Kenrick, William, LL.D., d. 1779, a critic of equal ability, impudence, and literary ferocity, was for a long time—first in the Monthly and subsequently in the London Review—the terror of the new scribes, and the object of disgust to the old authors, of his own day. Goldsmith, Akenside, Johnson, Colman, Boswell, Garrick, and a host of others, were in turn made to suffer for having gained that popularity or notoriety which the public denied to him. We have already had something to say of this "Literary Ishmaelite" in our lives of Goldsmith (see p. 689) and Dr. Johnson, (see p. 976.) and have little to add in this place. His productions—consisting of poems, poetical epistles, philosophical and philological speculations, comedies, letters, &c., pub. from 1751 to 1773—are now forgotten, save in connexion with the better men whom he attacked; nor would the world be much benefited by a revival of this lost knowledge. But those who desire to explore further may consult the Monthly Review and (Kenrick's own child) the London Review; Gent. Mag.; Chalmers's Biog. Diet.; Boswell's Life of Johnson, and other literary records of the day, and the Encyc. Brit. His most ambitious publication was A New Dictionary of the English Language: to which is prefixed a Rhetorical Grammar, Lon., 1773, 4to. The Rhetorical Grammar was also pub. separately in 1784, 8vo.

"After him, [Elphinstone—Principles of the English Language.] Dr. Kenrick contributed a portion of improvement, by his rhetorical Dictionary; but he has rendered his Dictionary extremely imperfect, by entirely omitting a great number of words of doubtful and difficult pronunciation,—those very words for which a Dictionary of this kind would naturally be consulted?"—Prof. to Walker's Dictionary, 1st ed., Lon., 1791, 4to.

Dr. Noah Webster thus comments on the above criticism:

"Let it be noted that the same objection lies in full force against Sheridan, Walker, and Jones?"—Prof. to Webster's Dictionary, lxi., Springfield, 1852, 4to.

"Dr. Kenrick," says Disraeli, "was a man of talents, who ran a race with the press, could criticize all the genius of the age faster than it was produced, could make his own malignity look like wit, and turn the wit of others into absurdity by placing it topsy-turvy. . . . The turn of his criticism, the airiness or the asperity of his sarcasm, the arrogance with which he treated some of our great authors, would prove very amusing, and serve to display a certain talent of criticism?"—Calamities of Authors, ed. Lon., 1840, 108.

Washington Irving—referring to Kenrick's attack upon Goldsmith's Inquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe—remarks,

"It may be well, however, in passing, to bestow our mite of notoriety upon the miscreant who launched the slander. He deserves it for a long course of dastardly and venomous attacks, not merely upon Goldsmith, but upon most of the successful authors of the day?"—Life of Goldsmith, ed. N. York, 1855, 125.

Mr. Macaulay takes care to introduce Kenrick into one of his piquant Newgate Calendars:

"There was no want of low minds and bad hearts in the generation which witnessed her [Madame D'Arbly's] first appearance. There was the envious Kenrick and the savage Wolcott, the asp George Steevens, and the polecat John Williams."—Crit. and Hist. Essays, Lon., 1854, iii. 308.

Let us see what the gruff Johnson thought of his assailant:

"Though he [Kenrick] certainly was not without considerable merit, he wrote with so little regard to decency, and principles, and decorum, and in so hasty a manner, that his reputation was neither extensive nor lasting. I remember one evening, when some of his works were mentioned, Dr. Goldsmith said he had never heard of them; upon which Dr. Johnson observed, 'Sir, he is one of the many who have made themselves public without making themselves known."—Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. Lou., 1848, 171.

Yet, after all the abuse which has been for three generations so profusely lavished upon Kenrick, he was, according to Johnson's own principles, a great benefactor to the unthankful authors whom he so ruthlessly impaled. It was, indeed, in reference to this very critic that Boswell tells us

"He [Johnson] remarked that attacks on authors did them much service. 'A man who tells me my play is very bad is less my enemy than he who lets it die in silence. A man whose business it is to be talked of is much helped by being attacked.'"—Ubi supra, 358.

We did not intend to make this article so long, but nothing is more natural than that an author who expects soon to place a huge Dictionary before the Argus-eyes of the critics, and who anticipates a large share of the belligerent philanthropy so warmly extolled by Dr. Johnson, should quote the lexicographer's encouraging dictum.

Kent, James, LL.D., July 31, 1763–Dec. 12, 1847, one of the most eminent of modern jurists, a native of Fredericks, Putnam county, New York, graduated at Yale College, 1781; commenced the practice of the law, 1785; elected a member of the New York State Assembly, 1790 and '92; Professor of Law at Columbia College in the city of New York, 1793–98; Master in Chancery, 1796; elected a member of the legislature from the city of New York, 1796; Recorder of the city, 1797; Puisne-Judge of the Supreme Court of New York, Feb. 6, 1798; Chief-Justice of the same court, July 2, 1804–Feb. 25, 1814; Chancellor of New York, Feb. 25, 1814–July 31, 1823. On becoming a judge, Mr. Kent returned to Poughkeepsie, (where he had commenced the study of the law;) but in the following year he removed to Albany, where he continued to reside until 1823. Having at this date attained his sixtieth year, though in the very prime of intellectual (and in his case physical) life, he was obliged, by the most absurd provision of the Constitution of his State, to relinquish his office, and yield to some successor who, if he had the disadvantage of less wisdom and learning, had the redeeming merit of fewer years. We all remember Mr. Pitt's (or rather Dr. Johnson's) admission of the "atrocious crime of being a young man;" Chancellor Kent was obliged to plead guilty to the imputed criminality of having attained middle-age! But finding nature stronger than legislative enactments, and his euthanasia not hastened by the edict of senators, he added to his turpitude by living twenty-four years of mental and physical vigour and professional activity, and composing four volumes of immortal Commentaries. About twenty years after the Burial-Service of the New York Statute-Book had been read over the late chancellor, he writes to Mr. Webster,

"I am indeed in my eightieth year, but, thank God, I am wonderfully well and active, and my ardour for reading, and my susceptibilities, are, I think, as alive as ever to the charms of nature, of literature and society. . . . My readings is regular and constant; all the reports of law-decisions as fast as I can procure them, all the periodicals, foreign and domestic, and old literature and new books, are steadily turned over."—New York, Dec. 12, 1842; Private Correspondence of Daniel Webster, post., 1857, ii. 161.

What obstinate vitality!

In 1823, he again took up his residence in the city of New York, and consented to reassume the duties connected with the Law Professorship of Columbia College. The Lectures delivered by him in 1824 were, as may readily be supposed, upon a more comprehensive plan than those which had introduced him to the students who attended his first instructions in the lore of the bench and the forum. Of these last, the Introductory was pub. by the trustees, and in 1795 the lecturer pub. in a small vol. (Dissertations, &c.) three others delivered as preliminary to his Course. He also edited, in conjunction with Mr. Rudeliff, The Revised Laws of the State of New York, 1802, 2 vols. 8vo, (continued by Messrs. C. & G. Webster, in four supplemental vols.,) pub., in 1824, A Summary of the first ten Lectures of the Professor of Law in Columbia College; in 1828, an Anniversary Discourse before the New York Historical Society; in 1831, an Address before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Yale College; and in 1826, one before the Law Association of New York. In 1840, he drew up a Course of Reading for the benefit of the Mercantile Library Association of New York,—a useful little manual, of which a new ed., (if we should not, indeed, say a new work,) with additions by Charles King, LL.D., President of Columbia College, and Henry A. Oakley, editor, was pub. in 1852. A portion of his decisions as Chancellor—the cases and opinions selected by himself—will be found in the seven vols. of Johnson's Chancery Reports, 1811–23, already noticed; see JOHNSON, WILLIAM, No. 3, p. 982. The character of these decisions is too well known to require any commendation in this place,—especially from a laic; but a few lines of eulogy indited by eminent jurists will not be deemed impertinent:

"In his decisions we can everywhere trace the happy use of that marvellous system of doctrines which Justinian collected with so much care, and which stands unrivalled in the world for its general equity and nice adaptation to the necessities of mankind. . . . Let those who now doubt the importance of the study of the civil law by common lawyers read diligently the opinions of Mr. Chancellor Kent, and they will find all the objections raised by indolence and ignorance, and prejudice, practically refuted, and the civil law triumphantly sustained. They will perceive the vivid light which it casts on the paths of juridical science; and they will be instructed and cheered in the pursuit, though they may not happen to possess the brilliant career of such a guide with equal prospects. . . . As to the chancery decisions of Mr. Chancellor Kent, they are the result of learning, and pains-taking research, and vivid discrimination, and those of any man that ever sat on the English woolsack.—OUR STORY; Maxwell's Writings, Bost., 1852, 150, 178; originally pub. in N. Amer. Rev., xi. 141–166, July, 1829.

Read this article, which contains a truly eloquent summary of the judicial character of Chancellor Kent. The latter expressed his acknowledgments to the writer in a letter dated August 7, 1820, which will be found in Story's Life and Letters, i. 377. In the words of another jurist, Kent's decisions are "more signally entitled to respect than those of any English Chancellor since the American Revolution, with the single exception, perhaps, of Lord Eldon."—JURIST'S GUIDE, § 5, Ken. Dec., 1847.

"I do not scruple to affirm that they form a series of unequalled excellence, and to the Equity lawyer of inestimable value. They are the most precious treasure his library contains. None who reflect on the nature and amount of instruction that these volumes supply, and on the method and style in which that instruction is conveyed, if able to make the comparison, will refuse to admit that there is no series of Reports in England, or in the United States that, in those distinctive proofs of a superior and permanent value, can be approached them."—JURIST, JOHN DUER, i. A Discourse on the Life, Character, and Public Services of James Kent, N. York, 1838, 60.

"His decisions must forever remain a monument of judicial wisdom, learning, and eloquence, without superior in those of any country or any age."—Hoffman's Leg. Stat., 1828, 108.

"His researches on every point were so full as to leave nothing to be supplied by those who might afterwards wish to have his decisions re-examined or to test the correctness of his conclusions. . . . His judicial opinions are unambiguously the most instructive to all, but especially to those who have commenced the study of the law and aspire to eminence in that profession."—WILLIAM JOHNSON, Reporter, Life of Chancellor Kent of the National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans, 1–2, vol. 6.

We may indeed claim for Chancellor Kent the honour of having erected the New York Court of Chancery. Judge Duer, after an exposition of the imperfect character of that court before 1814, continues:

"It is therefore not extravagant to say that, although, when he was appointed to the office of Chancellor, a Court of Chancery existed, yet a Court of Equity, in the true sense and the true efficacy of the term, was still to be created, and it was by the courage of his genius, his energy, and his labours, during the nine years that he acted as Chancellor, that this necessary Court, and the amplitude of its just dimensions, was created."—Discourse, ibid., 55.

"It required such a man, with such a mind, that, if he had not been comprehensive, exact, and methodical, always persevering, industrious, and bound by deep research, true to his spirit, yet more to the letter, of the law, pursuing principles with a severe and unflinching logic, yet blending with them the most persuasive equity—no other could such a man, with such a mind, to unfold the intricacies of equity in our country, and to settle them upon a new code. . . ."
—JURIST, JOHN DUER, i. A Discourse on the Life, Character, and Public Services of James Kent, N. York, 1838, xi. 142, July, 1829.

For other opinions upon Kent's Decisions, consult the authorities at conclusion of article JAMES, WILLIAM, (the Reporter), p. 982. Kent's Commentaries upon American Law (dedicated to William Johnson, the Reporter) were pub. vol. i., 1826; ii., 1827; iii., 1828; vol. iv., 1829; 2d ed., carefully revised and greatly enlarged, 1, 2, 3, 4 vols., The 6th ed. was the last revised by the author shortly before his death. The 7th ed., 1832; 4 vols. i. and the 8th ed. (1854) were edited by the author's son, William Kent, and the friend of the latter, Dorman Bridgman Eaton. We presume that a new ed. will be required within a year or two from the date at which we are writing (1857). It is said that there were sold to the year 1853, edits. 1-7 inclusive, 21,000 sets, or 84,000 vols., at a profit to the author and his heirs of $120,000.

In 1839 was pub. J. Eastman Johnson's Analytical Abridgments of Kent's Commentaries, N. York, 8vo; in 1840, 8vo, the 2d ed. (a 3d has since appeared) of The Most Important Part of Kent's Commentaries on American Law, reduced to Questions and Answers, and in 1837, Edin., 8vo, a republication of part of the Commentaries, under the title of A Treatise on Commercial and Maritime Law. We do not feel willing to conclude this article, long as it is, without the citation of some English and American enlogiums upon the invaluable Commentaries on American Law.

ENGLISH OPINIONS ON THE COMMENTARIES:

"They may be recommended to the English law-student of the present day as a substitute for Blackstone. They contain not only a clear statement of the English law, with all the alterations that have taken place since the time of Blackstone, but a full account of the main principles of Equity, (a topic on which the English commentator is confessedly deficient;) also a review of the modifications engrafted on the English law by the different states of the Union, and, on all important questions, an instructive parallel between the English, American, Modern Continental, and Civil Laws."—Johnson's Chancery Reform, 22, n.

"They are fine examples of lucid and manly reasoning, and the style in which they are written is perspicuous and forcible. From the nature of the work, Chancellor Kent was only able to devote a small portion of his treatise to the Law of Nations; but their brevity is the only thing that is objectionable in these lectures, for all that the author does give us is valuable."—Manning's Law of Nat., 44.

"We have never in any English work met with a more full and satisfactory account of the rights and liabilities of infants than is contained in the work before us. Before quitting this book we wish to say a few words as to its style, and of this we can scarcely speak in terms of sufficiently warm commendation. It is easy, clear, vigorous, and unaffected."—PROF. WINZESBEE: Lect. before the Dublin Law Institute.

"We have learned the respect that is due to Professor Kent, the late Chancellor of the State of New York, author of the Commentaries on American Law, a name probably not inferior, as a legal writer, to any of the present day."—Robertson on Personal Succession, 76, n.

See Marvin's Leg. Bibl., 438.

"We shall conclude with the following judicious and accurate estimate of the Civil Law contained in the Commentaries of Chancellor Kent, to whom we have been so frequently indebted during the course of this work."—Warren's Introduct. to Law Studies, 2d ed., Lon., 1845, 804.

Mr. Warren adds in a note, after referring to the "masterly and elaborate account of the Civil Law" in the forty-fourth chapter of Gibbon's Decline and Fall,

"Chancellor Kent gives also a very able sketch of the Civil Law in the twenty-third Lecture, which concludes the first volume of his Commentaries, and from which has been taken the foregoing extract."

"It will be a proud distinction to Kent and Story that they have done more than any other men to put an end to the indifference of English lawyers to the learning of their American brethren. Story, mentioning the praises given to Kent's Commentaries in some English legal publications, adds, 'This is as it should be; for England is deeply interested in cultivating a thorough knowledge of American Jurisprudence; and it would betray a lamentable want of professional ambition not to master a work which has become our first juridical classic,'—the American Blackstone, or something more."—Edin. Rev., xvi, 340; Review of Life and Letters of Mr. Justice Story.

"Lord Campbell, speaking of American as compared with English jurists, says, 'I really hardly know any name which we can so much boast of as the Americans may of that of Professor Story and Chancellor Kent, and others of very great distinction.'—H. H. Joy's Letters on Legal Education.

"I have studied Chancellor Kent's Commentaries," remarked the present Emperor of France, "think highly of them, and regard him as the first of our jurists. I would be glad to know him personally."

AMERICAN OPINIONS ON THE COMMENTARIES.

No one hailed the appearance of this work with more delight than the eminent jurist from whom we have already more than once had occasion to quote:

"The work is but a new proof of your accurate learning, extensive research, and unwaried diligence. It does honour to your talents and public spirit, and I am persuaded that it will give a permanent increase to your reputation. It will become an American text-book, and range on the same shelf with the classical work of Blackstone in all our libraries. If one were tempted to envy you any thing, it would be this proud distinction."—Letter to James Kent, Salem, Dec. 15, 1827; Story's Life and Letters, 1851, i. 526.

Nine years later (Oct. 15, 1836) Judge Story remarks, in a letter to the author,

"since I last wrote you, I have found time to examine various parts of your Commentaries in the last edition with more care than I had previously done. You have everywhere improved the text by your additions, and infused into it the new and fresh resources of your daily-augmenting learning. I rejoice to find also that in America the various merits of this admirable work are now universally and familiarly established. Abroad also it is acquiring a solid and imposing character; and I find from incidental notices of it here and there in legal publications in England, that it receives a just and liberal praise. This is as it should be; for England is deeply interested in cultivating a thorough knowledge of American jurisprudence, and it would betray a lamentable want of professional ambition not to master a work which has become our first juridical classic."—Ubi supra, xi. 219.

"These Commentaries have already acquired the reputation of a juridical classic, and have placed their author in the first rank in the benefactors of the profession. They embody the principles of Law in pages as attractive by the persuasive eloquence of their style as they are instructive by the fulness and accuracy of their learning."—Story: On the Conflict of Laws; Dedication.

See also Story's Eq. Jur., 6th ed., 1853, i. 65, n.

"It is the character of the Commentaries as a national work, and their masterly execution as such, that have stamped upon them a peculiar value. It is to these causes that the extent of the influence which they rapidly acquired and now exert on the jurisprudence, not of a single State, but of all, must be ascribed. . . . It is now in the hands of every student and of every practitioner of the law, and it ought to be in the hands of every legislator and statesman, and indeed of every man of cultivated mind and liberal studies."—JUDGE DUER: Discourse, &c., 76, 79.

In the last sentiment expressed by Judge Duer—the advantage of legal learning to laies—we have more than once in this volume added our lay testimony, and especially in our life of Edward Everett, p. 571. In this connexion we beg to recommend to our lay brethren some excellent remarks upon this subject, originally pub. in the North American Review, and appended by Mr. Johnson (Reporter) to his life of Chancellor Kent, in the National Portrait-Gallery, 1852, vol. ii. Who will not coincide with Mr. Johnson's remarks on the Commentaries?

"In the full maturity of his understanding, with a mind long habituated to legal investigations and researches, and with sound and enlightened views of jurisprudence, no man, perhaps, could have been found better fitted than Chancellor Kent to execute such a work, and it may diminish in some degree the regret felt for the loss sustained by the public and the legal profession in being deprived of his valuable services on the bench, to know how usefully to the world and honourably to himself he employed his time and talents in its performance."—Ubi supra.

In the page from which we have just quoted, Mr. Johnson draws a brief comparison between the Commentaries of Blackstone and those of Kent, and a fuller one will be found in Judge Duer's Discourse, &c., 76-79. And see quotation below. Doubtless all enlightened jurists—unless, indeed, we are to except Mr. Austin and some of his pupils as regards the reference to Blackstone—will endorse the dictum of Judge Sharswood:

"Blackstone and Kent should be read, and read, again and again. . . . These elementary works, with some others of an immediately practical cast.—Tidd's Practice, Stephen's Pleading, Greenleaf's Evidence, Leich's Nisi Prius, Mitford's Equity Pleading,—well combined, make up the best part of office-reading."—Profess. Ethics, Append., 119, 1855.

Mr. Hoffman, in his notice of one of the early edits. of the Commentaries, after praising "the deep research, the classical embellishments, the apt illustrations, and the clear and manly style, which characterize every portion of this able work," proceeds to point out some defects, ("if they be defects,") which, however, he remarks, "are trivial and easily remedied."—Leg. Stu., 166-168; vide also Note 2 on Title IV.

"England has only furnished one Blackstone, and the American rival equals him in classic purity and elegance of style, and surpasses him in extent and copiousness of learning. What do Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries contain of Equity Jurisprudence, of the Law of Nations, and the several titles of Commercial Law, which are discussed with such richness and accuracy by Chancellor Kent? Scarcely nothing; and a comparison of other titles in the two works shows the American author to have surpassed his rival in comprehensiveness of research and fulness of illustration, and to have equalled him in clearness and cogency of reasoning."—Merrill's Leg. Bibl., 438.

See also Lieber's Leg. and Polit. Hermeneutics, 221; 6 Pick., 310; 1 Angel's Law Intel., 9, ii. 231; 24 N. Amer. Rev., 345, (by W. Phillips); 2 U. S. Rev. and Lit. Gaz., 81; 24 Amer. Jur., 102, xxv. 114; 3 Law Rep., 402, vi. 289; Amer. Quar. Rev., 162; 2 South. Rev., 72; 6 U. S. Lit. Gaz., 81.

We may remark, in conclusion, that the value of Kent's Commentaries as a library-book of reference for the historical student, or general reader, who seeks for a solution of difficulties occurring in the course of literary investigations, is hardly to be overrated. For instance: the eloquent historian of the Conquest of Mexico, after briefly noticing the various theories of the right of title to territory, sends the reader for further information on this knotty point to those who may be presumed to speak ex cathedra upon matters peculiarly pertaining to their profession:

"For a brief view of the discussion, see Vattel, (Droit des Gens, sec. 209.) and especially Kent, (Commentaries on American Law, vol. iii. lec. 51.) where it is handled with much perspicuity and eloquence."—Hist. of the Cong. of Mexico, 2nd ed., Bost., 1855, 33, n.

We have already, in the course of this article, indicated those sources to which the reader may profitably refer who desires to linger a few moments more (while we necessarily pass to the discharge of other biographical duties) on the character of this distinguished jurist, useful citizen, and excellent man. We may add to our list of references, Life and Letters of Judge Story, i. 144-145, 156, 232, 425, ii. 97, 312; Works of Daniel Webster, 8th ed., 1854, i. 214; Webster's Private Correspondence, i. 287, ii. 160-162; N. York Church Rev., i. 104. It is understood that Mr. William Kent is now (1857) engaged upon a biography of his late eminent father. When completed it will be a fit companion of the Life of the late Judge Story, also written by his son, and both will be treasured as heirlooms by the future sons of America, when "all of us who now live shall be mute, and most of us forgotten." That at least we may not prove entirely useless to the day and generation in which our lot is cast, let us strive to emulate the noble example of him of whom his friend could say,

"For myself, when his character, as developed in the narrative that has now been given, rises before me, in all its integrity and truth, its nobleness and purity,—and when I reflect on the magnitude of his labors and upon their vast and most beneficial results,—I feel emboldened to say,—and I feel assured of your sympathy in saying,—that, great as our country is in all the elements of a just renown, and illustrious as its annals have become by the labors and by the exploits of statesmen and of heroes, it may yet be doubted whether, hitherto, it has produced a man more worthy of its entire veneration, gratitude, and love, than him whose services to his country and to his race we are this day met to commemorate.

The critic of Blackwood eulogizes Mr. Kenyon's poems, on the whole, very highly, but remarks,
"There are many pieces of moral meditation in the volume, which, though good as musical prose, and just in conception, yet lack the Muse's stamp."—XIV, 793, Dec. 1838.

Miss Mitford was a great admirer of Mr. Kenyon's poetry:

"Now, this verse has to me a singular charm, particularly The Rhymed Plea for Tolerance, which is so clear, so scholarly, and so full of strong manly sense."—Recollec. of a Lit. Life.

After quoting the poem of The Shrine of the Virgin, she remarks,

"I wish more people would write such lucid and melodious verse;

but I have a suspicion that among the many who call themselves poets there are very few indeed who can."—Ibid supra.

3. A Day at Tivoli; with other Verses, 1849, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Kenyon is a disciple in that good old school, (Boileau, Artic. 1.) Unstarting of the lone labor, he does his best to put as much concentrated meaning as possible into the fewest possible melodious verses; and on the shelf which holds Cowper, Rogers, Crabbe, may be found a corner for his third political volume, as for his first and second. It deals, as they did, with the same mixed region of the familiar and imaginative, throws the hues of fancy over the plainest lessons of experience, and expresses the elevation of poetry in the language of real life."—Lon. Examiner.

Mr. Kenyon was a man of large fortune, and not only "devoted liberal things," but during his life aided the straitened sons of song who were afflicted by the res angusta domi. But, like Samson of old, he probably destroyed more of the Philistines (anxiety, despondency, and care) in his death than he had done in his life. Eighty legatees mourned their friend and blessed their benefactor with the same breath. Among those so kindly remembered were his cousin Elizabeth Barrett Browning, (£4000,) her husband, Robert Browning, (£6500,) Barry Cornwall, (£6500,) and Dr. Henry Southey, (£8000.)

"By the inner world of English poets and London society Mr. Kenyon will be missed and remembered as a man of graceful and genial mind, who had been the intimate and helpful friend of Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey, who delighted in the exercise of hospitality, and whose munificence was as wide as it was delicately administered!"—Lon. Athenaeum, Dec. 6, 1856, 1420.

A biographical sketch of John Kenyon will be found in the Lon. Gent. Mag., March, 1857, 309-315.

"Lord Kenyon was an honest, intelligent, and learned magistrate; but from habit and education, and perhaps original cast of mind, he does not seem to have entered into the true spirit of commercial jurisprudence. He took no comprehensive principles in his range, and contented himself by administering the maritime law as he found it, without any ambition to extend its boundaries."—*JUDGE JOSEPH STORY: Growth of the Commercial Law; Miscell. Kettlewell, John, 1653-1695, a native of Northallerton, Yorkshire, educated at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, Fellow of Lincoln College, 1675; became Vicar of Colesbill, Warwickshire, and was deprived in 1690, in consequence of refusing to take the oaths to William and Mary. As an author he was best known by his Measures of Christian Obedience, Lon., 1681, 4to, but he also pub. a number of other political tracts and some serms, and devotional treatises, 1683-94. A collective ed. of his Works, with Life by Dr. Hickee, was pub. in 1719, 2 vols. fol. His Treatise on the Duty of Moral Rectitude was republ. in Tracts of Angl. Fathers, iv. 219. Memoirs of his Life, compiled from the Collections of Dr. George Hickee and Robert Nelson, Esq., &c., [by Dr. Francis Lee,] appeared in 1718, 8vo.

"He was learned without pride, wise and judicious without cunning," &c.—ROBERT NELSON.

"There were also some Protestant non-jurors, such as Kettlewell and Hickee, who resolutely followed the theory of Filmer to all the extreme consequences to which it led."—T. B. MACAULAY: Hist. of Eng., vol. iv., 1856.

Key. See CAIUS.

Key, Francis Scott, 1779-1843, a native of Frederick county, Maryland, educated at St. John's College, Annapolis; in 1801, commenced the practice of the law at Fredericktown, subsequently removed to Washington, D.C., and became District Attorney of the city. He continued to reside at Washington for the rest of his life. He was the author of a number of poems, which have only been collected within the last few weeks, Baltimore, 1857, edited by H. V. D. Johns, of Baltimore. Of these the best-known is The Star-Spangled Banner, inspired by the author's position as a prisoner with the British in 1814, during the bombardment of Fort M'Henry, which guards the entrance to Baltimore. An interesting account, by Chief-Justice Taney, Mr. Key's brother-in-law, of the circumstances connected with the composition of this stirring song, will be found in the preface to the vol. of Key's poems just noticed. School in connexion with the Univ. of London, 1833-42; sole Head Master of the Junior School, and Prof. of Comparative Grammar in the Univ. of London, 1842-57, (the present date.) Mr. Key is the author of many learned philological and other papers, pub. in the Journal of Education, (of the U. K. S.), the Penny Cyclopaedia, &c., and a Latin Grammar, Lon., 1843-46, 8vo. His essays on Terentian Metres, (contrib. to Quar. Jour. of Ed., vol. ii.), with some other matters, were republ. in a p. 8vo vol. in 1841. He has been occupied for about ten years on a Latin-English Dictionary, which we presume will be given to the world in due season. See Knights Eng. Cyc., 1856, vol. iii. 708-709.

Kidder, Daniel P., D.D., b. in the State of New York, 1815, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, late editor of publications issued by that body, and for between two and three years a resident of Brazil. 1. Mormonism and the Mormons; a Historical View of the Rise and Progress of the self-styled Latter-Day Saints, N. York, 1841, 18mo. 2. Sketches of Residence and Travels in Brazil, embracing Historical and Geographical Notices of the Empire and its several Provinces; illustrated, New York, 1845, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., Lon., 1849, 2 vols. p. 8vo. See North American Rev., lxxviii. 314; Princeton Rev., xvii. 357; Method. Quar. Rev., v. 427, (by R. West.)

"Mr. Kidder is in every respect admirably qualified to supply this marked and important defect in historical and statistical literature. He is an accomplished scholar, and has given much attention to the preparation of this work."

This work is highly esteemed in England, and is embodied in one of the Blue-Books of Parliament. It is now out of print, but we are pleased to see the announcement (Phila., 1857, 8vo) of Brazil and the Brazilians, by the Rev. D. P. Kidder, and the Rev. J. C. Fletcher, of the Presbyterian Church, late American Chaplain at Rio de Janeiro, and for a time Acting Secretary of the American Legation in that city. The publishers promise a splendid volume, illustrated by more than 130 engravings on steel, wood, and stone, and uniform with Dr. Kane's Arctic Explorations. This will contain the substance of the first-named publication, with many important additions. The value of a well-executed work of this character—the importance of making Brazil and the Brazilians better known to Europeans and North Americans—need hardly be enlarged upon in this place. In the last year (1856) Brazil exported sixty millions of dollars' worth of her productions, and imported to the amount of fifty-three millions of dollars. Europe brings Brazil in debt annually, but the United States are debtors to the latter every year about some twelve to fifteen millions of dollars. To the naturalist the flora and fauna of Brazil offer special attractions.

We notice another valuable work on Brazil, in addition to several already recorded in our Dictionary: Travels in Brazil, in the years 1817, 1818, 1819, and 1820. Undertaken by the command of His Majesty the King of Bavaria, and published under his special patronage. By Dr. John Von Spix and Dr. Charles Von Martius, members of the Royal Bavarian Academy of Sciences. Translated from the German. Vols. i. and ii., 8vo, with plates.

"The gentlemen fixed on for the mission appear, from the work before us, to be admirably qualified for the purpose, and to have pursued the object of their journey with a zeal and diligence rarely equalled. . . . We shall reserve till the appearance of the remaining [two] volumes an account of the interesting observations which they have made on the Botany, on the Animal Productions, on the Geology and Mineralogy, and on the various Agricultural and Mining Establishments."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

The whole of the country, from the twenty-fourth degree of south latitude, to Pará under the equator, and thence to the frontiers of Peru, is described.

Dr. Kidder's condutor in the preparation of Brazil and the Brazilians—the Rev. J. C. Fletcher—studied theology at Princeton, New Jersey, and at Geneva, Switzerland. He was for a number of years, as above noticed, chaplain at Rio de Janeiro. He has contributed a number of papers to the periodicals of the day, and whilst in Europe communicated the results of his observations in letters which appeared in the public journals: some of these epistles attracted considerable attention, and were republished in Calcutta.

We continue the enumeration of Dr. Kidder's literary labours:

Translated from the Portuguese, Demonstration of the Necessity of abolishing a constrained Clerical Celibacy, exhibiting the evils of that Institution, and the remedy, by Feijo, ex-Regent of the Empire of Brazil, &c. &c., 1844, 18mo.

Edited, 1844 to '56, The Sunday School Advocate, an official periodical of the Methodist Episcopal Church, circulating more than 100,000 copies. Edited also, during the same period, more than eight hundred volumes of Sunday-school books, besides numerous tracts, &c.

"In this there is exhibited much power of language and a discussion of many themes involved in the very comprehensive title of the volume."—H. T. TUCKERMAN.

Kidder, Richard, D.D., d. 1703, admitted Sizar in Emanuel Coll., Camb., 1649; Fellow, 1655; became Vicar of Stanground, Huntingdonshire, from which he was ejected for non-conformity in 1652; subsequently conformed, and became Rector of Raine, Essex, 1664; Rector of St. Martin's Outwich, London, 1674; Preb. of Norwich, 1681; Dean of Peterborough, 1689; Bishop of Bath and Wells, 1689. He was a profound Orientalist, and an excellent man. He pub. a number of serms. and theolog. treatises, and the following works, by which he is best known:

1. Demonstration of the Messias, Lon., 1684-99-1700, 3 vols. 8vo; 1815, 3 vols, 8vo; 1726, fol.

"The whole work discovers more than ordinary acquaintance with the Scriptures and with every thing relating to the Jewish controversy, and abounds with judicious criticism on important and difficult passages."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Killigrew, Anne, d. 1685, in her twenty-fifth year,—"a Grace for beauty, and a Muse for wit," to borrow Wood's gallant line,—was the daughter of Dr. Henry Killigrew, (post), and maid of honour to the Duchess of York. She was an accomplished scholar, an excellent painter, and the author of a number of poetical compositions which were pub. in the year after her death, Lon., 1686, 4to. She is best known, however, as the subject of a celebrated ode of Dryden's, already noticed in our Life of that poet. See also Wood's Athen. Oxon.; Recreations of Christopher North, originally pub. in Blackw. Mag., xxxi. 486. The following lines—something in the style à la Wren—prove that this lady did not despair of immortality through the medium of her own poetry:

"EPIGRAM WRITTEN BY HERSELF.

"When I am dead, few friends attend my hearse,
And for a monument I leave my verse."

Killigrew, Catherine, 1530?–1600? the fourth daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, the wife of Sir Henry Killigrew, and the aunt of the great Lord Bacon, was an excellent scholar, and a poetess of no mean pretensions. Sir John Harrington gives us some specimens of her poetry in his notes to his trans. of Ariosto, and Fuller copies some of her Latin verses in his Worthies of England, (ed. 1840, i. 509.) Fuller remarks of the daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke,

"Indeed, they were all most eminent scholars, (the honour of their own and the shame of our sex,) both in prose and poetry."—Ubi supra.

Killigrew, Henry, D.D., b. 1612, entered of Christ Church, Oxford, 1628; in 1642, was made Chaplain to James, Duke of York, and Preb. of Westminster. 1. The Conspiracy; a Tragedy, Lon., 1638, 4to. This piece, written when the author was only seventeen, was pub. without his consent. He pub. an ed. of it in 1653, fol., under the title of Pallantus and Eudora. See Langbaine's Dramat. Poets; Biog. Dramat. 2. Serm., 1666, 4to. 3. Serm., 1689, 4to. 4. XXII Serms., 1685, 4to; 1693, 4to. Edited by Bp. Patrick.

"In short, they both instruct and delight; satisfy the appetite and excite it; present solid nourishment, and give it a grateful taste. There is quickness and life everywhere, both in the sense and in the style."—BISHOP PATRICK.

Killigrew, Margaret. See CAVENDISH, MARGARET.

Killigrew, Thomas, 1611–1682, brother of William Killigrew, (post), and Henry Killigrew, (ante.) was a page of honour to Charles I., a companion of Charles II. in his exile, and after the Restoration groom of the bedchamber to the latter. In 1651, he was English ambassador to Vienna. He wrote nine plays during his travels, and two at London, all of which were pub. in 1664, Lon., fol. Two of his Tragi-Comedies—The Prisoners and Claricilla—were pub. in 1641, 12mo, and he pub. a Letter rel. to some Nuns at Tours, in 1635, fol. See Biog. Dramat. Killigrew talked better than he wrote, and Cowley wrote better than he talked, which induced a contemporary to remark,

"Had Cowley ne'er spoke, Killigrew ne'er writ, Combin'd in one, they'd made a matchless wit."

King, Sir Edmund, M.D., 1629–1709, pub. some papers on medical subjects and topics of natural history in Phil. Trans., 1666–86.

King, Edward, Fellow of Christ's Coll., Camb., 1622–23, drowned, Aug. 10, 1637, in his passage from Chester to Ireland,—which circumstance elicited the Lycidas of Milton,—was the author of a number of Odes and Epigrams of great poetical merit. The following vol. contains three Greek, nineteen Latin, and thirteen English poems, by various writers on the occasion of King's death: (Milton's Lycidas is one of them;) Justa Edovardo naufrago ab Amicis mœrentibus Amoris et μενεις χαρον, Cantab. apud Tho. Buck et Roger Daniel, 1638, 4to. See Nichols's Poems; Todd's Life of Milton; Symmons's Life of Milton; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

King, Edward. De Religionis Christianæ Fundamentibus, 1728, 8vo.

King, Edward, 1735–1807, a native of Norfolk, pub. several works on subjects connected with theology, politics, political economy, and antiquities, 1767–1805, and contributed papers to Archæol., 1774–82, and to Phil. Trans., 1767–79. His best-known works are—1. Essay on the English Constitutional Govt., Lon., 1767, 8vo. 2. Observ. on Ancient Castles, 1777, 4to: 1782, 4to. 3. Morsels of Criticism; tending to illustrate some few Passages in the Holy Scriptures upon Philosophical Principles and an enlarged View of things, 1788, 4to; 2d ed., 1800, 3 vols. 8vo. Supp., or vol. ii., 1800, 4to. Contents of the whole work: On the word Heaven in the Lord's Prayer; Septuagint translation of Genesis; John Baptist being Elias; Future Coming of Christ; Day of Judgment; Series of events in the Revelations; Daniel's Prophecies; Deaths of Ananias and Sapphira; Dissertations concerning Light, the Heavens, Stars, Fluid of Heat; Miracles; Jacob and Esau; Soul, Body, Spirit, &c.

"The author of it appears to me (I speak from his book) to be a gentleman of extensive erudition and ingenuity, and of accurate biblical knowledge, perhaps a little too fond of theory, and perhaps a little whimsical in his application of natural philosophy, but never without a serious attention and a profound piety."—Pursuits of Lit.

Read this long note, which elicited the 2d ed. of The Morsels of Criticism.

"Mr. King's particular aim is to provide answers to the more subtle opponents of Christianity, and to trace the completion of the sacred oracles. . . . We cannot take our leave of this valuable work without expressing our admiration of the singular union of ingenuity and piety which appears in every page."—Brit. Critic. O. S. xvii. Pref. p. iv., and p. 667.

"His criticisms are, in general, little more than philosophical dreams or romances."—Orne's Bibl. Bib.

Installation of George of Denmark, &c., 1684, fol. 3. Do. of Henry, Duke of Norfolk, &c., 1686, fol. 4. Natural and Political Observations and Conclusions upon the State and Condition of England. Written in 1696. Some extracts from this work were pub. by Davenant, but the whole was not given to the world until 1802, when Chalmers added it, with a notice of the author, to the ed. of his Comparative Estimate pub. in that year. Another ed. of King's tract, with his Life, was printed separately in 1810, 8vo. To this we refer the reader for an account of this ingenious man. See also Noble's College of Arms; Lon. Gent. Mag., vol. lxxxi. He assisted in the preparation of the New Britannia, and of several other works. We give some notices of his Observations just referred to:

King, Henry, D.D., 1591–1669, eldest son of Bishop John King, (post.) a native of Wornall, Buckinghamshire, educated at Christ Church, Oxford, became Archdeacon of Colchester, Residentiary of St. Paul's, Canon of Christ Church, and Chaplain to James I.; Dean of Rochester, 1638; Bishop of Chichester, 1641. He pub. a number of Serms., 1621–65; an Expos. of the Lord's Prayer, 1628, '34, 4to; the Psalms in Meter, 1651, '71, 12mo; and some Latin, Greek, and English Poems. His Poems, Elegies, Paradoxes, and Sonnets were pub. in 1657, sm. 4to; with a new title-page, 1664, 8vo; again—with the name of Ben Jonson as the author—1700, 8vo. A new ed. of his Psalms and Poems—edited, with Biographical Notices, Notes, &c., by Dr. John Hannah—was pub. by Pickering in 1843, 12mo. See Athen. Oxon.; Genl. Diet.; Nichols's Poems; Cibber's Lives; Topographer, vol. i. p. 408; Headley's Beauties; Cens. Lit., vols. v. and vi.; Ellis's Specimens, vol. iii.; Usher's Life and Letters, p. 567.

"The greater part of his poetry (which was either written at an early age, or as a relaxation from severer studies) is neat, and uncommonly elegant."—HENRY HEADLEY: ubi supra.

"Dr. King was one of that band of friends in which Wotton, Herbert, Walton, Hall, and Duppa were also numbered, to whom Donne presented the blood-stone seal on which he had caused to be engraved the figure of our Saviour extended on an anchor instead of a cross."

"Howell, in his Letters, says, 'But that which afforded me most entertainment in those miscellanies, was Doctor Henry King's Poems, wherein I find not only heat and strength, but also an exact concinnity and evenness of fancy.'"

King, Peter, first Lord King, 1669–1733, a native of Exeter, a nephew of John Locke, who was his mother's brother, became M.P. in 1699; Recorder of London, and knighted, 1709; Lord Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas, 1714; created a peer by the title of Lord King, Baron of Ockham, and made Lord Chancellor, 1725. 1. An Inquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, and Worship of the Primitive Church that flourished within the first three Centuries after Christ, Pt. I, 1691, 8vo. Pt. 2 was pub. soon afterwards. This work was republ. in 1712, '13, and '19. The last eds. were pub. in 1839, 8vo, and 1843. The Inquiry elicited a controversy with Edward Elys, which was pub. by the latter in 1694, 8vo. Other answers were pub., the best-known of which was An Original Draught of the Original Church, in answer to an Inquiry, &c., 1717, 8vo; several eds., last one 1840, fp. 8vo. This was known to be the production of a non-juring clergyman named Wm. Schuter. The British Critic says that this answer convinced Lord King that he was in error; but the Eclectic Review discredits this statement. See Eccl. Rev., June, 1832, 462–464. King, William, D.D., 1650–1729, a native of Antrim, Ireland, was educated at Trin. Coll., Dublin, presented to a prebend 1676, and afterwards to a precentorship of Tuam; promoted to the chancellorship of the Cathedral of St. Patrick's, and to the parish of St. Werburgh, Dublin, 1679; Dean of St. Patrick's, 1688; Bishop of Derry, 1691; Archbishop of Tuam, 1702. His lordship pub. a number of sermons, some theolog. treatises, principally controversial, against Papists and Presbyterians, and the following works, by which he is best known. 1. The State of the Protestants in Ireland under the late King James's Government, Lon., 1691, 4to; 3d ed., 1692, 8vo; Dubl., 1730, 8vo.

"The state of the Protestants in Ireland under the government of King James the Second is accurately and methodically represented by Dr. William King, the present Archbishop of Dublin, who has fully discovered their unparalleled sufferings in every thing that was dear and valuable to them."—BISHOP NICOLSON: Irish Hist. Lib., ed. 1776, 25.

"This copious history is so well received, and so universally acknowledged to be as truly as it is finely written, that I refer my reader to the account of those matters which is fully and faithfully given by that learned and zealous prelate."—BISHOP BURNET: Own Times.

But hear the other side:

"There is not one single fact I inquired into but I found it false in whole or in part, aggravated or misrepresented, so as to alter the whole face of the story and give it perfectly another air and turn; inasmuch that, though many things he says were true, yet he has hardly spoke a true word, that is, told truly and nakedly, without a warp."—CHARLES LESLIE: Answer to the State of the Protestants in Ireland, &c., 1692.

"A work of which the great object was to combat the Optimism of Leibnitz and the Manichæism imputed to Bayle."—DUGALD STUART: Ist Prelim. Dissert. to Essay, Brit. q. v.

"Pope has evidently borrowed his doctrine of 'whatever is, is best,' from this work."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 71, q. v.

In reference to this opinion, see Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. Lon., 1848, r. 8vo, 635, n.

Leibnitz, notwithstanding his published objections to this book, admitted that it was "full of elegance and learning." Bayle also took up the cudgels in defence of his own principles. See also Biog. Brit.; Swift's Works; Jones's Life of Bp. Horne; Bowles's ed. of Pope's Works; Bardy's Life of Shelton; Sheil's Sketches of the Irish Bar.

King, William, LL.D., 1663–1712, a native of London, educated at Westminster School, and at Christ Church, Oxford, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland about 1702, pub. a number of theolog. treatises, translations, poetical, classical, political, and other works, of which a collective ed. was pub. by John Nichols, with Notes and Memoirs, Lon., 1776, 3 vols. sm. 8vo. Among the best-known of his publications are The Art of Love and The Art of Cookery. See Memoirs as above; Biog. Brit.; Coote's Cat. of Civilians; Johnson's Lives of the Poets; Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors. King was a great humorist:

"After this narration, it will be naturally supposed that his poems were rather the amusements of idleness than efforts of study,—that he endeavoured rather to divert than to astonish,—that his thought seldom aspired to sublimity,—and that, if his verse was easy and his images familiar, he attained what he desired. His purpose is to be merry; but perhaps, to enjoy his mirth, it may be sometimes necessary to think well of his opinions."—DR. JOHNSON: ubi supra.

"Dr. King may be considered as the inventor of a new species of satire. He moves the risible muscles of his readers; he was a wit who lived on the highway of Literature, appropriating for his own purpose the property of the greatest passengers by a dexterous mode no other had hit on. What an important lesson the labours of King offer to real genius! Dr. King's dispersed works have fortunately been collected by Mr. Nichols, with ample illustrations, in 3 vols. 8vo, 1776."—Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors.

King, William, LL.D., 1685–1763, a native of Stepney, Middlesex, educated at Balliol College, Oxford, Principal of St. Mary Hall, 1718–22, pub. a number of Latin pieces, &c., but is best known as the author of a production never pub., entitled The Toast, an Epic Poem, 1736, 4to; 1747, 4to; Dublin, printed; London, reprinted. This is a satire upon the Countess of Newburg, elicited by a lawsuit relative to an estate in Galway. For a key to the characters, see Wm. Davis's Second Journey round the Library of a Bibliomane, 1825, sm. 8vo. King also printed (not pub.) Opera Latina, (including The Toast), 2 vols. in 1, 4to; Oxon., 1736, &c. On the death of the author the whole impression save sixty copies was destroyed by his executors. Reed's copy, (2204 of his cat.,) with MS. Key to The Toast, was sold for £10 10s. His Apology, in which he defends himself against his Whig opponents, was pub. about 1754, 4to. He also gave to the world the first five vols. of Dr. South's Sermons. In 1818, cr. 8vo, (2d ed., 1819, 8vo,) there was pub., from his original MS., Political and Literary Anecdotes of his Own Times, by Dr. Wm. King. Reviews of this work will be found in *Edin. Kinghorn, Joseph, a Baptist minister, is best remembered as the opponent of Robert Hall; the latter advocated "Mixed Communion," whilst Kinghorn espoused "Exclusion." Kinglake, John Alexander, a London barrister, b. 1802, at Taunton, Devonshire, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, called to the bar in 1837, has contributed to the London Quarterly Review and other periodicals, and pub. a very popular book, entitled Eothen; or, Traces of Travel brought home from the East, Lon., 1844, 8vo; 5th ed., 1846, 12mo.

"If the brilliant author of Eothen has produced one of the most striking pictures of the East that ever was presented to the nations of the West, another artist, [Eliot Warburton], whose pencil, like his, was 'dipped in the orient hues of heaven,' has been prematurely snatched from his admiring country."—Sir Archibald Alison's Hist. of Europe, 1815-52, chap. v.

"We hazard little in prophesying that Mr. Curzon's work [Visit to Monasteries in the Levant] will be more popular than any other recent set of Oriental descriptions, except Mr. Kinglake's; and, however that remarkable writer may claim the superiority in wit, point, and artistic finish," &c.—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxiv, 462-463.

"Nothing so sparkling, so graphic, so truthful in sentiment, and so poetic in vein, has issued from the press in many a day."—Lon. Critic.

"The best book of Eastern travels we know."—Lon. Examiner.

Mr. Kinglake is at this moment (Feb. 1857) a candidate for Parliament. Since the above was written, Mr. Kinglake has been withdrawn, (April, 1857.)

Kingsborough, Rt. Hon. Edward King, Viscount, 1795-1837, eldest son of the third Earl of Kingston, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford; represented his native county (Cork) in the Parliament of 1820-26, and subsequently devoted himself to the preparation of his great work.—The Antiquities of Mexico: comprising Fac-similes of Ancient Mexican Paintings and Hieroglyphics preserved in the Royal Libraries of Paris, Berlin, and Dresden; in the Imperial Library of Vienna; in the Vatican Library; in the Borgin Museum at Rome; in the Library of the Institute of Bologna; and in the Bodleian Library of Oxford; together with the Monuments of New Spain, by M. Dupaix; with their respective Scale of Measurement and accompanying Descriptions. The whole illustrated by many valuable inclined Manuscripts by Lord Kingsborough. The Drawings on Stone by A. Aglio. Lon., imp. fol., vols. i.-vii., 1831; vols. viii. and ix., 1848. Originally pub. at the rate of £110, unbound; now reduced to £36; or, with the plates coloured, originally pub. at the rate of £210; now reduced to £63; vols. viii. and ix. were pub. at £12 12s. for both. The following note, pub. within the last few weeks, demands the attention of those concerned:

"Dec. 10, [1856].
"40, ALBEMARLE STREET, [London.]

"Vol. ix. of Lord Kingsborough's Mexican Antiquities contains the Relation of Don Alva Ixtlichitl; but, in all the copies of the work which have fallen under my notice, I find that the volume closes abruptly, on p. 468, without finishing the Relation, of which an amount equivalent to several pages is wanting. In the language of the printing-office, it would seem that a 'signature' has been lost in making up the volume. 'The end of each of the preceding volumes is uniformly printed in, and its absence in vol. ix. confirms my suspicion of the accidental omission of a 'signature.' There are MS. copies of Ixtlichitl, from which the publishers could supply the deficiency,—no doubt one wholly unintentional on their part. E. G. S."—From the Lon. Athen., Dec. 13, 1856, 1537.

The initials will be recognised as those of Mr. Squier. Having called the attention of Mr. Prescott, author of the History of the Conquest of Mexico, &c., to the preceding note, he writes us,—

"The Relation of Ixtlichitl terminates on p. 468; but this is followed by another work, on the rites and customs of the Mexicans, making 60 pages. These pages are numbered from 1 to 60, and the signatures are those of vol. x.; but at the bottom of the last page is printed, End of vol. ix., end of the work,—showing that the original design of the publication was not completed."
"Boston, March 7, 1857."

An account of this magnificent publication, the first seven vols. of which cost Lord Kingsborough £22,000, (and his life also,) will be found in Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii, 233-235; Prescott's Hist. of the Conq. of Mexico, 23d ed., Bost., 1855, i, 128-130; see also Index to Mexico, and Index to his Peru, ed. 1855, Pref., ix., vol. i., 1801; Lon. Athenæum; Lon. Gent. Mag., 1831, Pis. 99-102, 306-307; Lon. Month. Rev., Feb., 1831, 253-274; Dr. Maginn's Homeric Ballads; The Genealogy of Glaucus. Two copies were printed on vellum, (the cost of which was estimated at three thousand guineas,) and ten were taken off on large drawing-paper. Nine were presented to crowned heads and public institutions, and the tenth to Mr. O. Rich, the eminent bibliographer, for valuable services rendered in the preparation of the work. We know of several copies of the Antiquities in America,—viz.: one in the Boston Athenæum, presented by the late Francis C. Gray, (see p. 724 of this Dictionary;) one in the library of the New York Historical Society; one in the library of the Rochester University; one in the Astor Library, New York; one in the library of the Worcester Antiquarian Society; and another in the library of Wm. H. Prescott, the historian. The late Mr. Corwin, of New York, also possessed a copy. We have said that this work cost Lord Kingsborough not only a large expenditure of money, but his life also:

"After having expended upwards of thirty thousand pounds upon this work, he got into difficulties with some of the persons with whom he dealt, particularly with a celebrated paper-manufacturer. He was arrested in Dublin, and, from obstinacy or unwillingness to pay a demand he thought unjust, was thrown into prison. He was there seized with a typhus fever, which ended fatally in a few days. If he had not lived, he would, within a year, have become Earl of Kingston and inherited a fortune of forty thousand pounds a year. Had he lived, there is no doubt but that he would have devoted his life and fortune to the development of the ancient history of America, which had become with him a monomania. . . . Lord Kingsborough's penchant for Mexican antiquities was produced by a sight of the original Mexican manuscript described by Purchas, (Pilgrimes, vol. iii.) preserved in the Bodleian Library, where his lordship was a student. From the time he first saw it, he appears to have devoted his mind to it, and to have thought of nothing else."—Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii, 234-235.

It is asserted, indeed, by his lordship's biographer, in the Gentleman's Magazine, May, 1837, that the imprisonment which resulted in his death was caused by his having become security for the payment of a debt due by his father, the Earl of Kingston; and the same writer assures us that four copies of the Mexican Antiquities were printed on vellum; but we prefer the authority of Mr. Rich, his lordship's coadjutor in the preparation of his great work and the purchaser of the bulk of the invaluable Kingsborough collection of the original materials from which the Antiquities were compiled. Of the two copies on vellum, one was presented by the editor to the Bodleian Library, and the other to the British Museum. This work well deserves the epithets by which Mr. Prescott signifies his admiration of it,—“noble,” “colossal,” “magnificent.” But the historian of Mexico by no means endorses the theory for which the noble commentator so zealously contends:

“The drift of Lord Kingsborough’s speculations is to establish the colonization of Mexico by the Israelites. To this the whole battery of his logic and learning is directed. For this hieroglyphics are unriddled, manuscripts compared, monuments delineated.”

But, whatever may be thought of his lordship’s speculations, we must all agree, with Mr. Prescott, “that by this munificent undertaking—which no government, probably, would have, and few individuals could have, executed—he has entitled himself to the lasting gratitude of every friend of science.”—Conq. of Mexico, i. 129.

“This work, in its magnificence, recalls to mind the patronage of crowned heads and the splendour of the princely patrons of literature.”—Lon. Athen.

“A magnificent monument of the picture-writing of the Mexicans is to be found in the splendid folios of the late Lord Kingsborough, who, after spending larger sums of money on a literary work than ever were before expended by any nobleman,” &c.—DR. MAGNAN: ubi supra.

“Cet ouvrage, de la plus grande magnificence.”—BRUNET: Manuel de Libraire, &c., 1842, ii. 770.

“It forms almost an era in one’s life to have had an opportunity of inspecting such a splendid series of volumes as are now placed before us under the title of Antiquities of Mexico. We should have supposed, after we had contemplated the superb materials of which they consist, that they were the results of some state enterprise, undertaken by a spirited and ambitious government, which aimed at exalting the national character and its own by the munificence of its patronage of the fine arts.”—Lon. Month. Rev., ubi supra.

The curious reader will find much interesting matter respecting the ancient Mexicans, in the Lettres Américaines of Count Carl, the Recherches Philosophiques sur les Américains of M. de Pauw, &c. Mr. Prescott’s great work on The Conquest of Mexico will, of course, be always consulted. Kingsbury, Rev. Benjamin. Theolog. and political publications. Lon., 1788–91.

Kingsley, Charles, Junior Rector of Eversley, Hants, and Canon of Middleham, born at Holne Vicarage, Devonshire, June 12, 1819, is the son of the Rev. Charles Kingsley, now (1857) Rector of Chelsea, was educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge, and in 1844 was married to the daughter of Pascoe Greenfell, Esq., who was for a number of years M.P. for Truro and Great Marlow. Mr. Kingsley, the subject of our notice, belongs to what is called the “Broad-Church Party,” and is a zealous advocate of the rights of the working-classes. The following list of his publications presents evidence of literary industry of no ordinary character. 1. XXV. Village Serms., Lon., 1844, 12mo; 2d ed., 1852, 12mo; 3d ed., 1854, 1p. 8vo. 2. The Saint’s Tragedy, a Story of Elizabeth of Hungary; a Drama in Verse, 1848, 12mo; 2d ed., 1851, 18mo. Also reprinted in Nos.

“The Saint’s Tragedy, which was Mr. Kingsley’s first literary work, contained great poetic promise, both dramatic and lyric. It evinced a subtle knowledge of human emotion, especially of the mental workings and heart-burnings of humanity wrestling with the views inculcated by Catholic ascetics.”—Chambers’s Journal.

3. Alton Locke: Tailor and Poet; a Novel, 1850, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 4th ed., 1856, 12mo.

“It is the book of an age. That it will exercise a deep and extensive influence on the public mind may be considered as certain. There is something in the author’s very errors suggestive of right; and, when he does enunciate truths which other men only hint and whisper, he stamps his idea inefficably on the memory and heart of the reader, in thoughts that breathe and words that burn.”—Eclectic Rev.

“Real genius, intense power of sympathy, an intimacy with the woes which the book describes, are the evident qualifications of the writer.”—Lon. Examiner.

“A book which exhibits in many passages decided marks of genius, but which, as a whole, is so preposterously absurd as rather to excite ridicule than to move sympathy.”—Blackwood’s Mag., Nov. 1850, vol. lxxviii.

“If Mr. Kingsley had really been a tailor, the style and sentiments of Alton Locke would have excited little surprise or even notice: it is the strangeness and incongruity of the exhibition which creates by much the larger share of its attraction.

‘The things themselves are neither new nor rare;’

‘We wonder how the mischief they came there.’ It is only as falling from the pulpit and the professional chair that such trash could make any impression.—could excite even curiosity.”—Revolutionary Literature: Lon. Quar. Rev., Sept. 1851, lxxviii. 533.

See also Fraser’s Mag., xlii. 576; South. Quar. Rev., xx. 118.

4. The Message of the Church to Labouring Men: a Sermon; 5th ed., 1851. 5. Yeast; a Problem, 1851, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1852, p. 8vo. Reprinted from Fraser’s Mag., with additions.

“Novel-readers will perhaps prefer it to Alton Locke on account of its passionate eloquence and exquisite love-passages. There is undeniable genius in it, and the beauty of certain passages reveals a poet and a thinker.”—Lon. Athen.

“It is powerful, earnest, feeling, and eloquent,—the production of a man acquainted with society, who has looked closely upon its various classes and has the power of reading the signs of the times.”—Lon. Spectator.

See also Blackw. Mag., June, 1855, and the Lon. Gazette. 6. The Application of Associative Principles and Methods to Agriculture; a Lecture, 1851.

“He mimes nothing,—spares nobody. . . . In his fiery zeal he forgets half the problem which he ventures to propound and resolve.”—Lon. Athen., 1851, 1249.

Mr. Kingsley has pub. a number of other occasional Lectures, some or all of which will shortly be issued in a vol. together with his Essays. See No. 18.

7. Serms. on National Subjects, 1852, 12mo. Second Series, 1854, 12mo.

“Marked by that originality of thought and force of utterance which characterize all of this author’s writings.”—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

8. Phænethon; or, Loose Thoughts for Loose Thinkers, 1852, 12mo; 2d ed., 1854, p. 8vo.

“We cordially welcome Mr. Kingsley into the field of discussion on which he has here entered. It is one in which he is capable beyond most of doing the state some service.”—Brit. Quar. Rev.

See Lon. Athen., Oct. 30, 1852; Lon. Spectator, Oct. 2, 1853; Non-conformist, Jan. 12, 1853.

9. Hypatia; or, New Foes with an Old Face, 1853, 2 vols. p. 8vo; reprinted from Fraser’s Mag.

“Passages of striking and vivid beauty abound in these volumes.”—Westminster Rev.

“Hypatia, while thoroughly characteristic of the author of Yeast and Alton Locke, manifests a patient, thoughtful comprehensiveness to which neither of those very clever books can lay claim.”—Brit. Quar. Rev.

“It is about the wildest book that ever was written.”—Blackw. Mag., June, 1855, vol. lxxviii.

10. Alexandria and her Schools; the substance of four Lectures delivered in Edinburgh in 1854, p. 8vo, 1854.

“A clear, rapid, accurate, and interesting sketch . . . Ought to enjoy a general and an enduring popularity.”—Lon. New Quar. Rev.

“A series of brilliant biographical and literary sketches, interspersed with comments of the closest modern, or rather universal, application.”—Lon. Spectator.

11. Westward Ho! or, The Voyages and Adventures of Sir Amyas Leigh, 3 vols. cr. 8vo; 1st. ed., April, 1855; 2d ed., June, 1855.

“Mr. Kingsley has selected a good subject, and has written a good novel to excellent purpose.”—Lon. Times, Aug. 18, 1855.

“His pictures of English society, feeling, and thought in the days of Queen Elizabeth, as given therein, are utterly at variance with historical record and with the voluminous evidence which is afforded by the works of the authors of that period. The whole novel is a huge anachronism; for the characters, except in name, belong to the age of Cromwell, and not to that of Elizabeth.”—Blackwood’s Mag., June, 1855, vol. lxxviii.

And see the same periodical for Nov. 1855, vol. lxxviii, art. Modern Light Literature: Traveller’s Tales.

The Lon. Spectator commends Westward Ho! as “noble and well-timed.”

12. Glaucois; or, The Wonders of the Shore, 1855, 12mo; 3d ed., 1856, 12mo.

“Its pages sparkle with life; they open up a thousand sources of unanticipated pleasure, and combine amusement with instruction in a very happy and unwonted degree.”—Lon. Eclectic Rev.

Glaucois is also highly commended by the Christian Remembrancer, The Guardian, and The Spectator; but Blackwood does not seem to value the work so highly; see that periodical for August, 1855,—Modern Light Literature: Science.

13. Poems, now first collected, 1856, 16mo. This vol. contains The Saint’s Tragedy and (see No. 1) Miscellaneous Poems and Ballads. The contents were collected by the author for the publishers, Messrs. Ticknor and Fields, of Boston, Mass., and have not been pub. in this shape in England. See Putnam’s Mag., May, 1856, vii. 532.

The following comments upon Mr. Kingsley’s poetical characteristics will be read with interest by his many admirers:

"Mr. Kingsley has the self-denial to reject all that is superfluous in thought or word, which is a most rare virtue in a young poet, and without it no one can ever become a writer of national songs. He has acquired the young writer's last-attained grace, simplicity."—Chambers's Journal.

14. Serms. for the Times, 1856, fp. Svo; twenty-five in number.

"Perhaps in this book there is a more sustained opposition to the popular religious sentiment of the day than in Mr. Kingsley's former volumes of sermons."—Oxford and Cambridge Mag., Jan. 1856, lxi.

"Whilst furnishing many passages of great power and beauty, it fails egregiously in expounding to the ignorant and irreligious the way of God's mercy."—Elec. Rev.

15. The Heroes; or, Greek Fairy Tales for my Children, 1856, Svo; 2d ed., 1856, Svo.

"The Heroes he has chosen are Persens, the Argonauts, and Theseus; and he tells about them so charmingly that we have read his tales from beginning to end almost as eagerly as they can have been read by the 'Rose, Maurice, and Mary' for whom they were expressly written."—Westminster Rev., April, 1856.

Also praised by The Examiner, The Spectator, and The Morning Post.

16. Two Years Ago; a Novel, 1857, 3 vols. p. Svo.

"Mr. Kingsley has never written any book equal to Alton Locke, and in Two Years Ago we miss almost entirely the characteristic excellencies of the Chartist novel. The narrative is disconnected, irregular, confused; the characters frequently pass, re-pass, and hold long colloquies, without any evident object; the plot is dim, and there is no definable reason why the story should be called Two Years Ago. . . . We cannot help thinking that Mr. Kingsley might advantageously allow his imagination some rest. He will otherwise run the risk of being counted among writers who, having enjoyed one success, continue to multiply failures, until the failures obscure the success and both are forgotten."—Lon. Athen., Feb. 14, 1857, 212.

The London Leader also condemns this novel; but, on the other hand, it is warmly commended by the Literary Gazette, Feb. 21, 1857; The Examiner, Feb. 14, 1857; The Spectator, Feb. 14, 1857; The Saturday Review, Feb. 21, 1857; The Overland Mail, Feb. 26, 1857; The Atlas, Feb. 28, 1857; The Critic, March 2, 1857. We give some extracts:

"It is, indeed, impossible not to be interested in a book so earnest and right-minded as this novel. . . . It is full of brave thought and wise counsel. It recognises all that is to be honoured in a man, and speaks as true men ought to speak of women. . . . The whole book is rich in colour, rich in active life and truth."—Lon. Economist.

"Mr. Kingsley has established himself among the finest prose-writers of his age and country. Two Years Ago is a book full of interesting writing, and thousands of persons will read it from beginning to end with avidity. We are glad to meet Mr. Kingsley once more on contemporary ground."—Lon. Spectator.

"It is really a relief to come upon a work of art like this. . . . No one can read Two Years Ago without feeling his love of virtue strengthened, his contempt for every thing mean and base confirmed, and his resolution braced for active exertion."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

We have also before us five highly-favourable opinions on the part of as many American journals, and the following verdict from a distinguished member of the Court of Literary Jurisprudence:

"Although somewhat disconnected and fitful, it has the power, the freshness, the discrimination, and the humanity, which have so widely endeared this industrious and vivid writer. There are splendid passages, and points of keen interest throughout."—H. T. TUCKERMAN.

We have heard Mr. Washington Irving express a very favourable opinion of Mr. Kingsley's talents as a novel-writer, and observed the pleasure with which he received a copy of Westward Ho!—then (1855) just published.

17. Andromeda and other Poems: announced for 1857.

18. Lectures and Essays: announced for 1857, by Ticknor & Fields, of Boston. This vol. will consist of a reprint of a number of the author's Lectures and Essays. Among Mr. Kingsley's minor contributions to the literature of the day are several pamphlets, occasional sermons, papers in the North British Review, Fraser's Magazine, the 8th ed. of the Encyclopædia Britannica, &c., and a Preface to Susanna Winkworth's trans. of the Life of the Rev. John Tauler, of Strasbourg. Reviews (from which we have been able to quote but very briefly) of Mr. Kingsley's characteristics as a writer will be found in Blackwood's Magazine for June, 1855, and the London Quarterly Review (art. Revolutionary Literature) for September, 1851.

Kinney, Mrs. Elizabeth C., a daughter of David L. Dodge, of New York, and wife of William B. Kinney, formerly editor of the Newark Daily Advertiser, has contributed many prose and poetical articles to the Knickerbocker Magazine, Graham's Magazine, the journal conducted by her husband, and other periodicals. In 1855, she gave to the world Felicitia, a Metrical Romance. Some of Mrs. Kinney's poetical compositions have been very highly commended; but, on the other hand, Felicitia was not a little ridiculed by a critic in Putnam's Magazine. (July, 1855.) In 1850, Mr. and Mrs. Kinney removed to Turin, (the former having received an appointment to the Sardinian Mission,) where they now reside.

Kip, J. I. Britannia Illustrata, &c. A fine copy of this splendid work, containing more than 580 views, and bound in 5 vols. imp. fol., (date of 1724,) was advertised by Mr. H. G. Bohn, in his Catalogue for 1841, p. 1533, £33; another in his Catalogue for 1848, p. 131, £31 10s. To these Catalogues, and to Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 1075, we refer the reader for particulars of dates, &c. of this valuable series of plates. Bohn's copies contained complete sets of the famous Views of Audley End, by Henry Winstanley.

Kip, William Ingraham, D.D., b. Oct. 3, 1811, in the city of New York, was educated at Rutgers College, and at Yale College; ordained deacon in the Prot. Epis. Church, 1835; stationed successively at St. Peter's Church, Morristown, New Jersey, at Grace Church, New York, (as assistant minister,) and at St. Peter's Church, Albany; consecrated Missionary Bishop of California in 1853, and since that date has resided at San Francisco. 1. W. Sewell, Fellow of Exeter Coll., Oxf., 2 eds. By this work and his preceding publications, Bishop Kip has gained an extensive reputation in the literary world. He has also contributed many papers to The New York Review, Church Review, Evergreen, American Monthly Magazine, Churchman, &c., and edited in 1850, with Preface and Notes, the Confessions of a Romish Convert. Since the above was written, we notice a new work upon the Roman Catacombs, by the Rev. Spencer Northcote, Lon., 1857, sm. 8vo.

Kipling, Thomas, D.D., d. 1822, Dean of Peterborough, pub. The Articles of the Ch. of Eng. proved not to be Calvinistical, 1802, 8vo, and some other works, and edited the Codex Bezae Cantab., 1793, 2 vols. fol. See Horne's Bibl. Bib.; Orme's Bibl. Bib. zine, &c., and pub. a number of Serms., the Life of Lardner, of Captain James Cook, &c. He is, however, best known as the editor and co-author of the new ed. of the Biographia Britannica, of which five vols. fol. were pub., 1778–93, ending abruptly with the article "Fastolf." A part of vol. vi.—Fentley–Foster—was printed.

"Of this precious portion there are but two known copies in existence."—Dilutin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 499, q. v., et p. 409.

And see Preface to this Dictionary, p. 5. A vol. of Kippis's Serms. on Practical Subjects was pub. in 1791, 8vo.

"The style is natural and animated, and the method perspicuous."—Analyt. Review.

"The natural powers of his mind were cultivated with an assiduity and perseverance of application in which he had few superiors and not many equals."—Dr. Rees's Cyc.

As a proof of his application, we may instance his perusal of the General Dictionary, 10 vols. fol., 1734–41, a feat which we imagine was never accomplished by any one else. In conjunction with William Spence, An Introduction to Entomology; or, Elements of the Natural History of Insects, 4 vols. 8vo: vol. i., 1815; ii., 1817; iii., iv., 1826. 6th ed. of vols. i. and ii., (being the popular portion of the work,) enlarged and corrected, 1842, 2 vols. 8vo, 31s. 6d. 7th ed. of do., 1856, cr. 8vo, 5s. 4000 copies sold in less than a year. This last ed. contains an Appendix by Mr. Spence, giving an account of the origin and history of the work. To this appendix in the Lon. Gent. Mag., Aug. 1850, The Literary Gazette, The Gardener's Chronicle, Blackwood's Mag., i. 569, n., and especially to the Rev. John Freeman's Life of Mr. Kirby, 1852, 8vo, (and the review of the last in the Athenæum, 1852, §41-§43,) we refer the reader. In 1829, Mr. Kirby pub. a vol. of Sermons on the Temptation of Christ, 8vo. The original ed. of the Introduction to Entomology—4 vols. 8vo, pub. at £3 18s.—is now (1837) very scarce. The scientific reader should possess this work, and should add to it Yeaute's Institutions of Entomology, Curtis's tracts, of Fundamenta Entomologie, Barbut's Genera Insectorum, and M. de Reaumur's Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Insectes, Paris, 1734, 6 vols. 4to, worth about £1 10s. to £2 in good binding. But for a country parlour-book, the 7th ed. of vols. i. and ii. of Kirby and Spence's Entomology, now to be had for 5s., will answer the purpose. By all means place by its side the Journal of a Naturalist, Mr. J. O. Westwood's entomological works, Sir Wm. Jardine's ed. of White's Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne, and Sir W. Jardine's Naturalist's Library. See JARDINE, SIR WM., Bart., No. 3.

"Let no man think he knows how to enjoy the country who has not studied the volumes of Kirby and Spence's delightful Introduction."—Lon. Quar. Rev., Dec. 1842.

"This work, the delight of our youth, and the admiration of our mature age, is well known as the most entertaining account of the habits of insects ever published in a popular form."—Dr. LINOLEY, in the Gardener's Chronicle, Dec. 3, 1842.

"No work in the English language, we believe, has done more than Kirby and Spence's learned and popular Introduction to spread the taste for 'natural history at home,' &c.—Natural History Review, July, 1855, 31, q. v.

Kirby and Spence's Entomology has been translated into French and German.

Jour. of Insanity; Winslow's (London), Psychological Journal, &c.

We have heard the eminent publicist, Dr. Francis Lieber,—whose opportunities for observation in European countries have been superior to those of most men,—express the highest admiration for Dr. Kirkbride's sagacity in the exercise of the duties of his responsible and difficult office,—that of a medical director of the insane. Indeed, he is more than a director: he is truly a pater-familias, and, as such, is beloved and revered by the children of his adoption.

"Unquestionably she is one of our best writers,—has a province of her own, and in that province has few equals. Her most noticeable trait is a certain freshness of style, seemingly drawn, as her subjects in general, from the West. In the second place is to be observed a species of wit, approximating humour, and so interspersed with pure fun, that 'wit,' after all, is nothing like a definition of it. . . . Her perceptive faculties enable her to describe with great verisimilitude."—EDGAR A. POE: ubi supra.

Kirwan, Walter Blake, 1754–1805, a native of Galway, Ireland, educated at the College of the English Jesuits at St. Omer; appointed Prof. of Natural and Moral Philosophy at Louvain; embraced the Protestant faith, 1787, and became minister of St. Peter's Church, Dublin, Preb. of Howth, and minister of St. Nicholas-Without, 1788; Dean of Killala, 1800. Serms., with a Sketch of his Life, 1814, 8vo; 1816, 8vo. This vol.—containing thirteen serms.—is now rare. Some copies are on large paper, r. 8vo, pub. at one guinea. Few preachers of any age have enjoyed the popularity of this divine. Such crowds thronged to hear him that it was found necessary to defend the entrance of the church, where he was to preach, with guards and palisades. His success was so great in charity-sermons that Dr. Grattan declared, some time before Kirwan's death, that he had collected in this way £60,000.

"Dr. Kirwan preferred our country and our religion, and brought to both genius superior to what he found in either. He called forth the latent virtues of the human heart, and taught men to discover in themselves a mine of charity of which the proprietors had been unconscious. He came to interrupt the repose of the pulpit, and shakes one world with the thunder of the other. The preacher's desk becomes the throne of light."—Dr. Grattan's Speech, June 18, 1792.

"The eloquence of the pulpit has never among us been carried to such perfection, nor have we heard of any preacher in Great Britain to be compared with him in this respect."—REV. G. AUSTIN: Chrononia.

See a review of Kirwan's Sermons in the London Quar. Rev., xi. 120–138. When published, they greatly disappointed the expectations of Kirwan's admirers.

"Dean Kirwan's sermons are known to have produced the most extraordinary effects in later times. Persons have gone to church without much fear of being induced, as others had been, to give more to the charity for which the Dean was to preach than they could afford; but after resisting for some time, they have ended by throwing down their watches and rings, and whatever else of value they had about them."—LORD BROUGHAM: *Contrib. to Edin. Kitto, John, D.D., 1804-1854, a native of Plymouth, the son of a mason, whilst assisting his father, fell from the roof of a building, (this was in his twelfth year,) and was so severely injured in the organ of hearing that he was totally deaf for the remainder of his life. Applying himself early to theological studies, he gave the results of his investigations to the world in a series of volumes than which none have done more to diffuse Biblical knowledge throughout Great Britain and America. 1. The Pictorial Bible, 1835-38, 3 vols. 8vo; 1847-49, 4 vols. 4to; 1850, 4 vols. imp. 8vo. New ed. announced, 1855. In this work we have an account of Mr. Kitto's Adventures in Persia. 3. Pictorial Hist. of Palestine, 1841, 2 vols. r. 8vo; 1852, p. 8vo; abridged, 1843, 12mo.

4. Gallery of Scripture Engravings, 1841-43, 3 vols. 4to; 1846-47, 4to. 5. Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature, 1843-45, 2 vols. 8vo; 1847, 2 vols. r. 8vo; abridged, 1849, 8vo; 1850, 8vo; 1855, 8vo. One of the abridgments is called The People's Edition. The Cyclopædia is composed of contributions by many eminent writers. We have more commendations before us of this work than we have time even to count. From these we select the eulogium of a Biblical scholar whose "name is a tower of strength" in his chosen department of research:

"It is not too much to say that this Cyclopædia surpasses every biblical dictionary which has preceded it, and that it leaves nothing to be desired in such a work which can throw light on the criticism, interpretation, history, geography, archaeology, and physical science of the Bible. It is beautifully printed, and is illustrated with fourteen engravings of maps and views, besides more than five hundred well-executed woodcuts of subjects calculated to elucidate the Holy Scriptures."—Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study of the Holy Scriptures, 9th ed., vol. v. p. 437.

"We regard it as a most important and practically-useful contribution to the cause of sound biblical learning, and have no doubt that it will soon take the place in the estimate of scholars, of every compilation of the kind. The enlistment of so many scholars in the production of a single work, each one presenting in a brief compass, the results of a lifetime of research, in precisely the matters where he is most at home, could not fail of enriching it with an amount of learning and scholarship to which, of course, the work of no single mind, however great, could pretend."—Biblical Repository.

"This work is at once learned, convenient, and interesting,—especially rich in embellishments. It is, however, the work of many hands, in Great Britain and some even in Germany, and of these some are very loose in their opinions. The work is, therefore, to be used with great discrimination."—Nevin's Biblical Antiq., Phila., 441.

To these vols. the Biblical scholar must add Kitto's Sunday Readings for Christian Families, 1853-55, 8 vols. sm. 8vo; and his Journal of Sacred Literature, (the latter vols. edited by Dr. Burgess,) 1st series, 7 vols., 2d series, 4 vols.; in all 11 vols. 8vo, 1818-53. For a detailed account of the literary labours of this useful writer and excellent man, we refer to Memoirs of John Kitto, D.D., by J. E. Ryland, Esq. With a Critical Estimate of Dr. Kitto's Life and Writings by Professor Endie, D.D., LL.D., 1856, 8vo. With Portrait and Illustrations. Reviewed in the London Spectator: see Bost. Living Age, lii. 445-447. Since the above was prepared for the press, there has been pub. a Life of John Kitto, D.D., by John Endie, Edin., 1857. The London Athenæum (June 27, 1857) prefers this biography to either Dr. Kitto's (The Lost Senses) or to Mr. Ryland's.

Dr. Kitto died Nov. 25, 1854, at Cannstatt in Wurtemberg, whither he had gone in quest of health. He left a widow and seven children.

"The name of Dr. Kitto is now immortally associated with biblical study and literature. The measure of his success is not more amazing in its amount than the means by which he reached it. His life is as instructive as are his labours, and both combined present an unequalled picture of triumph over obstacles which have been rarely so surmounted, and over circumstances which few have ventured to encounter, and which fewer still have mastered to such advantage. . . . What a contrast between the deaf and dumb paper-boy of 1819, wheeled into a workhouse to keep him from 'hunger and fasting, cold and nakedness,' and the John Kitto of 1854,—Doctor of Theology, though a layman, Member of the Society of Antiquaries, Editor of the Pictorial Bible and Biblical Cyclopædia, and author of the Daily Bible Illustrations! The interval between the two extremes was long, and sometimes gloomy; yet he bore bravely up, with earnest resolution and strong faith in God."—DR. EADIE.

Knight, Richard Payne, M.P., 1750-1824, noted for his knowledge of Greek literature, was the author of a number of works, among which are the following: 1. An Account of the Remains of the Worship of Priapus, Lon., 1786, 4to. This work—severely censured in the Pursuits of Literature—has been sold for £20.

"One of the most unbecoming and indecent treatises which ever disgraced the pen of a man who would be considered as a scholar and a philosopher."—Pursuits of Lit., 10th ed., 1812, 4to, 118, n. 3, v.

2. Analytical Essay on the Greek Alphabet, 1791, 4to. Reviewed by Porson in the Lon. Month. Rev. for 1794. See Porson's Tracts, p. 108; Museum Criticum, vol. i. p. 489; Pursuits of Lit., 16th ed., 1812, 4to, 170. 3. The Landscape; a Didaetic Poem, 1794, 4to. 4. Review of do., &c., 1795, 8vo. 5. The Progress of Civil Society; a Didactic Poem, 1796, 4to. Parodied in the Anti Jacobin, probably by Canning. 6. Analytical Inquiry into the Principles of Taste, 1805, 8vo.

"Such stores of reading and reflection have indeed rarely been brought to bear on the subject of criticism; but their effect is sometimes obscured, and sometimes weakened, by want of compression and arrangement. . . . Mr. Knight's style wants, in our judgment, purity, terseness, and elegance. The periods are long and straggling; and the colon perpetually usurps the place of a perfect stop. No one, we are convinced, could read aloud in such a style so much as to be intelligible, much less so as to give pleasure."—Edin. Rev., vii. 306, 326.

"I certainly do not assent to the unqualified commendations bestowed on Payne Knight. He is a powerful and coarse rebel, who makes some formidable attacks on the laws and government of philosophical criticism; but he will not, I think, subvert them, nor has he a mind to establish others in their stead. He mistakes the sense in which the word 'terror' is employed by Mr. Burke."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Life, vol. ii.

"The style of Mr. Knight is more lively, various, and discursive than Mr. Alison's, but not so systematic or conclusive. It is the cleverer book of the two,—but not the most philosophical discussion of the subject."—LORD JEFFREY: Contrib. to Edin. Rev., Lon., 1833, 12.

"There, too, is Alison's delightful book on Taste, in which the Doctrine of Association is stated with the precision of the Philosopher and illustrated with the prodigality of the Poet. Compare with it Payne Knight's Analytical Enquiry, and, from feasting on the juicy heart of an orange, you are starving on its shrivelled skin."—Prof. Wilson's Essays, vol. iv. 102, Edin. and Lon., 1856.

7. Monody on the Death of the Rt. Hon. C. J. Fox, 1806, 8vo. 8. Dilettanti Specimens of Ancient Sculpture; with Descriptions by R. P. Knight. 200 copies issued at £17 17s. A second vol. was pub. in 1835. 9. Inquiry into the Symbolical Language of Ancient Art and Mythology, 1818, 8vo. Privately printed. New ed. by E. H. Barker, 8vo. 10. An ed. of the Iliad and Odyssey; with Prolegomena, 1820. The Prolegomena were pub. separately, Leipsic, 1816, 8vo. 11. Alfred; a Romance in Rhyme, 1823, 8vo.

Mr. Knight bequeathed his collection of ancient bronzes, Greek coins, &c., valued at £50,000, to the British Museum. His catalogue of his coins (Nummi Veteres, &c.) was pub. by the trustees in 1830, 4to. He was a contributor to the Edinburgh Review, The Classical Journal, and The Archaeologia.

"Deprive these two octavo volumes of their embellishments, and such is the lethargy, or plodding humility, of their style, although the subject might have elicited energy from a moderately-instructed tyro, that you can hardly buckle yourself to the perusal of half a dozen pages."—*Dobson's Lib. Best ed., with a Continuation by Sir Paul Rycant and Roger Manley, 1687-1700, 3 vols. fol.

"But none of our writers can, in my opinion, justly contest the superiority of Knolles, who, in his History of the Turks, has displayed all the excellencies that narration can admit. His style, though somewhat obscured by time and sometimes vitiated by false wit, is pure, nervous, elevated, and clear. . . . Nothing could have sunk this author in obscurity but the remoteness and barbarity of the people whose story he relates."—DR. JOHNSON; Rambler, No. 122.

"A style and power of narration which Johnson has not too highly extolled. His descriptions are vivid and animated,—circumstantial, but not feebleness; his characters are drawn with a strong pencil."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 148.

"Let me strongly recommend Rycant's improved edition of Knolles's History of the Turks. . . . What fierce-looking fellows do the PORTRAITS make the originals to have been!"—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

Knowles, George Parker, Genealogist and Heraldic artist, b. at Merton, county of Surrey, England, 1797, is the author of several privately-printed genealogical works. Two of his latest publications of this kind are—1. A Genealogical and Heraldic Account of the Coultharts of Coulthart and Collyn, Chiefs of the Name, from their First Settlement in Scotland in the Reign of Conarus to the Year of our Lord 1854, &c., Lon., 1855, r. 8vo, pp. 23. 2. A Genealogical Account of the Rosses of Dalton, in the County of Dumfries, from their First Settlement in Scotland, &c. in the Twelfth Century to the Year of our Lord 1854, 1855, r. 8vo, pp. 8. The sole representative (1857) of the very ancient Scottish family of Coulthart of Coulthart and Collyn is John Ross Coulthart, b. 1807, a banker at Ashton-under-Lyne, of which place he was mayor in 1855. He is the author of a valuable vol. of Decimal Interest-Tables, Lon., 1838, 8vo, (see p. 435 of this Dictionary, and the London Times for Feb. 21, 1845,) and a Report on the Sanitary Condition of Ashton-under-Lyne, 1844. This Report was commended in the House of Lords by the Marquis of Normandy, July 26, 1844, and in the House of Commons by the Earl of Carlisle, (then Lord Morpeth,) March 30, 1847. See Hansard's Parliamentary Debates. Richard Coulthart, of Coulthart and Largmore, d. 1717, author of The Economy of Agriculture, 1688, was the great-great-grandfather of the preceding.

Knowles, Herbert, 1798-1817, a youth of remarkable poetical abilities, first introduced himself to Robert Southey by a poem which the laureate declared to be "brimful of power and of promise." At this time the author, an orphan in destitute circumstances, was being educated at Richmond School, Yorkshire, for a sizarship at St. John's College; but this prospect was clouded by the inability of his friend to continue payment of the necessary expenses. In this strait Southey came to the rescue without any solicitation save from his kind heart, and contributed and raised from others the necessary funds; but in vain, for in two months from this time Knowles was cut off, at the early age of nineteen. For further particulars, see Southey's Life and Correspondence, and an article by Southey on the Cemeteries and Catacombs of Paris, in the London Quarterly Review, xxi. 397-398. The periodical just named quotes the impressive lines by which Knowles is best known.—viz.: Lines written in the Churchyard of Richmond, Yorkshire. This beautiful poem is often quoted as The Three Tabernacles. "The reader will remember that they are the verses of a school-boy who had not long been taken from one of the lowest stations in life, and he will then judge what might have been expected from one who was capable of writing with such strength and originality upon the tritest of all subjects."—ROBERT SOUTHY, ubi supra.

Southey says nothing of his own kind agency in gladdening the last earthly hours of this unfortunate son of song: but let the remembrance of such noble acts never perish from the earth!

Knowles, J. C. Twelve Serms., 1786, 8vo.

Knowles, James, a schoolmaster of high reputation, cousin-german of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and father of James Sheridan Knowles, the dramatist. 1. New Ex- positor, Lon., 12mo. 2. Improved ed. of Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary. New ed., 1845, 8vo; again, 1850, 8vo, £1 4s. Contains upwards of 55,000 more words than are given in any former ed. of Walker. Mr. Knowles laboured at it for more than thirty years.

Knowles, James Davis, 1798-1833, a native of Providence, Rhode Island, pastor of the Second Baptist Church, Boston, 1825-1832; Prof. of Pastoral Duties and Sacred Rhetoric in the Baptist Theological Institution at Newton, Massachusetts, 1832-1833. 1. Memoir of Mrs. Ann H. Judson; see JUDSON, Mrs. ANNA HASSELLTINE. 2. Memoir of Roger Williams, Bost., 1831, 12mo.

Knowles, James Sheridan, a son of James Knowles, (ante), was born at Cork, Ireland, about 1784, made his appearance early in life as an actor and dramatic author; subsequently taught grammar and elocution at Belfast; travelled over Great Britain as a dramatic lecturer; and has been for a number of years past a Baptist preacher. Such is a brief summary of his biography, which will be found detailed at greater length in the Men of the Time, Lon., 1856. The following is a list of his dramatic productions: 1. The Chevalier de Grillon; an Opera. 2. The Spanish Story. 3. Hersilia. 4. Leo; or, the Gipsy. None of these have been preserved. It was somewhere about this time that Knowles pub. a small vol. of (5) poetical Fugitive Pieces, which was followed by his play of (6) Brian Borohme, brought out at the Belfast Theatre. We continue the enumeration of his dramatic works: 7. Caius Gracchus; Belfast Theatre, 1815. 8. Virginus; Covent Garden, 1820. 9. William Tell; Drury Lane, 1825. 10. The Beggar's Daughter of Bethnal Green, 1828. 11. Alfred the Great; Drury Lane, 1831. 12. The Hunchback; Covent Garden, 1832. 13. The Wife, a Tale of Mantua; Covent Garden, 1833. 14. The Daughter; Drury Lane, 1836. 15. The Love-Chase; Haymarket, 1837. 16. Woman's Wit; Covent Garden, 1838. 17. The Maid of Mariendorp; Haymarket, 1838. 18. Love; Covent Garden, 1839. 19. John of Procida; Covent Garden, 1840. 20. Old Maids; Covent Garden, 1841. 21. The Rose of Aragon; Haymarket, 1842. 22. The Secretary; Haymarket, 1843. A collective ed. of his Dramatic Works (many of which had been previously pub. separately) was given to the world, in 3 vols. p. 8vo, in 1843, and in 1856 a revised ed. was pub. in 2 vols. cr. 8vo. Mr. Knowles is also the author of (23) Fortescue; a Novel, 3 vols. p. 8vo, 1847; 1849. 24. George Lovell; a Novel, 3 vols. p. 8vo, 1847; 1849. 25. The Rock of Rome; or, the Arch-Heresy, p. 8vo, 1849; 1851. 26. The Idol Demolished by its own Priest, 12mo, 1851; 1852. Mr. Knowles has also contributed many articles to annuals and other periodicals. Since 1849 he has been in receipt of a pension of £200 from Government. In addition to the authority cited above, see Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age; James Montgomery's Lects. on General Lit., Poetry, &c.; Sir Archibald Alison's Essays, Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 112, 116; Blackwood's Mag., vii. 307, xxvii. 694, xxxvi. 132, xxxix. 267, xlvi. 173; Lon. Month. Rev., xciii. 53, exxviii. 64, cxxxi. 176; Fraser's Mag., xiii. 451, xiv. 272, with portrait; N. Amer. Rev., xl. 141, (by Park Benjamin.)

Sir Archibald Alison blames Mr. Knowles, in company with modern English dramatists generally, for utter disregard of the unities, and the consequent difficulty of an easy comprehension of plots which are embarrassed by a complicated story and lengthened succession of events:

"We have seen many a barrister," remarks the critic, "famed for cross-examination on the north circuit, unable to comprehend, till the piece was half over, the drift of Sheridan Knowles's dramas."—The Romantic Drama; Blackwood's Mag., 1840; and in Essays, iii. 112.

But Mr. Hazlitt—Knowles's "mental father," as the latter styles his friend of many years—does not seem to have considered the dramatist's transgressions in this respect as at all unpardonable:

"Ignorant alike of rules, regardless of models, he follows the steps of truth and simplicity, and strength, proportion, and delicacy are the infallible results. By thinking of nothing but his subject, he rivets the attention of the audience to it. All his dialogue tends to action, all his situations form classic groups. There is no doubt that Virginus is the best acting-tragedy that has been produced on the modern stage."—Spirit of the Age.

"The poetry of his dialogue is the poetry of passion; it is kindled up in him by the collision of events, and seems less proper to the man than to the scene: his language is to the purpose; it is but little ornamented. His dramas are full of impressive groupings, domestic incidents, the bustle of business, the activity of life: he subdues subject, scene, and language to the purpose and aim of his play. In this he differs from many writers, and differs for the better. His strength lies in home-bred affections; his Virginus, his Beggar's Daughter, and his Wife of Mantua, all bear evidence of this, and contain scenes of perfect truth and reality, such as no modern dramatist surpasses. He touches the heart and is safe."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the last Fifty Years, 1833.

Certainly Mr. Knowles was considered by a late eminent critic to have given ample evidence of his ability to instruct others in the "Reulis and Cauteles" (to borrow a phrase from King James) of the dramatic art:

"SHEPHERD. 'Heard ye ever of Knowles's Lectures on Dramatic Poetry?'"

"NORTH. 'I have. They are admirable. Full of matter, elegantly written, and eloquently delivered. Knowles is a delightful fellow and a man of true genius.'"—Notes Ambros., April, 1830.

Mr. Knowles, as we have already intimated, has been now for some years lecturing upon more important themes than those which formerly elicited his eloquence, and we imagine that he has never regretted his change of profession.

Knox, John, 1505-1572, the famous Scotch Reformer, was a native of Gifford, a village in East Lothian, or of Haddington, the principal town of the county. He was educated at the University of St. Andrew's; ordained a priest before the year 1530; became suspicious of the soundness of the Roman Catholic doctrines about 1535; declared himself a Protestant in 1542; became preacher at St. Andrew's, 1547; carried prisoner to France by a French fleet in the same year; regained his liberty and repaired to England, 1549; officiated as preacher at Berwick, and subsequently at Newcastle; Chaplain to Edward VI., 1552; fled to Geneva on the accession of Queen Mary, 1554; returned to Scotland and renewed his zealous pulpit-ministrations, 1555; accepted the post of preacher to the English congregation at Geneva, 1556; returned home and settled permanently in Scotland in 1559, and from this time laboured assiduously for the promotion of the principles of the Reformation. He was twice married, and had children by both his wives. It was whilst at Geneva, in 1558, that he pub. one of the best-known of his productions,—The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women, 16mo,—already noticed by us in our Life of Bishop Aylmer, p. 84 of this Dictionary. The most important of Knox's works—which consist principally of controversial tracts, devotional treatises, and liturgical manuals—is his Historie of the Reformation of Religion within the Realme of Scotland; in V. Books: with his Life, by David Buchanan, Edin., 1584, 8vo; 1st ed. It will be noticed that this work was pub. after the author's death, who did not finish it. An Account of Buchanan's Interpolations and Omissions will be found in the Appendix No. VI. to Bishop Nicolson's Scot. Hist. Lib., ed. 1776, 109. The 4th, and, until recently, the best, ed. of Knox's History (with several other Pieces, and Life, by Mat. Crawford) was pub. in 1732, fol. This was edited by Ruddiman. Another ed., edited by McGavin, was given to the world in 1831, 8vo; 1841, 8vo. But a more correct ed. than any preceding one has been lately put forth—vol. i., 1846, 8vo; vol. ii., 1848, 8vo—by Mr. David Laing. These two vols. were followed by two others—vol. iii., 1854, 8vo; vol. iv., 1855, 8vo—by the same editor, containing other works of the Scotch Reformer. In 1840, 8vo, the Rev. John Cumming edited The Liturgy of the Church of Scotland; or, John Knox's Book of Common Order. See also Confession of Faith, edited by J. Watson, and Writings of John Knox, in British Reformers, vol. v. We have not lingered long on the life of John Knox; but those who shall be induced, by our recommendation, to refer to the graphic portraiture sketched by the master-hand of Dr. McCrie, will not be disposed to censure us for sending them so soon to his instructive pages. This work—which contains a large amount of biographical and literary matter illustrative of Scotland in the sixteenth century—was first pub. in 1812, 8vo, and has been several times reprinted, edited by Mr. Smee and also by Mr. Andrew Crichton. Crichton's last ed. bears date 1854, fp. 8vo. But a new ed.—being a portion of a new and uniform issue, in 4 vols. 8vo, of Dr. McCrie's Works, edited by his son, of both his names—was put forth by Blackwood & Sons, of Edinburgh and London, in 1856, 2 Pts., 1 vol. 8vo. Previous to this last impression there had been six eds., (each one being an improvement on its predecessor,) besides several unauthorized issues of the first ed., which was enlarged to nearly double its size in subsequent eds.

"A work which has afforded us more amusement and more instruction than any thing we have ever read upon the subject, and which, independent of its theological merits, we do not hesitate to pronounce by far the best piece of history which has appeared since the commencement of our critical career."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xx. 1-29.

"Hume certainly intended to make the Reformers of Scotland odious and ridiculous. He had great powers of exciting sentiments of this kind on whatever occasion he pleased, and he has certainly succeeded in the instance before us. It is quite necessary, therefore, that a very valuable book lately published by Dr. McCrie should be read. His Life of Knox will correct our present notions in many important points."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. X.

"Dr. McCrie is really a great biographer, such as it has not been the lot of Knox's equals, or even his superiors, always to attain; for, however ably the characters of Luther and Calvin have been treated in the general histories of their times, where has either of them found a biographer like the present?"—Lon. Quar. Rev., ix. 418-433.

Having thus referred the reader to the representatives of the various shades of opinion in matters of Church and State, we may safely leave to him the formation of a proper estimate of the character of this remarkable man. As regards his indomitable energy, fervent zeal, and unconquerable courage, there can be no room for debate. The Regent of Scotland well knew the truth of that which he affirmed when he uttered over the Reformer's new-made grave those memorable words,—more quoted than any epicede since the days of Cicero,—“There lies he who never feared the face of man!”

Knox, Vicesimus, D.D., 1752-1821, a native of Newington Green, Middlesex, educated at St. John's College, Oxford, succeeded his father as master of the school at Tunbridge, over which he presided for thirty-three years. He obtained the united rectories of Runwell and Ramsden Crays, Essex, and the chapelry of Shipbourne, Kent. His principal publications are: 1. Essays, Moral and Literary, Lon., 1777, 12mo; anon. Additions were made to later eds., of which perhaps twenty have been pub. The Essays were last printed in vols. i. and ii. of the collective ed. of his works, 1824, 7 vols. 8vo.

"To persons of every description, but especially to young persons, the Essays of our author are invaluable: their first praise is that they recommend, in a most fascinating manner, all that is good and great; and, secondly, they are in a high degree calculated to form the taste and excite a spirit of literary enthusiasm."—Draï's Essays, vol. v. p. 365.

"Mr. Knox has brought together a good deal of information on the great deficiency of Christian doctrines, and the evil consequences of it, and presses powerfully the importance of seeking divine teaching."—Biebersteth's C. S.

11. Nature and Efficacy of the Lord's Supper, 1799, 12mo. Highly commended by Bishop Horsley, who was a great admirer of Knox's religious works, and recommended them for perusal as containing most attractive delineations of the pure spirit of Christianity.

"The Reverend Dr. Knox, master of Tunbridge School, appears to have the imitari auro of Johnson's style perpetually in his mind; and to his assiduous, though not servile, study of it, we may partly ascribe the extensive popularity of his writings."—Boswell: Life of Dr. Johnson.

"The celebrated Vicissimus Knox is a man to be praised as often as he is named, for his literary accomplishments, and yet more to be respected for the rare independence of mind which he ever displayed, and his steady adherence, through the worst of times, to the cause of liberty."—Edin. Review.

Knox, William, 1789–1825, a native of Roxburgh, Scotland, is perhaps better known through the medium of Sir Walter Scott's Diary than by his own poetical productions, a collection of which was pub. in 1818 under the title of The Lonely Hearth, and other Poems, 12mo. He also gave to the world Marioune, or The Widower's Daughter, a Christmas Tale; A Visit to Dublin, 1824; Songs of Israel, 1824; The Harp of Zion, 1825; and many contributions, prose and poetical, to the Litrary Gazette and other periodicals. A new ed. of The Lonely Hearth and other Poems was pub. in 1847, fp. 8vo. Sir Walter Scott, Professor Wilson, and Southey, thought highly of Knox's poetical abilities. See Chambers and Thomson's Biog. Diet. of Eminent Scotsmen, 1855, v. 365–367; Lockhart's Life of Scott.

"His talent then showed itself in a fine strain of pensive poetry, called, I think, The Lonely Hearth, far superior to that of Michael Bruce, whose consumption, by-the-way, has been the life of his verses."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Diary, Dec. 8, 1825; ubi supra.

KOECKER, (a German dentist, probably without an equal in the world as a dentist.) . . . While in America, he was at the head of his profession there, which is no light praise; for in America the diseases of the teeth are more frequent, more wasting, and better understood, than they are anywhere else on earth. Dr. K. cures many diseases that have always been regarded as incurable, even to the time of our celebrated Mr. Fox, who looks upon the derivation of the gums and alviolar processes in that light. . . . Dr. K.'s treatment of denuded nerves, and plugging or stopping, are peculiar to himself, and altogether unrivalled. He has written ably upon these very subjects."—American Writers, No. V, Blackwood's Mag., xli. 201, Feb. 1825.

- Laing, John. Voyage to Spitzbergen, 1815, '18, '20, 8vo.
- Laing, Malcolm, M.P., 1762-1818, a native of Orkney, a member of the bar, has already been noticed by us as editor of the last vol. of Henry's Hist. of Great Britain, 1785. He also edited the Life of James VI., pub. in 1804, and gave to the world two important works of his own. 1. Hist. of Scotland from the Accession of James VI. to the Reign of Q. Anne, 1800, 2 vols. 8vo; 1804, 4 vols. 8vo; 1819, 4 vols. 8vo. This may be considered a continuation of Dr. Robertson's History. In his Prelim. Dissert. on the participation of Mary Queen of Scots in the Murder of Darnley, (first prefixed to the ed. of 1804,) Mr. Laing exhibits a laboured argument in proof of the guilt of Queen Mary.
"His merit as a critical inquirer into history, an enlightened collector of materials, and a sagacious judge of evidence, has never been surpassed. If any man believes the innocence of Queen Mary, after an impartial and dispassionate perusal of Mr. Laing's examination of her case, the state of such a man's mind would be a subject worthy of much consideration by a philosophical observer of human nature. In spite of his ardent love of liberty, no man has yet presumed to charge him with the slightest sacrifice of his historical integrity to his zeal. That he never perfectly attained the art of full, clear, and easy narrative was owing to the peculiar style of those writers who were popular in his youth, and may be mentioned as a remarkable instance of the disposition of particular talents to general vigour of mind."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH; Edin. Rev., xlv. 37.
"I have just finished a careful perusal of your Dissertation on Mary, and I think myself bound to profess my shame for having ever doubted the atrocious guilt of that princess. Hume and Robertson are undoubtedly too mild. The original documents themselves cannot be read without conviction. Whoever doubts the genuineness of the long letter from Glasgow, or of Haubert's confession, must either be incorrigibly prejudiced, or altogether unaccustomed to the examination of evidence. If she were tried before me, I should certainly direct a jury to find her guilty."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH; Letter to Laing, 28th July, 1807, in Wickintush's Life.
"The ardour of Mr. Laing in the cause of liberty is not discredited by democratic coarseness or theoretic refinement. His enquiry into the controverted question of Mary's participation in the death of Darnley is minute without tediousness and acute without sophistry."—DR. PARR.

"A work which will be found often contributing to explain and illustrate the reign of Charles the First, but absolutely necessary in considering the reign of Charles the Second."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XIX., q. v.

"It is a work particularly rich in illustrative notes."—Dibdin's Lib. Com.

Charles James Fox, a warm friend of Laing, considered this history a work of great value. It has been regretted that so able a historian should not have given more of the results of his investigations to the world.

"Laing was most acute and ingenious."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

"Whether I consider his sagacity in explaining causes, his clearness in relating facts, his vigour in portraying characters, or his ingenuity in unfolding and enforcing principles, I shall ever find reason to lament that the continuation of Hume's History was not undertaken by a writer so eminently qualified as Laing was for a work so arduous and so important."—DR. PARR.

2. The Poems of Ossian; containing the Poetical Works of James Macpherson, in prose and verse, with Notes and Illustrations, 1805, 2 vols. 8vo. The object of the notes and illustrations is to prove the dishonesty of Macpherson, whom the critic handles without gloves:

"Had Macpherson forged a fifty-pound note and got the cash from Laing, he could not have been treated more unworthily: he is looked upon as a highland Catheran, who has made a descent on the Lowlands and marched away with much 'bestial.'"—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years. See MACPHERSON, JAMES, M.P.

Laing's work elicited answers from Mr. McDonald and the Rev. Mr. Graham. See Blackw. Mag., xvi. 701; Chambers and Thomson's Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen, 1855, iii. 345-349; Lord Cockburn's Memorials of his Own Time, 1856.

"These Notes embody more information, more instruction, more thought, and more entertainment, than twenty of the average octavos that annually profess to teach and amuse us with the incidents and the conclusions of travel. The tone of the author is admirable, on account of its manliness, independence, and fearless expression; and there is not a passage in the book that does not supply food for thought and strong suggestive points."—*Lon. Lamb, Lady Caroline, 1785-1828, the daughter of the Earl of Besborough, and wife of the Hon. William Lamb, (now Lord Melbourne,) gained some reputation by three novels and her knowledge of languages. 1. Glenarvon, 1816, 3 vols. 12mo. Glenarvon is supposed to represent Lord Byron. 2. Graham Hamilton, 2 vols. p. 8vo. 3. Ada Reis, 1823, 3 vols. 12mo. Lady Caroline also composed many poems. A biographical notice of her ladyship and a notice of her works will be found in The Annual Biography and Obituary for 1829.

Lamb, Charles, Feb. 18, 1775-Dec. 27, 1834, a native of London, was the son of John Lamb, clerk, servant, &c. to Mr. Salt, a benches of the Inner Temple. After an early education at the school of Christ's Hospital, and a brief engagement in the South Sea House under his brother John, Charles was so fortunate as to obtain a permanent situation in the accountant's office of the East India Company, which he held from April, 1792, until March, 1825,—retiring on a pension of £450 per annum. A domestic tragedy which occurred in his twenty-second year is connected at once with the most mournful and most pleasing recollections which cluster around the name of the author of Elia. Mary Lamb (Bridget Elia) in a fit of insanity, in the month of September, 1796, suddenly deprived her mother of life: she was proved to be in an insensate state of mind, and by a righteous verdict confided to her brother (by ten years her junior) for safe keeping. How faithfully the tender brother fulfilled this duty,—how anxiously he watched over his patient,—his by the double right of nature and legal obligation,—is familiar to those who know the least of his history. He now abandoned all hopes of union with one to whom he was deeply attached, and nerved himself to the discharge of his fraternal and filial duties: "I am wedded, Coleridge," he writes to his most dearly loved friend, "to the fortunes of my sister and my poor old father." The father died shortly after his wife had been summoned in so awful and sudden a manner to her account. Mary Lamb enjoyed her brother's affectionate guardianship until his eyes were closed in death, and survived him thirteen years, dying May 20, 1847. To great amiability of disposition she added considerable literary taste, and composed, in conjunction with her brother Charles, four juvenile works,—viz.: 1. Mrs. Leicester's School; or, the History of several Young Ladies, related by themselves, 1808, 12mo. 2. Tales from the Plays of Shakspeare, 1807, 2 vols. 12mo; 10th and last ed., 1855, 12mo. Mr. Charles Knight, in his ed. (1844, 2 vols. 18mo) of this popular work, has added to each Tale a few Scenes from Shakspeare.

"One of the most useful and agreeable companions to the understanding of Shakspeare which have ever been produced. The youthful reader who is about to taste the charms of our great bard is strongly recommended to prepare himself by first reading these elegant tales, which in a short compass, and adopting as much as possible the language of the great original, give each plot and story in a most impressive manner. Even those who are familiar with every line of the original will be delighted with the pleasing and compendious way in which the story of each play is here presented to them."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

3. The Adventures of Ulysses: intended as a Companion to the Adventures of Telemachus, 1808, 12mo; last ed., 1845, med. 8vo. This work is also ascribed exclusively to the pen of Charles Lamb. 4. Poetry for Children; entirely original, 1809, 2 vols. 12mo. For further information respecting Lamb's sister we must refer the reader to Talfourd's Final Memorials of her brother. Charles Lamb's first appearance before the world as an acknowledged author was in 1797, when there appeared in a small 12mo vol. a number of poems by Coleridge, Charles Lloyd, and our author. Lamb's share in this literary copartnership occupies twenty-eight pages, "within which space," says his biographer, "was comprised all that Lamb at this time had written which he deemed worth preserving." In the next year the blank verse of Lloyd and Lamb, which had been contained in the vol. just named, was pub. in a thin 12mo, under the title of Blank Verse, by Charles Lloyd and Charles Lamb. The vol. met with but little favour from the Monthly Reviewers:

"After a contemptuous notice of The Mourning Muse of Lloyd, Lamb receives his quoetus in a line:—Mr. Lamb, the joint author of this little volume, seems to be very properly associated with his plautive companion."

To this vol. succeeded—1. Rosamund Gray and Old Blind Margaret, 1798, 12mo. Very favourably reviewed in the Lon. Monthly Review for August, 1800.

"For mere pathos, however, all that Lamb has ever done falls far short of his beautiful tale Rosamund Gray. I remember when I first read it, many years ago, I had been very ill and dispirited, and, after resorting to book after book in vain for amusement, I took up the little story. Its simplicity attracted me at once; it opened upon my then fevered imagination with all the freshness of a vernal landscape, and its deep and unpretending pathos wou my heart."—Recollections of Lamb.

2. John Woodvil, a Tragedy; with Fragments of Burton, &c., 1802, 8vo. John Woodvil—an imitation of the style of the English dramatists of the age of Elizabeth—was offered to Kemble for the stage, and rejected.

"Godwin's catastrophe had probably rendered him [Kemble] less solicitous to encounter a similar peril,—which the fondest admirers of John Woodvil will not regret that it escaped. While the occasional roughness of its verse would have been felt as strange to ears as yet unused to the old dramatists whom Lamb's Specimens had not then made familiar to the town, the delicate beauties enshrined within it would scarcely have been perceived in the glare of the theatre."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: Sketch of Lamb's Life.

"Mr. Lamb's John Woodvil may be considered as a dramatic fragment, intended for the closet rather than the stage. It would sound oddly in the lobbies of either theatre, amidst the noise and glare and bustle of resort; but there where we have treasured up our hearts' in silence and in solitude it may claim and find a place for itself. . . . The defective or objectionable parts of this production are imitations of the defects of the old writers: its beauties are his own, though in their manner."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth, Lect. VIII, § v.

Mr. Hazlitt remarks, on another occasion, "There is much that is exquisite, both in sentiment and expression, in Lamb's play; and the following description of the spots of the forest has a truly antique air, like a passage in Heywood or Shirley:

"To see the sun to bed, and to arise!"

"So far as I was left at leisure, by a more potent order of poetry, to think of the John Woodvil at all, I had felt and acknowledged a delicacy and tenderness in the situations as well as the sentiments, but disfigured, as I thought, by quaint, grotesque, and mimetic phraseology."—De Quincey's Recollections of Charles Lamb.

"The passages which we have already quoted are, we trust, sufficient to justify our opinion of the age of the present drama. We might have selected many other passages of equal antiquity. The whole is indeed almost uniformly venerable, and will be justly appreciated by all who are desirous of possessing a complete specimen of the drama in its state of pristine rudeness."—MR. BROWN: Elin. Rev., ii. 90-96.

This contemptuous notice, from which we have extracted the above half-dozen lines, elicits the censure of Sergeant Talfourd in his Sketch of Lamb's Life.

3. Mr. H—; a Farce, 1806; not printed at the time. This piece was unsuccessful at Drury Lane Theatre, although Elliston played the principal character; but it had a great run at the Philadelphia theatre, with Mr. Wood as the hero. 4. Specimens of English Dramatic Poets who lived about the time of Shakspeare, with Notes, 1808, 8vo; often reprinted; last ed., 1854, p. 8vo. A second series of Specimens was pub. by Lamb in Hone's Every-Day Book, under the title of the Garrick Papers.

"He carries us on through whole scenes by a true, unerring motion. His was a poetical mind labouring in poetry."—Harold's Amusements of Literature: The Predecessors and Contemporaries of Shakspeare.

"A selection in which are displayed the utmost judgment and taste. The critical notices are extremely valuable, and above any praise of mine."—SINGER, in his ed. of Chapman.

"It was only by slow and unperceptible degrees that they won their way to the apprehensions of the most influential minds, and wrought out the genial purpose of the editor in renewing a taste for the great contemporaries of Shakspeare."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: Sketch of the Life of Lamb.

It is much to be regretted that a collection disfigured by so many indecencies ever won its way into public favour; and no man confers a benefit upon society by "renewing a taste for the great contemporaries of Shakspeare" so long as he renews at the same time a taste for their abominable obscenities. But we have already said enough upon this fruitful theme in our lives of BEAUMONT, FRANCIS; COLLIER, JEREMY; CONGREVE, WILLIAM; FORD, JOHN.

Mr. Macaulay (see his Essays, Lon., 1851, iii. 8-12, and Elin. Rev., Jan. 1841) properly, but too tenderly, rebukes Lamb's sophistical apology for the shocking literary immoralities of the early English dramatists. But no one since the days of doughty old Jeremy Collier has better handled this subject than Christopher North, in his Hour's Talk about Poetry. We give a brief extract:

"It is satisfactory to know that the good sense and good feeling and good taste of the people of England will not submit to be labourled by editors and critics into unqualified admiration of such enormities. The Old English Drama has buried in the dust with all its tragedies. Never more will they move across the stage. . . . But the monstrosities we have mentioned are not the worst to be found in the Old English Drama. Others there are, that, till civilized Christendom falls back into barbarous leathendom, must forever be unendurable to human ears, whether long or short,—we mean the obscenities. That sin is banished forever from our literature. The poet who might dare to commit it would be immediately hooted out of society and sent to roost in barns among the owls. But the Old English Drama is stuffed with ineffable pollutions, . . . and we cannot, for our part, imagine a Family Old English Dramatist."

"Neither Holland House nor the Elinburgh Review can make men permanently overlook the glaring defects of the Old English Drama apart from Shakspeare. Its extravagance, its conceits, its indecency, its constant delineation of profligate characters, has blinded men, and blinded them justly, to its vigour, its variety, its exquisite occasional beauty. Read excellence needs no testering; Holland House is not required to keep Milton or Pope aloft; the fame of Homer is greater than it was a thousand years ago; every successive generation is charmed by the delicacy of Virgil's taste and fascinated by the vigour of Dante's conceptions."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Essays, Polit., Histor., and Moral., Elin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 118: The Romantic Drama: originally pub. in Blackw. Mag., Aug. 1840.

5. Works in Verse and Prose, 1818, 2 vols. 18mo. This collection includes nearly all that Lamb had then written.

6. The Essays of Elia, 1823. 7. The Last Essays of Elia, 1833. Often reprinted; best ed. (separately pub.) 1833, 12mo. The Essays were originally pub. as fugitive pieces in the London Magazine, &c.

"They are carefully elaborated; yet never were works written in a higher defiance to the conventional pomp of style. A sly wit, a happy pun, a humorous combination, lets the light into the intricacies of the subject, and supplies the place of ponderous sentences. Seeking his materials for the most part in the common paths of life,—often in the humblest,—he gives an importance to every thing, and sheds a grace over all."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: Sketch of the Life of Lamb.

"The prose essays under the signature of Elia form the most

d. Jighliff section amongst Lamb's works. They traverse a peculiar field of observation, sequestered from general interest; and they are composed in a spirit too delicate and unobtrusive to catch the ear of the noisy crowd clamouring for strong sensations. . . . They resemble Addison's papers also in the diction, which is natural and idiomatic even to carelessness. They are equally faithful to the truth of nature."—De Quincey's Biographical Essays: Charles Lamb.

"As a dramatic writer Lamb was sadly deficient in plot and construction. But as a critic his merits were of a higher order; and he is entitled to stand nearly in the first rank. His reputation will, however, ultimately rest on the Essays of Elia, than which our literature rejoices in few things finer."—D. M. Moir's Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

"Shakspeare himself might have read them and Hamlet have acted them; for truly was our excellent friend of the genuine line of Yorick."—LORD HUNT: London Journal.

"His prose essays and sketches of men and manners are in a bolder and happier spirit (than his verses): there is a quaint vigour of language, a fanciful acuteness of observation, and such true humanities and noble sensibilities sparkling everywhere, as rank him among the most original critics of the age."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"Elia in his happiest moods delights me: he is a fine soul; but when he is dull his dulness sets human stupidity at defiance. He is like a well-bred, ill-trained pointer. He has a fine nose, but he won't or can't range. He keeps always close to your foot, and then he points larks and titmice. You see him snuffing and snoking and brandishing his tail with the most impassioned enthusiasm, and then, drawn round into a semicircle, he stands beautifully dead set. You expect a burst of partridges or a towering cockpheasant, when, lo and behold! away fits a lark, or you discover a mouse's nest, or there is absolutely nothing at all. Perhaps a shrew has been there the day before. Yet, if Elia were mine, I would not part with him for all his faults."—TRICKLER: Noctes Ambrosianæ, April, 1822.

8. Album Verses and other Poems, 1830. A collective ed. of Lamb's Poetical Works alone was pub. in 1838, sm. 8vo; 1839, med. 8vo. Prose and Poetical Works, 1838, 5 vols. p. 8vo. Prose Works, 1839, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 1840, med. 8vo; 1847, p. 8vo. Letters, with Sketch of his Life by Sir T. N. Talfourd, 1837, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 1841, med. 8vo, and in 16mo; 1850, 12mo. Prose and Poetical Works, with his Letters, and Life by Talfourd, 1850, 4 vols. 12mo. Contents: Vol. I. Letters of Lamb, with Sketch of his Life by Talfourd. II. Final Memorials; consisting of Letters, with Sketches of some of his Companions by Talfourd. III. Essays of Elia. IV. Rosamund Gray; Essays; Letters under Assumed Signatures published in The Reflector; Fragments from Burton's Common-Place Book; Mr. H—, a Farce; Poems; Sonnets; Blank Verse; John Woodvil, a Tragedy; The Witch; Album Verses; Miscellaneous Poems; Sonnets; Commemorative Verses; Translations from Vincent Bourne; Ode to the Treadmill; Going or Gone; Free Thoughts on several Eminent Composers; The Wife's Trial.

This excellent ed. was revised throughout and enlarged and repub. in 1852, r. 8vo; 1856, 4 vols. 12mo. The stereotype plates of 1850 were consequently destroyed.

Having considered Lamb as an essayist and as a dramatist, we must not conclude without a brief notice of his characteristics as a poet and as a conversationalist.

CHARLES LAMB AS A POET.

"Charles Lamb was a true poet, but not a great one. His genius was peculiar and wayward, and his mind seemed so impregnated with the dramatists preceding or cotemporary with Shakspeare—Marlowe Webster, Ford, Shirley, Marston, Massinger, and their compeers—that he could not help imitating their trains of thought. Yet he struck out a few exquisite things,—sparks from true genius which can never be extinguished: as The Old Familiar Faces; To Hester; The Virgin of the Rocks; and the descriptive forest-scene in John Woodvil, which it is said Godwin, having found somewhere extracted, was so enchanted with, that he hunted—of course vainly—through almost all the earlier poets in search of it:

"To see the sun to bed, and to arise; &c."

—Moir's Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

"There is much quaint feeling in his verses: he has used the style of the good old days of Elizabeth in giving form and utterance to his own emotions; and, though often unelevated and prosaic, every line is informed with thought or with some vagrant impulse of fancy. . . . He gives portraits of men whose manners have undergone a city change; records sentiments which are the true offspring of the mart and the custom-house, and attunes his measure to the humony of other matter than musical breezes and melodious brooks."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"All the great poets of the day have shown strong dramatic power in their narrative or heroic poems. We see no reason why Mr. Lamb should not be classed along with these writers. He is probably better acquainted and more deeply imbued with the spirit of the tragic genius of England than any of them."—Blackwood's Mag.

"His poetical productions are very limited, but they are sufficient, both in quality and quantity, to secure for him a prominent station among the poets of Great Britain."—Mrs. S. C. HALL.

"Those, therefore, err, in my opinion, who present Lamb to our notice amongst the poets. Very pretty, very elegant, very tender, very beautiful verses he has written; nay, twice he has written verses of extraordinary force,—almost demonic force—viz.: The Three Graves and The Gipsy's Malison. But, speaking generally, he writes verses as one to whom that function was a secondary and occasional function; not his original and natural vocation,—not an επος, but a πυρρον."—De Quincey's Recollections of Charles Lamb.

CHARLES LAMB AS A CONVERSATIONIST.

"Many of Lamb's witty and curious sayings have been repeated since his death, which are worthy to be held in undying remembrance; but they give no idea of the general tenour of his conversation, which was far more singular and delightful in the traits which could never be recalled than in the epigrammatic turns which it is possible to quote. It was fretted into perpetual eddies of verbal felicity and happy thought, with little tranquil intervals reflecting images of exceeding elegance and grace. He sometimes poured out puns in startling succession, sometimes curiously contrived a train of sentences to introduce the catastrophe of a pun, which in that case was often startling from its own demerit."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: Sketch of the Life of Lamb.

"It is forever to be regretted that so many of Lamb's jests, repartees, and pointed sayings should have perished irrevocably; and from their fugitive brilliancy (which, as Serjeant Talfourd remarks, often dazzle too much to allow of the memory coolly retracing them some hours afterwards) it is also to be regretted that many have been improperly reported."—De Quincey's Recollections of Charles Lamb.

"Nor is he otherwise in company than he is on paper: his wit is unwearied, and his gentleness of heart ever uppermost, save when he chooses to be sarcastic; and then he soothes whoever he offends, by some happy and unhopd-for compliment."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

Hazlitt gives us a graphic picture of one of the Noctes Ambrosianæ at Lamb's:

"This was the case formerly at L—'s, where we used to have many lively skirmishes at their Thursday evening parties. I doubt whether the Small-coal man's musical parties could exceed them. Oh for the pen of John Bunce to consecrate a petit souvenir to their memory! There was L. himself, the most delightful, the most provoking, the most witty and sensible, of men. He always made the best pun and the best remark in the course of the evening. His serious conversation, like his serious writing, is his best. No one ever stammered out such fine, piquant, deep, eloquent things in half a dozen sentences as he does. His jests scald like tears; and he probes a question with a play upon words. What a keen, laughing, hair-brained vein of home-felt truth! What choice venom! How often did we cut into the haunch of letters while we discussed the haunch of mutton on the table! How we skimmed the cream of criticism! How we got into the heart of controversy! How we picked out the marrow of authors!"—Table-Talk: On the Conversation of Authors.

It would be hardly an accurate use of language to assert that Lamb is or ever was a "popular writer." In the words of the author's friend of many years,—the English Opium-Eater,—he "ranks amongst writers whose works are destined to be forever unpopular and yet forever interesting,—interesting, moreover, by means of those very qualities which guarantee their own popularity. The same qualities which will be found forbidding to the worldly and the thoughtless, which will be found insipid to many even amongst robust and powerful minds, are exactly those which will continue to command a select audience in every generation."—Biographical Essays: Charles Lamb.

"His works—I again utter my conviction—will be received as amongst the most elaborately finished gems of literature: as cabinet-specimens which express the utmost delicacy, purity, and tenderness of the national intellect, together with the rarest felicity of finish and expression, although it may be the province of other modes of literature to exhibit the highest models in the grander and more impassioned forms of intellectual power. Such is my own intimate conviction."—Ibid.: Recollections of Charles Lamb.

"The glimpses and flashes which Charles Lamb flings over a subject shew us more of its bearings than a hundred farthing candles ostentatiously held up by the hands of formal and pragmatical literati. Every thing that rises up before his mind is set before us in vivid beauty. The style of his prose is exceedingly beautiful, in imitation of those rich older writers of ours, but always easy, simple, graceful, and concise."—Blackw. Mag.

To quote the language of one of the most accomplished critics of the age, on either side of the water,

"Were it only for the peculiar species of fame which Lamb's contributions to the light literature of his country have obtained him,—were it only for the valuable lesson involved in this tributary heritage,—in the method by which it was won, in the example with which it is associated,—there would remain ample cause for congratulation among the real friends of human improvement; there would be sufficient reason to remember, gratefully and long, the gifted and amiable essayist. Instead of the feverish passion for reputation which renders the existence of the majority of professed littérateurs of the present day a wearing and anxious trial, better becoming the dust and heat of the arena than the peaceful shades of the academy, a calm and self-reposing spirit pervades and characterizes the writings of Lamb. They are obviously the offspring of thoughtful leisure; they are redolent of the otium; and in this consists their peculiar charm. We are disposed to value this characteristic highly at a time which abounds, as does our age, with a profusion of forced and elaborate writings."—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN: The Humorist, Charles Lamb: Characteristics of Literature, First Series, N. York, 1849, 130-170.

Whatever points of difference may exist between these many critics respecting the character and literary recreations (for he has forbidden us to call them Works) of Charles Lamb, there is probably no one who would not cheerfully endorse the sentiment well expressed by an eminent critic whom we have had occasion to quote on a preceding page of this article:

"We admire his genius: we love the kind nature which appears in all his writings; and we cherish his memory as much as if we had known him personally."—T. B. MACAULAY: Comic Dramatists of the Restoration: Works, Lon., 1854, iii. 8; and in Edin. Rev., Jan. 1841.

Lander, Richard, 1804-1834, a native of Cornwall, made three expeditions into Africa. 1. With Captain Hugh Clapperton, 1825-28. In 1829, 4to, (1830, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.) Lander pub. Clapperton's Journal and his own kept during this expedition: Records of Captain Clapperton's Last Expedition to Africa; with R. Lander's Journal, Lon., 1829, 4to. See CLAPPERTON, HUGH. 2. With his brother, John Lander, (1806-1834,) 1830-31. On the 18th of November, 1830, they were rewarded for their toils and perils by reaching the Atlantic Ocean through the river Nun, (First Brass River,) one of the chief branches of the Niger. On their return home, June, 1831, Mr. Murray gave the brothers one thousand guineas for their journals, which were prepared for publication by Lieut. Beecher, R.N., and issued under the title of Journal of an Expedition to Explore the Course and Termination of the Niger; with a Narrative of a Voyage down that River to its Termination, by Richard Lander and John Lander, 1832, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1845, 2 vols. 18mo. 3. With Macgregor Laird and Dr. R. A. K. Oldfield, 1832-34. During a conflict with the savages Lander was wounded by a musket-ball, and died at Fernando Po, Feb. 7, 1834. His brother John sank under the unwholesome effects of the climate, and, with many others connected with this unfortunate expedition, found a grave in a land of strangers. Laird and Oldfield lived to publish an account of the Expedition, (1837, 2 vols. 8vo.) which we have already noticed on a preceding page. See LAIRD, MACGREGOR, and OLDFIELD, DR. R. A. K. Landon, Letitia Elizabeth, (Mrs. Maclean,) 1802-1838, generally known by her initials,—L. E. L.,—was a native of Brompton, London, the daughter of an army-agent, the niece of Dr. Landon, Dean of Exeter, and the sister of the Rev. Whittington Henry Landon. She commenced writing at an early age, and, some of her poetry meeting with the approval of Mr. Jerdan, editor of the London Literary Gazette, Miss Landon soon became an important contributor to its columns, and, indeed, coeditor of the paper. On the 7th of June, 1833, her literary engagements were closed by her marriage to Mr. George Maclean, Governor of Cape Coast Castle, and she shortly afterwards sailed for her new home. She survived her arrival but a few months, her life being suddenly terminated, October 15, 1833, by an accidental over-dose of prussic acid, which she was in the habit of taking for hysteric affections and spasms with which she had been for some time afflicted. This appears to be the true version of the story, and there seems to be no necessity, as we certainly have no space, for the discussion of any other theory. For further information respecting this popular author, and critical notices of her writings, the reader is referred to the authorities subjoined. Miss Landon's publications were as follows: 1. The Tale of Adelaide, a Swiss Romantic Tale; and other Poems, 1821, 12mo. 2. The Inprovisatrice, and other Poems, 1824, 12mo. 3. The Troubadour, Catalogue of Pictures, and Historic Sketches, 1825, 12mo. 4. The Golden Violet, and other Poems, 1826, 12mo. 5. The Venetian Bracelet, The Lost Pleiad, A History of the Lyre, and other Poems, 1829, 12mo. 6. Ethel Churchill, or The Two Brides: a Novel, 1832, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 1834, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 7. Francesca Carrara; a Novel, 1834, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 8. The Vow of the Peacock, and other Poems, 1835, 12mo. 9. Romance and Reality; a Novel, 3 vols. p. 8vo; also in 12mo. 10. Traits and Trials of Early Life, 1846; new ed., 1844, fp. 8vo. This partakes of the character of an autobiography of the author. 11. Duty and Imagination; a Novel, 1833, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 12. Flowers of Loveliness, with Poetical Illustrations, 1833, 4to. After Mrs. Maclean's decease there were pub. (13) The Zenana, and minor Poems, with a Memoir, (by Emma Roberts,) 1829, fp. 8vo. 14. The Life and Literary Remains of L. E. L., (by Laman Blanchard,) 1841, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 1855, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. These vols. contain a Tragedy, and upwards of one hundred pieces in verse and prose, all before unpublished. 15. Characteristics of the Genius and Writings of L. E. L., 1841, p. 8vo. 16. Lady Anne Granard; a Novel, 1842, 3 vols. p. 8vo. A new collective ed. of her Poetical Works was pub. in 1839, 4 vols. fp. 8vo; again, 1844, 4 vols. 12mo; 1849, 2 vols. 12mo; 1850, 2 vols. 16mo; 1850, 12mo. In addition to the works already enumerated, Miss Landon wrote many fugitive pieces for annuals and periodicals, edited Fisher's Drawing-Room Scrap-Book from 1831 until the year of her marriage, and also edited the Easter Gift and a number of other illustrated works. "Letitia Elizabeth Landon is, next to Sister Joanna, the most successful poetess of our day. She is the L. E. L. of many a pretty poem: nor has she sung only a tender ditty or two and then shut her lips to listen to the applause they brought; she has written much—sometimes loftily, sometimes touchingly, and always fluently and gracefully. She excels in short and neat things; yet she has poured out her fancy and her feelings through the evolutions of a continuous narrative and intricate story. The flow of her language is remarkable: her fancy is ever ready, and never extravagant."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833.

"Her deficiency alike in judgment and taste made her wayward and capricious, and her efforts seemed frequently impulsive. Hence she gave to the public a great deal too much.—A large part of her writings being destitute of that elaboration, care, and finish essentially necessary in the fine arts, even when in combination with the highest genius, to secure permanent success; for the finest poetry is that which is suggestive,—the result as much of what has been studiously withheld as of what has been elaborately given. It is quite apparent, however, that L. E. L. had opened her eyes to these her defects, and was rapidly overleaping them: for her very last things—those published in her Remains by Laman Blanchard—are incomparably her best, whether we regard vigorous conception, concentration of ideas, or judicious selection of subject. Her faults originated in an enthusiastic temperament and an effervescent fancy, and showed themselves, as might have been expected, in an unmeasured prodigality of glittering imagery,—her sense, untamed and untutored, ever darting in dalliance from one object to another, like the talismanic bird in the Arabian story."—Moir's Poet. Sketches of the Past Half Century, 1851.

"I should say that it is the young and ardent who must always be the warmest admirers of the larger poems of L. E. L. They are filled with the faith and the fancies of the young. The scenery and ornaments are of that rich and showy kind which belongs to the youthful taste,—the white rose, the jessamine, the summer garniture of deep grass and glades of greenest foliage, festal gardens with lamp and bowers, gay cavaliers and jewelled dames, and all that glitters in young eyes and love-haunted fancies. But, among these, numbers of her smaller poems from the first dealt with subjects and sympathies of a more general kind and gave glimpses of a nobility of sentiment, and a bold expression of her feeling of the unequal lot of humanity, of a far higher character. . . . Her prose stories have all the leading characteristics of her poetry. Their theme is love, and their demonstration that all love is fraught with destruction and desolation. But there are other qualities manifested in the tales. The prose page was for her a wider tablet, on which she could, with more freedom and ampler display, record her views of society."—Howitt's Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets, vol. ii.

"The fashionable as well as the familiar poetry of the present day sparkles with fanciful yet true descriptions, of which the subjects are, in general, among the most obvious and yet the least noticed, circumstances, recurring every day and everywhere. The brilliant parterres of Miss Landon's enclosure on the south of Parnassus, where ideas, like humming-birds, are seen flying about in tropical sunshine or fluttering over blossoms of all hues and climes, and the home-meadows of John Clare, the Northamptonshire peasant, whose thoughts, like bees, are ever on the wing in search of honey from 'the meekest flower that blows,' are equally productive of these curiosities of literature."—James Montgomery's Lects. on General Lit., 2d. ed., Lect. V.

"Not many years before, (the death of Eliot Warburton,) a female authoress—whose lyre, as melancholy and not less melodious than that of Sappho, had so deeply moved the British heart—breathed her last on the sombre shores of Cape Coast Castle. But the poems of L. E. L., of surpassing sweetness and pathos, rivaling those of Mrs. Norton herself in heart-rendering sentiment, will long survive their unhappy author, and speak to the heart of generations to which her premature fate will be a lasting subject of commiseration."—SIR ARCHIBALD ANSON: Hist. of Literat., 1810-1862, chap. v.

"NORTH. 'So do I; and, being old gentlemen, we may blamelessly make the public our confidante. There is a poetic purity in all her feelings that endears to me both her literary and personal character. She is a true enthusiast. Her affections overflow the imagery her fancy lavishes on all the subjects of her song, and colour it with a rich and tender light which makes even confusion beautiful, gives a glowing charm even to the most common, and when the thoughts themselves are full formed and substantial, which they often are, brings them prominently out upon the eye of the soul in flashes that startle us into sudden admiration. The originality of her genius, methinks, is conspicuous in the choice of its subjects; they are unobscured; and in her least successful poems—as wholes—there is no death of poetry. Her execution has not the consummate elegance and grace of Fanny Hemans; but she is very young, and becoming, every year she lives, more mistress of her art,—and has chiefly to learn how to use her treasures, which, profuse as she has been, are in abundant store. And, in good truth, the fair and happy being has a fertile imagination: the soil of her soul, if allowed to be fallow for one sunny summer, would, I predict, yield a still richer and more glorious harvest. I love Miss Landon; for in her genius does the work of duty; the union of the two is 'beautiful exceedingly.'—and virtue is its own reward, far beyond the highest amount of praise ever bestowed by critic, though round her fair forehead is already wreathed the immortal laurel.'"—Noctes Ambrosianæ, Feb. 1832.

Landon, Walter Savage, poet, soldier, philosopher, essayist, and critic, is a son of Walter Landon, Esq., and, his second wife, Elizabeth Savage, and opened his eyes, amidst opulence and refinement, at Ipsley Court, Warwickshire, on the 30th of January, 1775. More than four score years, "rich with the spoils of time," have since elapsed, but the boy-author of the last century still "lives a prosperous gentleman," and even to the present day often charms his sympathizing readers with the same verbal eloquence and mental ardour which compelled the reluctant admiration of their more conservative grandfathers. The youthful warrior who, in 1808, fired with the love of liberty, still as "the old man eloquent" pours forth a burning torrent of indignant denunciation at the tyrant who has placed his foot upon the neck of an outraged and unresisting nation. There are many, however, who share this generous hatred of oppression, who would be altogether unwilling to justify the extreme measures for its extirpation which Mr. Landon does not hesitate warmly to recommend. The subject of our notice was educated at Rugby School, and at Trinity College, Oxford, was intended for the law, but preferred the cultivation of letters; on the death of his father he resided for some time on the family estates,—which the ingratitude of some of his tenants induced him to sell in 1806; two years later he joined the Spanish patriots under Blake, fought against the ambitious Corsican, and received a colonel's commission in acknowledgment of his services; in 1815 he removed to Italy, where he resided (with the exception of occasional visits to England) for more than thirty years; is now, (1857,) and has been for some years past, living at the town of Bath in England. In 1811 Mr. Landon was married to Julia, daughter of M. J. Huillier de Malperthe, Baron de Neuville. He has three children, and between them he has (Lear-like, but not, we imagine, with Lear's ill success) shared the principal part of his once-ample possessions.

"Wrapp'd his colours round his breast

Mr. Landon commenced authorship at an early age, and, as we have already intimated, has not, even at the ripe age of eighty-two, entirely renounced the use of the gray-goose quill. Twenty years ago, indeed, he declared that he would "publish nothing more for the remainder of his life," (Letter to Countess of Blessington, 1838, &c.) but the public generally forget such promises, and in some cases are glad to see that the promiser is equally oblivious. His publications have been as follows: 1. A Collection of Poems, Lon., 1795, 8vo. 2. Gebirus; a Poem, 1802, 12mo. This is the author's trans. into Latin from his English original. Lord Jeffrey declares that the poem is equally unintelligible in both languages. See Edin. Rev., xl, 91-92. Gebir certainly did not meet with an enthusiastic welcome from the public:

"It had the sublime distinction for some time of having enjoyed only two readers, which two were Southey and myself. . . . Not knowing Southey at that time, I vainly conceived myself to be the one sole purchaser and reader of this poem. I even fancied myself to have been pointed out in the streets of Oxford—where the Landors had been well known in times preceding my own—as the one inexplicable man authentically known to possess Gebir, or even (it might be whispered mysteriously) to have read Gebir. It was not clear but this reputation might stand in lieu of any independent fame, and might raise me to literary distinction."—De Quincey's Notes on Landon: Essays on the Poets, &c., Bost., 1853, 247.

Let us hear Southey on the same theme:

"At Bristol I met with the man of all others whom I was most desirous of meeting,—the only man living of whose praise I was ambitious or whose censure would have humbled me. You will be anxious to know who this could be. Savage Landon, the author of Gebir,—a poem which, unless you have heard me speak of it, you have probably never heard of at all."—Letter to G. C. Bedford, Keswick, April 26, 1808: Southey's Life and Correspondence.

In a letter to Landon himself, dated April 23, 1809, Southey gives an amusing account of his laudatory review of Gebir in the Critical Review. See Southey's Life and Corresp. See our extract from Southey's Letter to Landon, July 15, 1811, post.

"Walter Savage Landon, the deep-mouthed Bœotian of the satire of Byron, is known to the lovers of song by his Gebir Count Julian,—a work less read than it deserves; for it contains passages of peculiar force and no ordinary beauty."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1838.

Cunningham has not got the title exactly as it should be: he evidently refers to the republication of 1831: see No. 3. The inducement for Byron to satirize Landon will be found in Lady Blessington's Conversations with the noble poet. His lordship makes a very lame excuse for his onslaught, and admits that

"he really is a man whose brilliant talents and profound erudition I cannot help admiring as much as I respect his character,—various proofs of the generosity, manliness, and independence of which have reached me: so you see I can render justice (en petit comité) even to a man who says he could not read my works."

The mortal offence is contained in the last line.

3. Count Julian; a Tragedy, 1812.

"I am not disappointed in Count Julian: it is too Greek for representation in these times; but it is altogether worthy of you. The thought and feeling which you have frequently condensed in a single line is unlike any thing in modern composition. The conclusion, too, is Greek. . . . Never was a character more finely conceived than Julian. The image of his seizing the horses is in the very first rank of sublimity: it is the grandest image of power that ever poet produced."—Southey to Landon Keswick, Feb. 12, 1811.

"I look upon Gebir as I do upon Dante's long poem in the Italian,—not as a good poem, but as containing the finest poetry in the language: so it is with Count Julian, and so no doubt, it was with the play which you have so provokingly destroyed."—Southey to Landon, London, July 15, 1811: ubi supra.

Southey does not mince matters; but that he was quite sincere appears from a letter a few weeks later to Sir Walter Scott:

"I have a tragedy of Landon's in my desk, of which Count Julian is the hero: it contains some of the finest touches both of passion and poetry that I have ever seen."—Keswick, Sept. 8, 1811: ubi supra.

A short review of Julian, by the same ardent admirer, will be found in the London Quarterly Review, viii, 86-92. In 1831, 8vo, appeared a new ed. of Gebir and Count Julian, with other Poems, printed for the benefit of Græc Darling. See Lon. Quar. Rev., lviii, 108; Lon. Monthly Review, cxv, 217. 4. Idyllic Heroica, Pisa, 1820, 4to. See Lon. Quar. Rev., lviii, 138; Lon. Monthly Rev., xev, 461. 5. Latin Poems, Lon., 24mo. See Fraser's Mag., xxxvii, 519. 6. Imaginary Conversations of Literary Men and Statesmen, 1824, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1826, 3 vols. 8vo. Second Series, 1829, 2 vols. 8vo. Repub. with adds. in the collective eds. of his works, 1816, 2 vols. med. 8vo; 1854, r. 8vo. 7. Imaginary Conversations of Greeks and Romans; new ed., 1853, 8vo. The author was not the coldest admirer of his own performances:

"My four vols.," he remarks, "contain more than seventy dialogues: let the sturdiest of the connexion [some of the critics] take the ten worst, and if he equals them in ten years I will give him a hot wheaten roll and a pint of brown stout for breakfast."

The dialogues, as they appear in the collective eds. of the author's works in 1816 and '54, amount to one hundred and twenty-five, and many of those formerly printed have been modified and enlarged. The Imaginary Conversations have received a large share both of praise and censure, and are thought to display great inequality. The London Quarterly Reviewer, referring to Mr. Landon's challenge, seems to think that it would be hopeless for almost any writer to attempt to rival the best, but continues:

"To attempt a rivalry with the ten worst would require an impudence of another description,—a brazen front, the exaggeration of caricature, and wit bordering on buffoonery."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lviii, 108.

Lord Jeffrey's notice of the first vol. does not commence in the most complimentary manner possible:

"This work is as remarkable an instance as we have lately met with of the strength and weakness of the human intellect. It displays considerable originality, learning, acuteness, terseness of style, and force of invective; but it is spoiled and rendered abortive throughout by an utter want of temper, of self-knowledge and decorum."—Edin. Rev., xl, 67, 92, q. v.

The best description that we have seen of the Imaginary Conversations occurs in a review of the collective eds. of Landon's Works, 1846, 2 vols. med. 8vo. After specifying certain faults with which the critic thinks them justly chargeable, he proceeds:

"But, these drawbacks stated, how little in reality do they affect the great bulk of these Conversations! What a weighty book they make! How rich in scholarship! how correct, concise, and pure in style! how full of imagination, wit, and humour! how well informed, how bold in speculation, how various in interest, how universal in sympathy! In these hundred and twenty-five dialogues—making allowance for every shortcoming or excess—the most familiar and the most august shapes of the past are reanimated with vigour, grace, and beauty. Its long-dusted ashes rekindle suddenly their wrothed fires, and again shoot up into warmth and brightness. 'Large utterances,' musical and varied voices, 'thoughts that breathe' for the world's advancement, 'words that burn' against the world's oppression, sound on throughout these lofty and earnest pages. We are in the high and goodly company of wits and men of letters; of churchmen, lawyers, and statesmen; of party-men, soldiers, and kings; of the most tender, delicate, and noble women; and of figures that seem this instant to have left for us the Agora or the schools of Athens, the Forum or the Senate of Rome. At one moment we have politicians discussing the deepest questions of state; at another, philosophers still more largely philosophizing.—poets talking of poetry, men of the world of worldly matters, Italians and French of their respective Literatures and Manners.—Lxxxiii. 489.

"His Imaginary Conversations is the work on which his fame—a worthy and well-earned fame—will rest. From his great experience of men of various nations, and his familiar acquaintance with both ancient and modern literature, he has been enabled to introduce the greatest variety of characters and topics, and to make the dialogues a perfect treasury of the broadest and most elevated axioms of practical wisdom."—Howell's Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets.

"A work generally and justly admired for the originality of thought, the depth of reflection, and the free and fearless spirit of inquiry which it exhibits, and for the style—always animated and ever powerful—in which it is written."—DR. PARR: Field's Life, ii. 140.

"The bookseller sent me the first volume of your unpublished series. Some things in it I wished away; with very many more, you know truly, I must be delighted. Lucullus and Cæsar especially pleased me, as one of the most delightful of these conversations throughout."—Southey to Landor, April 14, 1829: Southey's Life and Correspondence. See also Southey's Letter to ———, Oct. 1829: ubi supra.

"It is much superior in execution to the well-known Dialogues of the Dead by Lyttelton."—Goodhugh's E. G. Lib. Mon., 100.

"In our own time, Walter Savage Landor has adopted and improved upon the model of Lyttelton, and when his heroes talk they are certain to say something new."—Lawrence's Lives of the British Historians: Life of Lord Lyttelton.

"Mr. Landor has shown by this work that he possesses much intellectual acuteness, great clearness and vigour of understanding, and a considerable knowledge of the natural springs and movements of the human heart. We conceive this work to include a greater proportion of profound and original thinking, of moral and political wisdom, of elegant scholarship, of acute criticism, and of eloquent, poetical, and just expositions and enforcements of all these, than will be found in the same number of consecutive pages in any other work of the day."—*Lon. 8. Pericles and Aspasia, 1836. 2 vols. 12mo.

"There is another characteristic of Landor's writings, which I mention the more distinctly from the fact that it seems not to have much attracted the admiration even of his admirers—and that is the depth and tenderness of feeling which they breathe. Pericles and Aspasia, especially, is full of the sweetest and truest expressions of sensibility; and so are many of the dialogues. We are frequently forced to drop the book and surrender ourselves to the visions and memories, soft or sad, which his words awaken and cause to pass before the mind."—GEORGE STILLMAN HILLARD: Preface to his Selections from the Writings of Walter Savage Landor. "The author, by a strange principle of calculation, seems to reckon upon its very poverty of merit as a passport at least to its circulation. 'It is only our intimate friends,' says the preface, 'who like us best when we write well: the greater part of readers are complacent at imagining their superiority as they discover our aberrations.' The greater part of readers care for little else than to be pleased with what they read; but if there are others of an opposite temper, it cannot be denied that Mr. Landor has here written with sufficient mediocrity to secure their attention."—*Lon. Many of the pieces formerly printed are enlarged, &c., and some new ones are introduced. Mr. Landor has contributed to a number of the periodicals of the day, and still occasionally corresponds with The Examiner. Miss Mitford perhaps asserts more than we should find it convenient to prove, when, in her chapter on "Poetry that Poets Love," she declares,

"To no one can the words that I have placed at the head of this paper apply more properly than to Mr. Landor. No poetry was ever dearer to poets than his. Nearly fifty years ago we find Southey writing of and to the author of Gebir with a respectful admiration seldom felt by one young man for another; and, from that hour to the present, all whom he would himself most wish to please have showered upon him praises that cannot die."—Recollections of a Literary Life.

A very acute critic remarks that,

"With many high excellencies, Landor's poetry must ever remain a sealed book to the multitude; for whoever prefers to the obviously sublime, beautiful, and true, the grotesque, the visionary, and the involved, must be admired by the capricious select who can alone relish such elements in composition. . . . The style, tone, idiom, and manner of Landor are all quite un-English. He never acquired the Saxon gentility of his mother-tongue; and his Gebir, Count Julian, and many of his other poems read exactly like translations closely rendered."—Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

Southey, however, declares that

"Landor always paints with the finest touch of truth, whether he is describing external or internal nature."—Life and Correspondence.

"The poetry of Savage Landor has not been so much read as his prose. His Imaginary Conversations have eclipsed his verse. Yet there is great vigour, much satire, and much tender feeling in his poems, which should render them acceptable to all lovers of manly feeling."—Howell's Homes, &c. of the Poet.

That Landor is not a popular author, either in poetry or prose, it requires no argument to demonstrate; that he will always maintain a high rank as an English classic we can entertain no doubt.

"Landor," says an American traveller, "is strangely undervalued in England, usually ignored, and sometimes savagely attacked in the Reviews. The criticism may be right or wrong, and is quickly forgotten; but year after year the scholar must go back to Landor for a multitude of elegant sentences,—for wisdom, wit, and indignation that are unforgettable."—Emerson's English Traits.

"Had Mr. Landor, therefore, been read in any extent answering to his merits, he must have become, for the English public, an object of prodigious personal interest. We should have had novels upon him, lampoons upon him, libels upon him; he would have been shown up dramatically upon the stage; he would, according to the old joke, have been 'trauced' in French, and also 'overset' in Dutch. Meantime, he has not been read. It would be an affectation to think it."—De Quincy's Notes on Landor. Bost., 1853. 245.

The personal manners of Mr. Landor have been more than once described: Mr. Emerson, in the work from which we have just quoted, dwells on them at some length; and the portrait which the Countess of Blessington has given us presents an agreeable picture of the Reformer in his "hours of ease." Of him, as of his Scotch predecessor in reformation—though in a different field—it may be truly said "he never feared the face of man;" and it would appear from his gallant bearing at the evening conversazione, after a day of literary toil in the library, that the face of woman (especially such as that of our fair informant) possesses as few terrors.

"I had learned from his works," remarks her ladyship, after meeting Landor at Florence in May, 1825, "to form a high opinion of the man as well as the author. . . . But I was not prepared to find in him the courtly, polished gentleman of high breeding, of manners, deportment, and demeanour that one might expect to meet with in one who had possessed the greatest part of his life in courts. There is no affectation of politeness, no finikin affability in his urbanity, no far-fetched complimentary hyperbolical strain of eulogy in the agreements of his conversation with women and the pleasing things he says to those whom he cares to please."

It will doubtless surprise many worthy conservatives, who consider Landor the implacable enemy of all that they hold most dear in long and fondly cherished theories, to see their foe thus strangely translated from the department

Feræ Nature to that of Manni Assueta! Of her ladyship's sincerity in this zoological heresy there can be no question, for her biographer tells us,

"Of all the literary men with whom Lady Blessington came in contact—and they certainly were not few or undistinguished—at home and abroad, the person whom she looked on with most respect, honour and affectionate regard was Walter Savage Landor."—Madden's Literary Life and Corresp. of the Countess of Blessington.

His schools were crowded with illustrious scholars, and the fame of his genius and erudition was sounded throughout Europe. Langbaine, Gerard, D.D., 1608-1657, Fellow of Queen's Coll., Oxf., pub. an ed. of Longinus, Oxf., 1635, '38, 8vo; Traj. ad Rh., 1694; some works upon the Liturgy, the Univ. of Oxford, &c., and left some valuable MSS. which have been used by succeeding writers. See Athen. Oxon.; Genl. Dict.; Lloyd's Memoirs; Usher's Life and Letters.

Langbaine, Gerard, 1656-1692, son of the preceding, is well known as the author of a work entitled (in its complete shape) An Account of the English Dramatic Poets, &c., Oxf., 1691, 8vo. An abstract, with a continuation, was pub. by Giddon in 1692, 8vo, and in 1719 by Giles Jacob. Langbaine first called his book Momus Triumphans, 1688, 4to; then A New Catalogue of English Plays, 1688, 4to. The copy of his work, with Oldys's MS. notes, now in the British Museum, is sometimes referred to by writers. See Athen. Oxon.; Biog. Dramat.; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.; Brydges's Phillips's Theat. Poet. Anglic., lxxiv., lxxvi.; Lon. Gent. Mag., lxxvi. 37. Langbaine's Account bears a high character for accuracy, but his criticisms have been ridiculed. He tells us that he had in his library above 980 English plays and masques, besides several drolls and interludes.

"She was undoubtedly an amiable and excellent woman."—Edin. Rev., April, 1856.

Mr. Langdale disproves the reflections cast upon Mrs. Fitzherbert's character by Lord Holland, in his Memoirs. The state of the case respecting Mrs. Fitzherbert and the Prince of Wales was briefly this: in the sight of God and by the judgment of the Church of Rome (as declared by the Pope) they were man and wife; in the sight of the laws of England the marriage was a nullity. Of the unimpeachable, immaculate, and truly exemplary character of "Mrs. Fitzherbert's husband" (as Caroline of Brunswick styled The First Gentleman of England) we shall not permit ourselves to speak. Nor does it become the character of our book: the Prince of Wales has no claims as an author,—excepting, indeed, the authorship of profligacy, misery, and vice to the unhappy beings who fell within the circle of his deleterious influence.

Of this alliterative poem, the three first eds. were printed in 1550, and a number since; the last one—pub. 1842, 2 vols. 12mo, 500 copies printed—was edited by the learned antiquary Thomas Wright. Lanman, Charles, b. 1819, at Monroe, Michigan, after a mercantile education in New York from 1835 to '46, determined in the latter year to cultivate literature as a profession, and has given evidence to his many readers that he has not mistaken his calling. He has been connected editorially with the Monroe Gazette, the Cincinnati Chronicle, the New York Express, and from 1847 to the present date, 1857—with the National Intelligencer, and has contributed also to the columns of the Southern Literary Messenger, Bentley's Magazine, and The New York Observer. Many of his fugitive letters, originally pub. in periodicals, Mr. Lanman has since collected into volumes, thus preserving in a permanent shape for the instruction and entertainment of his readers the results of his extensive and intelligent observations. We annex a list of his publications, with a few brief extracts from the numerous commendations which they have elicited from public and private sources.

1. Essays for Summer Hours, Bost., 1842, 12mo; 3d ed., 1853, 16mo.
2. Letters from a Landscape-Painter, Bost., 1845, 12mo. A portion of this work was reprinted in No. 6.
3. A Summer in the Wilderness, N. York, 1847, 12mo. Noticed in the N. Amer. Rev., lxi., 422, (by Prof. Francis Bowen,) and in the American Review, (by G. H. Colton.)
4. A Tour to the River Saguenay, Phila., 1848, 12mo.

These Letters have many graphic touches which show the artist-eye of their ingenious author. They contain lively sketches of natural scenery and amusing narratives of travelling-incidents. At times a striking poetical expression flashes upon us, illuminating the page like a gleam of light. The Letters are very readable and pleasant.—J. G. PALFREY: N. Amer. Rev.

5. Letters from the Allegheny Mountains, N. York, 1849, 12mo.

As descriptive of the scenery of Georgia, Tennessee, and North Carolina,—a district strangely neglected by travellers,—this volume has original merits. It paints the wilderness in vivid colours,—but renders, at the same time, express homage to civilization.—Lon. Athenæum, 1849, 1128-1129.

Some of the scenes depicted in this volume are of startling interest, and every passage bears unmistakable evidence of the man of genius.—GEORGE D. PRENTICE: Louisville Journal.

6. Haw-ho-noo; or, Records of a Tourist, Phila., 1851, 12mo. See No. 2. Illychly commended by William C. Bryant, in the N. York Evening Post; by John R. Thompson, in the South. Lit. Mess.; by E. A. Duyckinck, in the N. York Literary World; and by Harper's Magazine.
7. Canoe-Voyage up the Mississippi, N. York. This is a 2d ed. of No. 3.
8. The Sugar-Camp, and other Sketches, Phila. This is a 2d ed. of No. 6.
9. Private Life of Daniel Webster, 1852, 12mo; Lon., 1853, p. 8vo. Mr. Lanman was private secretary to Daniel Webster, and relinquished his post as Librarian of the War Department, at Mr. Webster's request, to accept of the secretaryship.

10. Adventures in the Wilds of the United States and British Provinces, with an Appendix on Moose-Hunting, by Lieut. Campbell Hardy, (see HARDY, LIEUT.) Phila., 1856, 2 vols. 8vo. This is a republication of Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6, with the addition of three tours not before pub. in book-form,—viz.: I. The Sources of the Potomac, 1851; II. A Tour to the River Restigouche, 1853; III. A Winter in the South, 1854. The author was encouraged in the design of this collective edit. by the following letter from Washington Irving:

"I am glad to learn that you intend to publish your narrative and descriptive writings in a collective form. They carry us into the fastnesses of our mountains, the depths of our forests, the watery wilderness of our lakes and rivers, giving us pictures of savage life and savage tribes, Indians' legends, fishing and hunting anecdotes, the adventures of trappers and backwoodsmen,—our whole arcanum, in short, of indigenous poetry and romance. To use a favourite phrase of the old discoverers, they lay open the secrets of the world to us. I cannot but believe your work will be well received, and meet with the wide circulation which it assuredly merits."

Mr. Edward Everett also warmly advocated the enterprise. We quote a few lines from another letter of Mr. Irving's, written, it will be seen, after the book of Adventures was launched upon the world:

"I hope the success of your work has been equal to its merits. To me your Adventures in the Wilds of America are a continual refreshment of spirits. I take a volume of your work to bed with me after fagging with my pen, and then ramble with you among the mountains and by the streams in the boundless interior of our fresh unbacked country, and regret that I can do so only in idea, and that I am not young enough to be your companion in reality. . . . You are in fact the Picturesque Explorer of our country."—Sunnyside, March 2, 1857.

No. 4 was pub. in London by Bentley, 1847, p. 8vo, under the title of Adventures of an Angler in Canada; and Longman pub. in 1854, p. 8vo, under the title of Adventures in the Wilds of America, a compilation (made by Charles Richard Weld, Esq.) from No. 10. These vols. were well received by the English public.

The author is largely and justly popular in America, as one of the most pleasant sketchers who have followed in the footsteps of the Sketch-Book. Nor is he unknown or unappreciated in this country, in which it has been our very agreeable task to pay tribute to his merits. The periodical press of America has cause to be vain of such contributors as Mr. Lanman."—WILLIAM JERDAN, in the Lon. Lit. Gazette.

"Mr. Lanman writes like a man who observes acutely and describes with spirit and intelligence, rather than one profound as a naturalist, a geographer, or a politician. The charm of the work is its realness, if there be such a word; or, if there be not, then its reality. The reader feels that he is accompanying a clever and truthful guide."—CHARLES DICKENS, in the Lon. News.

Mr. Lanman is yet a young man, and has certainly received encouragement to induce him occasionally to resume the authorial pen whenever he finds time to tell a story and—happier than the philosophic knife-grinder of Ganning—finds that he has a story to tell. Since the above was sent to the press, we notice the following in a paper of the day. (August, 1857.)

"Mr. Charles Lanman, the author, and formerly private secretary to Mr. Webster, has been appointed to a similar position by Mr. Thompson in the Interior Department. The last public position held by Mr. Lanman was that of Examiner of Depositories, under President Pierce."

We should not omit to state that the subject of our notice is a grandson of the late Judge James Lanman, of Norwich, who was a graduate of Yale College, Connecticut, of the class of 1788, a member of the Senate of the United States from 1819 to '23, a holder of many other offices of honour and responsibility, and a "man had in reputation among all the people" for public spirit, private virtues, commanding influence, and extensive usefulness. May the memory of such be ever fresh in the hearts of the people! Judge Lanman's second wife was the mother of Mr. Parke Benjamin, a well-known son of song, already justly censured in this volume as a talent-burier,—as one who, possessing ample ability to write well, can hardly be persuaded to write at all. We must confess, however, that such frugal poets give far less trouble to Dictionary-makers, like ourselves, than their more fertile brethren of the lyre who err in the opposite extreme.

Lardner, Rev. Dionysius, LL.D., one of the most distinguished natural philosophers and mathematicians of modern times, was born April 3, 1793, in the city of Dublin, educated at Trinity College, in his native place; accepted the professorship of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in the London University (now University College) in 1828; resided in the United States from 1840 to '45, and since the latter year has been settled in Paris. Whilst in America Dr. Lardner delivered Popular Lectures on Science and Art in all the principal cities of the Union, which have been pub. in 2 vols. 8vo, and renebed the 15th ed. in 1855. Dr. Lardner is the author of many valuable works on different branches of mathematics, natural philosophy, &c., which have conferred an extensive reputation upon their learned author. Few writers have done so much to introduce science as a welcome guest to the family circle, and few, therefore, can so justly claim the honourable title of benefactor to the public mind of the age. 1. System of Algebraic Geometry, 1823, 8vo. 2. On the Differential and Integral Calculus, 1825, 8vo. 3. On Trigonometry, 1828, 8vo. 4. Discourse on the Advantages of Natural Philosophy, 1828. 5. First Principles of Arithmetic and Geometry, 12mo. 6. Lects. on the Steam-Engine, 1828, 8vo; 8th ed., 1851, p. 8vo; cheap ed., 1848, 12mo. 7. Buelid, Books I-VI.; with a Comment., &c., 9th ed., 1846, 8vo. 8. Theory of Central Forces, 8vo. 9. On Mechanics, 12mo. "The Museum of Science and Art is the most valuable contribution that has ever been made to the scientific instruction of every class of society."—SIR DAVID BREWSTER.

Dr. Lardner has also contributed articles on Algebra, Trigonometry, Natural Philosophy, &c. to the Edinburgh Encyc., the Encyc. Metropol., the Library of Useful Knowledge, the Elin. Rev., London Times, Trans. Royal Astron. Soc., &c. He was, as noticed above, a contributor, (see Nos. 9-14,) the projector, and for some time the editor, of the Cabinet Cyclopaedia which bears his name. This invaluable series—commenced in 1829 and completed in 1844—is comprised in 133 vols. 12mo., pub. at 6d. per vol.—each vol. sold separately,—or £33 18s. (now—1857—reduced to about £17) for the whole. Divisions: History, 67 vols.; Biography, 31 vols.; Natural Philosophy, 13 vols.; Natural History, 15 vols.; Useful Arts, 7 vols. Among the authors of these vols. are Sir Walter Scott, Sir James Mackintosh, Sir John Herschel, Sir N. Harris Nicolas, Sir David Brewster, Robert Southey, Thomas Moore, Bishop Thirlwall, W. Swainson, G. P. R. James, Jas. Montgomery, Prof. Powell, Prof. Heuslow, Rev. G. R. Gleig, and De Sisson & Co.

"One of the most valuable contributions that has ever been made to the cause of general knowledge and national education."—Lon. Standard.

"Some of the later volumes rank among the most useful and elegant contributions to modern literature."—Edlectic Review.

"A rich library of universal knowledge."—Lon. Month. Review.

"It is gratifying to observe with what unflagging spirit this series of publications is carried on by Dr. Lardner. It is the first instance of a literary undertaking of such vast extent having proved thoroughly successful in our country, and it is an instance in which success has been well and thoroughly deserved."—Lon. Examiner.

"The scientific works of Lardner's Cyclopaedia may be read at leisure hours; and the knowledge of these alone will shield us from the imputation of wasting time on classics while ignorant of other subjects."—Student's Guide to a Course of Reading necessary for obtaining University Honours, by a Graduate of Oxford.

"It's chokeful o' maist instructive and enterteenin' maitter."—SHEPHERD, in Notes Ambros., May, 1830, in Blackw. Mag., xxvii. 807.

A biographical account of Dr. Lardner will be found in Men of the Time, Lon., 1856; and see also Dublin Univ. Mag., xxxv. 663; Fraser's Mag., ii. 58, v. 696, with portrait of Dr. Lardner.

Lardner, Nathaniel, D.D., 1684–1768, a Dissenter, of Arian sentiments, a native of Hawkhurst, Kent, was educated at London, Utrecht, and Leyden; in 1713 was appointed tutor in the family of Lady Treby, in 1723, lecturer at the Old Jewry, and in 1729, assistant minister at Cruickshank Friars. He was a man of great learning; and, not being an agreeable preacher, employed nearly the whole of his time in those erudite investigations which will preserve his name to the latest posterity. For a detailed account of these labours, the reader is referred to the Life of Dr. Lardner, by Dr. Kippis, in the collective eds. of the works of the former, first collected, Lon., 1788, 11 vols. 8vo; again, 1815, 5 vols. 4to, £10 10s.; 1827, 10 vols. 8vo, £5 5s.; 1838, 10 vols. 8vo, £5 5s. Contents: Vols. I.–VIII. The Credibility of the Gospel History; IX. Sermons; X. Tracts; Dissertations upon the two new Epistles ascribed to Clement of Rome; Remarks upon Dr. Ward's Dissertations; Indexes. The ed. of 1788 is now very scarce, and copies were sold about thirty years since for 12 to 14 guineas. We quote some opinions upon his principal works. 1. The Credibility of the Gospel History; with a Supplement. Originally pub. in 17 vols. 8vo, 1727–57. For this great work the author received only £150.

"On this occasion it is proper to mention Dr. Lardner's excellent work of the Credibility of the Gospel History, in the second part of which—consisting of several volumes—he hath made a full and accurate collection of the passages which are to be found in the writers of the first ages of the Christian Church relating to the four Gospels and other sacred books of the New Testament. This he hath executed with so much fidelity and diligence, and with such exactness of judgment, that the English reader who hath not opportunity to consult the original will be able to judge for himself upon considering the passages of the original authors, which are very faithfully translated. This affords too clear and continued a proof of their having been generally received in the earliest ages of the Christian Church, that one would hope it should put an end to this part of the controversy."—Leland's Deistical Writers, ed. 1837, 39.

"The services which Dr. Lardner rendered to the cause of Christianity are well known and very considerable. His extensive and accurate investigations into the credibility of the gospel history have left scarcely anything more to be done or desired. Subsequent writers on the evidences of Christianity have generally availed themselves of Lardner's collection of testimonies, deeming it useless to verify his quotations or add to their number. His sentiments on the doctrinal part of Christianity did not injure his reasoning as an historian, but they probably influenced his selection of quotations from the early Christian writers. The History of the Writers of the New Testament Bishop Watson republished in the second volume of his Tracts. The first part of the Credibility was translated into Latin by the celebrated Wolfius. It was also translated into Dutch and German. Welch eulogizes it as insigne opus. The last volume of his collected works contains his Tracts; the vindication of three of the miracles of Christ; on the Logos; the two Epistles ascribed to Clement; on the Mosaic account of the Fall; on Dr. Ward's Dissertations; on Macknight's Harmony; and some minor pieces. They discover his usual research and accuracy, and show how far he departed from the orthodox belief."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"The publication of Dr. Lardner's Credibility was received with every mark of respect and gratitude both by members of the Church of England and Dissenters, and its reputation gradually extended into foreign countries. . . . His Credibility and his Collection of Jewish Testimonies may be said to have given the deistical controversy a new turn, and to have driven the assailants of the gospel from the field of Christian antiquity, in which they esteemed themselves securely entrenched, into the by-paths of sarcasm and irony. . . . The Abbé Labouderie, in his historical notice of Father Colonia, justly pronounces the Credibility to be a magnificent apology for Christianity, and a chef-d'œuvre of learning and criticism, . . . the whole of which Abbé Labouderie has announced his intention of translating into French."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 152–153.

"It is indeed an invaluable performance, and has rendered the most essential service to the cause of Christianity. Whoever peruses this work will find it replete with admirable instruction, sound learning, and candid criticism."—Dr. Kippis: Life of Lardner.

"This elaborate work is truly valuable. It contains the most copious materials for judging of the authenticity and credibility of the canonical scriptures of the New Testament."—Dr. Wm. HALES.

"A very candid and learned but Arian writer. He impartially goes through the principal fathers, showing their testimonies to the Scriptures."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"Nec a loco hoc plane alienum esse, existimo, insigne opus NATHAN LARDNERI, sermone anglicano compositum atque inscriptum: The Credibility of the Gospel History, quum id auctoritatem fidemque scripturam Novi Testamenti diuturno confirmandam spectat. Magno enim studio Lardnerus testimonia auctorum profanorum ac christianorum recensuit atque illustravit, quae probant, vera esse gesta, in libris noui foederis narrata."—Walchi Biblioth. Theolog. Selecta, Jenæ, 1762, tom. tert. p. 472, q. v.

The History of the Apostles and Evangelists, Writers of the New Testament, was pub. as a Supp. to the 2d Part of The Credibility, 1756–57, 3 vols.; again, 1760, 3 vols. 8vo. These 3 vols. form a portion of the 17 noticed above. The 3 vols. will be found in vol. ii. of Bp. Watson's Collection of Tracts.

"This book of Dr. Lardner is so full and judicious on the subject of the canon of the New Testament, that it may of itself be sufficient to give the reader very satisfactory information on that point."—BISHOP WATSON.

"An admirable Introduction to the New Testament. It is a storehouse of literary information, collected with equal industry and fidelity."—BISHOP MARSH: Divinity Lects., Cambridge, 1810, Lect. III., p. 48.

"In his history of the heretics he has shewn the same extent of reading, the same unwearied industry in collecting his scattered materials, which characterizes his other writings."—Dr. BURTON.

No clergyman or candidate for the ministry can afford to be without Dr. Lardner's Works, and no intelligent layman should be without them. If any man—not idiotic, nor destitute of ordinary good sense—can read Lardner's Credibility and still disbelieve the Gospel, it is absurd for him to pretend to believe the most common facts of history, or, indeed, the existence of any thing beyond the cognizance of his five senses. Where is the unbeliever who can pretend to have bestowed one-tenth of the time, learning, and toil sedulously devoted by Lardner to the question of the authenticity of the Gospel History? It has been well said that "The Credibility and the collateral writings of Lardner unite to a very considerable extent the objects of a Bibliotheca Patristica and an Ecclesiastical History. On them the author was laboriously employed for no fewer than forty-three years."

"Lardner's Works not only contain an Alphabetical Catalogue of Authors, Sects, and Writings, whose history is written, and from which extracts are made by him, but also form a sort of Bibliotheca, full of curious and useful information on the subject of ancient writers and their works."—Dr. E. WILLIAMS'S C. P.

Nor need the general reader be deterred from the perusal of Lardner by the fear of a dry and repulsive style:—

"The manner of this writer gives me pleasure: he has been called the 'laborious Lardner,' and laborious he must have been; but he never seems to me to labour. He is always easy and unembarrassed."—Hey's Lectures.

"In the applause of Dr. Lardner all parties of Christians are united, regarding him as the champion of their common and holy faith. Archbishop Secker, Bishops Porteus, Watson, and Tomline, and Doctors Jordan, Hey, and Paley, of the Anglican church, Doctors Doddridge, Kippis, and Priestley, amongst the Dissenters, and all foreign Protestant Biblical critics, have rendered public homage to his learning, his fairness, and his great merits as a Christian apologist. The candid of the literati of the Romish communion have extolled his labours; and even Morgan and Gibbon, professed unbelievers, have awarded to him the meed of faithfulness and impartiality. With his name is associated the praise of deep erudition, accurate research, sound and impartial judgment, and unblemished candour. The publication of his works constituted a new era in the annals of Christianity; for, by collecting a mass of scattered evidences in favour of the authenticity of the evangelical history, he established a bulwark on the side of truth which infidelity has never presumed to attack."—*Horne's Bibl. Treatise on the English Language, 1811, 8vo; 1818, 8vo; 1850, 8vo; 4th ed., 1855, 2 vols. 8vo. This work should be carefully perused by the student of the English tongue:

"He will find here an historical and analytical view, comprising the general ethnographical relations of the English language, and that, too, in a much more readable form than he may imagine. He must be prepared, however, to meet with principles rather than rules. At all events, it will set him thinking, and, in whatever nook or corner of the kingdom or of the world his lot may be cast, observing too; for the very dialect of the province will acquire a new interest, and indeed help him in his studies."—English Journal of Education.

"It is, in truth, a most learned and laborious Inquiry into some of the more abstruse points in general grammar, and in that of the English language in particular, commencing with its historical descent and connexions, and including the causes of many of its peculiarities of structure and condition. By the word Grammar, in ordinary parlance, is understood a number of rules; whereas the work before us so far as it has attained to the character of a well-ordered design, is a repository of the reasons which are at the bottom of the rules."—*Lon. To those who are disposed to follow still farther the paths of investigation into which Dr. Latham's Treatise will introduce them, we recommend the following works. I. Grimm, Deutsche Grammatik, Theil I., (all published,) 3d ed., 1840, 8vo.

"The Deutsche Grammatik of Grimm is the work not of an age nor of a century, but like the great History of the Athenian, a κρῆμα εἰς αἶψά. It is the magazine from whence all draw their facts and illustrations: it is a monument of learning, industry, comprehensiveness, and arrangement."—LATHAM.

"In this astonishing work a whole family of languages has for the first time found an expositor, and as it were a historiographer, placed on the summit of the comparative linguistic analysis of our age. Grimm's Teutonic Grammar comprehends the Scandinavian as well as the German languages in all their ramifications, reduces each of them to its most ancient forms, and follows it down from that point through the whole course of its development. This colossal work forms an epoch in the history of etymological philology."—THE CHEVALIER BÜSSER.

This invaluable collection of the earliest monuments of the Northern languages in Europe contains the works of Olfrid, Notker, and Willeram, an Anglo-Saxon list of the Gospels for Sundays and Festivals, Francic laws, Rhythmus Antiquus de Carlo Magno, &c. The Glossary occupies the whole of vol. iii.

"The Thesaurus of Schiller is a real mine of Francic literature. "Wachter has been peculiarly successful in discovering remote affinities, obscured by the changes. We may observe, in general, that this illustrious enquirer has, by the force of good feeling, and by the abundance of well-arranged materials, exceeded all his fellow-labourers united, critics and etymologists, in the same pursuits."—Whiter's Etymologicon.

"A work in which grammar, no longer an assemblage of conventional rules of speech, becomes a philosophical analysis of our language, and an elementary intellectual exercise, adapted to the highest purposes of instruction."—Minutes of Council of Education, (St. Mark's College), vol. i. 1845.

"His comparison of the old Saxon forms with the modern English, his classification of verbs under the heads of weak and strong forms, and his remarks on the derivation and construction of English words, afford evidence of laborious investigation and research, and are a valuable contribution towards reducing our language within its proper limits."—Classical Museum.

Latimer, Hugh, 1472-1555, a native of Leicestershire, educated at Cambridge; Rector of West Kingston, Wiltshire, 1529; Bishop of Worcester, 1535. He preached the doctrines of the Reformation with such ability and ardour that his enemies feared to allow him the brief remnant of a life already prolonged to the age of eighty-three, and made a bonfire of him and his friend Ridley at Oxford, Oct. 16, 1555. "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man!" exclaimed the brave old martyr to his fellow-sufferer, as the lighted fagot was laid at the latter's feet: "we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out."

A new ed. of Latimer's Serms., with Notes, and a Memoir, by John Watkins, LL.D., was pub. in 1824, 2 vols. 8vo.; and a complete ed. of his Works (the only complete one) was edited for the Parker Society by the Rev. George Elwes Corrie, Camb., 1844-45, 2 vols. 8vo. The early eds. of Latimer's Serms., pub. separately and collectively, (1st ed., 1548), are very rare, and bring high prices. See Fox's Martyrs; Rev. William Gilpin's Life of Latimer, 1755, 8vo; Wordsworth's Eccles. Biog.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; Brit. Reformers, vol. ii.; Tracts of Angl. Fathers, iv. 11; Blackw. Mag., lxi. 131; Lon. Retrospect, Rev., 1822, vi. 272.

"Latimer, more than any other man, promoted the Reformation by his preaching. The straightforward honesty of his remarks, the liveliness of his illustrations, his homely wit, his racy manner, his manly freedom, the playfulness of his temper, the simplicity of his heart, the sincerity of his understanding, gave life and vigour to his sermons when they were delivered, and render them now the most amusing productions of that age, and to us, perhaps, the most valuable."—Gilpin's Lives of the Reformers.

"Latimer, by his naïveté and simplicity, his wit, honesty, and piety, has, more than the other Reformers, retained his popularity. He will furnish many hints for useful addresses to the people. . . . His sermons are fine specimens of godly intrepidity, simplicity, and piety."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"These sermons abound with the boldest strokes of wit and satire, clothed in language the most plain and familiar. The keenest reproofs are conveyed by stories, comparisons, and a great variety of ways, evincing the intrepidity of righteousness in a very uncommon degree."—William's C. P.

"It is, however, impossible not to feel and to acknowledge in the sermons of Latimer a familiarity and yet force of style, upon which Swift, if not Sterne, in after-days, but with occasionally greater coarseness of expression, might have formed their own. There is throughout Latimer a purity, ease, and perfection of English idiom—to say nothing of the curious personal and historical anecdotes with which they are mixed up—which render his discourses invaluable to the lexicographer and philologist."—Dixson's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 78; see also 72, 73, 88.

"There are few books which throw so much light upon the manners and morals of their age and the whole state of society in those times as Latimer's Sermons; they may be ranked among the most curious and amusing specimens of our early literature."—SOTTNEY.

"Latimer,—brave, sincere, honest, inflexible—exercising his power over men's minds by a fervid eloquence flowing from the deep conviction which animated his plain, pithy, and free-spoken sermons."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: History of England.

"I never read any sermons so much like Whitefield's manner of preaching as Latimer's. You see a simple mind uttering all its feelings, and putting forth every thing as it comes, without reference to books or men, with a naïveté seldom equalled."—RICHARD CRELL: Remains.

"No English treatise on a theological subject, published before the end of 1550, seems to deserve notice in the general literature of Europe, though some may be reckoned interesting in the history of our Reformation. The Sermons of Latimer, however, published in 1548, are read for their honest zeal and lively delineation of manners. They are probably the best specimens of a style then prevalent in the pulpit, and which is still not lost in Italy nor among some of our own sectaries—a style that comes at once home to the vulgar, animated and effective, picturesque and intelligible, but too inspurging both of ludicrous associations and commonplace invective."—*Hallam's Lit. Pts. 1 and 2, 1853. The following advertisement has recently been pub. in the London papers:

"The editor of Archbishop Laud's Works in the Anglo-Catholic Library has collected materials for an additional volume, which will contain one hundred and twenty Letters hitherto unpublished, addressed by the archbishop to King Charles, the Queen of Bohemia, the prince her son, Sir Thomas Rowe, Lord Dorchester, the two Lords Conway, (the Secretary of State and his son.) Sir John Lamb, and other correspondents.

"He would be glad to receive information of any of the archbishop's letters or papers which may be preserved in any public or private collections, and of which he has not already obtained copies. Communications to be addressed to Messrs. Parker, Oxford."—May, 1857.

Of detached pieces there have been lately reprinted—in addition to the Sermons, Autobiography, and Conference with Fisher, noticed above—Private Devotions, edited by Faber, 1838, 18mo; again, 1855, 12mo; Liturgy, Episcopacy, and Church Ritual, 1840; again, 1847. His Great Peril of Popery, especially in the matter of the Blessed Eucharist, will be found in Tracts Angl. Fathers, i. 195. Charles I., in his parting interview with his daughter, the Princess Elizabeth, recommended to her perusal Laud's Relation of his Conference with Fisher the Jesuit, as one of the best safeguards against Popery. As regards the character of Laud, the reader has had indicated to him ample materials for an examination, and he must form his own conclusions. We will not, however, pass on to the next article without a few quotations from several eminent authorities:

"He was a man of great parts and very exemplary virtues, allayed and disciplined by some unpopular natural infirmities,—the greatest of which was besides a hasty, sharp way of expressing himself (that he believed innocence of heart and integrity of manners was a guard strong enough to secure any man in his voyage through this world, in what company soever he travelled, and through what ways soever he was to pass; and sure never any man was better supplied with that provision. . . . No man had ever a heart more entire to the king, the church, or his country."—Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion.

"A man vigilant enough of an active or rather of a restless mind; more ambitious to undertake than politic to carry on; of a disposition too fierce and cruel for his coat, which notwithstanding he was so far from concealing in a subtle way that he increased the envy of it by insolence. He had few vulgar and private vices, as being neither taxed of covetousness, intemperance, nor incontinence; and, in a word, a man not altogether so bad in his personal character as unfit for the state of England."—May's Hist. of Parliament.

"He was learned, if polemical knowledge could entitle him to that praise. He was disinterested; but with unceasing industry he studied to exalt the priestly and prelatical character, which was his own. . . . He was in this respect happy, that all his enemies were also imagined by him the declared enemies to loyalty and true piety, and that every exercise of his anger by that means became, in his eyes, a merit and a virtue. This was the man who acquired so great an ascendancy over Charles, and who led him, by the facility of his temper, into a conduct which proved so fatal to himself and to his kingdom."—Hume's Hist. of England.

On this point Mr. Gilpin happily contrasts Crammer and Laud:

"It is probable that if Henry had chosen such an instrument as Laud he would have miscarried in his point; while Charles, with such a primate as Crammer, would either have been successful in his schemes, or at least have avoided the fatal consequences that ensued."

Mr. Southey hardly concurs with this opinion:

"We are not the apostolists of Laud: in some things he was erroneous, in some imprudent, in others culpable. Evil, which upon the great scale is ever made conducive to good, produces evil to those by whom it comes. The bloody sentences of the Star Chamber brought down upon him a more tragic catastrophe than he attempted to avert by them; a milder primate could not have saved the church from her enemies, but he would not have perished by their hands. And, in return, it cannot be doubted that, when the clergy regained their ascendancy, the severity with which they treated the Dissenters was in no slight degree exasperated by the remembrance of his execution."—Lon. Quar. Rev., x. 101-102.

"The person on whom public hatred chiefly fell, and who proved in a far more eminent degree than any other individual the evil genius of this unhappy sovereign, was Laud. His talents, though enabling him to acquire a large portion of theological learning, seem to have been by no means considerable. There cannot be a more contemptible work than his Diary; and his letters to Strafford display some smartness, but no great capacity. He managed, indeed, his own defence, when impeached, with some alacrity; but on such occasions ordinary men are apt to put forth a remarkable readiness and energy. . . . And being subject, as his friends call it, to some infirmities of temper,—that is, choleric, vindictive, harsh, and even cruel to a great degree,—he not only took a prominent share in the severities of the Star Chamber, but as his correspondence shows, perpetually lamented that he was restrained from going further lengths. Laud had amply merited punishment for his tyrannical abuse of power; but his execution at the age of seventy, without the slightest pretence of political necessity, was a far more unjustifiable instance of it than any that was allged against him."—Hallam's Constit. Hist. of England, 7th ed., Lon., 1854, li. 38, 167.

"The Parliament was certainly far from faultless. We fully agree with Mr. Hallam in reproaching their treatment of Laud. For the individual, indeed, we entertain a far more unmitigated contempt than for any other character in our history. The fondness with which a portion of the church regards his memory can be compared only to that perversity of affection which sometimes leads a mother to select the monster or the idiot of the family as the object of her especial favour. . . . Never were faces more strikingly characteristic of the individuals to whom they belonged than those of Laud and Strafford, as they still remain portrayed by the most skillful hand of that age. The mean forehead, the puffed features, the peering eyes of the prelate suit admirably with his disposition. They mark him out as a lower kind of St. Dominic, differing from the fierce and gloomy enthusiast who founded the Inquisition as we might imagine the familiar imp of a spiteful witch to differ from an unreluctant of darkness. When we read his grace's judgments, when we read the report which he drew up, setting forth that he had sent some separatists to prison and implored the royal aid against others, we feel a movement of indigation. We turn to his Diary, and we are at once as cool as content can make us. . . Here was a man to have the superintendence of the opinions of a great nation!"—T. B. MACAULAY: Essays, 1854, i. 159-160, 424-425.

Mr. Macaulay has, within the last few weeks, reiterated his contempt for the prelate's intellectual powers: in his Life of Johnson, written for the 8th edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, he cites a striking instance of the extent to which the lexicographer's Jacobitical prejudices had blunted his critical acumen:

"Laud—a poor creature who never did, said, or wrote any thing indicating more than the ordinary capacity of an old woman—was a prodigy of parts and learning, over whose tomb Art and Genius still continued to weep."

But, however little the archbishop may himself have contributed to the Republic of Letters, it is not to be forgotten that he did much to furnish others for greater usefulness in this cause than he was able to exert personally: he made valuable donations of books and MSS. to the Bodleian Library, founded a professorship of Arabic in the University of Oxford, and bestowed ecclesiastical preferment on the ever-memorable John Hales, who had advanced views of church government directly contrary to his own favourite theories.

This piece of rascality, and its exposure, have already come under our notice: see DORRIS, JOHN; KIRKPATRICK, J., M.D.; and the authorities referred to below. The publications which conferred such unenviable notoriety upon Lauder were—1. Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his Paradise Lost, Lon., 1751, 8vo. 2. Letter to the Rev. Mr. Douglas; occasioned by his Vindication of Milton, 1751, 4to. 3. The Grand Impostor Detected; or, Milton Convicted of Forgery against Charles I., 1754, 8vo. The last piece was composed after Lauder's written confession (dictated by Dr. Johnson) of his imposture. He pub. some other matters. See Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Chalmers's Life of Ruddiman; Hawkins's Life of Johnson; Boswell's Life of Johnson; Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors; *Chambers and Thomson's Biog. Lauderdale, Hon. James Maitland, eighth Earl of, 1759-1839, was best known as the author of An Enquiry into the Nature and Origin of Public Wealth, &c., Edin., 1804, &c.; 2d ed., 1819, 8vo; in French, Paris, 1808, 8vo. This was reviewed by Lord Brougham in Edin. Rev., iv. 343. The review elicited Observations on the Review by his Lordship, 1804, 8vo, and the Observations provoked a sharp rejoinder by the reviewer, entitled Thoughts suggested by Lord Lauderdale's Observations upon the Edinburgh Review, Lon., 1805, 8vo. Ilis Lord-

Laurence, French, LL.D., M.P., d. 1809, best known as the friend of Edmund Burke, pub. Critical Remarks on Detached Passages of the New Testament, particularly the Revelation of St. John, Oxford, 1810, 8vo, wrote some of the Probationary Odes in conjunction with Mr. Richardson, and contributed to the Annual Register. He was in 1797 appointed Regius Professor of Civil Law in the University of Oxford. A vol. of Laurence's Correspondence with Burke was pub. in 1827, 8vo, and "the most interesting portion" of these letters was repub. in the collection of Burke's Works issued by F. & J. Rivington, London, 1852, 8 vols. 8vo.

Burke, with his usual modesty, rated his friend's intellectual abilities far beyond his own:

"But all this I must leave to your judgment, which, with less parliamentary experience, has infinitely more natural power than mine ever had, when it was at the best. . . My dear friend, you will have the goodness to excuse the interposition of an exhausted and sickly judgment like mine, at its best infirm, with a mind like yours, the most robust that ever was made."—Burke to Laurence, Feb. 10, 1797; Burke's Works, ed. 1852, ii. 309, 370.

"He [Laurence] was, indeed, one of the most singularly endowed men, in some respects, that ever appeared in public life. He united in himself the indefatigable labour of a Dutch commentator with the alternate plainness and sharpness of a Parisian wit."—Lord Brougham's Statesmen of the Time of George III., ed. 1856, ii. 74-79, q. v.

Law by Wm. Paley, D.D., Lon., 1820, 8vo. The Appendix, concerning the use of the word Soul in Holy Scripture, and the state of Death there described, was thought to favour materialism; and it elicited a warm discussion,—being attacked by George Campbell, (6th Dissertation,) Goldhard, and John Steffe, (seven Letters, 1758.) and defended by Francis Blackburn and Mr. Pickard. See Orme's Bibl. Bib.; Bickersteth's C. S. 4. Life, &c. of Christ, Camb., 1749, 8vo. Reprinted; also included in No. 3. 5. Serms., 1755, 4to. 6. Serms., Newcastle, 1768, 8vo. 7. Bishop Law was a man of learning; but an eminent modern authority, citing from the prelate's Notes to King's Essay on the Origin of Evil, and his own Inquiry into the Ideas of Space, Time, &c., remarks:

"In his own original speculations he is weak, paradoxical, and ocular: affecting, on all occasions, the most profound veneration for the opinions of Locke, but much more apt to attach himself to errors and oversights of that great man than to enter into the general spirit of his metaphysical philosophy."—DUGALD STEWART: First Dissert. to Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., 170, and n.

Bishop Law was the father of Lord Ellenborough, of the Bishop of Elphin, and of the Bishop of Bath and Wells.

Law, George Henry, D.D., 1761—1845, second son of the preceding, became Bishop of Chester, 1812, and of Bath and Wells, 1824. He pub. a number of Serms., Charges, &c., for a list of which, and a biographical notice of the author, see Lon. Gent. Mag., 1845, Pt. 2, 523.

Proposals and Reasons for constituting a Council of Trade in Scotland, 1701, '51, 12mo; Money and Trade Considered, 1705, '20, '50, '60, 8vo; and other tracts connected with his speculations. A vol., entitled Œuvres de J. Law, was pub. at Paris in 1790, 8vo. See John Philip Wood's Memoirs of Law, 1824, 12mo; Full and Impartial Account of the Company of Mississippi, 1720, 8vo; Wood's State of the Parish of Cramond, 1794, 4to; Justamond's trans. of the Life of Louis XV.; Voltaire's Siècle de Louis XV.; Diet. Mr. Wood's Memoirs of Law will be found full of interest:

"It is worth the while of those multitudes of all classes who are engaging so eagerly, and often so heedlessly, in joint-stock and funding speculations, to read the story of the most stupendous scheme of the kind ever conceived.—a scheme which absorbed the resources of a powerful kingdom, infected a nation with temporary madness, confounded all conditions, raising beggars to boundless wealth and casting down princes to penury."

Law, William, 1686—1761, an eminent Non-juring divine, a native of King's Cliffe, Northamptonshire, entered of Emanuel Coll., Camb., 1705; Fellow, 1711; officiated for some time as a curate in London; vacated his Fellowship in 1716, and subsequently took up his residence at Putney, as tutor to Edward Gibbon, father of the historian; about 1740 became chaplain and almoner to Mrs. Hester Gibbon (sister to his late pupil) and Mrs. Elizabeth Hutcheson, at King's Cliffe, and remained with these ladies (the three living in a house owned by Wm. Law) for the rest of his life. A collective ed. of his works—principally consisting of controversial tracts (against Hoadly, Mandeville, Trapp, and Warburton) and theological treatises—was pub. in 1762, 9 vols. 8vo. To these vols. must be added Serm., Tit. iii. 1, 1713, 8vo; Serm., 1 Cor. xii. 3, 1718, 8vo; and Letters to a Lady inclined to Enter the Church of Rome, 12mo. In his controversy with Bishop Hoadly, which has already been referred to, (see p. 852,) Law is thought to have acquitted himself with great credit:

"I am surprised that Johnson should have pronounced William Law no reasoner. Law did indeed fall into great errors; but they were errors against which logic affords no security. In more dialectical skill he had very few superiors. That he was more than once victorious over Hoadly no candid Whigs will deny."—T. B. MACAULAY: Hist. of England, vol. iii. chap. xiv., 1856.

Jones of Nayland commends Law's Three Letters to Bishop Hoadly as specimens of accurate argumentation. But Johnson did full justice to the work by which Law is best known to the present generation:

"When at Oxford, I took up Law's Serious Call to a Holy Life, expecting to find it a dull book (as such books generally are) and perhaps laugh at it. But I found Law quite an overmatch for me; and this was the first occasion of my thinking in earnest of religion after I became capable of rational inquiry." . . . He [Johnson] much commended Law's Serious Call, which, he said, was the finest piece of hortatory theology in any language."—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

The extravagance of this praise makes it ridiculous. Did Dr. Johnson understand all the languages of the world, and had he read all the hortatory theology written in those languages? We quote some more opinions upon the Serious Call:

"Mr. Law's master-piece—the Serious Call—is still read as a popular and powerful book of devotion. His precepts are rigid, but they are founded on the gospel; his satire is sharp, but it is drawn from the knowledge of human life; and many of his portraits are not unworthy of the pen of La Bruyère. If he finds a spark of piety in his reader's mind he will soon kindle it to a flame; and a philosopher must allow that he exposes with equal severity and truth the strange contradiction between the faith and practice of the Christian world."—EDWARD GIBBON, the historian: Miscell. Works, where read his eulogy of the excellent Law.

"Next to the perspicuity of its style—if not, indeed, still more than by this—the power of this volume to interest the reader, as well as to fortify its own statements, is mightily increased by the sketches of living character with which it is interspersed."—REV. DAVID YOUNG, of Perth.

"This excellent treatise is written in a strong and nervous style, and abounds with many new and sublime thoughts: in a word, one may say of this book, as Sir Richard Steele did of a discourse of Dr. South's, that it has in it whatever wit and wisdom can put together."—Clergyman's Letter: Gent. Mag., Nov. 1800.

"Eminently useful to thoughtless and worldly minds, but greatly wanting in the exhibitions of evangelical motives. At the end of a valuable abridgment published at York, these motives are suggested."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"Law's treatise of Christian Perfection is very famous; his Serious Call much better."—DR. DODDRIDGE.

Of the Treatise on Christian Perfection it has been remarked:

"Herein is seen what Mr. Law would have had Methodism to be,—the perfection of spiritual religion, according to the elemental principles of the Established Church of England,—the full development of experimental Christianity."

"There are some female characters sketched with exquisite delicacy and deep knowledge of nature, in a book where one would not expect to find them,—in Law's Christian Perfection."—DR. WATSON.

Law's Humble, Earnest, and Affectionate Address to the Clergy, (1762, 8vo; new ed., 1843, 8vo;) recommended to candidates for holy orders by Bishop Burgess. See Short Account of the Life and Writings of Mr. Law, by Richard Tighe, 1813, 8vo; Jones's Life of Bishop Horne; Life of Law prefixed to Mary Ann Kelly's Spiritual Fragments selected from his Works, 1838, 8vo; Dr. David Young's Essay prefixed to the Serious Call, Lon., 1838, 12mo; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Lon. Gent. Mag., vol. lxx. There have been several vols. of Selections from Law's writings, and many of his treatises have been republ. within the last few years. We should not omit to add that Law is often inaccurately stated to be the editor of the English ed. of the works of Jacob Behmen, which bears his name on its title-page, though undoubtedly some of Law's writings display evidence of the influence of the mysticism which distinguishes the reveries of the Teutonic philosopher.

"Law fell latterly into the reveries of Jacob Behmen, whom Law alleged to have been somewhat in the same state with St. Paul, and to have seen unutterable things. Were it even so, Jacob would have resembled St. Paul still more by not attempting to utter them."—DR. JOHNSON.

"Law was a powerful writer; . . . but, with his views of the reasonableness and necessity of a holy life, and his want of perception of those all-refreshing and comforting views of the gospel which distinguish the apostolic writings and the writings of the Reformers, or, at least, keeping them, as he did, in the background, it is not surprising that he fell into the reveries of Behmen and ended in mysticism."—REV. E. BICKERSTETH.

"Law's speculations were of the boldest character, and founded upon principles no less visionary than extravagant."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

"His works are very unequal,—some of them bearing a strong tincture of mysticism, while others are of an excellent practical tendency."—DR. E. WILLIAMS.

"He was a moral philosopher as well as a theologian, and the man who would combat his statements or escape from his practical conclusions has more to do than shut his eyes to the evidence of revelation."—DR. DAVID YOUNG.

"The writings of the Rev. William Law will remain an everlasting testimony of the strength and purity of the English language."—JOHN WESLEY.

"His writings have a severity seldom to be found: his language is generally just and beautiful and very nervous; but he is too ready to affect points of wit and strokes of satire, in which he does not equal South. Many of his characters are excellently drawn, in which he comes nearer the Jesuits than any writer in English."—DR. DODDRIDGE.

"His works possess a very high rank in English literature: . . . great ease, purity, copiousness, and correctness place them among the purest and most classical models of English composition; and in pregnancy of wit, poignancy of irony, dexterity of argument, and justness of conclusion, they are nearly unrivalled."—British Critic.

Lawrence, Amelia W., editor of The Drawing-Room Scrap-Book, Phila., 1850, 4to; 20 illustrations.

Lawrence, Andrew, a celebrated painter, an Englishman, but long a resident of Paris, flourished about 1750. H. G. Bohn advertises in his catalogue for 1848, vol. i. p. 268, 78 of this artist's plates, Paris and London. 1741–56, bound in 1 vol. atlas fol., for £12 12s. Prefixed is a MS. Life of Lawrence and a list of plates, by Thos. Major, 1785.

"In the taste, judgment, and pleasing variety of his work, Lawrence never had an equal, and perhaps never may hereafter, as it seems to be the ne plus ultra of that art, for in it all the requisites are united."—T. MAJOR.

Lawrence, Edmund. Serms., 1662, '90.
Lawrence, Edward, d. 1695, aged about 68. Serms. on Matt. viii. 5-13; 2d ed., Lon., 1672, sm. 8vo.
Lawrence, Edward. I. Young Surveyor's Guide, Lon., 1726, 12mo. 2. Duty of a Steward to his Lord, 1727, 4to. See Donaldson's Agricult. Biog., 47.

Lawrence, Edward A., Prof. in the Theolog. Seminary, East Windsor Hill, Conn. Discourse at the Funeral of Rev. Leonard Woods, D.D., Aug. 28, 1854.

Lawrence, Eugene, an American author. Lives of the British Historians, New York, 1855, 2 vols. 12mo. The series extends from Gildas to Charles James Fox, and Mr. Lawrence proposes, "should the work be favourably received, to continue the series down to the death of Arnold." (Preface, N. York, 1855.) The condition being met, the author is called upon to fulfil his implied promise.

"His style is pure, chaste, flexible, transparent, and unambitious. He evidently has studied his subjects thoroughly and by the best lights at his command."—North American Review, April, 1856, lxxxii. 574.

"He has produced a work in all essentials impartial, judicious, luminous, elegant, interesting, and valuable. We attach each of these epithets to it advisedly, and we can assure our readers that they will not find any of them undeserved or exaggerated. Mr. Lawrence writes like a scholar and a gentleman, with acumen, spirit, and taste. He has chosen a good subject and treated it thoroughly well."—London Critic, April 1, 1856.

"Want of minute accuracy and precision of information, although fatal to any enlarged usefulness from his work, do not hinder it from being light and agreeable reading. . . . He promises a continuation. Before he ventures upon it, we should advise him to enlarge the range of his reading upon our literary history. He has a style and pictorial power which might be useful if exercised about subjects which had been carefully studied."—Lon. Athen., May 10, 1856, 585.

Lawrence, Frederick. Life of Henry Fielding; with Notices of his Writings, his Times, and his Contemporaries, Lon., 1855, p. 8vo.

"A biography more interesting in itself, or more captivating from the graceful ease of its style, has seldom issued from the press."—Lon. Standard.

"A book executed with great good taste, and very satisfactorily."—Lon. Examiner.

Lawrence, George. Sermon, Lon., 1658, 4to.

Lawrence, Henry, a friend of Milton, who dedicates his 20th Sonnet to Lawrence. 1. Of our Communion and Warre with Angels, Lon., 1646, 4to; Amst., 1652, 4to; Lon., 1652, 4to. See British Biographer, No. 4; Todd's ed. of Milton's Poetical Works. 2. Vindie. of the Scriptures, &c., 1649, 4to. 3. Gospel Ordinances, 1652, 4to.

Lawrence, James Henry, pub. some poems and other works in German and English, the best-known of which is The Empire of the Nairs, (in German, Berlin, 1801; in English, Lon., 1813, 4 vols. 12mo.) already noticed by us in our Life of Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin.

Lawrence, John. Orbis Imperantis Tabella, 1655, 12mo.

Lawrence, John, d. 1732, Preb. of Salisbury, 1723, pub. several works on gardening and agriculture, Lon., 1714-28. See Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Donaldson's Agricult. Biog., 47.

Lawrence, John, pub. several works on horses, cattle, agriculture, &c., Lon., 1796-1810. See Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Donaldson's Agricult. Biog., 81.

Lawrence, Jonathan, 1807-1833, a native of New York, graduated at Columbia College, and subsequently was admitted to the Bar. A collection of his prose and poetical compositions was printed for private circulation shortly after his decease. Some specimens of his poetry will be found in Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America.

Lawrence, Leonard. The Evil-Entreated Lover, &c.: in English, Lon., 1639, 4to. Reviewed in Lon. Retrospect. Rev., 1821, iv. 72-76, q. v.

Lawrence, Margarette Woods, a daughter of the late Leonard Woods, D.D. Light on the Dark River; or, Memorials of Mrs. Henrietta A. L. Haulin, Missionary in Turkey; with an Introd. by Rev. E. S. Storrs, Bost., 1853, 2mo; 3d ed., 1855, 12mo. Illegally commended.

Lawrence, Richard. On Horses, 1801, '09, both 8vo.

Lawrence, Robert F., b. 1810, in New York. Lectures to Youth, Bost., 1848.

Lawrence, Thomas. On Cockle, Muscle, and Oyster Shells, Lon., 1664, 8vo.

Lawrence, Thomas, 1711-1783, the author of the Latin biographical memoir prefixed to the College of Physicians' ed. of Harvey's Works, (see p. 797 of this Dictionary.) also pub.—1. Oratio Anniversaria Harveiana, Lon., 1748, 8vo. 2. Dissert. Med. de Hydre, 1756, 8vo. 3. Praelectiones Med. Duodecim, 1757, '59, 8vo: chiefly physiological, concerning the brain and nervous system. 4. Praelectiones de Natura Musculorum, 1759, 8vo. 5. On the Effects of Lightning; Phil. Trans., 1764. He also wrote a Latin Life (not pub.) of Francis Nichols, M.D. Dr. Lawrence (a descendant of Henry Lawrence, the friend of Milton, ante) is best known to the present generation as the valued acquaintance of Dr. Johnson. See Hawkins's and Boswell's Lives of Johnson; Censura Litteraria; Lon. Gent. Mag., vol. lviii.

Lawrence, Sir Thomas, 1769-1820, an eminent painter, succeeded Benjamin West as President of the Royal Academy in 1820. The following collections of plates, from the works of this celebrated artist, are well worth the attention of the amateur. 1. Sir Thomas Lawrence's Choicest Works: fifty plates, engraved by Cousins, Ward, &c., fol., £12 12s.; proofs, £18 18s., large paper, r. fol.; proofs, £31 10s. Biographical and critical notices are attached to each plate. These plates should accompany the folio ed. of Lodge's Portraits. 2. Cabinet of Genus: portraits of children, women, &c., 13 plates, imp. 4to, 11 by 9, engraved by Lewis, £1 1s.

"Spirit, brilliancy, precision of drawing, and character. . . . His excellencies are allied to the Flemish School, reminding one, from the precision and power of his drawing, of Van Dyck and Lely.—graceful, spiritual, high-bred elegance, pre-eminence of intellect."—JAMESON.

"His best pieces, when put beside the master-pieces of Vanddyke or Titian, appear so inferior that an Englishman turns aside with mortification. His fame was great, the prices received for his pictures immense, during his life; but both have sensibly declined since his death, and his portraits have come to stand on their own merits as pieces of art, irrespective of the recognition of the likeness by the spectators."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815-1852, chap. v.

"Sir Thomas Lawrence was perhaps hindered from rising to the highest rank as a colourist by his early and first practice in making portraits in colourless chalk only. His wish to please the sitter made him yield more than his English predecessors had done to the foolish desire of most people to be painted with a smile,—though he was far from extending this indulgence to that extreme of a self-satisfied simper that the French painters of the age preceding his had introduced to portrait. Of indefatigable industry, Lawrence's habit of undertaking too many pictures at the same time was a serious drawback, in many cases, to their excellence. He began the portraits of children which he did not finish till they were grown up, and of gentlemen and ladies while their hair was of its first colour but which remained incomplete in his rooms till the originals were grey."—Charles R. Leslie's Hand-Book for Young Painters, 1855.

See Sir Thomas Lawrence's Life and Correspondence, by D. E. Williams, 1831, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The letters of the late President are delightful. They exhibit all that warmth of feeling and all that originality which are the never-fading characteristics of a first-rate mind. The publication is inestimable."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"The work is inestimable, as a record of one who has immortalized by the magic of his pencil the beauties, the station, and the learned of the commencement of the nineteenth century."—Lon. Sun.

Lawrence, William, President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Surgeon-Extraordinary to the Queen. 1. Trans. of Blumenbach's Comparative Anatomy, Lon., 1807, '08, 8vo. See GORR, R. T. 2. Treat. on Hernia, 1807, '10, 8vo; in French, Paris, 1818. 3. Introd. to Comparative Anatomy and Physiology, 1816, 8vo. 4. Lects. on Physiology, Zoology, and the Natural Hist.

of Man, 1819, 8vo. It is stated that this ed. was recalled by the author. It contained some very crude and absurd speculations, which have been retracted or modified in subsequent eds. For these the author was properly rebuked by Abernethy and others: see Cursory Observations upon the Lectures, &c., 1819; Blackw. Mag., xii, 97, 98; N. Amer. Rev., xvii, 13, (by T. Bradford); Amer. Quar. Rev., iii, 321. The 3d ed. of the above Lectures, including the Comparative Anatomy, (No. 3,) was pub. in 1828, 8vo, and the 7th ed. in 1848, 12mo. 5. Lects. on Surgery, 2 vols. 8vo. 6. Treat. on Venereal Diseases of the Eye, 1830, 8vo. 7. Anatomico-Chirurgical Descriptions and Views of the Nose, Mouth, Larynx, and Fauces, 1839, fol. 8. Anatomico-Chirurgical Views of the Male and Female Pelvis, fol. 9. Lects. on Comparative Anatomy; new ed., 1844, 12mo. 10. Treat. on Ruptures; 5th ed., 1838, 8vo; Amer. ed., Phila., 1843, 8vo.

"The peculiar advantage of the treatment of Mr. Lawrence is, that he explains his views on the anatomy of hernia and the different varieties of the disease in a manner which renders his book peculiarly useful to the student. It must be superfluous to express our opinion of its value to the surgical practitioner. As a treatise on hernia, presenting a complete view of the literature of the subject, it stands in the first rank."—Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal.

11. Treat. on Diseases of the Eye, Lon., 1841, 8vo; 3d ed., 1844, 8vo; Amer. ed., by Isaac Hays, M.D., Phila., 1847, 8vo; new Amer. ed., by Isaac Hays, M.D., 1853, 8vo.

Lawrence's work is recognised as the standard authority in diseases of the eye. The author has judiciously availed himself of the cases and opinions pub. by Mackenzie, Middlemore, Guthrie, Travers, Saunders, and the modern German and French practitioners. The American editor, Dr. Hays, has also incorporated into his edition the results of his long and extensive practice, and introduced many valuable illustrations from Jacob, Dalrymple, Walton, Wilde, Cooper, and other writers in this department. See HAYS, ISAAC, M.D. Dr. Lawrence has been a large contributor to the Medico-Chir. Trans., The Lancet, and other medical journals.

Lawrence, William Beach, b. in the city of New York, Oct. 23, 1800, graduated at Columbia College, 1818, subsequently pursued his legal and historical studies at Paris, and was admitted as a counsellor of the New York Supreme Court, 1823; Secretary of Legation at London, 1825; Chargé d'Affaires, 1827-28; Lieut.-Governor of Rhode Island, 1851-52; and for a portion of the time Governor of the State. 1. 3. Lects. on the Hist. of Joseph, 1807, 2 vols. 12mo. 4. Serms., Hawick, 1810, 12mo. 5. Expos. of the Book of Proverbs, 1821, 2 vols. 12mo; posth.; pub. from 80 MS. vols. left by the author. A biographical account of this excellent man will be found in Dr. Jamieson's Cye. of Mod. Relig. Biog.

"These works [Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5] of the late worthy professor were chiefly intended for the instruction of Christians in the ordinary walks of life. They are pious and sensible, full of sound doctrine and salutary admonition and instruction. There is not any thing of a critical nature to be found in them, which indeed was not the writer's object; but they everywhere discover a minute acquaintance with the Bible and the human heart, and a deep concern to profit the reader. The style is plain, and the illustrations generally very brief."—Orme's Bibl. Brit.

Mr. Lawson received a medal from the Society of Arts for his "Reclinea," a convenient chair for the observation of the zenith stars.

Lawson, James, b. 1799, at Glasgow, Scotland, a resident of the city of New York since 1815, has pub. Tales and Sketches by a Cosmopolite, 1830; Giordano, a Tragedy; and many fugitive prose and poetical articles in periodicals. He was one of the first to introduce American letters to the notice of British readers. See Duyckinck's Cye. of Amer. Lit., ii. 280.

Lawson, John. 1. For the Sabbath, Lon., 1644, 8vo. 2. Difficult Places of Scripture, 1646, 4to.

Lawson, John, Surveyor-General of North Carolina, killed by the Indians in 1712, while exploring lands on the river Neus. 1. Journal of 1000 Miles' Travel among the Indians, with a Descrip. of North Carolina, Lon., 1700, 4to; repub. under the title of A New Voyage to Carolina, &c., 1709, 4to; again, 1711, '14, '18, all 4to; in German, Hamb., 1722, 8vo. Rich says (Bibl. Amer. Nova) that this book was first pub. in John Stevens's Collection, 1708, No. 41: but we find an ed. noticed of 1700, 4to, and one also of 1711, 4to. A copy of this rare work (Lawson's North Carolina) was sold some years ago in South Carolina for $60.

Lawson, John, d. 1760, Senior Tutor and Prof. of Oratory in Trin. Coll., Dubl. 1. Lects. on Oratory, Dubl., 1758, 8vo; 1759, 8vo; 1760, 8vo.

"The author reasons very acutely."—Donaldson's Agricult. Biog.

Lawson, John Parker, a deacon in the Episcopal Church of Scotland, d. 1852, pub. several works, of which the following are the best known. 1. Life and Times of Archbishop Laud, 1573-1645, 1829, 2 vols. 8vo. 2. Hist. of the Episcopal Church of Scotland, Edin., 1843-44, 2 vols. 8vo.

"It will be seen, from a perusal of these volumes, that probably no branch of the Church Catholic has experienced more vicissitudes, or has been more traduced and misrepresented by its enemies, than the Episcopal Church of Scotland, both during its legal establishment and after the Revolution, when it was supplanted by Presbyterianism."—Preface.

"Mr. Lawson has shown great ability, industry, and impartiality in his labours."—Church and State Gazette, May 12, 1843.

3. R. Catholic Church in Scotland, 12mo. 4. Bible Cyclopaedia, 1847-49, 3 vols. 8vo. Mr. Lawson wrote the descriptive letter-press of the following splendid publications—Stanfield and Harding's Scotland Delimited, 1847-54, 15 Pts. fol., 90 plates; proofs, £23 12s. 6d.

Lawson, Mary Lockhart, a native and resident of Philadelphia, a daughter of the late Alexander Lawson, (the friend of Alexander Wilson, the ornithologist), an eminent engraver, has contributed many poetical pieces to the Knickerbocker and Graham's Magazines. Some of these—specimens of which will be found in Griswold's Female Poets of America and in other collections—are thought to display abilities of no common order.

Lawson, William John. Hist. of Banking in Great Britain, Lon., 1852, 8vo.

"Mr. Lawson has given us a very interesting volume as his contribution to the History of banking. He has taken great pains to make his work accurate; and as it is the result of many years' labor and research, it possesses a higher value than could be claimed for a mere ephemeral production. He presents us with a good general view of the state of banking, and incidentally of commerce also, from the earliest periods to the present time; and he has interwoven his facts so pleasantly with anecdotal narrative that the work will be found interesting to all classes of readers."—*Lon. Lay, Benjamin, d. 1760, aged seventy-nine, a philanthropist, a member of the Society of Friends, was a native of England, settled in Barbadoes about 1710, and subsequently removed to Abington, Pennsylvania, (ten miles north of Philadelphia,) where he remained until his death. He was, both in the West Indies and in Pennsylvania, a warm opponent of slavery, and in 1737 pub. a treatise entitled All Slave-Keepers that keep the innocent in Bondage, Apostates. One of the most prominent of his successors in this field was Anthony Benezet, already noticed in this Dictionary. Layard, Austen Henry, D.C.L., M.P., the celebrated traveller, is a descendant of an ancient and noble family, the eldest son of H. P. J. Layard, Esq., of the Civil Service in Ceylon, the grandson of the Rev. Dr. Layard, Dean of Bristol, and was b. in Paris, March 8, 1817. He has held several responsible appointments under Government, and declined other posts which have been offered to his acceptance. Biographical notices of Dr. Layard will be found in the Eng. Encyclopedia, 1856, and in Men of the Time, 1856. 1. Nineveh and its Remains; Researches and Discoveries in Ancient Assyria; with the Narrative of a Residence in that country, and excursions to the Vallies of the Nestorian Christians, &c., Lon., 1848, 2 vols. 8vo; 6th ed., 1850, 2 vols. 8vo, £1 16s. In this work we have an account of Layard's discoveries in 1845-46.

"We cannot close without once more congratulating Mr. Layard on his success as a writer as well as a discoverer; we repeat, that, taking this only as a book of travels, we have read none for a long time more entertaining and instructive. In his dissertations he is full and copious without being tedious; his style is plain, vigorous, and particularly unaffected; it is the natural language of a strong mind fully master of its subject, and warmed and enlivened, without being inflated or kindled into rhapsody, by the enthusiasm without which he would never have conceived or achieved his wonderful task."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxiv. 106-153, q. 2.

"It is very rarely—once or twice, it may be, in a century—if that a work of this high character is brought before us; if we except Sir Gardner Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, nothing comparable to it has been seen within our time."—Bentley's Miscellany.

"This is, we think, the most extraordinary work of the present age, whether with reference to the wonderful discoveries it describes, its remarkable verification of our early biblical history, or of the talent, courage, and perseverance of its author. We have had our Bruce and Munro Parks, as well as our Parrys, Franklins, Backs, and Rosses; but we question whether a more enlightened or a more enterprising traveller than Mr. Layard is to be met with in the annals of our modern English history."—Lon. Times.

"Je dois m'abstenir de toute discussion sur la détermination précise du nom que portait dans l'antiquité les divers lieux que M. Layard a explorés et les Rois d'Assyrie qui avaient érigé les superbes momumens dont il a relevé les plans et les dessins. A lui seul appartient cette tâche, car lui seul possède les matériaux qui serviront de base a une si importante discussion; et tous les archéologues, tous les géographes, n'issent en ce moment leurs vœux aux niens pour que la publication des observations et des portefeuilles de M. Layard ne se fasse pas attendre long temps."—Extract from a Report read before the Academie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres.

"It has been truly said that the narrative is like a romance. In its incidents and descriptions it does indeed remind one continually of an Arabian tale of wonders and genie."—DR. ROBINSON: Introduction, note to Amer. ed.

This long list of reviews in American periodicals of Dr. Layard's work is the best proof of the interest felt in the United States in the wonderful discoveries which have immortalized the author's name. The visitor to the library of Williams College, Massachusetts, will find a gratifying evidence of the generosity of Dr. Layard in the two colossal bas-reliefs from Nineveh presented to that institution by the discoverer.

2. The Monuments of Nineveh, illustrated from numerous drawings made on the spot, 1850, imp. fol., 10 Pts., 100 plates, £10 10s.

"In this magnificent collection of outline-engravings of the most interesting discovery of modern times, we have the means of forming something like an estimate of the full amount of the debt due to the enterprise and genius of Mr. Layard. Figures of Assyrian monarchs and rulers, pictures of their usages and customs, of their buildings, arms, and arts, representations of their audiences, sieges, battles, and lion-hunts, shapes of their deities and idols, colossal, monstrous, incongruous, yet not without sublimity and grandeur, are here presented to us fresh from the chisel and the pencil of Assyrian Titans and Angels, after having lain buried under mountains of earth and rubbish for at least twenty-five centuries. We have had no discovery in art that presents so many interesting features of observation and inquiry."—Lon. Examiner.

3. A Popular Account of Layard's Expedition to Nineveh; abridged by the author, 1851, cr. 8vo, 5s. The principal feature of this abridgment is the introduction of the most important Biblical and historical illustrations (forming a separate section of the original work) into the narrative. The author also gives us the results of his researches to the latest date prior to publication.

4. Fresh Discoveries at Nineveh, and Researches at Babylon: being the results of the second expedition to Assyria, [1849-51.] Also, a Journey to the Khabon, The Desert, Lake Van, Ancient Armenia, Kurdistan, and the Borders of the Euphrates, 1853, £1 1s.; or fine ed., 2 vols. 8vo, £1 10s.

"We cannot take leave of Mr. Layard without congratulating him on the superiority of this, his last production, over his Nineveh and its Remains."—Lon. Athen.

"Mr. Layard has by no means exhausted the interest of his subject. He has opened now a far wider field; his discoveries are presented more intelligibly, and something like completeness of view is offered to us. The incidents of travel are more full and lively in their detail than were those in the former work of the author. His work is a most valuable contribution."—Christian Examiner.

5. Illustrations of the Sculptures, Vases, and Bronzes recently discovered at Nineveh; principally Bas-reliefs of the Wars and Exploits of Sennacherib, from his Palace at Kouyunjik; from drawings made on the spot, 1853, fol., 71 plates, £10 10s. Uniform with No. 2. It has been ascertained, from inscriptions lately deciphered, that the palace of Kouyunjik, excavated by Dr. Layard, was built by Sennacherib, King of Assyria, and that its sculptures represent events recorded in sacred history. As respects the confirmation so abundantly offered by Dr. Layard's discoveries of the truth of some of the most striking portions of the Holy Scriptures, how nobly do his volumes compare with the imbecile attempts of some foolish skeptics of our own day to cast contempt upon the sacred volume! In the language of an eminent authority,

"In these days, when the fulfilment of prophecy is engaging so much attention, we cannot but consider that the work of Mr. Layard [Nineveh and its Remains] will be found to afford many extraordinary proofs of the truth of biblical history, and of the extreme accuracy of the denunciations of the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel against the Kings of Assyria, and of the destruction of Nineveh in particular."—London Times.

And what impression has been produced upon the mind of the learned and sagacious discoverer himself by the results of his researches?

"Doubtless, if I had undertaken these excavations with no other end than that of gratifying an idle curiosity or an ordinary spirit of enterprise. I should be utterly unworthy of the honour you have shown me. I trust they were embarked in from a higher motive. Archeology, if pursued in a liberal spirit, becomes of the utmost importance, as illustrating the history of mankind. [Great applause.] I confess that, sanguine as I was as to the results of my researches amongst the ruins on the Tigris and Euphrates, I could not, nor, indeed, probably could any human being, have anticipated the results which they produced. I do not say this in self-praise. I consider myself but an humble agent, whose good fortune it has been to labour successfully in bringing about those results. I could not doubt that every spadeful of earth which was removed from those vast remains would tend to confirm the truth of prophecy and to illustrate the meaning of Scripture. But who could have believed that records themselves should have been found which, as to the minuteness of their details and the wonderful accuracy of their statements, should confirm almost word for word the very text of Scripture? And remember that these were no fabrications of a later date in monuments centuries after the deeds which they professed to relate had taken place, but records engraved by those who had actually taken part in them."—Speech on occasion of the presentation to Dr. Layard of the Freedom of the City of London, Feb. 9, 1854.

Had Layard met with any thing in the course of his investigations which appeared, however remotely, to impeach the truth of the Bible, we should never have heard the last of it from some of the wisecracks who afflict both sides of the Atlantic with their crude speculations and childish fancies. We are pleased to understand that Dr. Layard has at present (1857) another volume on Assyrian antiquities in course of preparation. The reader must not fail to add to the works of this intelligent, instructive, and entertaining traveller, the following books. I. Monument de Ninive, découvert et décrit par M. Botta, mesuré et dessiné par Flandin; with 371 plates of Architecture, Sculpture, and Inscriptions, Paris, 1849-50, 5 vols. atlas fol. Usually sold at 80 guineas. Contents: vols. i., ii., Architecture and Sculpture, 168 plates; iii., iv., Inscriptions, 263 plates; v., Text.

"To Botta is due the merit of having found the first Assyrian Monument."—Layard.

"The cuneiform system of letters was a species of picture-writing, invented, not by the Semitic inhabitants of Babylon, but by those who preceded them. This writing was, however, reduced by the Semitic race to letters and adapted to the articulation of their language. Their mode of writing consisted of several elements. There was the ideographic, or picture-writing, and the phonetic, which was equivalent to the alphabet of their language. The cuneiform inscriptions were divided into three branches,—Persian, Scythic, and Assyrian."

This splendid work was pub. by order of the French Government, and under the direction of a committee of the Institute. If too expensive for the purse of the amateur, (and $500 is rather a large sum for one work,) he can procure for 10s. 6d. C. Tobin's trans. of Botta's Letters on the Discoveries at Nineveh, with 50 folding plates, consisting of Plan, Plates of Sculpture, and Inscriptions, Lon., 1850, 8vo.

II. Nineveh and its Palaces: the Discoveries of Botta and Layard applied to the elucidation of Holy Writ; upwards of 200 engravings, 8vo. Bonomi resided many years in the vicinity of the Assyrian discoveries, and acquired considerable knowledge of the languages and customs of the East. III. Ledyard, John, 1751-1788, celebrated as the companion of Captain Cook (the narrative of whose last voyage he published, Hartford, 1783, 8vo) and for his own explorations, was a native of Groton, Connecticut. His eventful life (the details of which do not come within the plan of our Dictionary) had been recorded by one of the most distinguished of American historians: Memoirs of the Life and Travels of John Ledyard, the American Traveller; comprising Selections from his Journals and Correspondence, by Jared Sparks, Camb., Mass., 1828, 8vo. Printed in London in 1828, 8vo, and in 1834, 8vo. See titles in Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 207-208. See also ibid., i. 311. Sparks's Life of Ledyard was repub. in the author's valuable Library of American Biography, New Series, 1847, vol. xiv. A review of these Memoirs, by Robert Southey, appeared in the London Quarterly Review, xxxviii. 55-113.

"Ledyard never desponded: no sooner was one of his castles demolished than he set about building another."—SOUTHEY: ubi supra, p. 93.

"In 1786, while at Paris, I became acquainted with John Ledyard, of Connecticut,—a man of genius, of some science, and of fearless courage and enterprise. . . . I suggested to him the enterprise of exploring the western part of our continent by passing through St. Petersburg to Kamschatka, and procuring a passage thence in some of the Russian vessels to Nootka sound, whence he might make his way across the continent to the United States; and I undertook to have the permission of the Empress of Russia solicited."—THOMAS JEFFERSON: Kandolph's Life of Jefferson, 2d ed., 1839, i. 55.

"The strong feeling which has guided her pen lends a peculiar charm to the book, and we lay it down with a consciousness that it has enlarged our sympathies and aided our appreciation of what is most lovely and excellent in human character. It is written with remarkable grace and finish of style."—FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lxi. 353-375, q. v.

"A gentleman from this city, now in Europe, lately paid a visit to Thomas Carlyle. He found him living at Chelsea, on the Thames, in the simplest manner, in a small house in quite a retired situation. He talks much of American affairs, still holding to his old opinion that Franklin is our greatest man. He said he had some years ago read a book which gave a much better account of the higher sort of character in New England than any thing he had seen since Franklin's writings. That book, he said, gave him an insight into the real, inner life of the highest natures, and was a most valuable work. It was the Memoir of the Buckminsters, by Mrs. Lee."—Boston Transcript, Aug. 1857.

Of this work about thirty eds. have been pub. in America and several in England. 3. Elinor Fulton; a Sequel to Three Experiments of Living. 4. Familiar Sketches of the Old Painters, 1838, 16mo.

"This is a delightful book, especially for the young. It is full of taste and right feeling, and contains instruction for the heart as well as the head."—Bishop Potter's Hand-Book for Readers and Students.

5. Luther and his Times. 6. Cranmer and his Times. 7. Huguenots in France and America, 2 vols. 8vo. 8. Rosanna; or, Scenes in Boston. 9. Rich Enough. 10. The Contrast; or, Different Modes of Education. 11. The World before You; or, The Log Cabin. 12. Stories from Life for the Young, 1849, 16mo. 13. Familiar Sketches of Sculpture and Sculptors, 1852, 2 vols. 16mo. 14. Memoir of Pierre Toussaint, 1853, 16mo. Mrs. Lee's writings have exerted a most beneficial effect upon the tone of American society.

Lee, Harriet, 1756-1851, the daughter of an actor, was for many years engaged, in conjunction with her sister Sophia, in the management of the Belvidere House, —an academy at Bath. 1. The Errors of Innocence; a Novel, 1786, 5 vols. 12mo. 2. The New Peerage, or

Our Eyes may Deceive Us; a Comedy, 1787, 8vo. 3. With Sophia Lee, The Canterbury Tales, 1797-1805, 5 vols. 8vo. These were all Harriet's excepting two,—viz.: The Young Lady's Tale, and The Clergyman's Tale, which occupy a vol. and a half. Sophia also wrote the Introduction to the whole series. The Canterbury Tales (12 in all) were very popular, and 2d eds. of the first two vols. were pub. in 1799. There have been recent eds. of the whole,—viz.: in 1833, (Bentley's Standard Library, vols. xii. and xiii.) and in 1839. Mason Brothers, of New York, are now (1857) issuing those of Harriet in 2 vols. 12mo, and Sophia's in 1 vol. 12mo. The Canterbury Tales fell into the hands of Byron when he was fourteen years of age; he remarks,

"There are fine things in The Canterbury Tales. Nothing of Scott's is finer than The German Tale: I admired it when a boy, and have continued to like what I did then. This, I remember, particularly affected me."

He also said of The Norman Tale:

"It made a deep impression on me, and may be said to contain the germ of much that I have since written."

Referring to this, Chambers's Cyclopedia of English Literature says,

"The public were unanimous in considering Harriet Lee as more interesting, passionate, and even more poetical than her illustrious imitator."

The republication in England of The Canterbury Tales (in Bentley's Standard Library) was hailed with great delight:

"To read The Canterbury Tales of Miss Lee once more is a species of temporary regeneration. There is scarcely any educated person of this century who has not, at some time or other, drawn a sincere pleasure from these pages. The different tales have been to many like turning down a leaf in life. . . . The Officer's Tale perhaps was read on some sunny bank in a pleasant land,—a stolen pleasure. On The German's Tale perhaps two hearts beat in unison, trembled in harmony, and, when sharing a mutual agitation,—two heads bent over the mystic page,—they turned round to see each other's fright reflected in well-known and well-loved features. Even now we feel a shiver running over the frame as we call to mind the fearful whisper of the name of Kruitner amidst the silent throng of a kneeling congregation in the cathedral. . . . We may be pardoned for approaching this number of The Standard Novels with feelings of far more interest than we take up any new novel of the day."—Lon. Spectator.

"Few readers of entertaining literature can be ignorant of these popular productions, and we are therefore spared the necessity of saying how much we have been excited by a perusal of Montford, how deeply entertained by the narrative of Arnold, how truly affected by the stories of Constance and Lothaire. The pure morality which reigns through these tales—which we can scarcely dare to call fictions—will render them the most eligible reading for young persons. They ought to be in every family library."—Edinburgh Post.

In 1821, whilst living at Pisa, Byron dramatized Kruitner, and pub. his version under the title of Werner; or, The Inheritance. See Blackwood's Mag., xii. 712, xv. 196. Harriet Lee also wrote a play, chiefly founded on Kruitner, entitled The Three Strangers. It was played in 1835, but was unsuccessful.

4. Clara Lennox; a Novel, 1797, 2 vols. 5. The Mysterious Marriage, or The Heirship of Roselva; a Play, 1798, 8vo. Biographical Accounts of Harriet Lee will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag., Sept. 1851, 326, and (from the Lady's Companion) in the Living Age, xxxi. 329.

Lee, Henry, D.D. 1. Notes on Locke on the Understanding, Lon., 1702, fol. 2. Serm., 1728, 4to. 3. Serm., 1730, 8vo.

Lee, Henry. Caleb Quotem; an Opera, 1810, 8vo.

Lee, Henry, 1756-1818, Lieutenant-Colonel Commandant of the Partisan Legion during the American war, a native of Virginia, graduated at Princeton College in 1773, was elected a member of Congress in 1786, and again in 1799, and in 1792 was made Governor of Virginia. He gained honourable distinction in every post to which he was called. 1. Oration on General George Washington, 1800. 2. Memoirs of the War in the Southern Department of the United States, Phila., 1812, 2 vols. 8vo; new ed., with Corrections by the author, and with Notes and Addits. by Henry Lee, Washington, D.C., 1827, 8vo. See LEE, HENRY, (post.)

Lee, Henry, 1787-1837, a native of Virginia, son of the preceding, was educated at William and Mary College, and in 1812 became a major in the United States army. He died at Paris whilst engaged in the preparation of his unfinished Life of Napoleon Bonaparte. 1. The Campaign of 1781 in the Carolinas; with Remarks, Historical and Critical, on Johnson's Life of Greene, &c., Phila., 1824, 8vo. 2. Observations on the Writings of Thomas Jefferson, with particular reference to the attack they contain on the memory of the late General Henry Lee; in a Series of Letters, N. York, 1832, 8vo; 2d ed.,

Phila., 1839, 8vo. See LEE, CHARLES CARTER; LEE, HENRY, No. 2. (ante); George Tucker's Life of Thomas Jefferson. 3. The Life of the Emperor Napoleon, &c., N. York and Paris, 1835. This vol. brings the narrative down to the year 1796. After the author's death, (which occurred before the completion of his labours,) the above vol. and some materials subsequently prepared were pub. in London and Paris under the title of The Life of Napoleon Bonaparte down to the Peace of Toleration and the Close of his First Campaign in Italy, r. 8vo. Lee is a warm advocate of Napoleon.

Lee, Mary Elizabeth, 1813–1849, a native of Charleston, S.C., a daughter of William Lee, and a niece of Judge Thomas Lee, contributed many prose and poetical articles to The Southern Rose, Graham's Magazine, Goddard's Lady's Book, New Orleans Miscellany, Philadelphia Courier, Token, Gem, Gift, Whitaker's Journal, Southern Literary Messenger, and Orion Magazine. A vol. of her poems was pub. in 1851, Charleston, 8vo, pp. 224, with a memoir by the Rev. Samuel Gilman, D.D. Her prose writings have not been collected; but the vol. pub. in the Massachusetts' School Library, entitled Social Evenings, or Historical Tales for Youth, is from her pen. Of her poetical pieces, perhaps the best-known is The Blind Negro Communicant. Miss Lee was a zealous scholar, and possessed a remarkable talent for the acquisition of languages. See Southern Quar. Rev., xix. 518.

Lee, Matthew. 1. Certamen elegiacum novem Musarum, Lon., 1600, 4to. 2. Liber de triumphata Barbarie, 1621, 4to.

Lee, Matthew. Oratio Anniversaria Harveiana, Lon., 1796, 4to.

Lee, Nathaniel, 1657?–1691 or 1692, the son of Dr. Richard Lee, rector of Hatfield, Hertfordshire, after leaving Trinity College, Cambridge, made an unsuccessful attempt as an actor, and finally settled down as a dramatic author. Habits of dissipation resulted in insanity, which led to his confinement for four years in Bellam, from which he was discharged in 1688, little to his benefit,—as about three years later he was killed in a street-brawl during a drunken frolic. Lee was the author of ten tragedies and one (The Princess of Cleve) tragi-comedy, viz.: 1. Nero. 2. Supponisba. 3. Gloriana. 4. The Rival Queens; or, The Death of Alexander the Great. 5. Mithridates. 6. Theodosius; or, The Force of Love. 7. Caesar Borgia. 8. Lucius Junius Brutus. 9. Constantine the Great. 10. The Princess of Cleve. 11. The Massacre of Paris. He was also joint author, with Dryden, of Ælipsis, and The Duke of Guise, tragedies. Lee's pieces were all pub. separately (save Supponisba and Gloriana, which appeared in one vol., 1676, 4to) between 1675 and '90. Collective eds. of his Dramatic Works were pub. in 1692, 2 vols. 4to; 1713, 2 vols. 8vo; 1722, 3 vols. 12mo; 1733, 3 vols. 12mo; 1734, 3 vols. 8vo. His best pieces are The Rival Queens; The Death of Alexander the Great; Theodosius; or, the Force of Love; Mithridates; and Lucius Junius Brutus. It has long been the fashion to laugh at Nat. Lee as a Bellamite, (metaphorically as well as literally,) and certainly many of his rhapsodies are crazy enough; but there is also much true poetry in some of his declamations. He was by no means unconscious of the criticisms which were freely levelled at him, even in his lifetime, as his dedication of Theodosius to the Duchess of Richmond amply proves:

"It has often been observed against me," he says, "that I abound in ungovern'd fancy; but I hope the world will pardon the sallies of youth. Age, despondence, and dullness come too fast of themselves. I discommod a man for keeping the beaten road, but I am sure the noble hunters that follow the game, must dig, hedge, and ditch sometimes, and run at all, or never come into the fall of the quarry. My comfort is, I cannot be so ridiculous a creature to any man as I am to myself; for who should know the house as well as the good man at home?—who, when his neighbours come to see him, still sets the best rooms to view; and, if he be not a wifol ass, keeps rathish and lumber in some dark hole, where nobody comes but himself, to mortify at melan-choly hours."

Certainly his friend Dryden was greatly to blame for his injudicious (if indeed sincere) encouragement of Lee's Bombastes vein. The extravagance of the tragedy of Alexander has been not a little ridiculed; but what does Dryden say of it to the author?

"Such praise is yours,—while you the passions move,
That 'tis no longer feign'd, 'tis real love,
Where Nature triumphs over wretched art:
We only warm the head, but you the heart.
Always you warm! and if the rising year,
As in hot regions, bring the sun too near,
'Tis but to make your fragrant spices blow,
Which in our colder climates will not grow.
Despise those drones who praise, while they accuse
The too much vigour of your youthful muse—
That humble stile which they their virtue make
Is in your power; you need but stoop and take."

It may be well enough to quote a passage from Alexander which has elicited rather opposite opinions from two famous critics:

Lee introduces Alexander the Great, saying,

"When Glory, like the dazzling eagle, stood
Perch'd on my beaver in the Granic flood—
When Fortune's self my standard trembling bore,
And the pale Fate's stood frighted on the shore,—
When the Immortals on the billows rode,
And I myself appear'd the leading God!"

Bishop Warburton declares that this passage contains "not only the most sublime, but the most judicious, imagery that poetry could conceive or paint."

Joseph Warton, on the other hand, asserts that "we have not in our language a more striking example of too turgid expression and genuine fustian and bombast."

These erudite critics are about equally wrong. Few admirers of the Bombastes school would venture to enlarge Warburton's eulogy; and that Warton greatly erred in assigning to the passage just quoted pre-eminence in extravagance, can be easily demonstrated by any one who chooses to cite scores of passages from Nat. Lee himself. For instance, take this:

"I found her on the floor,—
In all the storm of grief, yet beautiful,—
Pouring forth tears at such a lavish rate,
That, were the world on fire, they might have drown'd
The wrath of Heaven, and quench'd the mighty rain!"

Or this:

"Black, swarthy demons had a hollow cland,
And with long thunderbolts they drum aloud."

Or this:

"Were I in heaven, and saw him search'd in flames,
I would not spit my indignation down,
Lest I should cool his tongue."

But, as we have already stated, Lee undoubtedly possessed great genius:

"He is, in spite of his proverbial extravagance, a man of poetical mind and some dramatic skill."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, lii. 521

"The extravagance of Lee was not the sheer extravagance of the common herd of heroic-play manufacturers. Though it be madness, yet there's method in it. His frenzy is the frenzy of a poet. The hyperbolos of others, even of Dryden himself, were forced, cold, and far-fetched. They cut like experts, because they judged it proper or profitable so to do. Lee's only indulgence in natural exuberance, . . . There is a sort of genuine passion in his extravagance, and it has besides, a picturesque beauty, which is rarely to be met with in heroic ravings. His metaphors are not abortive, though they may be grotesque. His forms are strange enough, but they are well defined, and thrown out in bold relief. His visions fit palpably before us."—Lon. Retrospective Review, 1821, iii. 240–268.

This admirable review must be read by the student.

"Nathaniel Lee's Dramas are full of faults—faults of the least venial nature; but they are evidently the productions of a man of genius, and do not betray a single indication of imbecility or dullness. Their characteristics are summed up in a saying of his own. When the unfortunate author was confined in a straight-waistcoat in Bedlam, a scribbler who went to visit him had the cruelty to jeer at his dreadful malady, by observing that it was an easy thing to write like a madman. "No," said Lee, "it is not an easy thing to write like a madman, but it is very easy to write like a fool."—Henry Neele's Lects. on English Poetry, Lect. IV. p. 144.

Alas that poor Neele should himself have (so shortly after writing the above) become a victim to the same dreadful malady and fallen by his own hand! For further information respecting Lee, see Cibber's Lives; Biog. Dramat.; Censura Literaria; Spence's Anecdotes; Blackw. Mag., ix. 280.

Lee, Richard Henry, 1732-1797, a son of Thomas Lee, of Stratford, Westmoreland county, Virginia, was chosen President of the American Congress in 1784, and held several other distinguished public positions. He was one of the very first to oppose British oppression, the mover of the Declaration of Independence, June 7, 1776, and one of the most hearty, consistent, and energetic friends of American freedom. He was the author of some political letters, papers, &c. See Memoirs of his Life by his grandson, Richard Henry Lee, Phila., 1825, 2 vols. 8vo, and a review of the latter, by Edward Everett, in the North American Review, xxii. 373-400.

Few families in America have for so long a period, and in the persons of so many representatives, enjoyed such honourable distinction as the Lees of Virginia. All of the six sons of Thomas Lee, of Stratford, President of the Council, who died in 1730, were men of distinction. These were: 1. Philip Ludwell; 2. Thomas Ludwell; 3. Richard Henry; 4. Francis Lightfoot; 5. William; 6. Arthur.

Lee, Samuel, 1625-1691, a learned Non-conformist divine, a native of London, from 1686 to '88 minister of a congregation at Bristol, Rhode Island, was captured by the French on his way home, and died at St. Malo. He was the author of Orbis Miraculum; or, The Temple of Solomon portrayed by Scripture Light, Lon., 1639, '65, fol.; other theolog. treatises, several sermons, and Chronicon Castrense, which is added to King's Vale Royal. See Athen. Oxon.; Calamy; Diet. Hist., Supp.; Neal's Hist. of New England; Account of the Origin of Bristol.

Lee, Samuel, D.D., 1783-1852, a native of Longnor, Shropshire, worked as a carpenter until he was twenty-five years of age, but employed his leisure time in the acquisition of the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldaic and Syriac languages, to which he subsequently added a knowledge of the Arabic, Persian, French, German, and Italian tongues; entered Queen's Coll., Camb., 1813; ordained, 1817; elected Arabic Professor of the Univ. of Camb., 1819, and Regius Professor of Hebrew, 1831. Among the more important of his learned works (in addition to his eds. of the Arabic, Persian, and Malay Scriptures, and labours on the Syriac Old and New Testaments, 1816-23) were: 1. A Hebrew Grammar, 1830; 6th ed., 1844, 8vo. 2. Six Successful. 2. The Recess; or, A Tale of Other Times, 1783-86, 6 vols. 12mo. One of the earliest English historical novels. Successful. 3. The Hermit's Tale; a Poem, 1787, 4to. 4. Almeyda, Queen of Granada; a Tragedy, 1796, 8vo. Mrs. Siddons acted in this play, which met with but partial success. 5. The Life of a Lover; a Novel, 1804, 6 vols. 12mo. Written in early life. 6. The Assignment; a Comedy, produced 1807, and condemned the first night. Not printed. Ormond, or The Debauchee, (1810, 3 vols. 12mo.) which appears in the list of Sophia Lee's publications in Watt's Bibl. Brit., was not written by her. Respecting this fact, see *Lon. Gent. Leech, John, b. about 1816, in London, and educated at the Charter House, has acquired great celebrity by his caricatures in Punch, his illustrations of several of Albert Smith's works, the Comic History of England, the Comic History of Rome, Sponges's Sporting Tour, and several works pub. under his own name,—The Rising Generation, a series of Twelve Drawings on Stone, 1813, ob. fol.; Pictures of Life and Character from the Collection of Mr. Punch, 500 wood-cuts, 1856, ob. fol.; 2d series, over 600 wood-cuts, 1856, ob. fol., &c. He is now employed upon the illustration of The Train, a periodical commenced Jan. 1, 1856. The Train, so far, (we write in April, 1857,) has been very successful,—which is no marvel. See Lon. Athenaeum, Jan. 3, 1857, p. 14.

"Dr. Leechman's discourses have been much read, and still continue to be admired."—Lon. Month. Rev.

"He had a remarkable talent of selecting what was most important on every subject he handled; so that his arguments were never specious, but solid,—urged at the same time with a degree of warmth which carried the hearers along with him, for they were addressed equally to the judgment and to the heart."—Dr. Wodrow.

In a literary sense his book is of a very popular character. The style is clear, vigorous, and animated, with something of the easy pleasantness which characterizes the man of the world. Legare, Hugh Swinton, 1797-1843, an eminent American scholar, a native of Charleston, S. Carolina, graduated with the highest honours at the college at Columbia, and subsequently continued his studies at Paris and Edinburgh. In 1820, and again in 1824, he was elected a member of the State Legislature; made Attorney-General of South Carolina in 1830; Chargé d'Affaires at the Court of Brussels, 1833; sent to the National Congress in 1836; and in 1841 was appointed, by President Tyler, Attorney-General of the United States. He died at Boston, at the residence of his friend, George Ticknor, June 20, 1843, whilst participating, as one of the Cabinet, in the ceremonies connected with the completion of the Bunker Hill Monument. A collection of the writings of Mr. Legare, edited by his sister, was pub. in 1846, in two large 8vo vols. Here will be found a Diary kept at Brussels, a Journal on the Rhine, Extracts from his Private and Diplomatic Correspondence, Orations and Speeches, and Contributions to the New York and Southern Quarterly Reviews, and a Memoir of the life of the author. His principal contributions to the Southern Quarterly Review are those on Classical Learning, Roman Literature, Cicero de Republica, the Public Economy of Athens, the Life and Works of D'Aguesseau, Jeremy Bentham and the Utilitarians, Codification, Kent's Commentaries, Early Spanish Ballads, the Miscellaneous Writings of Sir Philip Sidney, Lord Byron's Letters and Journals, Hall's Travels in America, The Travels of the Duke of Saxe-Weimar, The Disowned, Tales of the Great St. Bernard, and the Miscellanies of William Crofts:—

"It is not too much to say of some of these essays," remarks Dr. Griswold, after the enumeration of the preceding, "that they will bear a favourable comparison with the best productions of their kind; yet they are certainly inferior to the more carefully-prepared papers which he gave to the world at a subsequent period."—True Writers of America, q. v., 4th ed., 1852, 391.

His best-known articles in the New York Review are, The Constitutional History of Greece, Demosthenes—the Man, the Orator, and the Statesman, and The Origin, History, and Influence of Roman Legislation. The title of the last-named essay recalls forcibly to mind the darling object of Mr. Legare's aspirations,—the marriage of the Civil and the Common Law. At home or abroad, amidst the relaxations of leisure or the perplexities of public duty, this favourite theory was never forgotten:

"He considered the law as his pursuit.—his object,—his field of his ambition. Fifteen years ago in 1828 I knew him as an eminent lawyer. He afterwards went abroad in a diplomatic capacity, and at Brussels, where he resided, devoted himself anew to the study of the Civil Law, with a view to make it subservient to the great object of his life, the expansion of the Common Law; and the being into it the enlarged and liberal principles and just and the morality of the Roman Jurisprudence. This object he seemed about to accomplish; for his arguments before the supreme Court were crowded with the principles of the Roman Law with great success. In every sentence that I heard I was struck with the union of the two systems. At the same time, the whole was wrought into a style beautiful and chaste; but never passing from the line of the argument nor losing sight of the cause. His argumentation was marked by the closest logic; at the same time he had a prolixité in speaking which I have never seen excelled. He had a warm, rich style, but no declamation; for he knew that declamation belongs neither to the jurist nor to the scholar."—July, 1857, Address before the members of the Law School at Cambridge, June 22, 1843; in the Law Reporter, August, 1843, and in Story's Miscell. Writings, 1852, 820-824.

For further information respecting Mr. Legare and his writings, see Amer. Whig, iv. 416; South. Quar. Rev., iv. 347, ix. 321, xvi. 224; South. Lit. Mess., ix. 570. It is to be deeply regretted that this accomplished scholar and eminent jurist did not leave some great work upon those topics of legal lore which reverential regard and passionate admiration had alike endeared to his bosom. That he had meditated a translation of the Elementa Juris Naturæ et Gentium of Heineccius, we have his own confession to his friend Judge Story:

"It was only during the last summer [of 1842] that he wrote to me that he intended to translate Heineccius's Elements: for he wished, he said, to entice the American lawyer to the study of the Civil Law. He added that he had nothing to gain by undertaking such a work, but that he would undergo the labor as a homage to his country. Knowing his eminent qualifications for the task, I advised him to make the translation, and to add to it notes of his own, so as to adapt the principles to the existing state of the Common Law,—telling him that he would thereby confer a benefit on his country which no man of his age would be likely to exceed."—Judge Story's Address, ubi supra.

But it was not so written: Hugh Legare must be added to the long list already chronicled in this volume, of those who left unfinished monuments of good intentions, whose devices were arrested by "the inexorable hour," and whose "purposes"—to use the affecting language of the patriarch—were "broken off" in the midst.

Leggett, William, 1802-1840, a political and miscellaneous writer of considerable reputation, was a native of the city of New York, educated at the Georgetown College, D.C.; entered the United States Navy as a midshipman in 1822; retired from the service in 1826; established The Critic, a weekly literary gazette, in 1828; was connected with William C. Bryant in the editorship of the New York Evening Post, 1829-36; commenced the publication of The Plaindealer, in 1836; appointed by President Van Buren diplomatic agent to the Republic of Guatemala, in April, 1840, but died in the following month, whilst making preparations for his departure. His published vols. are—1. Leisure Hours at Sea, N. York, 1825, 18mo. This is a collection of poems written whilst the author was in the naval service. 2. Naval Stories, 12mo. 3. Tales by a Country Schoolmaster, 12mo. 4. Political Writings, edited, with a Preface, by Theodore Sedgwick, 1840, 2 vols., 12mo. He was also the author of Block House, in the Tales of Glauber Spa, 1822, of pieces in The Mirror and the Atlantic Souvenir, was the principal contributor to The Critic and The Plaindealer, and left an unfinished novel, of which one vol. was printed. See Sedgwick's Preface to Leggett's Political Writings, and the Memoir of Leggett, by the same gentleman, in Criswell's Biographical Annual, N. York, 1840; N. York Rev., viii. 383; Democrat Rev., vii. 3. Mr. Bryant's poetical tribute to the Memory of William Leggett—"The earth may ring from shore to shore"—is doubtless well known to many of our readers. Leggett had devoted friends, and brilliant hopes were entertained of his future career:

"Every year was softening his prejudices and calming his passions. Every year was enlarging his charities and widening the bounds of his liberality. Had a more genial clime invigorated his constitution and enabled him to return to his labours, a brilliant and honourable future might have certainly been predicted of him. He would not have left a name only as the conductor of a periodical press,—he would not merely have left these transient and fleeting memorials of his ability and rectitude. It is not the suggestion of a too fond affection, but the voice of a calm judgment, which declares that, whatever public career he had pursued, he must have raised to his memory an imperishable monument, and that, as no name is now dearer to his friends, so few could then have been more honorably associated with the history of his country than that of William Leggett."—THEODORE SEDGWICK, ubi supra.

Best English ed., 1662, fol., with Supp. Several foreign eds.: see Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"A very valuable help to the understanding of the original languages of the sacred writings. . . The Critica Sacra not only gives the literal sense of every word in the Old and New Testament, but enriches almost every definition with philological and theological notes drawn from the publications of the best grammarians and critics then extant. To this work most succeeding lexicographers on the Old and New Testament have been greatly indebted."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 21.

"A very good help, wherein the pith of what others have more largely set forth is comprised."—WILLIAM GOULD, D.D.

"Leigh's Critica Sacra can hardly be reckoned, nor does it claim to be, more than a compilation from earlier theologians. It is an alphabetical series of words from the Hebrew and Greek Testaments, the author candidly admitting that he was not very conversant with the Latin language."—*Hallan's Lit. Leighton, Alexander, M.D. 1568-1644? a Scottish divine, a physician, father of Archbishop Leighton, will ever be remembered to the lasting disgrace of the English Star-Chamber, as we shall see presently. 1. Speculum Belli Sacra; or, The Looking-Glasse of the Holy War. Printed, 1624, Svo. 2. Appeal to the Parliament; or, Sion's Plea against the Prelacie. Printed the year and month [Sept. 1628] wherein Rochell was lost, 4to. Very rare; worth now (1857) about £3. A 2d ed., 4to, also without date, was printed abroad. For publishing this book he was sentenced (1.) To be publicly whipped at Westminster and set in the pillory; 2. To have one side of his nose slit, one ear cut off, and one side of his cheek branded with a hot iron; 3. To have the whole of this repeated the next week at Cheapside; 4. To have S. S. (Sower of Sedition) branded on his cheek with a red-hot iron; 5. To pay a fine of £10,000; 6. To suffer perpetual imprisonment in the Fleet. This beautiful exhibition of Christian charity occurred in June, 1630. To the shame of human nature, devils in human shape were found ready to put the barbarous enactment into force. The whole of this mild sentence was carried into execution (we suppose, indeed, that Leighton never had the ability to pay the fine) save the last item: after the martyr had undergone eleven years' confinement in jail, his prison-doors were thrown open by the Long Parliament in 1640. He is said to have died insane (in 1644 or '49) in consequence of the cruel hardships which he had suffered. Leighton, Robert, D.D., 1611-1684, son of Dr. Alexander Leighton, a native of Edinburgh, (according to Pearson) was educated at the university in that city, and in 1641 became Presbyterian minister in the parish of Newbattle, in the county of Edinburgh. He subsequently acted for ten years as Principal of the University of Edinburgh; about 1662 became Bishop of Dunblane, and in 1670 Archbishop of Glasgow. In 1673, after vainly attempting to effect an amicable compromise between the Episcopalians and Presbyterians, Leighton tendered his resignation, which, after a year's delay, was reluctantly accepted by the king. The good divine accordingly retired to Broadhurst, in Sussex, where he lived in retirement (but was constantly employed in doing good) until 1684, when he was unexpectedly summoned to London, and died there after six days' illness. The works of Leighton—which consist of a Commentary on the First Epistle of St. Peter, Lectures on different portions of the Old and New Testaments, Sermons, and theological tracts—were pub. collectively, with a Life of the author by Rev. Erasmus Middleton, 1805, 4 vols. Svo; by George Jerrett, with his Life of Leighton, 1806, 6 vols. Svo; 1820, 4 vols. Svo; by Rev. J. N. Pearson, with his Life of Leighton, 1825, 4 vols. Svo; 1828, 2 vols. Svo; 1830, 4 vols. Svo; also 1830, 2 vols. Svo; 1846, 2 vols. Svo; 1819, 2 vols. Svo. Whole Works, with Life by Aikman, 1837, Svo. An excellent ed. was pub. by J. C. Riker, New York, 1845, r. Svo, pp. 800. This ed. contains Pearson's Life, a Table of the Texts of Scripture, and an Index of Subjects.

"This is the only complete edition of Leighton's Works, as it contains every article found in both of the standard copies published in London and Edinburgh. It comprises the Commentary on the First Epistle of Peter, several minor Expositions on different parts of the Scriptures, thirty-one Sermons, Theological Lectures, Exhortations to Collegians, and other more concise pieces. The value of this edition is greatly enhanced by the two indexes which have been added to the volume, so that the archbishop's works are for the first time published complete, and with the essential facilities for the more edifying study of his superexcellent illustrations of revealed truth."

Pearson's Life of Leighton is commended by Bickersteth as "a delightful piece of biography," and by the British Critic as "a spirited and eloquent memoir." A number of Leighton's works have been pub. separately from time to time, and Selections have been given to the world. The last ed. of his Commentary on the First Epistle of St. Peter was pub. in 1849; one by the S. P. C. K., 2 vols. 1p. Svo; one by H. G. Bohn, 1849, Svo. The Rev. J. Pye Smith, D.D., edited in 1836, (again pub. 1839,) 12mo, his Expositions on the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, &c. The Commentary on St. Peter is the best-known and most highly prized of his productions.

"Perhaps there is no expository work in the English language equal altogether to the exposition of Peter. It is rich in evangelical sentiment and exalted devotion. The meaning is seldom missed, and often admirably illustrated. There is learning without its parade, theology divested of systematic stiffness, and eloquence in a beautiful flow of unaffected language and appropriate imagery. To say more would be unbecoming, and less could not be said with justice."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"This admirable Commentary is wholly practical, and has long been admired for its piety. Dr. Doddridge, in his paraphrase on this Epistle, has acknowledged himself deeply indebted to Archbishop Leighton for many important hints."—Horne's Bibl. Bio.
 "Leighton on I Peter with the Prelections are productions of uncommon worth."—Williams's C. P.

Of the Prelections Theologice an ed. was pub. by Prof. Scholefield, 1828, Svo; they were also pub. in Ward's Library of Standard Divinity, No. 1, 1839, Svo. Newton calls the work

"A diamond set in gold," and said it united "the simplicity of the gospel with all the captivating beauties of grace and style."

"Consult the Academical Lectures of Archbishop Leighton, than whom no man knew better how to render human attainments the handmaids to personal and practical religion."—Christian Observer.

This is a true saying, and a cloud of witnesses can be produced in its attestation:

"Archbishop Leighton had the greatest elevation of soul, the largest compass of knowledge, the most mortified and most heavenly disposition, that I ever yet saw in mortal; he had the greatest parts, as well as virtues, with the perfectest humility, that I ever saw in man."—BISHOP BRANET.

"There is a spirit in Leighton I never met with in any human writings, nor can I read many lines in them without being moved; more sentiments than Reynolds, more refined than Howe, more eloquent than Baxter, more practical than Charnock, more sublime than Hall."—BROOKER.

"His works ought to be reckoned among the greatest treasures of the English tongue; they continually overflow with love to God, and breathe an heart entirely transformed by the gospel, and above the views of every thing but pleasing God."—DR. DODDRIEGE.

"Leighton's praise is in all the churches. . . . He is one of the very first divines of the British Church; and his writings breathe throughout the spirit of devotion; they are distinguished by a noble strain of deep piety, a most humble, heavenly, and loving spirit, an elegant mind, and a scriptural standard of evangelical doctrine."—Beveridge's C. S.

"All his works are admirable. . . . full of holy simplicity, humility, and benevolent zeal."—Williams's C. P.

"It is a reproach to the present age that his valuable writings, breathing as they do the sublimest and purest spirit of piety, rich in beautiful images and classical learning, throughout abounding in practical reflections and all expressed with the sweetest and simplest eloquence, should have been neglected among us."—British Critic.

Bishop Burnet, to whom Leighton was indeed "guide, philosopher, and friend," cannot say enough in praise either of his learning or piety:

"He had great quickness of parts, a lively apprehension, with a charming vivacity of thought and expression. He had the greatest command of the purest Latin that ever I knew in any man. He was a master both of Greek and Hebrew, and of the whole compass of theological learning, chiefly in the study of the Scriptures. But that which excelled all the rest was, he was possessed with the highest and noblest sense of divine things that I ever saw in any man. . . . He had so subdued the natural heat of his temper, that in a great variety of accidents, and in the course of twenty-two years' intimate conversation with him, I never observed the least sign of passion but upon one single occasion. . . . There was a visible tendency in all he said to raise his own mind, and those he conversed with, to serious reflections. He seemed to be in a perpetual meditation. . . . His preaching had a sublimity both of thought and expression in it. The grace and gravity of his pronunciation was such, that few heard him without a sensible emotion. I am sure I never did."—History of his Own Time, ed. Oxford, 1833, vol. i. 242, 243, 244.

Burnet's account of the last interviews which he had with this good man is very touching. Burnet had despatched an earnest message to Leighton, begging him to come up to London, in the hope that he might have a beneficial influence upon Lord Perth, newly appointed Lord-Chancellor. Leighton was now in his seventy-fourth year; but such an opportunity of doing good he would by no means permit to pass unimproved. He hurried to London, and was soon in the arms of his friend:

"When I took notice to him, upon my first seeing him, how well he looked, he told me he was very near his end for all that, and his work and journey both were now almost done. This at that time made no great impression on me. He was the next day taken with an oppression, and, as it seemed, with a cold and with stitches, —which was indeed a pleurisy.

"The next day Leighton sunk so that both speech and sense went away of a sudden; and he continued panting about twelve hours, and then died without pains or convulsions. I was by him all the while. Thus I lost him who had been for so many years the chief guide of my whole life. . . . He used often to say that, if he were to choose a place to die in, it should be an inn; it looked like a pilgrim's going home, to whom this world was all an inn, and who was weary of the noise and confusion of it. He added that the officious tenderness and care of friends was an entanglement to a dying man, and that the unconcerned attendance of those that could be procured in such a place would give less disturbance. And he obtained what he desired; for he died at the Bell Inn, in Warwick-lane."—Ibid., vol. ii. 436, 438.

Leland, Anna. Home; or, Recollections of a New England Family, N. York, 1856, 12mo. This work has been highly commended by several critics, and ridiculed in at least one other quarter.

Leland, Charles G., an accomplished American scholar, of the same family as the famous antiquary John Leland, was b. in Philadelphia, August 15, 1824, graduated at Princeton College in 1846, and subsequently continued his studies at the Universities of Heidelberg, Munich, and Paris, under the guidance of Gervinus, Thiersch, and Schlosser. (See DAVISON, D., M.D.) Since Mr. Leland's return to America, he has varied the severity of his erudite investigations by contributions to the periodicals of the day. Among these must be especially noticed a series of papers originally pub. in The Knickerbocker under the title of (1) Sketch-Book of Meister Karl, and afterwards given to the world in a collective form, Phila., 1855, 8vo, pp. 335.

"An extraordinary production, full of natural sentiment, wit, amiable humor, incidents of foreign travel, description, moralizing, original poetry, odd extracts, and curious learning, all combined so as to display effectively the author's information, vivacity, and independence, and to illustrate the life of a student of the most catholic temper and ambition."—Grauert's Poets and Poetry of America, 16th ed., Phila., 1855, 595.

Washington Irving commends the Sketch-Book for "Its raciness, its quaint erudition, its graphic delineations, its vein of genuine poetry, and its true l'ibelais humour."

"It is not devoid of clever smartness; but the intention to be clever spoils the flavour; for cleverness preparée is almost as bad as malice preparée."—Lon. Athenæum.

2. The Poetry and Mystery of Dreams, 1855, 12mo, pp. 271. This is a work of more learning than would be inferred from the title. Mr. Leland has not only laid under contribution the works of modern authors, but has lingered with the enthusiasm of an antiquary (an ancient profession in his family) over the speculations of Artemidorus and Astrampsychius, and lent an indulgent ear to the vagaries of Achemet and Nicophorus. After an hour equitably divided between Menichus on the Philosophy of Sleep and Leland on the Poetry of Dreams, consider thy brain a hopeless dullard, O lethargic reader, if thy couch be unvisited by dreams. Write thyself down Somnolentus, and let thy "talk be of bullocks" for the rest of thy days.

3. Pictures of Travel; trans. from the German of Heinrich Heine. Pub. in Nus., Phila. and Lon.; commenced, 1855. This translation has elicited many warm—but not in all cases unmix'd—commendations from a number of very respectable authorities. Lacking space for quotations, we must be content to refer the reader to the Westminster Rev., Jan. 1856; Lon. Athenæum, Dec. 29, 1855, (a portion of this notice was transferred to Littell's Liv. Age, xlviii. 497;) Lon. Economist, (transferred to Littell's Liv. Age, xlvii. 375;) Lon. Lender, Sept. 1, 1855; *Lon. It is now known that the memoirs of Heine, the existence of which has been a matter of speculation, are extant in those gigantic characters which the poet's loss of sight in his latter days obliged him to employ. It was the writer's request that these papers should not see the light during the lifetime of his widow: only those, therefore, who may reasonably hope to survive this respected lady can expect to peruse the autobiography of her late celebrated husband. A number of his posthumous poems will shortly be issued, and M. Alfred Meissner, who has been intrusted with the arrangement of Heine's literary remains, intends to publish at Hamburg a biography of the poet. It will be remembered that Heine was born at Dusseldorf in 1797, educated at Gottingen and Berlin, and died in 1847. To undertake the translation of the Reisebilder required no little courage; but it would appear, from the great preponderance of favourable criticism, that Mr. Leland did not overestimate his philological resources. This young but very successful writer is connected with the editorial department of the Phila. Evening Bulletin, and is also editor of Graham's Illustrated Magazine. Since the above was written, we notice the announcement of a translation of Heine's Book of Songs by John E. Wallis, Lon., 1856, cr. 8vo. See also Edin. Rev., July, 1856; N. Amer. Rev., lxix. 216, (by W. H. Hurlbut,) and Fraser's Mag., xxvi. 733.

Leland, Henry P., brother of the preceding, a favourite contributor to the New York Knickerbocker, the New York Spirit of the Times, and other American periodicals, has recently pub. a collection of his fugitive pieces under the title of The Grey Bay Mare, and other Humorous Sketches of American Life, Phila., 1856, 12mo. This vol. is highly commended by the Petersburg Express, and styled "an agreeable companion" by the New York Criterion of June 21, 1856.

Leland, Leyland, or Laylonde, John, an eminent English antiquary, born in London in the beginning of the sixteenth century, died, after two years' insanity, (produced by intense mental application,) in 1552, was educated in early youth at St. Paul's School, under the famous William Lilly, and subsequently studied at Christ's College, Cambridge, and All Souls' College, Oxford. After accumulating a vast store of learning at home and abroad, he became chaplain to Henry VIII., who gave him the rectory of Popeling in the marches of Calais, and in 1533 dignified him with the title of his antiquary. By this commission his majesty laid his commands on him to make search after "England's antiquities, and peruse the libraries of all cathedrals, abbies, priories, colleges, &c., and places where records, writings, and secrets of antiquity were reposit." Never did the enraptured heir of broad acres and well-filled coffers peruse a loving father's last testament with more delight than swelled the heart of our erudite Dominic Sampson as he gloated over this ravishing parchment: so, grasping his oaken staff, girding his loins, and binding tightly his sandal-shoon, the happy Oldbuck of a former generation went on his way rejoicing. Gruff old Harry, who, in spite of his odd habit of plundering monasteries and chopping off his wives' heads after breakfast, knew how to enjoy a quiet joke, no doubt gave a sly wink to some of the attendant courtiers (delighted with his honest enthusiasm) as he grasped the antiquary's hand at parting, charged him not to leave a parchment unturned nor a Roman hypocast unexplored, and dismissed him with his benedictions and applause. Six years did the zealous Leland travel from library to scriptorium, from tumulus to tower, from castle to monastery. In 1542, he returned to give an account of his explorations to his royal master. But we must let him tell his own story:

"I have so travelled in your dominions, both by the seacoasts and the middle parts, sparing neither labour nor costs, by the space of these six years past, that there is almost neither cape nor bay, hav'n, creek, or pier, river or confluence of rivers, breaches, washes, lakes, meres, fenny waters, mountains, valleys, moors, heaths, forests, chases, woods, cities, boroughs, castles, principal manor-places, monasteries, and colleges, but I have seen them, and noted in so doing a whole world of things very memorable. . . . And because that it may be more permanent and further known than to have it engraved in silver or brass, I intend, by the leave of God, within the space of twelve months following, such a description to make of your realm in writing, that it shall be no mastery, after for the graver or painter to make a like, by a perfect example."

But the good antiquary had been building a monument in more senses than one: he was buried under the prodigious number of MSS. he had collected, and, after six years spent in the endeavour to arrange and digest them, he found himself still at a hopeless distance from the press. In his despair—suffering from the want of an intelligent amanuensis, &c.—he thus writes to his friend Cranmer:

"Est congesta mihi domi sup'plex
Ingens, aurea, nobilis, venusta,

Qua totus studeo Britanniarum
Vero reddere gloriam nitorem;
Sed fortuna meis noverca ceptis
Jam felicibus invidet maligna.
Quare, ne pereant brevi vel hora
Mularum mihi noctium laborum
Omnes—
CRANMERE, eximum decus priorum!
Implorare tuam benignitatem Cogor?" &c.

The pressure was too great; the brain cannot with impunity be so mercilessly taxed,—we had a melancholy proof of this, latterly, in the case of Hugh Miller!—and Leland became first a moody man, and then a madman.

"Proh tristes rerum humanarum vices! proh viri optimi deplorandam infelicissimamque sortem!"—Tito. SMITH: Pref. to Camden's Life.

"The precious and voluminous MSS. of Leland were doomed to suffer a fate scarcely less pitiable than that of their owner. After being pilfered by some and garbled by others, they served to replenish the pages of Stow, Lambard, Camden, Burton, Dugdale, and many other antiquaries and historians. Leland's Remains," says Bagford, "have been ever since a standard to all that have any way treated of the Antiquities of England!"—Dublin's Bibliomania, ed. 1842, 242-245, q. v.

We have already noticed Hall's publication of Leland's Commentarii de Scripturibus Britannicis, (see HALL, ANTHONY, D.D., No. 1.) Hearne's eds. of Leland's Itinerary and of his Collectanea, (see HEARNE, THOMAS, Nos. 5 and 6,) and for further information regarding this laborious antiquary and his works must refer the reader to the Lives of Leland, Hearne, and Wood, edited by W. Huddesford, Keeper of the Ashmolean Library, 1772, 2 vols. 8vo; Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon.; Chalmers's Biog. Dict.; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 892, 1116, 1117; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 156, 185, 205, 225, 226, 516, 517; Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors; Calamities of Authors; On the Literary Character, in collective ed. of these works, 1840, 123, 124, 292, 294, 479. The greater part of Leland's works are included in the Itinerary and the Collectanea just noticed. Many of his MSS. will be found in the Cottonian and Bodleian Libraries. We must not omit to mention that Henry VIII. rewarded his indefatigable labours by giving him the rectory of Hasely, in Oxfordshire, a canonry of King's College, (now Christ Church,) Oxford, and the prebend of East and West Knowle in the church of Sarum. We have quoted some of the antiquary's verses, and will add a brief criticism upon his merits as a poet:

"The epigrams and hendecasyllables of Leland, the first Englishman who, after the restoration of letters, wrote Latin poetry, without any pretensions to classical taste, have occasionally much eloquence and beauty."—DR. DRAKE.

It would be very hard to demonstrate the priority in point of time which Dr. Drake is willing to assign to Leland. Nothing is more difficult than to decide with any degree of probability upon questions of this character.

Leland, John, D.D., 1691-1766, a native of Wigam, Lancashire, pastor of a congregation of Presbyterian dissenters in Dublin, acquired great reputation by his treatises in defence of Christianity against its enemies. 1. A Defence of Christianity, Dubl., 1733, 2 vols. 8vo; Lon., 1740, 2 vols. 8vo; 1753, 2 vols. 8vo. This is an answer to Tindal's Christianity as old as the Creation. 2. The Divine Authority of the O. and N. Test. Asserted, 1739, 2 vols. 4to; 1837, 8vo. This is an answer to Morgan's Moral Philosopher. 3. Remarks on [Dodwell's] Christianity not founded on argument; in two Letters, 1744, 2 vols. 8vo. 4. Remarks on Lord Bolingbroke's Letters on the Study and Use of History, Dubl. and Lon., 1753, 8vo. 5. The Case fairly Stated, Dubl., 1754, 8vo. 6. A View of the Deistical Writers, &c., 1754-56, 3 vols., and two Supplements. A new ed. of the whole, with an Appendix by W. L. Brown, D.D., appeared in 1798, 2 vols. 8vo. The 5th ed. and the best, with a valuable Introduction, comprising a succinct View of the Subsequent History of the Controversy, by Cyrus R. Edmonds, was pub. in one octavo vol., pp. 730, Lon., 1837. This we have carefully read through, and know not how to say enough in its commendation. He who can read this work and yet remain an unbeliever in Christianity must be hopelessly obtuse or perversely prejudiced. See LARDNER, NATHANIEL, D.D. 7. A tract on the Liberty of the People of Ireland, 1754, 8vo. 8. The Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation, Lon., 1764, 2 vols. 4to; 1768, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., Glasg., 1819, 2 vols. 8vo. 9. Discourses on Various Subjects, with the Life, &c. of the Author, by the Rev. Dr. Isaac Weld, 1769, 4 vols. 8vo. Bishop Jebb (see his Correspondence with Alexander Knox) at one time intended to reprint these Discourses. For further information respecting Leland, see Weld's Life as above, and the life in British Biography, vol. x. Bishops Tomline, Watson, and other eminent divines, strongly recommend the perusal of Leland's works.

"One of the ablest champions against the deists, and for the defence of Christianity, that ever lived in any age or nation; and his works will remain as immortal monuments of clear, fair, masculine reasoning, and convincing demonstration, as long as reason and the world shall endure."—DR. JOHN RYLAND.

"Leland's View, as likewise his Treatises on the Necessity of Revelation, and on The Authority of the Old and New Testament, all display the superior powers of his mind, the soundness of his judgment, and his intimate acquaintance with all the subtleties of deism."—BURKE.

"Every one who wishes to make himself master of the Deistical controversy will carefully study Leland's Divine Authority of the Old and New Testament and his View of the Deistical Writers; yet Leland's greatest and most useful work is his Necessity and Advantages of the Christian Revelation. He who desires to know the full value of the Bible should above all things study this book. It contains the latest and maturest thoughts of the very able author."—Williams's C. P.

"Leland's Advantages and Necessity of the Christian Revelation is a work full of information as to the state of religion among the Heathen. His other works in defence of religion are useful. . . . An able Champion of the Christian faith."—Bielert's C. S.

The reader must refer to Leland's own account of Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 in Edmonds's ed. of the View of the Deistical Writers, 1837, 8vo, pp. 102, &c., 114, &c., 120, 135, 208, et seq.

Leland, Thomas, D.D., 1722–1785, a native of Dublin, educated at, and Fellow of, Trinity College in that city; Prof. of Poetry, 1763; Preb. of St. Patrick's, and Vicar of Bray, 1785. He was a profound scholar and a most eloquent preacher. 1. Orations of Demosthenes, and Latin Version, and Notes, Lon., 1754, 2 vols. 12mo: in conjunction with Dr. John Stokes. 2. Orations [19] of Demosthenes, in English, 1756–61–70, 3 vols. 4to; last ed., 1831, 12mo.

"The eloquent translator of Demosthenes."—Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors, ed. 1840, 107.

"The elegant translation which they say you have made of Demosthenes."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

But Warburton did not mean to please Leland. See Disraeli, ubi supra, 174.

"The orations are distinguished for simplicity, ardor, and force; and they are translated with great ability and accuracy. Hume says the orations present to us models which, of all human compositions, approach the nearest to perfection. This eulogy appears to be extravagant, when we consider how rarely his orations are read and studied even by scholars or statesmen, or when we refer to the speeches of Pitt, Fox, Burke, Hamilton, or Ames, Webster, or Clay, or Brougham."—CHANCELLOR KENT: Outlines of a Course of Eng. Reading, Oakley's ed., N. York, 1855, 8vo.

3. Hist. of the Life and Reign of Philip, King of Macedonia, 1758, 2 vols. 4to; last ed., 1820, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The Life of Philip contains many curious researches into the principles of government established among the leading States of Greece, many sagacious remarks on their intestine discords, many exact descriptions of their most celebrated characters, together with an extensive and correct view of the subtle intrigues, and those ambitious projects by which Philip, at a favourable crisis, gradually obtained an unexampled and fatal mastery over the Grecian republics."—DR. PARR: Tracts of a Warburtonian.

4. Dissert. on the Principles of Human Eloquence, &c., 1764, 4to. Elicited by Bp. Warburton's Discourse on the Doctrine of Grace. Answered (anonymously) by Hurd, on behalf of Warburton, in a very petulant letter. 5. Answer to a Letter to him, &c., 1764, 4to. This is a reply to Hurd.

"Leland answered for himself, and in the opinion of all the world, completely demolished his antagonist."—Lord Jeffrey's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., Lon., 1853, 889, q. v.

And see JORTIN, JOHN, D.D., No. 6.

6. Serms., 1769, 4 vols. 8vo. 7. The Orations of Æschines and Demosthenes on the Crown; trans. into English, with Notes, 1770, 3 vols. 8vo. 8. Exam. of Arguments in a late introduce. to the Hist. of the Ancient Irish and Scots, 1772, 4to. Anon. This is levelled at James Macpherson's Hist., 1771, 4to. 9. Hist. of Ireland, 1773, 3 vols. 4to. Comprises the period from the Invasion by Henry II. to the Revolution in 1688. Leland was assisted by Drs. O'Connor and other members of the Dublin Society.

"It is written with judgment, care, and just discrimination."—CHANCELLOR KENT: A Course of Eng. Reading, &c.

"A Protestant work, but excellent."—De Yescour's Histor. Anal. of Chris. Civil, Lon., 1850, 491.

Lemon, Mark, b. in London, Nov. 30, 1809, is the author of about sixty plays, principally farces and melodramas, of which The School for Tigers, The Serious Family, and The Ladies' Club, are among the best-known. He has pub. The Enchanted Doll, Lon., 1849, sq., (a Christmas Fairy Tale for Children,) and a vol. entitled Prose and Verse, 1852, 12mo, originally contributed to the Illuminated Magazine and other periodicals. He was one of the editors of Punch from its commencement, and two years after this event became sole editor, which post he still retains, (1857.) He is also well known as the literary editor of, and a large contributor to, the Illustrated London News, and as one of the writers in Dickens's Household Words.

Lemon, Robert. Calendar of State Papers, &c., 1547–1580, Lon., 1857, 8vo. The publication of these papers is an event of no small interest to historical students. Mrs. Everett Green, and Messrs. Bruce, Brewer, and Hamilton, are engaged in the preparation of other vols.; so that by January we shall probably have at least (including the present vol.) 3 vols. pub., each containing an account of 8000 to 10,000 MSS.

"Facts of moment in our national history and in the biography of our worthies—facts over which the billows seem to have long closed—will here be recovered."—Lon. Athenæum, Jan. 24, 1857, 167–108, q. v.

Lesley, John, 1527-1596, of an ancient Scottish family, was educated at the University of Aberdeen, obtained a canonry in the Cathedral of that city, 1547; studied also in the Universities of Toulouse, Poitiers, and Paris; Vicar-General of Aberdeen, 1554; Bishop of Ross, 1561; laboured zealously for the cause of Mary Queen of Scots when she was a prisoner in England; Bishop of Constance, 1593; died in the Monastery of Guirtenberg, near Brussels, 1596. His publications were as follows: 1. A Defence of the Honour of Mary, Queen of Scotland, &c., Lon., 1569, 8vo; Liege, 1571, 8vo. Immediately suppressed. 2. Pro Libertate Impetranda, Paris, 1574, 8vo. 3. Afflicti Animi Consolatio et Trauquilli Animi Conversatio, 1574, 8vo. 4. De Origine, Moribus, et Rebus Gestis Scotorum Romæ, 1575, 4to; 1578, 4to. With this history, which is carried down from 1436 to Mary's return from France in 1561, are pub. (also in Latin) 5. Parænsis ad Nobilitatem Populunque Scotorum; and (6) Regionum et Insularum Scotiæ Descriptio. 7. De Titulo et Jure Sereniss. Principis Mariæ Scotorum Reginae, &c. Rheims, 1580, 4to. No. 4 was originally written in the Scottish language, and this original was pub. by the Bannatyne Club in 1830, Edin., 4to.

In 1842 was pub. Vestiarius Scoticum, (in Scottish,) from the bishop's MS., edited by John Sobieski Stuart, Edin., 4to. See Lesley's Life, by Dr. George Mackenzie; Spotswood's, Robertson's, and Laing's histories; Dodd's Ch. Hist.; Strype's Life of Grindal; Encyc. Brit., 7th ed.

The Biographie Universelle says of him,
 "Indépendamment des écrits qu'il publia pour la défense de Marie Stuart, ouvrages savants, éloquent, et dictés par le plus courageux dévouement, c'est à lui que les Écossais doivent le premier recueil de leurs lois." &c.

Leslie, Charles, 1650?-1722, a native of Ireland, second son of Dr. John Leslie, Bishop of Clogher, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; entered himself in the Temple at London, 1671; admitted into holy orders, 1680; Chancellor of the Cathedral of Connor, 1687; refused to take the oaths to William and Mary, and applied himself to theological and political controversy, on which subjects he pub. many treatises. He was a defender of arbitrary power, endeavoured by his writings to promote the cause of the banished Stuarts, and resided abroad with the Pretender from 1713 to '21.

"His abilities and his connexions were such that he might easily have obtained high preferment in the Church of England. But he took his place in the front rank of the Jacobite body, and remained there steadfastly through all the dangers and vicissitudes of three-and-thirty troubled years. Though constantly engaged in theological controversy with Deists, Jews, Socinians, Presbyterians, Papists, and Quakers, he found time to be one of the most voluminous political writers of his age. Of all the non-juring clergy he was the best-qualified to discuss constitutional questions; for before he had taken orders he had resided long in the Temple, and had been studying English history and law, while most of the other chiefs of the schism had been poring over the Acts of Chalcedon, or seeking for wisdom in the Targum of Onkelos."—T. B. MACAULAY: Hist. of England, vol. iii., 1855, chap. xiv.; and see vol. iv. chap. xviii., n.

But his legal education does not appear, according to Mr. Hallam, to have been of much benefit to the polemic: "Leslie's Case of the Regale and Pontificate . . . is full of enormous misrepresentation as to the English law. Leslie, however, like many other controversialists, wrote impetuously and hastily for his immediate purpose."—Constit. Hist. of England, 7th ed., 1854, 175, n. See also p. 218.

Of Leslie's Theological Writings, a collective ed. was pub. by himself, Lon., 1721, fol.; new ed., Oxf., 1832, 7 vols. 8vo. Of his political works there has been no collective ed., and probably never will be. A new ed. of The Regale and Pontificate was pub. Lon., 1838, 8vo; of The Divine Right of Tithes, 1845, 8vo; of The Case stated between the Churches of Rome and England, (see HALL-LAM, p. 218, ubi supra), 1848, p. 8vo; 1855, 12mo. Of his theological tracts the best known are—1. A Short and Easy Method with the Jews, 1689. 2. A Short and Easy Method with the Deists, 1691, 8vo. 3. The Snake in the Grass, 1697, 8vo; against the Quakers. His Select Works, with a Life, were pub. 1811, 8vo. The last ed. of No. 2 was pub., Edin., 1851, 18mo. It has been supposed by some that this excellent little work was borrowed from the Abbé St. Réal, but this opinion is altogether untenable. Few theological treatises have elicited so much commendation as The Short and Easy Method with Deists.

"No book of this period among many that were written reached so high a reputation as Leslie's Short Method with the Deists, published in 1694,—in which he started an argument pursued with more critical analysis by others on the peculiarly distinctive marks of credibility that pertain to the scripture miracles. The authenticity of this little treatise has been only questioned on the Continent. . . . The internal evidence that the Short Method was written by a Protestant should be conclusive."—Hillman's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 288, q.v.

See the note, where the Biographie Universelle is deservedly rebuked for its unfair version of this controversy,—if, indeed, it be worth that name. See also Prosper Marchand's Dictionnaire Historique, art. SAINT RÉAL; and the authorities at conclusion of this article.

"No single theological work has perhaps received so much applause as his Short and Easy Method with the Deists. . . of which the reprints are innumerable."—Dobson's Lib. Comp., ed. 1822, 69.

"We have the historical evidence for the truth of scripture exhibited in a form so convincing and satisfactory that the mind which can resist such evidence must evince a total perversion of reason, as well as an abjuration of all such testimony as can substantiate the truth of any by-gone event in this world's history."—DR. CHALMERS.

"Leslie's most excellent work contains irrefutable arguments in favour of Christianity; but it is rather too logical, requiring more attention than men in general are willing to afford any subject, however important."—Blackwood's Mag., xviii. 160. Treatise of Dr. Wm. E. Channing's Lect. on the Evidence of Christianity, before the Univ. of Cambridge, March 14, 1821.

"Since infidelity is constantly reviving, and, though repeatedly laid prostrate by the weapons of truth, still rises with unexhausted vigour, the champion of Christianity will do well neither to disdain nor neglect such arms as Leslie has prepared for him, of which time has not injured the temper nor taken off the edge."—Christian Observer.

All of Leslie's theological works should be carefully perused by the student of divinity and the intelligent layman.

"These two volumes [1721, fol.] may be considered as a library in themselves to any young student of the Church of England, and no such person who takes a fancy to what he there finds can ever fall into Socinianism, Fanaticism, Popery, or any of those other modern corruptions which infest this church and nation."—James's Life of Bishop Horne.

"The polemical skill of a Leslie is a saying of Bolingbroke's. A clergyman's library should not be without this author's theological works. He is said to have brought more persons from other persuasions into the Church of England than any man ever did."—BISHOP HORNE.

"An acute controversialist in favour of the Church of England."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"Nor should the name of Leslie be omitted; since it is most conspicuous upon the rolls of Christianity. A contemporary of Tillotson, but possessed of greater acumen, and exhibiting a more condensed and logical style, he was perhaps the ablest defender of orthodoxy at the close of the seventeenth century. Ever ardent and active in what he conceived to be the cause of vital religion, his heart and head were constantly excited in the fruitful birth of those admirable works which appear to bear the stamp of immortality."—Dobson's Lib. Comp., 16-18.

"Leslie was a reasoner, and a reasoner who was not to be reasoned against."—DR. JOHNSON: Baker's Life.

"Every treatise comprehended in the collection [7 vols. 8vo, 1832] is incomparable in its way."—Baker's Pref.

Leslie, Charles Robert, R.A., b. in London, Oct. 19, 1794, of American parents, of Scotch descent, besides painting many good pictures, has written two good books,—which last fact entitles him to a place in our columns. Those who desire to read some comments upon the artist (for we have only to do with the author) are referred to the English Cyclopædia, Lon., 1856, Biography, vol. ii., 863; Men of the Time, 1836, 475; Blackw. Mag., vi. 467, xvi. 131, 505, xxiv. 699, xlii. 336, xlii. 315, xlvii. 378, l. 347. Mrs. Jameson—a most competent critic—has no hesitation in pronouncing Leslie "the finest interpreter of the spirit of Shakspeare."

1. Memoirs of John Constable, R.A., chiefly from his Letters, Lon., 1843, 6l., with illustrations; 2d ed., with addit. Correspondence, 1845, sm. 4to.

"Got up in a peculiar, antique, and handsome manner, congenial to, and worthy of the subject. The world at large will find much to entertain and instruct in this interesting biography; artists and amateurs in particular will derive great instruction, and every class of readers useful intelligence and agreeable amusement. Mr. Leslie has performed his task with infinite taste and discrimination, giving the opinions of a competent authority upon the productions of his contemporary and friend, and bringing out the remarkable qualities and estimable points of poor Constable's amiable private character in every relation of life with unaffected simplicity and consequent effect."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

See Lon. Athenæum, Jan. 27, 1844, 101, and Jan. 6, 1855, 21.

2. A Hand-book for Young Painters, 1855, cr. 8vo. This may be called an improved and enlarged ed. of the author's Lectures to the Students of the Royal Academy, whilst Professor of Painting, 1847-51.

"Mr. Leslie adds one more to the number of accomplished men who, like Sir Joshua Reynolds, write as admirably as they paint. Though the title of this Hand-book might lead to the inference that it was only adapted for artists, it will be read with delight and instruction by every person who has any enjoyment in pictures."—Lon. Quar. Rev., April, 1856.

"The book abounds in quotable, melodious passages, pregnant with thought, observation, and tenderest feeling, and falling sweetly upon the ear like the echoes of a poetic mind. Indeed, it is a book of Wisdom and Goodness as well as of Art and Taste,—'wholesome literature,' as we have said."—Westminster Rev., April, 1855.

"It is a thoroughly readable book, written in an agreeable and modest style, without either pretension or pedantry."—Blackwood's Mag., Dec. 1855.

"Mr. Leslie's mind, while very universal and academic in its tastes, is certainly not beyond its age, nor free from ultra conservative and conventional peculiarities. His genius is not innovating nor subversive, and rests quite satisfied with old truths, and sometimes, we almost think, with old errors. . . . It is as an opposer of many of Mr. Ruskin's opinions, however, that Mr. Leslie chiefly demands the thanks of the artistic world. He shows that it is from Lord Lindsay that this reformer has so largely borrowed. . . . On Turner, as put into competition with Claude, and idolatrously praised by Mr. Ruskin, Mr. Leslie is justly severe."—Lon. Athen., Jan. 6, 1855, 20-22.

"By all means, we repeat, let those who are accustomed to go to the galleries of modern art for fashion's sake carefully read Mr. Leslie's book, and get a hint of the way in which good pictures should be studied."—Lon. Examiner.

Leslie, David, Lord Newark. 1. Two Speeches touching Bishops, Lon., 1641, 4to. 2. Speech to the trained bands of Nottinghamshire, 1642, 4to.

Leslie, Eliza, a very popular American writer, a native of Philadelphia, sister of Charles Robert Leslie, the artist, is a descendant of Robert Leslie, a Scotchman, who settled in this country about 1745. Her father, a valued friend of President Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, and other representative men of the day, was noted for quick perceptions and extensive scientific knowledge, which he delighted to communicate to others, and all of his five children have given evidence of more than ordinary abilities. Of these, all yet survive: Thomas Jefferson is a major in the United States army; Anna Leslie, who resides in New York, has attained wide celebrity by her skill as an amateur painter; and the youngest of the family is the wife of the distinguished writer on Political Economy, Henry C. Carey. (see p. 338 of this Dictionary.) Miss Leslie has told her own story in so interesting a manner that it will only be necessary for us to refer the reader to the charming autobiography (originally communicated to Mrs. Alice B. Neal) in Hart's Female Prose Writers of America, whilst we pass on to an enumeration of her contributions to the literature of her country. 1. Seventy-Five Receipts for Pastry, Cakes, and Sweetmeats, 1827. 2. The Mirror: Juvenile Stories. 3. The Young Americans. 4. Stories for Emma. 5. Stories for Adelaide. 6. Atlantic Tales. 7. Stories for Helen. 8. Birth-Day Stories. 9. The Wonderful Traveller: an abridgment, with alterations, of Munchausen, Gulliver, and Sindbad. 10. American Girl's Book, 1831. 11. Pencil Sketches: Three Series, 1833-35-37.

"They are all written in a correct, easy, and spirited style, and exhibit a very keen and nice observation of the various scenes of domestic life, with a happy talent for working up the results in a narrative form. . . . Mrs. Washington Potts is perhaps the best, as it is the longest and most elaborate, of the tales, though Frank Finlay is in some respects the most agreeable. Uncle Philip and The Escorted Lady are also particularly good. . . . We shall be happy to meet Miss Leslie as a painter of scenes and subjects which would give pleasanter impressions of American society to those who do not know our country, and bring back pleasanter recollections to those who do. Vulgarity, foolishness, and affectation are the growth of every soil: human nature, there is much reason to believe, is very much the same in this as on the other side of the globe."—W. B. PEARBODY: N. Amer. Rev., xxxvii. 466: review of First Series.

12. Domestic Cookery-Book, 1837. This book reached its 41st ed. (not one of which consisted of less than 1000 copies) before 1851. The gross sale of Miss Leslie's Cookery and Receipt Books has been about 100,000 to this date, (1857.) 13. Althea Vernon; or, The Embroidere-

Handkerchief, 1838. 14. Henrietta Harrison; or, The Blue Cotton Umbrella, 1838. 15. Kitty's Relations. 16. Leonilla Lynmore. 17. House-Book, 1840; last ed., 1854.

"The work which Miss Leslie has here given them might be studied half a year with great benefit, even though the lady never had occasion to exercise her knowledge. . . . Miss Leslie takes the student by the hand and leads her over her home that is to be, explaining the use and benefit of each apartment, the proper mode of caring for it, gives directions for furniture, with curtains to match, &c."—Southern Literary Gazette.

18. Lady's Receipt-Book, 1846. 19. The Mail of Canal Street, and the Bloxhams. 20. Indian Meal Book. 21. Amelia; or, A Young Lady's Vicissitudes, 1848. This is the only novel which Miss Leslie has written. 22. The Dennings and their Beaux, with Alina Delray, 1851. 23. French Cookery. 24. Stories for Young People. 25. Stories for Summer Days and Winter Nights. 26. Russel and Sydney, and Charles Loring: Tales of the American Revolution. 27. Behaviour Book, 1853.

"A work apparently much required in some parts of America."—English Cyclopædia: Biography, 1856, vol. iii. 864.

Undoubtedly, "in some parts" of all countries. Miss Leslie has edited The Gift, The Violet, &c., and contributed largely to Godey's Lady's Book, Graham's Magazine, and other periodicals.

"Miss Leslie has much individuality, and in all her writings has exhibited decided talent. Her style is mature and spirited, her fable sufficiently simple and probable, her characters boldly and clearly, and perhaps in all cases accurately drawn, and her description, narrative, and dialogue uniformly well managed."—Criswell's Prose Writers of America, q. v.

"Her tales are perfect daguerreotypes of real life: their actors think, act, and speak for themselves: with a keen eye for the ludicrous, the failings of human nature are never portrayed but to warn the young and the thoughtless. Her writings are distinguished for vivacity and ease of expression, strong common sense, and right principle. In her juvenile tales the children are neither 'good little girls or bad little boys,' but real little boys and girls, who act and speak with all the genuineness and naïveté of childhood. No writer of fiction in our country has ever had a wider or more interested circle of readers; and this is clearly proved by the increased circulation of all those publications in which her name has appeared as a regular contributor."—Prof. J. Hart's Female Prose Writers of America.

"Miss Leslie has quick observation, a retentive memory, a sprightly fancy, and a persevering mind; she has also the great merit of being free from affectation: her purpose is always to be useful, to correct faults, expose follies, and wage war with what is perverse and contemptible."—Mrs. Hal's Woman's Record.

valuable papers in Nicholson's Journal, vols. iii. and iv.; in Edin. Phil. Trans., 1818, 1824; in the Edin. Review, and in the Encyc. Brit. A selection from his contributions to the latter was pub. in 1838, p. 8vo, prefaced by a Biographical Memoir of the author by Prof. Macvey Napier. Contents: 1. Achromatic Glasses; 2. Acoustics; 3. Aeronautics; 4. Barometer; 5. Barometrical Measurements; 6. Climate; 7. Cold and Congelation; 8. Dew; 9. Meteorology. Nor must we omit to commend to the reader's attention a vol., partly written by Sir John Leslie, pub. in Oliver & Boyd's Edinburgh Cabinet Library, entitled Narrative of Discovery and Adventure in the Polar Seas and Regions; 20th ed., 1856, 8vo. But the most celebrated of his papers in the Encyclopedia is the Dissertation in vol. i. on The Progress of Mathematical and Physical Sciences, chiefly during the Eighteenth Century. For this essay the author received about £500,—an amount for which some good-natured authors would engage to furnish a whole book. Sir John was never married. Further information respecting this distinguished scholar will be found in Macvey Napier's biography of Sir John Leslie, in Encyc. Brit.; also prefixed to the vol. of Leslie's Contributions to the work. See also Mrs. Thomson's Recollections, ii. 67; Memoirs of the Life of Sir James Mackintosh; Lon. Gent. "It would be impossible, we think, for any intelligent and well-constituted mind, thoroughly acquainted with the powers and attainments of Sir John Leslie, to view them with out a strong feeling of admiration for his vigorous and inventive genius, and of respect for that extensive and varied knowledge which his active curiosity, his excursive reading, and his happy memory had enabled him to amass and digest. His theoretical notions may be thrown aside or condemned; but his exquisite instruments and his experimental combinations will ever attest the utility no less than the originality of his labours, and continue to act as helps to farther discovery."

L'Estrange, Sir Roger, M.P. 1616-1701, a native of Norfolk, Licensor of the Press under Charles II. and James II., defended the measures of the Court in his Observer, (1679-87, 3 vols. fol.), The Public Intelligencer, The News, and in many tracts and pamphlets, long forgotten. He also pub. a number of controversial pieces of a theological character, and translations of Æsop's Fables, Seneca's Morals, Cicero's Offices, Erasmus's Colloquies, Quevedo's Visions, Bona's Guide to Eternity, the Works of Josephus, and Five Letters from a Nun to a Cavalier. The Poem of Loyalty Confined is supposed to have been written by Sir Roger whilst imprisoned on account of his adherence to Charles the First. See Miss Mitford's Recollections of a Literary Life. A list of his works will be found in Wutt's Bibl. Brit. See also Biog. Brit.; Genl. Diet.; Cibber's Lives; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Nichols's Poems; *Granger's Biog. "The business of licensing books was entrusted to Sir Roger L'Estrange, a well-known pamphleteer of that age, and himself a most scurrilous libeller in behalf of the party he espoused—that of popery and despotic power. It is hardly necessary to remind the reader of the objections that were raised to one or two lines in Paradise Lost."—Hallam's Const. Hist. of England, 7th ed., 1854, iii. 4.

This eminent critic admires Sir Roger's literary taste as little as his political principles:

"The pattern of bad writing in this respect (—lang) was Sir Roger L'Estrange: his Æsop's Fables will present every thing that is hostile to good taste; yet by a certain wit and readiness in rally, L'Estrange was a popular writer, and may even now be read, perhaps, with some amusement."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1864, iii. 353.

"Sir Roger L'Estrange among his rivals was esteemed as the most perfect model of political writing. He was a strong party-writer on the government side, for Charles the Second, and the compositions of the author seem to us coarse, yet they contain much idiomatic expression. His Æsop's Fables are a curious specimen of familiar style."—Desraeli's Curiosities of Lit., ed. Lon., 1851, 57.

"His Æsop's Fables was more a new work than a translation. The most valuable of his books is his translation of Josephus, which, though in a better style than most of his writings, has been very justly censured. He was one of the great corruptors of our language, by excluding vowels and other letters not commonly pronounced, and introducing pert and affected phrases."—Granger's Biog. Hist. of Eng., 5th ed., 1824, v. 470.

In a notice of Quevedo's Visions, by Mr. Tacknor, in his History of Spanish Literature, this eminent scholar remarks:

"All the translations I have seen are bad. The best is that of L'Estrange, or at least the most spirited; but still L'Estrange is not always faithful when he knew the meaning, and he is sometimes unfaithful from ignorance. Indeed, the great popularity of his translations was probably owing, in some degree, to the additions he boldly made to his text, and the frequent misapprehensions he hazarded of its jests to the scandal and taste of his times by allusions entirely English and local."—Vol. II., 271, n. N. York, 1855.

"L'Estrange was by no means deficient in readiness and shrewdness; and his diction, though coarse, and disfigured by a mean and flippant jargon which then passed for wit in the green-room and the tavern, was not without keenness and vigour. But his nature, at once ferocious and ignoble, showed itself in every line that he penned."—T. B. Macaulay's Hist. of Eng., vol. 1.

We are told that

"Queen Mary seemed to show great contempt for him, making the following anagram on his name:

Roger L'Estrange,

Lying strange roger."

Biog. Brit., 1760, v. 2727.

"This," says Granger, "naturally intrudes the dactyl made by Lee, who by years was so strangely altered as scarcely to be recollected by his old friend:

Faces may alter, names can't strange;
I am strange Lee altered; you are still Le' Strange."

Lever, Charles James, M.D., the popular novelist, was born in Dublin, August 31, 1806, was educated at Trinity College in his native city, and afterwards took a degree at Göttingen; practised medicine with great success in the North of Ireland, during the cholera-season of 1832; was subsequently nominated to the post of Physician to the British Embassy at Brussels, and filled this office for three years; in April, 1842, became editor of the Dublin University Magazine; in 1845 removed to Florence, where he has since resided, still writing for the periodical formerly under his superintendance. Mr. Lever has been a voluminous author, as the following list of his works—to which might be added a number not acknowledged to be from his pen—gives ample evidence.

1. Confessions of Harry Lorrequer, 1840, 8vo; 1845, 8vo; 1850, 8vo. 2. Charles O'Malley, the Irish Dragoon, 1841, 2 vols. 8vo; 1850, 2 vols. 8vo. 3. The Dodd Family Abroad, 1853-54, 8vo. 16. Sir Jasper Carew, 1854. 17. The Commissioner; or, De Lunatico Inquirendo. 18. Con Cregan. 19. The Mystic Vial. 20. Heirs of Randolph Abbey, 8vo. 21. The Martins of Cro' Martin, 1856, 8vo. On the first of the present year (1857) Messrs. Chapman & Hall, of London, commenced the publication of a cheap and uniform edition of Lever's Novels, (with illustrations in each vol. by H. K. Brown,—“Phiz.”) in crown 8vo vols. at only four shillings each. Mr. T. B. Peterson, of Philadelphia, has also issued a selection from the novels of Lever, in 4 vols. r. 8vo.: Vol. I., Charles O'Malley; II. Harry Lorrequer, Arthur O'Leary; III. Jack Hinton, Knight of Gwynne; IV. Tom Burke of Ours, Kate O'Donoghue, Horace Templeton.

Mr. Lever is not only exceedingly popular with readers at large, but his exuberant jollity has achieved a great triumph in overcoming the gravity even of the sternest of the rigid tribe of reviewers, and eliciting commendation where one of less assurance or less fun would have been edgued into sobriety by unsparring castigation.

“We have a very undue propensity to underrate these stories of adventure; but we think it remains to be proved that our books of emotion and sentiment are really of a higher class, as they certainly are not of a healthier. It is good to be the favourite of youth,—good to awake the eager interest, the laugh which rings from the heart. . . . There is no dulness in Mr. Lever's dashing, daring, rapid books. Of their kind they are capital. . . . It is not Mr. Lever's forte, perhaps, to dive into the secret heart of things, or analyze his heroes and heroines; but who can take a standing leap like the author of Harry Lorrequer? Who can waltz the world with such noble horsemanship? He has the true spring of Irish humour and Irish shrewdness in him. Mickey Free is as merry and honest a rogue as ever happy fancy invented; and all the secondary bits of life and character in the home-country are admirable.”—Blackwood's Mag., May, 1855: Modern Novelists, Great and Small.

“The intense spirit and frolic of the author's sketches have made him one of the most successful writers of the day.”—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

Mr. Lewes is now (1857) engaged in rewriting this work. Since the above was written, the new ed. of the Biographical History of Philosophy has made its appearance, Lon., 1857, 8vo; N. York, 1857, 8vo.

"Seven new names have been added to the list of philosophers,—Abelard, Algazali, Giordano Bruno, Hartley, Darwin, Cabanis, and Gall. An Introduction, setting forth the distinguishing characteristics of Philosophy and Science, replaces the original Introduction. Under the heads of Socrates, the Sophists, Aristotle, Hume, Condillac, Kant, and Eclecticism, considerable additions and alterations will be found; and throughout the revision has been such that scarcely a paragraph remains unaltered."—Author's Preface.

This work is not without value to the student; but we imagine that a little more of the spirit of true philosophy will cause the third edit., should one appear, to vary more from the second than the second does from the first.

8. Life and Works of Goethe, with Sketches of his Age and Contemporaries, from published and unpublished Sources, 1855, 2 vols. 8vo. On this work Mr. Lewes employed much labour during the ten years which preceded its publication. It has pleased the Germans greatly,—which is no marvel, considering the biographer's devotion to his hero. Dr. Julius Frese has pub. (Dec. 1856) the first vol. of an intended translation of Mr. Lewes's work.

"A more faithful and lifelike biography than this we have rarely read. The image of the living man is presented with much skill and much candour. Mr. Lewes speaks often of the 'many-sidedness of Goethe,' and he shows his weak sides and dark sides as well as his great and brilliant ones, of which we all know. If the reader does not form the same high estimate of Goethe the man as Goethe the author, it will not be from want of ample materials for forming a judgment. His whole history is here laid open, and the facts are derived not from books only, but from the testimony of those who knew the man, and from other authentic sources of information."—Lon. Literary Gazette, 1855, 691–603. See also 775–777.

But this critic condemns—what most dispassionate minds will deplore—the excessive exhibition of the favor biographicus which saps Mr. Lewes's integrity of judgment.

"Mr. G. H. Lewes has written a very good and very interesting life of Goethe. He has brought eminent qualifications to this task; for, though he is an ardent admirer of his hero, and indeed may be ranked among the Goethe idolaters, he has acuteness, discrimination, and good sense."—Fraser's Magazine.

The reviewer then proceeds to rebuke Mr. Lewes for his attempt to defend Goethe against the oft-repeated charges of immorality as a writer and irreligion as a man. The Life of Goethe—whilst as yet unfinished—and its author are thus referred to by the late Margaret Fuller:

"The second time Mr. Carlyle had a dinner-party at which was a witty, French, flippant sort of man, author of a History of Philosophy, and now writing a Life of Goethe—a task for which he must be as unfit as irreligion and sparkling shallowness can make him."

It will be remembered that the favourite object of Miss Fuller's literary life was a Memoir of Goethe, for which she had made long and assiduous preparation. Mr. Lewes was the editor of the Leader newspaper from its commencement, in 1849, until July, 1851, and he has been a contributor to the Edinburgh, Westminster, Foreign Quarterly, British and Foreign, and British Quarterly Reviews; to Blackwood, Fraser, the Classical Museum, and Monthly Chronicle, and to the Morning Chronicle and Atlas newspapers.

Lewis, Miss, afterwards Mrs. Robert Clerk, of Tetbury. Poems, Lon., 1788, 8vo.

Lewis, Alonzo, "The Lynn Bard," has gained reputation both as a topographer and a poet. 1. Forest-Flowers and Sea-Shells: Poems, Bost., 1831, 12mo. This vol. has passed through ten eds.

"Many passages of exceeding beauty will be found in the poem of Love, as well as in the minor pieces which are appended,—the majority of them being characterized by high moral views, with great sweetness of versification."—Sheffield (Eng.) Iris; edited by James Montgomery, the poet.

"We think our readers will agree with us that this is as mellifluous verse as ever Campbell or Rogers wrote."—Norwich (Eng.) Gazette.

"We love Lewis, for he is a poet in all his doings, lookings, sayings, and dreamings."—N. P. WILLIS.

See Amer. Month. Rev., i. 42. 2. Hist. of Lynn, including Nahant, 1844, 8vo.

"It is really a meritorious work, complete in every part, and evincing much reading, research, and correct judgment."—SNE-LING.

"A curious compendium, not only to antiquaries and the immediate descendants of the first settlers of that place, but to readers of every class and section of the country."—Traveller's Guide.

We have six other commendatory notices before us of this work, and a eulogistic poem addressed to "The Lynn Bard" by Mrs. Jane Ermina Locke.

Lewis, Charles. The Four Reformed Parliaments: Handbook to the Elections, 1832-42, Lon., 1842, 12mo.

"The Four Reformed Parliaments is a clever and well-digested list and calendar of the respective returns in these four general elections, the numbers polled, the members returned, their politics, &c. It is well printed, and a useful reduc-mecum for offices and men of business."—Bell's Messenger.

Lewis, Elisha J., M.D., b. 1820, in Baltimore, is a son of A. J. Lewis, an eminent merchant of Philadelphia, and a grandson of Captain Joseph Lewis, of the American Revolutionary army. The subject of our notice passed two years of his collegiate life at old Nassau Hall, Princeton, subsequently pursued his medical studies under Dr. John K. Mitchell, a distinguished physician of Philadelphia, graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, vigorously prosecuted his medical and scientific studies in Paris, afterwards settled in Philadelphia, where he has since resided. 1. Hints to Sportsmen; containing Notes on Shooting, the Habits of Game-Birds and Wild Fowls of America, the Dog, the Gun, the Field, &c., Phila., 1851, 12mo. 2. The American Sportsman, &c., 1855, 8vo. This may be considered an improved and enlarged ed. of No. 1. A third ed. was pub., 1857, 8vo.—a truly beautiful volume, with numerous illustrations. Highly commended in Putnam's Monthly Mag., v. 330.

Two American sportsmen have favoured us with some comments on this work, and from these we extract a few lines:

"The descriptions of the birds are most graphic, and the general information and practical suggestions are of the most useful character to every votary of the Dog and Gun."—L.

"A valuable compilation of well-digested ideas of writers, talkers, amateurs, and the thoroughly initiated in sporting-matters,—exhibiting much care, study, and patience on the part of the author."—C.

3. Amer. ed. of Youatt on the Dog; with addits., 1847, 8vo. Dr. Lewis is the author of several articles on the origin of the Setter and Pointer, repub. in Porter's ed. of Lt.-Col. P. Hawker's Instructions to Young Sportsmen, (see p. 801 of this Dictionary,) and has contributed numerous scientific and sporting as well as humorous papers to the New York Spirit of the Times. Of the latter, we understand, a selection will soon be pub. in a handsome volume.

Lewis, Sir George Cornwall, Bart., M.P., a son of the late Rt. Hon. Sir Thomas Frankland Lewis, was b. in Oct. 1806, graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, with distinguished honours, in 1828; was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in 1831, and, after filling several important political posts, was made Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1855. On assuming the duties of this responsible position he resigned into the hands of Mr. Henry Reeve, of the Privy Council, the editorship of the Edinburgh Review, in which he had succeeded Professor Empson in the early part of 1854. In 1844 Sir George was married to the widow of Thomas Henry Lister, Esq., a sister of the Earl of Clarendon, and a descendant of the great Lord-Chancellor. Lady Lewis is not unknown in the Republic of Letters: see LEWIS, LADY MARIA THERESA VILLIERS.

Sir George Cornwall Lewis has given to the world the following publications: 1. Augustus Boeckh's Public Economy of Athens, &c.; trans. from the German, Lon., 1828, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1842, 8vo.

"A work of great research and value. Had the author's knowledge of modern science borne any proportion to his knowledge of antiquity, the book would have been all that could have been desired."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 356.

See LAMB, ANTHONY.

2. K. O. Müller's Account of the Doric Race; trans. from the German, in conjunction with the Rt. Hon. Henry Tafel, M.P., Lon., 1830, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1839, 2 vols. 8vo. This trans. was revised, corrected, and enlarged by Müller himself before it went to the press.

"There is hardly a publication in existence which throws so much light on the 'dim' regions of fable and mythology, and on the annals of early Greece."—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

"We close the volumes in admiration of the author's unwearied industry and great knowledge."—Lon. Month. Mag.

"Otfrid Müller,—un des écrivains les plus savans et les plus ingénieux de l'Allemagne."—BENJAMIN CONSTANT: de la Religion.

No student of Grecian history can safely neglect this work; and he must add to it Leitch's trans. of the same author's Mythology, and Ancient Art and its Remains, (see LEITCH, JOHN,) and No. 9, infra.

3. On the Origin and Formation of the Romance Languages, 1835, 8vo; 2d ed., 8vo. 4. On the Use and Abuse of Political Terms, 8vo. 5. On Local Disturbances and the Irish Church Question, 1836, 8vo. 6. On the Government of Dependencies, 1841, 8vo.

"A learned and valuable work on a subject which, though of the greatest interest, has been strangely neglected in this country."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 95.

"A masterpiece of lucid arrangement, of logical statements, and of vigorous reasoning."—Lon. Examiner.

7. On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, 1849, 8vo. 8. On the Methods of Observation and Reasoning in Politics, 1852, 2 vols. 8vo. See Lon. Athenæum, 1852, 839-841. 9. K. O. Müller's Hist. of the Literature of Ancient Greece, from the author's MSS.: the first half of the trans. by Sir G. C. L., the remainder of the trans. and the completion of the work, according to the Author's Plan, by J. W. Donaldson, D.D., 1857, 2 vols. 8vo; 1 vol. was pub. previously. The 2d vol., containing the new portion of the work, is sold separately. It will be remembered that Karl Müller, late Prof. in the Univ. of Göttingen, died in 1840, whilst pursuing his researches in Greece, leaving this work incomplete. Dr. Donaldson has earned the gratitude of students by finishing this excellent Manual of Greek Literary History. 10. An Enquiry into the Credibility of the Early Roman History, 1855, 2 vols. 8vo.

"It exhibits a complete and intelligent mastery of the original authorities,—a full knowledge of what has been done by former critics, with an equitable spirit of appreciation towards them,—and a familiarity with historical research, modern as well as ancient. . . . The book is not, and does not profess to be, a history of Rome; but we are mistaken if it does not tend to influence materially the composition of future Roman histories. . . . No man interested either in ancient history or in the general theory of historical study can read his book without profit."—Edin. Rev., July, 1856, q. v.

"He does not merely object to the particular conclusions of Niebuhr, but boldly strikes at the root of his system, and assails not only the results of his investigations but the method by which he has arrived at them. He not only rejects Niebuhr's views as untenable, but maintains that it is impossible they should be otherwise. He not only discards as illusory the specious fabric reared by the Prussian historian, but affirms that any one which may be substituted in its place must be equally shadowy and unsubstantial. His views, like those of Beaufort, are simply negative, and his conclusions as to the early history of Rome may be summed up in the single line:—

"All that we know is nothing can be known."

" . . . We do not believe that the future historian of Rome will acquiesce in his sweeping scepticism; but he will undoubtedly be indebted to him for the most ample and complete examination of his materials: and will derive from his elaborate essay that advantage which must always proceed from every fresh examination of an obscure subject by an independent and original thinker."—*Lon. He was the author of a number of publications on baptism, the liturgy and catechism of the Church of England, &c., several biographical and other works. Among these are—1. Life of John Wickliffe, D.D., Lon., 1720, '23, 8vo; new ed., Oxf., 1820, 8vo. Some on large paper.

Britain, vol. i. 60, et seq.

"While I heartily accede to the utility of the work, and acknowledge my obligations to the author, I cannot but regret the want of a lucid order and of an agreeable style which it manifestly betrays. Lewis's biography of Caxton is among the dullest of all biographical memoirs."—Dibdin: T. p. Antiq., i. lx. n. d.

6. Antiq. and Use of Seals in England, 1704, 4to. 7. Life of Reynold Pecocke, Bishop of St. Asaph and Chichester, 1744, 8vo: two hundred and fifty copies printed; some on large paper. New ed., Oxf., 1820, 8vo. 8. Life of John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester: see FISHER, JOHN.

"Ungrateful should I be to omit the mention of the biographical labours of the Rev. John Lewis, whose Lives of Wicliffe, Caxton, and Bishop Pecocke are much cherished in the libraries of the curious. They are compositions of great care, apparent fidelity, and some utility; but, during their perusal, one is conscious of a feeling somewhat similar to that from a view of a dull dead level country, where the soil and produce are equally good, but where there is no variety, and where wantonness as naturally follows."—*Di din's Lib. Lewis, M. Books on Grammar, taxes, trade, lands, a bank, &c., Lon., 1675-78, &c.

Lewis, Matthew Gregory, M.P. 1775-1818, a son of the Deputy Secretary-at-War, and the grandson of Sir Thomas Sewell, Master of the Rolls, after studying at Christ Church, Oxford, resided for some time in Germany, where he "sipped full" of those tales of supernatural horrors which he afterwards reproduced in a new shape in his dramas and romances. In early life he was dependent upon an income allowed by his father, which young Lewis shared with his mother,—for his parents lived separately; but by the death of the former, in 1813, he came into possession of large estates in Jamaica, where he resided in 1815 and '17. To this circumstance we owe the work which (next to his Correspondence) does him the most credit.—The Journal of a West Indian Proprietor. He commenced authorship at a very early age, as the date of the first work in the annexed list testifies. 1. The East Indian; a Comedy written when the author was but sixteen. 2. The Monk; a Romance, Lon., 1795, 3 vols. 12mo. Often reprinted. This immoral production, founded on the story of Santon Barissa, in The Guardian, was in danger of prosecution by the Government on account of its revolting licentiousness. Of course it sprang at once into great popularity, or, rather, was sold with great rapidity. To avert prosecution, Lewis pledged himself to recall the printed copies and to omit the objectionable passages in a future edition. To procure one of the early impressions, therefore, is now difficult, and it is to be regretted that it is not (as Dr. Johnson wished respecting the complicated piece of music which tortured his nerves) quite impossible. It is a melancholy fact that some eminent characters of the day encouraged the shameless offender in his violations of decency, literary as well as moral purity, and good taste:

"Charles Fox paid the unusual compliment of crossing the House of Commons that he might congratulate the young author, whose work obtained high praise from many other able men of that able time."—SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The "Mothers of England" displayed more good sense:

"His Monk, that strange and extramundane production, made the reader 'sup so full of horrors' that mothers were obliged to lock it up from their sickly and sentimental daughters,—more especially as its morale was not of the choicest."—Moir's Sketches of the Pœt. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

Allan Cunningham, after noticing Mrs. Radcliffe as "the leader of those who superseded the true supernatural by means of the false supernatural, and wrought her wonders by aid of mystical machinery," &c., continues:

"The Monk by Lewis is of the same race of wild creations. All is forced and exaggerated; men and women are exhibited under a light which both distorts and discolours; human nature has not fair play for a moment: yet there is great force,—not of passion, but of posture, and great vigour of colouring,—not of nature, but of artifice. This melo-dramatic sort of representation of life, startled for a time, but could not last: when truth and true passion took the field, the fictitious of Lewis were of the same avail as the false rods of the prophets in the presence of the true rod of Moses."—Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

Sir Walter Scott styles the Monk "an ordinary exertion of genius." It is to be regretted that genius should be so perverted. Undoubtedly a strong attraction of the book was the poetry scattered through its pages:

"In spite of the objections we have stated, [indelicacy, supernatural machinery, and plagiarism.] The Monk was so highly popular that it seemed to create an epoch in our literature. But the public were chiefly captivated by the poetry with which Mr. Lewis had interspersed his prose narrative."—Scott's Essay on Imitations of the Ancient Ballad, in his Poetical Works, Abbotsford ed., Edin., 1850, 562, et seq.

"Lewis was a poet of no mean calibre. The ballads and little pieces scattered throughout his novel of the Monk were, in their day, the most popular things known. They were chanted in the street and in the drawing-room; while the subject of the most terrific, (Alonzo and Imogene) and many episodes in the novel, were represented on the stage."—Diddin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 748.

"After Mrs. Radcliffe, Monk Lewis was the greatest master of the art of freezing the blood. The robber-scene in the Monk is only inferior to that in Count Nathom and perfectly new in the circumstances and cast of the characters. Some of his descriptions are chargeable with unpardonable grossness; but the pieces of poetry interspersed in this far-famed novel, such as the flight of Roncesvalles and the Exile, in particular, have a romantic and delightful harmony, such as might be chaunted by the moonlight pilgrim, or might lull the dreaming mariner on summer seas."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the English Novelists, Lect. VI.

We shall have something more to say respecting Lewis as a poet before we have concluded this article. We may dismiss the Monk with the remark that Southey considered it no slight condemnation when he recorded his verdict against Cumberland's novels as "More profligate in their tendency than Matthew Lewis's unhappy book."—Letter to G. C. Bedford, June 12, 1803: Southey's Life and Corresp.

3. Village Virtues; a Drama, 1796, 4to. 4. Minister; a Tragedy, trans. from Schiller, 1797, 8vo. 5. The Castle Spectre; a Drama, 1798, 8vo. Acted in 1797 for sixty nights.

"When Lewis took a leap from the closet to the stage, his power was equally felt. I yet remember, when a boy, trembling in the very theatre at the scene in The Castle Spectre which brings the murdered maiden on the stage; and if productions are to be judged by their effect, that drama, like The Robbers of Schiller, has left on facile imaginations traces never to be obliterated."—Moir: ubi supra, p. 19.

Quintana's tragedy of The Duke of Viseo, printed in 1801, was imitated from Lewis's Castle Spectre: see Ticknor's Hist. of Spanish Lit., 2d ed., N. York, 1854, iii. 309.

6. Rolla; a Tragedy, 1799, 8vo. 7. Tales of Terror, Kelso, 1799, 4to; Lon., 1801, 8vo. See No. 12. 8. The Love of Gain; a Poem imitated from the 13th Satire of Juvenal, 1799, 4to. 9. The East Indian; a Comedy, 1800, 8vo. 10. Adelmorn, or The Outlaw; a Romantic Drama, 1800, 8vo. 11. Alphonso, King of Castile; a Tragedy, 1801, 8vo.

"There is some good poetry scattered up and down the play. . . . The ill-success which it has justly experienced is owing, we have no doubt, to the want of nature in the characters and of probability and good arrangement in the incidents,—objections of some force."—REV. SYDNEY SMITH: Edin. Rev., i. 314-317. Works, i. 31-35.

12. Tales of Wonder, Lon., 1801, 2 vols. 8vo. To this collection Walter Scott contributed the first-fruits of his poetical genius,—William and Ellen, the Eve of St. John, Glenfinlas, The Fire King, &c. See Lockhart's Life of Scott, Abbotsford ed., Edin., 1850, 80, 81, 83-84, 94, and Scott's Poetical works, same ed., 570-571.

"He [Scott] subsequently adventured in Monk Lewis's crazy bark, Tales of Wonder, which soon went to pieces, leaving, however, among its surviving fragments the scattered contributions of Scott."—WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT, the Historian: N. Amer. Rev., April, 1838; and in his Miscellanies, Boston, 1855, 188-189, q. v.

"Amidst the general depreciation of the Tales of Wonder," remarks Scott, "my small share of the obnoxious publication was dismissed without censure, and in some cases obtained praise from the critics."—*Essay on Imitations of the Ancient Ballad: Scott's Poet. See Lockhart's Life of Scott, same ed., 94.

"An extraordinary, but highly poetical, miscellany."—Diddin's Lib. Comp., 748.

"The Tales of Wonder and the Tales of Terror succeeded; [The Castle Spectre,] some of them stories of amazing vigour,—wild, extravagant, unnatural, but withal highly readable, nay, occasionally of enchanting interest."—Moir: ubi supra, 19.

The copartnership of Lewis and Scott in these marvellous tales presented too fair a mark to the author of English Bards and Scotch Reviewers to be passed over in silence:

"Oh, wonder-working Lewis, Monk, or Bard,
Who fair wouldst make Parnassus a churchyard!

* * * * *

All hail, M. P.! from whose infernal brain
Thin-sheeted phantoms glide, a grisly train;
At whose command 'grim women' throng in crowds,
And kings of fire, of water, and of clouds,
With 'small gray men,' 'wild yagers,' and what not,
To crown with honour thee, and Walter Scott."

13. The Bravo of Venice; a Romance, trans. from the German, 1804, 8vo. Reprinted. 14. Rungantino; a Melodrama, 1805, 8vo; 2d ed., 1806, 8vo. 15. Adelgitha; a Tragedy, 1806, 8vo. 16. In 1803, Mr. Lewis's Monodrama of The Captive was brought out on the stage, and Mrs. Litchfield played the principal character; but it was too horrible to be tolerated for more than one night. Henry Russell's song of The Maniac is only a very slight alteration of Lewis's Captive: see Irish Quarterly Review, iii. 665-672, for an account of this play and a notice of other works of the author. Lewis died on his return from a visit to his Jamaica plantations, May 14, 1818. After his death appeared—24. The Journal of a West India Proprietor, kept during a Residence in the Island of Jamaica, 1834, 8vo; 1844, sq. 12mo, (Pt. 16 of Murray's Home and Colonial Library.)

"Lewis's Jamaica Journal is delightful. It is almost the only unaffected Book of Travels I have read of late years. You have the man himself. It is by far his best work, and will live to be popular."—Coleridge's Table-Talk.

"This Journal stands high, among works of a similar kind, for grace, lightness, pleasantry, descriptive power, felicity of expression, and conversational fluency and freedom."—Edin. Rev.

"The graphic power displayed, whether in sketching scenery, manners, or incidents, appears to us not only high but first rate,—such as entitles the West India Proprietor to be ranked with Washington Irving in such pieces as the Visit to Palos,—with Wm. Matthews in the very best pages of the Diary of an Invalid,—nay, we hardly hesitate to say with Miss Edgeworth in the brightest pages of Castle Rackrent,—or Lord Byron himself."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

25. Lewis's Life and Correspondence; with many Pieces in Prose and Verse never before published, 1839, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Crammed full of anecdote as these volumes are, theatrical, political, and literary, there is not a dull page throughout."—Court Journal.

One of the best descriptions we have met with of Lewis's literary peculiarities, both in poetry and prose, occurs in Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century. We have no space for further quotations; but, as we have promised to say something more of Lewis as a poet, a few lines must not be denied:

"Lewis was a man rather of enthusiastic temperament than of high and sustained imagination. He could not face the sunlight and the clear blue sky; he required clouds and tempest, a howling wind, and a troubled sea. He was what the vulture is to the eagle, what the leopard is to the lion, what the scene-painter is to the artist. His plays are what melodramas are to tragedy, and the terrors of his poetry trench as much on the burlesque as on the sublime. . . . He had an exquisite ear for versification, as demonstrated in his Durandarte, and Alonzo the Brave,—of which latter The Fire King of Smith, in The Rejected Addresses, was a legitimate and scarcely extravagant burlesque."—Ubi supra, 19, 20.

On Lewis's pieces just noticed who can reflect without pleasure when he remembers what he owes to them?

"Lewis, whatever Scott might, on maturer consideration, think of his title to such fame. [that of a poet.] had certainly done him no small service; for the ballads of Alonzo the Brave, and the Fair Imogene, and Durandarte, had rock-kindle effectually in his breast the spark of poetical ambition."—Lockhart's Life of Scott, Abbotsford ed., Edin., 1850, p. 81.

And see in this connection Scott's Poetical Works, Abbotsford ed., 570–571.

Southey appears to think that the influence of Lewis's poetry on Scott's youthful muse was not at all of a happy character:

"In all these modern ballads there is a modernism of thought and language—turns to me very perceptible, and very unpleasant, the more so for its mixture with antique works,—polished steel and rusty iron! This is the case in all Scott's ballads. . . . Matthew G. Lewis, M.P., sins more grievously in this way; he is not enough versed in old English to avoid it. Scott and Leyden are, and ought to have written more purely."—Letter to C. W. F. H. Junr, June 9, 1803: Southey's Life and Correspondence.

It is a satisfaction to be assured that Lewis was a much better man than the character of his early writings would lead one to infer:

"Lewis," writes Lord Byron, "was a good man, a clever man, but a bore. My only revenge or consolation used to be setting him by the ears with some viracious person who hated bores especially.—Nadame de Staël or Hothothen, for example. But I liked Lewis; he was the jewel of a man, had he been better set.—I don't mean personally,—but less live one, for he was tedious as well as contradictory to every thing and everybody. Poor fellow! he died a martyr to his new riches,—of a second visit to Jamaica:

'I'd give the lands of Deloraine
Dark Musgrave were alive again!

That is,

'I would give many a sugarcane,
Mat. Lewis were alive again!"

"I would pay my share!" adds Scott. "How few friends one has whose faults are only ridiculous! His visit was one of humanity, to ameliorate the condition of his slaves. He did much good by stealth, and was a most generous creature."

Much interesting information respecting Lewis will be found in Scott's Essay on Imitations of the Ancient Ballad, in his Poetical Works, Abbotsford ed., Edin., 1850, 562–567, 569.

Lewis, Merer. On the Teeth, Lon., 1772, 8vo.

Lewis, Captain Meriwether, 1774–1809, a native of Virginia, private Secretary to President Jefferson, 1801–03; Governor of Louisiana, 1806; was associated with Captain William Clarke in the command of the exploring-party, directed by Government, across the continent to the Pacific Ocean. They left St. Louis, May, 1804, had ascended the Missouri 3843 miles by July, 1805, reached the Pacific Ocean at the mouth of the Columbia in November following, and returned to St. Louis in November, 1806, having travelled about 8000 miles. The account of their travels was first made known to the world by Jefferson's Message to Congress, read Feb. 19, 1806; pub., N. York, 1806, 8vo, pp. 128; republ., Lon., 1809, 8vo, pp. 309. Another account was pub. by Patrick Gass, (see p. 654 of this Dictionary,) and a complete account—prepared from the MSS. by Nicholas Biddle, but pub. under the name of Paul Allen, who only conducted the publication through the press—appeared in 1814, Phila., 2 vols. 8vo, with a Memoir of Lewis by President Jefferson. This was republ. in Lon., 1814, 4to; again, 1815, 3 vols. 8vo; 1817, 3 vols. 8vo. The 1st English ed. was reviewed by Robert Southey in the London Quarterly Review, xii. 317–368. Other notices of this expedition will be found in the Edin. Rev., xxiv. 412. (by Dr. Gordon); South. Quar. Rev., viii. 191; Analec. Mag., v. 127, 210; Method. Quar. Rev., ii. 556. Nor must the reader fail to procure the last Amer. ed., with valuable additions, of Lewis and Clarke's Travels, by Archibald McVickar, N. York, 1843, 2 vols. 18mo. President Jefferson gives Lewis a high character:

"Of courage undaunted, possessing a firmness and perseverance of purpose which nothing but impossibilities could divert from its direction; intimate with the Indian character, customs, and principles; guarded by exact observation of the vegetables and animals of his own country, against losing time in the description of objects already possessed," &c.

Lewis's end was a melancholy one: he committed suicide near Nashville, Oct. 11, 1809, in consequence, as was supposed, of the protest of some bills drawn by him on public account. At the time of this sad occurrence he was on his way to Washington, with a view to the settlement of his affairs with the Government. The collector of books on America must not neglect to add Lewis and Clarke's Travels to his library:

"This is an interesting work, and exhibits not only some valuable geographical notices, but very copious and amusing details respecting the manners, habits, and divisions of the Indian North American tribes."—Lon. Critical Review.

Lewis, William David, a resident of Philadelphia, b. in Christiana, Delaware, 1792, visited Europe in 1814 as private Secretary to the Hon. Henry Clay, one of the American commissioners appointed by the United States to negotiate a treaty of peace with Great Britain. He subsequently resided for ten years in Russia, engaged in commercial pursuits, and, devoting his leisure to the acquisition of the language of that country, he acquired a facility in its use which he has since retained. In 1849 (32mo, pp. 72) he printed at Philadelphia, for circulation among his friends, a few copies of The Bokchesarian Fountain, by Alexander Poshkeen, and other Poems by various Authors; translated from the original Russian by William D. Lewis. Dedicated to my Russian Friends. This is the first collection of translations from the Russian ever made by an American. This little work was the fruit of Mr. Lewis's literary researches in Russia. Several of the minor pieces in this collection were pub. anonymously, many years since, in the (Phila.) National Gazette when edited by Robert Walsh, and in the Atlantic Souvenir and other periodicals. Those who are so fortunate as to possess this little volume (which, we trust, will be reprinted for general circulation) are advised to note particularly Lewis's translation of Derjavin's Ode to God, and the note which prefaces it, pp. 66-72, and the stanzas entitled Time, pp. 57-59. We shall be mistaken if the latter do not remind him of Longfellow's admirable translation of Coplas de Manrique. It so happened that, some time after the publication of these versions, Alexander Noewitch Cazalet, the Russian Counsellor of Manufactures, was in America, and on his return to his native country Mr. Lewis confided to him several copies of his volume of translations for presentation at home. It may well be supposed that the many attached friends in Russia, whose genial hospitality had softened to the young traveller the rigours of a Northern clime, hailed with no ordinary pleasure this evidence that the pilgrim from a far country had not forgotten, in his restoration to the pleasures of home, those who had cheered his exile in the land of strangers. Among those who referred to this pleasing souvenir with the most enthusiasm was Nicholas Graitch, who, in an article in the Northern Bee, (of which he is editor), of July 18, 1851, after bearing testimony, to Mr. Lewis's intimate acquaintance with the Russian tongue, remarks:

"When he left us for America, in taking leave of him, I said, among other things, that he would forget us in his native land. 'No!' he exclaimed, with warmth; 'I shall never forget my Russian friends; I shall always remember them with affection.' And he has kept his word."

After describing the volume of translations, Mr. Graitch proceeds:

"It is a pleasant reflection that beyond the Atlantic Ocean, on the shores of Lake Erie or of the river Mississippi, the productions of Russian writers are read, understood, and appreciated according to their true value: it is still more agreeable to know that there beats a noble heart, loving our good Russia, and returning to her good for good."

Amen! say we: may such truly honourable and kindly feelings ever be cherished by all citizens of all nations! And what can tend more effectually to promote, expand, and strengthen them than the cosmopolitanism of letters and the fraternity of the press? He who brings mind into contact with mind, and shows its thousand heaven-born affinities, is your true philanthropist: the intelligent translator is worth a hundred diplomatists, and the unprejudiced, candid, and generous conductor of the press will gain more conquests for his country by his pen than an "army with banners" can achieve by the sword.

Leyden, John, M.D., 1775-1811, the son of a farmer of Denholm, county of Roxburgh, Scotland, studied at the University of Edinburgh, and in 1800 was ordained a minister of the Church of Scotland. A short trial having satisfied him that he had mistaken his calling, he applied himself assiduously to the study of medicine, was made assistant-surgeon in the East India Company's service in 1802; Professor of Hindustani in Fort William College, 1806; shortly afterwards appointed Judge of the Twenty-four Pargannahs of Calcutta; a Commissioner of the Court of Requests in Calcutta, 1809; Assay-Master at the Calcutta Mint, 1810. In 1811, Leyden accompanied Lord Minto in the expedition against Japan, and died there, on the 28th of August of the same year, of a fever contracted whilst ransacking a library in an unwholesome atmosphere. He was a man of astonishing erudition acquired under discouraging circumstances, possessed a remarkable facility in the acquisition of tongues, and had made great progress in a knowledge of Eastern dialects. For further particulars of his life, we must refer the reader to the admirable biography by his attached friend, Sir Walter Scott, first pub. in the Edinburgh Annual Register for 1811, and subsequently incorporated in Scott's Prose Works: our citations will be from the Abbotsford ed., Edin., 1850, 375-389. See Observations on the Complaynt of Scotland, 1802, 8vo. 3. Scottish Descriptive Poems, with some illustrations of Scottish Literary Antiquities, Edin., 1803, 12mo. 4. Scenes of Infancy: descriptive of Teiotland, 1803, 12mo; Lon., 1804, 12mo.

"The Scenes of Infancy have many picturesque passages, and record the traditions and delineate the landscapes of pleasant Teiotland with equal feeling and truth; original nerve is wanting where it cannot well be dispensed with, and the work may be accused of lulling us with sweet sounds more than elevating us with bright, brief bursts of natural emotion."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"The Scenes of Infancy—his most laboured and ambitious poetical effort—possesses many fine passages, and is characteristic, and quite worthy of his genius. Many of its descriptions and illustrations linger in the memory of the reader, and must be original in their tone, as they remind us of nothing else."—Moir's Sketches of the Past Lit. of the Past Half-Century, 1851.

"His love of Scotland was delightful. It breathes through all his writings and all his proceedings, and imparts to his poetry its most attractive charm."—Lord Cockburn's Memoirs of his Time, 1856.

"Indeed, as Leyden's reading was at all times somewhat ostentatiously displayed, so in his poetry he was sometimes a little too ambitious in introducing scientific allusions or terms of art, which embarrassed instead of exalting the simplicity of his descriptions. But, when he is contented with a pure and natural tone of feeling and expression, his poetical powers claim the admiration and sympathy of every reader."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Prose Works, 382.

"The poem now before us abounds with just and accurate descriptions of nature: it is full of variety and rich illustrations, which could only have been furnished by a vigorous mind improved by extensive reading."—Brit. Critic.

"Dr. Leyden cultivated the Muses with a success which will make many regret that poetry did not occupy a larger portion of his time."—SIR JOHN MALCOLM.

5. His Poetical Remains: with Memoirs of his Life by the Rev. John Morton, 1819, 8vo. Reviewed in Lon. Month. Rev., xci, 61; Blackw. Mag., v, 3; see also i 277. And consult the works of Allan Cunningham and Moir referred to under No. 4. 6. Malay Annals: with Preface by Sir T. Stamford Raffles, 1821, 8vo. 7. Memoirs of Baber; trans. by Leyden and Win. Erskine, &c., 1826, 4to. Reviewed by Lord Jeffrey in Edin. Rev., June, 1827; also in his Contrib. to the Edin. Rev., Lon., 1853, 340-358. Leyden contributed the Elf-King to Lewis's Tales of Wonder, (see LEWIS, MATTHEW GREGORY, M.P.) The Mermaid and the Court of Keeldar to Scott's Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, (see SCOTT, SIR WALTER,) and several papers to the Asiatic Researches, and New London Review, was editor of the Scots Magazine for 1802, and left many MS. treatises on the Eastern languages, grammars of the Malay, Prakrit, and other dialects, and translations from the Sanscrit, Arabic, and Persian tongues. In addition to the authorities quoted above, we may refer to Memorials of Leyden, in the New Scots Magazine, Jan. 1829; Lord Minto's Speech at the College of Fort William, soon after Leyden's death; and General Sir John Malcolm's letter to the editor of the Bombay Courier, and his poetical tribute to Leyden's memory in the Edinburgh Annual Register, 1811. The last stanza of the preceding runs as follows:

"Yes! he who struck a matchless lyre
O'er Flodden's field and Katrine's wave
With trembling hand now leads the choir
That mourns his Leyden's early grave."

The reference here is to Scott's lines in the Lord of the Isles:

"Scarba's Isle, whose tortured shore
Still rings to Corrievrikin's roar,
And lonely Colonsay,—
Scenes sung by him who sings no more!
His bright and brief career is o'er,
And mute his tuneful strains:
Queen's is his lamp of varied lore,
That loved the light of song to pour!
A distant and a deadly shore
Has LEYDEN'S cold remains!"

Canto IV, st. 2.

Scott's allusion is to Leyden's Mermaid, the scenery of which is laid at Corrievrikin.

Nor must we omit to quote the impressive conclusion of the same writer's charming biography of the "early-lost, the long-deplored" friend of happier years and brighter days.

"I never heard Scott name Leyden," says Allan Cunningham, "but with an expression of regard and a moistening eye." But to the promised extract. After quoting Leyden's "affecting farewell to the graves of his ancestors" "in the solemn passage which concludes the Scenes of Infancy," Scott continues:

"But the best epitaph is the story of a life engaged in the practice of virtue and the pursuit of honourable knowledge; the best monument, the regret of the worthy and of the wise; and the rest may be summed up in the sentiment of Sannazario:

"Hæcine te fossam tellus extrema manebat
Hospitii post tot terrarum marisque labores?
Pone tamen gemitis, nec non monumenta parentum
Aut moventis sporta tuis tibi funera regis;
Grata quies patriæ, sed et omnis terra sepulchrum."

"No man, whatever his condition might be, ever possessed a mind so entirely exempt from every sordid passion, so negligent of fortune and all its grovelling pursuits,—in a word, so entirely disinterested,—nor ever owned a spirit more firmly and nobly independent."—LORD MINTO: ubi supra.

Lieber, Francis, LL.D., for more than twenty years Prof. of Hist., Polit. Econ., and Philos. in the State College of South Carolina, now (1857) Prof. of History and Political Science in Columbia College, New York, member of the French Institute, (of the Academy of Morals and Politics,) &c., was born in Berlin, March 18, 1800. When fifteen years old, he joined the army against Napoleon, and was severely wounded, by several balls, at Waterloo. When, in 1819, the Liberals were persecuted all over Germany, he—then a student of the University of Berlin—was imprisoned, and the police published some of his poems, found among his papers, in order to expose him to the public as a revolutionist. He was, however, released, and went to the University of Jena to continue his studies. When the Greeks called on Western Europe for assistance, he joined the Philhellenes and went to Greece to fight against their oppressors. On his return, he went to Rome, where the historian Niebuhr, then Prussian ambassador, received him kindly and made him an inmate in his family. He wrote here, (in Niebuhr's house,) in German, his Journal in Greece, in 1822, (Leipzig, 1823,) which was translated into other languages. With the king's promise of protection, he returned to Berlin, and went to the University of Halle, but was again imprisoned. Niebuhr's influence, at length, released him. He published a small volume of poems, made in prison, under the name of Franz Arnold, and when he learned that a new arrest threatened him, always for old affairs, he fled to England, where he supported himself for a twelvemonth by giving private lessons. He contributed here to German periodicals, and wrote a tract on the Lancasterian system of instruction, in German. In 1827 he went to the United States, and soon commenced the Encyclopaedia Americana, which was finished in 13 vols. 8vo, Phila., 1828-32. This work was edited and written in Boston. He published here a translation of a French work on the July revolution, and of the Life of Caspar Hauser by President Feuerbach. This work went through several editions.

From Boston he went to New York, where he translated the work of Messrs. de Beaumont and de Tocqueville on the Penitentiary System in the United States, with an Introduction and many notes, (Phila., 1833, 8vo,) which in turn was translated in Germany. While in N. York he received the honourable charge of writing a plan of education and instruction for Girard College, which was published by the Board of Trustees, Phila., 1834, 8vo. Reviewed in The Heidelberg Annals, 1834, No. 24, &c. He went to reside in Philadelphia, and published there Letters to a Gentleman in Germany on a Trip to Niagara, (Phila., 1834, 8vo,) which was published in London under the title of The Stranger in America, 1835, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Reviewed in the Lon. Quar. Rev., liii. 290. He also wrote here his Reminiscences of an Intercourse with Niebuhr the Historian, (Phila., 1835, 12mo,) which was likewise published in London, in 1835, and translated in Germany. Reviewed in Lon. Quar. Rev., lv. 126; Lon. Athenaeum, 1835, 797; N. Amer. Rev., xliii. 120, (by Prof. C. C. Felton;) South. Lit. Mess., ii. 125, 535. In 1835 he accepted a call to a chair in South Carolina College, at Columbia, and discharged the duties of this post with eminent ability and success until his resignation in 1856.

Here he wrote his Manual of Political Ethics, Bost., 1838-39, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1847, 2 vols. 8vo; republished in London, 1839, 8vo; an Essay on Penal Law and Solitary Confinement at Labour, published by the Philadelphia Prison Discipline Society, Phila., 1838, 8vo; Legal and Political Hermeneutics; or, Principles of Interpretation and Construction in Law and Politics, Bost., 2d ed., 1839, 12mo; a Translation of Ramshorn's Latin Synonymes, 1839, 12mo; Great Events described by Great Historians, N. York, 1847, 12mo; Essays on Labour and Property, 1842, 18mo; 1844, 18mo; On the Character of the Gentleman, Charleston, S. C., 12mo; (reviewed in Southern Presbyterian Review, June, 1847;) also essays and papers On the Use of the Study of Latin and Greek as elements of education; On the Study of History and Polit. Economy as branches of a superior education; On Laura Bridgman's Vocal Sounds, (in the Smithsonian Transactions); On the Abuse of the Pardon Power, (published as a document by the N. York Legislature;) Remarks on Mrs. Fry's Views of Solitary Confinement, (published in England;) A Letter on the Penitentiary System, (published by the Legislature of South Carolina;) A Letter on Anglian and Gallican Liberty, (translated by Mittermaier into German;) A Letter on International Copyright, addressed to his friend, the Hon. Wm. C. Preston, then Senator of U. S.; A Lecture on the Origin and Development of the First Constituents of Civilization. The Phila. Prison Society also published his Letter on the Relation between Education and Crime and A Popular Essay on Subjects of Penal Law. His last work is his Civil Liberty and Self-Government, published in Philadelphia, 1853, 2 vols. 12mo; Lon., 1853, 8vo.

In 1844, the trustees of South Carolina College allowed Lieber to make a trip to Europe, during which, he published, in Germany, an essay on Extrajudicial and Intra-judicial Executions, proposing measures which have since been adopted, and Fragments on Subjects of Penology. In 1848 he revisited Europe, and during that visit published two essays, one on the Independence of the Judiciary and one on the Legislative System of Two Houses. An essay on Postal Reforms was published previous to our first teatcent Reform.

The United States Senate printed in 1839 (?) an Exposé of Lieber's on the Establishment of a Statistical Bureau at Washington. In 1848, while he was in Europe, a small volume, The West, and other Poems of his, was published in N. York.

Among his minor publications we notice, in addition to those already enumerated—1. A Letter on the Great London Exhibition (The World's Fair) of 1851; published in the National Intelligencer, Washington, June, 1851. 2. A Lecture on the History and Uses of Athenæums; delivered at the request of the Columbia Athenæum, March 17, 1856. This is an admirable discourse. 3. Was Napoleon a Dictator? Published in Putnam's Mag., Jan. 1855, 12-21. In this article will be found a long and interesting letter from Joseph Bonaparte (late King of Spain) to Dr. Lieber, dated Point Breeze, 1st July, 1829, explanatory of Napoleon's line of policy. Lieber has a number of letters from Joseph Bonaparte, and, of course, many from distinguished individuals in Europe and America; and all these, we trust, will some day or other see the light. 4. Shall Utah be admitted into the Union? Published in Putnam's Mag., March, 1855, 225-236. In the present state of this question, it is well to quote the decision (recorded in the last three lines of the essay) of so able a publicist as Dr. Lieber:

"Once more: the question we proposed to ourselves was, Ought the Mormons to be admitted? And we answer, No."

In our opinion, the Mormons ought forthwith to be admitted—not into the Union, but—into the penitentiaries of the Union, there to remain until sufficiently punished for their monstrous offences against the Common Law and statute-enactments of the land. 5. An Ode on the Sub-Atlantic Telegraph. Published in the National Intelligencer. In this connexion we must refer the reader to Lieber's Ode on the Proposed Ship-Canal between the Atlantic and the Pacific, (pub. in The West and other Poems,) of which Professor Longfellow remarks, "It is strong enough to make the canal itself if it could be brought to bear." 6. A Monody to the memory of Dr. E. K. Kane, the Arctic Navigator. Pub. in Elder's Life and Travels of Dr. Kane, 1857. This is the last of Lieber's publications. In former years he was a contributor to the Southern Literary Messenger and the Southern Quarterly Review, and pub. a number of essays in European periodicals. We understand that a selection from his minor publications will shortly be published in Boston, probably in 2 vols. 12mo. We should not omit to state that, as regards Political Economy in its exterior relations, Lieber is looked upon as—to quote the language of the late Secretary Robert J. Walker—"The philosophic head of the Free-Traders in the United States."

To quote Lieber's own language, he is

"An unhesitating advocate of the necessity as well as blessing of the freest possible exchange, on grounds of philosophy, religion, civilization, civil liberty, and the commonest utilitarian interests, as well as the highest humanitarian ends."—Letter to the Author of this Dictionary, New York, 1st July, 1856.

The three works by which Lieber is best known—and by which he will continue to be known to the latest posterity—are the Manual of Political Ethics, Legal and Political Hermeneutics, and Civil Liberty and Self-Government.

On each of these great works we proceed to adduce some opinions from eminent authorities,—regretting that, from the narrow limits to which we are confined, our citations must necessarily be few in number and brief in extent.

1. MANUAL OF POLITICAL ETHICS. This work is used as a text-book in Harvard University, and has been quoted as authority in the New York Court of Appeals and in the Supreme Court of Michigan. One of the most eminent of American lawyers and orators remarked, many years since, that he never considered himself fully prepared on a great case until he had looked over this work, and that he generally found in it something serviceable or suggestive:

"It is excellent,—abounding in elevated morals, sound common sense, statesmanlike views, and enlarged philosophy. . . . The work abounds with profound views of government, which are illustrated with various learning."—JUDGE JOSEPH STORY: Life and Letters, Post, 1851, ii. 278, 329.

"Dr. Francis Lieber, in his Manual of Political Ethics, 2 vols., Boston, 1823, has shown with great force, and by the most striking and apposite illustrations, the original connection between right and morality, and the reason and necessity of the application of the principles of ethics to the science of politics and the administration of government. The work is excellent in its doctrine, and is enriched with various and profound erudition."—CHANCELLOR KENT: Comment, ed. 1854, vol. i. p. 3.

"Well worthy the perusal of those who take an interest in political science. It is far from being a formal treatise, but is a most admirable preparation for the gradual introduction of scientific form."—American editor's note, in the Boston ed. (1861) of The Theory of Human Progression, p. 254.

"An admirable treatise. . . . A profound and elaborate work." GEORGE S. HILLARD: Boston Courier, Jan. 13, 1854.

A review of this work, by Mr. David J. Mac Cord, will be found in the Southern Review, Oct. 1847. It is highly commended by the London Athenæum, 1839, 483. A less favourable notice will be found in the Edin. Rev., lxxiii. 55, 76.

2. LEGAL AND POLITICAL HERMENEUTICS. This work is used as a text-book in Harvard University.

"A treatise replete with accurate logic, and clear and sound principles of interpretation, applicable to the duties of the lawyer and the science of jurisprudence."—CHANCELLOR KENT: Comment, ed. 1854, vol. i. p. 521.

"I am exceedingly pleased with it: it is full of excellent hints and principles and guiding-rules, and, what is very important, written in a clear, compact style, with great force of illustration and accuracy of statement, and, withal, in a spirit without which all other qualities are of little avail) of candour, and without partisanship."—JUDGE STORY: Life and Letters, ii. 283.

"I regard the Hermeneutics as a work eminently useful to our profession,—not merely useful to students, but to men of long experience at the bar,—as a most lucid exposition of the principles, and admirable illustration of the science, of interpretation and construction."—Letter of Simon Greenleaf, Professor of Law at Cambridge.

It will be noticed, by the legal reader, that Lieber's distinction between Interpretation and Construction, established in his Hermeneutics, has been sanctioned and adopted by Greenleaf in his work on the Law of Evidence, and by other writers on law.

A very favourable review of Legal and Political Hermeneutics, written by Robert von Mohl, Professor of Political Science in the University of Heidelberg, Cabinet-Minister to the Vicar-General of the German Empire in 1849, and one of the most eminent of German publicists, will be found in the first number of the 14th vol. of the Heidelberg Critical Annals of Jurisprudence. Von Mohl extols the work for its soundness and originality. Another commendatory notice of the same volume, written by Penheiro-Ferreira, ("Ancient Cabinet-Minister of Portugal,") occurs in the Révue Étrangère et Française, Paris, June, 1840, vii. 494. We give an extract:

"L'auteur a donné à son travail une extension qui en augmente l'intérêt; il s'efforce d'établir des principes propres à concilier les antinomies apparentes des lois émancipées d'une même source. Il va même plus loin; il indique des règles judiciaires pour éviter les ambiguïtés qui obligent d'avoir recours à l'hermèneutique."

3. ON CIVIL LIBERTY AND SELF-GOVERNMENT. This work is used as a text-book in Yale College. The main idea of this work is that democracy, or equality of itself, has nothing to do with LIBERTY; that democratic absolutism is the most stringent of all absolutisms; and that true LIBERTY—Angliann-American liberty—is institutional. This important truth Dr. Lieber demonstrates with great force, and displays it in broad contrast with the Gallican error which confounds the ideas of liberty and equality. To the last chapter—on Vox Populi Vox Dei—we would especially commend the attention of our young politicians.

"The reader cannot do better than to make Professor Lieber's volumes the subject of attentive study, if he wishes to store his mind with sound leading principles in statesmanship and jurisprudence. . . . His great work on Civil Liberty."—Cassidy on The Law and Progress of the English Constitution, 2d ed., Lon., 1854, 249, q. v.

In a recent work, entitled "Die Geschichte und Literatur der Staats-Wissenschaften," &c., von Robert von Mohl, Erlangen, 1855, (The History and Literature of Political Science, by R. von Mohl,) the author refers, in terms of commendation, to the work of Mr. Calhoun, expressing, however, his dissent from some of the opinions of the "great Southern statesman," and then introduces Dr. Lieber:

"Lieber's treatise on Civil Liberty and Self-Government in the United States is also an important work; and here, truly, praise is to be awarded without any admixture of blame. The author does not, indeed, treat of the entire foundation of American political institutions, since he restricts himself to a discussion of the democratic principle. So far, however, as he goes, he shows himself to be a man learned in general and in political science, calmly exploring his subject and evincing sound political tact and wisdom."

Ver Mohl continues his remarks, which extend over several pages.

"We commend it especially to all who are, or who expect to be, in public life, to all lawyers and law students, and to all persons interested in political and historical discussions. Our high sense of its merits is gathered from what we have before said. We look upon it as a permanent as well as valuable accession to political literature,—destined to take its place with the Federalist and the writings of Adams, Hamilton, and Jefferson."—GEORGE S. HILLARD: Boston Courier, Jan. 13, 1854.

"An admirable work. . . . To those who have access to the volumes, a careful reading of them is warmly recommended."—NOAH PORTER, D.D.: Prof. to Sermon on Civil Liberty, July, 1856.

"The events that are passing around us in both worlds, the Old and New, are referred to with an accuracy and copiousness of detail not usually found in Professors of any country. Dr. Lieber exalts the principle of self-government; and has produced, therefore, by implication, a very fine apology for the Constitution of the United States. His work may be read with advantage by those who wish to appreciate the manly tone in which political subjects are treated amongst the best-educated classes over the Atlantic."—Lon. Athenaeum, 1854, 436.

"Few writers have given more clear and comprehensive views of many of the points which Englishmen and Americans agree in holding as to civil liberty and self-government. . . . The whole work from its historical facts and philosophical principles, forms a valuable manual of political science."—Lon. Literary Gazette, 1854, 133-135.

"His work may be consulted with the greatest advantage, whether by American or English readers, who desire to make themselves accurately acquainted with the political resemblance and the political difference between the two great nations which have so immense an interest in understanding each other."—Lon. Globe, Nov. 7, 1853.

"There is no work of which this volume of Dr. Lieber's reminds us so much as of the famous work of Montesquieu, De l'Esprit des Loix. What the great French jurist did for forms of government in general, our author has done for those forms of government in particular which have the idea of liberty for their base. For closeness of coherence and perspicuity of argument his work stands pre-eminent among works on political science."—John Bull, Nov. 12, 1853.

"A profound and admirable work. Whoever will follow that very able writer in his masterly exposition of the principles of Anglican liberty." &c.—GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS: Hist. of the Constitution of the U. States, N. York, 1854, vol. i. 488, n.

"It is a work of rare merit, and should be read by every citizen and adopted as a text-book in every academy, college, and university in the Republic."—De Bow's Review.

"It is written with great clearness and force, and is one of the most valuable we possess upon the fundamental principles of political institutions."—Journal of Useful Knowledge.

See also a review of Civil Liberty and Self-Government, written by Rev. Dr. T. D. Woolsey, President of Yale College, in the New Englander for August, 1856, 329, 362.

Lieber's political works are often referred to by the Rev. Dr. Arnold, of Rugby School, (see his Works and Letters); by Mittermaier, in his Penal Process and other volumes; by Tremenaere, in the Constitution of the United States Compared with our Own, Lon., 1854, p. 8vo; by Dr. W. Cooke Taylor, in his Natural History of Society, 1840, 2 vols. p. 8vo; and by many other European and American authorities.

Mr. Prescott remarks, (Hist. of the Conq. of Mexico, 2d ed., Bost., 1855, i. 170, n.) "Such works could not have been produced before the nineteenth century."

Professor Greenleaf says that Lieber "always leaps into the deepest water, and always comes up like a good and easy swimmer;" and Chancellor Kent once observed that when he "read Lieber's books he always felt that he had a safe pilot on board, however dangerous the navigation might be."

"No greater tribute can be paid to the substantial worth of his writings," remarks Mr. Hillard, "than the fact that they have earned him the proud distinction of a place in the French Institute, as Corresponding Member, an honour which he shares with Mr. Prescott, Mr. Bancroft, Prof. Agassiz, and Prof. Bond, and with them alone, on this continent."—Boston Courier, Jan. 13, 1854, q. v. for an able review of the literary characteristics of Dr. Lieber.

Mr. Bancroft, the distinguished American historian, referring to the honours which crowd around the name of Lieber,—quoted, admired, and lauded at home and abroad, by his own people, and by foreign nations,—remarks that others may do justice to the great variety and accuracy of Lieber's acquisitions, but that his homage is to the manliness of heart which leads him to the love of the right cause, and the integrity of character which makes him at all times true to himself in the support of it. He declares that Lieber's "admirable work" on Civil Liberty and Self-Government well entitles Lieber "to the honours of a Defender of Liberty."

Some interesting accounts of Lieber's early history—and the lives of few men offer so tempting a subject for the pen of the novelist as that of this youthful soldier, political captive, earnest student, and celebrated professor—will be found in Niebuhr's letters to his sister-in-law, Madame Hensler, under date of 6th April, 7th and 22d June, 1822; 22d March, and 2d and 6th April, 1825.

These letters express the deep concern which Niebuhr felt in his young friend's efforts in the cause of freedom, his military services in Greece, &c.

As Professor of History and of Political Philosophy and Economy in the State College of South Carolina, Lieber's chair was for many years thronged with delighted and zealous students, whom their preceptor sent forth, from time to time, to take their places in the halls of legislation, the academies of science, the camp, or the forum, to instruct others by their wisdom or profit them by their example. The address of this great man to his former pupils, in the dedication to his treatise on Civil Liberty and Self-Government, reminds the reader of some of the finest remains of classical antiquity; and the work which it prefaces should be carefully and frequently perused by every American who earnestly covets for his country the inestimable blessings of peace within her own borders, and honour and reputation among the political families of the earth.

It will readily be believed that Lieber's resignation of a post the duties of which he had discharged so faithfully and with such eminent credit to himself, to his pupils, and to his college, exhibited feelings of no ordinary regret. No man, perhaps, ever entered an institution of learning under higher auspices, supported so eminent a character with such unbounded reputation, and proved so successful in gaining at once the affection of his pupils and the admiration of the learned of every land.

The illustrious Niebuhr, Kent, Story, and Livingston united in his praises when he entered the walls of the college which so long profited by his labours, and Preston, King, Pettigru, and Allston were among the large number of those who mourned his departure from its gates. The eulogistic resolutions unanimously passed, and the costly testimonials proffered the beloved preceptor of many studious days delightfully passed in the impartation and reception of knowledge, were felt to be a very inadequate expression of their appreciation of his worth.

On the 18th of May, 1857, a new professorship was created in Columbia College, New York, for the purpose of securing the services of Dr. Lieber, and he now occupies the chair of History and Political Science in that institution. In this case, as on the occasion of his election to his professorship in the College of South Carolina, he received a unanimous election of boards composed of about twenty-five members each. Such evidences of esteem must be grateful to the one thus distinguished; but they have been amply earned.

America indeed owes a large debt of gratitude to Lieber; for we speak advisedly when we say that few men, living or dead, have directly and instrumentally—orally and through the press—instructed so many of our countrymen in the laws of science, the principles of philosophy, the canons of ethics, and the institutes of politics and political economy. Long may this distinguished teacher continue to instruct his race; to form and mature the minds of those who are preparing for, and those who are now acting their part on, the stage of active life,—of social, political, and domestic duties; long may he be spared to qualify our youth for usefulness, and to "teach our senators wisdom."

Lieber, Oscar Montgomery, son of the preceding, b. 1830, in Boston, Massachusetts, educated professionally at Berlin, Göttingen and the mining-school at Freiberg in Saxony, is the author of Assayer's Guide, or Practical Directions to Assayers, Miners, and Smelters, (Phila., 1852, 12mo,) and a translation of Woehler's "Beispiele zur Uebung in der Analytischen Chemie," entitled "The Analytical Chemist's Assistant," with an introduction, illustrations, and copious additions, (Phila., 1852, 12mo;) also of a "Sketch of the Geology of the State of Mississippi," with a geological map of that State, where he was State-geologist in 1850-51, published in the New York Mining Magazine for July, 1854; translator of Cotta's Observations on the Formation of Metalliferous Veins, (N. Y. Mining Magazine for Oct., Nov., and Dec. 1854;) Remarks on Whitney's Metallic Wealth of the United States, (N. Y. Min. Mag. for Nov. and Dec. 1854.) He wrote Some Remarks on the Metalliferous Veins of the South, developing a new theory as to the real similarity of apparently different veins, (N. Y. Min. Mag. for Oct. 1855.) It appeared translated in Hartmann's Berg- und Huettenmaennische Zeitung, and in Cotta's Gangstudien, vol. iii. fasc. 1. He is the author of various articles on the metalliferous veins of the South, and on metallurgical operations, in Cotta's Gangstudien, and the Berg und Huettennannische Zeitung, (both German publications.) In 1854-55, he was engaged as assistant in the geological survey of Alabama. At the close of 1855 he was elected, by the Legislature of South Carolina, Mineralogical, Geological, and Agricultural Surveyor of the State, and is now (1857) engaged in the duties of this survey. His First Annual Report, embracing the progress of the survey during the year 1856, with Plates and Maps, was pub. at Columbia, S.C., in 1857, 8vo, pp. 136.

The editors of the Amer. Journal of Science and Arts, No. 70, July, 1857, page 145, observe, respecting O. M. Lieber's Mineral., Geol., and Agricultural Survey of South Carolina:

"The author has a field of great interest, and has taken hold of it with energy and success. There is no department in American geology requiring more study than the metamorphic rocks of the Atlantic States, and especially those of the South. The description and handsome maps of Mr. Lieber's report throw much light on the subject, and when the survey is completed—which we trust will be without interruption—the doubts as to the age of the metamorphic rocks, and the period of metamorphism, must certainly be much lessened if not wholly removed. The structure of the gold-veins, and their true relations to the containing rocks, their resources, and the value and nature of copper and other mines in the States, are additional topics of great importance, which Mr. Lieber has begun to elucidate."

Lightfoot, John, D.D., 1602-1675, a native of Staffordshire, educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, became minister of Stone, Staffordshire, in 1628; Rector of Ashley in 1631; minister of St. Bartholomew's, London, 1642; a member of the Assembly of Divines, 1643; and, in the same year, Master of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, and Rector of Much-Munden, Hertfordshire; Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, 1655. The best ed. of his works—which consist of Chronicles and Harmonies of the Old and New Testaments, learned annotations upon the Scriptures, explanations of Jewish antiquities, sermons, &c.—is the one edited by the Rev. J. R. Pitman, with a Life of the author, Lon., 1822-25, 13 vols. 8vo, £7 16s. This ed. contains matter before unpublished. The first ed. of his works was pub. at London, 1684, 2 vols. fol.; a 2d ed. was printed at Amsterdam, 1686, 2 vols. fol., containing all his Latin writings, with a Latin trans. of those which he wrote in English. At the end of both these eds. there is a list of such pieces as he left unfinished. It is the chief of these in Latin which make up the third vol. added to the former two in a 3d ed. of his Works by John Leusden, Utrecht, 1699, fol. They were communicated by Mr. Strype, who pub. in 1700, 8vo, another collection of Remains of Lightfoot, with a Preface. His works were published in foreign countries, and valued as highly by European critics as by English divines.

"Of all the theologians of his time, this celebrated divine (whose opinion was consulted by every scholar of note, both British and foreign) is supposed to have been the most deeply versed in the knowledge of the Scriptures. . . . The writings of Dr. Lightfoot are an invaluable treasure to the Biblical student. By his deep researches into the Rabbinical writings, he has done more to illustrate the phraseology of the Holy Scriptures, and to explain the various customs, &c. therein alluded to, particularly in the New Testament, than any other author before or since."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 129, 239, q. v.

"Singulari doctrinâ conscripta."—POOLE.

"Most of this author's remarks are deeply critical and curious."—Williams's C. P.

Gibbon says that our author,

"By constant reading of the Rabbin, became almost a Rabbin himself."—Miscell. Works, vol. v. 226.

"Lightfoot, with extensive knowledge of the Rabbinical writers, poured his copious stores on Jewish antiquities, preceded in this by a more obscure labourer in that region, Ainsworth."—Hullam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, ii. 357.

"One of the most profoundly learned of the bright constellation of scholars and divines which adorned that age and shone, perhaps, in any other. His Talmudical learning he most happily applied to the illustration of Scripture."—HALLS.

"In Biblical criticism I consider Lightfoot the first of all English writers; and in this I include his learning, his judgment, and his usefulness. His learning was immense; his judgment deep and acute; and his usefulness as a writer, on the subjects he has discussed, is far beyond that of any other writer with whom I am acquainted."—DR. ADAM CLARKE.

"I entreat the attention of the student to Lightfoot's Works. The honour of opening to the world the fountains of Talmudical learning, I rejoice to say, belongs to one of our own countrymen. To use the expression of Schœtzgen, 'nisi Lightfootus basisset, nulli non saltassent.'"—TOWNSEND.

"Lightfoot, from his great Rabbinical learning, is an admirable illustrator of obscure passages in the Scripture."—DR. AINSWORTH.

"That profound Rabbinist, Lightfoot."—DR. J. P. MITCHELL.

Orme thinks that our author laid too much stress upon his discourses in Jewish antiquities and philology:

"The Talmudical exertions partake largely of the unsatisfactoriness, and even silliness, of rabbinical learning—to which Lightfoot attached more importance than he ought for assistance in interpreting the New Testament. If any man could have made a good use of the works of ancient and modern rabbis, for illustrating the Bible, Lightfoot certainly was the man. But even in his hands the material is very unproductive; and, though we are grateful to him for the collections which he has made we can scarcely help regretting that so much labour has been expended to so little purpose. All that is really valuable in them might be put into a small compendium."—Orme's Bibl. Bib., q. v.

Lightfoot's Chronicle of the Times and the Order of the Texts of the Old Testament (in vol. ii. of Pitman's ed. of his Works) cannot be too highly commended.

"Notwithstanding the differences in opinion entertained by the learned concerning the chronology of particular events, the general method of this Chronicle has been, and still continues to be, held in the highest estimation by all who are competent duly to appreciate its merits."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 129.

"No divine," says Dr. Biddin, "anxious to become versed in a knowledge of Jewish rites and ceremonies, can view his theological library with content, without a copy of the works of John Lightfoot."—Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 56.

I. Schœtzgenii Horæ Hebraicæ et Talmudicæ in Universum Novum Testamentum, quibus Horæ Lightfootii supplementur, 2 vols. 4to, Dresde, 1733-42.

"In this work the learned author follows the example of Dr. Lightfoot. He goes over the same books, but superficially, and supplies what was wanting on the Epistles and Revelations. In the opinion of Walch, Schœtzgen is superior to Lightfoot; he pronounces his work to be one of great erudition, industry, and use."—ORME.

His Dramatic Works and Life were pub. by Thos. Davies in 1770, 2 vols. 12mo; again, with addits., 1810, 2 vols. r. 18mo.

Lilly, Lylye, Lylie, or Lyly, John, b. about 1553, pub. nine dramatic pieces between 1579 and 1600, Pap with a Hatchet, (about 1589.) and the following romance, by which he is best known: Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit, 1st ed., 1580, 4to. Euphues and his England, 1581, 4to. This is a sequel to the preceding. For eds., see Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 1133. This work, the style of which "exhibits the absurdest excess of pedantry, to which nothing but the most deplorable bad taste could have given even a temporary approbation," was intended to reform and purify the English language. It soon became the court standard:

"Our nation are in his debt for a new English, which he taught them: Euphuism and his England began first that language: all our ladies were his scholars; and that beauty at court which could not parley Euphuisme (that is to say, who was unable to converse in that pure and reformed English which he had formed his work to be the standard of) was as little regarded as she which now there speaks not French."—Blount's Preface to Lilly's Six Court Comedies, Lon., 1632, 12mo.

But all of Lilly's contemporaries did not think so favourably of his philological purifications and improvements. Shakspeare ridiculed the new dialect in Love's Labour Lost, (Holofernes.) and Ben Jonson in Every Man out of his Humour, (Fastidious Brisk.) Euphues, to quote the language of a modern learned critic,

"Did incalculable mischief by vitiating the taste, corrupting the language, and introducing a spurious and unnatural mode of conversation and action."—Gifford.

"The style, which obtained celebrity, is antithetical and sententious to affectation, a perpetual effort with no adequate success, rendering the book equally disagreeable and ridiculous, though it might not be difficult to find passages rather more happy and ingenious than the rest."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, ii. 194–196, q. v. for specimens.

Of Lilly's dramatic pieces, perhaps the one we are about to name was the best known, but all are now almost entirely forgotten:

"His comedy in prose, Campaspe, [1584, '91, 4to.] is a warning example of the impossibility of ever constructing, out of mere anecdotes and epigrammatic sallies, any thing like a dramatic whole."—SCHLEGEL: Lects. on Dramat. Lit.

He pub. a number of translations from Galen and other authors, 1499, &c., Rudimenta Grammatices, and the following very learned work: De Emendata Structura Latina Sermonis libri sex, Lon., 1524, 4to; many eds. on the Continent. This is composed principally of criticisms on distinctions in the Latin tongue.

"It has been remarked that, though Linacre formed his own style on the model of Quintilian, he took most of his authorities from Cicero. This treatise, the first-fruits of English erudition, was well received, and frequently printed on the Continent."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 338.

Lindsay, Alexander William Crawford, Lord, the eldest son of James Lindsay, twenty fourth Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, and premier Earl of Scotland, was born in 1812, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and subsequently travelled in the East.

1. Lives of the Lindsays; or, a Memoir of the Houses of Crawford and Balcarres, 1840, 4 vols. 8vo. These Memoirs were privately printed in 1835. The 3d ed. appeared in 1849, 3 vols. 8vo. The work was not originally intended for publication. To these vols. should be added, Case of James, Earl of Balcarres, claiming the Title and Dignities of Earl of Crawford, &c., [in the House of Lords] 1845, fol., pp. 239. The Case was drawn up by Mr. Riddell, perhaps the first peerage-lawyer of the age in Scotland, and a most erudite genealogical antiquary. When it is remembered that the noble house of Lindsay is traceable through a descent of twenty-eight successive generations, it will at once be perceived that his lordship rather suffered from the embaras de richesses than from any lack of materials for his graceful and sprightly "Muse of History." The noble chronicler has well acquitted himself of his laborious task.

"One of the very best specimens of Family History that our language affords. . . . Our readers will well aware that Lord Lindsay exerts his distinguished talents on all occasions under the influence of deep religious feelings. He dwells accordingly at more length on the piety which his distinguished very many of his family, male and female, than on any of the secular triumphs and honours of his ancient lineage."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxv. 468–490.

"We differ from the author in many of his opinions historical and religious, but no difference can hinder us from expressing our hearty admiration of his delightful work."—Lon. Geol. Mag., Nov. 1849, 497–502.

"He has given as a book which Scott would have delighted to honour."—Lon. Athen., 1849, 713–715; 738–740; 761–762.

"As a contribution to the History of Art, his work is unquestionably the most valuable which has yet appeared in England. His research has been unwearying."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxx. 4.

"We honour and hail Lord Lindsay's artistic enthusiasm; and we think that the public owe to him no small tribute of thanks for having thrown so fresh a glow over a comparatively dark period of history, and for having raised, as from the dead, images so vivid and so attractive, of artists whose very names, we fear, have been hitherto unknown to a large number even of our better-informed countrymen."—North British Review.

6. Reports of the Montrose Claim, 1856, 4to. Lord Lindsay has hardly yet lost his claim to be considered a young man, and we trust that his days of authorship have not so soon fallen into "the sere and yellow leaf." He who has proved that he can write so well will certainly be expected to write more.

Lindsay, or Lyndsay, Sir David, 1490?–1568? a native of Garmyln, Haddingtonshire, Knight of the Mount, Lord Lyon King-at-Arms under James V., contributed considerably to the establishment of the Reformation in Scotland by his satirical poems against the Church of Rome. His principal pieces are—The Historie and Testament of Squyer Meldrum, The Monarchie, The Dreame, The Complaynt, The Complaynt of the King's Papingo, Satyre on the Thrie Estaitis, Answer to the King's Flying, and The Complaynt of Basche, the King's Hound. For an account of his productions we refer the reader to the excellent ed. of his Poetical Works, with a Life of the Author, Prefatory Dissertations, and an appropriate Glossary, by George Chalmers, Lon., 1806, 3 vols. 8vo. See also Herbert Ames's Typ. Antiq.; Ellis's Specimens; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Brit. Crit., vol. xxxiv.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 1175–1176; Irving's Lives of the Scottish Poets; Lord Lindsay's Lives of the Lindsays; Blackw. Mag., xxvi. 491. The first collection of Lindsay's poems was pub. by Jascuy, in 1558, who in the same year printed two impressions, one in 12mo and one in 4to. John Skott pub. a 3d ed. in 1559, and others followed.

"In the earlier part of this period of thirty years [1520–1550] we can find very little English poetry. Sir David Lindsay, an accomplished gentleman and scholar of Scotland, excels his contemporary Skelton in such qualities, if not in fertility of genius. Though inferior to Dunbar in richness of imagination and in elegance of language, he shows a more reflecting and philosophical mind; and certainly his satire upon James V. and his Court is more pungent than the other's panegyric upon the Thistle. But in the ordinary style of his versification he seems not to rise much above the prosaic and tedious rhymers of the fifteenth century. His descriptions are as circumstantial without selection as theirs; and his language, partaking of a ruder dialect, is still more removed from our own."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 423–424.

A graver objection to Lindsay's lines is their gross indecency. The Satyre on the Thrie Estaitis holds up the clergy to great contempt. It was played before James V. and his queen at Linlithgow in 1539, &c.

"It is a singular proof of the liberty allowed to such representations at the period that James V. and his queen repeatedly witnessed a piece in which the corruptions of the existing government and religion were treated with such satirical severity."—SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The name of Sir Walter will doubtless remind the reader of the beautiful introduction of our herald-poet in Marmion:

"Still is thy name in high account
And still thy verse has charms,
Sir David Lindsays of the Mount,
Lord Lion King-at-arms!"

Pinkerton estimates the religious services of our author's satirical poetry at a very high rate:

"Lindsay had prepared the ground, and John Knox only sowed the seed."

Mr. Hallam speaks with less extravagance:

"Lindsay's poetry is said to have contributed to the Reformation in Scotland,—in which, however, he is but like many poets of his own and preceding times. The clergy were an inexhaustible theme of bitter reproof."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 424.

Lindsey, Theophilus, 1723–1808, a native of Middlewich, Cheshire, educated at St. John's College, Vicar of Catterick, Yorkshire, 1761, resigned this living in 1773, and in the next year opened a Unitarian chapel in London. In 1793 he was obliged, from failing health, to discontinue preaching, and was succeeded in his charge by Dr. Disney. He pub. several serms. and treatises in defence of Socinianism, and the following work, which is his most important production: An Historical View of the State of the Unitarian Doctrine and Worship from the Reformation to our own Times, &c., Lon., 1783, 8vo.

After his death appeared Serms., &c., with Preface by Thomas Belsham, 1810, 2 vols. 8vo.

"In the volumes of uninspired men we have met with none which, for the substance and the temper, for the manner and the tendency, are so completely evangelical."—Lon. Month. Repository.

In 1812 were pub. Memoirs of T. Lindsey, &c., by Thomas Belsham, 8vo, pp. 534. We give brief extracts from two reviews of this volume:

"Mr. Belsham never loses sight of his real object, which is to hold up to mankind the pure Unitarian doctrine as the standard of truth, never falls to adorn the professors of it with every epithet of exuberant panegyric, as the wise and excellent of the earth. . . . It was the advice to his pupils of an eminent tutor in one of those illustrious seminaries (the English universities) never to take up a book of reasoning without attempting to confute it. Even in their hands, young as they are, we can trust Mr. Belsham."—Lon. Quar. Rev., viii. 422–437.

"Of Mr. Lindsey considered as a writer, it is sufficient to observe that the measure of intellect he displayed was the most ordinary, and that he was not possessed of the power, in its lowest degree, of either inventing what was rare, or embellishing what was common."—ROBERT HALL: Eclectic Rev., and in Hall's Works, 11th ed., 1853, iv. 188–225.

Lingard, John, D.D., LL.D., Feb. 5, 1771–July 13, 1851, a native of Winchester, England, studied at the Roman Catholic College at Douay, and subsequently accompanied the members of this institution to England, when they were driven from home by the horrors of the French Revolution. After completing the preliminary course of instruction, Dr. Lingard received holy orders in the Church of Rome, and through the course of a long life was distinguished for his zeal in defence of the religious principles of his communion, and not the less so for his literary industry, sincere piety, and exemplary deportment. For the last forty years of his life he held the small preferment belonging to the Roman Catholic Church in the village of Hornby, Lancashire, where "he grew old in the midst of a community who honoured him for his worth" and mourned his decease as that of a much-loved friend. The recluse had no small difficulty in preserving the "illustrious obscurity" which he cherished,—as the head of his Church had warmly urged a cardinal's hat upon his acceptance. But for this proffered dignity the doctor declared he was altogether unsuited; "and," continued he, "it would quite put a stop to the progress of my history." Leo promised that he should not be interrupted in his literary pursuits, if he would listen to his proposal; but Lingard was inexorable, and the Pope had to be satisfied with the declaration that the modest churchman should be a cardinal in petto. Here was an authentic case of Nolo Episcopari. During the latter years of his life Dr. Lingard was in the receipt of a pension from the queen of £300 per annum, which, with the copyright-money paid him for his History of England, placed him in comfortable circumstances. The work just referred to was sold not long since (1857) for the respectable sum of £4683. A consideration of its merits will engage our attention after reciting the titles of the author's other principal publications. 1. Catholic Loyalty Vindicated, 1805, 12mo. This series of letters originally appeared in The New Courant. 2. The Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, 1809, 2 vols. 8vo; 1810, 2 vols. 8vo; 1810, 8vo; 1815, 8vo. It is stated that the 1st ed. of this work was pub. in 1804, and we have heard of one copy which bears date 1806. There was pub. in 1845, 2 vols. 8vo, The History and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church,—called the 3d ed. of The Antiquities, &c. But really this new ed. is a new work, although the substance of the old work is incorporated in it. The earlier publication was reprinted at Phila., 1841, 12mo.

"Is not this the proper place to notice Lingard's Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, 1815, 8vo? The author is a Roman Catholic; and his work, although a heavy and destructive fire was opened upon it in the Quarterly Review, vol. vii. p. 92, is not to be consulted without advantage. It has learning and accuracy."—Dobbin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 122, n.

We have the "heavy and destructive fire" to which Dibdin refers now before us. It certainly cannot be called a complimentary article. Towards the conclusion of his review the critic remarks:

"Such are the principles, and such are a few of the misrepresentations, of the work before us. To have noticed the whole, we must have stopped at every page."—P. 105.

Southey declares that it is "A work not more full of erudition than it is of Catholic sophistry and misrepresentation."

See also Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833; N. Brit. Rev., vi. 1; Eccl. Rev., 4th ser., xxii. 78. The Edinburgh reviewer, Dr. John Allen, pays the work rather a doubtful compliment when he remarks that "We can safely recommend his book for the curious matter it contains and the agreeable style in which it is written. Its defects are inseparable from the nature of his subject. Candour and impartiality are least of all to be expected from ecclesiastical historians."—xxv. 346-354.

These are the edits.; but of some of these there have been more than one impression. Abridgt. by Sadler, 2 vols. 12mo, 12s.; new abridgt., 1855, 12mo, 5s. American eds. pub. by Dunnigan, N. York, 13 vols. 12mo, $12; by Phillips, Sampson & Co., of Boston, 1853-54, 13 vols. 12mo, $9 75. In this ed. the editor has avoided some errors of the press which crept into the London edit. (the 5th) on which it is based. He has also occasionally dropped an explanatory note. We should not omit to notice that Lingard's history was trans. into French by M. Roujoux, and under the Government of Charles X. was used as the standard history of England in all the colleges of France. We presume that it still retains its favour in that quarter. The first ed. of Lingard's History was first reviewed by Dr. John Allen in the Edinburgh Review for April, 1825, 1-31, and for June, 1826, 94-155. The critic gives the historian credit for laborious examination of original records, great excellence of style, and a remarkable talent for narration, but charges him with the suppression of truth and perversion of facts:

"Dr. Lingard's book is the fruit of great industry, learning, and acuteness, directed by no ordinary talents. It is written in a clear and agreeable manner. His periods are passed and measured in their cadence, with a variety in their structure that pleases without palling on the ear. His style is nervous and concise, and never enfeebled by useless epithets or encumbered with redundant, unmeaning phrases. If it be deficient in that happy negligence and apparent ease of expression, if it want 'those careless unimitable beauties,' which in Hume excited the despair and admiration of Gibbon, there is no other modern history with which it may not challenge a comparison. The narrative of Dr. Lingard has the perspicuity of Robertson, with more freedom and fancy. His diction has the ornament of Gibbon, without his affectation and obscurity. . . . Dr. Lingard also, we are sorry to say, has no generous sympathy in the cause of freedom. He appears to take little interest in the struggles for liberty that form the brightest part of our annals. . . . Dr. Lingard, we need scarcely say, is a decided partisan of the Church of Rome. That he should be devoted to her doctrines was to be expected from the faith he holds, and the profession he has embraced. But he is not only a believer in the creed and advocate for the discipline of his church; he is the defender of all her saints and confessors, the eulogist of all who have laboured or suffered in her cause, the defender of all who have resisted her usurpations. . . . The devotedness of Dr. Lingard to his church is an amiable and laudable feeling. When he maintains the antiquity of her rites and discipline and vindicates the purity of her dogmas from vulgar misrepresentation and calumny, we approve his labours and applaud his learning. But when he describes what might injure her reputation, when he lays as what ever tends to her honour and credit, he weakens our confidence in his truth as an historian, and sinks himself into common place. . . . Dr. Lingard has indeed a wonderful talent for quotation, as much of a passage as suits his purpose and omitting whatever makes against him. . . . We can discern, also, that his political predilections are almost as likely to suborn his accuracy as his ecclesiastical, and that he will require to be watched as closely in his account of our free constitution as of our Protestant church."—April, 1825, 7, 19, 22, 30-31.

It is to be observed that the Anglo-Saxon portion of Lingard's history is that to which the reviewer's strictures are chiefly confined. The second part of Dr. A.'s review of Lingard's History (Edin. Rev., June, 1826, 94-155) is confined exclusively to an examination of the historian's misrepresentation—as his critic deems it—of the facts connected with the Massacre of St. Bartholomew. He refuses to credit Lingard's assertion that his "opinion was not formed till after a diligent perusal and comparison of the most authentic documents on the subject," charges him with a servile adoption of the version of the Abbé de Caveyue, and declares that, on the whole,

"We have found in his [Lingard's] account of that transaction no marks of diligence or research, and many plain indications of carelessness and haste, of borrowed learning, and inexcusable indifference to historical accuracy."—P. 95.

How far Dr. Allen is justified by the facts of the case in these grave charges, it is not, of course, for us to decide. He certainly had not determined to arraign the alleged offender without taking due time for consideration, for almost two years before the appearance of the first review we find the following entry in Tom Moore's Diary:

"Spoke of Lingard's History of England; read of Philip and Mary very curious. Allen has detected him in factiousness, or rather giving a false colour to his authorities—particularly about the views of the clergy, which he contrives to suppress or soften off."—Oct. 1823; Lord John Russell's Memoirs, Journal, and Correspondence of Thomas Moore, Lon., 1852, iv. 1-8.

Under date of 22d May, 1844, we find the following lines, which, as a veracious chronicler, we are not at liberty to omit:

"Was much surprised the other day at hearing Mr. Lemon of the State-Paper Office say that Lingard had never come to consult their papers. This from any other authority I should have pronounced downright impossible; but, as far as I have yet had time to examine, am inclined to believe it true, for, in a volume of his which I am at present employed upon, all the authorities he cites are from other sources. I have since seen one or two passages by Lingard to letters in the State-Paper Office."—Vol. v. 156, 68.

It is to be remembered that the last ed. of the History appeared about six years after the date of the above entry, and the author—even upon the presumption of former neglect—may have taken pains to refer to documentary authorities whilst engaged in the revision of his text. That he carefully examined the new historical matter which had been pub. since the date of his last edit., we have the evidence of a most respectable witness:

"We may as well take this opportunity of saying that Dr. Lingard's ultimate revision of his work seems to have been most elaborate. As far as we have been able to examine the text, (10 vols. 8vo, London, 1850,) he has neglected nothing, either of authority or argument, that had emerged in the interval from his preceding appearance before the public. Mr. Macanlay has a full share of the doctor's attention."—Lon. Quar. Rev., Sept. 1851, 289, n.

We have the last ed. (6th, 1854–55) before us, but have not adopted Mr. Moore's plan of running the eye over foot-notes in quest of evidence of visitations or non-visitations to the State-Paper Office. Such indications, the historical student will agree with us, are of little value one way or the other.

Dr. Lingard was not disposed to remain silent under accusations of so heavy a character as those preferred by Dr. Allen, and he soon gave to the world A Vindication of certain passages in the 4th and 5th volumes of the History of England; 2d ed., Lon., 1826; Postscript, in answer to Dr. Allen's reply, 1827. Of this pamphlet there were at least four edits. The doctor's preface to his Vindication proved that, whilst deeply wounded by what he considered a most unjustifiable assault upon his candour and veracity, (the two most essential qualities of a good historian,) he felt fully able to encounter the foe who had provoked him to the combat:

"It has pleased the reviewer [Edinburgh] to constitute himself my accuser: it remains for me to repel the accusation. If I fail in the attempt, the failure will justify his conduct: if I succeed, (and of success I cannot entertain a doubt,) his will be the disgrace of defeat and the shame of misrepresentation. He has provoked the contest: he must submit to the consequences."—P. 8.

That the historian's defence did not fail to favourably impress at least a number of his judges—the public—the following verdicts give ample evidence:

"Dr. Lingard's Vindication, in short, is satisfactory and complete; and the pamphlet is altogether beyond comparison the most masterly and the best-conducted piece of controversial argument which our times have produced."—Monthly Review, February, 1827.

"His pamphlet is a model of controversial style: the scholar, the gentleman, and the divine appear in their best character; the calm dignity and the spirited firmness with which the historian repels the coarse language and virulent accusations of his antagonist are strong assurances of the rectitude of his intentions and the truth of his cause."—Westminster Review, January, 1827.

"Whatever be the process by which Dr. Lingard has become qualified satisfactorily to discharge the duties of an historian, it is true—and his enemies admit it—that he must take his station among the most distinguished of the writers who have investigated the annals of this country."—Ibid.

"We scruple not to assert our conviction that Dr. Lingard has a manifest triumph over the reasoning and judgment of his opponents."—New Month. Mag., January, 1827.

"The historian's superior accuracy, fidelity, and research are too clearly manifest to require comment, beyond our record of the fact."—Ibid.

"We admire, and cannot too highly praise, the manly, temperate, and Christian spirit of Dr. Lingard's Vindication."—Lon. Mag., March, 1827.

"We do not envy or covet the feelings of the Edinburgh reviewer when he reads the indignant and triumphant pages of Dr. Lingard's Vindication. His punishment reminds us of the story of the end of Haman."—Ibid.

See also the Monthly Magazine for April, &c.

The Dublin Review, in a notice of the 4th ed. of the History, 1837–39, remarks:

"It is impossible to convey an idea of the labour bestowed on the revision of this edition. From the appearance of the first volume of the first edition in 1819, the author has been assailed in every imaginable form. Hence it was necessary to go through every charge to examine the authorities on which it was founded: where an error had been committed, to admit it; where not, to defend the original position. We know not a single point of importance on which the assailants succeeded, while those on which they triumphantly discomfited are almost innumerable."—No. 24.

Among these "assaults" of Lingard's historical accuracy, it will be remembered, was Archdeacon Todd, to whose publications in this controversy we have already referred in our life of THOMAS CRANMER, D.D., p. 447 of this Dictionary. In this connexion, the testimony of Robert Southey, one of the warmest champions of the Established Church, in favour of Dr. Lingard, is too valuable to be omitted:

"He [Southey] spoke freely of his contemporaries. Lingard he praised for true earnestness and a desire to state the facts."—Dr. R. Shelton Muckenzie's Recollections of Southey, in Southey's Life and Correspondence.

Dr. Dibdin, also a zealous defender of the English Church, remarks,

"There will be few who, on account of the religious creed (of the Church of Rome) of the author, alone, will deny this history a place on their shelves. The style is clear, vigorous, and unaffectured: the facts are, upon the whole, fairly developed, and the authorities faithfully consulted. Nor is Mr. Lingard, like David Hume, afraid of encountering the tough and prolix authors of the Middle Ages. His notes bear evidence of his research; and, although his colouring of some characters will necessarily be seen with different eyes by Papist and Protestant, yet it must be fairly acknowledged that the cause of historical truth (if TRUTH there be in HISTORY) is in all respects promoted by the cautious investigations and dispassionate remarks which characterize by far the greater portion of his work. Mr. Lingard has caused the historical critic to examine anew the data from which his inferences have been drawn respecting the reigns of Henry VIII. and Queen Mary and Elizabeth."—Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 246, n.

Even Dr. Allen, when about to criticize with great severity the Anglo-Saxon portion of Lingard's narrative, prefaces his strictures with the high compliment:

"To one desirous of making a study, and not a mere amusement, of the history of his country, we know no general history of England that we should sooner recommend than the work before us."—Edin. Rev., April, 1825, 2.

In the same periodical, for March, 1831, 1–45, will be found another review of Lingard's History, much more favourable than Dr. Allen's, but qualifying commendation with no slight censure. See other notices of the work in Lon. Quar. Rev., l. 273; Westminster Rev., vii. 87; Lon. Month. Rev., lxxxix. 293, xc. 43, cviii. 1, cxii. 159, cxviii. 389; Blackw. Mag., xix. 313, xxxi. 757, xxxix. 22, n., xl. 492; Sir Archibald Alison's Essays, Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 425; N. York Elec. Mag., xxiv. 350; N. York Internat. Mag., iv. 285.

Dr. Dibdin, in the passage from which we have just quoted, speaks of the "different eyes of Papist and Protestant" in inspections of historical data. The remark reminds us of a reflection of Mr. Prescott in his reference to the character of Elizabeth of England:

"If one need be convinced how many faces history can wear, and how difficult it is to get at the true one, he has only to compare Mr. Lingard's account of this reign with Mr. Turner's."—Hist. of Ferdinand and Isabella, 11th ed., Bost., 1856, iii. 201, n.

See Mr. Prescott's remarks quoted in our life of HENRY HALLAM, LL.D., in this Dictionary, p. 769, col. 2. A few brief quotations from other authorities not yet cited before our tribunal must conclude an article already lengthened beyond its intended limits. Mr. Macaulay characterizes Dr. Lingard as "A very able and well-informed writer, but whose great fundamental rule of judging seems to be that the popular opinion on a historical question cannot possibly be correct."—Art. on Sir William Temple, Edin. Rev., Oct. 1838; and in his Crit. and Hist. Essays, Lon., 1854, ii. 308.

"In truth," says Allan Cunningham, "Dr. Lingard, with all his research and learning and genius, is but a monk of the fourteenth century as far as respects freedom, civil and religious. . . . He is ready to aid no one but the clergy in pulling down kings; and he only does this that he may raise up a clerical idol in their stead."—Eng. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833.

It must not be denied that the graver errors with which Dr. Lingard was charged by Dr. Allen—a want of candour and impartiality, suppression of the truth in some cases, and perversion of the facts in others, where the truth is too well known to admit of disguise—are repeated to this day by judges whose erudition in the lore of history cannot be lightly questioned:

"His secret bias appears, not from what he tells us, but from what he conceals: the best-informed critic will not easily detect him in a false allegation, but the most superficial will have no difficulty in discovering much that is known and true, but adverse to his side, that is kept out of view."—Sir Archibald Alison: Hist. of Europe, 1815–52, vol. i. chap. v.

The authorities next to be cited are not disposed to let Dr. Lingard escape so easily:

"A late writer, whose acuteness and industry would raise him to a very respectable place among our historians if he could have repressed the inveterate partialities of his profession, has used every oblique artifice to lead his readers into a belief of Anne Boleyn's guilt, while he affects to hold the balance and state both sides of the question without determining it. Thus, he repents what he must have known to be the strange and extravagant lies of Saunders about her birth,—without vouching for them, indeed, but without any reprobaton of their absurd malignity."—Hallam's Const. Hist. of Eng., 7th ed., Lon., 1854, i. 31, n. See also 33, n.; 101, n.; 105, n.

"No one of our historians," remarks Mr. Hallam, "has been so severe on Mary's reign, except on a religious account, as Carte, on the authority of the letters of Noailles. Dr. Lingard, though with these letters before him, has softened and suppressed till this queen appears honest and even amiable."—Ubi supra, 105, n.

"The extreme prejudice under which this amiable and respectable author writes is a great drawback to his work. His history is far more learnedly and carefully composed than any other of our country; and yet, owing to his partiality, it leaves unsupplied the blank admitted by all to have been left by Mr. Hume—for we meet in every one part of his narrative with the apologist or advocate of the Pope and Popery. So Romish a history could hardly have been supposed possible to have been written in this country, and by a person of the most respectable character."—LORD BROUGHAM: Political Philosophy, 2d ed., Lon., 1849, iii. 278, n.

His lordship cites, as instances of "the working of clerical prejudice in an accurate, and, generally speaking, a liberal mind." I. The historian's comments on that provision of the Constitutions of Clarendon which made a clergyman triable for a crime before a civil or temporal judge, (ubi supra, 210;) II. His apology for King John's surrender of the kingdom into the hands of the Pope in 1213:

"Dr. Lingard, though he does not defend this base transaction, is anxious to extenuate it by all the means in his power. Nor can any thing be conceived much more flimsy than the topics he resorts to: for example, that the condition of vassalage was reckoned honourable in those times."—Ubi supra, 211.

III. His remarkable defence of Mary, Queen of Scots:

"As for the Stuarts, Mr. Hume, with all his prepossessions and his habitual love of kings and queens, must be admitted to have been very far surpassed by Dr. Lingard. The former had too masculine an understanding to let Mary's conduct pass unreviewed. The latter carries his partiality to the Romish queen so far that he not only acquits her of all knowledge of Barkeley's murder, but of all belief that Bothwell was an object of suspicion, and of all blame respecting his mock trial and scandalous escape; nay, he cannot even bring himself to ensure the marriage itself, looks upon it as quite a becoming thing for a woman to marry a few weeks after a husband's violent death, and seems quite satisfied that a queen can be married by force; but, worse than all, he appears absolutely to be the apologist of Bothwell himself, and gives an account of his end wholly different from all other writers."—Ubi supra, 278-279.

In our lives of Carte, Gibbon, Hume, Laing, and other historians, we have quoted the recorded judgments of the late Professor Smyth, of Cambridge; and his testimony is entitled to too much respect to be properly omitted in an impartial review of the merits and demerits of the author now under consideration:

"Dr. Lingard has lately published a History of England; and we have now, therefore, the views and reasonings of those who are members of the Roman Catholic communion, presented to us by a writer of great controversial ability. Dr. Lingard also consults records and judges for himself, and his book must therefore be always referred to on every occasion of importance. He tells the story of England in too cold a manner, and it is truly the Roman Catholic history of England; but his work is interesting, because the reader knows that the writer is not only an able writer, but a man of research and of antiquarian learning, and it therefore never can be conjectured beforehand what may be the information which he will produce or the sentiments that he will adopt. He sometimes differs with his predecessors, even on general subjects, and not always with good reason."—Lects. on Modern History, Lect. V.

Thus have we endeavoured to sum up with entire impartiality the evidence which has been offered for and against the merits of Dr. Lingard's great historical work. The decision is now left to the jury,—that jury by whose verdict, willing or unwilling, we must all at last abide,—an enlightened public. Ourselves the advocate of neither party, we are confident that we cannot be properly charged with injustice to either: not affecting to emulate the indifference of him who garnished his doorpost with the Epicurean device of "No Religion," we trust that we shall always carry unchallenged upon our critical shield the more honourable motto, "No Bigotry nor Misrepresentation: Charity and Candour to all, Malevolence and Asperity to none."

Also reprinted in Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, vol. iv. It was ridiculed by Dr. Wm. King, in his Journey to London in 1698, 1698, 8vo. A review of Lister's amusing book, with extracts, will be found in the Lon. Retrospec. Rev., 1826, xiii. 95-109. The following extract will please our bibliomaniacs of the present day:

"I was at an auction of books [in 1698] in the Rue St. Jacques, where were about forty or fifty people, most abbots and monks. The books were sold with a great deal of trifling and delay, as with us, and very dear."

We have seen (p. 385 of this Dictionary) that the Edinburgh Review and the Literary Gazette commended Mr. Lister's labours; and we might have added to the list of eulogists The Gentleman's Magazine, The Atlas, and perhaps other authorities equally respectable. Littell, Eliakim, b. Jan. 2, 1797, at Burlington, New Jersey, may well claim the proud title of an eminent literary benefactor to the public mind. He has published and edited the following journals: 1. THE NATIONAL RECORDER, commenced (at Philadelphia) Jan. 1819, 16 pp. per week, $5 per annum. This periodical at first consisted of selections from the newspapers, with the occasional introduction of original matter. Invited by the literary wealth of English journals, the editor was induced to borrow largely from their pages; and the foreign element soon became so important a feature of the work that its original title was dropped as inappropriate, and altered to (2.) THE SATURDAY MAGAZINE, in July, 1821, 24 pp. per week, $5 per annum. In this periodical were first pub. in America Confessions of an English Opium-Eater; and in the pages of this journal and its predecessor many of our elderly readers first made the acquaintance of Charles Lamb. A trial of one year proved to Mr. Littell the inconvenience of continuing long copied articles from one week to another, and he therefore determined to change his Saturday Magazine into a monthly journal, under the title of (3.) THE MUSEUM OF FOREIGN LITERATURE AND SCIENCE, in July, 1822, 96 pp. per month, $6 per annum. For the first year of its existence this periodical was edited by Robert Walsh, then editor of the (Philadelphia) National Gazette; but after that time it was (with the exception of the year 1835) edited for twenty years (until the end of 1842, to vol. xlv. inclusive) by Mr. Littell, assisted for a portion of his time by his brother, Squier Littell, M.D. In 1843, The Museum was united with another work, was called THE ECLECTIC MUSEUM OF FOREIGN LITERATURE, pub. in New York, and not edited by Mr. Littell, although he was half-owner of the joint work. In April, 1844, encouraged by Judge Story, Chancellor Kent, John Quincy Adams, Messieurs Prescott, Bancroft, Ticknor, and other gentlemen deeply interested in the intellectual advancement of the country, this indefatigable caterer for the public mind commenced, in Boston, the publication of (4.) LITTELL'S LIVING AGE, 61 pp. double columns per week, $6 per annum. Composed of extracts from the Edinburgh (Quarterly) and other Reviews, and the best British magazines and weekly periodicals, each weekly number of this journal contains more matter than the monthly numbers of THE MUSEUM at the beginning. It makes four large vols. per year, equal in quantity of matter to 13 vols. of the Edinburgh or London Quarterly Review. After issuing 36 vols., a second series was commenced in April, 1853. Vol. liii. of the whole work commenced with April, 1857. They are all now reposing on our library-shelves, and should be in every collection in the country. The sale of THE MUSEUM averaged about 2000 numbers monthly; that of LITTELL'S LIVING AGE is over 6000 weekly. In July, 1855, Mr. Littell commenced the publication, in Boston, of (5.) THE PANORAMA OF LIFE AND LITERATURE, 144 pp. per month, $3 per annum. This journal contains only but the amount of matter comprised in THE LIVING AGE. It is meant to be of a lighter character than the latter, excluding political articles,—partaking more of the nature of THE MUSEUM. We should not omit to state that, in addition to the periodicals thus edited as well as published by Mr. Littell, he pub., (1.) THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN THEOLOGICAL JOURNALS, commenced in 1828, same plan as THE MUSEUM, but confined to religious literature, edited by the late Rev. George Weller. This magazine survived until the expiration of the 4th vol., when it was gathered to its fathers with the significant epitaph, "Very much liked, but did not pay." About a year since, Mr. Littell was urged by a person in New York to make another attempt to establish a religious magazine of this character. 2. THE JOURNAL OF FOREIGN MEDICAL SCIENCES commenced in 1828, same plan as THE MUSEUM, but confined to medicine, edited by Squier Littell, M.D., (post), 3 vols. pub.

Few men indeed have laboured so long and so successfully in the great cause of public education, and few, therefore, are so well entitled to the gratitude of their countrymen, as the subject of this notice. Many of them owe to him their first introduction to the great minds of the past half-century, the commencement of that profitable acquaintance which hath soothed the pangs of sorrow, dispelled the gloomy shades of care, and made them wiser and better, happier and more contented, men.

Littell, John Stockton, b. at Burlington, New Jersey, a resident of Germantown, Penna., is a brother of Eliakim and Squier Littell. He has edited—with biographical and historical notes—Alexander Graydon's Memoirs of his Own Times, Phila., 1816, 8vo, and Alexander Garden's Anecdotes of the American Revolution, and pub. a Sketch of the Life, Public Services, and Character of Henry Clay. We hope that Mr. Littell will favour the reading public with some of the results of his researches into the unwritten passages of the Revolutionary period of this country.

Littell, Squier, M.D., b. 1803, at Burlington, New Jersey, a brother of Eliakim and John Stockton Littell, has acquired extensive reputation from his learned investigations into the nature, the probable causes, and modes of cure, of diseases of the eye. He has filled the responsible post of Surgeon to Wills's Hospital (Philadelphia) for Diseases of the Eye, from the opening of the Institution, in 1831, to the present time, (1857). 1. Manual of Diseases of the Eye; or, A Treatise on Ophthalmology, Phila., 1857, 12mo; 2d ed., 1846, 12mo; with Notes by Hugh Houston, Lon., 1838, 1p. 8vo; 1840, 12mo.

"Our limits will not allow us to notice the work of Dr. Littell in detail; but, after an attentive perusal of the volume, we confidently recommend it to the senior as well as junior members of the profession. It is replete with information, yet so terse in style and compressed in bulk as at once to entice and repay perusal. The descriptions are short, but comprehensive, while the treatment is characterized by great prudence. He has introduced almost all that is valuable, and every thing absolutely necessary to the student, within the compass of 250 small pages; and we would deliberately recommend our young friends to read this work before encountering the voluminous treatises of Lawrence, Travers, Mackenzie, Middlemore, &c.—*Brit. and For. Dr. Littell, as we have already stated, (see LITTELL, ELIAKIM,) edited, in 1828-29, the Journal of Foreign Medical Science, and was connected for some years with the editorial department of his brother's Museum of Foreign Literature and Science: he also edited, for a number of years, The [Philadelphia] Banner of the Cross, has been a contributor to the Medical Examiner and other journals connected with his profession, and is the author of many articles, in prose and verse, published in the literary periodicals of the day.

Littleton, Lyttleton, Luttelton, or Luttleton,

Sir Thomas, d. August 23, 1481, aged about 60, the celebrated author of Les Tenures, was the eldest son of Thomas Westcote, Esq., of the county of Devon, Esq., by Elizabeth, the daughter and sole heiress of Thomas De Littleton, of Frankley, Worcestershire, Esq., whose name and arms he took. On leaving the University, he removed to the Inner Temple and became one of the readers of that Society; was appointed, by Henry VI., Steward or Judge of the Court of the Palace, or Marshal-Sea of the King's Household; made King's Sergeant, 1455, one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, 1466, Knight of the Bath, 1475. Littleton's great work on English Tenures, written in Norman French, has been already referred to in our life of Lord Edward Coke, in this Dictionary; and to that article and the references attached to it, the article CARY, HENRY, (p. 351,) and the following authorities, we must send the reader for further information respecting

"the principal pillar on which the superstructure of the law of real property in Great Britain is supported." The 1st ed. of The Tenures is without date, but supposed to have been printed in 1481, London, fol. The late eds. (Tenures without Coke's Comment.) are—in English, from the 2d ed. of Coke Littleton, with Notes and Pref. by H. B. Kerr, Lon., 1813, 12mo; in English, from the Rohan ed., with Notes by H. Roscoe, 1823, 12mo; in English, new ed., 1831, 18mo; 2d ed., 1845, 24mo; in English, with Explanatory Notes, 1846, 8vo; in French and English, by T. E. Tomlins, 1841, 8vo. The eds. in French and English are more numerous than those of any law-book, except perhaps those of the Corpus Juris Civilis and its component parts. See Lord Coke's Pref. to his Comment., Hargrave's First and Second Addresses to the Public, and Charles Butler's Pref. to 13th ed. of Coke upon Littleton; (these are reprinted in the 19th London ed., and in R. H. Small's ed., Phila., 1853, 2 vols. 8vo.) 4. Reeves's Hist. Eng. Law, 113; Fulbeck's Preparative, 71; Bland's Codex, 126; Pref. to 10 Reports, 30; Ritso's Law Educ., 162; 1 Butler's Reminis., 115; 1 Bart. Sta., 221-230; No. 54 Law Mag., 286; 3 Law Mag., 152; Bridgman's Leg. Bibl.; Marvin's Leg. Bibl., 467, (from whom many of these references are taken;) Camden's Britannia; Ep. Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib., 169; Plowden, 58; 2 Angell's Law Intell., 266; Pref. to Henry Cary's ed. of Comment., (see p. 351 of this Dictionary;) Dibdin's Typ. Antiq. of G. Brit. We observe that Lord-Keeper Guilford (North's life of his lordship) recommends that Littleton be first read without Coke's Commentary; Judge Sharswood (Professional Ethics, Phila., 1853, 123) gives the same advice; and our experience—though a layman's opinion should be modestly proffered—endorses the wisdom of this dictum. Indeed, this is Coke's own advice to the reader:—to read Littleton by himself, again and again, and strive to understand him without recourse to the Commentary. But it would be a great error to suppose that the student is to be satisfied with one or two perusals of The Tenures. He must revert to it constantly.

"The very adepts in the law are not ashamed frequently to read it. I knew a Lord-Keeper [we may imagine who this was, that read it every Christmas, as long as he lived]."—ROGER NORTH.

"Thomas Littleton, alias Westote, the famous lawyer, to whose Treatise of Tenures the students of the Common Law are no less beholden than the Civilian to Justinian's Institutes."—Camden's Britannia.

"Littleton, out of the great books of the law, gathered the most special Cases, which were either generally agreed upon, or by the Court awarded to be law, or else in all ages received for positive rules. His book, doubtless, is of such singularity that Littleton is not now the name of a lawyer, but of the law itself."—FULBECK.

Lord Hobart went quite as far as this when he would not allow Littleton's authority to be questioned, declaring that "The sayings of Master Littleton are adjudged for law, and are judgments."

This is something more than he of The Tenures claimed for himself:

"And know, my son, that I would not have three believe all which I have said in these books is law, for I will not presume to take this upon me. But, of those things that are not law, inquire and learn of my wise masters learned in the law."—Epitologus: to his son, for whose benefit The Tenures were written.

The intelligent readers of the author of The Tenures and his learned commentator will share with Mr. Hargrave in "His veneration for the name of Littleton and Coke, his admiration of their writings, his persuasion that an attentive contemplation of them, by the improvement it must produce, will be its own reward."—First Address Pref. to Coke on Littleton.

But it is hardly worth while to quote any more testimonies to the value of this work: in the words of Charles Butler,

"The reputation of LITTLETON'S TREATISE ON TENURES is too well established to require any mention of the praises which the most respectable writers of our country have bestowed on it. No work on our laws has been more warmly or generally applauded by them."—Pref. to 13th ed. Coke on Littleton.

Mr. Butler proceeds to observe,

"But some foreign writers have spoken of it in very different terms."

After an examination of some of the objections thus referred to, Mr. Butler continues:

"If it were proper to enter into a further defence of Littleton, it might be done by observing that it must be a matter of great doubt whether Hottoman ever saw, or Gatzert more than saw, the work they so severely censure. Hottoman, if he had read it, might think it illegant and absurd; but he could not think it malicious or indicative of a disposition to slander."

Lord Coke did not let Hottoman off so easily:

"It is a desperate and dangerous matter," exclaims his indignant lordship, "for Civilians and Canonists (I speak what I know, and not without just cause) to write either of the Common Laws of England, which they profess not, or against them, which they know not. And for Littleton's Tenures I affirm, and will maintain against all opposites whatever, that it is a work of absolute perfection in its kind, and as free from error as any book that I have known to be written of human learning."

His lordship at a later period repeats his challenge, and dismisses Littleton's detractors with the following complimentary assurances:

"Such as in words have endeavoured to offer him disgrace never understood him, and therefore we leave them in their ignorance, and wish that by these our labours they may know the truth and be converted. But herein we will proceed no further: for Stultum est absurdas opiniones accuratus reprehendere: it is mere folly to confute absurd opinions with too much curiosity."—Pref. to Coke's Comment.

Having thus satisfactorily despatched the enemy, and unchecked by any apprehension of carping criticism, his lordship gives his enthusiasm full play, and proceeds to inform the awe-struck tyro, whilst he detains him a while in wondering admiration at the portals of wisdom, that "Certain it is that there is never a period, nor (for the most part) a word, nor an &c., but affordeth excellent matter of learning. . . . And it is to be observed that every word of Littleton is worthy of observation."

His lordship concludes his glowing eulogy with an irrefutable declaration:

"And albeit the reader shall not at any one day (do what he can) reach to the meaning of our author or of our Commentaries, yet let him noway discourage himself, but proceed; for on some other day, in some other place, that doubt will be cleared."

We call this assertion irrefutable; for certainly no man can prove that what is incomprehensible to him now will remain an impenetrable mystery to the end of his pilgrimage upon earth.

"He wrote, indeed, pleasing verses and with great facility.—a facility fatal to excellence; but his mind was chiefly remarkable for the fine power of analysis which distinguishes his London, and other of his later compositions. In this power of discriminating and distinguishing, carried to a pitch almost of painfulness, Lloyd has scarcely been equalled; and his poems, though rugged in point of versification, will be found, by those who read them with the calm attention they require, replete with critical and moral suggestions of the highest value."

- Locke, John, August 29, 1632-October 28, 1704, one of the most illustrious of philosophers and excellent of men, was a native of Wrington, Somersetshire, the son of a captain in the Parliamentary army, who subsequently practised as an attorney and clerk of the sewers in Somersetshire. After "completing" (or, as he would himself have said, commencing) "his education" at Westminster School, and Christ Church, Oxford, the subject of our notice applied himself with great industry to the study of medicine, and with such success that the celebrated Dr. Sydenham considered Locke's endorsement of his theory of the proper mode of treatment of acute diseases of sufficient weight to carry conviction to any unprejudiced mind:—

"You know," says he to Dr. Mapletoft, (the elegant Latinist,) "how much my method has been approved of by a person who has examined it to the bottom, and who is our common friend: I mean Mr. John Locke, who, if we consider his genius and penetrating and exact judgment, or the strictness of his morals, has scarce any superior, and few equals, now living."—Observationes Medicæ circa Morborum Acutorum Historiam et Curatorem, 1675, 8vo.

It occurs to us to refer, in this connexion, to Locke's Latin verses,—Auctori, in Tractatum ejus de Febribus. See Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. Lon., 1848, r. 8vo, 293, n. It was in the same year in which Sydenham gave these Observations to the world (1675) that Locke was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Physic; and it is an interesting fact that his skill in medicine not only elicited the admiration of Sydenham, but was the stepping-stone to that series of good fortunes which so remarkably distinguished the life of our philosopher.

The story runs on this wise. In 1666, Mr. Locke (who—with the exception of a few months spent on the Continent as secretary to Sir William Swan, envoy to the Elector of Brandenburg—had devoted his time since leaving college to intense study) prescribed most successfully for Lord Ashley, who was suffering from a dangerous abscess in the breast, occasioned by a fall. His lordship placed his life in the hands of the intelligent stranger, who had quite accidentally become his medical adviser, and declared that he would strictly follow his orders. Locke insisted upon a surgical operation: the abscess was opened; the cure was complete, though the wounded part never closed, and the patient lived to become a grateful and lifelong benefactor to the friend to whom, under the blessing of God, he owed the prolongation of his earthly existence. But it was not the tie of gratitude alone which henceforth united the fortunes of the young physician and his noble patient: the charms of conversation, the boundless stores of recondite knowledge, the equanimity of temper and benevolence of heart, which so eminently distinguished the young practitioner, completed a conquest in the library which was commenced in the chamber of sickness, and the enraptured peer henceforth refused to be satisfied until he found his friend living with him under his roof and sitting daily with him at his table. Whether it was to save his physician trouble, or himself weariness, during the physician's dreaded absence whilst visiting prospective patients, we know not; but certain it is that Locke was not permitted to scatter his boluses indiscriminately in the neighbourhood: his lordship took care that the life of no mortal out of the range of his own social circle should be abbreviated or lengthened by Locke's professional agency, and not a pill or prescription could be had save by the patron's consent.

But the "medicine of the mind," (to borrow a phrase from the learned Diodorus,) which Locke knew so well how to administer, the master of the house was not disposed to monopolize so selfishly. On the contrary, when he had secured the coveted prize so earnestly desired, he made a feast—many feasts—and called around him his friends and his neighbours to rejoice with him over his acquisition. That young Locke was not disposed, on these occasions, to permit either himself or the company to pay such exclusive devotion to their host's good things as should entirely preclude their enjoyment of his own, we have the following anecdote in evidence:—On one occasion, when Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, Lord Halifax, and some other noted wits, were varying the pleasures of the table with games at cards and undignified badinage, Mr. Locke, after regarding them for a few moments in disapproving silence, took out his pocket-book and commenced writing with great earnestness. The singularity of his conduct excited the curiosity of one of the lords, who begged to know what it was which he was recording with such interest:—

"My lord," responded the philosopher, "I am endeavouring to profit as far as I am able in your company; for, having waited with impatience for the honour of being in an assembly of the greatest geniuses of this age, and at last having obtained the good fortune, I thought I could not do better than write down your conversation; and, indeed, I have set down the substance of what has been said for this hour or two."

Some extracts were then read for the edification of the late dramatis persone, and it needed only the repetition of a few lines to induce the illustrious interlocutors to turn the conversation into a more rational channel. The fact that these great wits and—stranger still—great lords would thus patiently submit to be tutored by their untitled "guide, philosopher, and friend" redounds not a little to the credit of all parties. So successful, indeed, was Mr. Locke in turning the minds of his visitors to topics of intellectual investigation that a number of them, anxious that others should profit by the wisdom which they had learned to appreciate, urged him to communicate to the world the results of his speculations in a branch of metaphysical philosophy then little understood either by writers or readers at home or abroad. Accordingly, as early as 1670 we find Mr. Locke forming the plan of his great work, which did not see the light until twenty years later,—The Essay on the Human Understanding.

As an additional proof of the great influence which the philosopher possessed over the mind of his friend and host, Lord Ashley, we may notice the fact that when his lordship, fearful of the extinction of his noble line, desired to find a suitable wife for his only son, Locke's pupil, (in the spirit of the patriarch of old, who welcomed a Rebekah to his household,) he confided the whole matter to his friend, and begged him from among the daughters of the land to select one whom he would be satisfied to recommend as likely to make his son happy and himself a grandfather. Had Mr. Locke's commission been publicly announced, it is not to be doubted that the sage would suddenly have become very popular with the ladies, even with those who had but little taste for metaphysical speculation; for to marry into this great family was no ignoble object of ambition. Our author, although he never saw fit to look for a wife for himself, proved as successful in the direction of the affections as he afterwards did in the "Conduct of the Understanding." The young gentleman was happily married; and his eldest son was, in his youth, the pupil of Locke, and, in his maturer years, the celebrated author of The Characteristics,—a work which has already come under our notice in a preceding page. (See COOPER, ANTHONY ASHLEY.)

In 1672, Locke's patron, Lord Ashley, was created Earl of Shaftesbury and made Lord High-Chancellor of England. He immediately appointed Locke Secretary of Presentations; and in the following year, when the latter lost this post by his lordship's losing the great seal, he made his friend Secretary of the Board of Trade. This office also Mr. Locke retained but a year, the commission being dissolved in 1674. When the earl fell under the suspicion of the court, in 1682, and was obliged to return to Holland, Locke accompanied him; and this fact, added to the freedom of his intercourse with disaffected Englishmen abroad, brought the philosopher under such obloquy that, in 1684, the king ordered his name to be stricken from the roll of the students of Christ's Church. In the next year, orders were issued for his arrest as a party to the intended invasion of England by the Duke of Monmouth, and Locke, though entirely innocent of the offence charged, was obliged to hide himself from the eye of power for nearly a twelvemonth. Upon the accession of King James, William Penn, the Quaker, procured for his old friend Locke the promise of a pardon; but this offer the latter declined to accept, alleging that he had been guilty of no crime.

In 1686, he formed a literary society at Amsterdam, where he was at least once a week surrounded by Linboreh, Le Clerc, and other learned men, who knew how to profit by his instructions. Two years later, the Revolution of 1688 afforded an opportunity to Locke and many of his countrymen to return to the native land from which they had long been banished; and it is an interesting fact, worthy to be noted, that the illustrious exile was one of the happy band of patriots who sailed in the fleet which conveyed the Princess of Orange to a country which hailed her and her royal consort as the restorer of its lost liberties. Mr. Locke now made an unsuccessful attempt to regain his studentship at Christ Church. The society did not feel at liberty to deprive his successor, who had been regularly elected, but offered Locke a post as supernumerary student,—which he declined. As some compensation for his sacrifices in the cause of freedom, Locke was named Commissioner of Appeals, with a salary of £200 per annum; and in 1695 the king appointed him one of the Commissioners of Trade and Plantations,—a place worth £1000 a year. For the duties of this office his published writings on politics and subjects of political economy had proved him to be amply qualified, and public expectation was not disappointed when the intelligent theorist found himself in a position to carry his speculations into practice. In 1700, the increase of an asthmatic disorder which had long troubled him obliged him to desist from active employment; and he was too conscientious to accede to the king's proposition that he should retain his post and salary whilst others assumed his labours. His remaining twenty miles from London, at the seat of Sir Francis Masham, of whose family he had long been an inmate,—his time being exclusively occupied with the diligent study of that inspired volume which, to quote his own eloquent eulogy "has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth, without any mixture of error, for its matter."

When unable, from increasing infirmity, to read for himself, his excellent friend, Lady Masham, soothed the pains of approaching dissolution by relieving to him those blessed promises on which his hopes had long been stayed, which had consoled him when an exile from an ungrateful land and a fugitive among a strange people. It was whilst thus piously occupied, on the 28th of October, 1704, that his attentive friend noticed that he had ceased to breathe, and had at last entered into that rest which "remaineth for the people of God."

"You will not, perhaps, dislike to know," writes Lady Masham, shortly after the decease of this truly great man, "that the last scene of Mr. Locke's life was no less admirable than any thing else in him. All the faculties of his mind were perfect to the last; but his weakness, of which only he died, made such gradual and visible advances, that few people I think, do so sensibly see death approach them as he did. During all which time, no one could observe the least alteration in his humour,—Always cheerful, civil, conversible, to the last day, thoughtful of all the concerns of his friends, and omitting no fit occasion of giving Christian advice to all about him. In short, his death was like his life,—truly pious, yet natural, easy, and unaffected; nor can time, I think, ever produce a more eminent example of reason and religion than he was, living and dying."—Letter to Mr. Laughton.

Index at the end of each volume. Locke's Philosophical Works, with a Preliminary Discourse, Preface, and Notes, by J. A. St. John, were pub. in 1843, r. 8vo; again, 1851, (Bohn's Standard Library.) 2 vols. p. 8vo. These vols. contain Locke's philosophical writings: 1. On the Conduct of the Understanding; 2. An Essay concerning the Human Understanding; 3. Controversy concerning the Bishop of Worcester; 4. An Examination of P. Malebranche's Opinion of seeing all things in God; with Remarks upon some of Mr. Norris's Books; 5. Elements of Natural Philosophy; 6. Some Thoughts concerning Reading and Study for a Gentleman. Of the Essay on the Human Understanding, the last English ed. was pub. by Mr. Tegg, London, 1853, 8vo. The consideration of this great work, upon which the fame of the author will always rest,—and securely rest,—will be postponed for a few moments, until we have designated the other principal productions of its author. These are—1. A COMMON-PLACE BOOK TO THE HOLY BIBLE, 1686; 2d ed., 1697; revised and improved by Rev. Wm. Doid, LL.D., 1805, 4to; 1824, 8vo. We could not with propriety omit to record this vol. in this place; yet it is by no means certain that it is correctly ascribed to Locke. But this is a matter which has already claimed our notice: see DODD, WILLIAM, D.D. 2. THREE LETTERS CONCERNING TOLERATION: the First, anon., in Latin, Goudæ, 1689, 8vo; in English, Lon., 1689, 4to. The Second, in English, 1690, 4to. The Third, in English, 1692, 1765, 4to; in Latin, 1765, 4to.

"The first Letter on Toleration," remarks Sir James Mackintosh, "the most original perhaps of his works, was composed in Holland, in a retirement where he was forced to conceal himself from the tyranny which pursued him into a foreign land; and it was published in England, in the year of the Revolution, to vindicate the Toleration Act, of which he lamented the imperfection."

After quoting some of Locke's strictures, Sir James proceeds to remark, in a note:

"How far are we at this moment [1821] from adopting these admirable principles! and with what absurd confidence do the enemies of religious liberty appeal to the authority of Mr. Locke for continuing those restrictions on conscience which he so deeply lamented!"—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Miscell. Works, Lon., 1854, i. 328.

"Locke's invaluable Letter on Toleration appeared in 1689. It was, as might be expected, opposed; and the controversy was continued in subsequent letters till 1706. Many exceedingly disliked it."—BICKERSTETH.

A late eminent prelate remarks of the first Letter that it and the treatises of Taylor, Stillingfleet, and Bayle "should be carefully studied. They give a complete view of the subject. Such who have wrote since in support of the divine principle of toleration may be said only actum agere."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

Lord Grenville declared Locke's Letter on Toleration to be "unanswerable."

"A complete and satisfactory work on Toleration."—Bickersteth's C. S. ed. Lon., 1844, 380.

"Locke was engaged in a controversy through his first Letter on Toleration, which produced a second and a third; but it does not appear to me that these, though longer than the first, have considerably modified its leading positions. It is to be observed that he pleads for the universal toleration of all modes of worship not immoral in their nature or involving doctrines inimical to good government,—placing in the latter category some of the doctrines of the Church of Rome. . . . He denies altogether that the care of souls belongs to the civil magistrate, as it has never been committed to him. "All the power of civil government relates only to men's civil interests, is confined to the things of this world, and hath nothing to do with the world to come."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, iii. 290, 291.

3. THOUGHTS CONCERNING THE EDUCATION OF CHILDREN, 1693, 8vo. Many eds.

"Education in England has been in danger of being hurt by two of its greatest men, Milton and Locke. Milton's plan is impracticable, and I suppose has never been tried. Locke's, I fancy, has been tried often enough, but is very imperfect: it gives too much to one side, and too little to the other; it gives too little to literature."—DR. JOHNSON: Boswell's Life, ed. Lon., 1848, r. 8vo, 618.

An eminent critic of our own day by no means endorses this opinion:

"Much has been written, and often well, since the days of Locke; but he is the chief source from which it has been ultimately derived; and though the Emile is more attractive in manner, it may be doubted whether it is as rational and practicable as the Treatise on Education. If they have both the same defect,—that their authors wanted sufficient observation of children,—it is certain that the caution and sound judgment of Locke have rescued him better from error.

"There are, indeed, from this or from other causes, several passages in the Treatise on Education to which we cannot give an unhesitating assent. Locke appears to have somewhat exaggerated the efficacy of education. This is an error on the right side in a work that aims at persuasion in a practical matter; but we are now looking at the theoretical truth alone."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Eur. pt. 4th ed., 1854, iii. 421.

"Locke's reflections on the effects of education in modifying the intellectual faculties, and (where skillfully conducted) in supplying their original defects, have been distorted into the puerile paradox of Helvétius, that the mental capacities of the whole human race are the same at the moment of birth."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: 2d Prelim. Dissert. to Enyc. Brit., 7th ed., vol. i. 269-270, n.

4. TWO TREATISES OF GOVERNMENT; against Sir Robert Filmer, 1690, 8vo; 6th ed., 1764, 8vo. In French, Amst. and Geneva, 1722.

"Composed of three parts of different character and very unequal merit. . . . Locke, whose praise is less that of being bold and original than of being temperate, sound, lucid and methodical, deserves the immortal honour of having systematized and rendered popular the doctrines of civil and religious liberty. . . . Locke's writings were one day to lessen the misery suffered by mankind from cruel laws and unjust judges."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Miscell. Works, ed. Lon., 1854, i. 328, (q. v.) ii. 27, iii. 141.

See FILMER, SIR ROBERT.

"John Locke hated tyranny and persecution as a philosopher; but his intellect and his temper preserved him from the violence of a partisan."—T. B. MACAULAY: Hist. of Eng., 1848, vol. i. chap. v. "Hobbes seems to have been one of the first who had any thing like a distinct perception of the real source of wealth. . . . Locke, however, had a much clearer apprehension of this doctrine. His Essay on Civil Government, published in 1689, is, in fact, the earliest work in which the true sources of wealth are distinctly pointed out. . . . Locke has here all but completely established the fundamental principle which lies at the bottom of the science of wealth. . . . But though Locke gave, in the passage referred to above, a far more distinct and comprehensive statement of the fundamental principle that labour is the grand source of value, and consequently of wealth, than is to be found even in the Wealth of Nations, it was but little attended to either by his contemporaries or by subsequent inquirers. Locke was not himself aware of the vast importance of the principle he had developed; and three-quarters of a century elapsed before it began to be generally perceived that an inquiry into the means by which labour might be rendered most efficient was the object of that portion of political economy which treats of the production of wealth."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., Lon., 1845, 2, 3, 4.

See also (for notices of Locke's work on Money and Report of Board of Trade on the Poor) pp. 146, 156, 157, 275.

Mr. Hallam remarks of this same chapter,

"The excellent chapter on property would be sufficient, if all Locke's other writings had perished, to leave him a high name in philosophy."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, iii. 341.

It may be expected that the author of this Dictionary, as an American, should offer some comments upon Locke's famous Constitution for the Carolinas; but our limited space forbids any detailed examination of a subject which indeed is now of but little importance and excites no considerable interest in any quarter. We would not be understood as expressing any opinion upon the following animadversions of an eminent political philosopher of our own day:

"In 1669 a Constitution for the Carolinas was framed by the celebrated John Locke; and so widely different is practical statesmanship from profound philosophy, that it was found altogether unmanageable, grounded on principles extremely illiberal and wholly inconsistent with its author's theoretical love of freedom. It was universally disliked and vehemently opposed; nor did the colony, according to the common tradition, ever enjoy a day of peace or happiness under it, till in 1693 it was abandoned and the old government restored."—Lord Brougham's Polit. Philos., Pt. 3, 2d ed., Lon., 1849, 324.

5. The Reasonableness of Christianity as delivered in the Scriptures, 1695, '96, 8vo; new ed., 1842. In French, by Coste, 2 vols. 12mo. Vindication of the same from Mr. Edwards's Exceptions, 1695, '96, 8vo. Second Vindication, 1697, 8vo. Animadversions, 1697, 4to. See EDWARDS, JOHN, D.D., p. 544; BOLD, or BOLDE, SAMUEL. Mr. Bold defended Locke; and Edwards, as we have seen, attacked him in his Socinianism Unmasked. But Locke afterwards found a more formidable opponent in Bishop Stillingfleet, who considered that some of Locke's expressions in his Essay on the Human Understanding tended to favour Toland's notions, who in his Christianity not Mysterious had used several arguments drawn from Locke's Essay. Stillingfleet therefore, in 1697, put forth his Defence of the Trinity, in which both Toland and Locke were censured. The Defence was followed by three letters from Locke and two from Stillingfleet, all pub. 1697-99. We have anticipated the natural course of our history a little, but thought it better to refer to these two controversies at the same time. Lee, Brown, and the author of Mr. Locke's Religion out of his own Writings, (1700, 8vo), also censured some of his theological views; and we shall see presently that opposition from modern writers has been expressed in terms quite as decided. See No. 6, and some quotations appended thereto. But we must not omit to quote a few comments upon Locke's REASONABLENESS OF CHRISTIANITY AS DELIVERED IN THE SCRIPTURES.

"In his Reasonableness of Christianity as delivered in the Scriptures he hath, without formally mentioning Lord Herbert, furnished a proper antidote against his scheme."—Leland's Dissert. Writers, ed. Lon., 1857, 18, q. v. See also pp. 17, 190, 206, 281, 385, 378.

"This treatise was first published in 1695, without Mr. Locke's name; he concealed his being the author of it from his most intimate friends. A learned and ingenious prelate observed, 'If Mr. Locke writ it, it was the best book he ever laboured at.' Le Clerc, in his Bibliothèque Choisie, said that it was 'un des plus excellents ouvrages qui ait été fait depuis long-tems sur cette matière et dans cette vue.' And Limborch preferred it to all the systems of divinity he had ever read. Dr. Edwards wrote against it; and his objections produced from Mr. Locke two vindications of it. These merit the reader's attention as much as the work itself, which has long been generally approved."—BISHOP WATSON: Collec. of Theolog. Tracts, among which the bishop has introduced this work.

Indeed, the bishop does not hesitate to say for himself, "I must confess that I prefer this to all other systems of theology."

6. PARAPHRASE AND NOTES ON THE EPISTLES OF ST. PAUL TO THE GALATIANS, CORINTHIANS, ROMANS, EPHESIANS. To which is prefixed an Essay for the Understanding of St. Paul's Epistles by consulting St. Paul himself, 1705, '07, '09, '33, '42, '63, 4to; 1824, 8vo. In German, by Hoffman, 1763, 2 vols. 4to.

"Locke has done more towards clearing and fixing the sense of St. Paul's epistles than any or all of the commentators before him."—DR. PAIR.

"It contains much important truth and some very considerable errors. Locke read St. Paul with great attention, and yet missed his meaning on some leading subjects. His ideas of the person of Christ, of the doctrine of justification by faith, and the character and privileges of the Christian Church, are grossly erroneous. But, apart from his theological errors, his work possesses very considerable merit. He set the example, in English, of a style of criticizing the New Testament which was afterwards followed by Pierce and Benson, who, in a series of similar works, completed the epistolary part of the New Covenant."—Orme's Hist. Bib.

See BENSON, GEORGE, D.D., p. 106 of this Dictionary, where we have quoted Dr. Doddridge's opinion of the commentaries of Locke, Pierce, and Benson.

"In no book which the author has read does the pride of human reason, opposing the express testimonies of God and striving to wrest them from their obvious meaning, appear so prominently as in most parts of Mr. Locke's Exposition of St. Paul's Epistles."—THOMAS SCOTT, the Commentator.

"Locke himself is far from being a scriptural writer. . . . He concurred with the Arminians, and was intimate with their leaders in Holland. . . . Whatever desire of peace and union among Christians may have actuated him, we cannot but consider that his influence has been decidedly prejudicial to the pure gospel of Christ. . . . We cannot acquit him of a tendency to Socinian principles. His works must therefore be read with caution."—Bickersteth's C. S., ed. Lon., 1844, 289.

"Were I to recommend learned ingenuity and critical conjecture, often at the expense of truth, (and probably unsanctioned by the discipline of personal deep experience), the Commentaries of Dr. (John) Taylor and Mr. Locke's might be mentioned."—Williams's C. P., 5th ed., Lon., 1843, 292-293. See also pp. 361-362.

The manner in which Mr. Locke discusses the doctrine of predestination was, indeed, not calculated to please the critics whose strictures we have just quoted; but, on the other hand, his treatment of this topic seems to have greatly conciliated a once-famous controversialist, who claimed little in common with the commentator:

"This doctrine is very much softened, and the assumed proceedings of God towards men are brought almost within the bounds of credibility, by Mr. Locke's exposition of the ninth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans."—LORD BOLINGBROKE: Works, vol. iii. 456.

But his lordship cannot refrain, even in the midst of his civility, from manifesting his rooted dislike to Christianity, by the sneer that it was a great inconsistency in Mr. Locke to write a Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, and a Discourse on the Reasonableness of Christianity, after he had written an Essay on the Human Understanding. (Bolingbroke's Works, vol. iv. 166, 295.) His lordship here does not seem to perceive how much this silly comment is calculated to injure his own desperate cause,—that of credulous and unreasoning infidelity.

It is an interesting fact that Locke submitted his Paraphrases of, and Commentaries on, the Epistles to the Corinthians to the judgment of his illustrious friend Sir Isaac Newton, who read that on the first Epistle twice over, and that on the second Epistle once. The result of this examination he communicates to Mr. Locke, under date of May 15, 1703:

"I think your paraphrase and commentary on these two epistles is done with very great care and judgment."

See this letter in Sir David Brewster's Memoirs of Sir Isaac Newton, Edin., 1854, vol. ii. 320-322.

We are now prepared to enter upon a brief consideration—purposely reserved for our last subject—of the characteristics and merits of the author's greatest work,—(7.) ESSAY ON THE HUMAN UNDERSTANDING,—the inception of which dates, as we have seen on a preceding page, about 1670, although the work was not given to the world until 1690, (fol.) An abridgment of it, however, made by Locke, and trans. into French by Le Clerc, was pub. by the latter in his Bibliothèque Universelle for Jan. 1688. So popular was the Essay, that a second ed. was pub. in 1694; the 4th in 1700; the 5th in 1701; the 6th in 1705; the 7th in 1706: all in fol. Since then there have been many eds., at home and abroad, both in English and in other languages. A new ed. of the Conduct of the Understanding was pub., Lon., 1839, r. 8vo.

Its influence in France and Germany was perhaps even greater than at home, where it was opposed by some members of the University of Oxford and other liberal-minded philanthropists, who thought that the people were already becoming too wise for their teachers, and stood more in need of soporifics than intellectual stimulants. All that can be expected of us in this place is the citation of a few opinions of eminent authorities upon this famous production. To attempt, within the compass of the brief space to which we are necessarily restricted, either to give a faithful synopsis of the work itself, or to reconcile the opposing interpretations of its doctrines which have been offered from time to time by the disciples of, or the protestants against, the school founded by this illustrious philosopher, would be worse than useless, because unjust:

"The endless disputations of the learned led him to suspect that they had their origin in an improper use of words and want of precision in our ideas, which he proposed to rectify by ascertaining the grounds and extent of human knowledge, through investigation of the properties of the human understanding. This was the origin of his renowned work, by which he justly acquired the greatest distinction for the modesty and tolerance of his way of thinking and the clearness and rectitude of his understanding, evinced in the course of a correspondence with the most accomplished men of his day. . . . Locke's great object and merit was the investigation of the origin, reality, limits, and uses of knowledge. . . . He contested the hypothesis of innate ideas, throwing great light on one side of the question, and endeavoured to prove, by an induction which was necessarily incomplete, that all our notions are acquired by experience. The two ultimate sources of all our knowledge are the senses and reflection, (or the perception of the operations of our minds,) which has caused his system to be called one of sensualism,—since he gives even to reflection the application of an internal sense."—Trenchard's Manual of the Hist. of Philos., Johnson's Trans., Oxf., 1832, 336, 337.

"That Locke possessed a noble and lofty mind, superior to prejudice, and capable, by its native energy, of exploring truth even in the regions of the intellectual world before unknown, that his judgment was accurate and profound, that his imagination was vigorous, and that he was well furnished with ornaments of elegant learning, were there no other proofs, might be without hesitation concluded from his great and immortal work, The Essay on the Human Understanding, in which, discarding all systematic theories, he has from actual experience and observation delineated the features and described the operations of the human mind with a degree of precision and minuteness not to be found in Plato, Aristotle, or Des Cartes. After clearing the way by setting aside the whole doctrine of innate ideas and principles both speculative and practical, the author traces all ideas to two sources,—sensation and reflection: treats at large of the nature of ideas, simple and complex, of the operation of the human understanding in forming, distinguishing, compounding, and associating them, of the difficulties and obstructions in the search after truth which arise, from the imperfection of these signs, and of the nature, reality, kinds, degrees, casual hindrances, and necessary limits of human knowledge. . . . The work is of inestimable value as a history of the understanding,—not compiled from former books, but written from materials collected by a long and attentive observation of what passes in the human mind. A small treatise, On the Conduct of the Understanding, written by the same author, is a valuable supplement to his main work."—Engel's Hist. of Philos., drawn up from Bruce's Hist. of Crit. Philos., Lon., 1840, 621, 622.

This critic, it will be observed, does not join in the charge that Locke borrowed largely from Descartes and Hobbes; and Sir James Mackintosh doubts

"whether Locke be much indebted to Hobbes for his speculations. . . . His style, with all its faults, is that of a man who thought for himself; and an original style is not usually the vehicle of borrowed opinions."—Sir James Mackintosh's Works, Lon., 1854, 342, 343.

Mr. Lewes takes very strong ground on the same side:

"That Locke never read Hobbes may seem incredible, but it, we are convinced, the truth. It is one among many examples of how few were the books he had read. He never alludes to Hobbes in any way that can be interpreted into having read him. Twice only, we believe, does he allude to him,—and then so distantly and with such impropriety as to be almost convincing with respect to his ignorance."—Biog. Hist. of Philos., Pt. 2, Third Epoch, 2d ed., 1857, q. v.

Crousaz and Leibnitz speak of Locke's Essay in very different terms:

"Clarissimi et merito celebratissimi, Lockii de Intellectu Humano eximium opus, ex auctore sui dignissimum, logicis utilissimum semper amumerabitur."—CROUSAZ: Treat. Log. Prefat.

"In Lockio sunt quedam particularia non male exposita, sed in summa longe aberravit a jura, nec naturam mentis verat intellexit."—LEIBNITZ: Op., tom. v. p. 355, ed. Dutens.

"M. Locke avoit de la subtilité et de l'adresse, et quelque espèce de métaphysique superficielle qu'il savoit relever."—Hist., pp. 11, 12. And see Reflexions sur l'Essai de M. Locke, in the Recueil de Des Maizeaux, vol. ii.

But in his Nouveaux Essais sur l'Entendement Humain, Leibnitz treats Locke with far greater respect. See Lewes's Biog. Hist. of Philos.: Leibnitz, 2d ed., 1857.

See Le Clerc's Eloge on Locke in the Bibliothèque Choisie, année 1705, tom. vi. See also vol. xii., année 1707; Stewart's Prelim. Dissert. Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., vol. i. 106, n. We can barely refer here to Cousin's review of Locke's Essay:

"Locke is also a child of Descartes: he is imbued with his spirit and his method; he rejects every other authority than that of reason, and he sets out from the analysis of consciousness; but, instead of seeing all the elements which it comprehends, without rejecting entirely the interior element, liberty and intelligence, he considers more particularly the exterior element: he is above all struck with sensation. The philosophy of Locke is a branch of Cartesianism, but it is a straggling one, like Spinozism."—Cousin's Course of the Hist. of Mod. Philos., Wright's Trans., N. York, 1854, i. 236-237; see also p. 25, and vol. ii. 88, 159, et seq.

Of this review Mr. Hallam complains bitterly, and notices some of its alleged errors.—remarking, however,

"It is not possible in a note to remark on the many passages wherein M. Cousin has dealt no fair measure to our illustrious metaphysician. . . . I regret that he has taken so little pains to distinguish real from verbal differences of opinion, but has, on the contrary, had nothing so much at heart as to depreciate the glory of one whom Europe has long reckoned among the founders of metaphysical science."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 386, n.

"The eminence of his [Cousin's] name and the popular style of his lectures have given great importance to his criticisms: but, if we are to speak out our opinion fairly, we must characterize this criticism as very unfair and extremely shallow."—Lewes's Biog. Hist. of Philos.: Locke: 2d ed., 1857.

See also, on the subject of Cousin's misrepresentations of Locke's philosophy, article on History of Philosophy (by Samuel Tyler) in South. Quar. Rev., Nov. 1856. The French philosophers in general seem sadly to have mistaken Locke's doctrine respecting the origin of ideas, the power of moral perception, and the immutability of moral distinctions. These misrepresentations have been so largely exposed by Dugald Stewart in his Philosophical Essays, and in his Prelim. Dissert. to the Encyc. Brit., that we need only refer the reader to these works.

"I would not have enlarged so fully," remarks this able critic, "on Locke's account of the origin of our ideas, had not a mistaken view of his argument on this head served as a groundwork for the whole Metaphysical Philosophy of the French Encyclopedia."—Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., vol. i. 116. n.

As regards the merits of the Essay itself, Stewart does not attempt to disguise the dangerous tendency of some of its positions, (we have noticed some of the effects of this tendency in our life of DAVID HUME, p. 915 of this Dictionary,) but he considers that "The general effect of the whole work may be regarded as the best of antidotes against the errors involved in some of his particular conclusions."—Lit., p. 108.

"As the antagonists chiefly contemplated by Mr. Locke were the followers of Descartes, perhaps the only proposition for which he must necessarily be held to contend was, that the mind has no ideas which do not arise from impressions on the senses or from reflections on our own thoughts and feelings. But it is certain that he sometimes appears to contend for much more than this proposition; that he has generally been understood in a larger sense; and that, thus interpreted, his doctrine is not irreconcilable to those philosophical systems with which it has been supposed to be most at variance."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Works, Lon., 1854, i. 331-332.

Dr. Albert Schwegler, in his review of the Lockian philosophy, remarks:

"His empiricism is clear as the day. The mind, according to it, is in itself bare, and only a mirror of the outer world,—a dark space which passively receives the images of external objects; its whole content is made by the impressions furnished it by material things. Nihil est in intellectu quod non fuerit in sensu, is the watchword of this stand-point. . . . It is true that Locke was not always logically consistent, and in many points did not thoroughly carry out his empiricism; but we can clearly see that the road which will be taken in the further development of this direction will result in a thorough denial of the ideal factor."—Hist. of Philos. in Epit.; Seeley's Trans., N. York, 1856, 197, 198.

We presume that Schwegler had been reading Leibnitz just before inditing this passage; but the latter replies to "Nihil est in intellectu quod non fuerit in sensu" by "Nempe nihil est in intellectu quod non fuerit in sensu, nisi ipse intellectus."—Opera, tom. v. pp. 358, 359. See Dugald Stewart's comment on this criticism, Ist Prelim. Dissert. in Encyc. Brit.

Another eminent German philosopher remarks:

"Locke himself, indeed, was a good Christian; but this is only one instance more that he who first opens a new line of thought very seldom pursues it so far as to perceive even its most inevitable consequences. If we adopt his principles, we must inevitably renounce all other thoughts, and limit ourselves to the feeling, the experience, and the enjoyment of the senses; and those who in later times have openly professed these notions, although they called themselves independent philosophers, were in truth only the disciples of Locke."—FREDERICK VON SCHLEGEL: Lects. on the Hist. of Lit., English Trans., Phila., 1854, 313.

These last lines will perhaps remind some of our readers of a remark of Dugald Stewart's:

"It is with much regret I add [to the denial that Locke was a Hobbit, q. v.] that a very large proportion of the English writers who call themselves Lockists, and who, I have no doubt, believe themselves to be so in reality, are at bottom (at least in their metaphysical opinions) Gassendists, or Hobbists."—Prelim. Dissert. Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., vol. i. 114. n.

See Gassendi's Syntagma Philosophicum for those views of Reflection which Locke is supposed to have borrowed from this philosopher.

"Locke," remarks Mr. Lewes, "distinctly enough foresaw the idealistic and skeptical arguments which might be drawn from his principles. He did not draw them, because he thought them frivolous."—Bog. Hist. of Philos.: Locke; 2d ed., 1857.

Mr. Mill remarks:

"Few among the great names in philosophy have met with a harder measure of justice from the present generation than Locke, the unquestioned founder of the analytical philosophy of mind."—System of Logic, vol. i. p. 150.

A gentleman who has recently given to the world An Historical and Critical View of the Speculative Philosophy of Europe in the Nineteenth Century has been censured in very decided terms for an alleged misrepresentation of Locke's philosophy:

"It really mortifies us that these stale criticisms, which make Locke a mere sensationalist, should be written anew in the history of philosophy by a countryman of Locke's at this late day. Mr. Morell has, as it were, permitted Cousin to hold his hand while he writes the history of philosophy."—Hist. of Philosophy, by Samuel Tyler: South. Quar. Rev., Nov. 1856.

But the reader must examine the justice of the charge for himself: we seldom take either side of a literary controversy, for the excellent reason that it is our duty to present a fair exposition of both, and inflexible justice and eager partisanship are not supposed to travel always in company. As a striking evidence of the remarkable state of judicial impartiality to which we have tutored ourselves, we shall even quote Horne Tooke's astonishing criticism on Locke's great work without a syllable of righteous indignation. "The Essay," says this erudite philologist, is merely

"a grammatical treatise, or a treatise on words, or on language. It was a lucky mistake which Mr. Locke made when he called his book an Essay on the Human Understanding. For some part of the inestimable benefit of that book has, merely on account of its title, reached to thousands more than I fear it would have done had he called it a Grammatical Essay. The human mind, or the human understanding, appears to be a grand and noble theme; and all men, even the most insufficient, conceive that to be a proper object for their contemplation, while inquiries into the nature of language are supposed to be beneath the concern of their exalted understanding."—Divisions of Parley.

We are gratified that Mr. Tooke acknowledges the "inestimable benefit" of the Essay to "thousands." Perhaps no critic ever more heartily rated the peculiarities of Locke's philosophy than his former pupil, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the famous author of the Characteristics. Yet even he does not scruple to declare that the Essay is "a book that may as well qualify men for business and the world as for the sciences and a university. No one has done more towards the recalling of philosophy from barbarity into use and practice of the world, and into the company of the better and politer sort, who might well be ashamed of it in its other dress. No one has opened a better and clearer way to reasoning."—First Letter to a Student at the University, Feb. 1707.

Dr. Reid, also, does not hesitate to differ from his intellectual preceptor; yet he makes a very handsome acknowledgment of his deep obligations to his lessons:

"I mention these things that when I have occasion to differ from him I may not be thought insensible of the merit of an author whom I highly respect, and to whom I owe my first lights in those studies as well as my attachment to them."

Again:

"Of all Mr. Locke's works, his Essay on Human Understanding is that which has contributed most to his fame; and the reputation which it had from the beginning, and which it has gradually acquired abroad, is a sufficient testimony of its merit."

The influence of Locke's Essay upon the mind of Jonathan Edwards is very perceptible: this influence commenced in the early years of the author of the Treatise on the Will.

"In the second year of his collegiate course," remarks his biographer, "he read Locke on the Human Understanding with much delight. His uncommon genius, by which he was naturally formed for close thought and deep penetration, now began to discover and exert itself. From his own account, he was inexpressibly entertained and pleased with that book when he read it at college,—more so than the most greedy miser when gathering up handfuls of silver and gold from some newly-discovered treasure."—Life of P. esident Edwards: Edwards's Works, N. York, 1856, i. 2.

It is no difficult matter to multiply our quotations upon this grateful theme:

"The obligations we owe to him for the Essay on the Human Understanding are never to be forgotten. It is truly the first real chart of the coasts,—wherein some may be laid down incorrectly, but the general relations of all are perceived. And we, who find some things to censure in Locke, have perhaps learned how to censure them from himself: we have thrown off so many false notions and films of prejudice by his help that we are become capable of judging our master."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Jan. 1854, iii. 385-386.

Again:

"We come at length to the work that has eclipsed every other, and given to such inquiries whatever popularity they ever possessed,—the Essay of Locke on the Human Understanding."—Ibid., p. 363.

To judge from the tone of some other modern writers, we might suppose that Locke was, about the beginning of the present century, almost entirely neglected in England:

"From 1792 to 1800 I seldom heard Locke mentioned in England: his system, it was said, had become obsolete, and he was regarded as weak in ideology."—Chateaubriand's Sketches of Eng. Lit., 2d ed., Lon., 1837, ii. 268.

A few years later than this—that is, in 1810—Lord Jeffrey writes:

"The studies to which Mr. Stewart has devoted himself have lately fallen out of favour with the English public; and the nation which once placed the name of Locke immediately under those of Shakspeare and of Newton, and has since repaid the metaphysical labours of Berkeley and of Hume with such just celebrity, seems to be almost without zeal or curiosity as to the progress of the Philosophy of Mind."—Review of Dugald Stewart's Philosophical Essays, in Edin. Rev., Nov. 1810; and in Jeffrey's Works, Edin., 1853, 646.

We marvel at such jeremiads from so acute a critic as Jeffrey; or, rather, we should marvel, did we not remember that reviewers of the didactic school must have some text to expound from, whether it be canonical or otherwise. Who doubts that the reputation of Locke really stood much higher in the year in which Jeffrey wrote than it had done at any preceding date? That Locke's name was less in men's mouths than when his principles were undergoing a careful scrutiny from metaphysical disciples in—all parts of Europe should be considered a matter of course. The enterprise and energy of Columbus were lauded in every household in Spain immediately after his return from his newly discovered continent; but a few months later the name of the discoverer was but rarely heard from those who entered into his labours, peopled the wilderness, and tilled the soil which he had first made known to their need or to their cupidity. Locke's name was perhaps but seldom heard; but the influence of his doctrines had gone forth throughout the earth, and the teachings of his wisdom to the end of the world. No pen has better expressed the obligation of mankind to this illustrious teacher than that of Sir James Mackintosh, himself no ignoble master in the same school of philosophy:

"Few books have contributed more than Mr. Locke's Essay to rectify prejudice, to undermine established errors, to diffuse a just mode of thinking, to excite a fearless spirit of inquiry, and yet to contain it within the boundaries which Nature has prescribed to the human understanding. . . . His writings have diffused throughout the civilized world the love of civil liberty and the spirit of toleration and charity in religious differences, and the disposition to reject whatever is obscure, fantastic, or hypothetical in speculation.—to reduce verbal disputes to their proper value,—to abandon problems which admit of no solution,—to distrust whatever cannot be clearly expressed.—to render theory the simple expression of facts,—and to prefer those studies which most directly contribute to human happiness. If Bacon first discovered the rules by which knowledge is improved, Locke has most contributed to make mankind at large observe them. . . . If Locke made few discoveries, Socrates made none; yet both did more for the improvement of the understanding, and not less for the progress of knowledge, than the authors of the most brilliant discoveries. Mr. Locke will ever be regarded as one of the great ornaments of the English nation; and the most distant posterity will speak of him in the language addressed to him by the poet:

"O Deus Angliacæ certè, O Lux altera gentis!"

(GRAY: De Principiis Cogitandi.)—Edin. Rev., xxvii. 180, xxxvi. 229; and in Mackintosh's Works, Lon., 1854, i. 343, 344.

Professor Smyth, when illustrating the "connexion that subsists between the genius and the freedom of the human mind," remarks:

"In our own country, in like manner, the immortal Locke, under James II. was a student persecuted and silent: the world received no benefit from the labours of his thoughts. But the lapse of a few years and the renewal of a free form of government saw him cherished and admired; saw him give to mankind his Treatise on Government, his Reasonableness of Christianity, his Essay on Toleration, his Essay on the Human Mind, and contribute more, perhaps, than any individual who can be mentioned, to the best interests of his fellow-creatures, by contributing to remove obscurity from the mind, servility from the heart, and dogmatism from the understanding."—Lects. on the Hist. of the French Revolution, Lect. II., ed. Lon., 1855, vol. i. p. 43.

Dr. Watt beautifully describes Locke's genius as "wide as the sea, calm as the night, bright as the day."

LOCKE'S STYLE OF COMPOSITION:

Locke himself complains of his "discontinued way of writing," and "writing by incoherent parcels," in consequence of those vexatious interruptions which so often sorely afflict men of letters. See Disraeli on the Literary Character, ed. Lon., 1840, 439; and see also pp. 480, 483.

An eminent philosopher of the present day, who has within the last few months been called from the world, thus comments on Locke's philosophical style:

"In his language Locke is of all philosophers the most figurative, ambiguous, vacillating, various, and even contradictory,—as has been noticed by Reid and Stewart, and by Brown himself,—indeed, we believe, by every author who has had occasion to comment on this philosopher. The opinions of such a writer are not, therefore, to be assumed from isolated and casual expressions, which themselves require to be interpreted on the general analogy of his system."—SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON: Reid and Brown: Edin. Rev., lii. 189.

But Sir William does Locke less than justice; for it is to be remembered that many "commentators on this philosopher," and among them both "Reid and Stewart," also commend Locke's style in high terms:

"He gave the first example in the English language of writing on such abstract subjects with a remarkable degree of simplicity and perspicuity. His observations on the powers of the Human Understanding, and on the use and abuse of words, shew in him an uncommon degree of penetration and judgment."—Dr. Reid.

"His phraseology, though in general careless and unpolished, has always the merit of that characteristic unity and raciness of style which demonstrate that, while he was writing, he conceived himself to be drawing only from his own resources. With respect to his style, it may be further observed that it resembles that of a well-educated and well-informed man of the world, rather than of a recluse student who had made an object of the art of composition: . . . it may be presumed to have contributed its share towards his great object of turning the thoughts of his contemporaries to logical and metaphysical inquiries."—DUGALD STEWART: First Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., vol. i. 104.

We give some more opinions upon Locke's style; and we think that the wide difference of eminent critics upon this point will somewhat amuse the reader:

"In regard to style, it is generally agreed that the prose of Locke is the best of his times; and it requires no great knowledge of the English to perceive in it the manners of a man who has lived in the best society, and who expresses his thoughts without pedantry, in the most clear, most simple, and most familiar terms. . . . I need not tell you that the eminent characteristic of this style is clearness."—Cousin's Course of the Hist. of Mod. Philos., Wight's Trans., N. York, 1854, ii. 171.

"His writings are characterized by clearness, precision, openness, and determinateness."—Dr. Schwegler's Hist. of Philos., Seelye's Trans., N. York, 1856, 193.

"In English, Mr. Locke's celebrated Treatise on Human Understanding may be pointed out as a model of the greatest clearness and distinctness of philosophical style, with very little approach to ornament: . . . perspicuous and pure, but almost without any ornament whatever."—Blair's Lects. on Rhetoric, Phila., 1854, 202, 411.

"The diction he has adopted is, in general, such as does honour to his judgment. Relinquishing ornament and studied cadences, he is merely solicitous to convey his ideas with perspicuity and precision. No affectation, no conceits, no daring metaphors or inverted periods, disfigure his pages; all is clear, easy, and natural, exhibiting a plain and simple style accommodated to the purposes of philosophy."—Dr. DRAKE.

"The great Locke, in a plain and severe style, well adapted to the philosophical precision of his researches, unravelled the intricacies of the most interesting branch of philosophy by tracing ideas to their source and developing the faculties of the mind."—Kell's Elements.

"Locke and [Adam] Smith chose an easy, clear, and free, but somewhat loose and verbose, style,—more concise in Locke, more elegant in Smith,—in both exempt from pedantry, but not void of ambiguity and repetition."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Works, Lon., 1854, i. 309.

"There is no excuse for not understanding Locke. If his language be occasionally loose and wavering, his meaning is always to be gathered from the context. He had not the lucidity of Descartes or Hobbes; but he was most anxious to make himself intelligible, and to this end he varied his expressions and stated his meaning in a variety of forms. He must not be taken literally. No single passage is to be relied on, unless it be borne out by the whole tenor of his speculations. Any person merely 'dipping into' the Essay will find passages which seem very contradictory; any person carefully reading it through will find all clear and coherent."—Lewis's Biog. Hist. of Philos.: Locke, 2d ed., 1857.

"The style of Locke is wanting in philosophical precision: it is a good model of the English language, but too idiomatic and colloquial, too indefinite and figurative, for the abstruse subjects with which he has to deal. We miss in every page the translucent simplicity of his great French predecessors. This seems to have been owing, in a considerable degree, to an excessive desire of popularizing the subject and shunning the technical pedantry which has repelled the world from intellectual philosophy. . . . Locke is certainly a good writer, relatively to the greater part of his contemporaries: his plain and manly sentences often give us pleasure by the wording above. But he has some defects. In his Essay on the Human Understanding he is often too figurative for the subject. In all his writings, and especially in the Treatise on Education, he is occasionally negligent, and though not vulgar, at least according to the idiom of his age, slovenly in the structure of his sentences as well as the choice of his words: he is not in mere style, very forcible, and certainly not very elegant."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, iii. 366, 559.

Moore, referring to Locke's answer to Newton's famous letter to the former, remarks:

"Verboseness is its great fault, as it is of most of Locke's writings, except (as Lord L. remarked) in a sort of a report of a debate at which he was present, inserted in his works, where he has given one of the concise and clearest specimens of reporting that perhaps exist."—Diary of Thomas Moore, in his Memoirs, &c., Lon., 1853, iv. 154.

Of the character of Locke as a man, and as an honest seeker for truth, we have already had occasion to speak; and the theme is so pleasing that we are glad to refer to it again:

"All his contemporaries, and what is better, all the known actions of his life, testify that no one was more sincerely and constantly attached to truth, virtue, and the cause of human liberty. He loved and served this noble cause: he even had the honour of suffering for it, but without ever departing from the most perfect moderation."—Cousin's Course of the Hist. of Mod. Philos., Wight's Trans., N. York, 1854, ii. 175.

"No quality more remarkably distinguishes Locke than his love of truth. He is of no sect or party, has no oblique design, such as we so frequently perceive, of sustaining some tenet which he suppresses, no submissiveness to the opinions of others, nor—what very few lay aside—to his own."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, iii. 382.

"We cannot part from him without bearing testimony to his singular independence of mind, his acuteness and strength of intellect, his rectitude of character, his honest and unflinching search after truth, and his zeal for the diffusion of a manly, intelligent piety."—Morell's Hist. and Crit. View of the Spec. Philos. of Europe, N. York, 1848, 95.

In connexion with Mr. Morell's last-quoted paragraph, the reader will be pleased to read the following lines, extracted from Locke's paper, entitled Pacific Christians, containing eleven articles:

"If any one find any doctrinal parts of Scripture difficult to be understood, we recommend him—1st. The Study of the Scriptures in humility and singleness of heart. 2d. Prayer to the Father of lights to enlighten him. 3d. Obedience to what is already revealed to him, remembering that the practice of what we do know is the surest way to more knowledge,—our infallible guide having told us, if any man will do the will of him that sent me he shall know of the doctrine.—John viii. 17. 4th. We leave him to the advice and assistance of those whom he thinks best able to instruct him.—no men or society of men, having any authority to impose their opinions or interpretations on any other, the meekest Christian; since in matters of religion, every man must know and believe and give an account for himself?"

See Lord King's Life of Locke, ed. 1831, ii. 63-67.

"Shakspeare, Milton, Locke, and Newton are four names beyond competition superior to any that the Continent can put against them."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

Perhaps we cannot better conclude our notice of this great man than with a quotation from a late eminent prelate, once a distinguished member of the Republic of Letters:

"I would observe of the Works of Locke, that his reasoning is everywhere profound and his language masculine. Let them be ever upon your table; and when you have an hour to spare from business or pleasure, spend it with them, and I will answer for their giving you entertainment and instruction as long as you live."—LUDWIG WATSON.

Lockhart, John Gibson, 1794-1854, a native of Lanarkshire, the son of a minister of the Church of Scotland, was educated at the University of Glasgow and at Balliol College, Oxford, where he acquired great distinction, and became a member of the Scottish Bar in 1816. On the establishment of Blackwood's Magazine he became a contributor to its columns, and also wrote for the Edin. Annual Register; and his literary propensities were confirmed for life by his marriage, in 1820, to Sophia, eldest daughter of Sir Walter Scott. In 1826, he removed to London, and from that time till 1833 was the editor of the London Quarterly Review; visited Rome, for the benefit of his health, in 1833, and returned to die at Abbotsford, the residence of his son-in-law, James Robert Hope, November 25, 1854. 1. Sir Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk, Edin., 1819, 3 vols. 8vo, 13 portraits and 4 vignettes. Pub. under the name of Dr. Peter Morris, the Odontist. In this work we have lively—sometimes satirical—sketches of Scottish society.

"What an acquisition it would have been to our general information to have had such a work written, I do not say fifty, but even five-and-twenty years ago! and how much of grave and gay night then have been preserved, as it were in amber, which have now mouldered away! When I think that, at an age not much younger than yours, I knew Lhock, Ferguson, Robertson, Erskine, Adam Smith, John Home, &c., and at least saw Burns, I can appreciate better than any one the value of a work which, like this, would have handed them down to posterity in their living colours."—Sir Walter Scott to Lockhart, July 19, 1819; Scott's Life, 44.

"It gives us the pictures, mental and bodily, of some of the leading men of Scotland with great truth and effect. It is a singular hotch-potch, and full of wit and humour."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of Eng. for the Last F. fy Years, 1853.

"Nobody but a very young and a very thoughtful person could have dreamed of putting forth such a book. . . Since I have alluded to Peter's Letters at all, I may as well take the opportunity of saying that they were not wholly the work of one hand."—J. G. LOCKHART: Life of Scott.

2. Valerius; a Roman Story, 1821, 3 vols. 12mo. Anon.

"The most successful attempt which has ever yet been made to engraft the interest of modern romance on ancient story; its extreme difficulty may be judged by the brilliant genius of Bulwer having alone rivalled him in the undertaking."—Sir Archibald Alison's Hist. of Europe, 1815-52, chap. v.

"Though the skeleton was dug out of the grave, he has clothed it so dexterously with flesh and muscle, and breathed into it so strongly the breath of life, that it seems the work of nature."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

"It is an attempt, in short, which, though creditable to the spirit and talents of the author, we think he has done wisely in not seeking to repeat, and which, though it has not failed through any deficiency of his, has been prevented, we think, from succeeding by the very nature of the subject."—LORD JEFFREY: *Edin. "Very interesting, and done with ability, by a clever schoolboy with more wit than learning. All these attempts at making one at home eighteen hundred years ago are, and must be, failures. "July 23.—Read Reginald Dalton, by the author of Valerius; delighted. Felt quite at home at Oxford, though the town and gown riots are rather overdone; but the generous spirit of the young men, the manly, dashing, reckless feelings of the place, are nobly drawn; and the whole book is interesting and entertaining,—rather lengthy, perhaps, but a capital novel."—Portfolio of a Man of the World: Lon. Genl. Mag., 1848, Pt. 2, 357.

5. Ancient Spanish Ballads, Historical and Romantic, trans., with Notes, 1823, 4to. Last and best ed., with Life and portrait of Lockhart, beautifully illustrated by Owen Jones, &c., Murray, 1856, sm. 4to, £2 2s. Popular ed., 1856, p. Svo. 2s. 6d.

"A more appropriately as well as beautifully embellished volume never was offered to the world."—Edin. Rev.

Also highly commended by the Athenæum, Examiner, &c. These translations were originally pub. in Blackwood's Magazine, and some of them appeared in an ed. of Motteux's trans. of Don Quixote, edited, with Notes, by Lockhart, in 1822, 5 vols. Svo.

"Lockhart's Notes and Poetical Versions of Old Castilian Ballads, appended to the recent edition of Motteux, have rendered it by far the most desirable translation."—W. H. PIESCOTT, the historian: N. Amer. Rev., July, 1837; and in his Miscellanies, Bost., 1855, 170.

"With notes and illustrative translations, full of spirit and grace, by Mr. J. G. Lockhart."—Ticknor's Hist. of Spanish Lit., 2d ed., N. York, 1854, iii, 42).

Of Lockhart's Spanish Ballads we have many complimentary notices before us:

"These Spanish ballads are known to our public, but generally with inconvertible advantage, by the very fine and animated translations of Mr. Lockhart."—Hullam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, ii, 112.

"These translations derive, as I have said, not a little of their excellence from Mr. Lockhart's being himself a poet of fine genius, clear in his conceptions and masculine in execution. . . . What was tame he inspired; what was lofty gained additional grandeur; and even the tender—as in the lay of 'Count Alarcos'—grew still more pathetic beneath his touch."—Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Post 1/2 Century, 1851, 294.

"All other translations fade away before them."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

"Mr. Lockhart's picturesque version of the Moorish ballads."—Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella, 11th ed., Bost., 1856, 93.

"Long esteemed for the spirit and elegance with which the poet has exhibited the peculiar beauties of this literature in our English dress."—Scribner's Poets and Poetry of Brit., Edin., 1850, 486.

Svo; 1839, 10 vols. 12mo; best ed., (the Abbotsford) Edin., 1850, imp. Svo. Certain portions of this work elicited two pamphlets from the executors of James Ballantyne, the first of which was replied to by Lockhart in the Ballantyne Humbug Handled.

"Executed with so much skill, and in so admirable a manner, that, next to Boswell's Life of Johnson, it will probably always be considered as the most interesting work of biography in the English language."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815-52, chap. v.

"The charm of the work is mainly owing to its being so imbued with the spirit of the subject that it may almost be regarded as an autobiography."—Ibid.: Essays, 1850, iii, 388.

"Fortunate as Sir Walter Scott was in his life, it was not the least of his good fortunes that he left the task of recording it to one so competent as Mr. Lockhart, who, to a familiarity with the person and habits of his illustrious subject unites such entire sympathy with his pursuits, and such fine tact and discrimination in arranging the materials for publication."—Wm. H. PIESCOTT: Miscell., 1855, 178, q. v.

"The most impressive and instructive life, and one that awakens the tenderest sympathies."—CHANCELLOR KENT.

"One of the most delightful books in the language,—in all parts full of interest, which becomes of a melancholy cast towards the close."—Geo. STILLMAN HILLARD.

It is not a little remarkable that no collection has yet been published of Lockhart's papers in the London Quarterly. For these contributions he received payment at the usual rate, in addition to his salary as editor, of £1500 per annum. This source of income, in addition to his receipts (at least £600 a year) as Auditor of the Duchy of Cornwall, and property inherited from his family, placed Lockhart in very comfortable circumstances. As editor of the Quarterly, he had the advantage of succeeding a man who could count his enemies by thousands and reckon his friends on his fingers. (See GIFFORD, WILLIAM, p. 667 of this Dictionary.)

Lockhart's manners, indeed, were quite as unpopular as Gifford's criticisms; but the chilling influence of an austere deportment is not to be compared in its effects with the hot blood engendered by a virulent pen.

"A change was soon visible in the character of the Review: it showed a wider and a deeper sympathy in the fortunes of genius; the insults which Shelley had suffered were, in some measure, atoned for; praise was extended to the classic fancy of Keats; and, in short, good-will to all who could claim a share in feeling and imagination was the order of the day."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

"Its present accomplished editor, Lockhart, who at a short interval [Sir John T. Coleridge was editor for one year] succeeded Gifford in its direction, brought to his arduous task qualities which eminently fitted him for its duties. He is not political in his disposition, at least so far as engaging in the great strife of public questions is concerned: he is one of the light, not the heavy-armed, infantry, and prefers exchanging thrusts with a courtier in pier to wielding the massive club of Hercules. [See Alison's foot-note to this paragraph.] But in the lighter branches of literature he has deservedly attained the very highest eminence. As a novelist, a critic, and a biographer, he has taken a lasting place in English literature."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815-52, chap. v.

"NORTH. 'You alluded a little while ago to the Quarterly Review. James. What think you of it under the new management?'"

"SHEPHERD. 'Na: I wad rather hear your ain opinion.'

"NORTH. 'I may be somewhat too partial to the young gentleman, James, who is now editor, and, indeed, consider him as a child of my own.'"—Noctes Ambros., Nov. 1826.

North gives his opinion in a later paper:

"NORTH. 'The Quarterly Review is a great national work, and may it live forever! Notwithstanding his not infrequent over-sights, not a man alive could edit it in such a style as Mr. Lockhart.'"—Noctes Ambros., March, 1831, q. v.

"I have carefully preserved," proceeds North, "among other relics of departed worth, the beautiful manuscript of the first article he ever sent me."

Vol. iv. is not uniform in size with vols. i., ii., and iii. There are 240 portraits in all eds., but in the first just noticed the engravings are on copper; in the other eds. they are on steel. The coppers were destroyed immediately after the publication of the first ed. The finest copy of this work ever offered for sale was that of Mr. Harding, the publisher, (1st ed.,) which contained many duplicate plates. Some of the unlettered proofs have brought five to ten guineas each. The cost of getting up Lodge's Portraits, painting, engraving, printing, &c. exceeded £10,000. We notice the other eds.: 2. 1823-30, 12 vols. sm. 4to, £31 10s. 3. 1825, 12 vols. 4to, large paper, proofs, £50; proofs, r. 4to, £60. 4. 1835, 12 vols. r. 8vo, £30. 5. 1840, 10 vols. r. 4to, £28. 6. 1840, 10 vols. 4to, £17. 7. 1840, 10 vols. r. 8vo, £11 11s. 8. 1845-46, 8 vols. fp. 8vo, £2 12s. 6d. 9. 1849-50, 8 vols. fp. 8vo, £2. 10. 1852, 8 vols. 8vo, £2.

"A collection which at once satisfies the imagination and the understanding,—shewing us, by the pencil, how the most distinguished of our ancestors looked, moved, and dressed,—and informing us, by the pen, how they thought, acted, lived, and died."—SIR WALTER SCOTT.

"Such a union of various talents—such a Gallery of Illustrious Deeds—was scarcely ever before presented to the eyes of the public in colours almost as vivid and sparkling as if the ORIGINALS occupied the canvas when their copies were taken. . . . These short pieces of biography are indeed admirable,—very models of taste, and as characteristic as the portraits themselves."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., (q. v.) ed. 1825, 515.

Also praised by La Belle Assemblée, Literary Gazette, Literary Museum, &c. The collection entitled Physiognomical Portraits, 100 plates, large paper, India proof, pub. in 1824, 10 Parts, at £21, should accompany Lodge's Portraits. Among the former is the celebrated head of Michael Angelo by Cosmo Armstrong, which Raphael Morghen acknowledged his inability to imitate.

Freberi Theatrum Virorum Eruditione clarorum, omnis ævi omniumque Nationum, 2 vols. thick folio, with 1312 small portraits, Norib. 1688.

"Whoever is engaged in the investigation of the history of the revival of learning must experience great advantage from the possession of this biographical collection. The sketches of characters distinguished for their literary attainments are concise sometimes to abruptness; but the catalogues subjoined, descriptive of the different authors, are highly useful and important. It is curious also on another account: the work contains no less than 1312 portraits, of which a great many are Englishmen. These volumes have not hitherto produced any very large sum in the market, (usually about £7 7s.) but it is impossible that their value should not progressively increase, as well from the difficulty of procuring them on the Continent as from their own intrinsic importance."—Classical Journal, No. 6.

"Such a work ought to be in the library of every artist and man of taste; and even the most general reader will find in it much to instruct and much to interest him."—Lon. Atlas.

"Would that we could induce every one of our readers to buy and peruse that great work [Winklemann's Hist. of Ancient Art—complete]! What a fine source of enjoyment and culture it would prove to them!"—Corresp. of the Amer. Pub. Circ., N. York, Feb 16, 1856.

2. The Brehngel Brothers; trans. from the German of the Baron von Sternberg, sm. 4to. Illustrated by Billings.

Lodge, Thomas, M.D., d. 1625, an actor and dramatic poet of considerable celebrity in his day, educated at Trinity College, Oxford, pub. a number of dramatic pieces, novels, songs, &c., translations of Josephus and Seneca, and other works. Among his publications, some of which have brought high prices in the present century, are: 1. Aharum against Vsurers, &c., 1584, 4to. Bindley sale, £27. 2. Rosalind, Lon., 1590, 1623, '42, 4to. Bibl. Anglo-Poet., 421, £20. From part of this novel Shakespeare borrowed the plot of his As You Like It. 3. Life and Death of William Longbeard, 1593, 4to. 4. The Wounds of Civil War, 1594, 4to. 5. The Diuel Conjured, 1596, 4to. 6. Wits Miserie and the Worldes Madnesse, 1596, 4to. 7. "One of the best poets of the age. . . . Lodge has ten pieces in this collection [England's Helicon] and Breton eight. These are generally full of beauty, grace, and simplicity."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed. Lon., 1854, ii, 125, 174, n.

"Lodge and Greene are the only imitators of Lyly who have atoned for affectation of style by any felicity of genius or invention."—Dunlop's Hist. of Fiction, 3d ed., Lon., 1845, 407; and see p. 703.

The Fig for Momus was reprinted, very incorrectly, at the Anchinleck Press, 1817, 4to. The work opens very happily:

"Digbie, whence comes it that the world begins
To wink at follies, and to sooth ap sinnes?
Can any other reason be alleaght than this—
The world sooths sinne because it sinfull is."

Loft, Capel, 1751–1824, called to the London Bar, 1775, pub. a number of legal, theolog., political, poetical, and other works, of which almost all are now forgotten. Among these publications are—1. Reports in K. B. 12 to 14 Geo. III. Lon., 1776, fol.; Dubl. 1790, 8vo. Very inaccurate, but being a continuation of Burrow's Reports, and containing some of Lord Mansfield's decisions nowhere else reported. Loft's vol. is not without value. See *Brooke's Bibl. Loffie, Wm. Papers in Med. Obs. and Inq. and in Med. Facts, 1791.

Loftus, Dudley, 1618–1695, a learned Orientalist, a native of Rathfriland, near Dublin, trans. the Æthiopic New Testament into Latin for the London Polyglott, and pub. some translations from the Syriac into Latin and English, and several tracts, &c. See Athen. Oxon.; Harris's ed. of Ware's Ireland; Lodge's Peerage of Ireland, art. Loftus. It is said that when Loftus was only twenty he was able to translate as many languages into English as he had numbered years.

"Vir doctissimus, tum generis prosapia, quam singularum Orientalium scientia nobilitas."—BRIAN WALTON.

Yet Loftus seems to have lacked prudence and common sense; for another contemporary used to say of him that he "never knew so much learning in the keeping of a fool."

Loftus, Smyth. Reply to Gibbon, Dubl., 1778, 8vo.

Loftus, William Kemmett. Travels and Researches in Chaldea and Susiana; with an account of Excavations at Warka, the Erech of Nimrod, and Shushan, the Palace of Esther, in 1849–52, &c., Lon., 1857, demy 8vo. The author gives us an account of two visits to the countries named,—the first in 1849–52, the second at the end of 1853. This work should stand on the library-shelf next to Layard's vols. on Nineveh, &c. To the Biblical student Loftus's work offers especial attractions.

"An indefatigable traveller and a zealous explorer in such a field of research has a claim to attention, and will, no doubt, find many to listen to his account."—Lon. Athenæum, June 6, 1857, 721.

Logan, George, 1674–1755, minister of Edinburgh. 1. On the Right of electing Ministers, 1732. 2. Treat. on Government, 1746, '48, 8vo. 3. Second Treat. on Government, 1747, 8vo. Riddiman replied to these works in 1747. 4. Dissert. on Government, Manners, &c., 1787, 4to. Logan pub. other tracts on politics. See Chalmers's Life of Riddiman; Chambers and Thomson's Biog. Diet. of Eminent Scotsmen, 1855, vol. iii.

Logan, George, M.D., 1753–1821, grandson of James Logan, (see next article,) and a native of Pennsylvania, was a Senator of the United States 1801–07, and filled other important political posts. He pub. Experiments on Gypsum, and on the Rotation of Crops, 1797.

Logan, James, 1674–1751, a native of Lurgan, Ireland, grandfather of the preceding, and a member of the Society of Friends, accompanied William Penn to Pennsylvania in 1699, and filled successively the offices of Secretary of the Province and Clerk of the Council, Commissioner of Property, Chief-Justice, and (1736–38) President of the Council. The latter part of his life was passed at Stanton, his country-seat, near Germantown, in the enjoyment of his valuable library and correspondence with the learned of foreign countries. He was "master of the Greek, Latin, French, and German languages, and was well acquainted with mathematics, natural and moral philosophy, and natural history." 1. Experimenta et Meletemata circa Plantarum Generationem, Lugd. Bat., 1739, 8vo. With an English version on the opposite page, by Dr. Fothergill, Lon., 1747, '48, 8vo. This originally appeared in Phil. Trans., (Lon.,) 1735. Logan pub. other papers in Phil. Trans., 1734, on Davis's Quadrant, on Lightning, and on the Apparent Increased Magnitude of the Sun and Moon when near the horizon. 2. Canonum pro inveniendis refractionum, tum simplicium, tum in lentibus duplicium, focus, demonstrationes Geometricæ, Lugd. Bat., 1741. 5. Cicero de Senectute, with Notes, Phila., 1744, 4to, pp. 159. With Preface by Dr. Benj. Franklin, and printed by him.

"The First Translation of a Classic in this Western world."—Franklin's Preface.

We need hardly remark that Franklin is here in error.

"The translation is faithful, and at the same time easy, and the learned author enriched it with very entertaining notes, explanatory of the persons and things treated of in the text."—Thos. I. Wharton's Notes on the Proviu. Lit. of Penn.: Memoirs of the Hist. Soc. of Penn., 130–133, q. v.

A review of this translation, by Rev. Dr. Joseph Buckminster, will be found in The Monthly Anthology, vol. v. 281, 340, 391. Logan also made A Translation of Cato's Distichs into English Verse, printed at Philadelphia. He also left some translations from the Greek, and some other works, in MS. Logan's charges as chief-justice were reprinted abroad, 1736, 4to, &c.

"Of singular excellence. He appears in them not only as a watchful guardian of the domestic weal and as a sagacious director, but as a profound moralist and beautiful writer. Such subtle disquisition and lofty speculation, such variety of knowledge and richness of diction, are seldom found in compositions of the kind."—Walsh's Appeal, 275, 477.

The London Quarterly exposed itself to merited ridicule and contempt by referring to this distinguished scholar as "a man of the name of Logan, as obscure as Godfrey himself;" but Blackwood displays more knowledge of the subject when it speaks of him as "a great scholar for the age,—familiar with many languages,—a good mathematician. . . . We look upon him as altogether an extraordinary man."—Jan. 1825, lixix; American Writers, No. IV.

R. Mac Ian, 1843–49, 2 vols. fol., £33 12s.; 4to, £20. Two valuable works. Of the last work a new ed. is now (1857) being published, to be completed in 24 monthly Nos. r. 4to, 3 plates in each, 7s. 6d. per number.

"This work is one of the most valuable and interesting of modern times. The portraits are painted by a veritable Highlandman,—an artist of the true stamp, who is familiar with his subjects. It is a work of no ordinary importance."—Lon. Art Union.

"The tartans given by Messrs. McIan and Logan we have ever considered, and we know that they have been always received, as the veritable patterns."—Lon. M. Post.

Logan, Capt. John. Analogia Honorum, Lon., 1677, 1724, fol. Forms part of 5th ed. of Guiliim's Display of Heraldry.

Logan, John, 1748-1788, a native of Fala, county of Edinburgh, minister of South Leith, 1773, displeased his parishioners by writing for the stage and by his intemperance, and removed to London in 1786, where he became a writer for the English Review. It is asserted that he reformed his habits before his death. 1. Michael Bruce's Poems, 1770. Several pieces in this collection are by Logan and others, and some of Bruce's are omitted. "The sermons of Logan, though not so exquisitely polished as those of Blair, possess in a higher degree the animated and passionate expression of Massillon and Atterbury."—DR. ANDERSON.

Logan was a contributor to, and a reviser of, the Psalmody of the Church of Scotland, of which the collection of translations and paraphrases was first pub. in 1781.

"Logan had the dispositions of a poetic spirit, not cast in a common mould: with fancy he combined learning, and with eloquence philosophy."—Disraeli's Calamities of Authors, ed. Lon., 1840, 82-84, q. v.

Logan, Martha, d. 1779, aged 77, of S. Carolina. Treat. on Gardening: written at the age of 70.

Logan, Sir William Edmund, b. at Montreal, L. Canada, April 23, 1798, was educated in Montreal and Edinburgh. His admirable researches during many years in the coal-field of South Wales served to place him in the first rank of geological observers. In 1842, he was appointed to take charge of a geological survey of Canada, which is yet in progress under his direction. His published works will be found in his Annual Reports of the Progress of the Canadian Survey, and in the proceedings of the British Association and the Geological Society, embracing various important memoirs on the geology of Canada and the coal-districts of New Brunswick and Pennsylvania, besides his researches in Wales. He is also a large contributor to the Geological Survey of Great Britain.

Loggan, David, 1635-1693, an engraver, a native of Dantzic, emigrated to London, and died there. 1. Oxonia Illustrata, Oxon., 1675, fol., 40 plates. 2. Cantabrigia Illustrata, Cantab., 1688, fol., 30 plates. 3. Habitus Academicorum Oxonia à Doctore ad Servientem, 11 plates fol. Loggan also engraved many portraits. "Whenever you can meet with this small volume, purchase it, Lisardo, if it be only for the sake of reading the spirited introduction prefixed to it. The author was a man (whoever he may chance to be) of no mean intellectual powers."—Dibdin's Bibliomania, ed. 1842, 301.

Dibdin quotes from signature e4 recto an excellent passage, which, we think, will remind the reader of Sir Thomas Browne; but, from the remarks at top of signature c4 recto, it is evident that he is not the author of this admirable Introduction. Lemoine (see his Hist. of Printing, p. 75) ascribes it to Thomas Gny, founder of Gny's Hospital. Dibdin notices the book at length in his ed. of More's Utopia, vol. ii. 260, 284, and gives some specimens of the Introduction. See also Lon. Athen., vol. ii. 601-604; Horne's Introd. to the Study of Bibliography, 1814, vol. ii. 735.

Londonderry, Charles William Vane, K.G., Third Marquess of, 1778-1854, Colonel of the 2d Life-Guards, 1843, was for more than half a century noted for his uncompromising advocacy of High Tory principles in the Upper and Lower Houses of Parliament. 1. Suggestions for the Improvement of the Force of the British Empire, Lon., 1805. 2. Narrative of the Peninsular War, 1803-13, 4to; 1828, 1829, 2 vols. 8vo. "Lady Londonderry describes with great spirit and elegance many interesting scenes to which ordinary travellers have no access."—JOUX BILL.

Long, George, b. at Poulton, Lancashire, 1800, graduated with great distinction at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became Fellow; Prof. of Ancient Languages in the University of Virginia, 1824–26; Prof. of the Greek Language, Literature, and Antiquities in the London University, (now University College,) 1826–31; called to the Bar, Inner Temple, 1837; Prof. of Latin at University College, 1842–46; Lecturer on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law before the Society of the Middle Temple, 1846; Classical Lecturer at Brighton College, 1849–57, (the present date.) This eminent scholar edited, for the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, the Journal of Education, 1831–35; The Penny Cyclopædia, 1832–46, 29 vols.; The Biographical Dictionary, 1842–44, 7 half-vols. to end of Letter A, (all pub.) He has also pub., in conjunction with W. Hughes, an Atlas of Classical Geography, 1855, r. 8vo, and a Grammar-School Atlas of Classical Geography, 1855, 8vo; and, in conjunction with G. R. Porter, a Geography of Great Britain, with Supp. by H. Clarke, 1850, 8vo. To Mr. Long we are also indebted for The Civil Wars of Rome: Select Lives from Plutarch, newly trans., with Notes, 1844–48, 5 vols. 12mo, (also in 5 vols. 18mo); Two Discourses in the Middle Temple Hall, on Roman Law, 1846, 8vo; and France and its Revolutions, 1850, imp. 8vo. He was the compiler of The Standard Cyclopædia of Political, Constitutional, and Forensic Knowledge, 1848, 4 vols. p. 8vo.—first pub. in another shape, under the title of The Political Dictionary,—and is now engaged, in conjunction with the Rev. Arthur John Maclean, (of Trin. Coll., Camb., and Principal of Brighton College,) in the editorship of the Bibliotheca Classica, a series of Greek and Latin authors, commenced in 1850. In this library have been pub., in addition to other works, The Orations of Cicero, with a Commentary by Professor Long, vols. i–iv. Mr. Long has also edited works of Cicero and Cæsar, (two vols. of the Grammar-School Classics pub. by George Bell, London,) and contributed a Life of the author to Wittich's Visit to the Western Coast of Normandy, 1847, 18mo. Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth, one of the most popular of modern poets, born in Portland, Maine, Feb. 27, 1807, is a son of the late Hon. Stephen Longfellow, and a descendant of William Longfellow, of Newbury, Massachusetts. This gentleman—the first of the name who came to America—was born in Hampshire, England, in 1651, emigrated to Newbury, Massachusetts, where, in 1676, he married Anne Sewall, and was drowned at Anticosti, a large desert island of Canada East, in the estuary of the St. Lawrence, in 1690. (See Joshua Coffin's Sketch of the History of Newbury, Newburyport, and West Newbury, from 1635 to 1844, Bost., S. Drake, 1845, 8vo, plates.) On the mother's side he is a descendant of John Alden, who came over in the Mayflower, and who was the first man that landed at Plymouth. He entered Bowdoin College in 1821, and graduated in 1825, after which he devoted himself for a short time to the study of the law. Having received the appointment of Professor of Modern Languages in his alma mater, he went abroad in 1826, for the purpose of enlarging his opportunities of studious application, and spent three years and a half in France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Holland, and England. In 1829 he assumed the duties of his office, and two years later became a married man. In 1835, by the resignation of George Ticknor, (the distinguished author of the History of Spanish Literature), a vacancy occurred in the faculty of Harvard College, and Mr. Longfellow was elected Professor of Belles-Lettres. A second trip to Europe was the consequence of this new appointment, and the pilgrim-scholar again enjoyed the opportunity of gratifying his thirst for the choicest productions of Continental literature among the scenes—and, in some cases, amidst the associations—to which they owed their birth. The summer of 1835 was passed in Denmark and Sweden, the autumn and winter in Holland and Germany, and the ensuing spring and summer in the Tyrol and Switzerland. Whilst residing in Rotterdam, a melancholy event occurred in Mr. Longfellow's family history, which has invested that ancient city with an undying interest in his memory. The companion of his wanderings was suddenly summoned to other and eternal scenes, and he returned home a widower. In 1842 he again visited France, Germany, and England, passing the summer at Boppard on the Rhine. In 1843 he was again married. After holding his professorship in Harvard College for about twenty years, Mr. Longfellow retired in 1854 to the undisturbed enjoyment of literary leisure; and, as he has since that period given to the world the most famous of his poetical compositions, (Hiawatha, published in 1855,) we are encouraged to hope that what Harvard University has lost by his temporary withdrawal to the world at large will gain by his retirement,—the autumn fruitage of a mind eminent for the fragrance and luxuriance of its early blossoms, and whose golden summer has not "unbeseem'd the promise of its spring." Mr. Longfellow has resided since 1837 in the "Craigie House," Cambridge, the head-quarters of General Washington after the battle of Bunker Hill, and since distinguished as the temporary residence of Edward Everett, Jared Sparks, and several others of the scholars whose profound and varied acquisitions have made the city of Boston "a name and a praise" alike in the cloisters of Oxford and in the rude hut of the backwoodsman of the Western wilds. The history of "Craigie House" has been so admirably written by Mr. George William Curtis, in his biographical sketch of Longfellow in the Homes of American Authors, that we trust all admirers of the author of the Golden Legend (and their name is Legion) will not rest until they have made themselves familiar with this charming narration.

Mr. Longfellow first sought the road to public honours by pursuing the beaten path, time out of mind the highway of trembling and unconfirmed authorship,—contribution to the literary periodicals, which on every side tempt unfledged genius to make the first essay of its pinions on the uncertain atmosphere of popular appreciation. We have spoken of the "early blossoms" of Longfellow's genius,—the promise of its "spring;" and no one will quarrel with the phrase who remembers that the seven Earlier Poems, included between pages 20 and 23 of the first vol. of the last collective ed. of the author's Poetical Works, (Boston, 1857,) were all written before the poet was nineteen years of age. The titles of these are as follows: I. An April Day. II. Autumn. III. Woods in Winter. IV. Hymn of the Moravian Nuns at Bethlehem. V. Sunrise on the Hills. VI. The Spirit of Poetry. VII. Burial of the Minnisink. Many of his juvenile poems were originally published in the United Literary Gazette, a Boston Magazine; and at a later day, when success had increased his confidence in his own powers, he contributed a number of admirable papers to the North American Review,—that priceless repository of so many of the best thoughts of the best minds of the most highly-educated portion of the American Republic. Among these papers of our young author may be noticed the Essay on Sir Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy; and one on the Moral and Devotional Poetry of Spain, which first introduced to the public the reviewer's translation of Don Jorge Manrique's sublime Ode on the death of his father. Having thus seen Mr. Longfellow fairly committed to a literary career, and abundantly encouraged by critical judgment and popular favour to pursue that career with the brightest hopes of merited distinction, it is now proper that we should proceed to present a list of the volumes of prose and poetry which he has from time to time given to the world, accompanied with quotations from the opinions of eminent authorities respecting the merits of these publications.

I. COPLAS DE DON JORGE MANRIQUE. Translated from the Spanish, with an Introductory Essay on the Moral and Devotional Poetry of Spain. Bost., 1833, 12mo.

"Professor Longfellow's version is well calculated to give the English reader a correct notion of the Castilian bard, and, of course, a very exaggerated one of the literary culture of the age."—Prestcott's Hist. of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, 11th ed., Bost., 1856, ii. 231, n.; and see the text.

Sanchez, 1598. Edition très-rare, inconnue à M. Brunet! —Salua.

2. OUTRE-MER: A PILGRIMAGE BEYOND THE SEA, N. York, 1835, 2 vols. Sale to April, 1857, 7,500 copies.

"Snelling writes well in his way. He cannot help doing so. He appears to us a man of a trulent genius desperately ill disciplined. What a contrast to Longfellow! This writer—not unknown here as the author of Outre-Mer—comes nearer to a literary character than most of his associates. [In the Boston Book.] A professor of modern tongues in Harvard University, it is said; not of unknown tongues, we presume, though we were just about to call him an Irvingite. We speak in the literary acceptance, not theological. We cannot say that he imitates the author of the Sketch-Book: he has a spirit of his own. But it seems to us that his mind is much of the same description. He is sprightly, and witty, and graphic: he has seen much of the world, and used his opportunities well. There is an elegant ease in his style,—finished, but not finical; just the thing,—as we say of a private gentleman whose manners and dress excite no other remark, while they satisfy all who observe them. And, what! he has the genial bonhomme of Irving. He sees the pleasant side of things. He likes that his reader should be innocently pleased, and is content if he be so. If Longfellow, in a word, had come before Irving, his fame would be that of a founder of a school (so far as America is concerned) rather than of one of the scholars. As it is, he may be popular, but not famous; and he will hardly have credit even for what he is worth."—Lon. Athenæum, 1838, 389; Review of the Boston Book, edited by B. B. Thatcher. Bost., 1837, 12mo.

"His rich and poetical and yet graphic description, and the true feeling with which he locks on nature and on social life, are the qualities which most attract us in his writings, because they are not precisely those in which travellers are most apt to abound."—O. W. B. PEABODY: N. Amer. Rev., xxxix. 450-467; Review of Nos. 1 and 11, pub. in Boston, 1833-34.

3. HYPERION; A ROMANCE, N. York, 1839, 2 vols. 12mo. Sale to April, 1857, 14,500 copies.

"We shall never forget the circumstance of its first perusal. We took it, as our pocket-companion, with us on our first walk down the Tweed, by Peebles, Inverleithen, Clovenfod, Ashestiel, and Abbotsford. It was fine at any special bend of the stream, or any beautiful spot along its brink, taking it out and fuding in it a conductor to our own surcharged emotions. In our solitude we felt, We are not alone, for these pages can sympathize with us! The course of Hyperion, indeed, is that of a river, winding at its own sweet will, now laughing and singing to itself in its sparkling progress, and now slumbering in still, deep pools; here laving corn-fields and vineyards, and there lost to wooded and sounding glens. Interest it has much,—incident, little: its charm is partly in the 'Excelsior' progress of the hero's mind, partly in the sketches of the great German authors, and principally in the sparkling imagery and waving, billowy language of the book. Longfellow in this work is Jean Paul Richter without his grotesque extravagancies, or riotous humour, or turbulent force."—Giffillan's Second Gallery of Literary Portraits, 2d ed., Edin., 1852, 254-264.

"It is a book for minds attuned to sentiments of tenderness,—minds of an imaginative turn, and willing and ready to interest themselves in reveries as gorgeous as morning dreams, and in the delicate perceptions of art and poetry.—minds tried by suffering, and sensitively alive to the influence of the beautiful. . . . In tender and profound feeling, and in brilliancy of imagery, the work will bear a comparison with the best productions of romantic fiction which English literature can boast."—C. C. FELTON: N. Amer. Rev., i. 145-161.

"The production of a man of taste, refinement, and feeling: in truth, a pure poem."—Oakley's ed. of Kent and King's Outlines of a Course of English Reading, N. York, 1853, 108.

See also South. Lit. Mess., v. 839.

4. VOICES OF THE NIGHT, Cambridge, Mass., 1839, 16mo. Sale to April, 1857, 43,000 copies. The title Voices of the Night is applied to eight poems, most of which were originally pub. in The New York Knickerbocker, viz.: I. Hymn to the Night. II. A Psalm of Life. III. The Reaper and the Flowers. IV. The Light of Stars. V. Footsteps of Angels. VI. Flowers. VII. The Belaguered City. VIII. Midnight Mass for the Dying Year. But this vol. contains, in addition to the Voices of the Night, a number of the author's early poems and some translations from modern languages. From a notice of this vol. in the North American Review for Jan. 1840 (l. 266-269) we quote the following lines:

"The poetry of Mr. Longfellow is marked by a very vivid imagination, great susceptibility to the impressions of natural scenery, and a ready perception of the analogies between natural objects and the feelings of the human heart. But, besides this, he possesses an extraordinary command over the powers of language, and turns it to any form at will,—

'Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.'

See also Chris. Exam., xxviii. 242.

5. BALLADS, AND OTHER POEMS, Camb., Mass., 1841, 16mo. Sale to April, 1857, 40,000 copies.

"Mr. Longfellow's poetry has become so generally known, and, wherever known, is so universally admired, as to need no aid from the journals of literature. It is probably read and remembered in places 'beyond the solar road' over which the literary journals travel. It is, therefore, with no expectation of adding to its widespread renown, or of increasing the number of its admirers, that we call our readers' attention to this second volume from Professor Longfellow's pen."—C. C. FELTON: N. Amer. Rev., iv. 14-144.

Mr. Poe, in a review of this volume in his Literati, finds fault with Mr. Longfellow for what most critics have deemed worthy of high commendation:

"He regards the inculcation of a moral as essential. . . . In common with all who claim the sacred title of poet, he should limit his endeavours to the creation of novel moods of beauty, in form, in colour, in sound, in sentiment; for over all this wide range has the poetry of words dominion. To what the world terms prose may be safely and properly left all else. The artist who doubts of this thesis may always resolve his doubt by the single question, 'Might not this matter be as well or better handled in prose?' If it may, then it is no subject for the Muse. In the general acceptance of the term Beauty we are content to rest.—In being careful only to suggest that, in our peculiar views, it must be understood as inclusive of the sublime. Of the pieces which constitute the present volume there are not more than one or two thoroughly fulfilling the ideas we have proposed: although the volume, as a whole, is by no means so chargeable with didacticism as Mr. Longfellow's previous book, [Voices of the Night.] We would mention, as poems nearly true, The Village Blacksmith, The Wreck of the Hesperus, and especially The Skeleton in Armour."

It is impossible to avoid the reflection that, if the "inculcation of a moral" be sufficient to invalidate any claim to the title of a poet, the world has been greatly mistaken in their estimate of Shakspeare, Milton, Dante, Tasso, — and, indeed, almost all of the greatest of those whom we have heretofore ignorantly revered as true poets.

6. POEMS ON SLAVERY, Camb., Mass., 1842, 12mo. 7. THE SPANISH STUDENT; A PLAY, 1843, 12mo. Sale to April, 1857, 38,000 copies.

"The diction is easy and animated, and the story comes out distinctly enough. There are, to be sure, useless scenes, and instances of vain repetition, which render the action languid; but this, in the closest, interferes little with the interest."—Lon. Athen., 1844, 8.

"The Spanish Student is a spirited composition, well conceived, and abounding in pretty passages. . . . The first part of the first scene embodies an excellent satire on many of the insipid comedies of the present time; and the frequent erudite allusion to Spanish songs, fables, and authors which are made throughout its pages furnish abundant evidence of the author's great familiarity with Spanish literature. The plot is interesting, and many of the incidents show much ingenuity; but it is not adapted to the stage, being deficient in many of the essential requisites to make it palatable as an acting drama."—Irish Quar. Rev., June, 1855, 202.

"Upon the whole, we regret that Professor Longfellow has written this work, and feel especially vexed that he has committed himself by its republication. Only when regarded as a mere poem can it be said to have merit of any kind. For, in fact, it is only when we separate the poem from the drama that the passages we have commended as beautiful can be understood to have beauty. We are not sure, indeed, that a 'dramatic poem' is not a flat contradiction in terms. At all events, a man of true genius (and such Mr. L. unquestionably is) has no business with these hybrid and paradoxical compositions. Let a poem be a poem only; let a play be a play and nothing more. As for The Spanish Student, its thesis is unoriginal; its incidents are antique; its plot is no plot; its characters have no character; in short, it is little better than a play upon words to style it 'A Play' at all."—Poe's Liberator.

As the critic had just quoted from Mr. Longfellow's Preface, which informs the reader of the sources of the subject of the production which follows, it was quite unnecessary to assure us that the "thesis was unoriginal." Certainly it is unoriginal; the thesis of The Golden Legend is unoriginal, also; and so is that of Reynard the Fox. Such comments add little to our stock of knowledge. As regards instances of alleged imitations, &c. of other authors, which Mr. Poe produces from portions of Mr. Longfellow's works, it does not, of course, become us to offer any opinion; but, upon the subject of literary coincidences in general, we may be allowed to remark that to require a scholar who has mastered the choicest productions of half a dozen or more languages to discharge his mind of all foreign acquisitions and place them in a corner of his library, whilst he proceeds to compose from a mind in puris naturalibus, is about as wise as the expectation that the lake of the valley should be able, at the word of command, to reconvert itself into the insignificant mountain-stream to which it owes its origin.

"In The Spanish Student, the affluence of his imagination in images of grace, grandeur, and beauty is most strikingly manifested. The objection to it as a play is its lack of skill or power in the dramatic exhibition of character; but read merely as a poem cast in the form of a dialogue it is one of the most beautiful in American literature. None of his other pieces so well illustrates all his poetical qualities,—his imagination, his fancy, his sentiment, and his manner. It seems to comprehend the whole extent of his genius."—Whipple's Essays and Reviews, Bost., 1851, l. 66.

8. THE BELFRY OF BRUGES, and other Poems, Camb., Mass., 1846, 16mo. Sale to April, 1857, 38,000 copies. 9. EVANGELINE; A TALE OF ACADE, Bost., 1847, 12mo. Sale to April, 1857, 37,000 copies.

"Next to Excelsior and the Psalms of Life we are disposed to rank Evangeline. Indeed, as a work of art, it is superior to both, and to all that Longfellow has written in verse. . . . Nothing can be more truly conceived or more tenderly expressed than the picture of that primitive Nova Scotia and its warm-hearted, hospitable, happy, and pious inhabitants. We feel the air of the Forest world around us. The light of the Golden Age—itsself joy, music, and poetry—is shining above. There are evenings of summer or autumnide so exquisitely beautiful, so complete in their own charms, that the entrance of the moon is felt almost as a painful and superfluous addition: it is like a candle dispelling the weird, darkness of a twilight room. So we feel at first as if Evangeline, when introduced, were an excess of loveliness,—an amiable eclipser of the surrounding beauties. But even as the moon by-and-by vindicates her intrusion and creates her own 'holier day,' so with the delicate and lovely heroine of this simple story; she becomes the centre of the entire scene."—Giffillan's Second Gallery of Literary Portraits, 2d ed., Lon., 1852, 260-261.

Mr. Giffillan says many handsome things of Mr. Longfellow's minor poems, &c., which commendations the reader should not fail to peruse.

"With the sorrows of Evangeline a simpler rhythm would have been more in harmony,—were even the antique measure here selected completely bent to its modern occupation. This, however, is not the case. . . . The pilgrimage of the maiden in search of her betrothed is told with great feeling and pathos. But the real charm of the tale lies in its insulated pictures of scenery, one or two of which we will give."—Lon. Athen., 1848, 673.

"Evangeline, as almost all of our readers are aware, is one of the most pathetic and beautiful poetical narrations which has ever enriched our language. The pastoral scenes are lifelike daguerreotypes: there is an originality about the story of the lovers, and an appropriate solemnity of language throughout the whole piece, which, added to the beautiful descriptions which lie scattered among its pages, and the apposite comparisons which stud them, render it a truly fascinating if not enchanting poem. The most remarkable tale of passionate and constant love must pale its ineffectual fires at the recital of the devotion of Evangeline and the heroic constancy of her lover. Sir Edwin Landseer may well envy the ensuing pastoral sketch:

"Under the sycamore-tree were lives overhung by a pent-house, &c."

[Quoted to the end of the line concluding with "sang of mutation."—Irish Quar. Rev., June, 1855, 202-203.

"This is an American poem, full of beauties of real indigenous growth; and we hail its appearance with the greater satisfaction inasmuch as it is the first genuine Castalian fount which has burst from the soil of America."—Fraser's Mag., xxxvii, 295; copied in Bost. Living Age, xvii, 145-147.

"His longest poem, Evangeline, . . . was not long since warmly commended in these pages. No one with any pretensions to poetic feeling can read its delicious portraiture of rustic scenery, and of a mode of life long since defunct, without the most intense delight."—The Metropolitan; copied in Bost. Living Age, xix, 481-485.

"It is a tale of simple earnestness, very graceful, and, amid its unexaggerated truthfulness, animated by a tranquil and lofty spirit of endurance. . . . The interest, in Evangeline, throughout her devoted, life-prolonged search, kept up without intermission; and what is painful in the theme is relieved by beautiful sketches of the scenery of the Southwestern waters and the busy lives of their inhabitants. . . . The happy and varied imagery of the poem is throughout interwrought with that higher spirit which can impart a sad pleasure even to the deepest tragedy."—Lon. Examiner; copied in Bost. Liv. Age, xxiii, 390-391.

Mr. C. C. Felton, one of the most eminent of American classical scholars, after giving us a brief sketch of the history of Acadie, remarks:

"This subject, wholly national in its character, Mr. Longfellow has made the basis of the poem of Evangeline. He has selected those circumstances in the story which are susceptible of poetical treatment, and so combined them as to create, from authentic historical materials, a tale of rare beauty, tenderness, and moral power. . . . In Evangeline, Mr. Longfellow has managed the hexameter with wonderful skill. The homely features of Acadian life are painted with Homeric simplicity, while the luxuriance of a Southern climate is magnificently described with equal fidelity and minuteness of finish. The subject is eminently fitted for this treatment; and Mr. Longfellow's extraordinary command over rhythmical resources of language has enabled him to handle it certainly with as perfect a mastery over the dactylic hexameter as any one has ever acquired in our language."—N. Amer. Rev., lvi, 215-244.

"His Evangeline is a beautiful picture of rural life and love, which, from the charm of its pictures and the gentle harmony of its sentiment, became popular although written in hexameters."—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit.

"Elaborate and touching, his Evangeline is the most perfect specimen extant of the rhythm and melody of the English hexameter."—PRESIDENT CHAS. KING: Oakley's ed. of Kent and King's Outlines of a Course of English Reading, N. York, 98.

The subject of English hexameters has already come under our notice on a preceding page, (635.), and it will be sufficient to refer the reader to our article on ABRAHAM FRANCE and the authorities there cited. The critic in Blackwood (Feb. 1856) concludes his notice of Hiawatha with the remark:

"The poet was more successful in the wistfulness of his Evangeline, to which even these lengthened, desolate, inquiring hexameters lent a charm of appropriate sympathy; but it is a peculiarity of this sweet singer that his best strains are always wistful, longing, true voices of the night."

See other notices of Evangeline, in Amer. Whig Rev., vii, 155, (by G. W. Peck); New Englander, vi, 548, (by G. H. Holliston); Univ. Quar. Rev., v, 104, (by T. S. King); Brownson's Quar. Rev., 2d ser., iv, 56; South. Lit. Mess., xv, 46; Amer. Lit. Mag., ii, 172; Eccl. Mag., xv, 96.

Of course, the admirer of Evangeline will not be satisfied to be without the beautiful picture of Evangeline painted by Thomas Faed and engraved by James Faed: size of plate, without margin, 14 by 17½ inches:

"Sat by some nameless grave, and though that perhaps in its bosom

He was already at rest; and she longed to slumber beside him."

This has received the highest compliment which the painter and engraver could covet:

"I am delighted with the work, both in conception and execution, and have written to Mr. Faed to express my acknowledgment for this mark of his consideration and my appreciation of the very great beauty and feeling of his illustration."—Letter of Mr. Longfellow to the publishers.

10. KAVANAGH; A TALE, Bost., 1849, 16mo. Sale to April, 1857, 10,500 copies.

Kavanagh is, as far as it goes, an exact daguerreotype of New England life. We say daguerreotype, because we are conscious of a certain absence of motion and colour which detract somewhat from the vivacity, though not from the truth, of the representation. From Mr. Pendexter, with his horse and chaise, to Miss Manchester, painting the front of her horse, the figures are faithfully after nature. The story, too, is remarkably sweet and touching.

All who love purity of tone, tenderness, and picturesque simplicity have incurred a new obligation to the author of Kavanagh.—J. RUSSELL LOWELL: N. Amer. R. v., LIX, 196-216.

In this paper will be found some very sensible comments upon the oft-repeated and seldom-comprehended phrase, "a national literature." See also Mr. Lowell's remarks on the same subject in his review of The Timon, N. Amer. Rev., lxiv, 460, et seq. Mr. Longfellow himself, it will be remembered, has also written eloquently upon this theme; and, we may say, since the publication of Hiawatha he has written eloquently upon the other side of the question also. We should refer the reader to Mr. Longfellow's comments on "A National Literature" in the Preface to his Poets and Poetry of Europe.

Kavanagh is essentially Richter's, yet with a difference. The sharpness of touch, the incessant revelations of stoical character, which break through the fantastic waywardness of Richter, are not here. On the other hand, it has nothing of the conscious effort which sometimes characterizes Richter's wit,—nothing of the indulgence in sheer dirt which he mingles so harshly with passages of dreaming, ethereal purity.—Lon. Examiner; (copied in Bost. Liv. Age, xxiii, 389-390.)

11. THE SEASIDE AND THE FIRESIDE, Bost., 1849, 16mo. Sale to April, 1857, 30,000 copies.

The Seaside collection contains seven poems; the Fireside collection is composed of thirteen poems. See a review of this volume in Brownson's Quar. Rev., 2d ser., iv, 268. Since the publication of this vol. the author has pub. a number of minor poems in Putnam's (New York) Magazine.

12. THE GOLDEN LEGEND, Bost., 1851, 12mo. Sale to April, 1857, 17,000 copies.

In this poem he has obeyed the highest humanity of the poet's calling, by revealing,—which alone the poet can,—not coldly, but in the glowing and affluent reality of life, this truth: that the same human heart has throbb'd in all ages and under all circumstances, and that the devotion of love is forever and ever from the beginning the true salvation of man. To this great and fundamental value of the poem is added all the dramatic precision of the most accomplished artist. The art is so subtly concealed that it is not suspected.—GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS: Sketch of Longfellow, in Homes of Amer. Poets, 284.

"We have no hesitation in expressing our opinion that there is nearly as much fine poetry in Mr. Longfellow's Golden Legend as in the celebrated drama of Goethe. . . . Elsie, the firmer's daughter,—sincerely more than a child in years, but a woman in tenderness and devotion,—is as beautiful a conception as ever was formed in the mind of the poet. . . . We have already, at the commencement of this paper, expressed our decided objection to the machinery employed by Mr. Longfellow. It is the reverse of original, being now very hackneyed; and it is absurdly disproportionate to the object for which it is introduced. . . . Occasionally, whilst retaining rhyme and the semblance of metre, Mr. Longfellow is betrayed into great extravagance."—Blackw. Mag., Feb. 1852.

See also Eccler. Rev., 4th ser., xxxi, 455.

"Longfellow, in the Golden Legend, has entered more closely into the temper of the Monk, for good and for evil, than ever yet theological writer or historian, though they may have given their life's labour to the analysis."—Ruskin's Mod. Painters, vol. iv, p. 377.

13. THE WATF; a collection of Poems, edited by H. W. Longfellow, Bost., 1846, 12mo; Lon., 1849, 18mo. Pub. in vol. with No. 14, Bost., 1857, 12mo.

14. THE ESTRAY; a Collection of Poems, edited by H. W. Longfellow, Bost., 1846, 12mo. Pub. in vol. with No. 13, 1857, 12mo.

15. THE POETS AND POETRY OF EUROPE; with Biographical Notices and Translations from the earliest period to the present time, Phila., 1845, 8vo, pp. 779; 1848, r. 8vo; 1855, r. 8vo. This valuable volume contains selections from about three hundred and sixty authors, translated from ten languages,—the Anglo-Saxon, Icelandic, Danish, Swedish, Dutch, German, French, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese. Mr. Longfellow himself gives us translations from all of these languages but two. Among the other translators are Bowring, Felton, Herbert, Costello, Taylor, Jamieson, Brooks, Adamson, Thorpe, &c.

"In this great crowd of translations by different hands, certainly very few appear equal to Professor Longfellow's in point of fidelity, elegance, and finish. The work is an honourable memorial of his great attainments as a linguist,—in which character, rather than as a poet, his fame will be sustained and advanced by this publication."—PROF. FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lxi, 231.

"We think Professor Longfellow has done a good service to literature by preparing this work. It contains a great deal of valuable information respecting the different languages of Europe, as well as of the various writers of poetry. The extracts from the authors are sufficiently numerous and lengthy to give a fair idea of the peculiarities, style, and class of each. . . . Instead of decrying such selections on the ground that they give us only a smattering of the authors and their writings, we hail them as most powerful helps in disseminating information and creating and increasing a taste for mental cultivation."—Prot. Epis. Quar. Rev. and Church Register, N. York, April, 1855, 310-311.

See also Lon. Athen., 1845, 961-962.

We should be pleased to see a second volume of this work, according to the suggestion of the learned editor. As we have had occasion to refer to Mr. Longfellow's translations,—we speak not only of those in the volume just noticed,—we must quote a few lines more upon the subject:

"Longfellow's translations from the German, Swedish, Spanish, French, Dutch, Italian, and Anglo-Saxon possess in a very high degree that elegance of diction and thoroughly classical colouring for which all his other poems are remarkable."—Irish Quar. Rev., June, 1855, 202.

"Professor Longfellow excels in translating from the German and the Swedish."—Lon. Athen., 1844, 8.

The North American reviewer of Longfellow's Voices of the Night (1839, 16mo) remarks that the "Translations from the French, Anglo-Saxon, Danish, and German are all executed with a high degree of skill."—Vol. I, 269.

But Mr. Longfellow's fame as an accomplished linguist is so well established that it is not necessary for us to multiply quotations on this point.

16. THE SONG OF HIAWATHA, Bost., Oct. 1855, 16mo. Sale, in less than four weeks after publication, 10,000 copies; sale to end of March, 1857, 30,000 copies; to April, 1857, 50,000 copies.

"This Indian Edda—if I may so call it—is founded on a tradition prevalent among the North American Indians, of a personage of miraculous birth, who was sent among them to clear their rivers, forests, and fishing-grounds and to teach them the arts of peace. He was known among different tribes by the several names of Michaboa, Chiabo, Manabozo, Tarenyawagan, and Hiawatha. Mr. Schoolcraft gives an account of him in his Alpic Recarvels, vol. i, p. 134; and in his History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States, Part 3, p. 314, may be found the Iroquois form of the tradition, derived from the verbal narrations of an Onondaga chief.

"Into this old tradition I have woven other curious Indian legends, drawn chiefly from the various and valuable writings of Mr. Schoolcraft, to whom the literary world is greatly indebted for his indefatigable zeal in rescuing from oblivion so much of the legendary lore of the Indians.

"The scene of the poem is among the Ojibways, on the southern shore of Lake Superior, in the region between the Pictured Rocks and the Grand Sable."—Note to Hiawatha.

Notwithstanding this full and explicit statement by Mr. Longfellow of the sources from which he had derived the material of his poem, a writer in the National Intelligencer (Washington, D.C.) pub. an article, in a few weeks after the appearance of Hiawatha, charging the author with having borrowed "the entire form, spirit, and many of the most striking incidents" of Kalevala, the great national epic of the Finns. This attack was answered in two letters in The New York Observer, (Jan. 24, 1856, et ante), under the signature of Theodorus. The reviewer remarks, "Such a charge is not only untenable, but absurd," and proceeds to expose the alleged absurdity of which he complains. William Howitt, in a letter to the London Athenæum, Nov. 17, 1855,—elicited by a review of Hiawatha in a preceding number (Nov. 10, 1855,) of that excellent journal,—eulogizes Hiawatha in the highest terms, and commends the author for having chosen the metre of the Kalevala and the Kanteletar, but says not a word of plagiarism or even of imitation. Howitt's letter elicited another, (Athen., Nov. 24, 1855,) from Mr. D. F. McCarthy, (translator of Dramas of Calderon from the Spanish), who adduces examples to prove that the metre of Hiawatha is not confined to Finlandic or Slavonic poets; and he does not think it a matter of course, therefore, that even the metre was suggested to Mr. Longfellow by any of those bards. In the same periodical for Dec. 1, 1855, Mr. W. S. takes the field, and opens the question still further, remarking that

"Rhymless trochaic dimeter is commonly used throughout Europe. . . . Mr. Longfellow, in his unalliterated bases, may with as little reason be said to imitate the metre of the 'Kalevala' or Philethes, in his rhymeless iambic trimeter catalectic version of the Divina Comedia, can be asserted to represent the music of Dante."

As usual in cases of this character, two of the critics engaged in the controversy soon fell into a misunderstanding on their own account: Mr. Howitt felt himself aggrieved by some comments of W. S.'s upon his first communication, and in the Athenæum for Dec. 8, 1855, he takes the offender to task for his alleged want of courtesy. Mr. W. S., noways abashed, returns to the charge in the Athenæum for Dec. 15, and in the same paper appears a letter from W. Brockie, who, coolly enough, commences his dissertation with—

"The question as to whether or not Longfellow's Hiawatha is in the national metre of Finland seems not unlikely to raise a controversy in your columns. W. S. says it is not: I am inclined to think it is."

It would appear to our superficial judgment that the "controversy" had been already pretty well "raised." But the end is not yet. In the Athenæum for Dec. 29, Mr. Ferdinand Freiligrath gives us a summary of the arguments advanced by the four contestants, and decides that "Hiawatha"

"is written in a modified Finnish metre,—modified by the exquisite feeling of the American poet, according to the genius of the English language and to the wants of modern taste. I feel perfectly convinced that, when Mr. Longfellow wrote Hiawatha, the sweet monotony of the trochees of Finland, and not the mellow and melodious fall of those of Spain, vibrated in his soul."

From Mr. Freiligrath's intimate acquaintance with Von Schröter's Finnische Runen (Finnisch und Deutsch, Stuttgart und Tübingen, 1834) and the Kalevala, surely he would have been the one to detect any close imitations on the part of the American poet; but nothing of this kind is intimated. The London Leader also took a part in the Hiawatha controversy, and Dr. Latham, in a letter to that paper, considers that Mr. Longfellow received many suggestions (as stated by the writer in the National Intelligencer) from Kalevala; but the editor of the Leader takes an entirely different view of the subject, defends the author of Hiawatha manfully, and dismisses the whole matter with the comment:

"In Longfellow's case the obligation to Kalevala is assumed: it is very possibly no direct obligation at all; but, granting the obligation, we entirely absolve the poet for not having mentioned it."

Now, it is evident that Dr. Schoolcraft himself is the best judge whether the author of Hiawatha has faithfully reproduced in poetry those peculiarities of Indian mythology, customs, and superstitions which Dr. Schoolcraft has given us in prose,—on which prose Longfellow avowedly bases his poem. To him, therefore, let us have recourse for the solution of this question. We quote from his dedication of The Myth of Hiawatha and other Oral Legends, Mythologic and Allegoric, of the North American Indians, Phila. and Lon., 1856, 12mo:

"In Professor Henry Wadsworth Longfellow,

"SIR:—Permit me to dedicate to you this volume of Indian myths and legends, derived from the story-telling circle of the native wigwams. That they indicate the possession, by the Yes- peric tribes, of mental resources of a very characteristic kind,—furnishing, in fact, a new point from which to judge the race and to excite intellectual sympathies,—you have most felicitously shown in your poem of Hiawatha. Not only so, but you have demonstrated, by this pleasing series of pictures of Indian life, sentiment, and invention, that the use of the native lore reveals one of the true sources of our literary independence. Greece and Rome, England and Italy, have so long furnished, if they have not exhausted, the field of poetic culture, that it is at least refreshing to find, both in theme and metre, something new.

"Very truly, yours,

"HENRY R. SCHOOLCRAFT."

This certainly puts forever at rest the charge of the author of Hiawatha having borrowed—as has been alleged—"the form, spirit, and many of the most striking incidents of Kalevala." If these are dissimilar to those so graphically depicted by Dr. Schoolcraft, this gentleman could not endorse, as he has done, the faithfulness of Longfellow's poetical version of the latter: the admixture of foreign colours would necessarily destroy the vraisemblance of the whole picture. And if the Kalevala's "form, spirit, and incidents" are so exactly similar to the original Hiawatha characteristics, we see no necessity for borrowing the former, and no possibility of detecting their incorporation if they were borrowed. It is a very natural remark, that the author who first makes popular a peculiar style or measure must expect to be charged with plagiarism by the ignoramus who makes the wonderful discovery that such style or measure did not originate with the writer through whose agency it became known to him.

Having thus devoted quite as much space as we can afford to an examination of the paternity of Hiawatha, and recommitted this interesting aborigine to the domicile of the elminant whose name he bears, it is proper that we should inquire what impression he has made upon the many thousands in whose libraries and parlours he has become an intimate during his wanderings in his native country and in strange lands.

"Longfellow's epic," says a critic in Das Ausland, "is undoubtedly the most considerable poem which has appeared for some years in the English language. Its success has been unexampled on both sides of the Atlantic. In London the book has been twice reprinted; and, although we ordered it immediately after its publication, we were only able to secure a copy of the fourth edition. It was certainly a happy thought to gather the legends of the tawny aborigines of North America together in a great poem."

But this reviewer by no means accedes to Hiawatha unmixed commendation: he objects to portions of the plot, and to the measure.

"The tale itself is beautiful, fanciful, and new, and he has worked it up into a poem of many parts. . . . He has produced, in an imaginary memoir of the hero, Hiawatha, a picture of Indian life as it exists in the forest and by the river, full of light and colour, repose and action. . . . It is beyond all doubt that this Song of Hiawatha will increase Mr. Longfellow's reputation as a singer. The verse, as we have said and proved by extract, is sweet and simple, is full of local and national colour, has a tone and ring of its own: in a word, the story of Hiawatha is the poet's most original production."

—Lon. Athenæum, Nov. 10, 1855, 1295; and see p. 1359.

"This Song is a quaint chant, a happy illustration of manners; but it lacks all the important elements which go to the making of a poem. We are interested, pleased, attracted, yet perfectly indifferent: the measure haunts the ear, but not the matter; and we care no more for Hiawatha, and are as little concerned for the land of the Ojibweys, as if America's best minstrel had never made a song."—Blackwood's Mag., Feb. 1856.

But audi alteram partem: after an enthusiastic eulogy on Hiawatha in the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine for Jan. 1856, the critic concludes with—

"Henceforth the Ojibway and the Dacotah are to us realities,—men of like passions with ourselves. In our own dear mother-tongue their sweet singer Nawadaha has spoken to us, and the voice has gone direct from his heart to ours."

"Hiawatha may be taken as an accurate representation of Indian manners and superstitions artistically treated and poetically adorned."—Lon. Spectator.

"Mr. Longfellow's reputation will, we think, be raised by the Song of Hiawatha: it is by far, in our judgment, the most original of all his productions."—Lon. Examiner.

"If Mr. Longfellow had enriched the literature of his country with nothing save The Song of Hiawatha, he would deserve the poet's bays for this elaborate and most successful attempt to give to that literature a strong individuality, peculiar to the land where the red man once "hunted the bison and the beaver," the home of the Indian, whose sire the sun was, and the earth his mother."—Home Journal, (N. York.)

"We think it is his greatest work. It is the most absorbing work of its length we have ever read."—National Intelligencer, (Washington, D.C.)

The Liverpool Albion remarks that every succeeding effort of Longfellow is better than the last, and that Hiawatha is to be an immortal poem.

"Longfellow is the most accomplished poet of the day. Hiawatha is unquestionably his ablest work. . . . Every scene the Indian hero traverses in his allegorical progress is a breathing landscape, every adventure he meets with a capital story. . . . The episode of Hiawatha's Wooing, which we quoted in our last week's number, is one of the finest in the volume. It is a delicious love-story, and would, without the slightest context, make the fortune of any poet. . . . Of the legends themselves that Mr. Longfellow has collected, their possible origin, and interest as relating to other mythologies, we have no time to speak. We must content ourselves with an expression of unqualified approval of the manner in which they have been collected, digested, and set to the most exquisite music."—Lon. Illustrated Times.

As regards this "most exquisite music" there are very different opinions:

"Anybody who has read the five thousand and odd verses of Hiawatha has certainly had enough of this epic metre, which very soon becomes as tiresome to the ear as the tune of a barrel-organ."—Das Ausland.

"We have often had occasion," says the London Leader, "to remark on the careful study of our recent literature displayed in its criticisms of English authors by the Revue des Deux Mondes. The last number contains an article on Longfellow's Hiawatha, remarkable for subtle insight into the peculiar character of the poem, and genial criticism of its special merits. The writer, M. Emile Montégut, shows a thorough appreciation of the poetic substance and form of Longfellow's Indian legend scarcely to be expected in a foreigner, and least of all in a Frenchman. He pronounces Hiawatha to be the most finished poem Longfellow has produced. Of the metre he says:

"The melody of the verse, rapid and monotonous, is like the voice of nature, which never fatigues us though continually repeating the same sound. Two or three notes compose the whole music of the poem, melodious and limited as the song of a bird." Describing the general character of Hiawatha, he says, "The feeling for nature that pervades the poem is at once most refined and most familiar. The poet knows how to give, as a modern, voices to all the inanimate objects of nature: he knows the language of the birds, he understands the murmur of the wind amongst the leaves, he interprets the voices of the running streams, and yet, notwithstanding this poetic subtlety, he never turns aside to minute description, nor attempts to prolong, by reflection, the emotion excited. His poem, made with exquisite art, has thus a double character: it is Homeric from the precision, simplicity, and familiarity of its images, and modern from the vivacity of its impressions and from the lyrical spirit that breathes in every page."

The London Athenæum, after giving copious extracts, remarks:

"The Song of Hiawatha moves throughout in this beautiful and simple measure. Except in good hands, an instrument so artless would most likely fail. The line would tire on the ear. But Mr. Longfellow has contrived to give variety even to a measure evidently chosen for its sad and tender monotony: . . . despite its sameness of cadence, it scarcely palls on the ear even at the five thousandth verse."—Nov. 10, 1855, L295.

"Unhappily for the poet, this is the very measure to attract the parodist. Punch has opened the assault, and we will not venture to predict how many gleeful voices may echo his good-humoured mockery before the year is out. The jingle of this measure is irresistible, and, with a good vocabulary of any savage language at one's elbow, one feels a pleasing confidence that the strain might spin on forever, and almost make itself."—Blackw. Mag., Feb. 1856.

There have, indeed, we are sorry to say, been many parodies of Hiawatha. We have no patience with a burlesque imitation of an earnest original. Punning has been called (we say not, truly) the lowest kind of wit; but surely he who first said so forgot parodying. There was, indeed, so much true wit, so much hearty appreciation of the merits of the poet and the poem, in Punch's parody, that we could have excused it, had it not been for the baleful effects of its potent example. We cite an instance from a Boston paper of a much more agreeable evidence of the popularity of Hiawatha:

"The beautiful three-decked ship Minnehaha (named from the heroine of Longfellow's charming poem of Hiawatha) was most successfully launched about noon, on Saturday last, from Donald McKay's yard at East Boston. The occasion was one of unusual interest, and attracted a very large concourse of people, who rent the air with their huzzas as the Minnehaha gracefully glided into the 'laughing waters,' (her namesake)."

As early as Feb. 15, 1856,—four months after the first publication of Hiawatha,—a German translation by Adolph Böttger, was pub. in Leipzig. In April, 1856, another translation into German, by Ferdinand Freiligrath, was in the hands of the European public. The original poem was issued at Leipzig in January, 1856, at half a thaler, by Alphons Dürr, (for vol. xvii. of his Collection of Standard American Authors.) He notes on his title-page that Hiawatha is supplied in Rome, Vienna, Paris, Hamburg, Amsterdam, Brussels, Basle, Turin, Trieste, Venice, and Verona. We quote some other evidences of the popularity of Hiawatha:

"A PLUM FOR HIAWATHA.—Mr. Bright, in his recent speech at Manchester, commenting upon the effect of the war upon all departments of English effort, spoke of its influence upon the tone of English poetry, and contrasted Tennyson's war-lyrics with Longfellow's Hiawatha, thus:—'Take the poet-laureate as an example—[hear, hear]—a gentleman whom I have never seen or met, I believe, but once accidentally,—a gentleman of great refinement of manner and of mind, who has written poetry in our language, [hear, hear:] yet such was the pestilential influence of these scenes of carnage on a mind so accomplished and elevated as that, that he puts forth a poem which his friends are anxious should never be spoken of. I have had the opportunity lately of reading a poem from another country, written by the American poet Longfellow—[applause]—a poem which treats of the legends of the Indian tribes; and, while I have turned from the poem of our poet-laureate, in which I find him descending to slang of almost the grossest character, I turn with delight to the exquisite poem which has come to us from the other side of the Atlantic.' [Hear, hear.]"

Cardinal Wiseman some time since prefaced an enthusiastic eulogy on Longfellow (which we shall presently quote for the benefit of our readers) with the remark:

"He was a true philosopher who said, 'Let me make the songs of a nation, and I care not who makes its laws.'"

His Eminence, however, could hardly have foreseen that Longfellow's poetry would ere long be used by a ruler as an instrument to pacify a people for whom the threatenings of the law had but few terrors. We quote the narration which has elicited these remarks:

"AN APT QUOTATION.—The Leecompton (Kansas) Union of the 2d Inst. has a pleasant account of a visit recently paid by Acting Governor Stanton to the citizens of Lawrence. After partaking of the hospitalities kindly extended to him by Governor Robinson, he addressed, by request, a crowd of some five hundred free-State men, who did not hesitate to manifest disapprobation at such portions of the speech as did not accord with their peculiar political views. At the close of Mr. Stanton's speech he pictured in glowing language the Indian tradition of Hiawatha, of the 'Peace-Pipe,' 'shaped and fashioned' by 'Gitchie Manito, the Mighty,' and by which he 'called the tribes of men together,' and in his own language addressed them:—

"I have given you lands to hunt in,
I have given you streams to fish in,
I have given you bear and bison,
I have given you roe and reindeer,
I have given you brant and beaver,

Fill'd the marshes full of wild fowl,
Fill'd the river full of fishes:
Why, then, are you not contented?
Why, then, will you hunt each other?

"I am weary of your quarrels,
Weary of your wars and bloodshed,
Weary of your prayers for vengeance,
Of your wranglings and discussions:
All your strength is in your union,
All your danger is in discord;
Therefore be at peace henceforward,
And, as brothers, live together."

"The applicability of the quotation (says the Leecompton Union) was felt by the crowd, and involuntary applause burst forth from those who had murmured but a moment before."

We have not been sparing of the quotation of opinions on Hiawatha; but those who desire to pursue the subject still further can refer to the Irish Quarterly Review, Jan. 1856, and to Putnam's (New York) Magazine, Dec. 1855.

Having now concluded the list of the publications of this favorite author, it is proper that we should say a few words respecting the principal editions of his works. A beautiful illustrated collective ed. of Longfellow's Poetical Works was pub. by Carey & Hart in Philadelphia, 1845, 8vo, with engravings by J. Cheney from original pictures by Huntington. Messrs. Ticknor and Fields, of Boston,—so favourably known for their taste in getting up the best productions of American and English authors,—have been for some years Mr. Longfellow's publishers, and issue his works in single vols., or all together in 6 vols.—three of poetry and three of prose. They have within the last few months (in 1857) given to the world a beautiful edition of his Complete Works,—viz.: POEMS in 2 vols. 32mo. Contents of vol. i.: 1. Voices of the Night; 2. Earlier Poems; 3. Translations; 4. Ballads, and other Poems; 5. Poems on Slavery; 6. The Spanish Student; 7. The Belfry of Bruges, and other Poems; 8. The Seaside and the Fireside. Contents of vol. ii.: 1. Evangeline; 2. The Golden Legend; 3. Hiawatha. PROSE WORKS, 2 vols. 32mo,—viz.: Contents of vol. i.: 1. Outre-Mer, a Pilgrimage beyond the Sea; 2. Drift-Wood, a Collection of Essays. Contents of vol. ii.: 1. Hyperion, a Romance; 2. Kavanagh, a Tale. The circulation of this beautiful edition, which is sold at the trifling price of seventy-five cents per vol., will undoubtedly be very large. We recapitulate the figures which we have affixed to the titles of Longfellow's productions.

Total sale in America of Longfellow's Works to April, 1857...325,550

What the sale has been in Europe we have no means of knowing; but, as Longfellow is the most popular poet in America, undoubtedly he enjoys the same pre-eminence in Great Britain. If this assertion amaze the reader, we shall strengthen it a little, and are very safe in affirming that there is no living poet on either side of the water who makes even a distant approach to Longfellow's popularity. Within the last few years the English eds. of his Works have been issued by the following publishers: 1. Bickers; 2. Bogue; 3. Chapman; 4. Clarke; 5. Dickinson; 6. Gilpin; 7. Houlston; 8. Knight & Son; 9. Gall & Inglis; 10. Nelson; 11. Routledge; 12. Simpkin; 13. Slater; 14. Tegg; 15. Theobald; 16. Whittaker; 17. Kent & Richards; 18. Walker. Among the eds. put forth by these publishers deserving of particular notice are: 1. Poetical Works, "containing 34 pieces not in any other illustrated ed.," illustrated by John Gilbert. 100 plates, with a portrait after Lawrence, 1855, p. 4to, £1 1s.; pub. by Routledge. 2. Poetical Works, illustrated by Birket Foster, and others; last ed., 1856, 8vo, £1 1s.; pub. by Bogue. 3. Poems, with Essay by Gilfillan, (Liverpool,) 1850, sq., 5s. 6d.; gilt, 6s. 6d.; mor. extra, 10s.; pub. by Simpkin. 4. Voices of the Night, illustrated by a Lady, 1850, 4to, 10s. 6d.; pub. by Dickinson. 5. Voices of the Night, illustrated, 1852, 8vo, 15s.; pub. by Bogue. 6. Evangeline, illustrated, 1849, p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1852, p. 8vo, 10s. 6d.; pub. by Bogue. 7. Evangeline, illustrated by John Gilbert, engravings by Dalziel Brothers, 1856, med. 8vo, 7s. 6d.; pub. by Routledge. 8. Golden Legend, illustrated with 50 engravings, 1855, cr. 8vo, 12s.; mor. 21s.; pub. by Bogue. 9. Song of Hiawatha, illustrated by John Gilbert, 1856, 2s. 6d.; gilt, 3s.; pub. by Routledge. 10. Prose Works,—viz.: I. Outremer; II. Hyperion; III. Kavanagh; new ed., all in 1 vol. sq., 6s.; pub. by Bogue. 11. Hyperion, with illustrations, 1852, sq., 3s. 6d.; pub. by Bogue. 12. Prose Works, by Gilfillan, 1857, 12mo, 4s.; pub. by Bickers. Nor should we omit to notice the beautiful "Christmas Present," pub. by Boosey & Sons, of Holles Street, (1857, 12mo, £1 3s.) containing Fourteen of Longfellow's Songs, set to Music by Balie, as introduced at all the principal Concerts of the Season by Miss Dolby, Miss Huddart, Mr. Sims Reeve, and Herr Reichardt. Contents: 1. Two Locks of Hair, Song; 2. The Village Blacksmith, Song; 3. The Rainy Day, Song; 4. Stars of the Summer Night, Serenade; 5. The Arrow and the Song, Song; 6. The Happiest Land, Song; 7. Good-Night, Beloved, Serenade; 8. Annie of Tharaw, Song; 9. The Reaper and the Flowers, Song; 10. This is the Place, Ballad; 11. The Green Trees, Ballad; 12. The Day is Done, Song; 13. Trust her not, Duett; 14. Excelsior, Duett.

The publication of this volume is another evidence of the unbounded popularity of the author in Great Britain.

"Probably there is no author who writes the English language," remarks the correspondent of Moore's Rural New-Yorker, "so popular in England, at the present time, as Longfellow. His writings are the subject of much criticism in the journals, and are printed in almost every possible form and style. The number of cheap editions is very numerous, and this is a convincing proof of his great popularity. He is read and admired by all classes; and quotations from his poems are frequently made in the pulpit, in journals, and by public speakers."

Grace Greenwood, (Mrs. Sarah J. Lippincott,) in her Haps and Mishaps of a Tour in Europe, remarks:

"During this evening Mr. Dickens spoke to me with much interest and admiration of Mrs. Stowe and Mr. Hawthorne. Wherever I go, my national pride is gratified by hearing eloquent tributes to these authors and to the poet Longfellow."

Mary Russell Mitford was one of the most ardent of our poet's admirers, and devotes a chapter to his praise and poetry in her Recollections of a Literary Life:

"I do not know a more enviable reputation," she remarks, "than Professor Longfellow has won for himself in this country,—won, too, with a rapidity seldom experienced by our native poets. The terseness of diction and force of thought delight the old; the grace and melody enchant the young; the unaffected and all-pervading piety satisfies the serious; and a certain slight touch of mysticism carries the imaginative reader fairly off his feet. For my own part, I confess not only to the being captivated by all these qualities, (mysticism excepted) but to the further fact of yielding to the charm of certain lines. I cannot very well tell why, and walking about the house repeating such fragments as this,—

'I give the first watch of the night

as if I were still eighteen. I am not sure that this is not as great a proof of the power of the poet as can be given."—American Poets, Chapter VI.

That exquisite poet and intelligent critic, Mr. Moir, (the "Delta" of Blackwood,) at the conclusion of his Sketches of the Poetical Literature of the Past Half-Century, (Edin. and Lon., 1851, 12mo,) remarks:

"I should have also liked to have been able to add more strictures on the brother-poets of America, more especially Henry Longfellow and William Cullen Bryant, for both of whom I have a high admiration,—the one being distinguished for the possession of the very element in which our recent verse is so deficient,—imaginative truth,—and the other having preserved, in many of his pictures, the native original tone which must hereafter render them invaluable."

"The distinguishing qualities of Longfellow seem to be beauty of imagination, delicacy of taste, wide sympathy, and mild earnestness, expressing themselves sometimes in forms of quaint and fantastic fancy, but always in chaste and simple language. . . . One of the most pleasing characteristics of this writer's works is their intense humanity. A man's heart beats in his every line. . . . He loves, pities, and feels with, as well as for, his fellow human mortal. . . . He is a brother, speaking to men as brothers, and as brothers they are responsive to his voice. . . . We close our paper with feelings of gratitude and respect for our transatlantic author."—Gilfillan's Second Gallery of Literary Portraits, 2d ed., Edin., 1852, 254-264.

"In golden harmony, mellifluous diction, and erudite polish, Longfellow can successfully compete with our most fastidious poets; and few can surpass him in richness of fancy, imaginative capacity, and elevation of thought. The admiration which his poetry must necessarily elicit from us will be heightened considerably when we reflect that this elegance and unalterable deference to the laws of beauty is altogether unattended by any poverty of substance, contracted range of thought, tameness in origination of idea or its embodiment. . . . Philosophy, and that generally of the purest and the most hopeful kind, enhances the value of his poetry; his metaphysical ratiocinations are no less remarkable for their soundness and subtlety than for the buoyant spirit which pervades them; and wisdom holds her throne supreme over all his imaginings."—Irish Quar. Rev., June, 1855, 197-204.

"His poems are of an order to which we have none akin. Germany, more than England, has been the source of his inspiration. Our own writers of short poems—Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley—have nothing in common with him. He is still further removed from our lyric writers, from Burns to Moore. He writes, like Cowper, with a purpose, and his verses have a liquid flow to which the former can lay no claim."—Lon. Metropolitan.

"We are thankful that the present age is graced by such a poet as Mr. Longfellow, whose extraordinary accomplishment and research, and devotion to his high calling, can hardly be overrated. His productions must always command our deep attention, for in them we are certain to meet with great beauty of thought, and very elegant diction."—Blackwood's Mag., Feb. 1852.

See also Ruskin's Elements of Drawing; Leigh Hunt's letter to the American editor of his Corrected Poetical Works, prefixed to this collection, pub. by Ticknor and Fields, Boston, 1857.

These are certainly high commendations, and, with those previously quoted from foreign sources, must be the more gratifying to the subject of them from the fact that no national partiality can be suspected. Not, indeed, that our American critics are often guilty of indiscriminate laudation of their own countrymen. We are very naturally and very properly awake to the danger of erring in this matter, and are quite as likely to permit caution to incline us to the other extreme. As regards Mr. Longfellow, however, were our critics ever so extravagant in eulogy, it would be difficult for them to surpass the leaders of literary opinion in Europe. We have already quoted many American criticisms on several of our author's works, and feel tempted to adduce several native opinions respecting his general characteristics as a poet; but here—our article having already insensibly lengthened itself until, like the clown in the churchyard, we are afraid to look back—we must force ourselves to be brief.

"Longfellow has a perfect command of that expression which results from restraining rather than cultivating fluency; and his manner is adapted to his theme. He rarely, if ever, mistakes 'emotions for conceptions.' He selects with great delicacy and precision the exact phrase which best expresses or suggests his idea. He colours his style with the skill of a painter; and, in compelling words to picture thought, he not only has the warm flush and bright tints of language at his command, but he arrests its evanescent hues. In the higher department of his art—that of so combining his words and images that they make music to the soul as well as to the ear, and convey not only his feelings and thoughts, but also the very tone and condition of the soul in which they have their being—he has given exquisite examples in Maidenhood and Endymion. . . . Longfellow's verse occupies a position halfway between the poetry of actual life and the poetry of transcendentalism. Like all neutrals, he is liable to attack from the zealots of both parties; but it seems to us that he has hit the exact point beyond which no poet can at present go without being either neglected or ridiculed. He idealizes real life; he elicits new meanings from many of its rough shows; he clothes subtle and delicate thoughts in familiar imagery; he embodies high moral sentiment in beautiful and glowing forms; he weaves the golden threads of spiritual being into the texture of common existence; he discerns and addresses some of the finest sympathies of the heart; but he rarely soars into those regions of abstract imagination where the bodily eye cannot follow, but where that of the seer is gifted with a 'pervading vision.'"—E. P. Whipple's Essays and Reviews, vol. i. 60-61, 62-63; and N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1844, vol. lviii. 24, 26.

The reader should peruse the whole of this admirable paper, or, rather, the whole of the two volumes,—Whipple's Essays and Reviews, Bost., 1851.

"Nothing can exceed the exquisite beauty of some of his smaller pieces, while they also abound in that richness of expression and imagery which the Romantic muse is supposed to claim as her more especial attribute. The melody of his versification is very remarkable; some of his stanzas sound with the richest and sweetest music of which language is capable. It is unnecessary to illustrate this remark by quotations; the memories of all readers of poetry involuntarily find them. In the range of American poetry, it would not be easy to find any that is so readily remembered, that has sunk so deeply into the hearts of the people, and that so spontaneously rises to the speaker's tongue in the pulpit and the lecture-room."—Prof. C. C. Felton: N. Amer. Rev., July, 1842, iv. 115.

"Almost all Longfellow's poems are gems set with consummate taste. . . . His Skeleton in Armour is the most novel and characteristic of his shorter poems, and his Psalm of Life and Excelsior are the most familiar and endeared. He is the artistic, as Halleck is the lyrical, and Bryant the picturesque and philosophic, of American poets."—H. T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit., 1852.

The reference to the Psalm of Life and Excelsior may remind some of our readers of Mr. Gilfillan's fervid commendation of these poems:

"No poet has more beautifully expressed the depth of his conviction that life is an earnest reality,—a something with eternal issues and dependencies; that this earth is no scene of revelry or market of sale, but an arena of contest. This is the inspiration of his Psalm of Life; than which we have few things finer, in moral tone, since those odes by which the millions of Israel tuned their march across the wilderness. . . . We have just alluded to Excelsior, one of those happy thoughts which seem to drop down, like fine dews, from some serener region, which meet instantly the ideal of all minds, and run on afterwards, and forever, in the current of the human heart. We can now no more conceive of a world without Excelsior than of a world without the Hind, the Comus, or the Midsummer Night's Dream. It has expressed in the happiest and briefest way what many minds in the age had been trying in vain to express."—Second Gallery of Literary Portraits, 2d ed., 258, 259.

But to return to our American critics:

"Of all our poets, Longfellow best deserves the title of artist. He has studied the principles of verbal melody, and rendered himself master of the mysterious affinities which exist between sound and sense, word and thought, feeling and expression. This tact in the use of language is probably the chief cause of his success. There is an aptitude, a gracefulness, and vivid beauty, in many of his stanzas, which at once impress the memory and win the ear and heart."—R. W. GRAISWOLD: Poets and Poetry of America, 16th ed., Phila., 1855, 3-5.

"We shall only say that he is the most popular of American poets, and that this popularity may safely be assumed to contain in itself the elements of permanence, since it has been fairly earned, without any of that subservience to the baser tastes of the public which characterizes the quack of letters. His are laurels honourably gained and gently worn. Without comparing him with others, it is enough if we declare our conviction that he has composed poems which will live as long as the language in which they are written."—J. RUSSELL LOWELL: N. Amer. Rev., 69, 215.

"The secret of his popularity as a poet is probably that of all similar popularity,—namely, the fact that his poetry expresses a universal sentiment in the simplest and most melodious manner. Each of his most noted poems is the song of a feeling common to every mind in moods into which every mind is liable to fall. Thus, a Psalm of life, Footsteps of Angels, To the River Charles, Excelsior, The Bridge, the Gleam of Sunshine, The Day is Done, The Old Clock on the Stairs, The Arrow and the Song, The Fire of Driftwood, Twilight, The Open Window, are all most adequate and inexpressibly delicate renderings of quite universal emotions. There is a humanity in them which is irresistible in the fit measure to which they are wedded. If some elegiac poets have strung rosaries of tears, there is a weakness of woe in their verses which repels; but the quiet, pensive thought,—the twilight of the mind, in which the little facts of life are saddened in view of their relation to the eternal laws, time and change,—this is the meditation and mourning of every manly heart, and this is the alluring and permanent charm of Longfellow's poetry."—GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS: Sketch of Longfellow, in Honors of American Authors, N. York, 1853, 282-283.

The following list of translations of a number of Longfellow's works will interest the reader:

But we must not conclude without giving the promised quotation respecting Longfellow, from Cardinal Wiseman's Lecture on the Home Education of the Poor. Thus it runs:

"There is no greater lack in English literature than that of a poet of the people,—of one who shall be to the labouring-classes of England what Goethe is to the peasant of Germany. He was a true philosopher who said, 'Let me make the songs of a nation, and I care not who makes its laws.' There is one writer who approaches nearer than any other to this standard; and he has already gained such a hold on our hearts that it is almost unnecessary for me to mention his name. Our hemisphere cannot claim the honour of having brought him forth; but still he belongs to us, for his works have become as household words wherever the English language is spoken. And whether we are charmed by his imagery, or soothed by his melodious versification, or elevated by his high moral teachings of his pure muse, or follow with sympathizing hearts the wanderings of Evangéline, I am sure that all who hear my voice will join with me in the tribute I desire to pay to the genius of Longfellow."

Thus have we seen the poet's praise chanted alike by stern reviewer and gentle lady, by lowly critic and lordly prelate. But, as we cast a glance at the table where our books are piled in "learned confusion" around us, we are silently reminded that our pleasing task is not yet finished. The poet's bays are entitled to another wreath, and we shall not withhold it. It was promised by the wisest of men that he who was "diligent in his business" should "stand before kings;" and—laborious in the great duty of accumulating and distributing knowledge, laborious in the cause of humanity, of freedom, and of truth—the poet, scholar, and philanthropist of Cambridge has not failed in this reward also.

In 1855 the Rev. J. C. Fletcher took a number of specimens of American literature, art, and manufactures to the capital of Brazil, where he was permitted to exhibit them in the National Museum. They were first visited by the Emperor Dom Pedro II., whose knowledge of literature is as remarkable as his attainments in science. In the work entitled Brazil and the Brazilians, (by Rev. Messrs. Kidder and Fletcher,) Mr. F. gives an account of his majesty's visit; and to this narration (furnished us by Mr. Fletcher in advance of the publication of his volume) it is owing that to the many golden opinions of Mr. Longfellow already recorded we are able to add that of the monarch of Brazil:

"He [Dom Pedro II.] approached the table where were the books presented by Parry & McMillan. He opened the Homes of the American Authors, and surprised me by his knowledge of our literature. He made remarks on Irving, Cooper, and Prescott, showing an intimate acquaintance with each. His eye falling upon the name of Longfellow, he asked me, in great haste and eagerness, 'Monsieur Fletcher, avez-vous les poèmes de M. Longfellow?' It was the first time that I ever saw in Dom Pedro II. an enthusiasm which in its earnestness and simplicity resembled the warmth of childhood when about to possess itself of some long-cherished object. I replied, 'I believe not, your majesty.' 'Oh,' said he, 'I am exceedingly sorry, for I have sought in every bookstore of Rio de Janeiro for Longfellow, and I cannot find him. I have a number of beautiful marocquins from him; but I wish the whole work. I admire him so much.' Mr. Fletcher afterward presented him with the Poets and Poetry of America, informing the emperor that it contained some choice selections from the American poet whom he so much admired, and whom he called 'my Longfellow.' Afterward, at the palace of S. Christopher, when Mr. F. took leave of the emperor, the latter said to him, 'When you return to your country, have the kindness to say to Mr. Longfellow how much pleasure he has given me, and be pleased to tell him combien je l'estime, combien je l'aime.'"

Longfellow, Rev. Samuel, brother of the preceding, a Unitarian minister, stationed at Brooklyn, New York. In conjunction with Samuel Johnson, 1. A Book of Psalms and Hymns for Public and Private Devotion; 7th ed., Bost., 1855. 2. Thalatta: a Book for the Sea-Side, 1853, 12mo. This is a collection of poetry, partly original.

Longfellow, Stephen, LL.D., 1776-1849, father of the two preceding, a native of Gorham, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard University in 1798, became an eminent lawyer, was a member of the National Congress, and filled several other public posts with credit to himself and advantage to his constituents. He resided principally at Portland, Maine, and died in that city, which he had long faithfully served. A number of his legal arguments will be found in the Massachusetts and the Maine Reports. He was noted for his copious stores of knowledge, and the agreeable manner in which he imparted the results of his investigations to his hearers. See Judge Story's Life and Letters.

"In all the relations of private and public life, Mr. Longfellow was a model man: kind and affectionate in his family, prompt and efficient in business, courteous uniformly, ready with money or service, whenever properly required, and filling large places in benevolent and religious institutions, his death was deeply mourned, and the people grieved most of all that they should see his face no more.

"A life so adorned could not have been withdrawn from its sphere of usefulness without making a palpable void; and I only express the universal sentiment that was felt at his departure, that an able, upright, and Christian gentleman had gone.—one to whom may be applied language used in regard to an eminent English lawyer, 'that he cast honour upon his honourable profession, and sought dignity, not from the ermine or the mace, but from a straight path and a spotless life.'"—Willis's Address before the Maine Historical Society, March 5, 1857; containing Biographical Notices of the Former Presidents of the Society, 24-25, Portland, 1857, 12mo, pp. 54.

"An interesting missionary work."—Bickersteth's C. S.

This valuable work—which the collector of American history must secure—was drawn up from the accounts furnished by Gottlieb Spangenberg and David Zeisburger, forty years missionaries among the N. A. Indians. The Delawares, Lenni-Lenape, Iroquois, Shawanese, and Hurons, of Penna. and Western New York, are the principal dramatis personæ in this aboriginal drama.

Lossing, Benson J., son of a farmer, b. Feb. 12, 1813, at Beekman, Dutchess co., New York. From 1835 to 1841 he was the joint editor and proprietor of the Poughkeepsie Telegraph; and from 1836 to 1839 he was sole editor of the Poughkeepsie Casket, a literary paper, illustrated by his own pencil. In 1838 he removed to New York City, since which time his pen, pencil, and graver have been most industriously employed, as may be seen by the following works: 1. Outline History of the Fine Arts, N. York, 1840, 18mo, pp. 330, (being No. 103 of Harper's Family Library.) 2. Seventeen Hundred and Seventy-Six; or, the War for Independence, pp. 510, 8vo. 3. Lives of the Presidents of the United States, pp. 130, 8vo. 4. The New World, pp. 100, 8vo. 5. The Ohio Book, pp. 100, 8vo. 6. Biographical Sketches of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, 1848; 1854, pp. 382, 12mo. In July, 1848, he started on a series of journeys extending over nine thousand miles to collect material for the (7.) Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the War of Independence. Although actually engaged upon the work only about twenty months all together, as the demands of regular business would allow, its publication was not completed till December, 1852, 2 vols. imp. 8vo, pp. 1500.

Illustrated by 1100 engravings, chiefly from the pencil of the author. The remainder of the first edition was destroyed by fire in 1853. A new and revised edition was published in 1855, 2 vols. 8vo.

"I have found it one of the most useful books of reference in my possession, for the period which is covered by it."—EDWARD EVERETT.

"Destined to find its way to every farmer's hearth and to all the school-libraries of our country."—H. T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit., 1852.

"The cheapness of the work is truly remarkable; and we are confident that the Field-Book of the Revolution will be one of the household books of the country."—Home Journal.

Also highly commended by Washington Irving, George Bancroft, Jared Sparks, J. P. Kennedy, Millard Fillmore, Robert Chambers, of Edinburgh, &c.

8. Pictorial History of the United States, for Schools and Families, pp. 350, 12mo. 9. The Cenotaph; or, Brief Memoirs of Eminent Americans, pp. 400, 12mo; new ed., 1855, 12mo. Mr. Lossing has been engaged for several years in collecting materials for an illustrated history of the war of 1812-15, to be issued uniform in style with the Field-Book of the Revolution. He is also associated with Lyman C. Draper in the preparation of a series of works illustrative of the History and Biography of the Western Country, from rare and original materials which have been collected by Mr. Draper during many years of indefatigable research and travel.

Since the preceding was prepared for the press, this industrious author has given to the world (10.) Military Journal of two Private Soldiers, 1758-75, with Notes and Supp., 1855, 8vo, pp. 128. 11. With Edwin Williams, The National History of the United States, 1855, 2 vols. r. 8vo, pp. 1400: a most valuable work. 12. Great Family Pictorial Hist. of the United States, 1857, imp. 8vo, pp. nearly 700. 13. Primary Pictorial Hist. of the United States, 1857, 12mo, pp. 222.

"Lossing's Primary Hist. of the United States is a work prepared with much care to serve as an introduction to the larger and very popular School-History."—H. T. TUCKERMAN.

14. The Old Farm and the New Farm; a Political Allegory, by Francis Hopkinson; with an Introd., Notes, and Illustrations, by B. J. L., 1857, r. 16mo, pp. 76.

Mr. Lossing has been a great benefactor to the reading public; and we trust that he will continue his most useful labours.

She has gained considerable reputation by poetical contributions to various periodicals. See Poe's Autobiography; Griswold's Female Poets of America; Read's Female Poets of America; May's American Female Poets.

Loudon, Earl of, Lord High-Chancellor of Scotland. Several Speeches, 1641-46, 4to.

Loudon, Miss Agnes, only daughter of John Claudius Loudon and Jane Webb Loudon, commenced authorship at a very early age, her tale of The Lost Gloves having made its appearance in Chambers's Edinburgh Journal before the writer had numbered eleven years. She has since contributed a number of papers to the English periodicals, and given to the world the two following volumes: 1. Tales for Young People, Lon., 1847; new ed., sq. 2. Tales of School Life, 1849, sq.; 2d ed., 1851, sq.

Loudon, Mrs. Jane Webb, the daughter of Thomas Webb, Esq., of Ritwell House, near Birmingham, England, commenced her literary career in 1827 by the publication of a novel of more than ordinary interest, entitled The Mummy, (1827, 3 vols. 8vo.) but, after her marriage in 1830 to Mr. John Claudius Loudon, she turned her literary talents into the field of research so successfully and assiduously cultivated by her husband. This gentleman had been greatly pleased with the sagacity evinced in some scientific predictions in The Mummy, sought an introduction to the author, and in due time made her Mrs. Loudon. Mrs. Loudon's publications are as follows: 1. The Lady's Flower-Garden of Ornamental Plants, Lon., 1840-44, 5 vols. 4to. 2. Gardening for Ladies, 1840, fp. 8vo; 8th ed., 1851, 12mo.

16. The Lady's Country Companion; new ed., 1852, 12mo.

"No lady, however well versed in the matters it treats upon, can read it without finding much useful instruction pleasantly conveyed."—Puxton's Mag. of Botany.

Mrs. Loudon edited, in 1850, The Lady's Companion at Home and Abroad, which was discontinued after the publication of one vol., in consequence of the failure of her health. She has also edited, since her husband's death, several of his works, among which are the new edit. of The Encyclopedia of Gardening, 1850, 8vo; the new ed. of the Encyc. of Cottage, Farm, and Village Architecture, 1846, 8vo; and a new ed. of the Villa Gardener, 1850, 8vo. The new edit. (1855, 8vo) of his Encyclopedia of Plants, and the Second Addit. Supplement, (1840-55,) 1855, 8vo, were published (by G. Don) under her direction, assisted by David Wooster. She was a valuable assistant to Mr. Loudon in the preparation of several of his works, and wrote the memoir of his life and writings prefixed to his Self-Instruction, 1845. In addition to the works above enumerated, she has pub. a number of novels, tales, and children's books, and edited Peter Parley's Tales about Plants, 1839, 16mo. A notice of her Philanthropic Economy will be found in the Westminster Review, xxiii. 1. In 1846, Mrs. Loudon was complimented by the grant of an annual pension on the Civil List of £100 per annum.

Loudon, John Claudius, 1783-1843, a landscape-gardener, and one of the most useful writers of the age, a native of Cambuslang, Lanarkshire, removed in 1803 to England, where he resided during the rest of his life. In 1813, and again in 1819, he visited the Continent for the purpose of extending the sphere of his professional observations. He was a man of extensive information, untiring energy, and great benevolence of heart. 1. Observations on Laying out Public Squares, 1803. 2. Observs. on Plantations, 1804, 8vo. 3. On Hothouses, 1805, 8vo. 4. Country Residences, 1806, 2 vols. 4to, £3 3s.

The value of Köllar's work is well known. 28. Encyclopædia of Trees and Shrubs, 1842, 8vo, £2 10s. With upwards of 2000 wood-cuts. This is an abridgment of No. 19.

"In its present form, this valuable work is placed within the reach of thousands who could not hope to obtain it unabridged; and we strongly recommend it to universal patronage."—DR. LINDLEY: Gardener's Chronicle.

29. Suburban Horticulturist, 1842, 8vo, 16s.; 1849, 8vo, 15s. 30. On Laying Out and Planting Cemeteries, 1843, 8vo, 12s. All who have any interest in cemeteries should carefully consult this work. 31. Self-Improvement for Young Gardeners, &c.; with a Portrait, and Memoir of the Author by Mrs. Loudon, 1845, 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"This work was left unfinished, though he dictated a portion of it only a few hours before he died. He was never confined to his bed, and died standing, only a few moments after he had expressed to his wife his fear that he should never live to finish his Self-Instruction. She perceived his countenance to change as he spoke, and she had only time to clasp her arms round him to save him from falling, when his head sank on her shoulder, and he expired."—MRS. LOUDON.

Self-Instruction consists of "A collection of plain and practical treatises, linked together by their connection with horticultural and agricultural pursuits. . . . To superior gardeners, foresters, land-stewards, bailiffs, and farmers, it supplies a mass of sound instruction which can nowhere else be found combined in the same space or given in so lucid a style."—Britannica.

To the above list must be added the following periodicals, edited and partly written by Mr. Loudon: 32. The Gardener's Magazine, 8vo. First Series, 1826-34, 10 vols., £9 2s. Second Series, 1835-43, 9 vols., £8 19s.

"The first periodical devoted exclusively to horticulture. That this work met the wants of a large class of readers is evident from four thousand copies of the first number having been sold in four days."—MRS. LOUDON.

"To all our readers who are fond of gardening or country-affairs we recommend this work, as one from which they will derive both entertainment and instruction."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

"The Gardener's Magazine should be perused by every gardener and by every country gentleman."—Lon. Times, Feb. 7, 1839.

33. The Magazine of Natural History, 1829-36, 9 vols. 8vo, £10. To these works the purchaser should add Charlesworth's Magazine of Natural History, 1837-40, 4 vols. 8vo, £5 5s., where will be found original papers by Lyell, Mantell, Westwood, Yarrell, Hope, &c. Let him also procure the Annals of Natural History, 1838, &c.: see HOOKER, SIR WILLIAM JACKSON, K.H., D.C.L., under No. 30. 34. The Architectural Magazine, 1834-39, 5 vols., £6 6s.

"We strongly recommend the Architectural Magazine as pregnant with interest and instruction, both to the architect and the general reader."—Lon. Times, Feb. 2, 1839.

Mr. Loudon also contributed papers to the Encyclopædia Britannica, and to Brande's Dictionary of Science. His devotion to his books was so absorbing that in early life he was in the habit for several years of sitting up two whole nights in every week to gain time for study,—drinking strong tea to keep himself awake. Throughout life, indeed, unconquerable energy triumphed over ill-health, pecuniary embarrassment, and repeated discouragement.

"Considering the very delicate state of his health, it is astonishing he should have been able to produce so many elaborate productions."—M. Culloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 219.

"Never, perhaps, did any man possess more energy and determination than Mr. Loudon."—Lon. Gardener's Mag.

In 1618 he returned to England, and was imprisoned until after the king's death. Wood tells us that when at Gloucester Hall, Oxford, he was "accounted the most amiable and beautiful person that eye ever beheld;" but he was a victim to the political troubles of the day, "became very poor in body and purse, was the object of charity, went in ragged clothes, and mostly lodged in obscure and dirty places." Lover, Samuel, b. 1797, at Dublin, has distinguished himself as a painter, poet, dramatist, musician, and novelist. "The best production of the author of Handy Andy."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"All Mr. Lover's wit and humour and purely natural pathos are here brought into full play."—Lon. Month. Review.

Mr. Lover is also the author of several dramas and operettas. Among the best-known of these are Rory O'Moore, The White Horse of the Peppers, and The Happy Man. Of his songs, The Angels' Whisper, Rory O'More, and Molly Bawn have perhaps the most admirers. In 1844, he appeared before the public in a series of entertainments, which were styled by him Irish Evenings, in which he played his own music, told his own stories, and sung his own songs. The mélange proved attractive to the public and profitable to Mr. Lover, both in Great Britain and in the United States. He arrived in America in the spring of 1846, and entertained large and delighted audiences from New York to New Orleans. He resumed his Irish Evenings in 1848, after his return to England.

"Poet, painter, dramatist, he has won sufficient celebrity to make the fame of three different men, which, we trust, like the shambrock of his own native land, may long continue to be TRIA JUNCTA IN UNO!"—Dubl. Univ. Mag., vol. xxxvii.

Lowell, Charles, D.D., a son of Judge John Lowell, and father of James Russell Lowell the poet, born in Boston, August 15, 1782, graduated at Harvard College, 1800, matriculated at the University of Edinburgh, and studied Divinity under Hunter and Moral Philosophy under Dugald Stewart, 1802, was ordained over West Church in Boston, 1806, Jan. 1. Has been a fellow of the Corporation and Board of Overseers of Harvard College, a member of several literary societies in the United States and Europe. Author of about twenty published Discourses, chiefly on public occasions; of a volume of Occasional Sermons, 1856, and a volume of Practical Sermons, 1856; of Meditations for the Afflicted, Sick, and Dying; Devotional Exercises for Communicants,—i.e. of four volumes, and has contributed to periodicals.

Lowell, J. A Review of Hay's Treat. on Expatriation. Bost., 1814. 8vo.

Lowell, James Russell, b. Feb. 22, 1819, at Cambridge, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard College, 1838, is a son of the Rev. Charles Lowell, D.D., pastor of the West Church, Boston, and a descendant of Percival Lowell, who emigrated from Bristol, England, settled in Newbury, Massachusetts in 1639, and died there in 1665. On leaving college, the subject of our notice determined to embrace the profession of the law, and after the usual preliminary studies was admitted to the Bar; but the love of letters proved itself to be too deeply rooted in the heart of the young attorney to be summarily banished, and, as the Law is proverbially a "jealous mistress," the engagement, perhaps rather hastily made, was as hastily sundered, and poetical lubrications succeeded to prosaic briefs. In 1855, Mr. Lowell succeeded Mr. Longfellow the poet in the Belles-Lettres Professorship in Harvard College, and entered upon the duties of this responsible position after spending some months in Europe. See LOWELL, MRS. MARIA WHITE. His publications have been as follows:

1. A POEM RECITED AT CAMBRIDGE, Camb., 1839. 2. A YEAR'S LIFE, Bost., 1841, 10mo, pp. viii. 182. This is a volume of poems.

"Mr. Lowell has more of the 'vision' than the 'faculty divine.' He has the eye and mind of a poet, but wants the plastic touch which 'turns to shape the forms of things unknown.' His conceptions are superior to his power of execution. We are reminded, in reading his poetry, of the observation of a judicious critic in a sister-art,—that the picture would have been better painted if the painter had taken more pains. In this volume there is much of the ore of poetry, but little of it in its purified and polished state. We have found in it much, certainly, that is striking and beautiful. The author has seen for himself, and not transcribed the impressions made on other minds. . . . His imagination is vivid, and his fancy fruitful in fine images. . . . We are pleased, too, with his purity and elevation of feeling. Morally speaking, there is not a line which, dying, he could wish to blot. . . . In all that belongs to the form and garb of verse there is room for great improvement. . . . There is a good deal, too, of that cloudy and misty phraseology which is so fashionable now in prose and verse, which tantalizes us with glimmers of meaning but does not satisfy us with full revelations of it. . . . Another conspicuous fault of Mr. Lowell's poetry is the perpetual presence of daintiness and prettiness of expression. His thoughts are over-dressed. . . . We have been led to speak thus plainly of Mr. Lowell's defects solely on account of the promise which his volume displays."—GEORGE S. HILLARD: N. Amer. Rev., lii, 454, 455, 464, 465.

"I am very glad to hear that James Lowell's work succeeds. . . . The specimen of the work you give—the prelude to it, if I remember right—struck me as very choice and very beautiful. It had the freshness of a mind that draw from its own sources. I am tired, as well as yourself, of the endless imitations by American poets of the forms and figures, and topics of British poetry."—JUDGE JOSEPH STORY: Letter to Wm. W. Story, Washington, Feb. 9, 1841, in Story's Life and Letters, ii, 366.

3. POEMS, Camb., Mass., 1844, 12mo, pp. 279; Lon., 1844, 8p. 8vo. This Second Series contains A Legend of Brittany, Prometheus, Miscellaneous Poems, and Sonnets.

"We recognise in his later productions a firmer intellect, a wider range of thought, a bolder tone of expression, and a versification greatly improved. We feel that he is now becoming master of his fine powers, and an artist in the execution of his conceptions. . . . Mr. Lowell's poems want compression. . . . In the words of Taylor, they need pressing out. Redundancy, both of thought and expression is the principal fault which we think the critical reader will be disposed to find with them. . . . Of Mr. Lowell's poetical style in general the present volume has given us a high opinion. Not that it is by any means free from defects; but it has the elements of a clear, vigorous and pure form of expression. It shows the marks of a profound study of the English language in the best authors."—PROF. C. C. FELTON: N. Amer. Rev., lviii, 286, 288, 289.

"The Legend of Brittany is decidedly the noblest poem of the same length written by an American."—Edgar A. Poe's Literary James Russell Lowell.

4. CONVERSATIONS ON SOME OF THE OLD POETS, 1845, 12mo; two Amer. edits., and pub. in Lon., 1845, 8p. 8vo. Reviewed by C. T. Brooks, in the Bost. Chris. Exam., xxviii, 211. After reading the Conversations, the student of English literature should not fail to peruse Mr. Lowell's Essays on the English Song-Writers, pub. in The Pioneer, a Literary and Critical Magazine, (conducted by Mr. Lowell and Mr. Robert Carter, issued at Boston, January, February, and March, 1843, all that appeared.)

"Among the very best of his writings. . . . They show a deep appreciation of the poetical merit of those authors, and a fitness of critical tact quite unusual in the literature of the magazines."—PROF. C. C. FELTON: N. Amer. Rev., lviii, 283.

5. POEMS, Camb., Mass., 1848, 12mo, pp. 184. Among

(the poems in this Third Series (it has been incoherently termed the Second Series) are The Present Crisis, The Summer Storm, Above and Below, Extreme Unction, To a Pine-Tree, The Birch-Tree, The Changeling, To the Pandic Lion, and An Indian Summer Reverie. Lowell's Complete Poetical Works, revised, with addits., were pub. at Bost., 1850, 2 vols. 16mo, (3 edits.;) and 2 edits., with an Introduction by A. R. Seoble, have appeared in London, 1852, 18mo; 1853, 18mo.

"The successive publications of Mr. Lowell show a marked progress, and encourage us to hope for a rich harvest when the soil shall be cultivated to the utmost and the fruit has been allowed to reach its full maturity. . . . He will not complain of us for thinking that he has not yet attained his perfect stature, and that even his latest productions fall quite short of what he is able to accomplish. . . . The swift movement of Mr. Lowell's verses, and the daring energy of his conceptions, show that his genius inclines to the lyric form of poetry. He is master, indeed, of all the chorals of the lyre, and strikes them with a bold, imperious hand, till they ring out in loud but harmonious concert. . . . The descriptive power shown in many of these poems is one of their most striking merits. The poet's eye catches even the most minute tracery of nature's works and the most rapidly fleeting of her aspects, and depicts them in verse with startling distinctness. . . . We have quoted enough to show that Mr. Lowell possesses extraordinary powers as a poet, and has arrived at the free and vigorous use of them,—his finished work no longer falling behind his fresh and beautiful conceptions. . . . Many of the pieces in this volume will support as high a reputation as belongs to some of the most honourable names on the roll of English poets."—PROF. FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lxxvi, 471, 472, 475, 478, 482.

7. A FABLE FOR CRITICS, N. York, 1848, pp. 78, 12mo; 5th ed., Bost., 1856, 12mo, pp. v. 80.

"The Fable is essentially 'loose,' ill conceived, and feebly executed, as well in detail as in general. Some good hits, and some sparkling witticisms, do not serve to compensate for its rambling plot (if plot it can be called), and for the want of artistic finish so particularly noticeable throughout the work, especially in its versification. . . . In Mr. Lowell's prose efforts we have before observed a certain di jointures, but never, until now, in his verse; and we confess some surprise at his putting forth so unpolished a performance. . . . To show the general nature of the Fable, we quote a portion of what he says about Mr. Poe."—Edgar A. Poe's Literary James Russell Lowell.

"The Fable—which, by-the-way, is no fable at all—is really a very pleasant and sparkling poem, abounding in flashes of brilliant satire, edged with wit enough to delight even its victims. . . . His Fable is simply a very witty review-article done into rhyme. Most American writers of the present day who have any claim to notice, and some who have not, are summoned before him, to have their portraits taken, and then dismissed, usually with a sharp rap or two on the knuckles. The sketches are drawn in a very free and bold manner, though they have the usual defect of caricatures,—that the most prominent and peculiar feature is brought out in high relief and maliciously magnified, so that the likeness is instantly recognised, though the remainder of the face is left out altogether, or so drawn as to bear no resemblance to the original. . . . Another and frequent fault of our bard as a critic is that he often gives us the features of the man in place of a character of the author, and, as a natural consequence, mixes up so much of personal liking or aversion with his drawings that they lose all claim to fidelity."—PROF. FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lxxviii, 192, 194.

"It abounds in ingenious turns of expression and felicitous sketches of character: it is witty and humorous, and, for the most part, in a spirit of genial appreciation: but, in a few instances, the judgments indicate too narrow a range of sympathies, and the caustic severity of others has been attributed to desires of retaliation."—R. W. GRISWOLD: Poets and Poetry of America, 14th ed., 1855, 565.

"He has the rare faculty of writing clever doggerel. Take out the best of Ingoldsby, Campbell's rare piece of fun, The Friars of Dijon, and perhaps a little of Walsh's Ariadaphanes, and there is no contemporary verse of the class with which Lowell's may not fearlessly stand comparison; for, observe, we are not speaking of mock heroics like Pon Gaultier's, which are only a species of parody, but of real doggerel, the Babelaisque of poetry. . . . The Fable is a sort of review, in verse, of American poets. Much of the Boston leaven runs through it: the 'wise men of the East' are all glorified intensely, while Bryant and Halleck are studiously depreciated."—Fraser's Mag., July, 1856; and in The N. York Internat. Mag., August 5, 1850.

"Beneath its unpretending drab colour lies hid a world of political satire, keen, subtle humour, and manly, vigorous sentiment, interspersed with touches of genuine pathos."—Knickerbocker Mag.

"Showing the power of a master in verse, the heart of a true man, the learning of a scholar, the mind of a philosopher, and the wit of a satirist without the gall which too often accompanies it."—Hollen's Mag.

8. THE BIGLOW PAPERS, edited, with an Introduction, Notes, Glossary, and Copious Index, by Homer Wilbur, A.M., Pastor of the First Church in Jaalam, and (Prospective) Member of many Literary, Learned, and Scientific Societies, Camb., Mass., 1848, pp. 163; 3d ed., 1856, 16mo, pp. 208. This is a political satire upon the Invasion of Mexico by the United States, the State of the Slavery Question, &c. Biglow's verses first appeared in the newspapers of the day:

"They were received with merited favour, from their droll and felicitous portraiture of the Yankee character and dialect, and their successful hits at our national passion for military glory. Political opponents, as well as friends, laughed loud and long at the Birdofredom Swain's Letters, describing his experience in the wars, and the mis-haps that he encountered before he could make his way home again. We must quote a portion of his first letter from Mexico, though the phraseology may appear abstruse to some of our readers who are not familiar with New England forms of speech. . . . This is very far fun. The rhymes are as startling and felicitous as any in Hudibras, and the quaint drollery of the illustrations is in admirable keeping with the whole character of the forlorn recruit from Massachusetts. Of the almost numberless imitations of the Yankee dialect this is decidedly the best that we have seen. Sam Slick is a mere pretender in comparison. [See HALLIBRON, JUDGE THOMAS C., p. 760.] . . . We cannot say much for the copious prose commentary, the prefatory and illustrative matter in which the Biglow rhymes in this edition are embedded. Most of Parson Willbur's lengthy annotations are as heady as his own sermons, from which, indeed, a large part of them profess to have been borrowed."—PROF. FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lxxviii. 187, 188, 190.

"Mr. Lowell has shown that he is a wit and humorist, in the publication of his Biglow Papers. He is the only American who has attempted to laugh down the oppressors of the slave,—the propagandists of slavery. Some of the Biglow poems are capital specimens of Yankee wit and humour."—Bartlett's Modern Agitators, N. York, 1855, 310.

"His Biglow Papers abound in sly strokes of mirth that would make a stoic shake his sides with laughter. He is the Hudibras of America; and woe betide the unfortunate wight at whom he pecks his fun! for, while it is sport to him, it is death to the subject of his sarcasm."—Bunyan's Off-Hand Tinkings; Crayon Sketches of the Noticeable Men of our Age, 1854, 395.

"He is the first of our poets who has succeeded in making our harsh and uncouth Yankee dialect subservient to the uses of poetry; this he has done with entire success in that admirable piece of humorous satire, The Biglow Papers. No productions of a similar character in this country were ever half so popular as the pithy verses of Hosea Biglow, in spite of their being so strongly imbued with a trenchant spirit of opposition to the popular political views of the multitude."—Homes of American Authors: James Russell Lowell, 1853, 362, 363.

The critic in Fraser's Magazine for July, 1850, is an enthusiastic admirer both of the Fable for Critics (as we have seen) and of the Biglow Papers:

"Within the last three years there has arisen in the United States a satirist of genuine excellence, who, however, besides but moderately appreciated by his countrymen, seems himself in a great measure to have mistaken his real forte."

That is, he would have Mr. Lowell to renounce all sentimental and imaginative poetry, and henceforth confine himself to laughing at the follies and ridiculing the foibles of his fellow-men.

Another notice of the Biglow Papers (by D. March) occurs in the New Englander, vii. 63. See also Reviews of Mr. Lowell's Poems in The South. Lit. Mess., vii. 383; Brownson's Quar. Rev., 2d Ser., iv. 271; Bost. Chris. Exam., xxxvi. 173, xlv. 309, (by W. A. Davies); Democrat. Rev., xlii. 147; Bost. Liv. Age, iii. 161, (from the Lon. Inquirer.) An interesting biographical sketch of Mr. Lowell will be found in The Homes of American Authors, from which article we have already quoted a few lines, and will gratify the reader with a few more:

"Lowell is generally looked upon as a serious poet; and, indeed, no one has a better claim to be so regarded, for seriousness is one of the first essentials of all genuine poetry. But seriousness is not necessarily sadness. Much of his poetry overflows with mirthful and jocund feelings, and in his most pungent satire there is a constant bubbling up of a genial and loving nature: the brilliant flashes of his wit are softened by an evident gentleness of motive. . . . Lowell's prose-writings are as remarkable as his poetry: the copiousness of his illustrations, the richness of his imagery, the easy flow of his sentences, the keenness of his wit, and the force and clearness of his reasoning, give to his reviews and essays a fascinating charm that would place him in the front rank of our prose-writers, if he did not occupy a similar position among our poets."—362, 365.

His reviews and essays have appeared in the North American Review, Southern Literary Messenger, Knickerbocker, Democratic Review, Graham's Magazine, Putnam's Magazine, Boston Miscellany, and the National Anti-Slavery Standard. Nor should we omit to notice his edits. of the poems of Marvell, Donne, Keats, Wordsworth, and Shelley, pub. in Messrs. Little, Brown & Co.'s series of the British Poets.

One of the most accomplished of American critics remarks that Lowell

"Unites, in his most effective power, the dreamy, suggestive character of the transcendental bard with the philosophic simplicity of Wordsworth. He has written clever satires, good sonnets, and some long poems with fine descriptive passages. He reminds us often of Tennyson in the sentiment and the construction of his verse. Imagination and philanthropy are the dominant elements in his writings,—some of which are marked by a graceful flow and earnest tone, and many unite with these attractions that of high finish."—H. T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit., 1852.

Nor has Mr. Lowell failed of commendation abroad. The Italian correspondent of the London Critic ventures the assertion that the "American poet Lowell's powers of thought and expression will surely be recognised for ages to come;" and a highly-eulogistic review of his poetical writings (ed. Lon., 1853, 18mo) will be found in the Irish Quarterly Review for September, 1855; and see also Lon. Athen., 1853, 315.

Since the above was written, Mr. Lowell was married (in 1857) to Miss Frances Dunlap, niece of Ex-Governor Dunlap, of Portland, Maine.

Lowell, John, d. 1767, aged 63, minister of Newburyport, Massachusetts, and great-grandfather of the preceding, pub. a Sermon at the ordination of T. Barnard, 1738; a Sermon before Col. Titecomb and his soldiers, 1755; a Sermon on the death of Col. Moses Titcomb, who fell near Lake George, 1760. See Tucker's Funeral Serms.; Allen's Amer. Biog. Diet.; Sprague's Annals.

Lowell, Judge John, LL.D., 1743–1802, a native of Newburyport, Mass., son of the preceding, and grandfather of James Russell Lowell the poet, was the author of an English poem (No. 3) in the Pietas et Gratulatio, 1761, 4to, and of an Eulogy (Jan. 1791) on James Bowdoin, prefixed to vol. ii. of the Memoirs of the Amer. Acad. of Arts and Sciences, and also pub. in a separate form. He was a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution of Massachusetts, and introduced the clause in the Bill of Rights which effected the abolition of slavery in Massachusetts. He was appointed by Washington the first Judge of the U. States District Court, and at his death was Chief-Justice of the Circuit Court of the U. States. His letters to John Adams, and letters from Samuel and John Adams to him, are now in course of publication in the Historical Magazine, pub. in Boston: see vol. i. No. 9, &c.

"The memory of Judge Lowell, I am confident, is respectfully cherished by many persons whom I have now the honour to address. He was among those who enjoyed the public trust and confidence in the times which tried men's souls, and bore his part in the greatest work recorded in the annals of constitutional liberty,—the American Revolution."—HON. EDWARD EVERETT: John Lowell, Junr., Founder of the Lowell Institute: Everett's Orations and Speeches, 1853, ii. 384.

Lowell, John, LL.D., 1769–1840, son of the preceding, uncle of James Russell Lowell the poet, and of John Lowell, the founder of the Lowell Institute, (Boston, 1839,) was the author of many pamphlets and numerous papers in periodicals on politics, theology, agriculture, &c., under the signatures of The Roxbury Farmer, The Yankee Farmer, The New England Farmer, The Boston Rebel, &c. He was a zealous and powerful advocate of the doctrines of the Federal School. See Dr. F. W. P. Greenwood's Sermon on the Death of John Lowell, LL.D., March 22, 1840, Bost., 1840, 8vo, pp. 36; a review of this Sermon in N. Amer. Rev., li. 243–248; Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 61, 65; Lon. Quar. Rev., viii. 193–214. The article last referred to is a review of the well-known pamphlet on "Mr. Madison's War," Bost., 1812.

"We consider his pamphlet as a production of no ordinary cast; it is evidently the offspring of a powerful mind accustomed to think deeply and reason soundly."—Ubi supra.

The reviewer of Dr. Greenwood's Sermon on the death of Mr. Lowell remarks:

"Rarely is so beautiful a tribute paid to departed worth. Most rarely does distinguished worth appear such as to justify such a tribute."—N. Amer. Rev., li. 247.

"Mr. Lowell entered with earnestness into the discussion of these questions in the public journals, and after the decease of Mr. Ames, in 1808, possessed a greater ascendancy than any other person in New England over the minds of those who were opposed to the national administration. He was, however, as a political writer, not more intrepid and uncompromising than he was fair and honourable."—HON. EDWARD EVERETT: John Lowell, Junr., Founder of the Lowell Institute: Everett's Orations and Speeches, 1853, ii. 419, n.

Lowell, John, of the Suffolk Bar, editor of the Law Reporter, pub. at Boston, Mass., and author of legal treatises, &c.

Lowell, Maria White, 1821–1853, formerly Miss White, of Watertown, Massachusetts, the author of many excellent translations from the German and of original poems of more than ordinary merit, was married in 1841 to James Russell Lowell the poet. The death of this accomplished woman elicited one of the most exquisite effusions of modern days,—Longfellow's Two Angels, published in Putnam's Magazine, (New York,) April, 1854:

"'Twas at thy door, O friend, and not at mine,
The angel with the amaranthine wreath,
Pausing, descended, and, with voice divine,
Whisper'd a word that had a sound like death.

"Then fell upon the house a sudden gloom,
A shadow on those features fair and thin,
And softly, from that hush'd and darken'd room,
Two angels issued, where but one went in."

The theme—alas!—is a common one, and will be common, so long as genius mourns for the gifted dead and sympathizes with the living; but we doubt whether in the whole range of English exequial poetry there can be found any thing more beautiful than Longfellow's lament for Maria Lowell.

Mrs. Lowell's eminent merits had elicited ardent eulogiums during her lifetime:

"In 1844, she was married to James Russell Lowell, and for her genius, taste, and many admirable qualities, she is worthy to be the wife of that fine poet and true-hearted man. She has published several elegant translations from the German, and a large number of original poems of the imagination, some of which illustrate questions of morals and humanity."—R. W. GRISWOLD: The Female Poets of America, 2d ed., 1853, 380.

"There is great tenderness of feeling and simplicity in all the productions of her pen, and her household lyrics are full of pathos and beauty."—MRS. S. J. HALE: Woman's Record, 1853, 832.

"Her poetry, of which she has published but too little, is remarkable for pure beauty of thought, clothed in the richest yet simplest mantle of expression."—T. BUCHANAN READ: The Female Poets of America, 6th ed., 1855, 374.

Lowndes, William Thomas, d. 1843, a bookseller of London, will ever be held in honourable remembrance by bibliographers for two invaluable works compiled by him,—viz.: 1. The Bibliographer's Manual of English Literature, containing an account of Rare, Curious, and Useful Books published in, or relating to, Great Britain and Ireland, from the Invention of Printing; with Bibliographical and Critical Notices, Collations of the Rarer Articles, and the Prices at which they have been sold in the Present Century, Lon., 1834, 4 vols. 8vo, pp. xii. 2002, double columns, £4 5s.: large paper, £8 10s. This excellent work—of course, not without errors, but with less than from the comprehensive character of the undertaking might have been reasonably anticipated—should be in every library of any pretensions. It meets with a ready sale at about £5 to £6. 2. The British Librarian; or, Book-Collector's Guide to the Formation of a Library in all Branches of Literature, Science, and Art, arranged in Classes, with Prices, Critical Notes, References, and an Index of Authors and Subjects, 1839, Parts 1-11, 8vo, all published. Mr. Lowndes, whilst engaged in the preparation of this work, was attacked by mental derangement, produced by pecuniary embarrassment, and did not live to resume his labours. The eleven Parts which were published contain 1320 columns of most valuable matter, unfortunately almost useless for want of an index. To both of these works we have been largely indebted in the preparation of this Dictionary. Cheap edits. of the Bibliographer's Manual and the British Librarian (completed) we doubt not would meet with liberal encouragement.

Walter Lowrie, for many years a member of the Congress of the United States, was a native of Butler, Pennsylvania; graduated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, in 1837; studied theology at the Theological Seminary of Princeton, New Jersey; was ordained November, 1841; sailed to China, to join the Presbyterian Mission there, Jan. 19, 1842, and died August 19, 1847, having been thrown into the sea by pirates, when about twelve miles' sail from Chapoo. A memoir of this devoted Christian, edited by his father, was pub., N. York, 1849, 8vo, pp. viii., 500; Phila., 1854, 12mo, pp. 405; 1855, 12mo. This vol. is chiefly composed of Mr. Lowrie's letters, and should be attentively perused by all who are interested in the important subject of Christian missions. Mr. Lowrie was the author of—1. Letters addressed to Sabbath-School Children, N. York, 18mo. 2. The Land of Sinim; or, An Exposition of Isaiah xlix. 12, Phila., 1846, 18mo. 3. Serms. preached in China, 1851, 8vo. See N. Lowth, Robert, D.D., 1710-1787, a native of Winchester, the son of William Lowth, D.D., (post.) was educated at Winchester School, and at New College, Oxford, (elected 1730;) succeeded Spence in the Professorship of Poetry, 1741; Preb. of Durham and Rector of Sedgfield, 1755; Bishop of St. David's, 1766; trans. to Oxford in the same year, and to London, 1777; declined the Archbishopric of Canterbury, 1783. His principal publications are the following: 1. Prælectiones de Sacra Poesi Hebraeorum, &c., Oxf., 1753, 4to; 1763, 2 vols. 8vo. In Latin, et cum Notis Joannis Davidis Michaelis, Goet., 1758 et 1770, 2 vols. 8vo; Oxf., 1775, r. 8vo. Cum Notis et epistolis Jo. Da. Michaelis, ed. Edit. Em. Frid. Car. Rosenmüller, Oxon., 1810, 2 vols. 8vo; 1821, 8vo.

"The edition of 1821 may be considered as the best, as it includes, besides the additional observations of Professor Michaelis, the further remarks of Rosenmüller, (whose edition appeared at Leipzig in 1815,) Richter, and Weiske. Bp. Lowth's Lectures are reprinted in the thirty-first volume of Ugolino."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 171.

In 1787, 2 vols. 8vo, G. Gregory pub. a trans. of Lowth's Prælectiones, under the title of Lects. on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews; trans. from the Latin, with the principal Notes of Prof. Michaelis, and Notes by the editor [Henley] and others, 1787, 2 vols. 8vo; 1816, 2 vols. 8vo; 4th ed., 1839, 8vo; 5th ed., 1847, cr. 8vo; 6th ed., 1853, p. 8vo. In consequence of these additions, the English version is of more value than the Latin original. But the student can by no means dispense with Calvin E. Stowe's trans. of the Prælectiones, from the original Latin, with Notes, Andover, Mass., 1829, 8vo. In addition to the Notes of Rosenmüller and Michaelis, Prof. Stowe gives us extracts from the writings of other learned commentators on the subject of the sacred poetry of the Hebrews.—viz.: Sir Wm. Jones, Eichhorn, Gesenius, De Wette, &c. He has also added greatly to the value of his work by original notes.

"He has displayed in the execution of his task much sound judgment and research. All the notes he has selected are of sterling value, and those which are the results of his own investigations exhibit originality and learning."—REV. G. B. CHEEVER: N. Amer. Rev., xxxi. 337-379.

To the value of Lowth's great work it is easy to adduce ample testimonies:

"With regard to the transcendent excellencies of the poetical parts of the Old Testament, ample information will be derived from Lowth's Sacred Poetry."—DR. DODDRIDGE.

"An excellent work, highly interesting to every biblical student."—DR. ADAM CLARKE.

"An excellent compendium of all the best rules of taste, and of all the principles of composition, illustrated by the boldest and most exalted specimens of genius (if no higher title be allowed them) which antiquity has transmitted to us."—DR. G. GREGORY.

"It is an elegant and interesting book, though somewhat calculated to lead the mind to admire the poetical beauties of Scripture rather than their spiritual tendency and design. It is not distinguished so much for its philological criticisms as for the felicity of its illustrations. . . . Lowth was himself a poet, and deeply versant in the poetry of the Hebrews, as well as in the poetical writers of Greece and Rome."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Incomparable Prælectiones on the Poetry of the Hebrews."—GIBBON, the historian.

"In this admired work Dr. Lowth has described and illustrated the properties and excellencies of each particular species of that poetry with such admirable taste and skill, with such exuberant richness of imagery, such variety, copiousness, elegance, and roundity of style, as few writers have equalled in language not their own."—BISHOP PORTEUS.

"The greatest authority on this subject."—Montgomery's Lects. on Genl. Lit., Poetry, &c., Lect. III., §. v.

"Many instructive and elegant remarks on the Hebrew language. A delightful work of taste and criticism."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"Bishop Lowth prepared the way for a more accurate knowledge of this important part of divine revelation [the Prophetic Books] by his admirable Prælectiones, and by his amended translations of the prophecies of Isaiah."—Williams's C. P.

"Before the appearance of his volume, scarcely any thing had been accomplished in the whole wide range of sacred literature which it occupies. . . . Lowth was fortunate indeed in being the first adventurer in a region so delightful."—G. B. CHEEVER, D.D.: N. Amer. Rev., xxxi. 366, 367.

See also Lowndes's Brit. Lit., 16, 98.

Not only at home, but in Germany also, Lowth's Prælectiones excited a spirit of research in the department to which he was the first to call the attention of the learned world:

"Let no man forget what he was for his own age; how beneficial was his influence upon his contemporaries; that we have become what we are, in part at least, by his aid, and that he has helped us forward many steps by his investigations and masterly example."—EICHORN.

Nor let the reader suppose that Lowth's excellent work is interesting to divines and Orientalists only. The layman, also, may peruse it with delight and instruction:

"If you have not read Bishop Lowth's Prælectiones on Hebrew Poetry, let me commend its perusal to you. It opened to me, some years ago, quite a new view of the beauties of the prophetic and poetical part of the Old Testament."—HON. DANIEL WEBSTER: Letter to Mrs. Frigo, March 27, 1844; Webster's Private Correspondence, Bost., 1857, ii. 186.

The literary history of the Prælectiones, and the controversies connected with its publication, have already come under our notice. See EDWARDS, THOMAS; HARE, FRANCIS, D.D., No. 2; JEBB, JOHN, D.D., No. 3. 2. The Life of William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester, Lon., 1758-59, 8vo; 1759, 8vo; 1777, 8vo.

"A model in its way."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

"The reflections are sparing, and the style is languid. Even in antiquarian lore there is a dearth of intelligence; but the subject was not suited to the taste, habits, and learning of Lowth."—Dublin's Lib. Comp.

3. Short Introduction to English Grammar, with Critical Notes, 1763, 8vo. Often reprinted, and formerly used in schools.

"He gave to England the first regular grammar of his native tongue. [?] We are somewhat surprised that Murray's grammar, which is but an enlarged copy of Lowth's, should so generally have occupied its place, and that, too, with little acknowledgment to the individual from whom were derived its plan and most of its materials. Although Lowth's treatise was written so early as the year 1758, yet we doubt whether there is at the present day a single work of equal excellence in the same compass."—G. B. CHEEVER, D.D.: N. Amer. Rev., xxxi. 377.

"On this subject [study of the English language] the reader ought to peruse Dr. Lowth's Short Introduction to English Grammar, with Critical Notes. . . . Several niceties of the language are well pointed out."—Blair's Lects. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, Lects. IX. and XII.

Dissert. and Notes, Critical, Philological, and Explanatory, 1778, 4to; 1778, 2 vols. 8vo; 13th ed., Lon., 1842, 8vo; in German, trans. by M. Koppe, Goet., 1779-81, 4 vols. 8vo. Bishop Stock alters Lowth's trans. in some cases in the work entitled Isaiah in Hebrew and English, pub. by the former in 1804, 8vo. Lowth's version is deservedly held in great estimation, though it has not escaped censure for alleged undue freedom with the sacred text.

"A sublime and admirably-executed version."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 287; where see an account of the controversy elicited by Lowth's translation.

See also Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 181.

"Lowth's Isaiah does honour to our age and nation."—DR. BEATTIE.

"No former translator has expressed the meaning and spirit of the evangelical prophet so felicitously as Lowth. . . . Lowth is, perhaps, too partial to conjectural criticism, and the version is too highly wrought for common use; but it is a valuable specimen of sacred criticism, and indispensable to the interpretation of Isaiah."—Orne's Bl. Bib.

"In this, as in his former work, [Prælectiones, &c.] Dr. Lowth has very happily united the most critical judgment with the taste and spirit of poetry."—GIBBON, the historian.

"A much-esteemed version."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"May be consulted with considerable advantage."—Dr. E. Wilson's C. P.

And see Dr. W.'s remarks on the Prælectiones.

"Bishop Lowth not only corrected in many places the common Hebrew text on the authority of manuscripts, but sometimes introduced emendations from mere conjecture. Yet even Lowth has been supposed to have taken this liberty too often, especially by Professor Köcher, of Bern," &c.—Bishop Marsh's Divinity Lects., Camb., 1810, Lect. XII. 130-131, and n.

But see in this connexion Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 287.

"Lowth's conjectures and emendations are by some considered unwarrantable."—HENDERSON.

"The school of Lowth is characterized by an unwarrantable freedom in the use of conjectural emendations which has proved highly injurious to the correct critical treatment of the sacred Scriptures."—Lon. Eccl. Rev.

"His only fault as a sacred critic was a degree of what Archbishop Secker denominated the 'rabies emendandi,' or rage for textual and conjectural emendations. The prevalence of this spirit in his work on Isaiah was the only obstacle that prevented its attaining the same rank as a classic in sacred literature which has been accorded to the Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews."—G. B. CHEEVER, D.D.: N. Amer. Rev., xxxi. 376.

6. Lowth's Serms. and other Remains, now first collected and arranged, partly from original MSS.; with an Introductory Memoir by Rev. Peter Hall, Lon., 1834, 8vo.

"A valuable addition to our theological literature."—Lon. Chris. Remem.

"There are some valuable things in this volume; but, upon the whole, the publication adds more to the quantity of the bishop's writings than to the quantity of his fame."—British Critic, 1834.

See also Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 897. See Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the late Bp. Lowth, Lon. and Goet., 1787, 8vo; Hall's Memoir, as above; Dodsley's Annual Register, 1788; Darling's Cyc. Bibl., vol. I., 1873-1874; Blackw. Mag., xxix. 765, 902; Gent. Mag., vols. lvii., lviii., &c., especially 1835, Pt. 1, 155, 276, 385, 388; Pt. 2, 143, 254.

We must not omit to notice our author's Ode to the People of Great Britain, 1746, which seems to have been his earliest publication, though he had previously written two poems.—The Genealogy of Christ, since inserted in Search's Collections of Poems,—and Catharine Hill, 1729.

We are much in want of a uniform ed. of Lowth's Works, and a biography of the learned and excellent author. As a classical scholar, and especially as an elegant Latin poet, it would be difficult to commend Bishop Lowth too highly. The epitaph on his daughter's tombstone is considered to be unsurpassed in sweetness and pathos:

"Cara, vale! ingenio præstans, pietate, pudore,
Et plusquam natæ nomine cara vale!
Cara Maria, vale! At veniet felicius ævum,
Quando iterum tecum, sim modo dignus, ero
Cara, redi: læta tunc dicam voce, pater nos
Eja age in amplexus, cara Maria redi."

Lowth, William, D.D., 1661-1732, father of Bishop Robert Lowth, (ante), a native of London, was educated at Merchant-Tailors' School, and at St. John's College, Oxford, (elected, 1675); Preb. of Winchester, 1696; Rector of Buriton, Hants, 1699. He pub. a number of sermons, and the following works: 1. A Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Writings of the Old and New Testaments: in answer to [Le Clerc's] Five Letters, Oxf., 1692, sm. 8vo; Lon., 1699, 8vo; 3d ed., with two sermons, 1821, 8vo. 2. Directions for the Profitable Reading of the Scriptures, &c., 1708, '12, '26, '84, '99; last ed., 1821, 12mo.

"A very excellent little treatise, and calculated to assist very beneficially in the reading of the word of God. Even those whose acquaintance with the Scriptures is extensive may derive some useful hints from it."—Orne's Bibl. Bib.

3. Comment on Isaiah, 1714, 4to; Jeremiah, 1718, 4to; on Ezekiel, 1723, 4to; on Daniel and the Minor Prophets, 1726, 4to: all four together, 1727, 2 vols. fol.; 1730, fol.; 1739, fol., &c. These Commentaries, which are a continuation of Bishop Patrick's, are pub. with those of Patrick, Whitby, Lowman, and Arnald. This collective ed. has already come under our notice in our article on ARNOLD, RICHARD, &c.: see also HAMMOND, HENRY, D.D., No. 3. A beautiful ed. of Patrick, Lowth, Arnald, and Whitby's Commentaries, edited by Rev. J. R. Pitman, was pub. in 1822, 6 vols. r. 4to, £6 6s.; fine paper, 24 copies printed, £24. Nor should we omit to notice the excellent ed. of Patrick, Lowth, Whitby, Arnald, and Lowman's Commentaries, pub. by Messrs. J. B. Smith & Co., of Philadelphia, 4 vols. imp. 8vo, $20. This ed. contains the Sacred Text placed at the head of each page. Lowth is an excellent commentator:

"Lowth has compiled a judicious commentary, in which there are some good critical notes and a fine collection of parallels."—DR. DODDRIIDGE.

"It contains many valuable hints on the prophecies."—REV. E. BICKERSTETH.

"Lowth is one of the most judicious commentators on the prophets. He never prophesies himself; adheres strictly to the literal meaning of the inspired writer, and is yet generally evangelical in his interpretations. There is not much appearance of criticism; but the original text and other critical aids were doubtless closely studied by the respectable author. It is often quoted by Scott, and, along with Patrick and Whitby, (with whom he is associated, though a writer of more spirituality than either,) is pronounced by Bishop Watson the best commentary in the English language."—Orne's Bibl. Bib.

The following work, it will be seen, has been also highly commended: Kypke, (G. D.), Observationes Sacre in Novum Test., Wratislaviae, 1755, 2 vols. in 1, 8vo.

"Of all the expositions of the New Testament, conducted on principles like these, I know of none that are superior, or, indeed, equal, to those of Kypke. They are written without pedantry or an affectation of learning, and contain all that is important without being encumbered with extraneous matter."—MICHAELIS.

Dr. Lowth was a man of profound learning, and contributed notes to Potter's ed. of Clemens Alexandrinus, Hudson's Josephus, and other valuable works. See his life by his son, Bishop Lowth, in Biog. Brit.

Luders, Mrs. Catherine, of Indiana, under the nom de plume of Emily Hermann, has contributed a number of poems to The Literary World (N. York) and other periodicals.

Ludewig, Hermann E., b. at Dresden, Saxony, October 14, 1810, after completing his studies at Leipsic and Göttingen, commenced the practice of the law, devoting his leisure hours to books of travels and bibliographical studies.

In 1837, he published Le Livret des Ana: essai de Catalogue Manuel, Dresden, 12mo, giving a list of the books in Ana, which brought their number to about 400, instead of about 200 which had been collected before by Peignot and Hécart.

In 1840, he gave, in his Zür Bibliothekonomie, Dresden, 8vo, pp. xxx., 41, a sample of the catalogisation of large public libraries.

In 1844 and '45, he came to this country, travelled for one year and a half in the different States of the Union, and has since settled as a lawyer in New York and become a citizen of the United States.

In 1846, he published (500 copies) The Literature of American Local History, New York, 8vo, pp. 180; and at the same time published, in the Leipzig Serapeum, articles on American Libraries and Bibliography, which were afterwards acknowledged by Prof. Jewett, in his Notes on American Libraries, as the pioneer-sketches on these topics.

In 1848, Mr. L. issued his First Supplement to American Local History, relating entirely to the local history of the State of New York; pub. in N. York Literary World, Feb. 19, and 30 copies printed in pamphlet-form.

In 1854, he communicated to the Société de Géographie de Paris an article entitled De L'Histoire des Aborigènes du Mexique, in which "he advanced some original and peculiar views respecting the origin, migrations, and mutual relations of the Mexican tribes."

A very valuable work by Mr. Ludewig—Literature of American Aboriginal Linguistics, (a list of vocabularies and grammars of over three hundred American Indian languages)—is now (1857) in the course of publication in London, by Messrs. Nicolaus Trübner & Co., 1 vol. 8vo, about 300 pages. This desirable volume (containing 345 articles) will be enriched by additions from the learned pen of Mr. Nicolaus Trübner, well known as a scholar as well as a publisher. As the first attempt to arrange the materials for a study of American aboriginal languages, this work will be indispensable to the comparative philologist. (See DUPONCEAU, PETER S.) It will form vol. i. of Trübner's Bibliotheca-Glottica,—the carrying-out of a plan suggested in 1804 by C. G. von Marx, in his prospectus of a Bibliotheca-Glottica,—that is, a list of all the grammars and vocabularies of the world, written and published. See Lon. Athenæum, Jan. 1857, 136, 156.

We regret to add to the above (alas! how frequent are our post-mortem memoranda in this Dictionary!) that all hopes of future literary labours on the part of Mr. Ludewig were cut short by his death, Dec. 12, 1856. The author of this Dictionary had urged upon Mr. L. the preparation of an enlarged edit. of his Literature of American Local History, and was not without hopes of success in this suggestion; but this important duty must now devolve upon some one of the Forces, the Murphys, the O'Callaghans, the Felts, the Sargents, or the Drakes, who cultivate this particular field of research. We are glad to observe an interesting biographical sketch of Mr. Ludewig in the (Boston) Historical Magazine for Feb. 1857, 33-34: see also the same periodical for April, 1857, 119.

In order to avoid arrest, he retired to Vevay, Switzerland, where he remained from 1689 until his death. He was the author of several political tracts, but is best known by his Memoirs, pub. at Vevay: vols. i. and ii., 1698; vol. iii., 1699, all 8vo, Lon., 1721-22, 3 vols. 8vo; 1751, fol.; Edin., 1751, 3 vols. 12mo; Lon., 1771, 4to, 5th and best ed., with a portrait of Ludlow by Ravener.

"Ludlow's Memoirs, as to its composition, is below criticism; as to the matter, curious enough. With what spirit written you may judge by his character, which was that of a furious, mad, but I think apparently honest, Republican and Independent."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

"I would particularly recommend Ludlow's Memoirs of the Civil Wars."—LORD CHATHAM.

"To understand the conduct of Cromwell and the Republicans, not only must the Memoirs of Holles be read, but those of Ludlow. Ludlow's work becomes very important after the account of the battle of Naseby. . . . Ludlow was prepared to borrow assistance for his political measures from the army."—*Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. "The Age of Gold is a vigorous didactic and satirical poem on the times. It is written in the good old heroic couplet of Dryden and Pope. Mr. Lunt has mastered well the fine movement of this species of verse, which most poets of the present age have deserted for other kinds. This poem contains many excellently-pointed couplets, several finished and brilliant descriptions, and a vein of thought strongly and clearly brought out and weighty in its character."—*N. Amer. Luttrell, Edward. Gangrene; Memoirs Med., 1792.

Luttrell, Henry, gained some reputation as a poet, and more as a witty and sparkling conversationalist. His principal poetical production—Advice to Julia; A Letter in Rhyme—was pub. in 1820; 3d ed. Letters to Julia, in Rhyme, with Lines written at Amphyll Park, 2d ed., 1822, p. 8vo.

"His Advice to Julia is pointed, witty, and full of observation, showing in every line a knowledge of society, and a tact rarely met with."—Lord Byron's Conversations with the Countess of Blessington, q. v.

Read Letters to Julia—said to be by Mr. Luttrell. Very witty and sparkling—more French than English, though indubitable in the measure and manner. Rather too witty, and the wisdom rather fade, but the production of an able mind, and belonging to a highly civilized and cultivated and not bad state of society."—Portfolio of a Man of the World: Lon. Gent. Mag., 1845, Pt. 2, 578.

"The Advice to Julia is the longest—but, to my mind, the worst—of Mr. Luttrell's poems. The verses on Amphyll Park, and on Rogers's Seat at Holland House, are full of ingenious thought and lively and happy expression."—Moore's Memoirs, &c., Lon., 1853, vol. ii, 300, n.; and see Index, vol. viii, for many notices of Luttrell.

"He is a poet of very exquisite powers."—Blackw. Mag., vii, 520–527, q. v.

"One of the most accomplished men in all England, a wit and a scholar."—THE KLER, in Notices Ambros., April, 1827: Blackw. Mag., xxi, 456.

"He is a most agreeable member of society, the best sayer of good things and the most epigrammatic conversationalist I ever met."—LORD BYRON, ubi supra.

"Few men were better known, thirty years ago, in the world of fashion, than Henry Luttrell. The best man to make the table pleasant, to bring smiles to hostesses' lips, to restore the lost thread of conversation, to say good things as no other man could attempt, and to render mediocre stories in better style than anybody else."—Irish Quar. Rev., Sept. 1853, 662–665, q. v.

Luttrell, Narcissus, d. 1732, of the ancient family of the Luttrells of Dunstar Castle, Somersetshire, was noted, in his lifetime, for his passion for book-collecting, and has become known to the present generation by his Brief Historical Relation of State Affairs, from September, 1678, to April, 1714, Oxford Univ. Press, 1857, 6 vols. 8vo, with a copious Index. Printed from the original MSS., in 17 vols. sm. 4to, in the Library of All Souls' College. For the publication of this work we are indebted to Lord Macaulay's many references to it in his recently, published History of England, vols. iii. and iv. This "valuable manuscript," as Lord Macaulay justly terms it, is thought by some readers to make a very dry book:

"From what had been said we were induced to believe that, like the Diaries of Pepys and Evelyn, the Diary of Narcissus Luttrell would, when fully brought to light, clear up many passages of history otherwise obscure, and, taking us behind the scenes, show us the actors divested of buckram and tinsel, and without those trappings which modern writers had invested them with. But this expectation has not been realized. The volumes contain more than four thousand pages of what the editor—[if there be one—] terms 'a brief relation of state affairs'; but which—brief relations, from the way they are jumbled together in the same page, remind us very forcibly of the Stoke-Pogis shop-list, which contained a goodly assortment of Bibles, bear's grease, pickles, poetry, golly books, and gimlets."—Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1857, 694-698, q. v.

"When we speak of the Diary of Narcissus Luttrell, let us at once warn our readers from expecting much. They will, in such case, be sorely disappointed. There is nothing in it of the delectable conceit of Coryat. . . . We cannot, however, dismiss Narcissus Luttrell without the acknowledgment that he has, by his industry and perseverance, rendered some service to those engaged in historical inquiries. . . . There is in him no charming trace of but he, nevertheless, may be studied with profit, if not with pleasure."—Lon. Athen., May 16, 1857, 621-624, q. v.

'that sportive wit
That heals the folly which it deigns to hit,'

"We do not exactly know whether this book of Dr. Lyall's will be thought the best which has yet been published on Russia; but we are pretty certain that no other English writer has either had the same opportunities to make a good one, or shown a better disposition to make use of his advantages. . . . His testimony, we think, may in all cases be safely depended on, even where his opinions are open to objection; and his work, accordingly, seems to us much more valuable for the facts it contains than for the results which it seeks to embody. . . . It contains many curious and entertaining particulars; but it is a great deal too long and too minute. . . . However, there is a great deal of curious reading for curious readers; and the plates with which the work is illustrated and embellished are for the most part very beautiful."—*LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Lyde, William. See JOYNER.

Lydgate, John, a monk of the Benedictine Abbey of Bury St. Edmund's, supposed to have been born about 1375, was ordained a sub-deacon in 1389, a deacon in 1393, a priest in 1397, arrived at his greatest eminence as a poet about 1430, and died, as is supposed, about 1461. After pursuing his studies at Oxford, he travelled in France and Italy: returning home, fraught with all the learning of the Europeans, he opened a school in his monastery, and, when not engaged with his pupils, amused himself by writing poetry. That he did not restrict himself in the use of his pen may be inferred from the fact that Ritson enumerates no less than two hundred and fifty-one of his pieces, and seems to have lost his patience before he finished his catalogue, as he concludes the list by calling him a "voluminous, prosaic, and drivelling monk." See Ritson's Bibliog. Poet., ii. 66-90. His best-known works are: 1. The Story of Thebes; printed by Spight in his ed. of Chaucer. 2. The Fall of Princes; or, Boke of Johan Bochas; 1st ed. by Pynson, 1494, and several eds. since. That printed by John Wayland, large paper, 1558, fol., bound by Clarke, has been recently marked at £8 18s. 6d. in Joseph Lilly's Catalogue.

"This work is not improperly styled a set of tragedies. It is not merely a narrative of men eminent for their rank and misfortunes: the plan is perfectly dramatic, and partly suggested by the pageants of the times. Every personage is supposed to appear before the poet, and to relate his respective sufferings; and the figures of these spectres are sometimes finely drawn."—Warton: Hist. of Eng. Poet.

At the end is a single leaf, "A Memorial of suche Princes as since the tyme of King Richard the Seconde has been unfortunate in the realme of England," having at the back "The copy of the Queene's Majesties Letters Patentes, for the printing of Prymers and Manuals of Prayers, &c."

3. The Hystory, Siege, and Dystruccyon of Troye; 1st ed., printed by Pynson, 1513, fol. More correctly printed by Marshe, 1555, sm. fol.

"Warton, in his History of English Poetry, speaks with great praise of this famous old poem, 'for its rich and splendid descriptions of rural beauty,' its elegance of sentiment and expression, 'the strength and spirit of its descriptions of combats,' 'its touches of feudal life and manners and the practices of chivalry,' 'its exhibition of a multitude of Oriental fictions and Arabian traditions,' 'its anecdotes of ancient architecture and dramatic exhibitions,' and, what is more curious, its evident allusion to the circulation of the blood. Copies have been sold as high as £11 11s."

4. The Life and Death of Hector, his most Famous Acts at the Siege of Troy, 1614, fol.

"This modern versification from the heroic couplet into six-line stanzas is generally attributed to T. Heywood; Fuller and other writers, mistaking it for the original, are amazed that the language is so much more intelligible than that of Chaucer."—MS. note by Dr. Furner in a copy of the above.

Of his minor poems perhaps the London Lyckpenny is one of the best, and is not without value as a picture of London customs in the early part of the fifteenth century. Bishop Percy treats Lydgate with contempt; Ritson ridicules his "cart-loads" of poetical rubbish, and otherwise insults his memory, as we have seen; and Pinkerton considers him very stupid; but, on the other hand, Gray esteemed him highly; Coleridge vindicates his merits; Turner says that he "has been oftener abused than read;" and Warton, the greatest critic of all, with the exception of Gray, devotes to the monk time, space, and commendation:

"On the whole, I am of opinion that Lydgate made considerable addition to those amplifications of our language in which Chaucer, Gower, and Oecleve led the way; and that he is the first of our writers whose style is clothed with that perspicuity in which the English phraseology appears this day to an English reader. To enumerate Lydgate's pieces would be to write the catalogue of a little library. No poet seems to have possessed a greater versatility of talent. He moves with equal ease in every mode of composition. . . . His muse was of universal access; and he was not only the poet of his monastery, but of the world in general. . . . His manner is naturally verbose and diffuse. This circumstance contributed in no small degree to give a clearness and a fluency to his phraseology. For the same reason he is often tedious and languid. His chief excellence is in description—especially where the subject admits of a flowery diction. He is seldom pathetic or animated."—Hist. of Eng. P. et.

"Among the immediate successors of Chaucer, in England, the celebrated John Lydgate is confessedly the most tolerable."—Ellis's Specimens, ed. Lon., 1845, i. 223-241.

"Oecleve and Lydgate, with equal popularity, but with merit incalculably inferior, supported the renown of English poetry after the death of Chaucer."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Edin. Rev., iv. 158.

"After the death of Chaucer, in 1400, a dreary blank of long duration occurs in our annals. The poetry of Hoccleve is wretchedly bad, abounding with pedantry and destitute of all grace or spirit. Lydgate, the monk of Bury, nearly of the same age, prefers doubtless a higher claim to respect. An easy versifier, he seemed to make poetry familiar to the many, and may sometimes please the few. Gray—no light authority—speaks more favourably of Lydgate than either Warton or Ellis, or than the general complexion of his poetry would induce most readers to do. But great poets have often the taste to discern and the candour to acknowledge those beauties which are latent amidst the tedious dullness of their brethren. Lydgate, though probably a man of inferior powers of mind to Gower, has more of the minor qualities of a poet: his lines have sometimes more spirit, more humour, and he describes with more graphic minuteness. But his diffuseness becomes generally feeble and tedious; the attention fails in the school-boy stories of Thebes and Troy; and he had not the judgment to select and compress the prose narratives from which he commonly derived his subjects. It seems highly probable that Lydgate would have been a better poet in satire upon his own times, or delineation of their manners—themes which would have gratified us much more than the fate of princes."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 125-126.

Lydiat, Thomas, 1572-1646, a native of Oxfordshire, educated at and Fellow of New College, Oxford, obtained the living of Okerton, where he lived happily enough in the midst of his books, until he was thrown into the King's Bench prison in consequence of his inability to pay some debts for which he had become security to oblige a relation. After his release, through the intervention of Archbishop Usher and Sir William Boswell, who discharged the debt for which he was held captive, he suffered greatly in consequence of his courageous adhesion to Charles I. His unhappy experience has been commemorated by Dr. Johnson in the Vanity of Human Wishes:

"If charms yet flatter, once again attend:
Hear Lydiat's life, and Galileo's end."

He was a man of profound learning, and pub. several chronological and astronomical works, in the first of which—Tractatus de variis Annorum formis, &c., Lon., 1146

1605, 8vo—he attacked several of the positions of the renowned Scaliger. The latter treated his adversary with great contempt, (see Scalig. Epist., 291;) but Lydiat, nothing daunted, followed up his blows, and in his Defensio Tractatus de Variis Annorum formis, contra Jos. Scaligerum, (1607, 8vo,) and his Emendatio Temporum, (1609, 8vo,) carried the war on the Scaligerian Chronology quite into Africa: so, at least, thought Usher, if Wood is to be credited. His Canones Chronologie was pub. at Oxford, 1675, 8vo. To Wood's Athen. Oxon., the Genl. Diet., Usher's Life and Letters, Fuller's Worthies, and Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, we must refer the reader who desires to know more of this eminent scholar and loyal subject.

"He was a person of small stature, yet of great parts, and of a public soul; and, though a poor and contemptible priest to look upon, (for so he was held by the vulgar,) yet he not only puzzled Christop. Clavius, and the whole college of mathematicians, but also that Goliath of literature, Joseph Scaliger,—who, when he was worsted by our author's writings, (though he would never acknowledge it, howbeit great men, particularly the famous Usher, held it for granted,) he betook himself unmanly to his tongue, by calling him, in a scornful manner, a beggarly, beardless, and gelt priest."—Wood: Athen. Oxon., Bliss's ed., iii. 187.

"Learned men of unbiassed judgment will maintain that Lydgate had the best in that contest; but here it came to pass what Solomon had long before observed:—'Nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard.'"—Fuller's Worthies, ed. 1849, iii. 22.

"Ante aliquot dies tibi scripsi, ut scirem ex te quis sit Thomas Lydiat iste, quo monstro nullum pertentusius in vestra Anglia natum puto; tanta est inscitia hominis et confidentia. Nescimus quidem illi verum dicere accidit. . . . Non est similis morio in orbe terrarum. . . . Paucis asinitatem ejus perstringam ut lector rideat. Nam in tam prodigioso imperitium scarrabam scribere, neque nostre dignitatis est, neque oti."—Scalg. Epist., 291.

Lye, Edward, 1694-1767, a native of Totnes, Devonshire, educated at Hertford College, Oxford, took holy orders in 1719, was presented to the living of Hlaughton-Parva, Northamptonshire, which he exchanged for that of Yardley Hastings, and devoted his leisure hours to the cultivation of Anglo-Saxon literature. In 1743 he printed, from the MS. in the Bodleian Library, the Etymologicum Anglicanum of Francis Junius, (fol.) to which he prefixed an Anglo-Saxon Grammar, and prolegomena. He next gave to the world (with a Gothic Grammar prefixed) Sacerorum Evangeliorum, Versio Gothica, 1750, 4to, (prepared for the press by Eric Benzell, Archbishop of Upsal,) and after this laboured with great assiduity, until his death, on his Dictionarium Saxonico et Gothico-Latinum, accident Fragmenta Versionis Ulphilane, which was completed by his friend the Rev. Owen Manning, and pub. five years after Lye's death, in 1772, 2 vols. fol. A grammar of both languages is prefixed. A leading feature in this work is the exhibition of the Gothic equivalents. This valuable Dictionary is now worth about the price at which it was published, £3 3s. For a further account of Mr. Lye, see Nichols's Lit. Ance., vol. ix. 751-753. See also Horne's *Bibl. Lyell, Charles, 1767-1849, a native of Forfar, Scotland, an eminent scholar and distinguished botanist, educated at the College of St. Andrew's and at the University of Cambridge, is known to the literary world by a translation of the lyrical poems of Dante, and an essay on The Anti-Papal Spirit of Dante. His collection of the various edits. of Dante and his commentators excited the wonder and admiration of bibliographers, and his botanical library was equally the delight of naturalists. See Lon. Gent. Mag., Jan. 1850, 90. The genus of plants Lyellia was named after the subject of our notice, (by Mr. Robert Brown and Sir W. J. Hooker,) and Professor Lindley dedicated works to the same gentleman.

Lyell, Sir Charles, b. November 14, 1797, at Kinordy, Forfarshire, son of the preceding, after completing his education at Exeter College, Oxford, devoted some attention to the study of the law, but soon abandoned Coke and Blackstone for the more congenial pursuit in which he has gained such distinguished reputation. In 1832 he was appointed Professor of Geology in King's College, London, but did not long retain this position; in the same year he was married to the eldest daughter of the late Leonard Horner, Esq.; in 1836, and also in 1850, he was elected President of the Geological Society; in 1848 he was knighted, and in 1855 received the degree of D.C.L. from the University of Oxford. Sir Charles has given to the world the following works: 1. Principles of Geology; or, The Modern Changes of the Earth and its Inhabitants as illustrative of Geology: vol. i., 1830; ii., 1832; iii., 1833. Second eds. of vols. i. and ii. were called for before the appearance of vol. iii. The 3d ed. of the whole work was pub. in 1834, 4 vols. 12mo; 4th ed., 1835, 4 vols. 12mo; 5th ed., 1837; 6th ed., 1847, 8vo; 7th ed., 1849, 8vo; 8th ed., 1850, 8vo; 9th ed., 1853, 8vo.

"We cannot but express our obligations to him for the great addition he has made in the present volume to our knowledge of nature, and the beneficial influence it is likely to have in communicating a right direction and a philosophical spirit of induction to geological inquiries."—SIR HENRY THOMAS DE LA BEZUE: Lon. Quar. Rev., lxiii. 411-469: review of vol. i.

"It is very interesting and amusing, and should be read by every one who takes an interest in this rising branch of natural history."—Jamieson's Philosophical Journal: notice of vol. i.

"This is a work of no ordinary mind. It bears deeply stamped upon it the impress of talent, knowledge, and research; and, independent of the interesting and important nature of the subject, the depth and general justness of the author's views come recommended to us by the perspicuous and elegant language in which they are clothed. . . . We cannot conclude this notice of the volume without strongly recommending it."—Lon. Athenaeum: notice of vol. i.

"No one, twenty years ago, would have conceived it possible that a work on the principles of geology should appear replete with discussions such as those into which Professor Lyell here enters. . . . A review of the 3d ed. of the whole work, by Dr. Whewell, will be found in the Lon. Quar. Rev., liii. 406-448, and a review of the 8th ed.—we know not by whom—occurs in the Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxix. 412-451. We need not say that these papers should be read through, if the reader desire to know what impression the author has made on the mind of his critics. The Principles of Geology was not reviewed in the Edinburgh Review,—not, however, from the want of a due appreciation of the merits of the author: that periodical refers to it, in a review of the Elements of Geology, as "One of the most popular books ever published in England on the principles of that fascinating department of natural science, and certainly one of the most valuable that has appeared since Mr. Playfair's well-known Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory."—Vol. lxix. 406.

"How distinctly the general tendency of these volumes [Principles of Geology] is to open up new, interesting, and expansive views of the mighty work of creative intelligence. . . . No reader can peruse it without being deeply impressed by the fresh and striking proofs it affords, in every page, of the Almighty Power, Wisdom, and Goodness."—DR. WHEWELL: Lon. Quar. Rev., liii. 448.

2. Elements of Geology, 1838, 12mo; 2d ed., 1847, 2 vols. 12mo; 3d ed., pub. as A Manual of Elementary Geology, or The Ancient Changes of the Earth and its Inhabitants as illustrated by its Geological Monuments, 1851, 8vo; 4th ed., 1852, 8vo; 5th ed., 1855, 8vo. There has been pub., within a few weeks past, Recent Discoveries in Geology and Palaeontology; being a Supp. to the 5th ed. of the Manual of Elementary Geology, April 18, 1857.

"The author has given us a clear and condensed abstract of what he conceives to form the proper 'Elements' of his subject, and has transfused into it not only the result of much reflection, but also a great number of facts which to us were new."—Elin. Rev., lxix. 406-466: review of 1st ed.

"None among its votaries has marked each movement more minutely, or weighed its value and purpose more judiciously, than the distinguished author of this Manual. He has indeed done his task well, and both the beginner and the experienced investigator will find his book an invaluable guide and companion."—Lon. Literary Gazette, 1851, 87-88: notice of 3d ed.

And see p. 266 for a notice of Sir Charles's Anniversary Address before the Geological Society, Feb. 1851.

"In eloquence of description and beauty of language, few works of fiction excel Lyell's comprehensive work on Geology."—Lon. Litig.

A review of the 3d ed. of this work, of the 8th ed. of the Principles of Geology, and of Sir Charles's Anniversary Address before the Geological Society, Feb. 1851, will be found in the Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxix. 412-451; Silliman's Amer. Jour. of Science; Reports of the British Assoc. Many of these papers treat of the geological characteristics of various parts of the United States. One of his best productions is a review (in the Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 437-484) of G. P. Serope's Memoir on the Geology of Central France, Lon., 1827.

"Few passages of greater excellence can be found in any of his productions than some of those in a [this] review," &c.—Elin. Rev., lxix. 407.

"The two works to which we have now referred [The Principles of Geology, and the Elements of Geology] placed our author in the very highest rank of geological writers. Distinguished by the elegance and vigour of their style, by the extensive knowledge which they display and the grand generalizations which they advocate, these volumes have extended the reputation of their author, and raised geology to its present position as one of the most interesting of the inductive sciences."—North Brit. Rev.

Many valuable geological papers by Sir Charles Lyell will be found in the Trans. Geolog. Soc.; Proceedings Geolog. Soc.; Trans. of the Brit. Assoc. for the Advancement of Science; Brewster's Jour. of Science.

"Mr. Buckland, Professor Sedgwick, and Sir Charles Lyell are the most eminent of the new school of geology which has sprung up simultaneously in France and England and which, by a strict application of the Baconian method of philosophizing, has made earth reveal the secret of its formation anterior to the race of man, by the remains imbedded in its bosom. A more fascinating inquiry never was presented to the investigation of the philosopher; and it derives additional interest to the Christian believer from the confirmation which it affords, at every step, of the Mosaic account of creation, and the truth of Holy Writ."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815, 1852, chap. v.

3. Travels in North America, [in 1841-42,] with Geological Observations on the United States, Canada, and Nova Scotia, 1845, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1850, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"These volumes exhibit in a narrow compass more of the bright side of the American character and institutions than we have discovered in the panegyrics of the most ardent democrats who have visited the land of liberty. This effect is produced not only by the hopeful, good-humoured, and unaffected tone in which the excellent writer relates his adventures; the occurrences themselves tell their own favourable story."—Elin. Rev.: copied into the Bost. Liv. Age, viii. 605-612.

Not reviewed in the Lon. Quar. Review; see vol. lxxxv. 183.

"Although, as we have already intimated, only a small part of these volumes is made up from the materials of an ordinary book of travels, yet as such it is none the worse because the author came to inspect American rocks rather than American manners. The remarks he does offer are so sensible and discriminating, so evidently thrown out by one who possesses that rare knowledge,—how to observe,—and who thinks for himself that we only regret that they are so few and cursory, and are a little provoked when he cuts short his observations upon the current topics of the day and falls 'to napping the chuckie stanes' again."—N. Amer. Rev., lxi. 498-518.

"Mr. Lyell visited America not merely as a man of science or a philosopher, but as a man of sense and of the world, eminently imbued with qualifications to constitute him an astute observer."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

"We regard the work as one of the best books of travels that has appeared for some years."—Lon. Spectator.

4. A Second Visit to the United States, [in 1845-46,] 1849, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1850, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1855, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"This is very pleasant, and at the same time very instructive, reading. Sir Charles Lyell ranges, with great ease, liveliness, and rapidity, over an infinite variety of subjects, religious, scientific, politic, social,—from the most profound inquiries into the structure of the immense continent of North America, and the institutions, the resources, the destiny of the mighty nation which is spreading over it with such unexampled activity, down to the lightest touches of transatlantic character and manners. . . . Sir Charles Lyell's present volumes will command the interest of the ordinary reader in a much higher degree than his former valuable Tour, which we take some shame to ourselves for not having reviewed in this Journal."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxv. 183-224.

"If books are now like the sea-sand, good and true books are but as the rarer shells; and voyages and travels, having passed on beyond the interest of mere discovery, are to be estimated by those deeper qualities which make civilized nations acquainted with each other. To this end judgment and candour are more than all the arts of composition, and true candour is perhaps even more than judgment. Sir Charles Lyell's books upon the inexhaustible field of America are distinguished by both these qualities, but more especially by the last, and are worthy therefore to be studied for real increase of knowledge. They comprise observations upon every thing in that theatre of great experiments which would naturally attract the attention of a liberal and cultivated Englishman possessing those advantages of access and intercourse which were at the command of a man not only eminent in science, but conversant with the best society of Europe,—a gentleman by station and a gentleman by nature. . . . We believe these two books of Sir C. Lyell's and Mr. Mackay's [The Western World; or, Travels in the United States in 1846-47, 1849, 3 vols. p. 8vo] to be the most comprehensive, as well as impartial, that have been published in England upon the United States. Sir C. Lyell is by nature and habit a searcher after truth; and Mr. Mackay treats every subject in the spirit of a man intent upon conveying faithful and correct impressions to his readers."—Elin. Rev., xcii. 329-370.

"We know of no books of modern travels so full of agreeable and useful reading, so pregnant with instruction respecting the geology and physical geography of America, and so liberal and candid in their judgments on all the social, political, and religious questions which now everywhere agitate the public mind. There is no object too low for our author's notice, and none too high for his grasp. Whatever warms the heart of the philanthropist, or excites the zeal of the missionary, or perplexes the genius of the statesman or exercises the intellect of the sage, calls forth all his powers of observation, and rouses all his energies of thought. The condition of the criminal and the slave, the educational instruction of the ignorant, the moral and religious training of the people, the amelioration of the condition of the poor, and the equalization of political rights, are all advocated with that earnestness and talent which seldom fail to advance the object at which they aim."—North Brit. Rev., vol. xiv.

"It is less as a book of travels that the Visit is to be regarded than as an account of remarkable scenery and natural phenomena, and a picture of manners and society. In both these points of view Sir Charles Lyell possessed great advantages. He looks at Nature with learned as well as pictorial eyes. He not only sees her wonders and her beauties, but he knows their sources and consequences, so that he informs as well as pleases the mind; and we think this is done more agreeably than on his first journey."—Lon. Spectator: copied into Bost. Liv. Age, xxii. 170-175.

"We take leave of our intelligent and fair-minded author with renewed thanks for the pleasure and instruction we have derived from his book. His scientific observations are full of information and entertainment, though we cannot always go along with him in his theories; but the materials which he has brought together to assist one in forming a correct view of the condition and prospects of various portions of our country, and of the character of the several classes of its inhabitants, are more complete and trustworthy than can be found in any single book of travels in America with which we are acquainted."—PROF. FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lxi. 325-353.

It will be seen by a reference to the N. Amer. Rev. for July, 1851, p. 210,—art. J. F. W. Johnston's Notes on North America,—that Professor Bowen contrasts Sir Charles Lyell's Travels with Mr. Johnston's Notes very much to the advantage of the former.

A most interesting work, the sale of which, in America, had reached 23,000 copies (15,000 8vo, 8000 12mo) by 1853,—four years after the first publication. The London eds. were pub. 1849, r. 8vo; 1850, r. 8vo; 1852, r. 8vo; 1853, p. 8vo; 1855, p. 8vo.

"At a recent meeting in the Academy of Sciences, at Paris, M. Bousingault, while analyzing some bottles of water brought from the Dead Sea, declared that Commander Lynch's Expedition had thrown more light on the climate and topography of that region than any the world has as yet seen, although within the last twenty years many bold travellers have explored that singular lake."

See JENKINS, JOHN S., No. II; Bayard Taylor's Cyc. of Modern Travel, 1856.

"It is for the learned to comment on the facts we have laboriously collected. Upon ourselves the result is a decided one. We entered upon the sea with conflicting opinions. One of the party was skeptical; another, I think, a professed unbeliever of the Mosaic account. After twenty-two days' close investigation, if I am not mistaken, we are unanimous in the conviction of the truth of the scriptural account of the destruction of the cities of the plain. I record, with diffidence, the conclusions we have reached, simply as a protest against the shallow deductions of would-be unbelievers."—COMMANDER LYNCH: Narrative, &c., 1853, 380.

Class-Book of Etymology, 1847, 12mo; revised ed., 1852, 12mo: sale to August, 1857, 22,000 copies. To these valuable works should be added John Oswald's Etymological Dictionary of the English Language, revised by J. M. Keagy, M.D.; new ed., by Joseph Thomas, M.D.; with a Key by James Lynd, 1852, 12mo. The preceding vols. (pub. by E. C. & J. Biddle, Phila.) are used in the public schools of Boston, N. York, Phila., &c. The value of such aids to an accurate knowledge of the English language can hardly be overestimated. The topographical collections for this great work—which should be completed—will be found by the curious in the British Museum, Addit. MSS., 9408-9471. They form no less than 64 vols. Of Mr. Lysons, who was also the author of some minor publications, a biographical notice will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag., May, 1834, 558. See next article.

Lysons, Samuel, 1763-1819, called to the bar, 1798, keeper of the Records in the Tower of London, 1803, brother of the preceding, and also an eminent antiquary, assisted Daniel in the preparation of the Magna Britannia, and gave to the world the following valuable works: 1. An Account of Roman Antiquities discovered at Woodchester, Lon., 1797, colombier fol., £10 10s.

"His work on the remains of the Roman Villa and Pavements found at Woodchester is such a specimen of ingenuity, unwearied zeal, and critical accuracy in delineating and illustrating the fragments of antiquity, as rarely has been equalled, and certainly never surpassed."—Pursuits of Literature.

2. Figures of Mosaic Pavements discovered at Horkstow, in Lincolnshire, 1801, 4to. 3. Remains of two Temples and other Roman Antiquities discovered at Bath, 1802, imp. fol., £3 13s. 6d. 4. A Collection of Gloucestershire Antiquities, 1803, r. fol., 15 Nos., £6 6s.; large paper, £10 10s. 5. Figures of Mosaic Pavements discovered near Frampton, in Dorsetshire, 1808, imp. fol. 6. Reliquiæ Britannico-Romane, containing figures of Roman Antiquities discovered in various Parts of England, 1813-17, colombier fol., 156 plates, most of them col'd, £48 6s. A splendid work. 7. Remains of a Roman Villa discovered at Bignor, in Sussex, 1815, imp. fol., 35 plates. 8. Hist. and Antiq. of Devonshire, 1822, 2 vols. r. 4to.

Dean Buckland, J. Conybeare, J. Hawkins, J. Miller, the Bishop of Cloyne, and others, contributed greatly to this history of the county.

Lyttelton, Lord George, 1708-09-1773, a native of Hagley, Worcestershire, the eldest son of Sir Thomas Lyttelton, and brother of the preceding, was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford; entered Parliament in 1730, and warmly opposed Sir Robert Walpole's administration; became a Lord of the Treasury in 1744, and Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1756. In less than a year he resigned this responsible post to Mr. Legge, and, on the dissolution of the ministry in 1759, retired to private life,—not, however, without being rewarded for his political services by elevation to the peerage, by the title of Baron Lyttelton of Frankley. The following is a list of his lordship's publications: 1. The Progress of Love; a Poem, Lon., 1732, fol.

"Of his Progress of Love it is sufficient blame to say that it is pastoral."—Dr. Johnson: Life of Lord Lyttelton.

2. Letters from a Persian in England to his Friend at Ispahan, 1735, 8vo; 5th ed., 1744, 12mo. 3. Persian Letters, continued, or The Second Volume; 3d ed., 1736, 12mo.

"In his Persian Letters, as in all his other works, Lyttelton is but an imitator; the idea, the name, and some of the details, are borrowed from the Lettres Persanes of the President Montesquieu, then in high repute."—J. W. Croker: Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxviii. 229.

"An imitation of Montesquieu's first, and also his most indifferent, book."—Schlosser's Hist. of the Eighteenth Cent., &c., Davison's trans., Lon., 1842, ii. 68.

4. Monody to the Memory of a Lady lately deceased, 1747, fol. The "Lady" was the poet's wife,—Lucy Fortescue, to whom he was married in 1741. Few monodies are better known. 5. Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of Saint Paul; in a Letter to Gilbert West, Esq., 1747, 8vo. Often reprinted; last ed., 1845, 24mo. Also pub. in Christian Evidences, 1849, r. 8vo; see JENYNS, SOAME, M.P., No. 7. Of the many commendations elicited by this excellent work, none was probably so gratifying to the author as the following:

"I have read your religious treatise with infinite pleasure and satisfaction. The style is fine and clear, the arguments close, cogent, and irresistible. May the King of kings, whose glorious cause you have so well defended, reward your pious labours, and grant that I may be found worthy, through the merits of Jesus Christ, to be an eye-witness of that happiness which I don't doubt he will bountifully bestow upon you! In the mean time, I shall never cease glorifying God for having endowed you with such useful talents and giving me so good a son.

—Your affectionate father,

THOMAS LYTTELTON."

"A treatise to which fidelity has never been able to fabricate a specious answer."—Dr. Johnson: Life of Lord Lyttelton.

"The great advantage of this performance is, that the evidence for Christianity is here drawn to one point of view, for the use of those who will not attend to a long series of argument. The design is to show that the conversion and apostleship of St. Paul, alone considered, is of itself a demonstration sufficient to prove Christianity to be a divine revelation. This design is very happily executed."—Leahnd's Distical Writers, ed. Lon., 1837, 156, q. 7.

"He successfully shows that St. Paul was not an impostor nor an enthusiast, and that he could not have been deceived himself. From all which, his lordship infers the certainty of his conversion and call to the apostleship, and, consequently, the divine origin of the gospel. It is a well-reasoned and acute pamphlet, and discovers considerable acquaintance with the Scriptures."—Orme's Bibl. Bibl.

Lord Lyttelton has discussed the most illustrious instance of conversion to this religion, in the person of St. Paul, a man of the highest natural talents and of the profoundest reasoning and erudition; and he has accompanied the whole with remarks of weight and dignity on the general subject of revelation."—Mathias's Pursuits of Lit.

Lord Lyttelton's Observations elicited a tract entitled The Truth, Certainty, and Simplicity of the Christian Revelation, 1748, 8vo, pp. 32.

6. Dialogues of the Dead, 1760, 8vo. 7. New Dialogues of the Dead, 1762, 8vo; 4th ed., with four new Dialogues, (three by Mrs. Montague), 1763, 8vo.

"They were very eagerly read, though the production rather, as it seems, of leisure than of study,—rather effusions than compositions. The names of his persons too often erabte the reader to anticipate their conversation; and, when they have met, they too often part without any conclusion. He has copied Fenelon more than Fontenelle."—Dr. Johnson: Life of Lord Lyttelton.

"Lord Lyttelton's Dialogues he [Dr. Johnson] deemed a negatory performance. 'That man,' said he, 'sat down to write a book to tell the world what the world had all his life been telling him.'"—Rev. Dr. Maxwell's Collectanea, in Boswell's Life of Johnson.

"Johnson may have thought and spoken slightly of Lyttelton and his works, but scarcely in these terms. He could not have stated as censure what would be in truth the highest praise of such a work,—that it was the result of an accurate observation of mankind."—Croker's note to preceding quotation, in Croker's ed. of Boswell's Johnson, Lon., 1848, r. 8vo, 218.

"In which [the Dialogues of the Dead] we might very easily point out the French influence."—Schlosser's Hist. of the Eighteenth Cent., &c., Davison's trans., ii. 68.

"Where can be found compositions uniting the politeness of the gentleman with the attainments of the scholar, blended in juster proportions than in the Polymetis of Spence, the Athenian Letters, the Dialogues of Lord Lyttelton and Bishop Hurd, and the papers of the Adventurer and Observer!"—Histor. View of Eng. Lit. in Goodhugh's E. G. Lib. Man., 156.

"His [Lytton's] last literary production was his History of Henry the Second, elaborated by the searches and deliberations of twenty [thirty] years, and published with such anxiety as only vanity can dictate.

"The story of this publication is remarkable. The whole work was printed twice over, a great part of it three times, and many sheets four or five times. He began to print in 1755. Three volumes appeared in 1764, a second edition of them in 1767, a third edition in 1768, and the conclusion in 1771."—Dr. Johnson's Life of Lord Lytton

"His Majesty then asked him [Dr. Johnson] what he thought of Lord Lytton's History, which was then just published. Johnson said he thought his style pretty good, but that he had blamed Henry the Second rather too much."—Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. 1848, p. 8vo, 185.

"I read it with as great attention as pleasure: it is not a book to skim, but to learn by heart, if one means to learn any thing of England. You call it the History of Henry II.; it is literally the History of our Constitution, and will last much longer than I fear, the latter will: for, alas! my lord, your style, which will fix and preserve our language, cannot do what language cannot do,—reform the nature of man."—Horace Walpole to Lord Lytton.

"Walpole's opinion, if here sincerely given, has not been ratified by posterity. The History is little read, and not even consulted as much as its laborious diligence deserves: but the period is too remote and the subject too voluminously treated for popularity; and the style which Walpole so much extols seems diffuse and flat to the taste of an age formed on the dazzling brilliancy of Gibbon or the clearer and more mellowed colouring of Hume."—J. W. CROKER: Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxviii, 261.

"Lord Lytton, in his Life of Henry the Second, goes through a very candid and temperate inquiry into this question; and he thinks the Commons was originally a part of the national council or Parliament. The strongest evidence he produces is drawn from the two celebrated instances of the petitions sent, one by the borough of St. Alban's, the other by Barnstable."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. VI.

"The reader may consult Lytton's History—an elaborate and valuable work—with advantage."—SHARON TURNER.

"Lytton's Henry II. is a learned and honest book."—ROBERT SOUTHBY: Letter to John May, Aug. 5, 1805, in Southey's Life and Corresp.

"It is heavy, prolix, but trustworthy, and contains searching investigations into the laws, policy, characters, and events of that reign."—CHANCELLOR KENT: Course of Eng. Reading, Oakley's ed., 1853, 24.

Lord Macaulay, referring to the advantages which the parliamentary experience of Charles James Fox and Sir James Mackintosh gave them as historians, continues:

"Lord Lytton had indeed the same advantages; but he was incapable of using them. Pedantry was so deeply fixed in his nature that the hustings, the Treasury, the Exchequer, the House of Commons, the House of Lords, left him the same dressing-school-boy that they found him."—Crit. and Hist. Essays, London, 1854, ii. 54.

A review of Lytton's Henry the Second, by Gibbon the historian, will be found in the 1st vol. of Mémoires Littéraires de la Grande Bretagne:

"An excellent review,—at once acute, candid, and judicious."—LORD BROUGHTON: Lives of Men of Letters of the Time of George III., London and Glasgow, 1855, 395.

There was also pub. a 4to vol., entitled Additions to Lord Lytton's Works: being two Essays from Common Sense, and two Poems. 11. Poetical Works, 1785, 12mo; Glasgow, 1787, fol.

"Lord Lytton's Poems are the works of a man of literature and judgment devoting part of his time to versification. They have nothing to be despised, and little to be admired."—DR. JOHNSON: Life of Lord Lytton.

"The works of the great Lord Lytton are most important and instructive. Who that has lost a beloved wife can read his Monody, particularly the stanza 'O best of wives, without being moved to tears?'"—DR. VALLEY.

Among his lordship's best poetical compositions are the Advice to a Lady, (Belinda,) and the Prologue to Thomson's Tragedy of Coriolanus. We have already corrected the error (see GOLDSMITH, OLIVER, p. 690) which attributes to Lord Lytton the compilation entitled History of England, in a Series of Letters from a Nobleman to his Son. For further information respecting Lord Lytton and his works, see Johnson's Lives of the Poets, Peter Cunningham's ed., London, 1854, iii. 391-400; Memoirs and Corresp. of George, Lord Lytton, from 1734 to 1773, compiled and edited by Robert Phillimore, 1845, 2 vols.

Lytton, Thomas, d. 1779, aged 35, son of the preceding, is best known as the subject of a remarkable ghost-story, and the reputed author of two vols. of Letters, 1780-82, 8vo, (really written by Combe,) and a vol. of Poems by a Young Nobleman, 1780, 4to,—some of which he may have composed. Within the last few years Lord Lytton's claims to the authorship of The Letters of Junius have been warmly urged by an ingenious but mistaken champion: see JUNIUS, in this Dictionary, p. 1002-1003. Lytton, Sir Edward George Lyton Bulwer, b. 1805, the youngest son of General Bulwer, of Woodalling and Haydon Hall, Norfolk, and Elizabeth Barbara, the only daughter of Richard Warbenton Lyton, Esq., of Knebworth, Herts, was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he graduated B. A. in 1826 and M. A. in 1825. On succeeding, by his mother's death in 1844, to the estates of Knebworth, he exchanged, by royal license, the surname of Bulwer for that of Bulwer Lyton. In 1832, he was returned to the Reformed Parliament as member for Lincoln, and represented the Radical party in that august body until 1841. In 1847, he offered himself as a candidate for the suffrages of the Conservatives or Protectionists of the county of Lincoln, but was unsuccessful; and it was not until 1852 that he again took his seat in the House of Commons, being returned by the voters of Herts. He still (1857) holds his seat in Parliament, and, in the ability which he has displayed in the discussion and management of difficult political measures, has added another to the many instances which disprove the old superstition that men of letters make but indifferent statesmen. In Dec. 1856, he was elected Lord-Rector of the University of Glasgow. In 1827, Mr. Bulwer married Rosina, daughter of Francis Wheeler, Esq., of Lizzard-Connell, Limerick, Ireland. (See next article.) By this lady he has had two children,—a daughter who died at an early age, and a son, Robert, who, under the nom de plume of Owen Meredith, (q. v.) has recently given indications of poetical abilities of no ordinary cast. The subject of our notice was one of the number of those who literally "lisp in verse," having commenced authorship at the rather juvenile age of six years; and by the time he was half-way through his teens he had contributed a volume to the well-filled shelves of the London Circulating Libraries. Since that important epoch he has been no idler in the Republic of Letters, as the following list of his publications gives ample evidence: 1. Ismael; an Oriental Tale, 1820, 12mo. 2. Sculpture; a Poem, 1825. This gained the Chancellor Prize Medal for English Versification at the University. 3. Weeds and Wild-Flowers, [Juvenile Poems,] 1826. 4. O'Neill; or, the Rebel, 1837, p. 8vo. 5. Falkland; a Novel, 1827, p. 8vo. And a very reprehensible novel. See South. Lit. Mess., iv. 788. 6. Pelham; or, The Adventures of a Gentleman, 1828, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 2d ed., (pub. within a few months after the first ed.,) 1828, 3 vols. p. 8vo; again, 1844, 12mo; 1854, 12mo.

"In many parts of it the connexions which involve the most reprehensible violations of social and moral obligation are spoken of as matters of course, and exalted and beautified by the highest colouring of sentiment; and these defects are the more glaring by contrast with the high-wrought lessons of political integrity inculcated in the parliamentary episode. . . . Were a good novel a more rare production, we should have much more to say of the excellencies and defects of this, liable as it is to the gravest exceptions on account of its moral lessons, is certainly one of very high character for striking portraits, richness of thought, strength and originality of conception, and vivacity and energy of style."—W. PHILLIPS: N. Amer. Rev. xxviii. 418-433.

"If the most brilliant wit, remarks as acute in observation as they are profound in judgment, playful satire by the side of sound philosophy, a narrative whose interest never flags, and some pictures of the most riveting interest,—if these can make a work popular, Pelham will be as first-rate in celebrity as it is in excellence. The scenes are laid at the present day and in fashionable life."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"Mr. Bulwer has, in his delightful novel of Pelham, described his idea of a work of fiction."—Blackw. Mag., May, 1830, 711.

"In The Disowned the author has gone, we think, beyond the pitch of his first performance. Not that, taken as a whole, this novel is better executed, or even more interesting, than Pelham. Its plot is not so well ordered; and much of the dialogue, especially in those parts where his fashionables take the parole, is less spirited. But there is more pathos, and more power, a loftier eloquence in many passages, and everywhere something bolder and more adventurous, both in conception and in style."—Southern Review, iii. 473-495.

"If Pelham justly raised for its author a very high character, The Disowned will raise it far higher."—Lon. Lit. Gaz. See No. 6.

8. Devereux; a Novel, 1829, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 1847, 12mo; 1852, p. 8vo; 1855, 12mo.

Among the numerous characters who figure in the pages of this interesting work will be found Lord Bolingbroke, (throughout the work,) Swift, Pope, Addison, Steele, Colonel Cleland, (the supposed original of Will Honeycomb,) Beau Fielding, (the Orlando of The Spectator,) Colley Cibber, Sir Godfrey Kneller, Richard Cromwell, The Duke of Wharton, Lady M. W. Montagu, Duchess of Marlborough, &c.

"I have always found that one is never so successful as when one is least sanguine. I fell into the deepest despondency about Pompeii and Eugene Aram, and was certain—nay, presumptuous—about Devereux, which is the least generally popular of my writings."

Sir Archibald Alison thinks very differently, and considers it impossible to feel any lively interest in scenes and customs so far removed from the circle of every-day experience;

"There is great talent, much learning, and vigorous conception, in the Last Days of Pompeii, by Bulwer, and the catastrophe with which it concludes is drawn with his very highest powers; but still it is felt by every class of readers to be uninteresting. We have no acquaintance or association with Roman manners; we know little of their habits, scarce any thing of their conversation in private; they stand forth to us in history in a sort of shadowy grandeur, totally distinct from the interest of novelist-composition. No amount of learning or talent can make the dialogues of Titus and Lucius, or Gallius and Al. Vespasius, interesting to a modern reader."—*E. says, Polit. "It is a work of great power: the interest never flags; it pauses upon occasions, but, except perhaps in the beginning of the third volume, only to accumulate fresh force. It is thro'ged with character, drawn with a powerful and discriminating hand and finely contrasted."—Lon. Athen., 1835, 905, 923.

"On the whole, even the fame of E. L. Bulwer will be extended by his Rienzi."—Lon. Lit. Gazette, 1835, 771.

Sir Archibald Alison objects that in the plot of this work great latitude in the unities has been taken:

"All the richness of colouring and fidelity in drawing in Sir L. Bulwer's splendid historical romance, Rienzi,—the finest composition in that style in existence,—cannot take away the painful impression produced by the long interval which elapses between the commencement of the story, where the characters first appear, its middle, where the real interest is developed, and its termination, where the catastrophe occurs. It is on the centre, where unity of interest is strictly kept up, that the success of the work depends."—Essays, 1850, iii. 127: originally pub. in Blackw. Mag., Aug. 1846.

"The Last of the Barons is an admirably-chosen historical subject, worked out with even more than the author's usual power and effect; and but for a defect in composition to be hereafter noticed, it would be one of the most popular of all his productions. . . . The grand defect, which chills to a great degree the interest it otherwise would excite, is the crowding of historic incident, and complication of the story. It is so crowded with rebellions, revolutions, and dethronements, that even the learned reader who has some previous acquaintance with that involved period of English history has difficulty in following the story. Ample materials exist for two or three interesting historical novels in its crowded incidents."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Essays, 1850, iii. 538, 543; originally pub. in Blackw. Mag., Sept. 1845.

"Clotted with historical details, anxiously authenticated by foot-notes and conducted in an over-laboured dialogue, the story moves on so slowly and lifelessly, that we could not but ask, as we read, Where are the passion and the power of the author of Eugene Aram,—where the gorgeous colouring of his two Italian romances,—where the deep and delicate thoughts that, in spite of the conceit with which they were encrusted, gave such a charm to Ernest Maltravers? . . . This must not be the last of our author's fictions, unless he is content that his sun should set behind a cloud which posterity by no alchemy of regret or intelligence can convert into a glory."—*Lon. Ainsworth, Esq., 1845, 12mo; 3d ed., 1847, 12mo. Sir Edward was greatly benefited by the hydropathic system, and, in a spirit of true philanthropy, rehearses his experience for the advantage of others. "One of the most remarkable poems of the present generation:—remarkable in a threefold degree,—its conception being strictly original, its language and imagery new, its tendency eminently moral. It has beauties of no ordinary lustre: the animus of the work is essentially humanizing, its plot ingenious, and its effect altogether bold, harmonious, and original. No poem of equal length has issued from the English press for a number of years with any thing approaching to the ability of The New Timon: it augurs a resuscitation of our bardic glories. We may point in an especial manner to the author's originality in analyzing some of our most remarkable political characters, including the Premier, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Stanley, Lord John Russell, O'Connell, &c. The introduction of these clever sketches of our contemporary rulers tends considerably to render the other portions of the romance doubly piquant and zestful. That The New Timon is the production of no inexperienced pen, and that the author is no obscure observer of the social or political advancement of the age, is evident in every paragraph."—Lon. Sun.

"The poem of King Arthur is likely to win the admiration of all who have poetical feeling and knowledge. It takes up a great subject, evolving its national interest. The author has incarnated the dim ideas of a legendary period in flesh-and-blood beings drawn from his own experience. Two of the prominent characters in the poem will at once be recognised, with a strange interest at the present moment, as Louis Philippe and his minister; and keen as well as merciless, though in the light and laughing guise of wit, is the writer's exposure of the qualities that have dethroned and degraded them. This is clearly such a writer's privilege: so Ariosto wrote; so our own Spenser."—Lon. Examiner.

"It was impossible that a writer of Sir Edward Bulwer's profound thought and original genius should not unite, in the course of his career, with the great and the good of every other age and country, on so vital a subject as the direction by Providence of human affairs; and, accordingly, we hail with pleasure evident marks of such a disposition in several of his later works, particularly in the novel of The Caxton Family,—one of the most able and original of his many admirable works. To Sir Edward we are also indebted for the Memoir of Laman Blanchard prefixed to the Sketches from Life by the latter, (see BLANCHARD, LAMAN,) as well as for other literary papers, for which we must be content to make a general acknowledgment. This inexhaustible novelist has commenced the publication of a new novel (48)—

"What will He do with it?"—in the last number (June, 1857) of Blackwood's Magazine. His Poetical and Dramatic Works have been collected into 5 vols. p. 8vo: vol. i., 1852; ii., iii., iv., 1853; v., 1854; pub. by Chapman and Hall, London. An American ed. (the first) of Dramas and Poems, by Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, was pub. in Boston, 1857, 1 vol. 32mo. Of his Novels and Tales there have been several collective eds.,—viz.: With Frontispiece and Vignettes, pub. by Saunders and Otley, London, 14 vols. p. 8vo, 1810-45. Cheap ed., pub. by Chapman and Hall, 20 vols. cr. 8vo, 1848-53. Messrs. Routledge & Co. have recently entered into arrangements with the author for the exclusive publication of his works for a term of ten years; and it is said (we know not with what truth) that for this privilege they are to pay him no less than £20,000. Whilst we do not conceive that either the cause of good morals or the reputation of the author would have been greatly the loser by a convenient forgetfulness in the reprinted editions of several of the earlier and one or two of the later works of this popular writer, we deem it only an act of justice to copy the following very sensible preface from Chapman and Hall's new and revised issue of Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton's Novels and Tales:

"ADVERTISEMENT BY THE AUTHOR.

"For some years I have entertained the wish to publish an edition of my works in such form and at such a price as may bring them within the easy reach of every class of my countrymen. The recent example of an illustrious contemporary (Mr. Dickens) did not, therefore, suggest, though it undoubtedly has served to encourage, the present enterprise.

"In all my writings, those truths that have the most durable connection with the general interests of mankind have ever, in the most warmed my fancy or tasked my reason. With the people, in the larger sense of the word, I have always associated my objects as an author; and in the hands of that people I now place these evidences of the sympathy which exists between all who recognise in labour the true dignity of life. To struggle, and to struggle upwards, is the law which connects the destinies of the multitude with the aspirations of the scholar. All who think are co-operative with all who toil.

"Having, whether as a writer, or at one time as an actor in public life, advocated steadfastly that principle which would place whatever books can convey of profit or of pleasure within the attainment of the humblest reader, so I trust it is not with an ill grace that I now contribute my slender offering to those granaries of intellectual food which our age, with a wiser charity than our fathers', throws open to all who feel, as a want of our nobler nature, the hunger of the mind.

"If I cannot, in works of so light a character, profess to teach, at least it may be mine not ignobly to interest,—not frivolously to amuse; while there is that progressive link between book and book which permits me to indulge the hope that many a mind which my fancies may please, or my speculations may arouse, will be led unconsciously on to the study of wiser instructors and graver masters.

"May these works, then, thus cheaply equipped for a wider and more popular mission than they have hitherto fulfilled, find favour in those hours when the shop is closed, when the flocks are penned! and the loom has released its prisoner! may they be read by those who, like myself, are workmen! may they afford some relaxation after toil, some solace amidst pain, some not unsalutary escape from the stern realities of life! The sterner the realities, the more the escape is needed.—EDWARD BULWER LYTTON."

We have already quoted many opinions respecting the merits and demerits of our author, and have many more before us, which, from lack of space, must remain unquoted. The industrious reader, however, can amuse himself by turning over the following books, while we proceed to the next article of our Dictionary: Allan Cunningham's Biog. and *Crit. "Edward Lytton Bulwer has vigorous and varied powers: in all that he has touched on he has shown great mastery; his sense of the noble, the beautiful, or the ludicrous, is strong; he can move at will into the solemn or the sarcastic; he is equally excellent in describing a court or a cottage, and is familiar with gold spurs and with clouded shoon. . . . Bulwer is devoted to the cause of literature: all his speeches allude to it; his motions in Parliament refer to it; and in private as well as public life he is its warm and eloquent advocate."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"The brilliant fame of Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer as a novelist, and as a dramatic writer, has tended much to eclipse and disparage his appearances as a poet. In the two former departments he ranks deservedly as a magnate: in the last his status is more questionable. although, I confess, this is a thing rather to be felt than explained. He constantly touches the confines of success, and stands before the gate; but the 'Open Sesame' comes not to his lips. Perhaps it is that, in his themes, we have rather able and eloquent treatment than that colouring glow of imagination which has been termed inspiration. With fine descriptive powers, and with boundless range of illustration, there is a want of reliance on simple nature,—of that fusion of the poet in his subject which can alone give that subject consecration,—the poetic art without the poetic vision; and this defect is apparent in all his verse, from his early Weeds and Wild Flowers, O'Neil the Rebel, Ismael, and The Siamese Twins, down to his Eva, or the Ill-Omened Marriage, his Modern Timon, and his more elaborate and ambitious King Arthur. His translations of the poems and ballads of Sciller are, however, justly held in estimation among scholars for their spirit and fidelity."—Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century, 1851, 302-3 33.

"If the romances of Mr. James are deficient in the delineation of the secret feelings that dwell in the recesses of the heart, the same cannot be said of the next great novelist whose genius has adorned English literature. In the highest qualities acquired in this branch of composition, SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON stands pre-eminent, and entitled to a place beside Scott himself, at the very head of the prose-writers of works of imagination in our country. Born of a noble family, the inheritor of ancestral halls of uncommon splendour and interest, he has received from his Norman forefathers the qualities which rendered them noble. No man was ever more thoroughly imbued with the elevated thoughts, the chivalrous feelings, which are the true mark of patrician blood, and which, however they may be admitted by others, never perhaps exist in such purity as in those who, like the Arab steeds of high descent, can trace their pedigree back through a long series of ancestors. In delineating the passion of love, and unfolding its secret feelings, as well in his own as the opposite sex, he is unrivalled in English literature: Madame de Staël herself has not portrayed it with greater truth or beauty. In that respect he is greatly superior to Scott, who cared little for sentiment, and, when he did paint the tender feelings, did so from their external symptoms and from the observation of others only. Bulwer would seem to have drawn his pictures from a much truer and wider source—his own experience. He describes so powerfully and so well because he has felt so deeply. There is no portrait so faithful as that which is drawn by a great master of himself. Rienzi is one of the most perfect historical romances, Godolphin and Ernest Maltravers among the most interesting and charming novels, in the English language. Nor is he only remarkable as a novel-writer; he is at the same time a successful poet and dramatist. He has inhaled the kindred spirit of Schiller in the translation of his ballads. His Timon is by far the most brilliant satire, his plays the most popular dramatic compositions, of the age in which he lives.

"If some of his other works are not of equal merit, it is only the usual fate of genius to be more happy in some conceptions than others. In all the marks of deep reflection and profound thought are to be seen, as well as great observation of and power in delineating character. A more serious defect is to be found in the occasional choice of his subject, and the charms with which his magic pencil has sometimes environed vice. The greatest admirers of his genius cannot but feel surprised that he should have chosen as the heroine of one of his novels a woman who commits three murders, including that of her own husband and son; or regret that one so capable of charming the world by pictures of romance in its most elevated form should ever have exerted his powers on the description of low life or characters and scenes of the most shocking depravity. It is true he never makes licentiousness in the end successful, and the last impression in his works, as well as innumerable exquisite reflections, are all on the side of virtue; but in intermediate stages it appears often so attractive that no final catastrophe can counteract the previous impression. Every one knows that this is no more than what occurs in real life; but that is just the reason why additional force should not be given to it by the charms of imagination. It is true, painting requires contrast, and the mixture of light and shade is requisite to bring out the forms and illustrate the beauty of nature; but the painter of the mind, not less than of material objects, would do well to recollect the rule of Titian,—that the greater part of every picture should be in mezzotints, and a small portion only in deep shade."—Alison's Hist. of Europe, 1815-1852, clmap. v.
