI interest.
- Interrogating sources of interest to PSYOP intelligence based on their requirements.
- Preparing and disseminating interrogation reports.

Continuous coordination between the CIF commander and EPW holding area commander is essential. At a sub-level, it is also important for interrogators to maintain a good working relationship with MP at the holding area.

MP, who are in constant contact with EPWs or detainees, can provide interrogators valuable information on individual sources. By properly handling prisoners at all times, they also contribute to the success of interrogation operations by helping to reduce resistance by the sources.

The CIF should be administratively and operationally self-sufficient and located within or adjacent to the EPW holding area, close enough to facilitate operations.

ADEQUATE INTERROGATION FACILITIES

At corps level, particular emphasis should be placed on providing facilities adequate for the interrogation of EPWs of higher positions or rank. Because interrogations will normally last longer than at division, a greater degree of comfort should be provided, if possible. In other respects, the type of interrogation facilities and equipment parallels those found at division.

OB SECTION

OB analysts are a valuable interrogation facility asset. They ensure PIR, IR, and SIR are updated, and reporting is in response to them. In addition, they maintain a situation map (SITMAP) and OB updates to keep interrogators current on tactical situations.

EDITORIAL PERSONNEL

The senior interrogator may assign interrogators to edit INTREPs. They also may use the organizational chain of command to ensure quality control of reporting. When OB analysts are available, the commander may task them to edit reports.

DOCEX SECTION

The DOCEX section receives documents taken from captured personnel, battlefield casualties, and positions abandoned by the enemy. It processes captured documents; for example, screens for intelligence value, categorizes, and translates. It forwards translation reports on information of immediate tactical value. (Chapter 4 describes document categories.)

SPECIALIZED INFORMATION

The scope of interrogations at corps is widened by the commander's intelligence requirements, SIR of the numerous technical service staff agencies, and other intelligence agencies and services. All such special needs for information are coordinated by the corps G2 section. Interrogators must be aware of these overall intelligence requirements to adequately exploit captured personnel.

Because of the range of specialized information required, interrogation at corps level should be conducted by interrogators who specialize in fields such as armor, engineering, medicine, and other specialized subject areas.

To extract detailed EPW information, the senior interrogator will assign some interrogators as screeners and others to specialized areas. However, he must coordinate, for example, with technical intelligence (TECHINT) assets. This is to prevent duplication or gaps in information obtained.

Continuous coordination is required between all echelon interrogators to ensure a smoothly functioning operation.

The corps MI brigade applies the technical expertise, intelligence manpower, and equipment needed by G2 to produce integrated combat intelligence. The corps commander has OPCON, while the G2 has staff supervision over the MI brigade.

ECHELONS ABOVE CORPS FACILITIES

At echelons above corps (EAC), the MI company (I&E), MI battalion (C&E) or (I&E), MI brigade (EAC), will form the Theater Interrogation Facility (TIF). The TIF, which is commanded by an MI captain, provides interrogation support to the theater or joint command and to national level intelligence agencies. The TIF will—

- Be located within the main theater EPW internment facility.
- Be tailored organizationally to meet requirements of the theater and situation.
- Include interrogators, CI personnel, and intelligence analysts from the Army, Air Force, Marine Corps, and, in some cases, the Navy.
- Be organized similarly to the CIF; that is, by function.

- Have intelligence analysts to handle requirements and keep interrogators informed of changes in the operational or strategic situation.
- Maintain the capability to deploy "GO" teams to multiple theater EPW camps, as well as to forward deploy them to corps and ECB as needed.
- Provide experienced senior interrogation warrant officers and NCOs who are graduates of the Department of Defense (DOD) Strategic Debriefing Course (additional skill identifier 9N or N7) and physical plant for the Joint Debriefing Center (JDC), where exploitation of high-level (Category A) sources takes place on operational and strategic topics.

MEDICAL COMPANY INTERROGATIONS

Sometimes it may be advantageous to conduct interrogations at the medical company. Wounded prisoners being evacuated through medical channels are frequently valuable sources of information; however, interrogators cannot represent themselves as medical or Red Cross personnel.

The fact the EPW is wounded, and in an "enemy" hospital, puts him in a state of mind conducive to interrogation. The permission of competent medical authority is required before wounded prisoners can be interrogated.

US Army doctors and medics are considered competent medical authorities. In their absence, the interrogation may not commence, even upon direction of nonmedical military authority.

When interrogating a sick or wounded EPW, great care must be taken to avoid implying that treatment will be withheld if cooperation is denied. The interrogation process must not interfere with timely medical treatment, to include administering medication to relieve pain.

INTERROGATION AT BRIGADE AND BELOW

Interrogators are not usually attached below brigade level unless the combat situation requires limited tactical interrogation at battalion or lower. In this event, skilled interrogators from the MI battalion will be attached temporarily to committed battalions. They will assist in exploiting EPW immediately upon capture to extract information needed in support of the capturing unit.

Interrogations at battalion or lower are brief and concerned only with information bearing directly on the combat mission of the capturing unit. The following are examples of circumstances warranting an interrogation:

- A unit or landing force assigned an independent mission in which the S2 is primarily responsible for collecting information necessary to fulfill the unit's mission. Immediate tactical intelligence is necessary for mission accomplishment.

- There is a definite need for interrogation at a lower level to permit rapid reaction based on information obtained.
- It is advantageous to have an EPW point out enemy defenses and installation from observation points in forward areas.

BATTALION S2 CONTROLS

Interrogators employed for temporary periods at battalion level receive FIR, IR, and SIR from the supported battalion S2. This will ensure interrogators are fully oriented to the battalion's collection mission.

In other instances, interrogators may be placed at brigade in an "on-call" status, from which they can proceed to any of the subordinate battalions as circumstances warrant. Upon completion of a low-level, immediate-type interrogation, they can return to brigade and again become available for immediate employment.

Commanders and S2s below brigade level who are unable to obtain interrogator support from higher echelons should include provisions in unit and staff standing operating procedures (SOPs) for the "tactical questioning" (not interrogation) of EPWs or detainees. They should identify assigned personnel for language capability.

Interrogation personnel should provide training in the area of tactical questioning to designated S2 personnel. The potential for abuse of the EPW is greatest at the initial capture and tactical questioning phase. With the excitement and stress of the battlefield, it may become easy for unskilled personnel to resort to illegal techniques to elicit critical information.

Your instruction must stress the importance of the proper treatment of EPWs. Emphasize that the abuse of an EPW at the initial stage of contact often renders future interrogation futile.

If you are engaged in, or supervising the tactical questioning of EPWs, you are responsible for ensuring that EPWs are treated in accordance with the requirements of international and US law. Any tactical questioning conducted must be in response to the supported commander's PIR. Appendix C discusses S2 tactical questioning.

At this level the brigade S2 must maintain secure communication with interrogation personnel to ensure requirements are answered. Except under extreme weather conditions, and MP availability, it is not necessary to keep EPWs within the confines of a building or other shelter at battalion level since they will not remain for more than a few hours before being evacuated.

The capturing unit escorts or transports EPWs or detainees to the nearest collecting point, and turns them over to the MP. Interrogators in DS of the brigade will screen and categorize all EPWs or detainees, question them, and report information obtained in response to brigade PIR, IR, and SIR. They will do this under time constraints, as all EPWs or detainees must be evacuated without delay.

In spite of the temporary nature of the forward EPW collecting point, interrogators should maintain enough space between the collecting point and the interrogation site to ensure the privacy of interrogations. EPWs or detainees should not be able to observe or hear interrogations in progress.

INTERROGATIONS IN OTHER OPERATIONS

The functions and basic operational techniques employed by the interrogation element attached to the infantry division apply to interrogation elements supporting armored, amphibious, and airborne operations in any terrain or climate.

Differences arise primarily in the planning stages and interrogation objectives. These differences normally result from the inherent characteristics of each type of unit and terrain and climate involved.

For example, the interrogator engaging in airborne and amphibious operations will be dependent upon intelligence support from higher agencies during the planning stage. This is necessary because the unit does not have actual contact with the enemy until a specific operation begins.

Once H-hour arrives, the interrogator will be faced with a rapidly developing and changing tactical situation. At this time, the degree of success correlates to the preparations made during the planning stage.

Consequently, the interrogator must make a concerted effort to learn everything possible about the objective area—terrain, enemy, and weather—and relate these factors to the mission of the unit supported. Only by taking these steps will the interrogator be able to ensure success, and be prepared to begin interrogations as soon as possible after contact with the enemy is established. Interrogation objectives depend upon the mission assigned and type of unit supported.

FM 34-52

SPECIAL FORCES

Special Forces perform five primary missions:

- Unconventional warfare.
- Foreign internal defense.
- Direct action.
- Special reconnaissance.
- Counterterrorism.

The primary role of Special Forces is to influence deep, close, or rear operations beyond the forward limits of conventional military forces. These operations may extend into a hostile nation's homeland or into the territory of hostile states that threaten lines of communication in the friendly strategic rear.

AMPHIBIOUS OPERATIONS

The assault landing team is the basic subordinate task organization of the assault echelon of a landing force. Regardless of whether a battalion or brigade landing team is the basic element, it will operate independently during the first stages of the landing, and be organized to land, overrun beach defenses, and secure terrain objectives.

The interrogation element, along with CI teams, should participate in all aspects of the planning phase affecting the landing force to which it is attached. Interrogators should conduct specialized training. The chief interrogator should coordinate with the landing force intelligence officer on all matters concerning interrogators after the landing has been made.

The interrogators obtain as much background information about the enemy as possible to interrogate captured enemy personnel. Interrogators should study—

- All maps, charts, and photographs of the terrain and defenses of the landing areas.
- All INTREPs on the enemy armed forces in that area.
- Available information on enemy reserves, as well as on civilians residing in the area.

Interrogators should engage in other phases of training, including rehearsals, to smoothly execute embarkation, movement, and debarkation operations.

The interrogation element attached to an amphibious landing force will be OPCON to the landing force intel-

The Special Forces Group (SFG) normally deploys three two-person teams, as required, to support group operations. One of the teams may be attached to the joint interrogation facility (JIF). Special Forces interrogation activities include, but are not limited to—

- Interrogating EPWs, debriefing detainees and returned US personnel, and other persons of intelligence interest to the supported commander.
- Exploiting documents that appear to directly satisfy the supported commanders specific operational requirements (SORs).
- Participating in overt elicitation activities. These activities include liaison, escort, observer, and treaty verification measures.

ligence officer, and employed at his direction. Small interrogation teams may be formed, which will embark on separate ships. Communication silence will place an effective barrier between these teams until that silence is lifted.

When the assault begins, organizational artillery, air support, and naval gunfire depend primarily on shore units for accurate target information. As a result, interrogators may be required to concentrate their efforts on target acquisition.

The importance of information obtained from captured enemy personnel is magnified when establishing a beachhead. This is because the commander is unable to undertake probing actions to "feel out" the enemy as he can during a more conventional land operation.

INITIAL INTERROGATIONS

Interrogators should conduct initial interrogations near the landing beach close to the CP to communicate information without delay. If necessary, interrogators may be sent forward to operate with assault companies. EPW are turned over to the landing force shore party for custody and eventual evacuation.

Further instructions on interrogations and EPW handling are in the intelligence annex of the landing force operations order (OPORD). The interrogation of civilians for information of intelligence value also is an important part of the interrogation mission.

ESTABLISH AND OPERATE

When headquarters of the next higher echelon above the landing force has landed and established its CP, some of the interrogators may be returned to the command level from which they were originally detached. At this time, collecting points and interrogation facilities can be established and operated as in ordinary ground operations.

AIRBORNE OPERATIONS

The functions and basic methods of operations by interrogation personnel with airborne operations are similar to that of an infantry division. However, the method of employment of interrogators is somewhat different. Interrogators who are to operate with airborne units must understand the peculiarities in operations, as well as in training.

The most significant difference between airborne and normal ground operations is airborne operations are usually carried out behind enemy lines. Before the operation, airborne qualified interrogators must—

- Gain a realistic and complete picture of the enemy situation.
- Study enemy units identified in the objective area, and those capable of moving to counterattack our forces.
- Locate significant terrain features in the objective area.

The command echelon to which interrogators will be attached depends on each airborne battalion for the assault phase. Interrogators move into the objective area with the unit they are supporting. They are OPCON to the unit intelligence officer.

As soon as the objective areas and the missions of the respective units within an airborne force are designated, the interrogators who are to take part in the operation must receive details on most aspects of the operation. Interrogators must be provided with—

- The SIR and proposed H-hour.
- Maps, photographs, and other data required for interrogations.
- All information on enemy units which are outside the objective area, but are capable of being employed to counterattack US forces.

The shore party or helicopter support teams operate EPW collecting points in the vicinity of the landing beaches. EPW are evacuated from these points to designated ships by landing craft, helicopter, or amphibious vehicle. Retention in the objective areas is begun as increased facilities, supplies, and personnel permit, consistent with reasonable EPW safety from enemy action.

Interrogators should spend sufficient time coordinating with other intelligence specialists, particularly analysts, to provide a realistic and complete picture of the enemy situation.

They must study enemy units identified in the objective area, as well as significant terrain features, to provide a background for more comprehensive interrogations when the first EPWs are captured. Prior to the actual airborne assault, interrogators must know CP locations of the division and its subordinate units.

Interrogators involved in airborne operations must anticipate the numerous problems which will affect the interrogation mission. For example, it is conceivable during the assault phase that no basic transportation will be available to interrogation personnel; thus, flexibility is critical in planning and executing airborne operations.

COLLECTING POINTS AND INTERROGATION FACILITIES

Collecting points and interrogation facilities are established and operated as in other operations when—

- Headquarters of the next higher echelon above the assault units have been airdropped.
- Assault units have established physical contact with higher headquarters.

AIR ASSAULT (AIRMOBILE) OPERATIONS

Air assault operations are characterized by a high degree of tactical mobility. They are conducted by transporting infantry and field artillery units, with the necessary combat support (CS) and combat service support (CSS), into battle by helicopter. Once deployed on the ground, air assault infantry battalions fight like other infantry battalions. The essence of air assault tactics is a rapid tempo of operations over extended ranges. In division air assault operations, to support more than one brigade, there must be corps augmentation. FM 71-101 describes air assault operations.

Security of aircraft enroute to landing zones (LZs) is a major concern. Friendly aircraft and air defense support must ensure air routes are free of enemy aircraft and air defense systems.

When remotely monitored battlefield sensor systems (REMBASS) are available, friendly ground assets emplace REMBASS along likely enemy ground approach routes in the LZ to detect and report ground movement. Ground surveillance radar (GSR) is employed to warn of enemy movement on friendly flanks.

Air assault operations require extensive HUMINT support in operation planning. CI analysis is critical to ensure OPSEC measures are taken to prevent divulging critical information, such as—

- Date and time of operation.
- Size of force to be employed.
- Air routes to and from planned LZs.
- Planned LZ locations.

CI must also support staging area actions to prevent espionage, sabotage, and acts of terrorism which could adversely affect the operation.

Interrogation is a primary source of information for air assault operations IPB. Interrogation support of initial stages of the operation may be critical to its success.

The assault force commander needs immediate and current enemy intelligence. Lack of immediate questioning of EPWs captured in securing the LZs or in follow-up actions may cause failure of the operation.

Planners must consider the difficulty in getting EPWs back to a support area during the early stages of an air assault operation. Interrogators should support the air assault elements as soon as possible. This may mean an interrogation team is included in the air assault force to operate at a forward EPW collecting point established in the vicinity of the LZ.

Normally, one interrogation team should support each air assault battalion during the assault phase. If the air assault battalion is using more than one LZ, the team may be split to support each LZ.

After assault units have established a ground link-up, some or all of the interrogators may be returned to the echelon of command from which they were detached.

Interrogators supporting the early stages of an air assault operation must be provided with the SIR, which are critical to the operation's success. Interrogators must plan ahead on how to question EPWs to satisfy immediate collection requirements.

ARMORED AND MECHANIZED INFANTRY OPERATIONS

Armored units normally operate on extensive fronts, with deep zones of action and dispersed formations. Because of the mobility and wide range of action of armored units, interrogation normally is not as detailed as in other divisions. Interrogators must remain mobile, operate with minimum facilities, and be alert for sudden changes in the tactical situation.

Planning and Operation

With a few exceptions, the planning and preparation necessary for interrogators supporting armored units is the same as for those supporting regular infantry units. Since radio is the normal means of communication, all interrogation team members must be familiar with voice radio procedures and know how to operate radio equipment common to armored units.

Interrogator Employment

Interrogator personnel who support armored or mechanized units will come under OPCON of the J2, G2, or S2 of the supported unit. Interrogators at all levels of armored or mechanized units must be able to operate during fluid situations, and remain mobile at all times. Because of this mobility, liaison with the J2, G2, or S2 will not be as frequent as in other units.

Interrogators must operate with maximum efficiency on the basis of radio communications, messages, and written reports. As in other type units, interrogation personnel remain OPCON to the G2 until operations begin. At that time, the division MI battalion will attach interrogation personnel to subordinate units. After an operation is completed, interrogation personnel will revert to division control, pending a future mission.

Normally, interrogations within armored units will be limited to interrogating EPWs for location and deployment of antitank weapons and defenses, enemy roadblocks, and presence of enemy armor. In fast moving offensive operations, interrogators are best employed with the forward elements of the units.

Limited Interrogations

EPWs are questioned briefly at the point of capture (POC), and evacuated to division EPW forward collecting points, or are turned over to division MP for evacuation. Interrogators with battalions and brigades in armored operations should have vehicles equipped with radios so they can communicate with the respective intelligence officers and other intelligence agencies.

General exploitation techniques and procedures are modified to fit the environment and objectives of each interrogation.

EPWs are a primary source of information during tactical operations. The ability to exploit that source is a critical factor in mission success. EPWs are first-hand and last-minute observers of enemy operations. They represent one of the few forms of direct association with the enemy and usually possess valuable information.

Other sources of information are enemy and friendly civilians, refugees, defectors, captured agents, and informers. Because these sources may have lived in or passed through areas occupied or controlled by the enemy, they can provide valuable information.

CEDs are another important source of information which interrogation personnel will exploit in tactical operations. Documents will be found in the possession of EPWs or other detainees and on the battlefield. Often, they provide critical and sometimes detailed enemy information.

CAPTURE RATES

US military involvement in tactical operations during and since World War II has shown that conflict generates large numbers of EPWs, other detainees, and CEDs. The higher the intensity of conflict, the larger the number of EPWs, detainees, and CEDs.

In OPERATION DESERT STORM, EPWs were captured, and surrendered, in such great numbers that many with information had little or no contact with interrogators until they were transported to rear area collecting points. By this time, any tactical information they had was of limited use.

In LIC operations in Grenada and Panama, the EPW capture rate was lower, but the detainee rate was higher. The following factors contributed to an extreme challenge for interrogation operations:

- Limited size of US forces.
- Limited number of language-qualified interrogators.
- The focus on local populace.
- Massive amounts of CEDs.

To be successful, interrogation support to tactical operations must be carefully planned. Available interrogation assets must be balanced against the operations objective, enemy situation estimate, and projected EPW capture rates.

The formulas in Table 2-1 are used to estimate the approximate division-level EPW capture rates. These formulas could vary according to type of conflict and mission.

Table 2-1. Division-level EPW capture rate.

Defensive Posture	Offensive Posture
.00035 EPWs* = 9 EPWs/day	.00367 EPWs* = 94 EPWs/day
*per combat soldier per day.

Counterinsurgency Operations

EPW capture rate for counterinsurgency operations may be very low. However, failure of the enemy to wear a uniform or other recognizable insignia results in an identification problem. As a result, large numbers of civilian suspects may also be detained during operations.

This requires individual screening at brigade and division levels of detained personnel to determine their status and appropriate disposition. In Viet Nam, the ratio of EPWs approximated one for each six detainees taken into custody.

FM 34-52

Terrorists

Terrorists are a fact of contemporary life. They are dedicated, intelligent, well financed, resourceful, and astute planners. They are difficult to identify and are not easily captured or interned. The use of terrorist tactics worldwide has increased significantly over the past 25 years, and this trend is not expected to abate in the future.

Besides peacetime, acts of terrorism should also be expected in time of armed conflict. US forces must be prepared to engage in counterterrorist activities to assist the civil and military police. Current doctrine states counterterrorist activities may involve use of general purpose forces as well as those specifically organized and trained in counterterrorist techniques. There is no data available on projected terrorist capture rates.

INTERROGATOR SUPPORTED OPERATIONS

Combat operations which the tactical interrogator supports are discussed below. No matter what the operation is called, it is still incumbent upon the interrogator to gain critical combat information in support of that operation. The interrogator plays a key role to ensure the combat operation is a success.

OFFENSIVE OPERATIONS

Successful offensive operations demand imagination, thorough coordination, and skilled execution. These operations are characterized by—

- Aggressiveness.
- Initiative.
- Rapid shifts in the main effort to take advantage of opportunities.
- Momentum.
- Deep and rapid destruction of enemy forces.

Offenses should move fast, follow successful probes through gaps in the enemy defenses, and shift strength quickly to widen penetrations and reinforce successes to carry the battle deep into the enemy rear operations. They should destroy or control the forces or areas critical to the enemy's overall defensive organization before the enemy can react.

In the offense, certain principles are essential to battlefield success:

- Knowing the battlefield.

INTERROGATION OF PROTECTED PERSONS

Civilians and refugees caught in the middle of a conflict are protected by the GWS, GPW, and GC. Most of the provisions discussed below apply whether the civilian or refugee is found in the territory of a party to the conflict, or in occupied territory. Civilians and refugees fall into the broadly defined category of protected persons under the GC.

It is important to keep in mind that protected persons, even those who might be detained by you, are not EPWs. They must be treated differently and kept segregated from EPWs. The rights and protections afforded EPWs and protected persons, as well as those control and disciplinary measures that may be used against them, are different. Appendix D provides GWS, GPW, and GC provisions for protecting persons rights.

- Denying the enemy intelligence.
- Disrupting and destroying enemy command, control, communications, and intelligence (C³I).
- Maintaining operational integrity.

Interrogation provides a high percentage of information on the enemy and terrain which, along with weather, are the key elements in knowing the battlefield.

Movement to Contact

Movement to contact is a tactical operation to find and engage the enemy. The force is organized to hold the bulk of its combat power in the main body. It moves aggressively toward the enemy, making maximum use of IEW resources to find the enemy before the enemy detects the friendly force.

When contact is made, combat information and intelligence determine where and with what force to attack and overcome enemy resistance. Interrogation is an important source of that information.

In a movement to contact, the friendly force may encounter an enemy defending or moving to contact. Once contact is made, the action must be resolved quickly if the movement to contact operation is to continue. This is normally done by a hasty attack launched as quickly as possible with whatever assets are on hand. No time is available for detailed IPB and analysis, other than what has been done prior to movement to contact. The analyst quickly updates the intelligence analysis for as quickly as possible with whatever assets are on hand. No time is available for detailed IPB and analysis, other than what has been done prior to movement to contact. The analyst quickly updates the intelligence analysis for the commander and continues the update as the attack progresses.

IEW resources look deep to determine second-echelon vulnerabilities. These vulnerabilities form the basis for friendly offensive action, particularly deep interdiction.

While continuing to look deep, IEW resources also support close operations directly. They continue to be sensitive to enemy vulnerabilities which would bring maximum friendly success when exploited. Where possible, IEW resources support deception operations.

In the movement to contact, interrogators should be deployed forward to interrogate EPWs as well as indigenous personnel, particularly refugees, to determine as much as possible about the enemy and terrain which lies in the path of the advancing force.

Meeting Engagement

The meeting engagement may be the result of movement to contact. It occurs when a moving force, incompletely deployed for battle, engages an enemy force about which it has inadequate intelligence. Once contact is made, electronic countermeasures (ECM) are employed against enemy key C³ and electronic guidance systems.

All available collection resources deploy to determine the size, composition, disposition, capabilities, and intentions of the enemy force. They immediately report critical information, such as the location of assailable flanks and other enemy vulnerabilities, to the force commander. The commander needs this information quickly to decide whether to bypass, attack, or defend against the enemy.

Meeting engagement battles can be avoided if IEW resources are effectively integrated and used. If intelligence is effective, the commander can prepare for battle before encountering the enemy force.

Hasty and Deliberate Attacks

In hasty and deliberate attacks, IEW tasks are virtually the same. MI resources determine as much information as possible about the enemy's defensive posture. Key information determined by IEW assets includes—

- How the enemy's defense is organized.

- Where enemy reserve and counterattack forces are located, and when they move.
- What NBC weapons systems the enemy has, and where they are located.
- Where the enemy's conventional artillery is located.
- Where enemy radio electronic combat (REC) assets are located.

In a hasty attack, the need for rapid collection of combat information is critical. In such an attack it may be advantageous to deploy interrogation teams down to battalion level to operate in a similar manner as in the movement to contact.

In the deliberate attack, intelligence on the enemy is more complete, and interrogation support may not be provided below brigade. However, planning for a deliberate attack should task organize interrogation assets to satisfy the greatest need.

For example, a committed brigade that conducts the main attack receives the support of two interrogation teams; a brigade in a supporting attack receives only one team; and a brigade in reserve receives no interrogation support.

Exploitation and Pursuit

Commanders planning offensive operations must be prepared to conduct exploitation and pursuit actions. Without prior detailed planning for these contingencies, fleeting opportunities to press a successful attack to completion may be missed. IEW resources, particularly MI assets, play an important part in planning for and executing exploitation and pursuit missions.

IPB is critical and helps identify enemy vulnerabilities. Intelligence supports targeting by identifying, locating, and tracking enemy forces which may move to counter exploitation forces.

After the initial assault, MI assets determine the integrity of enemy defenses. They locate gaps, holes, and weak spots that may be exploited. They determine if the enemy intends to defend in place, delay, or withdraw to subsequent defensive positions. ECM are maximized to increase enemy force confusion.

Reconnaissance In Force

A reconnaissance in force (RIF) is a limited objective operation by a substantial force to obtain information and to determine enemy dispositions and strengths.

FM 34-52

The RIF also tests enemy reactions to friendly force action. Enemy reactions may reveal major defensive weaknesses which could be exploited.

Even when using RIF to gain information, commanders executing it must be alert to seize an opportunity to exploit tactical success. If the enemy situation must be developed across a broad front, a RIF may probe the enemy at selected points.

Recognizing that RIF is primarily an information-gathering operation, commanders must carefully consider the risks involved. Precise plans must be made in advance to extricate the force or to exploit success.

In many respects, MI RIF support is like movement to contact. Interrogation support is critical since EPWs will be an important source of the information the RIF seeks. Interrogation support, described in movement to contact, may be the most efficient means of supporting the RIF.

River Crossing

River-crossing operations are an integral part of land warfare. The objective of any river-crossing operation is to project combat power across a water obstacle while ensuring the integrity and momentum of the force. Because the modern battlefield is so lethal, and small enemy units can be destructive, crossings must be quick and undetected. Therefore, it is essential that rivers be crossed in stride as a continuation of operations.

MI units contribute to the planning and execution phases of river-crossing operations:

- IPB enables the commander to select the best crossing site and know the battlefield beyond, so operations can be sustained without interruption.
- IEW forces deploy forward and continue seeking enemy weaknesses for exploitation, and to warn of enemy forces capable of affecting the operation.
- Other elements guard the flanks to prevent enemy surprise.
- MI resources further help the commander know the battlefield and guard against a surprise attack by identifying, locating, and tracking enemy NBC-capable delivery systems.

Based on the picture of the battlefield drawn by the G2 as a result of IPB, the commander decides whether the crossing will be—

- Hasty or deliberate.

- Day or night.
- Wide or narrow on the front.

MI units normally are not part of the assault force; however, GSR teams may accompany the assault force if surveillance of enemy approaches to the exit bank cannot be conducted from the entry bank. Additionally, interrogators should be included in the assault force if immediate EPW exploitation is deemed critical to developing intelligence on the exit-bank battlefield.

Evacuation of EPWs back over the crossing site to a support area collecting point normally will be delayed. This is due to the need to get the maximum amount of force across the river in the shortest time. Two-way traffic in the early stages of the crossing may be precluded.

A forward collecting point on the exit-bank side of the river may be established immediately behind the assault force, and interrogations can be conducted to obtain information critical to the immediate situation. To accomplish this, organization of interrogation assets as outlined under movement to contact may be employed.

DEFENSIVE OPERATIONS

Defensive operations can retain ground, deny the enemy access to an area, and damage or destroy attacking forces. They cannot, however, win the battle by imposing the will of the commander on the enemy. For this reason, the defense is a temporary expedient, undertaken only when it is impossible to conduct offensive operations, or when attacking in another area. All defensive actions are undertaken in anticipation of ultimately resuming the offense.

Commanders plan the overall defensive effort on the basis of the METT-T. MI assets are allocated within the elements of the organizational framework to support the overall scheme. The IEW principles for supporting offensive operations apply to the defense, as well as to other operations. Interrogation support to defensive operations, likewise, is basically the same as that provided to offensive operations. Listed below are important factors to consider in defensive operations:

- The primary focus of intelligence requirements is on which enemy will attack and when, where, and how they intend to do it.
- The decentralized, fluid nature of the covering force battle requires interrogation support at the lowest possible echelon. This requires DS interrogation teams from the division MI battalion and the MI brigade (Corps). Questioning of civilians and EPWs is brief and is conducted to obtain information of immediate tactical value. Interrogators gather information about the identification, composition, disposition and direction of movement, strength, and capabilities of enemy forces involved in the immediate covering force battle.

- More interrogation support is required at corps. The enemy has the initiative, and will probably conduct operations in the friendly rear area.

Support of defense operations requires the closest management of interrogation assets. The necessity to support the covering force must be balanced against the increased corps rear operations support. The increased emphasis on rear operations may mean fewer corps interrogation assets available to support division.

The G2, in coordination with the MI unit commander, may determine that an echelon between the covering force and corps will not be supported. For example, EPWs may be interrogated by DS interrogators supporting the covering force, and then be evacuated back to division, bypassing brigade. Additionally, the five-member DS team, which provides flexibility, may have to be reduced to two or three interrogators. Table 2-2 shows interrogation support in LIC.

THEATER INTERROGATION FACILITY

The EAC interrogation facility will normally be designated as the TIF. A TIF is staffed by US Army interrogators and analysts, with support from Air Force, Navy, Marine Corps, and other US national agencies as required. In a multinational operation, a combined interrogation facility may be established with allied interrogator augmentation. In addition to conventional theater Army operations, a TIF may be established to support a joint or unified command to meet theater requirements during crisis or contingency deployments.

MI battalion companies, MI brigade (EAC) provide US Army interrogation support to the EAC TIF. The mission of the TIF is to—

- Establish liaison with host nation (HN) commanders to achieve critical intelligence information in response to theater and national level intelligence collection requirements.
- Ensure communication between HN and US military TIF commanders, and establish rapport with HN interrogation activities.
- Coordinate for national level collection requirements.
- Interrogate PWs, high-level political and military personnel, civilian internees, defectors, refugees, and displaced persons.
- Participate in debriefings of US and allied personnel who have escaped after being captured, or who have evaded capture.
- Translate and exploit selected CEDs.
- Assist in technical support activity (TSA) operations (see FM 34-5(S)).

The MI battalion (I&E) has an HHC for C³, and three interrogation companies, of which one is Active Component (AC) and the other two are RC. The companies consist of two MI companies, I&E (EPW support) and one MI company, I&E (GS-EAC).

The two MI companies support EPW compound operations. Their elements are primarily for GS at EAC, but may be deployed for DS at corps and division. The MI company (I&E) (GS-EAC) provides priority interrogation and DOCEX support to corps and divisions, to the TIF, and to temporary EPW compounds as required.

A TIF is organized into a headquarters section, operations section, and two interrogation and DOCEX sections. It will normally have an attached TSA section from Operations Group, and a liaison team from the Joint Captured Materiel Exploitation Center (JCMEC). The JCMEC liaison team assists in exploiting sources who have knowledge of captured enemy weapons and equipment.

The headquarters section provides all command, administrative, logistical, and maintenance support to the TIF. It coordinates with—

- Commander, MI Battalion (I&E) for personnel status, administrative support, and logistical support prior to deployment.
- Battalion S3 for deployment of interrogation assets.
- Theater J2 for reporting procedures, operational situation update, and theater and national level intelligence requirements.
- Provost marshal for location of theater EPW camps, and for procedures to be followed by interrogators and MP for processing, interrogating, and internment.
- Commanders of theater medical support units and internment facility for procedures to treat, and clear for questioning, wounded EPWs.
- Commander, CI company, for CI requirements and joint interrogation and CI procedures.

OPERATIONS SECTION

This section (where ideally the officer in charge [OIC] has the 3Q additional skill identifier) is organized into the operations, OB, and communications elements. The operations section—

- Designates work areas for all TIF elements.
- Establishes and maintains TIF functional files.
- Establishes interrogation priorities.
- Maintains a daily log and journal.
- Disseminates incoming and outgoing distribution.
- Conducts liaison with local officials, adjacent and subordinate intelligence activities, CI, MP, PSYOP, the JCMEC, Plans and Policy Directorate (J5), and provost marshal.

- Conducts coordination with holding area OIC or enclosure commander for screening site, medical support, access, movement, and evacuation procedures for EPWs.
- Conducts operations briefings when required.
- Manages screening operations.
- Manages EPW access for intelligence collection.
- Assigns control numbers (see DIAM 58-13).
- Supervises all intelligence collection activities within the TIF.

OB ELEMENT

This element—

- Obtains the initial data base and updates and maintains it.
- Establishes and maintains OB workbooks and files to include data generated by intelligence information which has not been verified.
- Maintains SITMAPs displaying enemy and friendly situation.
- Catalogs, cross-references, and disseminates collection requirements to TIF collection elements.
- Reviews INTREPs for inclusion into data base.
- Conducts OB briefings when required.

OTHER MI ELEMENTS

Collection missions are tailored and assigned by the CM&D section subordinate to the G2 at corps and division. The same functions are performed at brigade and battalion by the battlefield information control center (BICC). These elements must ensure the assigned collection mission is passed by secure means, through established channels, to the interrogation element.

If interrogators are deployed in a GS role, the CM&D section will pass its interrogator taskings to the MI battalion TOC. If interrogators are deployed in a DS role, they will receive taskings directly from the BICC.

The CM&D section (through the MI battalion TOC) or the BICC must maintain close contact with the interrogation element. This contact allows a two-way flow of communication.

The CM&D or BICC element needs the contact to accomplish the preceding three steps. They also use the contact to revise the interrogation element's collection mission as required. The interrogation element requires the contact to ensure it receives current guidance, direction, and assistance in solving collection problems.

ALL SOURCE ANALYSIS SYSTEM (ASAS)

This system provides assistance to the J2, G2, or G3 and MI unit commanders who collect and analyze intelligence and perform CI and EW functions. The following elements feed into the ASAS.

Imagery Exploitation

Interrogators should maintain close contact with imagery exploitation elements. Interrogators may be required to identify items on air photographs and should report information of interest to the imagery analysts. Imagery analysts can aid interrogation personnel by furnishing photographs for use in connection with interrogation and by verifying leads originally obtained through interrogation.

TECHINT Personnel

Normally, interrogation elements coordinate with the TECHINT sections of the RC battalion (TE). The TECHINT section, and its field teams, furnishes guidance and requirements to the interrogation elements through questionnaires and interrogation guides. These are valuable aids to the interrogator in obtaining specific TECHINT information.

Interrogators notify the nearest TECHINT personnel to obtain detailed technical information and guidance. At tactical levels, this is the exception rather than the rule, but it may be necessary when information is of immediate tactical value.

COUNTERINTELLIGENCE

Coordination between CI and interrogation elements is always necessary. This coordination is effected continuously, directly or indirectly, and at the discretion of the intelligence officer. CI elements are active in the security screening of refugees and civilians in the combat zone.

CI personnel and interrogators must work together to ensure proper interrogation of enemy civilians or personnel speaking the enemy's language. Interrogator personnel can further assist the CI effort by—

- Furnishing leads on suspected enemy agents and intelligence personnel.
- Informing CI elements concerning enemy personnel dressed in other than enemy uniforms.

FM 34-52

- Referring to CI elements, or making available to them for interrogation, all EPWs and other sources of CI interest. CI personnel are trained for interrogation in cases of suspected espionage, sabotage, or subversion. Their knowledge of the CI situation (to include hostile intelligence activities) enhances full exploitation of appropriate sources.

MILITARY POLICE

The corps MP commander operates the corps EPW holding area and provides escort guard support to divisions for EPW evacuation in routine or medical channels. EPWs are evacuated from the corps holding area to the next higher echelon with the least possible delay.

The MP commander also arranges and coordinates transportation requirements to include rations and water, if required, for the movement to include number of vehicles, railroad or passenger cars, or aircraft within the time and place of departure.

Expedient EPW evacuation is provided by the prior dispatch of escort guards to establish a ready reserve at the supported divisions. This reserve evacuation capability is maintained by sending additional escort

SUPPORT RELATIONSHIPS

Successful interrogation operations require support from elements within their echelon of assignment, including all major staff organizations. These elements are collectively responsible for the planning that creates the overall environment for interrogators. The intelligence staffs (J2, G2, or S2) direct contribution to interrogation operations has already been discussed. Its general responsibilities are outlined below, along with those of other staff and support elements.

PERSONNEL (G1 AND S1)

The G1 and S1 are responsible for—

- Supervising the medical support furnished to sources.
- Maintaining a list (by language and proficiency) of qualified linguists within their command.
- Coordinating with the G5 for procurement and payment of other interpreters and translators needed to perform intelligence and nonintelligence duties.

The G1 and S1 ensure the echelon's operations plan (OPLAN) contains complete provisions for source han-guards on a continuing or as required basis. These guards may also be attached to EPW and processing reception camps as needed.

EPW administrative processing is done by MP PW processing units. Processing includes personnel record preparation, fingerprint and identity cards (if needed), and internment serial number assignment.

PSYOP

Normally, interrogation elements coordinate with PSYOP elements to obtain information concerning the motivational factors and cultural value systems of the individuals to be interrogated.

PSYOP units, as a part of their normal operations, develop detailed analysis concerning psychological and cultural factors of friendly and hostile elements in the AO. Such information will help interrogation personnel to understand the source's attitude, value system, and perception; it will also help to obtain information more rapidly, and at the same time, PSYOP information on current conditions in enemy country or among enemy forces. A PSYOP PIR would be established to cover this requirement.

ding and evacuation. This plan must satisfy the interests of all other staff officers and provide for—

- Humane treatment of all sources.
- Prompt evacuation from the combat zone.
- Opportunities to interrogate sources.
- Integration of procedures for the evacuation, control, and administration of sources with other CS and CSS operations (through the provost marshal).
- Training for all troops on the provisions of international agreements and regulations relating to sources.
- Ensuring delivery of EPW and detainee mail.
- Maintaining EPW and detainee statistics.
- Administration and control of EPW currency and pay records, to include coordination with appropriate intelligence authorities about investigation of large sums of money.

INTELLIGENCE (J2, G2, AND S2)

The J2, G2, and S2 are responsible for supervising appropriate censorship activities relating to sources. They also—

- Coordinate with the G3 to ensure plans for interrogation, CI, PSYOP, and CA operations are included in unit training plans and OPLANs.
- Draft instructions for MI handling, evacuating, and exploiting captured enemy personnel and CEDs. (They coordinate with the G3 to ensure draft instructions are included in the command SOP, OPLANs, and supplementary orders.)
- Project source capture flows.
- Determine the number of interpreters and translators needed to perform intelligence duties.
- Control the procedures used to process and grant clearances to the interpreters and translators who need them.
- Coordinate with G5 on screening of non-suspect local nationals and displaced persons.

OPERATIONS (G3 AND S3)

The G3 and S3 are responsible for operations, plans, organization, and training. Where MP assets are not available, or insufficient, they are responsible for obtaining, organizing, and supervising employment of additional personnel as guards. The G3 and S3—

- Prepare, coordinate, and publish the command SOP, OPLANs, and supplementary orders. This includes instructions for handling, evacuating, and exploiting captured enemy personnel and CEDs, which are drafted by the G2.
- Incorporate interrogation operations into future plans and operations.
- Ensure subordinate units are trained in proper handling and evacuation of captured enemy personnel, captured enemy materiel (CEM), and CEDs.
- Train guard personnel.
- Provide G2 and S2 with details of planned operations.
- Plan and supervise all PSYOP activities in support of tactical operations.

- Evaluate, in coordination with the G2 and G5, enemy PYSOP efforts and effectiveness of friendly PSYOP on target groups.

SUPPLY (G4 AND S4)

The G4 and S4 are responsible for storing and maintaining supplies and equipment needed by subordinate units to conduct source handling operations, as well as delivering them to subordinate units as they are needed. The G4 and S4 also supervise—

- Command policy for evacuation and internment of captured enemy personnel, and evacuation and safekeeping of CEM and CEDs.
- Real estate acquisition and construction of source holding area facilities.
- Collection and distribution of captured enemy supplies. (This is coordinated with the intelligence and operations staffs.)
- Procurement and distribution of rations to source holding areas. (Captured enemy rations will be used when possible.)
- EPW and detainee transportation.
- Determination of requirements for use of source labor for the logistical support needed in source handling operations.
- Logistical support to interpreter personnel.

CIVIL-MILITARY OPERATIONS (G5 AND S5)

The G5 and S5 are responsible for CA. They—

- Advise, assist, and make recommendations that relate to civil-military operations (CMO) and CA aspects of current or proposed operations.
- Prepare estimates and conduct studies and analyses for CMO activities.
- Prepare the portions of operations, administrative, and logistics plans and orders for CMO activities.
- Determine requirements for resources to accomplish command CMO activities, including CA units and personnel.
- Coordinate with local US government, G1 and S1 representatives, and HN armed forces for procuring native linguists for interpreter support.
- Recommend command policy on obligations between civil and military authorities; on the AO population; and on the works and activities arising from treaties, agreements, international law, and US policy.

FM 34-52

- Provide civil support for tactical and CSS operations and prevent civilian interference with these operations.
- Coordinate military support of populace and resource control programs.
- Provide technical advice and assistance in reorientation of sources and enemy defectors.
- Coordinate MI aspects of CMO activities with the G2 or S2.

ADDITIONAL SUPPORT

Besides the major staff elements, an interrogation element requires support from several other elements in order to conduct operations. These elements are discussed below.

Communications

Secure, reliable communication must be available at or near the interrogation element's deployment site. Priority access to these communications must be arranged to support contact with collection management.

Staff Judge Advocate

This element can provide legal support and advice on the interpretation and application of international regulations and agreements about handling sources. It is also a channel for reporting known or suspected war crimes.

Health Service Support

This element must clear all sick and wounded sources before they can be interrogated. Seriously sick or wounded sources are evacuated through medical channels. If adequate facilities are not available in EPW hospitals, EPWs are admitted to military or civilian medical facilities where treatment can be obtained.

Each EPW is medically examined and weighed at least once a month. Provisions are made for the isolation of communicable cases, disinfection, and inoculations. Retained medical personnel and EPWs with medical training are used to care for their own sick and wounded.

NBC Protection

All EPWs will be provided NBC protection. If EPWs do not have their own NBC protection equipment, or their equipment is not usable, the detaining forces must provide them with proper NBC gear.

Chaplain Support

The unit ministry team, consisting of the chaplain and chaplain assistant, provides religious support. The team coordinates with the G5 and S5 to provide religious support for refugees, displaced persons, and indigenous civilians. It provides services for EPWs or assists detained clergy of enemy forces and other detained clergy. The team provides burial rites according to the religious rites of combatants. Religious preference of EPWs will be obtained from DA Form 4237-R (Detainee Personnel Record) (see Chapter 3).

Inspector General

This element is a channel for reporting known or suspected war crimes.

Public Affairs officer

The public affairs officer advises and informs the commander of public affairs impact inherent in planned or implemented EPW operations.

Engineer Officer

The engineer officer assists in planning the construction of EPW enclosures. He also assists the G2 and S2 in developing obstacle intelligence (OBSTINTEL) during the IPB. OBSTINTEL requirements are reflected in the PIR and IR. Much of the IR is technical in nature and warrants direct coordination with the interrogator to ensure the right questions are asked. Through the J2, G2, and S2, he will also analyze the information collected and its impact on the maneuver and engineer plan.

Military Band Unit

At division and corps, the band may augment the MP by providing security at central collecting points and corps holding areas.

CHAPTER 3 THE INTERROGATION PROCESS

Criteria for selecting personnel to be interrogated vary with the—

- Commander's collection requirements.
- Time limitations.
- Number and types of potential sources available.
- Exact circumstances surrounding the employment of US Forces.

In this regard, source selection is important in conducting interrogation at tactical echelons of command because of the proximity to enemy elements, number and conditions of detainees, and time restrictions.

The interrogation process involves screening of sources for interrogation and the use of interrogation techniques and procedures. Screening and interrogation involve complex interpersonal skills, and many aspects of their performance are subjective. Each screening and interrogation is unique because of the interaction between the interrogator and the source.

The five interrogation phases—planning and preparation, approach, questioning, termination, and reporting—are discussed later in this chapter.

COLLECTION PRIORITY

Interrogators are trained to exploit sources and CEDs. This allows the all-source collection manager three exploitation options for interrogation assets: They may exploit sources alone, exploit CEDs, or exploit both simultaneously.

In the past, it was assumed interrogators could accomplish the dual collection mission no matter what type of combat operations were being supported. This may no longer be true. Unit staffing, coupled with the amount of CEDs and sources, may prevent exploitation of sources and CEDs simultaneously.

The density of interrogation assets and command emphasis on the collection effort determine mission requirements. The feasibility of a dual collection mission may also be the result of initial IPB by the commander's intelligence staff. If an echelon cannot conduct a dual collection effort, interrogating sources receives the priority for two reasons:

- The greater intelligence potential of a source.
- The rate at which people forget detailed information.

An individual's value system is easier to bypass immediately after undergoing a significant traumatic experience. The circumstances of capture are traumatic for most sources. Many former PWs indicated extreme disorientation immediately after capture. Capture thrusts them into a foreign environment over which they have no control. Their mores were of no use to them during this period. Most of them survived this phase by clinging to very basic values (love of family and loyalty to friends or comrades).

Since humans are adaptable, this initial vulnerability passes quickly. An individual's established values begin to assert themselves again within a day or two. When this happens, much of an individual's susceptibility to interrogation is gone.

Memory stores information in two areas: short-term and long-term memory. The five senses constantly transmit information to the brain's short-term memory temporarily and then shifts to the brain's long-term memory. The time at which this transfer takes place varies, but research shows a great amount of detail is lost during that transfer. The percentage of information lost beyond recall varies from study to study, but 70 percent is a conservative estimate.

Much of the information of value to the interrogator is information the source is not aware he has. Although no research data is available in this area, it is likely this type of information will be lost quickly.

CEDs, while not affected by memory loss, are often time-sensitive and thus are screened quickly for possible exploitation (see Chapter 4).

The supported echelon's intelligence officer determines the guidelines for priority of exploitation. The commander's intelligence needs and the J2's, G2's, or S2's estimate of the enemy's intentions dictate the extent to which these guidelines can be applied. Exploitation priorities are reviewed and changed when needed.

FM 34-52

SCREENING

Screening is the selection of sources for interrogation. It must be conducted at every echelon to—

- Determine source cooperativeness and knowledgeability.
- Determine which sources can best satisfy the commander's PIR and IR in a timely manner.

PREPARE TO CONDUCT SCREENINGS

Screeners should obtain a copy of the element's overall objective statement from the PIR, IR, and SIR and become familiar with the intelligence indicators listed there. Screeners must use their experience and imagination to devise ways to identify EPWs and detainees who might possess information pertinent to these indicators.

For example, one group of indicators may concern new enemy units moving along a specific avenue of approach. In this case, a screener may want to concentrate first on screening EPWs and detainees captured near that location. When he questions those EPWs or detainees, the screener might try to determine what units are due to arrive in that area in the near future. The ability to recognize branch of service and rank insignia can be of great assistance to screeners.

Screeners coordinate with MP holding area guards on their role in the screening process. The guards are told where the screening will take place, how EPWs and detainees are to be brought there from the holding area, and what types of behavior on their part will facilitate the screenings.

DOCUMENT SCREENING

If time permits, screeners should go to the holding area and examine all available documents pertaining to the EPWs and detainees. They should look for signs that certain EPWs and detainees are willing, or can be induced, to cooperate with the interrogator. Previous screening and interrogation reports and EPW personnel records are important.

Interrogation reports identify EPWs and detainees who have been cooperative in the past. Prior screening reports indicate EPWs and detainees who appear cooperative. During EPW inprocessing, MPs prepare a DA Form 4237-R, which is prescribed by AR 190-8. A sample is shown at Figure 3-1. DA Form 4237-R contains additional information not required by the GWS, GPW, and GC, but which the EPWs and detainees may have volunteered during inprocessing. The volunteering of information is one indicator of EPWs or detainee's cooperation.

When examining documents, screeners should identify topics on which EPWs and detainees have pertinent information. Screeners should make a note of any documents captured with specific EPWs and detainees that may contain indications of pertinent knowledge and potential cooperation.

PERSONNEL SCREENING

If time permits, screeners should question holding area personnel about the EPWs and detainees. Since these personnel are in almost constant contact with the EPWs and detainees, their descriptions of specific ones can help identify sources who might answer the supported commander's PIR and IR.

Screeners should identify and note those EPWs and detainees whose appearance and behavior indicate they are willing to cooperate immediately or are unlikely to cooperate ever. Unless time is critically short, screeners should—

- Personally observe the EPWs and detainees.
- Pay attention to rank and branch of service insignias, and condition of uniform and equipment.
- Carefully observe the behavior demonstrated by other EPWs and detainees.
- Look for things like attempts to talk to the guards, intentional placement in the wrong segregation group, or any overt signs of nervousness, anxiety, or fright.
- Note any EPW or detainee whose appearance or behavior indicates willingness to talk.

CI SCREENING

Before initiating the screening process, the interrogator establishes liaison with supporting CI agents. The CI element, through the CM&D, provides PIR of CI interest. During the screening process, interrogators identify sources of CI interest. After these sources have been interrogated for any information of immediate tactical value (as needed), they are turned over to CI. CI is interested in sources who—

- Have no identification documents.
- Have excessive or modified identification documents.

- Possess unusually large amounts of cash or valuables.
- Possess knowledge of critical interest (for example, nuclear power or chemical plant operations, weapons test and development).
- Are illegal border crossers.
- Attempt to avoid checkpoints.
- Are on the black, gray, or white list (FM 34-60A(S)).
- Request to see CI or US Army Intelligence personnel.
- Have family in the denied area.

Screeners should always try to screen cooperative knowledgeable EPWs and detainees first. These include EPWs and detainees identified during the screener's review of documents, questioning of holding area personnel, and their own personal observations. Based on screener notes and recommendations, they establish the order which EPWs and detainees will be questioned. The holding area guards are then told to bring these EPWs and detainees, in order, to the screening site one at a time.

A screener must use a screening report to record information as it is obtained from the source. Figure 3-2 is a format for a screening report. All information shown is rarely obtained from any one source. The blocks save the screener as much additional writing as possible. If PIR, IR, and SIR information is obtained, it is spot reported in SALUTE format. When this type of information is obtained during screening, it must be exploited fully and reported as soon as possible.

Source screening ends when the screener is sure he can make an accurate assessment of the source's potential cooperation and pertinent knowledge. At this time, the source is returned to the control of the guards, and the screener records his assessment on the screening report.

The assessment is recorded using a screening code. The screening code is an alphanumeric designation which reflects the level of cooperation expected from the source and the level of knowledgeability the source may possess. Table 3-1 shows the codes for assessing sources.

Those sources who have been assigned to the same category may be interrogated in any order deemed appropriate by the senior interrogator. Category 1A sources normally should be the first to be interrogated; Category 1B, next; followed by those assigned to categories 2A, 1C, 2B, 3A, 2C, and 3B. Category 3C sources are normally interrogated last.

This order ensures the highest probability of obtaining the greatest amount of pertinent information within available time. Screening codes may change with the echelon. The higher the echelon, the more time is available to conduct an approach.

Figure 3-3 shows the order in which sources will be interrogated. The term "screening category" should not be confused with the categories that are assigned to EPWs and detainees based on their intelligence value.

There are five interrogation phases which take place after the screening process.

PLANNING AND PREPARATION

Once the senior interrogator has assigned specific sources to his subordinates, the interrogators develop a plan for their interrogations. These plans reflect the supported commander's PIR, IR, and SIR and current tactical situation. If they do not, subsequent interrogations will not help the element to satisfy its assigned collection mission, and information needed by the supported unit will be missed.

Each interrogator, where feasible, begins his preparation by examining the SITMAP, OB data base, and pertinent information contained in the interrogation element's files.

Screening reports (Figure 3-2) and DA Form 5976 (Enemy Prisoner of War Capture Tag) are excellent sources of information the interrogator needs. Figure 3-4 shows a sample of DA Form 5976. There should be at least one of these documents available on each EPW and detainee. Additional sources of information may be—

- Documents captured with the EPW or detainee.
- Reports from interrogation elements at previous echelons.

- DA Form 4237-R (Figure 3-1).

The planning and preparation phase and the approach phase (discussed later) are interrelated. In the planning and preparation phase, the interrogator gathers—

- Information on the source's circumstances of capture.
- Comments from others who have been with the source.
- Information on the source's observed behavior and personal traits.
- Peculiarities from the screening sheet.

This information helps the interrogator develop a picture of the source and enables him to select approaches most likely to work.

There are four primary factors that must be considered when selecting tentative approaches:

- The source's mental and physical state. Is the source injured, angry, crying, arrogant, cocky, or frightened? If so, how can this state be best exploited during interrogation.

ENEMY PRISONER OF WAR (EPW) CAPTURE TAG (Part A)
For use of this form, see AR 190-8, the proponent agency is DCSOPS

Attach this part of tag to EPW. (Do not remove from EPW.)

- Search - For weapons, military documents, or special equipment.
- Silence - Prohibit talking among EPWs for ease of control.
- Segregate - By rank, sex, and nationality.
- Safeguard - To prevent harm or escape.
- Speed - Evacuate from the combat zone.
- Tag - Prisoners and documents or special equipment.

DA FORM 5976, JAN 91

UNIT RECORD CARD (Part B)
Attach this part of tag to Unit (Do not remove from unit retains for records.)

Attach this part of tag to EPW's retained property. (Do not remove from property.)

As a minimum, the tag must include the following information:

- Item 1, date and time of capture.
- Item 2, capturing unit.
- Item 9, place of capture (grid coordinates).
- Item 10, circumstances of capture (how the EPW was captured).

- The source's background. What is the source's age and level of military or civilian experience.
- The objective of the interrogation. How much time is available for the interrogation? Is the commander interested only in specific areas (PIR, IR, SIR)? Is this source knowledgeable enough to require a full OB interrogation?
- The interrogator himself. What abilities does he have that can be brought into play? What weaknesses does he have that may interfere with the interrogation? Can his personality adapt to the personality of the source?

The interrogator may require the interrogator conduct research to obtain detailed data on a specific geographic area, political group, weapons system, or technical field. In the technical field, TECHINT personnel assist the interrogator.

There are various weapons identification guides to assist the interrogator in identifying any weapons mentioned by the source. However, the source should not be shown this guide until he has thoroughly described the items, or has drawn a picture of the weapons.

The interrogator may require maps, documents, recording and photographic equipment, screening reports, and other aids to facilitate the interrogation. From these aids, he must select those best suited to accomplish the objective, determine their availability, and arrange for their procurement well in advance of the interrogation. Some aids the interrogator may use are—

- DA Form 5976.
- Previous interrogation reports.
- Documents found on an EPW or detainee or on the battlefield.
- Maps.
- Imagery or aerial photographs.
- OB data.
- Guards.
- CA and PSYOP personnel.
- Informants.
- Physical aids (such as lights, tables, drafting tools).
- Interrogation guides.

The interrogator must consider in advance obstacles and limitations which may affect the interrogation. These obstacles and limitations may include—

- EPW or detainee legal status.
- Time and facilities available for interrogation.
- The military situation.
- Knowledgeability.
- Language restrictions.
- Physical condition.
- Psychological aspects.
- Other issues which may appear during the course of the interrogation.

Logistical requirements include—

- Bilets.
- Office space.
- Heat.
- Light.
- Messing and detention facilities.
- Transportation which may be required in support of the interrogation.

The various staff sections of the supported command may be called upon to furnish the necessary logistical items mentioned above. All support requests will be coordinated with the appropriate staff officer by the EPW or detainee camp or collecting point commander.

Interrogators should question guards about the sources, time permitting, as part of preparation. Since the guards are in constant contact with the sources, they may be able to provide information on—

- Their physical condition.
- Demonstrated attitude and behavior.
- Contact made with other guards or sources.
- How the source has been handled since capture.
- Hearsay (H/S) information from others who have handled the source.
- Confirmation of capture data, especially the circumstances under which the source was captured.

FM 34-52

Time permitting, each interrogator should unobtrusively observe the source to personally confirm his identity and to check his personal appearance and behavior.

After the interrogator has collected all information available about his assigned source, he analyzes it. He looks for indicators of psychological or physical weakness that might make the source susceptible to one or more approaches, which facilitates his approach strategy. He also uses the information he collected to identify the type and level of knowledge possessed by the source pertinent to the element's collection mission.

The interrogator uses his estimate of the type and extent of knowledge possessed by the source to modify the basic topical sequence of questioning. He selects only those topics in which he believes the source has pertinent knowledge. In this way, the interrogator refines his element's overall objective into a set of specific interrogation subjects.

The major topics that can be covered in an interrogation are shown below in their normal sequence. However, the interrogator is free to modify this sequence as necessary.

- Missions.
- Composition.
- Weapons, equipment, strength.
- Dispositions.
- Tactics.
- Training.

APPROACH PHASE

The approach phase begins with initial contact between the EPW or detainee and interrogator. Extreme care is required since the success of the interrogation hinges, to a large degree, on the early development of the EPW's or detainee's willingness to communicate. The interrogator's objective during this phase is to establish EPW or detainee rapport, and to gain his willing cooperation so he will correctly answer pertinent questions to follow. The interrogator—

- Adopts an appropriate attitude based on EPW or detainee appraisal.
- Prepares for an attitude change, if necessary.

- Combat effectiveness.
- Logistics.
- Electronic technical data.
- Miscellaneous.

As a result of the planning and preparation phase, the interrogator develops a plan for conducting his assigned interrogation. He must review this plan with the senior interrogator, when possible. Whether written or oral, the interrogation plan must contain at least the following items:

- Interrogation objective.
- EPW's or detainee's identity, to include visual observation of the EPW or detainee by the interrogator.
- Interrogation time and place.
- Primary and alternate approaches.
- Questioning techniques to be used or why the interrogator selected only specific topics from the basic questioning sequence.
- Means of recording and reporting information obtained.

The senior interrogator reviews each plan and makes any changes he feels necessary based on the commander's PIR and IR. After the plan is approved, the holding compound is notified when to bring the source to the interrogation site. The interrogator collects all available interrogation aids needed (maps, charts, writing tools, and reference materials) and proceeds to the interrogation site.

- Begins to use an approach technique.

The amount of time spent on this phase will mostly depend on the probable quantity and value of information the EPW or detainee possesses, the availability of other EPW or detainee with knowledge on the same topics, and available time. At the initial contact, a businesslike relationship should be maintained. As the EPW or detainee assumes a cooperative attitude, a more relaxed atmosphere may be advantageous. The interrogator must carefully determine which of the various approach techniques to employ.

Regardless of the type of EPW or detainee and his outward personality, he does possess weaknesses which, if recognized by the interrogator, can be exploited. These weaknesses are manifested in personality traits such as speech, mannerisms, facial expressions, physical movements, excessive perspiration, and other overt indications that vary from EPW or detainee.

From a psychological standpoint, the interrogator must be cognizant of the following behaviors. People tend to—

- Talk, especially after harrowing experiences.
- Show deference when confronted by superior authority.
- Rationalize acts about which they feel guilty.
- Fail to apply or remember lessons they may have been taught regarding security if confronted with a disorganized or strange situation.
- Cooperate with those who have control over them.
- Attach less importance to a topic about which the interrogator demonstrates identical or related experience or knowledge.
- Appreciate flattery and exoneration from guilt.
- Resent having someone or something they respect belittled, especially by someone they dislike.
- Respond to kindness and understanding during trying circumstances.
- Cooperate readily when given material rewards such as extra food or luxury items for their personal comfort.

Interrogators do not "run" an approach by following a set pattern or routine. Each interrogation is different, but all interrogation approaches have the following in common. They—

- Establish and maintain control over the source and interrogation.
- Establish and maintain rapport between the interrogator and source.
- Manipulate the source's emotions and weaknesses to gain his willing cooperation.

The successful application of approach techniques eventually induces the source to willingly provide accurate intelligence information to the interrogator. The term "willingly" refers to the source's answering the interrogator's questions, not necessarily his cooperation.

The source may or may not be aware he is providing the interrogator with information about enemy forces. Some approaches may be complete when the source begins to answer questions. Others may have to be constantly maintained or reinforced throughout the interrogation.

The techniques used in an approach can best be defined as a series of events, not just verbal conversation between the interrogator and the source. The exploitation of the source's emotion can be harsh or gentle in application. Some useful techniques used by interrogators are—

- Hand and body movements.
- Actual physical contact such as a hand on the shoulder for reassurance.
- Silence.

RAPPORT POSTURES

There are two types of rapport postures determined during planning and preparation: stern and sympathetic.

In the stern posture, the interrogator keeps the EPW or detainee at attention. The aim is to make the EPW or detainee keenly aware of his helpless and inferior status. Interrogators use this posture with officers, NCOs, and security-conscious enlisted men.

In the sympathetic posture, the interrogator addresses the EPW or detainee in a friendly fashion, striving to put him at ease. This posture is commonly used in interrogating older or younger EPWs. EPWs may be frightened and confused. One variation of this posture is when the interrogator asks about the EPW's family. Few EPWs will hesitate to discuss their family.

Frightened persons, regardless of rank, will invariably talk in order to relieve tension once they hear a sympathetic voice in their own tongue. To put the EPW at ease, the interrogator may allow the EPW to sit down, offer a cigarette, ask whether or not he needs medical care, and otherwise show interest in his case.

There are many variations of these basic postures. Regardless of the one used, the interrogator must present a military appearance and show character and energy. The interrogator must control his temper at all times, except when a display is planned. The inter-rogator must not waste time in pointless discussions or make promises he cannot keep; for example, the interrogator's granting political asylum.

When making promises in an effort to establish rapport, great care must be taken to prevent implying that rights guaranteed the EPW under international and US law will be withheld if the EPW refuses to cooperate.

Under no circumstances will the interrogator betray surprise at anything the EPW might say. Many EPWs will talk freely if they feel the information they are discussing is already known to the interrogator. If the interrogator acts surprised, the EPW may stop talking immediately.

The interrogator encourages any behavior that deepens rapport and increases the flow of communication. At the same time, the interrogator must discourage any behavior that has the opposite effect.

The interrogator must always be in control of the interrogation. If the EPW or detainee challenges this control, the interrogator must act quickly and firmly. Everything the interrogator says and does must be within the limits of the GPW, Article 17.

DEVELOPING RAPPORT

Rapport must be maintained throughout the interrogation, not only in the approach phase. If the interrogator has established good rapport initially and then abandons the effort, the source would rightfully assume the interrogator cares less and less about him as the information is being obtained. If this occurs, rapport is lost and the source may cease answering questions. Rapport may be developed by—

- Asking about the circumstances of capture. By doing this, the interrogator can gain insight into the prisoner's actual state of mind and, more importantly, he can ascertain his possible breaking points.
- Asking background questions. After asking about the source's circumstances of capture, apparent interest can be built by asking about the source's family, civilian life, friends, likes, and dislikes. This is to develop rapport, but nonpertinent questions may open new avenues for the approach and help determine whether tentative approaches chosen in the planning and preparation phase will be effective. If these questions show that the tentative approaches chosen will not be effective, a flexible interrogator can shift the approach direction without the source being aware of the change.

Depending on the situation, and requests the source may have made, the interrogator also can use the following to develop rapport.

- Offer realistic incentives, such as—
 - Immediate comfort items (coffee, cigarettes).
 - Short-term (a meal, shower, send a letter home).
 - Long-term (repatriation, political asylum).
- Feign experience similar to those of the source.
- Show concern for the source through the use of voice vitality and body language.
- Help the source to rationalize his guilt.
- Show kindness and understanding toward the source's predicament.
- Exonerate the source from guilt.
- Flatter the source.

After having established control and rapport, the interrogator continually assesses the source to see if the approaches—and later the questioning techniques—chosen in the planning and preparation phase will indeed work.

Approaches chosen in planning and preparation are tentative and based on the sometimes scanty information available from documents, guards, and personal observation. This may lead the interrogator to select approaches which may be totally incorrect for obtaining this source's willing cooperation. Thus, careful assessment of the source is critical to avoid wasting valuable time in the approach phase.

The questions can be mixed or separate. If, for example, the interrogator has tentatively chosen a "love of comrades" approach, he should ask the source questions like "How did you get along with your fellow squad members?" If the source answers they were all very close and worked well as a team, the interrogator can use this approach and be reasonably sure of its success.

However, if the source answers, "They all hated my guts and I couldn't stand any of them," the interrogator should abandon that approach and ask some quick, nonpertinent questions to give himself time to work out a new approach.

Smooth Transitions

The interrogator must guide the conversation smoothly and logically, especially if he needs to move from one approach technique to another. "Poking and hoping" in the approach may alert the prisoner to ploys and will make the job more difficult.

Tie-ins to another approach can be made logically and smoothly by using transitional phrases. Logical tie-ins can be made by including simple sentences which connect the previously used approach with the basis for the next one.

Transitions can also be smoothly covered by leaving the unsuccessful approach and going back to nonpertinent questions. By using nonpertinent conversation, the interrogator can move the conversation in the desired direction and, as previously stated, sometimes can obtain leads and hints about the source's stresses or weaknesses or other approach strategies that may be more successful.

Sincere and Convincing

If an interrogator is using argument and reason to get the source to cooperate, he must be convincing and appear sincere. All inferences of promises, situations, and arguments, or other invented material must be believable. What a source may or may not believe depends on the interrogator's knowledge, experience, and training. A good source assessment is the basis for the approach and vital to the success of the interrogation effort.

Recognize the Breaking Point

Every source has a breaking point, but an interrogator never knows what it is until it has been reached. There are, however, some good indicators the source is near his breaking point or has already reached it. For example, if during the approach, the source leans forward with his facial expression indicating an interest in the proposal or is more hesitant in his argument, he is probably nearing the breaking point. The interrogator must be alert to recognize these signs.

Once the interrogator determines the source is breaking, he should interject a question pertinent to the objective of the interrogation. If the source answers it, the interrogator can move into the questioning phase. If the source does not answer or balks at answering it, the interrogator must realize the source was not as close to the breaking point as thought. In this case, the interrogator must continue with his approach, or switch to an alternate approach or questioning technique and continue to work until he feels the source is near breaking.

The interrogator can tell if the source has broken only by interjecting pertinent questions. This process must be followed until the EPW or detainee begins to answer pertinent questions. It is possible the EPW or detainee may cooperate for a while and then balk at answering further questions. If this occurs, the interrogator can reinforce the approaches that initially gained the source's cooperation or move into a different approach before returning to the questioning phase.

At this point, it is important to note the amount of time spent with a particular source depends on several factors:

- The battlefield situation.
- Expediency which the supported commander's PIR and IR requirements need to be answered.
- Source's willingness to talk.

The number of approaches used is limited only by the interrogator's skill. Almost any ruse or deception is usable as long as the provisions of the GPW, as outlined in Figure 1-4, are not violated.

An interrogator must not pass himself off as a medic, chaplain, or as a member of the Red Cross (Red Crescent or Red Lion). To every approach technique, there are literally hundreds of possible variations, each of which can be developed for a specific situation or source. The variations are limited only by the interrogator's personality, experience, ingenuity, and imagination.

APPROACH COMBINATIONS

With the exception of the direct approach, no other approach is effective by itself. Interrogators use different approach techniques or combine them into a cohesive, logical technique. Smooth transitions, sincerity, logic, and conviction almost always make a strategy work. The lack of will undoubtedly dooms it to failure. Some examples of combinations are—

- Direct—futility—incentive.
- Direct—futility—love of comrades.
- Direct—fear-up (mild)—incentive.

The number of combinations are unlimited. Interrogators must carefully choose the approach strategy in the planning and preparation phase and listen carefully to what the source is saying (verbally or nonverbally) for leads the strategy chosen will not work. When this occurs, the interrogator must adapt to approaches he believes will work in gaining the source's cooperation.

The approach techniques are not new nor are all the possible or acceptable techniques discussed below. Everything the interrogator says and does must be in concert with the GWS, GPW, GC, and UCMI. The approaches which have proven effective are—

- Direct.
- Incentive.
- Emotional.
- Increased fear-up.
- Pride and ego.

Direct Approach

The interrogator asks questions directly related to information sought, making no effort to conceal the interrogation's purpose. The direct approach, always the first to be attempted, is used on EPWs or detainees who the interrogator believes will cooperate.

This may occur when interrogating an EPW or detainee who has proven cooperative during initial screening or first interrogation. It may also be used on those with little or no security training. The direct approach works best on lower enlisted personnel, as they have little or no resistance training and have had minimal security training.

The direct approach is simple to use, and it is possible to obtain the maximum amount of information in the minimum amount of time. It is frequently employed at lower echelons when the tactical situation precludes selecting other techniques, and where the EPW's or detainee's mental state is one of confusion or extreme shock. Figure C-3 contains sample questions used in direct questioning.

The direct approach is the most effective. Statistics show in World War II, it was 90 percent effective. In Vietnam and OPERATIONS URGENT FURY, JUST CAUSE, and DESERT STORM, it was 95 percent effective.

Incentive Approach

The incentive approach is based on the application of inferred discomfort upon an EPW or detainee who lacks willpower. The EPW or detainee may display fondness for certain luxury items such as candy, fruit, or cigarettes. This fondness provides the interrogator with a positive means of rewarding the EPW or detainee for cooperation and truthfulness, as he may give or withhold such comfort items at his discretion. Caution must be used when employing this technique because—

- Any pressure applied in this manner must not amount to a denial of basic human needs under any circumstances. [NOTE: Interrogators may not withhold a source's rights under the GPW, but they can withhold a source's privileges.] Granting incentives must not infringe on these rights, but they can be things to which the source is already entitled. This can be effective only if the source is unaware of his rights or privileges.
- The EPW or detainee might be tempted to provide false or inaccurate information to gain the desired luxury item or to stop the interrogation.

The GPW, Article 41, requires the posting of the convention contents in the EPW's own language. This is an MP responsibility.

Incentives must seem to be logical and possible. An interrogator must not promise anything that cannot be delivered. Interrogators do not make promises, but usually infer them while sidestepping guarantees.

For example, if an interrogator made a promise he could not keep and he or another interrogator had to talk with the source again, the source would not have any trust and would probably not cooperate. Instead of clearly promising a certain thing, such as political asylum, an interrogator will offer to do what he can to help achieve the source's desired goal; as long as the source cooperates.

As with developing rapport, the incentive approach can be broken down into two incentives. The determination rests on when the source expects to receive the incentive offered.

- Short term—received immediately; for example, letter home, seeing wounded buddies.
- Long term—received within a period of time; for example, political asylum.

Emotional Approach

Through EPW or detainee observation, the interrogator can often identify dominant emotions which motivate. The motivating emotion may be greed, love, hate, revenge, or others. The interrogator employs verbal and emotional ruses in applying pressure to the EPW's or detainee's dominant emotions.

One major advantage of this technique is it is versatile and allows the interrogator to use the same basic situation positively and negatively.

For example, this technique can be used on the EPW who has a great love for his unit and fellow soldiers. The interrogator may take advantage of this by telling the EPW that by providing pertinent information, he may shorten the war or battle in progress and save many of his comrades' lives, but his refusal to talk may cause their deaths. This places the burden on the EPW or detainee and may motivate him to seek relief through cooperation.

Conversely, this technique can also be used on the EPW or detainee who hates his unit because it withdrew and left him to be captured, or who feels he was unfairly treated in his unit. In such cases, the interrogator can point out that if the EPW cooperates and specifies the unit's location, the unit can be destroyed, thus giving the EPW an opportunity for revenge. The interrogator proceeds with this method in a very formal manner.

This approach is likely to be effective with the immature and timid EPW.

Emotional Love Approach. For the emotional love approach to be successful, the interrogator must focus on the anxiety felt by the source about the circumstances in which he finds himself. The interrogator must direct the love the source feels toward the appropriate object: family, homeland, or comrades. If the interrogator can show the source what the source himself can do to alter or improve his situation, the approach has a chance of success.

This approach usually involves some incentive such as communication with the source's family or a quicker end to the war to save his comrades' lives. A good interrogator will usually orchestrate some futility with an emotional love approach to hasten the source's reaching the breaking point.

Sincerity and conviction are critical in a successful attempt at an emotional love approach as the interrogator must show genuine concern for the source, and for the object at which the interrogator is directing the source's emotion.

If the interrogator ascertains the source has great love for his unit and fellow soldiers, the interrogator can effectively exploit the situation. This places a burden on the source and may motivate him to seek relief through cooperation with the interrogator.

Emotional Hate Approach. The emotional hate approach focuses on any genuine hate, or possibly a desire for revenge, the source may feel. The interrogator must ascertain exactly what it is the source may hate so the emotion can be exploited to override the source's rational side. The source may have negative feelings about his country's regime, immediate superiors, officers in general, or fellow soldiers.

This approach is usually most effective on members of racial or religious minorities who have suffered discrimination in military and civilian life. If a source feels he has been treated unfairly in his unit, the interrogator can point out that, if the source cooperates and divulges the location of that unit, the unit can be destroyed, thus affording the source revenge.

By using a conspiratorial tone of voice, the interrogator can enhance the value of this technique. Phrases, such as "You owe them no loyalty for the way they treated you," when used appropriately, can expedite the success of this technique.

Do not immediately begin to berate a certain facet of the source's background or life until your assessment indicates the source feels a negative emotion toward it.

The emotional hate approach can be used more effectively by drawing out the source's negative emotions with questions that elicit a thought-provoking response. For example, "Why do you think they allowed you to be captured?" or "Why do you think they left you to die?" Do not berate the source's forces or homeland unless certain negative emotions surface.

Many sources may have great love for their country, but may hate the regime in control. The emotional hate approach is most effective with the immature or timid source who may have no opportunity up to this point for revenge, or never had the courage to voice his feelings.

Fear-Up Approach

The fear-up approach is the exploitation of a source's preexisting fear during the period of capture and interrogation. The approach works best with young, inexperienced sources, or sources who exhibit a greater than normal amount of fear or nervousness. A source's fear may be justified or unjustified. For example, a source who has committed a war crime may justifiably fear prosecution and punishment. By contrast, a source who has been indoctrinated by enemy propaganda may unjustifiably fear that he will suffer torture or death in our hands if captured.

This approach has the greatest potential to violate the law of war. Great care must be taken to avoid threatening or coercing a source which is in violation of the GPW, Article 17.

It is critical the interrogator distinguish what the source fears in order to exploit that fear. The way in which the interrogator exploits the source's fear depends on whether the source's fear is justified or unjustified.

Fear-Up (Harsh). In this approach, the interrogator behaves in an overpowering manner with a loud and threatening voice. The interrogator may even feel the need to throw objects across the room to heighten the source's implanted feelings of fear. Great care must be taken when doing this so any actions would not violate the prohibition on coercion and threats contained in the GPW, Article 17.

This technique is to convince the source he does indeed have something to fear; that he has no option but to cooperate. A good interrogator will implant in the source's mind that the interrogator himself is not the object to be feared, but is a possible way out of the trap.

Use the confirmation of fear only on sources whose fear is justified. During this approach, confirm to the source that he does indeed have a legitimate fear. Then convince the source that you are the source's best or only hope in avoiding or mitigating the object of his fear, such as punishment for his crimes.

You must take great care to avoid promising actions that are not in your power to grant. For example, if the source has committed a war crime, inform the source that the crime has been reported to the appropriate authorities and that action is pending. Next inform the source that, if he cooperates and tells the truth, you will report that he cooperated and told the truth to the appropriate authorities. You may add that you will also report his lack of cooperation. You may not promise that the charges against him will be dismissed because you have no authority to dismiss the charges.

Fear-Up (Mild). This approach is better suited to the strong, confident type of interrogator; there is generally no need to raise the voice or resort to heavy-handed, table-banging.

For example, capture may be a result of coincidence—the soldier was caught on the wrong side of the border before hostilities actually commenced (he was armed, he could be a terrorist)—or as a result of his actions (he surrendered contrary to his military oath and is now a traitor to his country, and his forces will take care of the disciplinary action).

The fear-up (mild) approach must be credible. It usually involves some logical incentive.

In most cases, a loud voice is not necessary. The actual fear is increased by helping the source realize the unpleasant consequences the facts may cause and by presenting an alternative, which, of course, can be brought about by answering some simple questions.

The fear-up (harsh) approach is usually a dead end, and a wise interrogator may want to keep it in reserve as a trump card. After working to increase the source's fear, it would be difficult to convince him everything will be all right if the approach is not successful.

Fear-Down Approach

This technique is nothing more than calming the source and convincing him he will be properly and humanely treated, or telling him the war for him is mercifully over and he need not go into combat again. When used with a soothing, calm tone of voice, this often creates rapport and usually nothing else is needed to get the source to cooperate.

While calming the source, it is a good idea to stay initially with nonpertinent conversation and to avoid the subject which has caused the source's fear. This works quickly in developing rapport and communication, as the source will readily respond to kindness.

When using this approach, it is important the interrogator relate to the source at his perspective level and not expect the source to come up to the interrogator's level.

If the EPW or detainee is so frightened he has withdrawn into a shell or regressed to a less threatening state of mind, the interrogator must break through to him. The interrogator can do this by putting himself on the same physical level as the source; this may require some physical contact. As the source relaxes and begins to respond to kindness, the interrogator can begin asking pertinent questions.

This approach technique may backfire if allowed to go too far. After convincing the source he has nothing to fear, he may cease to be afraid and may feel secure enough to resist the interrogator's pertinent question. If this occurs, reverting to a harsher approach technique usually will bring the desired result quickly.

The fear-down approach works best if the source's fear is unjustified. During this approach, take specific actions to reduce the source's unjustified fear. For example, if the source believes that he will be abused while in your custody, make extra efforts to ensure that the source is well cared for, fed, and appropriately treated.

Once the source is convinced that he has no legitimate reason to fear you, he will be more inclined to cooperate. The interrogator is under no duty to reduce a source's unjustified fear. The only prohibition is that the interrogator may not say or do anything that directly or indirectly communicates to the source that he will be harmed unless he provides the requested information.

These applications of the fear approach may be combined to achieve the desired effect. For example, if a source has justified and unjustified fears, you may initially reduce the source's unfounded fears, then confirm his legitimate fears. Again, the source should be convinced the interrogator is his best or only hope in avoiding or mitigating the object of his fear.

Pride and Ego Approach

The strategy of this approach is to trick the source into revealing desired information by goading or flattering him. It is effective with sources who have displayed weakness or feelings of inferiority. A real or imaginary deficiency voiced about the source, loyalty to his organization, or any other feature can provide a basis for this technique.

The interrogator accuses the source of weakness or implies he is unable to do a certain thing. This type of source is also prone to excuses and reasons why he did or did not do a certain thing, often shifting the blame to others. An example is opening the interrogation with the question, "Why did you surrender so easily when you could have escaped by crossing the nearby ford in the river?"

The source is likely to provide a basis for further questions or to reveal significant intelligence information if he attempts to explain his surrender in order to vindicate himself. He may give an answer such as, "No one could cross the ford because it is mined."

This technique can also be employed in another manner—by flattering the source into admitting certain information in order to gain credit. For example, while interrogating a suspected saboteur, the interrogator states: "This was a smooth operation. I have seen many previous attempts fail. I bet you planned this. Who else but a clever person like you would have planned it? When did you first decide to do the job?"

This technique is especially effective with the source who has been looked down upon by his superiors. The source has the opportunity to show someone he is intelligent.

A problem with the pride and ego approach is it relies on trickery. The source will eventually realize he has been tricked and may refuse to cooperate further. If this occurs, the interrogator can easily move into a fear-up approach and convince the source the questions he has already answered have committed him, and it would be useless to resist further.

The interrogator can mention it will be reported to the source's forces that he has cooperated fully with the enemy, will be considered a traitor, and has much to fear if he is returned to his forces.

This may even offer the interrogator the option to go into a love-of-family approach where the source must protect his family by preventing his forces from learning of his duplicity or collaboration. Telling the source you will not report that he talked or that he was a severe discipline problem is an incentive that may enhance the effectiveness of the approach.

Pride and Ego-Up Approach. This approach is most effective on sources with little or no intelligence, or on those who have been looked down upon for a long time. It is very effective on low-ranking enlisted personnel and junior grade officers, as it allows the source to finally show someone he does indeed have some "brains."

The source is constantly flattered into providing certain information in order to gain credit. The interrogator must take care to use a flattering somewhat-in-awe tone of voice, and speak highly of the source throughout this approach. This quickly produces positive feelings on the source's part, as he has probably been looking for this type of recognition all of his life.

The interrogator may blow things out of proportion using items from the source's background and making them seem noteworthy or important. As everyone is eager to hear praise, the source will eventually reveal pertinent information to solicit more laudatory comments from the interrogator.

Effective targets for a successful pride and ego-up approach are usually the socially accepted reasons for flattery, such as appearance and good military bearing. The interrogator should closely watch the source's demeanor for indications the approach is working. Some indications to look for are—

- Raising of the head.
- A look of pride in the eyes.
- Swelling of the chest.
- Stiffening of the back.

Pride and Ego-Down Approach. This approach is based on attacking the source's sense of personal worth. Any source who shows any real or imagined inferiority or weakness about himself, loyalty to his organization, or captured under embarrassing circumstances, can be easily broken with this approach technique.

The objective is for the interrogator to pounce on the source's sense of pride by attacking his loyalty, intelligence, abilities, leadership qualities, slovenly appearance, or any other perceived weakness. This will usually goad the source into becoming defensive, and he will try to convince the interrogator he is wrong. In his attempt to redeem his pride, the source will usually involuntarily provide pertinent information in attempting to vindicate himself.

A source susceptible to this approach is also prone to make excuses and give reasons why he did or did not do a certain thing, often shifting the blame to others. If the interrogator uses a sarcastic, caustic tone of voice with appropriate expressions of distaste or disgust, the source will readily believe him. Possible targets for the pride and ego-down approach are the source's—

- Loyalty.
- Technical competence.
- Leadership abilities.
- Soldierly qualities.
- Appearance.

The pride and ego-down approach is also a dead end in that, if unsuccessful, it is difficult for the interrogator to recover and move to another approach and reestablish a different type of rapport without losing all credibility.

Futility

In this approach, the interrogator convinces the source that resistance to questioning is futile. When employing this technique, the interrogator must have factual information. These facts are presented by the interrogator in a persuasive, logical manner. He should be aware of and able to exploit the source's psychological and moral weaknesses, as well as weaknesses inherent in his society.

The futility approach is effective when the interrogator can play on doubts that already exist in the source's mind. There are different variations of the futility approach. For example:

- Futility of the personal situation—"You are not finished here until you answer the questions."
- Futility in that "everyone talks sooner or later."
- Futility of the battlefield situation.
- Futility in the sense if the source does not mind talking about history, why should he mind talking about his missions, they are also history.

If the source's unit had run out of supplies (ammunition, food, or fuel), it would be somewhat easy to convince him all of his forces are having the same logistical problems. A soldier who has been ambushed may have doubts as to how he was attacked so suddenly. The interrogator should be able to talk him into believing that the interrogator's forces knew of the EPW's unit location, as well as many more units.

The interrogator might describe the source's frightening recollections of seeing death on the battlefield as an everyday occurrence for his forces. Factual or seemingly factual information must be presented in a persuasive, logical manner, and in a matter-of-fact tone of voice.

Making the situation appear hopeless allows the source to rationalize his actions, especially if that action is cooperating with the interrogator. When employing this technique, the interrogator must not only have factual information but also be aware of and exploit the source's psychological, moral, and sociological weaknesses.

Another way of using the futility approach is to blow things out of proportion. If the source's unit was low on, or had exhausted, all food supplies, he can be easily led to believe all of his forces had run out of food. If the source is hinging on cooperating, it may aid the interrogation effort if he is told all the other source's have cooperated.

The futility approach must be orchestrated with other approach techniques (for example, love of comrades). A source who may want to help save his comrades' lives may be convinced the battlefield situation is hopeless and they will die without his assistance.

The futility approach is used to paint a bleak picture for the prisoner, but it is not effective in and of itself in gaining the source's cooperation.

We Know All

This approach may be employed in conjunction with the "file and dossier" technique (discussed below) or by itself. If used alone, the interrogator must first become thoroughly familiar with available data concerning the source. To begin the interrogation, the interrogator asks questions based on this known data. When the source hesitates, refuses to answer, or provides an incorrect or incomplete reply, the interrogator provides the detailed answer.

When the source begins to give accurate and complete information, the interrogator interjects questions designed to gain the needed information. Questions to which answers are already known are also asked to test the source's truthfulness and to maintain the deception that the information is already known. By repeating this procedure, the interrogator convinces the source that resistance is useless as everything is already known.

After gaining the source's cooperation, the interrogator still tests the extent of cooperation by periodically using questions to which he has the answers; this is very necessary. If the interrogator does not challenge the source when he is lying, the source will know everything is not known, and he has been tricked. He may then provide incorrect answers to the interrogator's questions.

There are some inherent problems with the use of the "we know all" approach. The interrogator is required to prepare everything in detail, which is time consuming. He must commit much of the information to memory, as working from notes may show the limits of the information actually known.

File and Dossier

The file and dossier approach is used when the interrogator prepares a dossier containing all available information obtained from documents concerning the source or his organization. Careful arrangement of the material within the file may give the illusion it contains more data than actually there. The file may be padded with extra paper, if necessary. Index tabs with titles such as education, employment, criminal record, military service, and others are particularly effective.

The interrogator confronts the source with the dossiers at the beginning of the interrogation and explains intelligence has provided a complete record of every significant happening in the source's life; therefore, it would be useless to resist. The interrogator may read a few selected bits of known data to further impress the source.

If the technique is successful, the source will be intimidated by the size of the file, conclude everything is known, and resign himself to complete cooperation. The success of this technique is largely dependent on the naivete of the source, volume of data on the subject, and skill of the interrogator in convincing the source.

Establish Your Identity

This approach is especially adaptable to interrogation. The interrogator insists the source has been correctly identified as an infamous individual wanted by higher authorities on serious charges, and he is not the person he purports to be. In an effort to clear himself of this allegation, the source makes a genuine and detailed effort to establish or substantiate his true identity. In so doing, he may provide the interrogator with information and leads for further development.

The "establish your identity" approach was effective in Viet Nam with the Viet Cong and in OPERATIONS JUST CAUSE and DESERT STORM.

This approach can be used at tactical echelons. The interrogator must be aware if it is used in conjunction with the file and dossier approach, as it may exceed the tactical interrogator's preparation resources.

The interrogator should initially refuse to believe the source and insist he is the criminal wanted by the ambiguous higher authorities. This will force the source to give even more detailed information about his unit in order to convince the interrogator he is who he says he is. This approach works well when combined with the "futility" or "we know all" approach.

Repetition

This approach is used to induce cooperation from a hostile source. In one variation of this approach, the interrogator listens carefully to a source's answer to a question, and then repeats the question and answer several times. He does this with each succeeding question until the source becomes so thoroughly bored with the procedure he answers questions fully and candidly to satisfy the interrogator and gain relief from the monotony of this method.

The repetition technique must be judiciously used, as it will generally be ineffective when employed against introverted sources or those having great self-control. In fact, it may provide an opportunity for a source to regain his composure and delay the interrogation. In this approach, the use of more than one interrogator or a tape recorder has proven effective.

Rapid Fire

This approach involves a psychological ploy based upon the principles that—

- Everyone likes to be heard when he speaks.
- It is confusing to be interrupted in mid-sentence with an unrelated question.

This approach may be used by one or simultaneously by two or more interrogators in questioning the same source. In employing this technique, the interrogator asks a series of questions in such a manner that the source does not have time to answer a question completely before the next one is asked.

This confuses the source and he will tend to contradict himself, as he has little time to formulate his answers. The interrogator then confronts the source with the inconsistencies causing further contradictions.

In many instances, the source will begin to talk freely in an attempt to explain himself and deny the interrogator's claims of inconsistencies. In this attempt, the source is likely to reveal more than he intends, thus creating additional leads for further exploitation. This approach may be orchestrated with the pride and ego-down or fear-up approaches.

QUESTIONING PHASE

The interrogation effort has two primary goals: To obtain information and to report it. Developing and using good questioning techniques enable the inter-

Besides extensive preparation, this approach requires an experienced and competent interrogator, with comprehensive case knowledge and fluency in the source's language.

Silent

This approach may be successful when used against the nervous or confident source. When employing this technique, the interrogator says nothing to the source, but looks him squarely in the eye, preferably with a slight smile on his face. It is important not to look away from the source but force him to break eye contact first.

The source may become nervous, begin to shift in his chair, cross and recross his legs, and look away. He may ask questions, but the interrogator should not answer until he is ready to break the silence. The source may blurt out questions such as, "Come on now, what do you want with me?"

When the interrogator is ready to break silence, he may do so with some nonchalant questions such as, "You planned this operation for a long time, didn't you? Was it your idea?" The interrogator must be patient when using this technique. It may appear the technique is not succeeding, but usually will when given a reasonable chance.

Change of Scene

The idea in using this approach is to get the source away from the atmosphere of an interrogation room or setting. If the interrogator confronts a source who is apprehensive or frightened because of the interrogation environment, this technique may prove effective.

In some circumstances, the interrogator may be able to invite the source to a different setting for coffee and pleasant conversation. During the conversation in this more relaxed environment, the interrogator steers the conversation to the topic of interest. Through this somewhat indirect method, he attempts to elicit the desired information. The source may never realize he is being interrogated.

Another example in this approach is an interrogator poses as a compound guard and engages the source in conversation, thus eliciting the desired information.

rogator to obtain accurate and pertinent information by following a logical sequence.

The questioning phase starts when the source begins to answer questions pertinent to interrogation objectives.

QUESTIONING TECHNIQUES

Good questioning techniques must be used throughout the interrogation. The interrogator must know when to use different types of questions. Good questioning techniques enable the interrogator to extract the maximum amount of information in the minimum amount of time. The interrogator must be able to use the following types of questions:

- Direct.
- Follow-up.
- Nonpertinent.
- Repeated.
- Control.

- Prepared.

Direct Questions

Questions should be presented in a logical sequence to avoid neglecting significant topics. A series of questions following a chronological sequence of events is frequently employed, but this is not the only logical method of asking questions. Adherence to a sequence should not deter the interrogator from exploiting informational leads as they are obtained.

The interrogator must consider the probable response of the source to a particular question or line of questioning and should not, if at all possible, ask direct questions likely to evoke a refusal to answer or to antagonize the source.

Experience has shown that in most tactical interrogations, the source is cooperative. In such instances, the interrogator should proceed with direct questions. Good, direct questions—

FM 34-52

- Begin with a basic interrogative: Who, What, When, Where, Why, and How.
- Require a narrative answer. One which cannot be answered by a simple Yes or No. This type of question requires the source to think about his answer in order to respond correctly.
- Provide a maximum amount of information in the least amount of time, and the greatest number of leads to other information.
- Are brief, precise, and simply worded to avoid confusion.

(NOTE: The source may not be on the same intellectual level as the interrogator and some may be illiterate. Some words or phrases in English do not translate into a foreign language.)

Follow-Up Questions

Follow-up questions are used to obtain complete information on a topic that pertains to the interrogation objective. They are used to exploit leads obtained from the source on information not directly related to the primary interrogation objective. Exploitation of these leads is discussed later. There are two types of leads:

- Hot—information that could affect the immediate tactical situation in your AO. This type of lead should be exploited immediately, and a spot report submitted as soon as possible. Figure 3-5 is a sample of a spot report in a SALUTE format.
- Cold—information of intelligence value that will not affect the immediate tactical situation. This type of lead is recorded and exploited after the interrogation objective has been satisfied or at the appropriate time during the interrogation sequence.

Nonpertinent Questions

Nonpertinent questions are used to conceal the interrogation's objectives or to strengthen rapport with the source. They may also be used to break the source's concentration, particularly, if the interrogator suspects the source is lying. It is hard for a source to be a convincing liar if his concentration is frequently interrupted.

Repeated Questions

Repeated questions ask the source for the same information obtained in response to earlier questions. They may be exact repetitions of the previous question, or the previous question may be rephrased or otherwise disguised. The use of repeated questions may develop a topic the source had refused to talk about earlier. Repeated questions may also be used to—

- Check source reliability.
- Ensure accuracy of important details such as place names, dates, and component parts of technical equipment.
- Return to a topical area for further questioning.

Control Questions

Control questions are developed from recently confirmed information that is not likely to have changed. They are used to check the truthfulness of the source's responses and should be mixed in with other questions throughout the interrogation.

Prepared Questions

Prepared questions are used primarily when dealing with information of a technical nature, or specific topic, which requires the interrogator to formulate questions beforehand; the interrogator prepares them in writing to be used during the interrogation. The interrogator may have to research technical material or contact TECHINT personnel to assist him in preparing questions. Interrogators must not allow the use of prepared questions to restrict the scope and flexibility of their interrogations.

The interrogator must use the different type of questions effectively. Active listening and maximum eye-to-eye contact with the source will provide excellent indicators for when to use follow-up, repeated, control, and nonpertinent questions.

The interrogator must use direct and follow-up questions to fully exploit subjects pertinent to his interrogation objectives. He should periodically include control, repeated, and nonpertinent questions in order to check the sincerity and consistency of the source's responses and to strengthen rapport.

A response which is inconsistent with earlier responses or the interrogator's available data is not necessarily a lie. When such a response is obtained, the interrogator should reveal the inconsistency to the source and ask for an explanation. The source's truthfulness should then be evaluated based on the plausibility of his explanation.

QUESTIONS TO AVOID

Interrogators should avoid the following types of questions.

Leading Questions

Leading questions require the source to answer Yes or No. They do not elicit narrative answers. They also prompt the source to answer the question in a way he thinks the interrogator wants to hear it; for example, "Did you go to the command post last night?" Although normally avoided during the interrogation, leading questions may be used to—

- Verify facts.
- Pinpoint map locations.
- Confirm information obtained during map tracking. Leading questions are used sparingly during map tracking.

Negative Questions

Negative questions should never be used during an interrogation. They imply the source should reply in the negative, and this sometimes confuses or leads the source to provide false information; for example, "You're not in the 1st Company, are you?" Negative questions usually require additional questions to clarify the source's responses.

Compound Questions

Compound questions are never used during an interrogation. They are two questions asked at the same time; for example, "Before you were captured today, were you traveling north or south?" They are easily misunderstood and may confuse the source or force him to give an ambiguous answer. Compound questions allow the source to evade a part of the question or to give an incomplete answer. They may confuse the source or cause the interrogator to misunderstand the response.

Vague Questions

Vague questions do not have enough information for the source to understand exactly what is being asked by the interrogator. They may be incomplete, general, or otherwise nonspecific and create doubt in the source's mind. Vague questions confuse the source, waste time, are easily evaded, and result in answers that may confuse or mislead the interrogator.

INTERROGATORS GUIDE

An Interrogators Guide is a pamphlet or notebook designed to guide the interrogator through the interrogation. The IPW senior interrogator should ensure team members prepare an interrogators guide, which could be included in the unit's SOP. The guides are made based on the AO and supported command intelligence requirements. They should be jointly prepared by the interrogator and available intelligence analysts. The guides contain information such as—

- PIR and IR.
- Topical sequence question format.
- Actual prepared questions to be used during the interrogation.
- Guidelines for employing the various approach techniques.
- Formats or samples of completed interrogation reports used by interrogators.

SPOT REPORTABLE INFORMATION

Spot reportable information is critical to the successful accomplishment of friendly COAs. Information may be spot reportable even when an interrogator cannot determine its immediate intelligence value. Spot reportable information is always time sensitive in that its value depends on the speed with which it is reported and processed.

If an interrogator obtains information he thinks is spot reportable, he must compare the information with his element's overall objective statement. Items of information relating to any of the intelligence indicators listed in the objective statement are spot reportable. Information relating to indicators not listed may still be spot reportable.

The key to identifying spot reportable information is recognizing its potential value. If the information indicates a significant change in the enemy's capabilities or intentions, it is spot reportable. Information inconsistent with current OB holdings should be spot reported if the inconsistency concerns an important item and the source has given a plausible explanation for it.

If an interrogator cannot decide if a piece of information is spot reportable, he should act as though it is. This means he should exploit it fully and record all pertinent information. The interrogator should then consult the senior interrogator for a final determination of the information's value. Spot reportable information is transmitted by the interrogator either written or orally in the SALUTE format (Figure 3-5).

LEADS

Leads are signs which tell the interrogator the source has additional pertinent information that can be obtained through further questioning. Hot and cold leads are provided by a source in response to interrogator questions.

A hot lead, when exploited, may obtain spot reportable information. A cold lead, when exploited, may obtain information not spot reportable, but still of intelligence value.

The use of follow-up questions to fully exploit hot and cold leads may require an interrogator to cover topics he did not list in his interrogation plan. An interrogator must exploit hot leads as soon as he identifies them.

Once the interrogator is sure he has obtained and recorded all the details known to the source, he issues a spot report. The interrogator then resumes his questioning of the source at the same point where the hot lead was obtained. An interrogator should note cold leads as they are obtained, and exploit them fully during his questioning on the topics to which the cold lead apply.

Cold leads may expand the scope of the interrogation because they may indicate the source possesses pertinent information in areas not previously selected for questioning. If the interrogator does not fully exploit all cold leads he obtains, he must include information on all leads he did not exploit in his interrogation report.

HEARSAY INFORMATION

H/S information must include the most precise data possible of its source. This will include—

- Name, rank, and duty position.
- Full unit designation of the person who provided the information.
- Date-time group (DTG) when the source obtained the information.

QUESTIONING SEQUENCE

The interrogator begins the questioning phase with the first topic in the sequence he tentatively established as part of his interrogation plan. He obtains all the source's pertinent knowledge in this topical area before moving on to the next topic in his sequence. He maintains his established questioning sequence to ensure no topics are missed. The only exception is exploiting a hot lead.

Map Tracking

During the questioning phase, the interrogator will attempt to pinpoint locations of any enemy dispositions known to the source. He will attempt to determine the whereabouts of the source, and will compare the source's description of terrain features with maps, aerial photographs, and pictomaps. Some map tracking advantages are—

- The source is led through his memory in a logical manner.
- A valid reliability scale can be determined by comparing the source's information with a map or aerial photographs.
- Discrepancies in the source's statements are easier to detect.

The interrogator asks the source if he can read the map being used. If so, he should be asked to show the location of routes and dispositions. If the source cannot read the interrogator's map, he must be asked if he knows compass directions. If not, the interrogator must explain them to him. This can be done by having the source picture himself facing the rising or setting sun and then establishing compass points.

The interrogator may find the source is most confident when expressing himself in terms other than compass directions. When this happens, the interrogator should allow the source to use his own frames of reference. However, the interrogator must ensure he understands the source.

The first location the interrogator should try to establish as the initial common point of reference (ICPR) is the source's POC. The POC cannot be used, however, unless the source can describe it well enough for the interrogator to be certain of its location. If the POC cannot be used, the interrogator must review locations previously mentioned by the source and ask him to describe each of them in turn.

Once the source describes a location well enough for the interrogator to be certain of its position on the map, an ICPR has been established. The interrogator then marks that position.

The interrogator reviews the source's past missions to identify those points he actually visited. The interrogator determines how long ago the source was at each point, and approximately how far each point is from the ICPR.

The interrogator wants to select as the destination common point of reference (DCPR) that point visited by the source which provides the longest route of travel to the ICPR, and is still within the supported command's AI. The DCPR selected must be a location the source can describe well enough for it to be plotted on the map, even if it is nothing more than a general vicinity.

Establish a Route

The interrogator establishes the route the source traveled between the DCPR and ICPR. When the DCPR is a specific point, the interrogator can establish the route from it to the ICPR, tracing the route in the same direction which the source actually traveled.

When the DCPR is an undefined point, the interrogator establishes the route from ICPR to the DCPR. This means the interrogator must trace the route in the opposite direction from that traveled by the source. The interrogator should establish the route traveled by using the following procedures in the sequence shown:

- Obtain the direction in which the source would travel when leaving the ICPR.
- Obtain a description of the surface on which the source would be traveling.
- Obtain the distance the source would travel in this direction.
- Obtain a description of the prominent terrain features the source would remember while traveling in this direction.
- Repeat the questions and plot responses until the entire route between the ICPR and DCPR has been plotted.

The interrogator can follow the same sequence when establishing the route actually traveled by the source by beginning with the DCPR.

Exploit the DCPR

The interrogator must obtain the exact location and description of each enemy disposition the source knew about at the DCPR. The interrogator does this by having the source—

- Identify and describe all items of military significance belonging to his forces which are located at the DCPR.
- Provide the full unit designation of enemy units to which these items belong.
- Identify and describe all collocated enemy units.
- Describe security measures employed at each identified disposition.
- Identify the source of his information.
- Provide the date and time he obtained his information.
- Provide name, rank, duty position, and full unit designation of each person who provided H/S information to the source.

The interrogator must repeat these questions, and plot or record the information as it is provided by the source, until he obtains all dispositions known by the source to be in the vicinity of the DCPR.

Segment and Exploit the Route

The interrogator begins exploiting the source's route with the segment closest to the ICPR or DCPR. The interrogator will segment closest to the DCPR, but either can be used.

The interrogator will exploit each segment of the route by asking the question: "From (description of common point of reference [(CPR)] to (description of next CPR) back along your route of travel, what of military significance belonging to your forces do you know of, have seen, or heard?" The interrogator will continue from segment to segment, fully exploiting each, until he has exploited the entire route traveled.

Exploit Dispositions Not On Route

If the interrogator obtains a disposition which is not located on the established route, he must establish the route the source would have taken to that disposition. The interrogator then treats this new route the same way he does any other route segment, exploiting it fully before moving on to the next segment of the original route.

The sequence above organizes map tracking so information obtained from the source can be plotted and recorded accurately. The description of each disposition must be recorded preferably near the site of the disposition on the map.

FM 34-52

Recording Information

There are several reasons for recording information obtained during interrogations. The most important is to ensure information can be reported completely and accurately. Recorded information may also be used to—

- Refresh the interrogator's memory on a topic covered earlier, such as when returning to a topic after exploiting a hot lead.
- Check responses to repeated questions.
- Point out inconsistencies to the source.
- Gain the cooperation of other sources.
- Compare with information received from other sources.

Taking Notes

There are several methods of recording information used during interrogations. Two are listed below, along with their advantages and disadvantages. These methods may be used separately, or in combination with each other.

Using His Own Notes. The interrogator's own notes are the primary method of recording information. When the interrogator takes his own notes, he has a ready reference to verify responses to repeated questions or to refresh his memory. They also provide him with the means to record cold leads for later exploitation.

Using his own notes expedites the interrogator's accurate transferral of information into a report format. When taking his own notes, however, he cannot observe the source continuously. This may cause him to miss leads or fail to detect losses in rapport or control that are detectable only through clues provided by the source's behavior.

It is possible to lose control, and the source's willing cooperation, by concentrating too much on note taking. The interrogator must avoid distracting the source while taking notes. They should be taken in such a way that maintains maximum eye-to-eye contact with the source.

TERMINATION PHASE

When it is necessary or prudent, the interrogator will terminate the interrogation. There are many ways to conduct a termination, but the following points must be conveyed to the source:

The interrogator will not have enough time to record each word the source says. Thus, he must—

- Be able to summarize information into a few words.
- Use past experiences to decide which items of information should be recorded.
- Organize his materials to avoid having to flip back and forth between references.

The only information that should be recorded during the approach phase is that required by Part I of DA Form 4237-R (Figure 3-1). All other information should not be recorded until after the source's cooperation has been obtained.

All notes must be complete, accurate, and legible. Notes should be organized by topical areas. A separate piece of paper should be used to record cold leads. The interrogator should use authorized military abbreviations and brevity codes (see AR 310-50). Notes should be in a recognizable format and complete for other interrogators to use. Situations may arise that require one interrogator to finish another's interrogation.

Using a Sound or Video Recorder. This method allows the interrogator to continually observe the source. When compared with note taking, this method allows more information to be obtained in less time. However, more time is required for report writing because the entire tape must be replayed to transfer information to the report.

Record names, numbers, and other pertinent, detailed information that may be unclear on the tape. Sound recorders cannot provide a quick reference that can be used to compare answers to a repeated question, and the equipment may malfunction.

Another method which has proven successful during exercises is to have linguist qualified intelligence analysts view interrogations or debriefings by using video cameras and monitors. This method allows the intelligence analyst to immediately pass additional questions to the interrogator to follow up on possible source knowledge.

- The approaches used to "break" the source must be reinforced. Any promised incentives should be rendered. The reinforcement must be sincere and convincing, as the source may be interrogated again.

- The source must be told the information he gave will be checked for truthfulness and accuracy. His reaction to this statement should be closely monitored.
- The source must be told he will be spoken to again by the same or another interrogator.
- Any identification or other documents, personal property, or other material must be returned to the source or be given to the evacuation guard, as appropriate.

REASONS FOR TERMINATION

Some reasons for termination are—

- The source remains uncooperative during the approach phase.
- The source could be wounded, sick, or elderly, and his condition might force the interrogator to terminate until a later time.
- The interrogation objective requires several questioning periods to obtain all the information.
- The source may change his attitude during the interrogation, and may become more alert, belligerent, bored, or too talkative, thus indicating termination until later.
- The interrogator fails to maintain rapport and loses control of the interrogation.
- Interrogation objectives have been satisfied.
- The interrogator becomes physically or mentally unable to continue.
- Information possessed by the source is of such value his immediate evacuation to the next echelon is required.

REPORTING INFORMATION

The last portion of the interrogation process is reporting information obtained. The most brilliantly executed interrogation becomes a wasted effort if not reported properly. To aid military operations, information obtained must be transmitted as quickly as the situation permits in a usable form to an agency capable of taking action.

- The interrogator's presence is required elsewhere.

TERMINATION PROCEDURES

Whatever the reason for terminating, the interrogator must remember there is a possibility someone may want to question the source at a later date. For that reason, he should terminate without any loss of rapport when possible. He offers the opportunity for the source to change or add to any information he has given.

During termination, the interrogator must properly dispose of any documents captured with the source. A source's military identity document must be returned to him.

If a source does not hold an identity card issued by his government, the MP will issue a DA Form 2662-R (United States Army EPW Identification Card). This form, shown at Figure 3-6, will accompany the source at all times. AR 190-8 is the prescribing directive of this form.

Some captured documents will contain information that must be exploited at higher echelons. These documents may be impounded by the interrogator and evacuated through intelligence channels. The interrogator must issue a receipt to the source for any personal documents he decides to impound. He must comply with the accounting procedures established for captured documents by the MP in accordance with AR 190-8.

These procedures are time-consuming but necessary. The interrogator can save time by preparing receipts and document tags during the planning and preparation phase.

The interrogator completes the termination phase by instructing the escort guard to return the source to the holding compound and to keep him away from sources who have not been interrogated.

Although the interrogator normally takes notes during the interrogation, he will have to rely on his memory, to some degree, while reporting information received from the source. The more distractions that occur between the interrogation and the reporting, the greater the chance the interrogator will lose some of the information obtained. The reporting normally is done in the format appropriate for the information being reported.

Appendix E contains formats of reports. Initial reports are submitted electronically when possible to ensure the information reaches the intelligence analysts in the least amount of time.

Written reports are prepared to document electronic reports. They are used as initial means of reporting only when electronic reporting is impossible. Any information of intelligence value that will diminish with the passage of time must be SALUTE reported.

Electronic SALUTE reports are formatted and submitted according to the procedures established during the senior interrogator's initial coordination. Information not SALUTE reportable is electronically reported with a lower priority.

The aim of any interrogation is to obtain information which will help satisfy a commander's intelligence requirements. Since these requirements will differ in scope at each level, when conducting PIR or IR interrogations, nonapplicable paragraphs may be deleted. Part I must always be included and distribution made according to STANAG 2033.

Regardless of the report format used, information must be reported accurately according to the following criteria:

- Each item of information reported which has a different date of information from the overall report must be accompanied by its correct date.

INTERROGATION WITH AN INTERPRETER

Interrogating through an interpreter is time consuming because the interpreter must repeat everything said by the interrogator and source. The interrogator must brief the interpreter before the interrogation can begin. An interrogation with an interpreter will go through all five phases of the interrogation process. After the interrogation is over, the interrogator will evaluate the interpreter.

INTERPRETATION METHODS

During the planning and preparation phase, the interrogator selects a method of interpretation. There are two methods: Simultaneous and alternate. The interrogator obtains information about his interpreter from the senior interrogator. He analyzes this information and talks to the interpreter before deciding which method to use.

- Each item of information not obtained as a direct result of the source's personal experiences must be accompanied by a description of how he obtained that information.
- All dispositions, towns, and other specific geographic locations must be accompanied by a correct, complete set of at least 6-digit universal transverse mercator (UTM) coordinates, to include the correct 100,000-meter grid zone identifier. The UTM coordinates are in STP 34-97E24-SM-TG.
- The information is reported exactly as it was obtained from the source. No information is deleted or added without explanatory comments.
- The report contains no errors in spelling, punctuation, or grammar that affect the meaning of the information reported.

Each report must include the interrogator's assessment of the source's value. This assessment addresses the source's intelligence, experience, cooperation, and reliability. Any areas of special knowledge possessed by the source should be identified.

The assessment codes are established by STANAG 2033. The codes assigned, and a written statement supporting these assignments, must be included on each report.

With the alternate method, the interpreter listens to an entire phrase, sentence, or paragraph. He then translates during natural pauses in the interrogation.

The simultaneous method should be selected only if all the following criteria are met:

- The sentence structure of the target language is parallel to English.
- The interpreter can understand and speak English as well as the target language with ease.
- The interpreter has special vocabulary skills for the topics to be covered.
- The interpreter can easily imitate the interrogator's tone of voice and attitude for the approaches selected.

FM 34-52

- Neither interrogator nor interpreter tends to get confused when using the simultaneous method of interpretation.

With the simultaneous method, the interpreter listens and translates at the same time as the person for whom he is interpreting, usually just a phrase or a few words behind.

If any of the criteria in the simultaneous method cannot be met, the interrogator must use the alternate method. The alternate method should also be used when a high degree of precision is required.

INTERPRETER BRIEFING

Once the interrogator has chosen a method of interpretation, he must brief his interpreter. This briefing must cover—

- Current tactical situation.
- Background information obtained on the source.
- Specific interrogation objectives.
- Method of interpretation to be used.
- The conduct of the interrogation: For example——Statements made by the interpreter and source should be interpreted in the first person, using the same content, tone of voice, inflection, and intent. The interpreter must not inject his own personality, ideas, or questions into the interrogation.

—The interpreter should inform the interrogator if there are any inconsistencies in the language used by the source. The interrogator will use this information in his assessment of the source. One example is a source who claims to be an officer, but uses excessive slang and profanity.

- Selected approach techniques and how they are to be applied.
- Physical arrangements of the interrogation site. Ideally, the interrogator and the source should face each other with the interpreter behind the source. This enhances interrogator control by allowing him to simultaneously observe the source and interpreter.
- Need for the interpreter to assist with preparing reports.

Throughout the briefing, the interrogator fully and clearly answers questions the interpreter may have. This helps ensure the interpreter completely understands his role in the interrogation.

CONDUCT THE INTERROGATION

During the interrogation, the interrogator corrects the interpreter if he violates any standards on which he was briefed. For example, if the interpreter injects his own ideas into the interrogation, he must be corrected.

Corrections should be made in a low-key manner. At no time should the interrogator rebuke his interpreter sternly or loudly while they are with the source. The interrogator should never argue with the interpreter in the presence of the source. If a major correction must be made, the interrogator and interpreter should leave the interrogation site temporarily, and only when necessary.

When initial source contact is made, the interpreter must instruct him to maintain eye contact with the interrogator. Since rapport and control must be established, the interpreter should be able to closely imitate the attitude, behavior, and tone of voice used by the interrogator and source. The questioning phase is conducted in the same way it would be if no interpreter were used.

During the termination phase, too, the interpreter's ability to closely imitate the interrogator and source is important. The approaches used are reinforced, and necessary sincerity and conviction must be conveyed to the source.

The interpreter assists the interrogator in preparing reports. He may be able to fill in gaps and unclear areas in the interrogator's notes. He may also assist in transliterating, translating, and explaining foreign terms.

After submitting all reports, the interrogator evaluates the performance of his interpreter. The evaluation must cover the same points of information the interrogator received from the senior interrogator.

The interrogator submits the results of his evaluation to the senior interrogator, who uses this evaluation to update information about the interpreter. This evaluation may also be used to develop training programs for interpreters.

STRATEGIC INTERROGATIONS AND DEBRIEFINGS

Strategic debriefing is questioning of individuals who are sources of information in a strategic or operational environment. This is done to obtain usable information in response to command and national level intelligence needs. Strategic intelligence—

- Provides support to national level planners and operational commanders across the operational continuum, and is useful for long-range planning.
- Is collected in peacetime as well as wartime; it often fills intelligence gaps on extremely sensitive topics or areas.

The objective of the strategic debriefing process is to obtain information of the highest degree of credibility to satisfy outstanding information objectives (IO). This avoids surprises of a strategic nature and consequences.

The types of sources encountered in strategic debriefing are emigres, refugees, resettlers, defectors, and selected US personnel. While there are other types, these represent the majority. Strategic debriefing guidance is provided in DIAM 58-13 and FM 34-5(S), Chapter 4.

DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF DEBRIEFERS

Specific duties and responsibilities peculiar to a particular operation will be detailed in unit SOPs. This is due to the diverse nature of the various operations using debriefers outside continental United States (OCONUS) and within the continental United States (CONUS). However, debriefers have the following common duties and responsibilities regardless of assignment.

Notification

Proper response to notification of the availability of a source will depend upon unit operations. The debriefer may have to respond spontaneously as in the case of walk-in sources. He may have the luxury of advance notice as in the case of an invitational interview.

Planning the Debriefing

The process for planning a strategic debriefing is similar to conducting a tactical interrogation, with the following considerations peculiar to the strategic environment. The debriefer should—

- Determine source's area of knowledgeability, personality traits, and potential intelligence value.

- Review IOs.
- Assemble and organize necessary maps, technical reference manuals, city plans, photographs, and handbooks in anticipated debriefing sequence.
- Select an appropriate debriefing site with consideration to host country legal agreements or particular unit SOP directives.

Initial Contact

The debriefer will usually use a friendly rapport posture with sources, who have a status far different from EPWs or detainees.

Questioning

Good questioning techniques, rapport, and effective lead follow-up ensure answering specific IO.

Reporting Information Obtained

Comprehensive and logical note taking is translated into objective reporting within the parameters of intelligence report procedures in DIAM 58-13.

Concluding the Debriefing

An interview is concluded in a manner which enables any debriefer to contact a source at a later date and resume the debriefing process. The debriefer ensures the source receives all promised incentives. It is often necessary to provide source transportation and lodging. Such considerations demand the debriefer be familiar with procedures for using Intelligence Contingency Funds (ICFs).

Operational Security

There is an obvious need for OPSEC before, during, and after any debriefing. Source confidentiality and handling of classified materials demand constant and special attention.

Language Ability

Maintaining a language proficiency is a basic requirement; improvement of dialects, slang, technical terminology, and military vocabulary is a must.

Liaison

A debriefer may have the added responsibility of maintaining local liaison with host-government agencies while OCONUS. Unit SOPs usually dictate necessary and proper procedures.

FM 34-52

S&T Enhancement

The debriefer keeps abreast with target country S&T developments. Intelligence agencies publish numerous reports and summaries which are readily available to the strategic debriefer.

STRATEGIC INTELLIGENCE COMPONENTS

Information gathered as strategic intelligence may be categorized into eight components. An easy way to remember these components is the acronym "BEST MAPS":

- Biographic intelligence.
- Economic intelligence.
- Sociological intelligence.
- Transportation and telecommunications intelligence.
- Military geographic intelligence.
- Armed forces intelligence.
- Political intelligence.
- S&T intelligence.

Each of these components can be divided into sub-components. These components and sub-components are not all-encompassing nor mutually exclusive. This approach enhances familiarization with the types of information included in strategic intelligence.

Biographic Intelligence

Biographic intelligence is the study of individuals of actual or potential importance through knowledge of their personalities and backgrounds. This component can be divided into sub-components:

- Educational and occupational history—civilian and military backgrounds of individuals.
- Individual accomplishment—notable accomplishments of an individual's professional or private life.
- Idiosyncrasies and habits—mannerisms and unusual life styles.
- Position, influence, and potential—present future positions of power or influence.
- Attitudes and hobbies—significant interests that may affect an individual's accessibility.

Biographic information is reported by a message intelligence report in accordance with the format in DIAM 58-13.

Economic Intelligence

Economic intelligence studies economic strength and weaknesses of a country. Its sub-components are—

- Economic warfare—information on the diplomatic or financial steps a country may take to induce neutral countries to cease trading with its enemies.
- Economic vulnerabilities—the degree to which a country's military would be hampered by the loss of materials or facilities.
- Manufacturing—information on processes, facilities, logistics, and raw materials.
- Source of economic capability—any means a country has to sustain its economy.

Sociological Intelligence

Sociological intelligence deals with people, customs, behaviors, and institutions. The sub-components are—

- Population—rates of increase, decrease, or migrations.
- Social characteristics—customs, morals, and values.
- Manpower—divisions and distribution within the workforce.
- Welfare—health and education.
- Public information—information services within the country.

Transportation and Telecommunications Intelligence

Transportation and telecommunications intelligence studies systems dedicated to and used during military emergencies and peacetime. The sub-components are too varied and numerous to cover.

Military Geographic Intelligence

Military geographic intelligence studies all geographic factors (physical and cultural) which may impact on military operations. Physical geography is concerned with natural or manmade geophysical features. Cultural geography provides demographics information.

3-32

Armed Forces Intelligence

Armed forces intelligence is the integrated study of the ground, sea, and air forces of the country. This is often referred to as OB. It is concerned with—

- Strategy—military alternatives in terms of position, terrain, economics, and politics.
- Tactics—military deployments and operations doctrine.
- OB—location, organization, weapons, strengths.
- Equipment—analysis of all military materiel.
- Logistics—procurement, storage, and distribution.
- Training—as carried out at all echelons to support doctrine.
- Organization—detailed analysis of command structures.
- Manpower—available resources and their conditioning.

Political Intelligence

Political intelligence studies all political aspects which may affect military operations. Its subcomponents are—

- Government structure—organization of departments and ministries.
- National policies—government actions and decisions.
- Political dynamics—government views and reactions to events.
- Propaganda—information and disinformation programs.
- Policy and intelligence services—organization and functions.

- Subversion—subversive acts sponsored by the government.

S&T Intelligence

S&T intelligence studies the country's potential and capability to support objectives through development of new processes, equipment, and weapons systems. The subcomponents are—

- Weapons and weapon systems.
- Missile and space programs.
- Nuclear energy and weapons technology.
- NBC developments.
- Basic applied science.
- Research and development systems.

STRATEGIC INTELLIGENCE CYCLE

Equally important to strategic intelligence components is awareness of the strategic intelligence cycle, and the debriefer's role within that 5-step cycle.

The debriefers—

- Identify intelligence gaps.
- Translate these gaps into IO.
- Answer those IO.
- Prepare intelligence reports.
- Prepare intelligence evaluation by the IO originator.

These evaluations measure information and report writing quality (see Appendix E). Evaluations provide vital feedback and guidance to strategic debriefers.

Appendix F contains information on the command language program (CLP) and Appendix G, on individual and collective training.

CHAPTER 4

PROCESSING AND EXPLOITING CAPTURED ENEMY DOCUMENTS

STANAG 2084 defines a document as any piece of recorded information, regardless of form, obtained from the enemy, which subsequently comes into the hands of a friendly force. CEDs can be US or allied documents that were once in the hands of the enemy. CEDs are—

- Typed, handwritten, printed, painted, engraved, or drawn materials.
- Sound or voice recordings.
- Imagery such as videotapes, movies, or photographs.
- Computer storage media including, but not limited to, floppy disks.
- Reproductions of any of the items listed above.

CEDs are mainly acquired two ways: Some are taken from sources; most, however, are captured on the battlefield from former enemy locations and enemy dead.

Documents found on EPWs or detainees or on the battlefield—which can be exploited more efficiently when combined with interrogation—are forwarded with the EPW or detainee to the next echelon in the evacuation channel.

In exceptional cases, documents may be evacuated ahead of the EPW or detainee for advance study by intelligence agencies. A notation should be made on the prisoner's captive tag (Figure 3-6), or accompanying administrative papers, about the existence of such documents and their location if they become separated from the EPW or detainee.

EPW or detainee interrogation has its disadvantages. The main disadvantage is prisoner-derived information usually has to be confirmed from other sources; for example, OB, CEDs, and other EPWs or detainees.

A prisoner may lie to further his army's cause or to ingratiate himself with the interrogator, by telling him what the prisoner believes he wants to hear. A prisoner may lack the background knowledge needed to interpret what he has seen or to pass it on accurately. He may misunderstand or misinterpret the interrogator's question because of language barriers or fright.

An EPW or detainee may have been misinformed or misled concerning the true situation for any number of reasons. This does not mean EPW or detainee interrogation is fruitless; however, it should not be considered absolutely reliable.

In contrast, a CED is something which the enemy has written for its own use. For this reason, CEDs are usually truthful and accurate. Spectacular cases have occurred in which falsified documents have been permitted to fall into enemy hands as a means of deception. However, these cases are exceptions and thus are usually famous. Because deceptive documents are unusual, a commander tends to believe in the authenticity of captured documents.

Information contained in CEDs can prove to be of intelligence value to commanders at all levels. CEDs are important because they provide information directly from the enemy. Only rarely will a single document or group of documents provide vital information. Usually, each document provides a small bit of a larger body of information. Each CED, much like a single piece of a puzzle, contributes to the whole.

In addition to their tactical intelligence value, technical data and political indicators can be extracted from CEDs that are important to strategic and national level agencies. CEDs can be helpful in exploiting sources.

The handling methods and reporting procedures to be used by US personnel acquiring CEDs are contained in STANAG 2084. It states CEDs, except those belonging to captured enemy equipment (CEE), will be forwarded for exploitation to the appropriate captured DOCEX center (normally organic to major North Atlantic Treaty Organization [NATO] commands). There are three types of documents:

- Official—documents of governmental or military origin (such as overlays, field orders, maps, codes, field manuals, and reports).
- Identity—personal items (such as cards or books, passport, and drivers license).
- Personal—documents of a private or commercial origin (such as letters, diaries, and photographs).

The volume of CEDs in combat will overwhelm an interrogation element of the size projected for a heavy division. A flow of CEDs similar to those encountered in OPERATIONS URGENT FURY, JUST CAUSE, and DESERT STORM would supply enough targets to keep a light division's interrogators busy around-the-clock screening and categorizing CEDs. Any attempt to conduct deeper exploitation would result in a tremendous evacuation delay and the end of timely reporting.

Experience shows a division involved in a HIC may have to process between 525 and 5,300 sources per week. While these figures are estimates, they demonstrate the inability of a division's own interrogators to simultaneously exploit sources and CEDs.

Divisions may receive additional interrogation assets from corps, depending on their mission. Prior planning must be conducted to establish the availability of these assets and their deployment within the division.

The density of interrogation assets and command emphasis on the collection effort determine mission requirements. The feasibility of a dual collection mission may also be the result of initial IPB by the commander's intelligence staff. If an echelon cannot conduct a dual collection effort, EPW interrogation receives priority.

CEDs, while not affected by memory loss, are often time sensitive; therefore, they are quickly screened for possible exploitation. Interrogators are given the CED exploitation mission because of their linguistic ability. This makes printed and typed material readily exploitable, but many handwritten documents are illegible.

DOCUMENT CATEGORIES

The category assigned to each CED must be recorded as part of the Captured Document Log entry for that CED. Interrogators should also enter a brief description of that CED. This description should identify the type of document (such as sound recording, written material, painting, engraving, imagery); and what language was used in the CED.

This entry should also specify the physical construction of the CED (such as typed, printed, handwritten, tape cassette, photographs, film) and give some indication of its size (such as the number of pages, rolls of film, cassettes). The categories are discussed below.

CATEGORY A

Category A documents—

- Contain spot reportable information.
- Are time sensitive.

Information contained in undeveloped imagery and recordings is inaccessible to most interrogation elements. The intelligence value of painted, drawn, or engraved material cannot be exploited by many elements unless it is accomplished by explanatory information in writing. An example of this would be an overlay prepared without map data, registration points, or identifying terrain features.

In spite of these limitations, an estimated 90 percent of all the information contained in CEDs can be exploited.

Figure 4-1 shows a comparison along a timeline of the amounts of information available to the interrogator from the two collection targets.

The comparison assumes the CEDs and sources initially had the same amount of information, and it was of equal intelligence value. The figures used are conservative estimates, and the time between the two target types might be even greater between 24 and 72 hours.

The percentage of information available from sources drops sharply during the first 24 hours after capture. This represents the rapid loss of what sources would consider to be insignificant details. A slower drop in the percentage begins at 48 hours to represent the resurgence of established value systems. This resurgence makes it harder for interrogators to obtain what information the source still remembers.

- Contain significant intelligence information.
- May be critical to successfully accomplishing friendly COAs.

Significant intelligence topics include enemy OB, new weapons or equipment on the battlefield, and may contain information that indicates a significant change in the enemy's capabilities or intentions.

When a document is identified as Category A, the document examiner immediately ceases screening operations and submits a spot report in SALUTE format of the critical information from the document. The examiner then resumes screening operations.

CATEGORY B

Category B documents contain information pertaining to enemy cryptographic or communication systems. Once a document is identified as Category B, it is classified SECRET. This is done to limit the number of people having knowledge of the capture or contents.

FM 34-52

Category B documents may contain spot reportable information, thereby requiring immediate exploitation. In every case, these documents will be transferred through secure channels to the technical control and analysis element (TCAE) or TSA as soon as possible.

CATEGORY C

Category C documents contain no spot reportable or time-sensitive information, but do contain information of general intelligence value that does not indicate significant changes in enemy capabilities or intentions.

DOCUMENT HANDLING

The accountability phase begins at the time the document is captured. Original documents must not be marked, altered, or defaced in any way. Documents must be clearly tagged. The capturing unit attaches a captured document tag (DA Form 5976, Part C) to each document; multiple CEDs are bundled or bagged together. The capture data is always recorded on a captured document tag. Figure 4-2 shows a format to use when a capture tag is not available; record the required data on any paper.

The captured document tag should be assigned a sequential number at the first formal exploitation point, showing the nationality of the capturing force by national letters prescribed in STANAG 1059. The capturing unit will record the information as follows:

- Time document was captured, recorded as a DTG.

Category C documents may be of interest or value to other agencies. When identified as Category C, they require exploitation, regardless of content.

CATEGORY D

Category D documents appear to contain information of no intelligence value. Documents are not identified as Category D until after a thorough examination by document translation specialists at the highest command interested. This is accomplished at EAC. Category D documents are to be disposed of as directed by the appropriate authority.

- Place document was captured, including the six- or eight-digit coordinate, and description of the location of capture.
- Identity of the capturing unit.
- Identity of the source from whom the document was taken, if applicable.
- Summary of the circumstances under which the document was found.

EVACUATION

CED intelligence value will be determined and exploited as early as possible. The document must be forwarded immediately to higher headquarters.

Custody of CEDs transfers (normally from the MP) to MI when MI identifies a document as having intelligence interest. When MI interest in an EPW-related CED stops, MI gives it back to the MP.

Echelon Responsibilities

There is no set time for how long any particular echelon may keep a document for study. The primary aim of speedy evacuation to the rear for interrogator examination remains. During evacuation, escorts carefully guard CEDs to prevent recapture, loss, or destruction.

Capturing Unit Responsibilities

The capturing unit is responsible for properly tagging and securing CEDs found on an EPW or on the battlefield. It forwards CEDs found on the battlefield directly to its S2. Documents found on an EPW stay with him. If the capturing unit takes CEDs from a captured person, it does so in accordance with the GPW and unit SOPs.

The capturing unit must clearly tag CEDs to show which EPW it was taken from so they can be matched up later. Specific responsibilities are discussed below.

Capture Unit's S2. This officer is responsible for tagging all untagged CEDs. The S2 performs battlefield DOCEX as practicable and ensures speedy CED evacuation to brigade.

Escort or Guards, Brigade and Below. The brigade provides escorts and guards to transport EPWs and CEDs from subordinate battalions to the division forward collecting point. The guards—

- Assume accountability for transported CEDs.
- Ensure each item transported has a completed captured document tag attached.
- Ensure items gathered from different battalions are not mixed.

Brigade IPW Team. This 2- to 4-person team's mission, when placed in DS, is to collect information of critical interest to the supported brigade commander. It concentrates whatever DOCEX efforts it can on CEDs found with EPWs. MP evacuate all examined CEDs, along with unexamined CEDs, via EPW evacuation channels.

Division IPW Section. This interrogation section's mission is similar to that of the brigade IPW team. At this stage, priority evacuation of high value EPWs and CEDs direct to EAC is possible. Most EPWs and CEDs of intelligence interest go to the corps EPW holding facility.

MP Escorts. MP assume responsibility for evacuating CEDs and EPWs from the brigade's capturing units at the division's forward collecting point. They escort EPWs and CEDs through EAC. MI assumes control from the MP when interrogators determine a captured item or EPW is of intelligence value.

Corps CED Team. The CIF commander may task-organize a team of interrogators at the corps EPW holding facility to screen incoming CEDs for examination by the CIF DOCEX element. The CED screening team—

- Sorts incoming CEDs.
- Identifies those of possible intelligence value.
- Separates them.
- Assumes custody from the MP.
- Batches selected CEDs and delivers them to the CIF DOCEX element.

CIF DOCEX Element. At the CIF or combined corps interrogation facility (CCIF), interrogators scan selected CEDs and decide their intelligence category. They assign serial numbers and examine CEDs to answer corps collection requirements, filing spot reports in SALUTE format as necessary.

CIF interrogators batch and forward Category B documents to specialized collection activities. Interrogators label, batch, and direct evacuation of all other documents to EAC via MP and EPW evacuation channels. Examples are the TECHINT team, CI team for espionage items, and Criminal Investigation Division (CID) or SJA for war crimes information.

Theater Document Examiners. Theater level interrogators, normally at a TIF, perform a final examination of all documents of possible theater intelligence value before storing or evacuating them. The Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) sets procedures for exploitation of documents above theater Army level. The following procedures have been devised to aid timely exploitation:

- Technical documents (TECHDOCs) found with materiel that relate to their design or operation should be evacuated with the materiel. When the materiel cannot be evacuated, the documents should be identified with the materiel by attaching a sheet marked "TECHDOC." This should list the precise location, time, circumstance of capture, and a detailed description of the materiel. If possible, photographs should be taken of the equipment and evacuated with the document. An object of known size such as a ruler should be placed close to the materiel and photographed with it to provide a size reference.

- CEDs containing communications or cryptographic information are handled as secret material and are evacuated through secure channels to the TCAE at division and the TSA at EAC.

ACCOUNTABILITY

At each echelon, starting with the capturing unit, steps are taken to ensure CED accountability is maintained during document evacuation. To establish accountability, the responsible element inventories all incoming CEDs. Thorough accountability procedures at each echelon ensure CEDs are not lost. To record each processing step as it occurs helps correct mistakes in CED processing.

Accountability is accomplished by anyone who captures, evacuates, processes, or handles CEDs. All CEDs should have completed captured document tags. An incoming batch of documents includes a CED transmittal. Figure 4-3 shows this format. The exact format for a document transmittal is a matter of local SOP, but it should contain the information listed below:

- The identity of the element to which the CEDs are to be evacuated.
- The identity of the unit forwarding the CEDs.
- The identification number of the document transmittal.
- Whether or not CEDs in the package have been screened and the screening category. (If not screened, NA is circled.)
- A list of the document serial numbers of the CEDs in the package.

When a batch is received without a transmittal, the interrogation element contacts the forwarding unit and obtains a list of document serial numbers.

The interrogation element records all trace actions in its journal. Accountability includes—

- Inventorying the CEDs as they arrive.
- Initiating necessary trace actions.
- Maintaining the CED log.

When intelligence derived from a CED is included in a unit or information INTREPs, the identification letters and number of the document concerned are quoted to avoid false confirmation. All CEDs are shipped with any associated documents.

INVENTORY

An inventory of incoming CEDs is conducted initially by comparing the CED to the captured document tag and accompanying transmittal documents. This comparison identifies—

- Transmittals that list missing CEDs.
- Document tags not attached to CEDs.
- CEDs not attached to document tags.
- CEDs not listed on the accompanying transmittal documents.

LOG

The captured document log, shown at Figure 4-4, is a record of what an element knows about a CED. After trace actions are initiated, the CEDs are entered in the remarks section of the captured document log. This log must contain the following:

- Name of capturing unit.
- File number (a sequential number to identify the order of entry).
- DTG the CED was received at this element.
- Document serial number of the captured document tag.
- Identification number of the transmittal document accompanying the CED.
- Full designation of the unit that forwarded the CED.
- Name and rank of individual that received the CED.

DOCUMENT EXPLOITATION

As incoming CEDs are accounted for, the exploitation phase for intelligence information begins. Exploitation includes—

- DTG and place of capture (as listed on the captured document tag).
- Identity of the capturing units (as listed on the captured document tag).
- Document category (after screening).
- Description of the CED (at a minimum the description includes the original language; number of pages; type of document such as a map, letter, or photograph; and the enemy's identification number for the CED, if available).
- Destination and identification number of the outgoing transmittal.
- Remarks (other information that can assist the unit in identifying the CED to include processing codes. These are set up by local SOPs to denote all actions taken with the document while at the element, including spot (SALUTE) reports, translations, reproductions, or return of the CED to the source from whom it was taken).

Accountability for the CED should be established at each echelon once the actions described above have been done.

TRACE ACTIONS

When necessary, the receiving unit initiates a CED trace action. Trace actions are initiated on all missing CEDs, captured document tags, and all information missing from the captured document tag. Trace actions are initiated by contacting elements from which the documents were received. This corrective action can be completed swiftly if that unit's captured document log was filled out completely.

If necessary, the trace action continues to other elements that have handled the document. If a captured document tag is unavailable from elements that have previously handled the CED, the document examiner fills out a captured document tag for the document using whatever information is available. Attempts to obtain missing CEDs are critical because of the information those CEDs might contain.

- CED screening to determine potential intelligence value.
- Extracting pertinent information from the CED.

CEDs are processed and exploited as soon as possible within the constraints of the unit's mission. The main mission of some units is to exploit human sources rather than to translate CEDs; therefore, manpower constraints may limit time for translation.

However, translating CEDs is necessary at any echelon where interrogators and translators are assigned. Therefore, it is important that interrogation elements possess qualified personnel to provide the translation support required. Intelligence units ensure there is no delay in CED exploitation.

Qualified personnel or document copying facilities should be available to handle CEDs; personnel should be available to exploit the volume or type of documents concerned. If not, documents are forwarded immediately to the next higher echelon. Copying availability is determined by the echelon in question, as well as mission and mobility considerations.

CED SCREENING

Document exploitation begins when CEDs are screened for information of immediate intelligence interest. As each document is screened, it is assigned one of four category designations. The category assigned determines the document's priority for exploitation and evacuation.

CED screening procedures include receiving the latest PIR, IR, and SIR; current friendly and enemy situation update; relevant OB; and review.

Brigade and division interrogators get this information from the supported J2, G2, or S2. Corps and theater DOCEX elements receive this information from their parent MI battalion or brigade. The DOCEX elements are responsible for obtaining and providing such operational intelligence information to their DOCEX teams.

TRANSLATING

Once a CED has been screened, the document must be exploited. The translation must be clearly and accurately typed or handwritten; this ensures usability. Also, as part of interrogation duties, the interrogator may have previously translated a document by sight to help gain a source's cooperation.

TYPES OF TRANSLATIONS

There are three types of translations:

SPECIAL DOCUMENT HANDLING

TECHDOCs are given special handling to expedite exploitation and evacuation. TECHDOCs are handled as Category A CEDs until screened by TECHINT personnel. Generally, TECHDOCs accompany the captured equipment until the intelligence exploitation is completed. TECHDOCs include maintenance handbooks, operational manuals, and drawings. Examples of TECHDOCs include—

- Air Force documents (AIRDOCs). These are documents of any category captured from crashed enemy aircraft, particularly if related to enemy anti-aircraft defense or air control and reporting systems. AIRDOCs are transmitted to the nearest Air Force headquarters without delay.
- Navy documents (NAVDOCs). These are documents taken from ships (for example, code books, call signs, frequency tables, and identification symbols). NAVDOCs are forwarded without delay to the nearest Navy headquarters.
- Maps and charts of enemy forces. Captured maps and charts containing any operational graphics are evacuated immediately to the supporting all-source analysis center. Captured maps and charts without graphics may be transmitted to the topographical intelligence section attached to corps.

SCREENING AT HIGHER ECHELONS

CEDs can be recategorized during screening conducted at higher echelons. The information may have become outdated, or the echelon currently exploiting the document may have different intelligence requirements.

- Full—one in which the entire document is translated. It is time-intensive and requires manpower, especially for lengthy documents or TECHDOCs. It is unlikely many full translations will be performed at corps or below. Even when dealing with Category A documents, it may not be necessary to translate the entire document to gain the information it contains.

- Extract—one in which only a portion of the document is translated. For instance, a TECHINT analyst may decide a few paragraphs in the middle of a 600-page helicopter maintenance manual merit translation, and a full translation is not necessary. The analyst would request only what he needed.
- Summary—one in which a translator begins by reading the entire document. He then summarizes the main points of information instead of rendering a full or extract translation.

A summary translation requires a translator have more analytical abilities. The translator must balance the need for complete exploitation of the document against time available in combat operations.

A summary translation may also be used by translators working in languages in which they have not been formally trained. For instance, a Russian linguist may not be able to accurately deliver a full translation of a Bulgarian language document. However, he can probably render a usable summary of the information it contains.

TRANSLATION REPORTS

Except for SALUTE spot reports, all information resulting from document exploitation activities will be reported in a translation report. After all required SALUTE reports have been submitted, the translator will prepare required translation reports.

CEDs that contain information of intelligence value that was not SALUTE reported are the subject of translation reports. Translation reports are prepared on all Category C CEDs and include portions of Category A, TECHDOCs, and Category B CEDs not SALUTE reported.

The priorities for preparing translation reports are—

- Category A.
- TECHDOCs.
- Category B.
- Category C.

A translation report, shown at Figure 4-5, should contain the following information:

- Destination, which is the element to which the report will be forwarded.

- Originator, which is the element that prepared the report.
- Date of preparation showing the DTG.
- Report number as designated by local SOP.
- Document number taken from the captured document tag.
- Document description including type of document, number of pages, physical construction of document, and enemy identification number, if applicable.
- Original CED language.
- DTG document was received at element preparing the report.
- DTG document was captured.
- Place document was captured.
- Identity of capturing unit.
- Circumstances under which document was captured.
- Rank and last name of translator.
- Type of translation: full, extract, or summary.
- Remarks for clarification or explanation, including the identification of the portions of the document translated in an extract translation.
- Classification and downgrading instructions, according to AR 380-5.

DISSEMINATION AND RECORDS

The translator records each exploitation step taken in the captured document log. Transmission of spot and translation reports is entered in the element's journal.

At least two copies are prepared for each spot (SALUTE) and translation report. One copy is placed in the interrogation elements's files. The other accompanies the CED when it is evacuated. When the CED cannot be fully exploited, a copy of the CED should be made and retained. The original CED is forwarded through evacuation channels. Even when copies of an unexploited CED cannot be made, the original CED is still forwarded through evacuation channels without delay.

My dear Serezhen'ka:
It has been a long time since I received a letter from you. How are you and where are you? The last time you wrote that fighting was going on around you all the time, and this worries me a lot. Take care of yourself. There have been many changes at home. Your mother, despite her age, had to go to work in the factory. They make tanks there, but the sign over the entrance says this is a sugar plant. I don't know why they do this. At the school where I work, we were also told to go and work at the same plant. They are going to close the school. Everyone has to go to the front or work in the war industry. I would be more at ease if I knew you are alive and well. Please write as soon as you can.
Your KATHY.

EVACUATION PROCEDURES

For friendly forces to benefit fully from a document, send CEDs to the element most qualified to exploit them as quickly as possible. Information gained from a CED is frequently time-sensitive. If a document is not sent to the element most capable of exploiting it, time will be lost. Time lost in exploiting the document may reduce or even negate the value of the information. The CED evacuation procedures in use at any element must ensure documents are shipped to their proper destinations in a timely manner.

NORMAL EVACUATION

CEDs are normally evacuated from echelon to echelon through the intelligence organizational chain. Depending on the type of documents, they may eventually be evacuated to the National Center for Document Exploitation. Interrogators and translators can exploit CEDs at every echelon; they will make an attempt to exploit CEDs within their expertise and technical support constraints.

DIRECT EVACUATION

Some CEDs are evacuated to different elements based upon the information contained and the type of document concerned. Direct evacuation to an element outside the chain of command takes place at the lowest practical echelon. Specific evacuation guidelines contained in local unit SOPs are followed when dealing with documents requiring special handling.

EVACUATION PRIORITIES

When transportation assets are limited, CEDs are evacuated according to priority. The priority is the category assigned to the CED. All Category A CEDs will be evacuated first, TECHDOCs will be considered Category A CEDs until examined by the captured materiel exploitation center (CMEC), followed in order by Categories B, C, and D.

Category B documents are evacuated to the TCAE, which maintains a SIGINT and EW data base. Category B documents pertaining to communications equipment are duplicated, if possible; the duplicate documents are sent to the CMEC.

CEDs not evacuated are held until the next transportation arrives. These remaining CEDs are combined with any other CEDs of the same category that have arrived and have been processed.

When determining evacuation priorities, interrogators consider CEDs ready for evacuation. Lower priority CEDs, no matter how old, are never evacuated ahead of those with higher priority. A package of documents contains CEDs of only one category. All un-screened CEDs are handled as Category C documents, but they are not packaged with screened Category C documents. CEDs in a single package must have the same destination.

TRANSMITTAL DOCUMENTS

When CEDs are evacuated from any echelon, a document transmittal is used (see Figure 4-3). A separate document transmittal is prepared for each group of CEDs to be evacuated.

When second copies of Category B CEDs are being sent to a TECHINT element, a separate document transmittal is required.

The transmittal identification number is recorded in the captured document log as part of the entry for each CED.

All CEDs being evacuated must be accompanied with the appropriate—

- TECHDOC cover sheet.
- SECRET cover sheet on Category B documents.
- Translation reports and hard-copy spot reports in SALUTE format accompanying translated documents.
- Captured document tags.

ASSOCIATED DOCUMENTS

Preparations for further CED evacuation begin with verifying document serial numbers. This is done by comparing the entry in the captured document log with the entry on the captured document tag attached to each CED.

Once all CEDs are present, copies of all reports derived from the CEDs are assembled. A copy of all SALUTE and translation reports is placed with the CEDs that were the sources of those reports. When possible, all Category B CEDs and their captured document tags should be copied.

GROUP DOCUMENTS

CEDs are first grouped according to their assigned screening category. Personnel must be careful when sorting CEDs to ensure no CED is separated from its associated documents. These large groupings can be broken down into smaller groups. Each of these smaller groupings consists of CEDs that were—

- Captured by the same unit.
- Captured in the same place.
- Captured on the same day at the same time.
- Received at the interrogation element at the same time.

DOCUMENTS CAPTURED WITH A SOURCE

The documents captured with a source play an important role in the interrogation process and can contain reportable information the same as with a CED obtained on the battlefield. During source screening operations, for instance, documents can indicate a specific source may have information pertaining to the commander's intelligence requirements.

The interrogator uses various pieces of information in forming his interrogation plan. Documents captured with the source may provide the key to the approach necessary to gain the source's cooperation.

Guidelines for the disposition of the source's documents and valuables are set by international agreement and discussed in more detail in AR 190-8 and FM 19-4.

One way the source's trust and continued cooperation can be gained is through fair and equitable handling of his personal possessions. In some instances, such treatment can make it more likely the source will cooperate during interrogation. Furthermore, fair treatment by the interrogator and holding area personnel can ease tensions in the confinement facility.

DOCUMENT DISPOSAL

The disposition of documents captured with a source is normally an MP function. Because of their language capabilities, interrogators at the compound probably will be required to provide assistance.

The MP sign for all documents taken from sources. To ensure proper handling and expeditious disposition of these documents, the interrogation element should sign for any documents captured with a source. When the interrogation element assumes control of documents, they process them according to established procedures.

When documents are captured with a source, it is recommended that they be taken away from him so he cannot destroy them. However, under no circumstances is a source's identification card to be permanently taken from him.

When documents are taken from a source, it is necessary to ensure the source from whom they were taken can be identified. The best way to do this is with the source's captive tag. The bottom portion of the tag is designed to be used for marking equipment or documents. Three possible actions may be taken with documents captured with a source. The documents may be confiscated, impounded, or returned to the source.

Confiscation

Documents confiscated from a source are taken away with no intention of returning them. Official documents, except identification documents, are confiscated and appropriately evacuated. The intelligence value of the document should be weighed against the document's support in the interrogation of the source.

Category A documents require exploitation and should be copied. One copy should be translated and exploited separately, and the other copy should be evacuated with the source. If copying facilities are not available, a decision should be made on whether to evacuate the document with the source or separately.

Category B CEDs should be evacuated to the TCAE for appropriate exploitation. Category C official documents can best be used in the interrogation of the source. Therefore, these CEDs and Category D official documents should be evacuated with the source.

Impounded

Impounded CEDs are taken away with the intention of returning them later. When a document is impounded, the source must be given a receipt. The receipt must contain a list of the items impounded and the legible name, rank, and unit of the person issuing the receipt. All personal effects, including monies and other valuables, will be safeguarded.

An inventory of personal effects that have been impounded will be entered on DA Form 4237-R (see Figure 3-1). Also, the officer in charge or authorized representative will complete and sign DA Form 1132-R (Prisoner's Personal Property List - Personal). A copy will be provided the source. See AR 190-8 for procedures on handling personal effects.

Returned

Returned CEDs are usually personal in nature, taken only for inspection and information of interest, and immediately given back to the source. Personal documents belonging to a source will be returned to the source after examination in accordance with the GPW. Copies of such papers may be made and forwarded if considered appropriate. An identification document must be returned to the source.

RECOGNITION AND EVACUATION OF DOCUMENTS

In a fast-moving tactical situation, it is possible documents captured with sources will not be handled expeditiously. Final disposition of these documents may not be made until the source is evacuated at least as far as the corps holding area.

Some documents captured with a source will aid in the interrogation of the source. Others, particularly Category A, should be copied and evacuated separately.

One copy can remain with the source to aid in the interrogation, and the other can be translated and exploited separately.

It is essential that the capturing unit correctly identify the documents captured with the source. This is more easily done when the interrogation element, rather than the MP element, signs for the documents captured with sources.

EVACUATION OF SIGNIFICANT DOCUMENTS

To efficiently exploit CEDs and sources, documents captured with a source are normally evacuated with the source. A document of great significance may be evacuated ahead of the source, but a reproduction should be kept with the source. If reproduction is not possible, note on the captured document tag where the document was sent.

Significant documents such as Categories A and B, TECHDOCs, maps, charts, AIRDOCs, and NAVDOCs are evacuated directly.

APPENDIX B

QUESTIONING GUIDES

This appendix contains sample tactical questions and topics for specific EPWs and detainees. It also contains a sample overall objective statement for an interrogation element and a sample overall objective statement with IEW tasks.

MESSENGERS

Messengers are frequently chosen on the basis of above-average intelligence, ability to observe, and to remember oral messages and instructions. Messengers, who have an opportunity to travel within the immediate combat zone, generally, will have a good picture of the current situation, and are excellent prospects for tactical interrogation on the following:

- Nature and exact contents of messages he has been carrying over a reasonable period of time, as well as names of persons who originated these messages, and names of persons to whom messages were directed. Description of duty positions of such personalities.

- Information as to extent which messengers are used in the applicable enemy unit, routes of messengers, and location of relay posts.
- Locations of message center and communications lines.

RADIO AND TELEPHONE OPERATORS

Radio and telephone operators, like messengers, are frequently familiar with the plans and instructions of their commanders. The liaison officer is the commander's agent for accomplishing coordination among the headquarters of lower, adjacent, and higher units. The liaison officer also may be called upon to effect coordination between infantry units and supporting or supported armor and artillery, engineer, and reconnaissance units.

APPENDIX C

S2 TACTICAL QUESTIONING GUIDE AND BATTLEFIELD EXPLOITATION OF CAPTURED ENEMY DOCUMENTS AND EQUIPMENT

History shows that EPWs, CEDs, and CEE are critical sources of combat intelligence. It has also shown the usefulness of information is directly proportionate to how fast a commander can get it.

OPERATIONS URGENT FURY, JUST CAUSE, and DESERT STORM proved that without workable procedures to handle captured persons or items, our combat effectiveness suffers because the evacuation chain jams the forward resupply effort. We also suffer because we have not exploited combat information sources at a low enough echelon to do that commander any good.

This guide is for battalion and brigade S2s. It explains standard procedures on what to do when the S2—

- Receives an enemy soldier.
- Detains a civilian.
- Finds an enemy document.
- Discovers an unusual enemy weapon during tactical operations.

PERSONNEL HANDLING

There are two types of persons captured on the battlefield: combatants and noncombatants. FM 27-10 defines the two types. The capturing unit treats all combatants and noncombatants as EPWs until the division forward collecting point segregates them by category. This is whether they are soldiers, clergy, or medics (see Chapter 3).

Noncombatants are handled, questioned, detained, evacuated, and released in accordance with theater policy.

At the EPW's capture point, the capturing element performs the following steps, with the senior soldier responsible for ensuring they are done. The steps are referred to as the "five S's."

STEP 1. SEARCH

The POC unit's first job is to disarm, then search all EPW or detainees, and tie their hands behind their back. They gather all loose enemy documents and equipment in the area. They evacuate them with the EPW. Documents and personal and protective military equipment stay with the prisoner unless otherwise directed by the battalion S2.

STEP 2. SILENT

The capturing unit instructs or signals EPWs to be silent. If that does not work, the EPW is gagged. Guards give orders to EPWs, but do not talk nor give them comfort items.

STEP 3. SAFEGUARD

The POC unit immediately moves the EPWs out of the fire zone. They protect EPWs from reprisals and give them medical care as necessary. The POC unit tries to preserve the shock of capture until brigade interrogators have a chance to question the EPWs.

STEP 4. SEGREGATE

The POC unit orders the EPWs to sit on the ground. It separates officers from enlisted, senior from junior, male from female, and civilian from soldier. It prepares a captive tag and puts one on each EPW (Figure 3-4). Tagging procedures are discussed under equipment handling procedures below.

STEP 5. SPEED TO THE REAR

Lastly, the POC unit moves EPWs to the unit supply point for evacuation. All captured documents, personal effects, and portable enemy equipment go with the EPW. Also, one escort guard should know the EPW's circumstances of capture.

FM 34-52

CAPTURED ENEMY DOCUMENTS FOUND ON ENEMY PRISONER OF WAR

The battalion S2, and subordinate unit commander, ensures CEDs found on EPWs are handled as follows. The POC unit will—

- Search each EPW.
- Return identification documents to EPW.
- Write the following on the top and bottom half of the EPW captive tag: Number of documents taken; date and time, location and circumstances of capture; capturing unit's designation.
- Put CED in a waterproof bag, one per EPW.
- Affix Part C of the captive tag to the bag (see Figure 3-4).
- Give CEDs to senior escort.
- Direct senior escort to evacuate CEDs with the EPW.

CAPTURED ENEMY DOCUMENTS FOUND ON THE BATTLEFIELD

An example of CEDs found on the battlefield is paperwork discovered in an overrun CP, but not on an EPW's person. The POC unit will—

- Put CEDs in a waterproof bag.
- Follow the same procedures described above, and tag the bag.
- Evacuate to battalion S2.
- Battalion S2 evacuates all CEDs along EPW evacuation channels.

EQUIPMENT HANDLING PROCEDURES

CEE includes all types of foreign materiel found on an EPW or on the battlefield that may have military application. The POC unit—

- Evacuates equipment with the EPW.
- Confiscates, tags, and evacuates weapons and other equipment found on an EPW the same as CEDs.

ITEMS OF TECHINT VALUE

The capturing unit may recognize certain CEE as having possible TECHINT value. Such items include—

- New weapons.
- Radios.
- Track vehicles.
- Associated manuals.
- All CEE known or believed to be of TECHINT interest.

The capturing unit's primary job when capturing a TECHINT item is to secure and report the capture to its S2 for disposition instructions. Figure C-1 provides a scenario for TECHINT items.

FIRST ECHELON BATTLEFIELD TECHINT EXPLOITATION

It is conceivable, although not likely, that the capturing unit leader or S2 may need to do field exploitation of a piece of CEE. If this happens—

- It will usually be at the request of the battlefield TECHINT team attached to corps headquarters.
- The small-unit leader or S2 follows the same procedures used to exploit a CED.

TAGGING PROCEDURES

There are two capture tags: A CEE tag and an EPW tag with a smaller tear-off document tag. The POC unit tags all captured personnel, CEDs, and CEE at the POC.

The battalion S2 or company commander is responsible for having sufficient CEE and EPW document tags as well as and waterproof bags prior to an operation.

When no standard tag forms are available, the following procedures will be used for expediency:

- Use meals, ready-to-eat (MRE) cardboard or other type of paper.

C-2

FROM THE FOXHOLE TO THE CMEC

The soldier either captures or observes an item of possible TECHINT interest. The soldier quickly reports the encounter through his or her command to the Battalion S2. The soldier then either safeguards the item or continues the mission as directed.

Upon learning that a forward platoon or company has captured or encountered an item of possible TECHINT interest, the Battalion S2 promptly—

- Coordinates security or continued observation of the item with the S3 and ensures the item is not tampered with in any way. Components, control knobs, and switches on C-E equipment should not be touched until the equipment is photographed or positions recorded.
- Examines and screens the item against PIR and IR and determines whether the item is known or believed to be of TECHINT interest; or, whether, in the soldier's opinion, the item deserves initiative reporting.
- Spot reports the capture or encounter in the SALUTE format through higher headquarters to the first Battlefield TECHINT element in the chain of command.
- Coordinates continued security or observation of the item until receipt of further instructions.
- Identifies items requiring immediate screening for combat information by other supporting MI elements. This could include C-E system items like code books, radios, or technical documents such as operator manuals.

Intermediate echelons of command continue forwarding the spot reported encounter or capture to their supporting Battlefield TECHINT element.

The supporting Battlefield TECHINT element receives the spot report and compares the information to requirements and the existing data base to see if collection is necessary. The element then decides further action and notifies the capturing unit accordingly. The CMEC or Battlefield TECHINT team's options at this point include, but are not limited to—

- Requesting the capturing unit to provide further information, such as detailed descriptions, sketches, photographs, or documents captured with the item.
- On-site screening or exploiting.
- Destroying the item.
- Abandoning the item unharmed.
- TECHINT team-supervised or routine evacuating.
- Priority evacuating to EAC.
- Recommending turning over initial exploitation to other MI elements, such as target exploitation or interrogators, for immediate tactical information screening.

FM 34-52

- Write the capturing unit's designation.
- Write date and time of capture.
- Write POC coordinates.
- Write circumstances of capture.
- Identify EPW, CED, or CEE captured.
- Put tag, without damaging the CED, in a waterproof bag.
- Attach EPW and CEE tags so they will not come off.

TACTICAL QUESTIONING

This section provides "how to" instructions to enable the S2 to do tactical questioning (TQ) on EPWs. Following these will—

- Achieve usable results.
- Preserve the source for subsequent formal interrogation.
- Keep the S2 from breaking the law.

WARNING

Improper, unlawful, or inept attempt at field exploitation can harm or destroy possible critical intelligence sources, and send US soldiers to prison. Any decision to attempt these procedures is a command responsibility, and only done by the S2.

Figure C-2 is an example of the front and reverse sides of a CEE tag. It should be included as a tab to the TECHINT appendix in the intelligence annex of an OPLAN plan or operations order (OPORD).

The purpose of TQ is to obtain combat information of immediate use to the battalion or subordinate unit by the S2. Sources of information can be an EPW and local or friendly civilians encountered in the operational area. (S2s use established procedures when questioning local or friendly civilians.)

LANGUAGE REQUIREMENT

TQ can be done only under one of following circumstances:

- The S2 speaks the EPW's language well enough to ask direct questions and understand the answers.

- A language qualified interpreter is available to assist the S2.

WHERE TQ IS DONE

TQ is done as soon as possible after removing the EPW from fire zones. However, battalion or brigade commanders forced to deal with heavy EPW input may set up an organized TQ effort at the unit's EPW collecting point.

WHO ASKS THE QUESTIONS

Only the S2 is authorized to conduct TQ. The S2 asks every question himself, even when using another soldier or local national as an interpreter. If augmented by interrogators, the interrogation team supervises the TQ effort.

TIME CONSIDERATIONS

TQ is designed to be a quick procedure, lasting from 5 to 20 minutes. A command decision is required if source questioning interferes with mission accomplishment or delays a priority evacuation.

ITEMS NEEDED FOR TQ

TQ is authorized for collection of combat information critical to successful mission accomplishment. The questioner needs to know what information headquarters requires. Other items required for TQ are—

- Maps.
- Vehicle and aircraft identification guides.
- Target language dictionary.
- Report forms, stationery, capture tags, waterproof bags.
- Interpreter or translator.

THE EXPLOITATION PROCESS

The exploitation process, discussed in Chapter 3, is the basis for all personnel examinations, to include TQ.

It consists of three parts: screening, questioning, and reporting.

SCREENING

If there is more than one EPW, the quickest method to pick who to question first is to—

- Check the captive tag to see if your unit recently captured the EPW with unusual equipment; for example, a sniper rifle or booby trap in an area of operational interest.
- Observe for high rank, key enemy unit patches, and unusual behavior.
- Use established guidelines and rank the most likely EPWs first for questioning.

QUESTIONING

The key to questioning is brevity. Tactical questioners work fast until they find an EPW who will give useful combat information. To do this, the tactical questioner—

- Ensures the EPW is under guard.
- Briefs interpreter as necessary.
- Has the EPW searched and obtains identity document.
- Looks over EPW's identity document and CEDs.
- Makes a mental questioning plan.
- Presents military bearing. Preserves the shock of capture.
- Asks military questions, intermixing biographical questions so as not to arouse the EPW's security training.
- Compares answers given on the identity card and other items found on the EPW to check for truthfulness.
- Ends questioning if the EPW stops or refuses to answer military questions.
- Ends questioning if the EPW intentionally or unintentionally provides so much irrelevant military information instead of information pertinent to the tactical questioner's combat mission.

- Never promises anything that cannot be delivered.

REPORTING

Tactical questioners report acquired information in SALUTE format (Figure 3-5). To do this, they—

- Obtain combat information using the direct questioning technique (see Chapter 3).
- Record combat information of interest to headquarters. This is recorded in SALUTE format as relevant answers are obtained.
- Attempt to fill in all SALUTE report blanks before moving to another collection requirement or before ending the questioning.
- End questioning by telling the EPW they will talk again, and return required items, such as the EPW's ID.

THE TACTICAL QUESTIONING PLAN

The questioning plan used during TQ is short, simple, and standard. The questioner can use it to uncover spot reportable information on any subject. An easy way to remember it is through the phrase "BIG 4 and JUMP."

- BIG 4 is a nickname for the Geneva Convention's "name, rank, service number, and date of birth."
- JUMP is an acronym for job, unit, mission, PIR, IR, and SIR, which is the sequence of the TQ plan.

More specifically, the TQ plan covers the following topics in sequence. Figure C-3 shows examples of the BIG 4 and JUMP questions.

- EPW biographical data.
- EPW duty position or job.
- EPW unit or employer.
- EPW present and future mission at time of capture.
- Commander's collection requirements in order of priority.

BATTLEFIELD DOCUMENT EXPLOITATION

Battlefield DOCEX is a capturing unit procedure done by the S2 before interrogator exploitation. A combat unit without language-qualified personnel can perform limited battlefield DOCEX, mainly on maps and overlays. Units with linguists have the advantage of being able to do more.

C-6

What is your last name? First name? Middle name?
 What is your rank? Service number? Date of Birth?

* * * *

What is your position (or job) in your unit (or firm)?
 What unit are you in (or who do you work for)?
 What was your mission (or what type of work were you doing) when you were captured?
 What would your future mission have been (or what jobs or projects would you have had) had you not been captured? What other missions would you have had if you had not been captured?

* * * *

Follow up on all given information items; in particular, ensure you have the source's full unit designation and thoroughly follow up on the source's missions. A good rule of thumb is to ask Who, What, When, Where, How, and Why to fully develop whatever information you obtain.

NOTE: Continue to ask questions based on collection requirements, phrasing them as direct questions. For example, "Where is the GATO cell's arm caches?" or "When will your unit attack SAN PABLO?"

After capturing an EPW or enemy CP, the capturing unit needs to look for maps, encrypted items, OPORDs, overlays, and other documents. The capturing unit then notifies headquarters to request disposition instructions.

The small-unit leader safeguards the items pending disposition instructions. At the same time he—

- Looks over the document.
- Does not mark or harm it in any way.

- Uses whatever resources are available to decipher it; for example, dictionaries and enemy map symbol guides. An example of Soviet and non-NATO symbols is at Figure C-5.

- Looks for information that has a direct bearing on his current mission.

After finding information of possible value to the mission, the S2 extracts the combat information and uses the SALUTE format as a template to organize the information (see Figure 3-5).

APPENDIX D

PROTECTED PERSONS RIGHTS VERSUS SECURITY NEEDS

The articles in this Appendix are extracted from the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of August 12, 1949.

The GC attempts to balance the necessity of the proper treatment of protected persons with the needs of security by the Detaining or Occupying Power. The GC applies to the whole of the populations of the countries in conflict, without any adverse distinction based, in particular, on race, nationality, religion, or political opinion. It is the design of the Convention to alleviate the sufferings caused by war (Article 13).

At the outbreak of a conflict, many protected persons become displaced persons. They move within their own country to areas where hostilities are not a threat or a power is able to protect them. They may become refugees, fleeing into neighboring countries seeking a safe haven. The GC provides that protected persons who desire to leave at the outset of, or during a conflict, should be allowed to do so, unless their departure is contrary to the national interest of the State (Article 35). However, in light of possible threats to the security of the State receiving the refugees or a Detaining Power, the Geneva Convention does recognize a State's right to take appropriate action to insure security.

The most typical security measure taken in such cases is the establishment of some manner of screening camps where the people may be identified and screened. During the process, useful intelligence may be obtained from legitimate displaced persons or refugees, and from potential threats, such as covert agents, who may be identified and interrogated.

In most cases, interrogators or linguists will conduct the screening operations while working closely with CI personnel to identify those protected persons of CI interest. Other military intelligence personnel may be required to participate in this screening process because of the large numbers of refugees and/or the lack of other qualified personnel.

Internment of a protected person occurs when the Detaining Power determines that confinement or assignment of residences to certain protected persons is absolutely necessary to the security of the Detaining Power (Articles 41 and 42). A civilian internee is defined by the Department of Defense (DOD) as a civilian who is interned during an armed conflict or occupation for security reasons or for protection or because he has committed an offense against the Detaining Power.

GENEVA CONVENTION PROVISIONS CONCERNING PROTECTED PERSONS

It is critical that the GC provisions concerning protected persons be strictly adhered to in the quest to identify legitimate threats and gain needed intelligence. Specifically:

(a) Article 5 provides that if a Party to the conflict is satisfied that an individual protected person is suspected of or engaged in activities hostile to the security of the State, such individual shall not be entitled to claim rights or privileges under the convention, if the exercise of that right would be prejudicial to that State. However, such individuals must be humanely treated during internment and the pendency of any investigation and/or prosecution. A limitation of rights or privileges may include the withholding of the right to communicate with members of their family or representatives of their government. Such restrictions would be appropriate in a case involving spying.

(b) Article 29 places the responsibility for the treatment accorded protected persons upon the Party in whose hands they are found. This is in addition to any personal responsibility incurred by an agent of that Party. This is an affirmative duty upon commanders to insure their subordinates are not mistreating protected persons or their property. The command and the government will ultimately be held responsible for any mistreatment.

(c) Article 31 prohibits physical or moral coercion against protected persons to obtain information from them or from third parties. Prohibited coercion may be obvious, such as physically abusing the subject of the screening or interrogation. It may also be more subtle, such as threats to turn the individual over to hostile forces; subjecting the individual to humiliating or degrading treatment; implying harm to the individual or his property, or implying a deprivation of rights guaranteed by international law because of a failure to cooperate; threatening to separate parents from their children; or forcing a protected person to perform guide services.

(d) Article 32 prohibits corporal punishment, torture or taking any measure of such character as to cause the physical suffering or extermination of protected persons in your control. This prohibition not only applies to actions taken by the Detaining Party against the protected persons, but also any adverse action that others may take.

(e) Article 33 prohibits collective punishments, penalties, reprisals, or pillaging of protected persons and their property. The principle behind this provision is that protected persons should only be held liable for offenses they personally commit. This prohibition includes all measures of intimidation or terrorism.

(f) Article 41 allows the Power, in whose hands the protected persons are found, to intern or force assigned residence to protected persons, if the other measures of control permitted by the convention are inadequate. Some persons may demand internment (for example, protected persons who may be threatened by others). Internment must be provided when the situation renders this step necessary (Article 42).

(g) If interned or forced into assigned residences, protected persons have the right to have any such determination reconsidered and reviewed on a periodic basis (Article 43).

(h) In connection with the above, Article 44 prohibits the Detaining Power from automatically interning or forcing an assigned residence against refugees who are nationals of an Enemy State, exclusively on the basis of their nationality, who do not, in fact, enjoy the protection of any government. The purpose of this article is to insure that refugees, who may only technically remain enemy aliens, are not, on that basis alone, automatically subject to control measures, notwithstanding the fact that they are not protected by their government. An example of this would be interning Iraqi refugees based solely on their status as Iraqis. This prohibition, however, does not in any way deny the right of a State to intern such persons or subject them to legitimate controls when there is an additional basis for taking such action in the interest of security of the State.

(i) Article 45 prohibits the transfer of protected persons into the custody of a Power not a signatory to the convention. The transferring Power must insure that protected persons transferred from their custody will be treated in accordance with the conventions. In the event that the transferring Power discovers that the protected persons are not being treated in accordance with the convention, they shall request that the protected persons be returned to their custody.

APPENDIX E

REPORTS

In addition to reports previously covered, there are other reports prepared or used by interrogators in tactical and strategic units. DIAM 58-13 is the authority for format and preparation of intelligence information reports (IIRs), biographic reports, and knowledgeability briefs (KBs). Local SOPs guide the interrogator in preparing other reports.

Message Text Format (MTF) Editor is software used by the military services, National Security Agency (NSA), and Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA).

MTF Editor—

- Creates, formats, edits, stores, prints, and transmits United States Message Text Formatting (USMTF) messages.
- Is designed to run on Z-150, AN/UYK-83, Z-248, IBM PC compatibles, and other standard and non-standard systems.
- Requires minimum 320K random access memory (RAM), microsoft (MS) or personal computer (PC) disk operating system (DOS) version 2.1 or higher, and 5.25-inch disk drive.

- Is "user friendly," as it employs many of the same commands available in commercial word processors.

The SALUTE report format contains relevant information necessary to alert higher commands of an incident or relevant information obtained. It answers all basic interrogatives: Who, What, When, Where, How, and Why.

Figures of sample reports, formats, and tags used by interrogators are listed below:

- Figure E-1, Spot report voice message template.
- Figure E-2, Battlefield TECHINT spot report.
- Figure E-3, Tactical interrogation report.
- Figure E-4, Captive tag (STANAG 2044).
- Figure E-5, IIR.
- Figure E-6, Biographic report.
- Figure E-7, Knowledgeability brief.
- Figure E-8, Interrogation report.

TACTICAL INTERROGATION REPORT

The TIR (Figure E-3) serves as written summary of initial or subsequent interrogations. The term "tactical interrogation report" was adopted under NATO STANAG 2033. The TIR—

- Eliminates information duplication of effort in later EPW interrogations.
- Disseminates information to the intelligence officers of the immediate command, those of other appropriate commands, and interrogators who will conduct further interrogations.
- Serves as an intelligence value assessment of EPWs, documents, and equipment carried by him at time of capture.
- Consists of Part I, Intelligence Potential of EPW, and Part II, information obtained.

In the heading, the EPW will be classified according to one of four categories explained in Chapter 4 under document exploitation.

The first section of the report contains the source's name and category, interrogation serial number, date, report number, interrogator's name and unit, maps and language used, and interpreter's name (if one is used).

The second section, Part I, contains the EPW's personal particulars, career, assessment of intelligence value, capture data from the captive tag, and documents and equipment found on the EPW.

The third section, Part II, lists information obtained from the EPW during the interrogation regarding missions, composition, strength, dispositions, tactics, training, logistics, combat effectiveness, electronic technical data, and miscellaneous data.

FM 34-52

BIOGRAPHIC DATA ENTRIES

The following data prosigns are used in biographic reporting. If available, biographic information will fit in the summary of the IIR; the text entry will be NONE.

Should the reportable information exceed the limitations of the summary, entries will be made in the text. When making entries, ensure that the numbers and prosigns shown here are those used in the biographic report; if you have no data for a particular item, skip it and list the next item for which you have a data entry. Items skipped are not listed on the report.

The paragraph classification follows the biographic prosign. Do not use colons to separate the prosign and data entries. Minimum essential data (MED) prosigns are asterisked.

SUMMARY INTERROGATION REPORT

The rationale behind the summary interrogation report, shown at Figure E-8, is to preclude duplication of effort. In DESERT STORM, as EPWs were being evacuated up the chain, the gaining interrogator would ask questions only to be told the same questions had already been asked by somebody else at a previous location. This is embarrassing, and does not foster rapport building, because the gaining interrogator had no previous EPW screening or interrogation reports. It was assumed this was the first time the EPW was questioned.

If the previous echelon received EPW information pertaining only to their immediate tactical situation, with no reports being forwarded, it would have been to the gaining interrogators advantage to be apprised of what transpired at the lower echelon; hence the summary interrogation report. This report is simple in design and purpose, but reveals EPW information that gives the gaining interrogator insight as to what was developed at the previous echelon.

COMMAND LANGUAGE PROGRAM

Foreign language knowledge is a perishable skill. Without constant reinforcement, this knowledge quickly fades. In a combat situation, this knowledge will be most critical. It is incumbent on the commander to establish and maintain an effective CLP.

STANDARDS

The goal for any language maintenance program is to have all linguists perform critical wartime mission tasks proficiently. Scoring 2/2/2 or better on the listening, reading, and speaking portion of the Defense Language Proficiency Test (DLPT) is the minimum standard for foreign language proficiency. However, there are several reasons why this should not be the sole criteria for judging the effectiveness of a language maintenance program nor an individual's proficiency.

Languages have different degrees of difficulty. The Defense Language Institute, Foreign Language Center (DLIFLC) has divided languages into four categories according to difficulty for an English speaker. The romance languages belong to Category I (easiest), while most of the Asian languages belong to Category IV (hardest). Therefore, a 2 on the DLPT for Korean does not correspond to a 2 for French.

There are several versions of the DLPT for each language. A 2 result on a version I examination is not the same as a 2 result on a version III examination, even in the same language. There are different forms (For example, A, B, or C) within each examination version.

Nevertheless, unless there is a qualified native speaker who can evaluate language proficiency, the DLPT can be used to evaluate language maintenance program effectiveness.

METHODS

The best method of learning and maintaining a foreign language is total immersion. Opportunities for total immersion include in-country temporary duty and teaching institutions. Unfortunately, in-country experience is not readily available for all languages, and immersion courses can be cost prohibitive.

A substitute for immersion training is one-on-one instruction or conversation with a native speaker. This can be part of the formal instruction at DLIFLC, Presidio of Monterey, CA; at the Foreign Language Training Center, Europe (FLTCE), Garmisch, Germany; and university refresher training courses or a DA-sponsored institute. It can also be done through hiring native speakers at unit locations.

The most prevalent, but probably least effective, method is through self-study materials, such as US Army Forces Command Language Maintenance Refresher and Improvement Course (FLAMRIC) and foreign language tapes. Most of these materials are available from DLIFLC or local language learning centers.

There is satellite communications for learning which transmits in-language news broadcasts from countries around the world.

An effective CLP begins with the commander. He must have a clear and accurate picture of his language mission requirements and be accountable for the CLP.

A command language council is formed to assist the commander. Council recommendations should become policy following command endorsement. This council—

- Consists of unit members who have a CLP interest.
- Consists of members who are appointed on orders.
- Should meet at least quarterly and follow an agenda.
- Should prepare and disseminate meeting minutes to unit linguists.

The CLP manager (CLPM) chairs the CLP council. Units commanded by a colonel should have a full-time CLPM. In lieu of rank and duty position, the CLPM should be appointed based on academic credentials or experience. The CLPM's tenure should be at least one year or longer.

The CLPM should maintain an individual linguist data base, with the following information:

- Duty assignment.
- Primary military occupational specialty (MOS).
- On-going language training.
- Post-DLIFLC language training.
- Expiration term of service (ETS) date.
- Permanent change of station (PCS) and date eligible for return from overseas (DEROS) date (if applicable).
- Foreign language proficiency pay (FLPP) status.
- DLPT dates and scores, to include which version.
- Required DLPT test.
- Individual training plan.
- Year-to-year test results.
- Current DA Form 330 (Language Proficiency Questionnaire).

The command should have a detailed SOP covering all CLP aspects. It should be specific in task assignments and self-explanatory. It is updated regularly and becomes an integral part of the unit or command SOP.

Unit language training time, governed by AR 611-6, is designated at regular intervals on the training schedule, and should take priority over competing and unscheduled training. Each linguist should have the opportunity to attend a specified amount of language training with established objectives and goals.

Units should have a refresher language training program. Self-study materials should be available, and off-duty use encouraged.

The CLPM should be aware of adult language education courses in the community. Both duty-hour and off-duty hour attendance are encouraged.

Opportunities for operational readiness training (REDTRAIN) should be used in support of the CLP. These opportunities include, but are not limited to, forward area training, live environment training, and summer language programs.

Monetary support for language maintenance programs comes mainly from REDTRAIN funds. These funds are normally located at major Army commands and are available to subordinate units. However, this should not preclude use of a unit's regular funds to support language sustainment when available.

Funding to support CLPs must be identified and documented regularly. These requirements must be addressed in annual budget planning. The CLP should also be represented in long-range budget planning. CLP requirements should be separate from other training budgets.

A good incentive is the FLPP for qualified linguists, depending on how they score on their DLPT. Only qualified linguists are eligible to receive FLPP.

A state-of-the-art language training vehicle is the teletraining network, or commonly referred to as video teletraining (VTT).

The VTT system was used by DLIFLC to teach Arabic to troops being deployed to Southwest Asia. DLIFLC broadcasts Arab language instruction to Fort Hood and Fort Huachuca. Other critical instruction was passed through the system.

The VTT is versatile and has many applications. Video and audio can be transmitted from one site to any number of receiving sites. In a two-way interactive mode, two sites can hold a bidirectional video and audio conference. In the multipoint mode, up to eight locations can hold a conference. The host site transmits the video and audio, while other locations receive the host's audio and video, plus all audio from the remaining sites. Any site can request, during the conference, to become the host site.

DLIFLC is committed to the VTT concept. It is ready to assist units having VTT capability with their remedial foreign language sustainment and enhancement programs.

For information concerning VTT language training, contact DLIFLC's Distance Education Division at DSN 878-5746/5747; Commercial (408) 647-5746/5747; or FAX at DSN 878-5512 or Commercial (408) 647-5512.

VTT is a proven cost effective and viable language training tool; for example, training soldiers in their units with qualified native speakers, which dramatically reduces travel and per diem costs.

APPENDIX G

INDIVIDUAL AND COLLECTIVE TRAINING

"In no other profession are the penalties for employing untrained personnel so appalling or so irrevocable as in the military."—General Douglas MacArthur.

Interrogator employment during OPERATION DESERT STORM demonstrated that units whose mission training plans (MTPs) were battle focused and based on the principles of training outlined in FM 25-100 and FM 25-101, accomplished the EPW and DOCEX mission more efficiently and timely.

The commander bears the ultimate responsibility for training his soldiers to fight and win. This appendix is designed to make the interrogation unit commander aware of aspects to consider when developing unit training programs.

There are no commissioned interrogation officers. The commissioned interrogation specialty was eliminated in 1970. The Interrogation Warrant Officer (351E), and the Senior Enlisted Interrogator (97E4L) advise the commander on the training and employment of interrogators. They provide the technical expertise required to develop the unit mission-essential task list (METL) and training plans and exercises to support that METL.

MISSION-ESSENTIAL TASK LIST

To train interrogators in the areas critical to the unit's mission accomplishment, the commander (CI/Interrogation Company or I&S Company) develops a complete and accurate METL. During the METL development process, the commander—

- Analyzes the MI battalion commander's restated wartime mission and approved METL; identifies specified and implied tasks.
- Uses situation training exercises (STXs) and field training exercises (FTXs) in ARTEP 34-298-10-MTP to determine collective tasks in support of critical wartime missions.
- Sequences collective tasks as he expects them to occur during the execution of the company's wartime mission.
- Obtains battalion commander's approval of the company METL.
- Briefs company leadership (officers and NCOs); uses soldiers training publications, soldiers manuals, and MTPs to identify leader and soldier tasks to support the collective critical tasks which comprise the METL.

When developing the METL, the commander keeps in mind, regardless of echelon, that interrogators have a mission to perform at the next lower echelon as GS or DS. For this reason, they must train and practice performing their mission at the assigned and lower echelon, and deploy with both echelons.

In addition to understanding the METL of your unit, you must be familiar with the METL of supported staffs and units. Other unit METLs to consider are--

- Supported S2s and the maneuver brigade and battalion staffs to which they belong. Train with these staffs during FTXs and command post exercises (CPXs) to facilitate team cohesiveness for combat. The S2 should know and train with his interrogation support team to prepare for wartime operations.
- Train and deploy with CI personnel. Interrogation and CI personnel should cross-train on each others respective wartime critical tasks.
- Train with combat arms units. Interrogators should train and emphasize the importance of tagging and evacuating EPWs and CEDs. Stress that EPWs and CEDs provide information that saves lives.

FM 34-52

JOINT MILITARY INTELLIGENCE AND MILITARY POLICE TRAINING

OPERATIONS URGENT FURY, JUST CAUSE, and DESERT STORM demonstrated the need for interrogators and MP to conduct integrated training with regard to EPW and civilian internee operations.

For effective, meaningful training to occur, commanders must plan, develop, and coordinate many tasks. Interrogators must be familiar with the METL of the MP unit assigned to your echelon with regard to EPW operations. Without integrating the two METLs, you cannot develop scenarios that allow soldiers to train in a battle-focused environment. The two units must learn to work together and understand the requirements and functions each unit will have to perform in wartime. Members of the band are trained and may be employed as augmentees to the holding area perimeter security force.

EXERCISE REQUIREMENTS

In addition to normal personnel and equipment required of any unit exercise, the following must be planned for and considered.

SCENARIO

The most time consuming and complicated portion of an interrogation exercise is scenario development. Included in the scenario must be reasonable actions of enemy and friendly forces.

Stories must be developed for EPWs and civilian internees; for example, as in the technical support packages and interrogator comprehensive evaluation. These stories should be entered into an automated HUMINT data base, and should interact with each other at least minimally. For example:

- Units should cross match.
- Missions should fit together.
- Some degree of personality (names of leaders and soldiers) should be shared by personnel.

It is not necessary that all EPWs and civilian internees have stories that include information of intelligence value nor that stories be complete in all aspects. There should be enough material in the stories to provide a realistic "skeleton" on which role players can build.

If possible, interrogators should develop or assist with story development. The stories should tie into real world exercise play and provide indicators of enemy COAs to the G2. Tying EPW and CI stories to exercise play facilitates incorporating EPW play into G2 exercise planning and execution. This will help identify and fix many shortcomings in the stories.

PERSONNEL

Additional personnel must be employed to make an interrogation exercise successful. Personnel will be needed to serve as EPWs, civilian internees, medical personnel, interpreters, CI teams, and EPW civilian internee guards for lower echelon units. The numbers of personnel needed can be varied and personnel may be reinserted any number of times, in any number of roles.

The minimum number of personnel serving as EPWs and civilian internees at any one time should not be allowed to go below 10 to 15. Personnel should be able to speak a foreign language; preferably, languages of assigned interrogators. This allows for optimum training and practice in performing the actual job of an interrogator.

Possible sources for linguistically capable EPW and civilian internee role players include—

- Other interrogation units.
- EW and CI personnel.
- PYSOP personnel.
- MP personnel.
- CA personnel.

Linguistically capable personnel may also be in other MOSs and units not normally associated with foreign language capabilities.

Another source of linguistic support is the US Army Reserve (USAR) and the Army National Guard (ARNG) units for AC units and vice versa. A few personnel with languages not indigenous to the unit should be included so interpreters can be trained when used.

G-2

If possible, at least one insertion of mass numbers of EPWs and civilian internees should occur. The number of personnel should be at least double the number of available interrogators. One way of simulating this is to—

- Insert a large quantity of individuals.
- Allow a short time for MP and interrogator personnel to work with this.
- Remove a portion of the personnel.
- Immediately reinsert them as new EPWs and civilian internees. The knowledgeability and cooperativeness of the sources should be mixed; for example, some may be of CI interest, some may have no information, and a few may refuse to break.

DOCUMENTS

Documents present another time consuming and difficult consideration for interrogation operation exercises. Documents should be in foreign languages; numerous documents should be relevant to scenario documents which are developed to interact with the EPWs and civilian internees and as stand-alone intelligence sources.

The number of documents used during an exercise should be excessive; large quantities of documents should be input into the scenario at the same time EPWs are being inputted. This allows simulation of EPWs and civilian internees, and documents arriving on the same sources of transportation.

MULTIPLE EXERCISE LOCATIONS

In order to exercise evacuation of EPWs and civilian internees, support to lower echelons' multiple exercise locations is necessary. These locations do not need to be drastically separated, but should not be within sight of each other.

For example, location to simulate a medical aid station should also be included along with personnel to simulate medical personnel. This allows personnel to practice interrogating EPWs and civilian internees in the medical evacuation system. Having multiple locations serves several purposes.

- Both interrogation and MP units have functions that must be performed at a lower echelon.
- Interrogators must be able to support the lower echelons with interrogations. This means teams must be able to deploy and act without normal unit leadership.
- Coordination must be affected with the supported lower echelon unit.
- Reports must be transmitted to the supported unit and accompany EPWs being evacuated.
- MP must receipt and receive EPW and civilian internees from lower echelons and guard them during the evacuation process from lower echelon to assigned echelon.

There is also a need to practice having multiple EPW and civilian internee facilities at the assigned echelon. When these are established, MP and interrogation assets must be divided in order to operate the additional facilities.

An additional aspect of using additional locations is training of interrogation and MP units to function with reduced staffing necessitated by performing multiple missions simultaneously.

OTHER SUPPORT

For corps interrogation platoon exercises, a food services section of the HHS company should be deployed in support of the exercise. This allows the food service section to practice operating two separate mess facilities required by doctrine.

FM 34-52
28 SEPTEMBER 1992

By Order of the Secretary of the Army:

GORDON R. SULLIVAN
General, United States Army
Chief of Staff

OFFICIAL:

MILTON H. HAMILTON
Administrative Assistant to the Secretary of the Army
02404

DISTRIBUTION:

Active Army, USAR, and ARNG: To be distributed in accordance with DA Form 12-11E, requirements for FM 34-52, Intelligence Interrogation (Qty rqr block no. 1130).

Senator LEVIN. All right. Now, in an annex in the Taguba Report it says the following as being a permissible technique for use in the Iraqi theater: “The interrogation officer in charge will submit memoranda for the record requesting harsh approaches for the commanding general’s approval prior to employment—sleep management, sensory deprivation, isolation longer than 30 days, and dogs.”

Secretary Cambone, were you personally aware that permissible interrogation techniques in the Iraqi theater included sleep management, sensory deprivation, isolation longer than 30 days, and dogs?

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir. That list, both in terms of its detail and its exceptions, was approved at the command level in the theater.

Senator LEVIN. That was a command-level approval?

Secretary CAMBONE. As far as I understand it, yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. Mr. Secretary, you said that you had decided, right at the beginning, that the Geneva Conventions would apply to our activities in Iraq.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. Yet Secretary Rumsfeld repeatedly has made a distinction between whether or not those Geneva Conventions rules must be applied, whether people—prisoners will be treated, “pursuant to those rules” or “consistent with those rules.” He said—and this is just a few days ago—that the Geneva Conventions did not apply precisely.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. You, this morning, said, again, the Geneva Conventions apply to our activities in Iraq.

Secretary CAMBONE. In Iraq.

Senator LEVIN. But not precisely?

Secretary CAMBONE. No. Sir, I think what—let me tell you what the facts are. The Geneva Conventions apply in Iraq.

Senator LEVIN. Precisely?

Secretary CAMBONE. Precisely.

Senator LEVIN. Do the—

Secretary CAMBONE. They do not apply in the precise way that the Secretary was talking about in Guantanamo and the—

Senator LEVIN. He was—

Secretary CAMBONE.—unlawful combatants.

Senator LEVIN.—talking about Iraq. Let me cut you right off there. The whole interview here was about Iraq—

Secretary CAMBONE. And I—

Senator LEVIN.—and the conditions at that prison. That’s what this whole entire interview was about. It was on NBC. It was May 5, 2004. It was an interview about Iraq. Guantanamo is no longer the issue here. The Secretary said something he’s said elsewhere, and I’ve heard this with my own ears recently. He said that the Geneva Conventions apply not precisely, that prisoners are treated “consistent with, but not pursuant to.”

Now, he did say the other day and this is a quote: “The Geneva Conventions did not apply precisely.” Are you saying that the SECDEF misspoke on—

Secretary CAMBONE. I can't speak for the SECDEF. I can only tell you what my understanding is, Senator——

Senator LEVIN. You don't know what he meant by that?

Secretary CAMBONE. I can tell you what I understand, and that is that——

Senator LEVIN. No. Do you know what he meant——

Secretary CAMBONE.—the Geneva Conventions apply.

Senator LEVIN.—by that?

Secretary CAMBONE. Sir, I can't speak for the SECDEF on that issue. I'll——

Senator LEVIN. You've not talked to——

Secretary CAMBONE.—take the—I will take the question for the record, and I will ask him. I can't——

Senator LEVIN.—the May 5 interview.

UNDER SECRETARY OF DEFENSE
5000 DEFENSE PENTAGON
WASHINGTON, DC 20301-5000

JUN 22 2004

Honorable John Warner
Chairman, Senate Armed Services Committee
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

In a hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee on May 11, 2004, Senator Levin asked me what the Secretary of Defense meant when he said, in an interview dated May 5, 2004 "The Geneva Conventions did not apply precisely" in Iraq.

I have discussed this with the Secretary. He confirmed that the Geneva Conventions have always applied to the war in Iraq. He told me that if he said that the Conventions did not apply precisely he could have been talking only about their application with respect to al Qaeda and Taliban fighters and their detention in Afghanistan or Guantanamo.

I have reviewed the transcript of the interview to which Senator Levin referred in his question. The context of the Secretary's statement was a reply to a question incorporating a quotation from a Washington Post editorial of that morning:

Q: Let me read you something from the Washington Post in their editorial this morning. It says, quote, "A pattern of arrogant disregard for the protections of the Geneva Conventions or any other legal procedure has been set from the top by Mr. Rumsfeld and senior US commanders." What's your response to that?

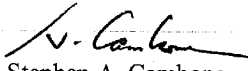

The antecedent in the Post editorial for the alleged "pattern" is not Abu Ghraib but the conduct of U.S. military or intelligence forces "since the beginning of the war on terrorism." Thus, the context of the question was not Iraq, but rather the war on terrorism and the treatment of al Qaeda and the Taliban.

With that context in mind, the Secretary replied as follows:

A: Well, it's not accurate. The fact of the matter is that from the very outset, the decision was made by the government of the United States that the people detained would not be treated in a manner that was – (correction.) The decision was made that the Geneva Conventions did not apply precisely but that every individual would be treated as though the Geneva Conventions did apply. And as a result, the provisions of the Geneva Conventions were the basic rules under which all people were detained. So it would not be accurate to say what that editorial said.

That the interviewer understood Guantanamo and Afghanistan to be the context of the Secretary's answer is made clear by the very next question in which the Secretary is asked about statements he made in February 2002 concerning the Geneva Conventions, al Qaeda and the Taliban. As you know, the President directed in February 2002 that U.S. Armed Forces shall treat al Qaeda and Taliban detainees humanely and, to the extent appropriate and consistent with military necessity, in a manner consistent with the principles of the Geneva Conventions.

Sincerely,

Stephen A. Cambone

cc: Senator Levin
Ranking Minority Member

Senator LEVIN. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator Levin.

I think, at this juncture, Secretary Cambone said the question of the utilization of dogs and other things were at the command level. Can you speak to that response to that important question?

General SMITH. Sir, I can. The rule on dogs, that I'm aware of, is that they can patrol in the areas, but they have to be muzzled at all times.

Chairman WARNER. Have you examined the exact language that your command promulgated down to these prisons?

General SMITH. Sir, I have the Army techniques that are authorized, which is what they live by.

Chairman WARNER. All right. We have to clarify this. Secretary Cambone said it came from your command, so I ask you to focus on it and provide it for the committee.

[The information referred to follows:]

[Deleted.]

Senator McCain?

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you.

Senator MCCAIN. General Taguba, I want to thank you for your excellent report, and I think it's been very helpful to this committee, as well as to the American people.

General Miller—first of all, we know that the detainees at Guantanamo Bay are not subject to the Geneva Conventions because they're al Qaeda—at least those that are al Qaeda—and, therefore, being terrorists, they are not subject to the Geneva Conventions for the treatment of prisoners of war. I don't disagree with that assessment, and I don't think you do, either. Do you?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir, no.

Senator MCCAIN. Yet General Miller was quoted in your report, when he arrived in Iraq—I believe Secretary Cambone was one of those who urged his transfer there—that he wanted to “Gitmo-ize” the treatment of prisoners in—throughout Iraq, including Abu Ghraib prison. What do you make of that statement?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I'd defer that to General Miller, sir. But, for the record, I've never been to Guantanamo. I'm only knowledgeable of my experience and my observations at Abu Ghraib, which is a detention operation, along with the other detention operations under the command and control of the 800 MP Brigade, as under combat conditions, separate and distinct of what I consider to be a sterile environment in Cuba.

Senator MCCAIN. But you found, clearly in your report, violations of the rules for the treatment—Geneva Conventions for the treatment of prisoners of war, right?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. Including moving prisoners around to avoid ICRC inspections?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir. That was conveyed to us by those that we interviewed, and comments that we assessed in the written statements.

Senator MCCAIN. In your report, General Karpinski says that General Sanchez said that in the case of problems in the prison—there was uprising and riot and escape—an American, I believe, was killed—that they should use lethal means immediately, and not non-lethal means to start with. Isn't that according to your report?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir. They changed their rules of engagement (ROE), I believe, four times, to use lethal and then to—non-lethal to lethal force based on the levels of the events. I believe the last time they changed the ROE, sir, was in November of last year. That's contained in one of the annexes that we have.

Senator MCCAIN. In your judgment, were these abuses a result of an overall military or intelligence policy to “soften up” detainees for interrogation?

General TAGUBA. Sir, we did not gain any evidence where it was an overall MI policy of the sort. I think it was a matter of soldiers, with their interaction with MI personnel, who they perceived or thought to be competent authority that were giving them—or influencing their actions to set the conditions for successful interrogations operations.

Senator MCCAIN. According to your report, these abuses were very widespread, correct?

General TAGUBA. Sir, the manner by which we conducted our investigation and collected evidence was that they were between mid-to late-October, and as late as December, perhaps early January.

Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Cambone, the media report that complaints were made by Ambassador Bremer and Secretary Powell concerning the treatment of prisoners in Iraq, do you know anything about that?

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir, I am not aware of those complaints.

Senator MCCAIN. In your opinion—well, maybe I'd better ask General Taguba—how far up the chain of command did awareness of these ongoing abuses—let me ask this.

When someone says that they're going to "Gitmo-ize" a prison, wouldn't a subordinate think, "We're going to change the rules"?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I'd rather not speculate on that. I don't exactly know what General Miller meant by "Gitmo-izing" Abu Ghraib because it's a different situation there.

Senator MCCAIN. I think it's pretty obvious, but I thank you for your testimony and your report.

Tell me, again, about your view of General Karpinski's role in this. She says that she was excluded from certain parts of the prison and certain areas where some of these abuses took place. Do you have anything on that?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I disagree with that.

Senator MCCAIN. You agree or disagree?

General TAGUBA. I disagree with the fact that she was excluded from certain areas of the prison. I believe, in my interview of her, she was still in charge of detention operations in-theater, and it's hard for me to believe that she would be excluded from any of those facilities, or even portions of those facilities.

Senator MCCAIN. What evidence did you find that these individuals received any training in the Geneva Conventions for the treatment of prisoners of war?

General TAGUBA. Sir, the evidence that we gathered were training records from the training that they received at the mobilization station and home station, their mission essential-tasks list that they developed to prepare them for deployment, that sort of thing. Several of these soldiers intimated to us—at least conveyed to us—that they were never trained on internment or resettlement operations. But as far as I was concerned, sir, they were—their leaders should have, could have, provided the necessary resources to which they are expected to do so in training their soldiers.

Senator MCCAIN. But they did not receive it.

General TAGUBA. No, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. Mr. Cambone states that they did, and the SECDEF states they did. I thank you, General.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Secretary CAMBONE. Mr. Chairman, could I just be a little more clear with Senator McCain?

Chairman WARNER. Yes, indeed.

Secretary CAMBONE. You asked if I was aware of concerns expressed by Ambassador Bremer and the Secretary of State, and I assumed you meant specifically on these cases.

Senator MCCAIN. No, I—

Secretary CAMBONE. I mean, that's what I intended to answer.

Senator MCCAIN.—on the treatment of prisoners of war.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, let me give you a broader answer, which is—

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you.

Secretary CAMBONE.—Ambassador Bremer had been concerned about the number of people who were in custody, and was anxious to see them move through the system and released as rapidly as possible, as was Secretary Powell.

Senator MCCAIN. But my question was—

Secretary CAMBONE.—on the broad question—

Senator MCCAIN.—but my question was—and I'm sorry to interrupt; my time's expired—

Secretary CAMBONE. Forgive me.

Senator MCCAIN.—were you aware of the complaints about treatment of prisoners of war made by Ambassador Bremer?

Secretary CAMBONE. Per se, in that sense, no. That he was worried about prisoners of war, that I knew.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General SMITH. Sir, could I also add that I have all the standard operating procedures (SOP) here for Gitmo. In every case, it is very specifically and clearly written that the humane treatment of prisoners is first and foremost, and inhumane treatment of detainees is never justified. It is all in the spirit of the Geneva Conventions.

Senator MCCAIN. I thank you. But clearly there's a difference between adherence to the Geneva Conventions for treatment of prisoners of war—

General SMITH. Yes, sir, but we were operating under the Geneva Conventions in Iraq. We clearly understood that.

Senator MCCAIN. I thank you.

Thank you, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Now, those applied to the prison in Iraq.

General SMITH. Sir, when he went over there, and he talked—

Chairman WARNER. When who went?

General SMITH. When General Miller went over there, and he spoke and addressed this with each of the commanders, he gave them the SOP that they were using at Gitmo to use as an example on how they should generate their own operating procedures.

Chairman WARNER. That included the phraseology to—

General SMITH. Exactly, sir. I just read it to you.

Sir, may I also just mention, on your question on promulgation of policy, the policy regarding dogs was established and put out by CJTF-7 on October 12, 2003, and it specifically says that interrogators must ensure the safety of security internees, and approaches must in no way endanger them. Interrogators will ensure that security internees are allowed adequate sleep, that diets—et cetera, et cetera—and then it says, "Should military working dogs be present during interrogations, they will be muzzled and under control of a handler at all times to ensure safety."

So General Sanchez, through those things, very specifically addressed what was allowed in the interrogation room and what was not allowed and those things that required his approval, such as segregation from the population in excess of 30 days.

Chairman WARNER. Can you throw any light, then, on where this thing broke down, given that he started in the proper way?

General SMITH. Sir, given the guidance that was put out there, I can't. I have to agree with General Taguba's assessment of it, in that these rules and regulations were out there, and, somewhere in the leadership chain execution and implementation of these policies broke down.

Chairman WARNER. Is CENTCOM trying to find out where that happened?

General SMITH. Absolutely, sir.

Chairman WARNER. All right. Thank you.

Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Taguba, I want to join others in commending you and thank you for the service to this country.

Secretary Cambone, I hope when you have a chance to read through the 2004 report, which, according to the ICRC, was given to Paul Bremer, General Sanchez, and the U.S. Permanent Mission in Geneva, according to Christopher Girard, who's from the ICRC, it talks about the ICRC collected allegations of ill treatment following the capture that took place in Baghdad, Basra, Ramadi, and Tikrit.

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. It isn't only focused on this one prison camp, but lists the others, as well. I think we have to be aware of that.

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. Now, let me just go quickly to this report. Newsweek Magazine reports that, since September 11, Secretary Rumsfeld has insisted on personally signing off on the harsher methods used to squeeze suspected terrorists held at U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. He's approved such tactics as the use of stress positions, stripping of detainees naked, prolonged sleep deprivation. Have you advised Secretary Rumsfeld on these issues? What other officials of the DOD have participated in these decisions?

Secretary CAMBONE. Sir, I can answer—

Senator KENNEDY. Has the General Counsel been involved in—

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY.—giving advice?

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. He's been involved?

Secretary CAMBONE. If I may, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. Yes.

Secretary CAMBONE. With the permission of the chair and yourself, the SECDEF has a deep regard for the well-being of those being held in Guantanamo and their well-being and their care. Therefore, any procedure, which is of the type that General Smith suggested, which are in the approved rules, but are harsh, he has withheld to his approval first.

Second, when the issue of how these prisoners, detainees, in Guantanamo were to be treated—there was convened, under the GC, the General Counsel of the Department, a working group whose objective it was to work through all of these issues. So that matrix that has been reported is the product of that effort.

Senator KENNEDY. All right. Let me—because my time is short—has the SECDEF—so he has, evidently, approved these kinds of things.

Secretary CAMBONE. I don't know in detail, sir, but those that he—there is a list that he has approved.

Senator KENNEDY. He has approved. What about on Iraq? Has he approved signing off on harsher methods of interrogation in Iraq?

Secretary CAMBONE. Again, sir, no. That, as General Smith said, is CJTF-7 promulgation.

Senator KENNEDY. If not, who—has someone had that authority in Iraq?

Secretary CAMBONE. If there is anything that exceeds General Sanchez's direction, he is, as I understand it, to sign off on that exception.

Senator KENNEDY. So he has the authority, General Sanchez. Do you know whether he's used that or not?

Secretary CAMBONE. General Smith?

General SMITH. Sir, he—

Senator KENNEDY. Just quickly.

General SMITH. Yes, sir. Just in that policy that I told you, where separation of greater than 30 days—he would be the approval authority. To the best of my knowledge, he has not used anything beyond that.

Senator KENNEDY. Let me ask you, Secretary Cambone, about "rendering." There are a number of reports about detainees in U.S. custody, U.S. intelligence officials being transferred for interrogations to governments that routinely torture prisoners. In December 2002, The Washington Post stated, "Detainees that refuse to cooperate with Americans have been rendered to foreign intelligence services"—Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Morocco, Syria, and other countries. Can you assure the committee that the administration is fully complying with all of the legal requirements, and that all reports of U.S. officials engaging in the practice of rendering are false?

Secretary CAMBONE. Sir, to the best of my knowledge, that is a true statement.

Senator KENNEDY. We are not—we have not—your statement, sworn statement, now—to your knowledge, the United States has not been involved in any rendering, any turning over of any personnel to any other country.

Secretary CAMBONE. No. No, you said that they were turned over for torture and misbehavior—mistreatment. We have returned, for example, individuals to the United Kingdom. There may be three or four of them that have been returned from Gitmo.

Senator KENNEDY. Have you turned over, to your knowledge, any suspects to Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Morocco, or Syria to gather information?

Secretary CAMBONE. From those people in DOD custody, not that I am aware of, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, you would know—

Secretary CAMBONE. I am not aware of any that have been transferred for that purpose. If I—

Senator KENNEDY. Well, for—

Secretary CAMBONE.—if there are—

Senator KENNEDY.—for any other purpose?

Secretary CAMBONE. If there are, I will come back to you and tell you. As best I know, there are not any persons under our custody that have been transferred.

Senator KENNEDY. Do the interrogators for MI, the CIA, and also the contract intelligence—do they all have identical rules and regulations, in terms of interrogating the detainees or prisoners of war or combatants, or is there any distinction among the three?

Secretary CAMBONE. Within Iraq, the rules of the Geneva Conventions apply. So, therefore, the rules—

Senator KENNEDY. I was not—that isn't my question. That's not my question.

Secretary CAMBONE. Sir—

Senator KENNEDY. My question is, do they have different kinds of rules of questioning? Do each of those services have rules? If they do have rules, how are they different?

Secretary CAMBONE. I can speak for the DOD contractor and military personnel, and those rules are the same. The people we hire—

Senator KENNEDY. Identical.

Secretary CAMBONE.—the people we hire, in most cases, are required to have had that training in the military in order to become interrogators.

Senator KENNEDY. They are bound by the same set—

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. So your testimony is, the private contractors, MI, and the military interrogators all operate at the same—and the CIA—all operate with the same rules of interrogation.

Secretary CAMBONE. I can only speak for the last, the military, inside of Iraq, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. You're going to provide those rules to us?

Secretary CAMBONE. I can do that.

[The information referred to follows:]

[Deleted.]

Senator KENNEDY. Let me just ask you, finally, in the opinion of General Taguba, the setting of conditions for favorable interrogation is not authorized or consistent with Army regulations. You seem to reach a different conclusion in your testimony today.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. Do you agree you and General Taguba differ on that issue?

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir. We do, and in this sense—

Senator KENNEDY. I think it's important that we understand, when we're talking about the abuses that are taking place with the MP, and you have two entirely different kinds of viewpoints on this issue—how in the world are the MP that are supposed to implement going to be able to get it straight, particularly when you have General Miller there that is following what you believe, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. How are we—how do you expect the MPs to get it straight if we have a difference between the two of you?

Secretary CAMBONE. Let me try and explain it. As far as I understand it, there is doctrine relative to the MP which gives them the responsibility for conveying to the interrogators the attitudes of those who are going to be interrogated—their disposition, who they've been talking to, and so forth—and as the interrogators, in turn, under doctrine, Army doctrine, ask the MP those kinds of questions. So there is designed in the system a collaborative approach with respect to gaining that information.

With respect to the issue of “Gitmo-izing,” if I may return to that, Senator Kennedy, let's go back to the conditions that were in Abu Ghraib. They were disorderly, as the General has pointed out. The notion, it seems to me, that General Miller had was that order needed to be established in the processes and procedures.

Senator KENNEDY. Just to finish, because my time is up—General Taguba, why do you believe that there should be a separation between the MP and MI officers?

General TAGUBA. Sir, there's a baseline that we use as a reference, which is Army Regulation 190–8, which is a multi-service regulation, establishing the policy of an executive agency for detention operations. In there it enumerates, in paragraph 1–5, the general policy and the treatment of not just EPWs, but civilian internees, retained personnel, and other detainees. That's the baseline that we use. We also use the MP's doctrine on detention operations, which is Field Manual 3–19.40. We further refer to the interrogations operations doctrine used by the MI, which is Field Manual 34–52.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

First of all, I regret I wasn't here on Friday. I was unable to be here. But maybe it's better that I wasn't, because as I watch this outrage, this outrage everyone seems to have about the treatment of these prisoners, I was, I have to say—and I'm probably not the only one up at this table that is more outraged by the outrage than we are by the treatment. The idea that these prisoners—they're not there for traffic violations. If they're in cell block 1A or 1B, these prisoners, they're murderers, they're terrorists, they're insurgents. Many of them probably have American blood on their hands. Here we're so concerned about the treatment of those individuals.

I hasten to say, yes, there are seven bad guys and gals that didn't do what they should have done. They were misguided and, I think, maybe even perverted. The things that they did have to be punished. They're being punished. They're being tried right now, and that's all taking place.

But I'm also outraged by the press and the politicians and the political agendas that are being served by this. I say “political agendas” because that's actually what is happening. I would share with my colleagues a solicitation that was made. I'm going to read the first two sentences. “Over the past week, we've all been shocked by the pictures from Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, but we have also been appalled at the slow and inept response by President Bush, which has further undermined America's credibility.” It goes on to demand that George Bush fire Donald Rumsfeld, and then it goes on to a timeline, a chronology. At the very last—and they say, “a solicitation for contributions.” I don’t recall this ever having happened before in history.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this solicitation be made a part of the record at this point.

Chairman WARNER. Without objection.

[The information referred to follows:]

Dear Friend,

Over the past week we have all been shocked by the pictures from the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. But we have also been appalled at the slow and inept response by President Bush, which has further undermined America's credibility in the world and created new dangers for Americans in Iraq. George Bush must fire Donald Rumsfeld. But that is only a first step towards taking responsibility for his administration's failures in Iraq.

Donald Rumsfeld must resign.

SIGN OUR PETITION

John Kerry has called on Donald Rumsfeld to resign, and today we're asking you to support him by adding your name to the call for Rumsfeld to resign here:

<http://www.johnkerry.com/petition/rumsfeld.php>

Help us show that America supports John Kerry in calling for Rumsfeld to resign. If 50,000 people sign this petition, that is a strong statement that will be recognized in the media – and by the Bush-Cheney campaign. Help us get to 50,000 signers by today by forwarding this email to your friends and family.

The events of the last week are a stark reminder of the stakes in this Presidential election. John Kerry's remarks yesterday painted a striking contrast to President Bush's evasion of responsibility,

"As president, I will not be the last to know what is going on in my command," Kerry said. "I will demand accountability for those who serve and I will take responsibility for their actions. And I will do everything that I can in my power to repair the damage that this has caused to America, to our standing in the world, and to the ideals for which we stand... Today, I have a message for the men and women of our armed forces. As commander in chief, I will honor your commitment and I will take responsibility for the bad as well as the good."

Show George Bush and show the media that you support John Kerry's stand: Donald Rumsfeld MUST resign immediately. To sign please click here:

<http://www.johnkerry.com/petition/rumsfeld.php>

Obviously this is one of the most important petitions we will send out in the course of this campaign. Please forward this petition to EVERYONE in your address book and get the word out.

Thank you,

Mary Beth Cahill

TIMELINE: What was known, and when.

Fall 2003 Bremer repeatedly raises issue of prison conditions with Rumsfeld and the President's inner circle according to LA Times: "Bremer repeatedly raised the issue of prison conditions as early as last fall – both in one-on-one meetings with Rumsfeld and other administration leaders, and in group meetings with the president's inner circle on national security. Officials described Bremer as 'kicking and screaming' about the need to release thousands of uncharged prisoners and improve conditions for those who remained." (Washington Post, Graham, 5/7/04)

November 5, 2003 Maj. Gen. Donald J. Ryder files report concluding that there were potential human rights, training, and manpower issues – system wide – that needed immediate attention. Discussed serious concerns about tension between missions of the military police

January 2004 Rumsfeld learns of photographs showing prisoner abuse according to the Washington Post: "...Rumsfeld has known of the photographs since January, when they came to the attention of U.S. commanders in Iraq, he had not seen them, and he was not aware that CBS was about to air them until just hours before they were broadcast last week." (Washington Post, Graham, 5/7/04)

Mid-January, 2004 Bush told about the photo of abuse according to the Washington Post: "Marine Gen. Peter Pace...said Wednesday on CBS's "Early Show" that beginning in mid-January, everyone "up the chain of command . . . was kept apprised orally of the ongoing investigation." Asked if Bush "was well aware of the situation," Pace replied: "Yes."" (Washington Post, Allen, 5/7/04)

- Military discloses Army has conducted 30 criminal investigations into misconduct by American captors in Iraq and Afghanistan, including 10 cases of suspicious death, 10 cases of abuse, and two deaths of Iraqis already determined to have been criminal homicides. (NY Times, Neilan, 5/5/04)
- General George Casey, Army's Vice-Chief of Staff, refers to a "complete breakdown in discipline." (NY Times, Reuters wire, 5/5/04)

Senator INHOFE. Mr. Chairman, I also have to say, when we talk about the treatment of these prisoners, that I would guess that these prisoners wake up every morning thanking Allah that Saddam Hussein is not in charge of these prisons. When he was in charge, they would take electric drills and drill holes through hands. They would cut their tongues out. They would cut their ears off. We've seen accounts of lowering their bodies into vats of acid. All these things were taking place. This was the type of treatment that they had.

I would want everyone to get this and read it. This is a documentary of the Iraqi Special Report. It talks about the unspeakable acts of mass murder, unspeakable acts of torture, unspeakable acts of mutilation, the murdering of kids—lining up 312 little kids, under 12 years old, and executing them—and then, of course, what they do to Americans, too.

There's one story in here that was in the—I think it was The New York Times—yes, on June 2. I suggest everyone take that—get that and read it. It's about one of the prisoners who did escape as they were marched out there, blindfolded, and put before mass graves, and they mowed them down, and they buried them. This man was buried alive, and he clawed his way out and was able to tell his story.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, at this point in the record, that this account of the brutality of Saddam Hussein be entered into the record, made a part of the record.

Chairman WARNER. Without objection, so ordered.

Tales of Saddam's Brutality

The Iraqi people talk about mass graves and Saddam's crimes against humanity

The cruelty of Saddam's regime is evident in its brutality toward Iraqi citizens. Mass grave sites across Iraq provide further evidence of Saddam's atrocities. Below, the Iraqi people share their stories of brutality, torture, fear, and death.

"The prison was a terrible, miserable place. I saw my relatives being tortured. One time, they buried my uncle in the sand up to his neck and left him in the heat. It was awful to watch. But the worst day was when they came for my father. Even then, I knew I would never see him again. I could feel it."

"When Saddam Hussein's government went on an anti-inflation tear in 1992, it rounded up, tried and executed 42 food merchants in one day, including Tabra's father, the wealthy patriarch of a well-known trading family.

"Whenever there was a merchant, a famous name in any sector, the old regime tried to stop them," Omar Tabra [Iraqi food merchant] said. "They did it by killing."

— Bill Glauber, Chicago Tribune, September 27, 2003

"Most afternoons, among the market stalls leading to the old city of Najaf young men set up TV sets in the street showing grotesque scenes of cruelty. Handcuffed prisoners are executed with sticks of dynamite shoved into their pockets. Screaming men plead for their lives as they are beaten by Saddam Hussein's secret police. Crimson fragments of bodies lie in the street, moments after a huge explosion, to the soundtrack of an Arab lament. The crowds gather round. People mutter and shake their heads. Then they queue to pay 1,000 Iraqi dinars (about 33p) [50 cents] for laser discs containing footage of the appalling scenes. These are the atrocity discs of Iraq, a booming mini-industry in a country still stricken by the consequences of the war. They are produced in home factories, with the simplest computer equipment."

— The London Times, September 20, 2003

"The day after the liberation, my aunt put out a black banner—an Arab mourning ritual—with the names of all her relatives who had been murdered by the regime on it. And she looked down her street, and there were black banners on almost every house. On some houses it looks like a long shopping list. She said to her neighbour, "You too?" Under Saddam it was a crime to mourn people killed by the regime—it made you seem suspicious too. Everyone was suffering terribly, but they were suffering alone. They just didn't know that everyone else was hating it too."

"The system of the regime started in primary school,' said Mr. Samarra'i, who defected on a trip to Switzerland in 1983 and returned here after the war. 'It was exactly like the Nazis in the 30's.'...

"Uday played hell with sports,' said Immanuel Baba Dano, a revered figure in Iraq who was coach of the national soccer team for most of the last three decades....

"Some athletes were humiliated, he said. Others were smeared with feces and jailed. Some were placed in a sarcophagus with nails pointed inward so that they would be punctured and suffocated, he said. At least a few were set in front of wild dogs to be torn to pieces. How many were executed is still not clear.

They stream to a clinic attached to his house, a sad collection of former political prisoners, relatives of the executed, and maimed men who cannot work because they lost an arm, an ear, or a foot to the torturer's knife. 'All the time in prison, I think, "What can I do to help these people?"' he said. ... 'For the first five years, he put me in a cell by myself, 2 meters by 2 1/2 meters, where I didn't know if it was day or night. I was so dirty with lice. There were cockroaches in my mouth at night. And they came to beat you in the morning and at night for nothing, nothing.' Once, he continued, the guards beat him in front of 300 inmates until they broke his legs. 'I never said, "Mercy," I just said, "Iraq.'"

Iraqis search for their relatives and friends among victims found in a mass grave in Musayib, 75 KM SW of Baghdad. "The nightmares persist, even years later, as Ehab Al Deen cannot shake the memories of torment from his summer camp with 'Saddam's Lion Cubs.'

"Like thousands of Iraqi teens, Al Deen vividly recalls long marches in oppressive heat, being slapped by military trainers for not following orders and spending nights in fields listening to the howls of wolves.

"The camps culminated each August with a ceremony in which the youths were videotaped in the Iraqi fighter tradition of ripping a dog's flesh with their teeth.

"The dogs were already dead,' said Al Deen, 18, who attended the camp in 1998 and still recalls the bitter taste. 'It was horrible.' ...

"They were mostly disenfranchised children from poor neighborhoods or sons of Baath Party members recruited by teachers during the school year. ...

"But once they arrived at the two military camps on the outskirts of Baghdad, the youths found hard work and mostly empty promises. ...

"I was so scared,' said Al Deen, who was 13 when he went to the camp in 1998. 'We cried for hours.'"

"The bodyguard says he was disgusted by Uday's activities-he points to a floor-to-ceiling cage in the corner of the club's kitchen where he says monkeys were kept for Uday because he liked to have the animals watch him when he was deflowering virgins. ... It was his to make the singers who entertained Uday at the Boat Club gulp down a liter and a half of a 'cocktail,' a combination of 90-proof alcohol often with some drugs thrown in. ...

"I would line up all the entertainment against that wall," the bodyguard said, pointing to the side of the garage. "And I would take a stick. ... And I would say, "Drink, drink, you have 10 minutes." If any of them didn't drink, I hit them with a stick.' ... Then, if the singers still refused, they were given a 'street beating,' meaning that their faces were untouched but they were pummeled until they could hardly stand up. ...

"I always felt like I was the one who took the beatings because each shout of pain from the beaten person, I used to pray to God and ask God to punish me for what I was doing. But the person who took the beating did not know that if I didn't carry out the orders, I would take the same beating that he was getting."

"Jailers often treated allegedly lagging players in ways certain to hurt, not improve, the athletes' performances on the field. After shaving their heads to humiliate them, athletes were hung upside down and the soles of their feet whipped. They were buried in hot sand up to their necks. Their fingers or ears were amputated. Electric shocks were applied to their skin. And, in the case of soccer players, they were forced to kick concrete balls."

At only 22, Tareq, a defender, has been to prison five times. After a while, he recognized a pattern to the punishment.

"The first stage of the torture is the reception, when you are given a choice of which plastic cable you will be beaten with.

Then you are beaten 15 to 20 times. The reception is over. In the next stage, you are thrown into knee-deep sewer water and told to swim," he says. Tareq was dragged bare-chested across hot asphalt. Made to run barefoot over broken glass and gravel. When it was time to leave, he says, "The farewell party is a beating."

Iraqi workers dig for the remains of Iraqis from a mass grave in Musayib, 75 KM SW of Baghdad. The victims are thought to be from among some 2,000 persons reported missing after the 1991 uprising against the Iraqi government.

Tareq recalls how his team was invited to pose for pictures with Uday. At 6-5, Tareq towered over Uday. "The next day, I was taken and flogged 20 times" for being taller, says Tareq, who plans to leave Iraq soon to play professionally in Germany or Scandinavia.

"Ahmad was Uday's chief executioner. Last week, as Iraqis celebrated the death of his former boss and his equally savage younger brother Qusay, he nervously revealed a hideous story. His instructions that day in 1999 were to arrest the two 19-year-olds on the campus of Baghdad's Academy of Fine Arts and deliver them at Radwaniyah. On arrival at the sprawling compound, he was directed to a farm where he found a large cage. Inside, two lions waited. They belonged to Uday. Guards took the two young men from the car and opened the cage door. One of the victims collapsed in terror as they were dragged, screaming and shouting, to meet their fate. Ahmad watched as the students frantically looked for a way of escape. There was none. The lions pounced. 'I saw the head of the first student literally come off his body with the first bite and then had to stand and watch the animals devour the two young men. By the time they were finished there was little left but for the bones and bits and pieces of unwanted flesh,' he recalled last week."

-- Sunday Times, London, July 27, 2003

One of the condemned women was pregnant. This presented a problem, said Ahmad, because under religious law a pregnant woman should at least be allowed to finish her term and deliver the baby before being executed. 'She was several months' pregnant,' he said. 'The doctor had verified it, she had said so and we could see her swollen stomach. She was taken in and out three times - everyone was unsure what to do with her.' Telephone calls were made to Uday by his representative. As they waited, the woman sobbed and begged for mercy for her unborn child. On the third telephone call the order was given to go ahead with her execution. 'At that the woman was beheaded - and knowing she was pregnant, I felt sick in the stomach and wished for Allah to open up the ground and swallow everyone there including myself,' said Ahmad.

"They put me in a cell just 1m by 1.5m, painted completely red with no windows and lots of tiny stones on the floor and told me to count them. It did not matter what number you said it would be wrong. If I said 2000, they would say no, it's 2001 and beat me 10 times. Then they put me inside a circle and told me to run round and round for nine hours. After that they threw me on the hot pavement and a fat guard sat on my chest. Then they pulled me along by my ankles so that my back was streaming with blood.

"Another time they drew a bicycle on the wall and told me to ride it. They threw me in foul dirty water and said you must swim, then they kept pushing me under with a stick forcing me to drink.

"Once they told us we had to catch 10 flies during the night and 10 mosquitoes during the day or you would be tortured more. This was impossible so you had to catch the mosquitoes at night and hold them till daytime and vice versa with the flies. Then they would ask which is male and which is female. Whatever you said it would be vice versa."

Iraqi exiles agreed that Uday Hussein, the eldest of five children, personified the government's random brutality. Human rights groups and Iraqi exiles accused him of routinely kidnapping women off the streets, raping and sometimes torturing them, and personally supervising the torture and humiliation of hundreds of prisoners. Such conduct earned him the title "Abu Sarhan," the Arabic term for "father of the wolf."

The witness said that on at least one occasion, Qusai supervised shredding-machine murders."

"In the last room, where she was held for several hours, the door was locked. At sunset two men entered. She recalled they said they had to take routine security precautions in advance of a meeting with Uday Hussein. They slipped a black hood over her head and tied her hands behind her back. The anxiety, which had mounted through the day, flared into terror. She was taken down to a lower level in an elevator and then along a passageway that seemed narrow because of the way the two men bumped against her. She was pushed into a room and tied, spread-eagle, to a bed.

"All of this period, I didn't resist,' she said. 'But on the bed, I knew. I said, 'I am like your sister; please don't do this.' I started to beg. They said if our sister married an Indian and started a network against the government, we would kill her. I kept praying, calling for Jesus and the Virgin Mary. I prayed to Muhammad. They damned them all.'

"They raped me twice that first day,' she continued. 'I don't know the persons. Two of them. I couldn't see them. They kept raping for four days as well as I can remember. They took my honor.'

"Over the next seven months, Hanna said, she implicated people she had never heard of in a spy network she knew nothing about. She was routinely beaten and she said the Major, in a grotesque joke, kept three sticks on a wall hanging under the names Jesus, the prophet Muhammad and Imam Ali, whom Shiite Muslims believe is Muhammad's true heir. Whichever holy man a prisoner called out for determined which stick they were beaten with. The Major, she said, also routinely used electric shock and once set a police dog on her in a small room; the scar of the bite mark is still on her arm.

"One of his preferred forms of torture, she said, was to order the women to strip, then tie them to the tree trunk, and smear wet sugar on them so the dogs would terrorize them as they licked it off their bodies. Hanna also identified his superior at the academy."

His tormentors did everything to stop him from sleeping so that he didn't know whether it was night or day. 'Then they take you,' he says. 'They put you flat on a table. Then they tie your legs and hands and they put you under a water tap. Then they let the water tap drip. You cannot move your head and they say you have to confess.' This went on for hour after hour before he passed out. 'One drop,' he says. 'But it's like a bomb.' 'The other one was that they bring in an animal,' he says, searching for the English word. 'Yes, a goat. They put a lot of salt on your feet and they bring in the goat to lick your feet.' The process, he says, induces uncontrollable laughing and crying at first and builds into a loss of control of the nervous system -- eventually a loss of consciousness."

"Her most disturbing memory is of the time she felt nothing but her own pain. After the beatings and electric shocks, Suriya Abdel Khader would find herself once again in the fetid cell, a room so crowded that most prisoners could only stand. The women died upright, then slumped to the floor, but Ms. Abdel Khader remembers registering only a dull flash of annoyance whenever that happened. 'Get this body out of the way,' she would think to herself. 'It's taking up room.' "The soldiers took them out in groups of 100 to 150 people. When his time came, Mr. Shaati was ordered to remove his T-shirt and rip it into strips that were tied over his eyes and around his hands. The prisoners were herded onto a bus, everyone holding on with their teeth to the shirt of the person in front of them. When they arrived at a field - Mr. Shaati is still not sure where - their grave had already been prepared. 'They led us down an incline into a wide long hole,' he said. 'It was quiet. No one fell or even cried. I was positioned very close to the corner, maybe second or third from the wall. Then they started shooting. Somehow I wasn't hit. By then, I guess, they didn't go to the trouble of shooting all of us.' After the grave was covered, Mr. Shaati, alive but choking on dirt, wormed his way out of the ditch. "I was lucky that I became like a dead body,' she said. 'I didn't know what was going on around me. There was no water, no bathroom. The only food was two big pots they brought in, one with dirty rice and one of soup. You had to fight for it. If you were strong and healthy, you'd get food. If you were weak, you'd wait.'

"Abdelhussein had disappeared on his way to work in Baghdad on Jan. 23, 1981. His family never heard a word from the government, but eventually they drew the obvious conclusion: as a Shiite, he must have been arrested in the Islamic Dawa Party roundup."

Some were buried alive when the holes were filled in over them by bulldozer. He felt himself being lifted with the dirt and dropped once again into the hole. "A chef at Baghdad's exclusive Hunting Club recalls a wedding party that Uday crashed in the late 1990s. After Uday left the hall, the bride, a beautiful woman from a prominent family, went missing. 'The bodyguards closed all the doors, didn't let anybody out,' the chef remembers. 'Women were yelling and crying, "What happened to her?"' The groom knew. 'He took a pistol and shot himself,' says the chef, placing his forefinger under his chin.

"Last October another bride, 18, was dragged, resisting, into a guardhouse on one of Uday's properties, according to a maid who worked there. The maid says she saw a guard rip off the woman's white wedding dress and lock her, crying, in a bathroom. After Uday arrived, the maid heard screaming. Later she was called to clean up. The body of the woman was carried out in a military blanket, she said. There were acid burns on her left shoulder and the left side of her face. The maid found bloodstains on Uday's mattress and clumps of black hair and peeled flesh in the bedroom. According to his chief bodyguard, when Uday learned that one of his close comrades, who knew of his many misdeeds, was planning to leave Iraq, he invited him to his 37th-birthday party and had him arrested. An eyewitness at the prison where the man was held says members of the Fedayeen grabbed his tongue with pliers and sliced it off with a scalpel so he could not talk. "Mr. Abu Musab, a member of the Iraqi National Congress, the political movement headed by Ahmad Chalabi, said he had been given the map by a man who, in October 1991, was among the drivers who took the Kuwaiti prisoners to their execution in Baghdad and subsequent burial here, 50 miles west of the capital. Each time, between 100 and 150 blindfolded people, their hands and sometimes feet bound, were led into pits about 10 feet deep. Gunmen then fired into the pit, often for several minutes, Arjawi said. "[J]ust to see the landscape of bones mixed with clothing, skulls strewn in the splay of human detritus and other remains is chilling. At first, it just seems like hundreds of bundles of clothes have been laid out on the dikes and roads that cut through the marshes here.

"Then the traces of human anatomy appear. A femur from a leg, a humerus from an arm, a shard of pelvis, and skull peeking out from a gray blanket that someone assembling remains laid down. The bundles reveal themselves as the former repositories of living human flesh, before the gunfire sent them on their journey into the marsh.

"As clumps of hair blew across the hard, dry land, Jabar Sattar sat rocking and sobbing on a hill of dirt created by the backhoe. He cradled a clear plastic bag containing the remains of his younger brother Faris. Faris was a soldier, he said, and had just returned from Kuwait when private security men arrested him in his front yard, just two miles from the grave site. 'I looked for 12 years,' Sattar cried into the bag of remains. 'Every day I told myself, you're alive and will come back. Now what am I going to say to our father?'"

"In two days, they've found 2,000 bodies--men, women, children, some handicapped. Many skeletons were still blindfolded. The Iraqis and the US military believe there are several thousand more. This is an archaeological site. And it's no accident the bodies were buried here. Under Saddam Hussein, it was illegal for Iraqis to dig here, or even walk on the site. Search teams look for identification inside crumbling wallets, adding each name to a ledger. If there's no ID, they hope a relative might recognize something -- a watch, a scarf."

"The skeletal remains on display Monday showed signs of physical trauma. Some still had faded bandages tied around the eye sockets and black cloth binding the feet. Several skulls had large holes on one side or were crushed in the back. In each open wooden coffin, the bones were carefully wrapped in white cloth, surrounded by scraps of hair, bits of teeth and bones. The visible evidence of their demise drove scores of black-clad women to wailing and men to weep."

"For people streaming past 32 coffins laid out in Basra's al-Jumhuriya Grand Mosque on Monday, grief competed with anger as they searched for relatives who disappeared after a Shiite Muslim uprising in 1999. Peering into a simple plywood coffin, Karima Musa Mohammed carefully looked over the remains inside--a ragged blindfold tied around the skull, feet bound by black cloth, faded gray pants, light gray shirt. 'No, not him. Not my son,' she pronounced, then burst into tears. The mass grave was one of many being unearthed around the country as Iraqis come to grips with the reality of Saddam Hussein's brutal regime."

"The grave was no more than a long trench, with dirt shoveled over the men executed for their role in the uprising here in 1999 after the killing of a prominent Shiite cleric, Muhammad Sadiq al-Sadr, said relatives who viewed the remains today.

"On March 25, 1999, a shepherd in the desert about 45 miles north of Basra saw men being brought by Baath Party trucks to an open clearing, said Ali Hassan, 20. The shepherd said he saw a backhoe dig a long trench and the men, blindfolded, were lined up in front of the ditch. Then they were shot."

"Two years ago, Iraqi wrestler Mitham Ali Hadi was competing in the Arab championships in Syria and defected. When the delegation returned home without him, its members were imprisoned and tortured. The punishment - which included wrestlers, coaches, journalists and referees - was a message to others who might have been considering defections. Even the chairman and the secretary of the wrestling federation were imprisoned, though they weren't in Syria during the tournament. 'At night, we used to hear the voices of our colleagues being tortured. We felt their pain alongside them,' former wrestling federation head Loai Sateh said in a recent interview."

"One of the tools used by Odai to torture athletes is currently on display at al-Hikma Mosque in Baghdad. It is a 2-meter (6-foot) body suit of metal bars that was used to restrain offending athletes under the scorching sun for hours. One athlete who spoke on condition of anonymity said he was placed in the suit for long hours under blistering sun. A hose dripped water into his mouth to prevent him from dying of dehydration. 'Whenever I tried to move my body, I would feel the burn of the metal rods,' said the man, displaying scarred legs and hands."

"At Baghdad's teeming Al-Mutanabi book market, Ali al-Saadi held up a gilded Islamist book and recalled the one he said led to his torture in one of Saddam Hussein's military prisons. 'When I was a literature student in 1982, intelligence officers found a book by Mohammed Sadeq Sadr in my house,' said Saadi of the Shiite ayatollah whose 1999 murder was widely attributed to Saddam's Sunni-majority regime. They accused me of organizing a political group. I spent three years in jail and suffered a lot,' he said, showing scars on his wrists from prison chains and gaps where he said three teeth had been pulled out with pliers. Saadi was just one of many writers and thinkers at the weekly market who celebrated being able to buy and sell books that were illegal under the old regime."

"First they broke his right arm with a pipe. Then they punctured his right eardrum with a skewer. And then they tried to break his right leg with a bat. But when the X-rays that Uday Hussein demanded as proof of their efficiency showed in fact they had not broken Tariq Abdul Whab's leg, his captors took him back to prison where someone smashed his right leg with such ferocity that his toe hit his kneecap. Mr. Whab received all this treatment simply because Uday thought the sports television reporter was being disloyal to him by talking to soccer players he didn't like."

"In May 1991, having served in the Persian Gulf War with the Marines, I volunteered for further duty in Provide Comfort -- a joint military operation designed to assist in the relocation of Kurdish refugees into northern Iraq. Assigned to the 24th Marine Expeditionary Unit, I was flown to the city of Zakho, where the unit was establishing its headquarters in and around an abandoned Iraqi divisional headquarters building....

"As the Marines began digging defensive positions and putting up tents, a grisly discovery was made. Heavy equipment had unearthed myriad body parts; hands, arms, legs, etc., were uncovered in what was determined to have been a mass grave. Most telling among this evidence of inhumanity was an infant's sandal.

"The body parts were reburied immediately after their discovery, but for many days the stench of rotting flesh lingered in the air until all the remains were located and reburied. It was later learned from the Kurds that about 70 of their tribesmen had been taken into this Iraqi divisional HQ and that none had come out alive. The victims were brutally tortured and executed, their remains then thrown into a common grave."

"...Turkish officials were told how Turkomans and Kurds were tortured together by Saddam Hussein's Iraqi police at the notorious security headquarters of Kirkuk. 'I was taken into custody and forced to sit on my knees for six days in a cell one meter by one meter along with a Kurdish prisoner,' a Turkoman man told the group. The man, who asked not to be named, said, 'Even this shows how we and the Kurds suffered the same fate in this city.'"

"As part of the prison routine, Issa was tortured daily, sometimes twice a day. Battery acid was spilled on his feet, which are now deformed. With his hands bound behind his back, he was hanged by his wrists from the ceiling until his shoulders dislocated; he still cannot lift his hands above his head. The interrogators' goal: 'They just wanted me to say I was plotting against the Baath Party, so they could take me and execute me. If they got a confession, they would get 100,000 dinars [roughly $40].'"

"A nondescript five-story building notable only by the extra barbed wire on the roof, the Haakimiya Prison is actually 10 stories. Below ground are interrogation cells where unspeakable horrors were committed. ...A former inmate, Mohsen Mutar Ulga, 34, ...was searching for documents about his cousin, executed under Saddam. Ulga said he was sentenced to 12 years in jail for belonging to an armed religious group called 'the revenge movement for Sadr,' referring to a martyred Shiite cleric. He had been arrested with 19 others; the lucky ones were executed right away. The rest were tortured with electric cattle prods and forced to watch the prison guards gang-rape their wives and sisters. Some were fed into a machine that looked like a giant meat cutter. 'People's bodies were cut into tiny pieces and thrown into the Tigris River,' said Ulga.

"Ulga and the reporter silently walked through the darkened cells at Haakimiya, which was surprisingly clean, except for the graffiti on the walls. GOD I ASK YOUR MERCY, scratched one prisoner who'd marked 42 days on the walls. SAVE ME, MARY, implored another, presumably a Christian. IN MEMORY OF LUJAY AND ABBAS WHO WERE TORTURED, read another."

Kubba was driving his Mercedes through Basra's Saad Square when he came upon some 600 men who had been detained while police checked their IDs. According to Kubba, 'Chemical Ali' Hassan al-Majid, Saddam's half brother and the tyrant of southern Iraq, stopped and inquired, 'No IDs? Just shoot them all.' Kubba watched as 'they shot over 600 people in front of me.'"

"Almost as large as Saddam's palaces are his many prisons, where countless Iraqis were tortured and killed. We take you now inside one of Saddam's most notorious prisons, 18 miles west of Baghdad, and it's hard to imagine a grimmer place. US soldiers are searching what remains of one of the biggest and most elaborate prisons in the world. Saddam Hussein never cut corners when it came to punishment. Abu Ghraib once held tens of thousands of human souls – criminals, political enemies, and those who just happened to get in the way. A 12-year-old Iranian boy visiting his grandmother near Basra in 1985 was swept up in an Iraqi invasion. He was still here 15 years later.

"[H]e lived with 28 other detainees in a nine-meter-square cell, dividing up 1.5 kilos of rice and porridge a day. 'It was so cramped we couldn't sleep on our backs, we had to sleep on our sides, like spoons. And they brought us polluted water to drink, so we all had diarrhea.' Ulga was released last fall during Saddam's surprise general amnesty. 'Most people don't know that before the amnesty, they executed 450 prisoners so they would never go free,' said Ulga."

"The massive prison cast a shadow over the entire neighborhood. Yehiye Ahmed, 17, grew up nearby. The prison guards were his neighbors; the inmates' screams were the soundtrack of his young life. 'I could hear the prisoners crying all the time, especially when someone was killed. I could hear everything from my house or when we played soccer behind the prison,' says Yehiye, a quiet boy, with large, haunted brown eyes and a body that suggests malnourishment.

"Yehiye and his friends would often go inside the Abu Ghraib compound to sell sandwiches and cigarettes to visitors, guards, and sometimes even prisoners. 'I saw three guards beat a man to death with sticks and cables. When they got tired, the guards would switch with other guards,' he recalls. 'I could only watch for a minute without getting caught, but I heard the screams, and it went on for an hour.'"

"... Anwar Abdul Razak, remembers when a surgeon kissed him on each cheek, said he was sorry and cut his ears off. Razak, then 21 years old, had been swept up during one of Saddam Hussein's periodic crackdowns on deserters from the Army. Razak says he was innocently on leave at the time, but no matter; he had been seized by some Baath Party members who earned bounties for catching Army deserters. At Basra Hospital, Razak's ears were sliced off without painkillers. He said he was thrown into jail with 750 men, all with bloody stumps where their ears had been. 'They called us Abu [Arabic for father] Earless,' recalls Razak, whose fiancée left him because of his disfigurement.

"No one is sure how many men were mutilated during that particular spasm of terror, but from May 17 to 19, 1994, all the available surgeons worked shifts at all of Basra's major hospitals, lopping off ears. (One doctor who refused was shot.) Today, Dr. Jinan al-Sabagh, an administrator at Basra Teaching Hospital, insists that the victims numbered only '70 or 80,' but he'd prefer not to talk about it. He says the ear-chopping stopped before his own surgery rotation came up. 'I want to forget about all this. I vowed I would never do it. I said I am a surgeon, not a butcher....'"

"A slightly broader picture of what happened has emerged from the chief gravedigger, just 21 years old. He is Muhammad Muslim Muhammad and he said he began digging graves here when he was 14 to fulfill his military service.

"He said he received the bodies every Wednesday at about 11 a.m., after the weekly hangings at around 5 a.m. There were never fewer than nine bodies to bury. During one especially bad time in 2001, he said, the numbers rose. One day he buried 18 people. He said he had never told anyone the details of his job. 'I didn't open my mouth, or I would have ended up with these poor people here,' he said."

"Saboowalla said he was imprisoned because he spoke his mind to fellow travelers fleeing Baghdad after Saddam's 1990 invasion of Kuwait. He said he'd remarked that if talks with the United Nations did not work, force would be used against Saddam. '...someone overheard me. The police came the same day and asked why I spoke against Saddam,' said Saboowalla. 'I told them it was just normal conversation and I didn't mean it.'"

"An Iraqi court sentenced him to 20 years for 'insulting' Saddam, who was then Iraq's president. He said the police testified that he had advocated 'shooting and killing Saddam.' The years in jail have made him watch his words. He refused to talk about how he was treated in jail. But his younger brother... said Saboowalla had spoken of being placed in solitary confinement for weeks and 'not seeing the sun' for 27 months."

"Mr. Hani came to a cemetery here today, like dozens of other Iraqis, not with the name of his dead brother but with a number. Satter's number was 535. A cousin, Sagur, arrested at the same time, was 537. These numbers were what was left of people convicted as enemies of Saddam Hussein and then made to disappear. Their graves were not dignified with names but with numbers painted on metal plates. The plates spread like rusty weeds, covering more and more feet of desert every year Mr. Hussein held power.

"But now that he is gone, the families of the disappeared are finding the numbers, matching them to the metal plates and finally collecting their dead. These were people executed - most by hanging in the fearsome Abu Ghraib prison a mile away - merely because the government considered them a threat. Many were Shiite Muslims more active in their religion than the Sunni-dominated government felt it could tolerate."

"My brother disappeared in 1992," this woman told us. "We never heard another thing from him." He and hundreds of others buried here were Shi'ite Muslims, Saddam's religious enemy. Witnesses say they were dumped in the middle of the night, without the dignity of a coffin, often mixed with the bones of another. Until this week, their whereabouts were unknown. But now, armed with shovels and mysterious scraps of paper, families are finally coming to reclaim their own. These people may have been just nameless, faceless victims to the regime, but if so, the question arises why would the regime have taken so much time to bury each one individually, and then mark each grave with a number? The answer: The regime didn't keep track. The cemetery's caretaker did. There must be thousands of people in this book. Thousands of names. Under penalty of death, this man stole Saddam Hussein's execution list and kept note of the bodies that came his way. "I suffered so many years," he said. "My hair turned white from the pain and guilt." But now he is free to tell, and when we went to visit him there was a line out the door, all people looking to match a name with his secret numbers. It is an act of courage that may finally bring some peace to families with homecomings so long overdue."

"Farris Salman is one of the last victims of Mr. Hussein's rule. His speech is slurred because he is missing part of his tongue. Black-hooded paramilitary troops, the Fedayeen Saddam, run by Mr. Hussein's eldest son, Uday, pulled it out of his mouth with pliers last month, he said, and sliced it off with a box cutter. They made his family and dozens of his neighbors watch.

"...Salman was blindfolded and bundled into a van. Residents of his neighborhood say the van arrived in the afternoon with an escort of seven trucks carrying more than a hundred black-uniformed fedayeen wearing black masks that only showed their eyes. They rounded up neighbors for what was billed as a rally; Mr. Salman's mother was ordered to bring a picture of Mr. Hussein. Two men held Mr. Salman's arms and head steady, and pointed a gun to his temple. Another man with a video camera recorded the scene. "I was standing and they told me to stick my tongue out or they would shoot me, and so I did. It was too quick to be painful but there was a lot of blood." The fedayeen stuffed his mouth with cotton and took him to a local hospital, where he got five stitches, no painkiller and was returned to prison."

"Doctors gave him an injection and he lost consciousness, he said. When he awoke, the right side of his head was wrapped in bandages. It was Sept. 15, 1994. "I started crying," Mr. Ghanem said. "I felt crippled. I felt oppressed. I hated Saddam with all of my heart, but I didn't know what to do."

"He was sent to prison where he said he saw hundreds of others missing one ear. Many, like Mr. Ghanem, had inflamed wounds.

"His mother came every Friday, selling off household appliances to buy painkillers and antibiotics for her son. Others were less fortunate. Mr. Ghanem described a medieval scene in which delirious and dying inmates lay on the prison's dirt floor screaming from pain. "The right side of some of the men's heads were puffed up like red balloons," he said. Two of his friends died from infections.

"Saddam, God curse him, treated my son like an animal," said Mr. Ghanem's weeping mother. "Only animals have their ears cut off."

"Though the tales of punishment were not a closely guarded secret in Iraq, it is only now that many athletes are talking freely about their experiences. A common thread runs through all their narratives. After losing a competition, players and their retinue were taken to the Olympic Committee building, where they were harangued before being transferred to a prison, usually Radwaniya. They often had their heads shaved as a mark of shame and spent the first days in prison without food. Many said they were whipped on their backs, legs and arms by thick metal cables that hung from a wall in the prison and were named after snakes. And if they were offered jobs playing abroad, Uday Hussein demanded a cut of the contract if they wanted exit visas to leave Iraq."

"There was a room painted in red in the Olympic Committee building where athletes were held in isolation for days on end," said Sabat, who has a passing resemblance to the French football star Zinedine Zidane. "We were all terrified of this room." Iraq's state-sponsored sporting violence even extended to journalists who covered competitions and matches. One reporter, who said he preferred not to give his name because he was still afraid of 'Uday's men,' told AFP that such violence was widespread in the dark years of Saddam's 24-year rule. In Kadhimiya, a primarily Shiite neighbourhood in Baghdad, 25 people were discovered in an underground prison, he said.

Bodies who have had their hands tied behind their backs - they had been shot in the head.

"It didn't matter if we felt he was guilty or not guilty. We had to do it," he explained. "These people were against Saddam Hussein. If we got orders to punish him, we would go and do it. "Well, in the beginning, this place looks just like an anonymous office building. And that made it all the more filled with terror, because slowly, prisoners would come up, tell you that they had been held here, that they had been tortured. You look at the walls, and see graffiti written by the prisoners here. And it's heartbreaking, really. Allah, help me. Or, you know, today I'm alive, but tomorrow I'll be underground. You see Iraqi families wandering around trying to find news of relatives, and finding nothing. I was about to leave when a group of agitated Iraqis came up and said, come with me. I have something to show you. It's an execution ground. There are still some bodies there. So I said, ok. Let's go take a look. And indeed, we drove to a very remote part of the prison. It was like a makeshift execution ground. You know, somebody had just hurriedly set some guys up there and shot them. They had been half-buried in the ground."

"Jamal al-Attar was 26 years old when the Iraqi Mukhabarat snatched him off the street for questioning. He was accused of being a resistance fighter opposed to Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. Then he was loaded onto a truck with scores of other Kuwaitis. That was the last anyone here [Kuwait] saw of him. Today, Mr. Attar would be 38 years old and would have spent one-third of his life in an Iraqi prison. "I must say that I hope that he is still alive. I hope that all of them are still alive," says Abdul Hamid al-Attar, Jamal's father. "But I have to be frank with myself. I am not that much optimistic."

"Most difficult, say family members, is not knowing whether their loved ones are alive. ... If Hussein did this to his own people, the Kuwaitis received worse, family members say.

"We wish that all of them are alive and all of them will be returned soon to Kuwait. but if not, [their families] should know the truth," says Ali Murad of the National Committee for the Missing and POWs.

"Attar agrees: 'Five or six years ago, we used to insist they are alive and that the Iraqis must bring them back to Kuwait alive. Now we have changed. We say we must know if they are dead or alive. but we can't accept that they are missing.'"

"The Baath regime has gone and now we can talk freely with you. They [the corpses] are all political. Ten to 15 bodies would arrive at a time from the Abu Ghraib prison and we would bury them here. The last corpse interred was number 993."

"The civilians were hanged. Sometimes a soldier would come through and they were all shot. I could distinguish them by their uniforms. This grave belongs to a woman. She was hanged. There are another five cemeteries in Baghdad with secret gravesites so in this city alone there are about 6,000 (political) corpses."

"Rusted from their beds, pulled off the street, yanked from their classrooms and their jobs, essentially abducted by the president's security goons and on the most feeble of pretexts, never again seen by their families and friends. Mourned furtively down through the years by parents and siblings, spouses and children.

"They are the missing, probably long dead and thus mercifully released from their misery. But hope lives on, however atrophied and threadbare. It is this hopeful longing for miracles that brings Iraqis, in their pleading numbers, to every portal, hatchway and unsealed vent hole, in search of loved ones. 'My brother,' says one. 'My son,' implores another."

"There is nothing in this tunnel, save for rats and sodden fruit crates. But across town, at another portal to the subterranean maze, a morsel of information has floated to the surface. It's a piece of paper, part of a security file. It reads: 'Ali Shankat. Executed criminal. Accused of writing about Saddam Hussein.'"

"Upstairs, accessible by a back stairway only, are about 100 individual cells, dark and windowless, stinking of urine. In one sits a plate of half-eaten food, biscuits and rice, still resting on a green plastic tray. At the end of a hallway lies a pile of bindings and blindfolds.

"An elevator, the only one in the place, leads to the basement and more cells. There are shackles in one room, long cables in another. On another floor there is a small operating room, where some former prisoners said doctors harvested the organs of those who did not survive.

"Finally, out back, stand three portable morgues, metal buildings the size of tool sheds, with freezer units attached. Inside one are six aluminum trays, each the length of a body."

"'I am one of millions who have been tortured,' said 33-year-old Ali Khadem Al Essery, whose knuckles were smashed with a club while he was being interrogated in 1994. Everyone here knows someone who was tortured, and many victims see a bleak future without a measure of justice exacted on the torturers."

-- Newsday, April 21, 2003

"Iraq became one of the few nations that legally sanctioned the use of torture in pre-trial investigations, and as a punitive measure. The death sentence was prescribed for a large variety of offenses including usurpation of public money, corruption, insulting the presidency, and treason -- loosely defined. Law became whimsical and contingent on the will of the party and president. Even foreign investments were dependent on the good will of the ruling elite, often tapping into a network of businessmen sanctioned and protected by a Saddam family clique."

"The picture that emerged of the intelligence service here was of a kind of sadistic shakedown operation, where agents took prisoners to satisfy their masters but extracted money to satisfy themselves.

"Other men returning here said the interrogators had gone even further, demanding sex with female relatives when no money could be paid. In most cases, the prisoners said, bribes were paid, women were offered, but the prisoner remained in jail.

"My family paid them everything we had, $25,000, and still they did not release me,' Mr. Masawi said."

"Tens of thousands of security files on Iraqis have been found in a huge underground vault beneath the headquarters of Saddam Hussein's most feared secret police agency, the legacy of a Soviet-style domestic spying system that controlled everything from job assignments to whether a person would live or die.

"The files include the mundane -- a man denied the right to leave the country because he refused a job transfer -- and the chilling -- a 19-year-old high school student hanged because he admitted he was the leader of a cell of a banned political party.

"By God, this is everyone in Iraq,' translator George Yousef muttered as he entered the records vault, about twice the size of a basketball court, discovered two days ago by U.S. marines and visited by a journalist Sunday."

"Malthan Al Naji had a visit from a United Nations relief team. Anwar Abdul Al Razaq got sick. Zuhair H. Jawa Kubba had American dollars in his pocket. Jawad Abdul Al Naby smuggled some sheep. Because these things happened, these men were beaten with steel rods, had electrodes placed on their genitals, were hung from their arms until their shoulders were dislocated, were suspended by their ankles over the stone floor of a cell while their torturers whipped them with electric cables and pulverized their knuckles with wooden clubs."

"Dr. Jinan Al Sabagh, a surgeon at Basra's Teaching Hospital, remembers the day in 1994 when the Baath Party came to the hospital with groups of men who were said to be deserters. The doctors were told to slice off the men's ears.

"It was definitely obligatory,' said Al Sabagh, a gentle man in his 60s who seemed close to tears as he struggled to describe what happened those three days. 'If you didn't, you would have the same thing done to you.

"They made four groups of doctors, one for each day,' Al Sabagh explained. "I was in the fourth group. One doctor here refused and they said if you didn't do it we will do the same to you. He did it."

"The relatives push forward, waving their faded pictures, in much the same way that desperate kinfolk had wandered around the ruins of the World Trade Center towers after 9/11, seeking information about their missing. Haid Ahmed holds up a photograph of his brother, Moayed, an agriculture student who disappeared in June, 1981. 'We haven't been able to search for him until now. We were too scared even to try.' Too scared, in the Saddam days, to even inquire about Moayed's fate.

"My brother could be anywhere. This is just a possibility. But any place I hear there is a prison, I go there. I have been to four prisons already. I am going to keep looking because my father and mother have asked me to. We have talked about him every day since he was taken. His life inside prison is now longer than his life outside. In my heart, I think he is alive, but only God knows."

"I am still afraid," he murmured. "Saddam is alive and so are all those closest to him. We don't know if one day the regime will come back. Those who did this to me are still around. We just don't know their faces. They just took off their uniforms and went home. They are still out there and we are still afraid."

-- Mutilation victim quoted in The Sunday Times (London), April 20, 2003

"After he arrived in Baghdad, he was placed in a darkened room with only a small red light, no bed. Guards would splash buckets of water through a small gap in the bottom of the door to put an inch or two of water on the floor so that he could not sleep. They gave him tea and a piece of bread for breakfast. Rice and a piece of bread for lunch. He went to the bathroom in his room, on the floor."

-- The Baltimore Sun, April 20, 2003

"In a pile in one of the rooms used for torture were textbooks for children: a science book for third-graders, an agriculture book for sixth-graders. Whole families, including infants and toddlers, were held in this prison. This was a form of mercy, this keeping the families together."

-- The Baltimore Sun, April 20, 2003

"In the night, they took me again to the room, and they made my body wet with water. I was naked," he recalls, and now is when he searches with his eyes for that spot. To cushion his words: They used clamps to connect electrical wire to his genitals and then they sent a current running through him.

"My whole body shook," he says. "I was shouting to them, 'I will sign anything! Just stop this!' I was shaking, shaking. I shook until I passed out."

"The guards shocked him in the same way every night for two weeks. When they feared he would die, they gave him a week off. Then back to the shocking. Always they beat him, sometimes on his back, sometimes on his legs and arms, often on the soles of his feet until they bled. The pattern continued for six months."

-- The Baltimore Sun, April 20, 2003

"He described how, clad in black garb that covered all but his eyes, he had often meted out sentences in the street, in front of a victim's family and horrified onlookers. Guarded by armed colleagues, he used to tie up and blindfold the accused. One of his men held the detainee's head in a firm grip. Another forced open the mouth.

"Ali would then draw out a pair of pliers and a sharp knife. Gripping the tongue with pliers, he would slice it up with the knife, tossing severed pieces into the street. "Those punished were too terrified to move, even though they knew I was about to chop off their tongue," said Ali in his matter-of-fact voice. "They would just stand there, often praying and calling out for Saddam and Allah to spare them. By then it was too late.

"I would read them out the verdict and cut off their tongue without any form of anaesthetic. There was always a lot of blood. Some offenders passed out. Others screamed in pain. They would then be given basic medical assistance in an ambulance which would always come with us on such punishment runs. Then they would be thrown in jail."

-- Fedayeen Saddam member interviewed in The Sunday Times (London), April 20, 2003

"Ferass Adnan is a 23-year-old trader who speaks with difficulty these days now that part of his tongue is missing. Some months ago he got into a fight in a market in northern Baghdad and was overheard insulting Saddam as the 'son of a dog'. A policeman tried to arrest him, but Adnan fled.

"Within hours, Iraqi secret police agents arrived at Adnan's home and, failing to find him, took away his uncle, brother, and two cousins. They were thrown in jail and tortured with electric shocks.

"It was only a matter of days before the regime's ubiquitous security spies caught up with Adnan in the suburbs of Baghdad. He was jailed and then, on March 5, turned over to the specialists of Ali's punishment squad. Adnan was taken back to his father's home in north Baghdad, where his entire family was ordered to gather outside the local coffee house.

"His hands were tied and his eyes blindfolded,' the young man's father, Adnan Duleimi, recalled last week. 'I had not seen my son since they had arrested him. I tried to pay for his release. I lost all my savings, handing everything I had to corrupt security officers who promised to help but only took my money. There was nothing I could do. I had to watch in silence as they took a knife to my son's tongue. Had I said a word we would all have been killed."

"One of Ali's fellow fedayeen lost his tongue simply for repeating how he had heard of a man who had accused Uday of bringing shame on the Iraqi people for dressing in multi-coloured shirts . which, according to the critic, made him look like a woman.

"There was no mild form of criticism when it came to Saddam, Uday or the regime,' said Ali. 'Any critical comment, even to say that the president looked tired in a speech, was enough to risk having one's tongue cut off by us."

-- Interview with a member of the Fedayeen Saddam in The Sunday Times (London), April 20, 2003

"Former prisoners of ousted president Saddam Hussein's government are everywhere in Basra, standing on street corners waiting for water, rummaging through papers in the headquarters of the once feared secret police, sitting quietly at home on a hot afternoon. These are the tortures they describe, and more: a prisoner forced to sit on a heated metal stove, electric shocks applied to genitals, a small blade used to slash a prisoner's back. Even doctors became torturers; they cut off army deserters' ears. Servants of the system fell victim to it, too: police officers and prison guards arrested, tortured, then sent back to work. Torture was considered so routine that many former prisoners shrugged at first when asked about it. 'Of course, they tortured me. Beating people here is something regular,' said Malthem Najj."

"Anwar Abdul Qadir was there, too, looking. He has been missing his brother since 1991 as well, when the 17-year-old was taken from their home at 4 a.m. His uncle is also missing, and his cousin was executed in 1996. Altogether, he has six relatives who were arrested and whose whereabouts are unknown. 'I'm very lucky they just took five or six relatives,' he said, nodding in the direction of Abdul Wahab. 'Some people had five or six brothers taken."

"I saw thousands killed and buried in mass graves. Some were lined up and machine-gunned before being covered with sand. Others were just buried alive. Saddam had a programme of telling villagers (Kurds) they were being relocated south. We would take trucks that would normally hold 12 to 15 people and put in 200 with no water or ventilation. Many would die on the way. Survivors were driven to Al Anbar or Tharthar and buried alive in vast holes dug in the ground. I saw thousands of people . men, women and children . die this way."

"Adnan Agari, who never returned, was taken away with his brother Ghassan and his cousin Khatar. They were taken to Baghdad and tortured with electrified wire, Ghassan said. "At least three massacres on Saddam City's streets have occurred in the last 10 years, including 700 people gunned down during a 1998 Shiite demonstration, said Muhammad Qadim Saadoun, a former air force helicopter pilot whose 40-day political imprisonment ended last week with the U.S. entry into Baghdad.

"He said he was imprisoned repeatedly for refusing to fire on his fellow Shiites, who form the majority of the population but had long been subservient to Mr. Hussein's Sunni-dominated secular government.

"You cannot imagine the horrible things they did to us,' Mr. Saadoun said. He was tortured while hanging upside down by his feet and pistol-whipped so hard he has lost some of his memory."

"For days now, scores of desperate Iraqis have turned up outside the state security complex here, searching for their missing loved ones, begging the American troops who guard its gates to help them find the relatives whom they believe to be trapped in a prison beneath the sprawling grounds.

"With the fall of Saddam Hussein's government, 30 years of buried history is slowly being resurrected. The Iraqis who appear each morning calling out names and dates of arrest are hoping that their missing brothers, sisters, aunts and uncles will be resurrected along with the past.

"They hold up one finger, two fingers, four fingers, trying to explain to the Americans how many relatives are supposedly in the jail. They throng the gates from dawn to dusk, holding up photos of their vanished loved ones and holding desperately onto hope."

"One of the disappeared is the son of an old man named Kadem Agari Albadri. He lives in a walled-compound on Maerifa Street, the street of knowledge, landscaped with ficus and palms. His name appears in the book as a local teacher. His son Adnan is there, also: No. 32, arrested March 3, 1991. Suspect. Whereabouts unknown.

"... Much of his family and friends gathered today to hear him speak. They all brought faded pictures or names scribbled on scrap paper of sons and brothers who have disappeared. They need look no further than the book.

"Before anything, I want to tell the people of America and Britain something,' Mr. Albadri said. 'There is nothing, nothing more terrible for a father and mother than to have their child taken from them. Not to know. Never to see his body. You cannot imagine. This is how we lived.'

"I was sitting outside my father's house in a village near Tikrit on Friday when two carloads of fedayeen stopped. They got out and began to beat me and accuse me of being a saboteur. Then they shot me in the leg. They took me to the police station and kept me for three nights, saying they would kill me. Then yesterday they just disappeared. And at 7am this morning (Monday) an American Marine came and let me out of my cell. I feel very lucky."

"When they came closer, I could see in the bus men, women and children with blindfolds over their eyes. I was very afraid and hid in a hole. It was mostly men. There were about eight children and ten women. They (Ba'ath Party forces) took them off the bus and led them over to the hole in groups. They sat or knelt and then they began to shoot them from very close, many shots. Some were just pushed in and then covered up with earth. There was no escape, it was done very quickly.

"I could not tell this secret because I knew it was dangerous knowledge that I should not hold, dangerous knowledge. But if the British Army want me to show them I will dig up the bodies myself, because I know they are there. I can never forget."

"'Me.' 'Me.' 'Me.' they murmured in response to the question: Whose father, brother, son had been executed by Saddam Hussein's government. Eleven hands in all, raised in the stagnant air inside the low mud-brick house of Sheik Kathem Al Wafi, signalling the death toll here.

"These men and their sheik, the elders of the Al Wafi tribe, are people of the Madan, the marsh Arabs who for five millennia lived in a vast area of wetlands that began about 50 miles north of Basra. I lived, that is, until 1988, when Hussein's government began a systematic campaign of oppression, execution and internal exile against them."

"The few Iraqi men of Pumping Station No. 1 tried to protect it as if it were their own. In the end, they lost tools, spare parts and important records to gangs ransacking the oil complex. But they saved the new red fire engine; a quick-thinking operations manager drove it home.

"Over the weekend, the men sat silently, their faces clouded with doubt and fear, as an American oil engineer tried to convince them the station - and the oil flowing through it - really do belong to them and the Iraqi people.

"Under Saddam's regime, the workers said, the station was a place where they had to be careful in their work and careful what they said. On the payroll as a mechanic was a Baath Party official whose real job was to ensure loyalty to the Iraqi dictator.

"Any workers who complained 'would disappear in the night,' said Muslim Yehia, a technician. 'We don't know if they were killed or tortured or ran away.'

He said he was arrested in the central city of Karbala on March 10, 2000. He returned to the facility in Baghdad this weekend, he said, to help rescue any Iraqis who still might be imprisoned there."

"An Iraqi soldier, who according to the facility's records witnessed the beatings, said interrogators regularly used pliers to remove men's teeth, electric prods to shock men's genitals and drills to cut holes in their ankles.

"In one instance, the soldier recalled, he witnessed a Kuwaiti soldier, who had been captured during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, being forced to sit on a broken Pepsi bottle. The man was removed from the bottle only after it filled up with his blood, the soldier said. He said the man later died.

"I have seen interrogators break the heads of men with baseball bats, pour salt into wounds and rape wives in front of their husbands," said former Iraqi soldier Ali Iyad Kareen, 41. He then revealed dozens of Polaroid pictures of beaten and dead Iraqis from the directorate's files."

"Saturday, former prisoners and Iraqi soldiers said they heard screams of 'help' from men who were still there. Several soldiers who tried to enter the underground prison through a manhole said they found the area flooded and doors locked. Kanan Alwan, 41, who worked in the facility's administrative office, said the intelligence officers of the facility programmed the prison's computers, which control the water flow, so that the water level would exceed the height of the prison doors.

"They are drowning in there, and there's nothing we can do for them," Alwan said. "The real criminals fled. But the innocents who probably did nothing wrong have been condemned to death."

I had a letter from a Kuwaiti prisoner of war, one of 605 Kuwaitis still recorded as missing from the 1991 Gulf War, and they found it when they searched my house. They tortured me with electricity. They made me sit on hot metal plates. They used to drink and laugh as they tortured me."

"The ordeal of one...victim of the secret police, a woman identified only as Lalla, is recounted in A Book of Cruelty: An Attempt to Spoil What Has Remained of Your Lives, by Amer Badr Hassoun. According to Hassoun's account, the woman, a young law professor, was taken into custody for refusing to join the Baath Party. She was transferred from a Baghdad prison to a series of prisons in the north before ending up at the Baghdad security directorate. One of her torturers there was a former student who kicked her and administered electric shocks before killing a 13-year-old boy who was also a prisoner. During one torture session, she passed out and was taken to the adjoining Security Hospital and subsequently to the nearby al-Kindi Hospital. She was threatened with execution if she spoke of her torture to doctors or nurses. When a doctor asked her if she had been tortured, she responded with silence.

"She was later tried by a judge named Awwad al-Bandar on the charge of not joining the Baath Party. After being refused permission to represent herself, she was convicted and given a life sentence. She was ultimately released during one of Hussein's amnesty declarations and later told her story to Hassoun. Her current whereabouts are unclear."

"Sheikh Lami Abbas Ajali looked around at the small cell where he spent several bleak weeks of his life and recounted the torture: How he was hit, prodded, had his eyelids pulled back, electric shocks applied to his temples and genitals, how he was handcuffed with tight manacles and then lifted into the air from behind.

"He recalled Saturday how torturers stuffed 10 suspects into an eight-foot by six-foot room so only two could sleep at any given time while the other eight were forced to stand. And how he was kept blindfolded, never quite sure where he was, where they were taking him, what would hit him next."

"Hassan Ali Rasan has clawed for days in the rubble of the Detention and Security Center, searching for a piece of hope. Amid twisted wire, bricks and unexploded rocket-propelled grenades, Rasan hunts for traces of his cousin Kasem, missing for 12 years since Saddam Hussein's agents paid him a visit when he was a student.

"The male warders made her wear pants, an offense to Shiites' strict female dress codes; without a belt they often fell down. The low point of every day was the daily torture session; the high point, gruel in a bowl, the prisoners' only meal. Even that was denied her if "I made some mistake." Hashmia's jailers scored her back with a hot poker, beat the soles of her feet with sticks, made her pull up her baggy pants and whipped her legs. The sexual humiliation may have been even worse than the pain, but that was serious. 'They slapped me so hard that my neck hurts from it even now.' The torturers wanted her to confess to plotting against the Baathist regime, but she knew that would mean a death sentence."

"Coalition forces have discovered an abandoned military prison here, where discarded gas masks and used atropine injectors suggest the recent presence of chemical weapons and human testing. ... There was no sign of what happened to the inmates and no indication of what their crimes were. But the punishment seems to have been severe. ... There is also evidence of crude torture. Electric cords snake through a tiny window in one cell, the frayed ends dangling from an anchor in the ceiling. Similar sets of wires trail into other concrete rooms. ... 'I'd hate to think of what those clamped onto,' said one U.S. soldier, who speculated the far end would be attached to a generator. 'It's just evil in here.' ... At least a half-dozen gas masks were scattered near the prison's entrance and inside one of the wire-enclosed walkways of the white cinder-block prison. There were also several spent auto-injectors of atropine, a powerful drug that is administered as an antidote to nerve gas."

"The Baath Party completely dominated life in Iraq. Until this week, every neighborhood had a Baath official who kept tabs on the area, ran a network of informants and recruited members into the party, say Iraqis. It wasn't difficult to figure out who they were: They had the best cars and the nicest houses and they had money to throw around."

"It didn't take much to run afoul of the party. A wrong word or chance comment within earshot of an informant often was enough to earn an interrogation or worse, according to residents of southern Iraq. There was little accountability, charges were difficult to counter and informants were eager to turn in 'troublemakers' to prove their own value."

"Ordinary people living in this kind of pressure cooker, where any misstep could be fatal, generally avoided sharing their true feelings with anyone but their closest friends and relatives. Making sure children didn't say an errant word before they understood the implications was also an essential survival tactic. 'You only talked when you were sitting with your very, very closest friends,' said Raheem Khagany, 24, an assistant engineering professor. 'If a Baath member heard you, you could be executed.'"

"...[S]ecret police thugs brutalized even senior officials of the Information Ministry, just to keep them in line (one such official has long been missing all his fingernails). One Foreign Ministry officer told me of a colleague who, finding out his brother had been executed by the regime, was forced, as a test of loyalty, to write a letter of congratulations on the act to Saddam Hussein. An aide to Uday once told me why he had no front teeth: henchmen had ripped them out with pliers and told him never to wear dentures, so he would always remember the price to be paid for upsetting his boss."

"U.S. soldiers with tanks and armoured vehicles took over the sprawling compound of Baghdad's military intelligence headquarters on Friday after local people thronged the compound searching for missing relatives.

"Reuters correspondent Khaled Yacoub Oweis said he heard one explosion. It was not clear what caused it. Earlier, Iraqi civilians had been digging feverishly, saying they believed relatives were trapped in underground dungeons used by Saddam Hussein's feared security apparatus."

"The Baath Party completely dominated life in Iraq. Until this week, every neighborhood had a Baath official who kept tabs on the area, ran a network of informants and recruited members into the party, say Iraqis. It wasn't difficult to figure out who they were: They had the best cars and the nicest houses and they had money to throw around. ... It didn't take much to run afoul of the party. A wrong word or chance comment within earshot of an informant often was enough to earn an interrogation or worse, according to residents of southern Iraq. There was little accountability, charges were difficult to counter and informants were eager to turn in 'troublemakers' to prove their own value. ... Ordinary people living in this kind of pressure cooker, where any misstep could be fatal, generally avoided sharing their true feelings with anyone but their closest friends and relatives. Making sure children didn't say an errant word before they understood the implications was also an essential survival tactic. 'You only talked when you were sitting with your very, very closest friends,' said Raheem Khagany, 24, an assistant engineering professor. 'If a Baath member heard you, you could be executed.'"

"Naji Abbas headed out for a couple of hours one day in 1985 to buy some medicine and never returned. Thirteen months later, family members say, the police told them they could pick up his body at the Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad. Abbas, who, according to relatives, was guilty of nothing more than being a Shiite Muslim in Sunni-ruled Iraq, had been tortured, an eye poked out, an arm broken and his chest burned with electrical wires. The regime of Saddam Hussein then delivered the clincher: Family members were asked to pay 30 dinars, a month's wages, for the bullets that killed him."

"...in the mid-1990's one of our Iraqi cameramen was abducted. For weeks he was beaten and subjected to electroshock torture in the basement of a secret police headquarters because he refused to confirm the government's ludicrous suspicion that I was the Central Intelligence Agency's Iraq station chief. CNN had been in Baghdad long enough to know that telling the world about the torture of one of its employees would almost certainly have gotten him killed and put his family and co-workers at grave risk."

"Two men yesterday gave eyewitness accounts of the execution last Saturday of a commander of the Iraqi 29th brigade after he recommended retreating from Sheykhani, a frontline town that fell to US and Kurdish forces at the weekend.

"He was made to stand in a ditch for half an hour or so and then he was shot," said Salah Mehdi Taleb. The man who shot him was Mahmoud Taher, who also gave us political education."

"If you want to stay out of trouble you have to join, and then you could be promoted in the party from the street level to representing the city. But then take part in beatings and the burning of property of the people they don't like. I was one of the people they didn't like."

"Perhaps saddest were two rooms, each hardly bigger than a normal bedroom, reserved for children; they had been crammed with scores of kids from 12 to 16 years old, say the former inmates. Ali Nasr, 13 at the time, was caught up in a sweep when Shiites throughout Iraq rioted after the murder of their Grand Ayatollah, Mohammed Sadiq al-Sader (also called Sader II) in Najaf. ... Ali spent six months in the juvenile wing of Unit Four, sleeping on his feet when the cell was too crowded to lie down, or taking turns on the floor with other prisoners. The boy was still too scared to talk about it, even now."

"Former United Nations worker Vanessa Lough said children as young as four have been taken from their parents during the night over the past fortnight and murdered after extremists targeted families thought to have been helping the Coalition forces.

"Some children were hanged as their helpless parents were forced to watch," said Ms Lough, 37. She heard of the atrocities during a water drop on the outskirts of Basra, Iraq's second largest city and a Ba'ath party stronghold. 'In one street alone, they said three children could at one point be seen hanging from the lampposts and around the corner another child lay burned on the road. Parents and children who resisted were badly beaten.' Ms Lough said that, at first, the three women, all middle-aged, were reluctant to talk about what they had seen for fear of persecution.

"They were genuinely afraid for their lives," she added. "Through what I can gather, they knew of at least 11 deaths but said there were many more elsewhere in the city."

"One of the ladies said Ba'ath party leaders and several henchmen had ordered and carried out the killings after their headquarters were bombed last week. It was their way of getting back. One of the men told a father his son was being killed because the father had been seen laughing with several men from the British Army that day. They told him he had "betrayed" Saddam in an act of treason. He received a broken leg and a severe beating. The men made the father watch as they set his son alight with petrol."

"Haydar, who played 12 years on Iraq's junior and senior national teams, said the troubles started in 1986, when he joined professional team al-Rashid, which was owned by Hussein. When the team lost, Haydar said, players were imprisoned for several days.

"I was tortured for the first time in 1993, after the Iraqi national team lost 2-0 to Jordan," Haydar told ESPN.com. ... A few months later, when Haydar suggested he might not be able to play because of a bleeding ulcer, he was arrested at his home at 2:30 a.m. and sent to prison.

"He took me right to the Olympic prison, where the guards whipped my feet 20 times a day for three days," he said. "They gave me nothing to eat or drink other than a daily glass of water and slice of bread. Then they sent me to al-Radwaniya for four more days of punishment, and this time, I got the full treatment.

"They took my clothes off, laid me down on my back and dragged me by my legs across hot pavement until my back was a bloody mess. Then they made me roll in the sand. All because I wanted to stop playing soccer."

Senator INHOFE. I am also outraged that we have so many humanitarian do-gooders right now crawling all over these prisons looking for human-rights violations while our troops, our heroes, are fighting and dying. I just don't think we can take 7 bad people—there are some 700 guards in Abu Ghraib, there are some 25 other prisons, about 15,000 guards all together, and 7 of them did things they shouldn't have done, and they're being punished for that. But what about some 300,000 troops who have been rotating through all this time, and they have—all the stories of valor are there.

Now, one comment about Rumsfeld. A lot of them don't like him. I'm sorry that Senator McCain isn't here, because I just now said to him, "Do you remember back 3 years ago when Secretary Rums-feld was up for confirmation? I said, "These guys aren't going to like him, because he doesn't kowtow to them, he's not easily intimidated." I've never seen Secretary Rumsfeld intimidated. Quite frankly, I can't think of any American today as qualified as Donald Rumsfeld is to prosecute this war.

Now, all the ideas about these pictures. I would suggest to you any pictures—and I think maybe we should get direction from this committee, Mr. Chairman, that if pictures are authorized to be disseminated among the public, that for every picture of abuse or alleged abuse of prisoners, we have pictures of mass graves, pictures of children being executed, pictures of the four Americans in Baghdad that were burned and their bodies were mutilated and dismembered in public. Let's get the whole picture.

Now, General Taguba, many, many years ago I was in the United States Army. My job—I was a court reporter. I know a little bit about the history. The "undue command influence" that is the term that you've heard, and I'd like to make sure that we get into the record what that is. I'm going from memory now, but it's my understanding that the commanders up the line can possibly serve as appellate judges. Consequently, commanders up the line are not given a lot of the graphic details, but merely said, as in the case of Rumsfeld, "Serious allegations need to be investigated," and they started an investigation. This is back in January. Now, Rumsfeld said, and I'm quoting him now, "Anything we say publicly could have the impact on the legal proceeding against the accused. If my responses are measured, it is to assure that pending cases are not jeopardized." Do I have an accurate memory as to why they have this particular "undue command influence" provision that we have been following now for five decades, that I know of?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I'm not a lawyer, and—

Senator INHOFE. But isn't that the reason you were called in? I should ask General Smith.

General Smith, isn't that the reason that General Taguba was brought in, in the first place, to keep this from happening?

General SMITH. Yes, sir, to do the investigation and do the fact-finding so that the commanders could make informed decisions on what actions should be taken thereafter. The difficulty in the command-influence piece is that, should General Sanchez, or should I or General Abizaid, say something along the lines that, "We must take this action against these individuals," then that is command influence and down the line those that are making judgment on them would be influenced and biased in their decisions.

Senator INHOFE. That, sir, has not changed over the last 45 years.

General SMITH. That has not changed. That has happened, we have had a number of folks who have had their sentences impacted by command influence.

Senator INHOFE. Mr. Chairman, one last question to General Smith. All kinds of accounts are coming out now and many of them are fictitious, I would suggest. One was about a guy being dragged out of a barbershop—this was in The Washington Post this morning—and blindfolded. They talked about the person doing this and said he had an AK-47. Are our troops issued AK-47s?

General SMITH. They are not, sir.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you very much.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

For the benefit of all Members, the subject of the pictures has been raised, and I'd like to address that. In consultation with the DOD over the weekend, the DOD indicated its willingness to cooperate in every way to provide these pictures to the Senate Armed Services Committee. But it occurred to me, in my capacity as chairman, that this issue was a Senate institutional issue—it went beyond this committee—because I think other Senators should be entitled to receive that information in the same way as members of this committee.

I, thereby, asked the Senate leadership, majority, minority, and invited Senator Levin to join me, and we discussed this issue very carefully yesterday. We are seeking the advice of Senate counsel and the respective counsel of the majority/minority leader, and counsel to this committee, and we will before, hopefully, the end of the day, have adopted a procedure by which that transmission of further evidence can come to the whole Senate. We'll focus on how it would be made available to all Senators, and under what conditions, in compliance with Senate procedural rules and to protect the legal interests of all parties involved. Thank you.

Senator BYRD.

Senator BYRD. Thank you, General Taguba, for your report and for your service to your country.

In Friday's hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee, General Schoomaker, the Army Chief of Staff, said of the prison abuse, "This is not a training issue, but one of character and values." It's becoming clear to me that this abuse wasn't just about values; it was about policies and planning. General Taguba, based on your investigation, who gave the order to "soften up" these prisoners, to give them "the treatment"? Was this a policy? Who approved it?

General TAGUBA. Sir, we did not find any evidence of a policy or a direct order given to these soldiers to conduct what they did. I believe that they did it on their own volition. I believe that we—they collaborated with several MI interrogators at the lower level, based on their conveyance of that information through interviews and written statements. We didn't find any order whatsoever, sir, written or otherwise, that directed them to do what they did.

Senator BYRD. Doesn't the lack of training of our troops for prison duty actually demonstrate a monumental failure in planning for the long-term occupation of Iraq? How else could the military and civilian leadership of the Pentagon explain why this training wasn't even offered?

General TAGUBA. Sir, the training of the Geneva Conventions is inherent every time we—from as a recruit all the way up to my rank level. In terms of these MPs, as far as internment and resettlement, some of them received training at home station and the Mobility Station, and some did not. That was our recommendation, that a mobile training team be deployed to theater to ensure that they are in compliance with training tasks to do that. There was the capacity to do that during the conduct of their operation because there were competent battalion commanders. The battalion commander at Camp Ashraf was conducting his detention operations to standard. At Camp Bucca—they did that at Camp Bucca, and also Camp Cropper. Somehow it did not pan out at Abu Ghraib.

General SMITH. Sir, I might also mention that this organization, the 800th MP, is a specific task-organized internment and resettlement organization. Their job was this sort of stuff.

Senator BYRD. So you don't agree that there was a monumental lack of planning, that there was a monumental failure of planning for the long-term occupation of Iraq? You don't agree with that?

General SMITH. Sir, I'm—are you talking to me?

Senator BYRD. Yes.

General SMITH. I'm just addressing the specific training issue for the 800th MP that you related to, that this was their task, to come over and do that. I mean, that's what they did as an organization. So they were brought over to conduct internment and resettlement issues.

Secretary CAMBONE. If I may, Senator Byrd, I don't think that the difficulties we found at Abu Ghraib indicate that there was a long-term planning effort. In fact, Major General Ryder, who also did a report, was there specifically for that purpose, "What is the long-term basis for confinement facilities and training and care and so forth?" So, no, there was attention being paid to the longer-term occupation issue.

Senator BYRD. Secretary Cambone, when, if ever, did Ambassador Bremer first raise any concerns about how the military was running prisons in Iraq?

Secretary CAMBONE. Sir, as I said earlier, the broad question of moving detainees through the prison system was a concern of Ambassador Bremer early on. With respect to the specific conditions inside of those facilities, I am not aware of his having raised them. I don't know when that might have been. I do know that—I am told that sometime in the February/March time frame he raised this issue, but I would have to check records for you, sir.

Senator BYRD. Didn't Ambassador Bremer have overall responsibility for what was going on in Iraq?

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir. He was the occupying power, the one in whom that was invested.

Senator BYRD. Shouldn't he have known how Iraqi prisons were being run? Shouldn't he have sounded the alert if he thought that the military was doing something wrong?

Secretary CAMBONE. Again, sir, the working papers that are issued by the ICRC are done at the level of the command that they are investigating, and they don't frequently elevate to that level. They did meet in February 2004, which is the result—the resulting paper is the one that has been distributed. At that time, the ICRC presented to Ambassador Bremer their findings for that previous year. It is my guess it is that point that the specific issues that you're addressing may have been raised by Ambassador Bremer.

Senator BYRD. Do you know if Ambassador Bremer made any recommendations to the DOD?

Secretary CAMBONE. He was anxious that the DOD find a way to, as I've said, move the prisoner detainee more rapidly through the system, provide addresses for the location to the dependents, and things of that character, that is a general treatment of the detainees within the system in Iraq.

Senator BYRD. Do you know if he made any recommendations with reference to policy?

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir, not beyond what I've said. Again, his concern would have been for the broad population and assuring that we were moving people through that system, doing what was necessary for interrogations, and releasing those who had either served their time or had no reason for being in custody. He was anxious to see those people returned to their homes and families.

Senator BYRD. My time is up.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator Byrd. Thank you very much.

Senator Roberts.

Senator ROBERTS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think my questions are somewhat repetitive. But, at any rate, General, thank you for the job that you've done. Many are called, and few are chosen, and you have done an outstanding job.

In your report, you indicated that the 800th Military Police Brigade had not been directed to change its policies and procedures to set conditions for intelligence interrogations, but you concluded, indeed, such changes had been made at lower levels. Were these changes made at the battalion or the company level?

General TAGUBA. Sir, we didn't find any changes, either at the company or the battalion, or even at the brigade.

Senator ROBERTS. I'm going to repeat the question by Senator Byrd. Did these changes result from orders or direction from the MI unit at the prison?

General TAGUBA. Sir, there were interactions between the guards and the MI at that level.

Senator ROBERTS. But the changes were not policy.

General TAGUBA. No, sir.

Senator ROBERTS. Did you discuss with Major General Miller his recommendation that the MPs and the MI functions be better coordinated to determine exactly what he had in mind? As a follow-up—this is the “Gitmo-ize” question—is there some level of coordination between the MP and the MI units that is permitted by Army regulations? You cited a whole series of Army regulations. General Ryder, I believe, states that we should have a firewall in between the MPs and the military interrogators. But yet General Miller says from his experience in regards to Gitmo that that basically, if not impossible, is actually detrimental, in terms of cooperation; but insists that if you do have that kind of cooperation, you must have leadership, you must have discipline, and you must have training. Were the MI officers at Abu Ghraib familiar with Major General Miller's recommendations?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I cannot answer that. I was not there for the debriefing, nor did I discuss in any detail General Miller's report.

Senator ROBERTS. Did the intelligence officers then at the prison believe that Major General Miller's recommendations had been accepted and adopted? If so, what was the basis of this belief?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I cannot answer that. I was not there, nor did I question whether the CJTF-7 accepted his recommendations or not. I just read his report.

Senator ROBERTS. Okay. General Smith, an order to “soften up” a detainee would not be a lawful order, is that correct?

General SMITH. Sir, that’s correct.

Senator ROBERTS. What legal basis then would a soldier have for following that order?

General SMITH. Sir, none. Especially if you’re an organization of that type and have read any of the regulations. All of them are replete with guidance on humane treatment, as well as a number of fragmentary orders that were put out through General Sanchez telling them that they could not do many of these—or take actions that were inhumane.

Senator ROBERTS. Secretary Cambone, thank you for your appearance. We welcome you to the Intelligence Committee tomorrow.

Some accused of the abuses at the prison claim they were acting under orders from intelligence officers. Do any of the DOD regulations or policies encourage, condone, or permit such acts?

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir.

Senator ROBERTS. In your review of this matter, have you learned of any local or unit-level policies—I emphasize the word “policies”—that encourage or condone or permitted these abuses?

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir.

Senator ROBERTS. Were you aware of Major General Miller’s recommendations that MPs set the conditions for the interrogations at the prison? Did you discuss this recommendation with anybody at the CJTF-7?

Secretary CAMBONE. I did not discuss them with anybody at CJTF-7, no, sir.

Senator ROBERTS. What did you understand this recommendation to mean?

Secretary CAMBONE. That there had to be a basis for the transfer of information from those who had custody, on a daily basis, of those who were being interrogated—to those who were being interrogated in order that the interrogators understood personalities, relationships, in order to be able to gain the information that they were trying to gain from the—

Senator ROBERTS. From a pragmatic standpoint, is this a good thing or a bad thing? Is Ryder right, and Miller wrong? Miller right and Ryder wrong? Or is this somewhere in between?

Secretary CAMBONE. While it is written in doctrine, it seems to me doctrine is meant to be adapted to circumstance, and that was what the substance of General Miller’s recommendation was.

Senator ROBERTS. When is the Fay Report going to come out?

Secretary CAMBONE. It’s my understanding—and, General, you can correct me—that he is completing his work in Iraq over this week. He has to go to Germany to see people who have since rotated from Iraq to Germany, and then will come back here to meet others. So we’re looking toward the end of this month and perhaps the first part of June.

Senator ROBERTS. Is the policy in regards to the MP and the MI functions at Gitmo—is this being reviewed for compliance with Army regulations?

Secretary CAMBONE. If General Fay didn't realize that was a subject of his investigation, sir, he is now painfully aware of it.

Senator ROBERTS. Was your encouragement to Major General Miller to inspect the prison in any way prompted or otherwise linked to concerns about any abuse at the prison?

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir. To the contrary, it was the desire to make certain that we had the proper conditions within those places in order for the information to be gathered.

Senator ROBERTS. When you learned of the abuse, and knowing of the intelligence activities at the prison, did you have any concern about a possible link to the intelligence unit?

Secretary CAMBONE. I understood—it was probably in February—that there were MI personnel who were implicated. I did not know the nature of that implication, the extent or scope of the abuse that had taken place. So I didn't make a connection in the sense that there was a significant issue here until we moved down the path and realized exactly what was taking place.

Furthermore, I still don't know that there is a significant issue here.

Senator ROBERTS. I thank the chairman.

General SMITH. Sir, could I clarify on the MP/MI regulation here? It is not absolutely clear in this regulation that the MPs and the MI guys should not have some relationship. What is absolutely clear in the regulation is that the MPs are not allowed to be in the interrogation process. So do not take it that there is some Army regulation out there that says, "This shall not be." I have it right here, and I'll be glad to provide it for the record.

[The information referred to follows:]

[Deleted.]

Senator ROBERTS. I think that would be helpful. My point was, I don't think you can set up a firewall between those who are interrogating and the MPs. I don't even think that would be desirable. On the other side of the fence, you don't want them directly involved—

General SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator ROBERTS.—and with the lack of discipline and leadership and training, to have something like this happen.

General SMITH. I agree with you. I believe when you read the document you will see that that allows that sort of activity.

Senator ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, it would be helpful if we had Secretary Cambone's statement. I don't have that. I don't know if it was made available. He has it now.

Chairman WARNER. It was made available just shortly before the hearing.

Senator ROBERTS. All right, thank you, sir.

Chairman WARNER. It's being reproduced now. Thank you.

I acknowledge, as chairman of the Intelligence Committee, you're conducting a separate inquiry on this matter, but I think it's important—and I picked up on something Secretary Cambone said.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Do you have any knowledge of any CIA participation in the interrogation process in the cell blocks?

Secretary CAMBONE. I do know that there were people who were brought by CIA personnel to that place, to the cell blocks, and there may be—and, again—there may have been interrogations conducted by the CIA personnel while they were there. That's about the extent of my knowledge of specifically what they were engaged in, in terms of interrogation.

Chairman WARNER. General Smith, do you have any additional knowledge?

General SMITH. No, sir, I do not.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator Reed.

Senator REED. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Taguba, to the best of your knowledge, when did this pattern of abuse begin, as we've seen in the pictures?

General TAGUBA. Sir, to the best of the evidence that we gathered, it happened sometime after October 15, 2003, thereabouts—

Senator REED. 15th of—

General TAGUBA.—mid- to late-October.

Senator REED. Right.

General Smith, General Miller came to Iraq in August with the baseline from Guantanamo, which had a series of coercive measures, which was being employed in Guantanamo. We all recognized that area was not subject to the Geneva Conventions. He briefed, as you indicated in your previous testimony, individuals at the prison. He also recommended the establishment of a theater JIDC there. Is that correct?

General SMITH. I believe so.

Senator REED. That's correct.

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. That was August. Then in October, we start seeing a series of abusive behaviors, which the accused suggest were a result of encouragement or direction from these intelligence people in this theater JIDC. General Taguba has testified that he did not investigate, talk to, or in any way know anything about what was going on in that JIDC. Is that a fair chronology?

General SMITH. Sir, it's a fair chronology. I would only say that in speaking with General Miller, he has to be the one that answers some of this, he spoke directly to the brigade commanders who were involved here, and he had the special operating procedures with him, and left those with them.

Senator REED. General, to your knowledge, General Miller made it very clear to these brigade commanders that because of the Geneva Conventions, many of these provisions could not be applied?

General SMITH. Sir, according to General Miller, that was very clear to the commanders.

Senator REED. That was very clear. Then why would he bring those procedures over and brief them?

General SMITH. Sir, to the best of my knowledge—and, again, these are questions you're going to have to ask General Miller—but, to the best of my knowledge, he did not bring those coercive procedures over with him.

Senator REED. Thank you.

Mr. Secretary, you encouraged General Miller to visit.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. Were you in communication, or anyone in your office in communication, with General Miller during his trip or after his trip?

Secretary CAMBONE. He technically went under Joint Staff auspices, but with my encouragement and that of other senior members of the DOD, to look at the issues that we've talked about. Now, on his return, when he completed his report, I received a briefing on it, and then asked for people to look at its subsequent progress and what had taken place.

Senator REED. So you were briefed on his recommendation to use the guard force actively to condition the—

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir. Again, the—

Senator REED. You weren't briefed on that.

Secretary CAMBONE. No, no. Excuse me. I want to phrase this right, and that is, on the issue of making certain that we had the kind of cooperative relationships, I understood that. I don't know that I was being told, and I don't know that General Miller said, that there should be that kind of activity that you are ascribing to his recommendation.

Senator REED. General Taguba—excuse me, I'm probably doing violence to your name; forgive me—was it clear from your reading of the report that one of the major recommendations was to use guards to condition these prisoners?

General TAGUBA. As I read it on the report, yes, sir, that was recommended on the report.

Senator REED. But General Miller didn't think it was important enough to brief you, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary CAMBONE. Sir, I was not briefed by General Miller.

Senator REED. Who were you briefed by?

Secretary CAMBONE. My deputy, General Boykin, briefed me on the report.

Senator REED. So General Boykin and General Miller were collaborating on this exercise?

Secretary CAMBONE. Oh, not at all. Not at all, sir. Not at all.

Senator REED. General Boykin didn't think it was important enough to brief you on that.

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir. Again, your suggestion that the report on the phrase "setting the conditions" is tantamount to asking the MP to engage in abusive behavior, I believe, is a misreading of General Miller's intent.

Senator REED. Mr. Secretary, what I'm suggesting is, anyone in your position should have asked questions. One, specifically, would be, what does it mean to "set the conditions" of these troops, under the Geneva Conventions?

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. Did you ask that question?

Secretary CAMBONE. I didn't have to ask that question. Why? Because we had been through a process in which we understood what those limits were with respect to Iraq and what those were with respect to Guantanamo.

Senator REED. Mr. Secretary, what is the status of the detainees in that prison under the Geneva Conventions?

Secretary CAMBONE. I'm sorry, sir, which prison?

Senator REED. Abu Ghraib.

Secretary CAMBONE. Abu Ghraib? They are there under either Article 3 or Article 4 of the Geneva Conventions.

Senator REED. Let me recite Article 4, "Persons protected by the Geneva Conventions are those who, at any given moment and in any manner whatsoever, find themselves, in case of a conflict or occupation, in the hands of a party to the conflict or occupying power of which they are not nationals." These are protected persons.

Let me read Article 31, "No physical or moral coercion shall be exercised against protected persons in particular to obtain any information from them or from third parties."

Secretary CAMBONE. Sir, we're in agreement here.

Senator REED. We're in agreement—I don't think we are, Mr. Secretary.

Secretary CAMBONE. We are in agreement on—

Senator REED. General Miller suggested that guard forces be used to "set the conditions." Based on the template at Guantanamo, those methods were coercive. Yet you did not choose to ask about this. You're completely oblivious.

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir. Again, what I said was, we knew what the circumstances were with respect to Guantanamo. We knew what the circumstances were with respect to Iraq. We understood that the Geneva Conventions, and all of its articles, applied in Iraq. That—again, I come back to what I keep saying here—the notion was that you had to have a cooperation, a cooperative attitude, team-building, call it what you will between the MPs and—

Senator REED. Mr. Secretary, please.

Secretary CAMBONE.—the MIs.

Senator REED. Please.

Secretary CAMBONE. Sir—

Senator REED. This is not a cooperative attitude. This is not a guard observing the comments of a prisoner.

Secretary CAMBONE. That is exactly true, sir.

Senator REED. That is—is that happening in Guantanamo?

Secretary CAMBONE. No. Sir, what took place—

Senator REED. Is that what's happening in Guantanamo?

Secretary CAMBONE.—what took place in the prison, we have all said, exceeded the regulations, laws, and laws of war, conventions of the Geneva Conventions, and everything else. General Taguba has said repeatedly that there was no policy, he discovered no direction, that these were not directed acts on the part of those individuals—

Senator REED. Mr. Secretary, people failed to ensure, by asking appropriate questions, that these recommendations were transmitted down to individual soldiers in a way that they would understand—

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator REED.—this is just—is cooperating, not participating in the "setting the conditions," as was done—as is done in Guantanamo.

Secretary CAMBONE. Senator, I agree with you on the transmission of those directions. As I said to you, and as General Smith has alluded to, there is a paper from General Sanchez making precisely those points. Moreover, if you read General Miller's report, he says, "Before you do anything with this, we need a command staff judge advocate to work this problem and make sure it's done"——

Senator REED. Did a command SJA issue a legal opinion?

Secretary CAMBONE. When—again, what I have is his report, and it says that that was an activity in progress. I have not heard—what I know is that General Sanchez subsequently——

Senator REED. General Sanchez ordered this policy without advice of counsel.

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir, he did not. If you read General Taguba's report, he will tell you that, at the time he was there, he had not seen any action—it's page 12, I think—to implement the procedures, specifically and officially, from General Sanchez down to anyone in the lower ranks of his command that the activity that was taking place was not authorized.

General SMITH. I would add that there were numerous FRAGOs out there that direct other than what you are suggesting.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much. If there's further amplification to the Senator's question, please provide it for the record.

Senator Allard.

Senator ALLARD. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you for moving forward on this investigation quickly here at the committee level. I think it's something we need to move off our agenda so that we can begin to concentrate on how many good things are happening in Iraq, as far as moving them towards a sovereignty, their own sovereignty. I do have a statement I'd like to have put in the record and I'd ask unanimous consent, prior to my questioning.

Chairman WARNER. Without objection.

[The prepared statement of Senator Allard follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT BY SENATOR WAYNE ALLARD

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would like to thank our witnesses for appearing this morning to help us discuss the allegations that have been raised.

I would like to begin my remarks by reminding us all of the phenomenal progress we are making in the transformation of the Iraqi government. Specifically, the Iraqi Governing Council approved the Transitional Administrative Law (TAL), representing the most liberal basic governance document in the Arab world. As I understand this historic document, it represents an Iraqi "bill of rights," including the assurances for all Iraqis of freedom of religion, freedom of expression, freedom of the press, and freedom of assembly. In addition, this TAL includes fundamental rights for women.

Our progress in Iraq also includes remarkable public works accomplishments. Oil production and power generation now surpass pre-war levels. All 22 universities and 43 technical institutes and colleges are open. Coalition forces have rehabilitated more than 2,200 schools. All 240 hospitals and more than 1,200 health clinics are open. Health care spending in Iraq has increased 30 times over pre-war levels. Additionally, 170 newspapers are being published.

Our military forces are directly responsible for this positive change, and should be commended. These accomplishments, in my mind, are what define the valor, commitment, and compassion of our Armed Forces. It is not the incidents that are the subject of this hearing. Gentlemen, I know you share my frustration and concern over the reported incidents of prisoner abuse involving our Armed Forces.

My frustration comes from believing our soldiers know better than to carryout those activities now splashed all over our public media. Several of my colleagues and I have been to Iraq and Afghanistan recently, and we have seen the unmatched skills of our soldiers in defeating a hostile enemy, as well as rebuilding a public works infrastructure. Yet, here we are discussing how the misdeeds of a few can overshadow the accomplishments of so many.

My concern comes from understanding that we need to develop and employ all prudent measures to ensure our military men and women, as well as millions of locals, remain safe and secure throughout the reconstruction of this region. Without a doubt, our forces need effective detention and interrogation tools for terrorists, insurgents, and others trying to kill us. Successful exploitation of these enemy combatants will ultimately deny them the opportunity to plan, prepare, or execute more killings. Today, we must examine events that got out of control, and figure out how to realign our people and our practices toward a humane and legal alternative.

Mr. Chairman, it also appears to me that the military has done a good job with investigating these allegations and taking appropriate actions. However, it was disappointing that senior leaders did not recognize and report the serious consequences that the underlying allegations entail. I look forward to your continued leadership, as well as the leadership of SECDEF Rumsfeld, in getting to the bottom of this matter and getting our focus back on the job well done by our security and reconstruction forces.

Senator ALLARD. I'd also share my shock and dismay that Senator Inhofe mentioned, in the fact that this unfortunate situation at Abu Ghraib prison is actually being used as a fundraiser by the Kerry campaign. I just find that appalling.

Now I'd like to move forward and pose a question to you, General Taguba. In my statement, I find that your reporting supports that the Army has taken the initiative in following through appropriately on our own affairs. Just so that I'm clear in my own understanding, were you directed by any of your superiors to remove any findings that you felt were credible or relevant?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I was not directed by my superiors.

Senator ALLARD. Were you directed by any of your superiors to withhold or remove recommendations for any adverse personal actions regarding subjects of your investigation?

General TAGUBA. Sir, none whatsoever.

Senator ALLARD. Just so I'm clear also about the makeup of the prison population, my understanding, from some of the testimony that we've received here today, that if somebody is classified as a terrorist—in other words, they're not associated with any country, officially—then there's a difference; they don't fall under the Geneva Conventions' guidelines. Is that correct?

Secretary CAMBONE. The President designated the al Qaeda as being unlawful combatants, sir.

Senator ALLARD. So just that particular terrorist organization, or any terrorist organization?

Secretary CAMBONE. I know for a fact it's al Qaeda, and my guess is that depending on the circumstances, if we found ourselves in armed conflict with some other organization, such as—the President would take that under advisement.

Senator ALLARD. Okay. Now, did we have terrorists in the population at this prison?

General TAGUBA. Sir, none that we were made aware of.

Senator ALLARD. So as far as we know, these were all related to those guidelines that generally you were complying with, as far as the military is concerned, on how you handle prisoners.

General TAGUBA. Sir, they were either classified as security detainees or "other" detainees—criminals, things of that nature.

Senator ALLARD. But no terrorist classification.

General TAGUBA. None that we were given, no, sir.

Senator ALLARD. Okay.

Secretary Cambone or General Smith, in your estimation why was anyone taking pictures in the security detention facility at Abu Ghraib? Is there any explanation, from a physical security or prisoner security or MI perspective?

General SMITH. Sir, the photographing of prisoners, especially with private cameras, is against—

Senator ALLARD. Private cameras?

General SMITH. By private cameras—is against the rules.

Senator ALLARD. So these were taken by private cameras?

General SMITH. Sir, I believe they were taken by digital cameras that belonged to the individuals, but I don't know that. Maybe General Taguba does.

Senator ALLARD. I see.

General TAGUBA. Sir, they were personal cameras.

Senator ALLARD. They were personal cameras.

General SMITH. This specifically says “photographing, filming, and videotaping of individual EPW/civilian internee, other than internal internment facility administration or intelligence/counter-intelligence purposes, is strictly prohibited.”

Senator ALLARD. So this didn't have anything to do with the way you managed the prisoners or any of their interrogation or any physical security of the prison. This was taken on by individuals, unknown to those in command at the time?

General SMITH. That is my belief, but I don't know—

General TAGUBA. Sir, as far as we know, based on the evidence and the interviews and the statements, they were taken with personal cameras.

Senator ALLARD. Individuals taking that on their own, without any instruction from command.

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

Senator ALLARD. Okay.

Now, General Smith, in General Taguba's report he recommended that a mobile training team be assembled and dispatched to your area of operations to oversee and conduct comprehensive training in all aspects of detainee and confinement operations. Were these teams dispatched, as recommended?

General SMITH. Sir, they were dispatched before the report was actually approved. About 50 percent of the training is complete, and they will continue and have all of this completed by the end of June, although everybody who is out there is getting training weekly, awaiting the mobile training team specifically getting down there. That will be followed by sustained required training every week in all of these rules. Additionally, the Geneva Conventions are required to be briefed at every change of shift.

Senator ALLARD. Your point is, is that when you got General Taguba's report, even before it was finalized you were beginning to take corrective action, and so action was—you were responding immediately to concerns about how—what was being reported in the camp at Abu Ghraib.

General SMITH. That's correct, sir.

Senator ALLARD. Okay.

General Smith, General Taguba—I understand the necessity and significance of maintaining a strategic interrogation exploitation process. After all, a primary goal along these lines is to save the lives of Americans, Iraqis, and other partners in the region. Can you share with us whether or not your command is actually developing good intelligence based on your approved interrogation techniques? In other words, are we saving lives?

General SMITH. Sir, my belief is that we are. We absolutely have built the networks and what they look like and who the players are, based on intelligence information from human intelligence (HUMINT). A portion of that is this kind of activity. So, sir, I would say, absolutely, that there have been lives saved because of the people that we have been able to go out and pick up, because of the HUMINT process.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Akaka.

Senator AKAKA. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

General Taguba, I want to commend you and your team for submitting a very, what I consider, a candid and thorough report. Your task was not an easy one. However, your honesty and your integrity reflect the character we expect from soldiers in our military.

General Taguba, in your report, you reference the lack of supervision over U.S. civilian contractor personnel, third-country nationals, and local contractors within the detention facility at Abu Ghraib. During your investigation, did you determine how many civilian contracted personnel were working there? Who supervised these individuals? Can you describe what you observed, in terms of type of access these individuals had to the detainee areas?

General TAGUBA. Sir, we did not make a determination of how many civilian contractors were assigned to the 205th MI Brigade and operating at Abu Ghraib. I personally interviewed a translator, and I also personally interviewed an interrogator, both civilians, contractors. There was also a statement—and substantiated by the witnesses that we interviewed of another translator—a third-country national, in fact, who was involved. There was another third-country national who was acting as a translator for the interrogators, that was involved in one of the interrogation incidents where dogs were used.

Their supervision, sir, from the best that we could determine or discern from the information that we gathered, was, they were under the supervision of the JIDC, who was then under the supervision of one—a lieutenant colonel, who was also supervised by the brigade commander, the MI brigade commander. That was the chain, sir.

Senator AKAKA. What access did these individuals have to the detainee?

General TAGUBA. Sir, they had an open access to the detainees.

Senator AKAKA. General Taguba, your report finds that two contractors were either directly or indirectly responsible for the abuses at Abu Ghraib. Were either of these contractor personnel supervising soldiers or in a position to direct soldiers to take specific actions?

General TAGUBA. Sir, they were not in any way supervising any soldiers, MP or otherwise. However, the guards, those who were involved, looked at them as competent authorities as in the manner by which they described them, as the MI or by name or by function.

Senator AKAKA. Secretary Cambone, what kind of training did the U.S. civilian contractors have prior to going to Iraq? I've been informed that the training for interrogators included training tactics and techniques used by other countries. Did such training occur? If so, are these tactics and techniques approved by DOD intelligence officials?

Secretary CAMBONE. The only tactics and techniques that would be approved, sir, are those that are approved by the command for use in that situation. As I said earlier, the recruitment—and if you look at the advertisements for the recruitment, they look for people who have had the experience of being interrogators. I am told that, in fact, some of the retired personnel and those who have since left the service are quite capable and are, in terms of the interrogator's art, better able to conduct those interrogations than the younger individuals who are new to that activity.

General SMITH. Sir, most have gone through the 19½ week training at Fort Huachuca, either while they were in the service or afterwards.

Senator AKAKA. General Smith, who is keeping a record of all the employees that work for all the contracted firms in Iraq and Afghanistan? Is it the contracted firm or DOD?

General SMITH. Sir, you're beyond my knowledge there, except that the contracting officer who contracts with the company is responsible for ensuring that they comply with the contract. By name, I suspect he has who those contractors are. But I can't tell you that for sure.

Senator AKAKA. Thank you for your responses.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator Akaka.

Senator Sessions.

Senator SESSIONS. Thank you.

I first want to, again, state my appreciation for the superb work of our soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan. In many, many instances, some of which we've seen on television, they demonstrate restraint day after day. They've maintained their poise and their professionalism sometimes under very intense pressure. They've risked their lives, and we've seen a soldier going to the bridge to save an Iraqi woman under hostile fire. They have, on their off-hours, built schools and hospitals, and treated the sick. So this is particularly painful for all of us, to have this experience.

But I absolutely have visited those soldiers there. They've told me of things that they've done and the relationships they've had with Iraqi citizens. I strongly—it's interesting how many want to volunteer and go back, because they believe in the work and they want to see this to be a healthy, stable country. Nothing we say today should denigrate that.

I have been somewhat concerned at the suggestion that there is a policy of abuse here. General Smith, I think you've read, clearly, that the explicit statements from every level of command are in existence that would absolutely prohibit this kind of behavior, is that not correct?

General SMITH. Sir, that's absolutely correct, in many venues and a number of times where FRAGOs have been republished for the purpose of doing that. I would like to present those for the record. I know Senator Reed is very concerned about it, and I would like to put those in the record.

[The information referred to follows:]

[Deleted.]

Senator SESSIONS. With regard, General Smith, of the Geneva Conventions, I was in the Army Reserve. I, for a short time, had a Judge Advocate General (JAG) slot, although I'm not like Colonel Lindsey Graham over here, who is an actual practicing JAG officer, but I remember in the transportation unit I had to train the transportation soldiers, enlisted people in the Geneva Conventions. Isn't that done throughout the Army?

General SMITH. Sir, that is. That continues to be a requirement.

Senator SESSIONS. In basic training, every soldier has been trained in the Geneva Conventions, is that not correct?

General SMITH. That's correct, sir.

Senator SESSIONS. I heard you say that they are briefing the Geneva Conventions at every shift change now in Abu Ghraib prison?

General SMITH. That's correct, sir.

Senator SESSIONS. Before that occurred, one of the criticisms I think General Taguba mentioned was, they were supposed to be briefing the Geneva Conventions periodically, but perhaps it was not occurring. Are you familiar with that part of the report and what the requirement was?

General SMITH. I'm familiar with the report.

Senator SESSIONS. General Taguba, you made some reference to the fact that there was a procedure established to train periodically, and it may not have been occurring?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir. It's required, under AR-190-8, to post the Geneva Conventions in the language of the detainee. So you have many detainees there of different languages. They have to post that. It's a requirement, especially for those units that are conducting internment and resettlement mission requirements. Those guards, in terms of discipline, were supposed to conduct by their own SOP, guard mounts, where you have shifts—you're changing shifts, and you have guard mount. Sir, we found evidence that was not being done. They did kind of a replacement, so to speak, during their shift time, because they were not conducting guard mounts by which they were to reinforce tenets of the Geneva Conventions, or made clear that the postings of the Geneva Conventions were to be made available, not only to the detainees in a language from which they come from, but also where they could see them.

Senator SESSIONS. That was never challenged or rejected by General Abizaid, General Sanchez, or anyone else in authority in Iraq. I mean, those policies were in effect, and amounted to a violation of the established Army policy when that did not occur. Is that correct?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I cannot speak for General Abizaid or General Sanchez, but that's the responsibility of the battalion commander and also those personnel who are conducting internment and resettlement or detention operations. It's clear, it's in their doctrine, it's in the regulation.

Senator SESSIONS. Of course, General Smith, MPs have more of this training than other soldiers, I assume, in how to handle prisoners.

General SMITH. Sir, I can't speak to that, but my assumption would be that certainly they have more training than the average soldier would.

Senator SESSIONS. I thank you for your comments, and would note that—my time is expiring, but this “Gitmo-ize” issue, I think, really misses the point. Yes, we wanted to use some of the procedures that were working in Guantanamo, and try to share that information to get it up to the people in authority so we could save lives, get it out to the people who could use it to identify who these attackers and terrorists were, but I don't think there's any indication that General Miller would in any way suggest this kind of behavior was legitimate.

General SMITH. Sir, you're absolutely right in both counts. In a counter-insurgency like this, intelligence is critical, in that if you want to go find the guys that are making the improvised explosive devices (IED) or the ones who are shooting down helicopters with surface-to-air missiles like SA-7s, or folks who are fomenting the insurgency, then you have to use HUMINT to do that. You can't do that by technical means alone.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

General SMITH. So it is a critical piece of the process. Clearly, time and time again, we are told: humane treatment in concert with the Geneva Conventions.

Senator SESSIONS. Thank you, Senator.

Chairman WARNER. That's a very important inquiry and response, and I appreciate that, General.

Senator Bill Nelson.

Senator BILL NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I don't think General Miller is where the problem lies, Senator Sessions. I think it lies elsewhere.

General Taguba, on page 16 of your report you state, “I find that the intentional abuse of detainees by military police personnel included the following acts.” You list a whole number of those acts; among them, videotaping and photographing naked male and female detainees; forcibly arranging detainees in various sexually explicit positions for photographing; forcing groups of male detainees—and I will insert paraphrasing here—certain sexual acts while being photographed and videotaped; a male MP guard having sex with a female detainee; using military dogs, without muzzles, to intimidate and frighten detainees, and, in one case, biting and severely injuring a detainee; sodomizing a detainee with a chemical light and perhaps a broomstick; using military working dogs to frighten and intimidate detainees with threats of attack, and, in one instance, actually biting the detainee. Is that your report?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

Senator BILL NELSON. All right.

Mr. Secretary, when did you become aware of the nature of these prisoner abuses and the existence of the photographic and video evidence? That's two questions.

Secretary CAMBONE. The photographic evidence—be clear—that there were photographs associated with this inquiry, I knew early, in the change of the year. The nature—

Senator BILL NELSON. I'm sorry, I didn't understand.

Secretary CAMBONE. I'm sorry. I understood, at the beginning of this year, that there were photographs associated with the criminal investigative inquiry.

Senator BILL NELSON. Did you know about these acts?

Secretary CAMBONE. I did not know about these acts, and learned of them in specificity when I read the report and when I was exposed to some of those photographs.

Senator BILL NELSON. You read the report when?

Secretary CAMBONE. It has to be in the last week, sir. It was not out of the command until the end of last month.

Senator BILL NELSON. Now, the SECDEF told us last Friday that he learned about these abuses in the middle of January.

Secretary CAMBONE. That we had abuses, true. The nature of them, I was not aware of.

Senator BILL NELSON. Did you know that they were horrific?

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir. I received a report that there was an inquiry underway—a number of—six or seven, by the way, and this being one of them—in which there were people implicated in abuses of prisoners in Iraq. The character of it, the scope, the scale, I was not aware of.

Senator BILL NELSON. Specific to this prison, what was your role in alerting others that you work for, such as the SECDEF?

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir. Again, as the Secretary testified, corporately we were aware—and I was one of those who told him so—that there were investigations underway with respect to this facility, and ultimately the report that General Taguba's done, in the February time frame. I mean, and so it was a report of an investigation about acts of abuse.

Senator BILL NELSON. What was your role in alerting the SECDEF to the danger posed to our theater strategy and the general perception around the world?

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir, and let me throw out gradations here. There are instances of people having been mistreated in their apprehension, transportation, and interrogation. That was—a level of poor performance and behavior on the part of our people was understood, but it was understood a fairly low level of abuse and incidence—rate of incidence. The scale of this was unknown to any of us. Had we known its scale, scope—the earlier we would have known, the sooner we would have been able to come to you, to the President, and to others to talk about it.

Senator BILL NELSON. You're saying you didn't know about that until last week?

Secretary CAMBONE. Scope, scale—until the pictures began appearing in the press, sir, I had no sense of that scope and scale. I knew of the problem, that there was abuse, that there was a criminal investigation, that there was an investigation being done by General Taguba, but I had no sense of it, sir.

Senator BILL NELSON. Okay, given that fact, why was the SECDEF unprepared when he came before us in the secure room in the Capitol on April 28, 2004—why was he unprepared to share the information that he knew of with Members—probably some 35 or 40 Members of the U.S. Senate?

Secretary CAMBONE. Sir, I don't—I can't answer for the SECDEF on that question. He was here. He spoke with this committee and gave his answers, I recall. I can't speak for him on why he did not raise it that evening. I don't know.

Senator BILL NELSON. You had not discussed that with him?

Secretary CAMBONE. That day, I had not discussed it with him, no, sir.

Senator BILL NELSON. Had you discussed it with him anytime before, after you learned, in mid-January, about these abuses?

Secretary CAMBONE. Again, I informed him that there were investigations underway, of which this is one of six or seven that I was informed of. I—again, I did not understand the scope and scale. If I had, I assure you, Senator, I would have told him.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Talent.

Senator TALENT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Secretary Cambone, very quickly, one of the things that I've wondered about, when you said you didn't recognize scope and scale, is it possible that not having seen the pictures, you didn't recognize what the significance of the pictures would be, in terms of the impact of this internationally?

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator TALENT. General Taguba, your report—I think if we summed it up, we'd say that the unit at the prison was under-disciplined, under-manned, and poorly led. Is that a fair summation?

General TAGUBA. Sir, very fair.

Senator TALENT. In the middle of an Army that I think all of us would agree is very well-disciplined and very well-led. So the question in my mind—well, how? Why is this particular unit so below the standards in performance of the rest of the United States Army? I'm going to make a comment, and you can comment on it if you want. I was in the other body all throughout the 1990s, during which time the highest civilian authorities here and on the other side of Pennsylvania Avenue were cutting the size of the Army, and, in my judgment, not funding adequately what—the end strength that we had remaining. What I saw consistently was the Army, in order to keep the tip of the spear sharp, if you will, allowing some of the rest of the spear to go rusty. Sooner or later, those chickens come home to roost. You have a poor commander, you don't have enough people, the guys you have are not trained up adequately because you don't have the money for it, and then something like this happens. I'll just say, I wish we had had the interest nationally through the 1990s about funding the Army adequately, and maybe we wouldn't all be sitting here.

General Smith, let me ask you a question. I had a phone call, actually, from a constituent who raised an issue that might help in one aspect of this. As I understand it, one of the difficulties with getting this up to the various highest civilian levels is that—the concern about command influence, because the same people that you'd want to report this through and to are the people who would be involved in passing on any court-martials that may emerge from this. I know this is a problem. My wife used to be in the JAG corps.

A constituent let me know that there is an office in the Air Force, the reporting office on special-interest cases, which is evidently designed to deal exactly with this. Are you aware of that office?

General SMITH. Sir, I'm not aware of that office, and this was in basically Army channels.

Senator TALENT. Right. What I'm wondering, and maybe to recommend to the SECDEF, this office exists for—as I am told, and we're checking this out in my office—in the Air Force to deal with cases like this. So you can—if you think something's of special significance, you can get it up to higher authority, but through a separate, specially-created chain of command so you don't compromise the command influence, and then you can get it to somebody who then has the discretion, if they want to, to go directly to the SECDEF or the Deputy SECDEF. We're certainly going to be looking—and I'd recommend it to you, if you're not aware of it, because evidently it functions pretty well in the Air Force. You're not aware of it, though, as of now, I take it.

Secretary CAMBONE. Now that you mention that office, yes, I recall that there is one, and I can tell you that the SECDEF has more than that on his list of ideas—or will have more than that on the list of his ideas.

Senator TALENT. Okay.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Secretary CAMBONE. You are right. Some way has got to be found to do this.

Senator TALENT. Yes, because we clearly have a defect in this. Command influence is a problem but I think everybody involved in this probably wishes they had just said, "The heck with command influence, we have to pick up the phone and call"——

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator TALENT.—"and let people know."

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir. Indeed, at least to the extent that the sergeant delivered the disk to the criminal investigative division (CID), he put in train, at least, a process that has brought all this to light.

Senator TALENT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator Dayton? I'm sorry, we have a different sheet, but I think Senator Nelson is preceding. All right, thank you very much.

Senator BEN NELSON. I hate to cheat my colleague from Minnesota out of his place, but——

Chairman WARNER. You've been getting here earlier and earlier each time. [Laughter.]

Senator BEN NELSON. I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I thank the witnesses today, as well, for your very strong statements about your opinions, as well as the nature of the investigations. I'm going to ignore some of the partisan sniping that's been going on from the other side today, because I don't think it's particularly helpful.

Having said that, General Taguba, in your opinion this is not a top-down problem. I think what you're saying is that this was something that may have been spontaneous, but an abuse involving only a handful—last week, the operative word was "few" individuals, but I think that right now I think that perhaps it's a limited number of people. Is that accurate?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir. Based on the interviews and the statements that were given to us by both the detainees, MP personnel, and those that we examined, there were others, but we just could not track them down.

Senator BEN NELSON. Who is the highest-ranking officer you interrogated?

General TAGUBA. My interviews, sir, Brigadier General Janice Karpinski.

Senator BEN NELSON. You didn't talk to General Sanchez?

General TAGUBA. No, sir.

Senator BEN NELSON. Did you talk to Colonel Pappas?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir, I did.

Senator BEN NELSON. Who's the highest-ranking official—not officer—you may have talked to?

General TAGUBA. Sir, none. I stopped at General Karpinski.

Senator BEN NELSON. So what may have happened above General Karpinski is an open book. In other words, it's not—or it's a closed book. No one knows what may or may not have occurred above that level. Is that accurate? Insofar as your investigation is concerned.

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir. She did intimate to me other officials from the CPA that she interacted with, in terms of the prison system, the Iraqi prison system, but I did not go after that. I did do a midcourse brief to General Sanchez and General McKiernan, but only in that we were proceeding on the timeline without any great delay.

Senator BEN NELSON. But General Karpinski says that her command was severed by the infusion of MI dealing with certain detainees. Is that accurate or an approximation of her statement?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I don't understand where her command authority—her command was severed from Abu Ghraib?

Senator BEN NELSON. Because others were put in, and she was given the instruction—Colonel Pappas appeared on the scene, and MI not under her command were there, as well. Is that accurate?

General TAGUBA. Sir, it's contained in my report that when I asked her if she had known about FRAGO 1108 dated 19 November, the first time—the only time I interviewed her—she had no knowledge of that until about 2 days afterwards, of which I asked her what did she do after that, and then she wanted clarification from her chain of command, when she was told that the FRAGO was, indeed, in effect, and that the MI brigade commander was the commander, the forward-operating base commander.

Senator BEN NELSON. Under those circumstances, if her command wasn't severed, was it at least interfered with, in your judgment?

General TAGUBA. Sir, truthfully, she challenged that.

Senator BEN NELSON. In what way?

General TAGUBA. She challenged the authority that was given to Colonel Pappas.

Senator BEN NELSON. What was the result of the challenge?

General TAGUBA. Sir, it created confusion and friction between those two commanders.

Senator BEN NELSON. So what we have now is confusion, a lack of clarity of command. We have a handful, at least, of spontaneous abusers, as it relates to detainees. Do we know whether, in that prison or in other prisons where there were criminal prisoners, as well, not detainees, whether there was any abuse that carried over into their lives?

General TAGUBA. Sir, the FRAGO only affected Abu Ghraib. Camp Bucca was still under the 800th MP brigade, exclusively. So was Camp Cropper and Camp Ashraf.

Senator BEN NELSON. Were the abuses there anywhere similar? Were there photographs there, as in the case of Abu Ghraib?

General TAGUBA. None that we gathered, in terms of evidence, no, sir.

Senator BEN NELSON. Those other prisons were under her command. Is that correct?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir. There were—you might consider abuse, but that was in terms of slapping a prisoner, and there were—

Senator BEN NELSON. Not similar type abuses as we have here.

General TAGUBA. Not to the gravity that was exposed, no, sir.

Senator BEN NELSON. And not photographs.

General TAGUBA. Not photographs, no, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator BEN NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Chambliss?

Senator CHAMBLISS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Taguba, it's refreshing to those of us who deal with the military every day, not only to look at your report, but to see your frankness here today. I think every military officer can certainly walk a little taller and a little straighter because of the work that all of you gentlemen are doing, but particularly, General, with respect to the way you have handled yourself and being willing to be critical where you need to be critical.

Now, General Smith, you made the statement earlier that this particular unit, the 800th MP brigade, was—they were trained—their job was this sort of stuff. Now, I'm assuming you mean from that that their job was to go over there and run this prison.

General SMITH. Sir—and maybe General Taguba can jump in on this a little bit—but I believe there are only one or two organizations of its type in the United States Army, and it is an internment and resettlement brigade.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Okay.

General SMITH. Is that correct, General?

General TAGUBA. That's correct, sir.

Senator CHAMBLISS. General Taguba, while General Schoomaker took exception to a comment I made the other day relative to the lack of training of this unit that just happened to be a Reserve unit, the fact of the matter is, there were a few dysfunctional individuals within this unit that, according to your report, was a very poorly trained unit that didn't have knowledge of what they were supposed to do. In fact, as I read your statement here, there's a general lack of knowledge, implementation, and emphasis of basic legal, regulatory, doctrinal, and command requirements within the 800th MP brigade and its subordinate units. Do you still stand by that statement?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir, I stand by that statement.

Senator CHAMBLISS. In fact, your report is replete with comments relative to the lack of training of this particular unit that was supposed to be highly specialized and trained to do exactly what they were sent there to do, isn't that correct?

General TAGUBA. Sir, when I interviewed the company commander and asked them to outline for me what training he received at the mobility station, he basically gave me the typical basic requirements to only marksmanship, things of that nature. When I asked him, "Did you get any additional training prior to your deployment and into deployment with regard to internment and resettlement or anything that has anything to do with detention operations," he said he did not.

I did not interview the battalion commander, the 320th MP battalion commander, because he invoked his rights; however, those that we interviewed within that chain of command also concluded that.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Okay.

General, there's something that has puzzled me throughout this process that's evolved over the last—or been made public over the last 10 days or so. One thing is the fact that Major General Ryder went in there in October and November 2003 and did a report. In his report, according to your report, his objective was to observe detention and prison operations, identify potential systemic and human rights issues, and provide near-term, mid-term, and long-term recommendations to improve operations in the Iraqi prison system. Yet during the time that he was there, in Abu Ghraib, some of these incidents were occurring. I think your report confirms that. Certainly when he testified the other day before the Intelligence Committee, that was obvious. I have asked the question, privately and publicly, why didn't somebody come forward and tell Major General Ryder about this during the time that he was there when these incidents were going on? Do you have any—can you shed any light on that particular question?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I read General Ryder's report. I did not discuss it with him. I know that within the content of his report he visited quite a bit of the detention centers, not just exclusively Abu Ghraib. The results, of course, were his recommendations, I agreed with, in terms of putting things under single command and control, things of that nature. I don't want to speculate about anything with regards to any knowledge of detainee abuse having not been reported or being reported up the chain of command. It was apparent in our investigation that these things were happening, but we were puzzled also at the fact, sir, that none of this stuff was going above the battalion commander level. That's what we concluded, that none of this stuff was going above the battalion commander level.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Okay, thank you, General.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

The committee will continue right through the first vote, and if there's a second, likewise, until every Senator has had their opportunity to ask questions.

Next week we have our bill on the floor, according to the current schedule, so, in all likelihood, we'll have to suspend this series of hearings until after the bill has been considered.

Senator BILL NELSON. Mr. Chairman, will we continue with a second round?

Chairman WARNER. No, Senator, because I think we would be infringing on the policy counsels for both parties.

Thank you very much.

Senator Dayton.

Senator DAYTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thank you for holding today's hearings, and for your resolve to face these atrocities. You're an honorable man, and would that everyone shared your resolve to find the truth rather than to deny it or deflect it.

Unfortunately, we in this committee were overshadowed yesterday by President Bush's words and actions, traveling to the Pentagon with the Vice President to tell the SECDEF, the country, and the world, "You're doing a superb job." The President looked at a dozen more pictures of abuse, and reportedly shook his head in disgust, but the apologies, regrets, and mea culpas are now history. It's back to business as usual.

If anyone missed those subtleties, the Vice President was even more direct over the weekend when he said, "People ought to get off of his case and let him do his job," referring to the SECDEF. In other words, we should stop meddling and interfering and let them go back to running the war.

This morning illustrates the difficulty in a hearing to get beyond the words to the realities. General Taguba's report and directness here today are notable exceptions. But it shows why the pictures made such a difference. They showed us the truth. Most of the words today have managed to obscure that truth. We're told there were papers and procedures, policies and protocols, there were directives given, conditions set, and everyone followed the Geneva Conventions, international law, United States principles, except for a few people, who did very bad things unbeknownst to anyone else, all of whom were doing what they were doing to save American lives. So let's dispense with this and get back to our good intentions, the great progress going unreported in 95 percent of Iraq, the upcoming handoff of democracy to whoever the recipients shall be.

That's why those pictures are so disruptive, because they defy that sanitizing. They can't be obscured by non-descriptions like, "the inappropriate behavior of a sexual nature," which were words used to describe the forced masturbation of one detainee or the rape of another. That's why Pentagon officials are reportedly preventing the additional pictures from being publicly released.

The White House communications director said that the President wants the Pentagon to, "use its best judgment about the release of the photos." Well, we've seen where that best judgment has gotten us so far, and I think it's deplorable that they intend, again, to try to suppress the truth and all the truth from the American people.

Chairman WARNER. Senator, having worked on that question with the DOD, at this point in time the decision as to public release is an ongoing review. To the best of my knowledge, as of late last night, no final decision has been made by the DOD, the White House, or others.

Senator DAYTON. All right. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

If you go elsewhere—and thank goodness for a free and vigilant press, because I don't think we would find most of this out any other way—but there is an ICRC report which describes excessive patterns of—patterns of excessive force used by U.S. soldiers in prisons, and not just the one subject to this investigation, but throughout the country. The ICRC wrote that ill treatment during capture was frequent, that it often included pushing people around, insulting, taking aim with rifles, punching, kicking, striking, which seem to go beyond—seem to reflect a usual modus operandi, and appear to go beyond the reasonable, legitimate, proportional use of force required to apprehend suspects or restrain persons resisting arrest or capture.

The published reports say that as many as 43,000 Iraqis were detained at various times, and that an estimated 90 percent of them were determined to have not had any involvement in the matters that are under—that were of concern to U.S. authorities, that only 600 were turned over for prosecution, that 8,000 remain in detention now for indefinite periods of time, although I gather that there are now steps being taken to release all but 2,000 of them.

My time is up, but I'm just going to complete here by just referring to one individual who said he was taken from a barbershop where he was getting a shave, and he was beaten with pipes, starting on his legs and back, and moving to his head. He was bleeding from his mouth and ears, he fainted. When he woke up, he was in a dog's cage at a local military base. He was left naked in the cage for several days, receiving only scant food and water, until soldiers hung him from a tree by his cuffed hands, "They told me they would bring my wife and hang her next to me." I don't take any pleasure in recounting these incidents, but I take umbrage that there are still those who want to deny that they occurred to any degree or those that want to ascribe other motives to those of us who are just trying to face up to them.

I want the United States to succeed in Iraq. I'm deeply concerned that what's occurred there is going to cause further violence that will come down on our troops, that will bear the brunt of this, and set back our ability to meet our objectives there. But I don't see how that's going to be served by trying to obscure or deny what's occurring there or what has occurred there and make sure—try to make sure it doesn't happen again there or anywhere else in the world.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My time's expired.

Chairman WARNER. I thank you, Senator.

Senator Cornyn.

Senator CORNYN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Taguba, Chairman Warner asked, I believe, earlier, the question, "What went wrong?" You answered, there was a failure of leadership from the brigade level on down—and down. In your investigation, did you find any evidence—any evidence whatsoever—that culpability extended beyond the brigade level?

General TAGUBA. No, sir, we did not. However, we did recommend, based on some evidence that we gathered of the complicity of MI interrogators, and we recommended that a separate investigation be provided under Procedure 15 of 380–10.

Senator CORNYN. How many individuals do you believe were involved in this abuse at Abu Ghraib?

General TAGUBA. Sir, directly, there were those six or seven, I believe. I know that the ongoing investigation continues under Article 32. I don't know of any others. In terms of those soldiers' supervisors and leaders, I enumerated that on my report. I believe there was a total of 17 there that I identified.

Senator CORNYN. So there were seven—there was disciplinary action taken against the seven supervisors, and then there was the actual criminal charges that have now been brought, I guess, against another seven, is that correct?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir. Those were the criminal investigations, but I'm not involved in that whole process, but my investigation was purely administrative, to gather facts and circumstances that were related to detainee abuse and the other things that I mentioned to you earlier, principally their leaders.

Senator CORNYN. I ask those questions because I'm concerned that there are those who are suggesting that somehow what you have said was exceptional misconduct on the part of these guards and their supervising—their superior officers was somehow the norm. Indeed, there was a question asked earlier, attempting to suggest that this was the implementation of policies and procedures that are in existence at Guantanamo Bay. There was a question asked about whether Guantanamo Bay was somehow the baseline, and that now that represented the norm, and this was the logical conclusion of those policies and procedures at Guantanamo Bay.

I have to tell you that, like other members of the committee, no doubt, I've traveled to Guantanamo Bay because of my interest in the detention of the individuals there who—of course, who plan, finance, and execute terrorist acts against Americans and other innocent civilians. I had an opportunity to meet General Geoffrey Miller, who was the commander of the Joint Task Force at Guantanamo. I was very impressed with the treatment, with the policies and procedures that allowed the humane interrogation of detainees there.

Let me just ask you, is there any—whether they're enemy combatants or unlawful combatants or common criminals, is there any policy that you're aware of in the United States military that allows for less than humane treatment of detainees?

General TAGUBA. No, sir. I did not find that anywhere.

Senator CORNYN. Of course, we are concerned about the atypical conduct on the part of these individuals who committed these crimes, and those who failed to see that they got the supervision and the leadership necessary in order to avoid these crimes. But I must add my voice to those of others that say, while we are absolutely committed to getting to the bottom of this—and your report gets us a long way there—and of making sure that the guilty are held accountable, we can't forget the context in which all of this is taking place, and that is in a larger context of many other military troops serving honorably in Iraq and Afghanistan and elsewhere, and the need to get essential information from some of these detainees that could well protect America from the next 9/11.

So I want to commend you and the others for the wonderful service that you're performing, and thank you for helping us get to the bottom of this. I hope that we will ultimately be successful in doing so, holding those accountable who are responsible, and then making sure we focus on our greater and more important job of making sure that America's safe in this war on terror.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator CLINTON.

Senator CLINTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to join in thanking you, General Taguba, for your service and for this report.

I don't think anyone disagrees with the last comment by my colleague that our objective is to both prosecute this war on terrorism successfully and also to ensure the safety and security of our own people from future attacks. The question is whether behavior and conduct and decisions with respect to the treatment of these detainees undermine the potential success that we all agree is essential to our national security.

I am still confused, and my confusion is this. With respect to the actions that are described in your report, General Taguba, you also included a number of other problems at other detention facilities. But is it your best information that no detention facility that was in any way connected with the 800th MP brigade had the level of problems that you reported in this unit at Abu Ghraib?

General TAGUBA. Yes, ma'am. The scope, again, was within the context of those facilities that the 800th MP operated.

Senator CLINTON. The 800th MP brigade was under the command of General Karpinski. Is that correct?

General TAGUBA. Yes, ma'am.

Senator CLINTON. Now, if the problems were severe and located principally in this one unit, then I think it is appropriate to follow the chain of command up to the decision to send General Miller to that prison, where, as I understand the testimony thus far, he set up a specific joint interrogation unit. He did, however one wants to describe it, either coordinate or direct the MP's involvement in the conditioning of the detainees. Is that a correct statement, General?

General TAGUBA. Yes, ma'am.

Senator CLINTON. All right. So it seems to me that if, indeed, General Miller was sent from Guantanamo to Iraq for the purpose of acquiring more actionable intelligence from detainees, then it is fair to conclude that the actions that are at point here in your report are in some way to General Miller's arrival and his specific orders, however they were interpreted by those MPs and the MI that were involved. Therefore, I, for one, don't believe I yet have adequate information from Mr. Cambone in the DOD as to exactly what General Miller's orders were, what kind of reports came back up the chain of command as to how he carried out those orders, and the connection between his arrival in the fall of 2003 and the intensity of the abuses that occurred afterwards.

Now, we know that General Karpinski has been rightly singled out for appropriate concern about her behavior and her failure of command. But I just want to read to you a comment she made in an interview, which I find extraordinary. I quote, "But when I looked at those pictures, and when I continued to see those pictures, I don't think that there was anything that was improperly done, because this wasn't something that was a violation of a procedure. This was something they were instructed to do as a completely new procedure. I'm not sure that those MPs had ever been confronted with any instructions like this before."

General Taguba, can you explain for us the disparity between holding this brigade commander completely accountable, and the comments that I just read to you, in light of the fact that certainly the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade was given tactical control over that prison? Can you explain General Karpinski's comment?

General TAGUBA. Yes, ma'am. During the course of our investigation, there was clear evidence, based on my interview of General Karpinski and Colonel Pappas, that there was friction between those two commanders in the operation of Abu Ghraib. The dissension was who was in charge of—when, and at what time. They could not explain. So that's the context of the ambiguity of the order that was given to Colonel Pappas. It was clear that he was directed to be the forward operating base commander there for security detainees and force protection. However, General Karpinski challenged that, and she noted that in her recorded testimony. Point one.

I held her accountable and responsible, not exclusively and solely for the abuse cases there at Abu Ghraib, but the context of her leadership, the lack of leadership on her part overall, in terms of her training, the standards, supervisory omission, the command climate in her brigade. Those were all, in totality, why I held her accountable and responsible, ma'am.

Senator CLINTON. Just one last follow-up, General. Did Colonel Pappas report directly to General Miller?

General TAGUBA. That I did not know because General Miller was not there. He reported, I believe, to CJTF-7.

Senator CLINTON. General Smith, do you know who Colonel Pappas reported directly to?

General SMITH. Yes, ma'am. Through CJTF-7. Ma'am, General Miller had no command relationship in this at all. He came over to do an investigation and make some findings and recommendations on how to improve. Nobody reported to him. He had no relationship whatsoever, other than to report details.

Senator INHOFE [presiding]. Thank you, Senator Clinton.

Senator Graham.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, Senator.

I think they've left, but just a few minutes ago there were some foreign military officers who came to the hearing, and I would just want to say, for the record, that I'm very proud of the fact that our military command system, civilian and military, comes out in the open, is asked hard questions, and has to appear before the public.

You've documented, General Taguba, some failings. I think we're failing the country ourselves up here a bit. I think we're overly politicizing this. This should be what binds us, not what tears us apart. I think Republicans and Democrats may have a different view of a lot of things, but it seems to me that investigating a prison abuse scandal, when you say you're the good guys, should pull you together, not tear you apart. I would just hope my colleagues can understand that when you say you're the good guys, you have to act as the good guys.

So, General Taguba, how long have you been in uniform?

General TAGUBA. Sir, this is my 32nd year.

Senator GRAHAM. Saddam Hussein is in our control. How would you feel if we sicced dogs on him tomorrow?

General TAGUBA. Sir, on Saddam Hussein?

Senator GRAHAM. Yes.

General TAGUBA. Sir, we still have to follow the tenets of international law.

Senator GRAHAM. As much as you and I dislike him, as mean a tyrant as he is, and you know he'd kill us all tomorrow, I am so proud of you. What are we fighting for, General Taguba, in Iraq? To be like Saddam Hussein? Is that what we're fighting for?

General TAGUBA. No, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Our standard, General Smith, can never be to be like Saddam Hussein, can it be, sir?

General SMITH. No, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. How long have you been in the service?

General SMITH. Thirty-four years.

Senator GRAHAM. Is it okay with you if the ICRC comes and looks at our prisons?

General SMITH. Absolutely, sir, and they should.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. God bless you both.

General Taguba, it comes down to this for me. You have one prison that was run differently than other prisons. The photo we see of the detainee on the stool, wired up, was that just six or seven people having a good time in a perverted way at that person's expense, or is there something deeper going on there, and do you know?

General TAGUBA. Sir, based on the evidence, it was six or seven people who created that type of a scenario or situation.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. To the dog scenario, where you see the detainee with two dogs, was that a couple of guards with dogs in a perverted way having a good time, or was there something else going on?

General TAGUBA. No, sir. The dogs were invited in there according to written statements, and collaborated by interviews, by the two MP guards.

Senator GRAHAM. The way these people were stacked up in sexual positions and the sexual activity, was that just individual guards or was that part of something else going on?

General TAGUBA. Sir, those were individual acts, as based again on interviews and statements and collaborated by the detainees' statements.

Senator GRAHAM. Part of the defense that we're going to be hearing about in these court-martials is that the people that we're charging are going to say this system that we see photographic evidence of was at least encouraged, if not directed, by others. Do you think that's an accurate statement?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I would say that they were probably influenced by others—

Senator GRAHAM. Okay.

General TAGUBA. —but not necessarily directed specifically by others.

Senator GRAHAM. We're not going to have a seminar in military law today, but I have a different view of command influence than some people have suggested, in terms of what we can disclose and how it would affect court-martials. There is another level of accountability in the military beyond just participating in out-of-bounds behavior, Geneva Conventions or otherwise. Do you agree with me that the UCMJ prevents this conduct regardless of the Geneva Conventions?

General TAGUBA. Absolutely.

Senator GRAHAM. So, ladies and gentlemen, what we're here today is to show the world that our military is governed by the rule of law, just like all of us. Having been a JAG officer for over 20 years, a prosecutor, a defense attorney, and now a Reserve judge, I have great confidence that we will get to the bottom of this. Do you agree with that, General Smith?

General SMITH. Yes, sir, I do.

Senator GRAHAM. Now, dereliction of duty is a concept unique to military law. It probably should apply to us in politics. A lot of us would be in trouble, probably me included, if that were the case. But in the military, as a commander, it can be a criminal offense if you derelict your duty to maintain good order and discipline in a way that crosses the line. Is that correct?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. You interviewed a general officer. In your report, you indicated that you thought that general officer misled you about how many times that person had been to the prison system. Is that correct?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir. That was collaborated by her own aide.

Senator GRAHAM. I would suggest to you, General Taguba, that out of this investigation, not only should we focus on the privates and the sergeants and the specialists who did criminal activity, but we also should have a higher accountability, that if a general officer misrepresents what they did, in terms of command and control, that a letter of reprimand may not be the appropriate sanction. But I will leave that discussion for others.

Colonel Phillabaum?

General TAGUBA. Colonel Phillabaum, yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Your description of his time there was classic dereliction of duty. You have recommended a letter of reprimand for him.

General TAGUBA. Relief from command, sir, and to be removed from a promotion list.

Senator GRAHAM. My point is that Secretary Rumsfeld should not be held accountable for the criminal activity of others. It would be unfair to any military commander, politician, or otherwise to have to take a fall when people break the law and take the law in their own hands. However, those of us in responsibility do have a burden to bear.

Senator INHOFE. Senator Graham, your time has expired.

Senator GRAHAM. Can I just end with this one thought, Mr. Chairman?

Senator INHOFE. Yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Secretary Rumsfeld has to manage the whole war. I think it would be unfair for him to take a fall if this is just a limited activity of a few people or of a prison poorly run. At the end of the day, General Taguba, responsibility, command and otherwise, is very much part of the military law and culture, and I appreciate what you've done to expose the failings.

Thank you very much.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Senator Graham.

Senator Bayh.

Senator BAYH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, gentlemen, for your presence here today.

Two quick questions for you, Mr. Cambone, then one observation that if any of you want to react to, I would appreciate it. I apologize for moving expeditiously, but there is a vote that is about to expire.

Mr. Cambone, I'd like to follow up on the questions of some others—I think Senator McCain started, and then it was touched upon a little bit later—with regard to Ambassador Bremer's warnings.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Senator BAYH. The published reports indicate that he began raising these warnings in about August of last year. As I understand your testimony, these were sort of general in nature, about the overcrowding and the concern for transiting people through there and returning them to their civilian situation when they didn't need to be retained any longer.

The ICRC report came to his attention in February or March, and you seemed to imply that perhaps his warnings became more specific with regard to activities in the prison thereafter. Is that the case?

Secretary CAMBONE. With respect to the first part of your question, sir—or your statement—I believe that to be the case. That is to say, I was not in communications with Ambassador Bremer, nor know of any statements by him specific to these abuses.

Senator BAYH. So in these meetings with the SECDEF, you were never present?

Secretary CAMBONE. I did not know of those. I did know of his general concern, as you said, for the prison population.

Senator BAYH. What about following the ICRC report?

Secretary CAMBONE. With respect to the 2004 report, I can only tell you, again, what I know, and that is that there was a meeting in that time frame, of February, at which members of the—senior members of the CPA staff met with members of the ICRC, and this report was made available. From that, there were some communications from CPA to the State Department and elsewhere with respect to these concerns.

Senator BAYH. About these abuses.

Secretary CAMBONE. That's what I think I know. Sir, I did not see the ICRC report until I began working my way into this problem over the last 2 weeks.

Senator BAYH. My second question involves the dispute between you and the general about who had tactical control at the prison. As I understand it, he believes that the MI individuals did exert practical tactical control, and it's your opinion that they did not. As I understand your position, the intelligence authorities were given control over the facility, but not control over the individuals running the facility. What exactly does that mean? How do you have control over a facility, but not the people who are running it? What were they in charge of, the plumbing or the—Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir. In the same way that you have a building supervisor who doesn't tell the tenants how to do their business. In other words, you do require someone who is senior in command to be able to be responsible for the facility—that is, for its security from outside activity, internal security, the care and feeding of folks, all of those administrative and logistics tasks that go with running a large facility. Then there are, within that facility, a number of operations and activities that take place, which are under the command of other individuals, and those individuals are responsible for the exercise of command over those activities.

Senator BAYH. That's a layman's opinion. General, I'd be interested in your opinion. It seems to me the attempt here to draw this line may have contributed to the confusion about who was in charge, which may have led to some of these troubles. General, is that a fair comment?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir. We followed doctrine in the context of our investigation as a matter of our baselines. We used those as references. Doctrinally, TACON, as given to Colonel Pappas, was that his mission was for security detainees and force protection. Doctrinally, if you are TACON to him, he establishes priorities.

Secretary CAMBONE. That doesn't go, sir, though, to the heart of his being able to give what would have been—and, General, correct me—unlawful orders to the commander of that MP battalion.

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir.

General SMITH. Nor, sir, does it allow him to change their mission. In other words, they're trained to a specific task. It's the person with operational control that is allowed to change how they do business and the like. So as General Taguba said, he can change the priorities for these folks, but they still have to operate within the guidelines and the doctrine that they are trained to. So they are still cops doing cop business.

Senator BAYH. General?

General TAGUBA. Sir, there were established standards two, in fact—that were signed by Lieutenant General Sanchez that stipulated what you can and cannot do. Those were clear. However, the failing here was that some leaders just did not comply with it. They were posted for a purpose, sir, and there are certain standards that they have to follow.

Senator BAYH. Compounded by a number of other things, including lack of uniformity in training.

My last comment—and this gets to the dilemma; we face this repeatedly in the intelligence arena, Mr. Chairman—and that is the following. Timely and accurate intelligence information is essential to our protecting our troops, civilians, winning the war against this insurrection and the larger war against terrorism. At the same time, preserving our honor and our moral integrity is also vitally important, in the longer term, to winning this struggle, because that, at the end of the day, is what differentiates us from those with whom we fight.

Now, it seems to me there are—you've laid our, all of you, in your testimony—we begin taking our instruction, but how do you draw the line? How do you draw the line between vigorous but acceptable interrogation versus morphing into abuse? We start with the Geneva Conventions, as general principles. I think, Mr. Cambone, you then used the term "approved interrogation techniques," of which there were 20 or 30, so we try and refine that general guidance into more specific guidance. Then exceptions are allowed at the behest or the direction of the commander, who, I assume, in this case, would have been General Sanchez, is that correct?

General SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator BAYH. I assume he didn't authorize any exemptions.

General SMITH. No.

Senator BAYH. That's the process that we go through in trying to determine where the line is, what you can do and what you can't do.

I'd just like to conclude by saying, I think it is absolutely critical that we enforce the line as we defined it, vigorously, hold those who crossed it to account to show that we don't tolerate this kind of thing. But let's learn the lessons of the past, as well. We are currently trying to overcome some past intelligence abuses, 20, 30 years ago, and our reaction to those abuses that have hamstrung us in the covert arena, and otherwise. So let's draw the line, bright and clear. Let's institute training. Let's hold commanders who don't insist that the line be followed to account, as well as the foot soldiers. But let's not throw the baby out with the bath water, because gaining access to appropriate information is also important as we also preserve our moral integrity and our honor.

Secretary CAMBONE. Thank you for that, Senator. If I may say, in trying to answer the committee's questions today on these issues, if in any way I suggested that if we find that there was misconduct or misbehavior or inappropriate behavior on the part of anyone associated with the MI side of this, which General Fay is now looking at today, I can assure you and other members of this committee that we will be back here, and we will tell you that.

Senator BAYH. Thank you.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Senator Bayh.

Senator Lieberman.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thanks to the witnesses.

In absentia, I wanted to thank Chairman Warner and Senator Levin for the speed and intensity with which they have convened this series of hearings, and I thank you gentlemen for being here.

We have a real challenge here, which is to deal with this inhumane, immoral, unacceptable, un-American behavior that happened in this prison, and maybe others—I want to ask some questions about that—and to do it as quickly as we can so that we can get back to fighting the war on terrorism, and to do it in so comprehensive and aggressive a way that we do not allow, or even failitate unintentionally, the erosion of public support in this country for the critically important mission our troops are performing in Iraq and in the broader war against terrorism. That's why I appreciate these hearings. In that regard, I think the comprehensiveness of our investigation—yours, really—is critically important.

General TAGUBA, I just want to make clear, when you were asked to investigate, you were asked to investigate conditions at Abu Ghraib and two of the other most populated prison facilities in Iraq, is that correct?

General TAGUBA. Yes, sir. Matters related to training, standards, internal policies, and the like, yes, sir.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Are there other prison facilities in Iraq beyond those three, therefore, that have not been reviewed, or are they being reviewed now for conduct that we're concerned about?

General TAGUBA. Sir, I did not go beyond the four that I looked at during the course of the investigation, and I believe a subsequent investigation by the Army IG conducted that following my investigation. They looked at other facilities, also.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Is that General Ryder's investigation?

Secretary CAMBONE. No, sir, there's an independent investigation put in train by the acting Secretary of the Army that covers all—as I understand it—not only facilities in Iraq, but in Afghanistan, as well.

Senator LIEBERMAN. That was my next question. Afghanistan, as well.

General SMITH. That is ongoing, Senator.

Senator LIEBERMAN. That is ongoing?

General SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator LIEBERMAN. In the sense that it predates this scandal?

General SMITH. No, sir. It continues today.

Senator LIEBERMAN. I gotcha. So that—would it be fair for you to say, through us, to the American people, that we are essentially looking everywhere throughout the American military prison system to make sure nothing like what happened at the Abu Ghraib prison is occurring anywhere else?

General SMITH. I would have to look at the specific charge that the Department of Army IG was given, but I believe that to be the case, certainly.

Secretary CAMBONE. With respect to the CENTCOM area of responsibility (AOR) and the handling of prisoners there, and terrorists who are in detention, the SECDEF has asked the Secretary of the Navy to take a look, as well, as Charleston and in other places where there may be internees.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Okay, that's very important. Let me come back. Obviously you will continue to report to us on the conclusions of those investigations.

I had an exchange with Secretary Rumsfeld on Friday that reverberated in my own mind over the weekend. I think one of the other Senators may have asked one of you a question about this. It is about the relevance of the Geneva Conventions to the prisoners being held in Iraq. I had read various statements by the SECDEF and others that confused me on this, because I don't think the Geneva Conventions were being applied precisely to detainees. In response to—in Iraq—my question on Friday, Secretary Rumsfeld said the President announced from the outset that everyone in Iraq who was a military person and was detained is a prisoner of war; therefore, the Geneva Conventions apply.

Second, continuing with the Secretary's statement, the decision was made that civilians or criminal elements that are detainees are also treated subject to the Geneva Conventions, although it is a different element of it.

At an earlier point in an interview he did on television, he—and this is, I think, what was asked—before he said that they're not entitled to the Geneva Conventions—oh, I'm sorry, here it is—"The decision was made that the Geneva Conventions did not precisely apply, but every individual would be treated as though the Geneva Conventions did apply." So, first of all, my staff can't find the statement that the President made announcing that policy. Secretary Cambone, I would ask you—

Secretary CAMBONE. Sir, I'd be happy to get that for you, and I'm happy to ask the SECDEF this afternoon what, indeed, he had in mind in that expression. Senator Levin asked that question earlier, and I will ask him, and I will get you an answer.

Senator LIEBERMAN. I would appreciate that. As part of that, I would ask General Taguba or General Smith to respond to this part of it. How do we—there's a report in one of the papers today, based on an ICRC Report, that 70 to 90 percent of the detainees, according to the ICRC, were captured without solid evidence of their guilt, but—and the numbers are large—is there a process for determining—considering what Secretary Rumsfeld said on Friday—who is an EPW, and who is a detainee? Who's military, and, therefore, treated as a prisoner, or who's a detainee, and, therefore, who gets the higher level of rights, legally?

Secretary CAMBONE. We have at the moment very few, as I recall, EPWs left in the system. What we have, primarily, are those who have posed a threat to the security of the coalition forces, the Iraqi Government, the Iraqi people, or others who may have committed crimes of one kind or another against Iraqi citizens. There are some of those latter who are, as I understand it, in custody and being in the custody of Iraqi security police and things of that sort, and they are in a process to be brought forward before an Iraqi judicial process, which, itself, is slowly and painfully standing up.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Okay. So my final question—and I think my time is up, maybe I should ask you to bring it back to the Pentagon and then respond to it if you could—is the status, which is—because, as I read the Geneva Conventions, I think that detainees have rights under the convention. They're a lot lower than the rights of prisoners of war. So I'm confused by what seems to be the policy that Secretary Rumsfeld articulated on Friday, that though they're not entitled to the rights of Geneva Conventions, that we're giving it to them.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir. I will take one more step on behalf of my General Counsel, and I will offer you him—

Senator LIEBERMAN. Fine.

Secretary CAMBONE. —for a period of time, to come by and brief you and other Senators, as you might wish, Mr. Chairman, on precisely how this has unfolded, so that there is no confusion left in the committee or in the American people about where we stand on the Geneva Conventions.

Senator LIEBERMAN. I appreciate that.

Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER [presiding]. Thank you, Senator.

I will be discussing, with the SECDEF and others, the other witnesses that I think should come before the committee, and I am considering the General Counsel, given his expertise in this area. So we'll do that.

Secretary CAMBONE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. I wish to thank the SECDEF, through you, Mr. Secretary, for the cooperation in putting together this series of hearings that we're holding today.

I would ask now, do you or any other witness have a response to a question or wish to make any added statement before we close out this morning's record?

Secretary CAMBONE. I do. Sir, I ordinarily begin my presentations here by saying that it's a pleasure. This is not. It is a duty and a responsibility. We take it seriously. General Dayton's point, we will get to the bottom of this.

Moreover, I would like to thank you for your courtesies. They are important to all of us who are grappling with a very difficult problem. In the end, we will answer this committee's questions and those of the other committees of Congress to the best of our knowledge, with as much knowledge as we have at the time we are asked the question. Sir, therefore, I say to you, if we read through this record and we find we have made a mistake, I have misspoken on the Geneva Conventions or I have told you something about command relationships that is incorrect, I would beg your indulgence to allow us to correct that record as quickly and as accurately as we can, and make any changes known to every member of the committee when we do so.

Chairman WARNER. I thank you for that offer, and it will be done.

Secretary CAMBONE. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. This afternoon we'll be having Lieutenant General Keith B. Alexander—he's the Deputy Chief of Staff, G-2, United States Army, handling intelligence matters; Major General Ronald L. Burgess, Jr., Director for Intelligence, J-2, The Joint Staff; and Major General Thomas J. Romig, Judge Advocate General, United States Army.

If there are no other comments, I thank my colleagues for the sincerity, the tremendous time that each of them is putting in to prepare for this hearing. I think it has been a very successful hearing. I thank you, Secretary Cambone, General Smith, and General Taguba. The hearing is adjourned.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN

ABU GHRAIB CHAIN OF COMMAND

1. Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Cambone and General Smith, I would like to request a document that will lay out the entire chain of command, from the guards and interrogators in the prison all the way up to the SECDEF. I believe we need to see exactly how this chain of command operated, who it included, and who was ordering the personnel in Abu Ghraib to act in this way. Under whose authority did the prison personnel operate and who issued instructions governing prison operations? Can you provide such a document to this committee?

Secretary CAMBONE. The military police operated under the command of the 372nd Military Police Company of the 800th Military Police Brigade. The interrogators were controlled by the Joint Interrogation Debriefing Center (JIDC) and the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade. Tab 1 contains the charts that reflect the chain of command, and has been previously provided to the Senate Armed Services Committee.

General SMITH. The premise of the question implies that abuse was ordered at some level. This is not established fact and certainly was not the policy of CJTF-7 or CENTCOM. Specific written policies were in effect and signed by Lieutenant General Sanchez that emphasized applicability of the Geneva—Hague Conventions and the importance of treating all protected persons in a humane manner.

The interrogator chain of command was as follows:

Interrogator—205th MI Bde—CJTF-7—CENTCOM—SECDEF.

The MP chain of command was as follows:

Guard—320th MP Battalion—800th MP Bde—[CJTF-7/CFLCC]¹—CENTCOM—SECDEF.

GITMO-IZING ABU GHRAIB

2. Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Cambone, General Smith, and General Taguba, it has been reported that General Miller wanted to GITMO-ize the confinement operations at Abu Ghraib prison because of your concern in that facility that MI was not getting the information from detainees like he thought they should be. What did he mean by GITMO-izing Abu Ghraib prison?

Secretary CAMBONE. I am unaware of any such statement being made by MG Miller.

General SMITH. CENTCOM is not in a position to speculate about what Major General Miller might have meant by the phrase “GITMO-ize Abu Ghraib” attributed to him in Senator McCain’s question. Major General Miller was not assigned to CENTCOM during the period in which he is alleged to have made that remark nor was he conducting his review at CENTCOM’s request. Also, his perception of the facility may have changed since his recent assignment to our AOR. Recommend directing this question to General Miller who is in a better position to respond as to his intention.

General TAGUBA. I have never been to Guantanamo so I would not know specifically what Major General Miller meant by the term “GITMO-izing” Abu Ghraib Prison. This question should be directed to Major General Miller.

GUANTANAMO BAY

3. Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Cambone and General Smith, are you comfortable with the open-ended detentions at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba?

Secretary CAMBONE. The United States has no interest in holding detainees at Guantanamo Bay any longer than is necessary. However, hostilities in the war on terrorism continue and we do not intend to take any action that would present an undue risk to our security interests. Within that framework, the U.S. Government has released and transferred out of detention at Guantanamo 140 detainees. Additionally, DOD has instituted an Administrative Review Board and procedures to determine annually if enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay should be released, transferred, or continue to be retained. I expect this comprehensive review process to result in additional detainee transfers and releases.

General SMITH. To the extent these detainees represent a real threat to safety and security, their continued internment is necessary and essential for the protection of U.S. forces, our coalition allies, and the American people.

GENERAL OFFICER APPROVAL OF INTERROGATION TACTICS

4. Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Cambone, General Smith, and General Taguba, General Miller announced that certain practices would be discontinued, including hooding, stress positioning, and sleep deprivation, but that they would be permitted with approval by a general officer. Under what authority can a general officer permit these techniques?

¹ CJTF-7 had TACON of 800th MP Bde, CFLCC had OPCON of 800th MP Bde.

Secretary CAMBONE. This matter was reviewed extensively in the Kern/Fay investigation, on which the committee held hearings. Further, General Sanchez and General Abizaid testified before the committee and discussed their authorities in detail.

General SMITH. Practices not violative of international or national law or contrary to regulations issued by higher authority may be approved by a commander pursuant to the exercise of his command authority.

General TAGUBA. These practices were outlined in a CJTF-7 memorandum dated 12 October 2003, Subject: Interrogation and Counter Resistance Policy in which such practices would have to be approved by the Commander, 205th MI Brigade or by Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, CG CJTF-7. Commanders may approve practices which do not violate international or national law or which are not contrary to regulations issued by a higher authority.

CAUSE OF DEATH OF FORMER HEAD OF IRAQ'S AIR FORCE

5. Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Cambone, General Smith, and General Taguba, the Denver Post reports an allegation that the former head of the Iraqi Air Force died during interrogation when he was rolled up inside a sleeping bag so only his feet stuck out, and then sat on and rolled back and forth until he died of suffocation. Apparently the investigation concluded that this was a death from "natural causes." What can you tell me about this?

Secretary CAMBONE. The case concerns Major General Mowhosh, the former Iraqi Air Defense commander. General Mowhosh died on November 26, 2003, at Forward Operating Base Tiger, in western Iraq. The U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command was notified of the death and initiated an investigation that same day. The Office of the Armed Forces Medical Examiner (OAFME) performed an autopsy on December 2, 2003, with preliminary indications that the manner of death was a homicide and the cause of death was asphyxia. OAFME issued a death certificate on May 12, 2004. I am advised that there is a criminal investigation into this incident.

General SMITH. At the 3d Armed Cavalry Regiment detention facility (FOB Tiger) in Iraq, an Iraqi detainee, Iraqi Army Major General A. Mowhosh, believed to be former Chief of Army Air Defense, died while in U.S. custody. On 26 November 2003, the detainee died while undergoing interrogation by MI soldiers. An autopsy was conducted which disclosed evidence of blunt force trauma to the body. The preliminary report, however, lists the cause of death as asphyxia due to smothering and chest compressions. The manner of death is listed as homicide. A criminal investigation is still ongoing.

General TAGUBA. I have no knowledge regarding the cause of death of this detainee.

EVIDENCE OF ABUSE IN OTHER U.S.-OPERATED DETENTION SITES

6. Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Cambone, General Smith, and General Taguba, have you seen any evidence of abuses at other detention centers in Iraq, at Guantanamo, in Afghanistan, or at any other detention center operated by the U.S. worldwide?

Secretary CAMBONE. As of late August, of the more than 50,000 individuals apprehended and detained since the beginning of hostilities, there have been about 300 cases of alleged detainee abuse across the Joint Operations Areas. 157 individual investigations have been completed and 66 cases were substantiated so far. Of those 66, 8 occurred in Guantanamo, 3 in Afghanistan, and 55 in Iraq. About one third of these cases occurred prior to, the detention facilities at the point of capture or tactical collection point, frequently under trying circumstances.

There has also been a series of 11 major, comprehensive investigations conducted prior to and since the situation at Abu Ghraib became known. Eight of these are complete and have been briefed to Congress or otherwise released. As the remaining three investigations develop their conclusions, we will share them with Congress as well.

General SMITH. No; I have not personally witnessed any evidence of abuse at a DOD-operated detention facility.

General TAGUBA. My investigation team visited only the four detention sites in Iraq—Abu Ghraib, Camp Cropper, Camp Ashraf, and Camp Bucca during the period of the 15–6 investigation. Other than Abu Ghraib, there were two reported detainee abuses cases at Camp Bucca. The 310th MP Battalion Commander at Camp Bucca took legal action on those cases.

PRISON GUARDS

7. Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Cambone, General Smith, and General Taguba, is it now, or has it been, administration policy that prison guards should “facilitate” detainee interrogations? If so, how were they instructed to do this?

Secretary CAMBONE. This matter has been investigated in several of the reviews the DOD initiated when the abuse allegations came to light. It is my understanding that the matter was addressed by those investigations during briefings to SASC members or staff and during hearings covering those investigations.

General SMITH. Prison guards are not to take an active role in detainee interrogations. A passive role such as observing and reporting is permissible.

General TAGUBA. The U.S. Army is the executive agent for EPW and Detainee Operations in accordance Army Regulation 190–8, and also Army Field Manual 3–19.40. There are no provisions outlined in these documents where prison guards should ‘facilitate’ detainee interrogations, nor do I know of any administration or command policy that directs it.

PERMISSIVE CLIMATE OF PRISONER ABUSE

8. Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Cambone, General Smith, and General Taguba, in Secretary Rumsfeld’s May 7, 2004 testimony, he testified that the Abu Ghraib prison personnel followed the provisions of the Geneva Conventions and that the Geneva Conventions were posted for all prison personnel to see. General Taguba has stated that neither the camp rules nor the provisions of the Geneva Conventions were posted in English or in the language of the detainees at any of the detention facilities in the 800th MP Brigade’s area of responsibility. Would this supervisory error not contribute to a permissive climate of prisoner abuse?

Secretary CAMBONE. Posting of camp rules and the applicable Geneva Conventions is required by the conventions and service regulations. Detention facilities have posted Geneva Conventions rules both in English and detainee languages. In addition, I understand that it is standard operating procedure within MNF–I that the rules regarding both detention and interrogation, including the principles of the Geneva Conventions, are routinely briefed at shift changes and guard mounts.

General SMITH. If the provisions of the Geneva Conventions were not posted at 800th MP Brigade Facilities, this would be in error. However, the failure to post does not excuse individual instances of prisoner abuse. All MPs should have received training in the Geneva Conventions and Law of War prior to receipt of their military occupational specialty designation.

General TAGUBA. In accordance with Army Regulation 190–8, the Geneva Conventions are required to be posted in English or in the language of the detainees and must be available to the detainees. Guards and interrogators must also have general knowledge regarding the requirements of the Geneva Conventions Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War and be trained on the provisions of the Geneva Conventions. It is possible that non-compliance with the requirement to post the Geneva Conventions and have them available for detainees and guards could be a contributing factor to a permissive climate of prisoner abuse.

INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OF THE RED CROSS REQUEST

9. Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Cambone, General Smith, and General Taguba, the ICRC has stated that it repeatedly asked U.S. authorities to take corrective action with respect to the treatment of prisoners in Iraq. Which U.S. authorities were asked and why did they refuse?

Secretary CAMBONE. The DOD’s internal reviews concluded that we needed to improve our handling of ICRC reports to ensure that the concerns raised by the ICRC are reviewed by the proper authorities in the chain of command. It should be noted that the ICRC did, however, report their own concerns to responsible commanders at various levels and how those concerns were addressed is under review in the ongoing investigations we initiated after those allegations came to light.

General SMITH. During the period in question, ICRC reports were normally handled at the CJTF–7 level. I will defer to those military officials to provide any relevant details responsive to your questions.

General TAGUBA. I do not know specifically the U.S. authorities to whom the ICRC repeatedly requested that corrective actions be taken with respect to the treatment of prisoners in Iraq.

NUMBERS OF DETAINEES

10. Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Cambone, General Smith, and General Taguba, how many persons do we currently have detained in Iraq, Afghanistan, and elsewhere as part of the wars there and the war on terror?

Secretary CAMBONE. Although the figures vary daily as persons are released and others are interned, as of 29 August there were 5,405 persons under the control of MNF-I in Iraq, 476 persons under the control of CFC-A in Afghanistan, and 586 persons in Guantanamo Bay.

General SMITH. Although the figures vary daily as persons are released and others are interned, as of 6 August 2004, there were 9,416 persons under the control of MNF-I in Iraq and 454 persons under the control of CFC-A in Afghanistan.

General TAGUBA. The investigation covered the period of June 2003 to January 2004. Since there were no specific or common detainee accounting system in theater utilized by the 800th MP Brigade, the estimates of detainees in U.S. custody were from 11,333 as of June 2003 to 11,699 as of December 2003 in the four detention camps I mentioned earlier. I do not know the detainee population in Afghanistan or elsewhere.

PROSECUTION OF CIVILIAN OPERATORS IN ABU GHRAIB

11. Senator MCCAIN. Secretary Cambone, General Smith, and General Taguba, interrogation specialists from private defense contractors were operating inside Abu Ghraib and may have taken part in these atrocities. Given the UCMJ has been amended by the Military and Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 1999, do you intend to prosecute the contractors who allegedly abused prisoners and committed other atrocities under the UCMJ?

Secretary CAMBONE. The Department of Defense is taking a wide range of actions to address the abuses at Abu Ghraib, including criminal investigative action. Such investigations can result in charges being brought against military members under the UCMJ, and against DOD civilian personnel and DOD contractors under the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000 (P.L. 106-778) (MEJA). The MEJA extended Federal criminal jurisdiction to misconduct committed by persons employed by or accompanying the Armed Forces outside the United States. This includes civilian employees of both the Department of Defense and of contractors of the Department of Defense. Of course, authority to initiate prosecutions rests with the Department of Justice (DOJ), not the Department of Defense.

Additionally, the Fay investigation's review of the role of contractors at Abu Ghraib is now complete. The report includes recommendations to forward its findings to Army General Counsel and the DOJ for determination of appropriate action.

General SMITH. Culpable persons who abused prisoners will be referred to the relevant judicial authority system for appropriate action.

General TAGUBA. The U.S. Military does not have jurisdiction to prosecute civilians under the UCMJ except in time of war as officially declared by Congress. That is not the situation in Iraq. The criminal prosecution of U.S. civilians could only be effected by the host country or by the U.S. Department of Justice in coordination with a U.S. Attorney's office for violation of U.S. laws that have extra-territorial application.

 QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SUSAN COLLINS

GRAVITY OF INITIAL ABU GHRAIB PRISON ABUSE

12. Senator COLLINS. General Taguba, did you see any indication that the initial reports of abuse at Abu Ghraib prison were not taken seriously by investigators or the DOD chain of command?

General TAGUBA. I believe the initial reports of detainee abuse were taken seriously by the CG, CJTF-7 and Commander, CENTCOM. Upon being made aware of these abuses, Lieutenant General Sanchez almost immediately requested that the CENTCOM commander appoint a two star general to investigate reports of detainee abuse and other matters relating to the 800th MP Brigade. The CENTCOM Commander, through his Chief of Staff, then directed the CFLCC Commander, Lt. Gen. David McKiernan to appoint such an investigating officer.

ABU GHRAIB CHAIN OF COMMAND

13. Senator COLLINS. General Smith, please describe the chain of command beginning with the alleged abusers. Who in that chain of command was aware of the initial reports of abuse of Iraqi prisoners?

General SMITH. The initial reports of abuse were reported to CID by a soldier stationed at Abu Ghraib. CID informed the suspects' commanding officer who in turn made notification through the operational chain of command. The Commander of CJTF-7, Lieutenant General Sanchez, promptly reported the matter to General Abizaid, who in turn quickly advised Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Myers. Other reporting may have occurred through both Service and CID channels. Those alleged to have committed the abuse are assigned to the 372nd MP Company, 320th MP Battalion, 800th MP Brigade. The brigade commander was under the tactical control of the Commander, CJTF-7 and the Operational Control of the Combined Forces Land Component Commander (CFLCC).

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CARL LEVIN

MILLER REPORT

14. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, in early September 2003, Major General Geoffrey Miller, Commander, Joint Task Force Guantanamo, led a team to review current ability to rapidly exploit internees in the Iraqi theater for actionable intelligence. It has been generally reported that General Miller's team recommended that military police in Iraq be used to set the conditions for the successful interrogation and exploitation of internees/detainees. Why was General Miller sent to Iraq, what were his specific orders, and who recommended that he be sent and why?

Secretary CAMBONE. MG Miller was dispatched to Iraq via joint staff message to advise CENTCOM and the Iraq Survey Group on detainee operations in Baghdad, including interrogations. Dr. Cambone was involved only to the extent that he was interested in having MG Miller help improve the flow of intelligence information to CJTF-7 and back to the subordinate commands. MG Miller had no directive authority in that visit. He was in Iraq from August 31 to September 9, 2003.

15. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, who in the Office of the SECDEF was briefed on General Miller's recommendations and who approved these recommendations?

Secretary CAMBONE. The USD(I) was never officially briefed on MG Miller's report and only received a copy of the report April 2004.

16. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, when and how were General Miller's recommendations conveyed to commanders at CJTF-7?

Secretary CAMBONE. Major General Miller conducted briefings to the staff on 3 and 7 September 2003 during the course of his visit and concluded with an exit briefing on 9 September 2003.

17. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, does the DOD agree with General Taguba's conclusion that MP should not be involved with setting "favorable conditions" for subsequent interviews?

Secretary CAMBONE. The Department agrees with the statement General Sanchez made before the SASC on 19 May: "MPs were involved in passive enabling of those operations and had no involvement in the conduct of interrogations. Those were the orders in the SOPs that remained after General Miller's visit."

18. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, according to the Washington Post, General Sanchez is reported to have issued a memorandum on October 12, 2003, calling for a "harmonization" of military policing and intelligence work at Abu Ghraib to "maximize the efficiency of the interrogation." Did General Sanchez issue this memorandum based on the recommendations of General Miller's report?

General SMITH. The 12 October memorandum was the CJTF-7 Command Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policy. To the best of my knowledge, it was issued, in part, based upon Major General Miller's recommendations.

END STRENGTH AND TRAINING OF THE 800TH MP COMPANY

19. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, it appears all MP functions at Abu Ghraib were performed by Reserve MP units, at least during the period in question. The Taguba Report noted that the units of the 800th MP Brigade are greatly under strength, as Reserve component units do not have individual personnel replacement system to mitigate medical losses or the departure of individual soldiers. Why was an inadequately staffed, inadequately trained, and unprepared unit sent to handle such a critical task? Who bears responsibility for this staffing decision?

General SMITH. This Reserve Brigade's purpose was to fulfill the mission for which it was assigned. Brigade leadership was expected to fulfill its mission by adapting and utilizing soldiers who were supposed to be trained to accomplish mission requirements. As the Taguba Report notes, there are only two MP (Internment/Resettlement) Battalions in the Army, which have corrections training on their Mission Essential Task List (METL). The Taguba Report also noted that the Commander of the 800th MP Brigade did a poor job of allocating resources. The Commander also did not train her soldiers in confinement operations after it became clear that the mission of her soldiers was to change after the fall of the former Iraqi regime. Adapting to the mission is expected of commanders, especially senior commanders. Some of the "staffing decisions" were dictated by the limitations in specific resources available; a situation which the U.S. Army has identified and is taking steps to correct.

20. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, is this a problem faced by Guard and Reserve units throughout Iraq?

General SMITH. Guard and Reserve units deployed throughout Iraq are expected to be trained and ready to perform their missions. Training and readiness are responsibilities of the Service components and are issues currently under review by those components.

21. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, have there been any changes in the training of the MP units and personnel since the detainee abuses were first discovered? If so, what changes have been made to date, and when were they made?

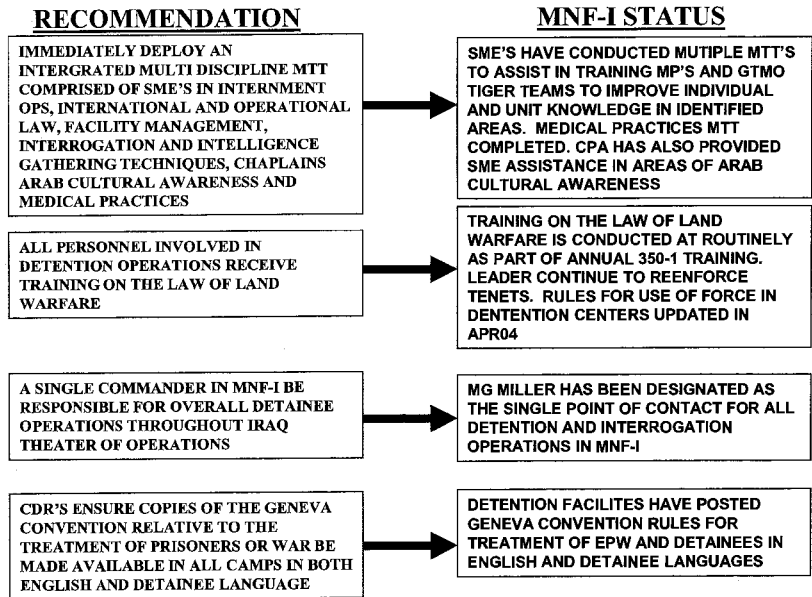

General SMITH. Training and readiness are the responsibilities of the Service components and I would defer to those officials to report on changes made.

TAGUBA REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

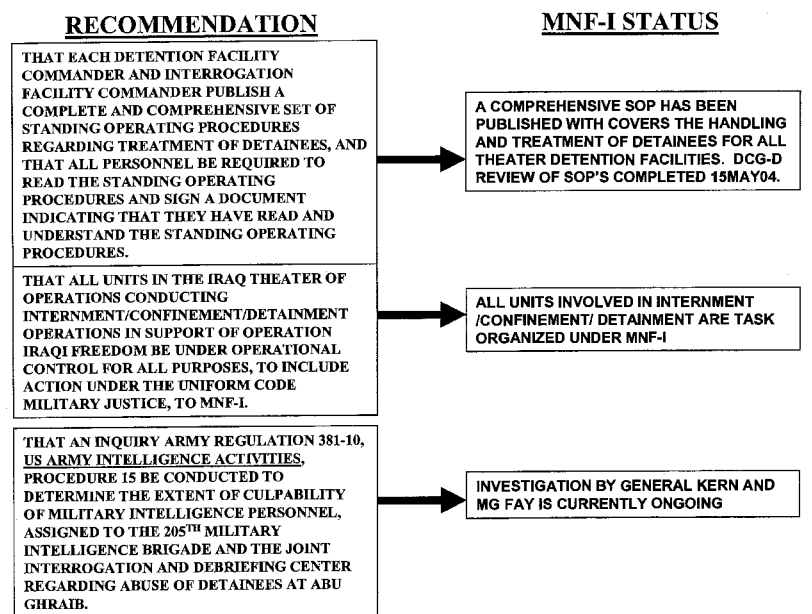

22. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, General Taguba's report contained a number of recommendations with regard to the situation at Abu Ghraib detention facility. To what extent have the recommendations contained in the Taguba Report been adopted and implemented? Please address each of the specific recommendations in the three parts of the report.

General SMITH. The attached summary of MNF-I actions is responsive to this question.

15-6 INVESTIGATION OF 800TH MP BDE

INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OF THE RED CROSS REPORT

23. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, the February 2004 report of the ICRC indicates that the abuses revealed in the Taguba Report were consistent with allegations of abuse collected by the ICRC in the course of some 29 visits to 14 internment facilities in central and southern Iraq during the period of March to November 2003. The ICRC report makes clear that since the beginning of the conflict in Iraq, the ICRC regularly brought concerns about the ill-treatment of detainees to the attention of coalition forces. In addition, ICRC President Jacob Kellenberger has said that he met with senior administration officials in May 2003 and January 2004 to discuss issues related to the treatment of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, in Afghanistan, and elsewhere. How many times since the beginning of the conflict in Iraq were ICRC reports brought to the attention of coalition forces? Please provide any written reports provided by the ICRC to coalition forces concerning the treatment of detainees.

General SMITH. While ICRC reports are not classified documents, they must be handled as such. The information contained in these reports pertains to ongoing military operations and identifies facilities, practices, personnel, and detainees, including by name. This information is sensitive and requires protection. Staffers within DOD have worked closely with staffers of the congressional committees. The staff and members of the SASC have been briefed on this issue and DOD has made available all of the relevant ICRC reports to the committee members.

24. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, who in CENTCOM was aware of the ICRC's reports of prisoner abuse throughout 2003? What action was taken in response to these reports and why wasn't it more successful in addressing the underlying problems?

General SMITH. I was not personally aware of the ICRC reports of prisoner abuse throughout 2003. Based upon further inquiry, I have learned that only one ICRC report, dated 12 May 2003, was ever addressed to this command. This predated my assumption of duties by approximately 5 months. All other such reports have been addressed to subordinate organizations or officials at the Pentagon.

Our subordinate commands will hold accountable those who failed in their duties and they will ensure that the necessary training will be conducted to curtail future incidents. New leadership at the confinement facility is clearly aware of the need to heighten their vigilance to prevent any possible mistreatment of Iraqi detainees. Additional training on the Geneva Conventions has been conducted for the new units that are taking over detention operations to ensure the new soldiers are aware of their duties and responsibilities. Additionally, the reported allegations prompted Lieutenant General Sanchez to request the immediate provision of a team to conduct additional training on confinement operations, with emphasis on treating detainees with dignity and respect. A single senior officer with proper authorities and support to oversee all aspects of detainee operations has been appointed. Maj. Gen. Geoff Miller has been in place since 15 April 2004 and is properly focused and making a positive difference.

25. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, did CENTCOM keep senior administration officials informed of the ICRC's concerns about the ill-treatment of Iraqi prisoners? If so, at what level and on what occasions were they informed?

General SMITH. With one exception, ICRC reports and concerns were handled at the CJTF-7 level. CENTCOM did not receive ICRC reports. Had I known about the abuses as outlined in the ICRC reports which have now been furnished to this command, senior administration officials at the Pentagon would have been promptly informed. In fact, as soon as the abuses at Abu Ghraib were reported to CENTCOM, that information was immediately passed to the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

26. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, on how many occasions did senior DOD or administration officials meet with representatives of the ICRC and when did these meetings occur?

Secretary CAMBONE. There were four such occasions—May 27, June 27, October 15, and December 19.

27. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, were any investigations, changes in policy, or other actions initiated as a result of these meetings?

Secretary CAMBONE. The Department of Defense has already launched no less than 12 separate investigations into the ICRC's allegations of prisoner mistreatment:

- a. MG Ryder, the Army Provost Marshall General, launched an investigation to assess ongoing detention and corrections operations in Iraq. MG Ryder completed that assessment on November 6, 2003, and a copy of the Ryder Report has been provided to Congress.

b. MG Miller, Commander of the Guantanamo facility, launched an assessment of intelligence and detention operations that was completed on September 5, 2003. A copy of the Miller Report was provided to Congress..

c. MG Taguba's administrative investigation of detainee operations and the 800th MP Brigade was completed May 6, 2004, and a copy was submitted to Congress.

d. VADM Church completed a review of procedures at Guantanamo and Charleston on May 11, 2004.

e. LTG Jones and MG Fay are currently reviewing military intelligence and contractor interrogation procedures of the 205th MI Brigade at Abu Ghraib.

f. LTG Mikolashek, the Army Inspector General, is currently performing an overall assessment of doctrine and training related to detention operations.

g. BG Jacoby is currently reviewing detainee operations and facilities in Afghanistan.

h. Secretary Rumsfeld has ordered an investigation to collect authorized interrogation practices in the all DOD detention facilities used for the war on terror and to ensure that all appropriate policy guidance is being followed.

i. BG Formica is currently performing an administrative investigation into detainee abuse by CJSOTF-AP.

j. COL Ertman is performing an Army Reserve assessment of Reserve training with a focus on military intelligence and military police.

k. Hon. Schlesinger is leading an independent examination of detainee issues for the Department of Defense.

l. Finally, there are the criminal investigations of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib and other detainee deaths while in Coalition custody.

m. To coordinate these various investigations and ensure a coherent policy response to their recommendations, the Department of Defense has created a new position, the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Detainee Affairs. This position will allow a single office to ensure compliance with DOD policy directives and coordinate with the ICRC. As part of this effort, DOD has taken steps to ensure that all ICRC reports (which formerly went only to officers in the field) are submitted directly to the Pentagon. The Departments of the Army and Navy are currently taking steps to launch criminal investigations into each instance of abuse alleged by the Red Cross.

28. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, the February 2004 ICRC report indicates that during a mid-October 2003 visit to the Abu Ghraib Correctional Facility, ICRC delegates witnessed "the practice of keeping [detainees] completely naked in totally empty concrete cells and in total darkness, allegedly for several consecutive days." In response to ICRC inquiries, the report states that "The military intelligence officer in charge of the interrogation explained that this practice was 'part of the process' for obtaining confessions and extracting information. In response to the allegations documented by the ICRC in mid-October 2003, or any other ICRC reports, what specific steps were taken to correct the situation at Abu Ghraib or any other detention facilities run by coalition forces and when were they taken?"

General SMITH. My expanded answer to question 24 responds to this question.

29. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, what was the extent of the ICRC's access to the facilities at Abu Ghraib and did it include the part of the facility where the abuses depicted in the photos are alleged to have occurred?

General SMITH. During the period in question, ICRC visits were coordinated by CJTF-7. I will defer to those military officials to provide any details responsive to your questions.

30. Senator LEVIN. General Smith, whom did the ICRC brief about these alleged abuses?

General SMITH. The ICRC exercised its prerogative to brief at the levels they thought were appropriate. The ICRC did not brief anyone in HQ, CENTCOM, to include me.

INTERROGATION TECHNIQUES

31. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, in an interview with The New York Times, Major General Geoffrey D. Miller, the new commander of American prisons in Iraq, stated that the roughly 50 techniques the military officially uses in prisoner interrogations include hooding, sleep deprivation, and forcing prisoners into “stress positions.” An unclassified December 12, 2003, Situation Update to Major General Miller is included as an annex to the Taguba Report. The document describes interrogation techniques permissible for use in the Iraqi theater of operations, and reportedly it includes a process allowing for the use of sleep management, sensory deprivation, isolation longer than 30 days, and dogs. Were you personally aware that permissible interrogation techniques in the Iraqi theater included sleep management, sensory deprivation, isolation longer than 30 days, and dogs?

Secretary CAMBONE. The USD(I) did not know what specific interrogation techniques were being used in the Iraqi theater. The techniques used in theater were developed and approved in theater without any USD(I) involvement.

32. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, who within the Army or DOD authorized the use of these additional techniques and were they specifically authorized for use in Abu Ghraib?

Secretary CAMBONE. Development of interrogation policies consistent with the standing guidance was within the authority of Combined Joint Task Force-7 and did not require higher-level approval.

33. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, what steps were taken to ensure that interrogation techniques complied with the Geneva Conventions?

Secretary CAMBONE. Prior to the commencement of Operation Iraqi Freedom, Commander, U.S. Central Command, prepared Operational Plan (OPLAN) 1003-V. Appendix 1 to Annex E of OPLAN 1003-V specifically addressed the treatment of the operational plan annex on enemy prisoners of war, retained persons, civilian internees, and other detainees. It outlined responsibilities, policies and procedures with respect to the handling of detainees, and provided specific guidance that the Geneva Conventions applied to all persons held by U.S. forces. This means of promulgation is consistent with the usual manner in which commanders provide guidance to their subordinate commanders. The subordinate commands would review the OPLAN and draft their own orders. For instance, the CJSC EXORD itself does not specifically address the Geneva Conventions; rather, it refers back to OPLAN 1003-V.

In addition to the promulgation of this OPLAN and its Annexes, commanders were responsible for ensuring that detainees were treated in accordance with the Geneva Conventions and applicable international law and that measures were implemented to ensure the forces were aware of and complied with the Law of War.

34. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, who within DOD made the legal determination as to whether these interrogation techniques comply with the Geneva Conventions, including the requirement of Article 31 of the Geneva Conventions that “No physical or moral coercion shall be exercised against protected persons, in particular to obtain information from them or from third parties” and to whom was that determination briefed?

Secretary CAMBONE. I understand that the CJTF-7 policy issued on October 12, 2003, titled “Interrogation and Counter Resistance Policy,” included interrogation approaches contained in existing interrogation doctrine (e.g., Army Field Manual 34-52), reflected longstanding DOD interrogation practice, and was issued after consultation with the CJTF-7 Staff Judge Advocate and lawyers within the U.S. Central Command.

35. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, what role did your office play in developing DOD policy on interrogation in Iraq?

Secretary CAMBONE. My office did not play any role in developing DOD policy on interrogation in Iraq.

36. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, did your office provide direction on interrogation guidelines to either General Abizaid or General Sanchez? If so, when and to whom?

Secretary CAMBONE. The USD(I) did not provide direction on interrogation guidelines to either General Abizaid or General Sanchez.

37. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, did you provide direction on guidelines to either Secretary Rumsfeld or Deputy Secretary Wolfowitz? If so, when and to whom?

Secretary CAMBONE. The USD(I) did not provide direction on interrogation guidelines to either Secretary Rumsfeld or Deputy Wolfowitz.

38. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, at a May 14, 2004, DOD press briefing, senior military officials stated that since last October General Sanchez had approved 25 requests to hold detainees in isolation for more than 30 days, but had not approved the use of any other interrogation technique requiring commanding general approval. General Sanchez also reportedly announced that he would deny requests to use other harsh methods that required his explicit approval. How many requests were made since the issuance of the Interrogation ROE for permission to use the interrogation techniques requiring General Sanchez's approval?

Secretary CAMBONE. The number of requests is unknown. However, the "Interrogation Rules of Engagement" were a graphic aid prepared by the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade. This aid is not a policy document and was not prepared or approved by Combined Joint Task Force-7. Lieutenant General Sanchez signed an "Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policy" document on 14 September 2003. Revised policies were published on 12 October 2003 and 13 May 2004. Some of those policies required certain specific interrogation techniques to be approved in advance by Lieutenant General Sanchez on a case-by-case basis and after a legal review.

39. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, besides the 25 cases mentioned in the May 14 briefing, are there any other cases in which the use of these techniques was granted in the Iraqi theater?

Secretary CAMBONE. The only restricted technique that was approved for use was segregation in excess of 30 days. The figure "25" mentioned in the 14 May briefing was an estimate. Records at Multinational Force in Iraq Headquarters (successor to Combined Joint Task Force-7) indicate Lieutenant General Sanchez approved fewer than 20 segregations.

40. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, did General Sanchez suspend the use of these techniques as a matter of policy, or has a determination been made that they are not compliant with U.S. international obligations?

Secretary CAMBONE. Of the techniques that required his approval, only segregation in excess of 30 days was ever approved and used. Whether any of the other techniques could, as a hypothetical matter, have been approved under any specific set of circumstances is uncertain. However, both policy and law can be factors in reviewing the suitability of various interrogation techniques depending on the status of the detainee and the manner in which the technique might be employed.

41. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, in your testimony, you promised to provide a comparison of the command-level guidelines for the use in interrogation for detainees in Guantanamo and Iraq. Please provide this comparison.

Secretary CAMBONE. Attachment prepared by Detainee Task Force on 28 September 2004.

GENEVA CONVENTIONS

42. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, Secretary Rumsfeld testified on May 7, 2004, that the Geneva Conventions apply to all prisoners of war, retained personnel, civilian internees, and other detainees in the custody of U.S. forces in Iraq. General Taguba has stated that the Geneva Conventions were not posted at Abu Ghraib and military police at that facility were not trained in the applicability of the Geneva Conventions. When was the determination made that the Geneva Conventions did apply to all detainees in Iraq and by whom was it made?

Secretary CAMBONE. The Geneva Conventions applied during Operation Iraqi Freedom. The plans for Operation Iraqi Freedom that were prepared by Commander, U.S. Central Command, and briefed to the President and me included provisions that clearly stated that enemy prisoners of war, retained persons, civilian internees, and other detainee “operations will be conducted in compliance with the 1949 Geneva Convention and applicable U.S. military regulations.” Further, component and supporting commanders were responsible under the plans for Operation Iraqi Freedom for “[e]nsuring that treatment of all detained persons is in accordance with the Geneva Conventions and other applicable international law.” The President directed these plans to be executed. Detention operations during Operation Iraqi Freedom were always to be conducted in accordance with the Geneva Conventions.

43. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, how was this decision disseminated to troops in the field and were specific directives or guidance sent out, of which the military police at Abu Ghraib should have been aware?

Secretary CAMBONE. (from 7 May Levin W, SECDEF, also used for #33): Prior to the commencement of Operation Iraqi Freedom, Commander, U.S. Central Command, prepared Operational Plan (OPLAN) 1003-V. Appendix 1 to Annex E of OPLAN 1003-V specifically addressed the treatment of the operational plan annex on enemy prisoners of war, retained persons, civilian internees, and other detainees. It outlined responsibilities, policies and procedures with respect to the handling of detainees, and provided specific guidance that the Geneva Conventions applied to all persons held by U.S. forces. For instance, the CJSC EXORD itself does not specifically address the Geneva Conventions; rather, it refers back to OPLAN 1003-V.

In addition to the promulgation of this OPLAN and its Annexes, commanders were responsible for ensuring that detainees were treated in accordance with the Geneva Conventions and applicable international law and that measures were implemented to ensure the forces were aware of and complied with the Law of War.

44. Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone, will the JAG be conducting his own review of the interrogation techniques listed in the October 12 Situation Update included in an annex to the Taguba Report to determine his assessment of their compliance with the Geneva Conventions?

Secretary CAMBONE. Department-wide, much has been done to improve detainee operations:

Army:

- Established Provost Marshal General in September 2003 as Army executive agent for detainee operations.
- Planning for general officer-level Military Police command in Army future force.
- Developed detainee operations integration plan—prioritized plan addressing policy, doctrine, organization, training, materiel, leadership, personnel, and facilities.
- Synchronized Army with joint policy and doctrine.
- Established Detainee Operations Oversight Council.

CENTCOM:

- Assigned a general officer to be in charge of all detention and interrogation operations in Iraq.
- Issued standard interrogation policies that emphasize application of Geneva Conventions and that are fully consistent with overall DOD policies.
- Upgrading detention facilities for soldiers and detainees.

Joint Staff:

- Created Joint Staff Detainee Affairs Division to address worldwide detainee operations.
- Drafted Multi-Service Tactics, Techniques & Procedures on Detainee Operations by the Air, Land, & Sea Applications Center.
- Expediting publication of Joint Doctrine for Detainee Operations (Joint Publication 3-63).
- Including Joint Interrogation Operations in “Joint and National Intelligence Support to Military Operations.” (Joint Publication 2-01)
- Added Detainee Operations to “Joint Training Policy and Guidance for the Armed Forces of the United States.” (Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff Instruction 3500.01C)

OSD:

- Established Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Detainee Affairs (DASD-DA) office.
- Established a Joint Detainee Coordination Committee on Detainee Affairs chaired by DASD-DA.
- Issued policy “Procedures for Investigations into the Death of Detainees in the Custody of the Armed Forces of the U.S.”
- Issued policy “Handling of Reports from the International Committee of the Red Cross.”
- Initiated a department wide review of detainee-related policy directives.

As part of that department wide review of detainee-related policy directives, the Judge Advocate General will review all policies and directives in order to ensure their compliance with the Geneva Conventions.

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOHN WARNER,
CHAIRMAN

Chairman WARNER. Good afternoon. The Armed Services Committee reconvenes for a second panel to resume our hearing, a series of hearings regarding the mistreatment of Iraqi prisoners by some elements and certain personnel, few in number, I hope, of our Armed Forces, in violation of the United States Constitution and laws and international laws.

Testifying before us are Lieutenant General Keith B. Alexander, Deputy Chief of Staff, G-2, United States Army—General Alexander is the senior intelligence officer in the Army; Major General Ronald L. Burgess, Director for Intelligence, J-2, Joint Staff; and Major General Thomas J. Romig, Judge Advocate General (JAG) for the United States Army.

We're privileged to have you here. I thank you, Secretary Rumsfeld, and the Acting Secretary of the Army, Les Brownlee, for facilitating your presence here today.

Senator Levin, you can make any comments you want.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN

Senator LEVIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Let me add my welcome to our three witnesses this afternoon. We all appreciate their appearing before us.

This morning, General Taguba agreed with the conclusion of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), based on the evidence presented to him, that coercive practices, such as holding prisoners naked for an extended period of time, were a systematic part of the intelligence process at Abu Ghraib.

Additionally, we heard from Under Secretary Cambone that stressful and harsh approaches, including sleep deprivation and use of dogs, could be approved by the commander. But that doesn't square with the statements by the witnesses that the Geneva Conventions provisions and principles were supposed to be followed, since they don't allow for such practices. For instance, Article 31 of the fourth Geneva Conventions states that "no physical or moral coercion shall be exercised against protected persons, in particular to obtain information from them or from third parties." I hope that our witnesses this afternoon will address, in great detail, that issue.

Finally, Mr. Cambone said this morning that one of General Miller's recommendations for Iraq was to dedicate and train a detention guard force, subordinate to an intelligence commander, who would set the conditions for successful interrogation. But General Taguba told us this morning that under Army doctrine that should not be the function of a guard force. So that is also an issue which I hope our witnesses will address, along with a multitude of other matters which I know are before this committee.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator Levin.

Gentlemen, will you kindly stand and raise your right hands? [Witnesses sworn.]

General Alexander and other witnesses, I presume each of you has a brief opening statement. Your entire statements will be admitted to the record.

If you will proceed, General Alexander.

STATEMENT OF LTG KEITH B. ALEXANDER, USA, DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF, G-2; ACCOMPANIED BY MG RONALD L. BURGESS, JR., USA, DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF, J-2; AND MG THOMAS J. ROMIG, USA, JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL

General ALEXANDER. Chairman Warner, Senator Levin, and members of the committee, on behalf of the men and women of the United States Army Intelligence, we appreciate the opportunity to appear before you today. With me today is Major General Ron Burgess, J-2, Joint Staff, and Major General Tom Romig, the JAG of the Army. I am making this statement on behalf of the three of us.

First, let me assure you that we find the alleged abuses of detainees in Abu Ghraib prison, Iraq, totally reprehensible. Army Intelligence neither condones, nor tolerates, these actions. Furthermore, we would like to emphasize that Army Intelligence soldiers are trained to abide by the highest standards for the humane treatment of all personnel in the custody of our soldiers worldwide.

We conduct extensive legal training for all of our Army Intelligence professionals, especially interrogators, in the law of war and the provisions of the Geneva Conventions of 1949. Our training manuals specifically prohibit the abuse of detainees, and we ensure all of our soldiers trained as interrogators receive this training.

Geneva Conventions protocols are reinforced during each practical exercise. Sir, there are 12 practical exercises that the interrogators go through, each of those last 2 hours. An interrogator will flunk an exercise should he or she inadvertently violate a Geneva Accord.

The contemptible behavior of a few soldiers does not represent the professionalism, dedication, and compassion demonstrated by the majority of soldiers in Iraq. Commanders and soldiers at every level have the duty to respect and follow the established international laws of armed conflict, and to treat everyone, to include those within our military detention facilities, with dignity and decency in the same ways that we expect to be treated, as Americans. Those soldiers who mistreated or humiliated detainees will be brought to justice swiftly. Again, the Army does not condone or tolerate such behavior.

The allegations of misconduct at Abu Ghraib have hit at the very core values of our Nation, the Department of Defense (DOD), and the Army, causing us grave concern, and prompting a very focused and thorough review of these incidents. Senior leaders at all levels take every report seriously, and expect an extensive investigation of every allegation.

The Combined Joint Task Force-7 (CJTF-7) in Iraq has an ongoing investigation of allegations that intelligence soldiers were involved in the abuse of detainees in Abu Ghraib. This investigation, called a Procedure 15, is currently ongoing and being conducted by Major General Fay for Lieutenant General Sanchez, and will identify and report questionable intelligence activities that may have violated law, executive order, or presidential directive.

Army Intelligence will not tolerate soldiers who violate the dignity and rights of others, to include those whom we have detained. We remain steadfastly committed to dealing expeditiously with any complaint or allegation of mistreatment, and to ensuring our commanders take appropriate action.

Sir, I would like to address a few issues that arose during this morning's testimony.

First, on the interrogation rules of engagement (ROE), we brought with us the rules of engagement that were in effect at the CJTF-7 in Iraq prior to October 2003. These rules are in compliance with the Geneva Conventions, and directly stem from our interrogation manual, Field Manual (FM) 34-52. These are the rules that interrogation soldiers are trained on at Fort Huachuca. In addition, contractors were to read and sign that they understood these rules.

Second, in the timing of events, the ICRC reports cover periods from March 2003 through the end of 2003, and perhaps into 2004. They visited Abu Ghraib, we know for sure, in October 2003, on the 11th and 12th, and again on the 23rd, and conducted a series of interviews with detainees. That report, as Major General Taguba stated, was given to Brigadier General Karpinski to respond, and she provided her response on the 24th of December 2003. A formal report was produced in February 2004. Important to note is, many of the problems that were identified during that time period were prior to the issue of when the military intelligence (MI) brigade took over, on 19 November 2003.

Chairman WARNER. Did you personally get copies of those reports?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I got copies of those reports this week. I did not get those last year. No, I did not.

Sir, reference tactical control (TACON), my understanding, in discussions with General Sanchez, was that the military police (MP) would remain in charge of detainee operations, but he needed Colonel Pappas to take over force protection and the overall management of the forward operating base (FOB) at Abu Ghraib and kick off many of the initiatives he wanted accomplished to upgrade the facility. However, this is a key issue, and I would recommend that we take this for the record, from the Joint Staff to Central Command (CENTCOM).

Sir, I would like to briefly go over interrogation operations, because I think this gets to the key that we see a split between MI and MPs. I think we need to understand that. In my discussions with General Ryder, we do not have a split. There is a door at places, and there is openness at places, and I'd like to explain that.

First, if you were to look at the general population for when prisoners of war (POW) come in there, that general population is seen most clearly by the MPs, and is screened by MI personnel who talk to the MPs on who are the key folks that are there. Sir, as you may expect, the MPs understand who are the ringleaders, who is the person who is in charge, and who are the key folks that may have intelligence value. It is a requirement in that phase that the MP and MI work closely together to develop and understand who are the high-value detainees.

The second step, isolating and getting those high-value detainees into the Joint Interrogation and Debriefing Center (JIDC), and looking at what goes on with those prisoners. The people who understand the environment that those prisoners are in day in and day out, 24 hours a day, are the MPs, and the best way to understand that interrogation plan and the methods that the interrogator will use is the MP and the personnel who are around him, and that is one of the things that we need to have MP and MI talk about. Is this detainee or prisoner having a good day or bad? Has he been quiet, or has he been talking? What is the way to discuss this with him?

There is a gate, and that gates starts at the interrogation cell itself. That's where the MPs should not be involved, and that is the door that General Ryder talked about in my discussions with him. I think we need to be clear on that, because when we talk about doors we give the inference that we mean, "No MPs over here, and no MI over there."

That is what General Miller found when he went over there. He found that the MPs and the MI were not talking enough together, so that we missed key people who ought to have been interrogated, and that we weren't making the best value of it.

Now, there's another part of this that I need to walk through, and that is how we develop the interrogation plan. Because, sir, this is not something that we just say, "Okay, bring 'em in. What are we going to do?" We develop an interrogation plan. In that plan, we look at the prisoner. What do we want to get from this prisoner? What are the approaches, the techniques to be used? Sir, those techniques, again, are in our FM 34-52, and are in the ROE that I talked about. What are the questions to be asked? What do we learn?

That interrogation plan is to be approved by the chain of command. Then, from that, we get an interrogation report that comes out, the information that was received during that interrogation. The leaders review and approve both of those parts of that plan.

All of that stems from the priority intelligence requirements that the theater, the divisions, and the brigades have.

Sir, in early August, I went over to Iraq. One of the things that I found, in talking with the division commanders and the brigade commanders and CJTF-7, is that the flow of information that Dr. Cambone talked about, was not getting back to the units that apprehended these people. There was a problem. That flow of information—so if they grabbed a prisoner, the information on what that prisoner had that could have been useful for that brigade, the interrogation reports, were not getting there. That's important to saving soldiers' lives.

That was one of the key things that we were trying to fix. How do you get, when you consolidate all the prisoners from Iraq at one facility, information that goes back to 4th Infantry Division to this brigade to say, "This is the guy who fired the improvised explosive device, and he's part of this network." If it does not get there, we are not going to stop those attacks, and we're going to have soldiers killed. That was one of the things that we were looking at.

Chairman WARNER. Did you visit the prison and look at that?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, at the time I was there—I got there in early August—Abu Ghraib was not yet stood up. Abu Ghraib was in the phases of getting the prison stood up. The engineers were there, so it was not stood up. There were not prisoners at Abu Ghraib at that time. I have not been back to Iraq since August, sir.

Sir, once again, thank you for the opportunity to speak before you today, and we look forward to answering your questions.
[The prepared statement of General Alexander follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT BY LTG KEITH B. ALEXANDER, USA

Chairman Warner, Senator Levin, and members of the committee, on behalf of the men and women of United States Army Intelligence, I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you today.

First, let me assure you that I find the alleged abuses of detainees in Abu Ghraib Prison, Iraq, totally reprehensible. Army Intelligence neither condones nor tolerates these actions. Furthermore, I would like to emphasize that Army Intelligence Soldiers are trained to abide by the highest standards for the humane treatment of all personnel in the custody of our soldiers worldwide.

We conduct extensive legal training for all of our Army Intelligence professionals, especially interrogators, in the Law of War and the provisions of the Geneva Conventions of 1949. Our training manuals specifically prohibit the abuse of detainees, and we ensure all of our soldiers trained as interrogators receive this training. Geneva Conventions protocols are reinforced during each practical exercise. An interrogator will flunk an exercise should he or she inadvertently violate a Geneva accord.

The contemptible behavior of a few soldiers does not represent the professionalism, dedication, and compassion demonstrated by the majority of soldiers in Iraq. Commanders and soldiers at every level have the duty to respect and follow the established international laws of armed conflict and to treat everyone, to include those within our military detention facilities with dignity and decency in the same ways that we expect to be treated as Americans. Those soldiers who mistreated or humiliated detainees will be brought to justice swiftly. Again, the Army does not condone or tolerate such behavior.

The allegations of misconduct at Abu Ghraib have hit at the very core values of our Nation, the Department of Defense and the Army Intelligence Community, causing us grave concern and prompting a very focused and thorough review of these incidents. Senior Leaders at all levels take every report seriously and expect an extensive investigation of every allegation. CJTF-7 has an ongoing investigation of allegations that Intelligence Soldiers were involved in the abuse of detainees in Abu Ghraib. This investigation, a "Procedure 15," currently ongoing and being conducted by Major General George Fay, will identify and report questionable intelligence activities that may have violated law, Executive Order, or presidential directive.

Army Intelligence will not tolerate soldiers who violate the dignity and rights of others, to include those we have detained. We remain steadfastly committed to dealing expeditiously with any complaint or allegation of mistreatment, and to ensuring our commanders take appropriate action.

Once again, thank you for this opportunity to speak before you today. I look forward to answering your questions.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

General BURGESS.

General BURGESS. Sir, I will stay with the statement as read by Lieutenant General Alexander, and I look forward to your questions.

Chairman WARNER. Fine.

General ROMIG.

General ROMIG. Sir, I have no comments, either. I look forward to your questions.

Chairman WARNER. Let us proceed with a 6-minute round, in hopes that we can get in two rounds this afternoon.

General Alexander, with due respect to you, you laid out very concisely and professionally, exactly what the manuals say, what everybody was supposed to do, but it didn't happen, and this committee—and you pointed out, General Fay is looking into that—is trying to put together a record for the Senate, for the American public, that lends some explanation to what happened.

Now, you're the chief of all Army Intelligence. Number one, the MI people that did the interrogations participated, presumably to some degree, with the guards. They were your people down the chain, correct?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. General Karpinski was in your chain, so to speak. Is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. She's in the Army, yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. I realize that, but she was working with your people.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Now, what can you tell the committee, of your own knowledge, to help us and the American public and, indeed, much of the public in the world, to understand what went wrong? We know the wrongs occurred. We've gotten the initial reports—General Taguba. We, through the press, have seen pictures. It's a possibility the Senate may see additional pictures. The Pentagon is very forthcoming in trying to help this committee and the leadership of the committee and the leadership of the Senate develop that evidence. What can you personally tell, as chief, as to what went wrong?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, on the specifics, my assessment, it was a failure of leadership. What we need to—in terms of the MP leadership, as General Taguba said—the question, the real question is, did intelligence personnel tell those individuals to do that? Were those personnel low-level people who said this would be a good idea, or was that high-ranking personnel that said, "This is the method of operations?" My understanding and, to date, my belief, is that this was interaction between low-level people, who were not in the action of their duties, who were not doing interrogations at the time, or who made statements to these folks that, "Yes, what you're doing"—as it was in General Taguba's report—"is softening them up. They're speaking like crazy."

What General Fay has to find out in his investigation is, where was there complicity? Who and at what level did that go? To this point, my belief is that that was informal, and that these were a group of undisciplined MP soldiers who felt that they had some, according to their statements, preference from MI to go and do what they were doing. But we don't have any facts to an individual that did that, other than a couple of civilian contractors who were involved.

That's what we're looking for, sir. We will investigate that to find out exactly who said it and where does it go.

Chairman WARNER. So even though you're the chief of Army Intelligence, even though this series of problems has been going on since the fall of 2003, you cannot provide the committee any facts that help us understand exactly what was done and not done—by all levels, not just low levels—of those in the Intelligence Command. Is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. No, sir. I—

Chairman WARNER. All right.

General ALEXANDER. Let me go up higher. Clearly, at the higher levels, the rules of—

Chairman WARNER. A lot of people are following this. I think the committee understands "high" and "low."

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. What's your definition of "high," what's the definition of "low"?

General ALEXANDER. Let's start at the brigade level, where Colonel Pappas was involved. The two incidents that—

Chairman WARNER. He was an MI man, is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. He was an MI colonel, subordinate to the CJTF-7, working for General Sanchez. His responsibilities and his policies that he put out were—as an example, these interrogation ROE and the procedures. I know of two incidents—

Chairman WARNER. You know for a fact he did that?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir. We have—in fact, we also have his rules that he had folks coming in to brief them on. We had General Sanchez's statements of, "Here are the interrogator rules of engagement." Both of those are the same, and they stem from that same manual. In every case, it says, "Treat prisoners humanely."

Also, sir, I think it's important to note that when we talk about this humane treatment, when Colonel Pappas found a soldier having a prisoner walk naked, he found out about that and disciplined that soldier right away. So when actions were brought—

Chairman WARNER. What's the date/time group of that action?

General ALEXANDER. I don't have the date/time group, but I'll get you that, sir, for the record.

[The information referred to follows:]

On 16 November 2003, a military intelligence soldier decided to strip a detainee in response to what the soldier believed was uncooperative and physically recalcitrant behavior. Later the soldier walked the semi-naked detainee across the camp. Colonel Pappas left the issue to Lieutenant Colonel Jordan to handle. Lieutenant Colonel Jordan temporarily removed the soldier from interrogation duties. The soldier was counseled by her immediate supervisor but did not receive an Article 15, UCMJ.

General ALEXANDER. But he took action. So my thoughts are, when he knew something was going on, he took action. There were other cases of discipline that he took on soldiers who did an interrogation at the wrong time, and I will get you the exact date/time group of that, too. It's in General Taguba's report, but I think we need to get that, and I'll put that for the record.

[The information referred to follows:]

On 7 October 2003, three MI personnel conducted an interrogation without authorization. The three soldiers each received nonjudicial punishment, Field Grade Article 15s, from Colonel Pappas for failing to get authorization to interrogate the detainee. Additionally, Colonel Pappas removed them from interrogation operations.

General ALEXANDER. So it's clear, from where I sit, that both Colonel Pappas and the theater knew the ROE.

Chairman WARNER. But somehow that information either didn't flow down the chain or there was absolute total breakdown in discipline and disregard.

General ALEXANDER. That's what I believe.

Chairman WARNER. Go below Pappas. What's the next level?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, the next level was—

Chairman WARNER. Battalion commander, isn't it?

General ALEXANDER. There's the battalion commander, and there is the JIDC.

Chairman WARNER. All right. Can you tell us about their level of responsibility and inquiry into this situation?

General ALEXANDER. Right. Yes, sir. Lieutenant Colonel Jordan was the officer in charge of the JIDC. He is also mentioned in the Taguba Report for not doing his job. What we have to find out is, in executing his, and in executing Colonel Pappas's, what did they or did they not do. That's one of the things that General Fay has to find out, and that's part of that Procedure 15, sir. That's part of an ongoing investigation.

Chairman WARNER. I feel that, as hard as this committee tries to discharge its oversight, we're at the point where we're not likely to learn much about what took place and where that level struck a breakdown of discipline until this Fay Report is out. Is that your thinking?

General ALEXANDER. Yes sir, to get the accurate answer. I can give you an assessment, but that assessment will change as we find these facts out and as General Fay completes his investigation.

Chairman WARNER. Give us your assessment to date.

General ALEXANDER. Sir, my assessment is there was a complete breakdown in the discipline on the MP side, and there were some MI soldiers, contractors who may have been involved, or at least in some of those pictures. The question is, what did they say to the MPs to get them to do this? To this point, as General Taguba said, there is nothing that we know that a MI person told them to do this.

Chairman WARNER. All right.

General ALEXANDER. That's what we're trying to find out.

Chairman WARNER. Did the MI people hire the contractors?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, the contract actually stems under a CENTCOM contract, and that CENTCOM contract then went to CJTF-7. But the MI people there at Abu Ghraib were responsible for oversight of those contractors. It's important to note that what Major General Fast required of those contractors—and she's the C-2 in Iraq, the senior MI person in Iraq—

Chairman WARNER. I met her on my visit over there during the same time frame you were there.

General ALEXANDER. Right. Sir, they were to read and state they understood the interrogation ROE.

Chairman WARNER. Did she check their level of experience and training?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, that was part of the contract, that they were supposed to have the 97 Echo, which is our interrogation military occupational specialty (MOS), or equivalent, to be hired.

Chairman WARNER. All right. Do you have any knowledge of other government—U.S. Government agencies, Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) or otherwise, Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) or any other group, that were working with your MI people?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I know that there were other government agencies that visited the facility and talked to prisoners, but I know of no wrongdoing on their behalf.

Chairman WARNER. I'm not suggesting that. Who are they? What are they?

General ALEXANDER. The CIA.

Chairman WARNER. CIA.

General ALEXANDER. The CIA also conducted some interrogations, as I understand it, at that facility.

Chairman WARNER. What about DIA?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I do not know that DIA conducted that. I would have to check that.

Chairman WARNER. All right. My time is expired.

Senator LEVIN.

Senator LEVIN. You say you have no evidence that MI people were actively involved in and directing, and suggesting that harsh activities occur?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, we have not found any.

Senator LEVIN. But—

General ALEXANDER. That's what we're looking for.

Senator LEVIN.—the Taguba Report itself quotes—for instance, on page 18, Sergeant Davis, the MP company Sergeant or Specialist Connell. He said, "I saw them nude, but MI"—military intelligence—"would tell us to take away their mattresses, sheets, and clothes." Isn't that evidence that MI—

General ALEXANDER. Sir, that—

Senator LEVIN.—told them to take away their clothes? Then you have Sergeant Davis stating that he heard MI insinuate to the guards to abuse the inmates. Isn't that evidence? When he asked what MI said, he stated, "Loosen this guy up for us. Make sure he has a bad night. Make sure he gets the treatment." Isn't that evidence that the intelligence folks were involved in this?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, those are the statements that spawned the Procedure 15 to look into exactly who said it. Because the statements, as you read those, it says, "MI personnel or people in civilian or people of authority." But when you ask, you get, "Well, who specifically told you to do this?" That's the question that we have to get to.

Senator LEVIN. But you've—

General ALEXANDER. They can't be—

Senator LEVIN.—some evidence, at least.

General ALEXANDER. Oh, absolutely. Sir, and that's why the investigation is going on.

Senator LEVIN. But I thought a minute ago you said you haven't seen any evidence that MI was involved.

General ALEXANDER. Sir, we have no proof that a person in authority told them to do this activity.

Senator LEVIN. Let's go back to the MI personnel. There is evidence, I take it, in the Taguba Report that MI personnel gave suggestions to the MPs that they "loosen this guy up," that they take his clothes away, that they make sure he has a "bad night," and that he gets "the treatment." That is evidence, isn't it, of MI personnel involvement?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir, that's a statement by those soldiers.

Senator LEVIN. Right. All I'm saying is, is that evidence? I'm not saying it's conclusive. I'm not saying anything other than it is evidence, is it not?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir. That's the evidence that led to the beginning of the Procedure 15.

Senator LEVIN. All right. So you've seen that evidence. Now, these interrogation ROE that I think you handed out—

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN.—these are the ones that were adopted by whom?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, these were the interrogation ROE that were used by the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade and their interrogators.

Senator LEVIN. Who was in charge of that brigade?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, Colonel Pappas.

Senator LEVIN. Okay. Now, Colonel Pappas adopted these ROE, which talk about how long you can have sleep management, sensory deprivation, and stress positions. Are those all consistent, as far as you are concerned, and do you have a legal opinion saying those are consistent with the Geneva Conventions?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir. More importantly, because those are—and as it states in our manual, those are ones that we have to be very careful that we do not exceed the Geneva Conventions. It requires the commander's written approval to implement those.

Senator LEVIN. All right. You're saying that they are approved by the Geneva Conventions—

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN.—that they're authorized by the Geneva—

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. But, second, you're saying that only with commander's approval. Do you have commander's approval for those activities in that prison?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I am not aware of any situations that General Sanchez gave them written approval to do the ones that are under his part there.

Senator LEVIN. Do you have any situation where he was asked for written approval?

General ALEXANDER. No, none, sir.

Senator LEVIN. So there was no case where he was either requested, and, therefore, obviously, no case where he would have granted, written approval, although this specifically says that these activities require the commander's approval.

General ALEXANDER. That's correct. None that I know of, sir.

Senator LEVIN. All right. Thank you. Have you asked General Sanchez whether or not he had any requests?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, we have asked, and we have gotten—but I will ask formally, and I will—

Senator LEVIN. We've gotten—

General ALEXANDER.—I will respond—

Senator LEVIN.—what?

General ALEXANDER. Gotten the same response that I gave you—

Senator LEVIN. All right.

General ALEXANDER.—that none were there. But I will ask that formally and reply that back for the record.

[The information referred to follows:]

Lieutenant General Sanchez testified at the Senate Armed Services Committee hearing, 19 May 2004, with General Abizaid, Major General Miller, and Colonel Warren on Iraqi prisoner abuse that the only request he had approved was for continued segregation beyond 30 days. He testified that he never saw any other method come to his level requesting approval.

Senator LEVIN. Okay. Finally, in the annex to the Taguba Report, the document describes interrogation techniques, again, which are permissible with certain approvals of commanders. But then it says the following, "Interrogation officer in charge will submit the memorandum for the record requesting harsh approaches for the commanding general's approval prior to employment—sleep management, sensory deprivation, isolation longer than 30 days, dogs."

Are you familiar with that description that the officer in charge will submit memoranda to the commanding general (CG) requesting harsh approaches? Are you familiar with that language, which was in the annex, but left off this document?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, those are what's under the CG's approval, part of that document you're holding. If you look in the right-hand—

Chairman WARNER. It says right here, "requires CG's approval."

Senator LEVIN. No, I'm talking about the harsh-approaches language.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, and when you read the harsh-approaches language, sir, read the—if you would read the language—

Senator LEVIN. No, I understand that. I'm talking about the characterization of this list as being harsh approaches. This is quotes. This comes from the annex in the Taguba Report.

General ALEXANDER. Right.

Senator LEVIN. It says that in an unclassified December 12 situation update—in that situation update. Have you seen that situation update?

General ALEXANDER. No, sir, I have not.

Senator LEVIN. It's that update which is included—to Miller—included as an annex to the Taguba Report. It says the document describes these techniques which are permissible, and that document, which you say you haven't seen, but which is in the annex, says that a request for harsh approaches. That's their description. You're saying harsh approaches are approved by the Geneva Conventions?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I'm saying that when you read the interrogation manual, there are—when you look at the ways of talking to prisoners, it stems—and I have a copy of the manual that we can leave here, and when you look at it, it talks about harsh approaches, and it talks about the way that you talk to a prisoner, it talks about the direct approach. It goes all the way through all of these. As Dr. Cambone stated this morning, and others, we have gone to great extent trying to ensure that everything that we're doing is in compliance with the Geneva Conventions.

Senator LEVIN. Thank you.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you.

Senator McCain.

Senator MCCAIN. I thank you.

General Alexander and General Burgess and General Romig, thank you for being here today.

General Alexander, maybe you can't answer this, but we have a sort of contradiction here. General Taguba, who gave, I think, an excellent testimony this morning, basically concludes that these abuses were somewhat confined to a relatively small area. Is that what you get out of it, General Alexander, as well?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, the abuses of this nature, yes, sir, that's correct.

Senator MCCAIN. But yet, on the other hand, we have reports that Ambassador Bremer complained, that Secretary Powell complained, at the highest level, that the ICRC issued a long series—a number of reports concerning prisoner abuses. Something doesn't connect there. Can you help us out on that?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I've not seen the reports from Secretary Powell and from Mr. Bremer.

Senator MCCAIN. How about the ICRC?

General ALEXANDER. I have read the ICRC, and the key ones that are in the ICRC, when I read that, which was this week, when I looked at that, and you look at the allegations, and you look at the pictures, you immediately make the connection that what the ICRC had and what the pictures said are the event.

Senator MCCAIN. The ICRC alleged, as I understand it, that these situations were widespread, and not confined to just one small area.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir. But I don't know where the ICRC went. I do know that in the memo that I saw, it talked about Abu Ghraib, and it listed those allegations in Abu Ghraib that were exactly what we saw in those pictures.

Senator MCCAIN. All right. I think we need to pursue that line, because I—again, as serious as it was for Ambassador Bremer and Secretary Powell to repeatedly complain about this situation, I think it leads one to believe that it was widespread. That may not be the case.

But I want to get into a little philosophical discussion with you very quickly. Unfortunately, we don't have much time for all three of you, do you think we should have signed the Geneva Conventions for the treatment of POWs?

I'll begin with you, General Burgess.

General BURGESS. Yes, sir, I do.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

General ROMIG. Absolutely, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. Why do you think we should? Because this keeps us from getting information that may save American lives. This is a restraint by humanitarian do-gooders. Why don't we just throw them in the trash can and do whatever is necessary? We certainly have developed sophisticated techniques that we could just go after these people and get what we need, and save American lives.

General Burgess.

General BURGESS. Sir, two things. One, it applies to us, as well. Number two, we're a nation of law, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. Good point, General.

General ALEXANDER. I think, sir, one of you mentioned earlier, either last week or this week, that we hold these standards, and our military to that standard, to set a symbol for the rest of the world. Why we're here today and what we're doing today is explaining the problems that we have openly and honestly, and trying to fix those problems. We are not perfect. We make mistakes. When we identify those mistakes, get 'em out.

So when you go back to this, absolutely we should do the—

Senator MCCAIN. I'm talking about the—— General ALEXANDER.—the Geneva Conventions.

Senator MCCAIN.—extent and the problem we're facing here.

General ALEXANDER. Yes.

Senator MCCAIN. It seems to me, General, that we distinguish ourselves from our enemies by our treatment of our enemies. Would you agree with that?

General ALEXANDER. Absolutely, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. General Romig—I ask you three because you've served this Nation with distinction, and, obviously, from looking at you, you've seen incoming fire on occasion—please go ahead.

General ROMIG. Yes, sir. I agree with everything that was said. It impacts on the way our soldiers are treated—our soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines—but it's the right thing to do, too, sir. Those are our values. That's what we stand for, those sorts of values that we see in the Geneva Conventions.

Senator MCCAIN. So, General Alexander, are we overreacting to this situation, in your view? Please be candid, and if you think we are, please say so.

General ALEXANDER. Sir, at times, sitting here, one might want to say, yes, we're overreacting. But the reality is, we are not. I think these were reprehensible acts, and I think we have to get to the bottom of it. I think if we have a problem, if it is an intel oversight problem, if it is an MP problem, or if it's a leadership problem, we have to get to the bottom of it, we have to do it honestly and objectively, and then we have to hold those who were responsible accountable. That standard is so that the rest of the countries of the world know that we will do that.

Senator MCCAIN. That way we remove the stain on those million—1.399 million men and women in the military who would never consider such behavior.

General ALEXANDER. Exactly, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. I thank the chairman. I think it's well to put this in perspective, particularly in the fact that we are going to fight other conflicts, I'm very much afraid. I'm very much afraid Americans may become prisoners. If we somehow convey the impression that we have to do whatever is necessary and humanitarian do-gooders have no place in this arena, which I believe the ICRC has an important role to play, then I think we're setting ourselves up for some very serious consequences for American fighting men and women in conflicts in the future.

I see you nodding your head, General Romig. Do you agree with that?

General ROMIG. Absolutely, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. General——

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

General BURGESS. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. I thank the chairman. I thank the witnesses for their candor and for their service.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you.

I want to do a follow-up. You said you saw the material that was sent by Ambassador Bremer expressing his concern, and from the Secretary of State, is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I said I had not seen that.

Chairman WARNER. Oh, you had not seen it.

General ALEXANDER. I have not seen that, no, sir.

Chairman WARNER. But you know it existed somewhere.

General ALEXANDER. I heard—yes, sir, in earlier testimonies, I heard that, watching the testimonies, but I had not seen the specific documents from either Secretary Powell or Mr. Bremer. I've not seen those.

Chairman WARNER. Were those transmissions in documentary form, though, to those that received them?

General ALEXANDER. I don't know, sir.

General BURGESS. Sir, I do not know.

Chairman WARNER. All right, thank you very much, because the committee is anxious to get a hold of those documents. Thank you.

Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much to our panel.

I'd like to address this to General Romig. During the lunch hour, I read through this United Press International story about Arnaud de Borchgrave, who's a very experienced writer. He writes, "Long before the official reports and journalistic exposes revealing the horrific abuse of Iraqi prisoners, high-ranking American officers and the Judge Advocate General (JAG) expressed their deep concern that the civilian officials at the Pentagon were undermining the military's detention rules and regulations and ignoring interrogation procedures, even citing cases of torture. The Pentagon civilian leadership were appraised in late spring of 2003, and again in October 2004. JAG officers are quoted as telling Scott Horton, the chairman of the Committee on International Law of the Bar Association—New York Bar Association, that Feith had significantly weakened the military rules and regulations governing prisoners of war. JAG informants also blame the DOD's Chief Counsel, William Haynes, who's been recently appointed by President Bush through the Federal Appeals Court, along with Feith, for creating an atmosphere of legal ambiguity that allowed mistreatment of prisoners. These were eight JAG officers that went and spoke with Scott Horton. One deputy counsel at the Pentagon, a staunch Republican, recently resigned, as he explained, not for attribution, that right-wing ideologues are putting at risk the reputation of the U.S. military. JAG officers who spoke to Horton said civilian officials, directed by Feith, removed safeguards that were designed to prevent the abuses that the world has now witnessed. At Abu Ghraib, these safeguards should have included observations of interrogations behind two-way mirrors by JAG officers—would then be authorized to stop any misconduct on the spot."

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS AND JUSTICE:

HUMAN RIGHTS STANDARDS APPLICABLE TO THE UNITED STATES' INTERROGATION OF DETAINEES

Executive Summary/Introduction

This Report is a joint effort of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York's Committees on International Human Rights and Military Affairs and Justice, undertaken to consider allegations – reported in the press and by human rights and humanitarian organizations conducting their own investigations – that individuals detained by the United States at its military and intelligence facilities in connection with the initial War in Afghanistan and the subsequent ongoing conflict in Afghanistan, are being subjected to interrogation techniques that constitute torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.¹ We note at the outset, however, that although this project was initially motivated by allegations regarding the treatment of detainees from the War in Afghanistan, the international law and human rights standards discussed herein – with the exception of Geneva Convention protections applicable only to situations of international armed conflict – apply broadly and with equal force to the treatment of detainees captured in other situations, including detainees picked up in other countries in connection with the broader “War on Terror.”² In this Report, we will examine the international legal standards governing United States military and civil authorities in interrogating detainees and propose ways of assuring that those standards are enforced.

¹ For purposes of this Report, the term “War in Afghanistan” refers to the period of international armed conflict in Afghanistan – from October 2001 to June 2002, when the Taliban was the governing force in Afghanistan, and the phrase “ongoing conflict in Afghanistan” refers to the period after June 18, 2002 when Hamid Karzai was elected as Afghanistan’s transitional head of state, and the U.S. and other international parties were operating in Afghanistan at the invitation of this new Afghanistan government. This distinction becomes important in discussing the protections afforded to detainees by the Geneva Conventions. See Section II of this Report.

² An assessment of the parameters and legal implications of the “War on Terror,” a term coined by the Administration, is beyond the scope of this Report.

The Alleged Interrogation Practices

These allegations first surfaced in December 2002, when the U.S. military announced that it had begun a criminal investigation into the death of a 22 year-old Afghan farmer and part-time taxi driver who had died of “blunt force injuries to lower extremities complicating coronary artery disease” while in U.S. custody at Bagram Air Force Base in Afghanistan.³ Since then, details about interrogation techniques allegedly employed at U.S. detention facilities – most of which are off-limits to outsiders and some of which are in undisclosed locations – have come from government officials speaking on the condition that they would not be identified and from the few prisoners who have been released. Some examples of “stress and duress” interrogation “techniques” reportedly being practiced by U.S. Department of Defense (“DOD”) and Central Intelligence Agency (“CIA”) personnel at U.S. detention facilities include: forcing detainees to stand or kneel for hours in black hoods or spray-painted goggles, 24-hour bombardment with lights, “false-flag” operations meant to deceive a captive about his whereabouts, withholding painkillers from wounded detainees, confining detainees in tiny rooms, binding in painful positions, subjecting detainees to loud noises, and sleep deprivation.⁴

³ Carlotta Gall, U.S. Military Investigating Death of Afghan In Custody, N.Y. TIMES, Mar. 4, 2003, at A14. According to the New York Times, another Afghan man died of a pulmonary embolism or a blood clot in the lung while in U.S. custody at Bagram on December 3, 2002. Both men died within days of arriving at Bagram. Human Rights Watch has criticized the U.S. government for failing, one year after the first two deaths at Bagram – which were classified as homicides, to release the results of its investigation. In addition, the U.S. is reportedly “rendering” suspects to the custody of foreign intelligence services in countries where the practice of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment during interrogation is well-documented.⁵

The Administration’s Responses

The Association and others have written to U.S. government officials to ask whether there is any factual basis for these allegations and whether steps are being taken to ensure that detainees are interrogated in accordance with U.S. law and international standards prohibiting torture and “cruel, inhuman or degrading” treatment falling short of torture (“CID”).⁶

In response to inquiries from Human Rights Watch, U.S. Department of Defense General Counsel William J. Haynes has stated that: “United States policy condemns and prohibits torture” and that, when “questioning enemy combatants, U.S. personnel are required to

While standards and conditions of confinement – addressed by many of the international legal instruments examined in this Report – would be included in any exhaustive inquiry into the treatment of detainees at U.S. detention centers, in this Report we are focusing more narrowly on the legality of interrogation methods.

Muller, citing to the need to protect intelligence sources and methods, has responded to our inquiries by stating only that “in its various activities around the world the CIA remains subject to the requirements of U.S. law” and that allegations of unlawful behavior are reported by the CIA to the Department of Justice and are subject to investigation.⁸

In response to an inquiry made by U.S. Senator Patrick J. Leahy regarding U.S. policy, Haynes stated that U.S. policy entails “conducting interrogations in a manner that is consistent with the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (“CAT”), as ratified by the U.S. in 1994, and with the Federal anti-torture statute, 18 U.S.C. §§ 2340 - 2340A, which Congress enacted to fulfill U.S. obligations under the CAT.”⁹ Haynes also stated that U.S. policy is “to treat all detainees and conduct all interrogations, wherever they may occur, in a manner consistent with” the U.S. obligation, pursuant to Article 16 of CAT, namely, “to prevent other acts of cruel, inhuman, or degrading Leahy articulates the policy position of “the entire U.S. government.” Copies of the correspondence cited in fn. 6-9 are attached to this Report as Appendix A.

treatment or punishment which do not amount to torture” insofar as such treatment is “prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth, and/or Fourteenth Amendments.”¹⁰ Haynes assured Senator Leahy “that credible allegations of illegal conduct by U.S. personnel will be investigated and, as appropriate, reported to proper authorities.”¹¹ Furthermore, Haynes stated that the U.S. does not “expel, return (refouler) or extradite individuals to other countries where the U.S. believes it is ‘more likely than not’ that they will be tortured,” that “United States policy is to obtain specific assurances from the receiving country that it will not torture the individual being transferred to that country,” and that “the United States would take steps to investigate credible allegations of torture and take appropriate action if there were reason to believe that those assurances were not being honored.”¹²

Both Haynes and Muller have declined, however, to give details concerning the specific interrogation methods used by U.S. personnel at U.S. military and CIA detention facilities.

Legal Standards Prohibiting Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment

Although we are not in a position to investigate the factual basis for the allegations of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading interrogation practices at U.S. detention facilities that have been made, we can describe the legal principles which should guide our military and intelligence personnel in their conduct. Accordingly, in this Report we examine the international and U.S. law standards against which the interrogation practices used on detainees should be assessed. We also address the question of whether there are any circumstances posed by the post-September 11 world in which abrogation of our country's obligations to prevent and punish torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment should be permitted in the interrogation of terrorist suspects.

The Convention Against Torture

First and foremost, the U.S. obligation to prohibit and prevent the torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of detainees in its custody is set forth in the Convention Against Torture And Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment ("CAT"), to which the U.S. is a party.¹³ When the U.S. ratified CAT in 1994, it did so subject to a reservation providing that the U.S. would prevent "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment" insofar as such treatment is prohibited under the Fifth, Eighth, and/or Fourteenth Amendments.¹⁴ Thus, the U.S. is obligated to prevent not only torture, but also conduct considered cruel, inhuman or degrading under international law if such conduct is also prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. In interpreting U.S. obligations, we look to the U.N. Committee Against Torture's interpretations of CAT as well as U.S. case law decided in the immigration and asylum law context, under the Alien Tort Claims and Torture Victim Protection Acts and concerning the treatment of detainees and prisoners under the Fifth, Eighth and/or Fourteenth Amendments. We also examine the procedural mechanisms available under U.S. law to punish violations of CAT – including prosecution under federal criminal law (18 U.S.C. §§ 2340 - 2340A) and the Uniform Code of Military Justice ("UCMJ").

Other International Legal Standards which Bind the United States

While there is a dearth of U.S. case law applying CAT's prohibition against torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in the interrogation context, there is a wealth of international law sources which offer guidance in interpreting CAT. Some of these international legal standards are, without question, binding on the U.S., such as: the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (the "ICCPR"),¹⁵ the law of jus cogens and customary international law. Another international legal instrument which has been ratified by the U.S. and is relevant to the interrogation practices being examined by this Report is the Inter-American Declaration on the Rights and Duties of Man.¹⁶ Other sources, such as the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms,¹⁷ also provide guidance.

The applicability of the Geneva Conventions to the detainees from the War in Afghanistan, however, presents a more contentious issue. The Administration's official position is that the Geneva Conventions do not apply to Al Qaeda detainees, and that neither the Taliban nor Al Qaeda detainees are entitled to prisoner of war ("POW") status thereunder. Nevertheless, the Administration has stated that it is treating such individuals "humanely and, to the extent appropriate and consistent with military necessity, in a manner consistent with the principles of the Third Geneva Convention of 1949," and that the detainees "will not be subjected to physical or mental abuse or cruel treatment.”¹⁸ The Administration has never explained how it determines what interrogation techniques are “appropriate” or “consistent with military necessity,” or how it squares that determination with U.S. obligations under human rights and customary international law. For POW and civilian detainees who meet the relevant criteria of Geneva Convention (III) Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War (“Geneva III”) and Geneva Convention (IV) Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (“Geneva IV”), respectively, all coercion is prohibited.¹⁹ Moreover, any detainee whose POW status is in doubt is entitled to a hearing and determination by a competent tribunal and, pending such determination, any such detainee must be treated as a POW. Concern for the safety of U.S. forces weighs in favor of extending POW status liberally. At a minimum, all detainees – regardless of POW or civilian status – are entitled to humane treatment and prompt hearings under human rights and customary international law, including the protections of Article 3 common to all four Geneva Conventions (“Common Article 3”) and Article 75 of the Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and Related to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (“Additional Protocol I”).²⁰ We urge the U.S. to promptly establish proper screening procedures for all detainees, whether or not they served with forces that met the specific criteria of Geneva III.

¹⁸ See White House Fact Sheet: Status of Detainees at Guantánamo (Feb. 7, 2002) (available at <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2002/02/print/20020207-13.html>).

²⁰ Additional Protocol I, reprinted in 16 I.L.M. 1391. While neither the United States nor Afghanistan is a signatory to Additional Protocol I, it is generally acknowledged that certain provisions are binding as a matter of customary international law. And although the terms of Common Article 3 specifically limit its scope to internal conflicts, it is considered by customary international law to have broader scope.

Legal Standards which the United States Should Look to for Guidance

Other relevant sources of law, such as the seminal 1999 Israeli Supreme Court decision on interrogation methods employed by the Israeli General Security Service, Judgment Concerning The Legality Of The General Security Service's Interrogation Methods,²¹ and decisions of the European Court of Human Rights, although not legally binding on the U.S., also offer useful guidance in our interpretation of CAT. These foreign decisions indicate that the “War on Terror” is not unprecedented. As the Israeli and Northern Ireland experiences demonstrate, the U.S. is not the only country to have faced terrorism within its borders, despite the unique tragedy of September 11 and the potential threat of weapons of mass destruction that could expand the loss of life by orders of magnitude. We can and should learn from the experience of other countries whose courts have grappled with the need to permit effective interrogation while at the same time upholding the standards of human rights and the rule of law.

Standards in the Time of Terror

There is an inherent tension between the need to obtain potentially life-saving information through interrogation of terrorist suspects and the legal requirement of upholding the standards set forth in CAT. We grappled with the question of whether there are any circumstances under which torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment would be permissible in a post-September 11 world. While we acknowledge the real danger posed to the United States by Al Qaeda and other terrorist organizations, we concluded that there are no such exceptions to CAT’s absolute prohibition of torture.

Condoning torture under any circumstances erodes one of the most basic principles of international law and human rights and contradicts our values as a democratic state.

²¹ 38 I.L.M. 1471 (Sept. 6, 1999).

Permitting the abuse of detainees in U.S. custody, perhaps under so-called “torture warrants,” not only harms the detainees themselves; it compromises the moral framework of our interrogators and damages our society as a whole. If U.S. personnel are allowed to engage in brutal interrogation methods which denigrate the dignity and humanity of detainees, we sanction conduct which we as a nation (along with the international community) has clearly determined is wrong and immoral. Accordingly, we unanimously condemn the torture of detainees under any circumstances. We note that U.S. constitutional jurisprudence on “cruel, inhuman or degrading” treatment, which has been made relevant to CAT by the U.S. reservation, is an extremely important source of guidance on this subject. On the other hand, much of this jurisprudence evolved in the context of domestic criminal justice administration, and how these precedents would be applied in a case arising out of the interrogation and detention covered by this Report is, in the absence of more definitive authority, a matter of some speculation.

Recommendations

We applaud the statements in William Haynes’ June 25, 2003 letter to Senator Leahy affirming the policy of the U.S. regarding its commitment to CAT. To make that policy meaningful, we make the following recommendations:

1. Training and Education. All law enforcement personnel, civilian or military, medical personnel, public officials and other persons who may be involved in the custody, interrogation or treatment of anyone under any form of detention or imprisonment should be informed and educated regarding the prohibition against torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, as applied in practice. This requires, as provided in Article 11 of CAT, that the U.S. keep under systematic review interrogation rules, instructions, methods and practices as well as arrangements for the custody and treatment of such detainees.²² Above all, commanders should not condone non-compliance nor permit an environment in which troops are encouraged to provide lip service to compliance but yet think that non-compliance is acceptable.

Given that CIA personnel are not generally subject to the UCMJ, possibly not even when accompanying the armed forces in the field, special procedures should be available to provide reasonable assurance that compliance with CAT is being taught and maintained by intelligence agencies. That assurance might best be provided by the applicable committees of the Congress exercising oversight responsibility in conjunction with the inspectors general of the applicable agencies.

2. Prompt Investigation of Violations. As required by Article 12 of CAT, the U.S. must ensure that allegations of abusive conduct are taken seriously and are fully and impartially investigated.²³ Thus, any individual who alleges that he or she has been subjected to torture must be provided with a meaningful opportunity to complain to, and to have his/her case promptly and impartially examined by, competent authorities. Steps must be taken to ensure that the complainant and witnesses are protected against all ill-treatment and intimidation.

3. Expand the Scope and Reach of Section 2340. Consistent with its obligation under Article 4 of CAT to ensure that all acts of torture are offenses under its criminal law²⁴ – and since 18 U.S.C. § 2340 does not, by its terms, apply to acts constituting torture committed in extraterritorial detention centers under U.S. jurisdiction – the U.S. must expand the geographic reach of Section 2340 so that the prescriptions of CAT are applicable at all U.S. detention centers.

²³ Id., Art. 12.

²⁴ Id., Art. 4.

4. Fully Utilize the UCMJ. The U.S. must more fully utilize the procedures and protections available under the UCMJ to prosecute all violations of CAT by the armed forces or others subject to the UCMJ.

5. Independent Investigation of Human Rights Compliance in Other Countries. As provided by Article 3 of CAT, the U.S. must not “render” detainees to other countries where there are substantial grounds for belief that the detainees would be in danger of being subjected to torture.²⁵ In determining whether there are “substantial grounds for belief” that a detainee would be in danger of torture if rendered to another country, U.S. authorities must take into account all the relevant considerations concerning that country, including independently investigating whether there exists a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights in the country.²⁶

6. Grant POW Status to Detainees Whose Status is in Doubt and Possibly as a Matter of Policy. The U.S. should adhere to Geneva III’s requirement that any detainee whose POW status is in “doubt” is entitled to POW status – and, therefore, cannot be subjected to coercive treatment – until a “competent tribunal,” which must be convened promptly, determines otherwise.²⁷ We urge the U.S. to consider the policy grounds for extending POW treatment to regular force combatants, whether or not legally required to do so, as it has done in prior conflicts.

²⁵ Id., Art. 3.

²⁶ For example, a lawsuit was recently filed by the Center for Constitutional Rights on behalf of Maher Arar, a Syrian-born Canadian citizen alleging that U.S. authorities deported him to Jordan in September 2002, where he was driven across the border and handed over to Syrian authorities. The Arar Complaint alleges that, although the U.S. Department of State’s 2003 Country Reports designated Syria as a government that practices systemic torture, U.S. officials allegedly relied on assurances from the Syrian government that Arar would not be tortured. Arar has alleged that he was tortured repeatedly in a Syrian prison for 10 months, often with cables and electrical cords. See Complaint in Maher Arar v. John Ashcroft, et al. (available at http://www.ccr-ny.org/v2/legal/September_11th/docs/ArarComplaint.pdf).

7. Prompt Screening and Hearings for All Detainees. In keeping with the spirit of the Geneva Conventions and human rights law, we urge the U.S. to provide proper screening procedures and hearings to all detainees.²⁸

We now turn to a more detailed discussion of the international standards applicable to interrogation procedures.

THE CONVENTION AGAINST TORTURE

The U.N. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (“CAT”) is the primary source of international law relevant to the treatment of detainees.²⁹ CAT has been ratified by the U.S., and its prohibitions against torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment have been implemented in our domestic law.

Specifically, U.S. law implements CAT’s prohibition against torture in the immigration and asylum contexts, under the Alien Tort Claims and Torture Victim Protection

²⁷ Geneva III, Art. 5.

²⁸ We note that the Department of Defense has recently circulated for comment administrative review procedures for enemy combatants at Guantánamo Bay Naval Base. See <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Mar2004/d20040303ar.pdf>. While welcoming such a review process, we do not consider it to meet the requirement for status determination under the Geneva Conventions.

Acts, by criminal statute and under the UCMJ. Under CAT, the U.S. is also obligated to prevent “cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment” as defined in international law; however, by express reservation, the U.S. interprets this obligation in keeping with standards of treatment required by the Fifth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. Accordingly, under CAT, American military and intelligence personnel involved in the interrogation of detainees may not torture those detainees, nor may they subject them to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment that is, or would be, forbidden under the Fifth, Eighth and/or Fourteenth Amendments.

CAT’s Definitions of – and Prohibitions against – Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment

CAT defines and prohibits torture, as defined, and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in general terms. In addition, it also sets out steps ratifying countries must take to prevent, investigate, and criminalize acts of torture;³⁰ prohibits the extradition or other rendering (also known as “refoulement”) of a person to a country that would likely subject such person to torture;³¹ creates a Committee to oversee the implementation of CAT by ratifying countries; and sets forth procedures for inquiries, individual communications, and inter-State complaints.

CAT’s preamble acknowledges that torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment are already prohibited under Article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Article 7 of the ICCPR. Thus, rather than simply mirroring the prohibitions from these instruments, Article 1 of CAT provides additional guidance to states parties in preventing and punishing torture by setting forth an explicit definition of torture:

³⁰ Id. Article 4.1 states: “Each State Party shall ensure that all acts of torture are offences under its criminal law. The same shall apply to an attempt to commit torture and to an act by any person which constitutes complicity or participation in torture.”

...torture means any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions.

This definition makes it clear that the result of torture need not be physical pain or suffering, but can also be mental. In addition, torture is defined to include such conduct undertaken for the purpose of obtaining information. Finally, the prohibition is not directed at private citizens, acting independently of government; it applies rather to acts committed by government officials and agents, or persons acting with official consent or acquiescence.

CAT's prohibition of torture is absolute. An order from a superior officer or a public authority may not be invoked as a justification of torture. Specifically, Article 2(2) provides: "No exceptional circumstances whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification of torture."

Although CAT does not provide a definition of CID punishment or treatment, Article 16 requires ratifying countries to prevent "other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment which do not amount to torture...." This language suggests that cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment is on a continuum with torture.

CAT requires each signatory state to prevent the commission of the prohibited acts within any territory under the state's jurisdiction. Specifically, each ratifying country must ensure that any official who may be involved in the interrogation of anyone under any form of detention or imprisonment is informed of and educated about the prohibitions against torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. CAT also requires each ratifying country to ensure that allegations of torture and CID treatment are fully and impartially investigated. See CAT Articles 12 and 16(1).

CAT's Prohibition against Torture and CID Treatment as Interpreted by the U.N. Committee Against Torture
The U.N. Committee Against Torture, created by CAT, is charged with monitoring implementation of the treaty by ratifying countries through the determination of individual complaints, considering country reports submitted under CAT, and resolving inter-State disputes. Given the importance of international standards in interpreting U.S. domestic law³² as well as the recent Lawrence v. Texas decision, in which the U.S. Supreme Court expressly looked to foreign and international law for guidance,³³ U.N. Committee decisions are relevant to the assessment of whether the actions of U.S. personnel involved in the interrogation of detainees constitute torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.

The U.N. Committee has concluded that the following acts³⁴ constitute torture under CAT:

- daily beatings and detaining someone in a small, uncomfortable space for two weeks;³⁵
- forcing someone to sleep on the floor of a cell while handcuffed following interrogation;³⁶
- in severe cases, sleep deprivation;³⁷ and
- the threat of torture.³⁸

Furthermore, the U.N. Committee has recommended that the use of a blindfold during questioning be expressly prohibited.³⁹ More generally, the U.N. Committee has expressed concern that States have defined torture too narrowly, covering only “systematic blows or other violent acts.”⁴⁰ The U.N. Committee has also expressed concern whether the penal law of one

Practices were selected for inclusion here because of their similarity to the practices allegedly used by U.S. agents with respect to detainees held in connection with the War in Afghanistan and the ongoing conflict in Afghanistan. State was too narrow in defining torture because it failed to prohibit “certain aspects of torture, such as psychological pressure, threats and intimidation.”⁴¹

The U.N. Committee has found that the following acts amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment under CAT:

- depriving someone of food and/or water;⁴²
- in some cases, binding someone in a restraint chair;⁴³
- the use by prison authorities of instruments of physical restraint that may cause unnecessary pain and humiliation;⁴⁴ and
- long periods of detention (two weeks or more) in detention cells that are sub-standard (this conduct may amount to torture if the period of detention is extremely long).⁴⁵

The U.N. Committee has found that the following acts may amount to torture when used in combination with other forms of CID:

- being restrained in very painful conditions;
- being hooded;
- the sounding of loud music for prolonged periods;
- sleep deprivation for prolonged periods;

- violent shaking; and
- using cold air to chill.⁴⁶

In sum, the U.N. Committee Against Torture has indicated that the classification of treatment as CID or torture is often a matter of severity, intensity, and the totality of the circumstances. Combining several forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment will frequently amount to torture, and ratifying countries are required under CAT to refrain from all such practices, whether they reach the level of severity to be considered torture or not. Thus, according to U.N. Committee jurisprudence, alleged interrogation practices such as forcing detainees to stand or kneel for hours in black hoods or spray-painted goggles, 24-hour bombardment with lights, binding detainees in painful positions, withholding painkillers from wounded detainees, and subjecting detainees to loud noises and sleep deprivation, at a minimum, constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and may, depending on the circumstances, rise to the level of torture. U.N. Committee decisions critical of blindfolding, psychological pressure and threats and intimidation strongly suggest that “false-flag” operations meant to deceive detainees about their whereabouts and “stress and duress” interrogation techniques are also prohibited.

U.S. Law Implementing CAT's Prohibitions against Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Senate adopted a resolution of advice and consent to U.S. ratification of CAT, subject to the declaration that it be deemed non-self-executing, on October 27, 1990.⁴⁷

⁴⁶ These techniques were found by the Committee to constitute “breaches of article 16 and also constitute torture as defined in article 1 of the Convention. This conclusion is particularly evident where such methods of interrogation are used in combination, which appears to be the standard case.” Concluding Observations concerning Israel (1997), U.N. Doc. No. A/52/44, at para. 257.

The U.S. ratified CAT in October 1994, and CAT entered into force with respect to the United States on 20 November 1994.⁴⁷ The implementation in U.S. immigration, extradition, criminal and civil tort law of CAT's prohibition against torture, as well as the express application of U.S. constitutional standards to CAT's prohibition against CID treatment, indicates that many of the interrogation practices allegedly being used by the U.S. against detainees may be prohibited under international and U.S. law.

U.S. Understandings and Reservations in Ratifying CAT

The United States conditioned its ratification of CAT upon certain understandings related to CAT's definition of torture in Article 1. In one such understanding, the U.S. specified that mental pain or suffering within the meaning of "torture" refers to prolonged mental harm caused by or resulting from: (1) the intentional infliction or threatened infliction of severe physical pain or suffering; (2) the administration or application, or threatened administration or application, of mind-altering substances or other procedures calculated to disrupt profoundly the senses or the personality; (3) the threat of imminent death; or (4) the threat that another person ⁴⁷ See 136 CONG. REC. 36,198 (daily ed. Oct. 27, 1990). The instrument of ratification included the declaration that "the provisions of Articles 1 through 16 of [CAT] are not self-executing." See United Nations Treaty Collection: Declarations and Reservations, (available at http://www.unhcr.ch/html/menu3/b/treaty12_asp.htm).

In the case of a self-executing treaty, "no domestic legislation is required to give [it] the force of law in the United States." Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Franklin Mint Corp., 466 U.S. 243, 252 (1984). By contrast, a non-self-executing treaty is one that "must be implemented by legislation before it gives rise to a private cause of action." Mannington Mills, Inc. v. Congoleum Corp., 595 F.2d 1287, 1298 (3d Cir. 1979).

⁴⁸ See Ratification Status for CAT, United States of America (available at www.unhcr.ch). The U.S. has not opted out of the inquiry procedure under Article 20. It has entered a declaration accepting the interstate complaint procedure set up by Article 21. The U.S. has not, however, accepted the competence of the Committee under Article 22 to receive and consider complaints on behalf of individuals subject to its jurisdiction who claim to be victims of a violation of CAT.

will imminently be subjected to death, severe physical pain or suffering, or the administration or application of mind-altering substances or other procedures calculated to disrupt profoundly the senses or the personality.⁴⁹ Another U.S. understanding pertains to defects in criminal procedure: non-compliance with applicable legal procedural standards (such as Miranda warnings) does not per se constitute “torture.”⁵⁰

When ratifying CAT, the United States also took the following reservation: “the United States considers itself bound by the obligation under Article 16 to prevent ‘cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment,’ only insofar as the term ‘cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’ means the cruel, unusual and inhumane treatment or punishment prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.”⁵¹

Torture in U.S. Legislation, Regulation and Case Law
CAT’s prohibition of official acts amounting to torture has been implemented in

See Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, opened for signature May 23, 1969, 1155 U.N.T.S. 331, at Art. 19(c). This Report assumes that the U.S. reservation with respect to Article 16 of CAT is valid.

implementing laws and regulations, U.S. courts have interpreted CAT's substantive provisions in a variety of contexts.⁵²

U.S. Immigration Law and Torture

As previously noted, all countries that ratify CAT are obligated to ensure that detainees are not deported or extradited to countries where they are likely to be tortured. In 1998, the United States enacted the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998, § 2242, Pub. L. No. 105-277, Div. G, 112 Stat. 2681, 2681-822 (Oct. 21, 1998) (the "FARR Act"), implementing this obligation. In 1999, the Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") promulgated regulations effectuating the FARR Act in the immigration and asylum context, providing aliens in exclusion, deportation or removal proceedings with grounds to seek withholding of removal based on CAT. See 8 C.F.R. § 208.18 (2004), et seq. These regulations incorporate CAT's definition of torture verbatim, with the following qualification: "Torture is an extreme form of cruel and inhuman treatment and does not include lesser forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment that do not amount to torture." See 8 C.F.R. § 208.18(a)(2) (2004). These regulations further define mental pain or suffering consistently with the U.S. understandings to CAT, and exclude from the definition of torture acts which result in "unanticipated or unintended severity of pain and suffering." See 8 C.F.R. § 208.18(a)(5) (2004).

A number of federal court cases and Board of Immigration Appeals ("BIA") decisions address torture claims in the immigration context. The BIA has held that the following abuses of detainees and prisoners, for example, amount to torture: "suspension for long periods in contorted positions, burning with cigarettes, sleep deprivation, and...severe and repeated beatings with cables or other instruments on the back and on the soles of the feet,'...beatings about the ears, resulting in partial or complete deafness, and punching in the eyes, leading to partial or complete blindness." Matter of G-A-, 23 I & N Dec. 366, 370 (BIA 2002) (internal citations omitted).⁵³ Furthermore, persons seeking asylum or withholding of removal have successfully challenged deportation under Sections 208 and 241(b)(3) of the Immigration & Nationality Act ("INA") when they have a well-founded fear of future persecution. Although "persecution" is not defined in the INA, it is understood to encompass treatment falling short of torture.

U.S. Extradition of Fugitives Who Face Threat of Torture

In the extradition context, torture claims are governed by regulations enacted by the Department of State under the FARR Act. Under these regulations, individuals sought for extradition may present a claim that they are likely to be tortured if surrendered to the requesting state. These claims are considered by the U.S. Secretary of State, who is responsible for implementing CAT's obligation not to extradite an individual to a State where he or she is in danger of being subject to torture. Specifically, section 95 of 22 C.F.R. (2004) provides, in relevant part, that the Secretary of State must consider whether a person facing extradition from the U.S. "is more likely than not" to be tortured in the State requesting extradition, and that appropriate policy and legal offices must review and analyze the information relevant to the torture allegation. The extradition regulations, and the decisions interpreting them,⁵⁴ demonstrate that U.S. administrative bodies and courts view CAT's prohibition against extradition to torture as binding on the U.S. even when the extraditable individual is accused of wrongdoing.

⁵³ This had also been the position of the Ninth Circuit. See Al-Safer v. INS, 268 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2001) (holding that severe beatings and cigarette burns sustained over periods of days, weeks and months constitutes torture). More recently, however, the Ninth Circuit has held that neither serious persecution (e.g., threats, unjust charges, fines, illegal searches and seizures) nor verbal abuse alone amount to torture. See Gui v. INS, 280 F.3d 1217 (9th Cir. 2002); Quant v. Ashcroft, 2003 U.S. App. LEXIS 6616 (9th Cir. 2003).

U.S. Implementation of CAT's Criminal Law Requirements

18 U.S.C. §§ 2340 and 2340A were enacted to fulfill CAT's requirement that each ratifying country criminalize all acts of torture, including attempts to commit torture and complicity in torture.⁵⁵ Section 2340 defines torture as:

an act committed by a person acting under the color of law specifically intended to inflict severe physical or mental pain or suffering (other than pain or suffering incidental to lawful sanctions) upon another person within his custody or physical control. . .

"Severe mental pain or suffering" is also defined, using the same wording as the U.S. understandings concerning Article 1 of CAT set forth in Section I(C)(1) above. See 18 U.S.C. § 2340. As discussed further below, however, this statute applies only to U.S. nationals (or others present in the U.S.) who have committed or attempted or conspired to commit acts of torture "outside of the United States."⁵⁶

⁵⁵ The Senate Committee on the Judiciary acknowledged the relationship of 18 U.S.C. § 2340 to CAT and the Torture Victim Protection Act in a 2002 report. See S. REP. NO. 107-44 (2002), at 10-11.

⁵⁶ A restrictive interpretation of the scope of the statute is found in the U.S. Dept. of Justice, Criminal Resource Manual 20 (Oct. 1997), which provides: "Section 2340A of Title 18,

U.S. Case Law Interpretations of Torture in Tort Claims

Two U.S. statutes provide for civil suits against those who commit acts of torture abroad. The Alien Tort Claims Act of 1789 (“ATCA”), 28 U.S.C. § 1350, states that “[t]he district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States.” The Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991 (“TVPA”), 28 U.S.C. § 1350, provides that:

[a]n individual who, under actual or apparent authority, or color of law, of any foreign nation – (1) subjects an individual to torture shall, in a civil action, be liable for damages to that individual; or (2) subjects an individual to extrajudicial killing shall, in a civil action, be liable for damages to the individual’s legal representative, or to any person who may be a claimant in an action for wrongful death.⁵⁷

The TVPA extends a civil remedy to U.S. citizen torture victims, while the ATCA provides a remedy for aliens only.

U.S. courts applying the ATCA and TVPA have found that the following acts constitute torture: subjecting detainees to interrogation sessions lasting 14 hours (Xuncax v. Gramajo, 886 F. Supp. 162, 170 (D. Mass 1995)); beating with hands (Tachiona v. Mugabe, 234 F. Supp. 2d 401, 420-423 (S.D.N.Y. 2002); Cabiri v. Assasie-Gyimah, 921 F. Supp. 1189, 1191, 1196 (S.D.N.Y. 1996); Abebe-Jira v. Negewo, 72 F.3d 844, 845 (11th Cir. 1996)); threatening United States Code, prohibits torture committed by public officials under color of law against persons within the public official’s custody or control. . . . The statute applies only to acts of torture committed outside the United States. There is Federal extraterritorial jurisdiction over such acts whenever the perpetrator is a national of the United States or the alleged offender is found within the United States, irrespective of the nationality of the victim or the alleged offender.”

⁵⁷ See S. REP. NO. 102-249 (1991) (stating that the TVPA would “carry out the intent of the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, which was ratified by the U.S. Senate on October 27, 1990”).

Conclusion: CAT's Prohibition against Torture as Implemented in U.S. Legislation and Regulation

U.S. domestic laws prohibiting, or providing a cause of action to victims of, torture are consistent with the standards of CAT. However, these U.S. statutes and regulations are limited to specific contexts – such as, refugee claims, extradition of foreign fugitives, criminalizing acts of torture committed outside the U.S. by U.S. officials, and providing compensation to victims of torture committed by aliens. Accordingly, the U.S. has yet to fulfill its obligation, under CAT, to enact laws which adequately prevent U.S. officials and individuals acting with their consent from subjecting any detainee to torture and which punish such conduct wherever it occurs.

CAT's Prohibition against "Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment," as Interpreted by United States Law

As previously noted, the U.S.'s reservation to Article 16 of CAT provides that the United States considers itself bound by Article 16 only insofar as CID treatment is understood to mean "the cruel, unusual and inhumane treatment or punishment prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments."

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee report states that this reservation is the outgrowth of concern that "degrading treatment or punishment . . . has been interpreted as potentially including treatment that would probably not be prohibited by the U.S. Constitution" and cites, as an example of what the United States would not find "degrading" under the U.S. Constitution, a holding by the European Commission of Human Rights that the refusal of authorities to give formal recognition to an individual's change of sex might constitute degrading treatment.⁵⁸ This explanation suggests that the reservation was intended to prevent the importation of foreign social values or mores into U.S. law, rather than any view that international norms of CID treatment are out of step with U.S. law.

In assessing interrogation conduct under Article 16 of CAT, the U.S. should look to international standards defining cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. If such conduct is prohibited under international law, the U.S. is bound to prevent such conduct unless it would not be prohibited under the Fifth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The Committees take note that much of the case law under the three Amendments arises in the context of domestic criminal justice proceedings. How this jurisprudence would be applied in a case relating to the detention and interrogation of foreign combatants is not completely clear. For instance, on the one hand some of the special protections provided in the American criminal justice system with respect to interrogations would be of doubtful applicability, particularly considering an asserted state interest in national security. On the other, the absence of a legitimate state interest in punishment might mandate a higher standard of treatment of detainees generally.

Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment Standards

The Constitution's guarantee of due process forbids compulsion to testify, at least for domestic law enforcement purposes, by fear of hurt, torture or exhaustion. See Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46 (1947) (armed Texas Rangers on several successive nights took defendant from county jail into the woods, whipped him, asked him each time about a confession, interrogated him from approximately 11 p.m. to 3 a.m. and warned him not to speak to anyone about the nightly trips); Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936) (confessions obtained by mock executions and whippings); Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143, 154 (1944) (defendant was taken into custody by police officers and for 36 hours thereafter was held incommunicado, without sleep or rest, and interrogated without respite by relays of officers, experienced investigators, and highly trained lawyers); see also Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 327 U.S. 274 (1946). However, the presence of unlawful police coercion motivated by “immediate necessity to find the victim and save his life” to extract a confession has been found by one appeals court to be insufficient to exclude a subsequent confession.⁵⁹

Due process also prohibits actions taken under color of law that are “so brutal and offensive to human dignity” that they “shock the conscience.”⁶⁰ The Supreme Court has given content to the phrase “shocks the conscience” by reference to the spectrum of fault standards in tort law. Intentional infliction of injury unjustifiable by any government interest is the sort of official action which could rise to the conscience-shocking level.⁶¹ All applicable sources of law are consistent in prohibiting such extreme conduct.

Eighth Amendment Standards

The Eighth Amendment prohibits “cruel and unusual punishments.”⁶² In the context of law enforcement, U.S. courts have long held that the norms articulated under the Cruel ⁵⁹ Leon v. Wainwright, 734 F.2d 770 n.5 (11th Cir. 1984) (kidnapping conviction confirmed based on a confession obtained following a prior coerced confession).

⁶⁰ Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165, 172 (1952).

⁶¹ County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 848-49 (1998).

⁶² The UCMJ, discussed below, provides that no “cruel or unusual punishment” may be adjudged by any court-martial or inflicted upon any person subject to the UCMJ (10 U.S.C.S. § 855). In general, military courts have applied the Supreme Court’s interpretation of the Eighth Amendment to claims raised under this provision. See, e.g., United States v. Avila, 53 M.J. 99, 2000 CAAF LEXIS 569 (C.A.A.F. 2000). Thus, under the UCMJ, POWs and persons who under the law of war are subject to trial for military offences by a military and Unusual Punishment Clause establish a minimum level of protection, applicable even to pretrial detainees.⁶³

While the Supreme Court initially interpreted the Eighth Amendment as prohibiting only barbaric or torturous punishments, this interpretation was early broadened in two respects: (i) to prevent disproportionate punishments (Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349 (1910)) and (ii) to address non-physical forms of cruel and unusual punishment (e.g., Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (1958) (in case involving denationalization as a punishment for desertion from the United States Army, the Court noted that “evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society” should inform interpretation of the Eighth Amendment)). In 1947, the Supreme Court recognized that wanton or unnecessary infliction of pain also constitutes cruel and unusual punishment. Louisiana ex rel. Francis v. Resweber, 329 U.S. 459, 463 (1947).

In cases brought by prisoners under the Eighth Amendment alleging that excessive force was used against them by government officials, courts consider both the objective component (whether the wrongdoing was “harmful enough” to implicate the Eighth Amendment) and the subjective component (whether the officials acted with a sufficiently culpable state of mind) of the challenged conduct. Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 8 (1992). In order to establish that the objective component of an Eighth Amendment violation is satisfied, a prisoner need not prove he has sustained significant injury. However, the extent of injury tribunal are not to be punished in a cruel or unusual manner, within the meaning of the Eighth Amendment.

⁶³ City of Revere v. Massachusetts Gen. Hosp., 463 U.S. 239, 244 (1983). See also County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 849-50 (1998) (citation omitted) (“We held in City of Revere v. Massachusetts Gen. Hospital that ‘the due process rights of a [pretrial detainee] are at least as great as the Eighth Amendment protections available to a convicted prisoner’”).

suffered is one factor that may suggest “whether the use of force could plausibly have been thought necessary” in a particular situation, “or instead evinced such wantonness with respect to the unjustified infliction of harm as is tantamount to a knowing willingness that it occur.”⁶⁴ The subjective component involves, in the context of force used by prison officials, “whether force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.”⁶⁵

Enforcement of CAT under U.S. Law

18 U.S.C. §§ 2340 – 2340B

As stated above, the United States’ attempt to comply with its obligation under CAT to criminalize torture is codified in 18 U.S.C. § 2340A. Section 2340A criminalizes conduct by a U.S. national or a foreign national present in the U.S. who, acting under color of law, commits or attempts to commit torture outside the United States. The statute is exclusively criminal and may not be construed as creating any right enforceable in a civil proceeding. See 18 U.S.C. § 2340B. Section 2340A generally applies to acts committed by U.S. nationals overseas (everywhere except “all areas under the jurisdiction of the United States, including any of the places described in sections 5 and 7 of this title and Section 46501(2) of Title 49.”) When the Section was enacted the reach of the cross-referenced provisions, notably 18 U.S.C. § 7, was uncertain.⁶⁶ However, Section 7 was broadened in the USA PATRIOT Act to clarify jurisdiction

⁶⁴ Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 7 (1992) (quoting Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312, 321 (1986)).

⁶⁵ Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312, 320-21 (1986) (quoting Johnson v. Glick, 481 F.2d 1028, 1033 (2d Cir. 1973)).

⁶⁶ Compare U.S. v. Gatlin, 216 F.3d 207 (2d Cir 2000) with U.S. v. Corey, 232 F.3d 1166 (9th Cir 2000). However, the question was substantially mooted for most purposes by the passage of the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000, PUB. L. 106-503, 112 STAT. 2488, over crimes committed against U.S. citizens on U.S. property abroad by extending U.S. criminal jurisdiction over certain crimes committed at its foreign diplomatic, military and other facilities, and by cross-reference excluded those places from the reach of Section 2340A. The resulting drastic limitation of jurisdiction under 18 U.S.C. § 2340A appears unintended. We recommend that Congress amend Section 2340A to assure that it applies to U.S. government premises abroad without prejudice to the expansion of U.S. criminal jurisdiction under other statutes.

The U.S. did not enact a specific criminal statute outlawing torture within the United States, out of deference to federal-state relations and because it determined that existing federal and state criminal law was sufficient to cover any domestic act that would qualify as torture under CAT.⁶⁷ It is submitted that the inapplicability of state law to U.S. facilities abroad and the lack of other federal criminal law comparable to Section 2340A leaves a serious vacuum in carrying out the obligations of the U.S. under CAT.

Unfortunately the U.S. has never enforced 18 U.S.C. § 2340A, and has thereby fallen far short of its obligations under international law and its professed ideals. The United States has failed to utilize 18 U.S.C. § 2340A to prosecute either U.S. agents suspected of committing torture outside the jurisdiction of the U.S. or foreign torturers living within the United States. Indeed, Amnesty International reported in 2002 that in the eight years following the enactment of 18 U.S.C. § 2340 and § 2340A, not a single case had been brought under that section.⁶⁸ which subjects persons accompanying the armed forces abroad to U.S. civilian criminal jurisdiction, even if outside the "special maritime and territorial jurisdiction."

Uniform Code of Military Justice

The UCMJ may be used to prosecute in courts-martial certain acts of ill-treatment carried out, whether within the United States or overseas, by American military personnel and possibly certain civilians accompanying such personnel. This federal statute is essentially a complete set of criminal laws that includes both crimes that are normally part of a criminal code as well as uniquely military and wartime offenses.

As a jurisdictional matter, the UCMJ applies worldwide (10 U.S.C. § 805), and persons subject to the UCMJ include any U.S. service member (10 U.S.C. § 802) as well as certain civilians “[i]n time of war ... serving with or accompanying an armed force in the field” (10 U.S.C. § 802(a)(10)) and POWs (10 U.S.C. § 802(a)(9)).⁶⁹ Because courts-martial have jurisdiction to try “any person who by the law of war is subject to trial by a military tribunal” for any offense against the laws of war (10 U.S.C. § 818), the UCMJ would seem to apply also to “unlawful combatants” deemed by the Administration not to qualify for POW status under Geneva III.

The broad statutory application of the UCMJ to civilians associated in various ways with the armed forces has been judicially limited in deference to the requirements of Article III, Section II, of the Constitution and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments protecting the right to trial by jury. As so limited, the UCMJ does not apply to civilians who have no military status in peacetime, even if they are accompanying United States forces overseas as employees or dependents. Although courts’ interpretations of the terms “serving”, “accompanying” and “in the field” suggest a broad application, the “time of war” requirement is construed narrowly when applied to civilians.⁷⁰ As recently as 1998, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces⁷¹ analyzed the propriety of the application of the UCMJ to civilians and stated:

As a matter of constitutional law, the Supreme Court has held that Congress may not extend court-martial jurisdiction to cover civilians who have no military status in peacetime, even if they are accompanying United States forces overseas as employees or dependents.

Willenbring v. Neurauter, 48 M.J. 152, 157, 1998 CAAF LEXIS 43 (C.A.A.F. 1998). The line of cases in this area generally focuses on the application of the UCMJ to civilian contractors and civilian dependents of service members. See, e.g., Robb v. United States, 456 F.2d 768 (Ct. Cl. 1972) (civilian engineer employed by U.S. Navy in Vietnam was not subject to UCMJ); Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957) (no jurisdiction over civilian dependents of service members stationed overseas in peacetime for capital offenses). No cases directly address whether CIA operatives conducting para-military operations with the regular armed forces or interrogations within a military base are considered civilians for purposes of UCMJ application. In Reid v. Covert, the Supreme Court stated, “[e]ven if it were possible, we need not attempt here to precisely define the boundary between ‘civilians’ and members of the ‘land and naval Forces.’ We recognize that Averette*, 19 U.S.C.M.A. 363, 365-66, 41 C.M.R. 363, 365-66 (1970) (the phrase “in time of war” is limited to “a war formally declared by Congress”; even though the Vietnam conflict “qualified as a war as that word is generally used and understood[,] ... such a recognition should not serve as a shortcut for a formal declaration of war, at least in the sensitive area of subjecting civilians to military jurisdiction”). Cf. United States v. Anderson, 17 U.S.C.M.A. 588, 589, 38 C.M.R. 386, 387 (1968) (United States’ involvement in Vietnam conflict “constitutes a ‘time of war’ . . . within the meaning of” Article 43(a) of the UCMJ, which provides that there is no statute of limitations over certain offenses committed “in time of war”).

there might be circumstances where a person could be ‘in’ the armed services . . . even though he had not formally been inducted into the military or did not wear a uniform.” See 354 U.S. at 22.⁷² In any event, where a CIA operative is a detached service member who has not been formally discharged from military service (as is often the case in practice), the UCMJ would generally apply to such person in time of war or peace.

The UCMJ provides the strongest substantive basis for potential prosecution of torture or CID treatment in federal criminal law, specifically outlawing cruel or unusual punishment, torture under 18 U.S.C. § 2340 and a variety of related offenses. Article 55 of the UCMJ provides that:

Punishment by flogging, or by branding, marking, or tattooing on the body, or any other cruel or unusual punishment, may not be adjudged by any court-martial or inflicted upon any person subject to this chapter. The use of irons, single or double, except for the purpose of safe custody, is prohibited.

10 U.S.C. § 855.⁷³ Article 55 is unique in its specific definition of “cruel or unusual punishment” as an offense.⁷⁴ While most military courts have followed the Supreme Court’s analytical framework of protections under the Eighth Amendment as they pertain to cruel and ⁷² As previously noted, the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000, see supra note 66, eliminated any gap in jurisdiction resulting from Reid v. Covert by conferring jurisdiction on federal courts over civilians accompanying the armed forces abroad.

⁷³ The protections of Article 55 apply to “any person subject to” the UCMJ. And as stated previously, the UCMJ would seem to apply to unlawful combatants under 10 U.S.C. § 818.

⁷⁴ The Articles of War preceding the UCMJ prohibited “cruel and unusual punishment,” but the phrase was changed to “cruel or unusual punishment” in Article 55 (emphasis added). See Articles of War 41, Manual for Courts-Martial, U.S. Army, 1929 at 212, and 1949 at 284. The legislative history of Article 55 provides no rationale why the word “and” was changed to “or.” United States v. White, 54 M.J. 469, 2001 CAAF LEXIS 497 (C.A.A.F. 2001).

unusual punishment,⁷⁵ several military courts have found that Article 55 provides greater protections than those given under the Eighth Amendment.⁷⁶ It is notable that Article 55 applies at least the equivalent of the protection afforded by the Eighth Amendment even if the victim is not otherwise entitled to constitutional rights (e.g., a non-citizen apprehended and detained outside the U.S. and arguably not entitled to such rights).⁷⁷

Moreover, the UCMJ effectively provides a basis for the prosecution of military personnel in courts-martial for the offense of torture in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2340.

Article 134 of the UCMJ (10 U.S.C. § 934) provides:

Though not specifically mentioned in this chapter, all disorders and neglects to the prejudice of good order and discipline in the armed forces, all conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the armed forces, and crimes and offenses not capital, of which persons subject to this chapter may be guilty, shall be taken cognizance of by a general, special, or summary court-martial, according to the nature and degree of the offense, and shall be punished at the discretion of that court.

Article 134 makes punishable acts in three categories of offenses not specifically covered in any other article of the UCMJ: Clause 1 offenses involving disorders and neglect to the prejudice of good order and discipline; Clause 2 offenses involving conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the armed forces; and Clause 3 offenses entailing non-capital crimes or offenses that violate Federal law.

⁷⁵ See United States v. Kinsch, 54 M.J. 641, 2000 CCA LEXIS 237 (A.C.C.A. 2000). See also Section I(C)(3)(b) of this Report for a fuller discussion of the Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual treatment and punishment.

⁷⁶ See United States v. Wappler, 2 C.M.A. 393, 9 C.M.R. 23, 1953 CMA LEXIS 897 (C.M.A. 1953); White, 54 M.J. at 473; United States v. Avila, 53 M.J. 99, 2000 CAAF LEXIS 569 (C.A.A.F. 2000).

⁷⁷ Compare the federal criminal civil rights statutes, 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242, and the civil statute 42 U.S.C. § 1983, all of which apply only where the victim is entitled to constitutional rights.

In order to successfully charge an individual under Clauses 1 and 2 of this Article, the government must show: (i) that the accused did or failed to do certain acts; and (ii) that, under the circumstances, the accused's conduct was to the prejudice of good order and discipline in the armed forces or was of a nature to bring discredit upon the armed forces.⁷⁸ Under Clause 1, the acts must be directly prejudicial to good order and discipline, rather than remotely so. Under Clause 2, discredit is interpreted to mean "injure the reputation of," and encompasses conduct that brings the service "into disrepute or which tends to lower it in public esteem."⁷⁹ With respect to Clause 3 offenses, as a general rule, any offense created by Federal statute may be prosecuted as an Article 134 offense. United States v. Perkins, 47 C.M.R. 259 (Ct. of Mil. Rev. 1973).⁸⁰

Thus, a service member whose conduct is alleged to violate 18 U.S.C. § 2340, the federal enactment of CAT, could be prosecuted under Article 134 of the UCMJ, as a Clause 3 violation. Moreover, multiple counts alleging Article 134 violations also could be brought in such a situation, as such conduct could be construed as prejudicial to good order and discipline and/or of a nature to bring discredit upon the armed forces. Perkins, 47 C.M.R. at 263-264.

⁷⁸ Manual for Courts-Martial, United States, (1995 edition) (the "Manual"), Paragraph 60.b (1-2). The Manual is issued by the President as a regulation under the authority granted by Congress under Article 3 of the UCMJ.

⁷⁹ Manual, Paragraph 60.c (3).

⁸⁰ According to the Manual, however, the doctrine of preemption "prohibits application of Article 134 to conduct covered by Articles 80 through 132. For example, larceny is covered in Article 121, and if an element of that offense is lacking—for example, intent—there can be no larceny or larceny type offense, either under Article 121 or, because of preemption, under Article 134." Manual, Paragraph 60.c (5)(a). In effect, Article 134 may not be employed to salvage a charge where the charge could not be sustained under the substantive offense provisions of the UCMJ or Federal statute. Accordingly, conduct which violated Article 55 discussed above or any other substantive provision of the UCMJ could not be charged under Article 134. These remain alternative, not cumulative provisions.

Finally, criminal charges for torture or CID conduct could be brought under a variety of other provisions⁸¹ including “cruelty.”⁸² The last of these offenses is generally intended to be applied to mistreatment of U.S. service members by their superiors, but by its terms it is not so limited and has been applied to intentional mistreatment of detainees.⁸³ And in instances where specific orders are in place regarding the treatment of detainees, as is recommended in this Report, failure to obey such orders is punishable under 10 U.S.C. § 892. A number of service members in Iraq are or have been investigated or tried for assaulting detainees, ⁸¹ For example, murder (10 U.S.C. § 918), manslaughter (10 U.S.C. § 919), dereliction of duty (10 U.S.C. § 892).

For purposes of this Report, we assume that U.S. military interrogations of detainees are conducted for intelligence gathering purposes and not with an investigatory intent to elicit incriminating responses in anticipation of criminal prosecution. However, should the focus of the interrogation shift from an intelligence to a law enforcement nature, Miranda warnings under Article 31 of the UCMJ (10 U.S.C. § 831) would be required. The failure to give such warnings is a criminal offense under Article 98 of the UCMJ (10 U.S.C. § 898).

⁸² See Article 93 of the UCMJ (10 U.S.C. § 893). Two Marines face charges for assault, cruelty and dereliction of duty involving the treatment and death of an Iraqi prisoner. See Associated Press Newswires, Two Marines Face Trial After Iraqi Dies, Apr. 14, 2004; Tony Perry, Iraqi Prisoner Died After Marine Grabbed His Throat, Officials Say, L.A. TIMES, Oct. 22, 2003, at B06. It is not believed that the incident involved interrogation, but it is notable that such alleged offenses involved Marine infantry reservists who had not been trained in the treatment of prisoners (apart from one with relevant peacetime background) and are reported to have been given only a brief orientation before being assigned to this duty. As advocated elsewhere in this Report, proper training of U.S. military and intelligence personnel is essential to achieve compliance with the U.S.’s obligations under CAT.

under the assault provision of the UCMJ (Article 128), and in at least one case the alleged assault occurred in the context of an interrogation.⁸⁴

The UCMJ is thus the substantively most extensive body of federal criminal law relating to the interrogation of detainees by U.S. military personnel and, in time of war, its reach could possibly extend to civilians such as CIA agents accompanying such personnel. It prohibits such persons from subjecting detainees to torture and “cruel or unusual punishment” within or without the United States and regardless of the applicability of constitutional rights.

Summary

CAT’s prohibition against torture is absolute. By ratifying CAT, the United States has accepted that the prohibition of torture is non-derogable. Moreover, by implementing prohibitions against torture in immigration, extradition, criminal and civil tort law contexts, the U.S. has given CAT’s prohibition against torture the force of U.S. law. Furthermore, by stipulating that CAT’s prohibition on CID treatment or punishment means the cruel and unusual treatment or punishment prohibited by the U.S. Constitution, the U.S. has made relevant the case law providing that detainees cannot be subjected to interrogation techniques: that force them to answer law enforcement questions by “fear of hurt, torture or exhaustion,” Adamson v. California, supra; that are “brutal and offensive to human dignity,” Rochin v. California, supra; that fall below the “evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society,” ⁸⁴ An officer in Iraq was charged under Article 28 (10 U.S.C. § 928) for firing his pistol near an Iraqi detainee’s head in the course of an interrogation in order to elicit details about a planned ambush or assassination. Thomas E. Ricks, Army Accuses Officer In Iraq Of Firing Pistol Near Prisoner, WASH. POST, Oct. 30, 2003, at A14. The officer faced a possible court-martial and up to eight years imprisonment. Following a UCMJ Article 32 hearing (which is akin to a grand jury or preliminary hearing), the division’s commanding general ordered that the officer be fined and allowed to retire. See U.S. Officer Fined for Harsh Interrogation Tactics (Dec. 13, 2003) (available at <http://www.cnn.com/2003/US/12/12/sprj.nirq.west.ruling>).

Trop v. Dulles, supra; or which deliberately inflict force or pain (in the context of restoring prison order or safety), Hudson v. McMillian, supra. However, U.S. enforcement of CAT in our domestic criminal law – particularly with respect to acts of torture or CID treatment by U.S. civilians or by U.S. officials in extra-territorial areas under U.S. jurisdiction – has been incomplete. We urge the U.S. to fill in the gaps in preventing and punishing torture and CID treatment left by 18 U.S.C. § 2340A and to fully utilize the UCMJ to fulfill its obligations under CAT.

THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS

The four Geneva Conventions of 1949 are the core of the international law of armed conflict applicable to the treatment of detainees, albeit not the complete body of applicable law. The applicability of the Geneva Conventions to persons captured by the United States in connection with the War In Afghanistan and the ongoing conflict in Afghanistan, however, is highly controversial. The most hotly contested issue is whether those Al Qaeda and Taliban detainees who were captured before the creation of the Karzai government are entitled to POW status under Geneva Convention III Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War (“Geneva III”). This issue is of particular significance because Geneva III flatly prohibits “any form of coercion” of POWs in interrogation – the most protective standard of treatment found in international law. Likewise, Geneva Convention IV Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (“Geneva IV”) protects “civilian” detainees who qualify as “protected persons” from “coercion.”⁸⁵ We also should note that the issues regarding Geneva III and Geneva IV are affected by whether the person was detained either before or after the Karzai government was established. Before the Karzai government, the U.S. was engaged in an international armed conflict with Afghanistan, which was governed by the Taliban (albeit the U.S. did not recognize that government). After the establishment of the Karzai government, the conflict in Afghanistan became an internal one – as the U.S. and other international organizations were present in Afghanistan with the consent of the Karzai government to assist in maintaining order. Geneva III and Geneva IV apply only in situations of international armed conflict and, therefore, ceased to apply once the Afghan conflict became an internal one. See Geneva IV, Art. 6.

⁸⁵ See Section II(C) for a discussion of who qualifies as a “protected person” under Geneva IV.

In this section, we will examine the Administration’s position that Al Qaeda and Taliban detainees are not POWs under Geneva III and some critiques of the Administration’s position. We submit that, regardless of whether a detainee enjoys status as a POW or civilian protected person under the Geneva Conventions, the Conventions nevertheless are relevant to the interrogation of detainees in the following respects:

First, the requirements of humane treatment embodied in Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and Article 75 of Additional Protocol I protect all detainees captured in situations of international or internal armed conflict, regardless of “legal” status.⁸⁶ Of course, all

⁸⁶ “Common Article 3” provides that detainees “shall in all circumstances be treated humanely” and prohibits the following acts “at any time and in any place whatsoever”: “violence to life and person, in particular murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture;” and “outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating or degrading treatment.” Common Article 3 also provides that the “wounded and sick shall be collected and cared for.”

Although neither the United States nor Afghanistan is a party to Additional Protocol I, it is generally acknowledged that relevant sections of Protocol I constitute either binding customary international law or good practice, in particular the minimum safeguards guaranteed by Article 75(2). See Michael J. Matheson, Remarks on the United States Position on the Relation of Customary International Law to the 1977 Protocols Additional to the 1949 Geneva Conventions, reprinted in The Sixth Annual American Red Cross-Washington College of Law Conference on International Humanitarian Law: A Workshop on detainees – including those captured outside of Afghan territory or in connection with the “War on Terror” – are entitled to the protection provided by human rights law, including CAT, the ICCPR and customary international law.

Second, notwithstanding its position on the POW status of Taliban and Al Qaeda detainees, the Administration has undertaken that it will treat all detainees in a manner consistent with the principles of Geneva III. Accordingly, the interrogation techniques reportedly being used on detainees at Bagram and other U.S. detention facilities should be considered in light of the text and spirit of the Geneva Conventions.

Third, if there is doubt as to whether a detainee meets Geneva III criteria for POW status, that detainee is entitled to interim POW status until a “competent tribunal” determines his or her legal status. Because the U.S. government has not convened “competent tribunals” to Customary International Law and the 1977 Protocols Additional to the 1949 Geneva Conventions, 2 AM. U. J. INT’L L. & POL’Y 415, 425-6 (1987).

Article 75 provides that “persons who are in the power of a Party to the conflict and who do not benefit from more favourable treatment under the Conventions” “shall be treated humanely in all circumstances” and that each state Party “shall respect the person, honour, convictions and religious practices of all such persons.” Paragraph 2 of Article 75 prohibits, “at any time and in any place whatsoever, whether committed by civilian or military agents”: “violence to the life, health, or physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular . . . torture of all kinds, whether physical or mental,” “corporal punishment,” and “mutilation”; “outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment . . . and any form of indecent assault”; and “threats to commit any of the foregoing acts.”

The U.S. rejection of Additional Protocol I was explained in a presidential note to the Senate in the following terms: “Protocol I . . . would grant combatant status to irregular forces even if they do not satisfy the traditional requirements to distinguish themselves from the civilian population and otherwise comply with the laws of war. This would endanger civilians among whom terrorists and other irregulars attempt to conceal themselves. These problems are so fundamental in character that they cannot be remedied through reservations. . . .” See 1977 U.S.T. LEXIS 465.

determine the status of any detainees, all detainees for whom POW status is in doubt are entitled to interim POW status.⁸⁷

Finally, even accepting the interpretation that the Third and Fourth Geneva Conventions contain gaps leaving certain detainees captured in the War in Afghanistan (i.e., citizens of co-belligerents and neutrals) without POW or “protected person” civilian status, the Geneva Conventions are supplemented by human rights law and customary international legal norms which have the force of law in the United States. For example, even where a detainee may not be entitled to a hearing under Geneva III, he is entitled to a hearing to determine the justification for his detention under Article 9 of the ICCPR. Many detainees may not be combatants at all and may be simply innocent bystanders mistakenly detained or wrongfully turned over to the U.S. military by the Northern Alliance.⁸⁸ They deserve prompt hearings in which they are given an opportunity to establish their non-combatant status.

Application of the Geneva Conventions to the Afghan Conflict Generally

Both the U.S. and Afghanistan are parties to the Geneva Conventions. Article 2 common to all four Conventions provides that the Conventions “apply to all cases of declared war or of any other armed conflict” between two or more parties to the Conventions so long as a state of war is recognized by a party to the conflict. The Conventions also apply to all cases of partial or total occupation of the territory of a signatory, even if the occupation meets with no armed resistance. See Geneva Conventions, Art. 2. Signatories to the Conventions are bound by its terms regardless of whether an additional party to the conflict is a signatory. Id. The Administration’s position is that the Geneva Conventions apply to the War in Afghanistan.⁸⁹

Geneva III

Relevant Legal Standards

Under Geneva III, combatants are entitled to POW status if they are members of the armed forces (other than medical personnel and chaplains). The specific requirements for combatant/POW status are set forth in Article 4 of Geneva III⁹⁰ and Articles 43 and 44 of Additional Protocol I.⁹¹

⁸⁹ See, e.g., Sean D. Murphy, Contemporary Practice of the United States Relating to International Law, 96 AM. J. INT’L L. 461, 476-77 (2002).

⁹⁰ Article 4-A of Geneva III provides, in part:

Prisoners of war, in the sense of the present Convention, are persons belonging to one of the following categories, who have fallen into the power of the enemy:

Members of the armed forces of a Party to the conflict as well as members of militias or volunteer corps forming part of such armed forces.

Members of other militias and members of other volunteer corps, including those of organized resistance movements, belonging to a Party to the conflict and operating in or outside their own territory, even if this territory is occupied, provided that such militias or

If there is any doubt as to whether captured persons meet Article 4's criteria for POW status, such persons are entitled to interim POW status until a "competent tribunal" determines their legal status.⁹² volunteer corps, including such organized resistance movements, fulfill the following conditions:

- (a) of being commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates;
- (b) that of having a fixed distinctive sign recognizable at a distance;
- (c) that of carrying arms openly;
- (d) that of conducting their operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war.

Members of regular armed forces who profess allegiance to a government or an authority not recognized by the Detaining Power. . . .

⁹¹ Article 43 of Additional Protocol I provides: "The armed forces of a Party to a conflict consist of all organized armed forces, groups and units which are under a command responsible to that Party for the conduct or its subordinates, even if that Party is represented by a government or an authority not recognized by an adverse Party. Such armed forces shall be subject to an internal disciplinary system which, inter alia, shall enforce compliance with the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict."

⁹² See Geneva III, Art. 5; see also, U.S. Dept. of Army, Field Manual 27-10, "Law of Land Warfare", Art. 71 (1956); U.S. Dept. of Army, REGULATION 190-8 Military Police, "Enemy Prisoners of War, Retained Personnel, Civilian Internees and Other Detainees," § 1-5 (a)(2) (1997). Under U.S. military regulations, a "competent tribunal" pursuant to Article 5 of Geneva III consists of three commissioned officers. The regulations also require that persons whose status is to be determined be advised of their rights; be permitted to attend all open sessions, call witnesses and question witnesses called by the tribunal; be permitted (but not compelled) to testify or otherwise address the tribunal; and be provided with an interpreter. The regulations provide for the tribunal's determination of a detainee's status in closed session by a majority vote and require a preponderance of the evidence to support the tribunal's finding. See Erin Chlopak, Dealing with the Detainees at Guantánamo Bay: Humanitarian and Human Rights Obligations Under the Geneva Conventions, HUM RTS. BR. (Spring 2002), at 6, 8.

Geneva III mandates that POWs be treated humanely at all times. This includes freedom from physical and mental torture, acts of violence, intimidation and insult, and exposure to public humiliation.⁹³ Pursuant to Article 14, POWs also “are entitled in all circumstances to respect for their persons and their honour . . . [and] shall retain the full civil capacity which they enjoyed at the time of their capture.”

With respect to interrogation, in particular, Article 17 of Geneva III provides: “No physical or mental torture, nor any other form of coercion, may be inflicted on prisoners of war to secure from them information of any kind whatever. Prisoners of war who refuse to

It should be noted that the “competent tribunal” outlined in ARMY REG. 190-8, § 1-6 is a quick, administrative process that is highly dependent upon the availability of witnesses during ongoing combat and support operations. Unsworn statements may be presented as evidence, and a record of the proceedings is developed. Although the tribunal may or may not include military lawyers such as members of the Staff Judge Advocate General (“JAG”), JAG lawyers will subsequently review the record. The record may also be the basis for any further proceedings for war crimes or for any other penalty.

Fundamentally, the tribunal determines only status and does not adjudicate liability. Tribunals are required under Geneva III only when status of the detainee is in doubt. When, for example, ten thousand uniformed members of a regular enemy infantry division surrender as a body, there is no need for a tribunal. When, however, non-uniformed, but possibly military, personnel mix with refugees, that is a classic situation for such tribunals.

⁹³ Specifically, Article 13 of Geneva III provides:

Prisoners of war must at all times be humanely treated. Any unlawful act or omission by the Detaining Power causing death or seriously endangering the health of a prisoner of war in its custody is prohibited, and will be regarded as a serious breach of the present Convention. In particular, no prisoner of war may be subjected to physical mutilation or to medical or scientific experiments of any kind which are not justified by the medical, dental or hospital treatment of the prisoner concerned and carried out in his interest.

Likewise, prisoners of war must at all times be protected, particularly against acts of violence or intimidation and against insults and public curiosity.

answer may not be threatened, insulted, or exposed to any unpleasant or disadvantageous treatment of any kind.” Under Article 17, POWs are only obligated to provide their name, rank, date of birth, and army, personal or serial identification number or equivalent information. Geneva III does not, however, prohibit non-coercive interrogation of POWs. POWs may be interrogated, but they are not obliged to respond to such interrogation, nor may they be threatened, coerced into responding or punished for failing to respond. The Geneva Conventions also do not “preclude classic plea bargaining” – i.e., the offer of leniency or other incentives in return for cooperation.⁹⁴

Thus, to the extent detainees from the War in Afghanistan are considered POWs or to the extent their POW status is in “doubt” pending the determination of status by a competent tribunal, interrogation tactics which rise to the level of “coercion” are prohibited by Geneva III.

The United States’ Position

In sharp contrast with past conflicts (such as Vietnam and Korea) in which it was U.S. policy to presume that military prisoners were entitled to POW status regardless of the possible nonqualification of their forces under Geneva III, from the very outset of the War in Afghanistan, United States officials labeled captured Al Qaeda and Taliban prisoners “unlawful combatants,” and stated that the Geneva Conventions were, therefore, entirely inapplicable to their treatment.⁹⁵ The United States reasoned that Al Qaeda was not entitled to the protections of the Geneva Conventions because: (1) Geneva III could not apply to members of a nonstate organization, such as Al Qaeda, (2) the conflict was not an internal conflict such that Al Qaeda members could benefit from the protection of Common Article 3, and (3) in any event, Al Qaeda members failed to meet the requirements set forth in Article 4(A)(2) of Geneva III.⁹⁶ The United States argued further that, since Afghanistan was not a functioning state during the conflict and the Taliban was not recognized as a legitimate government, Geneva III could not apply to the Taliban.⁹⁷

After vigorous criticism was leveled against these arguments, Secretary of State Colin Powell requested that the Administration reconsider its position.⁹⁸ On February 7, 2002, in response to Powell's comments, the Administration partially reversed its initial position. Although the Administration continues to argue that the Geneva Conventions are inapplicable to Al Qaeda captives, President Bush announced that Geneva III was applicable to the Taliban because both the U.S. and Afghanistan were signatories to the Convention and the parties had been involved in an armed conflict. However, President Bush further argued that because the Taliban had violated the laws of war and associated closely with Al Qaeda, "[u]nder the terms of the Geneva Convention ... the Taliban detainees do not qualify as POWs."⁹⁹ The decision in

Article 5 Presumes POW Status Until the Determination of Status by a Competent Tribunal

Critics of the Administration position argue that non-civilian detainees from the War in Afghanistan either clearly qualify as POWs or their POW status is in “doubt.” Geneva III mandates that a detainee whose status is in “doubt” must be treated as a POW until his status is decided otherwise by a competent tribunal under Article 5. Indeed, Article 5’s presumption that captured combatants are entitled to POW status until their status is determined by a competent tribunal is one that has been consistently honored by the U.S. since World War II.¹⁰⁸ Moreover, like Article 5, customary international law also includes the principle that a competent tribunal must resolve any doubt about the status of a captured combatant.¹⁰⁹ We agree with critics of the ¹⁰⁹ Michael J. Matheson, while serving as Deputy Legal Advisor of the U.S. State Department, stated:

We [the United States] do support the principle that, should any doubt arise as to whether a person is entitled to combatant status, he be so treated until his status has been determined by a competent tribunal, as well as the principle that if a person who has fallen into the power of an adversary is not held as a prisoner of war and is to be tried for Administration position that all combatants whose claim to POW status is “in doubt” must be treated as POWs until such doubt has been resolved by a “competent tribunal.” Accordingly, since no tribunals have been convened for detainees from the War in Afghanistan, all such detainees must be considered POWs under Geneva III.

The Taliban Detainees Were “Regular Armed Forces” and, Therefore, Are Encompassed by Article 4(A) of Geneva III
Critics of the Administration’s position that Taliban fighters are not entitled to POW status because they do not satisfy the requirements of Article 4(a)(2) of Geneva III¹¹⁰ assert that Taliban captured in the War in Afghanistan are entitled to POW status either under Article 4(a)(1) because they are “[m]embers of the armed forces” of Afghanistan; or Article 4(a)(3) as they are “[m]embers of regular armed forces who profess allegiance to a government of an authority not recognized by the Detaining Power.”¹¹¹ an offense arising out of the hostilities, he should have the right to assert his entitlement before a judicial tribunal and to have that question adjudicated.

Matheson, supra note 86.

¹¹⁰ Some have argued that the Taliban did comply with the requirements for Article 4(a)(2). See, e.g., ROBERT GOLDMAN AND BRIAN TITTEMORE, UNPRIVILEGED COMBATANTS AND THE HOSTILITIES IN AFGHANISTAN: THEIR STATUS AND RIGHTS UNDER INTERNATIONAL HUMANITARIAN RIGHTS LAW (The Am. Soc. Of Int’l Law Task Force on Terrorism, Task Force Paper) (available at <http://asil.org/taskforce/goldman.pdf>.)

¹¹¹ Not only did the Taliban profess such an allegiance, but they were the strongest military partner in the Alliance, effectively controlling Afghanistan. See “Taliban Reach Zenith?” 85 National Defense 10 (Oct. 1, 2000).

First, depriving Taliban and Al Qaeda of POW status because they do not obey the laws of war sets a dangerous precedent, inviting other state parties to claim that another party is not obeying the rules of war and that they are, therefore, free from the obligations of Geneva III. International humanitarian law applies regardless of whether or not the other party to the conflict respects such laws.¹¹² Reciprocity arrangements are generally rejected in international humanitarian law as they can so easily be abused at the expense of civilians or persons rendered “hors de combat.”¹¹³

Second, it is in the U.S.’s self-interest to ensure that the Geneva Conventions – a regime of vital importance to the safety of our own armed forces – are interpreted as broadly as possible. Otherwise, an opposing state party could use the argument that the U.S. has violated the laws of war to deny captured U.S. soldiers POW status. In fact, North Korea and Vietnam have already used this argument as a basis to deny captured U.S. prisoners POW protections

¹¹² Article 1 of Geneva III states “The High Contracting Parties undertake to respect and to ensure respect for the present Convention in all circumstances.” See also Military and Paramilitary Activities (Nicar. v. U.S.), 1986 I.C.J. REP. 14, 14 (June 27) (holding that Geneva III applies in all circumstances regardless of the actions of the other party to the conflict). See also, generally, Theodor Meron, The Humanization of Humanitarian Law, 94 AM. J. INT’L L. 239, 248-249 (2000).

¹¹³ As the ICRC Commentaries on Article 1 state: “it is not merely an engagement concluded on a basis of reciprocity, binding each party to the contract only in so far as the other party observes its obligations. It is rather a series of unilateral engagements solemnly contracted before the world as represented by the other Contracting Parties. Each State contracts obligations ‘vis-à-vis’ itself and at the same time ‘vis-à-vis’ the others. The motive of the Convention is so essential for the maintenance of civilization that the need is felt for its assertion, as much out of respect for it on the part of the signatory State itself as in the expectation of such respect from all parties.” ICRC Commentaries to Article 1, Convention (III) relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, Geneva, 12 August 1949, ICRC Database on Int’l Humanitarian Law (available at <http://www.icrc.org/ihl.nsf/b466ed681ddfcfd241256739003e6368/49cfe5505d5912dlc12563ed00424cdd?Open Document>). under the Geneva Conventions.¹¹⁴ Indeed, it was reportedly these very examples that prompted Colin Powell, out of concern for the safety of U.S. forces, to request that President Bush reconsider the Administration's initial position.¹¹⁵

We accordingly urge liberal extension of POW treatment where that would encourage reciprocal treatment of U.S. service personnel and advance more generally foreign policy and national security interests. We further believe that, even to the extent that POW status is denied to detainees, such detainees must be afforded the protections of international criminal law, as well as international human rights and humanitarian law.

Geneva IV

Geneva IV applies in international armed conflicts to the same extent as Geneva III. It covers "protected persons" defined as "those who, at a given moment and in any manner whatsoever, find themselves, in case of a conflict or occupation, in the hands of a Party to the conflict or Occupying Power of which they are not nationals." See Geneva IV, Article 4.¹¹⁶

¹¹⁴ George H. Aldrich, The Taliban, Al Qaeda, and the Determination of Illegal Combatants, 96 AM. J. INT'L L. 891, 895-96 (2002) (noting that North Korea and North Vietnam denied POW status to all American prisoners on the basis of the allegation that they were all war criminals).

¹¹⁵ Colin Powell apparently made remarks to this effect in a memo leaked to the press on January 27, 2002. See Editorial, Bush's Call on Captives, THE BOSTON GLOBE, Jan. 29, 2002, at A10.

¹¹⁶ Legal commentators have argued that persons who have directly participated in the War in Afghanistan and who do not qualify as POWs under Geneva III (i.e., detainees considered to be "unlawful combatants" by the U.S.) should automatically be considered "protected persons" under Geneva IV, unless other exceptions apply. See, e.g., Michael Ratner, Moving Away from the Rule of Law: Military Tribunals, Executive Detentions and Torture, 24 CARDOZO L. REV. 1513, 1518-19 (2003) ("There is no gap between the two conventions"). Recent decisions of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTFY) have held that, "if an individual is not entitled to the protections of the Third Convention as a

The fact that a person may have unlawfully participated in a conflict is not relevant to Geneva IV protections, apart from a significant national security exemption. The term “protected persons” includes persons detained as spies or saboteurs as well as other persons suspected of engaging in activities hostile to the security of the detaining power. Specifically, Article 5 provides:

Where in the territory of a Party to the conflict, the latter is satisfied that an individual protected person is definitely suspected of or engaged in activities hostile to the security of the State, such individual person shall not be entitled to claim such rights and privileges under the present Convention as would, if exercised in the favour of such individual person, be prejudicial to the security of such State

....

In each case, such persons shall nevertheless be treated with humanity and, in case of trial, shall not be deprived of the rights of fair and regular trial prescribed by the present Convention. They shall also be granted the full rights and privileges of a protected person under the present Convention at the earliest date consistent with the security of the State or Occupying Power, as the case may be.

As drafted, (i.e., the use of the words “the latter”), it would appear that the national security derogation is available only to the State on whose territory the conflict is occurring (i.e., in the War in Afghanistan, only to the Northern Alliance), and there is no authority whether or not an allied State, such as the United States, can benefit from such exemption.

In an exception of great importance in Afghanistan, given the number of third country participants in the conflict, “protected persons” does not include “[n]ationals of a State which is not bound by the Convention,” “[n]ationals of a neutral State who find themselves in prisoner of war (or of the First or Second Conventions) he or she necessarily falls within the ambit of [Geneva IV].” See The Prosecutor v. Delalic, IT-96-21-T, at para. 271 (1998); see also Prosecutor v. Tadic, IT-94-I-A, 38 I.L.M. 158 (1999).

the territory of a belligerent State” and “nationals of a co-belligerent State ... while the State of which they are nationals has normal diplomatic representation in the State in whose hands they are.” See Geneva IV, Article 4. For example, a Pakistani picked up on the battlefield in Afghanistan would fall within the exceptions to “protected person” status under Geneva IV.

However, in no event would such provision permit the State to commit “grave breaches” as defined in Article 147, which includes torture or inhuman treatment and willfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, upon a “protected person”. See Geneva IV, Art. 146. Furthermore, to the extent that any physical or moral coercion (otherwise prohibited by Article 31 of Geneva IV) might fall below the level of “grave breach” and thus be derogable, the ICRC commentary to the national security derogations contained in Article 5 of Geneva IV, involving persons engaged in activities hostile to the security of the state notes that:

widespread application of the Article may eventually lead to the existence of a category of civilian internees who do not receive the normal treatment laid down by the Convention but are detained under conditions which are almost impossible to check. It must be emphasized most strongly, therefore, that Article 5 can only be applied in individual cases of an exceptional nature, when the existence of specific charges makes it almost certain that penal proceedings will follow. This article should never be applied as a result of mere suspicion.

Like POWs under Geneva III, “protected persons” under Geneva IV cannot be subjected to coercive interrogation tactics. Specifically, Article 31 of Geneva IV provides that “[n]o physical or moral coercion shall be exercised against protected persons, in particular to obtain information from them or from third parties.” Article 32 further provides that “any measure of such a character as to cause the physical suffering or extermination of protected persons” is prohibited and that “[t]his prohibition applies not only to murder, torture, corporal punishments, mutilation and medical or scientific experiments not necessitated by the medical treatment of a protected person, but also to any other measures of brutality, whether applied by civilian or military agents.”

By its terms, Geneva IV ceases to apply “on the general close of military operations” in the case of an international conflict. See Geneva IV, Art. 6. Whether military operations have reached a “general close” after the establishment of the Karzai government in June 2002 and whether the change in character of the conflict from an international one to a multi-national conflict within a single State against non-State opponents terminated application of Geneva IV are issues open to controversy.¹¹⁷ Thus, the ability of some civilians captured in Afghanistan to claim “protected person” status under Geneva IV today is subject to additional debate. However, regardless of the characterization of the current conflict, torture and inhumane treatment of civilian detainees from the War in Afghanistan or the ongoing conflict in Afghanistan, whether or not they qualify as “protected persons” under Geneva IV, is not permitted. All such persons are still entitled to the protections of international human rights law and to humane treatment under Common Article 3 and Article 75 of Additional Protocol I.

Summary

None of the detainees from the War in Afghanistan or the ongoing conflict in Afghanistan fall outside of international humanitarian law. An individual detained during the armed conflict in Afghanistan – whether considered an international or internal armed conflict – is either protected by Geneva III as a POW, by Geneva IV as a civilian “protected person,” or, at the very minimum, by Common Article 3 and Article 75 of Additional Protocol I. Of course, all detainees – regardless of where or when they were captured – are entitled to the protection of human rights law (including CAT and the ICCPR) and customary international law.

Detainees protected as POWs or civilians under Geneva III or Geneva IV cannot be subjected to coercion of any kind. In addition, those detainees whose POW status is in doubt are entitled to interim POW status until a competent tribunal determines otherwise. At least some Afghan detainees are entitled to such tribunals, and the U.S. is long overdue in providing any process whatsoever to detainees, many of whom may simply be innocent non-combatants, wrongfully detained. We, therefore, urge the U.S. to establish proper screening procedures for all detainees.

OTHER INTERNATIONAL LEGAL STANDARDS

The legal standards set forth in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, and customary international law also apply to the treatment of detainees held by the United States.

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights¹¹⁸

Relevant Legal Standards

Like CAT, the ICCPR expressly prohibits both torture and CID. Specifically, Article 7 of the ICCPR provides: “No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.”¹¹⁹ However, the ICCPR goes further than CAT in its non-

It was ratified by the United States in 1992, subject to a number of reservations, understandings and declarations. See 138 CONG. REC. S4781-01 (1992).

derogability provision, expressly stating that neither torture nor CID treatment can be justified by exceptional circumstances such as war, internal political stability or other public emergencies. (See ICCPR, Art. 4). Article 10 also provides that: “All persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person.”

The Human Rights Committee, established under Article 28, adjudicates complaints filed by individuals or states parties alleging violations of the ICCPR. The Committee has found the following conduct to violate Article 7’s prohibition against cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment: threatening a victim with torture, prolonged solitary confinement and incommunicado detention, and repeated beatings.¹²⁰ Moreover, the Human Rights Committee has specifically criticized interrogation procedures such as handcuffing, hooding, shaking and sleep deprivation as violations of Article 7 in any circumstances.¹²¹

Although the ICCPR does not expressly prohibit states parties from “rendering” individuals to countries where they are likely to be mistreated, the Human Rights Committee has explained that, under Article 7, states parties “must not expose individuals to the danger of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment upon return to another country

U.S. Courts

In ratifying the ICCPR, the U.S. Senate declared that Articles 1 through 27 are not self-executing. Thus, while the Supreme Court has not squarely decided the issue, the majority of federal appeals courts have held that the ICCPR provides no privately enforceable rights and is not binding on federal courts.¹²⁴ The Second and Ninth circuit courts, however, have cited the ICCPR as evidence that customary international law prohibits arbitrary arrest, prolonged detention and torture.¹²⁵

The Human Rights Committee

The Human Rights Committee is empowered to: (i) receive state party reports and comment on those reports (see ICCPR, Art. 40(4)); (ii) rule on complaints filed by a state party that another state party is not fulfilling its obligations under the ICCPR (see ICCPR, Art. 41);¹²⁶ and (iii) rule on complaints filed by individuals “who claim that any of their rights enumerated in the Covenant have been violated and who have exhausted all available domestic remedies.”¹²⁷

Organization of American States’ Instruments

Relevant Legal Standards

The U.S. is a member of the Organization of American States (the “OAS”).

Article XXV of The American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man (the “American Declaration”), which was adopted by the Ninth International Conference of the OAS in 1948, provides:

¹²⁵ See Kim Ho Ma v. Ashcroft, 257 F.3d 1095, 1114 (9th Cir. 2001) (recognizing that an international prohibition exists against “prolonged and arbitrary detention” and citing, among other sources to ICCPR, Art. 9); Martinez v. City of Los Angeles, 141 F.3d 1373, 1383-84 (9th Cir. 1998) (same); United States v. Romano, 706 F.2d 370, 375 n.1 (2d Cir. 1983) (citing to ICCPR for articulation of rights of a person charged with a criminal offense); Filartiga v. Peña-Irala, 630 F.2d 876, 883-84 (2d Cir. 1980) (citing ICCPR as one example that international law universally rejects torture).

¹²⁷ See Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 21 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 16) at 59, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966), 999 U.N.T.S. 302.

Every individual who has been deprived of his liberty has the right to have the legality of his detention ascertained without delay by a court, and the right to be tried without undue delay or, otherwise, to be released. He also has the right to humane treatment during the time he is in custody.

On June 1, 1997, the U.S. signed, but has not yet ratified, the American Convention On Human Rights (1969) (the “American Convention”).¹²⁸ Article 5 of the American Convention, which sets forth Rights to Humane Treatment, provides:

1. Every person has the right to have his physical, mental, and moral integrity respected.
2. No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment. All persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person.

Moreover, pursuant to Article 27(2) of the American Convention, the Rights to Humane Treatment may not be suspended “[i]n time of war, public danger, or other emergency that threatens the independence or security of a State Party.”

With respect to the treatment of detainees, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (the “Inter-American Commission”) – which represents all member countries of the OAS and was established under Chapter VII of the American Convention – has determined that, “when the State holds a person in detention and under its exclusive control, it becomes the guarantor of that person’s safety and rights.”¹²⁹ In this regard, the Commission has found the following practices to be violations of Article 5 of the American Convention: threats to summon family members and pressure them to “talk”; threats to kill detainees; blindfolding detainees and forcing them to run around; “prolonged isolation and deprivation of communication”; solitary

The Inter-American Court of Human Rights (the “Inter-American Court”) – established pursuant to Chapter VIII of the American Convention – has held that, “in order to establish if torture has been inflicted and its scope, all the circumstances of the case should be taken into consideration, such as the nature and context of the respective aggressions, how they were inflicted, during what period of time, the physical and mental effects and, in some case, the sex, age and state of health of the victims.”¹³¹ “The violation of the right to physical and psychological integrity of persons is a category of violation that has several gradations and embraces treatment ranging from torture to other types of humiliation or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment with varying degrees of physical and psychological effects caused by endogenous and exogenous factors which must be proven in each specific situation.”¹³²

The Inter-American Court has found the following practices to violate Article 5 of the American Convention and/or Article 2 of the Inter-American Convention To Prevent and

¹³³ The U.S. is not a signatory to the Inter-American Convention To Prevent and Punish Torture, O.A.S. Treaty Series No. 67. Article 2 of this Convention defines torture as “any act intentionally performed whereby physical or mental pain or suffering is inflicted on a person for purposes of criminal investigation, as a means of intimidation, as personal punishment, as a preventive measure, as a penalty, or for any other purpose. Torture shall also be understood to be the use of methods upon a person intended to obliterate the personality of the victim or to diminish his physical or mental capacities, even if they do not cause physical pain or mental anguish.”

Moreover, the Inter-American Court has warned that the fact that a State is confronted with terrorism does not, in itself, warrant the use of force:

Any use of force that is not strictly necessary, given the behavior of the person detained, constitutes an affront to human dignity . . . in violation of Article 5 of the American Convention. The need to conduct investigations and the undeniable difficulties inherent to combating terrorism are not grounds for placing restrictions on the protection of the physical integrity of the person.¹³⁷

In a case brought before the Inter-American Commission by detainees alleging violations of the United States' obligations under the American Declaration by U.S. armed forces in Grenada in 1983, Coard, et al. v. United States, the Inter-American Commission expressly extended the protections of human rights and humanitarian norms to extraterritorial conduct by U.S. military forces and criticized the U.S. for delay in providing procedure to detainees.¹³⁸ Acknowledging the need to balance between public security and individual rights, the Inter-

In the Suarez-Rosero case, the Inter-American Court explained that incommunicado detention is "an exceptional measure" which can cause the detainee to suffer extreme psychological and moral injury. "[I]solation from the outside world produces moral and psychological suffering in any person, places him in a particularly vulnerable position, and increases the risk of aggression and arbitrary acts in prisons." Suarez-Rosero Case, Judgment of November 12, 1997, Inter-Am. The Coard petitioners alleged that U.S. forces arrested them during the period in which it consolidated control over Grenada; that they were held incommunicado for many days; and that months passed before they were taken to a magistrate, or allowed to consult with counsel. "During this period petitioners were threatened, interrogated, beaten, deprived of sleep and food and constantly harassed." Coard, at para. 17. The petitioners alleged that their whereabouts were kept secret, and that requests by lawyers and others to meet with them were rejected. They also alleged that U.S. forces subjected them to threats and physical abuse – including threatening to hand the detainees over to Caribbean authorities and allowing Caribbean authorities to "soften" the detainees. Coard, at paras. 18-19.

American Commission in Coard held that: “What is required when an armed force detains civilians is the establishment of a procedure to ensure that the legality of the detention can be reviewed without delay and is subject to supervisory control. . . . [C]ontrol over a detention [cannot] rest[] exclusively with the agents charged with carrying it out.” Coard, at paras. 58-59.

Enforcement

The Inter-American Commission has competence with respect to matters relating to the fulfillment of the commitments made by the States Parties to the American Convention.¹³⁹ “The main function of the Commission” is “to promote respect for and defense of human rights.”¹⁴⁰ Any person may lodge a petition with the Commission complaining of violation of the American Convention by a State Party, so long as effective domestic remedies available to the petitioner have been exhausted.¹⁴¹

On March 12, 2002, in response to a petition challenging detentions at Guantánamo Bay coordinated by the Center for Constitutional Rights,¹⁴² the Inter-American Commission adopted precautionary measures addressed to the United States concerning the

The Inter-American Court also has competence with respect to matters relating to the fulfillment of the commitments made by the States Parties to the American Convention. Id., Art. 33. Only States Parties and the Commission have the right to submit a case to the Inter-American Court, however, and only after the case has been considered by the Inter-American Commission. Id., Art. 61.

Guantánamo detainees.¹⁴³ Specifically, the Commission asked the U.S. “to take the urgent measures necessary to have the legal status of the detainees at Guantánamo Bay determined by a competent tribunal.”¹⁴⁴ In so doing, the Inter-American Commission explained:

[W]here persons find themselves within the authority and control of a state and where a circumstance of armed conflict may be involved, their fundamental rights may be determined in part by reference to international humanitarian law as well as international human rights law. Where it may be considered that the protections of international humanitarian law do not apply, however, such persons remain the beneficiaries at least of the non-derogable protections under international human rights law. In short, no person under the authority and control of a state, regardless of his or her circumstances, is devoid of legal protection for his or her fundamental and non-derogable human rights.¹⁴⁵

With regard to the Guantánamo Bay detainees in particular, the Inter-American Commission observed that: “[T]he information available suggests that the detainees remain entirely at the unfettered discretion of the United States government. Absent clarification of the legal status of the detainees, the Commission considers that the rights and protections to which they may be entitled under international or domestic law cannot be said to be the subject of ¹⁴³ See Rules of Procedure of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, Art. 25(1): “In serious and urgent cases, and whenever necessary according to the information available, the Commission may, on its own initiative or at the request of a party, request that the State concerned adopt precautionary measures to prevent irreparable harm to persons.”) effective legal protection by the State.”¹⁴⁶ The Inter-American Commission further noted that, regardless of the legal status of the Guantánamo Bay detainees, their legal protections “may in no case fall below the minimal standards of non-derogable rights.”¹⁴⁷ Thereafter, the Commission issued a renewed request to the U.S. government for precautionary measures, stating that new factual allegations regarding torture or other ill-treatment of detainees “raise questions concerning the extent to which the United States’ policies and practices in detaining and interrogating persons in connection with its anti-terrorist initiatives clearly and absolutely prohibit treatment that may amount to torture or may otherwise be cruel, inhuman or degrading as defined under international norms.”¹⁴⁸

¹⁴⁶ Id.

¹⁴⁷ Id., at 534. The Inter-American Commission invited the U.S. to provide information concerning compliance with these precautionary measures. In response, the United States argued that: (i) the Commission did not have jurisdiction to apply international humanitarian law, particularly the Geneva Conventions, as well as customary international humanitarian law; (ii) the Commission lacks authority to request precautionary measures with respect to States which are not party to the American Convention; and (iii) in any event, precautionary measures are neither necessary nor appropriate because the detainees are not entitled to prisoner of war status, do not meet Geneva Convention criteria for lawful combatants and are, instead, enemy combatants. See Response of the United States To Request For Precautionary Measures – Detainees in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, reprinted in 41 I.L.M. 1015, 1028-1030 (2002). The U.S. stated, however, that it “is providing the detainees with protections consistent with international humanitarian law.” Id. at 1031. The U.S. also asserted that it had no obligation to convene a tribunal to determine the detainees’ status, and that the detainees had no right to counsel or to have access to courts. Id. at 1034. However, on December 2, 2003, the Pentagon announced that U.S. citizen and Taliban soldier Yaser Esam Hamdi would be given access to a lawyer, “as a matter of discretion and military policy,” but that the decision “should not be treated as a precedent” and was “subject to appropriate security restrictions.” See Associated Press Newswires, Pentagon OKs Lawyer For Terror Suspect, Dec. 3, 2003; Jerry Markon and Dan Eggen, U.S. Allows Lawyer For Citizen Held as “Enemy Combatant”, WASH. Customary International Law and Jus Cogens

Relevant Legal Standards

Customary international law has long prohibited the state practice of torture, without reservation, in peace or in wartime.¹⁴⁹ On December 9, 1975, the United Nations General Assembly adopted by consensus the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Punishment.¹⁵⁰ The Torture Resolution together with CAT and the ICCPR – ratified by 133 and 151 States, respectively – embody the customary international law obligation to refrain from behavior which constitutes torture.¹⁵¹ In addition, in 1985 the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Torture, Pieter

¹⁴⁹ In order for a state's practice to be recognized as customary international law, it must fulfill two conditions:

Not only must the acts concerned amount to a settled practice, but they must also be such, or be carried out in such a way, as to be evidence of a belief that this practice is rendered obligatory by the existence of a rule of law requiring it. The need for such a belief, i.e., the existence of a subjective element, is implicit in the very notion of the opinio juris sive necessitas. The States concerned must therefore feel that they are conforming to what amounts to a legal obligation.

The report details state practice and opinio juris with respect to national legislation prohibiting torture. See also HERMAN J. BURGERS & HANS SANELIUS, THE UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION AGAINST TORTURE AND OTHER CRUEL, INHUMAN OR DEGRADING TREATMENT OR PUNISHMENT (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers/Kluwer Academic Publishers 1988), at 1-12. The widespread ratification of regional human rights instruments such as the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the Koojimans, noted the widespread existing domestic legislation in many countries, including the United States, expressly or by implication prohibiting torture as well as cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment.¹⁵²

The prohibition of torture is, moreover, one of the few norms which has attained peremptory norm or jus cogens status, and is recognized as such by United States courts.¹⁵³ Jus cogens is defined as a peremptory norm “accepted and recognized by the international community of states as a whole as a norm from which no derogation is permitted and which can be modified only by a subsequent norm of general international law having the same character.”¹⁵⁴ While many international agreements expressly prohibit both torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment,¹⁵⁵ it remains an open question as to whether jus cogens status

American Convention on Human Rights and the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights further reinforce the argument that torture is prohibited by customary international law.

U.S. ratification of the ICCPR and CAT are clear pronouncements that we condemn the practice of torture and CID treatment and that we consider ourselves legally bound to prohibit such conduct. Indeed, in 1999, the United States issued a report to the U.N. Committee Against Torture categorically affirming that:

Every act constituting torture under the Convention constitutes a criminal offense under the law of the United States. No official of the Government, federal, state or local, civilian or military, is authorized to commit or to instruct anyone else to commit torture. Nor may any official condone or tolerate torture in any form. No exceptional circumstances may be invoked as justification for torture. United States law contains no provision permitting otherwise prohibited acts of torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment to be employed on grounds of exigent circumstance (for example, during a "state of public emergency") or on orders from a superior officer or public authority, and the protective mechanisms of an independent judiciary are not subject to suspension.¹⁵⁶

Furthermore, the United States has enacted the Torture Victim Protection Act,¹⁵⁷ has imposed civil liability for acts of torture regardless of where such acts take place,¹⁵⁸ and has enacted the Torture Victims Relief Act, providing for monetary assistance for torture victims.¹⁵⁹ As previously discussed, not only does the U.S. Constitution prohibit cruel and unusual punishment or treatment by state officials (including under the military justice system), but almost all of the U.S. State constitutions have similar prohibitions.¹⁶⁰ Finally, a number of federal judicial proceedings have recognized that the right to be free from torture as well as cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment is a norm of customary international law.¹⁶¹

In the State Department Country Reports On Human Rights Practices, for example, the United States has expressly characterized the following types of conduct – some of which are allegedly occurring at U.S. detention centers – as “torture” or “other abuse”: tying detainees in painful positions; forcing detainees to stand for long periods of time; incommunicado detention; depriving detainees of sleep; dousing naked detainees with cold water; denial of access to medical attention; interrogation techniques designed to intimidate or disorient; subjecting a detainee to loud music; forcing a detainee to squat or to assume “stressful, uncomfortable or painful” positions for “prolonged periods of time”; long periods of imprisonment in darkened rooms; verbal threats; and instilling detainees with the false belief that they are to be killed.¹⁶² The following types of conduct have been defined as cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment: stripping; confinement in severely overcrowded cells; beating; imprisonment in small containers; and threats against family members of detainees.¹⁶³

Enforcement

As the Second Circuit stated in Filartiga v. Peña-Irala, 630 F.2d 876 (1980), the United States is bound by customary international law. Thus, in cases where jurisdictional hurdles have been met, the bans on torture, arbitrary detention, and at least some aspects of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment have been enforced by U.S. courts as violations of customary international law.¹⁶⁴

SHOULD EXCEPTIONS BE MADE FOR THE “WAR ON TERROR”?: THE EXPERIENCE OF OTHER JURISDICTIONS

Notwithstanding the clear legal prohibitions against the use of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in U.S. and international law, we considered whether, in a post-September 11 world, the threat posed by terrorists to the United States could ever justify the use of prohibited interrogation practices. We sought to answer the question of whether there are any Suarez-Mason*, 672 F. Supp. 1531, 1541-43 (N.D. circumstances in which torture and CID treatment in the interrogation of detainees should be permitted.

For additional guidance in answering these questions, we looked to the experiences of Northern Ireland and Israel, other places where the struggle between fighting terrorism and upholding the rule of law has been waged. Both the European Court of Human Rights and the Israeli Supreme Court have confronted the contradictory demands of national security and human rights against the backdrop of terrorism. The legal debate that infuses these courts' seminal decisions on the use of torture and CID treatment in the interrogation of terrorist suspects offers guidance to the United States in interpreting CAT. These courts have ruled that there are no exceptions to the prohibition against torture and CID treatment. Their rulings express the conviction that the torture and CID treatment of detainees – even when those detainees are suspected terrorists – cannot be justified.

Legal Challenges to Interrogation Practices in Northern Ireland and Israel

The Republic of Ireland v. The United Kingdom

The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (the “European Convention”) came into force in 1953.¹⁶⁵ Article 3 of the European Convention provides: “No one shall be subject to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.” The judicial body primarily charged with interpreting and enforcing the European Convention is the European Court of Human Rights (the “ECHR”). The ECHR has, in several decisions, applied the European Convention’s prohibition against torture and inhuman or degrading treatment to cases involving interrogation of suspected terrorists who pose a threat to national security.

¹⁶⁵ 213 U.N.T.S. 221.

The most important of these decisions is The Republic of Ireland.¹⁶⁶ The Republic of Ireland case was decided in a legal and political environment conditioned by several years of terrorism in Northern Ireland perpetrated by members of the Irish Republican Army (IRA) and Loyalist groups. By March 1975, over 1,100 people had been killed, over 11,500 injured and £140 million worth of property destroyed.¹⁶⁷ To combat a campaign of violence being carried out by the IRA, in 1971, the Northern Ireland Government introduced regulations providing authorities with extrajudicial powers, including arrest for interrogation purposes and internment.¹⁶⁸

The Republic of Ireland Decision is a landmark legal discussion of whether specific interrogation practices committed by British security forces against IRA detainees constituted torture or inhuman or degrading treatment. The impetus for the ECHR's decision was the Republic of Ireland's application before the European Commission of Human Rights alleging, among other things, that various interrogation practices – including specific practices referred to as the “five techniques” – amounted to torture and inhuman or degrading treatment, in contravention of Article 3 of the European Convention.¹⁶⁹ The “five techniques” – described by the ECHR as methods of “disorientation” or “sensory deprivation” – include a number of practices allegedly being used today by U.S. interrogators:

- Wall-standing: Forcing a detainee to remain spread-eagled against a wall with his fingers placed high above his head against the wall, his legs spread apart and his feet positioned such that he must stand on his toes with the weight of his body resting on his fingers;

- Hooding: Keeping a dark bag over a detainee’s head at all times, except during interrogation;
- Subjection to noise: Holding a detainee in a room where there is a continuous loud and hissing noise;
- Deprivation of sleep; and
- Deprivation of food and drink.¹⁷⁰

The European Commission of Human Rights unanimously found that the “five techniques” constituted torture, and that other challenged interrogation practices amounted to inhuman and degrading treatment.¹⁷¹ Although the British Government subsequently discontinued the “five techniques” and did not contest the underlying allegations of the case or the Commission’s findings in connection therewith, the Republic of Ireland nevertheless referred the case to the ECHR.¹⁷² The ECHR took the opportunity to rule upon the legality of the “five techniques,” citing to the European Court’s responsibility “to elucidate, safeguard and develop the rules instituted by the Convention.”¹⁷³

In The Republic of Ireland decision, the ECHR explained that ill-treatment “had to attain a minimum level of severity to fall within Article 3, the assessment of which was necessarily relative, depending on all the circumstances, including the duration of the treatment, its physical or mental effects and, sometimes, the sex, age or state of health of the victim.”¹⁷⁴ The ECHR pointed out that, while the term “torture” attached “a special stigma to deliberate inhuman treatment causing very serious and cruel suffering,” the distinction between torture and inhuman or degrading treatment “derived principally from a difference in the intensity of the suffering inflicted.”¹⁷⁵ The ECHR held that since the “five techniques” “were applied in combination, with premeditation and for hours at a time, causing at least intense physical and mental suffering and acute psychiatric disturbances, they amount to inhuman treatment.”¹⁷⁶ The ECHR further held that since the “five techniques” aroused “in the victims feelings of fear, anguish and inferiority capable of humiliating and debasing them and possibly breaking their physical or moral resistance, they were also degrading.”¹⁷⁷ The ECHR concluded that the “five techniques” violated Article 3’s prohibition against inhuman or degrading treatment, but that they did not amount to torture.¹⁷⁸

In the years since the Republic of Ireland decision, neither time nor the ever-expanding threat of terrorism has diminished the ECHR’s commitment to maintaining an absolute prohibition against torture and inhuman or degrading treatment. In Chahal v. United Kingdom, Case No. 70/1995/576/662 (Nov. 15, 1996), for example, the ECHR rejected Great Britain’s argument that national security considerations justified the deportation of an Indian citizen to India on grounds that he was active in extremist Sikh organizations in England and was suspected of planning terrorist and other violent acts in the country. Chahal argued that, if deported, he would be tortured in India. In ruling that Chahal’s deportation by the United Kingdom would constitute a violation of Article 3 of the Convention, the ECHR stated:

Article 3 enshrines one of the most fundamental values of democratic society. . . . The Court is well aware of the immense difficulties faced by States in modern times in protecting their communities from terrorist violence. However, even in these circumstances, the Convention prohibits in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, irrespective of the victim’s conduct. Unlike most of the substantive clauses of the Convention and of Protocols Nos. 1 and 4, Article 3 makes no

Israeli Supreme Court Judgment Concerning The Legality Of The General Security Service's Interrogation Methods
As the Israeli Supreme Court notes at the outset of its Judgment Concerning The Legality Of The General Security Service's Interrogation Methods,¹⁷⁹ the State of Israel "has been engaged in an unceasing struggle for both its very existence and security, from the day of its founding":

Terrorist organizations have established as their goal Israel's annihilation. Terrorist acts and the general disruption of order are their means of choice. In employing such methods, these groups do not distinguish between civilian and military targets. They carry out terrorist attacks in which scores are murdered in public areas, public transportation, city squares and centers, theaters and coffee shops. They do not distinguish between men, women and children. They act of cruelty and without mercy.¹⁸⁰

In 1987, the Landau Commission of Inquiry into the Methods of Investigation of the GSS Regarding Hostile Terrorist Acts (the "Landau Commission") was established to investigate the interrogation practices of the main body responsible for fighting terrorism in Israel, the General Security Service (the "GSS"), and to reach legal conclusions concerning them. The resulting Landau Report,¹⁸¹ concluded: "The effective interrogation of terrorist suspects is impossible without the use of means of pressure, in order to overcome an obdurate provision for exceptions and no derogation from it is permissible under Article 15 even in the event of a public emergency threatening the life of the nation.

will not to disclose information and to overcome the fear of the person under interrogation that harm will befall him from his own organization, if he does not reveal information.”¹⁸² The Landau Report explained that: “The means of pressure should principally take the form of non-violent psychological pressure through a vigorous and extensive interrogation, with the use of stratagems, including acts of deception. However, when these do not attain their purpose, the exertion of a moderate measure of physical pressure cannot be avoided.”¹⁸³ The Landau Commission recommended, however, that GSS interrogators should be guided by clear rules “to prevent the use of inordinate physical pressure arbitrarily administered,” and formulated a code of guidelines (set forth in a secret part of the Landau Report) which defined, “on the basis of past experience, and with as much precision as possible, the boundaries of what is permitted to the interrogator and mainly what is prohibited to him.”¹⁸⁴ The Landau Commission asserted that the latitude it afforded GSS interrogators to use “a moderate measure of physical pressure” did not conflict with the standards set forth in international human rights conventions – such as the UDHR, the ICCPR and the European Convention – which prohibited torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.¹⁸⁵

In 1999, in the GSS Interrogation Methods Decision, the Israeli Supreme Court took up the legality of certain interrogation practices employed by the GSS. The Israeli Supreme Court acknowledged that the Landau Commission had approved the use of “a moderate degree of physical pressure,” and that the Landau Commission’s recommendations had been accepted by the Israeli Government.¹⁸⁶ The interrogation methods considered by the Israeli Supreme Court in the GSS Interrogation Methods Decision were:

- Shaking: Forcefully shaking a detainee's upper torso back and forth, repeatedly, and in a manner which causes the neck and head to dangle and vacillate rapidly.
- The "shabach" position: Forcing a detainee who has his hands tied behind his back to sit on a small and low chair whose seat is tilted forward and towards the ground, where one hand is placed inside the gap between the chair's seat and back support, the detainee's head is covered by an opaque sack falling down to his shoulders, and powerfully loud music is played in the room.
- The "frog crouch": Forcing a detainee to crouch on the tips of his/her toes for five minute intervals.
- Excessive tightening of handcuffs: Using particularly small cuffs, ill-fitted in relation to the suspect's arm or leg size.
- Sleep deprivation: A detainee is deprived of sleep as a result of being tied in the "shabach" position, being subjected to powerfully loud music or intense non-stop interrogations.¹⁸⁷

In examining the legality of these GSS interrogation methods, the Israeli Supreme Court acknowledged that, taken individually, some of the components of the "shabach" position have "legitimate" goals: for example, hooding prevents communication between suspects, the playing of powerfully loud music prevents the passing of information between suspects, the tying of the suspect's hands to a chair protects investigators, and the deprivation of sleep can be ¹⁸⁶ GSS Interrogation Methods Decision, 38 I.L.M. at 1477.

¹⁸⁷ Id., at 1474 -76. The Israeli Government argued that such interrogation methods did not need to be outlawed because, before resorting to physical pressure against detainees, GSS interrogators are instructed to "probe the severity of the danger that the interrogation is intending to prevent; consider the urgency of uncovering the information presumably possessed by the suspect in question; and seek an alternative means of preventing the danger." Id., at 1475. The Israeli Government also argued that directives respecting interrogation provide that in cases where shaking – considered the harshest interrogation method of those examined in the GSS Interrogation Methods Decision – is to be used, "the investigator must first provide an evaluation of the suspect's health and ensure that no harm comes to him." Id., at 1475.

necessitated by an interrogation.¹⁸⁸ According to the Israeli Supreme Court, however, there is a necessary balancing process between a government's duty to ensure that human rights are protected and its duty to fight terrorism. The results of that balance, the Israeli Supreme Court stated, are the rules for a "reasonable interrogation" – defined as an interrogation which is: (1) "necessarily one free of torture, free of cruel, inhuman treatment of the subject and free of any degrading handling whatsoever"; and (2) "likely to cause discomfort."¹⁸⁹ "In the end result," the Court noted, "the legality of an investigation is deduced from the propriety of its purpose and from its methods."¹⁹⁰

Turning to the specific interrogation methods before it, the Court concluded that shaking, the "frog crouch," the "shabach" position, cuffing causing pain, hooding, the consecutive playing of powerfully loud music and the intentional deprivation of sleep for a prolonged period of time are all prohibited interrogation methods.¹⁹¹ "All these methods do not fall within the sphere of a 'fair' interrogation. They are not reasonable. They impinge upon the suspect's dignity, his bodily integrity and his basic rights in an excessive manner (or beyond what is necessary). They are not to be deemed as included within the general power to conduct interrogations."¹⁹² The Israeli Supreme Court explained that restrictions applicable to police investigations are equally applicable to GSS investigations, and that there are no grounds to permit GSS interrogators to engage in conduct which would be prohibited in a regular police interrogation.¹⁹³

In so ruling, the Israeli Supreme Court considered the “ticking time bomb” scenario often confronted by GSS interrogators:

A given suspect is arrested by the GSS. He holds information respecting the location of a bomb that was set and will imminently explode. There is no way to defuse the bomb without this information. If the information is obtained, however, the bomb may be defused. If the bomb is not defused, scores will be killed and maimed. Is a GSS investigator authorized to employ physical means in order to elicit information regarding the location of the bomb in such instances?¹⁹⁴

The Israeli Supreme Court stated that it was prepared to presume that if a GSS investigator – who applied physical interrogation methods for the purpose of saving human life – is criminally indicted, the “necessity” defense recognized under Israeli Penal Law would be open to him in the appropriate circumstances.¹⁹⁵ The Israeli Supreme Court also acknowledged that the legislature could enact laws permitting the interrogation methods that its decision struck down.¹⁹⁶ However, the Israeli Supreme Court refused to imply from the existence of the “necessity” defense, as the State argued for it to do, “an advance legal authorization endowing the investigator with the capacity to use physical interrogation methods.”¹⁹⁷

The Legal and Moral Implications of the “Ticking Bomb” Scenario
 As the Republic of Ireland and GSS Interrogation Methods Decision demonstrate, in the face of a terrorist threat there is an inherent tension between obtaining potentially life-saving intelligence information through abusive interrogation of detainees and upholding human rights:

In crystallizing the interrogation rules, two values or interests clash. On the one hand, lies the desire to uncover the truth, thereby fulfilling the public interest in exposing crime and preventing it. On the other hand, is the wish to protect the dignity and liberty of the individual being interrogated.¹⁹⁸

International and human rights law is clear: torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of detainees is prohibited. Those who would, nevertheless, support the use of moderate physical force, sensory deprivation or disorientation techniques in the interrogation of terrorist suspects argue that resort to such methods is, at times, the only way to prevent the death of innocent persons and is, therefore, justified in such cases as the “lesser of two evils.” Proponents of this view would argue that the legitimacy of an act can be measured by whether its utility exceeds its harm. On this point, the Landau Commission took the following position:

To put it bluntly, the alternative is: are we to accept the offense of assault entailed in slapping a suspect’s face, or threatening him, in order to induce him to talk and reveal a cache of explosive materials meant for use in carrying out an act of mass terror against a civilian population, and thereby prevent the greater evil which is about to occur? The answer is self-evident.

Everything depends on weighing the two evils against each other.¹⁹⁹

In the case of detainees being held by the U.S. in connection with the “War on Terror,” however, the “ticking bomb” scenario is further complicated. Any utilitarian justification for subjecting these detainees to interrogation practices prohibited by CAT must necessarily be premised on the certainty (or, at least, the substantiated suspicion) that these individuals do, in fact, possess vital intelligence information. But, here, there is no such certainty. Instead, hundreds of detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Bagram Air Force Base and other U.S. detention facilities have been detained for months without any type of hearing or legal challenge permitted to their detention.

¹⁹⁸ Id., at 1481.

¹⁹⁹ See 23 Isr. L. Rev., at 174.

Our answer to the question of whether torture of detainees should ever be permitted in a post-September 11 world is that there are no such circumstances. We condemn the use of torture in interrogation of detainees, without exception. By its terms, CAT permits no derogation of the prohibition against torture – stating that “[n]o exceptional circumstances whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political stability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification of torture.”²⁰⁰ As the Israeli Supreme Court has explained, “A democratic, freedom-loving society does not accept that investigators use any means for the purpose of uncovering the truth. ‘The interrogations practices of the police in a given regime are indicative of a regime’s very character.’”²⁰¹

We recognize that some legal scholars and ethicists may well argue that circumstances exist (as in the “ticking bomb” scenario) in which torture and CID treatment in the interrogation of detainees should be permitted. However, we stress that torture of detainees – which is prohibited under international and U.S. law – is never permissible, and should be fully investigated and prosecuted in all cases.

²⁰⁰ CAT, Art. 2.

²⁰¹ GSS Interrogation Methods Decision, 38 I.L.M. at 1481 (internal citations omitted).

In summary, the Association makes the following recommendations:

First, we urge the United States to amend 18 U.S.C. § 2340 to encompass the actions of military and intelligence personnel at U.S. facilities overseas, to fully utilize the UCMJ to protect all detainees from abuse and to independently investigate human rights compliance in countries to which we are “rendering” detainees.

Second, U.S. military and intelligence personnel involved in interrogation of terrorist suspects should be educated regarding the prohibition against torture and CID, and should receive training to comply with those rules.

Third, the U.S. should adhere to its commitments under the Geneva Conventions, extend POW treatment to regular force combatants as a matter of policy, and promptly establish proper screening procedures and hearings for all detainees.

Finally, the Association notes that particularly in these times of terrorism and violence, it is important to protect the rule of law and the standards of decency to which our nation and the community of nations are committed. As the Israeli Supreme Court has stated:

This is the destiny of democracy, as not all means are acceptable to it, and not all practices employed by its enemies are open before it. Although a democracy must often fight with one hand tied behind its back, it nonetheless has the upper hand.²⁰²

Appendix A

December 26, 2002

President George W. Bush

The White House

1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW

Washington, DC 20500

Dear President Bush:

Human Rights Watch is deeply concerned by allegations of torture and other mistreatment of suspected al-Qaeda detainees described in the Washington Post ("U.S. Denies Abuse but Defends Interrogations") on December 26. The allegations, if true, would place the United States in violation of some of the most fundamental prohibitions of international human rights law. Any U.S. government official who is directly involved or complicit in the torture or mistreatment of detainees, including any official who knowingly acquiesces in the commission of such acts, would be subject to prosecution worldwide.

Human Rights Watch urges you to take immediate steps to clarify that the use of torture is not U.S. policy, investigate the Washington Post's allegations, adopt all necessary measures to end any ongoing violations of international law, stop the rendition of detainees to countries where they are likely to be tortured, and prosecute those implicated in such abuse.

f. Prohibitions Against Torture

The Washington Post reports that persons held in the CIA interrogation centers at Bagram air base in Afghanistan are subject to "stress and duress" techniques, including "standing or kneeling for hours" and being "held in awkward, painful positions." The Post notes that the detention facilities at Bagram and elsewhere, such as at Diego Garcia, are not monitored by the International Committee of the Red Cross, which has monitored the U.S. treatment of detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The absolute prohibition against torture is a fundamental and well-established precept of customary and conventional international law. Torture is never permissible against anyone, whether in times of peace or of war.

The prohibition against torture is firmly established under international human rights law. It is prohibited by various treaties to which the United States is a party, including the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), which the United States ratified in 1992, and the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, which the United States ratified in 1994. Article 7 of the ICCPR states that "No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment." The right to be protected from torture is non-derogable, meaning that it applies at all times, including during public emergencies or wartime.

International humanitarian law (the laws of war), which applies during armed conflict, prohibits the torture or other mistreatment of captured combatants and others in captivity, regardless of their legal status. Regarding prisoners-of-war, article 17 of the Third Geneva Convention of 1949 states: "No physical or mental torture, nor any other form of coercion, may be inflicted on prisoners of war to secure from them information of any kind whatever. Prisoners of war who refuse to answer may not be threatened, insulted, or exposed to any unpleasant or disadvantageous treatment of any kind." Detained civilians are similarly protected by article 32 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. The United States has been a party to the 1949 Geneva Conventions since 1955.

The United States does not recognize captured al-Qaeda members as being protected by the 1949 Geneva Conventions, although Bush administration officials have insisted that detainees will be treated humanely and in a manner consistent with Geneva principles. However, at minimum, all detainees in wartime, regardless of their legal status, are protected by customary international humanitarian law. Article 76 ("Fundamental Guarantees") of the First Additional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions, which is recognized as restating customary international law, provides that "torture of all kinds, whether physical or mental" against "persons who are in the power of a Party to the conflict and who do not benefit from more favorable treatment under the [Geneva] Conventions," shall "remain prohibited at any time and in any place whatsoever, whether committed by civilian or military agents." "[C]ruel treatment and torture" of detainees is also prohibited under common article 3 to the 1949 Geneva Conventions, which is considered indicative of customary international law.

II. Possible U.S. Complicity in Torture

It is a violation of international law not only to use torture directly, but also to be complicit in torture committed by other governments. The Post reports being told by U.S. officials that "[t]housands have been arrested and held with U.S. assistance in countries known for brutal treatment of prisoners." The Convention against Torture provides in article 4 that all acts of torture, including "an act by any person which constitutes complicity or participation in torture," is an offense "punishable by appropriate penalties which take into account their grave nature."

The Post article describes the rendition of captured al-Qaeda suspects from U.S. custody to other countries where they are tortured or otherwise mistreated. This might also be a violation of the Convention against Torture, which in article 3 states: "No State Party shall expel, return ('refouler') or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.... For the purpose of determining whether there are such grounds, the competent authorities shall take into account all relevant considerations including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights."

The U.S. Department of State annual report on human rights practices has frequently criticized torture in countries where detainees may have been sent. These include Uzbekistan, Pakistan, Egypt, Jordan and Morocco. The United States thus could not plausibly claim that it was unaware of the problem of torture in these countries.

III. International Prosecutions for Torture and Command Responsibility

Direct involvement or complicity in torture, as well as the failure to prevent torture, may subject U.S. officials to prosecution under international law.

The willful torture or inhuman treatment of prisoners-of-war or other detainees, including "willfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health," are "grave breaches" of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, commonly known as war crimes. Grave breaches are subject to universal jurisdiction, meaning that they can be prosecuted in any national criminal court and as well as any international tribunal with appropriate jurisdiction.

The Convention against Torture obligates States Parties to prosecute persons within their jurisdiction who are implicated or complicit in acts of torture. This obligation includes the prosecution of persons within their territory who committed acts of torture elsewhere and have not been extradited under procedures provided in the convention.

Should senior U.S. officials become aware of acts of torture by their subordinates and fail to take immediate and effective steps to end such practices, they too could be found criminally liable under international law. The responsibility of superior officers for atrocities by their subordinates is commonly known as command responsibility. Although the concept originated in military law, it now is increasingly accepted to include the responsibility of civil authorities for abuses committed by persons under their direct authority. The doctrine of command responsibility has been upheld in recent decisions by the international criminal tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda.

There are two forms of command responsibility: direct responsibility for orders that are unlawful and imputed responsibility, when a superior knows or should have known of crimes committed by a subordinate acting on his own initiative and fails to prevent or punish them. All states are obliged to bring such people to justice.

The allegations made by the Washington Post are extraordinarily serious. They have put the United States on notice that acts of torture may be taking place with U.S. participation or complicity. That creates a heightened duty to respond preventively. As an immediate step, we urge that you issue a presidential statement clarifying that it is contrary to U.S. policy to use or facilitate torture. The Post's allegations should be investigated and the findings made public. Should there be evidence of U.S. civilian or military officials being directly involved or complicit in torture, or in the rendition of persons to places where they are likely to be tortured, you should take immediate steps to prevent the commission of such acts and to prosecute the individuals who have ordered, organized, condoned, or carried them out. The United States also has a duty to refrain from sending persons to other countries with a history of torture without explicit and verifiable guarantees that no torture or mistreatment will occur.

Thank you for your attention to these concerns.

Sincerely,

Kenneth Roth

The Honorable George W. Bush
The White House
Washington, DC 20301-1010

Dear President Bush:

We are writing to you on a matter of great concern. As you are no doubt aware, on December 26th the Washington Post reported that your Administration has used, tacitly condoned or facilitated torture by third countries in the interrogation of prisoners. These reports are so flagrantly at odds with your many statements about the importance of human rights that we trust that you are equally disturbed by it.

You have repeatedly declared that the United States "will always stand firm for the non-negotiable demands of human dignity." Surely there is no more basic and less negotiable requirement of human dignity than the right to be free of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. As you know, under the Torture Convention "no exceptional circumstances whatsoever" may be invoked to justify torture and no party may return or extradite a person to another state where there are "substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture." Likewise, under the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, "no one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."

As you declared in your State of the Union address, these solemn commitments of the United States are non-negotiable; in legal terms, there can be no derogation from them. You may also know that it was your father's Administration that sought and received overwhelming Senate support for the United States to ratify these two treaties.

The Administration's response to the outrageous statements made by numerous unnamed officials to the Post's reporters concerning United States use or tolerance of torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment has thus far been wholly inadequate. Whatever the truth of the Post's allegations, without a more authoritative response to this high-profile story the world will conclude that the United States is not practicing what it preaches. America's authority as a champion of human rights will be seriously damaged.

What is clearly needed in this instance are unequivocal statements by you and your Cabinet officers that torture in any form or manner will not be tolerated by this Administration, that any US official found to have used or condoned torture will be held accountable, and that the United States would neither seek nor rely upon intelligence obtained through torture in a third country. These statements need to be accompanied by clear written guidance applicable to everyone engaged in the interrogation and rendition of prisoners strictly prohibiting the use or tolerance of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of prisoners and mandating full compliance with the Geneva conventions requirements for the treatment of prisoners.

We urge you in the strongest terms to take this opportunity to demonstrate that torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment is, in fact as well as word, non-negotiable.

Senator KENNEDY. Now, do you know anything, General Romig, about any of your officers in the DOD being concerned about these issues?

General ROMIG. Sir, first, I received both of these articles from one of your staffers immediately—

Senator KENNEDY. I wanted you to know it before I asked you the question.

General ROMIG. Yes, sir. I appreciate that.

I also contacted my office immediately and said, "Let's get to the bottom of this and find out"—for one thing, I can't tell, really—and I skimmed through the articles—if these are Army JAGs, Air Force JAGs, Navy JAGs, or Marine JAGs. It's troubling, regardless of who said it, but we're trying to get to the bottom of it.

Senator KENNEDY. Do you know whether they—any of these safeguards had been removed with regard to these prisons, such as the two-way mirror? Have there been changes? Have there been alternatives for what—a process where JAG had been monitoring, watching, or observing these kinds of interrogations?

General ROMIG. Sir, I'm not aware of the use of the two-way mirror as a regular standard method of monitoring interrogations. The fact that there are so many interrogations going on at different locations, we wouldn't have enough JAG officers to sit through all of these.

Senator KENNEDY. Do you know if there's been a change? Here is—"Mr. Horton and the bar colleagues wrote to Haynes and the CIA's general counsel in an effort to clarify U.S. policy on the treatment and interrogation of detainees. "These inquiries," he recalls, "were met with a firm brush-off. We then turned to Senators who have raised the issue previously, and assisted their staff in pursuing it. These inquiries were met with a similar brush-off."

What do you know about any of the changes that have taken place with regards to the JAG position, in terms of observing the interrogation of detainees, POW, combat—

General ROMIG. Sir, I'm not aware of any change in that regard.

Senator KENNEDY. That has not been brought at all to your attention in the—General ROMIG. Not the issue of the role of the JAG in the—Senator KENNEDY. No one in your department has come to you and expressed any kind of concern that they had heard that there were these kinds of activities, inappropriate kinds of activities taking place in any of the prisons? I have to move along. Either yes or no.

General ROMIG. Sir, I'm not aware of anybody specifically talking about any issues in a prison who have looked into those.

Senator KENNEDY. With regard to the contractors, as I understand, the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) doesn't apply to the contractors, does it?

General ROMIG. Sir, technically it would in a congressionally-declared war. Article 2 of the UCMJ—

Senator KENNEDY. In the kind of situation we have now, it does not.

General ROMIG. It does not, that is correct.

Senator KENNEDY. All right. What about the Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA)? I understand we have a SOFA that excludes prosecution for the military, also civilian personnel.

General ROMIG. It depends on which SOFA we're talking about, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. I'm talking about those that are applicable. We're talking about Iraq, and we're talking about Afghanistan. If there are other places you want to distinguish you can do that.

General ROMIG. Yes, sir. Basically, my understanding right now is that we do not have a SOFA in Iraq because we are in a mode where we are really operating the sovereignty there. But once it's turned over, that'll be one of the issues that we must have, is a SOFA.

Now, there is another piece of legislation that I think you're aware of—Senator KENNEDY. That's going to happen pretty quickly.

General ROMIG. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. Give me, quickly, the answer in Afghanistan, so I know that. Can they be prosecuted? Will civilians be protected under the SOFA?

General ROMIG. Again, it depends on the kind of offense, but my understanding is that we would have jurisdiction over those.

Senator KENNEDY. Homicide.

General ROMIG. Homicide—

Senator KENNEDY. There are two individuals—

General ROMIG.—U.S. on U.S., we'd have jurisdiction.

Senator KENNEDY. You'd have jurisdiction.

Let me just, finally, ask General Alexander, what's going to be the status of these camps on June—at the time of the transfer of sovereignty? Who's taking them over? Is the United States still going to be running these camps? Is it going to be the Iraqis? Tell us what exactly is going to be the status in these prison camps in Iraq.

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I'm not sure of what the status is going to be of those camps. I believe that we will still run some of those camps. I know that when General Ryder went over, one of his issues was to figure out when the Iraqis would be capable of running the camps, the prison system, themselves. I'm not sure what the status is, sir. I'd have to take that for the record.

[The information referred to follows:]

At the time of the transfer of sovereignty, all detainee facilities will remain under the operational control of U.S. military forces.

Senator KENNEDY. My time is up.

Senator INHOFE [presiding]. Thank you, Senator Kennedy.

Senator Roberts has an Intelligence Committee commitment, so I'm going to defer to him and then take his turn, without objection.

Senator ROBERTS. I thank the Senator, and I will try to be very brief. I think many of the questions, while important, are a little repetitive.

This is a question for General Romig. There has been a great deal of discussion about the fact that the MI brigade at the prison was given TACON of the MP unit there. Now, given the fact that the abuse at issue is a violation of the UCMJ, what impact does the issue of TACON have on the culpability of those who have committed these acts?

General ROMIG. Virtually none, sir. If you commit an offense under the code, regardless of what the chain of command is, charges can be preferred, and they would go up to the general court-martial convening authority—or the special court-martial convening authority, but if it's serious offenses, it would go up to the general court-martial convening authority, which would probably be either III Corps or CJTF-7.

Senator ROBERTS. The same question I asked this morning, and a related question—an order to “soften up” a detainee would not be a lawful order, is that correct?

General ROMIG. That's exactly right, sir, depending on how it was conveyed. But on its face, it does not sound like a lawful order.

Senator ROBERTS. So what legal basis, then, would a soldier have for following that order?

General ROMIG. Sir, there would be none. Our soldiers are taught, “Illegal orders are orders that you first must, or should, apprise the person giving the order that it's an illegal order, and, if they don't cease and desist, then you must disobey.”

Senator ROBERTS. General Alexander, I know you went over, in some detail, who had the accountability and the responsibility on the lack of training and the lack of leadership and the lack of discipline. Who had the responsibility to ensure the MPs were properly trained and were actually fulfilling the unit's mission? Are we talking about Colonel Pappas or Lieutenant Colonel Jordan or General Karpinski? Who is it?

General ALEXANDER. General Karpinski and Colonel Phillabaum, sir.

Senator ROBERTS. And Colonel Phillabaum.

General ALEXANDER. The battalion commander.

Senator ROBERTS. Okay. Let me just say that—for the record, and I hesitate doing this, but I think it's pertinent to what has been discussed by Senator McCain—there's just been a video posted on an Islamic militant Web site showing a group affiliated with al Qaeda that beheaded an American civilian in Iraq, saying the death was revenge for the abuse of the prisoners by American soldiers. I will not get into the individual's name. After reading the statement, the men were seen pulling the man to his side, and putting a large knife to his neck, a scream sounded as the men literally cut off his head, shouting, "Allah akbar," God is great, and then held the head out before the camera.

It seems to me that this underscores, in part at least, the tremendous value of interrogation and better intelligence to prevent atrocities like this. I don't think this was a one-for-one cause. In other words, I think this happens anyway, under the circumstances. But there's a different value system going on here. I know we have to reach—for the very highest levels of conduct, and I know we will. I know as soon as we get through with the inquiry—or the investigation, pardon me—the Fay Report—that you'll report back to the Intelligence Committee and this committee on what happened.

I mention that only to show that this is a very difficult situation, and, under the circumstances, I think that the American public certainly understands that.

I thank the Senator for yielding me the time.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Byrd.

Senator BYRD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The ICRC has reported that it warned about prison abuses throughout 2003, but it was only when a young soldier came forward, on January 13, 2004, that an investigation was launched. The question must be asked, why did the military only get serious about this problem when one of its own broke silence?

General Alexander and General Burgess, you're both senior military officers with responsibilities for intelligence collection. The ICRC made a litany of complaints about interrogations at Iraqi prisons for more than a year. Why wasn't an investigation launched into those complaints? Why were our civilian and military leaders sitting on their hands waiting for a whistleblower to come forward, when ICRC reports were being stacked from floor to ceiling?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I'll answer that first. I believe you're correct, that when that report went forward—and, as I understand, it went forward to General Karpinski, and she responded to it. What I would do in that situation is just as you said, I think an investigation should be done to look into the incidents that the ICRC had done at that time. I do not know if General Karpinski did such an investigation. I do not know the answer to that. But I do agree with you that if those allegations that were made in there were known to them, they should have investigated it right then.

General BURGESS. Sir, and I would agree with what General Alexander said. I would also highlight that on the Joint Staff, as the J-2, I never saw the ICRC report, until here in the last week.

Senator BYRD. Why were not the ICRC reports taken seriously? Didn't anyone stop to think that there was a problem here? Was everyone just passing the buck, right up until the moment that this young soldier stepped forward? Why did it take until last week for the ICRC reports to make it to your desk? Shouldn't you have been seeking out these reports rather than waiting for them to come to you?

General Alexander?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, that is a great question. As I understand it, those reports go to the JAG at the CJTF-7 and were given to the MP brigade commander at the time who was in charge of the facility to answer. They were not widely disseminated at that time. Why they were not widely disseminated, I do not know. Going out and finding them, it's hard to understand. I would like to do that. I mean, exactly what you said. Had I known that there was a report out there, exactly, I would go after it. It's difficult to know to go after one that you don't know is there, to be honest.

Senator BYRD. General Burgess?

General BURGESS. Sir, I understand the system, as he has laid out, and I would highlight that is also the system that I am familiar with, based on Guantanamo. When the ICRC does their looks down there also, they are provided to the commander down there, which is the situation I'm more familiar with, because I was involved in that process. So it should have been dealt with, but that is the process that we currently have in place.

Senator BYRD. The ICRC reports that 70 percent to 90 percent of the Iraqis in detentions were wrongfully arrested. If the military and the administration seek to win the hearts and minds of the Iraqi people, it will not be done by rounding up the usual suspects and throwing them in dysfunctional prisons for no reason. General Alexander, how can you justify a wrongful arrest rate of up to 90 percent? Who ordered the policies that resulted in the arrest of nine innocent Iraqis for every one criminal or terrorist taken to prison? Has anyone ordered an end to arbitrary arrest of the Iraqi people, or is this just another issue that will be subject to another investigation?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I don't know how to answer that question, but let me try this way. As I understand it, no one is going out and just arresting people. In each case, the reasons for arrest are based on shootings, an incident, or intelligence that they have. I saw the report that you saw, that 70 to 90 percent. I do not know that that's true. I do know that there are a number of people that have been arrested that, after further screening, it was determined should not be arrested, but I don't know the percentage to that, sir.

I do know that the commanders on the ground who are trying to protect their troops and the Iraqi civilians, when you have people armed with weapons who are in an area that is shooting at either our people or the Iraqi people, that's wrong, and that is one of the reasons that many of these people are apprehended. How you go about that, that is a very difficult thing. The essence of your question, though, and how to, as you put it, win the hearts and minds of the people, is one of the things that we really have to work at. That is the key to solving not only that problem, but the rest of the problems in the Middle East.

Senator BYRD. Has anyone ordered an end to these arbitrary arrests?

General ALEXANDER. You see, sir, I don't know that anybody is doing arbitrary arrests, as you say. I don't know that. So, therefore, I don't know that they've ordered an end to it. I don't know that they're setting up—as far as I know, they are not doing that.

General BURGESS. I have not seen any indication of arbitrary arrests, sir. The only thing that I am familiar with, in terms of—as individuals that have intelligence value are picked up by the units, whether it be battalion or brigade, the general standing operating procedure is, the brigade will hold onto them for up to 14 days and conduct interrogations for actionable intelligence, and then, following that time frame, they will be evacuated to Abu Ghraib or to another holding area.

Senator BYRD. I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator INHOFE. I thank the Senator.

In case our panel is wondering, there is a vote taking place right now, and so I'm going to stay here and keep it open until someone returns. So I may have 15 or 20 minutes here.

First of all, let me share a thought with you. You describe, General Alexander, the acts perpetrated by the seven as being reprehensible, and I certainly agree with you. I have spent a lot of time looking, since this first became public—and I think it's gotten way too much publicity, quite frankly, and I think a lot of it, as I said this morning, is politically charged. But those reprehensible acts, as near as I can determine, were confined to about seven people. I understand those seven people are, right now, being prosecuted within the system, and that's taking place as we're talking.

Now, first of all, is that your understanding, too?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir. I would add that others who witnessed it, and did not report it, are also responsible, and those people will be held accountable, too.

Senator INHOFE. Do you know about how many of those there are?

General ALEXANDER. Right now, I know of two or three more who will come forward in that category, so that those that you see in the pictures, that they were in the pictures, even if they say, "All I did was see this," they should have reported it, and they were wrong.

Senator INHOFE. Yes. My concern has been what effect this is having on our ability to get actionable intelligence. This has been a great concern of mine. First, if this hadn't become public, if this hadn't come into the public arena as it has, is it your belief, each one of you, that this would have been handled internally anyway?

General ALEXANDER. Absolutely, sir.

General BURGESS. Yes, sir.

General ROMIG. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. In fact, wasn't it being handled long before that happened?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. As I look at the timeline and I see that starting on January 3, 2004, the different things that happened, they jumped right in, and I commended them this morning—General Taguba—the fact that he did that all in just a little over 1 month, that's beyond the call of duty. So I would say that, and I think it's important that we tell the people of America that this would have happened anyway.

I had—45 years ago, I was in the Army, and I was in the court system. I was a court clerk. I think I saw one general the entire time I was in the Army. But, nonetheless, I recall some of the things that were going on at that time, and there are always court-martial going on. This is not unusual. It's taking place. They're not highly publicized. It's probably good that they aren't highly publicized, and sometimes these are being abused.

Now, would you say that because of this, things are going on, in terms of securing actionable intelligence as if this hadn't happened?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I will tell you that General Miller is now in charge of Abu Ghraib. He is a great officer. He understands the process, and he understands the law. He has gone around and talked to all of the MPs and all the interrogators and the rest of the support troops there at Abu Ghraib and the other facilities and told them how important their work is. Don't let the actions of a few stop the important work that they're doing, because it is important. Sir, I think that is exactly right. He is a great leader. He's not an MP officer, he's not an MI officer. He's a combat leader who's taken charge of that facility based on experience and lessons that he learned at Guantanamo.

Senator INHOFE. I was down at Guantanamo, and I saw that, and I think it's very important for you folks, or us, to keep reinforcing this, that these are things that are confined to just a small handful of people. If you had, such as we know there were, about 700, I understand, guards at just this one prison, but there's some 25 other prisons, too—that it's something that we need to keep reminding people.

Chairman WARNER [presiding]. You can go vote.

Senator INHOFE. Let me finish when I get back.

Chairman WARNER. A vote is on, and we're trying to keep the hearing going.

Senator Dayton, have you voted?

Senator DAYTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Fine. Would you like to take your turn now?

Senator DAYTON. Thank you.

General Alexander, if I understand your remarks correctly, are you asserting that the Taguba Report, the ICRC Report, and the pictures of the prisoner abuses that we saw last week all refer to the same limited number of events that were carried out by a few MPs, with a couple of unidentified low-level MI officials perhaps interacting with them to lead them to those actions?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I'd note that in the ICRC Report it says that one of the detainees had women's underwear on their head. I, you, the American public saw that photo on TV. That led me to make that statement that those same things that they noted in their report we see in a photograph. So, yes, sir, that is why I made that. Now, I'm not asserting that it is only isolated to seven people at one facility, everybody else is pure. I would not make that statement. I'm saying that the incidences I looked at, the ICRC allegations, and as I look at these allegations I see a very close parallel, and that that committee report was done on two visits in October.

Senator DAYTON. I'm sorry, what committee, sir?

General ALEXANDER. The ICRC Report was done based on their visits in October to Abu Ghraib. That's why I made that statement, and I believe that is accurate. Now, the ICRC could say—you see, I don't know who was photographing, and they didn't know either; they just said it was being photographed, and they made that statement. Does that make sense?

Senator DAYTON. It does make sense. It may well be the same individuals, although the report, as I read it, refers to other abuses that occurred in that prison to other prisoners that didn't fit the descriptions in those pictures. But I guess I just wanted to clarify, for my own understanding, what you're implying here, because, as I read the ICRC Report, it refers to 14 other—or a total of 14 detention centers or prisons, and I don't know how to quantify the extent of the violations that they are alleging, but it certainly appears to be far broader and more systemic than one set of incidents photographed at one prison. Would you concur with that sir, or do you—

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir, I think—in the ICRC Report, there was one portion on Abu Ghraib—

Senator DAYTON. Right.

General ALEXANDER.—which is what I was referencing.

Senator DAYTON. Okay.

General ALEXANDER. There are allegations, and there are investigations ongoing at other prisons. Anytime someone does something that violates the law, we ought to ensure that we begin an investigation. Normally, a criminal investigation, the Army Criminal Investigation Division (CID) does that.

Senator DAYTON. The references—and, again, it's hard to know exactly who—it's impossible to know who they're referring to, but there are a number of references in the ICRC Report to MI personnel, and how that they—to characterize these—what they say are various abuses. Some officers told the ICRC that the widespread ill-treatment of persons deprived of their liberty during arrest, initial internment, and tactical questioning was due to a lack of MPs on the ground to supervise and control behavior, the lack of experience of intelligence officers in charge of “tactical questioning.” What is tactical questioning?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, that's at the maneuver-battalion/maneuver-brigade level. When you first get a prisoner, what are the questions that you ask him? We actually did send a tactical questioning training team over to all the divisions to train them on the standards for that.

Senator DAYTON. All right, thank you.

Another part of the report says, “Several military intelligence officers confirmed to the International Red Cross that it was part of the military intelligence process to hold a person deprived of his liberty naked in a completely dark and empty cell for a prolonged period, to use inhumane and degrading treatment, including physical and psychological coercion against persons deprived of their liberty to secure their cooperation.” This is not referring to the Abu Ghraib facility. I take it that certainly would appear to violate the edicts that you have described.

General ALEXANDER. Absolutely, sir.

Senator DAYTON. It also refers to other MI. Referring to Abu Ghraib, the MI officer in charge of the interrogation that they witnessed in early October explained that this practice of denying them of their—keeping them completely naked in empty concrete cells, in total darkness, allegedly for several days. The ICRC investigators interrupted his visit and requested an explanation from the authorities. The MI officer-in-charge of the interrogation explained that this practice was “part of the process.” The process appeared to be a give-and-take policy, whereby persons deprived of their liberty were “drip-fed” with new items—clothing, bedding, hygiene articles—in exchange for their “cooperation.” Again, this would violate the practices of the—

General ALEXANDER. Absolutely wrong.

Senator DAYTON.—instructions?

General ALEXANDER. Absolutely wrong.

Senator DAYTON. How, then, were these—if these are MI officers, how are they getting—how are they deviating, then, from—and to what extent were they—to what extent were there MI officers who were deviating from what you said were the clear instructions they had received?

General ALEXANDER. Right. Sir, here’s what we have to clarify on that point, which we do not know. Who is the person they referred to as a “military intelligence officer”? Was it one of the contractors or was it one of the interrogators? Both did not wear rank, as is normal practice, because you don’t want an interrogator who is a Spec-4 interrogating a major. In some cultures, that would never—they would never get anything. So they go in without rank, and so it may be that an interrogator, civilian or military, indeed, said that. If that happened, that is one of the individuals that we need to find and hold accountable.

Senator DAYTON. I’d just—my time is expired, but how are—what steps have been taken to assure that this is not happening now, and will not happen in the future there?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, clearly, with General Miller there, not only do we have the supervision, but he is going back and ensuring everybody understands those requirements and, I think, forcing the leadership from both the units to be at the facility 24 hours a day. That’s what needs to happen.

Senator DAYTON. Thank you.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator DAYTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator Dayton.

I’m going to ask the indulgence of my colleagues. I just left the floor, as all of us did, in connection with voting, and the Senators on the floor are in a virtual state of shock about this report about this alleged beheading, and it brings to mind a concern. It’s all right in here, very clearly. We’re waiting for the Fay Report. We don't know how long that's going to be. How many weeks or months might that Fay Report take?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, he's trying to get it done within a month.

Chairman WARNER. Within a month. Then I suppose, it has to be chopped on by General Abizaid in the chain—in CENTCOM. Would that be correct? In other words, how soon can—whether it's Congress or internally within the executive branch, Department of the Army, DOD—we begin to address where the problem might lie so that it can't be repeated? Because it is clear in this report that our service men and women serving in Iraq, Afghanistan, and around the world are now—could well be subjected to this type of threat.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. As a matter of fact, the first question I asked on the last—to the hearing with Secretary Rumsfeld and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs was to General Myers. I asked if these stories are generating a greater risk to your men and women in uniform worldwide? The answer was yes.

You have to balance the UCMJ, comparing all these reports with the need to really, and on almost a real-time basis, begin to deal with this problem so it can't happen again or proliferate further.

Can you comment on the enhanced risk to our forces in your intelligence channels? What evaluation have you made?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, first, we are taking actions right away. We are not waiting on the Fay Report to fix anything. We're waiting on the Fay Report to find more information on others who should be held accountable. We are taking actions, and that's what you're seeing. Those people who we can hold accountable now, who should be charged, are being charged. As General Taguba explained, he did not go into the depths on the MI part of this, and we need to do that and find out, just as Senator Dayton brought out, if there were MI officers or personnel involved, and hold them accountable. So we're doing that in parallel. We're not waiting.

Chairman WARNER. All right.

General ALEXANDER. Currently, sir, we're fixing—

Chairman WARNER. I don't want to take up too much time.

Did you have any further comments, General Burgess, on this situation, the enhanced risk to our forces worldwide, particularly in Iraq and Afghanistan?

General BURGESS. Sir, as you highlighted, from what Chairman Myers and Secretary Rumsfeld said, Chairman Myers has given me direction to pay attention since this incident, and we have been following the intelligence. There has been an up-tick, a little bit—

Chairman WARNER. Don't use the word up-tick.

General BURGESS. I'm sorry, sir. There has been an increase, if you will, in some of the threat reportings. We have followed that. We have also been following the foreign press as we have followed that. This incident this last weekend that you're reading about, which occurred on Saturday, is one that we are taking a look at to see if we can make a direct correlation to, but at this time have not been able to.

Chairman WARNER. The committee would like to have copies. You have a report that goes out, which is—it's in the open—about intelligence repercussions. I used it once upon a time. We'll see that we get it from you.

Senator Allard.

Senator ALLARD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Roberts brought up the beheading article in his questions and I just want to compliment you on the great response that I think you gave. We still need to comply with the Geneva Conventions and that we still need to welcome oversight, like from the ICRC, and that you do welcome oversight, like from the committee. But there is an inherent risk when we make this public, and I think we all need to recognize that. But I also think it highlights the difference between our system and our way of doing things, as opposed to our opposition so many times, who refuse to comply with that. I understand the need to do that. Because if we can make these work, and we get our adversaries to comply with it, it means our people, our men and women who are serving in the Armed Forces, if they happen to be prisoners, have a better chance of survival.

So I compliment you on your foresight. This is unfortunate that this happened, and it's just—when you make things public like this, this is what happens. You're going to increase antagonism on the other side, and we need to think about those things.

I was struck by the fact that there were people within the prison, an individual, at least one, who knew the rules well enough to report an infraction, and knew that he could do that. In fact, he was encouraged to do that. So the message got down to some of those people who were working in the prison. Apparently, it didn't get to some of the others. Can you explain the discrepancy in why some of them got the message and some of them didn't? Or is it your view that some of them decided just to ignore the law?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I believe that it was a group that lacked discipline and leadership. I think that—your latter statement is the more accurate. I think that's really what happened. I know that, as I stated earlier, cases that were brought up, people were disciplined, and corrective action taken. So there were people who knew the rules and brought them forward consistently. It was not just that one. There were a couple of instances that I—for the record, those incidences. But you will see, in those incidents, that, in fact, they were—when they were brought up, the leadership immediately took action, brought the JAG in, said, "Okay, what happened?" So I think that—I think that needs to come out. Because I think the perception is that we're not all—but when those things were going on—I don't know, as I said earlier, what was done about the ICRC Report, whether an investigation was started on that.

Senator ALLARD. My perception is that actually there was a problem being recognized before this incident actually happened, in October and December, and there were already—

General ALEXANDER. Right.

Senator ALLARD.—people beginning to become made aware of this, and there was beginning to be some review. But, obviously, you can't jump ahead of the review. You have to establish the facts before you can take action. Am I correct in assuming that there already was some review beginning to take place, before the 1st of October, of the prison system and how we were handling prisoners?

General ALEXANDER. There clearly are reviews that went on, in terms of when General Ryder went over to look at the prisons for General Sanchez.

Senator ALLARD. That was part of routine review, I guess.

General ALEXANDER. That was part of a routine—yes, sir.

Senator ALLARD. Okay, very good.

General ALEXANDER. When General Miller went over to look at how they set up and how they get that—how they set the flow of information, that also was important.

Senator ALLARD. General Alexander, at any time after September 11, 2001, did the Army staff develop or issue to field commanders a revised doctrine for collecting intelligence specifically through the strategic exploitation of battlefield detainees or enemy prisoners of war?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, we didn't put out a revised doctrine, per se. But I will tell you that we did look at how we do data-mining, as the Department of the Army and as the Intelligence Community, and how we used that data-mining to support analysis. Our intelligence system has an awful lot of information, and that some of that information may apply to the guy who is being interrogated. In the past, we were never able to use that. Some of the tools and things that we do use and that we have pushed forward, allow us to take advantage of all parts of our Government for the interrogators, so when they set that interrogation package up—that's one of the things that is evolving, and I think it's exceptional.

Senator ALLARD. General Burgess, did the Joint Staff develop—same question—or issue to field commanders revised doctrine for collecting intelligence specifically through the strategic exploitation of battlefield detainees or enemy prisoners of war?

General BURGESS. Sir, there wasn't any doctrine, if you will, that was promulgated. But what I will tell you, since you picked on September 2001, is that as we stood up Guantanamo Bay, in December 2002, we pulled together across the community, across the Intelligence Community and the military, those folks who had some insights into how we would do that. I had to go back to the Vietnam War and the Korean War to find the last time we had held detainees and conducted strategic debriefing, if you will, in the numbers we were talking about, because even when we conducted Operations Desert Shield/Desert Storm, in the early 1990s, we gathered a lot of people, but we didn't do much, in terms of interrogation, before the war was over and we released. So we hadn't set up a process. So it was a re-learning experience in some cases.

Senator ALLARD. General Romig, would you characterize for us the number, just a rough estimate, of the UCMJ hearings the Army conducted during Operations Enduring Freedom or Iraqi Freedom regarding the mistreatment of enemy prisoners of war or battlefield detainees or other such prisoners? Then, the final question, where is the threshold? At what point does this trend reach such a level that the Chairman or the Secretary of Defense (SECDEF) needs to intervene?

General ROMIG. Sir, we've been tracking these since probably end of November, first part of December, all detainee abuse cases, both in Iraq and Afghanistan. We currently have about 83 cases. Twenty-two of those cases were cases that were initiated at the unit level. Somebody came forward and reported misconduct. A lot of it was low-level misconduct. Often, at the unit level, it was at roadblocks and things like that, where somebody mistreated a civilian. But we're tracking all of those. The units are handling those with a wide variety of disciplinary actions, from court-martial down through article 15 non-judicial punishment and administrative actions, reliefs, administrative eliminations from the service, and all those kinds of things. So 83 is the number we have right now, sir.

Senator ALLARD. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Lieberman.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I've been thinking—and I gave voice to this the other day in this hearing—that in our pursuit of justice for those who have committed what you, General Alexander, quite appropriately described as reprehensible acts in the prison in Iraq, which have angered, embarrassed you in the military, we in Congress, the American people, that there was a danger that people might misunderstand who has the moral high ground generally, and Iraq specifically. In my opinion, the zeal with which we pursue this wrongdoing, punish those responsible, make sure nothing like it exists anywhere else in our American military prison system, assures us and the world that we do have the moral high ground. I've worried, as I've watched the public opinion polls, with support seeming to drop in the last week for our mission in Iraq and the focus on these investigations, that there was beginning to be a blurring of that distinction.

Then we hear this story, which I assume, for the moment, is true, of al Qaeda beheading an American. There we see what is exactly the truth. We have the moral high ground in Iraq. Our enemies are the exact opposite. They are inhumane and immoral. There's not going to be any investigation by any al Qaeda legislative body of how that happened. Osama bin Laden and Zarqawi are not going to apologize to that man's family or to the American people.

I hope that this awful inhumane act brings us to clarity that what happened in that prison was wrong, that we will search it out and eliminate it, and that it does not diminish the support for our cause in Iraq, which I consider to be not only moral, but fundamental to the future security of the American people.

What's going to happen if these people, who beheaded this man, our enemies who are fighting us, force us to retreat from Iraq? Think about how they will be emboldened and how our future and the future of our children will be compromised.

In that regard, I greatly appreciated your answer to Senator McCain's question about the Geneva Conventions, we embrace it because it's the law of the land, and we believe in the rule of law, and we want our prisoners to be treated humanely.

In that regard, I want to ask you a few questions. I remain uncertain about the application of the Geneva Conventions to detainees in the prisons in Iraq. Secretary Rumsfeld testified the other day that he felt they weren't entitled to the rights under the Geneva Conventions, but they were generally going to be given them. Maybe General Romig, on behalf of JAG, if you participate in any meetings and you understand this—we understand that the people at Abu Ghraib didn't follow the Geneva Conventions, that's obviously and painfully clear. But what was the state of the understanding of the rights of those who were taken as detainees if they were not formally under the Geneva Conventions? If they were not, why weren't they?

General ROMIG. Sir, there's really two bases to say that we apply the Geneva Conventions to these folks. First is, DOD policy and Joint Chiefs of Staff instructions say, for all conflicts that we're going to be involved in, we're going to apply the Geneva Conventions, but, additionally, Geneva Conventions number four applies to the situation of an occupation or where we're running the government, and these individuals—number four is for civilians.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Right.

General ROMIG. Number four is the one that we are applying in Iraq. One of the things that we're doing, and I don't know if this is the time to do it, but I wanted to dispel the——

Senator LIEBERMAN. Forgive me——

General ROMIG. Yes, sir.

Senator LIEBERMAN.—I just wanted to make clear that you would say that all of these security detainees are entitled to rights under the Geneva Conventions—not as great as POWs, but rights, nonetheless.

General ROMIG. A sliding scale of rights, depending on what they're being detained for and—but, certainly, yes. What I was going to illustrate is, we have a procedure for detainees being brought in, in Abu Ghraib and all of the other detention facilities, where there is—first off, they have to have an apprehension form, Coalition Provisional Authority apprehension form, two sworn statements. They go through a screening process, and, within 72 hours, our magistrate cell of three to five JAGs at Abu Ghraib, do a review of the evidence to see if they're being properly detained, if there's evidence to support probable cause to believe that they've committed the offense. On top of that, we also afford them Article 78 of the Geneva Conventions number four, which requires that you apprise them of why they're being held, and an opportunity to either appeal or provide a statement. We do that for every detainee.

Senator LIEBERMAN. As far as you know, that was done, the detainees who we see humiliated and otherwise abused in those pictures?

General ROMIG. Yes, sir.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Let me ask you another kind of question, which goes to the credibility of the investigation. I know there are a lot of investigations going on. General Fay, the Inspector General, seems to be doing something, and we've asked questions here at our hearings about up the chain of command. Is there any group now investigating that question of whether there was culpability up the chain of command of the behavior that we have all been so offended by in the Abu Ghraib prison?

General ROMIG. Sir, there are two ongoing investigations. General Alexander mentioned the Procedure 15, which is looking at the MI side, but that's up the MI side of the chain, and there is an ongoing CID investigation that is looking at taking all the leads from all the interviews they do and running it wherever it might go.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Again, none of those is limited to the people seen in the pictures or in cell block 1A or even at Abu Ghraib. They're going to go as high as the investigation takes them.

General ROMIG. It depends on the evidence they develop, yes, sir.

Senator LIEBERMAN. A final question—I apologize, my time's up—what about this group Secretary Rumsfeld announced Friday, which seemed to get lost in all the news about his testimony, the commission that is headed by Secretary Schlesinger and Secretary Brown and a couple of others. Do you know what their authority is here?

General ROMIG. Sir, I do not know the authority. I've not seen their charter, but I think it is a good idea.

Senator LIEBERMAN. What do you think they're going to do?

General ROMIG. Sir, I think they're probably going to make recommendations on both detention procedures and interrogation procedures, and look at just an outside look at what we're doing.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Okay, thank you.

Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. I thank you, Senator Lieberman, for bringing out those points.

We're almost in a lock-down for getting information, subject to the completion of all these investigations, which are necessary. But I'm just concerned.

Senator Inhofe, you had some time.

Senator INHOFE. Yes, my questions were interrupted by a vote, so let me just go back and pick up where we left off.

First off, I think we concluded that in the absence of all the publicity and all of this, that the seven people who are responsible for the acts we've been talking about would have been and were being prosecuted anyway to the same degree, and then also that I believe you said my concerns should not be all that great, that because of all of this that you are inhibited in what you're able to do, in terms of your gathering intelligence information now. In other words, you're still ongoing in getting this information. Do you all agree to that?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. Okay. Now, you were here, I think, when General Taguba was testifying this morning, and I asked him a series of questions, in terms of did he really feel that the offenses, that the reprehensible acts, were confined to cell block 1A and 1B of one prison, and then, in addition to that, that we don't have any evidence that this is going on at any of the other 25 prisons. He agreed to that. Do the three of you agree with that?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. As far as you know.

General ALEXANDER. Of this sort.

General BURGESS. As far as I know.

Senator INHOFE. I think that's very important, because there's an article this morning in the Washington Post that alleged abuses like those in the prison are widespread, and not isolated, and I just think it's a bad message to send out since the message is wrong, and I wanted to hear all of you express yourselves.

Now, as far as the cell blocks 1A and B are concerned—more hard-core guys, aren't they?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. I understand that you have three categories. One was enemy POWs, one was Iraqi crimes against Iraqis, and one was Iraqi crimes against the coalition. So it is that last category where the most serious ones are, is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. Those who have great intel value, yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. Intel value, that's good. Now, something was brought up by Senator Byrd, and he was quoting from this report, and I want to clarify this, because I think it's very, very important. In fact, I was criticized. These people didn't understand what was said in the report that came from the ICRC. They talked about 70 to 90 percent of the persons were deprived of their liberty in Iraq and had been arrested by mistake. I have been told that as you arrest people, and we find out that, number one, they didn't do anything that was all that bad, and, number two, they had no value, in terms of intelligence, that there's a revolving door, they go right back out. I would suggest that this 70 to 90 percent would include all those people who were brought in, and then they found out they didn't have anything of any value to us, in terms of intelligence. Do you want to comment on that?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, the 70 to 90 percent, I don't know where we get that number, and I don't know that that is an accurate number. I do know that, just as you said, when they find they have a person who was wrongfully arrested, the intent is to get that person back out as quickly as possible.

Senator INHOFE. I think that's exactly the answer I was looking for. A lot of people out there are thinking that 90 percent of the people arrested didn't do anything, and that just flat isn't true.

Mr. Chairman, thank you very much.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe. Senator Reed?

Senator REED. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

General Alexander, when was General Fay appointed to conduct his investigation?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, the 7th of April is my understanding of the date that he was appointed, and I think that was the day after the 15-6 investigation was signed off.

Senator REED. Now, General Sanchez received a report from the ICRC in February, is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, General Sanchez's headquarters received it. I don't know when General Sanchez got it.

Senator REED. But his headquarters received it in February. Within this report, there are allegations or actually statements by the inspectors. In particular, they witnessed the practice of keeping persons deprived of their liberty, completely naked in totally empty concrete cells, in total darkness, allegedly for several consecutive days. First, that's a violation of the commander's guidance.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. That's a violation of the Geneva Conventions.

General ALEXANDER. Exactly, sir.

Senator REED. So this report is received in February.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. In this particular incident, the explanation for this behavior was because the MI officer said it was part of the process.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. From February to April—

General ALEXANDER. No, sir. Let me, if I might—

Senator REED. Go ahead, General.

General ALEXANDER. We touched on this briefly before. In the identification of who's a MI officer—

Senator REED. General, if you'll excuse me, the sequence is that the report's received by headquarters in February—

General ALEXANDER. That's correct.

Senator REED.—containing this information, which would raise, I think, serious concerns about policy, about practice, about compliance with the Geneva Conventions in the intelligence operation, regardless of who the individual is. It takes until April 4 to appoint an investigating officer.

General ALEXANDER. Sir, there's an ongoing investigation at that time, which is the Taguba investigation on that facility.

Senator REED. General Taguba testified earlier today because of his mission he was not required to, nor was he encouraged to, investigate the MI aspects. Is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. That's correct. When that was brought out—as soon as that was brought out and made public, to the best of my knowledge—you see, I did not receive a copy of the ICRC Report until this week.

Senator REED. Now, I understand from your testimony that General Karpinski received a report even before General Sanchez.

General ALEXANDER. That is correct, sir. My understanding is, she did an out-brief in November of that report, and she responded on the 24th of December with actions.

Senator REED. She did not inform General Sanchez or his headquarters of these allegations which violated his policy and which violated the Geneva Conventions?

General ALEXANDER. I do not know who—I understand, but I do not know who, other than the JAG—is my understanding is the only person who had information at the CJTF-7. But, sir, I will have to take that for the record to give you the exact answer. I do not know.

[The information referred to follows:]

Lieutenant General Sanchez can provide the most authoritative answer on when he became knowledgeable on the findings of the International Committee of the Red Cross on Abu Ghraib.

General ALEXANDER. The other part that we answered on that was, we do not know if General Karpinski started an investigation based on the incidents that were in those reports, because, as you point out, they're illegal.

Senator REED. General Burgess, the JIDC, that's a joint asset, not an Army asset, is that correct?

General BURGESS. Sir, it is joint.

Senator REED. Colonel Norton is an Army officer, former JDIC commander, Colonel Steve Norton?

General BURGESS. I'm not sure if he is an Army officer or not.

Senator REED. Do you know anything about his background, where he's served before?

General BURGESS. No, sir, I do not.

Senator REED. Were you involved with General Miller's trip, in terms of being briefed about it or being involved in his trip in August in which he talked about a different regime, if you will, in that prison?

General BURGESS. Yes, sir, I was.

Senator REED. Are you aware of the recommendations he made, including that the MP should be preparing prisoners for interrogation?

General BURGESS. Sir, when he did his report, that was provided to the theater, and it was not provided to the Joint Staff; however, I did talk to General Miller, and subsequently received a copy of that report.

Senator REED. So you were aware of the fact that he was recommending something which General Taguba had recognized as being—at least if carried out, would be violating Army regulations and maybe even implicated in the Geneva Conventions?

General BURGESS. Sir, I was aware, as I looked at what General Miller said, and I have read his report, and I have looked at slides that accompany that. I interpreted what General Miller had said in a different manner, I think, than maybe General Taguba may have, and that probably came from my working with him down at Guantanamo.

Senator REED. Did Secretary Cambone's office receive the same briefing, to your knowledge?

General BURGESS. Sir, I do not know if Secretary Cambone received it or not.

Senator REED. Who else, to your knowledge, received the briefing from General Miller about his recommendations or saw the report or slides?

General BURGESS. Sir, as far as I know, I can only confirm that General Miller's report was provided to Lieutenant General Sanchez. If it was provided higher, I'm not certain. I have slides that were prepared for the DOD, but I have not been able to confirm that they were ever presented.

Senator REED. The ROE that you have handed out, General Alexander, were they changed in any respect with respect to the Miller—

General ALEXANDER. No, sir. Those rules, as I stated, stem from our FM on interrogation operations, and so when you look at that, that manual was written in 1984, and it's consistent. So it's one that we have—

Senator REED. General Miller recommended the establishment of the theater JIDC in his report. Is that correct?

General BURGESS. Yes, sir, he did comment on that.

Senator REED. General Sanchez approved that?

General BURGESS. Sir, I would assume General Sanchez approved that, because they, in fact, formed a JIDC.

Senator REED. Can you also assume that General Sanchez approved his recommendation with respect to using MP to prepare the prisoners for interrogation?

General BURGESS. No, sir, I cannot assume that, because I have not seen any authorities or promulgation put from General Sanchez following the release of the Miller Report to him.

General ALEXANDER. Sir, may I comment on that? Because I think it's taken out of context. I know what it says, but I honestly believe that that is taken out of context. I have talked to General Miller on what he meant. I have read our doctrine from both the MP and the MI side. The part about where MP and MI have to work together for screening and for understanding the mindset of the prisoner before he's interrogated is something that we do have to closely work on, and it is something that was broken.

Senator REED. Mr. Chairman, might I ask one follow-up question?

Chairman WARNER. Yes. If I may say, you have a very important line of questioning, and you may take another minute.

Senator REED. General Alexander or General Romig, is, anywhere within the Miller report or the slides, clearly stated that the situation in Iraq is different than Guantanamo, that the Geneva Conventions applies in Guantanamo? I ask this because the interpretation of what is meant by preparing prisoners in the Guantanamo environment has a much different legal and practical connotation. In the Iraq environment, it has a much, much different connotation. It appears that the Guantanamo connotation found itself in Iraq, as prisoners were being, in this report, subject to the violations of the commander's guidance. Also the Geneva Conventions, did you see anything where it was emphasized the fact that this would be two separate situations? General Romig, I think you concur with my analysis.

General ROMIG. Yes, sir, they are two separate situations, but I did not see the slides on that, so I don't know.

Senator REED. General Alexander? General Burgess?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I've seen the slides, and, again, I've been to Guantanamo, and I talked to General Miller after his visit to Iraq. Clearly, before going to Iraq, his concern was they had enough people. Iraq was getting all the interrogators. They don't need the help. He went over there, and he saw some of the conditions in the camp—that was prior to Abu Ghraib—and he helped fix that. That was the old Camp Cropper. So one of the things that he did in his time there was, for General Sanchez, looked at what needed to be fixed in other camps, the humane treatment, and the facilities that we have at Guantanamo are an order or magnitude better than the facilities we have in Iraq. He understood that right away. Sir, he also understood that the ability to integrate intelligence into interrogations and what he called the flow of information that he had at Guantanamo does not exist in Iraq, because the system was not there to support it. All of those needed to be fixed, and those were the key things he was talking about. Nowhere—and he added a line in his report to have the legal review or recommendations to make sure what we're saying is correct. But, sir, I believe that what he said was honestly correct, and I believe that there was no intent to, as it is taken, to, quote, "soften up" prisoners for interrogation. I know it says it, and people are quoting those, but I've talked to General Miller, and I will tell you, I honestly believe that he did not say it in those manners.

Senator REED. Just a final question.

Chairman WARNER. We need to move on, Senator. I thank the Senator.

General ROMIG. Sir, if I could, there's one final point, if I could, on General Miller's—if you read his report, his primary focus was in three areas—integration, synchronization, and fusion. That's where his report went and how that comes together and works. The line on “softening up,” as I read the report, that does not come out, to me, in terms of doing that.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you. We will hopefully have General Miller before the committee at some point.

Senator COLLINS.

Senator COLLINS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Alexander and General Burgess, the February 2004 report of the ICRC states that there was a particular category of prisoners that was particularly at risk for abuse, and I want to quote to you from the report. It says that “persons deprived of their liberty under the supervision of the MI were at high risk of being subjected to a variety of harsh treatments, ranging from insults, threats, and humiliations to both physical and psychological coercion, which, in some cases, was tantamount to torture, in order to force cooperation.” That's pretty strong language, talking about prisoners who were under the control of MI being of particularly high risk.

General Alexander, you've said that this report only came to your attention, I believe you said, last week, or relatively recently. General Burgess, when did you learn of the ICRC Report? I'm talking about the February report?

General BURGESS. Yes, ma'am. Just last week.

Senator COLLINS. Shouldn't this report, with its indictment of certain MI, have been brought to your attention sooner than that? Who should have brought this to your attention, General Alexander?

General ALEXANDER. Ma'am, clearly it should be brought to the attention of the commander responsible for that theater so he can take action on it. My understanding is that the initial report did go to General Karpinski, and that she was asked to respond to that report, and did so on the 24th of December. I do not know if she, in fact, started an investigation into those, because they are serious, and I agree with you that as soon as we hear about one of those allegations an investigation should begin right away, and we shouldn't wait for it.

Senator COLLINS. I want to bring up a second issue and have all three of you comment. If a small group of guards, on their own initiative, decided to abuse their prisoners, I am very skeptical that they would have chosen bizarre sexual humiliations that were specifically designed to be particularly offensive to Muslim men. It seems to me that it is far more likely that a group of out-of-control, undisciplined guards would beat up prisoners, not strip them naked and put them in a human pyramid. That really troubles me, because it just doesn't—it implies too much knowledge of what would be particularly humiliating to these Muslim prisoners. That is why, even though I do not yet have the evidence, I cannot help but suspect that others were involved, that MI were involved, or people further up the chain of command, in suggesting to these guards specific types of abuse that were designed to break these prisoners.

I would like to ask each of you to comment on that, starting with General Alexander.

General ALEXANDER. Ma'am, your logic is correct. I think that the difficulty is to find out who told whom what to do. As you state, the soldiers that are charged are saying that, "Military intelligence told me to do this." Now, the question is, "Who?" A defense can't be, "I was told to do it by that group or that group." "Who told you?" That's really where we need to get to. Who told them to do this? Who was that individual? That is the key to all of this.

Now, in the General Taguba Report, there were three soldiers, not interrogators, who are MI analysts that were listed, and there were two contractors listed. It appears that at least one of the contractors did tell some of them some of this, but it's not clear what they said. What complicates that, as I understand it, is, some of these soldiers now that are charged have pleaded the Fifth and are not talking to the investigators to give out the rest of what they know. So we want to get exactly the facts that you're stating, because that is important to us. To fix the system, we have to know who, we have to know what they did and why they did it, and then we have to take action, hold them accountable and fix it so that it doesn't happen again. So I agree with the way that you put that out.

Senator COLLINS. General Burgess?

General BURGESS. Ma'am, what you've laid out is logical. What I would say is, I've learned, doing intelligence work, that you close no doors, you see where the threads, as I call them, will take you. But the last point I would leave you with, in my short 30 years in the military, I'm not surprised much anymore what one person will do to another person. Just dealing with things that I've had to deal with through my career, just dealing with the situations that come up. So anything is possible. I'm not condoning, not saying it's right. It's just human nature in some cases.

Senator COLLINS. General?

General ROMIG. Senator, since we have an ongoing CID investigation and pending cases, it would be inappropriate for me to comment.

Senator COLLINS. I thought you would answer that way.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Senator, it's an excellent line of questioning. We keep coming up against the following: "CENTCOM knew it, but we didn't know it," or, "investigation is going to learn the facts." We're creeping along here trying to get at these questions. At the same time, I guess we have to observe the integrity of these investigations. But I agree with you, these youngsters didn't understand the nuances of Muslim culture, who some people say staged those photographs, which I understand were going to be shown to the prisoners' families, by way of threat, unless he came forward with some valuable information. The plot is thickening.

But I'm just curious, General Alexander, you wear three stars, you're the Chief of Army Intelligence, you train all your people, you send them to the combatant commanders. It would seem to me if they are represented to have done wrong—I don't care whether it's CENTCOM, Southern Command (SOUTHCOM), European Command (EUCOM)—they should inform you promptly of what your people are doing wrong. That's my view.

Now, we turn over here to our good friend, Senator Akaka.

Senator AKAKA. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I've been asking questions about contracted personnel. General Burgess, how many U.S. contracted personnel do we have working with our MI units? The big question is, do all of these individuals have the proper security clearance?

General BURGESS. Sir, I would like to take the response to your question for the record so I can give you an exact response.

General BURGESS. We've broken the number out in terms of interrogators, linguists, and others that are providing some analytical assistance, so it actually breaks out in different ways and in three different locations. That's not—I'm talking Afghanistan, Iraq, and Guantanamo. So to give you a specific answer, I'd like to provide that to the committee.

Sir, in those cases where security clearance is required, that is written into the contract, and that is worked. There are some of the skills that we're talking about, though, depending on the category of the linguists, where different security clearances are required or may not be.

Senator AKAKA. General Burgess, it is reported that one of the two civilian contractors named in Major General Taguba's report did not have a security clearance. What are the rules regarding security clearances for contracted personnel who will be interrogating detainees?

General BURGESS. Sir, as a general rule—and I highlight “general rule”—we require at least a collateral clearance, depending on the access that the individual's going to have. However, I have asked for the specific statements of work for those contract, and have not read them yet.

Senator AKAKA. I've also read some articles on this, and would ask the question, whose responsibility is it to ensure that all of the U.S. contracted personnel have the appropriate clearances?

General BURGESS. Sir, as a general rule, that resides with the organization that “lets the contract,” and you have a contracting officer who is responsible for seeing that the contract is executed in accordance with the standards. That is normally done at the Unified Command and lower, depending upon where you're executing the contract.

Senator AKAKA. I've read some reports where the hired contractor firms claim that it is not their responsibility to do any background research or checks or investigations on any of the people they hire. Do you know that to be true?

General BURGESS. Sir, I do not know that to be true.

Senator AKAKA. Also, General Taguba's report stated that contracted personnel from third-world nations were involved in this. Do you have any comment about that?

General BURGESS. Sir, depending on your definition of third-world country, it is a true statement to say that we use foreign nationals with security clearances to do interrogations or translations.

Senator AKAKA. Can you name some of the countries that these foreign nationals are from?

General BURGESS. Sir, for example, we are using some Iraqis to do some linguist work for us, if you will, not only translation work, but also just providing those skills for the soldiers on the ground.

Senator AKAKA. What kind of training did the U.S. civilian contractors have prior to going to Iraq? I've been informed that the training for interrogators included training tactics and techniques used by other countries. Did such training occur? If so, are these tactics and techniques approved by DOD intelligence officials?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, as far as I know, they did not. The contract that I'm familiar with, the personnel who were brought on from the CACI contract were former soldiers or former U.S. who had an interrogation MOS and had been trained on the rules. Sir, as we stated earlier, they were also supposed to sign and understand the interrogation ROE.

General BURGESS. I would highlight the approaches or the interrogation techniques would still be those that are laid out in the Appendix H of the Army FM that we discussed earlier.

Senator AKAKA. Another concern I have is about records. General Burgess, who is responsible for keeping a record of all of these civilian contractors that the U.S. has in Iraq? Is this responsibility of the individual contracted firms or the DOD?

General BURGESS. Sir, I do not know the answer to that question.

Senator AKAKA. General Romig, was there any consultation between commanders—that's commanders from company, battalion, or brigade—between commanders and the command JAG regarding the treatment of detainees at Abu Ghraib?

General ROMIG. Sir, we had a JAG officer assigned to the brigade, the MI brigade. I can't tell you the day-to-day discussions, but there was a JAG officer assigned to the brigade. In addition, the MP brigade had a couple of JAG officers. As I said, there was a magistrate cell in Abu Ghraib of three to five JAG officers. So there was ample—we believe—now, having said that, we're taking a look at the resourcing and the training for our JAG and MI units to make sure we're doing it right, so we're looking at that also.

Senator AKAKA. Thank you for your responses.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator Lindsey Graham.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Hat's off to the panel. You all have done an excellent job answering a lot of questions. I think the truth is, we won't know yet. When somebody offers as a defense in a court-martial, "Someone else made me do it," it's going to take awhile to find out who that someone else is. I share Senator Collins' concern that this is probably not just six or seven people having an out-of-bounds perverted experience, it probably goes deeper. But in terms of what Senator Kennedy was asking, General Romig—is that right? Am I pronouncing your name right?

General ROMIG. Yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. I'm informed the Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act exists that would allow the Department of Justice to prosecute contractors serving overseas. Are you familiar with that?

General ROMIG. Yes, sir, that is correct.

Senator GRAHAM. I would make this invitation to you. Could you and your JAGs look at that, and maybe get the other JAGs to look at it and see if we need to improve that? Because I'm not so sure it gives us all the tools that we need, but I would appreciate it if you would do that.

General ROMIG. Yes, sir, we would look at it.

[The information referred to follows:]

Section 3266 of title 18, United States Code, enacted by the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000 (MEJA), directs the Secretary of Defense, after consultation with the Secretary of State and Attorney General, to prescribe regulations governing the apprehension, detention, delivery, and removal of persons under MEJA. The Department of Defense is currently engaged in that process. The Department is also reviewing legislation to amend MEJA. H.R. 4390 was introduced on May 19, 2004, to amend MEJA to apply to employees of contractors of other Federal agencies when their "employment relates to supporting the mission of the Department of Defense." Currently with respect to contractor employees, MEJA applies only to an employee of a Department of Defense contractor.

General ROMIG. One additional point about that. There are implementing instructions that are on the Federal Register right now that DOD has put out. Prior to that, though, the Air Force has prosecuted two cases under that act.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, and if we need to improve it and make it tighter, I would appreciate that.

General Alexander, you've been very candid. One of the things that jumps out at me about this report is that the prison is being shelled every day, it seems like. These people are in a war zone, so you could have the best-trained, highly-motivated people in the world, and this was just a tough job. But if you have poorly-trained people who were told they were going to go home, and had that yanked out from under them, and poor command, it's a cocktail for disaster. Do you agree with that?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. Part of this hearing—and I appreciate so much what the Chairman and Senator Levin have done by having these hearings—is to try to make sure that we get it right next time. Seven-hundred people guarding 7,000 at one time is not a good ratio, I don't believe. Do you have the men and women under your command necessary to, in a valid way, get MI gathered? Is it your opinion we have enough people in uniform in the Reserve component to act as MPs to prevent this problem in the future?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, that's a great question. Army transformation is at the heart of what you're getting to right now. I know that the Army leadership has been over here to brief that, but let me give it to you from my perspective, because it is important.

Today we have about 240 active duty interrogators. We will more than triple that under Army transformation and that key change and some of the other changes we make for our analysis and other areas to fight this new emerging threat is where our Army is going under that transformation, and that's very important to our country in the future.

So I would say that continue please, sir, supporting as you have that transformation process. It's vital to resolving this issue and others.

Senator GRAHAM. Chairman Warner asked a very good question in just simple terms, and give us an educated guess, because I know you don't know everything, what do you think happened in that prison between the MI community and the MPs?

General ALEXANDER. Speculation—

Senator GRAHAM. Just your gut feeling as a three-star general.

General ALEXANDER. I believe you had not only poor leadership, you had a group that were essentially leadership and controlled their environment on the midnight shift. Nobody came to check on them for periods of time and their leaders may have been absent at those times, and that other people came up and heard that some of this was going on, and they did things that were incorrect, reprehensible, and should be punished. If any leaders participated in that, they should receive the same punishment, and if anyone told them to do that, in my mind, they should receive the same punishment.

What we have to do, sir, is find out exactly who told them and what they did do, and I think that will come out.

Senator GRAHAM. One final thought. I think everyone here, Republican or Democrat, will make sure you have the resources necessary to gather intelligence in a lawful way to protect our troops to do your job, and we will look at retooling the military. We can learn from this experience.

But I would like to end on this thought. Senator Lieberman I think spoke to a lot of us here a few minutes ago. The beheading video is not only shocking, but it should be a wake-up call as to exactly who we're dealing with here. We're dealing with an enemy who has absolutely no boundaries, who's despicable in every way, and really behaves like animals in the name of God.

Our challenge as a nation, General Alexander, is to keep the fight going, vanquish this enemy, because losing is unacceptable to the international community. We learned one thing if nothing else from Hitler, one more country wasn't enough. You could never appease him, and we'll never be able to appease the folks we're fighting today. So for the international community, it is now time to join this fight. We have made mistakes, and I'll be the first to admit it, but the war itself is not a mistake. These people need to be controlled and vanquished, and in the process we need not become animals ourselves. That's what this is all about.

Mr. Chairman, I know we can do both of these things. We can vanquish this enemy and we can do it with honor, because we've done it before as a nation, just as we defeated Hitler working together, we can defeat these people. I believe that these hearings, no matter how bad it makes us look for the moment, is an opportunity for us to show the world that there is a better way, and I hope the people of Iraq will be watching and listening, because they need to have higher expectations about their future.

I appreciate you all serving our country and we will stay in touch.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator Graham, for those observations.

Senator Ben Nelson.

Senator BEN NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. We haven't ceded the moral high ground in this situation, no matter how bad the abuses are, no matter how many there were. We haven't ceded the moral high ground, no matter what we find out, as to who was involved, and as to what level. We will correct it, we'll prosecute those who have engaged in criminal acts, and we will hold everyone accountable no matter what their level of authority.

It will help remove the stain, but in the process of doing that, it's important that we don't create the opportunity for scapegoats or duck responsibility as it might be our responsibility to deal with, simply because it's painful, or it puts us all in a very difficult situation to deal with it.

So I have to ask this, General Alexander. As you look at your future investigations and current investigations, would you expect to find anything that would bear on the court-martial that are underway or about to get underway? Would there be any factual evidence that you might determine that would have any impact on those trials?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I think the one key thing that will impact that is if someone in authority told them to do what they did, that has great impact. It does not condone it, but it clearly in my opinion is a mitigating factor. We have not found that.

Senator BEN NELSON. Will you find it, or do you know whether you'll find it?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I don't know that it exists.

Senator BEN NELSON. That's what I mean. But if you don't know whether it exists, you don't know that it doesn't. I guess I certainly don't want to sweep anything aside, I don't want to put anything in limbo, but I am concerned that we're moving forward before all the investigations are complete and no one would want us to rush to judgment. It would also, I think, be inappropriate if we look like we're rushing to judgment.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir. I think the allegations, and I think this perhaps may be something that—

Senator BEN NELSON. I think you might want to pass it off to General Romig.

General ROMIG. I would say that it looks like that the cases are being moved very quickly, but you have to realize that the investigation started in mid-January, and so the chain of command has had the information as the investigation was developed.

Senator BEN NELSON. I agree. I shouldn't have used the word quickly as opposed to prematurely. That's, I think, what my concern is, and then as it relates to General Karpinski, it's my understanding that the MI may have taken over November 2003. Is that after the abuses that are in question here? I guess, General Alexander, you gave the time frame.

General ALEXANDER. Sir, she was given a report by the ICRC on November 6.

Senator BEN NELSON. About these particular abuses or the fact that there were abuses?

General ALEXANDER. About the fact that there were abuses and some of the abuses listed in there sounded the same as some of the abuses we're seeing. Now, what we have to do is get the exact dates of those. I do not have those.

Senator BEN NELSON. Would this have been by the midnight shift?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator BEN NELSON. These abuses?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir. My understanding, because when you read in the ICRC, that one statement, you immediately think of that one picture, at least I do. Now, that report was given to her on 6 November, and as I said, the Fragmentary Order (FRAGO) took place on 19 November.

Senator BEN NELSON. Do we have any explanation from General Sanchez about why he interrupted the command by putting Colonel Pappas in place to deal with both the intelligence, and force protection side?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, it was just as you say. That General Sanchez wanted Colonel Pappas to move his headquarters to Abu Ghraib and take charge of the force protection. As was pointed out earlier, they were receiving artillery or mortar fire. People were getting shot. The facility is not being policed, and going along with the initiatives as quickly as he wants to. The MP battalion commander on the ground was not making that headway. He felt that by putting one of his senior commanders there, moving Pappas up to do that and putting him in charge of that, it was the correct thing to do for the soldiers and the detainees. So that is why I believe he made that decision.

Senator BEN NELSON. General Burgess, I'm sure you're familiar with the term, rendering detainees or prisoners in terms of shifting them off to other locations, other governments for intelligence-gathering purposes?

General BURGESS. Yes, sir, I am aware of the term rendering.

Senator BEN NELSON. Do you know of any instances where we've participated in that by sending any detainees or anyone within our custody to another country for any other purpose or any purpose?

General BURGESS. Sir, I am aware that we have currently kept individuals under U.S. Government control in terms of conducting interrogations. I am familiar, but it would not be appropriate to go into in this session and could discuss with the leadership another particular case, but it would not be appropriate here.

Senator BEN NELSON. I wouldn't want you to go into it, but you are aware it might be something we could take up in a secure environment?

General BURGESS. Yes, sir, but—yes, sir. That's all I'll say about it here.

Senator BEN NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Talent.

Senator TALENT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I had one question for General Romig. Before that, I'll comment on something Senator Collins said. I understand her saying that it's hard to believe how these enlisted soldiers would have known that this was the way to humiliate these particular prisoners. That actually is less of a question mark in my mind. Anybody who's worked in the civilian prison system or is relying on anybody who has, knows something about Islam, that's not uncommon, and I would think know something about how to humiliate people too, because unfortunately, that's not uncommon in the civilian prison system.

What is inexplicable to me, and I'd appreciate your comment even if you're going over old ground, is where the officers of this brigade were. If I ask myself what is unusual, truly incomprehensible about the conduct of these enlisted people is that they would have done this to this scale and with this documentation without having asked the officers in their direct line of command whether they should do it.

Now, maybe you know this and are not commenting on it because it's part of the cases, I don't know, but that to me is the true question mark here, because I'm not used to an Army operation where there seems to be such an abdication of the first rule of a chain of command, which is to know what is going on with those immediately beneath you. General, if you want to comment, go ahead.

General ROMIG. Senator, as you point out, it would be inappropriate with an ongoing investigation and criminal cases moving forward for me to comment on that.

Senator TALENT. This is the crux of what, at the appropriate time, I want to know about this, because I agree with you, General Burgess, that people can be pretty inventive even on their own in figuring out ways to do the wrong thing. But for them to take this on their own responsibility just seems to me to be extremely unlikely, and the natural place they would have gone to check this out is their own chain of command, not somebody in MI.

General ROMIG, let me ask you a question that I raised with the panel this morning, and you can just maybe enlighten me because another side of this is, why, once General Taguba issued his report, it took so long to work its way up the upper level of the chain of command, and of course, everybody is talking about command influence, which I know is an issue. Now, could we maybe deal with this in the future by having a separate line apart from the chain of command for the purposes of court-martial and the UCMJ where you can report a special interest case? In other words, get it to the top through a separate line? I'm told the Air Force has this kind of an office. Are you aware of that? I have an all-green panel here so maybe you're not, but I mean, are you aware of that? Is this something the Army could look into?

General ROMIG. Sir, I'm not sure what you're exactly referring to.

Senator TALENT. It's called the Reporting Office on Special Interest Cases, and what I'm told is that you can go to this office if you think the case has some interest beyond the particular case for the policy of the Air Force, and you don't have to worry about command influence, because this office is not in the chain of command for those purposes.

General ROMIG. There's a difference, I guess, between reporting, which this was reported up, we knew about it in January, versus having the entire report up with all, as I've heard, 6,000 pages if you count the annexes. It's not necessary, I don't think, to have a full report if you're apprised of what's in the report, and that occurred much earlier. But this is something we ought to look at, you're right.

Senator TALENT. Yes, because if the higher level officers are caught between their responsibilities from a command influence standpoint and their desire to expedite this up the chain because of the effect on the mission and the strategy, then maybe we can do something to free them from that conflict.

General ROMIG. That's something that should be looked at, you're right, sir.

Senator TALENT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. I thank you. We have to look at that. If you could take that on yourself to look at that situation—

Senator TALENT. We're looking at it in my office, Mr. Chairman. I'll talk to the staff of the committee about it too.

Chairman WARNER. When you sit here and say you knew about it in January, did you blow some whistles and alert people that we have a problem?

General ROMIG. Sir, I did not see the videos or the photos, but I knew of the case and that it was going to be a nasty case, had meetings with the Vice Chief of Staff and other leadership in the Army, so we were working the issue. But this was also—

Chairman WARNER. As early as January?

General ROMIG. Mid- to late-January, yes, sir. This was also in the context of tracking all the detainee abuses, which we started well before this.

Senator TALENT. Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, I asked Secretary Cambone this morning, and I think that what I can sense that those at the top level saw this as a UCMJ-type situation and their command influence protocols cut in in their own minds, and they said, okay, we have to go by the book on this because we don't want to prejudice the prosecution, which is understandable, because you know how that's drilled into them. So maybe some separate reporting-type situation where we'd have people who would be more free to really rattle everybody's cage about it is the way we need to—we will look into it, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Yes, some assessment as to how it affects American, overall foreign policy, everything. We now have Senator Pryor.

Senator PRYOR. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. General Romig, I want to follow up if I may on Senator Graham's and also Senator Akaka's questions about contractors, and specifically, just for clarification, in your view, what rule of law applies to these civilian contractors?

General ROMIG. It depends on what they do. If they have committed an offense that, for example, a homicide or a serious assault, maiming of somebody, these would be prosecuted under Federal law, under the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act, brought back to the United States and prosecuted in Federal courts.

Senator PRYOR. By the Department of Justice?

General ROMIG. Yes, sir.

Senator PRYOR. Do you happen to know how many contractors were involved in this prison? Do you know how many—

General ROMIG. Sir, I have no idea.

Senator PRYOR. Do you?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir. There were 29 as I understand it, 8 interrogators, 10 screeners, 9 analysts, and 2 reports writers, so 29.

Senator PRYOR. So 29 civilian contractors?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator PRYOR. Were they all with the same company or is that different companies?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, they were all with the same company. Now, those were the interrogators. There was also a linguist contract under another contractor type.

Senator PRYOR. Who had the bigger—the 29, who had that contract?

General ALEXANDER. That was CACI, sir.

Senator PRYOR. Okay. Who was the commanding officer there at the prison?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, right now today—

Senator PRYOR. No, who was it at the time?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, that was the report, so I want to make sure I answer this exactly correct. After 19 November, Colonel Pappas was the FOB commander. Prior to that, it was Lieutenant Colonel Phillabaum, who ran Abu Ghraib for the 800th MPs, and that was under General Karpinski.

Senator PRYOR. Great. General Alexander, you have mentioned, I think almost all witnesses have mentioned, discipline and leadership. Is it your conclusion that part of the problem there with the discipline and the leadership is the failure to train or is it the failure to screen? Where does this start to break down?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I can tell you from my experience when I was a lieutenant, one of the first things my platoon sergeants taught me to do was to visit the billets at all times day and night, so that's one of the first things you learn as a lieutenant is to go and see what your troops are doing day and night. We did that in Germany because of drug problems back then.

I think right there the question is, where was the leadership on the night shift? When did they come by and visit? That is, when people refer to a breakdown in the leadership, that's what forms in my mind.

Senator PRYOR. Does that go for training as well?

General ALEXANDER. Absolutely, sir. In training, it is laid out both in the CJTF orders about make sure your soldiers are trained on the humane treatment. That's specific in the orders. Sir, I think it was pointed out earlier that this was an internment, this is the duty of this unit. This was something that you are trained to do. That is the first basic thing that all noncommissioned officers and junior leaders know to do, and I can't answer why it was not done.

Senator PRYOR. Let me ask one last question or one last line of questions, and that is, understandably, in the last few days we've been very focused on the conditions in the prison itself. There have been some question today and previously about the qualifications for getting yourself into this prison, and we've talked about that a little bit. There's this ICRC Report that 70 to 90 percent were wrongly arrested and detained. We can—we don't know all the background on that, so I'm not going to ask about that. But my question is, once they're in the prison, from that point, where do they go? If you're going to prosecute these people or whatever decision you make, where do they go from here?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, the facility that is there at Abu Ghraib—and I'll let General Burgess add in here if I state anything incorrectly—has three areas, a general detainee population area, an Iraqi criminal area, and then this JIDC. The general population is where most everyone is brought in who is captured by our troops who are doing something against our soldiers or we believe, or against Iraqi civilians. The criminals are the ones who are brought in for criminal acts, and that is now under Iraqi control.

The JIDC is where personnel who are of intelligence value are placed because they either participated in an act against our forces or know something that is important for the priority information requirements that the commanders have.

Senator PRYOR. There's a report, and forgive me, but I can't remember if it's in The Washington Post or exactly where I saw it, that talks about, it says the Americans have established a secret court. I was curious about this central criminal court of Iraq and what exactly is that and how does that work. I assume some of these prisoners there would be tried in that court. Could you elaborate on that?

General ALEXANDER. I guess it's a secret court because I'm not aware of it, sir, I really, truly am not.

General ROMIG. Sir, that's—I wouldn't really characterize it as a secret court. It's a court that functions within Iraq for criminal cases, serious criminal cases. One of the things, sir, I wanted to point out was that these individuals undergo a 6-month review. If the feeling is we need to continue to detain them, at the 6-month mark, a review and appeals panel reviews and makes recommendations for their release if they feel they should be released. That goes up to Baghdad to an appeals board that is chaired by some very senior officers.

Senator PRYOR. Thank you. Mr. Chairman, that's all I have.

Senator SESSIONS [presiding]. I'm proud to be a representative of the people in a country that takes these things seriously, that believes in truth and facts, honor and duty, and responsibility, and we're all humans and we frequently all of us fail. There have been some failures here. We're going to get to the bottom of it, and I appreciate your candor, all three of you, as we go forward, and I most of all appreciate the great service of our soldiers under very stressful conditions at this very moment, because this Senate and this Congress voted to send them there by a three-fourths majority vote. If anybody thought that everything was going to go smoothly, they're not worthy of the office of United States Senator, because anybody that knows history knows that there will be problems.

But we don't believe in them, we believe in eliminating them, and I'm just proud of the way you've responded to date. The beheading that we hear about, I pray it's not true. If it is true, it would not be untypical of what we're seeing in the enemy that we're facing. They are not going to have their own internal inquiries and they're not going to condemn these actions because they justify these actions and they believe in them.

One of the things I think it's important for us to remember and I just want to get straight, maybe General Alexander, of this MP unit, is even last year four members were submitted to court-martial for abusive procedures, were they not?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I'm not aware of that.

General ROMIG. That may be correct, sir. I'd have to double check.

Senator SESSIONS. I think it's in the report, referred for court-martial. I'm not sure how that came out, but they were disciplined for abusing prisoners last year, which means, number one, I'm glad somebody in the unit took charge of it, number two, the military's not tolerating this. I have not forgotten a very fine brigade commander who, in a combat situation, lost his discipline and fired a gun by an Iraqi's head, thinking he had to have information. He was removed from the service, basically, and a spotless record otherwise, because the military did not tolerate this kind of activity.

I'm also aware that within 1 day of this specialist, not an officer, a specialist coming forward, an investigation was opened under the CID. General Romig, that's what you do to prosecute people, take them to court-martial and put them in jail with, is it not?

General ROMIG. Yes, sir.

Senator SESSIONS. So that was commenced the next day. Can you tell me, any of you, about the suspensions? I know we've talked about the Brigadier General in charge of the brigade, but there's been some actions within a few days of this report to actually remove people from their official position, not privates, not people out there at the lowest level who were in the photographs, but officers of substantial rank. What can you tell me about that, General Romig?

General ROMIG. Yes, sir. The battalion commander received a general officer memorandum of reprimand and was relieved for cause.

Senator SESSIONS. Within a week perhaps?

General ROMIG. Sir, I could get the time frame. I just don't have it in front of me.

Senator SESSIONS. It was a short period of time, as I recall.

General ROMIG. Yes, sir. After a chance for the command to review the evidence and the facts. There are a number of folks that they're waiting for their rebuttal on their general officer memorandum of reprimand. An operations sergeant major was relieved with a general officer memorandum of reprimand, so there were a number of actions taken, and all of these are very significant actions to a person's career obviously.

Senator SESSIONS. That was long before any news media, any Congress got involved in this. Sometimes I think this Congress reminds me, in this instance particularly, of the little dog that chases an automobile down the road barking and thinks it ran the automobile off. Like we were demanding you do something, you've already done it.

Let me ask about this MP situation, General Alexander, and I think it was somewhat confusing about the chain of command and the orders. As I understand, Senator Levin indicated there was some evidence. I think as the good lawyer he is, he was correct. There was some evidence that perhaps MI personnel had done wrong. Is it your opinion that there was not persuasive evidence, and if not, why?

Let me just ask you, are you saying to us that you were not persuaded by the evidence that you've seen to date that any of these MI people authorized anything like this?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, that is a good statement and I appreciate the opportunity to clear it up, because I have not seen any indications that a person in the intelligence chain of command told them to take these activities on. There are numerous statements, as you point out, that allege MI officers, which could be any of the people there, told them to do this. We need to find out the specifics and the facts of that, wherever that may lead this.

Senator SESSIONS. I agree with that. We need to follow that up where it leads. I will say, as a person who's been involved in prosecutions for over 15 years, in fact, they didn't get any names and specific allegations, and I believe the phrase was insinuated, that these officers insinuated this or that does cause me some concern. If somebody had told me to do something and you were complaining to me about it, I'd say this person told me to do it and I'd give the name.

But I think we do need to follow that up. I don't believe that the MI deserves any pass on this in terms of an investigation, I don't think you do. I do think it's quite possible that an MP working in that prison, if they had been, if it had been suggested they do these kind of things, may have felt they had some authority or ability to do so.

Senator BILL NELSON. Senator Sessions?

Senator SESSIONS. Can you share any more with us on that?

Senator BILL NELSON. Did you know we're in a vote and we have 3 minutes left?

Senator SESSIONS. I did not, and my time just ended 1 minute ago.

Senator BILL NELSON. I need to go and vote.

Senator SESSIONS. I do too.

Senator BILL NELSON. So if you're chairing the meeting, would you recess it until we can get back?

Senator SESSIONS. Senator Nelson, that is a brilliant suggestion.

Senator LEVIN. Mr. Chairman?

Senator SESSIONS. Oh, Senator Levin, you want to chair it for us?

Senator LEVIN. There's someone else coming back here as well, so we'll keep it going if that's all right with you.

Senator SESSIONS. I would just try to follow up on that. I think we need to know that. I think we need to know if there were any suggestions that, going beyond these interrogation ROE, which I think makes sense, occurred. Also, I'm aware, General Alexander, that this was a dangerous place to be, and our soldiers were at great risk, and this Congress, we're on the top defense officials and military people to get more intelligence, because we said repeatedly good intelligence saves lives, and so I know there's a great pressure on.

Are you satisfied now that since January and since these things have arisen that we've gotten our people back on the right side of that line if they ever got across of it? Are they clearly informed now where the line is, what is legitimate for them to do in interrogation, and are they on the right side of it?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir. I am convinced we have taken those actions.

Senator SESSIONS. It seems to me we have at least five investigations ongoing on policies. Our policies are being reemphasized and I think we're on the right track, and I believe that is what a good nation does that has high ideals. If they mess up, they get themselves straight, but we don't give up on the mission that we're undertaking, which is noble and honorable and going to be a great improvement for the lives of the people of Iraq. Senator Levin.

Senator LEVIN. Thank you. I was going to have some additional questions in the second round.

Senator SESSIONS. You're available to commence the questioning if you would like.

Senator LEVIN. We might as well start a second round before the first round is over and save some time later on, if that's all right with you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator SESSIONS. I think it makes sense.

Senator LEVIN. Thank you. First of all, let me ask you, General Romig, about this interrogation ROE that require the commanding general's approval. In your opinion, are those actions and activities, including stress positions, sensory deprivation, and so forth, consistent—not consistent with—would the Geneva Conventions say that those are okay?

General ROMIG. Sir, this is the first that I've seen of these. They were—the legal review, as I understand, was done down at CJTF—

7, but if I'm not mistaken, these are taken out of your FM, is that correct?

Senator LEVIN. Could you tell us which FM that is? We're having trouble finding that FM. What's the date of it, that field manual?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, it's FM 34-52.

Senator LEVIN. What's the date of that?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, it's 1984, I believe. No, 1992, I'm sorry.

Senator LEVIN. What page are you on?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I'm on the date where these are, they're on 3-16 roughly.

Senator LEVIN. So those specific items are listed in that FM?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

General ROMIG. Sir, the point I was going to make is those get an exhaustive legal review to ensure that they're appropriate and consistent with the conventions, international conventions, the field manuals do.

Senator LEVIN. That protected persons under the Geneva Conventions can be subjected to these, is that what you're saying, General?

General ROMIG. Again, sir, I have to fall back on the prior legal review that was much more exhaustive than my taking a look at right now, and saying that if that's the case, yes, I would concur with that.

Senator LEVIN. General Alexander, can you tell us who the lawyer was who said that these items are consistent for protected persons, that these are allowed to be applied to protected persons under the Geneva Conventions?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I don't know the lawyer's name on that. I do know that that was done, as General Romig said, at CJTF-7. It is consistent with our FMs, so I don't know who, which lawyer at CJTF-7, but we can take that for the record.

[The information referred to follows:]

The Interrogation Rules of Engagement Chart was prepared by the officer-in-charge of interrogation operations at Abu Ghraib prison. It was intended as a graphic aid to assist interrogators in determining what interrogation approaches they could or could not use without higher approval. It was informally reviewed by the 205th Brigade Judge Advocate and attorneys assigned to the Office of the Staff Judge Advocate, CJTF-7.

Senator LEVIN. That would be within the last year or so?

General ALEXANDER. Yes. That part there where these are laid out are also laid out in the guidance from CTJF-7 on their interrogation operations.

Senator LEVIN. So this would be within the last how many months?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, those came out when the CJTF was stood up in July, and we have copies of those and their standing orders that came out.

Senator LEVIN. Just so I can be real clear again, that FM specifically lists these items with the same words?

General ALEXANDER. No, sir. In fact, I'll give you the manual, a copy of the manual to leave here with the committee.

Senator LEVIN. That would be very helpful, but my question is, does the FM say specifically that you can apply stress for up to 45 minutes?

General ALEXANDER. No, sir, it does not say you can apply stress up to 45 minutes. It says on here, and this is where the lawyers have to get involved, just as you say, sir, and I understand you're a lawyer, so I feel I'm on the short end of the stick.

Senator LEVIN. No, no, I won't either use that or misuse that. I'm not sure it's even a plus.

General ALEXANDER. What it says here in the manual is that you can't use stress positions for a prolonged period of time is exactly what it says.

Senator LEVIN. So that's been interpreted by a lawyer to mean up to 45 minutes?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. Unless you get something approved in writing and then it says sleep management, and what are the words in the manual, about 72 hours without sleep?

General ALEXANDER. It says abnormal sleep deprivation, examples of mental torture include abnormal sleep deprivation. I understand that at the general counsel's, as they convene to look at what sleep deprivation, and again, that would go on, but they looked at exactly, okay, so what is sleep deprivation, is that 16 hours in a day, and so they went through that and those are the periods, and you can see that because those have caveats in the FM, those are the ones that General Sanchez personally had to get involved with.

Senator LEVIN. No, I understand that, that's if it's more than 72 hours, but I'm talking about the——

General ALEXANDER. Sir, it says 72 hours——

Senator LEVIN. You're correct. What are the words in the manual about sleep management or sleep——

General ALEXANDER. Abnormal sleep deprivation.

Senator LEVIN. So have you seen the legal opinion that interprets that to mean you can do sleep management up to 3 days with the commanding general's approval?

General ALEXANDER. No, sir, I have not seen the legal opinion——

Senator LEVIN. That supports that.

General ALEXANDER. That supports it exactly like that, but I do know that both they and a larger one was done for the DOD.

Senator LEVIN. All right. If you could get that for us, I'd appreciate it. Have you seen that, General Romig?

General ROMIG. No, I have not, sir.

[The information referred to follows:]

"Sleep deprivation" is not an approved interrogation technique in U.S. Army Field Manual 34-52. In January 2003, the Secretary of Defense directed the DOD General Counsel to establish a working group to review various interrogation techniques for use in operations at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The concept of "sleep deprivation" as an interrogation technique was addressed in the Working Group. Their analysis, however, was limited to possible techniques for use on unlawful combatants in Guantanamo. It did not address operations in Iraq. After considering the Working Group Report, the Secretary of Defense approved interrogation procedures in April 2003 that did not include "sleep deprivation." As previously noted, the chart prepared at Abu Ghraib prison was informally reviewed by the 205th Brigade Judge Advocate. I have been informed that sleep deprivation, or "sleep management" as it is delineated on the chart, was never requested nor approved for use by the Commanding General, CJTF-7.

Senator LEVIN. Thank you. Now, on the ROE, this document here, it's been declassified, in effect, I guess, since the charts have been used already. Apparently CENTCOM did not approve the initial draft of these ROE. Do you know anything about that?

General ALEXANDER. No, sir.

Senator LEVIN. The ICRC report, page 3.2, called MI section, and paragraph 27 under that section says the following, that: "the ICRC visited people at the Abu Ghraib correctional facility. They witnessed the practice of keeping persons deprived of their liberty, completely naked in totally empty concrete cells and in total darkness allegedly for several consecutive days. Upon witnessing such cases, the ICRC interrupted its visits and requested an explanation from the authorities. The military intelligence officer in charge of the interrogation explained that this practice was 'part of the process.'"

Did you see this before I just read it to you?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. Does that trouble you?

General ALEXANDER. Absolutely, sir.

Senator LEVIN. Would that be evidence that the MI officer in charge of interrogation had something to do with this process?

General ALEXANDER. Clearly, that's one of the individuals we would like to know who that was, specifically what is his name or her name so that we can take action. Sir, you point out a good question, a good point. As soon as we know that, we should begin an investigation.

Senator LEVIN. No, you should begin an investigation to find that out.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. That's a lot different. You said as soon as you know that you should begin an investigation. I would hope you're investigating to find out who these folks are. There's all kinds of evidence that MI is involved here. We have the statements in General Taguba's report over and over again referring to MI people. Sergeant Davis stated he'd heard MI insinuate to the guards to abuse them. When he said, what did MI say, he said, loosen this guy up, make sure he had a bad night. The rest of the wings, according to this witness, are regular prisoners and 1A, 1B, are MI holds. Was that your understanding that 1A and 1B are MI holds?

General ALEXANDER. That's my understanding, yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. Does anybody here on this panel know what Secretary Rumsfeld meant when he said the Geneva Conventions did not apply precisely to Iraq? That's clearly the context that he was referring to on that date, back on May 5.

Secretary Rumsfeld Interview with Matt Lauer NBC "Today"

MATT LAUER: Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld is at the Pentagon this morning.

Mr. Secretary, good morning to you. Thanks for joining us.

RUMSFELD: Good morning.

LAUER: I don't know if you were able to hear Senator Biden as he was talking just now. I know you were just sitting down. But he basically says he wants to know what did you know and when did you know it. When did you find out about the abuses taking place at Abu Ghraib prison?

RUMSFELD: The first indication that the Department of Defense received was, I believe, on January 13th, when a soldier who saw some abuses taking place, apparently, reported them up his chain of command to his superior out there in Baghdad area. And the Central Command, the United States military command there, made an announcement to the world January 16th indicating that the charges of abuses had been made and that an investigation had been initiated by General Sanchez.

LAUER: And the investigation – the report by General Taguba was completed – the date I have is March 9th. And yet, when questions really started to be asked about this last week, General Myers, General Kimmitt, I asked, and you, as of yesterday, said you have not yet read the full report on this, and from what I understand from your comments, hadn't seen the pictures of this abuse until they aired on CBS last week. Why did it take so long for a report of such gravity to make its way up the chain of command?

RUMSFELD: Well, first of all, the report, as I understand it, is a stack of a report coupled with a whole series of annexes. And so when I'm asked a question as to whether I've read the entire report, I answer honestly that I have not. It is a mountain of paper and investigative material. Second –

LAUER: But in general terms, were you aware –

RUMSFELD: Just a minute. Just a minute.

LAUER: -- of the abuses taking place prior to that?

RUMSFELD: Just a minute. I'm going to respond to your question.

Second, the report and the information was part of a criminal investigation. And when there's a criminal investigation, as you know, whether it's in the military or outside the military, those things are managed in a prosecution or prosecutorial mode, and the materials are pretty much kept within that chain.

Third, the information about the abuse led to the investigations from a management standpoint that were initiated almost immediately, and then sequentially thereafter to the point that there are six different aspects of it that have been looked into.

The system worked. And it was announced publicly. There was no secret about it. They went right before the world in Iraq and told the Iraqi people, the American people, everyone, "Be on notice. There have been these charges made." So it worked.

LAUER: When you say the system worked, you're talking about the system of investigation. Clearly there are parts of the system in place in the prisons in Iraq that are broken. The military report calls these incidents, quote, "horrific abuses."

RUMSFELD: Indeed.

LAUER: It continues to say they were, quote, "wanton acts of soldiers in an unsupervised and dangerous setting." So who, Mr. Secretary, is ultimately responsible for that unsupervised and dangerous setting?

RUMSFELD: Well, clearly it's the United States Army and the Central Command have the responsibility for the management of the prisons in that part of the world. And they are determining responsibility at the present time. And there have already been some criminal actions undertaken.

LAUER: Reserve Brigadier General Janis Karpinski has said - and she's the person who was in charge of the prisons in Iraq - and she said that the cell block where these abuses took place at Abu Ghraib was off-limits to everyone, including her. Again, she's in charge of the prisons there. She's a general. How could that be?

RUMSFELD: There's two aspects to the facility there at Abu Ghraib. One aspect, of course, is detention. It's keeping people off the street so that they can't go out and commit a criminal act.

A second aspect is interrogation, and it's asking people questions to try to glean information that can save the lives of American soldiers in Iraq. And one aspect of it is handled by the people who handle detention and another aspect is handled by the people who handle the process of asking questions to try to save the lives of American soldiers.

LAUER: But can the people who handled the asking questions aspect of it really tell a brigadier general that she cannot have any access to that cell block?

RUMSFELD: Those are legal questions that are being studied in the investigation and determined to try to assess responsibility and culpability.

LAUER: Let me read you something from the Washington Post in their editorial this morning. It says, quote, "A pattern of arrogant disregard for the protections of the Geneva Conventions or any other legal procedure has been set from the top by Mr. Rumsfeld and senior U.S. commanders." What's your response to that?

RUMSFELD: Well, it's not accurate. The fact of the matter is that from the very outset, the decision was made by the government of the United States that the people detained would not be treated in a manner that was - (correction?). The decision was made that the Geneva Convention did not apply precisely but that every individual would be treated as though the Geneva Convention did apply. And as a result, the provisions of the Geneva Convention were the basic rules under which all people were detained. So it would not be accurate to say what that editorial said.

LAUER: When you said, though, in February of 2002, and I'm quoting, "The set of facts that exist today with the al Qaeda and the Taliban were not necessarily the set of facts that were considered when the Geneva Convention was fashioned" - again, in February 2002 - by questioning the relevance of the Geneva Convention in certain circumstances, with al Qaeda and the Taliban, have you laid the foundation for the atmosphere in which these abuses may have occurred?

RUMSFELD: Certainly not, because in close proximity to what you quoted, I think you'll find the statement I just made, that the United States government, the lawyers, made a conscious decision and announced it to the world and announced it to all the people engaged in the detention process that these people would, in fact, be treated as though the Geneva Convention did apply.

LAUER: When the president went to Iraq, he took the moral high ground. He said, "Look, Saddam Hussein is abusing and torturing the Iraqi people. We can provide a country where the Iraqis don't have to live in fear." You've talked about the war of ideas. How do these photos, how do these incidents, impact that war of ideas?

RUMSFELD: Harmful.

LAUER: Just one word?

RUMSFELD: Well, I've responded. I don't know what else one can say. There's no question that when any citizen, soldier or civilian, breaks the law, abuses people in a manner that's inconsistent with the way people are trained and taught and with the way decent human beings behave, then that's harmful to the United States.

LAUER: Real quickly, Mr. Secretary, if you will, would you support a congressional hearing into this? Would you testify before that hearing? And would you issue a formal apology to the Iraqi people for these abuses?

RUMSFELD: Well, anyone who sees the photographs does, in fact, apologize to the people who were abused. That is wrong. It shouldn't have happened. It's un-American. It's unacceptable. And we all know that. And that apology is there to any individual who was abused. It seems to me that these things have occurred. The task for me, as the responsible person in the Department of Defense, is to see that if it's an isolated instance that it's punished under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. If it's systemic, if there's something broader than that, obviously we have to undertake the kinds of investigations we're taking to see if other individuals conceivably have behaved that way.

LAUER: And real quickly - I've only got 10 seconds left, Mr. Secretary - you say if it's an isolated incident. There are some 20 other investigations ongoing now about possible cases of abuse. Are you convinced it's an isolated incident?

RUMSFELD: Of course not. We wouldn't be conducting these investigations if we thought we knew the answers. We don't know the answers. And that's why, starting last January, at the first indication of this, these investigations were initiated.

LAUER: Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld. Mr. Secretary, I appreciate your time this morning.

RUMSFELD: You bet.

Senator LEVIN. Do any of you know what he meant? General Romig?

General ROMIG. No, sir. I did not hear that quote, but I do not know what he meant either. I do know that I had a discussion with some folks at DOD a day ago, and their view was, DOD general counsel, that it did apply.

Senator LEVIN. But in your judgment, does the Geneva Conventions apply precisely to Iraq?

General ROMIG. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. General Alexander, do you know what the SECDEF possibly is referring to in the month of May of this year? He says the Geneva Conventions do not apply precisely. Do you have any idea what he could be referring to?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I did not hear the context of what he said, so, sir, I can't comment on that.

Senator LEVIN. Can I ask one more question?

Chairman WARNER [presiding]. Sure.

Senator LEVIN. I will ask you, General Burgess, do you know what the SECDEF meant?

General BURGESS. No, sir, I do not.

Senator LEVIN. Secretary Cambone could not tell us either this morning. He said he would try to find that out, but it's pretty significant when the SECDEF does not even—or put it this way, states with great ambiguity and confusion what the rule of law is relative to the treatment of prisoners in Iraq. You can understand, it seems to me, how that confusion could filter down to the lowest levels.

Now, there was an order on November 19, 2003, effective immediately, commander of the 205th MI brigade assumes responsibility for the Baghdad confinement facility and is appointed FOB commander. So the commander on November 19 of that facility is the commander of the MI brigade. So those MPs are taking orders, at least on one chain of command, from the head of the MI brigade. Is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir, for the security, as I understand it, for the security of the facility and for the initiatives that General Sanchez had to fix it up.

Senator LEVIN. But that's their mission, is it not?

General ALEXANDER. But it was not for the detainee operations. As I understood, that stayed with the MPs, but that's something that has to be clarified, and we need to get you that.

Senator LEVIN. You're saying that the what of the—General ALEXANDER. The security of the detainees, which is inherently an MP mission, stayed with the MPs, as I understand it. There's two parts, sir, if I could just add to this. I think the timing of the date is also important, and the reason I bring up the timing is the 19th, the first ICRC report that went to General Karpinski happened on the 6th, so I believe that what General Sanchez was doing was to try to fix the force protection issues at that FOB.

Senator LEVIN. Let me read you the last line. It says, "units currently at Abu Ghraib are TACON to the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade for security of detainees." That's what it says. So they're taking orders, those MPs are taking orders relative to the security of detainees from the commander of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade, are they not?

General ALEXANDER. On the 19th—

Senator LEVIN. And after the 19th.

General ALEXANDER. After November 19, yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. So that's who they're getting orders from. So why is there any doubt in your mind that we ought to go to the—up that chain of command to find out how it is that these MPs were performing these actions without the knowledge, control, of the people in their chain of command, which is the MI brigade commander. That's the right person to look to, isn't it?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir, if they occurred after the 19th.

Senator LEVIN. Of course.

General ALEXANDER. If they occurred before, and we have indications that at least the ICRC report was given to General Karpinski on the 6th, and those took place in October, so that's where the difference is.

Senator LEVIN. After the 19th—

General ALEXANDER. Absolutely.

Senator LEVIN.—that's where you look.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. To the MI brigade commander before the 19th otherwise. Got you.

Chairman WARNER. You're next, Senator, but let me just finish up the colloquy that the Senator and I were having here before you arrived. That FRAGO of the 19th was the subject of a lot of discussion. It was issued by General Abizaid, is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. No, General Sanchez.

Chairman WARNER. Which he had perfect right to do it. What concerns me is were you asked to chop on it, because you're looking at the worldwide picture, you're looking at all of the combatant commanders. You're looking at SOUTHCOM, which is running the Guantanamo operation and if this departed from what you're doing in other commands, it seems to me that's troublesome.

General ALEXANDER. Sir, it actually was consistent as a matter of fact with what was done during Panama—or excuse me, during Haiti.

Chairman WARNER. During Haiti?

General ALEXANDER. Yes. In Haiti, the battalion commander had responsibility over that prison facility and the MPs there.

Now, you asked the question of why did General Sanchez not chop that through me. But, sir, it would not normally come back to the Department, because we aren't in that chain per se.

Chairman WARNER. I know people are ducking and running from that chain, but you're the chief of intelligence, you're the Lieutenant General, you're looking after all your people all over the world, you train them. It seems to me the combatant commanders should have an affirmative responsibility to keep you informed about your sphere of responsibility in the Department of the Army. The ICRC Report went into details about allegations of your people performing acts inconsistent with law and regulation, am I not correct?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. That should have been brought immediately to your attention in my judgment, whether it's CENTCOM, SOUTHCOM, PACOM, or whatever command it is. But it's not the case, that is not the procedure?

General ALEXANDER. That's correct, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Then this committee's going to look into that, because we cannot have these—I call them symptoms—out here, which I understand we put them together in Goldwater-Nickles operating in such a manner that headquarters here in Washington with individuals of your rank in important positions having overall examination throughout the whole of the globe not knowing about it. For example, General Fast. This committee was asked to expedite her promotion from one star to two stars, and literally we agreed to have her jump over ahead of others who were in the normal order of promotion to two stars. I met her over there on my trip this summer and I was impressed. Now, she was the J-2 officer for General Abizaid, is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. General Sanchez, sir.

Chairman WARNER. I mean General Sanchez, I understand that. Does she keep you informed as a part of her responsibility of what's going on in that command?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, clearly we talk a lot, we do.

Chairman WARNER. But is there any formality by which she has an obligation to keep you advised?

General ALEXANDER. No obligation, sir, other than in terms of resources, outfitting, and training, we clearly have that responsibility, and for policies where they fall short. So for fixing the capabilities in Iraq, that is a responsibility that we have for all our soldiers, and so in that we looked at what were all the problems, and sir, we came up with 127 different areas that we needed to fix, some of which fell into that human intelligence area. That was briefed back by me to both General Fast and General Sanchez and then that is something that we here at the headquarters and throughout the Army are working quickly to fix those, and we fixed about 123 of them.

Chairman WARNER. But the training fell down in these allegations. Your intelligence people were trained according to your manual presumably, but it collapsed, and it seems to me that should have been reported back to you ASAP that somehow all of the indoctrination and training, which presumably these MI people had, didn't function.

General ALEXANDER. You bring out another good point, sir. We did the training and doctrine command for the Army, did send teams over to Iraq on intelligence support to counterterrorism interrogation training, and that went on from early October 2003 for about a month and a half, along with another set of courses we talked about earlier called tactical questioning. So those mobile training teams were both established to go overseas to hit our divisions and then have hit units here.

Chairman WARNER. So you're saying they were training at the very time that these wrongful acts were taking place?

General ALEXANDER. Throughout Iraq, not necessarily at Abu Ghraib, but through the units—

Chairman WARNER. Throughout Iraq.

General ALEXANDER. Throughout Iraq, yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Bill Nelson.

Senator BILL NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I want you to recognize Senator Clinton, because she was before me, but I think you're on to something. I want to develop it when it comes my turn. I think Senator Levin is on to something and that needs to be further developed.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Clinton.

Senator CLINTON. I thank my friend and colleague. I don't think that's the right order, but I won't argue about it. Mr. Chairman, I first want to thank you for your leadership of this committee. The last 2 days have been extremely challenging, and in every way you have given tremendous leadership. Of course I thank our ranking member who's been by your side the whole time. This is not anything any of us would wish on our Army or on our Senate or on anyone in any administration, but it comes to us to try to deal with this and to understand it as best we can, and I thank each of you for the time you've spent with us this afternoon.

Chairman WARNER. I thank you, Senator. To the extent that Senator Levin and I have given this particular series of hearings, leadership has been highly dependent on the total cooperation of every single member. We've had 100 percent attendance of our committee for 2 days.

Senator CLINTON. Gentlemen, I am still trying to understand exactly what some of the testimony we've already heard actually means. When General Sanchez on November 19, 2003, issued what has been referred to as a FRAGO effectively placing Abu Ghraib under TACON of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade, is that the only instance in which General Sanchez placed any other military—any other facility under MI command?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, ma'am, because I think that's the only place where there is a MI unit of that capability under him, so that's the only place, there is only one. It is the 205th.

Senator CLINTON. So that intel—when you say MI unit, you're talking about the 205th, right?

General ALEXANDER. MI Brigade, yes, ma'am.

Senator CLINTON. MI Brigade. They were solely assigned to Abu Ghraib?

General ALEXANDER. No, they were not solely assigned. They were subordinate to General Sanchez as the theater, the core level brigade that they have for the theater of Iraq. Their headquarters was about 20 miles south of Abu Ghraib, and he was the closest senior tactical leader that General Sanchez had to go in and fix what he saw as severe force protection issues at Abu Ghraib.

Ma'am, I would have done the same. I think the force protection issues that he had, the fixing of the facility for both our soldiers and the detainees were things that he saw were languishing.

Senator CLINTON. General Alexander, may I just clarify that for my own understanding? When Secretary Cambone testified this morning, he said that the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade under Colonel Pappas, as I recall, was given control of the facility, but not of the MPs. That struck me as a distinction without any meaning. Was Colonel Pappas put in charge of the facility under General Sanchez's order?

General ALEXANDER. As I understand it, and this is one that I said early on we need to take for the record to get General Sanchez's language on here exact, as I understand it in my discussions with General Sanchez, is that what Colonel Pappas was put in charge of was this facility of Abu Ghraib, which had the prison, it had the living area for the soldiers, it had the feeding area, it had the perimeter security, it had the MP detention area, it had an Iraqi criminal area, and it had a JIDC.

So this whole base, very much like Fort Drum, but smaller, this base, the garrison commander, and that's the distinguish that I think Dr. Cambone tried to make, the one responsible for fixing the garrison of Abu Ghraib was removed from the MP to the MI battalion commander. I do not believe that it was General Sanchez's intent to take the security detainee of those other detainees and say to Colonel Pappas, you also tell the MPs how to do detainee operations. I believe that was not—and his comments to me said that, but we need to get his statement for you on that, because I think he was the commander on the ground who made that decision.

Senator CLINTON. That would be very helpful. Also, as I'm piecing together the chronology, the order by General Sanchez apparently flowed from a set of recommendations from General Miller, is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. No, ma'am, it did not. Although your chronology is correct in terms of General Miller was there from August 31 to roughly September 9, there were a series of incidents of force protection, and I think it's important to note that Abu Ghraib was totally almost demolished in many areas before the first of August so that the engineers had to go in and build it. That part of building it up is some of the stuff General Miller got to there, the actual compound for detaining these folks was at what was called Old Camp Cropper, the Old Camp Cropper area, and then that was moved, those folks were moved as they opened this up from the mid-August to mid-September time period up to Abu Ghraib, which became the theater holding and became the JIDC.

When General Miller went there, the concerns that he had, as General Burgess has brought out, was intel fusion, synchronization, the flow of information, and how you work together as a team to accomplish the mission. Nowhere in my military experience have I ever seen it where a MI person goes down and tells an MP that we soften the units up and that's good behavior. That is totally wrong. We ought to find out if anyone did say that, hold them accountable.

Now, in October, there was a series of ICRC visits throughout Iraq and two times they visited Abu Ghraib. It was those statements that came out in that document that you've seen that was given to General Karpinski in a draft form for her to respond on December 24, so that was November 6. So, as you look at the sequence of events, there was a series of mortar attacks and persons injured that went on through early November that I think led General Sanchez to say, I have a responsibility to protect my forces, you're not moving out fast enough, Pappas, I want, Colonel Pappas, I want you to move your unit up there and take charge for that force protection mission and for getting these initiatives, the quality of living for those soldiers fixed, and ma'am, you're familiar with that quality of living because it's the same thing we would say for our soldiers at Ft. Drum. If we put them in—they didn't have heat up there—being familiar with in New York State—if you don't give them heat and they are living in barracks without heat and the garrison commander went 2 months without having heat, he'd be out of there and you'd put a new one in charge.

I think that's what General Sanchez did, and I think that was clearly—I think it is being read into the events that General Miller said these nefarious things that caused this to happen. Ma'am, I do not see that, and I do not believe that is correct.

Senator CLINTON. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator Clinton, for those helpful comments. Senator Nelson, you've been patient.

Senator BILL NELSON. Mr. Chairman, if I could get Senator Levin's attention.

Senator LEVIN. You have it.

Senator BILL NELSON. It seems to me that we have a revelation here that the two of you as our leaders have discovered that there was a military intelligence unit after November 19. When you juxtapose that then upon the testimony this morning, where there was a difference of opinion between General Taguba and Secretary Cambone. General Taguba said he was clearly under the impression that MI had direction over the MPs there. Secretary Cambone said no, that they didn't.

So with the information that you've gotten here, I think it's starting to clarify, and the question I would have, and I wish Secretary Cambone was here, is why does he have a different impression? Let me ask you this.

Chairman WARNER. I think it would be proper if you were to pose that question to these three witnesses and see what their views are.

Senator BILL NELSON. Go ahead, gentlemen.
General Alexander?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I—

Chairman WARNER. The MPs, what was their chain of command up and who had UCMJ authority over them?

Senator LEVIN. After November 19.

Chairman WARNER. After the 19th.

General ALEXANDER. Thank you. I've not studied the FRAGO, I've not seen it. I know of it, but that would specify in there who has UCMJ authority.

Chairman WARNER. Have we got it here? We're going to send it right down to you for a good judicial interpretation.

General ALEXANDER. All right, sir.

Senator LEVIN. You don't have the FRAGO, General?

Senator BILL NELSON. While we're waiting for that, I'll just ask General Alexander, when did you become aware of the abuses?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I heard of the abuses when the initial reports came out in January that there were abuses going on. I did not understand at the time that there were MI personnel in charge because the way it was characterized was of an MP. So when I look at the abuses, I do not get normally the abuses of those outside MI.

As soon as we found out that there were MI involved, that's when they came to us and they said we need somebody, a senior officer that we could appoint who is senior to these level—

Senator BILL NELSON. When was that?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, that was on November 7 when they asked me for General Fay.

Senator BILL NELSON. November 7?

General ALEXANDER. No, sir, April 7, I'm sorry, sir.

Senator BILL NELSON. April 7.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator BILL NELSON. When did you see the photographic evidence?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, on television.

Senator BILL NELSON. All right. When did you read the Taguba report?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, last week.

Senator BILL NELSON. What was the Army's plan for dealing with the strategic and operational consequences of the release of this evidence of prisoner abuse?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I'm not sure I understand your question.

Senator BILL NELSON. If there was, it has been testified in front of this committee last Friday by the SECDEF, that he knew of abuses as far back as the middle of January, we've had other testimony to that effect. Now, what I want to know is, what was the Army's plan, knowing of abuses, that—what was your plan for dealing with the consequences of those abuses?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, there was a series of investigations, and when those came out, those series of problems—one of the things that the acting Secretary of the Army took upon him was, we have to look throughout the Army to see how our detainees are being operated, and he gave the—and I'll read you exactly, sir, here—he gave, for starting on February 11, the Department of the Army Inspector General, the mission to conduct a functional analysis of the Army's internment, enemy POW detention, interrogation policies, practices and procedures based on current DOD and Army policies and doctrine.

Senator BILL NELSON. Okay, I don't understand, I don't understand all that language.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Senator BILL NELSON. The Army had to have a plan once they found out about abuses that if those abuses became public, there were going to be consequences in Iraq that were going to be inimical to our goal in Iraq, which is to stabilize Iraq.

So my question is, what were, are, the Army's plans for dealing with the consequences of abuses such as this being made public?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, the Army has not developed a plan as you say on going against—we are looking at all the things that we ought to do that as an Army in terms of what measures can we take with our allies, what are the things that we have to show as we are here today, what other venues should we do, what are the actions, is examples that folks like General Abizaid and others take in the leadership to show the Iraqi people that we are sorry and that we apologize for these, how do we police up our own ranks to ensure this will never happen.

All of that are things that the Army leadership and, I think it's important, the CJTF and the CENTCOM leadership are concurrently doing, because it's a combined—

Senator BILL NELSON. Okay, let me just wrap up here and then we can go back into this matter that you were talking about, Mr. Chairman. So you know of no plan, I call it a plan, but brainstorming session, if for that reason, of first finding out about these abuses and then saying, what in the world is this going to do to us out there in the Muslim world, specifically in Iraq, that is going to hinder the ultimate objective that we have, which is to stabilize Iraq? You know of no discussions or plan?

General ALEXANDER. No, absolutely, sir, in terms of brainstorming. At all levels we are brainstorming, we are looking at what are the things that we ought to do, what are—and I've been asked this, sir, last week by—in another committee, what could Congress do.

Senator BILL NELSON. Did anybody specifically discuss the kind of physical and torture violence and perhaps even beheading that would occur as a result of these abuses?

General ALEXANDER. No, sir. Nobody could come out and say, we think a civilian is going to be beheaded. I think we all are concerned that these events will increase the number of incidents, attacks against our soldiers and civilians throughout the region. We are clearly concerned about that, and that's one of the things that we as an Army, we as a military, and we as a Nation need to get out front, because those terrorist organizations that oppose us are going to use this as a rallying flag to go against that.

We all understand. We are all working on that, sir. From both the Joint Staff side, our side, we've had a working group amongst us with the Joint Staff to talk about, what are the things that we could or should do. So those are going on, sir.

Senator BILL NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I would just submit for our future discussion, and obviously General Alexander is not responsible here. But the question is that were we prepared about Muslim sensitivities in trying during an occupation to prepare that country for something they've never experienced in recent history called democracy, and so that had we been better prepared, that we would have immediately jumped on prison abuses and found out more about what they were.

Why don't you pursue the line on the difference on MI and MP?

Chairman WARNER. Yes, I will do that, but I think this hearing has really raised a lot of very important questions which the committee has to work to resolve, and I'm told by my staff that I may have inadvertently used the word ducking and bobbing, but that did not refer to this panel before us today, because I think you have been direct in your responses and pointed out, it's almost like a bowling alley. Everybody's been in his lane doing his job but somehow we need more cross action between these individuals.

So we come back to this order, FRAGO, and we now have the distinguished JAG interpreting. Judge?

General ROMIG. Yes, sir. The FRAGO, it would appear that since they are under TACON of the 205th, I'm talking about the 800th people, the MPs, that they have, the 205th has control for missions and tasking and things like that, but UCMJ remains with the 800th MP brigade.

Chairman WARNER. Remains with that. But now TACON then did go to the MI side?

General ROMIG. It did.

Chairman WARNER. It did.

General ROMIG. That's for control of movements and detailed direction of the operation of, it appears the facility.

Chairman WARNER. Then—

Senator BILL NELSON. Including the interpretation, I mean, the interrogation, if I might?

Chairman WARNER. That's my understanding, and that Taguba report, he took that position this morning.

General ROMIG. Sir, absent anything else, that's what it would appear to be.

Chairman WARNER. That's the way it reads to you. General Alexander, do you want to take a look at it?

General ALEXANDER. No, sir, I've looked at it, and that's why I said, I know that this is a key issue—

Chairman WARNER. But why don't you take a few moments and look at it?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, I've read it.

Chairman WARNER. Oh, you've read it.

General ALEXANDER. I have read it. It's my book that I passed over to him, and the key issue though is, what did General Sanchez convey to the two commanders and what did he expect of them, and my understanding from him is what we need to clarify to you, and that's one of the things that, as I started out, I said we'll take that for the record so that we get it to you exactly correct, go through the Joint Staff to CENTCOM so that you know that we've done that, because I think that is one of the key issues of when he said that, who was expected to have responsibility for the MP part of security detainee operations?

It was pointed out, I think by General Taguba, if I'm not mistaken, that in fact General Karpinski thought that she still had that and it was 2 days after her initial investigation that she said, well, this order came out. So there is clearly disagreement, so this is one of the issues that has to be ironed out, and we owe that back to you accurately from—

Chairman WARNER. What does the plain English say?

General ALEXANDER. Just as General Romig read it, sir. TACON.

Chairman WARNER. The plain English language according to your interpretation is that TACON went from the MP commander to the MI commander.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir. It says under the first paragraph, effective immediately, the 205th Military Intelligence brigade commander assumes responsibility for the Baghdad central confinement facility and is appointed the FOB commander. Units directly at Abu Ghraib are under the TACON for security of detainees and FOB protection. Now—

Chairman WARNER. Embraced in there is the responsibility for the interrogation procedures?

General ALEXANDER. I think all of that is what needs to be laid out by General Sanchez so that we answer it exactly correct. But as I understand it, the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade remained responsible for the interrogation and the overall security of the facility itself, protecting all the persons there, both the detainees and the soldiers. That's what I think General Sanchez intended. I know how it reads, and we have to clarify that point.

Chairman WARNER. I come back again. So you feel that you need to do further research to determine whether or not this FRAGO in fact reposed in the MI the responsibility for the conduct of the interrogations?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, they always had—

Chairman WARNER. They always had that?

General ALEXANDER. They always had the conduct of the interrogations. I think the question, the key point, is did the MI brigade commander tell the MPs out in the general detention facility how to do their job? That was the key point.

Chairman WARNER. Which is a—to use a phrase—a preparatory step for the MI to come in, so in a sense—

General ALEXANDER. That's correct.

Chairman WARNER.—they were telling—I'm not suggesting what they did because we don't know, we're waiting for the reports. But someone is likely to have told the MPs, here are certain steps you can take, and I use the word soften up these prisoners, so when we come to the cell block, they're mentally and physically in such a condition that our interrogation can be more fruitful. Is that about right?

General ALEXANDER. That's how it's reported, sir, but it is my understanding—and that's why the November 19 and when these acts took place is such a key time, because if the ICRC report is correct, as we believe it is, then it took place in October, or at least some of them.

Chairman WARNER. What took place?

General ALEXANDER. Some of these allegations by the ICRC of detainee abuse took place in October.

Chairman WARNER. Correct.

General ALEXANDER. Before the MI brigade was in charge.

Chairman WARNER. Correct. But they continued after the FRAGO is my understanding.

General ALEXANDER. Sir, that's what has to be clarified, because I don't know that we accurately know when they started, when they stopped, and what happened. Those dates, I don't have the dates of all the pictures. But I understand that they were late October, they were from early October, late October, early November, but I don't know how far that went on.

Chairman WARNER. To the extent that I have any knowledge, it's because of testimony perhaps the day before yesterday that this didn't stop until this very courageous enlisted man took the disk with photos on it and gave it to his superior, and at that point in time, then everybody turned to and realized we have a problem and it stopped. Has that scenario been related to any of you gentlemen?

General ALEXANDER. Not in those words, no, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Anything approximating?

General ALEXANDER. As I understand it, that at least we know it was going on through the October-November time period, so the detainee abuse cases or events, clearly October, November, and now the question is when did they stop. I think the key point of this November 19, so they're going on before the MI brigade takes command, did they change it and make it retroactive? No, they couldn't. So that could not have happened. We all agree on that.

So my concern is that we are trying to say that when we put the MI brigade commander in charge, what we did was already make the conditions to soften them up. Sir, look at what was going on in October and early November. It is clear that they had already had these infractions, and I don't know how long that went on. But clearly we have to find that out.

Chairman WARNER. I would go back, again we're trying to surmise in the October time frame, prior to the November 19 FRAGO, these actions of abuse were going on, but they were going on in the context of interrogations being conducted by MI people. Am I not correct in that?

General ALEXANDER. Those are the statements, and in each statement—

Chairman WARNER. There were MI people assigned to do those duties at that prison.

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir. That's exactly right.

Chairman WARNER. Presumably they were trying to elicit intelligence from the prisoners.

General ALEXANDER. Those are named in General Taguba's report. There are three soldiers and two contractors named in his report. But as you state, there are indications that there are more and there are indications in places that say MI officers, and so what General Taguba recommended was that a Procedure 15 look into that because he did not have the specific data to say it was that person who did it.

What they got was, they told me to do it, and that's where we really need to make sure we get the facts, wherever they may lead, sir, and bring them out and hold those who did wrong accountable.

Chairman WARNER. Good. Let me read you from the Taguba report, it's page 45, that Colonel Thomas Pappas, Commander of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade be given a general officer memorandum of reprimand and investigated UP Procedure 15 AR activities for the following acts, which have been previously referred to in the aforementioned findings. So he was punished for the following: failure to ensure that soldiers under his direct command were properly trained in and followed the interrogation ROE. So he failed to ascertain that all of his soldiers had the proper training to adhere to the interrogation ROE, is that correct?

General ALEXANDER. That's correct, sir.

Chairman WARNER. That implies to me that MI people were not performing their duties, perhaps because they'd never been trained. Do you infer that from that language?

General ALEXANDER. Well, sir—

Chairman WARNER. Or improperly trained.

General ALEXANDER. I think, and as he listed out, and he lists out the four people, he, Colonel Jordan, and two others, who acted improperly, and any soldier, it says here, any soldier who does not report that is not following the interrogation ROE. We know that there were soldiers who were in some of those photographs who observed it and didn't report it.

Chairman WARNER. But if they—what this says, as I read it, ensure that soldiers in his command were properly trained, he didn't ensure that, so that training would have come under your jurisdiction, wouldn't it, for those soldiers?

General ALEXANDER. Sir, all the training for our soldiers under the interrogation ROE for the unit there would fall under the joint command that he's operating under. The doctrinal training that we have falls under the Army, and that's what we give them at Fort Huachuca. We also provide a mobile training team to bring them up.

Chairman WARNER. Okay. Much work has to be done, and I thank you all three of you—I have one or two questions left—for your cooperation and your direct response today, and I assure you that I have the highest respect for each of you and what you've tried to do.

But let me press on into this area. This goes to General Burgess. According to the CJTF-7 policies on interrogation ROE, there are certain interrogation techniques whose employment would require the explicit approval of the commanding general. The attachment to the Taguba Report included at least one memorandum requesting such approval from the commanding general, General Sanchez.

How frequently were requests made for approval to employ interrogation techniques requiring explicit approval?

General BURGESS. Sir, based on the knowledge that I have, there were no requests to General Sanchez.

Chairman WARNER. Therefore, the next question you've answered, how often were such requests approved by Sanchez? There were none.

Now, accountability. That's a subject that's very much on the minds of us here in Congress. I'll ask this to the JAG. Court-martial action against certain individuals has been, that's past tense, recommended, but only administrative action against leaders in the chain of command such as Brigadier General Karpinski and Colonel Pappas, Lieutenant Colonel Jordan, Lieutenant Colonel Phillabaum, and others. The apparent failures of leadership of these individuals as documented in the Taguba Report could suggest more stringent responses than "a memorandum of reprimand" essentially letters of admonishment.

In your view, are the disciplinary actions recommended for members of the chain of command appropriate for the offenses in this situation?

General ROMIG. Mr. Chairman, first I would point out that it was the commander on the scene who assessed the evidence before them in the context of what was going on there and made those decisions. It's certainly within the realm of the reasonable and that's why in our system you have the ability of a commander to choose a couple different options or more.

I would say that some of these, you mentioned Colonel Pappas, that is still pending the Procedure 15, and there may be some other things that could come out of this as the cases move forward and more investigation is done. So I'm not sure it's over as it stands right now.

Chairman WARNER. That's the next question. Do the administrative and non-judicial actions taken to date preclude reexamination of any of these cases and potential judicial action under the UCMJ?

General ROMIG. No, sir.

Chairman WARNER. So that avenue is still open?

General ROMIG. Yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. Gentlemen, I think we had a marathon, close to 7 hours of hearing, but we thank you very much first for your distinguished careers of service, for your continuing effort to assist the SECDEF and the Acting Secretary of the Army and all others to get to the bottom of it, including the United States Senate and the Congress of the United States. So thank you very much.

I will be in consultation with the ranking member, Mr. Levin, with regard to future hearings of this committee. It's apparent to me that we need to do a good deal more work and there are a lot more witnesses to work with. But we're faced with the fact that our bill is on the floor beginning Monday, and it's at the moment not clear to me that we can next week continue with a hearing in view of the heavy commitment of all members of this committee to floor action. Then following that's a recess period, so we could be 2 weeks away, although I'll examine Thursday of this week with the staff and Senator Levin and see whether or not the availability of some of the witnesses we have in mind can be arranged for that hearing.

So for the moment, subject to further announcement, we'll let you know of our schedule. But thank you again for today. The hearing is adjourned.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN

GITMO-IZING ABU GHRAIB

1. Senator MCCAIN. General Alexander, General Burgess, and General Romig, it has been reported that General Miller wanted to GITMO-ize the confinement operations at Abu Ghraib prison because of your concern in that facility that military intelligence was not getting the information from detainees like he thought they should be. What did he mean by GITMO-izing Abu Ghraib prison?

General ALEXANDER. I am unaware of any such statement being made by Major General Miller.

General BURGESS. I am unaware of any such statement being made by Major General Miller. During General Miller's testimony in the Senate hearing on Iraq prison abuse on 19 May 2004, Senator Daniel Akaka (D) Hawaii asked him: "Did you tell General Karpinski that you were going to GITMO-ize Abu Ghraib? My question is, what did you mean by this statement?"

General Miller responded: "Senator, I did not tell General Karpinski I would GITMO-ize Abu Ghraib. I don't believe I've ever used that term. Ever."

General ROMIG. I am unaware of any such statement being made by Major General Miller.

GENERAL OFFICER APPROVAL OF INTERROGATION TACTICS

2. Senator MCCAIN. General Alexander, General Burgess, and General Romig, General Miller announced that certain practices would be discontinued, including hooding, stress positioning, and sleep deprivation, but that they would be permitted with approval by a general officer. Under what authority can a general officer permit these techniques?

General ALEXANDER. Concur with Major General Romig and Major General Burgess.

General BURGESS. A general officer can only approve techniques that are approved by doctrine and in accordance with applicable international law. In addition, the Secretary of Defense may further limit authority by requiring that he receive specific notification and/or provide approval of certain lawful techniques.

General ROMIG. If a practice or technique is lawful, a commander may restrict the use of that practice or technique in many ways, including that a general officer approve its use. To the extent that any practice involving detainees violates U.S. or international law, no general officer would have authority to permit the practice or technique.

CAUSE OF DEATH OF FORMER HEAD OF IRAQ'S AIR FORCE

3. Senator MCCAIN. General Alexander, General Burgess, and General Romig, the Denver Post reports an allegation that the former head of the Iraqi Air Force died during interrogation when he was rolled up inside a sleeping bag so only his feet stuck out, and then sat on and rolled back and forth until he died of suffocation. Apparently the investigation concluded that this was a death from "natural causes." What can you tell me about this?

General ALEXANDER. I have been informed that the case is presently being investigated by the Army's Criminal Investigation Command as a suspected homicide.

General BURGESS. Army Criminal Investigation Division (CID) initiated an investigation immediately after the death of Major General Mowhosh, the former Iraqi Air Defense Minister, on November 26, 2003. A preliminary investigation determined that General Mowhosh died during interrogation by two U.S. Army interrogators. The CID investigation is ongoing and being treated as a suspected homicide.

General ROMIG. I have been informed that the case is presently being investigated by the Army's CID as a suspected homicide.

PRISON GUARDS

4. Senator MCCAIN. General Alexander, General Burgess, and General Romig, is it now, or has it been, administration policy that prison guards should "facilitate" detainee interrogations? If so, how were they instructed to do this?

General ALEXANDER. I don't know of any administration policy that prison guards should facilitate detainee interrogations. However, it is clear that in screening prisoners and understanding the state-of-mind of detainees to be interrogated, MI and MP should work together. Specifically, FM 34-52 says on page 3-9, "Interrogators should question guards about the sources, time permitting, as part of preparation. Since the guards are in constant contact with the sources, they may be able to provide information on:

- Their physical condition.
- Demonstrated attitude and behavior.
- Contact made with other guards or sources.
- How the source has been handled since capture.
- Hearsay (H/S) information from others who have handled the source.
- Confirmation of capture data, especially the circumstances under which the sources was captured."

General BURGESS. I am not aware of any policy that prison guards should facilitate detainee interrogations.

General ROMIG. I don't know of any administration policy that prison guards should facilitate detainee interrogations. I am aware that this issue was reviewed by both Major General Miller, Commander of JTF-GITMO, and Major General Ryder, Army Provost Marshal General, last fall, and more recently by Major General Taguba, CFLCC Deputy Commanding General, in his investigation of the 800th Military Police Brigade. Neither Army doctrine on detention operations (Army Regulation 190-8, Enemy Prisoners of War, Retained Personnel, Civilian Internees and Other Detainees) nor the Army's Field Manual 34-52, Intelligence Interrogation, addresses the issue other than to specifically prohibit physical or moral coercion and inhumane treatment to compel information. In my opinion, we need to revise our doctrine to better define the relationship between interrogators and those responsible for operating detention facilities.

PERMISSIVE CLIMATE OF PRISONER ABUSE

5. Senator MCCAIN. General Alexander, General Burgess, and General Romig, in Secretary Rumsfeld's May 7, 2004 testimony, he testified that the Abu Ghraib prison personnel followed the provisions of the Geneva Conventions and that the Geneva Conventions were posted for all prison personnel to see. General Taguba has stated that neither the camp rules nor the provisions of the Geneva Conventions were posted in English or in the language of the detainees at any of the detention facilities in the 800th Military Police (MP) Brigade's area of responsibility. Would this supervisory error not contribute to a permissive climate of prisoner abuse?

General ALEXANDER. Posting of camp rules and the applicable Geneva Conventions is required by the conventions and service regulations. However, the absence of these postings cannot be directly related to a permissive climate of prisoner abuse.

General BURGESS. At this time ongoing investigations will determine where and how the camp rules and Geneva Conventions provisions were posted in the 800th MP Brigade's area during the time the alleged offenses took place.

General ROMIG. Posting of camp rules and the applicable Geneva Conventions is required by the conventions and service regulations. Failure to adhere to this requirement could be one of a number of indicators that regulations were not strictly followed. Without more facts, however, I cannot conclude that a failure to post the documents would necessarily contribute to a permissive climate of prisoner abuse.

PROSECUTION OF CIVILIAN OPERATORS IN ABU GHRAIB

6. Senator MCCAIN. General Alexander, General Burgess, and General Romig, interrogation specialists from private defense contractors were operating inside Abu Ghraib and may have taken part in these atrocities. Given the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) has been amended by the Military and Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 1999, do you intend to prosecute the contractors who allegedly abused prisoners and committed other atrocities under the UCMJ?

General ALEXANDER. Concur with Major General Romig.

General BURGESS. As standard practice, military commanders order investigations when personnel under their command are suspected of committing UCMJ offenses, including atrocities of this nature. The Department of Justice has the authority to prosecute contractor employees of the Department of Defense under the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act (MEJA). Contractors are only subject to the UCMJ during a declared state of war. I would respectfully defer all legal opinions to General Romig.

General ROMIG. The MEJA of 2000 is a separate and distinct Federal criminal statute. It does not amend the UCMJ, nor does it enforce the punitive articles of the UCMJ. Under MEJA, the decision to prosecute is made by the Department of Justice (DOJ). It is my understanding that DOJ is currently reviewing the conduct of certain private defense contractors in Iraq.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CARL LEVIN

CHAIN OF COMMAND AT ABU GHRAIB

7. Senator LEVIN. General Alexander, we have heard that Abu Ghraib Prison was placed under the command of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade commander on November 19, 2003. According to General Taguba, this effectively made an MI Officer, rather than a Military Police (MP) Officer, responsible for the MP units conducting detainee operations at that facility, which is not doctrinally sound due to the different missions and agendas assigned to each of these respective specialties. Who made the decision to put the MI commander in charge of the Abu Ghraib facility and why?

General ALEXANDER. According to Lieutenant General Sanchez's testimony before Congress, he put the 205th as TACON authority on November 19 to enhance the force protection posture of Abu Ghraib, i.e., to act as the garrison commander of FOB Abu Ghraib, not to assume the responsibilities for detention operations

8. Senator LEVIN. General Alexander, does the Department agree with General Taguba's conclusion that this decision was "not doctrinally sound"?

General ALEXANDER. It normally would not be "doctrinally sound" to place a Military Intelligence (MI) commander in charge of the Military Police in order to run a prison as MI personnel are not trained in the running of a prison; however, as stated before, Lieutenant General Sanchez testified it was never his intent for MI to run the prison, but to assume responsibility for the force protection of the base.

9. Senator LEVIN. General Alexander, General Taguba specifically recommended that General Karpinski, brigade commander, be relieved from command and issued a General Officer Memorandum of Reprimand. General Karpinski was issued a General Officer Memorandum of Admonishment on January 17, 2003 but as of early March was still in command of the 800th Military Police Brigade. On what basis was General Karpinski issued a General Officer Memorandum of Admonishment on January 17?

General ALEXANDER. General Karpinski was issued a General Officer Memorandum of Admonishment on January 17 by Lieutenant General Sanchez because incidents that had occurred "reflect a lack of clear standards, proficiency and leadership within the brigade."

10. Senator LEVIN. General Alexander, why was General Karpinski not relieved of command at that time?

General ALEXANDER. As this is a command decision, refer to CJTF-7, Lieutenant General Sanchez.

11. Senator LEVIN. General Alexander, it has been reported that General Miller's review team recommended that military police set the conditions for the successful interrogation and exploitation of internees/detainees and that the guard force be actively engaged in setting the conditions for successful exploitation of the internees. General Taguba has stated that these recommendations would appear to be in conflict with the recommendations of General Ryder's Team and AR 190-8 that military police do not participate in military intelligence supervised interrogation sessions. Do you agree with General Taguba's conclusion that military police should not be asked to "set the conditions" for interrogations?

General ALEXANDER. Military Police are part of the interrogation mission. Their role is not only to secure the detainees as well as escort them to and from interrogation booths but also to provide passive intelligence to interrogators. Per Field Manual 34-52, "interrogators should question guards about the sources, time permitting, as part of preparation. Since the guards are in constant contact with the sources, they may be able to provide information on: their physical condition; demonstrated attitude and behavior; contact made with other guards or sources. . ." MPs are in a unique position to provide information on detainees because of their daily interaction with them. Army G2 believes Military Police should not play an active role during actual interrogations, meaning except for security presence, they should not interact with detainees during interrogations nor conduct their own “interrogations” of detainees. Military doctrine and policy has to be updated to reflect the roles and responsibilities of both MPs and MI for future detention operations.

12. Senator LEVIN. General Alexander, doesn't the subsequent decision to appoint General Miller to take over Abu Ghraib prison appear to ratify his recommendation for using military police to support interrogations? Doesn't this send the wrong message after the abuses at Abu Ghraib?

General ALEXANDER. See answer to question #11.

13. Senator LEVIN. General Alexander, who made the decision to appoint General Miller?

General ALEXANDER. Refer to CJTF-7, Lieutenant General Sanchez, for answer.

ROLE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERALS

14. Senator LEVIN. General Romig, the Army Judge Advocate General (JAG) Corps has consistently served as one of our strongest lines of defense against unlawful or indefensible conduct by members of the military. That line of defense appears to have broken down at Abu Ghraib prison. To your knowledge, was there a JAG assigned to Abu Ghraib prison—with either the military police battalion or the military intelligence brigade responsible for the prison? If so, was the JAG consulted on the detention and interrogation techniques used by military police and military intelligence at the prison?

General ROMIG. The 800th Military Police Brigade had a Lieutenant Colonel Staff Judge Advocate with an organic legal element that provided area coverage to the Abu Ghraib detention facility. The 205th Military Intelligence Brigade had two Brigade Judge Advocates, one of whom was assigned to the Abu Ghraib detention facility with his brigade in late November. A magistrate's cell, typically consisting of three Judge Advocates, was placed at Abu Ghraib in late September 2003 in order to conduct legal reviews of detention. The 205th Military Intelligence Brigade Judge Advocate was consulted on interrogation approaches as necessary. Additional legal support was provided by the CJTF-7 SJA section.

15. Senator LEVIN. General Romig, did the JAG review interrogation plans on a case-by-case basis to ensure their compliance with Army regulations and the Geneva Conventions?

General ROMIG. The Brigade Judge Advocate would review interrogation plans and observe interrogations on a periodic basis. He did not review all plans or attend all interrogations. The Judge Advocate reviewed all requests for exception to CJTF-7s 12 October 2003 Interrogation Policy. The CJTF-7 Staff Judge Advocate reviewed requests for exception that were submitted to the CJTF-7 Commander.

16. Senator LEVIN. General Romig, who has responsibility for ensuring that the Interrogation Rules of Engagement (IROE) in Iraq, provided to this committee at today's hearing, are properly applied and adhere to the Geneva Accords?

General ROMIG. This is a command responsibility. Under Army doctrine as reflected in FM 34-52, Intelligence Interrogation, the command's J2, G2, or S2 has primary staff responsibility to ensure interrogation activities are performed in accordance with the Geneva Conventions and U.S. policies. The manual further states that if there is any doubt as to the legality of a proposed form of interrogation, the advice of the Command Judge Advocate should be sought before using the method in question. The IROE document provided to the committee was locally-produced by the officer in charge of interrogations at the Abu Ghraib Prison and informally reviewed by the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade Judge Advocate along with members of the Office of the Staff Judge Advocate, CJTF-7. [I would also like to point out that the term “IROE” is an improper use of the concept of ROE. In military operations, the term “rules of engagement (ROE)” refers to limitations on the use of force.]

17. Senator LEVIN. General Romig, what role does your office play in vetting and approving rules for the conduct of interrogations?

General ROMIG. We provide legal advice to the Army Chief of Staff and the Army Staff on a wide range of matters, including the DOD Law of War Program and the DOD Program for Enemy Prisoners of War and Other Detainees. This includes reviewing Army interrogation doctrine for legal sufficiency. In the case of interrogations at Guantanamo, we participated in a review of interrogation procedures as part of a DOD Working Group (please see my answer to question 28). In Iraq, my office does not have a direct role in vetting and approving rules for the conduct of interrogations. The collection of intelligence is tasked to components assigned to the Subordinate Joint Force Command (CJTF-7) in accordance with collection plans prepared by the Command's J2. The chain of command runs from CJTF-7 through the Combatant Command (USCENTCOM) to the Joint Staff. Legal officers are assigned to each of these headquarters. Although my office is not technically in the chain of command, we are a "reach-back" source from which judge advocates in the field can request advice or opinions regarding any legal issue affecting current operations. I am not aware of this happening for this particular issue.

18. Senator LEVIN. General Romig, did your office review these IROEs?
General ROMIG. No.

ACCOUNTABILITY OF CIVILIAN CONTRACTORS

19. Senator LEVIN. General Romig, there is evidence that civilian contractors may have been involved in some of the potentially criminal actions documented in the Taguba Report. It has been reported that a contractor serving as an interrogator at Abu Ghraib allowed and/or instructed MPs, who were not trained in interrogation techniques, to facilitate interrogations by "setting conditions" which were neither authorized and in accordance with applicable regulations/policy and he clearly knew his instructions equated to physical abuse. If you conclude that civilian contractors overseas have committed criminal acts, what systems are in place to hold them accountable and is there a court with jurisdiction to try them for criminal conduct?

General ROMIG. U.S. contractors accompanying a force are not subject to the UCMJ except in time of a congressionally declared war. However, they are still subject to U.S. Federal jurisdiction under the War Crimes Act (which provides for jurisdiction over any U.S. national who commits a "war crime"), 18 USC §§ 2340-2340A (implementing the Torture Convention), and potentially to the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act.

20. Senator LEVIN. General Romig, has anybody in the Department reviewed the use of civilian contractors as interrogators to determine whether this is an appropriate use of contractors or is an inherently governmental function?

General ROMIG. I believe the Army is reviewing the issue.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY

PROCESS IN FORMULATION OF DETENTION AND INTERROGATION RULES OF ENGAGEMENT

21. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, I provided you with two media reports (the UPI article by Arnaud de Borchgrave and the Salon.com article by Joe Conason, both dated May 11, 2004). Were you previously aware that senior Judge Advocate General (JAG) officers went outside the Department to the New York City Bar Association to raise their concerns on the formulation of military interrogation and detention rules?

General ROMIG. No.

22. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, the JAG officers reportedly said that civilian appointees, and particularly Mr. Feith and Mr. Haynes, have ignored or bypassed the military lawyers with respect to the formulation, drafting, vetting, and implementation of interrogation rules of engagement and other legal issues related to the subjects of our hearings. Please describe the process for establishing policies on interrogation rules of engagement and detention and the role of JAG officers in the process.

General ROMIG. Army doctrine and policies for intelligence interrogation are contained in Field Manual 34-52, Intelligence Interrogation. The most current version is dated 28 September 1992. The FM implements general principles contained in Field Manual 34-1, Intelligence and Electronic Warfare Operations, and several standardization agreements (STANAGs) that the U.S. has entered into with our NATO allies (i.e., STANAG 2033, Interrogation of Prisoners of War; STANAG 2044, Procedures for Dealing with Prisoners of War; and STANAG 2084, Handling and Reporting of Captured Enemy Equipment and Documents). The principles and techniques of interrogation set out in the FM specifically incorporate the constraints established by the UCMJ and the 1949 Geneva Conventions. The FM recognizes that intelligence interrogation execution will vary depending on unit mission, task organization, and collection priorities. The current manual was reviewed for legal sufficiency and comment by Judge Advocates assigned to U.S. Army Intelligence Center (the agency proponent) and in the Office of The Judge Advocate General (OTJAG). All changes recommended by OTJAG were incorporated in the final FM. Regarding the role of Judge Advocates assigned to commands in the field, please see my answer to questions 16 and 17.

23. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, have the processes changed since September 11, 2001? If so, please describe the previous process, highlighting the differences between then and now.

General ROMIG. Please see my answer to question 28.

24. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, since the assumption by Mr. Feith and Mr. Haynes of their current positions, what has been their role in the matters and processes described in the previous question?

General ROMIG. Aside from the formulation of a working group noted in question 28, I am not aware of any role Mr. Haynes may have played in the processes described in the previous question. With regard to Mr. Feith, on January 17, 2002, he issued a memorandum, subject: Responsibility for detainees in association with the global war on terrorism, in which he advised that the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Special Operations and Low-Intensity Conflict) would assume responsibility for "overall development, coordination, approval, and promulgation of major DOD policies and plans related to persons detainees in association with the global war on terrorism. This include[d] development, coordination, approval, and promulgation of major DOD policies, and new courses of action with DOD components and other Federal agencies as necessary." This memorandum also advised that DOD Directive 2310.1 would be adjusted to reflect this decision. I have no knowledge of what other role, if any, Mr. Feith has had in these matters.

25. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, after assuming their positions, did either Mr. Feith or Mr. Haynes alter the role of civilian appointees in the process? If so, was this done by formal order, by oral directions, or some other means? Please provide any documentation that would indicate when this change was made and the substance of those changes.

General ROMIG. Please see my answer to question 24.

26. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, if the decisions on IROE and other legal issues were not made and implemented through the regular pre-existing assignments, channels, and command chain, including JAG, how were they made and communicated to the action commands and officers? Please provide details on the rules and other orders most relevant to these hearings and list the others affected.

General ROMIG. Please see my answer to question 16. I am not aware of any other decisions involving legal matters that were made outside regular pre-existing assignments, channels, and command chain.

27. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, if such decisions were communicated by Mr. Feith and/or Mr. Haynes horizontally or upwards to other civilian officials, and then downward to military officials, please describe those channels in as much detail as you can, providing documentation where available.

General ROMIG. I have no personal information on how Mr. Feith or Mr. Haynes communicates decisions aside from established channels and modes, such as information papers, directives, instructions, and policy guidance.

MR. HAYNES' "WORKING GROUP"

28. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, are you familiar with the "working group" under the direction or other leadership of Mr. Haynes, described to us by another witness, in connection with the matters under review by the committee? Please describe the membership and functions of that working group. If you or any member of your office were a member, please provide all documentation with respect to that group. If no one in your office was a member, please explain why, when, and how that occurred.

General ROMIG. In early January 2003, a working group of various attorneys and operators was formed within the Department of Defense regarding detainee interrogation. The group was generally directed to review interrogation procedures at Guantanamo, and make recommendations regarding appropriate techniques and approaches. The specific function, membership, reports, and comments of the working group are contained in classified documents maintained by the Department of Defense. The group was headed up by Mary Walker, Air Force General Counsel, who reported the findings of the group to Mr. Haynes. Members of my staff served on the working group. In March, I submitted a memorandum to Ms. Walker expressing a number of reservations and concerns with the final draft of the working group report. In addition, we briefed the Army Chief of Staff and Deputy Chief of Staff, G-3, of our concerns in preparation for Joint Staff meetings on this issue.

NEWS ARTICLES AND THE TAGUBA REPORT

29. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, do you believe that the concerns reportedly raised by JAG officers in the above mentioned articles may have been a contributing cause of any of the gaps, faults, and misbehavior described in the Taguba Report? Please explain in detail.

General ROMIG. Please see my answer to question 30.

INTERROGATION SAFEGUARDS AND JAG'S INVOLVEMENT

30. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, the civilian officials reportedly removed safeguards designed to prevent the abuse of prisoners. One of those safeguards was the routine observation from behind a two-way mirror by a JAG officer who was empowered to stop any misconduct. The instructions originated by these officials also reportedly granted private contractors unprecedented participation in the interrogation process—precisely because such civilian contractors are not covered by the UCMJ and therefore are “free to do whatever they want to do.” An April 26, 2002, report in the Wall Street Journal stated that the JAG Corps “keeps a lawyer on hand during interrogations, for quick decisions on the degree of physical or mental pressure allowed.” Was this military policy? If so, under what circumstances? Is this no longer policy? If so, when was this change in policy made, who made it, how was it transmitted to the field, and did the JAG Corps have any role in making this policy change?

General ROMIG. I believe the individuals who reported that officials removed safeguards designed to prevent abuse of prisoners, specifically that these officials prevented judge advocates from being present during all interrogations, are incorrect in their understanding of the facts. To the best of my knowledge, judge advocates have never routinely observed all intelligence interrogations. During Operations Desert Shield/Desert Storm, judge advocates at the division, corps, and theater level were available to advise commanders on a wide-range of operational law issues, including the application of the law of war and the UCMJ as to interrogations and treatment of detainees. Judge advocates were neither required to nor precluded from observing interrogations. As a practical matter, it would have been physically impossible for judge advocates to routinely observe all of the large number of interrogations that occurred during those operations. After discussing the issue with command legal advisors, it is my understanding that the current practices at Guantanamo and in Iraq are the same: judge advocates are neither required to nor precluded from observing interrogations.

31. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, have JAG lawyers been present during all interrogations conducted by military or intelligence personnel in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Guantanamo Bay? If not, do you believe that the absence of JAG lawyers may have contributed to any of the reported abuses in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Guantanamo Bay?

General ROMIG. Please see my answer to question 30.

32. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, according to the Taguba Report, a new policy authorizing the use of “stress and duress” practices was initiated by the Pentagon in late 2002 or early 2003. Are you aware of this change in policy? Who made it and when, how was it transmitted to the field, and did the JAG Corps have a role in making this policy change?

General ROMIG. I am not aware of any change of policy other than noted in my answer to question 28.

33. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, do you believe that this change in policy contributed to any of the reported abuses in Iraq or Afghanistan?

General ROMIG. Please see my answer to question 32.

34. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, was the JAG Corps involved in the decision to give private contractors much broader authority to interrogate military detainees?

General ROMIG. My office was not involved in the decision to employ private contractor interrogators or how much authority private contractors should have when interrogating military detainees.

35. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, who made this decision and when and how was it transmitted to the field?

General ROMIG. I don't know.

36. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, in making this policy change, did policy-makers discuss the lack of accountability under the UCMJ for civilian contractors?

General ROMIG. I don't know.

37. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, was there any discussion of the limits of jurisdiction for prosecuting military contractors?

General ROMIG. There has been considerable discussion within all the Services regarding the increasing reliance of contractors on the battlefield, the lack of UCMJ jurisdiction except during periods of a congressionally declared war, and the other possible forums for exercising criminal jurisdiction (the War Crimes Act, 18 USC §§ 2340–2340A, and potentially the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act). However, I am not aware of discussions focused on contractors hired to perform interrogations.

38. Senator KENNEDY. General Romig, do you share the concerns reportedly expressed by the JAG articles as summarized in the three articles I have referenced?

General ROMIG. As set out in my answer to question 30, I believe the concerns reportedly raised by Judge Advocates in the articles were based upon an incorrect understanding of JAG roles in observing interrogations, both during Operation Desert Storm and in our present conflicts. To that extent, I do not share their concerns. As to any concerns I may have had regarding the formulation of interrogation policies at Guantanamo, please see my answer to question 28.

[Whereupon, at 5:57 p.m., the committee adjourned.]

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOHN WARNER, CHAIRMAN

Chairman WARNER. Good morning, everyone. The committee meets today for the third in a series of hearings regarding the mistreatment of Iraqi prisoners by a small—hopefully, a very small—number of personnel of the Armed Forces of the United States, in violation of U.S. and international laws.

Testifying before us today are General John P. Abizaid, Commander, U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM); Lieutenant General Ricardo Sanchez, Commander, Multi-National Force-Iraq; Major General Geoffrey Miller, Deputy Commander for Detainee Operations, Multi-National Force; and they are joined this morning by their Judge Advocate General (JAG), which I think is a very wise decision.

We welcome our witnesses and thank them again for their service. Many times members of this committee and other Members of Congress have gone abroad and visited each of you in CENTCOM, and, most particularly, in Afghanistan and Iraq. We must all be mindful of the role of our witnesses in the operational chain of command and of their related responsibilities in the administration of military justice. Each witness this morning will use caution with regard to their comments, such as not to inadvertently influence, in any way, the ongoing criminal or administrative proceedings and the investigations. Many investigations instituted by the Department of Defense (DOD) are now ongoing. Indeed, this morning we see the opening of the first trials, an opening in a manner in which the entire world can see democracy in action.

As I have previously stated, this mistreatment of prisoners represents an appalling and totally unacceptable breach of military regulations and conduct. Our committee, a part of the United States Congress, a coequal branch of government, has a solemn responsibility to determine, as best we can, how this breakdown in military leadership and discipline occurred, and, most importantly, what steps are being taken, by the civilians in control and, indeed, those in the uniform, to see that it never, ever happens gain.

I firmly believe this prisoner mistreatment represents an extremely rare chapter in the otherwise proud, magnificent history of the United States military. It is counter to every human value that we, as Americans, have learned beginning in our earliest stage with our families, our schools, and our churches. It is counter to what this Nation stands for, and it is counter to the principles that the men and women of the Armed Forces, today and in years past, have fought to protect wherever they are in the world. It is counter to the cause of freedom.

There must be a full accountability for the abuse of Iraqi detainees, and important questions must be asked of the chain of command to understand what happened, how it happened, when it happened, and how those in positions of responsibility either ordered, encouraged, authorized, or maybe looked the other way at such conduct.

Our witnesses today are uniquely qualified to answer many of these important questions, including:

What policies and procedures were established for the treatment of prisoners and detainee interrogations?

What was the chain of command at the prison?

Were military police (MPs) or military intelligence (MI) personnel in charge, and at what times?

When did you—I say that collectively and individually—realize the magnitude, seriousness, and uniqueness of these allegations?

What measures did you take to inform the civilian structure, from the President to the DOD, Department of State, and others, that civilian structure that has the ultimate responsibility for the control of the United States military, which goes back to the very origins of this country?

What steps were taken to respond to earlier reports of mistreatment of prisoners received from the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and possibly other sources?

Finally, how did the conduct of interrogations and detainee operations evolve from May 2003 until January 2004?

I am confident that you will, to the best of your ability, be responsive to these and other questions.

I am proud of the manner in which the Armed Forces of the United States, represented by these extraordinarily accomplished officers before us, have promptly reacted to the allegations, undertaken the appropriate investigation, and begun disciplinary actions under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ). The trials, in some instances, begin today.

We are a nation of laws. We confront breaches of our laws openly and directly, and we must find the evidence to hold those who break the law accountable. We must not forget our overall purpose in Iraq and, indeed, in Afghanistan. Success in both areas is essential not only to our Nation and the people of Iraq, but to the entire world as we fight global terrorism.

We all have an important stake in learning the truth. We must not allow these acts of a few to tarnish the honor of the many dedicated men and women in uniform, 99.99 percent of whom are valiantly upholding the values they were taught in the cause of freedom, and doing so at great personal risk and with great sacrifice.

Lastly, how this hearing originated is spelled out in a letter that I wrote to the Secretary of Defense (SECDEF) last week on May 13, in which I thanked him for his participation and assistance in facilitating the hearings that we had had. I indicated that our committee would pursue further hearings and involve a list of witnesses, and I named them all, you three among them.

Then I will recite this paragraph: "To date, in scheduling, the committee has tried to meet your requirements, and we hope to continue such cooperation in arranging the earliest possible date for appearances of these witnesses. Given that some witnesses may need to remain in Iraq for operational reasons, we are open to exploring the option of video teleconferences for some hearings."

In the course of the last few days, in working with the Department on having, I thought, several civilians come up today, somewhat unexpectedly my distinguished colleague, Senator Levin, and I were informed that you were in town, General Abizaid, and had been for several days, and that the other witnesses were coming for consultation to the DOD. Therefore, the Secretary made you available here this morning. That is, plain and simple, how it happened.

As to the conduct of this hearing, the buck stops right here on this desk, and I am the chairman, and I consult with my members, as my distinguished ranking member consults with his, and I am very proud in the manner in which this committee has pursued its responsibilities under the Constitution. We are trying to search for the facts and put together a record so that we here in Congress, and, indeed, the American public can better understand these problems.

This story has been unfolding in many ways. First, a very brave enlisted man sought to bring to the attention of his superiors a problem which, frankly, in his gut he knew was wrong. He is to be commended for that. Thereafter, the military very quickly took action, and the rest is history. The press has been diligent. The victims have actually gone on to tell their story. The lawyers are trying to interpret it. Really, the distressing thing is watching the families of the soldiers who are under the UCMJ now being examined, as well as the families of other soldiers. I felt it was imperative that, at some point in time—and the Pentagon basically selected when that time would be: this morning—you would face the American public and then face the world and give your own personal accounts of how this situation happened and, most importantly, what we are going to do to see that it never happens again. That is the executive and legislative branches working together.

We are proud of the democracy here in America. It is an open process, and we are going to show the world how we fairly, firmly, and calmly deal with this situation.

Thank you.

Senator Levin.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN

Senator LEVIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

First I want to join you in welcoming our witnesses this morning. I want to join you in thanking each one of them for their service to our Nation. Most importantly of all, I join you, Mr. Chairman, in asking our witnesses to pass along to the troops under their command the gratitude of every member of this committee and of our Nation for their service.

The allegations of abuses of Iraqi detainees have shocked our country and shocked our justifiably proud Armed Forces and their families. The committee's hearing this morning is part of our continuing effort to investigate and find out the full extent of these abuses and how they could have happened. Insisting on accountability will help prevent future abuses, and hopefully help restore the credibility of our Nation within Iraq, the region, and throughout the world.

The inquiry is not just about the behavior of a few soldiers at a detention facility. We, of course, must do whatever we can to ensure that the perpetrators of the abuses are held accountable. But those who were responsible for encouraging, condoning, or tolerating such behavior, or who established or created an atmosphere or climate for such abusive behavior, must also be held accountable.

The February 2004 report of the ICRC presents an overview of documented abuses that extend beyond the conduct of interrogations at one cell block in one detention facility. The report sets forth an extensive list of methods of ill treatment used "in a systematic way" by MI at Abu Ghraib and a number of other facilities. The abuses that are alleged apparently are not limited to detention facilities. Many of the alleged violations are reported to have occurred at the time of arrest. This is particularly disturbing, given the statement in the ICRC report that "certain military intelligence officers" told the ICRC that, in their estimate, between 70 and 90 percent of the persons deprived of their liberty in Iraq had been arrested by mistake.

In addition, according to their report, the ICRC, in May 2003, handed over to CENTCOM, in Doha, a memorandum based on "over 200 allegations of ill treatment of prisoners of war during capture and interrogation." I know that General Abizaid and General Sanchez will inform us today about when the ICRC report and other reports of abuse were brought to their attention and what actions were ordered to address those concerns.

In addition to reports that were made in the field, ICRC President Kellenberger stated that he briefed administration officials, including Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) Administrator Paul Bremer, Secretary Powell, National Security Advisor Rice, and Pentagon officials, concerning allegations of abuse on a number of occasions, including in early- and mid-2003 and January 2004. We would be interested in hearing from our witnesses about what word, if any, was received from Washington or Ambassador Bremer as a result of those allegations of abuse being brought to the attention of administration officials.

Finally, I want to commend you, Mr. Chairman, for your determination to carry out the oversight responsibility of this committee. Committees of jurisdiction have an obligation to understand these events, to deter future abuses, and to help assure proper accountability. Mr. Chairman, you are leading this committee in a responsible way to do just that, and the Nation is in your debt for carrying out your duty as you see it.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Levin, the committee is acting as a whole. All members, and most especially yourself, have been responsible for conducting ourselves, I think, in strict accordance with the institution of the Senate and in the best interest of the Constitution.

Gentlemen, I ask you to rise. [Witnesses sworn.]

Chairman WARNER. General Abizaid.

STATEMENT OF GEN JOHN P. ABIZAID, USA, COMMANDER, UNITED STATES CENTRAL COMMAND

General ABIZAID. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Warner, Senator Levin, and members of the committee:

A few days ago I had the honor to talk to the class of 2004 at West Point, a group of young men and women who have dedicated themselves to service to the Nation, and who clearly understand that within the first year of their duties they will likely find themselves in combat, probably in the CENTCOM theater of operations. I could have just as easily been talking to young cadets at the Air Force or Naval Academies, or at countless other colleges or places where our young people are about to be commissioned as officers in our Armed Forces. One of the most important messages I had for them is my deep belief in the principle that officers of the United States military are responsible; that, when in charge, we must be in charge. This is as true for the lowest second lieutenant in the chain of command as it is for me. Every officer is responsible for what his or her unit does or fails to do. I accept that responsibility for CENTCOM.

I come before you as a senior regional commander to address the Abu Ghraib prison case, and, at the same time, I hope you will allow me to discuss the conduct of the war, not only in Iraq, but throughout the region.

As all of you understand, both General Sanchez and I, as members of the chain of command, have yet to examine all the facts about the incidents at Abu Ghraib and have made no judgement as to the guilt or innocence of any person associated with events there, nor have we precluded further action against others that additional testimony or evidence may indicate acted inappropriately or failed in their duties.

From evidence already gathered, we believe that systemic problems existed at the prison that may have contributed to events there. Other investigations are currently underway, and we will consider their findings carefully once they become available. We will follow the trail of evidence wherever it leads. We will continue to correct systemic problems. We will hold people accountable. In accordance with the UCMJ, we will take appropriate action.

On my way back to the States, I stopped and talked to many of the region's top military and political leaders to discuss Abu Ghraib and the situation in Iraq to assess the damage that this incident has done to our reputation. They, like us, and like the many Iraqis who talked to me before I last left Iraq, were shocked, disgusted, and disappointed at the images of abuse. Yet all of them expressed confidence that our system could and would produce answers and hold people accountable.

If we endanger our ability to see that justice is served, through failure to thoroughly investigate allegations, by inadvertently exerting inappropriate command influence, or through the inappropriate handling of evidence, we will do ourselves, the region, and Iraqis, in particular, a great disservice.

As concerned as the good people of the region are about what happened at Abu Ghraib, they are more concerned about our willingness to stay the course in Iraq and Afghanistan. They are more worried that we will lose our patience with the difficult task of stabilizing those places, and we will walk away, come home, and bring up the drawbridges and defend "Fortress America." For some of the nations in the region, our departure could be fatal. I reassured our friends that we are tough, that we cannot be defeated militarily, and that we will stay the course.

We know that we must move quickly from occupation to partnership in Iraq. We know that we must help the Afghan Government of President Karzai extend its influence throughout its own land. We must find and destroy al Qaeda and its ideological partners wherever we find them, and we must help the nations of the Middle East help themselves in fighting this desperate war against terror and extremism. We have given much blood and treasure since September 11, and we will give more.

Allowing moderation to succeed in a region where talented people seek prosperity and hope for their children is as an important victory as were our struggles against totalitarian regimes in World War II. Our enemies are in a unique position, and they are a unique brand of ideological extremists, whose vision of the world is best summed up by how the Taliban ran Afghanistan. If they can outlast us in Afghanistan and undermine the legitimate government there, they will once again fill up the seats at the soccer stadiums and force people to watch executions. If, in Iraq, the culture of intimidation practiced by our enemies is allowed to win, the mass graves will fill again.

Our enemies kill without remorse, they challenge our will through the careful manipulation of propaganda and information, and they seek safe havens in order to develop weapons of mass destruction (WMD) that they will use against us when they are ready. Their targets are not Kabul and Baghdad, but places like Madrid and London and New York. They are a patient and despicable enemy who seek to break our will, to terrorize us in such a manner as to cause us to leave the fight, to isolate us from our allies, to destroy those who seek a better future, and to wreck the patient work required to build reliable infrastructure and sophisticated economic structures. Unlike us, they will not hold themselves accountable for their outrages.

Our enemies believe they have scored a great victory in Madrid. They believe they changed a government and forced a valued ally off the battlefield. They see before them elections in Iraq, elections in Afghanistan, and, indeed, elections here at home and elsewhere. They see us mired in scandal and preoccupied with failure.

We should not kid ourselves about the violent times ahead. Yet we should also understand that despite the images of Abu Ghraib and burning High Mobility Multipurpose Wheeled Vehicles that constantly play on our media screens, we are winning the battle against extremism. Our troops are confident. They win tactical battle after tactical battle. They work with Iraqis and Afghans to build viable security forces. One day these viable security forces will allow us to come home. They know that the enemy is elusive and dangerous, and they know that they need to fight this war with balanced ferocity and compassion.

As we fight this most unconventional war of this new century, we must be patient and courageous. It will require a great amount of intelligence work. We must focus all of our national power, and recognize that this war requires as much political, economic, diplomatic, and national willpower to win as it does the courage to fight and to sacrifice with our young people in harm's way.

There are more people in the region who value peace over terrorism, who know that moderation brings prosperity and hope for their children. They also know that if they cannot stand alone, they certainly cannot expect that the United States of America will walk away from them.

Our gift to them has to be to give them a chance to win. Our great gift to ourselves will be to show a great and open demonstration that the rule of law applies in time of war, that despite the great demands of the day-to-day battles, we will fix what is broken, and we will let justice be served.

No doubt, we have made mistakes in Abu Ghraib. We have suffered a setback. I accept responsibility for that setback. But the failures of a few will not keep the many courageous young men and women of ours from accomplishing their dangerous and important work to defend the Nation abroad.

I thank the committee.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, General, for a very good statement.

General Sanchez.

STATEMENT OF LTG RICARDO S. SANCHEZ, USA, COMMANDER, MULTI-NATIONAL FORCE—IRAQ

General SANCHEZ. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, thank you for the opportunity to appear before the committee and talk to you about events in Iraq, and specifically the events at Abu Ghraib.

Before I talk about these events, I am proud to report that over 150,000 coalition military personnel are doing great work in Iraq under very difficult circumstances. They are fighting an insurgency, rebuilding and protecting infrastructure, and setting the conditions for the inevitable turnover to an interim government on the June 30. Those soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines of America, and the people who support them, are stunned, disappointed, and embarrassed by the events that transpired at Abu Ghraib prison. However, like me, these great service members also understand that we must continue with our mission.

Regarding the events at Abu Ghraib, we must fully investigate and fix responsibility as well as accountability. I am fully committed to thorough and impartial investigations that examine the role, commissions, and omissions of the entire chain of command, and that includes me. As a senior commander in Iraq, I accept responsibility for what happened at Abu Ghraib, and I accept, as a solemn obligation, the responsibility to ensure that it does not happen again.

We have already initiated courts-martial in seven cases, and there may very well be more prosecutions. The Army Criminal Investigative Division's (CID) investigation is not final, and the investigation of MI procedures by Major General Fay is also ongoing. We may find that the evidence produced in these investigations not only leads to more courts-martials, but cause us to revisit actions previously taken to determine whether to initiate judicial or non-judicial action in cases which may have been handled to date by adverse administrative action.

In this regard, I must be very circumspect in what I say. We must let our military justice process work. It is a process in which the American people can and should have confidence, and one in which I take great pride.

I cannot say anything that might compromise the fairness or integrity of the process, or in any way suggest the result in a particular case. I have taken an oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States, and that includes ensuring that all persons receive a fair trial and, if found guilty, appropriate punishment.

This respect for the rule of law has been a guiding principle for my command. There is no doubt that the laws of war, including the Geneva Conventions, apply to our operations in Iraq. This includes interrogations. I have reinforced this point by way of orders and command policies. In September and October 2003, and in May 2004, I issued interrogation policies that reiterated the application of the Geneva Conventions and required that all interrogations be conducted in a lawful and humane manner with command oversight.

In October 2003, I issued a memorandum for all coalition forces personnel that was titled "Proper Treatment of Iraqi People During Combat Operations." I reissued this memorandum on January 16 after learning about the events that had taken place at Abu Ghraib.

On March 4, 2004, I issued my Policy Memorandum Number 18, titled "Proper Conduct During Combat Operations." This document, which I also reissued in April, emphasized the need to treat all Iraqis with dignity and respect. This policy memorandum also contained a summary for distribution, down to the individual soldier level, that provided clear guidance and mandated training on the following points: Follow the law of war and the rules of engagement (ROE); treat all persons with humanity, dignity, and respect; use judgement and discretion in detaining civilians; respect private property; and treat journalists with dignity and respect.

With regards to Abu Ghraib, as soon as I learned of the reported abuses, I ensured that a criminal investigation had been initiated, and requested my superior appoint an investigating officer to conduct a separate administrative investigation under Army Regulation 15-6 into this matter. Within days of receiving the initial report, I directed suspension of key members of the chain of command of the unit responsible for detainee security at Abu Ghraib.

The criminal investigation, while still underway, resulted, thus far, in the decision to initiate court-martial proceedings against seven individuals. The administrative investigation that was conducted by Major General Taguba has caused me to change the way we conduct detention, internment, and interrogation operations.

One significant change has been the addition to my staff of a general officer with responsibility for detention operations. Major General Geoffrey Miller was assigned this task, and has taken numerous positive steps to eliminate the possibility that such abuse could occur in the future.

Well before I received the January 14 report and viewed the shocking photographs later on, I had directed steps be taken to improve the overall condition of detainees at Abu Ghraib. Back in August 2003, I requested that subject-matter experts conduct a comprehensive assessment of all detention operations in Iraq. This was the genesis for the report completed by Major General Ryder, the Provost Marshal General of the Army.

In September, a team headed by General Miller assessed our intelligence interrogation activities and humane detention operations. We reviewed the recommendations with the express understanding, reinforced in conversations between General Miller and me, that they might have to be modified for use in Iraq, where the Geneva Conventions were fully applicable.

Plans for the new detainee camp at Abu Ghraib, which will now be called Camp Redemption, were begun in November of 2003 in order to relieve overcrowding at the facility. After a series of mortar attacks against the facility in September which killed and injured both Iraqi detainees and U.S. soldiers, I directed increased force-protection measures be taken in order to protect coalition forces and detainees. Plans to upgrade the facilities for soldiers and detainees were also implemented.

Finally, the rate at which detainee case files were reviewed and recommended for release or continued internment was increased, both in November 2003 and again in February 2004, in order to ensure that only those detainees who posed a threat to security were detained. Indeed, our February 2004 changes resulted in the review of over 100 cases per day. The terrible events that occurred in the fall of 2003 have obviously highlighted additional problems that we have moved quickly to address.

While horrified at the abusive behavior that took place at Abu Ghraib, I believe that I have taken the proper steps to ensure that such behavior is not repeated. I further believe that my actions have sent the correct message that such behavior is inconsistent with our values, our standards, and our training. I have faith in our military justice system to resolve the cases brought before it.

I would like to read the concluding paragraph from my memorandum to the command on proper conduct during combat operations. I believe it is an accurate summary of my standards and expectations. "Respect for others, humane treatment of all persons, and adherence to the law of war and rules of engagement is a matter of discipline and values. It is what separates us from our enemies. I expect all leaders to reinforce this message."

In closing, the war in Iraq continues against a relentless enemy that is focused on preventing the Iraqi people from achieving their dream of freedom, prosperity, and security. This awful episode at Abu Ghraib must not allow us to get distracted. America's Armed Forces are performing magnificently, sacrificing every single day to defeat an enemy that is ruthless and elusive in its quest to terrorize Iraq and the world. The honor and value systems of our Armed Forces are solid and the bedrock of what makes us the best in the world. There has been no catastrophic failure, and America's Armed Forces will never compromise their honor. America must not falter in this endeavor to defeat those who seek to destroy our democratic value systems. In Iraq, the coalition military, including our 130,000 Americans, remain focused, and I guarantee you they will not fail.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, General. That is a very comprehensive statement, and I would ask, on behalf of the committee, that the documents that you referred to in your testimony—could copies be provided to the committee?

General SANCHEZ. We will comply, Mr. Chairman.

MEMORANDUM FOR All Coalition Forces Personnel

SUBJECT: Proper Conduct During Combat Operations

1. Purpose. This memorandum reemphasizes the responsibility of Coalition Forces to treat all persons with dignity and respect. It reiterates the obligation of Coalition personnel to comply with the law of war.
2. Humane Treatment of the Iraqi People. Coalition Forces are committed to restoring the human rights of the Iraqi civilians and the rule of law. We must treat all civilians with humanity, dignity and respect for their property and culture. Coalition Forces preserve human life by avoiding civilian casualties and rendering prompt medical attention to persons injured during combat operations. Use judgment and discretion in deciding whether to detain civilians. In all circumstances, treat those who are not taking an active part in hostilities, including prisoners and detainees, humanely. Remain particularly aware of heightened sensitivity in the Iraqi and Islamic cultures concerning the treatment of females. Whenever possible, females will be searched in a non-public location; unless absolutely necessary, male soldiers will not search females.
3. Force Protection and the Lawful Use of Force. We are conducting combat operations in a complex, dangerous environment. Coalition Forces must remain bold and aggressive, yet disciplined, in their use of force. When in contact with the enemy, use only that force necessary to accomplish the mission while minimizing unintended damage. Our posture must be strong and determined, while remaining firmly in control of the destructive power of our weapons. You have learned the principles of the law of war throughout your military careers. As professional soldiers, you must follow them, and comply with the rules of engagement. Before engaging any target, you must be reasonably certain that it is a legitimate military target. Self-defense is always authorized.
4. Treatment of Journalists. Coalition Forces will treat journalists and media representatives with dignity and respect. Verbal or physical harassment of media members is inconsistent with our values as professional soldiers. Media coverage, in large part, shapes domestic and international public perception of the security environment in Iraq. The media's mission to report the story of the reconstruction and security of Iraq is important to our mission. Independent coverage by local, national and international media will be facilitated to the maximum extent possible consistent with force protection and security. Journalists and media representatives must be permitted to travel without undue hindrance in order to pursue their profession. They can be expected to operate as both embedded and independent reporters, provided they do not represent a risk to Coalition Forces, CPA members or the Iraqi Security Forces. Their equipment will be seized, and film or digital disks erased, only when required for imperative reasons of security and in accordance with procedures stated in CJTF-7 Frago 1176, Treatment of Journalists/Media Representatives, 041815DEC03.

5. A summary of "Rules of Proper Conduct During Combat Operations" is enclosed. This memorandum and the Rules of Proper Conduct will be distributed down to the platoon level. Leaders will ensure that all CJTF-7 personnel are trained on the Rules of Proper Conduct. Additionally, leaders will ensure that all CJTF-7 personnel receive refresher training on the rules of engagement, which includes training on the disciplined use of force, posted on the CJTF-7 CENTRIX web-site (Staff Section/SJA/Rules of Engagement/ROE Vignettes.ppt (30 JAN 04)).

6. Conclusion. Respect for others, humane treatment of all persons, and adherence to the law of war and rules of engagement is a matter of discipline and values. It is what separates us from our enemies. I expect all leaders to reinforce this message.

 - Remain bold and aggressive, yet disciplined, in the use of force.
 - SELF-DEFENSE IS BOTH AUTHORIZED AND REQUIRED.

2. TREAT ALL PERSONS WITH HUMANITY, DIGNITY AND RESPECT.
 - Remain culturally aware. When uncertain as to whether your actions will offend Iraqi or Islamic culture discuss your actions with a chaplain or other knowledgeable person.
 - Render prompt medical care to persons injured during operations.
 - Respect the honor of women.
 - Search females with female soldiers in a non-public area whenever possible; unless absolutely necessary, male soldiers will not search females.

3. USE JUDGMENT AND DISCRETION IN DETAINING CIVILIANS.
 - Detain persons only when necessary and in accordance with the rules of engagement.
 - Treat all detainees humanely – if force is required, use only minimum necessary force.
 - Use hoods only when necessary for imperative reasons of safety or security, and consider the use of blindfolds as a less demeaning way to limit detainees' vision.
 - Fill out the CPA Apprehension Form legibly and completely. Provide the details that will allow your higher headquarters to know whether to keep a person in detention as a criminal or a threat to security.

4. RESPECT PRIVATE PROPERTY.

 - Provide claims forms to potential civilian claimants if operations result in unintended damage to innocent persons or property.

5. TREAT JOURNALISTS WITH DIGNITY AND RESPECT.
 - Do not verbally or physically harass journalists or media representatives.
 - Do not seize journalists' equipment, or erase film or digital disks, unless required for imperative reasons of security.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.
General Miller.

STATEMENT OF MG GEOFFREY D. MILLER, USA, DEPUTY COMMANDER FOR DETAINEE OPERATIONS, MULTI-NATIONAL FORCE—IRAQ

General MILLER. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, thank you for affording me this opportunity to appear this morning. While I have no opening statement, I do stand with the statements of General Abizaid and General Sanchez.

Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Colonel Warren, do you wish to add anything?

STATEMENT OF COL MARC L. WARREN, STAFF JUDGE ADVOCATE, CJTF-7

Colonel WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I have no opening statement, but I would be happy to respond to any questions.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

We will have a 6-minute round and I advise the committee that, in consultation with General Abizaid and the ranking member, there will be a brief closed session following the open session, such that we can receive some classified material.

General Abizaid, what policies has CENTCOM established for the conduct of interrogations in detainee operations? When were these policies established? What allegations of abuse are you aware of that could have also occurred in Afghanistan? Are the policies being uniformly applied and enforced throughout your area of responsibility (AOR)?

General ABIZAID. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

As I believe the Army has come over and discussed with the committee, the total number of detainee abuse cases that have been investigated since, I believe, the beginning of the conflict in Afghanistan is around 75. Of course, there are some death investigations, as well. We have homicide investigations that go back as far as December 2002 in Afghanistan that we absolutely have to move on and understand what happened there. We are working with the Army CID to understand that. But I believe the committee has the statistics on abuse.

Abuse has happened. Abuse has happened in Afghanistan, it has happened in Iraq, it has happened at various places. The question is, is there a systemic abuse problem with regard to interrogation that exists in the CENTCOM AOR?

Yesterday—and I know the committee has not had a chance to review it yet—I did see the preliminary findings of a Department of the Army Inspector General (IG) investigation that talked about problems in training, problems in organization, very specific changes that will need to be made in doctrine, et cetera. I specifically asked the IG of the Army if he believed that there was a pattern of abuse of prisoners in the CENTCOM AOR. He looked at both Afghanistan and Iraq, and he said no. I sent my IG out in August of last year, asking him the same question, Are we treating people with dignity and respect?

Chairman WARNER. What findings did he report back when you sent him out in August?

General ABIZAID. He came back and said that we were struggling with the number of prisoners, we were struggling with the facilities, and we were struggling to, in particular, deal with criminal detainees that needed to go into an Iraqi criminal detention system that still did not exist.

Chairman WARNER. But he did not discover any of the evidence that is now being revealed about these abuses?

General ABIZAIID. No, sir, he did not.

Chairman WARNER. All right. That is a direct answer.

Can you provide the committee, without violating UCMJ procedures, your own personal observations as to what you believe happened from the breakdown of the orders to General Sanchez, as clearly documented here this morning, and where it happened?

General ABIZAIID. Sir, I think you know that Major General Fay is still conducting—

Chairman WARNER. Yes.

General ABIZAIID.—an investigation, and so I am not quite ready to say where I think all the breakdowns were. But it is clear that there were some breakdowns in procedures, in access, in standards of interrogation, in confusion between the roles of what the MI people were doing, versus the MPs. There was also, clearly, criminal misconduct that took place.

Chairman WARNER. All right.

General ABIZAIID. The criminal misconduct is not the subject of any order or policy that I believe exists anywhere.

Chairman WARNER. There has been, of course, concern that the initial steps by the chain of command were directed at a group of enlisted people who are now subject to various forms of UCMJ accountability. Can you assure this committee that you will diligently pursue all evidence and—no matter how high up the chain, or sideways or down the chain—all persons will be brought forward, subject to the UCMJ?

General ABIZAIID. Sir, I assure the committee that we will do that.

Chairman WARNER. Fine.

General ABIZAIID. I can also assure the committee that I have been in this business a long time, and when General Sanchez called me up and told me, I think, probably within 24 hours of the evidence being handed to his CID people in Baghdad, he followed it up very shortly with a decision to suspend the entire chain of command, which is a pretty strong action that does not just focus at a low level. He initiated investigations and he moved ahead in a way that I thought was commendable.

Chairman WARNER. Do you feel that the UCMJ procedures and other regulations impeded, in any way, your responsibility to keep the civilian control structure back in Washington advised?

General ABIZAIID. No, sir, it did not impede us. As always, we believe that we have to do everything possible to protect the evidence that is available to keep the investigatory information within investigatory channels, and that is what we tried to do.

Chairman WARNER. You tried to do that in a timely fashion.

General ABIZAIID. That is what we tried to do, yes, sir.

Chairman WARNER. General Sanchez, on November 19 you directed that the commander of the 205th MI Brigade assume command of all units and operations in the Abu Ghraib prison. Why did you put MI in charge of the prison? In your view, did this new command arrangement improve intelligence and detainee operations? What objections did General Karpinski, commander, have concerning the change in command responsibilities?

General SANCHEZ. Mr. Chairman, on November 19, I issued a Fragmentary Order that placed all elements at Abu Ghraib under the tactical control of Colonel Pappas, the 205th MI commander. The specific order stated that this was for forward-operating base (FOB) protection and for security of detainees. The context of the order was that we had been receiving significant amounts of direct and indirect fire, and, during the conduct of one my visits, I had found that force protection and the defensive planning of that FOB was seriously lacking, and I needed to get a senior commander in charge of the defense of that FOB, and that was the purpose of the order.

The order did not intend to eliminate any of the responsibilities of the 800th MP Commander, and that was a specific purpose for the tactical control (TACON). TACON placed the 320th under the 205th MI Brigade Commander, and what that does—specifically, it gives the MI brigade commander authority to conduct local direction and control of movements or maneuvers to accomplish the mission at hand. All of the other responsibilities for continuing to run the prison, for logistics, training, discipline, and the conduct of police—or, correction—of prison operations remained with the 800th MP Brigade Commander. There was never a time where General Karpinski surfaced to me any objections to that TACON order.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you.

General Abizaid, you have, quite properly, advised this committee this morning that you are fighting a war. This responsibility, occasioned by these abuses, has taken a measure of your time, but you have continued, and your troops have performed bravely.

Here is the question I put to you, eliciting your professional and personal view: Is the scheduled change of limited sovereignty on July 1 consistent and achievable, in your judgement, given the security situation?

General ABIZAID. Mr. Chairman, it is achievable, but it needs to emerge soon as to who is going to be in charge, what their names are, where they are going to be, and what they are going to do.

Chairman WARNER. That is on the Iraqi side.

General ABIZAID. That is correct.

Chairman WARNER. It is clear on our side that we have a United States Ambassador in place to provide the security?

General ABIZAID. Sir, we are going to be there, no matter what.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you.

Senator Levin.

Senator LEVIN. Thank you.

General Sanchez, your answer to Senator Warner about who was responsible for the MP units conducting detainee operations at that facility leaves me uncertain now, because General Taguba says that your order of November 19 effectively made the MI officer, rather than the MP officer, responsible for the MP units conducting detainee operations. That is a quote. Do you disagree with General Taguba, then, on that point?

General SANCHEZ. Senator, the purpose of the order was as described. It was to ensure that I had synchronized FOB defenses, and that was the purpose for the TACON order that was issued to the MP unit at that installation.

Senator LEVIN. In addition to its purpose, though, General Taguba said that the MI officer then became responsible for the MP units conducting the operations. Do you differ with that?

General SANCHEZ. They were responsive to the MI officer for the specific purpose of defending the FOB, Senator.

Senator LEVIN. That did not, then, include conducting detainee interrogations.

General SANCHEZ. That is exactly right, sir. It did not include that.

Senator LEVIN. There is a difference there between you and General Taguba.

General SANCHEZ. Yes, sir.

Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid, in May 2003, the ICRC sent to the coalition forces a memorandum based on over 200 allegations of ill treatment of prisoners during capture and interrogation at collecting points, battle-group stations, and temporary holding areas, according to the ICRC report, which I am now reading. It said here that CENTCOM in Doha received this memorandum. I am wondering if, in fact, you remember receiving that memorandum and what action you took on it.

General ABIZAID. There are some ICRC reports, Senator, that we received. Which one are you talking about?

Senator LEVIN. May 2003.

General ABIZAID. I know that the May 2003 report was received at our headquarters, that is correct.

Senator LEVIN. What action do you remember taking?

General ABIZAID. I was the deputy commander at the time. I know that we discussed the report, we sent it forward to the Coalition Forces Land Component Commander, General McKiernan, and we asked for his take on it.

Senator LEVIN. Did you receive a report from him, do you remember?

General ABIZAID. I do not believe we received a report in writing. I do not recall having a lot to do with this particular report, or paying much attention to it.

Senator LEVIN. Perhaps you could check your records and supply to the committee any documents relative to that.

General ABIZAID. I will, sir.

MEMORANDUM FOR CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE

SUBJECT: Combined Forces Land Component Command Response to International Committee of the Red Cross's May 2003 Report

1. During the SASC hearings on 19 May 2004, Senator Levin requested that Commander, United States Central Command, supply the committee with any documents relative to a 12 May 2003 report made by the International Committee of the Red Cross.
2. A diligent and thorough search of records held at United States Central Command and Combined Forces Land Component Command revealed that neither command had any documents responsive to the report made by the International Committee of the Red Cross.
3. My POC for this action is LTC John S. T. Irgens, DSN 651-6422.

JOHN G. CASTELLAW
Major General, USMC

Senator LEVIN. In early July, according to the ICRC, they sent to the coalition forces a working paper detailing approximately 50 allegations of ill treatment in the MI section of Camp Cropper. This, according to their report, set forth requiring or using stress positions for 3 or 4 hours, physical hits, prolonged exposure to sun, and a number of other allegations. Can you tell us whether the early July ICRC report was received at headquarters?

General ABIZAID. No, and we have a real problem with ICRC reports and the way that they are handled and the way that they move up and down the chain of command. For example, the February report of 2004, I first read in May.

Senator LEVIN. But relative to the early July report—

General ABIZAID. I will not make any excuses for it, Senator. I will just say that we do not all see them. Sometimes it works at a lower level. Sometimes commanders at the lowest level get the report, and they work on it confidentially. I think what we have to do is have a system, when there is something that comes to the attention at any level of command, that is not being worked through at the lower level, but that it surface all the way up through the chain of command. So we have a problem there that has to be fixed.

Senator LEVIN. Thank you.

General Sanchez, is there a record of the ICRC working paper being received by you or at your level?

General SANCHEZ. Is this the July paper?

Senator LEVIN. The July working paper detailing 50 allegations of ill treatment.

General SANCHEZ. Not that I am aware of, Senator.

Senator LEVIN. So there is no indication at your level, at your headquarters, that that document was ever received?

General SANCHEZ. No, Senator. The working paper that I am aware of that made it to my headquarters was the November paper.

Senator LEVIN. The Interrogation Rules of Engagement is a document which was presented to this committee by General Alexander, saying that the ROE that were in effect at the Combined Joint Task Force 7 (CTJF-7) in Iraq prior to 2003 are set forth on a piece of paper, which—are you familiar with it?—called “Interrogation Rules of Engagement”?

General SANCHEZ. Yes, sir, I have seen that.

Senator LEVIN. Did you approve this? Did you have legal advice? What is this document that General Alexander told us were the ROE that were in effect at the CJTF?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, the first time I saw that paper was when it was shown in one of the prior hearings in this same forum.

Senator LEVIN. So that he would—

General SANCHEZ. I had no role in preparing it or approving it.

Senator LEVIN. All right. So he was in error, then, relative to that? General Alexander, then, would have been in error if he said this was the document—

General SANCHEZ. Right, sir. I have never seen that, I had never approved it, and I had no part in putting that together, sir.

Senator LEVIN. I do not believe this committee has your October 12 policy statement. If I am wrong, then fine. But would you provide that October 12 statement to the committee?

General SANCHEZ. Yes, sir.

[The information referred to follows:]

The requested document was provided to the committee as an attachment to the question for the record (QFR) 76 for Lieutenant General Sanchez.

Senator LEVIN. Finally, the newspaper reported that a hundred or so high-value detainees do not fall under your command, General Sanchez, but are the responsibility of General Dayton, who is commander of the Iraq Survey Group and reports directly to General Abizaid. Is that accurate, as far as you know?

General SANCHEZ. Yes, sir, that is accurate.

Senator LEVIN. Do you know why?

General SANCHEZ. My MPs provide security at that—

Senator LEVIN. Can you just tell us, then, why that was done that way, General Abizaid?

General ABIZAID. Sir, that was done that way because the people at Camp Cropper happened to be those people who had theoretical information concerning WMD information, and also were the high-value detainees who we hope someday to turn over to a legitimate Iraqi government for trial.

Senator LEVIN. But why should they be treated differently from other detainees, separated out that way?

General ABIZAID. They were separated out that way to ensure that we understood, I guess I would call it, the strategic environment, as opposed to the tactical environment, where we would get information from lower-level detainees. It was established that way as a result of discussions that had taken place here in Washington regarding having a better and more efficient way to really understand what was going on with regard to WMD.

Senator LEVIN. That was all, then, WMD-information related, basically?

General ABIZAID. It was, sir, but it was also dealing with very senior levels of the former Iraqi Government.

Senator LEVIN. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

I have just been told that the DOD has informed the committee that another disk of pictures has been located, and I will soon advise the committee on the conditions under which that can be viewed.

Senator McCain.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank the witnesses, particularly Generals Miller, Abizaid, and Sanchez, for their outstanding service to our Nation under the most difficult circumstances. I was pleased to hear that you were here on other business and did not have to be called back from the theater of operations. I thank you for all the time and effort you have devoted to trying to resolve this terrible issue. We are very grateful for that and for your appearance here today.

General Sanchez, according to a November 19, 2003, message, as you responded to questions from Senator Warner and Senator Levin, you transferred full responsibility to Colonel Pappas to assume full responsibility for Abu Ghraib and appointed the National Guard units to be under the tactical control of 205th MI Brigade Commander for security of detainees and FOB protection. I quote from your message. I think that is accurate.

In his statement to General Taguba, Colonel Pappas said, "Policies and procedures established by the joint detention and detention center at Abu Ghraib relative to detainee operations were enacted as a specific result of a visit by Major General Geoffrey Miller, Commander Joint Task Force Gitmo." He went on to say, "The key findings of his visit were that the interrogators and analysts developed a set of rules and limitations to guide interrogation and provide dedicated MPs to support interrogation operations." I repeat, "and provide dedicated MPs to support interrogation operations."

Now, General Sanchez, General Miller's report, as I understand it, had observations and recommendations. One of those recommendations was, "It is essential that the guard force be actively engaged in setting the conditions for successful exploitation of the internees."

Am I accurate so far, General Sanchez?

General SANCHEZ. Yes, Senator.

Senator MCCAIN. General Miller.

General MILLER. Yes, sir, you are.

Senator MCCAIN. Well, General Miller, do you believe that your instructions may have been misinterpreted?

General MILLER. Senator, I do not. On our visit to the JTF to be able to give an assessment of the intelligence function—it is three major areas: intelligence fusion, the interrogation process, and humane detention—the team of 19 experts laid out those standards that would allow for humane detention, interrogation in accordance with the Geneva Conventions, and then recommended procedures by which intelligence could be fused more rapidly to provide actionable intelligence for units and for the JTF itself.

Senator MCCAIN. Well, thank you. But it seems to me that this order that I just quoted turned over certain MP duties to the control of Colonel Pappas and then certain things happened. According to General Taguba's report, soldiers were questioned who were involved in this.

Soldier number one, question: "Have you ever been directed by the MI, military intelligence, personnel or any government agency to soften up a prisoner prior to interrogation?"

Answer: "Yes. Sometimes they would ask me to show a prisoner, 'special attention.'"

Soldier number two: "Have you ever been told by MI personnel to work over a prisoner?"

"Yes. MI told us to rough them up to get answers from the prisoners."

"Why didn't you report the abuse?"

"Because I assumed that if we were doing anything wrong or out of the ordinary or outside the guidelines, someone would have said something. Also, the wing belonged to military intelligence, and it appeared military intelligence personnel approved of the abuse."

Soldier number three, question: "What can you tell us about the abuse of prisoners at Abu Ghraib?"

"Yeah, the MI staffs, to my understanding, have given compliments to us on the way we were handling the MI holds. Example being statements like: 'Good job. They're breaking down real fast,'" "They answer every question now. Keep it up," and "They're giving out good information."

Soldier number four: "Have you heard MI insinuate the guards to abuse inmates of any type of manner?"

"Yes."

"What was said?"

Answer: "They said, 'Loosen this guy up for us. Make sure he has a bad night. Make sure he gets the treatment.'"

Do you see my point, Major General Miller? According to General Taguba's report, there were at least a number of guards, MPs, who were under the impression, or stated that they were under the impression, that they were under specific directions of MI personnel to, "rough up, soften up, given 'em a bad night," et cetera. How do we respond to that, General Miller?

General MILLER. Senator, in the recommendations that we made—

Senator MCCAIN. This goes back to my first question. Does this lead you to believe that your orders were misinterpreted?

General MILLER. No, sir. The leadership that received the recommendations throughout the JTF had a clear understanding of the recommendations that we made in those three areas of intelligence fusion, interrogation, and humane detention that laid out those requirements, that laid the base that they must be in concert with the Geneva Conventions, and gave recommendations from our experience about how those three functions could be done successfully.

Senator MCCAIN. There must have been a breakdown somewhere.

General MILLER. Sir, in my estimation, it was a breakdown in leadership on how follow-on actions may have occurred, but I was not present at that time, so it would be difficult for me to give a—

Senator MCCAIN. General Sanchez, my time is expired.

Chairman WARNER. Yes, go ahead.

Senator MCCAIN. General Sanchez, please?

General SANCHEZ. Senator, I wanted to make one clarification, that General Miller did not issue any orders, and he has not issued any orders, until he arrived as the deputy commanding general for detainee operations. Those orders were my orders, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. I guess my question was better directed to you. Were those orders misinterpreted?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, I do not believe those orders were misinterpreted. The procedures that General Miller and I had discussed, that he recommended, were very detailed, and it very clearly stated that MPs were involved in passive enabling of those operations and had no involvement in the conduct of interrogations. Those were the orders in the standard operating procedures (SOPs) that remained after General Miller's visit.

Senator MCCAIN. I thank the witnesses. My time has expired.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much. General, I echo the sense that all of us greatly respect you and the troops who you are commanding. We have lost 23 very brave soldiers from my State of Massachusetts and we are all very mindful of the complexities and the difficulties that the uniformed service personnel are facing over there. So we thank you so much for your leadership and your careers of public service in serving our country.

General Sanchez, as an old MP myself, I am surprised that you think the MI are better at protecting the forces than the MPs, but we will leave that for another time.

When we had the SECDEF here, General Abizaid, last week, he denied that there was any failure to take any of these reports seriously. The military, not the media, discovered these abuses, he said. Specialist Joseph Darby reported the acts of abuse at Abu Ghraib prison in mid-January. According to Secretary Rumsfeld, by the next day, investigations were authorized.

Yet now we learn, both from the front page of The New York Times and the front page of The Wall Street Journal today, that the ICRC observed abuses in the prison during the two unannounced inspections in October 2003 and it complained in a strongly-worded written report on November 6. This report was reviewed by senior military officials in Iraq, including two advisors to General Sanchez, according to this report.

So it appears that the military's first reaction was to restrict future ICRC visits to Abu Ghraib. That is the story in here. After the ICRC had provided two critical reports, the reaction of the military personnel who were dealing with the prison then was to restrict access. They said, "You have to give us notice." All of us understand what that means. If you are going to give notice prior to the inspections, it obviously compromises the inspections.

So according to those news reports, nothing was done in the prison for 2 months. The military previously acknowledged that the worst abuses continued into December 2003.

So we have the SECDEF saying one thing, and we are learning, from two newspapers, another story. That is why I think we were trying to find out exactly who was in charge and who bears the responsibility. These are completely conflicting stories that have come out within a period of just a few weeks here before this committee. I do not know whether you have any reaction to those stories, whether you had a chance to see those this morning.

I want to move on quickly. I suppose it is fair to ask, who in Iraq or in CENTCOM is responsible for receiving and responding to the reports of violations of international law or conventions by U.S. military personnel?

General ABIZAIID. I am responsible. If someone brings it to my attention, I am responsible, and I will not turn my back on any report that I receive.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, you obviously did not get these reports.

General ABIZAIID. No, I did not, but—

Senator KENNEDY. Well, I am asking who would have gotten these reports. Who would have received this report in the chain of command? General?

General SANCHEZ. Senator, the November report was received by the brigade commander. Then, as I find out now, the CJTF-7 staff assisted her in responding to that report.

Senator KENNEDY. Did that brigade commander receive all of the reports, or just who, institutionally—

General SANCHEZ. No, sir. What—

Senator KENNEDY.—receives, within your organization, any of the—like for the ICRC violations that come on in. Who is in charge on that? Who receives it?

General SANCHEZ. When the February 2004 report came in, that is when I found out that the November working papers had been issued to the brigade commander. At that point, I immediately changed the procedure and required that those reports come to me as the senior commander in the country. That is the procedure now.

Senator KENNEDY. There was no central receiving officer in charge prior to what you have just established? Is that right?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, prior to that, those all would come to the Staff JAG's Office. That was the repository, and he was the point of contact, in terms of commander—it was coming at the lowest level.

Senator KENNEDY. At the staff JAG officer—

General SANCHEZ. Yes, sir, that is correct.

General ABIZAIID. If I may, sir, this system is broken.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. All right.

General ABIZAIID. We have to fix it.

Senator KENNEDY. Let me move on to General Miller. After your assessment of the detention interrogation in Iraq, you stated that it was essential that the guard force be actively engaged in setting the conditions for the successful exploitation of the internees. General Taguba strongly disapproved of the recommendation, and he has stated that setting of the conditions for the detainees' successful exploitation through interrogation is fundamentally inconsistent with Army regulations and undermines the goals of running a safe and secure detention facility. That is what he testified to here, before this committee.

The New York Times reported yesterday that Colonel Thomas Pappas, who is the MI Brigade Commander at Abu Ghraib, told General Taguba that there were no safeguards to ensure the MPs at Abu Ghraib behaved properly in setting conditions for the detainees. "There would be no way for us to actually monitor whether that happened," Colonel Pappas said. "We have no formal system in place to do that." General Taguba also found the MPs had not been trained on the Geneva Conventions.

Was this not a catastrophic failure of leadership? How would you expect an average soldier in the Army to understand the term "successful exploitation" is not simply an euphemism for "anything goes"? Do you take responsibility for that failure?

General MILLER. Thank you, Senator.

The Taguba Report was very thorough, but I would like to clarify on this one point. The recommendation that my team made in the September time frame was that the MPs help set the conditions for successful interrogation as we had learned of their success in Guantanamo. The recommendation was that they conduct passive intelligence-gathering during this process. That meant to observe the detainees, to see how their behavior was, to see who they would speak with, and then to report that to the interrogators so the interrogators could better understand the human dynamic of the detainee as he would come into the interrogation booth.

We also recommended that the MPs, for security reasons, would accompany the detainee from the cell block, or the area where they were held, up to the interrogation booth, because they are security risks. Then the MP would wait somewhere else, and then accompany the detainee back. Our recommendation was that the MPs did not actively participate in any form of the interrogation itself. That was explained, in detail, to the chain of command. The SOP that laid that out was provided to them. It is about 200 pages long, and it goes into great detail about how this system works, because it says, in the SOP, that the MPs are not trained intelligence officers and should not initiate questioning or anything like that; they were just to be observers of that process. So that was the active support for the interrogation process that was recommended.

So, Senator, I will tell you, I believe that the recommendations we made, had they been implemented, would have not only increased the intelligence value of what was being done, but helped ensure that humane detention was accomplished throughout every facility.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Before responding, General Sanchez, you made full reference to the brigade commander. Now, that would be General Karpinski?

General SANCHEZ. Yes, sir, that is correct.

Chairman WARNER. All right. I want the record to reflect that.

General ABIZAID. Mr. Chairman, just for the record, I would like to caution the committee. We still do not know what we do not know.

Chairman WARNER. That is very clear, and we recognize that. It has been a struggle to get a full understanding throughout this whole thing and that is why we have to entrust credibility to what the DOD, and the Army particularly, are doing now with a series of investigations. We fully appreciate that.

General ABIZAID. I think that Major General Fay's report will go a long way to make us understand this dynamic between MPs and MI, in particular, relative to Senator McCain's questions.

Chairman WARNER. I share that. Thank you, General.
Senator Roberts.

Senator ROBERTS. General Abizaid, you realize that your statement is contrary to the United States Senate, where we always know what we do not know. [Laughter.]

Let me say that I want to thank Senator McCain for his comments, because I think he spoke for the whole committee in reference to the contribution that you are making to our country and your service to our country, and I would like to associate myself with his remarks.

I am going to try to get my fast questions in to General Miller and basically—well, first let me ask of General Sanchez, no soldier would be justified in interpreting an order in such a way as to violate the UCMJ, is that correct?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, I would agree with that, absolutely.

Senator ROBERTS. So even if a soldier did misinterpret General Miller's recommendation, even though I doubt if they had it, to carry out these acts, it would not be an excuse, would it?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, that is correct. That is a basic instinct we have built into the soldier.

Senator ROBERTS. General Miller, would the abuse evidenced by the photos be permitted or condoned under any practices or policies that were recommended in your report?

General MILLER. Senator, they absolutely would not be.

Senator ROBERTS. Would the abuse evidenced in the photos be permitted or condoned at any of the practices or policies at Guantanamo Bay?

General MILLER. Senator, they would not.

Senator ROBERTS. Do you have any problem with General Ryder, who allegedly said there should be a firewall between the MPs and MI, given your rationale as to why they should work together, if we have the leadership and the training and the discipline that you have indicated that we now have?

General MILLER. Sir, our doctrinal publication said that there should be cooperation between the MPs and the intelligence function in a detention facility, but it does say there should not be any active participation by the MP force in any interrogations.

Senator ROBERTS. I have a staffer who works on the Intelligence Committee for me. I have the privilege of being chairman. He has been down at Guantanamo, in a Reserve capacity. He indicates that you made a remarkable turnaround down there. Many Senators have gone down. It only takes a day. I encourage every Senator here to do that. I credit you for improving a very difficult kind of situation.

In Iraq, it is my understanding that there are three prisons, five battalions. Four of the five are Reserves. Is that correct?

General MILLER. Senator, in the organization that I now lead, as the Deputy Commanding General for Detainee Operations, that is a correct statement.

Senator ROBERTS. After the incident at Abu Ghraib, how would you determine the leadership today in regards to discipline, training, and leadership of those personnel who you command as of right now?

General MILLER. Sir, in the first 30 days of my opportunity to work in this capacity, I was able to visit every facility and talk to virtually every leader and soldier who is involved in this. I will tell you that there is strong, positive, dynamic leadership throughout this chain of command.

Senator ROBERTS. So we have seen a hell of a change.

General MILLER. Sir, we have seen soldiers and leaders who know what standards are and execute them 7 days a week, 24 hours a day.

Senator ROBERTS. At Guantanamo Bay, you had one MP per two prisoners. In Iraq, you have one MP per eight and a half prisoners. Is that correct?

General MILLER. Sir, those are approximately the correct numbers.

Senator ROBERTS. Okay. But you have indicated that 50 percent of the prisoners in Abu Ghraib will be released. You have 3,800 prisoners now; that will bring it down to 1,500. What is happening to the 1,500? I understand there are 74 being tried by the Central Court of Iraq. Will all 1,500 be tried?

General MILLER. Sir, those approximately 1,500 security internees have been interned. That means that we have strong evidence that they have committed attacks on the coalition, and they will most likely be referred to the Central Criminal Court of Iraq for trial by the Iraqi system for those. There are a number of those, approximately 600 to 700, who are so dangerous that, should they be released back into Iraqi society, they would put that society at risk of a high probability of attack on their fellow citizens.

Senator ROBERTS. So they are the worst of the worst.

General MILLER. Sir, those are the worst of the worst.

Senator ROBERTS. If the ICRC investigated today, what would they find?

General MILLER. Sir, the ICRC is, as a matter of fact, investigating today. They are at Camp Bucca, which is one of our theater facilities down by Umm Qasr, on the southern border. They have found that we are making an enormous effort to improve conditions every day, that we take their findings seriously, and that we have addressed them. General Sanchez made a change when I arrived in the theater and put the ICRC responsibility directly on me. So all reports come to me, and I move them to General Sanchez and the command leadership as rapidly as possible.

Senator ROBERTS. So until we get the report by General Fay to assess responsibility and accountability, you think there has been a big change in regards to leadership, training, and discipline, which are all directed at interrogation, to provide better intelligence to save Iraqi lives and American lives, is that correct?

General MILLER. Yes, sir, that is absolutely correct.

Senator ROBERTS. I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Senator Byrd.

Senator BYRD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Abizaid and General Sanchez, this travesty of justice occurred on your watch. The Iraqi prisoner abuse scandal has dealt a body blow to the heroic efforts of scores of American military troops and civilian workers in Iraq to win the hearts and minds of the Iraqi people. I do not know if that damage can ever be fully repaired. Certainly, a lot depends on what else might emerge about this scandal and on what you and the civilian leadership at the Pentagon do to set things right.

General Sanchez, you told Senator Levin that you never saw the ROE presented to this committee last week. If you did not see or set the so-called ROE for the interrogation of prisoners in Iraq, who does? Who does set them?

General SANCHEZ. Senator, what I stated was that I had not seen the specific slide that was referred to. I was the one who approved the interrogation ROE on September 12 and again in the October time frame, sir.

Senator BYRD. Does anyone in the civilian leadership of the Pentagon need to approve the rules of interrogation operations?

General SANCHEZ. Senator, those rules were forwarded to CENTCOM in the September time frame, and, based on the inputs from CENTCOM, resulted in the October memorandum.

Senator BYRD. I will ask the question again. Does anyone in the civilian leadership of the Pentagon need to approve the rules of interrogation operations?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, I do not know. As far as I know, there is no requirement for the civilian leadership to approve those rules of engagement.

General ABIZAID. Senator, I would say we are all responsible for making sure what happens in our organizations happens right. Things do not have to go all the way to the top to be approved. We know what is right and we know what is wrong.

Senator BYRD. The committee needs to know if you can answer this question. Does anyone in the civilian leadership of the Pentagon need to approve the rules of interrogation operations? If so, who?

General ABIZAID. My answer is no. It is our responsibility.

Senator BYRD. Then you are saying that nobody in the Pentagon approves these rules.

General ABIZAID. No, I am not saying that, sir.

Senator BYRD. Then what are you saying?

General ABIZAID. I am saying that the ROE for interrogators are a product of Army doctrine, of Army training, of practices in the field, and of commanders doing their job out there.

Senator BYRD. General Abizaid, if someone at the Pentagon is required to approve these ROE, surely you know.

General ABIZAID. If I knew, Senator, I would tell you. I would not forward any ROE to anybody. Nobody has asked me for any, and I would not have forwarded it to them.

Senator BYRD. So you are, indeed, saying that nobody in the Pentagon approved these rules.

General ABIZAID. I do not know that I am saying whether they reviewed them or not. I am saying that I have not personally forwarded anything to the Pentagon for their approval.

Senator BYRD. Did the SECDEF have to approve these rules to your knowledge?

General ABIZAID. Sir, I am just telling you what I said. In CENTCOM, I have not forwarded anything to the Pentagon for approval with regard to ROE.

Senator BYRD. I am not asking you what you forwarded to the Pentagon. To your knowledge, did the SECDEF have to approve these, or did he approve these ROE, to your knowledge?

Colonel WARREN. Senator, if I might, I was the legal advisor for the command and participated in the drafting of the counter-resistance and interrogation policy. There is no requirement that the DOD review or approve the methods that we used. As Generals Abizaid and Sanchez have said, they were operating in a combat environment. The commanders have the authority to approve those policies.

Senator BYRD. All right, if there is no requirement, to your knowledge, did the SECDEF approve these ROE?

Colonel WARREN. Sir, to my knowledge, no.

Senator BYRD. General Sanchez, as Senator Kennedy stated, The New York Times reported this morning—and here it is, right here—the headline says, “Officer Says Army Tried to Curb ICRC Visits to Prison in Iraq.” Is that allegation accurate?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, I never approved any policy or procedure or requirement to do that.

Senator BYRD. Let us see what this says. “Two announced inspections in Iraq,” and, “The ICRC observed abuses in one cell block on two unannounced inspections in October, and complained in writing on November 6. The military responded that inspectors should make appointments before visiting the cell block.” Well, we know what that means.

General Abizaid, the ICRC has alleged a pattern of abuse at detention centers in Iraq. With all due respect, how can you explain the culture of abuse that was allowed to develop in a prison system under your ultimate command?

General ABIZAID. I do not believe that a culture of abuse existed in my command. I do not believe that based on what my IG told me and what the Department of the Army IG told me. I believe that we have isolated incidents that have taken place. I am aware that the ICRC has its view on things. A lot of its view is based upon what happens at the point of detention where soldiers fighting for their lives detain people, which is a very brutal and bloody event.

Senator BYRD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, my time is up.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator Byrd.

Senator Allard.

General ABIZAID. Mr. Chairman, if I may?

Chairman WARNER. Feel free, General, when you wish to add some information.

General ABIZAID. Policies do flow from the top of the DOD and I do not want to give any impression that they do not.

Chairman WARNER. We recognize the tradition of civilian leadership.

General ABIZAID. But SOPs are our business and we work them.

Senator BYRD. These are not SOPs we are talking about, I hope.

Chairman WARNER. Fine.

Senator Allard.

Senator ALLARD. Mr. Chairman, I just want to point out that I think the real travesty of justice is on the other side, where we see women and children used as shields, where we see a fight being carried on in mosques and other religious structures by our adversaries, where I see that conflict being carried in schools, and where our adversaries do not care about innocent lives. They will cheat and lie and do anything. I think that we have to understand the challenges that our men and women are facing in Iraq, and I think that it is a very difficult situation.

Now, that does not justify, I think, what we have seen by a few individuals here in this prison, and I want to fully understand how it is that that kind of incident would happen in the prison. I think we all have to understand it. I think, General Abizaid, that you have recognized that there is a problem and that we are in the process of correcting that problem.

Major General Miller, of the list of reports that came out, yours was the first report. You looked at Guantanamo and then you went on ahead and briefed, I think, the command in Iraq as to what you learned in Guantanamo, is that correct?

General MILLER. Senator, when I briefed the command of CJTF-7, it was on the findings and recommendations that the team I brought found of our assessment of the operations within CJTF-7 in Iraq.

Senator ALLARD. Did you share with them some of the lessons learned and what not in Guantanamo, and explain to them what to watch out for?

General MILLER. Yes, sir. We used our SOPs that we had developed for humane detention, interrogation, and intelligence fusion, to be able to use that as a starting point where they could go about improving their capability.

Senator ALLARD. So when you did your briefing, how far down did that information go? Did it go to those interrogators or were you relying on individuals further down in the command to pass on your words?

General MILLER. Sir, the recommendations that I made from the assessments were given to the senior leadership of the JTF for them to make decisions, upon their applicability, and then to, if they chose, make additional modifications to their procedures to go about doing that. In no case did the team have the opportunity to or ask to brief down at the lowest level. It was at the senior leadership level, at the commander and the senior staff-officer level.

Senator ALLARD. Now, with those lessons learned, can anybody on this panel explain to me what happened to the information that was shared by Major General Miller to the higher command? How was that passed down?

General SANCHEZ. Yes, Senator. After I received the recommendations of General Miller, I then forwarded those to my staff and the commander of the detention center for modification, in accordance with the Geneva Conventions, since we knew that there was a difference in climates between the two different operations.

Senator ALLARD. By that difference in climate, you are saying that, in Guantanamo, it was not as pertinent to actually what was happening in the field of battle, but what was happening in Iraq was very pertinent to what was happening on a day-to-day basis in the field of battle, and that information was crucial to the survival of Americans. Is that correct?

General SANCHEZ. Yes, sir, that is exactly right. We were, at that point in time, working very hard to get intelligence fusion at a higher level that could allow us to target, precisely, the enemy forces. We had to very rapidly take those recommendations and modify them to the theater, modify them to ensure that they were in accordance with the Geneva Conventions, get the lessons that had been learned before in interrogation and detention operations, and be able to adjust our own procedures and fix the procedures that we had in country.

Senator ALLARD. Now, General Abizaid and General Sanchez, I would like for you to describe the checks and balances, or the command-wide reporting and supervision, that was in place during 2003, when the subject prisoner abuses occurred. General Taguba's report clearly shows abuses reported as early as May 2003 in Iraq, as well as major accountability and leadership and basic discipline breakdowns through the 800th MP Brigade. I guess the bottom line is, did Brigadier General Karpinski, the 800th MP Brigade Commander, keep you informed as to the deteriorating conditions in her command?

General ABIZAID. I did not talk to the 800th MP Brigade Commander.

Senator ALLARD. General Sanchez.

General SANCHEZ. Sir, as far as the deteriorating conditions of her command, part of our basic understanding in the July/August time frame was that we had a detainee situation that had not been faced by our Army in over 50 years. That was the reason why I had requested the Ryder team to come in to assist us in establishing those operations so that they would be efficient, effective, and treating people with dignity and respect. That is why I supported the Miller team coming into the country. We were providing the resources that were necessary in order for us to stand up the capabilities of the 800th to be able to function effectively.

Senator ALLARD. So the Ryder Report, that was a first report in trying to deal with any hint of impropriety that was happening at the prison, is that correct?

General SANCHEZ. Senator, there were investigations that had been conducted as a result of allegations of abuse that were out in the command, not at the detention centers, at that point. As we have stated before, there were allegations at the point of contact, where the soldiers are fighting every single day, from the ICRC, that prisoners were being treated roughly. Those were the allegations that were being investigated at that point in time. As far as detention center abuses at that point, I did not have knowledge of that.

General ABIZAID. But I would like to make sure that the committee understands we did have detention center problems. They were overcrowded, we didn't have the MPs in the right place, we were moving into facilities that had been destroyed or damaged by the war, and we had an intelligence problem, in that the tactical units were not getting feedback from the detainees who moved into the detention centers. From Ambassador Bremer's point of view, he had a problem, in that we were not releasing detainees back into the population quickly enough, and he wanted us to come up with a system that would make that more efficient.

So let us be clear that we understood there were problems in the detainee system, linked to the intelligence system, linked to the political system, that had to be addressed and we were working on them. But I would also like to remind you that these images are not the kind of thing that we thought was happening out there, that anyone in the chain of command would have condoned or allowed to be practiced.

Senator ALLARD. Mr. Chairman, my time is expired.

General MILLER. Sir, if I may just add one clarifying point, because I think it is important. During the assistance visit that my team made in the August/September time frame, we were also charged with the responsibility of looking for humane detention at the CJTF-7 level detention facilities. In doing that assessment in one of the facilities, the team found that it was being operated in an unsatisfactory manner. I stopped the assessment, went to General Sanchez and made this report. He directed that there be corrective action made within 48 hours in this facility. That action was immediately started and was continuing on as the assessment team that I led departed theater. So there were reports. I will tell you there was very aggressive action taken by the chain of command to go about correcting those shortfalls.

Senator ALLARD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator.

Senator ALLARD. My time is expired.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator Reed.

Senator REED. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Colonel Warren, is it accurate to say that all the prisoners at Abu Ghraib were entitled to the protections of the Geneva Conventions, that they were either enemy prisoners of war (POWs) or protected persons? Is that correct?

Colonel WARREN. Sir, that is right. They were protected persons, either under the Third or Fourth Geneva Conventions.

Senator REED. Under the Geneva Convention Article 31, no physical or moral coercion shall be exercised against any protected persons, in particular to obtain information about them or from third parties. Is that correct?

Colonel WARREN. Sir, you are quoting from Article 31 of the Fourth Convention. That is an accurate recitation of what the Article says. I would cite for you Pictet's Commentary on the Article for elaboration that coercion should not be taken out of context.

Senator REED. Colonel, thank you. But that is the operative rule.

Colonel WARREN. That is the literal rule.

Senator REED. Let us go back to the ROE here. Sleep management, 72 hours, sensory deprivation, 72 hours. Would you consider that to be physical or moral coercion?

Colonel WARREN. Sir, not prohibited coercion, under Article 31, for security internees and unlawful combatants.

Senator REED. I am talking about "in particular to obtain information about them or from third parties."

Colonel WARREN. No, sir, I would not.

Senator REED. So these are not methods to use for interrogation.

Colonel WARREN. Sir, the list on the right-hand side of the—

Senator REED. Can you answer the question, Colonel?

Colonel WARREN. Sir, that does not require a yes or no answer. I have to elaborate upon it.

Senator REED. Well, Colonel, my time is 6 minutes, so let me just move on.

Colonel WARREN. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. You have just said that these are coercive means.

Colonel WARREN. No, sir, I did not. What I said is—

Senator REED. For a protected person to obtain information.

Colonel WARREN. No, sir. What I said was those that are on the right are a list on a slide, which was produced at a low level, which was not representative of our counter-resistance and interrogation policy.

Senator REED. Excuse me, Colonel. I am not asking how it was evolved, but if 72 hours with a bag over your head is contrary to Article 31 of the Fourth Geneva Convention.

Colonel WARREN. That would be. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. Thank you.

General Sanchez, in today's USA Today, it has been reported that you ordered or approved the use of sleep deprivation, intimidation by guard dogs, excessive noise, and inducing fear as an interrogation method for a prisoner in Abu Ghraib prison. Is that correct?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, that may be correct that it is in a news article, but I never approved any of those measures to be used within the CJTF-7 at any time in the last year.

Senator REED. Excuse me. Now I want to get back to this. It may be correct that you ordered those methods used against a prisoner, is that your answer?

General SANCHEZ. No, sir, that is not what I said. I said it may be correct that it is printed in an article, but I have never approved the use of any of those methods within CJTF-7 in the 12½ months that I have been in Iraq.

Senator REED. What level of command produced this slide?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, my understanding is that that was produced at the company commander level.

[The information referred to follows:]

In response to questions by Senator Reed concerning whether I had ordered or approved specific interrogation approaches, I stated, "I have never approved the use of any of those methods within CJTF-7 in the 12.5 months that I've been in Iraq." I provided a similar response to follow-up questions by Senators Collins and Dayton.

In the context of Senator Reed's questions, "those methods" referred to a list of interrogation approaches on the right column of a chart entitled, "Interrogation Rules of Engagement" (IROE), which would require a written exception to policy for use, and to "Sleep Deprivation, Intimidation by Guard Dogs, Excessive Noise and Inducing Fear," which were reported in a USA Today article as having been approved by me for a specific prisoner at Abu Ghraib prison.

CJTF-7 Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policy in the fall of 2003 was stated in two memoranda, the first dated September 14, 2003, and the second dated October 12, 2003. Both CJTF-7 Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policy memoranda were furnished to the committee on May 19. The September 14 Policy authorized the methods listed in the right column of the IROE chart, except for "sensory deprivation" and "sleep deprivation." Use of the authorized methods was subject to the general and specific safeguards listed in Enclosure 2 of the Policy, as well as the implementation guidance of the commander, 205th MI Brigade. The September Policy remained in effect for less than 1 month, until superseded by the October 12 Policy.

The October 12 Policy, which remained in effect for 7 months, authorizes the methods listed at its Enclosure 1. These methods do not include sleep deprivation, presence of military working dogs, or excessive noise. Use of any methods not listed at Enclosure 1 of the October 12 memorandum would require an exception to policy granted by me, as well as legal review and review by the command's senior intelligence officer. The methods listed in the right column of the IROE chart are similarly not authorized under the October 12 Policy without an exception to policy granted by me.

Except for segregation in excess of 30 days, I have neither received nor approved any requests for the use of any methods requiring an exception to policy. Except for segregation in excess of 30 days, I have not approved the use of any of those methods for a particular prisoner.

Senator REED. How could the company commander evolve such a specific list? How could the company commander then turn around and say some of these things would require your permission, without any interaction between your commands? It seems to me just difficult to understand.

General SANCHEZ. Sir, it is difficult for me to understand. You would have to ask the commander.

Senator REED. This is the company commander that you relieved and gave a letter of admonition?

General SANCHEZ. No, sir.

Senator REED. No? Okay.

General Miller, at Guantanamo it has been reported that you developed a 72-point matrix for stress and duress that lays out types of coercion and escalating levels. They include harsh heat or cold, withholding food, hooding for days at a time, and naked isolation in cold, dark cells. Is that correct?

General MILLER. Sir, that is categorically incorrect.

Senator REED. That never happened.

General MILLER. Sir, that is categorically incorrect.

Senator REED. All right. When you were dispatched by Secretary Cambone and General Boykin to go to Iraq, did they give you any specific instructions about increasing the aggressiveness of interrogations?

General MILLER. Sir, I was tasked to conduct an assistance visit by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They tasked U.S. Southern Command (SOUTHCOM), who then tasked CJTF-Guantanamo to put the team together.

Senator REED. Did you have conversations with General Boykin and Secretary Cambone, prior to your departure, about your trip?

General MILLER. Sir, I did not.

Senator REED. You did not. Did you have any discussions after your visit, after you returned?

General MILLER. Sir, I submitted the report up to SOUTHCOM. I had no direct discussions with Secretary Cambone or General Boykin.

Senator REED. Well, Secretary Cambone testified that General Boykin briefed him on your discussions, and he led to the implication that you and General Boykin had—have you spoken to General Boykin about any of these issues?

General MILLER. No, sir. The report was provided up, and this is my speculation, because I do not know—it may have gone to General Boykin, but he and I have not had personal conversations about this inspection visit.

Senator REED. Your team, when they went down and briefed at the—how low a level did you brief and talk to the people in that prison?

General MILLER. Yes, sir. Sir, that team went at several different levels. They started at the CJTF level.

Senator REED. How far did they go in the prison?

General MILLER. Then went down to the battalion commander level at the MP function, and to the company commander level at the MI function.

Senator REED. That might be the level where this document was developed?

General MILLER. Sir, I do not know what level that document was developed at.

Senator REED. Did your team specifically brief that these techniques, which you deny being in place in Guantanamo, could not be used? Did they in any way suggest that methods could be used in that prison that are contrary to the Geneva Conventions?

General MILLER. Sir, no methods contrary to the Geneva Conventions were presented at any time by the assistance team that I took to CJTF-7. There is no—because you brought it up again, sir—there is no status, or there is no program at JTF-Guantanamo that has any of those techniques that are that are prohibited by the Geneva Conventions.

Senator REED. One of the problems we have, General, is that we have not yet, after repeated requests, received that documentation about the interrogation techniques at Guantanamo, which is another lack of cooperation in this investigation.

My time has expired. Will we have a second round, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WARNER. It is important that we conclude today's round with a closed session, and Senators will be given an opportunity to ask questions.

Senator Sessions.

Senator SESSIONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thank all of you for your service in a difficult and dangerous area of the world. You are serving your country with distinction.

General Abizaid, I appreciate your leadership and your comments earlier today. We have made progress in Afghanistan and Iraq. We have had al Qaeda on the run and we have avoided another attack on this country, for which we can be grateful. I think you are correct to suggest that sometimes in this city, people get preoccupied with failure and error, rather than seeing the progress that has occurred.

I am troubled by this suggestion that the interrogation rules are some sort of a smoking gun of illegality and impropriety. You have been asked about sleep adjustment, or sleep management, for 72 hours. Those, as I read this document—this is a restrictive document that says such an action must have the direct approval of the commanding general. Is that the way you understand it, General Sanchez?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, that is the way I read that document also.

Senator SESSIONS. Are you the commanding general, or who was the commanding general referred to?

General SANCHEZ. That referred to the commanding general of CJTF-7. That is me, sir.

Senator SESSIONS. So the system was set up to restrict these kind of activities. They could never be done, even though, as Colonel Warren, the JAG officer, said, they could be acceptable under—some of them, at least—the Geneva Conventions, but they had to make a written report and request to you before any of those could be used.

General SANCHEZ. That is exactly right, sir.

Senator SESSIONS. Were any of these ever approved by you?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, the only approvals that I ever had at my desk were for continued segregation beyond 30 days, and there were 25 of those that were approved. I never saw any other method come to my level requesting approval.

Senator SESSIONS. So the only requests under this category of what some referred to as “harsher treatment” were the isolation requests, which is done in American prisons every day. These isolation requests were, in fact, submitted to you in writing. Did you or your staff make an evaluation before you approved them?

General SANCHEZ. Yes, sir. Those came forward. My staff, both the intelligence officer and my staff judge advocate, evaluated those, and then my staff judge advocate brought them in to me, and I personally approved them.

Senator SESSIONS. I would like to note that, in big print here, it says, “Safeguards. Approaches must always be humane and lawful. Detainees will NEVER”—in capital letters—“be touched in a malicious or unwanted manner.” Were the actions in this prison in violation of that directive? The allegations and the pictures we have seen, those would be in violation of that directive, would they not?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, if those allegations are proved in the investigative process to be true, those would be violations.

Senator SESSIONS. It says, “Geneva Conventions must be complied with.”

General SANCHEZ. Absolutely, sir. That was always the standard.

Senator SESSIONS. Now, General Abizaid or General Sanchez, General Ryder was a provost marshal. That is the person in charge of the military prison system, is that not correct?

General ABIZAID. Yes, sir, that is correct.

Senator SESSIONS. He is the Army’s top expert on how to house prisoners. It is not easy in the United States, I am telling you. Senator Kennedy and I sponsored a bill recently to crack down on sexual abuse in prisons, the prison rape bill, because it happens in American prisons, we have abuses. But it is difficult in a theater of combat operations. You brought him over to help you bring order to this situation in the post-hostility conflict, is that what you did?

General ABIZAID. Yes, sir. We have asked for a lot of help, because we needed a lot of help in this theater on a lot of different things. But what is the most helpful is where commanders travel and look and see with their own eyes what is going on and how it is going on. General Sanchez and I and others have been all around the theater, have talked to interrogators, we have looked to make sure what was happening was right, and we emphasized to them, all the time, that they need to treat people right.

Senator SESSIONS. Well, things go awry. There is just no doubt about it. It is more difficult in a combat environment.

General Miller, you had a reputation for being able to manage a prison and to obtain information from detainees in a way that was closely inspected and observed by the ICRC and other people on a continuing basis. We had soldiers at risk in Iraq. We have civilian leadership of the new Iraqi Government at risk of their very lives, as we saw one just killed recently. It certainly would have been wonderful if we had obtained intelligence so we could have interdicted the latest murder of the head of the Iraqi Governing Council (IGC).

General Abizaid, you said you want to get information to the tactical commanders. For the American people who may not understand this language, part of the problem was, as I understood it, you were obtaining information, but were not getting it out to the people who could benefit from having it, is that fair to say?

General ABIZAID. Well, Senator, as I traveled around—and I spent most of my time when I go around going to tactical units—I was extremely impressed by the amount of information that they had about local conditions. I would always ask them whether, once the detainees were evacuated into the prison system, they receive follow-up information that would help them in their difficult job of breaking down the cellular structures that the enemy uses against us. At the same time, General Sanchez and I, probably very early on in General Sanchez's arriving in the theater, were concerned that we were not getting a good view of what was happening at the leadership level. So we knew that there had to be a connection between what the tactical units knew and what the leadership knew if we were ever to get at the insurgency-based problems that we were seeing out there. So we were dealing with a systemic problem, and we still do not have as good a view as we would like to have about the nature of the insurgency, and who is in charge, and where the cells move, and how they operate, et cetera. It is an intelligence-intensive task.

Senator SESSIONS. General Miller, one of your responsibilities was trying to make sure that the evidence that had been gathered was promptly disseminated. Is that one of your responsibilities?

General MILLER. That is correct, Senator.

Senator SESSIONS. I think my time has expired, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Ben Nelson.

Senator BEN NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you all for being here this morning.

General Abizaid, I want to commend you, particularly for your candor. This city, and this group, from time to time, is used to what I have termed "progressive candor." We learn a little bit at a time, and ultimately somebody has to take responsibility. I appreciate very much your willingness to take the responsibility.

General Miller, there are photos showing MI, MPs, and private contractors in the vicinity of prisoner abuse. We are being told that it was a handful, or a few—the operative word of the day—bad apples engaging in activities that were abusive, not consistent with either Geneva Conventions rules or with the expectations of the command above them. So can you tell me who were the participants, who were the abusers in this situation? I am not aware of anyone outside of a handful of privates, sergeants, et cetera, being charged with anything. What about the private contractors? Are the MI people, apart from MPs, being charged, or do you know?

General MILLER. Senator, those events are a part of the investigations being done, also being done now by General Fay, involving the intelligence elements, both the military and any of the contractors who would be involved in the intelligence function.

Senator BEN NELSON. Will we expect something within a timely manner on those investigations?

General MILLER. Sir, it is my understanding that General Fay's report is nearing a close and that those reports will be given to the chain of command very quickly.

Senator BEN NELSON. General Miller, what instructions or orders were you given before you arrived on your way to Guantanamo?

General MILLER. Sir, on my assumption as the commander of JTF-Guantanamo, I went to the headquarters, SOUTHCOM, and General Hill laid out his responsibilities for me and gave me the orders. We had an opportunity to fuse two JTFs together that were not working as successfully. That was the priority mission, to be able to integrate both a detention and intelligence function to produce actionable intelligence for the Nation—in this case, operational and strategic intelligence to help us win the global war on terror.

Senator BEN NELSON. Did you talk to any of the civilians within the DOD?

General MILLER. Sir, initially I did not. Once I made my assessment at JTF-Guantanamo, then I went to Washington, DC, and talked to both the Intelligence Community and others who are a part of the functionalities that we had at Guantanamo about detention, interrogation, and an intelligence fusion.

Senator BEN NELSON. Anyone at the level of Under Secretary or Assistant Secretary of Defense?

General MILLER. Sir, I did not initially talk to them. But later on—as you remember, I was there for 17 months—I talked all the way up to the SECDEF level, briefing them on the operations that we had and the intelligence that we gathered and then the integration of those operations throughout Guantanamo.

Senator BEN NELSON. Were any of those discussions directed at what you might do in the future if you were assigned to Abu Ghraib, or to Iraq in general?

General MILLER. No, sir, they were not.

Senator BEN NELSON. Were there any differences between the two assignments?

General MILLER. Senator, there were substantial differences. JTF-Guantanamo has the responsibility to detain enemy combatants not covered by the Geneva Conventions, and so there were specific authorizations and limits that went directly into Guantanamo. So I became very knowledgeable of those. I read the Geneva Conventions, to be frank with you, in great depth. My lawyer probably spent 1 to 2 hours a day with me as I learned every day how to be more effective in doing this job and also doing it to the standards of America, using humane detention and interrogation that reflected America's values.

Senator BEN NELSON. Thank you.

General Sanchez, you suspended the entire chain of command that was under the command of General Karpinski, including General Karpinski herself. She says she objected to the interference with her command, which was represented by Colonel Pappas, in bringing intelligence operations and TACON over the prison. But you disagree that she objected.

General SANCHEZ. Senator, General Karpinski never talked to me about any interference.

Senator BEN NELSON. Did she send you a written communication?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, she received the same order that assigned responsibility for FOB protection and security of detainees as the other commanders in the task force.

Senator BEN NELSON. Is it usual that an MI officer would take over the tactical command for force protection?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, it is dependent upon the senior commander in that FOB who has responsibility to defend his soldiers.

Senator BEN NELSON. Do you know of any other instances?

General SANCHEZ. A brigade commander, yes, sir. The MI brigade commander, no, sir. He was a senior man who was permanently on that FOB, and he had responsibilities for protecting his soldiers, and that was my intent.

Senator BEN NELSON. Merging interrogation and force protection together?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, a commander has integral responsibility, independent of his mission, to protect his soldiers, and that was what I was trying to institutionalize.

Senator BEN NELSON. My time has expired. Thank you.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Collins.

Senator COLLINS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

First, let me begin by thanking all of you for your extraordinary service. One of the tragedies of this abuse scandal is that it not only obscures the fine work that you are doing, but it also overwhelms the thousands of acts of kindness, courage, and compassion by our troops every day in Iraq, and that is why this abuse scandal is particularly upsetting. I feel it sets back and undermines the good work of the vast majority of our troops.

I have to say that after reading the Taguba Report, reviewing the various interviews, and participating in these hearings, I remain unclear about the answers to some very basic and critical questions, questions such as, who really was in charge of the prison, and what was allowed in the treatment of the prisoners?

General Sanchez, at the committee's hearing last week, General Alexander referred to these guidelines, the interrogation ROE, as yours. Numerous press reports have referred to these rules as "the Sanchez guidelines." But is it your testimony this morning that these guidelines were not issued by your office and that, in fact, you only saw them last week at our hearings?

General SANCHEZ. Ma'am, absolutely not. The first time I saw the slide that was specifically shown to me by one of the Senators, that is what I was referring to. I personally issued the memorandums, and I have both memorandums sitting here that I will provide to the committee.

[The information referred to follows:]

The requested documents were provided to the committee at the conclusion of the hearing on May 19, 2004, and as part of QFR number 76 for Lieutenant General Sanchez.

General SANCHEZ. Those ROEs were my ROEs, and I personally approved those after I consulted with my higher headquarters and my staff judge advocate.

Senator COLLINS. In response to a question from Senator Reed, you said, however, that you had never approved the presence of dogs, sleep deprivation, or stress positions that are listed on these guidelines. Is that correct?

General SANCHEZ. Ma'am, that is exactly right.

Senator COLLINS. General Sanchez, I also want to follow up on your November order putting MI in charge of some aspects of the prison. I also want to explore with you the role of MI, in general.

In the Taguba Report, the General says that the recommendation of General Miller's team, that the guard force be actively engaged in setting the conditions for the successful exploitation of the detainees, would appear to be in conflict with the recommendations of General Ryder's team and AR 190-8, that MPs do not participate in MI-supervised interrogation sessions. He also says that having MPs actively set the favorable conditions for interviews runs counter to the smooth operation of a detention facility. Didn't your order, where you involved the MPs in some aspects of the supervision of the prison, run counter to the regulation cited by General Taguba?

General ABIZAID. Senator Collins, may I address this?

Senator COLLINS. Yes, General.

General ABIZAID. First of all, we do not have all the facts. I think it is important for the committee to understand that. We need to see what we are going to hear from the 205th MI Brigade. What was in the mind of that commander? What did he think?

So if we can set that aside, let me share with you one of the findings that came out of the Department of the Army IG investigations but are preliminary. They are not approved. I am sure they will be shared with this committee. Our doctrine is not right. It is just not right. There are so many things that are out there that are not right in the way that we operate for this war. This is a doctrinal problem of understanding where you bring—what do the MPs do? What do the MI guys do? How do they come together in the right way? This doctrinal issue has to be fixed if we are ever going to get our intelligence right to fight this war and beat this enemy. So we have problems that have to be looked at from top to bottom in order to ensure that there is no confusion. Because, you see, the Ryder Report says one thing, the Taguba Report will say one thing.

Senator COLLINS. Exactly my point.

General ABIZAD. You are going to see that the Fay Report says something else. It is not because anybody is lying to anybody; it is because the system is not right. There are a lot of systems that are wrong out there that we had better fix if we are going to beat this enemy.

Senator COLLINS. But, General, I guess what concerns me is, when you have all these contradictory doctrines or all these contradictory findings, it suggests to me that there was great confusion at the prison, and that confusion can set the stage for the kinds of unacceptable abuses that occurred. That is my concern.

General ABIZAD. It is a concern that I share, Senator, and we will find out the facts. But I would like to ensure that you understand that there is great confusion in a combat zone all the time—almost as much as there is here in Washington, but not quite.

Senator COLLINS. Thank you, General.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator.

That confusion in the combat zone goes way back in history.

Senator DAYTON.

Senator DAYTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I wanted to join with others in thanking you for convening this hearing and doing your utmost to get to the bottom of these matters.

But I really question our ability to get down to the truth of what has occurred at 6 minutes apiece. We now have heard from 15 of the highest-level officials involved in this entire operation, from the SECDEF to the generals in command, and nobody knew that anything was amiss, no one approved anything amiss, no one did anything amiss. We have a general acceptance of responsibility, but there is no one to blame, except for the people down at the very bottom of one prison. The focus has been on that, although the ICRC report says that there were abuses at 14 different prisons under U.S. control.

According to The New York Times today, the ICRC complained in writing on November 6 about some of the abuses that they had witnessed, which paralleled the practices that were shown in the pictures, of holding Iraqi prisoners naked in dark concrete cells for several days at a time, forcing them to wear women's underwear on their heads while being paraded and photographed, and it characterizes the response of the Army to that complaint as barring unannounced visits by the ICRC at the prisons. It cited a particular letter dated December 24 that the Army had described as evidence of the military promptly addressing the ICRC concerns, but the action that was taken, the barring of unannounced visits, brings into question what the content of that letter actually was.

The Army has refused to release that letter, citing "a tradition of confidentiality in dealing with the international agency." An Army spokesman declined on Tuesday to characterize the letter or to discuss what it said about the ICRC's access to the cell block.

General Sanchez, is that evidence of the transparency of this Army's handling of these matters? How are we going to find anything out if no one will tell us anything or even provide the information that is necessary to evaluate these matters?

General SANCHEZ. Senator, I swore to tell you the truth, and everything that I have told you in here is the truth.

Senator DAYTON. What is in the December 24 letter to the ICRC?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, I do not recall exactly what the—we have the letter, obviously, and I would have to leave it to the Department to provide that letter to you, sir. Sir, as far as I am concerned, we are transparent within CJTF-7.

Senator DAYTON. All right, I will accept that, then. So you will provide a copy of that letter, and we can assess what the response was?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, as long as that is within the approval of the higher headquarters and the DOD, yes, sir, we will provide that.

[The information referred to follows:]

The requested document was provided as an attachment to the Lieutenant General Sanchez QFR number 35.

Senator DAYTON. All right. That is a big caveat, but we will see what comes forward.

General SANCHEZ. Sir, I have no problems with providing you that letter; however, there are higher-headquarters directives.

Senator DAYTON. Fair enough.

Sir, on November 19, you—again, according to another newspaper report; sometimes I think our responsibilities in this body are relegated to reading the newspapers and watching the other news reports to find out these things that we are not getting any information about—but there is reportedly a memo from your office, General Sanchez, on November 19, that placed the two key Abu Ghraib cell blocks, where the abuses occurred, under the control of Colonel Pappas. Then there is also reference made to a request he reportedly made to you 11 days later about a interrogation plan for a particular prisoner that involved—first, the interrogators were to throw chairs and tables in the man's presence at the prison and “invade his personal space.” This is a request from Colonel Pappas, the man to whom you turned over that authority over those two cells. Then the police were to put a hood on his head and take him to an isolated cell through a gauntlet of barking dogs. There, the police were to strip-search him and interrupt his sleep for 3 days, with interrogations, barking, and loud music, according to Army documents, the plan that was sent to you. Is that one of the 25 requests for additional interrogation techniques that you approved?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, first of all, you stated that I issued an order that I specifically put key cell blocks under Colonel Pappas. I never issued such an order. Second—

Senator DAYTON. Okay. So the article is incorrect?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, I never issued such an order.

Second, that request never made it to my headquarters—or to me, personally, rather.

Senator DAYTON. So there was not any memo on November 19 from your office to place these cell blocks under Colonel Pappas?

General SANCHEZ. No, sir. I never issued such an order.

Senator DAYTON. All right.

General SANCHEZ. That specific request for interrogation methods, that never got the CJTF-7 commanding general's level, and I never approved any interrogation methods other than continued segregation.

Senator DAYTON. Thank you.

General Abizaid, you commented on the need to stay the course. Speaking for myself—I will not presume to speak for my colleagues—the Senate has been bipartisanly resolute behind every request the President has made for funding and support. It has been virtually unanimous. It has been across the board—the supplemental appropriations, the authorizations we are taking up now, the 2005 authorization. We are adding, at the request of the President, an additional $25 billion for purposes that have not even been defined. But I think it is something I wanted to try to get an answer on from various authorities. What is that course? What is the direction that we are on? I would just note in response particularly to some comments that were made about how well things are going, I do not know how to sort this out. I want us to succeed there. I just want to be told the truth about whether we are doing well or not, so we can assess whether the Minnesotans and other Americans who are serving over there are going to be there for months or years, and what their likelihood is of returning safely and alive.

But I refer here to a Washington Post comment made by a Kurdish member of the IGC, that if something is not done about the security situation, there will be no transfer of power. “Uthman”—his name—“who is generally pro-American, described the assassination as only the most extreme example of the lawlessness that has grown in the year since President Saddam Hussein was driven from power. ‘Never in Iraq has it been like this. Never. Even under Saddam,’ he said. ‘People are killed, kidnapped, and assaulted, children are taken away, women are raped, no one is afraid of any punishment.’” Is that an accurate description of 1 percent of the country, 5 percent, more than that? What is the security situation there, sir?

General ABIZAID. Yes, sir. I appreciate the question. First of all, not only were people carried away in the middle of the night and raped and tortured and killed under Saddam, but it happened at a huge scale, at an institutional scale unequaled in any recent memory, perhaps only rivaled by what the Nazis did. So, are things better just by the mere fact that that regime of torture and intimidation is gone? Yes, that is a good thing.

On the other hand, I will not be Pollyannaish about where we are, Senator. This is a hard thing, and it is going to take a long time, and it is going to take a lot of courage and a lot of perseverance and, unfortunately, more blood, and it is going to take more treasure. But there are more people in Iraq that are working with us to try to make their country a better place than are trying to tear it apart. The people that are trying to tear it apart are ruthless. They are doing it precisely now for the reasons that—I think I have been about as honest as I could be with this committee in the past—because this is the vulnerable time. They must make it fail now. They are pulling out everything that they can to make it fail. It is hard. That is why we kept extra forces there. It is hard, and it is tough, and it is difficult. But we will prevail. I am telling you, there are things that are bad about Iraq, and we are responsible for security, and it is not like walking in downtown Washington, DC. It is a dangerous place. But I can tell you, people have a right to express their opinion. There is political activity, there is freedom of the press, there are things that are happening in Iraq that do not happen anywhere else in the Middle East, and we ought to be damn proud about it.

Senator DAYTON. May I just conclude? My time is up. How soon do you expect that the 200 or 4,000 or whatever Iraqi police and militia will be in a position to enforce their own law and order on their city streets?

General ABIZAIID. Well, Senator, I would have said, before the recent events, that somewhere between September and December they would be ready, but we had a setback. We know we had a setback, and we are putting one of our best officers in the United States military on the job. If the creek does not rise, somewhere between January and April they will be ready.

Senator DAYTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Chambliss.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Gentlemen, let me echo the sentiments of all of our colleagues up here relative to the leadership you are providing and the great job that all the men and women underneath you are doing. While we have seen this story on the front pages of the paper for the last 3 weeks, those of us who have followed the details of the battles that your men and women are waging every day know and understand that you have scored major victory after major victory in the last 3 weeks, and we commend you for the great job your folks are doing.

Colonel Warren, would you tell me what the jurisdiction is between the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and the Army relative to the arresting, securing, transporting, and interrogation of these detainees in Iraq?

Colonel WARREN. Sir, I do not know that it is a matter, necessarily, of jurisdiction. We do know that other agencies do detain individuals in Iraq. They use the same legal standard under the Fourth Geneva Convention, which is that they are imperative threats to security. Once they are brought into a coalition force's detention facility, they are subject to our rules and regulations.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Well, is there any integration or cooperation between the CIA and the Army relative to the securing of prisoners and bringing them to places like Abu Ghraib?

Colonel WARREN. Sir, your question is outside the scope of my knowledge. I can speak to the rules that apply once they are inducted; the arrangements relative to operations, I am unable to speak to those.

Senator CHAMBLISS. General Abizaid, can you answer that question?

General ABIZAIID. Sir, I would like to answer the question in closed session.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Okay.

General Abizaid and General Sanchez, I have asked this question twice before, and I still have not gotten a satisfactory answer. General Ryder was sent to this prison. He was there in late October, early November 2003. During the very time he was there, these particular incidences that are alleged, the alleged abuses that we are talking about now, were ongoing. Yet even though he was asking questions of the conditions of the prison and the condition of the prisoners, nobody told him, apparently, one word about these incidences happening. Can either of you give me any explanation of why that would have happened when a general of his stature was there?

General ABIZAID. Well, I can tell you that as I travel around, I do not always get the whole truth and nothing but the truth. I get a lot of, "Everything is okay, everything is fine, do not worry about it." That is one of the problems that we have in the Armed Forces, that we have to look beyond our rank and think about what would our son be doing in that particular position in that particular unit, and is he or your daughter doing the right thing or not. So just because General Ryder was there, because General Sanchez was there, because half a dozen other important people that went there to visit it did not see it does not mean it was not happening. We have a lot to understand about what went on in that organization, and why and who was responsible.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Well, I accept your answer. I think it is a repeat of the statement you made earlier that there are some things in this system that are broken, and you are now working to fix them. That is what leadership is all about; when you recognize a problem, you take after it, and you fix it. I commend you for doing that.

General Miller, the situation at Guantanamo has been alluded to by a number of folks during this process. I have been down there a couple of times. I had the opportunity to visit the prison, both before the new camp was built as well as afterwards, and I saw the interrogation of prisoners down there. From what I saw, and from what I have heard, there has been no systemic prisoner abuse that was ongoing at any point in time at Guantanamo, and I just wish you would address that very quickly, if you will, please.

General MILLER. Thank you, Senator. Sir, there was no systemic abuse of prisoners at Guantanamo at any time. I believe that there were three or four events—I will have to correct that for the record as we go back and look—of instances of minor abuse.

[The information referred to follows:]

There were a total of eight instances of minor abuse requiring administrative action. Those infractions resulted in one reassignment, one counseling, three reprimands, two Article 15s, and one Special Court Martial acquittal.

Two or three of those were corrected by administrative action, an Article 15, and one went to court-martial about an abuse of one of the enemy combatants down there. It was the effect of strong, dynamic leadership by the chain of command 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, that did not allow the abuse to happen. We walked the cell blocks and the interrogation booths of Guantanamo around the clock—not because we did not trust our people, but this is a very difficult mission, and it takes active engagement by leadership to ensure that it is done correctly. That is why, in Guantanamo, because of the enormously talented people who were there—75 percent, as most of you know, were Reserve component leaders—we were successful.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Thank you.

Colonel Warren, there is an article in The Wall Street Journal today, which says, “A senior legal advisor to Lieutenant General Sanchez helped draft a formal response to the Red Cross’s November report, according to one senior Army official.” Is that you they are referring to?

Colonel WARREN. Sir, that may be me to whom they are referring. In fact, I did not draft that particular response. I believe, however, that my office did. As General Sanchez alluded to earlier, before January the intake of working papers—the camp visit reports from the ICRC—were handled in a haphazard manner. Some of them were given to the camp commander, some were given to the MP brigade, some went to my office. In the particular case that is at issue, the October visit, it took a period of time—and I do not know how long, but I believe several weeks—for the working papers to reach the level of my office. My office participated in the drafting of a response for Brigadier General Karpinski’s signature. That response was dated December 24, and would have been delivered to the ICRC.

When we discovered this haphazard process—and, frankly, were concerned in the December time frame, when I first became aware of the content of the report and its genesis—I talked to General Sanchez. This would have been in early January. General Sanchez then mandated that, from that point forward, all ICRC reports and working papers would be addressed to him, and that the single entry point for those to the command would be me. That way we could maintain positive accountability of those reports, as well as take remediative action and track the corrections that were done by the subordinate commands.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Thank you.

Thank you, gentlemen.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Clinton.

Senator CLINTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I thank our witnesses for their service and for their appearance today. I know it is not an easy assignment to be here, given, especially, all your other responsibilities. But it is in line with this committee’s constitutional and institutional responsibilities, and I believe all of us are trying to discharge them to the best of our ability.

General Miller, I would like to return for a moment to this Interrogation ROE document that has been much discussed. General Sanchez characterized this document as having been developed at a relatively low level, at the company level, and indicated that he had not seen it before it became public at our hearings. But in an annex to the Taguba Report, it was revealed that this document was briefed to you as part of a situation report when you visited Iraq in August 2003. What was your reaction to that document at that time? Did you have any concern that the techniques described would violate the Geneva Conventions?

General MILLER. Senator, that report is incorrect. At no time was that document briefed to me during my visit in the August/September time frame.

Senator CLINTON. Was it briefed to you at any time prior to that or following that period?

General MILLER. Senator, that document was never briefed to me at any time.

Senator CLINTON. Were the contents of the document briefed to you, General?

General MILLER. The contents of that document were not briefed to me.

Senator CLINTON. So it is not only that you never saw the document, the slide; you were never briefed, orally or in writing, about the contents of that document. Is that correct?

General MILLER. Senator, that is absolutely correct.

Senator CLINTON. General Sanchez, at a hearing last week, General Alexander, the head of Army MI, distributed that slide to the committee. He stated, at that time, that the slide was prepared by CJTF staff, your staff. Do you know where General Alexander obtained the slide or why he believed that this came from your staff?

General SANCHEZ. No, ma'am, I do not.

Senator CLINTON. Colonel Warren, do you have any information that would lend us some additional enlightenment about why General Alexander told us, in sworn testimony, that this slide came from General Sanchez' staff?

Colonel WARREN. I absolutely do, ma'am. The reason that the General made the statement that he did is because the slide, as we now know, contained a CJTF-7 logo and was posted on the wall of the Joint Interrogation and Debriefing Center at Abu Ghraib. It was titled "The Interrogation Rules of Engagement," an unfortunate use of the term "ROE. What it should have said is, "Interrogation Policy Extract." That is the context that is so vital for you to understand, ma'am. When that slide was created—and I talked to the person who created it; it was the commander of Alpha Company 519th MI Battalion—

Senator CLINTON. What was that person's name, Colonel?

Colonel WARREN. Captain Woods, ma'am.

Senator CLINTON. Thank you.

Colonel WARREN. It was intended to be a prophylaxis. There is really nothing insidious about that particular slide. In fact, if you will go back, ma'am, to the Counter-Resistance and Interrogation Policies, which General Sanchez has said we will make available to the committee, you will see that they lay out specific measures that are approved.

The October 12 memorandum, in fact, approves only those measures which are contained within the Army Field Manual on interrogations that applies to POWs and segregation in excess of 30 days. The intent of the slide, however, was to ensure that interrogators understood that those measures on the left-hand column—the ones that were approved, the ones I mentioned—were authorized, but that any other measures were not, without commanding-general approval.

Now, why is it that some of those, again, that seem to be the so-called "harsh methods" appear on the right, ones such as sensory deprivation that were never in any authorized policy? The reason is that within the drafts that we prepared in the headquarters in the September and October time frame, we, collectively—the legal community and the MI community—took every doctrinal approach that was authorized, we took every approach that had been used by interrogators in other places, we took every approach that was contained in any document that we could find, and we put that in a policy so as to regulate it to ensure that it complied with the Geneva Conventions, that there was command oversight, there was a specific safeguards document that was published that referenced the Conventions, and required that at no time could any interrogator in any approach violate the floor of the Geneva Conventions—that is, the basic requirements to food, shelter, water, medical care, clothing, and protection. It required an interrogation plan. It required that any exception to policy go through the senior intelligence officer and the staff judge advocate, me, before going to the commanding general.

So the intent of that slide was to remind interrogators that anything that was not authorized had to go to the commanding general. By the way, that list was prepared by a captain with all good intentions, but it had items on it that could never be approved, and frankly, could never reasonably be requested.

But note, ma'am, what is on the bottom. That is something that often is overlooked, because that captain did not do a bad job. That captain paraphrased the safeguards that are in enclosure two of our Counter-Resistance and Interrogation Policy. You will note that they talk about the requirement to treat everyone with humanity, to follow the Geneva Conventions, and to never unlawfully touch a person who is under interrogation.

Senator CLINTON. Colonel, may I just quickly follow up in one question. Are you aware of any requests for approval submitted in writing for any exceptions to the list on the right-hand side?

Colonel WARREN. Yes, ma'am. I am aware of approximately 25 requests for segregation in excess of 30 days, which went through the process of approval that I described. I am also aware that there were three requests for stress positions which were submitted and were denied at the brigade commander level, so they never would have arisen to the CJTF-7 level for review or approval.

Senator CLINTON. Is it also your understanding that non-military agents of our government and private contractors were similarly bound by the rules that you have just described?

Colonel WARREN. Ma'am, I can not speak definitively to the former. However, I can speak definitively to the latter, and any contractors who were working within our facility under contract to the DOD were certainly and clearly bound by our rules and policies.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Graham.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Abizaid, is it fair to say that people in the region, the Arab world, are watching these hearings, and have been?

General ABIZAID. It is fair to say that, Senator, yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. In your professional opinion—I know we are sort of beating on ourselves here a bit—does this help or hurt our cause?

General ABIZAIID. It helps our cause.

Senator GRAHAM. I could not agree with you more.

General ABIZAIID. It helps our cause, because they have to know that people will be held accountable who are in positions of responsibility.

Senator GRAHAM. Does anybody at this panel feel like a burden has been placed upon you to come here and have to talk about what happened?

General ABIZAIID. No, sir. We feel it is our responsibility.

Senator GRAHAM. Colonel Warren, you are a very good JAG officer and a very good officer, and I know you are in a tough spot. But if you had talked about that slide an hour ago, that would have really helped. So just pipe up. [Laughter.]

Don't be bashful.

Now, I disagree with you a bit, General Abizaid, about a doctrine problem. I do not think we have a doctrine problem. I like our doctrine. Our doctrine, when it comes to trying to gather intelligence, is that anybody in Iraq is covered by the Geneva Conventions, and that we are going to follow the law because that is who we are as a nation. The idea that MPs—General Miller, I am talking to you now—can help the interrogators know what is going on in the cell block is a good doctrine, is it not?

General MILLER. Yes, sir, it is.

Senator GRAHAM. It is stupid to not be able to talk to the people who are running the jail about how the prisoner is doing that day before you interrogate him, right?

General MILLER. Yes, sir, that is exactly right.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. For those who are watching, in the Arab world or anywhere else, can you get good intelligence and still be humane and decent?

General ABIZAIID. Yes, you can, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you agree with that, General Miller?

General MILLER. Yes, sir, I do.

Senator GRAHAM. That is our doctrine.

Our problem is that these well-thought-out policies and procedures, when it came to practice, failed miserably, and that is why we are here, is that not true?

Now, let us talk about how that failure may have occurred. Colonel Warren, I need you to help me here.

Colonel WARREN. Yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Pappas comes in November, is that correct, General Sanchez?

General SANCHEZ. Yes, sir, that is correct.

Senator GRAHAM. But we know that in October abuse is already taking place before he gets there, is that correct?

General SANCHEZ. Yes, sir, now we know that.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. So there was a culture in that jail that was abusive before November. My question is, do we know if it changed after November in its tone or its application? Do we know the answer to that yet?

Colonel WARREN. Sir, I do not think we know. I think, as we have said, that the Fay Report may provide some insight, and also the CID report conducted by the Army is not yet final.

Senator GRAHAM. Is it true, or not, that some of the people in these abuse photos are common criminals?

Colonel WARREN. Sir, that is absolutely correct. We know, from the list of victims, that that is true.

Senator GRAHAM. So now we know that the abuse was not just directed at the high-value targets, but there was abuse going on, just in general.

Colonel WARREN. Absolutely correct, sir, and they should not have been in that cell block. That violated our orders and our policies.

Senator GRAHAM. So one thing we can find out pretty quickly is, in October, it is done to people who are not high-value targets. That jail was just sort of screwed up.

Colonel WARREN. Certainly, it would suggest, by the investigations and the evidence we have, that that statement is accurate. Yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. General Sanchez, I have never been in combat, but I do have some knowledge of the military. I have never seen a more dysfunctional command relationship, in the history of me looking at the military, like that jail. Do you agree with that?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, it was dysfunctional before November 19.

Senator GRAHAM. Right.

General Miller, the reason you were called over is to make sure that we not only did this legally, but to ensure we that got the necessary intelligence to win this war, is that correct?

General MILLER. Sir, I was requested to come over to give an assessment and then to be able to—

Senator GRAHAM. Is that why you brought him over, General Sanchez?

General SANCHEZ. Yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. I think you have done a great job at Guantanamo Bay. I am glad you brought him over.

People did not misunderstand what you said. They just totally ignored it. That is why we are here, is it not?

General MILLER. Sir, in my opinion, that is exactly correct.

Senator GRAHAM. Now, here is my problem. When it comes time to assess who ignored it, I am just not convinced that it is six or seven MPs doing this by themselves, because we know, in the photos, Colonel Warren, that there are people who are not MPs. We know that MI analysts and maybe interrogators are present at abuse situations.

Colonel WARREN. That is correct, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Do I have your promise and pledge, all of you, that you are going to make sure that whatever information we get out of these court-martials will answer that question?

General ABIZAID. You do, sir, absolutely.

General SANCHEZ. Absolutely, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. I will give everybody an A-plus past January. I thank General Sanchez. You reported this appropriately to General Myers. Did you call him on January 14?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, I called General Abizaid.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. Who called General Myers?

General ABIZAID. I did, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. You told him this was a big deal.

General ABIZAID. I did, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. He had every assurance that you were investigating it. So from General Myers' point of view—he is running this war—it is fair to say that, in January, he thought you were on top of it and you were investigating the matter, is that correct?

General ABIZAID. That is correct, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. So when we look at responsibility up the chain, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs was informed that it was being investigated in early January.

General ABIZAID. I would say immediately, yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Please, if you can, explain how the abuse could have happened at this level, for this long, with this much devastation to our country, and no one knew about it before January in the photos given over by the specialist?

General ABIZAID. Explain how the abuse was taking place between October and November with us not knowing about it?

Senator GRAHAM. How did it happen so long and so deep without us knowing?

General ABIZAID. Well, I think there are failures in people doing their duty, and there are failures in systems. We should have known, and we should have uncovered it and taken action before it got to the point that it got to. I think there is no doubt about that. I have asked myself the question, as I am sure everybody else in the chain of command has, what could and should we have done differently? I can think of some things that we have to do. We have to ensure that we have transparency with the ICRC, for example. We have to ensure that there are other methods—just like when we had this problem that we looked at during the movement phase of the war, where there were a lot rapes and sexual assaults going on that were unreported. When we looked at our systems, what we have at Fort Bragg, North Carolina, does not get replicated on the battlefield.

So, Senator, there is a lot of work we have to do, and we have to fix this one so it doesn't happen again.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Lieberman.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thanks to the witnesses.

Obviously, I express not only my gratitude for your service, but my support for the mission we have sent you to Iraq to carry out. I think it is the test of a generation, and I appreciate your confidence as you go forward, because it is going to have a lot to do with our future security. It makes why we are here all the more heartbreaking and infuriating, because it distracts us from that mission. But I absolutely agree with you, we have to go at this. Casualties occur in a war. The tragedy here is that this prison abuse scandal is a self-inflicted wound. But, like any wound, we have to clean it up, fix it up, and then try our best to make sure it does not happen again.

I want to express, first, my concern that, on more than one occasion, at least two of you today—and you are honorable people, obviously, under oath—have taken specific objection to parts of General Taguba's report. That report has received a lot of credibility and I believe it was a report, General Sanchez, to you. Should we think less of it because of the objections raised today? General Miller's response to a question Senator Clinton asked said that something that he was reported to have done or seen just did not happen. You have separated yourself from conclusions in the report on a few occasions. Does it lead you to doubt the thoroughness of the report, or lead you to feel, as the commander, that you ought to send somebody else out there?

General SANCHEZ. No, sir, it does not. As we have stated here, there are some differences, there are some concerns with our doctrinal foundations and the conduct of MP and MI operations, and I think that is what is reflected there. We have to fix those over time.

Senator LIEBERMAN. So the areas in which you disagree—and you have heard that General Miller has disagreed with General Taguba's report—you are pursuing in different ways, then.

General SANCHEZ. Sir, where I disagreed with the report was in my placing the 205th MI commander in charge of force protection and security of detainees.

I believe that was exactly the right decision to make, given the circumstances, the tactical circumstances, and the warfighting conditions that existed—

Senator LIEBERMAN. So, in that case, your disagreement is on a matter of judgment, really, not fact.

General SANCHEZ. Absolutely, sir.

Senator LIEBERMAN. General Miller, yours is a matter of fact.

General MILLER. Yes, sir, mine is a matter of fact. The incident that Senator Clinton brought forward—

Senator LIEBERMAN. In your testimony, you said it did not happen.

General MILLER. Yes, sir, that is correct.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Let me go on to another concern of mine that follows up on Senator Graham's questions. Let me preface this by saying, in taking some notes myself, General Abizaid, you said two things here today that I want to come back to. One is that, to the best of your knowledge, there was no pattern of prisoner abuse in your command. Second, you expressed a belief that there were systemic problems that existed at Abu Ghraib that may have contributed to events there. Obviously we are all interested in trying to figure out when a reasonable person in a position of responsibility would have found that out.

The decision by the Pentagon to send General Miller to Iraq, and then your decision, General Sanchez, to get Colonel Pappas involved—am I correct, General Sanchez, that you are saying that that decision was made because of your concern that conditions at Abu Ghraib were as—I think someone used the word; maybe you did, yourself—dysfunctional? Is that correct?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, that is exactly right. It was dysfunctional in terms of the ability to defend the FOB. That was the judgment that I expressed in the issuance of that Fragmentary Order.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Got it. Well, that is what I wanted to clarify. But, at that time, the dysfunction that you saw in Abu Ghraib did not include your knowledge of prisoner abuse. Is that right?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, that is exactly right.

Senator LIEBERMAN. General Miller, your understanding of the reasons why you were dispatched to Iraq last fall did not include—or did they?—a concern about prisoner abuse.

General MILLER. Sir, they were not focused on the concern about prisoner abuse. They were about the overall capability of CJTF-7 to develop actionable intelligence, to do intelligence fusion, to see how interrogations were conducted.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Your stress on humane treatment, on the Geneva Conventions, was of your own initiative, not because anyone, as they dispatched you to Iraq, had said, “We think we have a problem of prisoner abuse.”

General MILLER. Sir, that is absolutely correct.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Let me now go to this chart that has received so much attention. I have to say, again here, this was put before us by General Alexander, the general in the Army who is in charge of intelligence, so the fact that it comes from a lower-ranking—well, a company commander, Captain Woods, is surprising. Now, maybe it was given to us in the context of this investigation because it is not all bad news for the Army. It does have a series of approved approaches for all detainees on the left here, which certainly, to me, seems reasonable. At the bottom, it lists safeguards, including “approaches must always be humane and lawful, Geneva Conventions apply.”

The problem is this section here on the right, and Captain Woods told anyone who saw this chart that it required General Sanchez’s approval. Some of these seem reasonable, some of them literally seem in violation of the Geneva Conventions.

I wanted to ask you, Colonel Warren, two questions. First, how could Captain Woods have come up with these sections that she said required the commanding general’s approval if the commanding general had not approved this chart? Second, do you agree that the procedures listed on the right side, including environmental manipulation, sleep adjustments, and sensory deprivation, are, in fact, violations of the Geneva Conventions under all circumstances? Because I thought in your answer to Senator Reed earlier, you opened a door in which you were suggesting they might not be. If so, I think it is very important for the committee to hear that.

Colonel WARREN. My answer is that they are not.

Senator LIEBERMAN. That these are not violations of the Geneva Conventions?

Colonel WARREN. These are not, in and of themselves, in isolation, violations of the Geneva Conventions. Specifically, the Fourth Convention, when applied to security internees—in this case, who were unlawful combatants.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Which covers a number of the people at Abu Ghraib, is that right?

Colonel WARREN. It does. It should cover those who, in this circumstance, would have been permissibly under active interrogation. As was pointed out by Senator Graham, some of the people depicted in these photographs should not have been under interrogation at all; they were of no interest. They were actually criminal detainees who should not have been in that cell block in the first place.

But that as an aside, sir, this is more complicated than a yes or no answer. Those things that were on the right that were placed there by Captain Woods, as I said earlier, sir, were placed there in order to show the range of the universe, if you will, of things that were not authorized. They were representative.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Where did she get the authority to not only put them down on paper, but to say that they required the approval of General Sanchez? She is a captain.

Colonel WARREN. I think I can explain that, sir, because, again, I was present throughout as this policy developed.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Please, with the chairman's consent, if you would just take a moment to go over this.

Colonel WARREN. If I might.

Chairman WARNER. The witness will have adequate time to respond.

Colonel WARREN. Thank you, sir. This goes back to General Miller's team's visit, where they looked at a broad range of interrogation and intelligence analytical operations. Their recommendation was that we should have an interrogation policy. We, as a task force, did not have one. We were focused on the tactical level of interrogations. We were following predominantly Army Field Manual approaches. In addition, we had other units, such as Alpha Company 519th MI Battalion, which had served in Afghanistan, bring in their own policies that have been used in other theaters.

Additionally, we had what we called the Common Law of Interrogation Approaches, and that consists of approaches which were variations on the authorized approaches contained within the Army Field Manual by way of implementation. So the point that was made, to have a policy, I believe, was a reasoned and correct recommendation, and I was present at meetings in which—

Senator LIEBERMAN. Reasoned and correct.

Colonel WARREN. Reasoned and correct, absolutely, sir. I believed we needed to have one as we moved our focus to the operational level, as we became more sophisticated, and, frankly, if we wanted to stem the growth of this Common Law of Interrogations so that we could regularize it, so that we could regulate it, and so that we should be able to provide proper oversight.

So we took a number of these SOPs and policies. Among them were those in use in Guantanamo Bay. Others were, as I mentioned, those that were imported into theater. We put together a team of folks who were MI and legal officers. We looked at those policies, we reviewed them against the requirements that we believe were imposed by the Fourth Geneva Convention. We discarded some of those procedures. An example is sensory deprivation. We floated these through the command in a series of drafts.

To be sure, in some of these drafts—specifically one dated September 10—you may very well find all of those on the right-hand side, including sensory deprivation. But during the course of the staffing and the deliberative process and the review—and, sir, by no means is there a book that you can look up that runs through interrogation approaches and methods and has a check and a block that they comply or do not comply with the Geneva Conventions—this is a matter of judgment, a matter of rigor, and a matter of oversight and interpretation. We came up with the interrogation policy first dated September 14. We then sent that to CENTCOM, as General Sanchez described.

During the course of the next 28 days, this deliberative and consultative process continued within the legal and the MI community. It resulted, ultimately, in the October 12 policy. The October 12 policy, as I described, requires compliance with the Geneva Conventions. It draws a legal contrast between POWs and between security internees interned for suspicion of hostile activity to the security of the state, and it requires the safeguards and oversight mechanisms I described. That policy contains only the field manual approaches, which applied to enemy POWs who enjoyed the highest, most preferred status on the battlefield plus segregation in excess of 30 days. When Captain Wood at some point, we believe in October, prepared that slide, what I believe that she did was to take all of the approaches that were floating around the command, if you will, in various drafts, and within the policies listed them to ensure that interrogators understood that only those things on the left were authorized without permission.

Senator LIEBERMAN. But again, you would say that of the group on the right, which has attracted the attention of the committee, the media, and the public, none of these are inherently or automatically in violation of the Geneva Conventions?

Colonel WARREN. In my opinion they are not, sir, and this is why one has to read not just Article 31 of the Fourth Convention but also Pictet's commentary and various legal treatises and interpretations of coercion as applied to security internees.

I will make another point, sir, with regard to the environment in which we found ourselves. Remember that there were three Geneva Conventions, initially. In the 1929 iteration, after World War II, the Fourth Convention, the Civilian's or Occupation Convention, was added. The body of case law, if you will, concerning interpretation of specific articles within the Fourth Geneva Convention is not very great at all. In fact, as we worked through this we did the best we could do under the exigencies of the circumstances and I am frankly very comfortable, sir, with that October 12 policy that remained our policy for a period of 8 months.

If I might add one other thing, sir. It is very important—and this is a problem with a chart like this—it is very important that you understand the definitions which are contained, for example, in the field manual and the policy of some of those measures. To use a term I have learned in the past week in Washington, the optics are bad on that chart. But if you read the actual definitions you will find, for example, with regard to environmental manipulation, it sounds horrible. But the fact is that environmental manipulation can be as simple as, while at all times maintaining the minimum requirements of the Geneva Conventions, that a person who cooperates in interrogations would get an air conditioned room. A person who is not cooperating gets the minimum, non-air conditioned room. Each of those approaches has to be laid out, in writing, in an interrogation plan. Each of those interrogation plans is reviewed at the brigade level. For an exception to policy it comes up for legal and senior intelligence review before going to the commanding general. So the intent of the chart, frankly, was to regulate, not to impose unlawful measures.

Senator LIEBERMAN. So though General Sanchez did not see the chart before last week when General Alexander put it before us, it accurately reflects what you think is the appropriate policy for interrogation?

Colonel WARREN. Those on the left and the safeguards, absolutely. Those on the right, again, are the range of things that may very well in implementation not be authorized. In particular, given the intensity, the magnitude, the duration, and the combination of measures, they may very well, as Senator Reed suggested, violate the Geneva Conventions. You have to look at it on a case-by-case basis.

Senator LIEBERMAN. But obviously you would agree that a lot of what we have seen in pictures that occurred in a particular cell-block in Abu Ghraib violated the Geneva Conventions?

Colonel WARREN. No question about it, sir. They also violated U.S. law and that is why we are seeing court martials.

Senator LIEBERMAN. This chart?

Colonel WARREN. Absolutely, sir.

Senator LIEBERMAN. Thank you very much.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Cornyn.

Senator CORNYN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I guess we can conclude that not even the combatant commanders can go very far without their lawyers, correct, General Abizaid?

General ABIZAID. I am going to hire Colonel Warren.

Senator CORNYN. I do not think any of us should be surprised that at least six separate investigations occurring in a war zone might occasionally come up, at least in a preliminary fashion, with some conflicts or gaps in the investigation. But I want to make sure that we understand, at a baseline, where we are.

General Abizaid, is it not true that in basic training our soldiers receive training on the Geneva Conventions?

General ABIZAID. Yes sir, that is true.

Senator CORNYN. Also, prior to their deployment to the theater of operations they receive retraining on the terms of the Geneva Conventions?

General ABIZAID. They are supposed to, yes sir.

Senator CORNYN. I believe that you have made very clear that under no circumstances, no matter what the category of detainee may be, that at a basic minimum everyone in the custody of the United States Military is entitled to be treated humanely. Is that correct, sir?

General ABIZAID. That is correct, sir.

Senator CORNYN. I believe very strongly that in addition to the hearings that we have had here, which hopefully will, after they conclude, allow our military to get back and do what we have asked you to do in Iraq and Afghanistan, and that is defeat the enemy. That we have to let our military justice process work.

But General Sanchez, you suspended the entire chain of command, not just privates and corporals, on January 17 or thereabouts. Is that correct?

General SANCHEZ. Yes sir, that is correct.

Senator CORNYN. So just to be clear, no one is pointing the finger at the lowest level of our military food chain and saying, "You are at fault and the commanding officers are being protected." Is that right?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, that is correct.

Senator CORNYN. General Miller, I had the pleasure of traveling to Guantanamo Bay, like a number of committee members have, and meeting you there. I was enormously impressed with that operation. There have been some who, during the course of these hearings, have suggested that perhaps because of the various categories of detainees we have in different locations, whether in Iraq, Afghanistan, or Guantanamo Bay, there is some variation in terms of the acceptability of humane treatment. But would you also confirm for us that at a minimum everyone, regardless of their status at Guantanamo Bay or anywhere else, to your knowledge, is entitled to be treated humanely?

General MILLER. Yes, Senator. Every combatant who is at Guantanamo is detained in a humane manner.

Senator CORNYN. In your opinion, General Miller, has the intelligence that you have been able to gain from those who have recruited, financed, and carried out terrorist activities against the United States or our military saved American lives?

General MILLER. Senator, absolutely.

Senator CORNYN. Would you confirm for us, General Abizaid, that that is also true within CENTCOM?

General ABIZAID. Senator, I agree that it is true. I would also like to add that some of these people who we are dealing with are some of the most despicable characters you could ever imagine. They spend every waking moment trying to figure out how to deliver a WMD into the middle of our country. We should not kid ourselves about what they are capable of doing to us, and we have to deal with them.

Senator CORNYN. If we needed any other reminder of that, the death of Nicholas Berg, I believe, reminded us, again, in a graphic fashion. But I, for one, am not troubled by the fact that some person who is trying to kill Americans is deprived of a good night's sleep in order to elicit information, consistent with the Geneva Conventions and our laws and humanity that might save American lives. I consider you all American heroes and congratulate you for the job that you are doing.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator PRYOR.

Senator PRYOR. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. General Abizaid, according to The Washington Post on May 8, 2004, starting in August 2003, Ambassador Bremer had concerns about the treatment of detainees and pressed the military to, "improve conditions, and later made the issue of regular talking points and discussions with Secretary Rumsfeld, Vice President Cheney, and National Security Advisor Rice." The same Washington Post article notes that in August 2003, Ambassador Bremer, "After interceding in one detainee's case, urged the U.S. Military in Iraq and top Bush administration officials to improve conditions and avoid potential fallout.” General Abizaid, is that statement I just read essentially true?

General ABIZAID. Ambassador Bremer brought up to me on one of my many trips to Iraq, on more than one occasion, his concern about detainees.

Senator PRYOR. Okay, so you were aware that Ambassador Bremer had concerns about the treatment of detainees. Were you also aware that he raised this matter with a wide array of senior administration officials?

General ABIZAID. I am not aware of that, Senator, but as I understand the context of Ambassador Bremer’s and my discussions, and also the context of discussions that I had with many Iraqis who were talking to me about the detainee issue, it had to do with moving into the prison system, being lost sight of because we did not have a good tracking system, not being able to get information to families in a timely manner. These were things that we were all concerned about. General Sanchez and I talked about them, and we certainly knew that the detainee system had to be such that we could identify people, track people through the system, and then release people in a timely fashion back to their families once we had determined that they served no intelligence purpose to us. Until General Miller got there—well, I should not say that. We were struggling with this very early on and I will not make any excuses for it other than to say, when you take a country in the shape that we took it, everything was broken and we were starting from zero.

Senator PRYOR. But are you saying that Ambassador Bremer did not have concerns about human rights violations? It was more a clerical concern?

General ABIZAID. To me the issue was how you want to describe human rights violations, as far as the Arabs were concerned and then Ambassador Bremer was concerned. “My husband disappeared into your prison system and now you guys cannot find him.” That is a human rights problem. I agreed with him and Rick agreed with him and we moved to fix it.

Senator PRYOR. Okay. General Sanchez, were you aware that Ambassador Bremer had concerns about the prison system?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, on many occasions since the time I became the commanding general of CJTF-7, Ambassador Bremer and I had discussions about detainee operations. We talked, as General Abizaid stated, about the identification, the in-processing, and the release procedures.

Senator PRYOR. What about the treatment of the prisoners and detainees?

General SANCHEZ. We also talked at some points about the quality of life of prisoners and the conditions that existed, especially during the summer and into the early fall.

Senator PRYOR. Do you recall when he first brought those to your attention?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, it was not a matter of him bringing it to my attention; it was a part of general discussions that we were having.

Senator PRYOR. Do you remember when those general discussions started?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, we started having those in the mid-summer time frame.

General ABIZAID. Senator, if I could just add, there is another issue here which I want to make clear to the committee. It has to do with what goes on at the point of capture. This is not police work that we are dealing with, it is not a standard arrest, it is combat, and there were an awful lot of people in Iraq at the IGC level that thought our troops were being too harsh in the way that they took people into custody. In my mind, having seen it personally on the battlefield, I thought, and I still think, it was some of the most professional work I have seen young troopers do anywhere. So, we did have a different point of view in that regard.

Senator PRYOR. General Sanchez, let me follow up with you, if I may. You mentioned you were having these general discussions about conditions and a variety of issues relating to the detainees. When did you first start to report that up the chain of command, and who did you report that to?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, there were multiple occasions when General Abizaid and I had discussions, especially as they related to actions at the point of attack.

Senator PRYOR. Here again, do you remember when that started?

General SANCHEZ. Sir, as I stated, immediately.

Senator PRYOR. As soon as you were aware of it.

General ABIZAID. Senator, let there be no doubt. We knew there were problems in the detainee system. We did not think that there was a set of conditions existing out there such as we have seen in the photographs. But we knew that there were problems and we moved to get them under control as quickly as we could. When I say immediately, I took command in July and I would imagine that, besides talking about operational matters, one of the first things that the two of us talked about was how we had to get this under control.

Senator PRYOR. General Abizaid, when you talked to your superiors, who did you talk to?

General ABIZAID. Sir, I cannot recall specifically mentioning the problem to the SECDEF or to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, but on one of their visits and during one of our phone calls—we talk all the time, and there is a free exchange of information—they would have known. I do not think that Don Ryder coming over to look at the system was indicative of us trying to sweep the problem under the table; it was indicative of us trying to fix the problem.

Senator PRYOR. Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. One advantage of going close to last is that you can cross things off your list. I have done a lot of crossing off. Let me just share a concern. During the last 3 hours there have been eight references to different newspaper accounts, some of them with the same newspaper several times. Of the articles that were written, there are four of them that have been categorically denied by you, General Abizaid, or by General Sanchez, and I believe you in that. It leads me to believe this is so press-driven that it is just out of control. But when you get your briefings every morning, I know you read the different articles in the paper that affect you. Is that not correct?

General ABIZAID. Yes sir.

Senator INHOFE. There are many times that you have found that they are in error, and I am sure you have either directly or indirectly called that to the attention of the newspaper or the publication that gave these in these articles. Is that correct? You have done it right here in this setting.

General ABIZAID. Well sir, there are a lot of things that are incorrect. I do not spend much time correcting them.

Senator INHOFE. Well, I would hope you did not but I guess I would ask this: have you ever seen a retraction by any of these newspapers when something is proven to be wrong?

General ABIZAID. No sir.

Senator INHOFE. All right. I have not either. I think Senator Collins was right when she talked about all the good things that are happening that you just do not see in the media. Not just the humanitarian things that we see when we go over to Iraq and go to Afghanistan and see what these great guys and gals are doing and how much they are loved by the people over there. In the case of Afghanistan, General Abizaid, the Oklahoma 45th, they have taken on the responsibility of training the Afghan National Army to train themselves, and they are doing a great job. When I was over there I watched the expressions on the faces of the new Afghan commanders, teaching and training their troops. This is something that would be worthy, certainly, of publication. I dare say very few people, not half of 1 percent of the people in America, know all these good things that are going on. Quite frankly it just breaks my heart to see you guys over here. I agree with what Senator Graham said, that we have to air this out and get it out in the public but we have already had the SECDEF, the Under Secretary of Defense, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and quite frankly, I am sorry that you guys are here. I would rather be handling this in some way where we can get your statement, get it in the record and have that done with. Because you have an awesome responsibility. General Sanchez, as commander of CJTF-7—that is all the Army, all the Navy, all the Air Force, all the Marines, all the coalition forces, all the allies—that is your responsibility in Iraq. General Abizaid, you have that responsibility plus what is going on in Afghanistan. By the way, I think that the Afghanistan success story should serve and will serve as a model for what we are trying to get done in Iraq.

So, that is just one opinion. I know that you are anxious to get back to the battlefield and that is where your mind is today and that is where your heart is. I did talk to Senator Warner when I found you were going to be here and he assured us that you had other reasons to be here. So, perhaps that takes care of that.

I think some things are worth repeating. I think that until we see the Fay Report, until we get the results of the investigations, the results of the courts martial, we are not going to have the answers. This concept of undue command influence puts you in a very awkward position to say things, and I hope in your own minds you have not said anything publicly that is going to interfere with the prosecutions that are going on. Do you feel pretty comfortable that you have been able to do that?

General ABIZAID. Yes sir, I do.

Senator INHOFE. I look at what happened when things were discovered and I was amazed with how quickly things were done, how quickly you took care of the problems that were there. The guards were removed, the commanders were relieved, criminal investigations started immediately. That was long before the public even knew what was going on, long before the pictures came out. Maybe the system is broken but it is not broken to the extent that you did not perform immediately when you found out what was going on.

I want to say one thing, and this is just an opinion. There are a lot of people who have been critical that some of the guards, the seven guards that have been referred to many times, are taking the heat for all of this. I do not think there is an American out there, once they see the videos and the pictures that we at this table have seen of the behavioral pattern of these guards, who would be at all critical of any kind of punishment that they would be subjected to. Now, I am not saying anything that has not already been in the paper. I was very careful, after I saw those, not to say anything. But others did, and they talked about the fact that this was like they were staging a porn film. Well, this is something that no one would condone. You folks would not; no one else would. So I just think that we need to talk about the good things that have been happening and get you back in the battle where you belong.

Before I run out of time, General Sanchez, there have been several things that you have taken away in terms of interrogation techniques. Do you think that has harmed your ability to get the information that you need to have?

General SANCHEZ. No sir, it has not.

Senator INHOFE. Okay. Colonel Warren, I believe it was you who said that, yes, in cellblock 1-A and 1-B those are the tough guys, those are the terrorists. But occasionally one gets in there who is not. I would suggest that probably the profile of that individual got them there and when you realized that they did not belong there you took them out. General Miller, is that what you think might have happened?

General MILLER. Sir, I was not there when they were using cellblock 1-A and 1-B, but in discussions that was the intent early on in September.

Senator INHOFE. Okay. Well, I knew that you were not there at the time. In fact, I was down at Guantanamo Bay when you were there and you just did great work down there. My time has expired, but I am glad that Senator Cornyn brought up something most significant, and that was, did any of the information that you have been able to get from these detainees prevent something bad from happening or save American lives or save coalition lives and, if so, are there any specific examples that you would like to share with us? In other words, you were successfully interrogating some of these people in that particular section. Was some of the information that you got helpful in saving American lives or saving troops?

General ABIZAID. Senator, I do not know the answer to that. I certainly do know that in many cases good interrogation techniques used by very smart people have saved the lives of an awful lot of Americans and Iraqis.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you very much.

General MILLER. If I could just add to that. General Sanchez, as one of my new jobs as the Deputy Commander for Detainee Operations, asked me to look at the intelligence function. I tell you that half the effort of CJTF-7, now Multi-National Force Iraq, is going down to develop actionable intelligence at the unit level. That saves soldiers' lives every day. The other 30 percent goes toward theater-level things that come down from the commanders' decision or in taskings from other organizations. The other 20 percent we just keep as a standby that is used every day because of high profile. So that system, that organization works every day and every night to try to be able to provide actionable intelligence.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, General Miller, and I hope that the media is paying attention today after you gave—I know my time is up, but Colonel Warren wanted to say something about Article 32 early on.

Chairman WARNER. Please, Colonel Warren.

Senator INHOFE. Is there anything you would like to say about Article 32?

Colonel WARREN. Well sir, Article 32 of the Fourth Convention is the one that prohibits torture and the conduct of medical experimentation and so forth. Those are grave breaches under the law of war. Of course, obviously prohibited under our policies, under our values, our standards, our training, and our interrogation policy.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator Inhofe.

General SANCHEZ. Mr. Chairman, may I add something?

Chairman WARNER. Yes, General Sanchez.

General SANCHEZ. As a result of the two visits from General Miller and then from General Ryder, the system that we put into place for intelligence fusion within CJTF-7 matured significantly because of the experience and the lessons and the integration of those lessons into the command under General Fast. There is absolutely no question in my mind that because of those two efforts, significant amounts of Americans' lives have been saved because of the turn in terms of from the time we find the information, develop the intelligence and get it to the tactical level for action, it is absolutely the right thing for us to have done and I would do it again.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you for that answer.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you. General Sanchez, in my most recent visit I met with General Fast. Would you kindly explain the position that she occupies?

General SANCHEZ. Yes sir. Brigadier General Fast has been my Director for Intelligence of the CJTF-7.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

Senator Bayh.

Senator BAYH. Gentlemen, thank you for your service to our country under most difficult circumstances. I can only hope that your treatment at our hands today has been humane. I sometimes feel empathy for those who are on the receiving end of these hearings.

General Abizaid, who was responsible for the staffing levels at the prison, for the number of MPs and prison guards?

General ABIZAID. I would say the responsibility for a unit coming with the right number of people belongs to the United States Army. The responsibility if we have shortages then devolves upon CJTF-7 to tell me so I can tell the Army to fix it.

Senator BAYH. The reason I ask is I understand Army doctrine calls for one MP brigade per about 4,000 prisoners, and here we had one battalion for what ultimately reached about 7,000 or slightly more prisoners, or about five times the number of detainees per guard or MP that the Army doctrine would call for. I would like your opinion—and there have been some reports to this effect—this substantial overcrowding did not excuse the behavior, of course, but did it contribute to an atmosphere which might have given rise, at least in part, to this aberrant behavior?

General ABIZAID. Well, it contributed to systemic failures at the prison. I think that is clear.

Senator BAYH. It gets to my second and somewhat broader concern, now that I have had a chance to reflect upon this whole set of circumstances. I would like your opinion, both with the benefit of hindsight and going forward, on whether we have adequate troop strength in Iraq to accomplish our mission. I have been concerned from day one, and I know Senator McCain and some others have had this concern, that we did not have adequate strength at the beginning to prevent some of this rampant looting that took place; that we did not have adequate troop strength to prevent some of the sabotage of vital infrastructure that took place; that we did not have adequate troop strength to immediately clamp down on the insurrection which has now gathered a momentum all on its own. I wonder if, just in a microcosm, this is another manifestation of our continual underestimation of the task that we have taken on here. In a situation like this where we are deposing a regime, we are trying to reconstitute a country with no history of democracy, it seems to me we should err on the side of having more strength than necessary rather than too little.

Both looking back and looking forward, have we had adequate troop strength and do we have adequate troop strength to accomplish our mission with this critical June 30 handover fast approaching?

General ABIZAID. Have we had adequate troop strength? Certainly in February I would have told you absolutely. Things were where we thought they would be. Did we anticipate that there would be additional violence as we moved towards a political process? We did, and that is the reason I asked for the troops from the First Armored Division and the Second Armored Cavalry Regiment to remain there, although we did not specify them particularly. I would like to point out that one piece of hugely good news that has been lost in this period of the Abu Ghraib scandal is the incredible work and bravery and selflessness and military capability of those two units, as well as have the Marines in moving from positions in contact in Baghdad down into the south and fighting a very tough fight.

But to answer your question directly—and forgive me for diverting—Senator McCain and I have had the opportunity many times to discuss it and I appreciate his opinion. There are certain types of troops that we do not have enough of and we still do not have enough of them, and we have to figure out how to get them. They are MPs and they are MI guys and they are human intelligence guys and they are civil affairs people. We must build a force structure that allows us to be able to fight a war like this in the 21st century and they are not in the force structure. We have MPs on the scene that the Army has done a very good job in training that do not happen to be MPs. We have Air Force truck units. We are doing things with our force structure that, in my view, we need to sit back from a service provider point of view and say, "Okay, what do we really need?"

Now, in terms of asking are there enough tanks, are there enough Bradleys, are there enough combat troops, marines, etcetera, I am pretty comfortable with that. It is the enablers I am not comfortable with. I will end it up by saying I am also not comfortable that there are enough international troops on the battlefield because the effort needs to be not just American, but it needs to be international. These are things that I have said, I believe, to the committee on numerous occasions.

Senator BAYH. It is not new thinking.

General ABIZAIID. Did I miscalculate the number of troops? Maybe. Maybe I miscalculated, but I think we have adjusted and will continue to adjust based on what the enemy does, because the enemy has a vote.

Senator BAYH. The civilian leadership always places this at your doorstep, saying that they are endeavoring to get you everything you need and I certainly appreciate that. But Deputy Secretary Wolfowitz began to touch on this, I think, yesterday in some of his testimony up here in a different capacity, when he said this is not only a military undertaking, this is a political undertaking. I am just wondering if those who felt that we were going to be greeted as liberating heroes, so to speak, perhaps did not underestimate the magnitude of the societal transformation we have taken on. This goes way beyond the military purview, and I am just wondering if, given the magnitude of that task, we have been understaffed and this is just another manifestation of that.

General ABIZAIID. Well Senator, I cannot comment for the political side of the house, but I can comment in saying that while we cannot be defeated militarily we are not going to win this thing militarily alone. We have to get everything together—economics, politics, intelligence, information, you name it—it all has to come together in a synchronized fashion that allows us to do this very important task. It is really one of the hardest things that this Nation has ever undertaken in this part of the world or anywhere else.

Senator BAYH. Gentlemen, several of you have indicated in response to recent questioning that lives have been saved, attacks have been prevented with access to timely and accurate intelligence. I think, General Miller, you have indicated that approximately 600 of these detainees are some of the worst of the worst and that if released upon Iraqi society they would not only imperil our forces, but also innocent Iraqis. Colonel Warren, I think you indicated that the Geneva Conventions would allow somewhat more vigorous interrogations of some of those kind of folks, but with the exception of a few requests for solitary confinement we have not gone there. Is that all correct? Stress positions were requested but were not permitted.

Where I am going with all this is that it is so important that we strike the right balance here. On the one hand, timely intelligence saves innocent Iraqi lives and the lives of our troops. On the other hand, there is a dividing line beyond which our moral integrity, our honor is vitally important if we are going to win this war against terrorism because we do stand for something better. So what has been brought before this committee with these pictures, which obviously go to the latter issue of who we are and what we stand for, let us not lose sight of the former, either.

The pictures that stick in my mind also, Mr. Chairman, are the pictures of the young men out there at Walter Reed, some of them missing arms, some of them missing legs, fractured lives in the full flower of their youth. The pictures that came out of those flag-draped caskets. Those pictures are important, too. So, there is no excuse for the behavior that gave rise to the pictures of this abuse at this prison. We have to root it out and some of these individuals are on trial. But at the same time, let us not repeat some of the mistakes that we have made in the area of covert intelligence where the Director of the CIA now tells us it is going to take 5 years to reconstitute our covert capabilities and adequately protect this country. A balance is in order here and I just hope that we are empowering you to strike that balance in ways that protect our brave men and women on the one hand and preserve our honor on the other.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator. Is there a desire for any witness to speak? If not, Senator Dole.

Senator DOLE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Gentlemen, I certainly want to join my colleagues in thanking you for your tremendous leadership and your outstanding service to your country. Like Senator Cornyn, I regard you as heroes sitting in front of us today, and I thank you for your time with us. Since all of you have been very forthcoming in the last 3 hours of questions, I would like to take this opportunity to ask some questions with regard to your overall Iraqi operations.

First of all though, General Miller, let me ask you, would you clarify who will be in charge of running the Iraqi prison system after June 30?

General MILLER. Senator, that is still in dialogue and discussion between the CPA, the IGC, and now the soon-to-be Interim Iraqi Government. Those transitions are working. I will tell you that as far as Multi-National Forces Iraq, our plan is to continue to run our theater-level, our Multi-National Forces Iraq three detention facilities and other detention facilities that allow us to ensure we can implement a safe and secure environment. But as we work towards transition, every day I meet with my Iraqi counterparts to see how we can more successfully move to integrate this operation.

Senator DOLE. Thank you. Now, in an intercepted letter written by al Qaeda operative Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, we were given insight to a terrorist message that was very significant and compelling. In noting concern that he may lose a foothold in Iraq he wrote, "With the spread of the army and the police, our future is becoming frightening." He went on to detail the very environment of chaos his network requires to succeed—attacks on Iraqi security forces, the targeting of Kurds, the Shi'ite populations, and the killing of Americans—the very environment evolving in Iraq that he feared the coalition forces would suffocate.

General Abizaid, several reports have claimed that Zarqawi is in Baghdad. If he actually got into Baghdad past coalition forces, can we assume that he has the mobility to move to other regions in Iraq?

General ABIZAID. Senator Dole, I would assume that Zarqawi has the ability to move around the Nation, unfortunately. The nature of the insurgency is one that you cannot stop one person from moving where you would not like them to move, even as visible as they may be. He can move around, he can strike at will, and we have reason to believe that he was in Jordan recently and had his hands in the plot that would have killed thousands and thousands of Jordanians that was foiled by the king's special forces and intelligence forces. So there is a great battle going on in the region. It not only extends to Iraq, but it is in Saudi Arabia. It should come as no surprise to the committee that these people are also attacking foreigners in places like Saudi Arabia. There is a strategy at work here that we should not lose sight of, and it is happening in Afghanistan and it is happening in Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, and elsewhere in the region, and it is also happening in places like Madrid.

Senator DOLE. Can you confirm that Zarqawi beheaded Nicholas Berg?

General ABIZAID. I do not know that I can confirm that it was him. I know that there are various reports of people saying it is his voice on the tape. I know he has claimed it, and it certainly would not be past him.

Senator DOLE. General Kimmitt said that the killing of Salim had the classic hallmarks of Zarqawi. Do you have any further information to share with us on that?

General ABIZAID. No Senator. I would not want to give Zarqawi any stature he does not deserve. He is a murderer, he is a torturer, and that is the status he deserves.

Senator DOLE. Do you have any indication that al Qaeda is coordinating with al-Sadr's resistance?

General ABIZAID. That is a very good question, but I think the answer is no. But in that part of the world you never know.

Senator DOLE. Saddam Hussein's government was believed to have produced several hundred tons of sarin as well as stockpiles of mustard gas. Now, the presence of both sarin and mustard gas has been reported in Baghdad. Do our men and women in theater have the equipment, the devices that they need in order to protect themselves from the exposure to such agents as these? General Sanchez?

General SANCHEZ. Yes ma'am. The answer is yes, we do. We deploy with all of our chemical, nuclear, biological capabilities and those are present.

Senator DOLE. General Abizaid, defense contractors and private business representatives, of course, are critical to reconstruction efforts and rebuilding in Iraq. Terrorists seem to have shifted their focus; they are targeting these unarmed civilians. A corporation from my home State of North Carolina, Blackwater, of course, with four contractors who were shot, burned, and hung from a bridge; Nick Berg's murder—what are you doing to provide increased security for these unarmed civilians?

General ABIZAIID. I think it is best left for General Sanchez to talk about the details, but it is clear that the enemy has discovered a vulnerability in the contracting system. It is also clear that we have to work with the contractors to protect them, not only in coordinating with Iraqi security services but with our own. For example, we should not have convoys moving around areas that we know to be very violent without some sort of coordination with the military, and that has happened before and that has gotten people into trouble before.

Senator DOLE. General Sanchez, do you want to answer that as well?

General SANCHEZ. Yes ma'am. We are working with the CPA reconstruction effort. We work with all the contractors in the country. We have the mechanisms to provide escort for convoys as they move across the country, and there have been instances where contractors have moved without coordination with the local commanders and without escort and they have gotten themselves in trouble. But we do have the mechanisms and we are continuing to work that with them.

General ABIZAIID. By the way, Senator Dole, if I may, I would just like to add by saying, we sometimes forget that a lot of these contractors who are out there are heroes too.

Senator DOLE. Yes.

General ABIZAIID. They are out there in a very dangerous area. A lot of them—I would say the vast majority of them—are doing it because they love their country. We should not fail to praise them. There are times when we are not happy with the way contracts work, et cetera, but these young Americans and older Americans who are out there doing this are by and large great people who love the country and doing God's work.

Senator DOLE. Thank you for adding that statement. I could not agree with you more. My time has expired.

Chairman WARNER. I would like to also say I thank you very much for the recognition. It is well-deserved by that infrastructure that supports our forces.

We have two remaining Senators, then the committee will stand in recess for just a few minutes and we will resume in room 219, which is in this building.

Senator Bill Nelson.

Senator BILL NELSON. General Miller, I think you cleaned up the situation at Guantanamo. I think you did a good job. Of course, we are trying to sort out other things but I just want that in the record, from my observations, having been there twice.

General Abizaid, yesterday we had Lieutenant General Sharp in front of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He offered a little bit of clarity, and perhaps you can help clarify things here for us. Earlier in your testimony you stated that what we are facing, "It's a hard thing, it will take a long time." One of the responsibilities that we have is looking at a force structure. We keep getting different statements that are interpreted different ways. So one of the things that I would like to ask you is, do you consider it part of the mission in Iraq to disarm the militias, such as the Mehdi army of al-Sadr?

General ABIZAID. I regard al-Sadr's militia right now as being a hostile force and it is our mission to disarm them or destroy them in battle.

Senator BILL NELSON. I would think that would be the common sense thing; if I were the commander that would be part of my mission.

General ABIZAID. But Senator, if I might add, it is also clear that as we move towards a period of partnership in Iraq, which is so essential for us to move to, that those militia forces or armed groups that may belong to people loyal to the new Iraq, that are willing to move forward in a manner of reconciliation and work towards a better future, we need to work with them to integrate them into the system. So it is not that we will go out and destroy all militias, certainly not. It is that we will fight those who are working against us and will work to help integrate those that have worked with us, such as we find in the Kurdish areas and to a certain extent in some of the Shi'ite areas with the Badr Corps.

Senator BILL NELSON. It would be nice if we had an Iraqi army that was ready to do a lot of that. It would be nice if we had a police force that would be able to help us. But at the moment we do not. So I am asking you about your mission now. Does your mission in Iraq include providing security on the streets against crime, functions normally performed by a police force?

General ABIZAID. Our mission in some areas, where the police force is not working, unfortunately causes us to have to do police work. That is correct. It is also correct to say, Senator, that we probably have overstated how bad things are with the Iraqi security forces, that the Iraqi security forces in certain areas of the country are exceptional and they are doing very well. In the north we see it and in some places in the south. There are many police forces that are doing well by Iraqi standards and will continue to do well. We had a failure during the April time frame, as you are well aware, of some units of the Iraqi Civil Defense Corps, of some units of the Army and of some units of the police. But on the other hand, Senator, I believe this has more to do with our willingness to give them authority than it has to do with their willingness to fight for their country. They want to fight for their country but they want to fight for Iraqis. So as we move towards this period of sovereignty and Iraqi chains of command are established that are reliable, I believe that the quality of Iraqi forces will move in a direction that will surprise a lot of people. I have faith in them.

Senator BILL NELSON. I certainly hope so. I visited one of those police academies in Jordan where you are training them, but it is a long time and there are only X thousand that you can prepare. We will find out how many in the future. Since we are having to disarm militias and also having to provide some protection against street crime right now, the question is, is the 105,000 level, augmented by keeping the additional 20,000 so that you are somewhere in the range of 125,000, 130,000 troops, is that sufficient for you to carry out your mission over the course, not only before June 30 but over the rest of the year after June 30?

General ABIZAID. Again, I do not like to waffle in my answers, and this will sound like a waffle to you, but it depends on a couple of different things. It depends upon the enemy, although I would predict, and I think Rick will agree with me, that the situation will become more violent, even after sovereignty, because it will remain unclear what is going to happen between the interim government and elections. So moving through the election period will be violent, and it could very well be more violent than we are seeing today. So it is possible that we might need more forces. But I would again say that perhaps with a resolution in the United Nations could say that instead of international forces withdrawing from Iraq they should come to Iraq, because other nations need to understand how important Iraq's stability is for their future as well as the entire region's future. Getting more international forces and getting a higher quality of Iraqi forces will help us figure out where we stand. But I think the numbers about where we are now for the foreseeable future unless something changes, either international force-wise or in the quality of Iraqi troops, and is what we can expect through the elections.

Senator BILL NELSON. What did you mean by a long time?

General ABIZAID. Well, we know the elections will take place in December or January. So, I am saying that the First Armored—please do not get me in any more trouble with the First Armored Division and the Second Armored Cavalry. We will rotate them out of there but the force levels will stay about what they are, I think, until after the elections. Or until we come to a point where we see that we are going to have a soft landing.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator AKAKA.

Senator AKAKA. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I want to add my gratitude to you and praise and commendation for your leadership as well as to our troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. I too have visited Iraq and Afghanistan, and the kind of message I got while I was there was good. Our troops seemed to have been working well at that time.

I have been very concerned about one part of the personnel that is there. We have talked about international and coalition forces, we have talked about the MPs, the MIs. One group is the contractors—this has been mentioned here—and I get the sense, and I would like to get an answer from you on this, that the contractors seem to be outside of the line of command. That is my feeling. As a result some things they do are not known by us.

General Abizaid, it is my understanding that the civilian contractors who are interrogators—there are many different kinds—work directly with MI personnel. My question is, who supervises the civilian interrogators and do they report to any agencies other than the DOD? Another question is, is anyone in the DOD accountable for the behavior the civilian contractors?

General MILLER. Sir, if I could I would like to take this.

Senator AKAKA. General Miller. Thank you.

General MILLER. The civilian contractors who work in our intelligence organizations are accountable to the chain of command of the intelligence organization. So if you are an interrogator you are accountable to the chain of command of the interrogation company or the battalion or the brigade that goes in there. So there are also people who do screening. By screening I mean when you are captured, they do the initial debriefing to be able to develop intelligence. So we have a small number who are in our Intelligence Fusion Centers. They all work for the military through here. In our organization currently no civilian contractor is at a supervisory position. It is the military who sets the priorities and ensures that we meet our standards.

Senator AKAKA. What other types of personnel do you have there as contractors besides interrogators?

General MILLER. Sir, in the intelligence area there are the screeners, those who get initial information from those under interrogation, and those who are involved in intelligence fusion, developing intelligence from processed intelligence, from raw intelligence and feeding our computer systems. Those are the contractors that we have in the intelligence system.

General ABIZAID. You will also find interpreters, Senator.

Senator AKAKA. Thank you. My question on that is, are there any contractors who are from Third World nations?

General ABIZAID. I am sure there are. Yes, I have talked to some.

General MILLER. Our translators, some of them are from Third World nations. They do an excellent job for us.

Senator AKAKA. Okay. Can you name some of the nations?

General MILLER. Sir, I am sorry, I cannot.

Senator AKAKA. My concern has been—and thank you for answering it—that they are within the line and chain of command so that we know what they are doing and they are answerable to someone in DOD.

General MILLER. Sir, we will, for the record, get the Nations that those interpreters are from.

[The information referred to follows:]

This is in response to your request about the countries whose citizens are working for us as interpreters/translators through the Army's linguist contract. As regards JTF-GTMO, all the linguists there now are U.S. citizens with security clearances, although previously there were some linguists there who did not require a security clearance. At that point we did have non-U.S. citizens there, most notably a Chinese citizen who spoke Uighur; he has since become a U.S. citizen and remains on the island. Due to the high level of proficiency required to support Army missions, many of the linguists working as U.S. citizens in positions that require security clearances are naturalized citizens. Their countries of origin have not specifically been tracked—some of these individuals became U.S. citizens more than 20 years ago while others, such as the Uighur linguist at JTF-GTMO, are very new citizens.

As to the foreign nationals working under the Army linguist contract, the majority of the requirements for linguists who do not require access to classified information are hired locally. We have such linguists hired in Iraq, Afghanistan, Kuwait, Qatar, and Bahrain. OSD funded an effort for linguists without security clearances to be hired from the U.S. and other allied nations with the intent of providing the forces in Iraq with linguists who are not only fluent in the Iraqi dialect of Arabic and knowledgeable of Iraqi customs, but also are familiar with U.S./Western culture. While the majority of the linguists hired through this program are Iraqi citizens who are permanent resident aliens of the U.S., there are also some Canadians of Iraqi descent working for us as linguists. Additionally, there are one or two linguists from Lebanon, Jordan, Egypt, and Italy, all of whom have sufficient proficiency in the Iraqi dialect and English to allow them to support Army missions.

Senator AKAKA. Thank you very much. General Miller, you have had quite a bit of publicity and so let me ask you this out of my curiosity. Did you tell General Karpinski that you were going to "Gitmoize" Abu Ghraib? What did you mean by this statement?

General MILLER. Senator, I did not tell General Karpinski I was going to "Gitmoize" Abu Ghraib. I do not believe I have ever used that term. When Janis Karpinski and I were having our dialogues, they were about humane detention, how the detention centers would be run, the requirements for the MPs and the leadership to be present and ensure that humane detention is done. As we have talked about before, it is an enormously high leader impact, high leader-type requirement.

Senator AKAKA. Do you think it is possible that any of your recommendations could have been misconstrued by the civilian contractors?

General MILLER. Senator, I do not believe that any of those recommendations were misconstrued. At that time there were no civilian contractors employed in the organization. But once again, that would be speculation on my part because I was not there during the hiring to see how the civilian contractors came in.

Senator AKAKA. General Abizaid, you discussed the need to modify Army doctrine about Abu Ghraib, and you cited instances of abuse in Afghanistan and Iraq. Is the problem of detainee abuse systemic within CENTCOM?

General ABIZAID. No sir, I do not believe it is systemic. There have been instances of abuse in Afghanistan and other prisons, and in Iraq as well. I believe my comments concerning doctrine have to do more with how we fuse intelligence, how we distribute intelligence, how we work in a synchronized manner to achieve results that will help our young soldiers and marines on the battlefield.

Senator AKAKA. Thank you very much for your response.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much, Senator Akaka.

We have had an excellent hearing, a very thorough exchange of views and responses. We thank you.

Senator Talent.

Senator TALENT. I appreciate the opportunity and if we are going to go in a closed I will withhold my questions. I do have a very brief statement, though. I do want to associate myself with some of the concerns that Senator Inhofe raised. There is so much that you do not know whether you know it or not, and one of the worst things that could happen out of this is if we ended up in a situation where some of these people got off because of something that was said at one of these hearings. In addition, I think there is something to be said for waiting until you all can present the comprehensive results of your investigations. I do want to, just for the record, Mr. Chairman, respectfully suggest to you and the ranking member that we consider whether it would be good to have the Fay Report in hand before we do the next hearing. I know you are talking constantly with the ranking member about timing and what we ought to do, and I think these hearings have been very good. But it almost comports with the Senate schedule anyway, given that a recess is coming up.

Chairman WARNER. Senator, in my discussions with the DOD, which I might say has been very cooperative, they have indicated that this committee will be the first to receive the Fay Report when it is available.

Senator TALENT. If it looks like they are stonewalling on it I think it is a different thing.

Chairman WARNER. No.

Senator TALENT. But you think in a couple of weeks that the report will be available.

Chairman WARNER. The DOD will determine the timing of the release of that report.

Senator TALENT. All right. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Again, I thank you very much. We will now go to Hart 219 for a closed session. I thank the committee. I take note that we have had 100 percent attendance here today. I think that speaks to the seriousness and the solemnity with which this committee regards this very serious issue.

Senator LEVIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank our witnesses for joining us but also indicate that I have some additional questions that are unclassified that we do not have time to ask.

Chairman WARNER. Right.

Senator LEVIN. I will be submitting those to our witnesses. I think if the chairman would set a deadline for those so our witnesses will not have to be troubled by questions coming in for a long period of time; for instance, questions within the next 24 hours or 48 hours would be very helpful.

Chairman WARNER. Absolutely. Thank you.

Senator LEVIN. Would that be all right?

Chairman WARNER. That would be fine.

Senator LEVIN. Forty-eight hours then?

Chairman WARNER. Let us just establish midday Friday.

Senator LEVIN. That would be fine. Noon Friday?

Chairman WARNER. Noon Friday. Thank you very much.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SUSAN COLLINS

GENERAL TAGUBA'S REPORT

1. Senator COLLINS. General Miller, General Taguba's report stated that the 320th Military Police (MP) Battalion (BN) and the 372nd MP received no training in detention or internee operations prior to deployment to Iraq. I would like your assessment of the training of the MPs at Abu Ghraib prison. Prior to their deployment to Iraq, what was their experience at civilian or military prisons, and once they were mobilized, what training were they provided?

General MILLER. The United States Army Reserve Command could better comment on the exact make up from civilian life of the 320th MP BN. The soldiers and leaders of the 320th MP BN were trained in accordance with the current Department of the Army mobilization requirements. The Department of the Army would better be able to comment on pre-deployment training conducted.

LACK OF TRAINING

2. Senator COLLINS. General Miller, do you believe that a lack of training played a part in the alleged abuse at Abu Ghraib?

General MILLER. I believe it was a breakdown in the fundamentals of leadership within the unit that led to the alleged abuse going unreported. Leaders set the tone by which a unit runs; they imbued the morals and standards of the unit on each individual soldier and junior leader. In this case the leadership failed to do their primary job: to lead.

OTHER U.S.-RUN PRISON FACILITIES

3. Senator COLLINS. General Abizaid, can you give me your assessment on whether abuse similar to that alleged at Abu Ghraib has occurred at other U.S.-run prison facilities in Iraq or Afghanistan?

General ABIZAD. The type of abuse seen in many of the photographs taken at Abu Ghraib appears at this time to be confined to that location and to have occurred during the timeframe of October-November 2003. At other detention facilities there have been isolated incidents of alleged abuse, normally involving the use of excessive and unauthorized physical force. Each of these incidents is currently the subject of review and investigations are ongoing.

INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OF THE RED CROSS REPORT

4. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, with respect to the working paper that the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) submitted to the Combined Joint Task Force (CJTF) officials on November 6, 2003 to complain about abuses observed at Abu Ghraib in October, you testified that your "office participated in the drafting of a response for Brigadier General (BG) Karpinski's signature. That response was dated December 24 and would have been delivered to the International Committee of the Red Cross." According to The Wall Street Journal, General Karpinski stated that the first time she learned of the ICRC report was in late November when she was summoned to a meeting with you and General Walter Wojdakowski, where she was told by you "not to worry about the response because his officers were working on the response for my review." When did you first become aware of the November 6 ICRC report, to whom was it addressed, did you read the report, and were you aware of its content?

Colonel WARNER. I first became aware of the report in early December 2003 when I returned to Iraq from leave. I was on leave in Germany from 12-30 November 2003. The report was transmitted by the ICRC cover letter, dated November 12, 2003, addressed to "BG Janice Karpinsky (sic), 800th MP Brigade." General Karpinski's December 24, 2003, response is enclosed.

REPLY TO ATTENTION OF Commander, 800th Military Police Brigade

24th December 2003

Ms Eva Svoboda
ICRC Protection Coordinator
IRAQ

Dear Ms Svoboda,

ICRC VISITS TO CAMP CROPPER AND ABÚ-GHURAYB IN OCT 03

Introduction

Thank you for your letter dated 12 November 2003 enclosing confidential Working Papers relating to visits to Camp Cropper and Abu Ghurayb in October.

The importance of cooperation between the ICRC and Coalition forces, particularly during ongoing hostilities by those who have no regard at all for protected symbols or institutions, cannot be overstated. Given the difficult conditions under which Coalition forces operate, our mutual interaction helps to ensure every effort is made to uphold the Geneva Conventions. It is our desire all individuals in detention facilities be treated humanely, at all stages of the detention process.

Special Detention Facility (Camp Cropper)

While your Working Paper acknowledges conditions in this facility have continued to notably improve, it claims conditions still contravene internment standards in Geneva Convention III and IV (GCIII and IV). We maintain those detainees who have been classified as Enemy Prisoner of War (EPW) or those awaiting GCIII/5 determination, are being treated in accordance with the principles in GCIII/13. However, there are ongoing efforts to improve their conditions.

With regard to the segregations of High Value Detainee (HVD) EPW/Security Internees, these personnel have been assessed to be of significant ongoing intelligence value to current and future military operations in Iraq. Their detention condition is in the context of ongoing strategic interrogation and imposed local conditions. Under the circumstances, we consider their detention to be humane. When their detention is determined to be no longer necessary due to "imperative reasons of security" and if available evidence does not support prosecution for crimes, they will be released. Notwithstanding the continuing armed conflict in Iraq, nearly 5% of HVDs have already been released on parole.

Concerning segregations, the issue of cells without daylight is a disciplinary prohibition in GCIII/IV. The HVDs are not held in such conditions as a disciplinary measure, but as a temporary security precaution during their ongoing interrogation and as a result of available appropriate structures. As your paper notes, internees have access to electric lighting, an hour outside their cells each day, and showers.

The alleged ill treatment of Ibrahim Khalil Ibrahim Hussein Al-Aani upon capture will be investigated and appropriate action taken if warranted. U.S. forces make the legal status, rights and judicial guarantees of all detainees a continuing priority in detention operations.

Regarding the treatment of EPWs under GCIII, the matter will be considered and appropriate measures will be implemented if necessary. With respect to the security internees, who are "definitely suspected of or engaged in activities hostile to the security of the State", we agree they are protected persons under GCIV. However, depending on the nature of the security risk presented by these internees, their protections are subject to the derogation pursuant to GCIV/5.

Baghdad Central Detention Facility (Abu Ghurayb)

It is regretted there were difficulties with access to detainees on 21 October 03. Improved procedures should ensure such problems are avoided in the future.

The security environment around Abu Ghurayb is challenging, like many areas in Iraq. Steps are continually being taken to improve security by engaging those launching attacks on the facility. Shelters against mortar or rocket attack are in shortage throughout the country for Coalition forces as well, but may be provided to the facility in due course. There is no threat of air attack.

Concerning the interrogation of security internees, the questioning of a small number of internees selected for their significant intelligence value in Unit 1A is a military necessity. Our forces follow clear procedures governing interrogation to ensure approaches do not amount to inhumane treatment. As internees in Unit 1A undergo interrogation, they may be segregated for security purposes for the period of interrogation. Their right to communication may also be infringed for "absolute security" reasons as contemplated in GCIV/5.

With regard to the criminal detainees in the common law sections, recreational activities should improve over time, as should family visits for this category of detainee. Despite obvious military security issues with respect to communication by security internees, means to allow family visits and other types of communication for these internees are being reviewed in order to balance humanitarian and security considerations. The rioting and shooting of a U.S. guard last month by a security internee using a pistol smuggled into the facility is a timely example of the need to ensure proper security measures are taken throughout the facility.

Improvement can be made for the provision of clothing, water and personal hygiene items. Efforts are ongoing to make continued improvements in these areas. As with the HVD facility, improvements are continually being made with regard to procedures relating to judicial guarantees.

Conclusion

The two Working Papers provided should offer great assistance in understanding how our detention operations are conducted in accordance with the Geneva Conventions. However, security conditions during this armed conflict do present challenges delaying certain improvements in the detention conditions of all classes of detainees. As security in Iraq improves, more resources can be devoted to further improving the conditions in detention facilities. Our aim is to continue providing for the security and humane treatment of all detainees. However, as you will have noted, while the armed conflict continues, and where "absolute military security so requires" security internees will not obtain full GC protection as recognized in GCIV/5, although such protection will be afforded as soon as the security situation in Iraq allows it.

In the meantime, in the context of ongoing operational and strategic interrogation of certain security internees, locally imposed conditions and resource constraints, all internees are guaranteed humane treatment as a minimum standard. We will seek to exceed this standard where possible and appropriate. Your input is important, and we look forward to a positive ongoing working relationship with ICRC delegates in the future.

Sincerely,

JANIS L. KARPINSKI
Brigadier General
Commanding

5. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, did you personally approve your office's response to the ICRC report? What actions did your office take to inquire into the validity of these ICRC alleged abuses?

Colonel WARREN. I approved the proposed response provided to the 205th MP Brigade (BDE). In my absence in late November, my section conducted an analysis of the report, which it provided to the Commander, 800th MP BDE and CJTF-7 C-2 by transmittal memorandum, dated November 27, 2003.

Judge Advocates from my section met with officers from the 205th Military Intelligence (MI) BDE and the 800th MP BDE in order to inquire into the validity of the reported abuses. Through this process, Judge Advocates were continually assured that the accusations were baseless. Judge Advocate General Corps (JAGC) officers responsible for ICRC liaison attended a meeting with the ICRC on November 16, 2003, at which the report was discussed and a meeting at Abu Ghraib with the MPs and MI personnel on December 4, 2003, called for the purpose of discussing the report. I personally discussed the allegations of the report with MI and MP personnel present at a Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) Prison Meeting in December. I also personally discussed the allegations with the Judge Advocate of the 205th MI BDE, who was present at Abu Ghraib. The unanimous reaction of all military personnel with whom I talked was that the allegations were implausible and not credible or exaggerated.

6. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, what was BG Karpinski's role in the drafting and approval of the response? Did she sign the response to the ICRC? At that time, was it normal procedure for your office to draft responses to ICRC reports?

Colonel WARREN. BG Karpinski signed the response, dated December 24, 2003. Notice of the report was provided to her command in late November, while I was on leave. A draft response was formulated in concert with her command and the 205th MI BDE and was provided to her office in mid-December. I understand that changes were made to the draft by the BDE during the coordination process before it was prepared in final for her signature. To the best of my knowledge, this was the first time that my office drafted a response to an ICRC report.

There was no normalized procedure for handling ICRC reports and responses. Until January 2004, there was no clear delineation of responsibility for receipt of, and response to, ICRC reports in Iraq. This is because the 800th MP BDE, a Coalition Forces Land Component Command (CFLCC) unit, had operated the Enemy Prisoner of War (EPW) facility at Camp Bucca since the beginning of the war and had an established and continuing relationship with the ICRC.

My section became involved in the ICRC visits to detention facilities in late May 2003. This involvement consisted of attendance at some portion of the inspection visits, typically the in and out-briefs, and reviewing copies of the reports. Meetings at the ICRC Baghdad headquarters were attended by officers from the 800th MP BDE and CJTF-7 Judge Advocates. At these meetings, my officers or I would receive copies of ICRC reports and I was added as a courtesy copy addressee on most correspondence. Until January 2004, when the process was changed at the direction of Lieutenant General Sanchez, I believe that all original reports were addressed to the 800th MP BDE (either to BG Karpinski or to the camp [battalion] commander). The process, as explained to me by an ICRC delegate, was such that these reports (termed "Working Papers") were to be handled at the lowest level possible, typically one level up from the camp commander, and a written response was neither required nor expected by the ICRC. Rather, the ICRC would use the report content as a basis to assess corrective action in subsequent visits to the camp at issue.

7. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, what other responses to the ICRC did your office participate in drafting or reviewing prior to that time?

Colonel WARREN. To the best of my knowledge, the December 24, 2003, response was the first written response to a camp visit drafted by my section. Previously, my section drafted and reviewed correspondence to and from Lieutenant General Sanchez. A summary of correspondence with the ICRC is enclosed. While I believe this summary to be complete, it is possible that documents have been lost in the past 16 months of combat operations.

SUMMARY OF LTG SANCHEZ' RESPONSES TO ICRC REPORTS

(Q. 7)

-- 20 July 2003, Letter from COL Marc Warren on behalf of LTG Sanchez to Ms. Kasandra Vartell, ICRC, prepared regarding the correspondence sent to LTG Sanchez on 16 July 2003 verifying that an investigation into an alleged incident was underway.

-- 6 September 2003, LTG Sanchez responds via a letter to the ICRC letter to him dated 17 August 2003 concerning notification to the ICRC of information pertaining to protected persons.

-- 21 April 2004, LTG Sanchez responds via a letter to Mr. Anthony Dalziel (ICRC) regarding the letter he wrote on 16 April 2004, regarding respect for international and humanitarian law.

8. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, who in your chain of command did you inform of the substance of the report? Did you inform General Sanchez, and if so, when?

Colonel WARREN. I do not recall personally informing any superior officers in my chain of command of the report transmitted by letter of November 12, 2003, until January 2003. When I returned from leave, I learned that the report was being staffed within the command for a response. I do not recall discussing the detailed substance of the report with Lieutenant General Sanchez until February 2004.

9. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, when you learned of the report, what actions, if any, did you personally take to inquire into the validity of the ICRC alleged abuses?

Colonel WARREN. Please see my response to question number 5.

10. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, what corrective actions, if any, were taken in response to the report? Please provide the CJTF-7 response to the ICRC report.

Colonel WARREN. For specific corrective actions on conditions of detention, I must refer you to the 800th MP BDE. For general conditions of the Abu Ghraib base camp after November 19, 2003, and for all matters pertaining to interrogation operations, I must refer you to the 205th MI BDE. As to corrective actions on ICRC access beginning in January 2004, officers from the CJTF-7 headquarters coordinated and attended future visits. This approach was implemented for the next ICRC visit to Abu Ghraib, which occurred during the period of January 4-8, 2004, and was the subject of positive comment by ICRC delegates. In its report on the January 4-8, 2004, visit, the ICRC commented on improvements at Abu Ghraib made since their October visit. Also in January 2004, the ICRC was informed that reports should be addressed to the commander, CJTF-7 and provided to me or one of my officers.

There was no CJTF-7 response to the October 2003 report. The response provided to the ICRC was from the Commander, 800th MP BDE.

CJTF INTERROGATION POLICY

11. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, could you confirm that: CJTF had not issued official interrogation policy guidance prior to September 14, 2003; the September 14, 2003 interrogation policy was subsequently determined to be noncompliant with the Geneva Conventions; and this determination led to the issuance of new guidance on October 12, 2003?

Colonel WARREN. It is correct that CJTF-7 had not issued official interrogation policy guidance prior to September 14, 2003. It is not correct that the September 14, 2003, interrogation policy was subsequently deemed to be noncompliant with the Geneva Conventions. However, it is accurate that legal analysis conducted within CJTF-7 and U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) contributed to the decision to issue the more conservative October 12, 2003, policy.

12. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, did any of the alleged detainee abuses that have come to light occur during the period prior to September 14, 2003? If so, please describe the nature of these alleged abuses.

Colonel WARREN. To the best of my knowledge, none of the detainee abuses that came to light in the U.S. Criminal Investigation Division Command (USACIDC) Investigation or the Army Regulation 15-6 Investigation conducted by Major General (MG) Taguba concerning Abu Ghraib occurred prior to September 14, 2003. It is possible, however, that cases of abuse that occurred prior to that date will come to light in the course of MG Fay's investigation. I believe that the chronology of any cases of abuse will be part of the report of investigation by MG Fay.

13. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, did any of the alleged detainee abuses that have come to light occur during the period between September 14 and October 12, 2003? If so, please describe the nature of these alleged abuses.

Colonel WARREN. To the best of my knowledge, two incidents of detainee abuse occurred at Abu Ghraib between September 14 and October 12, 2003. I believe that the first was an allegation of rough treatment of an Iraqi male suspected of mortar attacks. The second was an incident in which three MI soldiers were punished under Article 15, Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), for improper association with a female detainee (violation of policy). It is possible, however that additional cases of abuse that fall within that time period will come to light in the course of MG Fay's investigation.

14. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, what categories of persons (e.g., prisoners of war (POWs), detainees, etc.) were covered by the September 14, 2003 interrogation policy and the October 12, 2003 interrogation policy?

Colonel WARREN. The September 14, 2003, policy covered both categories and distinguished the two. The October 12, 2003, policy applies by its terms only to civilian security internees.

MILITARY INTELLIGENCE

15. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, is it true that MI operations at Abu Ghraib detention facility and other detention facilities in Iraq were conducted by MI units that had prior experience in Afghanistan, where the administration determined the Geneva Conventions did not apply?

Colonel WARREN. I understand that at least one MI unit (A Company, 519th MI BN) and selected soldiers from other units had prior experience in Afghanistan. My understanding of the U.S. Government's position on the application of the Geneva Conventions in Afghanistan is that they did not apply to the conflict with al Qaeda. Regardless, as a matter of policy, the U.S. forces treat all detainees humanely and, to the extent appropriate and consistent with military necessity, in a manner consistent with the principles of Geneva Conventions.

16. Senator COLLINS. Colonel Warren, in the absence of any interrogation policy guidance from CJTF-7 prior to mid-September 2003, are you concerned that those units might have utilized the interrogation rules that had been in effect in Afghanistan?

Colonel WARREN. Yes. This is one reason why CJTF-7 issued the policy that culminated in the October 12, 2003, memorandum.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CARL LEVIN

HIGH VALUE DETAINEES

17. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid, you have confirmed that the high value detainees at Camp Cropper fall under the responsibility of General Dayton, commander of the Iraq Survey Group (ISG), who reports directly to you. You also confirmed that the high value detainees were put under General Dayton as a result of a decision in Washington to have a better and more efficient way to understand what was going on with respect to weapons of mass destruction. General Sanchez testified that his MPs have responsibility for providing security. Who in Washington was involved in this decision?

General ABIZAID. The decision to establish the ISG involved appropriate members of the Joint Staff, the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD), the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), and the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). The ISG is a unique organization designed to explore the linkage between weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and the former regime leadership. Its establishment required close coordination and careful consideration.

18. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid, is there a division in the chain of command for the high value detainees at Camp Cropper, with the detention and interrogation of the high value detainees under one chain of command and the protection and security of those detainees under another chain of command?

General ABIZAID. During the period in question, there was a division between responsibility for the detention facility and its security and responsibility for the interrogation of high value detainees (HVDs) at Camp Cropper. As the CJTF-7 Commander, LTG Sanchez was responsible for the Camp Cropper detention facility: its security; operations and maintenance; and disposition/protection of all resident HVDs. The Director, ISG, in compliance with modification 3 to the ISG execute order (EXORD), dated October 17, 2003, conducted interrogations and debriefings of HVDs resident at Camp Cropper in order to acquire information in direct support of ISG's unique mission: organize, direct and apply capabilities and expertise in Iraq to discover, take custody of, and exploit information and material of intelligence value on individuals and methods within the following three areas: weapons of mass destruction, counterterrorism, and the fate of Captain Michael Scott Speicher.

19. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid, who were the sources of the decision that there be dual chains of command and for what reason?

General ABIZAID. The original EXORD, dated May 31, 2003, directed Commander, CENTCOM, to coordinate with the Director, DIA, to stand up the ISG in order to accomplish national objectives in Iraq. This EXORD clearly stated that the ISG would generate its own taskings and that its priorities would be highly responsive to national requirements. The command relationships reflected in the original EXORD had the ISG operational control to the CJTF-7. In modification number one to that EXORD, dated June 20, 2003, the Secretary of Defense directed a change to the command relationships making ISG operational control to CENTCOM.

The ISG is a unique organization, reporting to both Commander, CENTCOM and the DIA with strategic direction from the CIA. The specialized mission and requirements of the ISG demanded unique management, to include a direct link to the Department of Defense (DOD) for time sensitive permissions and authorities, as well as consistent alignment with national objectives. I believe this change in command relationships was designed to reflect the relative independence and unique mission of the ISG.

20. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid, in your personal view, is it wise to focus so much on WMD when the HVDs might have information that could be valuable in the day-to-day effort to protect U.S. and coalition forces?

General ABIZAID. At the time of the establishment of the ISG, the need to immediately locate and disable any possible Iraqi WMD was one of the highest national priorities. While ISG interrogations were focused on WMD, counterterrorism, and the fate of Captain Speicher, these were not the only topics addressed. Standing operating procedure (SOP) in the ISG required that all captured persons were immediately interrogated or debriefed for all actionable intelligence, to include force protection information.

The mission of the ISG is currently under re-evaluation. I agree that intelligence assets, already in short supply throughout the theater, need proper focus and constant re-tasking to meet changing requirements. Currently, counterterrorism and counterinsurgency requirements are theater-wide priorities.

21. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid, what benefit do you see in the command relationship that seems to violate the tenet of unity of command?

General ABIZAID. The ISG, because of its unique mission, organizational structure and technical areas of expertise, had a dual reporting chain to CENTCOM and the DIA. Unity of command was not affected by this reporting relationship. Command and control remained under CENTCOM operational control, with close coordination with CJTF-7. This reporting relationship, which affected collection and exploitation priorities, merely allowed more rapid access to strategic information of value to national level policymakers.

22. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid, do the CJTF-7 October 12, 2003 interrogation policy guidelines apply to those HVDs? If not, why not? What interrogation policy applies? Please provide a copy of the interrogation policy for these HVDs.

General ABIZAID. The ISG promulgated its own interrogation SOP on October 3, 2003. ISG had no command and control relationship to CJTF-7 and its SOP predated the CJTF-7 October 12, 2003, policy guidelines. Consequently, the original ISG SOP did not follow the October 12, 2003, interrogation policy guidelines of CJTF-7. The ISG interrogations SOP was updated in May 2004 and now includes by reference the October 12, 2003, CJTF-7 interrogations policy memo. Both the October 3, 2003, and current ISG interrogations SOPs are classified at the SECRET level.

MEETINGS WITH ICRC OFFICIALS

23. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid and General Sanchez, the February 2004 ICRC report makes clear that since the beginning of the conflict in Iraq, the ICRC regularly brought concerns about the ill-treatment of detainees to the attention of coalition forces. Additionally, Secretary Powell has stated that he met with ICRC President Jacob Kellenberger three times since the beginning of 2003 and they discussed the treatment of detainees, including in Iraq. Secretary Powell advised that Mr. Kellenberger raised this matter in meetings with the Pentagon and with National Security Advisor Condoleeza Rice over the same time period. Did any senior administration officials contact you with concerns about the treatment of detainees in Iraq following their meetings with Mr. Kellenberger or any other ICRC official?

General ABIZAID. I do not recall being contacted by any senior administration officials following their meetings with Mr. Kellenberger or any other ICRC representatives.

General SANCHEZ. No.

24. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid and General Sanchez, which officials contacted you, when did they do so, and what was the nature of their concerns?

General ABIZAID. I do not recall being contacted by any senior administration officials following their meetings with Mr. Kellenberger or any other ICRC representatives.

General SANCHEZ. No officials contacted me.

25. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid and General Sanchez, were any investigations, changes in policy, or other actions undertaken following the ICRC's meetings with administration officials?

General ABIZAID. I do not recall being contacted by any senior administration officials following their meetings with Mr. Kellenberger or any other ICRC representatives and am unaware of any investigations, changes in policy or other actions that may have resulted from those meetings.

General SANCHEZ. I am not aware of any ICRC meetings with administration officials. If those meetings took place, I am not aware of any investigations, changes in policy or other actions being initiated as a result of those meetings.

26. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid and General Sanchez, did either of you keep senior administration officials informed of the ICRC's concerns about the ill-treatment of prisoners? If so, at what level and on what occasions were they informed?

General ABIZAID. I do not recall contacting any senior administration officials concerning ICRC concerns during the period in question. The ICRC provided its reports on a confidential basis which were designed for issue resolution at the lowest possible level. As I testified during the hearing, at the time in question, ICRC reports were not ordinarily surfaced all the way up through the chain of command.

General SANCHEZ. I had no communication with senior administration officials concerning the ICRC.

The ICRC provided confidential reports which were designed for issue resolution at the lowest level possible. The ICRC Working Papers regarding the ICRC October were enclosed in a November 12, 2003, letter from the ICRC to BG Karpinski, commander of the 800th MP BDE. Those concerns were examined by the 800th MP BDE in concert with CJTF-7 Judge Advocate, C2 (Intelligence), and Provost Marshal's Office. Brigadier General Karpinski provided a December 24, 2003, response.

As soon as information about the detainee abuse reached my level in January 2004, a criminal investigation was initiated. A command-directed investigation (the Major General Taguba investigation) quickly followed. This information about the abuse was provided to higher levels in the military chain of command immediately.

Starting in March 2004, my command prepared a periodic, typically a weekly, report of "detainee abuse" cases that was provided to the Office of the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

27. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid and General Sanchez, were any investigations, changes in policy, or other actions undertaken as a result of your meetings with the ICRC or receipt of ICRC reports?

General ABIZAID. ICRC reports and concerns were normally handled at the CJTF-7 level and generally resulted in locally improved conditions. I will defer to LTG Sanchez to provide more details on any actions taken.

General SANCHEZ. Yes. The improvement in conditions at detention facilities was a mutual goal of the ICRC and the command. Although not taken solely as a result of ICRC meetings and reports, many improvements did address observations of the ICRC. Particularly during the period April through fall 2003, improvements in shelter, food, clothing, showers, medical care, sanitation facilities, segregation of categories of prisoners, hygiene items, and overall quality of life were made in all detention facilities, most noticeably Camp Cropper and, later, Abu Ghraib. ICRC complaints about overcrowding were addressed by closing Camp Cropper as a Corps Holding Area.

ICRC observations about family notification led directly to the decision to produce Arabic language prisoner lists in the fall of 2003 and distribution of the lists to Civil-Military Operations Centers and, through the CPA, to Iraqi authorities. ICRC observations also led to the posting of names of detainees on the CPA Web site. ICRC observations about family access contributed to the decision to open a visitor's center at Abu Ghraib and Camp Bucca with detainees allowed two visits per month. Additionally, in the absence of a reliable mail system, CJTF-7 continued to personally deliver "Capture Cards" to the ICRC.

ICRC complaints about access difficulties during the October visit to Abu Ghraib led to the decision of CJTF-7 to provide dedicated officers to future ICRC visits to ensure that the ICRC delegates were properly accommodated. This was implemented in the January 2004 visit to Abu Ghraib and was the subject of positive comments by the ICRC. Specific complaints about ICRC access to HVDs were resolved when access was allowed starting in May 2003. Specific complaints about access to eight internees at Abu Ghraib, to whom private visitation had been temporarily denied during the January 2004 visit, were resolved when the ICRC was allowed private interviews with seven of the internees in March and the eighth internee in April. (In January, the ICRC was denied private interviews of eight individuals undergoing active interrogation, but allowed to see the internees, observe the conditions of detention, and obtain the individuals' names and internee serial numbers).

ICRC complaints about rough treatment of persons at the point of capture or in detention were addressed by the publication of command policy memoranda and orders. These include:

- Issuance of interrogation policies in September and October 2003, and May 2004 reiterating the application of the Geneva Conventions and requiring that all interrogations be conducted in a lawful and humane manner, with command oversight.
- Issuance of a memorandum in October 2003 titled "Proper Treatment of Iraqi People During Combat Operations," and reissued on January 16, 2004, after learning about the events that had taken place at Abu Ghraib.
- Issuance of the "Rules for Proper Conduct in Combat" memorandum, partly in response to the ICRC's February report. A draft of the rules was provided to the ICRC for review and comment prior to publication.

ICRC complaints about legal process were addressed through implementation in the summer of 2003 of a requirement that a Magistrate review detentions within 72 hours of induction in a detention facility, service of internment orders and notice of opportunities to appeal, and initiation of both Criminal Detainee Release and Security Internee Review and Appeal Boards in August 2003. Complaints about legal status determination of HVDs were addressed by holding tribunals convened under Article 5, Third Geneva Convention, in the summer of 2003.

ICRC complaints about availability of medical treatment were addressed through increased availability of both dental care and elective surgery and continuing planning for a hospital dedicated to the care of detainees, with provision for intensive care needs and surgery requirements. Services will include emergency physicians, an optometrist, and preventive medicine. Capabilities will include a primary care clinic, pharmacy, laboratory, x-ray capability, rehabilitation capability with an occupational therapist and physical therapist, a prosthetics unit, medical record keeping unit, and respiratory care unit.

The command has centralized the command and control of detainee operations under a Deputy Commanding General, Detainee Operations. One of the goals of this reorganization is to improve the conditions and processes of detention, a mutual goal of the command and the ICRC. Detention Operations is:

- Reviewing the entire process of notifications of detainee deaths and family retrieval of remains with a view towards consistency, efficiency, and responsiveness.
- Reforming the processing of detainee medical records to consolidate record keeping.
- Providing guidance to units to further preventative medicine efforts and arrange for relocation of detainees from the vicinity of areas with standing water.
- Promulgating special training to medical staff for screening of detainee abuse, to include informing detainees that there would be no retaliation for reporting abuse.
- Monitoring food service upgrades to ensure improved conditions for detainees with diabetes. Further nutritional care is to be made available through the detainee hospital.
- Reviewing issues associated with the rapid turnover of medical personnel to ensure proper medical treatment.
- Ensuring emplacement of sandbags around detainees' tents, as well as concrete bunkers for protection against mortars.

Detention Operations has taken steps to relieve over-crowding and ensure cleanliness of camps. Current planning includes climate controlled living facilities. All detainees are issued cots, mattresses, and pillows. Food quality has been improved. Ice is now available on a daily basis. Detainee holding areas now have "pea gravel" in place to hold dust down. A mail system is now in place for detainees. Detainee compound leaders now meet weekly with battalion commanders to discuss detention issues. There is improved accountability and security of detainees' personal property.

ABU GHRAIB VISITS BY ICRC

28. Senator LEVIN. General Sanchez, the February 2004 report of the ICRC describes a mid-October 2003 ICRC visit to Unit 1A of the Abu Ghraib correctional facility. It states that in the course of that visit, ICRC delegates witnessed, among various methods used to secure the cooperation of detainees, the practice of "keeping [detainees] completely naked in totally empty concrete cells and in total darkness, allegedly for several consecutive days." Upon demanding an explanation from authorities at the facility, the ICRC delegates were told by the MI officer in charge of the interrogation that "this practice was 'part of the process.'" [Emphasis added.] The ICRC expressed their concerns about the Abu Ghraib correction facility in a November 6, 2003, working paper submitted to CJTF-7 officials. Who received the November 6, 2003, ICRC working paper?

General SANCHEZ. The November 6, 2003, ICRC working paper was transmitted by ICRC letter dated November 12, 2003, and delivered by the ICRC to an officer of the CJTF-7 Staff Judge Advocate's office on November 16, 2003. It was addressed to the Commander, 800th MP BDE.

29. Senator LEVIN. General Sanchez, was there a "process" in effect at Abu Ghraib facility in October 2003 by which detainees would be segregated and deprived of light and clothing for days at a time, in order to secure their cooperation in interrogations?

General SANCHEZ. Not to my knowledge. Such a "process" would have violated the CJTF-7 Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policies, as well as command policies that mandate the treatment of all Iraqis, including prisoners and detainees, with dignity, respect, and humanity. (See, for example, the October 5, 2003, policy memorandum, Subject: Proper Treatment of the Iraqi People During Combat Operations, which is enclosed.)

MEMORANDUM FOR All Coalition Forces Personnel

SUBJECT: Proper Treatment of the Iraqi People During Combat Operations

1. Purpose. This memorandum reemphasizes the responsibility of Coalition Forces to treat all persons under their control with dignity and respect. It reinforces the obligation of Coalition personnel to comply with the law of war.
2. Humane Treatment of the Iraqi People. Coalition Forces are committed to restoring the human rights of Iraqi civilians and the rule of law. We must treat all civilians with humanity, dignity, and respect for their property and culture. Coalition Forces preserve human life by avoiding civilian casualties and rendering prompt medical attention to persons injured during combat operations. In all circumstances, treat those who are not taking an active part in hostilities, including prisoners and detainees, humanely. Remain particularly aware of sensitivity concerning females. Whenever possible, females will be searched in a non-public location; unless absolutely necessary, male soldiers will not search females.
3. Force Protection and the Lawful Use of Force. We are conducting combat operations in a complex, dangerous environment. Coalition Forces must remain bold and aggressive, yet disciplined, in their use of force. When in contact with the enemy, use only that force necessary to accomplish the mission while minimizing unintended damage. Our posture must be strong and determined, while remaining firmly in control of the destructive power of our weapons. You have learned the principles of the law of war throughout your military careers. As professional soldiers, you must follow them, and comply with the rules of engagement. Before engaging any target, you must be reasonably certain that it is a legitimate military target. Self-defense is always authorized.
4. Conclusion. Respect for others, humane treatment of persons not taking part in hostilities, and adherence to the law of war and rules of engagement is a matter of discipline and values. It is what separates us from our enemies. I expect all leaders to reinforce this message.

RICARDO S. SANCHEZ
Lieutenant General, USA
Commanding

30. Senator LEVIN. General Sanchez, did you approve the use of these practices at Abu Ghraib or other detention facilities in Iraq?

General SANCHEZ. I never approved these practices at Abu Ghraib or any other detention facility within my command. Over a 7-month period, I approved approximately 25 requests for segregation in excess of 30 days. Subject to safeguards, segregation from the general detainee population was authorized for up to 30 days for the purpose of security and to prevent collusion of persons believed to possess significant intelligence information. Requests for segregation in excess of 30 days had to be approved by me on an exceptional basis. I did not approve the deprivation of light and clothing. This is not authorized under the CJTF-7 Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policy.

31. Senator LEVIN. General Sanchez, would such a “process” be consistent with the interrogation guidelines issued by CJTF-7, either on September 14 or October 12, 2003?

General SANCHEZ. Absolutely not.

32. Senator LEVIN. General Sanchez, when were the ICRC working paper and concerns about this “process” or these practices brought to your attention?

General SANCHEZ. The existence of the ICRC working paper was brought to my attention in mid-January 2004 during the same timeframe that the CID investigation and the Army Regulation 15-6 investigation were initiated. I learned of the specific contents of the ICRC Working Papers for visits in October 2003 in February 2004 during an update on the status of the ongoing Abu Ghraib investigations.

33. Senator LEVIN. General Sanchez, was the November 6, 2003, working paper provided to General Karpinski?

General SANCHEZ. Yes.

34. Senator LEVIN. General Sanchez, did CJTF-7 ever recommend the establishment of a “give-and-take policy” at Abu Ghraib facility in order to improve the effectiveness of interrogation operations? If so, was such a policy established based on the recommendations of the Miller report?

General SANCHEZ. I have no knowledge of a “give-and-take policy.”

35. Senator LEVIN. General Sanchez, at the May 19 hearing, there was discussion of a December 24, 2003 letter, which members of your staff helped to prepare, in response to the ICRC November report. Please provide the committee a copy of that December 24 letter.

General SANCHEZ. A copy of the letter is enclosed.

Dear Ms Svoboda,

ICRC VISITS TO CAMP CROPPER AND ABU-GHURAYB IN OCT 03

Introduction

Thank you for your letter dated 12 November 2003 enclosing confidential Working Papers relating to visits to Camp Cropper and Abu Ghurayb in October.

The importance of cooperation between the ICRC and Coalition forces, particularly during ongoing hostilities by those who have no regard at all for protected symbols or institutions, cannot be overstated. Given the difficult conditions under which Coalition forces operate, our mutual interaction helps to ensure every effort is made to uphold the Geneva Conventions. It is our desire all individuals in detention facilities be treated humanely, at all stages of the detention process.

Special Detention Facility (Camp Cropper)

While your Working Paper acknowledges conditions in this facility have continued to notably improve, it claims conditions still contravene internment standards in Geneva Convention III and IV (GCIII and IV). We maintain those detainees who have been classified as Enemy Prisoner of War (EPW) or those awaiting GCIII/5 determination, are being treated in accordance with the principles in GCIII/13. However, there are ongoing efforts to improve their conditions.

With regard to the segregations of High Value Detainee (HVD) EPW/Security Internees, these personnel have been assessed to be of significant ongoing intelligence value to current and future military operations in Iraq. Their detention condition is in the context of ongoing strategic interrogation and imposed local conditions. Under the circumstances, we consider their detention to be humane. When their detention is determined to be no longer necessary due to "imperative reasons of security" and if available evidence does not support prosecution for crimes, they will be released. Notwithstanding the continuing armed conflict in Iraq, nearly 5% of HVDs have already been released on parole.

Concerning segregations, the issue of cells without daylight is a disciplinary prohibition in GCIII/IV. The HVDs are not held in such conditions as a disciplinary measure, but as a temporary security precaution during their ongoing interrogation and as a result of available appropriate structures. As your paper notes, internees have access to electric lighting, an hour outside their cells each day, and showers.

The alleged ill treatment of Ibrahim Khalil Ibrahim Hussein Al-Aani upon capture will be investigated and appropriate action taken if warranted. U.S. forces make the legal status, rights and judicial guarantees of all detainees a continuing priority in detention operations.

Regarding the treatment of EPWs under GCIII, the matter will be considered and appropriate measures will be implemented if necessary. With respect to the security internees, who are "definitely suspected of or engaged in activities hostile to the security of the State", we agree they are protected persons under GCIV. However, depending on the nature of the security risk presented by these internees, their protections are subject to the derogation pursuant to GCIV/5.

Baghdad Central Detention Facility (Abu Ghurayb)

It is regretted there were difficulties with access to detainees on 21 October 03. Improved procedures should ensure such problems are avoided in the future.

The security environment around Abu Ghurayb is challenging, like many areas in Iraq. Steps are continually being taken to improve security by engaging those launching attacks on the facility. Shelters against mortar or rocket attack are in shortage throughout the country for Coalition forces as well, but may be provided to the facility in due course. There is no threat of air attack.

Concerning the interrogation of security internees, the questioning of a small number of internees selected for their significant intelligence value in Unit 1A is a military necessity. Our forces follow clear procedures governing interrogation to ensure approaches do not amount to inhumane treatment. As internees in Unit 1A undergo interrogation, they may be segregated for security purposes for the period of interrogation. Their right to communication may also be infringed for "absolute security" reasons as contemplated in GCIV/5.

With regard to the criminal detainees in the common law sections, recreational activities should improve over time, as should family visits for this category of detainee. Despite obvious military security issues with respect to communication by security internees, means to allow family visits and other types of communication for these internees are being reviewed in order to balance humanitarian and security considerations. The rioting and shooting of a U.S. guard last month by a security internee using a pistol smuggled into the facility is a timely example of the need to ensure proper security measures are taken throughout the facility.

Improvement can be made for the provision of clothing, water and personal hygiene items. Efforts are ongoing to make continued improvements in these areas. As with the HVD facility, improvements are continually being made with regard to procedures relating to judicial guarantees.

Conclusion

The two Working Papers provided should offer great assistance in understanding how our detention operations are conducted in accordance with the Geneva Conventions. However, security conditions during this armed conflict do present challenges delaying certain improvements in the detention conditions of all classes of detainees. As security in Iraq improves, more resources can be devoted to further improving the conditions in detention facilities. Our aim is to continue providing for the security and humane treatment of all detainees. However, as you will have noted, while the armed conflict continues, and where "absolute military security so requires" security internees will not obtain full GC protection as recognized in GCIV/5, although such protection will be afforded as soon as the security situation in Iraq allows it.

In the meantime, in the context of ongoing operational and strategic interrogation of certain security internees, locally imposed conditions and resource constraints, all internees are guaranteed humane treatment as a minimum standard. We will seek to exceed this standard where possible and appropriate. Your input is important, and we look forward to a positive ongoing working relationship with ICRC delegates in the future.

Sincerely,

JANIS L. KARPINSKI
Brigadier General
Commanding

36. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid, when were the ICRC working paper and concerns about the practices described above brought to your attention?

General ABIZAID. I did not become aware of the contents of the November 6, 2003, working papers until shortly before I prepared for my testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

37. Senator LEVIN. General Abizaid, did General Sanchez, or anyone else, alert you to ICRC concerns about the treatment of detainees at the Abu Ghraib prior to January 2004?

General ABIZAIID. I did not become aware of the contents of reports authored by the ICRC until shortly before I prepared for my testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee. Historically, the ICRC determines at what level they would like to air their concerns and views their communications as confidential. The ICRC exercises their prerogative to address officials at the level they deem appropriate. It has been our practice in the CENTCOM area of responsibility (AOR) to address the ICRC's concern at the level of command to which they were raised. I have since changed that practice and directed that copies of ICRC reports be forwarded through the chain of command to me.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY

ICRC VISITS AND REPORTS

38. Senator KENNEDY. General Abizaid, General Sanchez, and General Miller, it would be helpful for the committee if you would clarify and complete the various pieces of testimony on the ICRC visits and reports by having the witnesses answer the following questions. For each answer indicate the witness or witnesses who are the source of the information, whether the information is from personal knowledge or from inquiries or review of records, and that each witness has reviewed the answer and does or does not have additional or conflicting information.

What were the dates and locations of the visits the ICRC made during the period from September 11, 2001, to the present to detention or interrogation facilities or other holding facilities of any kind in Afghanistan, Guantanamo, or Iraq operated, controlled, or directed in whole or in part by the United States Government, the CPA, or any related entity?

General ABIZAIID. Historically, the ICRC determined at what level they would like to air their concerns and viewed these communications as confidential. The ICRC exercised its prerogative to address officials at the level they deemed appropriate which was generally the lowest level possible. It has been our practice in the CENTCOM AOR to address the ICRC's concern at the level of command to which they were raised, and, as I testified at the hearing, with one exception, ICRC reports were not normally surfaced all the way up through the chain of command. That exception is a report, dated May 12, 2003, concerning facilities in Iraq that was provided directly to the CENTCOM Director of Policy and Plans (J-5).

General SANCHEZ. Dates and locations of ICRC visits to facilities in Iraq are listed on the enclosed summary. A succession of commands has been engaged in continuous combat operations in Iraq since March 2003. CJTF-7 records reasonably available are provided from the date of CJTF-7's inception on June 14, 2003, to the present. CJTF-7 does not have records that may have been kept by other commands, such as CFLCC or the 800th MP BDE.

General MILLER. I defer to U.S. Southern Command (SOUTHCOM) to respond on any ICRC visits to Guantanamo.

39. Senator KENNEDY. General Abizaid, General Sanchez, and General Miller, who at any level of the CPA was aware of the visit before or at the time it took place? Who was informed of the visit after it occurred?

General ABIZAID. I am not aware of whom, if anyone, in CPA was involved with ICRC visits.

General SANCHEZ. I do not know who within CPA was aware of the October 2003 ICRC visit to Abu Ghraib before or after it took place. In early February 2003, I attended one meeting with Ambassador Bremer and representatives of the ICRC which included discussion of the working papers pertaining to the ICRC's visits in October. As a matter of practice, I understand that the CPA Office of General Counsel frequently had representatives at meetings with the ICRC at which visits were discussed and reports were provided. Meetings between CPA and ICRC representatives at which CJTF-7 personnel were not present occurred periodically throughout the period of occupation.

General MILLER. I was assigned to CJTF-7/Multi-National Force-I on April 12, 2004, and am unaware of events which occurred during the October and November time frame in regards to CPA and ICRC visits.

40. Senator KENNEDY. General Abizaid, General Sanchez, and General Miller, in what form, on what date, and, if oral, to whom was each ICRC report made? To whom was each written report delivered?

General ABIZAID. Please see my response to question #38.

General SANCHEZ. Detailed information on ICRC reports in Iraq is provided in the enclosed summary. Prior to January 2004, ICRC reports were addressed to the Commander, 800th MP BDE or one of its subordinate organizations, with a copy furnished to the CJTF-7 Staff Judge Advocate. Reports were actually delivered to a CJTF-7 Judge Advocate or to a representative of the CPA Office of General Counsel. From January until April 2004, ICRC reports were addressed to the Commander, CJTF-7 and delivered to a Judge Advocate from CJTF-7. Starting in April 2004, ICRC reports were addressed to the Deputy Commanding General, Detention Operations, and delivered to a Judge Advocate from CJTF-7. The procedure for the ICRC is to provide an oral out-brief to the camp commander at the end of each visit. The out-brief observations form the basis of the subsequent ICRC written report.

General MILLER. Prior to April 12, 2004, I do not know who received reports from the ICRC. Since April 12, 2004, I have served as the single point of contact for all matters related to the ICRC and detainee operations.

41. Senator KENNEDY. General Abizaid, General Sanchez, and General Miller, to whom was each report disseminated by the person who first received it and by each successive recipient and when? If the witnesses do not know and cannot determine all the recipients, explain why.

General ABIZAID. The May 12, 2003, ICRC report delivered to the CENTCOM J-5 was provided by him to the CENTCOM Chief of Staff. It was not brought to my attention and I do not know if it was disseminated further.

General SANCHEZ. Information on ICRC reports in Iraq is provided in the previously enclosed summary. Originals of reports were provided to the addressee. Copies of reports or extracts of the reports were typically disseminated within the command to C-2 (Intelligence), C-3 (Operations), Provost Marshal, Engineer, Surgeon, and Staff Judge Advocate. All of the recipients of each report cannot be determined with specificity. The command was conducting continuous combat operations during this period.

General MILLER. Prior to April 12, 2004, I do not know who received reports from the ICRC. Since April 12, 2004, I have served as the single point of contact for all matters related to the ICRC and detainee operations.

42. Senator KENNEDY. General Abizaid, General Sanchez, and General Miller, who wrote or otherwise gave any summaries, memoranda, reports, or other descriptions of each report, when and to whom were they disseminated and re-disseminated?

General ABIZAID. In Afghanistan, the CJTF Staff Judge Advocates have, in the past, designated a point of contact (POC) who routinely met with the ICRC and received reports together with other representatives from the detention center and the command. In Iraq, MG Miller has instituted detailed procedures for handling ICRC correspondence. MG Miller met with the ICRC and established himself as the single POC for all ICRC matters to include documents, working papers, visit coordination, and any other ICRC-related issues which may arise.

General SANCHEZ. Information on summaries, memoranda, and reports is provided in the enclosed summary. All of the recipients of each report cannot be determined with specificity. The command was conducting continuous combat operations during this period.

MEMORANDUM FOR Chief, Detention Operations (OSJA)

SUBJECT: International Committee for the Red Cross (ICRC) Inspection Preparation and Execution

1. Background. The ICRC will conduct inspections of detention facilities in Theatre in accordance with the Geneva Conventions of 1949. The frequency of these inspections could be expected to be once every 1-2 months. The following procedures worked well during the last round of inspections in Jan 04 to ensure a successful inspection both from the military and ICRC perspective. The key element to a successful visit is timely communication with interested parties in order that proper inspection preparation is undertaken and coordinated.
2. ICRC Visit Dates. While the ICRC are entitled to conduct inspections unannounced, past experience (namely the Oct 03 inspections) has converted them to giving prior notice of intended inspections. Currently, CJTF-7 can expect to get 3 to 4 weeks notice of a proposed visit to a detention facility. This is normally communicated to the Office of General Counsel (LTC Paul Muggleton) at CPA.
3. Pre-Inspection Contact. Timing is everything. Approximately two weeks before the inspection, it is best to contact the MPs responsible for the facility and the interrogation organization (MI or OGA) to warn them out about the inspection (if not already done) and to arrange to have a coordination meeting the following week (that is the week before the visit – ideally two to three days before the visit).
4. Pre-Inspection Meeting. This should be held two to three days before the ICRC inspection at the facility to be inspected. This generally gives enough time to prepare for the arrival of the ICRC as a current issue. It needs to be attended by MPs and representatives from the interrogation organization. The meeting agenda should include:
 - a. Dates and timings of the inspection;
 - b. Date, timing and location of the ICRC Outbrief;
 - c. Sequence, attendance and venue of the arrival briefing to ICRC;
 - d. Contents of arrival briefing to ICRC;
 - e. Arrangement of life support for ICRC team – accommodation, toilets, showers and meals during inspection;
 - f. Escorts for the inspection team – number of escorts and how it is proposed to divide up the delegates, if at all, during their inspection.

FOR OFFICIAL USE ONLY

- g. Details of any internees/detainees that the ICRC will not have access to due to active interrogation, relying on the derogations in Geneva III/126 or Geneva IV/143

By the conclusion of the meeting, all parties at the facility should have a clear understanding of their responsibilities for the inspection, and how it is to proceed.

5. Arrival Briefing. The purpose of this briefing is to welcome the ICRC, orientate them to the facility, advise them of their life support aspects of the inspection, security issues and to lay out the ground rules for the visit. This has to be against a background of their right to a free and unrestricted visit, although the derogations in the Geneva Convention do allow impositions to be placed on the inspection for reasons of 'imperative military security'. In summary, the ICRC have accepted that they will be escorted (to a degree) during their inspections by an escort officer for reasons of administrative support and security, who is also to ensure that their movements in the facility are as arranged. The escort should not hear or observe individual interviews with the internees. The arrival briefing will also set out a time and place for the twice-daily coordination meetings. Following the arrival briefing, it is helpful for the inspection team to be given a walk around inspection of the facility if the delegates have not been part of a prior inspection.

6. Daily Coord Meetings. These are control measures. There should be a morning meeting, which generally takes no more than five minutes, where the inspection team meets their escort for the day, and their inspection program for that day is confirmed. The evening meeting also only takes five to 10 minutes, and is to confirm that the days inspection was without incident, answer any questions that cannot wait until the Outbrief, coordinate any admin points, and to confirm the inspection program for the following day. It should be noted that one of the purposes for the evening coordination meeting was to give the ICRC the opportunity to address any questions that the delegates had during that day, and hence avoid questions to their escorts. The ICRC will normally commence their daily inspection at around 0845hr to 0900hr and will conclude for the day at approximately 1700hr to 1800hr.

7. Outbrief. This is where the ICRC will summarize their points for the visit. It will normally be held on the morning of departure. It is our opportunity to put our case forward for any criticisms they may have. It is therefore important that senior representatives from MPs, the intelligence entity and SJA attend, as the result of this brief and the visit will be formulated into a report to be later staffed to the CG. The Outbrief will normally be of a 60 to 90 minute duration.

For a nation that is a member of the UN, these provisions of the Charter, if implemented, may qualify that member nation's right to remain neutral in a particular conflict. For example, if a member nation is called on by the Security Council, pursuant to Articles 42 and 43 of the Charter, to join in collective military action against an aggressor state, that member nation loses its right to remain neutral. However, the member nation would actually lose its neutral status only if it complied with the Security Council mandate and took hostile action against the aggressor.

COMPLIANCE WITH THE LAW OF WAR

The Role of Protecting Powers and the ICRC

The System of Protecting Powers. Common Articles 8 - 11 of the Geneva Conventions of 1949⁴ provide for application of the Conventions in time of international armed conflict "with the cooperation and under the scrutiny of the Protecting Powers whose duty it is to safeguard the interests of the Parties to the conflict." The diplomatic institution of protecting powers, which developed over the centuries independent of the Law of War, enables a neutral sovereign state, through its designated diplomatic representatives, to safeguard the interests of a second state in the territory of a third state. Such activities in wartime were first given formal recognition in the Geneva Prisoner of War Convention of 1929.

Such protecting power activities are especially valued when the second and third state do not have effective diplomatic relations, which is traditionally the case in time of war between them. In particular, the protecting power attends to the humanitarian interests of those citizens of the second state who are within the territory and under the control of the third state, such as prisoners of war and civilian detainees.

Protecting power activities reached their zenith during World War II, as the limited number of neutral states acting as protecting powers assumed a role as representatives not merely of particular belligerents, but rather as representatives of the humanitarian interests of the world community. Article 5 of GP I seeks to supplement (not supplant) the protecting power system embodied in the Geneva Conventions by imposing on the parties to the conflict the duty to implement that system from the beginning of the conflict.

The Contributions and Role of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC). Originally formed in 1863, the ICRC is an organization of Swiss citizens that has played a seminal role in the development of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict. In addition, during World War II, the ICRC supplemented the efforts of the protecting powers, and undertook prodigious efforts on behalf of prisoners of war. Those efforts included the establishment of a Central Prisoner of War Agency with 40 million index cards, the conduct of 11,000 visits to POW camps, and the distribution of 450,000 tons of relief items.

The role of the ICRC as an impartial humanitarian organization is formally recognized in both common articles 9 - 11 of the Geneva Conventions⁵ and in the Protocols. Since World War II, the protecting power system has not been widely used, and the ICRC has stepped into the breach as a substitute for protecting powers in international conflicts, under the auspices of common articles 9 and 10 of the Geneva Conventions⁶ and Articles 5 and 6 of Protocol I.

With respect to non-international conflicts, common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions recognizes the prerogative of the ICRC or other impartial humanitarian organizations to offer its services to the parties to the conflict.

GP II, however, fails to reaffirm this ICRC prerogative and recognizes, in Article 18, only the offer of services by "relief societies located in the territory" of a party to the conflict.

Relations between U.S. Forces and the ICRC

Subject to essential security needs and other reasonable requirements, the ICRC must be permitted to visit PWs and provide them certain types of relief. Typically, the U.S. will invite the ICRC to observe PW conditions as soon as circumstances permit. Once on the scene, the ICRC will closely examine compliance with the Law of War and, in particular, the Geneva Conventions concerning a broad range of issues.

Given his professional qualifications and specialized training in the Law of War, the judge advocate should serve as the escort and liaison officer with the ICRC.⁷ This role is doctrinal, and stated in FM 71-100-2, INFANTRY DIVISION OPERATIONS TACTICS, TECHNIQUES, AND PROCEDURES, page 6-28. The judge advocate can quickly identify and resolve many Law of War issues before they become a problem for the commander. For those Law of War matters requiring command decision, the judge advocate is best suited to provide advice to the commander and obtain timely responses. These same skills are essential in dealing with ICRC observers. The judge advocate can best serve as the commander's skilled advocate in discussions with the ICRC concerning the Law of War.

Both the commander and the judge advocate should recognize that the ICRC, as an impartial humanitarian organization, is not a political adversary, eagerly watching for and reporting Law of War violations.⁸ Rather, it is capable of providing assistance in a variety of ways. In recent conflicts, the ICRC assisted in making arrangements for the transportation of the remains of dead enemy combatants and for repatriating PWs and civilian detainees. By maintaining a close working relationship with ICRC representatives, the judge advocate receives a two-fold benefit. He is assisted in identifying Law of War issues before they pose problems to the command, and he has access to additional legal resources that may be used to resolve other Law of War matters.

The ICRC is also heavily involved in MOOTW, where it may be present in conjunction with numerous other organizations and agencies. In the former Yugoslavia, Somalia, and Rwanda, for example, many international organizations are or were engaged in "humanitarian relief" activities. Among the most significant is the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). The list of private voluntary organizations (PVOs) and nongovernment organizations (NGOs) in the field is large; approximately 350 humanitarian relief agencies are registered with the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID).

REMEDIES FOR VIOLATIONS OF THE LAW OF WAR

U.S. Military and Civilian Criminal Jurisdiction

It is DoD policy that a member of the armed forces who commits an offense that qualifies as a "war crime" will be charged under a specific article of the UCMJ. In the case of other persons subject to trial by general courts-martial for violating the laws of war (UCMJ, art. 18), the charge shall be "Violation of the Laws of War" rather than a specific UCMJ article.

The War Crimes Act of 1997 (18 U.S.C. § 2401) provides federal courts with jurisdiction to prosecute any person inside or outside the U.S. for war crimes where a U.S. national or member of the armed forces is involved as an accused or as a victim.

"War Crimes" are defined in the War Crimes Act as (1) grave breaches as defined in the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and any Protocol thereto to which the U.S. is a party; (2) violations of Articles 23, 25, 27, 28 of the Annex to the Hague Convention IV; (3) violations of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and any Protocol thereto to which the U.S. is a party and deals with a non-international armed conflict; (4) violations of provisions of Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Mines, Booby-Traps & Other devices (Protocol II as amended May, 1996) when the U.S. is a party to such Protocol and the violation willfully kills or causes serious injury to civilians.

U.S. policy on application of the Law of War is stated in DoD Directive 5100.77 (DoD Law of War Program) and further explained in CJCSI 5810.01 (12 Aug 96) (Implementation of the DoD Law of War Program). Except when ⁷ General Prugh (former TJAG) fulfilled the task of "interfacing" with the ICRC when he was the legal advisor to CDR, MACV in Vietnam. General Prugh relates that during the early stages of Viet Nam, OTJAG concluded that the U.S. was involved in an Art 3, not Art 2, conflict. In June 65 the situation had changed, and by Aug 65 a formal announcement was made that Art 2 now applied. Soon, ICRC delegates began to arrive, and it fell upon the judge advocates to meet with the delegates. This role continued in operations in Grenada, Panama, Somalia, Haiti, and during the Gulf War. The development of this liaison role was also apparent in Haiti, particularly in the operation of Joint Detention Facility.

⁸ It is essential to understand the neutrality principle of the ICRC. One must stay at arm's length from the delegates so not to risk harming their relationships with the enemy. For example, ICRC personnel will meet with prisoners in private.

PEACEKEEPING OPERATIONS

Military peacekeeping operations support diplomatic efforts to achieve or maintain peace in areas of potential conflict. The UN has been the most frequent sponsor of peacekeeping operations. Historically, US Army battalions or brigade task forces have been involved in peacekeeping operations. However, divisions must be aware of the uniqueness of these types of operations. To be effective, the following conditions must be established for the peacekeeping force:

- Consent, cooperation, and support of the disputing parties.

- Political recognition of the peacekeeping force by a portion of the international community.

- Clear rules of engagement.

- Sufficient freedom of movement for the force to conduct its mission.

- An effective C₂ system.

- An effective intelligence capability.

Peacekeeping often involves ambiguous situations requiring the peacekeeping force to deal with extreme tension and violence without becoming a participant. These operations follow diplomatic negotiations which establish the mandate for the peacekeeping force. The mandate describes the scope of the peacekeeping operation in detail. It typically determines the size and type of force each participating nation contributes. To ensure an effective peacekeeping operation, a mandate should have—

- Conditions the host nation intends to impose on the peacekeeping force.

General MILLER. Prior to April 12, 2004, I do not know who issued specific guidelines, field manuals or SOPs for dealing with the ICRC. Since April 12, 2004, I have served as the single point of contact for all matters related to the ICRC and detainee operations and as such I receive all reports from the ICRC directly.

45. Senator KENNEDY. General Abizaid, General Sanchez, and General Miller, were there outstanding orders, field manual provisions, or other SOPs at any level anywhere for the dissemination and handling of, or responses to, such oral or written reports? If so, what were they? Please provide copies of all versions since September 11, 2001, including any written, oral communications, orders, or other statements altering or providing exceptions to the stated procedures.

General ABIZAD. The tri-service regulation on EPWs and civilian internees, Army Regulation 190-8, paragraph 3-16, briefly addresses handling of ICRC reports and requires that they be forwarded by the relevant camp commander through Army channels to Headquarters, Department of the Army. As I stated in my testimony, I believe the reporting process for ICRC reports was broken and subsequent to that hearing I directed my staff to conduct a review of these procedures. Consequently, CENTCOM has recently implemented a new policy which requires subordinate units to provide copies of all ICRC correspondence within 48 hours of receipt to the Office of The Staff Judge Advocate, CENTCOM. Additionally, subordinate units are to immediately provide CENTCOM with responses to all ICRC concerns. ICRC correspondence is immediately analyzed in light of the unit responses, and submitted to my Chief of Staff (through the Joint Security Director) for review and any necessary action by me.

General SANCHEZ. I am not aware of any outstanding orders, field manual provisions, or other SOPs that prescribe how to handle ICRC reports. In January 2004, I orally directed that ICRC reports would be addressed to me and provided to my Staff Judge Advocate section. In April 2004, I directed that ICRC reports would be received by the Deputy Commanding General, Detention Operations.

General MILLER. Prior to April 12, 2004, I do not know who issued specific guidelines, field manuals or SOPs for dealing with the ICRC. Since April 12, 2004, I have served as the single point of contact for all matters related to the ICRC and detainee operations and as such I receive all reports from the ICRC directly.

DOD INQUIRY OF ABU GHRAIB

46. Senator KENNEDY. General Abizaid, General Sanchez, and General Miller, have you been the subject of, participated in, or become aware of any internal DOD inquiry into or investigation of the matters raised by these questions or the issues raised at the May 19 hearing? If so, please provide the name of the person and office conducting that inquiry or investigation, the date it began, and copies of any materials or information you provided for that purpose. If you were interviewed, please provide the date of the interview, the name of the interviewer, and a copy of any notes, summary, transcript, or other record of the interview. If there has been a report, summary, or other document or oral presentation arising out of such inquiry or investigation, please provide a copy or if oral your knowledge of the contents of the oral presentation.

General ABIZAD. I am aware of the following investigations/inquiries:

- a. Schlesinger Panel.
- b. Interrogations Special Focus Team (Admiral Church)
- c. Sec Navy Detainee Review
- d. Jacoby Assessment (CFC-A)
- e. Taguba AR 15-6
- f. MG Fay Procedure 15
- g. Miller Report
- h. Ryder Report
- i. Formica AR 15-6
- j. Army Inspector General (IG) Report
- k. Army Reserve Review of Training

To the best of my knowledge, the Taguba, Miller, and Ryder reports are complete and available. In addition, I have provided an interview for the Schlesinger Panel and the Interrogation Special Focus Team (Admiral Church).

General SANCHEZ. I am aware of the investigation initiated on January 19, 2004, at my request by MG Antonio Taguba and conducted under the provisions of Army Regulation 15-6. This investigation is complete and I understand that a copy of the report of investigation has been provided to Congress.

I am also aware of the ongoing investigation initially appointed by me under the provisions of Army Regulation 15-6 in which MG George Fay is the investigating officer. At my request, a superior appointing authority was named by the acting Secretary of the Army. I have not been interviewed by MG Fay.

I am also aware of the appointment of a DOD Independent Commission on Detention Practices, appointed by the Secretary of Defense in May 2004. I was interviewed by this body on June 24, 2004. Because its report has not yet been completed, I refer you to the Commission for any records of my interview.

I am aware of the investigation being conducted by Vice Admiral Church, also at the direction of the Secretary of Defense. I have not been interviewed by Vice Admiral Church.

Additionally I am aware of an ongoing USACIDC investigation. I have not been interviewed in this investigation.

General MILLER. Yes. I have been interviewed by the OSD Schlezinger Independent Panel to Review DOD Detention Operations and MG Fay's investigation. As all investigations/panels remain ongoing, I cannot comment on them at this time.

NON-DISCLOSURE AGREEMENTS

47. Senator KENNEDY. General Abizaid, General Sanchez, and General Miller, there are reports that persons with information potentially relevant to our inquiry have been asked to sign non-disclosure or other agreements precluding their disclosing what they know and that others may have been threatened with courts martial or other reprisals if they disclose what they know. Please tell us everything you know about these allegations.

General ABIZAID. I am not aware of persons being asked to sign nondisclosure statements or threatened with courts-martial or reprisals for providing information to investigators.

General SANCHEZ. I am not aware of any such agreement within my command, nor do I know anything about the allegations.

General MILLER. I have no knowledge of any actions of this nature.

JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL OFFICERS

48. Senator KENNEDY. General Abizaid, General Sanchez, and General Miller, there have been published allegations that JAG officers have been excluded from the legal decisionmaking and implementation of policies in the field of interrogation and detention practices, and have been displaced by civilian attorneys and officials at DOD. Please tell us everything you know about the substance of these allegations.

General ABIZAID. I am not aware of JAG officers being excluded from the legal decisionmaking and implementation of policies in the field of interrogation and detention practices at CENTCOM. I actively seek and routinely rely on the advice and counsel of my Staff Judge Advocate on all such matters.

General SANCHEZ. This is not the case at the task force level. Judge Advocates are integral members of my command, full participants in operations, and relied upon to provide legal advice and support in the field of interrogation and detention practices in the field. I have no knowledge of the role of JAG officers at higher levels.

General MILLER. I have no knowledge of any actions of this nature.

ICRC REPORTS

49. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, apparently you received one or more ICRC reports yourself (as will be indicated in full in the answers to the previous questions). Who determined, and on what basis, that you should receive those reports?

Colonel WARREN. CJTF-7 Judge Advocates typically received copies of the reports from the ICRC at our periodic meetings. If a representative of the 800th MP BDE was not present at the meeting, we would also receive the original report and provide it to the Brigade or the CJTF-7 Provost Marshal's office. This protocol was self-imposed and was not determined by superior authority. In January 2004, we informed the ICRC to address reports to LTG Sanchez and provide the original reports to me or to a CJTF-7 Judge Advocate. Previously, CJTF-7 was given copies of reports (often with my name on the "copy furnished" line) that were addressed to commanders within the 800th MP Brigade. It is certainly possible that one or more reports would have been given to me at a meeting, either as copies or sealed originals for another addressee. However, I recall receiving only other correspondence that was addressed by name to LTG Sanchez. After the bombing of the ICRC headquarters in the fall of 2003, most meetings with the ICRC were held at the CPA. There, ICRC meetings were also attended by one or more attorneys from the CPA Office of General Counsel, as well as MP officers (and MI officers as available as well). If a CJTF-7 Staff Judge Advocate officer was not present at a meeting, a CPA General Counsel attorney would receive the report.

50. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, what did you think your responsibilities and obligations required you to do with those reports? Which of the following did you think you were receiving them on behalf of: the facility Commander, JTF-7, CENTCOM, JAG, MI, DOD, or OSD? Which of those, and who else, did you disseminate the reports or descriptions of the reports to? Who told you whom to disseminate them to? Why did you not disseminate them to each of those people or entities?

Colonel WARREN. The reports were directed to the addressees. Starting in January 2004, I began accepting original reports on behalf of CJTF-7. For this reason, I had my officers ensure that the reports had been or were provided to activities that had responsibilities for the facilities: C-2, C-3 (PMO), 800th MP BDE, 205th MI BDE, and the camp commander. As a result of the October 2003 ICRC visit to Abu Ghraib and the delay in responding to the November 2003 ICRC report, I recommended to the Commander, CJTF-7 that, as a matter of procedure, all future ICRC reports be addressed to the Commander, CJTF-7 and given to a CJTF-7 Judge Advocate. Starting with the January 2004 ICRC visit to Abu Ghraib, this was the practice followed until changed by the Deputy Commanding General, Detention Operations in April 2004.

51. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, what was your personal reaction when you saw or heard those reports?

Colonel WARREN. For purposes of questions 51 through 55, I assume you are referring to the reports pertaining to the October 2003 ICRC visit. My reaction was one of surprise and disbelief. The report seemed so implausible as to be unbelievable.

52. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, did you think the activities described were consistent with applicable policy?

Colonel WARREN. Not if the report was accurate.

53. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, did you think the activities described were consistent with the Geneva Conventions?

Colonel WARREN. Not if the report was accurate.

54. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, did any of the activities described surprise or outrage you?

Colonel WARREN. Yes. Please see my response to question 51.

55. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, did you think that the reports required remedial action?

Colonel WARREN. Yes. Remedial action was taken as described in my responses to questions 5 and 10.

56. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, did you express your opinions on the preceding four questions, or on any other questions raised by the reports to anyone in any form? To whom and in what form? Please provide copies of any materials in any form containing or reflecting those opinions.

Colonel WARREN. I do not specifically recall to whom I stated my opinion at the time, although I am sure that I commented on the report to officers in my section, and to MP and MI officers. The only documents that I am aware of that could be considered as reflecting an opinion are those referred to in my response to question 5.

AUTHORITY TO TAKE ACTION

57. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, did you think it was your responsibility as a legal advisor to take remedial action yourself?

Colonel WARREN. Yes. In addition to my responsibility as a legal advisor, I believe it is my duty as a member of the U.S. military to ensure that captured persons are protected and treated humanely. I regret that I did not recommend a more formal inquiry into the allegations of the report. While this would not have prevented the abuse documented in the USACIDC report, which occurred in November, a more formal inquiry might have resulted in an earlier initiation of the CID investigation.

58. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, did you have authority to take that action? If so, what did you do? Please provide any documentation. If not, whose responsibility did you think it was or to assure that remedial action was taken? Did you inform that person promptly and fully? Please provide documentation.

Colonel WARREN. The primary authority and responsibility to take remedial action rested with the MP commanders of the camps and the facilities, and with their chain of command. Having said that, early on in the war and throughout the fall, in an effort to assist those efforts, I was personally involved, along with my officers, in arranging for and obtaining food, water, shelter (including tents), showers, and other supplies for prisoners, as well as obtaining detention facilities.

PRISONER CATEGORIES AT ABU GHRAIB

59. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, we have heard that the prisoners at Abu Ghraib fall into three categories: common criminals, EPWs, and security internees. Could you explain the difference between an EPW and a security internee?

Colonel WARREN. An EPW is a person who meets the criteria of a lawful combatant in accordance with the Third Geneva Convention (Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Enemy Prisoners of War, August 12, 1949). In Iraq, a security internee is a person who is a civilian (not meeting prisoner of war criteria) who is interned as an imperative threat to security in accordance with the Fourth Geneva Convention (Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Civilian Persons in Time of War, August 12, 1949). Both EPWs and security internees are "protected persons" under the Geneva Conventions.

60. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, could you elaborate on what circumstances of capture would lead to a determination that someone is a security internee? Is that decision reviewed, and if so, when?

Colonel WARREN. Authority to capture or detain is stated in the ROE. Upon capture, a person is to be treated humanely and with dignity and respect. Their status is irrelevant. Within 72 hours (until the summer of 2003, 21 days) after induction at a detention facility, a Magistrate reviews the circumstances of capture to determine whether a reasonable basis exists to conclude that the detainee is an imperative threat to security. This review exceeds the legal requirement of the Fourth Geneva Convention, which mandates a review within 6 months of detention. Whether detention should continue is reviewed by the Review and Appeal Board, which also considers appeals from orders of internment.

61. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, is a security internee an unlawful combatant? If a security internee is an unlawful combatant, does that mean the Geneva Conventions do not apply to them?

Colonel WARREN. Not all security internees are unlawful combatants. An unlawful combatant is a person who engages in hostilities against a lawful combatant without legal privilege. Simply put, legal privilege attaches when a person meets the criteria of Article 4 of the Third Geneva Convention. The significance of this legal privilege is that it means that the person cannot be prosecuted for lawful "warlike acts." While an unlawful combatant can be prosecuted for warlike acts, the Geneva Conventions still apply to them. If captured, they, like security internees who are not unlawful combatants, are protected persons under the Fourth Geneva Convention.

62. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, does some lesser standard of Geneva Conventions apply to the security internees?

Colonel WARREN. The four Geneva Conventions afford different protections to different categories of individuals. At one end of the spectrum are the protections afforded by the Third Geneva Convention to EPWs during international armed conflict. This includes immunity from all lawful pre-capture acts, and is the highest protection afforded by the Geneva Conventions. The Fourth Geneva Convention applies to civilians, who are afforded many, but not all, of the protections and privileges afforded POWs. Security Internees (persons who present an imperative threat to security) are a category of civilian internees who are afforded fewer protections than civilian internees not suspected of being a security threat. The latter point proceeds from a plain reading of the Fourth Geneva Convention and in Pictet's Commentary to the Geneva Conventions. See, for example, Pictet's comments on "coercion" under Article 31 of the Fourth Geneva Convention.

63. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, why would the Geneva Conventions apply to unlawful combatants in Iraq, but not in Afghanistan?

Colonel WARREN. The Geneva Conventions apply in Iraq because there was a state of international armed conflict, then occupation, triggering the application of the Conventions by their terms. I refer you to the DOD for an analysis of the applicability of the Geneva Conventions in Afghanistan.

CRITERIA FOR DETERMINING THE STATUS OF PERSONS CAPTURED BY THE UNITED STATES

64. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, did the United States military change their criteria for determining the status of persons captured by United States military personnel after May 1?

Colonel WARREN. No. The criteria are not set by the military, but by international law. Specifically, in situations such as Iraq where it is applicable, Article 5 of the Third Geneva Convention would require a presumption of POW protection in cases "where status is in doubt." In these cases, POW protections could only be denied based up action by competent tribunal convened under Article 5.

CJTF-7 conducted such tribunals through the summer of 2003 where status of captured personnel was in doubt. POW protections were accorded to Saddam Hussein, captured in December 2003, without action of an Article 5 tribunal because CJTF-7 concluded that his status as a POW was not in doubt.

However, for the majority of persons captured after May 1, the date of the announced end of major combat operations, no doubt existed as to their status as POWs. By May 1, 2003, the Iraqi military had disintegrated and had been abolished by CPA order. U.S. and U.K. military forces were under effective control of Iraqi territory and Iraq was occupied territory. Virtually all persons detained after May 1 simply did not meet the criteria of the Third Geneva Convention as members of the Armed Forces, or of a militia, volunteer corps or levee en masse, in order to be accorded POW status.

65. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, what was the number of EPWs captured after May 1? How many security detainees have been captured after May 1? If there was a change in criteria after May 1, why does this date have legal significance?

Colonel WARREN. Those numbers are not available to me, but I believe they can be obtained from the National Detainee Reporting System database. The criteria by which we discerned the status of POWs has never changed throughout the conduct of the war and is governed by the Third Geneva Convention. The significance of May 1 is discussed in the response to question 64.

66. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, were the implications of the change discussed with Pentagon leadership, Pentagon legal counsel, State Department leadership, State Department legal counsel, the White House, or White House legal counsel?

Colonel WARREN. The distinction between international armed conflict and occupation was and is a widely known fact, consistent with applicable international law, specifically the law of war and the law of occupation. The distinction explains the difference between the Third and Fourth Geneva Conventions. It was a matter of continuous discussion and implementation. One example of its implementation is the establishment and operation of the Central Criminal Court of Iraq (CCCI), which has had a number of prosecutions and convictions of unlawful combatants for attacks on coalition forces. Their very status as unlawful combatants makes defendants susceptible to prosecution. Were they POWs, they would be afforded legal privilege (immunity) for their acts. I discussed this matter with the DOD General Counsel and the JAG of the Army, and their staff.

SCOPE OF GENEVA CONVENTION

67. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, could you please provide a list of all legal and military treatises, texts, authorities, regulations, journals, and manuals that you relied upon as authoritative or informative for defining the scope of the Geneva Conventions relative to limits on interrogation and detention?

TIME LINE OF CJTF–7 INTERROGATION POLICY

68. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, could you provide a time line describing the development of the CJTF–7 interrogation and counter resistance policy signed by you on October 12, 2003?

Colonel WARREN. I did not sign the policy, which is a CJTF–7 command policy memorandum.

The following timeline describes the development of the policy:

September 10, 2003: Draft Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policy memorandum circulated for comment.

September 14, 2003: Policy memorandum issued, provided to CENTCOM for review.

September 14–October 12, 2003: Review of the policy within CJTF–7 and between CJTF–7 and CENTCOM.

September 28, 2003: Second draft circulated for comment.

October 4/5, 2003: Third draft circulated for comment.

October 12, 2003: Final policy memorandum issued.

69. Senator KENNEDY. Colonel Warren, could you provide a time line describing the evolution of the chart provided to the committee by MG Alexander and described as the CJTF–7 Interrogation Rules of Engagement that appear several times in the Taguba report annexes?

Colonel WARREN. I cannot from personal experience. However, I understand that the chart was prepared at Abu Ghraib in late September or October 2003. It was not a CJTF–7 command product.

DETAINEES AT ABU GHRAIB

70. Senator KENNEDY. General Sanchez, were you aware of the number of detainees who were there on average at Abu Ghraib in the fall and winter of 2003? How many?

General SANCHEZ. Yes. A report is forwarded daily to the National Detainee Reporting System database, which is maintained by Headquarters, Department of the Army. During the fall and winter of 2003, the detainee population varied between 5,000 and 6,700.

71. Senator KENNEDY. General Sanchez, were you aware of the number of detainees who were processed in and released on a daily basis? How many?

General SANCHEZ. I was not aware of the number of in-processed and released detainees on a daily basis as the Commanding General, CJTF–7. Periodically I reviewed snapshots of detainee numbers in order to maintain situational awareness of ongoing developments in the detainee population. Examinations of the databases for Abu Ghraib indicate the following numbers in-processed during the months from October 2003 to March 2004:

October – 2,429
 November – 1,980
 December – 2,105
 January – 1,922
 February – 1,143
 March – 961

The daily report of releases may be obtained from the National Detainee Reporting System database, maintained at Headquarters, Department of the Army.

PRISONER TRACKING SYSTEM

72. Senator KENNEDY. General Sanchez, were you aware of the prisoner tracking system at Abu Ghraib?

General SANCHEZ. Yes. At first, a manual tracking system was used, but this was replaced by the Biometric Automated Track Toolset (BATS) system in the latter part of 2003. This system has vastly improved our ability to account for those in the custody of coalition forces.

73. Senator KENNEDY. General Sanchez, were you aware of the problems the military had with keeping track of who was at the prison?

General SANCHEZ. Yes. That is why we transitioned to more technologically advanced systems such as BATS. For several months, we had enormous problems with the identification of detainees. This was caused by difficulties in entering and maintaining the correct data in non-standard databases developed by the 800th MP BDE. Problems ranged from transliteration and disarrangement of detainees' multiple names through misunderstanding of the Arabic language to false names provided by some detainees. Early in the war, some prisoners had no capture tags or documentation. These problems were exacerbated by the use of at least two numbering systems for detainees and maintenance of at least three populations: EPWs, criminal detainees, and security internees.

MILITARY POLICE AT ABU GHRAIB

74. Senator KENNEDY. General Sanchez, did you have sufficient MPs at Abu Ghraib to maintain security and aid in detention operations?

General SANCHEZ. Yes.

INTERROGATION RULES OF ENGAGEMENT

75. Senator KENNEDY. General Sanchez, do you believe that it was appropriate to use the tactics listed on the right hand side of the slide titled "Interrogation Rules of Engagement (IROE)" provided to the Committee by MG Alexander on the prisoners at Abu Ghraib when you didn't even know who was there and if they deserved such treatment?

General SANCHEZ. The IROE slide was not approved or produced by CJTF-7. The slide was prepared by a subordinate command in order to summarize the interrogation and counter-resistance policy. The CJTF-7 interrogation and counter-resistance policy was stated in two memoranda, the first dated September 14, 2003 and the second dated October 12, 2003. Both memoranda were furnished to the committee on May 19, 2004.

The September 14, 2003 policy authorized the methods listed in the right column of the IROE chart, except for "sensory deprivation" and "sleep deprivation." Use of the authorized methods was subject to the general and specific safeguards listed in Enclosure 2 of the Policy, as well as the implementation guidance of the commander, 205th MI BDE. The September policy remained in effect for less than 1 month, until superceded by the October 12, 2003, policy.

The October 12, 2003, policy which remained in effect for 7 months, authorizes the methods listed at its enclosure 1, subject to the safeguards listed at its enclosure 2. These methods do not include sleep deprivation, presence of military working dogs, or excessive noise. Use of any methods not listed at enclosure 1 of the October 12 policy is not authorized without a written exception to policy granted by me, as well as legal review and review by the command's senior intelligence officer. The methods listed in the right column of the IROE chart are similarly not authorized under the October 12 policy.

Except for segregation in excess of 30 days, I have neither received nor approved any requests for the use of any methods requiring an exception to policy. Except for segregation in excess of 30 days, I have not approved the use of any of those methods for a particular prisoner.

Safeguards for all interrogation methods included: limited use of the techniques only by trained personnel; medical evaluations of all candidates prior to employment of interrogation approaches and their combinations; interrogation plans with specific attention to proposed limits on duration, intervals between applications of interrogation approaches, termination criteria, and the presence of qualified medical personnel; appropriate supervision; provision for adequate sleep, food and water; monitoring for adverse medical or psychological effects during segregation; adequate supervision of the use of interrogation approaches.

By its terms, the October 12, 2003, policy enunciates the purpose of interviews and interrogations to obtain the “most information from a security internee with the least intrusive method, applied in a humane and lawful manner with sufficient oversight by trained investigators or interrogators. Further, “Interrogators must ensure the safety of security internees, and approaches must in no way endanger them.”

Additionally, interrogations were subject to a October 5, 2003, command policy memorandum entitled “Proper Treatment of Iraqi People During Combat Operations” which emphasized treatment of all persons under coalition forces’ control, including prisoners and detainees, with dignity, respect, and humanity. This memorandum was reissued by order in January 2004. Similar memoranda and orders were issued in April and March 2004.

Finally, the slide itself reiterates adherence to these standards outlined above: “[a]pproaches must always be humane and lawful, [d]etainees will NEVER be touched in a malicious or unwanted manner—[t]he Geneva Conventions apply within CJTF-7. . . . VIOLATIONS MUST BE REPORTED IMMEDIATELY TO THE OIC.” The slide concludes with the reiteration that the use of all the techniques are subject to general safeguards as well as guidance from the 205th MI BDE Commander, CJTF-7 Commander and FM 34-52, Interrogation Intelligence.

76. Senator KENNEDY. General Sanchez, could you describe your rationale for the development of the October 12 guidance for IROE and the October 5 memorandum on the CJTF-7 Interrogation and Counter Resistance Policy? Are these documents different? If so, how? Please provide copies of both and any earlier drafts of both documents.

General SANCHEZ. The October 12 memorandum was the “Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policy.” There was no CJTF-7 document termed IROE. There was an October 5, 2003, memorandum entitled, “Proper Treatment of the Iraqi People During Combat Operations.”

The October 12, 2003, memorandum was developed to state the command’s policy on Interrogation and Counter-Resistance. It was preceded by the September 14, 2003, policy on the same subject, and a series of drafts, all of which are enclosed in classified form (enclosures retained in committee files). The October 5, 2003, memorandum on Interrogation and Counter-Resistance was a draft that reflects the process leading to the October 12, 2003, policy.

The October 12 document is very different from the October 5 memorandum. The October 5, 2003, memorandum applies to Interrogation and Counter-Resistance only generally in that it requires the treatment of all persons, including detainees, with dignity, respect, and humanity. There were no prior drafts of this memorandum. The rationale behind the October 12 policy was to ensure that the command had a single interrogation policy that comported with the Geneva Conventions. The rationale behind the October 5 memorandum was to reemphasize to soldiers that they had an obligation to follow the law of war and treat all persons, including detainees, with dignity, respect, and humanity.

77. Senator KENNEDY. General Sanchez, did you adopt General Miller’s recommendations from his September report in your October 5 memorandum? To what extent did you accept General Miller’s recommendations? If you rejected any of his recommendations, could you explain why?

General SANCHEZ. The October 5 memorandum was developed to reinforce the obligation of coalition forces to treat the Iraqi people with dignity, respect and humanity. This obligation specifically extended to detainees. MG Miller’s recommendations had no connection to the drafting or issuance of the October 5 memorandum. A copy of the memorandum is enclosed.

MEMORANDUM FOR All Coalition Forces Personnel

SUBJECT: Proper Treatment of the Iraqi People During Combat Operations

1. Purpose. This memorandum reemphasizes the responsibility of Coalition Forces to treat all persons under their control with dignity and respect. It reinforces the obligation of Coalition personnel to comply with the law of war.
2. Humane Treatment of the Iraqi People. Coalition Forces are committed to restoring the human rights of Iraqi civilians and the rule of law. We must treat all civilians with humanity, dignity, and respect for their property and culture. Coalition Forces preserve human life by avoiding civilian casualties and rendering prompt medical attention to persons injured during combat operations. In all circumstances, treat those who are not taking an active part in hostilities, including prisoners and detainees, humanely. Remain particularly aware of sensitivity concerning females. Whenever possible, females will be searched in a non-public location; unless absolutely necessary, male soldiers will not search females.
3. Force Protection and the Lawful Use of Force. We are conducting combat operations in a complex, dangerous environment. Coalition Forces must remain bold and aggressive, yet disciplined, in their use of force. When in contact with the enemy, use only that force necessary to accomplish the mission while minimizing unintended damage. Our posture must be strong and determined, while remaining firmly in control of the destructive power of our weapons. You have learned the principles of the law of war throughout your military careers. As professional soldiers, you must follow them, and comply with the rules of engagement. Before engaging any target, you must be reasonably certain that it is a legitimate military target. Self-defense is always authorized.
4. Conclusion. Respect for others, humane treatment of persons not taking part in hostilities, and adherence to the law of war and rules of engagement is a matter of discipline and values. It is what separates us from our enemies. I expect all leaders to reinforce this message.

RICARDO S. SANCHEZ
Lieutenant General, USA
Commanding

There was an October 5, 2003, unsigned draft of the CJTF-7 Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policy. The draft led to the final policy, issued on October 12, 2003. The promulgation of a command Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policy was based on the recommendations of MG Miller's assessment. With regard to the observation that CJTF-7 should have a specific interrogation policy, no aspect of MG Miller's recommendation was rejected.

78. Senator KENNEDY. General Sanchez, did you coordinate recommendation of MG Miller with anyone in the Pentagon? Was this policy coordinated with interrogation policies in any other theaters or with any other agencies? Who approved this policy?

General SANCHEZ. I did not coordinate MG Miller's recommendations with anyone in the Pentagon and I am not aware of any such coordination by my staff. I understand that the September 14 Interrogation and Counter-Resistance Policy was modeled on the policy from Guantanamo Bay, modified for use in a theater of war in which the Geneva Conventions were applicable. I understand that other policies were consulted in the development of the CJTF-7 policy, but I am unaware of any coordination with other agencies.

COPPER GREEN

79. Senator KENNEDY. General Sanchez, I would like to ask you a question that may require a classified response. If such a response is necessary, I would appreciate it if you would provide unclassified and classified answers for the record. Are you aware of the existence of a program that was called "Copper Green"?

General SANCHEZ. No.

SPECIAL ACCESS PROGRAM

80. Senator KENNEDY. General Sanchez, are you aware of any Special Access Program to gather intelligence from detainees at Abu Ghraib?

General SANCHEZ. No.

ASSESSMENT OF DETAINEE OPERATIONS

81. Senator KENNEDY. General Miller, after you completed your assessment of detainee operations on September 9, did you provide recommendations to LTG Sanchez? Did you provide those recommendations to Colonel Pappas?

General MILLER. I gave an outbrief to LTG Sanchez and MG Fast covering those topics covered in the Assessment of DOD Counterterrorism Interrogation and Detention Operations in Iraq (MG Miller Assistance Visit Report). This included recommendations in detention, information management and fusion, and interrogation operations. Colonel Pappas, though present during visits to Abu Ghraib and consulted at Camp Victory, was not provided with a copy of the final report by the assessment team.

[Whereupon, at 12:21 p.m. the committee adjourned.]

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOHN WARNER, CHAIRMAN

Chairman WARNER. The committee meets today to continue its series of hearings relating to allegations on prisoner abuse and otherwise the manner in which the Department of Defense (DOD), particularly the Department of Army, maintains and conducts its detention and interrogation of the prisoners. This is a very important segment of the U.S. commitment in the ongoing war on global terrorism.

Today's hearing will focus on the Department of Army Inspector General's Detainee Operations Inspection Report that focuses on detention operations, doctrine, and training. I welcome our witnesses this morning: the Honorable Les Brownlee, Acting Secretary of the Army; General Peter J. Schoomaker, Chief of Staff of the United States Army; and Lieutenant General Paul Mikolashek, Inspector General (IG) of the Army. Good morning, gentlemen, and thank you for coming.

General MIKOLASHEK. Good morning, sir.

Chairman WARNER. On February 10, 2004, the Secretary of the Army as executive agent for the Department of Defense, Enemy and Prisoner of War Detention Program, issued a directive for the Army IG to establish an assessment team to complete a functional analysis of the Department's internment, enemy-prisoner of war, and detention policies, practices, and procedures.

Secretary Brownlee took this action after allegations of detainee abuse and inadequate training for soldiers involved in the detention of prisoners came to the Secretary's attention.

I have the full text of that directive here, and I ask that it be placed following my opening statement in the record. It is here for anybody to inspect.

I apologize to my colleague for the short notice about this hearing, but Senator Levin and I feel as these matters become available we should bring them to the attention of our colleagues promptly with a hearing, and we have done so this morning.

I want to thank the Department of Defense and the Department of the Army for making this information available to the committee in a timely and a forthright manner. I have been in consultation with the Secretary for a week or 10 days about the timing, and he assured me that it would be forthcoming as soon as it has been completed, and that has been done. So I thank you, Mr. Secretary.

At a time when the Army is decisively engaged around the world, especially in Iraq and Afghanistan, the Army is also committed to rigorously and thoroughly reviewing its practices and procedures and making constructive adjustment and changes along the way. I commend you, Mr. Secretary, the Chief, and others for that course of action.

As a result of allegations of abuse of prisoners and the related scrutiny of interrogation policy and procedures, the Department has directed 11 senior-level reviews—that is the Department of Defense—in addition to many unit-level reviews and criminal investigations. That list of reviews was provided to the committee at the last hearing, but basically five of these reviews are now complete and have been provided to the committee in their entire text. Five of the remaining six senior-level reviews are estimated to be completed over the course of the next several months, including the Fay report on interrogation procedures at the Abu Ghraib prison and Dr. Schlesinger's independent review together with Secretary Harold Brown of the DOD detention operation. That review was directed specifically by the Secretary of Defense (SECDEF).

I wish to remind members of the committee that the report that will be presented this morning is not, and I repeat, is not, an investigation of specific allegations of abuse. Rather, it is an IG inspection, which is focused on the adequacy of current Army training and doctrine to prepare soldiers to properly and safely capture, care for, control, and interrogate prisoners in a combat theater of operations.

It is intended to examine the presence or absence of systemic issues, not just individual cases. It must be viewed in that context. It is but one piece of a larger picture, but in my view a very important piece, and it is a timely public disclosure of that piece.

As the committee has conducted its oversight responsibilities, we have learned that detention operations are complex and are not limited to the operation of just prisons. Detention operations start at the moment of capture, often in the heat of battle and the ensuing confusion, and continue through the screening, transportation, interrogation, and in some cases the long-term internment.

Prior to September 11, few people in our military had experience in the detention of prisoners. It was a skill not often practiced. That has changed since operations began in Afghanistan and now continuing through Iraq.

In the case of the Abu Ghraib prison, we have experienced an unacceptable breakdown in military discipline. This represents an extremely rare chapter in the otherwise extraordinary proud history of our Armed Forces. It defies common sense and contradicts all the values that Americans stand for and that our military defends. Once again, I commend the Department of Defense and specifically the Department of the Army for the manner in which it is proceeding under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) to hold those accountable where they have been determined to have broken the Military Code and the Geneva Conventions.

Of our uniformed personnel, 99.9 percent are performing difficult tasks humanely and honorably and in some cases making the ultimate sacrifice of life and limb to win the war on terror. Each of us on the committee has nothing but the strongest support for our brave men and women in uniform and their families.

Congress has the responsibility to get at the facts, to make sure that the conditions that have allowed this misconduct to occur have been identified and corrected, and to ensure that systems are in place so that the misconduct of this type never happens again. But as we conduct our necessary oversight, it is just as important to ensure that the Armed Forces have the ability to vigorously conduct the missions required to defend our Nation and to win the global war on terrorism. Intelligence-gathering is at the very heart of that.

I thank our witnesses for their service and their dedication to do the right thing for the Army and our Nation.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE INSPECTOR GENERAL

SUBJECT: Directive for Assessment of Detainee Operations

You are hereby directed to establish an Assessment Team to complete a Functional Analysis of the Department's internment, enemy prisoner of war, and detention policies, practices, and procedures as the Army executes its role as DOD Executive Agent for Enemy Prisoners of War and Detention Program.

When conducting this assessment, the following terms of reference apply. Use all potential Doctrine, Operations, Training, Materiel, Leadership, Personnel, and Facilities (DOTMLPF) approaches to identify any capability shortfalls with respect to internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations, and interrogation procedures and recommend appropriate resolutions or changes if required.

The assessment will focus on the following objectives:

- a. Assess the adequacy of DOTMLPF of Army Forces for internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations, and interrogation procedures.
- b. Determine the standards for Army Forces charged with internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations and interrogation procedures (e.g., size, equipment, standardization, and training).
- c. Assess current and future organizations and structures for Army Forces responsible for internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations and interrogation procedures.

You are authorized to task the Army Staff and subordinate headquarters for those resources needed to ensure accomplishment of the detainee operations assessment. You are further authorized access to locations, documents, and personnel across the Army in order to complete your assessment. Coordinate with other Services for assistance, documentation, and information that may assist in completing this assessment.

You will provide me with a report at the conclusion of the assessment.

This assessment is exempt from the HQDA Short Notice Tasking Policy Message, dated 031353Z Jan 01, requiring units to be notified 180 days from execution of tasking and the HQDA memorandum dated January 27, 2004, subject: Travel [Restriction] to Iraq, Afghanistan, Kuwait and Qatar which requires my approval to travel to these countries.

R. L. Brownlee
Acting Secretary of the Army

Chairman WARNER. Senator Levin.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN

Senator LEVIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Let me join you in welcoming our witnesses and thanking them on behalf of the entire committee for their service to the people of the United States and what we represent.

Today we receive testimony on the Army Inspector General's analysis of the Army's prisoner detention operations doctrine and training.

General Mikolashek, your report examines whether there were systemic problems with detention operations in Iraq and Afghanistan that may have contributed to abuse of detainees in U.S. custody, including the abuses, which were so graphically depicted in photos from Abu Ghraib.

When General Abizaid appeared before this committee in mid-May, he testified that one of the preliminary findings of the Army IG's investigation was that, "Our doctrine is not right." Based on a very quick perusal of the final report, which we just received, it claims that the incidents of abuse in Iraq and Afghanistan were not the result of systematic problems. Nonetheless, the report finds that Army doctrine needs to be adapted to the environment in which our soldiers are working to provide security, and in this regard the report makes over 50 recommendations for improving Army detention operations.

The findings and recommendations of this report will need to be closely examined in light of the additional allegations of abuse and legal and policy memoranda that have emerged in the last few months. This additional information includes the February 2004 International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) report, which documents a wide variety of "methods of ill treatment" in the detention and interrogation of detainees in Iraq. It reports that these methods were used "in a systematic way," and, quoting again from the ICRC February 2004 report, "appeared to be part of the standard operating procedures by military intelligence personnel to obtain confessions and extract information."

Interrogation techniques witnessed by the ICRC during their visits to Abu Ghraib appear consistent with techniques that we now know were approved and later rescinded by high-level Defense Department officials or by in-theater commanders in Iraq. In light of the frequently changing "rules of engagement," as they were called, for interrogations in Iraq, Afghanistan, and elsewhere, it is difficult to believe that there were not systemic problems with our detention and interrogation operations.

The report that we receive today is the first of a half dozen reports that we expect to receive over the next several weeks, including a report from Generals Fay and Jones on the role of military intelligence personnel at Abu Ghraib. Each of these reports will be helpful to us and the Nation in understanding what really happened with the detainees in Iraq.

I look forward to your testimony. I also want to thank our chairman because he continues to pursue the reports and to schedule hearings, when appropriate, when these reports are received. Very strong oversight by this committee is surely appropriate under the circumstances we face.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you, Senator Levin. Again, in consultation with you we have arranged today in S-407 of the Capitol to have additional matters relating to the ICRC available for inspection by members and such other material as has been made available by the Department relative to the overall question of the prisoners throughout the world.

Secretary Brownlee, we welcome you before our committee, that you remember with, I hope, great fondness. You were our Chief of Staff under a series of chairmen. We just admire so much your work in the Department of Defense, your love for the United States Army, the men and women in uniform and their families, and the around-the-clock care that you try to provide for your family in the Army. Thank you, sir, for your service.

STATEMENT OF HON. LES BROWNLEE, ACTING SECRETARY OF THE ARMY; ACCOMPANIED BY GEN PETER J. SCHOOMAKER, USA, CHIEF OF STAFF OF THE ARMY; AND LTG PAUL T. MIKOLASHEK, USA, INSPECTOR GENERAL OF THE ARMY

Mr. BROWNLEE. Mr. Chairman, Senator Warner; Senator Levin; and distinguished members of the committee, I appreciate the opportunity to be here today along with our Chief of Staff of the Army, General Schoomaker, and our Inspector General, General Paul Mikolashek. I might add, sir, that the lavish praise that you just heaped on me should be spread among all these people in uniform and those serving around the world, because it is their service and sacrifice that really counts.

Chairman WARNER. You have followed that same message ever since you were a platoon leader.

Mr. BROWNLEE. Which I might still should be doing, sir.

But we are here this morning, sir, to offer testimony on the Department of Army Inspector General's report on the detention operations. When I last appeared before you on 7 May to testify about detainee abuses at Abu Ghraib, the Inspector General's inspection was ongoing. It is now complete.

Let me begin by emphasizing again that this is a report of an assessment of detention operations across the Central Command area of operations. It is not the result of an investigation of a single incident.

In mid-January 2004, credible reports led senior commanders in the Central Command area of responsibility to begin investigations into allegations of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib Prison. Concerned that there might be systemic problems in the planning, doctrine, or training of how the Army was conducting detention operations in Central Command, on 10 February I directed the Inspector General of the Army, Lieutenant General Paul Mikolashek, to conduct a functional analysis of the Department's internment, enemy prisoner of war, and detention policies, practices, and procedures.

General Mikolashek conducted a thorough and balanced inspection in the following 5 months. He and his team looked at ongoing detention operations in Central Command with assessment visits to 16 detention facilities in that theater. During the course of their inspection, they interviewed some 650 soldiers, noncommissioned officers, and officers.

Three key findings emerged based on this inspection: First, all the leaders and soldiers interviewed by General Mikolashek and his team understand the requirement and obligation to treat all detainees humanely, and they are doing so.

Second, while the inspection revealed some deficiencies, shortfalls, and required adjustments, we were unable to identify system-wide failures that resulted in incidents of abuse. This inspection indicates that these incidents of abuse resulted from the failure of individuals to follow known standards of discipline and Army values and in some cases the failure of a few leaders to enforce these standards of discipline.

Third, just as the current operational environment demands that we adapt, so too we must adapt our organization, doctrine, and training. We are making these adjustments.

General Mikolashek's team concentrated on two key components of detention operations: the capture, security, and humane treatment of the detainees; and the conduct of interrogation operations in order to gain useful intelligence. While he did not find any systemic failures that led directly to the abusive situations we reviewed, his report makes recommendations to improve the effectiveness of detention operations. We are reviewing those recommendations. We are implementing them as quickly as possible.

It is worth noting that our soldiers are conducting operations under demanding, stressful, and dangerous conditions against enemies who do not follow the Geneva Conventions, who take hostages and ruthlessly execute them, who maim and kill noncombatants indiscriminately and without remorse, who fight from inside mosques and other protected sites.

Our soldiers are in an environment that demands significant volumes of human intelligence, particularly at the tactical level, where the need for this actionable intelligence is most critical to protect our forces and the intelligence itself is most perishable.

They understand their duty to treat detainees humanely and in accordance with the laws of land warfare and report incidents of abuse when they occur. I am proud of our soldiers, as I know all of you are. They are indeed doing their duty every day under harsh, difficult, dangerous conditions, and the allegations and reports of abuse have in many cases come from the soldiers themselves, who saw something wrong and informed their chain of command.

We have developed, trained, and educated our leaders to adapt to the environments in which they find themselves. They understand their tasks, conditions, and standards and to the best of their abilities and capabilities have adapted their tactics, techniques, and procedures to accommodate this operational environment.

Institutionally, we are expanding our doctrine on detainees to provide our commanders greater flexibility and adaptability within well-defined principles. Our training and education at the individual, unit, installation level, and institutional levels must continue to be thorough and reflect the intensity of the environment in which we now operate.

During the course of his inspection, General Mikolashek's team noted that since October 2001 U.S. forces have detained some 50,000 individuals in Afghanistan and Iraq. As of June 9, 2004, which was the cutoff date for General Mikolashek's report, there were 94 cases of confirmed or possible abuse of any type, which include theft, physical assault, sexual assault, and death. The Army has initiated criminal investigations into these allegations and, where appropriate, legal action has been and will be taken.

The Inspector General's review of all reported cases of abuse determined that these incidents resulted from the failure of individuals to follow known standards of discipline and Army values and, in some cases, the failure of a few leaders to enforce those standards of discipline. These incidents are not representative of Army policy, doctrine, or soldier training. These actions, while regrettable, are aberrations when compared to the actions of the hundreds of thousands of our soldiers who have served and continue to serve around the world with distinction and honor.

Mr. Chairman, all of you are aware that these incidents of detainee abuse have occurred. Army soldiers and leaders were involved in these incidents, and the Army is responsible for their actions. As the senior civilian official in the Army, I accept this responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity to appear before this distinguished committee today. I thank you and the members of the committee for your continuing support of our men and women in the Army, and we look forward to answering your questions.

Let me just say as I yield to my friend here what a great pleasure it is to serve every day with General Pete Schoomaker. He brings such great leadership to the Army and our soldiers, and I am so proud just having the honor on a daily basis to work with a soldier like this.

Chairman WARNER. I share those views.

Mr. Secretary—General, if you will just wait a minute—you and I met earlier this morning on a subject, which is not directly before the committee today, and that is the reported problems with the Army budget. I wonder if you would just provide the committee with a brief synopsis of what we discussed because one or more members may wish, given the opportunity here to have you this morning, to probe into this budget matter. I think you can bring some clarity to it.

Mr. BROWNLEE. Yes, sir. The article certainly reflects that there are continuing demands for resources through our efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan. The Department has met with us and the other Secretaries, Chiefs, and the staff of the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) has worked closely with us. A plan was in place and we have all taken actions to defer some things into the next fiscal year where possible.

But also, we want to be sure and express our sincere appreciation to the members of this committee and the entire Congress because the appropriations bill, the defense appropriations bill that is now before the Senate and we hope will pass today. This bill has within it a $25 billion bridge supplemental, which includes a provision that will make that $25 billion accessible to the Department upon enactment of the bill, which is a little unusual. Normally it would be available at the first of the fiscal year.

But Congress, recognizing the demand for resources, the situation we were in, and some of the deferrals we were making, recognized this and took steps. Sir, we are greatly appreciative.

Chairman WARNER. I hope you can assure us that this shortfall has not in any way affected the combat operations or deprived any soldier, sailor, or airman working with the Army of the means by which to carry out their missions?

Mr. BROWNLEE. Sir, to my knowledge there is no shortfall anywhere as a result of these kinds of issues. We would ensure that that did not happen.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you.

General Schoomaker.

General SCHOOMAKER. Sir, thank you very much.

Chairman WARNER. You also joined in the discussion with the Secretary this morning, and I presume you can give us the same assurances?

General SCHOOMAKER. Sir, I can, and I would just amplify the Secretary's comments there, that the Department of Defense helped us with the corporate decision of a little more than $4 billion to fulfill—

Chairman WARNER. Added it to your cash?

General SCHOOMAKER. Added it to us, to ensure the continuity of operations and that we did not have to do things that were not in our best interests. So we appreciate their support as well.

Sir, thank you very much for your kind statements. Chairman Warner, Secretary Levin, distinguished members of the committee, I appreciate the opportunity to appear here today with Secretary Brownlee and with General P.T. Mikolashek.

We currently have more than one million soldiers in the Army and more than 300,000 of them are deployed around the globe in over 120 countries. The vast majority of our soldiers are performing their duties with honor, dignity, courage, and respect.

We are, have been, and will remain a value-based institution. When I was sworn in as Chief of Staff in August of last year, I said our values will not change. That was true in August, and it is true today. Our values will not change, and they are nonnegotiable. Our soldiers are warriors of character. They exemplify our values every day and are the epitome of the American spirit. They are the heart of our Army.

As the Chief of Staff of the Army, as the senior uniformed officer in the Army, I am responsible to train and equip soldiers and grow leaders. I am also responsible to provide ready and relevant land power to the combat commanders and the joint team. Although I am not in the operational chain of command, I am responsible for our soldiers' readiness, and it has been made very clear over the last couple of months that we could have prepared our soldiers better, and I feel a great deal of responsibility for the actions of our soldiers, both good and bad.

Having said that, I believe the inexcusable behavior of a few is not representative of the courageous and compassionate performance of the majority of our soldiers. The IG report confirms that belief. As the Secretary has already stated, the report focuses on the training, material, leadership, personnel, facilities, standards, force structure, and policy. It identifies what went right as well as where we could do better as related to the internment of enemy prisoners of war and other detention operations and intelligences procedures. It also recommends actions to begin addressing the identified shortfalls right away.

Commanders and leaders at every level have a duty to respect the established international laws of armed conflict, to treat those within our military detention facilities with dignity and decency in the same ways that we expect to be treated as Americans. This inspection shows that our commanders and leaders in nearly every case know this and did this.

Abuses that did occur by a few have hit at the very core of the values of our institutions, caused us grave concern, and prompted us to take a very focused and thorough review of this matter. I am pleased that the Inspector General has completed this very important review.

In our Army we expect all soldiers to demonstrate the basic core values of dignity and respect for others, to include those we have detained. We remain steadfastly committed to dealing expeditiously with any complaint or allegation of mistreatment, and I am confident that our commanders have been taking appropriate action.

Thank you very much.

Chairman WARNER. Thank you very much.

General Mikolashek.

General MIKOLASHEK. Chairman Warner, Senator Levin, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to you and the members of this committee on this important subject. As has already been mentioned, the Secretary did direct us on February 10 to conduct this functional analysis of how the Army conducted detention operations in the context of our doctrine, organization, current and future organizations, training material, leadership, and soldiers, and recommend changes to those as we saw fit.

While this inspection began with this directive on 10 February, the Army had already begun to assess detention operations internally. An assessment of interrogation operations as well as an assessment by the Provost Marshal General regarding corrections operations in theater had been completed. Further, commanders of forward-deployed units were using their own inspectors general to conduct assessments of detention operations in both Afghanistan and Iraq. While a catalyst for this specific inspection was the initial report of the crime at Abu Ghraib, we had been looking at these processes for some time.

This inspection represents one of several ongoing inspections and investigations. It is not a criminal investigation. The Criminal Investigation Department (CID) will continue to conduct investigations into the specific crimes involving detainee abuse. This inspection does not seek to find culpability or fix responsibility regarding questionable activity by military intelligence personnel, as the Procedure 15 report seeks to accomplish that task.

This inspection, as previously stated, was not an investigation of a particular incident or a unit or solely focused on abuse, but a comprehensive, broad examination of all our systems that influence the conduct of these operations in both Iraq and Afghanistan and how the Army prepares and supports its soldiers in the execution of these tasks.

We approached this mission with an eye toward the future by offering recommendations as to how the Army can adjust its doctrine, organizational structures, training, and other key systems. To some degree, it does represent a snapshot in time. Even during the conduct of our visits, we noticed continual adjustments and improvements by the commanders and soldiers in the field. Many of the recommendations contained in this report are already being acted upon.

We conducted this inspection, as the Secretary mentioned, through the use of interviews, sensing sessions, surveys of over 650 soldiers from private to major general. We visited sites from the point of capture to the internment and resettlement facilities in both Afghanistan and Iraq. We visited our combat training centers at Fort Polk and Fort Irwin, as well as the Army's Survival, Evasion, Resistance, and Escape Training Center. We visited units and soldiers who had redeployed to the continental United States (CONUS) and Reserve component soldiers who were demobilizing who had been conducting detention operations in theater. We visited the Military Intelligence School, the Military Police School, as well as reviewed all known previously conducted reports and investigations regarding detention operations.

We also analyzed 125 case summaries of alleged abuse in an effort to establish a pattern, a trend, or a root cause. We did conduct a thorough review of the systems affecting detention operations through the eyes of the soldiers and the leaders who are tasked with executing those operations. We looked for systemic issues and problems, and we defined a systemic problem as one that is widespread or presents a pattern. We attempted to determine what problems exist within these systems and to determine if any directly related to abuse.

This report must also be taken in context of the world in which our soldiers are operating. We see that this is a tough, demanding, dangerous, and different environment that is in a constant state of flux. The enemy we face is ruthless and determined, who seeks to accomplish their objectives through terror, murder and intimidation. They seek to hide among the people and gain support from the populace as well as from external sources. They adapt as we adapt.

This environment puts a tremendous burden on our soldiers who confront this enemy and their supporters eyeball-to-eyeball every day. You will see our soldiers have responded to this challenge very well.

This kind of battlefield puts a premium on knowing the enemy in detail on virtually a personal basis, and thus a premium on human intelligence, particularly at the tactical level.

In order to examine these operations, we determined that there are fundamentally two components of detention operations: first, the capture, care, and control of detainees; and second, the interrogation process itself. These components enable the goals of detention operations: first, to keep the enemy off the battlefield in a humane and secure manner; and then to gain intelligence from those who would do us harm.

In summary, during our inspection we found that, as the Secretary mentioned, our soldiers and leaders do understand the requirement to treat people humanely. They are doing so. They also understand their duty obligation to report incidents of abuse and they do so. They also have done a remarkable job of adjusting their procedures to the environment that I described.

While we did find shortcomings and flaws in each of the systems we looked at, we also found that in our analysis of those abusive situations that did occur they were not the result of any widespread systemic failure. In those cases that we reviewed, the result was of an individual's failure to adhere to known standards of discipline, training, or Army values, or in some cases an individual failure that was accompanied by the failure of a leader to enforce discipline, provide supervision and oversight.

We found that the current operational environment puts demands on our soldiers and leaders to adapt rapidly, and they are doing so. We saw that our soldiers and leaders, when confronted with the difficult and unexpected, responded exactly the way they should have: creatively, rapidly, and aggressively. Our leader development doctrine and process produced these leaders who are unafraid to take risks and, despite a wide range of adversities and uncertainty, adapted and are getting the job done.

Our training doctrine teaches that we train to a task, condition, and a standard. But when the conditions become so different new tasks are created, our soldiers and leaders must respond and react, and they are doing so today.

However, as I mentioned, not all of these systems function perfectly and, just as our soldiers and leaders in the field are adapting, our doctrinal, organization, and training systems must also continue to adapt to support these soldiers in these kinds of operations.

Throughout the report we identify 8 significant findings, 15 other observations, and suggest 52 recommendations that, when implemented, will assist our soldiers and commanders in accomplishing their mission. I will discuss the major findings in the context of the two key components of detention operations.

Regarding the capture, care, and control of detainees, as I previously mentioned, we find that commanders, soldiers, and leaders at all levels throughout the process do treat them properly and emphasize the importance of doing so. We found that leaders are visible during the conduct of detention operations from the point of capture up through the internment and resettlement operations. We found that soldiers are aware of that responsibility to report infractions and they do report them. In fact, during the course of our inspection five soldiers came forward and reported to my inspectors incidents of abuse.

We examined all known cases of abuse that had been reported in Army channels as of June 9, 2004. As of that time, there were 125 reports of abuse cases. We recognize that since that time other reports of alleged abuse have come forward and you have probably seen a different set of numbers, and those differences can be accounted for by the time gap since our data cutoff and what has gone on since then. Our information only includes Afghanistan and Iraq, not Guantanamo. Our reports are based on those made to the Army CID or to Army units as of that cutoff date of June 9.

Having said that, for the purpose of our analysis the use of the all known reports at that time, the study of those 125 cases does provide us a solid basis for analysis in an effort to determine if there was a pattern, a root cause, or perhaps a systemic failure.

As mentioned before, we found that the abuse that did occur, based on a review of those incidents, it was the result of an individual failure of discipline or compounded by the actions or failure of actions of a leader at the tactical level to enforce those standards of discipline, provide the right kind of oversight and supervision.

We defined "abuse" as wrongful death, assault, sexual assault, or theft. As of June 9, we had reviewed 103 summaries of completed and ongoing CID investigations and 22 unit investigations conducted by the chain of command, hence the 125 total.

Not all of the investigations are closed, but nevertheless we attempted, based on the information we had, to categorize each of them in order to identify a pattern. We separated the 125 cases into two categories where it was determined through the course of the investigation that no abuse had occurred. There were 31 of those cases, leaving 94 that abuse was confirmed, that was possible, or that was in an unknown or undetermined category.

As the Secretary mentioned, this number must be taken in the context of the estimated 50,000 detainees that had been under U.S. control for some period of time, not to mention the volume and number of contacts with Iraqi people through checkpoints, patrols, and other operations. We view the 50,000 as a conservative estimate.

We then associated each case with a location on the battlefield. We determined that nearly half the cases, 45 out of the 94, took place at the point of capture. Of note, 20 of those 45 cases were theft and 25 had some element of physical abuse associated with them. The point of capture is the place on the battlefield that is the most uncertain, dangerous, and violent.

Most of the allegations of abuse that occurred at the point of capture were the result of actions by a soldier or soldiers who failed to maintain their self-discipline or follow procedures when dealing with recently captured detainees. Some were a reflex or impulse action on the part of the detainee or the part of the soldier. There are a few incidents that clearly show criminal activity.

Twenty-one of the cases took place at internment and resettlement facilities, including the highly publicized case at Abu Ghraib. There were 19 incidents that occurred at division and brigade level collection points throughout the battlefield. Our review of those cases also establishes that abuse was caused by an individual or individuals acting criminally or failing to follow the known standards, or the failure of a leader to be involved and intercede to stop potentially abusive situations from occurring.

There are nine other cases for which the location precision of what happened is unknown or undetermined, and that accounts for the 125.

Our report also identified several other findings regarding security, administration, medical support, organization, training, regarding the capture, care, and control of detainees.

We also examined and inspected all the four internment and resettlement facilities and found among all of them only Abu Ghraib was in an undesirable location based on its proximity to hostile fire and the location near an urban area.

Regarding interrogation operations, we looked at the process and the necessity to gain valuable information from those we detain. We recognize that this environment has placed a premium on human intelligence, particularly at the tactical level. We found that our commanders recognized this quickly and adapted their procedures in an effort to meet this demand. They realized the necessity to hold detainees long enough at the tactical level to take advantage of the knowledge that both the command has of the environment and the possible information that the detainee may have.

The commanders then must provide, however, for their security, medical care, accountability of the detainees and then be able to conduct more extensive questioning interrogation at that tactical level.

We found that our doctrine must be expanded to further define the relationship between military police (MP) and military intelligence (MI). Both must understand not only their roles, but also the roles and limitations of the other.

We also must provide our commanders more precise guidance on how to establish and operate joint-interrogation facilities. We found that our commanders need more interrogators and interpreters, particularly at the tactical level, and that contract interrogators, while providing considerable value, must be trained on military interrogation techniques, procedures, and policy.

We found that our tactical intelligence officers have the need to conduct complex human intelligence missions and must be able to manage the full spectrum of human intelligence (HUMINT) assets that are being used now in this current environment. Our training of these officers must be expanded to include these types of operations.

We reviewed the existing command policies developed for the conduct of interrogations to determine their compliance with law and policy. We found that the approved command policies regarding interrogation approach techniques developed for Operations Enduring Freedom (OEF) and Iraqi Freedom (OIF), along with the published safeguards, were generally consistent with law and policy. We also found, however, that training and oversight of these policies was inconsistent, but could also find no confirmed instance involving the application of an approved approach technique that led to abuse.

We also identified another series of observations. We provide recommendations that will clarify our policy, expand our doctrine, verify our ongoing organizational efforts, improve the living conditions for our soldiers and detainees, and refine our training to support these operations and better enable our commanders to accomplish the mission in its current environment and into the foreseeable future.

Our recommendations have been reviewed and an action plan has been developed that tasks the Army staff and the subordinate commands for further review and implementation.

I appreciate the opportunity to provide this summary of our report and look forward to your questions. Thank you.

R. L. Brownlee
Acting Secretary of the Army

FOREWORD

This inspection report responds to the Acting Secretary of the Army's 10 February 2004 directive to conduct a functional analysis of the Army's conduct of detainee and interrogation operations to identify any capability shortfalls with respect to internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations, and interrogation procedures and recommend appropriate resolutions or changes if required.

Based on this inspection:

-- the overwhelming majority of our leaders and Soldiers understand the requirement to treat detainees humanely and are doing so.

-- we were unable to identify system failures that resulted in incidents of abuse. These incidents of abuse resulted from the failure of individuals to follow known standards of discipline and Army Values and, in some cases, the failure of a few leaders to enforce those standards of discipline.

-- the current operational environment demands that we adapt; our Soldiers are adapting; so we must also adapt our doctrine, organization, and training.

We examined the two key components of detainee operations: the capture, security and humane treatment of the detainees; and the conduct of interrogation operations in order to gain useful intelligence. While we did not find any systemic failures that directly led to the abusive situations we reviewed, we have made recommendations to improve the effectiveness of detainee operations.

We found that Soldiers are conducting operations under demanding, stressful, and dangerous conditions against an enemy who does not follow the Geneva Conventions. They are in an environment that puts a tremendous demand on human intelligence, particularly, at the tactical level where contact with the enemy and the people are most intense. They do understand their duty to treat detainees humanely and in accordance with laws of land warfare. These Soldiers understand their obligation to report incidents of abuse when they do occur, and they do so. Our leaders have been developed, trained and educated to adapt to the environment in which they find themselves. They understand their tasks, conditions and standards. The conditions of the current operations have caused them to adapt their tactics, techniques and procedures within their capabilities to accommodate this operational environment.

Expanding our doctrine to provide commanders flexibility and adaptability within well-defined principles will better enable them to conduct these operations. Our training and education systems at the individual, unit, and institutional levels must continue to be thorough and realistically simulate the intensity of the environment in which we now operate.

While the primary purpose of this inspection was not to examine specific incidents of abuse, we did analyze reported incidents to determine their root or fundamental causes. To provide a context for the incidents, we noted that an estimated 50,000 individuals were detained for at least some period of time by U.S. Forces during the conduct of OPERATION ENDURING FREEDOM and OPERATION IRAQI FREEDOM. U.S. Forces' contact with the local populace at checkpoints, on patrols, and in other situations increases the number of contacts well in excess of this 50,000 estimate. As of 9 June 2004, there were 94 cases of confirmed or possible abuse of any type, which include, theft, physical assault, sexual assault, and death.

The abuses that have occurred are not representative of policy, doctrine, or Soldier training. These abuses should be viewed as what they are - unauthorized actions taken by a few individuals, and in some cases, coupled with the failure of a few leaders to provide adequate supervision and leadership. These actions, while regrettable, are aberrations when compared to the actions of fellow Soldiers who are serving with distinction.

Executive Summary

Detainee Operations

1. Background: On 10 February 2004, the Acting Secretary of the Army directed the Department of the Army Inspector General (DAIG) to conduct an assessment of detainee operations in Afghanistan and Iraq. In order to satisfy this directive, the DAIG inspected internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations, and interrogation procedures in Afghanistan and Iraq. The inspection focused on the adequacy of Doctrine, Organization, Training, Materiel, Leadership, Personnel, and Facilities (DOTMLPF), standards, force structure, and policy in support of these types of operations.

This inspection was not an investigation of any specific incidents or units but rather a comprehensive review of how the Army conducts detainee operations in Afghanistan and Iraq.

The DAIG did not inspect the U.S. military corrections system or operations at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base during this inspection. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and Defense HUMINT Services (DHS) operations were not inspected.

2. Purpose: Conduct a functional analysis of the Army's internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations, and interrogation procedures, policies, and practices based on current Department of Defense and Army policies and doctrine. The inspection is to identify any capability and systemic shortfalls with respect to internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations, and interrogation procedures and recommend appropriate resolutions or changes if required.

3. Concept: Two teams conducted inspections of 26 locations in Iraq, Afghanistan, and the Continental United States (CONUS). The CONUS team consisted of seven personnel, including augmentees, and visited 10 locations while the OCONUS team consisted of nine personnel, including augmentees, and inspected 16 locations. We interviewed and surveyed over 650 leaders and Soldiers spanning the ranks from Private to Major General. We also reviewed 103 reports of allegations of abuse from Criminal Investigation Division (CID) and 22 unit investigations that covered the period from September 2002 to June 2004.

4. Objectives: The DAIG Team had four objectives for the inspection:

- a. Assess the adequacy of DOTMLPF of Army Forces for internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations, and interrogation procedures.
- b. Determine the standards for Army Forces charged with internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations and interrogation procedures (e.g., size, equipment, standardization, and training).
- c. Assess current and future organizations and structures for Army Forces responsible for internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations and interrogation procedures.
- d. Identify and recommend any changes in policy related to internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations and interrogation procedures.

5. Synopsis:

In the areas that we inspected, we found that the Army is accomplishing its mission both in the capture, care, and custody of detainees and in its interrogation operations. The overwhelming majority of our leaders and Soldiers understand and adhere to the requirement to treat detainees humanely and consistent with the laws of land warfare. Time and again these Soldiers, while under the stress of combat operations and prolonged insurgency operations, conduct themselves in a professional and exemplary manner.

The abuses that have occurred in both Afghanistan and Iraq are not representative of policy, doctrine, or Soldier training. These abuses were unauthorized actions taken by a few individuals, coupled with the failure of a few leaders to provide adequate monitoring, supervision, and leadership over those Soldiers. These abuses, while regrettable, are aberrations when compared to their comrades in arms who are serving with distinction.

The functional analysis of the Army's internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations, and interrogation procedures, policies, and practices can be broken down into two main functions: (1) capture, care, and control of detainees, and (2) interrogation operations.

We determined that despite the demands of the current operating environment against an enemy who does not abide by the Geneva Conventions, our commanders have adjusted to the reality of the battlefield and, are effectively conducting detainee operations while ensuring the humane treatment of detainees. The significant findings regarding the capture, care, and control of detainees are:

- All interviewed and observed commanders, leaders, and Soldiers treated detainees humanely and emphasized the importance of the humane treatment of detainees.
- In the cases the DAIG reviewed, all detainee abuse occurred when one or more individuals failed to adhere to basic standards of discipline, training, or Army Values; in some cases abuse was accompanied by leadership failure at the tactical level.
- Of all facilities inspected, only Abu Ghraib was determined to be undesirable for housing detainees because it is located near an urban population and is under frequent hostile fire, placing Soldiers and detainees at risk.

We determined that the nature of the environment caused a demand for tactical human intelligence. The demands resulted in a need for more interrogators at the tactical level and better training for Military Intelligence officers. The significant findings regarding interrogation are:

- Tactical commanders and leaders adapted their tactics, techniques, and procedures, and held detainees longer than doctrinally recommended due to the demand for timely, tactical intelligence.
- Doctrine does not clearly specify the interdependent, and yet independent, roles, missions, and responsibilities of Military Police and Military Intelligence units in the establishment and operation of interrogation facilities.
- Military Intelligence units are not resourced with sufficient interrogators and interpreters, to conduct timely detainee screenings and interrogations in the current operating environment, resulting in a backlog of interrogations and the potential loss of intelligence.

- Tactical Military Intelligence Officers are not adequately trained to manage the full spectrum of the collection and analysis of human intelligence.
- Officially approved CJTF-7 and CJTF-180 policies and the early CJTF-180 practices generally met legal obligations under U.S. law, treaty obligations and policy, if executed carefully, by trained soldiers, under the full range of safeguards. The DAIG Team found that policies were not clear and contained ambiguities. The DAIG Team found implementation, training, and oversight of these policies was inconsistent; the Team concluded, however, based on a review of cases through 9 June 2004 that no confirmed instance of detainee abuse was caused by the approved policies.

We reviewed detainee operations through systems (Policy and Doctrine, Organizational Structures, Training and Education, and Leadership and Discipline) that influence how those operations are conducted, and have identified findings and recommendations in each. While these findings are not critical, the implementation of the corresponding recommendations will better enable our commanders to conduct detainee operations now and into the foreseeable future, decrease the possibility of abuse, and ensure we continue to treat detainees humanely.

The findings and observations from this inspection are separated into the following three chapters: Chapter 3 - Capture, Care, and Control of Detainees, Chapter 4 - Interrogation Operations, and Chapter 5 - Other Observations. A summary of the Capture, Care, and Control of Detainees and the Interrogation Operation findings is provided below.

Capture, Care, and Control of Detainees

Army forces are successfully conducting detainee operations to include the capture, care, and control of detainees. Commanders and leaders emphasized the importance of humane treatment of detainees. We observed that leaders and Soldiers treat detainees humanely and understand their obligation to report abuse. In those instances where detainee abuse occurred, individuals failed to adhere to basic standards of discipline, training, or Army Values; in some cases individual misconduct was accompanied by leadership failure to maintain fundamental unit discipline, failure to provide proper leader supervision of and guidance to their Soldiers, or failure to institute proper control processes.

We found through our interviews and observations conducted between 7 March 2004 and 5 April 2004 that leaders and Soldiers in Afghanistan and Iraq were determined to do what was legally and morally right for their fellow Soldiers and the detainees under their care. We found numerous examples of military professionalism, ingrained Army Values, and moral courage in both leaders and Soldiers. These leaders and Soldiers were self-disciplined and demonstrated an ability to maintain composure during times of great stress and danger. With the nature of the threat in both Afghanistan and Iraq, Soldiers are placed in extremely dangerous positions on a daily basis. They face the daily risks of being attacked by detainees, contracting communicable diseases from sick detainees, being taunted or spat upon, having urine or feces thrown upon them, and having to treat a detainee humanely who just attacked their unit or killed a fellow Soldier. Despite these challenges, the vast majority of Soldiers and other U.S. Military personnel continued to do their duty to care for detainees in a fair and humane manner.

Our review of the detainee abuse allegations attempted to identify underlying causes and contributing factors that resulted in abusive situations. We examined these from the perspective of the Policy and Doctrine, Organizational Structures, Training and Education, and Leadership and Discipline systems. We also examined them in terms of location on the battlefield and sought to determine if there was a horizontal, cross-cutting system failure that resulted in a single case of abuse or was common to all of them. Based on this inspection, we were unable to identify system failures that resulted in incidents of abuse. These incidents of abuse resulted from the failure of individuals to follow known standards of discipline and Army Values and, in some cases, the failure of a few leaders to enforce those standards of discipline. We also found that our policies, doctrine, and training are being continually adapted to address the existing operational environment regarding detainee operations. Commanders adjusted existing doctrinal procedures to accommodate the realities of the battlefield. We expect our leaders to do this and they did. The Army must continue to educate for uncertain environments and develop our leaders to adapt quickly to conditions they confront on the battlefield.

Using a data cut-off of 9 June 2004 we reviewed 103 summaries of Army CID reports of investigation and 22 unit investigation summaries conducted by the chain of command involving detainee death or allegations of abuse. These 125 reports are in various stages of completion. 31 cases have been determined that no abuse occurred; 71 cases are closed; and 54 cases are open or undetermined. Of note, the CID investigates every occurrence of a detainee death regardless of circumstances.

Recognizing that the facts and circumstances as currently known in ongoing cases may not be all-inclusive, and that additional facts and circumstances could change the categorization of a case, the Team placed each report in a category for the purposes of this inspection to understand the overall numbers and the facts currently known, and to examine for trends or systemic issues. This evaluation of allegations of abuse reports is not intended to influence commanders in the independent exercise of their responsibilities under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) or other administrative disciplinary actions. As an Inspector General inspection, this report does not focus on individual conduct, but on systems and policies.

This review indicates that as of 9 June 2004, 48% (45 of 94) of the alleged incidents of abuse occurred at the point of capture, where Soldiers have the least amount of control of the environment. For this inspection, the DAIG Team interpreted point of capture events as detainee operations occurring at battalion level and below, before detainees are evacuated to doctrinal division forward or central collecting points (CPs). This allowed the DAIG Team to analyze and make a determination to where and what level of possible abuse occurred. The point of capture is the location where most contact with detainees occurs under the most uncertain, dangerous, and frequently violent circumstances.

This review further indicates that as of 9 June 2004, 22% (21 of 94) of the alleged incidents of abuse occurred at Internment/Resettlement (I/R) facilities. This includes the highly publicized incident at Abu Ghraib. Those alleged abuse situations at I/R facilities are attributed to individual failure to abide by known standards and/or individual failure compounded by a leadership failure to enforce known standards, provide proper supervision, and stop potentially abusive situations from occurring. As of 9 June 2004, 20%, (19 of 94) of the alleged incidents of abuse occurred at CPs. For the remaining 10% (9 of 94) of the alleged incidents of abuse, a location could not be determined based on the CID case summaries.

*Note For the purpose of this inspection, we defined abuse as wrongful death, assault, sexual assault, and theft.

The Army estimates that over 50,000 detainees have been captured or processed. While even one case of abuse is unacceptable, we conclude that given the volume of detainees and the potential for abuse in these demanding circumstances, the overwhelming majority of our Soldiers and leaders are conducting these operations with due regard for the detainees right to be treated humanely and properly.

Detainee abuse does not occur when individual Soldiers remain disciplined, follow known procedures, and understand their duty obligation to report abusive behavior. Detainee abuse does not occur when leaders of those Soldiers who deal with detainees enforce basic standards of humane treatment, provide oversight and supervision of detainee operations, and take corrective action when they see potentially abusive situations developing. Our site visits, interviews, sensing sessions, and observations indicate that the vast majority of Soldiers and leaders, particularly at the tactical level, understand their responsibility to treat detainees humanely and their duty obligation to report infractions.

We inspected I/R facilities at Bagram, Baghdad, and Camp Bucca and found only Abu Ghraib overcrowded, located near a densely populated urban area, on a dangerous main supply route, and subject to frequent hostile enemy fire from enemy mortars or rockets. The physical design of the camps within the prison was not optimal for the mission: towers were not properly placed to support overlapping fields of fire and cover blind spots; entrance/egress routes were hampered by make-shift gates; and sally ports were not used correctly. The supply of fresh water was difficult to maintain and the food quality was sub-standard. Detainees did not have access to bunkers or shelters with overhead cover to protect them from hostile enemy mortar or rocket fire from outside the walls of Abu Ghraib.

Interrogation Operations

The need for timely, tactical human intelligence is critical for successful military operations particularly in the current environment. Commanders recognized this and adapted by holding detainees longer at the point of capture and collecting points to gain and exploit intelligence. Commanders and interrogators also conducted tactical questioning to gain immediate battlefield intelligence. Commanders and leaders must set the conditions for success, and commanders, leaders, and Soldiers must adapt to the ever changing environment in order to be successful.

Of the interviewed point of capture battalion and company leaders, 61% (25 of 41) stated their units established CPs and held detainees at their locations from 12 hours up to 30 days. The primary reason units held detainees at these locations was to conduct screenings and interrogations closer to the point of capture. The result of holding detainees for longer timeframes at all locations was increased requirements in facility infrastructure, medical care, preventive medicine, trained personnel, logistics, and security. Organic unit personnel at these locations did not have the required institutional training and were therefore unaware of or unable to comply fully with Army policies in areas such as detainee processing, confinement operations, security, preventive medicine, and interrogation.

Doctrine does not clearly and distinctly address the relationship between the MP operating I/R facilities and the Military Intelligence (MI) personnel conducting intelligence exploitation at those facilities. Neither MP nor MI doctrine specifically defines the interdependent, yet independent, roles, missions, and responsibilities of the two in detainee operations. MP doctrine states MI may collocate with MP at detention sites to conduct interrogations, and coordination should be made to establish operating procedures. MP doctrine does not, however, address approved and prohibited MI procedures in an MP-operated facility. It also does not clearly establish the role of MPs in the interrogation process. Conversely, MI doctrine does not clearly explain MP internment procedures or the role of MI personnel within an internment setting. Contrary to MP doctrine, FM 34-52, Intelligence Interrogation, 28 September 1992, implies an active role for MPs in the interrogation process: "Screeners coordinate with MP holding area guards on their role in the screening process. The guards are told where the screening will take place, how EPWs and detainees are to be brought there from the holding area, and what types of behavior on their part will facilitate the screenings." Subordination of the MP custody and control mission to the MI need for intelligence can create settings in which unsanctioned behavior, including detainee abuse, could occur. Failure of MP and MI personnel to understand each other's specific missions and duties could undermine the effectiveness of safeguards associated with interrogation techniques and procedures.

Doctrine that addresses the establishment and operation of interrogations contains inconsistent guidance on terminology, structure, and function of these facilities. At the time of the inspection there were facilities in OPERATION ENDURING FREEDOM and OPERATION IRAQI FREEDOM that conducted intelligence exploitation as Joint Interrogation Facilities and as a Joint Interrogation and Debriefing Center. The intelligence sections of each were uniquely structured to meet mission requirements.

Shortfalls in numbers of interrogators and interpreters, and the distribution of these assets within the battlespace, hampered human intelligence (HUMINT) collection efforts. Valuable intelligence—timely, complete, clear, and accurate—may have been lost as a result. Interrogators were not available in sufficient numbers to efficiently conduct screening and interrogations of the large numbers of detainees at collecting points (CPs) and internment/resettlement (I/R) facilities, nor were there enough to man sufficient numbers of Tactical Human Intelligence Teams (THTs) for intelligence exploitation at points of capture. Interpreters, especially those Category II personnel authorized to participate in interrogations, were also in short supply. Units offset the shortage of interrogators with contract interrogators. While these contract interrogators provide a valuable service, we must ensure they are trained in military interrogation techniques and policy.

Due to the demand for immediate tactical intelligence, tactical intelligence officers were conducting interrogations of detainees without thorough training on the management of HUMINT analysis and collection techniques. They were not adequately trained to manage the full spectrum of HUMINT assets being used in the current operating environment. The need for these officers to understand the management of the full spectrum of HUMINT operations is a key for successful HUMINT exploitation in the current operating environment.

Current interrogation doctrine includes 17 interrogation approach techniques. Doctrine recognizes additional techniques may be applied. Doctrine emphasizes that every technique must be humane and be consistent with legal obligations. Commanders in both OEF and OIF adopted additional interrogation approach technique policies. Officially approved CJTF-180 and CJTF -7 generally met legal obligations under U.S. law, treaties and policy, if executed carefully, by trained soldiers, under the full range of safeguards. The DAIG Team found that some interrogators were not trained on the additional techniques in either formal school or unit training programs. Some inspected units did not have the correct command policy in effect at the time of inspection. Based on a review of CID case summaries as of 9 June 2004, the team was unable to establish any direct link between the proper use of an approved approach technique or techniques and a confirmed case of detainee abuse.

6. Conclusion: The Army's leaders and Soldiers are effectively conducting detainee operations and providing for the care and security of detainees in an intense operational environment. Based on this inspection, we were unable to identify system failures that resulted in incidents of abuse. This report offers 52 recommendations that are designed to improve the ability of the Army to accomplish the key tasks of detainee operations: keep the enemy off the battlefield in a secure and humane manner, and gain intelligence in accordance with Army standards.

Chapter 1

Background and Inspection Concept

1. Background: On 10 February 2004, the Acting Secretary of the Army directed the Department of the Army Inspector General (DAIG) to conduct an assessment of detainee operations in Afghanistan and Iraq. In order to satisfy the Acting Secretary of the Army's directive, the DAIG inspected internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations, and interrogation procedures in Iraq and Afghanistan. The inspection focused on the adequacy of Doctrine, Organization, Training, Materiel, Leadership, Personnel, and Facilities (DOTMLPF), standards, force structure, and policy.

2. Inspection Concept: The detailed concept for this inspection is as follows:

a. Purpose: The purpose of this inspection was to conduct a functional analysis of detainee operations based on current Department of Defense (DoD) and Army policy and doctrine.

b. Objectives:

(1) Assess the adequacy of DOTMLPF of Army Forces for internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations, and interrogation procedures.

(2) Determine the standards for Army Forces charged with internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations and interrogation procedures (e.g., size, equipment, standardization, and training).

(3) Assess current and future organizations and structures for Army Forces responsible for internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations and interrogation procedures.

(4) Identify and recommend any changes in policy related to internment, enemy prisoner of war, detention operations and interrogation procedures.

c. Scope: Two teams conducted inspections of 25 locations in Iraq, Afghanistan, and the Continental United States (CONUS). The CONUS team consisted of seven personnel, including augmentees, and visited seven locations while the OCONUS team consisted of nine personnel, including augmentees, and inspected 16 locations. We interviewed and surveyed over 650 leaders and Soldiers spanning the ranks from Private to Major General. We also reviewed 103 reports of allegations of abuse from Criminal Investigation Division (CID) and 22 unit investigations that cover the period of September 2002 to June 2004.

d. Focus: The inspection focused on the functional analysis of the Army's internment, enemy prisoner of war, and detention policies, practices, and procedures as the Army executes its role as the DoD Executive Agent for Enemy Prisoners of War and Detention Program. Numerous DoD Policies, Army Regulations, and Army Field Manuals provided the guiding tenets for this inspection.

e. Task Organization: Two teams from the DAIG Inspections Division, with augmentation from the Office of the Provost Marshal General (OPMG), Office of the Judge Advocate General (OTJAG), Office of the Surgeon General (OTSG), U.S. Army Maneuver Support Center

(USAMANSCEAN), U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command (USACIC), U.S. Army Special Operations Command (USASOC), and the U.S. Army Intelligence Center (USAIC) conducted the inspection by traveling to 25 locations in CONUS and OCONUS. The composition of these teams was as follows:

f. Inspection Process:

- (1) Preparation Phase: Research and Training (February - March 2004)
- (2) Execution Phase: On-Site Inspections (March - April 2004)
- (3) Completion Phase: Final Report Preparation (April - June 2004)

g. Inspection Locations and Schedule: See Appendix C.

h. Inspection Approach: The Inspectors General (IG) for Combined Forces Land Component Command (CFLCC), Combined Joint Task Force-7 (CJTF-7), Combined Joint Task Force-180 (CJTF-180), and local IGs served as coordinating agents for all DAIG inspection activities at those locations. These IGs were telephonically and electronically notified by DAIG with the Notification Memorandum and Detailed Inspection Plan that was sent to all affected Commanders/IGs on 20 February 2004.

i. Other Reports: This report mentions the Ryder Report, Miller Report, and Taguba Investigation throughout its inspection results. These two reports and investigation deal with the following: the Ryder Report is an assessment of detention and corrections operations in Iraq; the Miller Report is a classified assessment of the Department of Defense's counterterrorism interrogation and detention operations in Iraq; and the Taguba Investigation is a classified investigation under Army Regulation 15-6 into the 800th Military Police (MP) Brigade's detention and internment operations.

j. Definitions: The DAIG used the following definitions throughout the report.

(1) The DAIG defined the term "detainee operations" as the range of actions taken by Soldiers beginning at the point of capture, the movement of detainees through division forward and central collecting points (CPs), to internment at internment/resettlement (I/R) facilities, and release. This includes the administrative and medical processing of detainees, medical treatment of detainees, sanitary conditions at I/R facilities and CPs, and interrogation procedures. The term "detainee operations" does not apply to confined U.S. Military personnel.

(2) Army Regulation (AR) 190-8, Enemy Prisoners of War, Retained Personnel, Civilian Internees and Other Detainees, 1 October 1997, defines the term detainee as "any person captured or otherwise detained by an armed force." The DAIG uses the term as defined by AR 190-8 in this report. The term "detainee" includes enemy prisoners of war (EPWs), retained persons (RP), civilian internees (CIs), and other detainees (ODs). When making a differentiation between the different classifications of detainees, the report will specifically mention EPWs, RPs, CIs, or ODs. The report will also point out the use of non-doctrinal terms sometimes used as detainee classifications.

(3) The battlespace of OPERATION ENDURING FREEDOM (OEF) and OPERATION IRAQI FREEDOM (OIF) included an enemy that deployed asymmetrically with adaptive tactics; a battlespace in which there was not always a clear forward line of troops, massing of forces, or an identifiable rear area to which detainees could be rapidly evacuated. The battlespace of OEF and OIF was non-linear with combat and stability operations taking place simultaneously throughout the areas of operation. Combatants included both uniformed and non-uniformed state and non-state sponsored forces who fought using conventional and non-conventional methods to include terrorist actions against both military and civilian targets. Detainees were, and continue to be, more than compliant civilian internees and enemy prisoners of war. They are primarily a noncompliant hostile population that requires more intensive screening, interrogation and segregation. The Army is in a new and unique operational environment stemming from the need for immediate tactical level intelligence coupled with the significant numbers of non-traditional combatants/detainees encountered.

(4) We define a problem as systemic if it is widespread and presents a pattern. We attempted through observations, sensing sessions, interviews, site visits, surveys, and reviews of documents, other reports, and investigations to identify failures in the systems that comprise detainee operations.

Chapter 2

Inspection Methodology

The Department of the Army Inspector General (DAIG) Team developed a baseline approach to the inspection that focused on gathering information and data from five primary domains: interviews, sensing sessions, document reviews, surveys of commanders, leaders, and Soldiers, and site visits. This approach allowed the Team to glean perceptions and attitudes about detainee operations from selected individuals and populations; to assess detainee operations in doctrinal manuals, unit policies, unit Standing Operating Procedures (SOPs); and to determine compliance with Department of Defense (DoD) and Army policies. The Team visited U.S. Armed Forces-controlled internment/resettlement (I/R) facilities and division central and forward collecting points (CPs), as well as units conducting patrol missions, to gather overall trends and observations on detainee operations from point of capture to the processing conducted at U.S. Armed Forces-controlled I/R facilities.

This baseline methodology afforded the Team a standard, systematic approach to conducting an inspection at each location, which proved essential since the DAIG Team conducted split operations with two teams that traveled separately to continental United States (CONUS) and outside the continental United States (OCONUS) locations. The Team had to tailor their trips to look at units that had already returned from OPERATION ENDURING FREEDOM (OEF) and OPERATION IRAQI FREEDOM (OIF) as well as those units currently deployed.

The methodology established a three-phase plan for executing the inspection.

a. Phase 1: Preparation. This phase included travel planning, pre-deployment training, administrative requirements, a review of documents the Team requested in advance from the unit IGs, pre-inspection visits to the National Training Center (NTC) at Fort Irwin and the Joint Readiness Training Center (JRTC) at Fort Polk, and development of a detailed inspection plan.

b. Phase 2: Execution. This phase outlined the physical execution of the itinerary developed by the local IG in accordance with the Detailed Inspection Plan. Each visit began with an inbrief to the unit's senior leadership and ended with an outbrief. The DAIG Team conducted interviews, sensing sessions, and a survey of Commanders, leaders and Soldiers currently in the area of responsibility (AOR) and those who recently returned from OEF and OIF to determine detainee operations tactics, techniques, and procedures from point of capture to arrival at the CPs; inspected CPs from receipt of detainees to the transfer of detainees to U.S. Armed Forces-controlled I/R facilities; inspected U.S. Armed Forces-controlled I/R facilities and operations; and reviewed policies, plans, records, programs, Standard Operating Procedures (SOPs), and other related documents.

c. Phase 3: Completion. The DAIG Team returned to home station and conducted post-trip data analyses of the information gathered. The Team then crafted detailed trip reports of the visit that captured the critical information gleaned from the trips. These trip reports formed the basis from which the Team developed the findings outlined in the report. Additionally, team members cross-walked information and traveled to the MI and MP schools for coordination and confirmation of information used in the findings.

The following section outlines the baseline methodology in detail to include the specific requirements for interviews and sensing sessions based upon the type of unit visited.

a. Inspection Methodology. The local IG served as the coordinating agent for all DAIG inspection activities. The coordinating agent worked with his or her respective DAIG Team point of contact (POC) to develop an itinerary for a four-day inspection for CONUS units and a 30-day period for OCONUS. The coordinating agent and DAIG Team POC fine-tuned the itinerary to maximize the Team's ability to meet the inspection's baseline requirements.

b. Personnel Interviewed:

(1) OCONUS

(a) The Team conducted interviews at CFLCC, CJTF-7, CJTF-180, U.S. Armed Forces-controlled I/R facilities, and division CPs. The Team interviewed selected leaders from CFLCC/CJTF/division/brigade/battalion staffs and company level personnel. Individual interviews occurred in the interviewee's office or in a similar location free from interruptions and telephone calls. The coordinating agent scheduled these interviews to last no more than 1.5 hours. The coordinating agent also considered geographical dispersion and travel times between events. The interviews were conducted by one or two DAIG Team members with the unit interviewee.

(b) The DAIG Team conducted sensing sessions at each U.S. Armed Forces-controlled I/R facility, division CPs, and at the company level, one for junior enlisted (Private through Specialist, but not including Corporals) and one for junior noncommissioned officers (Sergeant and Staff Sergeant). Units provided eight to twelve Soldiers per session. Each sensing session required a classroom or similar facility that was removed from the unit's normal work location. The area was relatively quiet and free from interruptions and telephone calls. In addition, the room needed no less than 14 chairs or desks formed in a circle or square. The coordinating agent scheduled 1.5-hour time blocks for each sensing session. The sensing sessions were conducted by two DAIG Team members with the unit Soldiers.

(c) The coordinating agent adjusted the interview schedule, in coordination with the Team, based upon the availability of personnel. The Team recognized that only full-time Manning personnel might be available in Reserve Component units.

(d) The matrix below was a strawman that was finalized by the DAIG Team POC and the local IG for the OCONUS inspection.

Chapter 3

Capture, Care, and Control of Detainees

1. Summary of Findings: Army forces are successfully conducting detainee operations to include the capture, care, and control of detainees. Commanders and leaders emphasized the importance of humane treatment of detainees and, currently, leaders and Soldiers treat detainees humanely and understand their obligation to report abuse. In those instances where detainee abuse occurred, individuals failed to adhere to basic standards of discipline, training, or Army Values; in some cases individual misconduct was accompanied by leadership failure to maintain fundamental unit discipline, failure to provide proper leader supervision and guidance to their Soldiers, or failure to institute proper control processes.

For the purpose of this inspection, we defined abuse as wrongful death, assault, battery, sexual assault, sexual battery, or theft. As of 9 June 2004 we had reviewed 103 summaries of Criminal Investigative Division (CID) reports of investigation and 22 unit investigation summaries conducted by the chain of command involving detainee death or alleged abuse. These 125 reports are in various stages of completion. No abuse was determined to have occurred in 31 cases; 71 cases are closed; and 54 cases are open or undetermined. Of note, the CID investigates every occurrence of a detainee death regardless of circumstances. While recognizing that any abuse incident is one too many, we conducted a review and categorization of the summary reports of the 125 investigations. Based on our review and analysis of reports and case summaries of investigations and our observations and interviews conducted throughout this inspection, we could not identify a systemic cause for the abuse incidents. The DAIG uses the term "systemic" specifically to describe a problem if it is widespread and presents a pattern. As defined by the DAIG in this report, a systemic issue may be found either horizontally across many various types of units, or vertically through many command levels or within systems. The DAIG determined that incidents where detainees were allegedly mistreated occurred as isolated events. In a few incidents, higher ranking individuals up to Lieutenant Colonel were involved; however, the chain of command took action when an allegation of detainee abuse was reported.

Abu Ghraib had problems with deteriorating infrastructure that impacted the clean, safe, and secure working environment for Soldiers and living conditions for detainees. Poor food quality and food distribution, lack of laundry capability, and inadequate personal hygiene facilities affected the detainees' living conditions. Overcrowding, frequent enemy hostile fire, and lack of in-depth force protection measures also put Soldiers and detainees at risk.

2. Findings:

a. Finding 1:

(1) Finding: All interviewed and observed commanders, leaders, and Soldiers treated detainees humanely and emphasized the importance of the humane treatment of detainees.

(2) Standard: See Appendix E.

(3) Inspection Results: The DAIG Team conducted numerous interviews and sensing sessions with leaders and Soldiers that revealed most leaders and Soldiers have treated detainees humanely and would report detainee abuse if they became aware of it.

For OPERATION ENDURING FREEDOM(OEF), Chairman Joint Chiefs of Staff(CJCS) Message dated 211933Z JAN 02, stated that Al Qaida and Taliban would be treated humanely and, to the extent appropriate and consistent with military necessity, in a manner consistent with the principles of the Geneva Conventions. Therefore, most detainees were classified as civilian internees (CIs) (sub-classified for OEF by the following non-doctrinal terms: Persons Under U.S. Control (PUC), Enemy Combatant (EC), and Low-level Enemy Combatant (LLEC)). Interviews, sensing sessions, and document reviews revealed that most Soldiers were aware of their requirement to treat detainees humanely. In most cases, the present level of treatment exceeded the Common Article 3 standard of treatment. Notwithstanding, while detainee abuse had occurred in OEF in the past, the DAIG Team observed that units currently conducting detainee operations missions treated detainees humanely.

Many noncommissioned officers (NCOs) stated very clearly that the humane treatment of detainees was paramount to the success of the mission. Another group of junior enlisted Soldiers stated that they received substantial training on detainee treatment. They went on to specifically mention that they were taught to treat detainees with dignity and respect. In another sensing session, the NCOs stated that the minimum standard for treating detainees is protection, respect, and humane treatment. Some went on to say that violations are not tolerated by the command or fellow Soldiers.

Consistent with these statements, the DAIG Team that visited Iraq and Afghanistan discovered no incidents of abuse that had not been reported through command channels; all incidents were already under investigation. The DAIG Team that visited units recently returning from Iraq did receive a total of 5 new allegations of potential abuse that occurred prior to January 2004. The DAIG Team immediately turned these over to the chain of command and Army Criminal Investigation Division (CID). There is no evidence of the cover-up of current detainee abuse by U.S. Soldiers. This is consistent with the results of the teams' sensing sessions; all currently deployed Soldiers were aware of their responsibility to report abuse and appeared to be willing and able to report any potential abuse.

In OIF, U.S. Forces detained the full spectrum of classes of detainees, but most were classified as EPWs or CIs. Presently, CIs make up the vast majority of the U.S.-controlled detainee population. EPWs are entitled to all the protections in the Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War (GPW), and CIs are entitled to relevant protections in the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (GC). The GPW and GC provide detailed levels and standards of treatment for EPWs and CIs that include treatment during armed conflict and occupation. Most leaders and Soldiers treated EPWs and CIs humanely and consistent with the Geneva Conventions (GPW and GC).

The Army estimates that over 50,000 detainees have been captured or processed. While even one case of abuse is unacceptable, we conclude that given the volume of detainees and the potential for abuse in these demanding circumstances, the overwhelming majority of our Soldiers and leaders are conducting these operations with due regard for the detainees right to be treated humanely and properly.

Detainee abuse does not occur when individual Soldiers remain disciplined, follow known procedures and understand their duty obligation to report abusive behavior. Detainee abuse does not occur when leaders of those Soldiers who deal with detainees enforce basic standards of humane treatment, provide oversight and supervision of detainee operations and take corrective action when they see potentially abusive situations developing. Our site visits, interviews, sensing sessions and observations indicate that the vast majority of Soldiers and leaders, particularly at the tactical level, understand their responsibility to treat detainees humanely and their duty obligation to report infractions.

The GC and GPW require that copies of the GC be posted in the detainees' language in facilities that contain EPWs and/or CIs. Only 25% (4 of 16) facilities inspected maintained copies of the Geneva Conventions in the detainees' language. No facilities in Afghanistan complied with this Geneva requirement, while only 4 facilities in Iraq were compliant. Other specific details of treatment outlined in the GPW and GC are covered elsewhere in this report.

The DAIG Team observed that units made efforts to comply with the DoD requirement to treat the detainees consistent with the Geneva Conventions. Some of the improvements being made by units and resourceful individuals include: increased training for key noncommissioned officers (NCOs) and small unit leaders; developing standing operating procedures (SOPs); and requesting copies of the Geneva Conventions in the detainees' language for posting.

In general, the Miller Report recognized that detainees should be secured in a humane environment and that greater involvement by judge advocates was required. The DAIG Team did not observe a dedicated judge advocate for interrogation operations, but did note that the MI brigades, assigned to duty at Abu Ghraib, were each assigned at least 1 brigade judge advocate. The Ryder Report stated EPWs and CIs should receive the full protections of the Geneva Conventions unless the denial of these protections was due to specifically articulated military necessity.

The Taguba Investigation observed that many Soldiers and units upheld the Army Values. The Taguba Investigation also detailed numerous incidents where U.S. Soldiers abused detainees, which the investigation characterized as "systemic." As used in the Taguba Investigation, the term "systemic" deals with a subset of the security and interrogation operations at only one interment /resettlement facility and is not theater-wide. However, MG Taguba testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee on 11 May 04, narrowing the extent of the term "systemic" by stating that these particular abuses were individual actions not committed at the direction of the chain of command and that the resulting photos were taken with personal cameras. Additionally, the Taguba Investigation recommended detention facilities make several changes that would help ensure compliance with the Geneva Conventions. As stated above, the DAIG uses the term "systemic" specifically to describe a problem if it is widespread and presents a pattern. As defined by the DAIG in this report, a systemic issue may be found either horizontally across many various types of units, or vertically through many command levels from squad through division or higher level. Based on our review and analysis of reports and case summaries of investigations and our observations and interviews conducted throughout this inspection, we could not identify a systemic cause for the abuse incidents.

(4) Recommendation: CJTF-7 and CJTF-180 continue to emphasize compliance with the requirements regarding the humane treatment of detainees.

Recommendation: Commanders continue to stress the importance of humane treatment of detainees and continue to supervise and train Soldiers on their responsibility to treat detainees humanely and their responsibility to report abuse.

b. Finding 2:

(1) Finding: In the cases the DAIG reviewed, all detainee abuse occurred when one or more individuals failed to adhere to basic standards of discipline, training, or Army Values; in some cases abuse was accompanied by leadership failure at the tactical level.

(2) Standard: See Appendix E.

(3) Inspection Results: As of 9 June 2004, there were 125 reported cases of detainee abuse (to include death, assault, or indecent assault) that either had been, or were, under investigation.

For the purpose of this inspection, we defined abuse as wrongful death, assault, sexual assault, or theft. As of 9 June 2004 we had reviewed 103 summaries of Criminal Investigation Division (CID) reports of investigation and 22 unit investigation summaries conducted by the chain of command involving detainee death or alleged abuse. These 125 reports are in various stages of completion. No abuse was determined to have occurred in 31 cases; 71 cases are closed; and 54 cases are open or undetermined. Of note, the CID investigates every occurrence of a detainee death regardless of circumstances.

Recognizing that the facts and circumstances as currently known in ongoing cases may not be all inclusive, and that additional facts and circumstances could change the categorization of a case, the Team placed each report in a category for the purposes of this inspection to understand the overall numbers and the facts currently known, and to examine for a trend or systemic issue. This evaluation of alleged abuse reports is not intended to, nor should it, influence commanders in the independent exercise of their responsibilities under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) or other administrative disciplinary actions. As an Inspector General inspection, this report does not focus on individual conduct, but on systems and policies.

We separated these 125 cases into two categories:

- (1) no abuse occurred
- (2) confirmed or possible abuse

In the first category of no abuse occurring, we further separate the reports into deaths (to include death from natural causes and justified homicide as determined by courts martial) and other instances (to include cases where there was insufficient evidence to determine whether abuse occurred or where the leadership determined, through courts martial or investigation, that no abuse occurred). There were a total of 19 natural deaths and justified homicides, and 12 instances of insufficient evidence or determined that no abuse occurred. Deaths occurred at the following locations: 15 at I/R facilities; 1 at Central Collecting Points (CPs); 1 at Forward CPs; and 2 at the point of capture (POC) for a total of 19. Other instances where it was determined that no abuse occurred were at the following locations: 2 at I/R facilities; 1 at Central CPs; 2 at Forward CPs; 5 at the POC; and 2 at locations which could not be determined or did not fall into doctrinal categories, for a total of 12.

In the second category of confirmed or possible abuse, we further separated the reports into wrongful deaths, deaths with undetermined causes, and other alleged abuse (e.g., assault, sexual assault, or theft). There were a total of 20 deaths and 74 incidents of other alleged abuse. Deaths occurred at the following locations: 10 at I/R facilities; 0 at Central CPs; 5 at Forward CPs; and 5 at the POC, for a total of 20. Other instances of alleged abuse occurred at the following locations: 11 at I/R facilities; 3 at Central CPs; 11 at Forward CPs; 40 at the POC; and 9 at locations which could not be determined or did not fall into doctrinal categories, for a total of 74.

This review indicates that as of 9 June 2004, 48% (45 of 94) of the alleged incidents of abuse occurred at the point of capture. For this inspection, the DAIG Team interpreted point of capture events as detainee operations occurring at battalion level and below, before detainees are evacuated to doctrinal division forward or central collecting points (CPs). This allowed the DAIG Team to analyze and make a determination to where and what level of possible abuse occurred. The point of capture is the location where most contact with detainees occurs under the most uncertain, dangerous and frequently violent circumstances. During the period of April-August 2003 when units were most heavily engaged in combat operations, 56% (29 of 52) of point of capture incidents were reported. Even during this period of high intensity combat operations, Soldiers and leaders identified incidents that they believe to be abuse and the command took action when reported. Most of the allegations of abuse that occurred at the point of capture were the result of actions by a Soldier or Soldiers who failed to maintain their self discipline, integrity, and military bearing, when dealing with the recently captured detainees. There are a few incidents that clearly show criminal activity by an individual or individuals with disregard of their responsibility as a Soldier.

This review further indicates that as of 9 June 2004, 22% (21 of 94) of the alleged incidents of abuse occurred at I/R facilities. This includes the highly publicized incident at Abu Ghraib. Those alleged abuse situations at the I/R facilities are attributed to: individual failure to abide by known standards and/or individual failure compounded by a leadership failure to enforce known standards, provide proper supervision and stop potentially abusive situations from occurring.

While recognizing that any abuse incident is one too many, through a review of the summary reports of the 125 investigations and categorizing them, the DAIG did not identify a systemic cause for the abuse incidents. The DAIG uses the term "systemic" specifically to describe a problem if it is widespread and presents a pattern. As defined by the DAIG in this report, a systemic issue may be found either horizontally across many various types of units, or vertically through many command levels from squad through division or higher level. The DAIG determined that incidents where detainees were allegedly mistreated occurred as isolated events. In a few incidents, higher ranking individuals up to Lieutenant Colonel were involved; however, the chain of command took action when an allegation of detainee abuse was reported.

Recognizing that the facts and circumstances as currently known in ongoing cases may not be all inclusive, and that additional facts and circumstances could change the categorization of a case, the Team placed each report in a category for the purposes of this inspection to understand the overall numbers and the facts currently known, and to examine for a trend or systemic issue. This evaluation of alleged abuse reports is not intended to influence commanders in the independent exercise of their responsibilities under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) or other administrative disciplinary actions.

The DAIG Team that visited Iraq and Afghanistan found no incidents of abuse that had not already been reported through command channels; all incidents were already under investigation. The DAIG Team that visited units recently returning from Iraq did receive a total of 5 new allegations of potential abuse that occurred prior to January 2004. In each of these cases, CID and the chain of command were notified of the allegations. There is no evidence of any cover-up of current detainee abuse by U.S. Soldiers. This is consistent with the results of the teams' sensing sessions that all currently deployed Soldiers were aware of their responsibility to report abuse and appeared to be willing and able to report it.

In studying the actual abuse investigations, the incidents may be broken down into 2 broad categories. The first category will be referred to as isolated abuse, and the second as progressive abuse. The first are those incidents that appear to be a one-time occurrence. In other words, these are incidents where individual Soldiers took inappropriate actions upon the capture of detainees or while holding or interrogating them. The second category of detainee abuse, referred to as progressive abuse because these usually develop from an isolated incident into a more progressive abuse.

There is substantial research on the behavior of guards in prisons and Enemy Prisoner of War (EPW)/Prisoner of War (POW) camps, in addition to the Department of Defense (DoD) experience of running simulated prisoner of war resistance training. Research indicates that regardless of how good the training and oversight, some inappropriate behavior will occur. (For example, one of the seminal studies of prisoner/guard behavior is Haney, C., Banks, C., & Zimbardo, P., A Study of Prisoners and Guards in a Simulated Prison, the Office of Naval Research, 1973. For a more recent review, along with significant commentary, see Philip Zimbardo, A Situationist Perspective on the Psychology of Evil: Understand How Good People are Transformed into Perpetrators, a chapter in Arthur Miller (Ed.) The social psychology of good and evil: Understanding our capacity for kindness and cruelty. New York: Guilford, 2004. Also worth reviewing are Stanley Milgram's studies, starting with Obedience to authority, New York: Harper & Row, 1974.) Because of this, the DoD simulated prisoner of war resistance training that prepares service members to resist exploitation, requires intensive oversight to prevent the abuse of Soldiers by other Soldiers.

Contributing factors to the first category of abuse include poor training (common in the cases the DAIG Team reviewed), poor individual discipline, novel situations (to include the stressors involved in combat operations), and a lack of control processes (specific oversight mechanisms). Commander's addressed the first category of abuse through counseling, administrative action, and UCMJ (up to and including courts-martial).

Below are 4 examples of this first category of detainee abuse from the 125 reported allegations referenced in the first paragraph of the inspection results above.

– One incident occurred at an internment/resettlement (I/R) facility where a Master Sergeant and her 3 subordinates attempted to beat several detainees as they arrived at the camp. Other Soldiers, not in her chain of command, prevented much of the potential abuse and then reported the Master Sergeant to the chain of command who took corrective action. All 4 Soldiers were administratively separated from the Army; 3 of these Soldiers also received nonjudicial punishment.

– In another incident a Specialist was threatening detainees by stating he would shoot them. A guard observed him making these threats and immediately turned the Specialist in to his chain of command. The commander took quick action, administering an Article 15, to prevent a recurrence.

– Another example occurred in an internment facility where a Specialist and a Staff Sergeant began to punish a detainee by using excessive force. Another Soldier from a different company joined them. The Platoon Sergeant discovered the incident and immediately relieved both of the Soldiers in his platoon and pressed charges against all 3. All 3 received field-grade Article 15 punishments.

– Another illustrative incident occurred when an interrogator struck a detainee on the head during questioning. The International Committee of the Red Cross, via the mayor of the detainee's compound, discovered this after the fact. Once he was made aware of the incident, the Soldier's commander investigated and ultimately issued a field-grade Article 15. The commander then required 2 Soldiers to be present during every interrogation.

In these examples, abuse was discovered immediately by the command, and corrective actions were taken to prevent a recurrence. One comment made by a Noncommissioned officer (NCO) from a unit that did not have any abuse cases was that multiple levels of NCO oversight ensured compliance with the Rules of Engagement (ROE), and the team leaders and Platoon Sergeant maintained strict standards for all Military Police (MP). One interrogator NCO stated that in his unit there would be a number of people in the room during interrogations to ensure that Soldiers did not violate the Interrogation ROE.

The psychological research on abuse (see above) suggests that in similar situations, such as prisons, when some relatively minor abusive behavior occurs and corrective action is not taken, there is an escalation of violence. If there is uncorrected abuse and more people become involved, there is a diffusion of responsibility making it easier for individuals to commit abuse. The research further suggests that a moral disengagement occurs which allows individuals to rationalize and justify their behavior. (See Bandura, A., Moral Disengagement in the Perpetration of Inhumanities, Personality and Social Psychology Review, 1999.)

In at least 11 of the 125 incidents reviewed by the DAIG Team, immediate corrective action was not taken by the chain of command. The reasons for this leadership failure included either a lack of fundamental unit discipline, ambiguous command and control over the facility or individuals involved, ambiguous guidance from command on the treatment of detainees, no control processes in place to provide oversight and notify the command of the incident, or, in very few cases, leader complicity at the Lieutenant Colonel level and below in the actions. This led to the second category of detainee abuse, referred to as progressive abuse because these usually develop from an isolated incident into a more progressive abuse.

Here are 5 examples of this second category from the 125 reported allegations referenced in the first paragraph of the inspection results above, where actions were not taken until more generalized abuse had occurred.

– The incidents involving Tier 1A at Abu Ghraib began no later than October and continued until December 2003. The degradation of the detainees by the guard force appears to have started out with smaller, less-intensive types of abuse and humiliation, and increased to physical assault and injury. There were no formal control processes, such as a routine inspection of Tier 1A during the night hours or electronic monitoring, in place to easily identify abuse and bring it to the attention of the command. Eventually, a Soldier who knew it was wrong was made aware of the abuse and reported it to CID. Charges were preferred on 20 March 2004 against 6 reserve MP Soldiers for detainee abuse, and further investigation continues.

– In a different incident that resulted in a death, 2 Warrant Officers appeared to exhibit a pattern of abusive interrogations. A detainee, who was overweight and in poor physical health, died during an interrogation. The CID investigation contained sworn statements indicating that physical beatings at this site were common during this time and alleged that the two Warrant Officers routinely slapped and beat the detainees they were questioning. There were no control processes in place to review the interrogation techniques used in this facility. There was apparently no oversight on the behavior of the interrogators, and, although many of the guard personnel were aware of the techniques being used, the abusive behavior was not reported. There was a perception among the guard personnel that this type of behavior by the interrogators was condoned by their chain of command. Both Warrant Officers received a General Officer Memorandum of Reprimand and further disposition of the case is under review.

– In another incident a platoon detained 2 individuals, later released them on a bridge, and made them jump into a river below. One of the detainees drowned. Sworn statements indicated the platoon "as a whole" had previously discussed having detainees jump off the bridge, and the planned action apparently had the support of the Platoon Sergeant. There is no evidence to support any previous incidents by this platoon, but these discussions are indicators that junior leader deficiencies at the platoon level contributed to the death of a detainee. CID continues to investigate this incident.

– There was an incident involving a Sergeant First Class (SFC) telling his subordinates to, "rough them up," referring to 2 detainees in custody. This occurred in the middle of the night without any oversight and at a division collecting point operated by an infantry unit. There are indications that this SFC had given similar guidance earlier. Several of the SFC's subordinates actually performed most of the subsequent beating. There is no evidence that the SFC had abused detainees previously. This incident was adjudicated by both Special and Summary Courts-Martial, with the SFC receiving a reduction to Staff Sergeant (SSG) and a punitive censure. One SSG was reduced to a Specialist and received 30 days confinement; another SSG pled guilty to one specification of violation of a lawful general order and was reduced to the grade of Sergeant. Finally, a Specialist was found guilty at a summary court-martial and his punishment included forfeiture of $1092 and hard labor without confinement for 45 days.

– One final example is an incident where a Soldier had been talking extensively with others in his unit about wanting to kill an Iraqi. This Soldier later shot and killed an Iraqi detainee who was flexi-cuffed and may have tripped while walking away from the Soldier. This incident is currently under investigation.

Although elimination of all abuse is the goal of the DoD Law of War Training several factors prevent the complete elimination of detainee abuse. These include:

a. The psychological process that increases the likelihood of abusive behavior when one person has complete control over another is a major factor. This is the same process that occurs in prisons, in EPW/POW camps, and in DoD resistance training. Even in well-trained and screened populations, it is a constant threat. This threat can be minimized through individual and unit training on proper procedures and standards of behavior and by leader supervision of actual operations.

b. Poor training in the handling of detainees increases the risk of abuse. Although most personnel interviewed had some training in the Law of Land Warfare, many did not have training specific to detainee handling. It was often the case that individuals conducting interrogations were not school-trained as interrogators.

c. Ambiguous instructions concerning the handling of detainees also greatly increase the risk of abuse. Some Soldiers believed their command encouraged behavior at the harsher end of the acceptable range of behavior in the treatment of detainees. This can very quickly lead to abusive behavior, even if it is not the intent of the command. The Taguba Investigation makes clear that the 800th MP (I/R) Brigade leadership did not properly communicate to its Soldiers the requirements for the treatment of detainees. In order to mitigate the risk of abuse, commanders must give clear, unambiguous guidance, make sure that Soldiers understand the guidance, supervise Soldiers' operations, and then hold their Soldier's accountable for meeting standards.

d. Criminal behavior among a small percentage of Soldiers.

e. Combat operations, as a new experience for many Soldiers, combined with the above, may lead to Soldiers justifying abusive behavior as a result of their exposure to danger. This leads to a moral disengagement where Soldiers do not take responsibility for their actions.

f. Poor unit discipline, which is a function of poor leader supervision, allows abusive behavior an opportunity to occur. Again, the Taguba Investigation identified a serious lack of discipline among the units involved in detainee abuse.

The last 3 of these factors can be best prevented by making sure Soldiers understand the standards of behavior expected of them, and by leaders who maintain unit and individual discipline and exercise appropriate supervision of Soldiers.

Almost all of the abuse cases studied by the DAIG Team were isolated events. The Soldiers' chain of command, when notified of the allegation of abuse, took appropriate action and prevented further abusive behavior. The DAIG Team found that most abuse incidents were isolated events that, when discovered, were immediately corrected by commanders at battalion level and lower.

Those cases where corrective action did not occur, usually because the chain of command was not aware of the abuse, resulted in a continuation of abuse or a progression from talking about abuse to actually committing abuse. Factors that influenced this progression of abuse and responsive actions taken by units to mitigate these factors were:

a. Poor oversight and poor control mechanisms to inspect and check on Soldiers' behavior decreased the likelihood that abuse would be discovered by command. This led to a breakdown in the command and control of Soldiers interacting with detainees. One NCOIC stated that the chain of command did not visit his location very often, and that when they began to receive enemy fire, he did not see the Commander or Command Sergeant Major (CSM). In response, over time, several units developed standing operating procedures that incorporated specific control mechanisms, such as requiring a certain number of personnel to be present during interrogations, having all Soldiers sign a document outlining acceptable behavior, and tasking independent officers to monitor all detainee operations, with the ability to observe anything, anytime, within their facility.

b. A command climate that encourages behavior at the harsher end of the acceptable range of behavior towards detainees may unintentionally, increase the likelihood of abuse. One officer interviewed stated that there is often a "do what it takes" mindset. This appeared to be more prevalent in the early days of the war in Iraq. Among other responses, the CJTF-7 Rules for Detainee Operations, published 30 November 2003, states, "Treat all persons with dignity and respect." In addition, on 12 October 2003, CJTF-7 published a memorandum stating all interrogations would be, "applied in a humane and lawful manner with sufficient oversight by trained investigators or interrogators. Interrogators and supervisory personnel will ensure uniform, careful, and safe conduct of interrogations."

c. In the few cases involving the progression to more serious abuse by Soldiers, tolerance of inappropriate behavior by any level of the chain of command, even if minor, led to an increase in the frequency and intensity of abuse. In a few cases, the perception, accurate or not, that Other Governmental Agencies(OGA) conducted interrogations using harsher methods than allowed by Army Regulation, led to a belief that higher levels of command condoned such methods. As noted in paragraph b above, CJTF-7 began to publish specific guidance that emphasized the humane treatment of detainees. At the time of the DAIG Team's visit to the theater, leaders and Soldiers uniformly understood the need to treat detainees humanely.

It is evident there were Soldiers who knew the right thing to do and reported abuse when they discovered it. Soldiers who believed that abusive behavior was not acceptable reported almost all of the abuse incidents. Some of these Soldiers stopped other Soldiers from hurting detainees, demonstrating moral courage in the face of peer pressure. Others reported serious abuse when it involved their comrades and leaders. This finding on abuse focused on a very small percentage of Soldiers who may have committed abusive behavior, and not on the vast majority that, even under the stress of combat and poor living conditions, and presented with sometimes resistant and hostile detainees, have treated all within their care humanely.

(4) Root Cause: Detainee abuse was an individual failure to uphold Army Values and in some cases involved a breakdown in the leadership supervision of Soldiers' behavior.

(5) Recommendation: Commanders enforce the basic fundamental discipline standards of Soldiers, provide training, and immediately correct inappropriate behavior of Soldiers towards detainees to ensure the proper treatment of detainees.

Recommendation: Commanders assess the quality of leadership in units and replace those leaders who do not enforce discipline and hold Soldiers accountable.

Recommendation: TRADOC develop and implement a train-the-trainer package that strongly emphasizes leaders' responsibilities to have adequate supervision and control processes in place to ensure the proper treatment of detainees.
