Fothergill, John, M.D., 1712-1780, an eminent physician, a member of the Society of Friends or Quakers, was a native of Carr End, Yorkshire. After travelling on the continent, he settled in London, where he gained such fame in his profession that he enjoyed an income of about

£7000, and left an estate of £80,000. He endowed a seminary for young Quakers at Ackworth, near Leeds, assisted Sydney Parkinson in his account of his South Sea Voyage, and printed Anthony Purver's (a Quaker) trans. of the Bible from the Hebrew and Greek, at an expense of £2000. 1. "The person of Dr. Fothergill was of a delicate rather than extenuated make. His features were all expressive, and his eye had a peculiar brilliancy. His understanding was comprehensive and quick, and rarely embarrassed on the most sudden occasions. There was a charm in his conversation and address that conciliated the regard and confidence of all who employed him; and so discreet and uniform was his conduct, that he was not apt to forfeit the esteem which he had once acquired."

Partly in verse and partly in prose; much in the style of Robert Greene. Three sheets only. Bibl. Anglo-Poet., 74, £6. It is reprinted in the Harleian Miscellany.

"The intention of this Pamphlet was to expose the sin of drunkenness, and the folly and danger of those who give themselves up to that chaguable, silly, and health-destroying vice; a vice, in which a man takes the utmost pains to drown his own reason, to commence a fool, the object of a sober man's resentment and reproach, and to ruin both his own estate and constitution."—OLDYS.

Foulis, or De Follis, Henry, 1638?–1685, entered Queen's Coll., Oxf., 1654; Fellow of Lincoln's Coll., 1659; took holy orders, but devoted himself to historical studies. 1. Hist. of the Wicked Plots and Conspiracies of our blessed Saints, the Presbyterians, &c., Lon., 1662; Oxf., 1674, fol.

"Which book, tho' full of notable girds against that party, yet it hath been so leasing to the royalists (who have found much wit and mirth therein) that some of them have caused it to be chained to desks in public places, and in some country-churches, to be read by the vulgar. But as by the publishing of this book he hath much displeas'd the Presbyterians, of whom some have fallen foul upon him in their writings for so doing; so hath he more displeas'd another party for the writing of this book following:

"[2. The History of the Ionish Treasons and Insurgations, with an Account of many gross Corruptions and Impostures of the Church of Rome, &c., Lon., 1671 and '81, fol. Which book had it not fallen into the hands of a knavis bookseller, might have been extant in the lifetime of the author, and so consequently more complete and exact than it now is. At its first publication, I was inform'd by a letter written by a noted man of that party, that the papists did look upon the said book as a simple thing—that he (the author) fought against his own shadow, and that all sober Catholics did disallow much of what he combats against."—*Athen. It is to be remembered that Anthony Wood shows no mercy to Dissenters; especially such as had left the Church of England; unless, indeed, they became Roman Catholics. Mr. Cooper describes Fowler as "An able, hdy. faithful, indefatigable servant of Christ. He was quick in apprehension, solid in his notions, clear in his conceptions, sound in the faith, strong and demonstrative in arguing, mighty in convincing, and zealous for the truth against all errors."

Fowles, Rev. James H., 1812–1854, b. at Nassau, New Providence, was the son of Lt. Henry Fowles of the British Army. He graduated at Yale College in 1831, and about 1833 was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York. He subsequently received ordination at the hands of Bishop Bowen of S. Carolina, and, after officiating in several parishes in that State, in 1845 accepted the rectorship of the Church of the Epiphany, Philadelphia, then recently vacated by the removal of the Rev. Dr. Stephen H. Tyng to New York. He here laboured with great zeal until within a few months of his death, when obliged to resign his duties from ill health. 1. *Protestant Epis. "We should be glad to make some extracts from these sermons, but it is about as difficult to do this as it would be to substitute any other language for that of the author. Each sermon is a piece of solid masonry. It must be taken as a whole to be appreciated; and what is uncommon, there is not a sermon in the book which will not read better the second time. For close logical reasoning, for distinctness of doctrine, for scriptural style, and for power of thought, few sermons we have ever seen equal them."—*Prot. Epis. Quarterly Rev. and Ch. Reg., N. Fox, Rt. Hon. Charles James, Jan. 24, 1749–Sept. 13, 1806, second son of the first Lord Holland and Lady Georgiana Carolina, eldest daughter of Charles, Duke of Richmond, was educated at Eton, and at Hertford Coll., Oxf. He studied the classics to great advantage under the eye of the celebrated Drs. Barnard and Newcome, and distinguished himself by his proficiency in the ancient languages. This taste and erudition he retained through life, as is abundantly evinced by his letters to Gilbert Wakefield and his controversies with Dr. Warton. In his 14th year he visited the continent, and also in 1765 and '66, where that love of gaming was acquired which proved the bane of his future life. In 1768 he took his seat in Parliament, and entered upon that brilliant political career which for a long term of years gave him so commanding a position in the eyes of the world. As it is in this capacity that Mr. Fox is principally known, a detailed account of his life will not be expected in a work devoted to authors and their productions. It is sufficient that we indicate the works where fuller information can be had. The student is therefore referred to—1. Hist. of the Political Life and public Services as a Senator and a Statesman of the Rt. Hon. C. J. Fox, Lon., 1783, 8vo. 2. Memoirs of the Life of R. B. Sheridan, 1799, 8vo. 3. F., selected and in part written by Philopatris Varricensis, 1809, 8vo. This work, principally a collection of eulogies upon Fox, is by Dr. Samuel Parr. See a review of it by the Rev. Sydney Smith, Edin. Rev., xiv. 353. 8. Memoirs of the latter years of C. J. F., 1811, 8vo. Appendix, same year, by J. B. Trotter. This gentleman was Mr. Fox's private secretary. 9. Sir S. E. Brydges's ed. of Collins's Peerage, 1812. 10. Corresp. of C. J. F. with Gilbert Wakefield, 1796-1801, 1813, 8vo. See end of this article. 11. F., edited by Lord John Russell, vols. i., ii., iii., pub. to Dec. 1854. 20. Hist. Sketches of the most eminent Orators and Statesmen of ancient and modern time, N. York, 1855, 8vo. 21. Article BURKE, EDMUND, in Allibone's Critical Dictionary of English Literature and Eng. and Amer. Authors, Phila., 1859, inap. 8vo.

To these many others works might be added; such as Waxall's Memoirs, Wilberforce's Life, &c., but our list is sufficiently long for most readers. In addition to the Speeches, &c. already referred to, Mr. Fox is the author of some juvenile Latin and Greek compositions, some pieces in the New Foundling Hospital for Wit, an Essay on Wind, of which 50 copies were privately printed, political pamphlets, the 14th, 16th, and perhaps some other numbers of the "Englishman," pub. in 1779, and a History of the Early Part of the Reign of James II., pub. in 1808, 4to, by his nephew, Lord Holland. This is an unfinished production, written with great accuracy, but with such pharisaical punctiliousness of style, that the absence of the Reverent copia verborum of Cicero is painfully felt.

"He once assured me, says Lord Holland, that he would admit no word into his book for which he had not the authority of Dryden."

This remark reminds us of the elegant, the truly classical, compliment paid by Mr. Prescott to Washington Irving in the Preface to the History of Ferdinand and Isabella. The eloquent historian, who has performed his task in that masterly manner which forbids all regret at the selection of his theme, remarks that had Mr. Irving persevered in a design once entertained by him of occupying the same ground, he should have abandoned the field,

"If not from courtesy, at least from policy: for, though armed with the weapons of Achilles, this could give me no hope of success in a competition with Achilles himself."

Had Dryden's vocabulary been at the command of the historian of the Reign of James II., we should still have lacked the magical charm which captivates the reader of the Essay on Dramatic Poesy. We may truly apply to him what he declares of Shakspeare:

"Dryden's magic could not copied be, Within that circle none durst walk but he."

In the House of Commons, indeed, Fox could display the force and beauties of the English tongue in a manner which Dryden would have gladly copied; but he needed the excitement of opposition or the stimulus of immediate applause, and sank in the socket when there was no one to admire his brilliancy. Dr. Parr, whose admiration of Fox was excessive, and who would have commended the history of Tom Thumb, if recorded by the leader of the New Whigs, is glad to have a legitimate occasion for the expression of his devout veneration.

"Nothing," says he, referring to Fox's History of James II., "can exceed his anxious endeavour to discover the truth of facts for himself, nor his scrupulous care to present it fairly and fully to his readers. In this respect, all must own he discharged his trust with ability rarely equalled, and with fidelity never surpassed."

Yet the work elicited Some Observations, by the Rt. Hon. George Rose, 1809, 4to, which were answered in a Vindication of Fox's History, by Sergeant Samuel Heywood, 1811, 4to. There was also pub., in 8vo, a work entitled Remarks on Fox's History of James II. We should not omit to state that, of the History of James, some copies were pub. on large paper, 4to, and some of elephant folio size.

"It was also during the early progress of printing the first volume of these [Typographical] Antiquities, at Mr. Savage's, in Bedfordbury, Covent-Garden, that I used to see the sheets of Mr. Fox's Historical Work hanging up in every direction through the dwelling-house and adjacent yard. It will be naturally supposed that five thousand copies of a quarto volume, with five hundred more upon a larger paper, and yet another two hundred and fifty of an elephantine size, were not likely to be carried through the press where the premises were small, without seeking to subvert every passage and corridor of the building. . . . [Note.] It was doubtless the boldest experiment ever made with a large paper speculation; but it succeeded. In due course, what at first came forth as a rapid and overboiling torrent, at a high price subsided into a quiet channel, and became obtainable on very moderate terms. Yet, considering the extraordinary number of copies printed, I do not consider this book of the commonest possible occurrence. As the work of an AUTHOR whose name can never perish, it must necessarily form 'part and parcel' of every well-ordered library. Why is it not classed in 'rank and file' with the octavo Humes, Robertson, and Gibbons?"—Diddin's Reminiscences of a Lit. Life, vol. i. 277.

"The topmost step [of Authorship] . . . may be considered as the tender of the leading booksellers of the day to become purchasers (and of course publishers) of Mr. Fox's Historical Work, when Mr. Miller was the fortunate adventurer at the price of FOUR THOUSAND GUINEAS."—Ibid., vol. i. 185.

The octavo size, for which Diddin, the Bibliomaniac, sighed, can now be obtained. Fox's History was pub. in an octavo vol. by Bogue of London, in 1846, bound with Armand Carrel's Revolution in England; again, 1854. See CARREL, ARMAND.

A copy of the elephant quarto size was illustrated by the late Mr. Gray of Harringay Park, at an expense of 36 guineas. It is bound in 2 vols. 4to. It fell into the hands of Mr. H. G. Bohn of London, who offered it at the trifling price of £8 8s.

This article is already longer than we can well justify, yet we feel unwilling to conclude without quoting a few lines of tribute to the eloquence of this great orator. This subject is ably treated by our learned and excellent correspondent, Dr. C. A. Goodrich, in his admirable work, already referred to, entitled Select British Eloquence. In this volume, which should be in every collection of any pretensions, will also be found six of Mr. Fox's best speeches. Undoubtedly Fox owed much of his success as an orator to the most careful and elaborate cultivation of his great natural genius. He proposed to himself, as the first object of life, oratorical distinction; and by gradual ascents he at length reached the summit. We by no means rank him with Pitt in vigour, or with Burke in fervour; but in promptness, lucidity, and fulness, Fox knew no superior.

Burke describes him exactly, in those graphic lines which excited the bitter indignation of meddling, pompous little Dr. Parr:

"I knew him when he was nineteen; since which time he has risen by slow degrees to be the most brilliant and accomplished debater the world ever saw."

This is it: he was a brilliant and accomplished debater. He had on ordinary occasions far greater power over his auditors than either of his great contemporaries and rivals. He lacked the moral elevation and the commanding sway of Pitt, but he knew better how to touch the passions. He had less philosophy than Burke, but he possessed far more tact. In the knowledge of man he was inferior to either, but in the knowledge of men he left both far in the rear. Their respective influence over their auditors illustrated our distinction. When Pitt thundered his anathemas, they hung their heads with confusion; when Burke exhorted them by their love of virtue and truth, they were half persuaded to make an alliance with virtue: but when Fox arose, full of blandishments of voice and manner, and instructed and amused them by turns, they forgot their terror and their repentance, and gave him their hearts and their votes.

The discussion of the question, how far the eloquence of Fox may properly be compared with the ancient model, to which doubtless he laboured to conform his style, has elicited opinions so contradictory, from two great critics, that we may well decline to enter the lists.

"He certainly possessed, above all moderns, that union of reason, simplicity, and vehemence, which formed the prince of orators. He was the most Demosthenean speaker since Demosthenes."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

But, says Lord Brougham, in reference to this dictum,—"There never was a greater mistake than the fancying a close resemblance between his eloquence and that of Demosthenes."

In reviewing these rather antagonistic opinions, Dr. Goodrich points out ten characteristics of the oratory of Fox which bear a striking resemblance to the well-known peculiarities of Demosthenes, and instances other points in which the dissimilarity is quite as obvious. The clearness of intellect which distinguished the great English orator did not lack that prevailing influence which can only be lent by the warmth of the passions.

"His feeling," says Coleridge, "was all intellect, and his intellect was all feeling."

"I have seen his countenance," says Godwin, "lighten up with more than mortal ardour and goodness; I have been present when his voice was suffocated with tears."

In kindness of temper and geniality of disposition in private life no man surpassed the indignant "Thunderer" of the Commons of England. He knew no animosities outside of the lines of party entrenchments.

"He was," said Mr. Burke, shortly after their separation, "a man who was made to be loved."

Dr. Franklin, a close observer of men and manners, was most favourably impressed with the appearance of sincerity and warmth which pervaded his whole character. In a letter to David Hartley, dated "Passy, 6th Sept., 1753," he remarks:

"Enclosed is my letter to Mr. Fox. I beg you would assure him that my expressions of esteem for him are not mere professions. I really think him a great man, and I should not think so, if I did not believe he was at bottom, and would prove himself, a good one."—Spark's Works of Franklin, vol. x. 1, 2.

But alas! that period never arrived; a great man and an eloquent orator Fox certainly was; but to that highest title which can be proposed to man's loftiest ambition—a GOOD MAN—the great English statesman could lay no claim.

Two articles on Fox, by the Rt. Hon. John Hookham Frere, will be found in the Lon. Quar. Rev., ii. 375, and vi. 518. See, also, articles by the Rev. Sydney Smith, in Edin. Rev., xiv. 490, and xviii. 325; and a review of Fox's Corresp. with Gilbert Wakefield, by the Earl of Dudley, in Lon. Quar. Rev., ix. 313. See also a review of Fox's James II., by Lord Jeffrey, in Edin. Rev., xii. 271; and a notice by Francis Horner of the French trans. of 'his work, in Edin. Rev., xv. 190.

We have referred to Dr. Parr's enthusiastic admiration for Mr. Fox. We quote an amusing exemplification:

"When I pronounced the words Mr. Fox arises! Parr would roar out 'stop!' and, after shaking the ashes out of his pipe, and filling it afresh, he would add, 'Now, you dog, do your best!'"

"In the course of the speech, he would often interrupt me, in a tone of triumphant exultation, with exclamations such as the following: 'Capital!'—'Answer that, if you can. Au ter P.H.!' and at the conclusion, 'That is the speech of the orator and statesman!'"—New Month. Mag., Aug. 1826, where will be found many interesting recollections of Dr. Parr.

"If I were to be asked what was the nature of Mr. Fox's eloquence, I should answer that it was only asking me in other words what I understood to be the character of eloquence itself, when applied to the transactions of British Government and Laws."—ERSEINE.

Fox, George, 1624-1690, the founder of the Society of Friends or Quakers, was a native of Drayton, Leicestershire, where his father followed the occupation of a weaver. George was bound apprentice to a shoemaker and grazier, and, whilst engaged in tending his sheep, enjoyed those opportunities for undisturbed meditation which resulted in the formation of that character of solid piety and religious zeal which eminently distinguished his future life. In 1643 he abandoned his occupation, and four years later he became an itinerant preacher, rebuking sharply whatever he deemed worthy of reprobation, and often "holding forth," without invitation, to congregations assembled for regular service. These "breaches of the peace" led to frequent imprisonments, involving great hardships and privations, which were patiently submitted to by one who was always ready to lay down his life in defence of what he believed to be the truth. About 1669 he was married to Margaret Fell, the widow of Thomas Fell, a Welsh Judge. It will not be expected that we should follow him in his arduous and unremitting efforts for the benefit of his fellow-beings. The reader will find ample sources of information in the works indicated below. In the course of his public ministrations he twice visited the continent, spent two years in assiduous labours among the American colonies, and repeatedly visited different portions of Great Britain. He died in London in 1690, continuing his public addresses until within a few days of his death. A list of his separate publications will be found in Bibl. Brit. His writings were published in three vols. fol., viz.: 1. Journal of his Life, Travels, &c., 1694, fol.; 1709, 2 vols. 8vo; 1765, fol. 2. Collection of many Select and Christian Epistles, Letters, and Testimonies written by George Fox, 1698. 3.  Gospel Truth Demonstrated in a collection of doctrinal books given forth by George Fox; containing principles essential to Christianity and Salvation held among the people called Quakers, 1706. A new ed. of his works has been pub. in Phila., 8 vols. 8vo. See Sewel's Hist. of the Quakers; Neal's Puritans; Rees's Cyclopædia; Jonah Marsh's Life of Fox, 1848, 12mo; Samuel M. Janney's Life of Fox, with Dissertations on his Views concerning the Doctrines, Testimonies, and Discipline of the Christian Church, Phila., 1853, 8vo.

Fox's Journal is a volume of great interest, and has been highly commended even by those who felt little sympathy for the author's religious peculiarities.

"It is one of the most extraordinary and instructive narratives in the world: which no reader of competent judgment can peruse without revering the virtue of the writer."—SIR JAMES MACINTOSH. "I have read through the ponderous folio of George Fox. Pray how may I return it to Mr. Skewell at Ipswich? I fear to send such a treasure by a stage-coach: not that I am afraid of the coachman or the guard robbing it, but it might be lost. Can you put me in a way of sending it safely? The kind-hearted owner trusted it to me for six months; I think I was about as many days in getting through it, and I do not think that I skipped a word of it."—Charles Lamb to Bernard Barton. Feb. 1823.

The reader will find a brief notice of Fox's labours in Scotland in this Dictionary, article BARCLAY, ROBERT. We have quoted, in the article referred to, William Penn's opinion of Robert Barclay, and it is but fitting that we should record the testimony of the same eminent authority to the excellence of the character of George Fox. He mentions in terms of warm commendation his meekness, humility, and moderation; tells us that he was

"Civil beyond all forms of breeding; in his behaviour very temperate, eating little, and sleeping less, though a bulky person. . . . He had an extraordinary gift in opening the Scriptures, but above all, excelled in prayer. The reverence and solemnity of his address and behaviour, and the ferventness and fullness of his words, often struck strangers with admiration."

"This is evidently the work of a person of taste and intelligence, not much accustomed to write with a view to publication. It is composed in an easy conversational style, with very little of the getting up of authorship, or the parade of literary accomplishments. It is written, however, in a very pleasing and lively manner, and indicates great good sense and liberality of sentiment; although the want of pretension is sometimes carried the length of carelessness, and the want of method is sometimes productive of considerable embarrassment."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., ix. 224-242.

"It is a pleasant book, and contains a good notice of both its subjects, and judicious criticisms on their works; but it is quite as interesting for the glimpses it gives of the fine accomplishments and generous spirit of its author, who spent some time in Spain when he was about thirty years old, and never afterwards ceased to take an interest in its affairs and literature. . . . An excellent abstract of it (in the play of The Star of Seville) in its original state, and faithful translations of parts of it, are to be found in Lord Holland's Life of Lope. . . . For notices of him [Jovencallos] see. . . . Lord Holland's Life of Lope de Vega, 1817, Tom. Fox, or Foxe, John, 1517–1587, the Martyrologist, a native of Boston, Lincolnshire, was educated at Brasenose Coll., Oxf., where he attained great distinction by his extraordinary acquisitions. His love of study he retained after he had left college: for we are assured by his son that before he was thirty years of age he had read over all the Greek and Latin fathers, the schoolmen, and the proceedings of councils and consistories. He received the degree of B.A. in 1538, and in 1543 was elected Fellow of Magdalen College. In 1545 he was accused of heresy, and, boldly proclaiming his opinions to be in favour of the Protestant Reformation, he was expelled from his college. After supporting himself for some time as a tutor in the family of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Warwickshire, and subsequently in the household of the Duke of Norfolk, he found himself in danger from the vigilance of Gardiner, and escaped with difficulty to the continent. He here meditated his great work—the Acts and Monuments of the Church, or Book of Martyrs. The first draft of it was an octavo volume, pub. at Strasbourg, 1554, in Latin, entitled, Commentarii rerum in Ecclesie Gestarum, maximarumque per totam Europam persecutionem à Wiclavi temporibus ad hanc usque etatam descriptarum; in one book. Reprinted, with 5 other books, at Basil, 1559, fol. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned home, was pensioned by his former pupil, now fourth Duke of Norfolk, and through Secretary Cecil received a prebend in the Church of Salisbury. No office in the church would have been thought too good for him, had he been willing to forget scruples to which he adhered with self-denying pertinacity. He refused to subscribe to some of the canons, and boldly petitioned the Queen on behalf of the German Anabaptists. He spent the rest of his days in great esteem for his profound learning, sincere piety, and unfeigned humility, and died, amidst the blessings of the nation, in 1587, in his 70th year. He pub. a number of theolog. treatises, tables of Grammar, the Latin play of De Christo triumphante, &c., an account of which will be found in the authorities cited below; but he is best known by the great work already mentioned—the Acts and Monuments of these latter and perilous days, touching matters of the Church; wherein are comprehended and described, the great persecutions and horrible troubles that have been wrought and practised by the Romish Prelates, specially in this Realm of England and Scotland, from the year of our Lord 1000, unto the tyme now present. Gathered and collected according to the true copies and writings certificate, as well of the parties themselves that suffered, as also out of the Bishops' Registers, which were the doers thereof, Lon., 1563, fol.; 1583, fol. Enlarged, 1570, 2 vols. fol.; 1576, 2 vols. fol.; 1612, '32, '43, 3 vols. fol.; 1650, 2 vols. fol.; 9th ed., 1684, 3 vols. fol.

Respecting the new editions of this valuable work, we can give nothing more to the purpose than the following extract from a letter before us, written by an eminent bibliographer, who, having instructed our grandfathers in his youth, continues in his advanced age to enlighten their descendants with the results of his pains-taking researches. It would indeed be difficult to estimate the value of this gentleman's thirty-five years' service in the British Museum.

"A new edition, superintended by the Rev. S. A. Cuttley, M.A., was published at London, 1836–41, in 8 vols. 8vo; to which was prefixed a Life of Foxe, including a vindication of his work from the attacks of Romanists, by the Rev. George Townsend, D.D. of Durham. This edition having been severely criticised, (and not without reason) a carefully-revised and considerably-improved edition was published between the years 1846 and 1849. But the best edition of Foxe's Acts and Monuments will be found in the Reformation Series of the Ecclesiastical Historians of England, published at London, also in 8 vols. 8vo, in 1853 and following years. The editors (the Rev. R. R. Mendham, M.A., and Josiah Pratt, Jun., M.A.) have most carefully corrected the whole work, and have verified the documents consulted by Foxe. This edition is beautifully and accurately printed, and is enriched with a valuable Appendix of Documents. Dr. Townsend's Life and Vindication of Foxe are retained, with some corrections."—Thomas Hartwell Horne, D.D., to S. Austin Allibone, British Museum, London, April 25, 1856.

All the other so-called Foxe's Book of Martyrs, edited respectively by Milner, Buckley, Pratt, Clarke, Cobbin, Cunningham, Kennedy, Seymour, Mrs. Tonna, or any one else, are merely abridgments,—of more or less value. The first abridgment, by Rev. Timothy Bright, M.D., (q. v.)

pub. in 1581, and again in 1589, 4to, is now a rare book, but is little valued. We have already referred under the appropriate head to the Rev. Dr. Thomas Bray's Martyrology, or Papal Usurpation and Persecution, 1712, fol., intended as a supplement to the Acts and Monuments.

The Acts and Monuments received the approbation of the first three Archbishops of the Reformed Church of England, viz.: Parker, Grindal, (who assisted Fox in the work,) and Whitgift. It was ordered to be set up in every one of the parish churches in England, as well as in the common halls of archbishops, bishops, deans, archdeacons, and heads of colleges; and its influence in keeping alive the Protestant feeling in Great Britain and North America is too well known to be disputed.

Without entering at large into the merits of the work, it certainly would appear that, as regards conscientiousness of performance and adherence to records, the faithfulness of the Book of Martyrs cannot intelligently be questioned. For the same reason—abundant testimony—that we believe Sir Thomas More, the Roman Catholic Chancellor, to have been one of the best of men, do we believe John Fox, the Protestant chronicler, to have been one of the most veracious of historians. As regards the credit accruing to their respective communions from the adherence of these two great men, it is to be remembered that More simply retained the bias of education and habit, whilst Fox had to overcome both of these before he could be a Protestant. Both were honest as the sun; and had Sir Thomas More presented us with Roman Catholic Acts and Monuments as well attested as those of John Fox, we should have considered them entitled to equal credence. It has been confidently declared that "All the popish writers from Harpsfield to Milner have not proved, and it never will be proved, that John Fox is not one of the most faithful and authentic of all historians."

The testimony of the two eminent authorities subjoined must have great weight with those who can appreciate the value of evidence:

"Mr. Fox must not go without the commendation of a most painful searcher into records, archives, and repositories of original acts and letters of state, and a great collector of MSS. All the world is infinitely beholden to him for abundance of extracts thence communicated to us in his volumes. And as he hath been found most diligent, so most strictly true and faithful in his transcriptions."—STRYPE: Annals of the Reformation.

"Mr. Fox hath very diligently and faithfully laboured in this matter, [of Archbishops and Metropolitans], and searched out the truth of it as learnedly as I know any man to have done."—ACCUSATION WHITTIER, after he "had read over his Acts and Monuments from the one end to the other." See Defence of the Answer to the Admonition, p. 333.

The great Camden thus refers to the Martyrologist and his work:

"Ex eruditum numero obiit Johannes Foxus Oxoniensis, qui Ecclesiasticum Anglie Historiam sive Martyrologium indefesso veritatis studio, primum latine postea anglie auctus, magna cum laude contexit."—Annales Elizabethæ, p. 558, edit. 8vo.

Bishop Burnet, a most pains-taking searcher into original papers, thus sets his seal to Fox's conscientiousness as a historian:

"Having compared these Acts and Monuments with the records, I have never been able to discover any errors or prevarications in them, but the utmost fidelity and exactness."—Prof. to Hist. of the Reformation.

But faithfulness in a historian is one thing; infallibility is quite another thing; and we doubt not at all that, as Wood and Collier among Protestants, and many Roman Catholic commentators, affirm, Fox has, without any intention to deceive, admitted exaggerations, and even sometimes fictions, which diminish the value, whilst they add to the bulk, of a book of great learning, research, and historical as well as theological value.

But for critics, who lived long after the historian and the historian's opportunities, to pretend to know the contents of records which they never saw, is a little more than absurd; it is foolish and impertinent, and places the offender beyond the lines of polite and intelligent controversy. Undoubtedly John Fox was not an infallible chronicler nor a perfect man; and if any modern Quixote seek for a religionist without zeal, an advocate without partialities, a partisan without prejudice, and a man without passions, he must needs go altogether out of the world for his Phoenix.

It is much to be said of any man, in the absence of all perfection, which is recorded by Fuller of our historian:

"Although the richest mitre in England would have counted itself preferred by being placed upon his head, he contented himself with a prebend of Salisbury. How learnedly he wrote, how constantly he preached, how piously he lived, and how cheerfully he died, may be seen at large in the life prefixed to his book."—Church History.

To this life, written by his son, and to the authorities subjoined below, we refer the curious reader who wishes to see a specimen of that which has been written for and against the famous Martyrologist:

"Several of Fox's other works—his Treatise on Justification, and the Sermons on Christ Crucified, and on Christ Triumphant—are excellent."—Bickersleth's C. S.

Nor should we omit to acknowledge the pious zeal of Fox in collecting the Works, appending thereto the Lives, of William Tyndale, John Frith, and Robert Barnes, 1573, fol. He tells us that he collected them that they might "Remain as perpetual samples—shining in the church of Christ—to geeve light to all posteritie."—See BARNES, ROBERT.

Francis, John W., M.D., LL.D., one of the most distinguished of American physicians and men of letters. b. 1789, in the city of New York, is the son of Melchior Francis, a native of Germany, who settled in America about 1784. The subject of this memoir enjoyed as a youth the learned preceptorship of George Strebeck and John Conroy, distinguished for their attainments in the classical and mathematical departments. In 1809 he graduated at Columbia College, from which in 1812 he received the degree of Master of Arts. In 1807, whilst still an under-graduate, he commenced the study of medicine under the eye of the celebrated Dr. Hosack, and gained the warm approbation of his discriminating tutor by his assiduous devotion to the object of his pursuit.

"During the period of his professional studies for four collegiate years, he never absented himself from a single lecture, nor attended one without making notes or abstracts on the subject taught by the lecturer."

What an example is this to the students of the present day, and how great has been the reward, in large stores of professional erudition, in public esteem, and national reputation, of the hours thus devoted to the acquisition of useful knowledge!

In 1811 the laborious student received from the College of Physicians and Surgeons of N. York, organized in 1807, the degree of M.D.; and, a few months later, received from his old preceptor, Dr. Hosack, the offer of a co-partnership in business. This flattering offer was indeed the highest compliment that could be paid to the talents and acquirements of the young physician, and was of course accepted. The connection thus formed lasted until 1820. In 1813 Dr. Francis was appointed lecturer on the Institutes of Medicine and Materia Medica in the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York, and laboured with great zeal in the discharge of his arduous duties. Anxious to transplant to his native soil whatever was valuable in the renowned medical schools of Europe, he left home for a tour in Scotland, Ireland, Holland, and France, and derived profitable themes of meditation and practice from the friendly converse of the celebrated Gregory, Jamieson, McCurtney, Denon, Gall, Cuvier, and other benefactors of the science and erudition of their race. The ardent thirst for knowledge, the acuteness of perception, and breadth of comprehension, which distinguished the young American, did not escape the notice nor fail to elicit the approbation of his distinguished European friends.

"A mind more ardent in the pursuit of useful knowledge," writes the late Patrick Colquhoun, "perhaps never existed; and I have no doubt he will, in a few years, stand at the head of his profession." See Life of Eddy, by S. L. Knapp.

Upon the return of the young traveller to New York, he was appointed Professor of the Institutes of Medicine in the College of Physicians and Surgeons; and, on the death of Dr. Stringham in 1817, succeeded that gentleman in the department of Medical Jurisprudence. Two years later he became Professor of Obstetrics, in addition to his former duties, and held this appointment until 1826, when he resigned at the same time with his colleagues, Drs. Hosack, Mott, McNevin, and Mitchell.

A majority of the professors who had resigned from the College of Physicians and Surgeons organized a new institution under the name of Rutgers Medical College, and its success was so great that at the end of four terms the Legislature closed the doors of the last-named institution. In the Rutgers Medical College Dr. Francis was chosen Professor of Obstetrics and Forensic Medicine, and his classes were crowded with students from different parts of the republic, attracted by his great and growing reputation. For other particulars connected with the life of this eminent physician, useful citizen, and public benefactor in many senses, we must refer the reader to the source to which we are indebted for the facts above stated,—the biography of Dr. Francis in the National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans, vol. iv., Phila., 1853, 8vo. "Dr. Francis writes as he might have told the story in successive sittings, bound by no prearranged order, but letting each name or topic suggest that which succeeds. "For forty years he has been engaged in the most active exercise of professional duties in his native city. But amid the incessant avocations of a large practice, Dr. Francis has found time to manifest his interest in, and genius for, the liberal studies. In a series of able discourses delivered before various literary and scientific bodies, he has illustrated the value and charms of horticulture, the fine arts, American biography, history, and science. He is identified with the city of New York more prominently than any individual in the same professional sphere. He is always consulted in questions of local and personal interest, and his co-operation is deemed essential on occasions of municipal festivity, literary and scientific anniversaries, and charitable enterprises."—Men of the Time, N. York, 1852, 12mo.

"In his social character Dr. Francis represents an almost obsolete class. He is emphatically a New Yorker in his feelings and associations. The frank hospitality of the early colonists is combined around his fireside with the discursive intercourse of the savant and the patriotic sentiment of the citizen. In American history and biography he is an oracle, and has been an efficient member of all the institutions originated to advance the interests of literature and science in his native city. With enlarged benevolence, a mind unwearied in inquiry, constant association with men and books, and an ardent love of knowledge as well as friendship for its promoters, Dr. Francis finds time, even amidst the unceasing claims of an extensive practice, thus to identify his name with the progress of the age and the literature of his country."—National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans, vol. iv., 1853, Svo.

Dr. Francis was at one time supposed to be the author of the Letters of Junius: see JUNIUS.

Francis, Sir Philip, 1740–1818, son of the preceding, was a native of Dublin, and educated under the eye of his father, and at St. Paul's School, London. After visiting Portugal in 1760, in company with Lord Kinnoull, the British Envoy, and holding a clerkship in the War Office, which he resigned in 1772, he went in 1774 to India, where he became a member of the council of Bengal. Brought into contact with that disgrace to the British name—that man of violence and blood—Warren Hastings, Francis opposed his measures, and a controversy ensued which resulted in a duel, in which the latter was wounded. He returned to England in 1781, was chosen M. P. for Yarmouth, Isle of Wight, in 1784, received the order of the Bath in 1806, and died in 1818. He pub. a number of political Speeches, Remarks on the defence of Warren Hastings, Letters on the E. India Company, Reflections on the Currency, &c., 1784–1814. These were but of temporary interest, and are now forgotten; but the name of Sir Philip Francis will always occupy a prominent place among literary men, in consequence of the persuasion entertained by many that he was the author of the famous LETTERS OF JUNIUS. But this is by no means a settled point, and we think that the claims put forward on behalf of Sir Philip Francis are now less readily allowed than they were some twelve or fifteen years past. We do not, however, by this remark intend to express any opinion of our own upon the subject. We shall best discharge our duty by indicating to the reader the sources of information upon this famous controversy. See JUNIUS.

Franklin, Benjamin, LL.D., January 17th. 1706–April 17th, 1790, one of the most distinguished of modern philosophers, was a native of Boston, Massachusetts, where his father, Josiah Franklin, an emigrant from England, carried on the business of a tallow-chandler and soap-boiler. At the age of eight years, Benjamin, the youngest but two of seventeen children, was sent to a grammar school; from which he was removed in less than a year to be placed under the tuition of George Brownell, who conducted a seminary in which writing and arithmetic formed the principal branches. His father designed him for the ministry, but, needing his assistance at home, withdrew him from school when only ten years of age, and set the future philosopher to work at "cutting wicks for the candles, filling the moulds for cast candles, attending the shop, going of errands," &c.

If we at first felt inclined to blame the father for so soon depriving his son of the benefits of schooling, we must remember that the good tallow-chandler was straitened in circumstances, and had the expenditures of a large family to provide for on a business probably incapable of much profitable extension.

His occupation was extremely distasteful to him, and he felt a strong inclination to exchange it for the roving life of a sailor, but paternal prudence prevented the consummation of this project. His father allowed the youth to abandon a trade for which he evinced so strong an aversion, and bound him apprentice to his brother James, who had recently (in 1717) returned from London, and established a printing-office in Boston. Young Franklin soon became an adept in his new business, and doubtless was stimulated by the nature of his duties to that love for reading which remained with him through life.

Among his favourite works were The Pilgrim's Progress, Plutarch's Lives, Burton's Historical Collections, an odd volume of The Spectator, and Cotton Mather's Essays to do Good. The perusal of this last work had so great an effect upon his future life that we shall be excused for quoting from a letter from Dr. Franklin, written after he had attained great eminence, to a son of Cotton Mather:

"When I was a boy, I met a book entitled Essays to do Good, which I think was written by your father. It had been so little regarded by its former possessor that several leaves of it were torn out, but the remainder gave me such a turn of thinking, as to have an influence upon my conduct through life: for I have always set a greater value on the character of a doer of good than any other kind of reputation: and if I have been, as you seem to think, a useful citizen, the public owes all the advantage of it to that book."

We may remark, as a comment to the above, that the first edit. of the Essays to do Good was pub. in 1710, 12mo. In 1807, 12mo, it was repub. by the Rev. George Burder, who detracted greatly from its value by making such alterations in the style as he thought would "render it more agreeable to a modern reader,"—changing "many quaint and obsolete words and phrases for others more intelligible and pleasant." This is as intolerable as the modern versions of Chaucer and Spenser. Carrying out this bright idea, Mr. Burder favours us with no less than three hundred "improvements" on the first eighteen pages! But we are happy to state that the Massachusetts S. School Society have recently (Boston, 1845, 18mo) issued an exact reprint of the original; the latter is now so scarce that a copy was recently sold in Boston for six dollars. The new edit. is pub. at a low price, and should be circulated by thousands and tens of thousands through the land. If the whole of the seed thus sown shall produce but one more FRANKLIN, the expenditure will be richly repaid.

But to return to the subject of our memoir. Among young Franklin's first literary efforts were some specimens of ballad poetry, which he printed, and sold himself in the streets of Boston:

"One was called The Light-House Tragedy, and contained an account of the shipwreck of Captain Wortbilkale with his two daughters; the other was a sailor's song, on the taking of the famous Teach, or Blackbeard, the pirate. They were wretched stuff, in street-ballad style; and when they were printed, my brother sent me about the town to sell them. The first sold prodigiously, the event being recent, and having made a great noise. This success flattered my vanity; but my father discouraged me by criticising my performances, and telling me verse-makers were generally beggars. Thus I escaped being a poet, and probably a very bad one."
—Autobiography.

The autobiography from which we have quoted is, or should be, familiar to all of our readers, and a repetition will not be expected here. To this work, and to Dr. Jared Sparks's continuation of his Life, we must refer the reader for interesting particulars connected with the career of this extraordinary man and his important contributions to human knowledge. A rapid summary of the principal incidents in his life is all that our space will allow. In 1723, disgusted with the continued severity of his brother's treatment of him, he removed to Philadelphia, where he obtained employment with a printer named Keimer, and devoted himself to his business with great industry and intelligence. Having made the acquaintance of Sir William Keith, then Governor of Pennsylvania, he encouraged him to establish a printing-office for himself. As his father did not second this proposal, Sir William sent him to London in 1724 to select the proper stock for a small printing-establishment. Unable to accomplish the object of his visit, he worked at his trade in London for about two years, and then returned to Philadelphia. It was whilst still in London, in 1725, that he pub. A Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity, Pleasure and Pain. This essay introduced him to the acquaintance of Mandeville, the author of The Fable of the Bees. It is not to be doubted that intimacies with English freethinkers at this period, and with French deists and atheists at a later stage of his life, did much to engender those latitudinarian sentiments upon religious subjects which Franklin is known to have entertained. The essay on Liberty and Necessity, &c. is not to be found in any edition of Franklin's Works. When Dr. Sparks, in 1840, pub. his edit., this essay was supposed to be lost; but a copy has since been discovered in England. See (London) Notes and Queries No. 114, Jan. 3, 1852; Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit. In 1727 he entered into partnership with a person named Meredith, and two years later wrote and published an anonymous pamphlet on the Nature and Necessity of Paper Currency; which was the cause of an issue of bills amounting to eighty thousand pounds. In the same year he purchased from Keimer the Pennsylvania Gazette, the 1st No. of which bears date Dec. 24, 1728. Franklin and Meredith's first issue was No. 40. Through the columns of this journal, and by the agency of the Junto—a club established by him on his return from London—the enterprising printer now controlled political influence to no contemptible extent. In 1730 he was married to his old acquaintance, Mrs. Rogers, formerly Miss Read, who had been deserted by her husband; and in the same year he founded the public library in Philadelphia. In 1732 he first pub. Poor Richard's Almanac, which had a great run—in several cases an annual sale of 10,000 copies—for 25 years. Franklin was now a prominent member of the community, and in 1736 was chosen Clerk of the Provincial Assembly; in 1737 he became deputy postmaster at Philadelphia; and in 1753 Postmaster-General for British America. In 1741 he pub. The General Magazine and Historical Chronicle for all the British Plantations in America; in 1742 he invented what is still called The Franklin Stove; in the next year he originated The American Philosophical Society; in 1749 he had the great satisfaction of establishing in Philadelphia an institution of learning, which, in the maturity of its age and fame, as the University of Pennsylvania, has conferred honour of the most substantial kind upon the country at large; in 1752 he was rejoiced at the demonstration of the truth of his theory of the identity of lightning with electricity; in 1754 he sat as a delegate in the Congress of Commissioners of the Colonies convened at Albany, in expectation of a rupture with France; the value of his suggestions in this assembly, respecting articles of union between the colonies, is well known to the student of early American history. Nor must we omit to mention, among the services rendered by Franklin at this period, the important aid which he rendered to Braddock at the moment of extreme need. In 1756 we find Franklin commanding in person on the frontier, and ready to endure any hardships or perils which the nature of his duties might impose. From 1757 to 1762 he spent in England, as agent for Pennsylvania, (he was complimented by the degree of Doctor of Laws, conferred by the Universities of Edinburgh, Oxford, and St. Andrew's, and chosen Fellow of the Royal Society,) and in 1764 again visited England, with a petition for a change in the charter. Whilst in Great Britain, he was not forgetful of the interests of the colonies at large, and it was doubtless greatly owing to the effect produced by his celebrated examination before the Parliament in 1766 that the obnoxious Stamp Act was repealed.

When the difficulties between Great Britain and her colonies had been aggravated to a state of open hostility, Franklin was elected a member of the American Congress, and, after signing the Declaration of Independence, was appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to France, where he arrived in December, 1776. His success in enlisting the sympathies and substantial assistance of the French people in behalf of the American colonies is well known. He returned to Philadelphia, September 14, 1785, at which period he had attained the advanced age of 80 years, and was received with the enthusiastic acclamations of a grateful nation. From the original letter in the valuable collection of our esteemed friend, George P. Putnam, of New York, we copy the following testimonial to the patriotic services of the individual to whom it is addressed:

"Mount Vernon, Sept. 25, 1785.
"DEAR SIR: Amid the public gratulation on your safe return to America, after a long absence, and the many eminent services you had rendered it—for which as a benefitted person I feel the obligation—permit an individual to join the public voice in expressing his sense of them; and to assure you, that as no one entertains more respect for your character, so none can salute you with more sincerity or with greater pleasure than I do on the occasion.

"I am—dear sir,

"Your most obt.

"and most Hble. Servt.,

"G. WASHINGTON.

"The Hon'ble DOCT. FRANKLIN."

He filled the dignified office of President of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania from 1755 to 1788, and in 1787 sat with Washington and Hamilton in the Federal Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States. His last public act was to sign his name, as President of the Abolition Society, to a memorial to Congress, and the last paper which he composed was on the same subject. He died of a disease of the lungs, after a short illness, on the 17th of April, 1790.

We have already referred to the religious opinions of this eminent philosopher as "latitudinarian," and we know not that we could have selected a better word. Nothing can be fairer, in this connexion, than to quote his own words, in a letter to Dr. Stiles, dated March 9, 1790, but a few weeks before his death:

"As to Jesus of Nazareth, my opinion of whom you particularly desire, I think the system of morals and his religion, as he left them to us, the best the world ever saw, or is likely to see: but I apprehend it has received various corrupting changes; and I have, with most of the present dissenters in England, some doubts as to his divinity."

"It may not be unnecessary to remark, that if we may credit Dr. Priestley, Dr. Franklin was not correct in estimating the sentiments of a majority of the dissenters in England."—PRESIDENT ALLEN.

When Thomas Paine proposed to publish his infamous Age of Reason, Franklin wrote to him,

"I would advise you not to attempt unchaining the tiger, but to burn this piece before it is seen by any other person. If men are so wicked with religion, what would they be without it?"

A notice, however cursory, of the religious opinions of Benjamin Franklin, would be hardly just if it omitted to notice a memorable declaration made by him, on an august occasion, of his profound belief in the overruling providence of Almighty God.

His celebrated speech in the Convention for forming a Constitution for the United States, when supporting his motion for providing daily prayer in the Convention, was in these words:

"In the beginning of the contest with Britain, when we were sensible of danger, we had daily prayers in this room for the Divine protection. Our prayers, sir, were heard, and they were graciously answered. All of us who were engaged in the struggle must have observed frequent instances of a superintending Providence in our favour. To that kind Providence we owe this happy opportunity of consulting in peace on the means of establishing our future national felicity. And have we now forgotten this powerful friend? or do we imagine we no longer need His assistance? I have lived, sir, a long time, [81 years]; and the longer I live the more convincing proofs I see of this truth, that God governs in the affairs of man. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without His notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without His aid? We have been assured, sir, in the sacred writings, 'that except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it.' I firmly believe this; and I also believe that without His concurring aid, we shall succeed in this political building no better than the builders of Babel; we shall be divided by our little partial local interests; our projects will be confounded; and we ourselves shall become a reproach and a by-word down to future ages. And what is worse, mankind may hereafter, from this unfortunate instance, despair of establishing government by human wisdom, and leave it to chance, war, or conquest. I therefore beg leave to move that henceforth prayers, imploring the assistance of Heaven and its blessing on our deliberations, be held in this assembly every morning before we proceed to business; and that one or more of the clergy of this city be requested to officiate in that service."

His death was sincerely mourned both in Europe and America.

"Mirabeau announced in the General Assembly of France that 'the genius which had freed America, and poured a flood of light over Europe, had returned to the bosom of the Divinity.' 'Everywhere,' to use the language of Rochefoucauld, 'he was the object of the regrets, as he had been of the admiration, of the friends of liberty.'"

Turgot celebrated his discoveries in electricity, and his labours in behalf of freedom, in the striking line written by him under Franklin's portrait:

"Eripuit cœlo fulmen, septrumque tyrannis."

The history of this celebrated line need not here be repeated.

His Experiments and Observations on Electricity, made at Philadelphia, [proving that lightning and electricity are the same,] and communicated in several Letters to Mr. P. Collinson of London, were pub. in that city in 1751, '53, '54, 3 Pts. 4to. They were not originally designed for publication, but Collinson thought them too important to be withheld. The public interest in these experiments justified Collinson's anticipations. "Nothing," says Priestley, "was ever written on the subject more justly applauded. All the world, even kings, flocked to see them, and retired full of admiration." They were tested with eminent success by M. de Loz, in Paris, by M. Beccaria, in Turin, by Richmann, in Russia, and by philosophers in various countries. Professor Richmann, as if to rebuke his temerity, was struck dead, in the midst of his investigations, by the formidable element which he had chosen for a plaything. The 4th edit. of his letters and papers on electricity, enlarged by essays on various philosophical subjects, appeared in 1769, 4to. This edit., and the 5th, which was pub. five years later, is supposed by Dr. Sparks to have received some degree of attention from the author, who was then in London. Translations of his writings were made into Latin, French, Italian, and German, and appeared in various parts of Europe. In 1772 M. Dubourg made a new collection of Franklin's writings, including some not before printed, and pub. them at Paris, 2 vols. 4to. In 1779 another collection was pub. in London, consisting of Political, Miscellaneous, and Philosophical Pieces. These, few of which were in print before, were edited by Benjamin Vaughan, an intimate friend and correspondent of the author. In 1787 a selection from the above edits. was pub. in a thin 8vo.

In 1793 there appeared in London what is called The Works of Dr. Franklin, in 2 vols.; in 1798 a selection of his pieces was pub. in Paris, 2 vols. 8vo; and in 1806 an edition, superintended by a Mr. Marshall, was issued in London, in 3 vols. 8vo. In 1816-19 edits. were pub. in England and the United States, by William Temple Franklin, grandson of the author, and Mr. William Dunne of Philadelphia, (also a descendant of Dr. Franklin,) first in 3 vols. 4to. (Lon.) subsequently in 6 vols. 8vo, Lon., 1818; also in 1835; Phila., 1818. The Phila. ed., in 6 vols. 8vo, contains some papers and letters not to be found in the Lon. ed. It has been reprinted in 2 vols. r. 8vo. There is a Lon. ed. of his Life and Writings, 1818, 2 vols. 8vo. There has been republ. at Paris, in 2 vols., a selection from Franklin's writings in Spanish, translated from the French by Mangino. Further particulars respecting the eds. of Franklin's writings will be found in the Preface to Sparks's ed., Boston, 1836-40, to which we are indebted for many of the facts now stated. New ed. of the same, thoroughly revised, with additions and new illustrations, Phila., 1858, 10 vols. 8vo. This edition is the only complete one, and contains about six hundred and fifty letters and miscellaneous papers (more than one-third of the whole bulk of the new ed.) not to be found in any other collection. Of these, upwards of four hundred and sixty had never been printed. The Familiar Letters of Franklin, pub. in 1833 by Dr. Sparks, are included in this ed., and magazines, pamphlets, and newspapers have been industriously examined, and no printed paper omitted which is known to have been written by Franklin. The number of books, papers, &c.—excluding letters—is no less than 304!

"In classifying these materials, the following arrangement has been adopted:

- "1. Autobiography.
- "2. Essays on Religions and Moral Subjects and the Economy of Life.
- "3. Essays on General Politics, Commerce, and Polit. Economy.
- "4. Essays and Tracts, Historical and Political, before the American Revolution.
- "5. Political Papers during and after the American Revolution.
- "6. Letters and Papers on Electricity.
- "7. Letters and Papers on Philosophical Subjects.
- "8. Correspondence.

"Under each head all the articles have been placed in the order in which they were written, with the date of each prefixed wherever this could be ascertained. The Correspondence is also printed in chronological order from beginning to end, without regard to the contents of the letters. This method was believed to be preferable to any attempt at a classification, because in numerous instances a single letter treats of various subjects, both of a political and of a private nature."—Preface.

We need not dwell upon the great value of the learned editor's notes and historical remarks, which illustrate the text. Dr. Sparks has not forgotten the great importance of a copious index to a work of this character—to a good work of any character. He gives us, indeed, no less than five indexes, viz.: Index. I. A List of the Author's Writings, chronologically arranged. II. Letters written by Franklin to Individuals and Public Bodies. III. Letters addressed to Franklin by Various Persons. IV. Miscellaneous Letters. V. General Index.

Can any collector of American history do without such a noble set of volumes as this?

As regards minor publications, Franklin's autobiography has been frequently pub. in America and England, and we have edits. of his Life by Holley, Stanley, Weems, and Weld, and sundry compilations from his writings. On this eminent philosopher and statesman—of whom Lord Brougham declares that “his genius ranks him with the Galileos and the Newtons of the Old World,” and of whom Mirabeau does not scruple to assert, “Antiquity would have raised altars to this mighty genius,”—it would be easy to quote pages of panegyric; but our space allows of but brief citation. At the conclusion of this article, however, we shall refer the reader to other papers upon the fertile themes of Franklin and his discoveries.

“A singular felicity of induction guided all his researches, and by very small means he established very grand truths. The style and manner of his publication on electricity are almost as worthy of admiration as the doctrine it contains. He has endeavoured to remove all mystery and obscurity from the subject. He has written equally for the uninitiated and for the philosopher; and he has rendered his details amusing and perspicuous, elegant as well as simple. Science appears in his language in a dress wonderfully decorous, best adapted to display her native loveliness. He has in no instance exhibited that false dignity by which philosophy is kept aloof from a useful inmate and servant in the common habitations of man, that, to preserve her merely as an object of admiration in temples and palaces.”—SIR HUMPHRY DAVY.

“This self-taught American is the most rational, perhaps, of all philosophers. He never loses sight of common sense in any of his speculations; and when his philosophy does not consist entirely in its fair and vigorous application, it is always regulated and controlled by it in its application and result. No individual, perhaps, ever possessed a juster understanding, or was so seldom obstructed in the use of it by indolence, enthusiasm, or authority. . . . The distinguishing feature of his understanding was great soundness and sagacity; combined with extraordinary quickness of penetration. He possessed also a strong and lively imagination, which gave his speculations, as well as his conduct, a singularly original turn. The peculiar charm of his writings, and his great merit also in action, consisted in the clearness with which he saw his object—and the bold and steady pursuit of it, by the surest and the shortest road. He never suffered himself in conduct, to be turned aside by the seductions of interest or vanity, or to be seared by hesitation and fear, or to be misled by the arts of his adversaries. Neither did he, in discussion, ever go out of his way in search of ornament, or stop short from dread of the consequences. He never could be caught, in short, acting absurdly, or writing nonsensically; at all times, and in every thing he undertook, the vigour of an understanding at once original and practical was distinctly perceivable.

“But it must not be supposed that his writings are devoid of ornament or amusement. The latter especially abounds in almost all he ever composed; only nothing is sacrificed to them. On the contrary, they come most naturally into their places; and they uniformly help in the purpose in hand, of which neither writer nor reader ever loses sight for an instant. Thus, his style has all the vigour and even conciseness of Swift, without any of his harshness. It is in no degree more flowery, yet both elegant and lively. The wit, or rather humour, which prevails in his works, varies with the subject. Sometimes he is lighter and sarcastic; often gay and even droll; reminding us, in this respect, far more frequently of Addison than of Swift, as might naturally be expected from his admirable temper, or the happy turn of his investigation. . . . Upon the whole, we look upon the life and writings of Dr. Franklin as affording a striking illustration of the incalculable value of a sound and well-directed understanding, and of the comparative uselessness of learning and laborious accomplishments. Without the slightest pretensions to the character of a scholar or man of science, he has extended the bounds of human knowledge on a variety of subjects, which scholars and men of science had previously investigated without success; and has only been found deficient in those studies which the learned have generally turned from in disdain. We would not be understood to say any thing in disparagement of scholarship and science; but the value of these instruments is apt to be overrated by their possessors; and it is a wholesome mortification to shew them that the work may be done without them. We have long known that their employment does not insure its success.”—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., viii. 327-341; xxviii. 275-302, q. v.

These last reflections of Lord Jeffrey hardly require a scathing answer. It were as wise to say that the American Indian, whose native talent enables him to fashion his canoe with a rude flint, could not make a better canoe, and sooner despatch his work, with the steel axe and the sharp tools used by his civilized neighbour. Had Franklin been an educated man, doubtless he would have been enabled to add larger contributions to the stock of human knowledge than those which have immortalized his name.

See papers on Franklin, his Correspondence and his Discoveries, in the N. Amer. Rev., vii. 289, by A. Norton; xxxvii. 249, by W. B. O. Peabody; lix. 446, by Francis Bowen; Meth. Quar. We are glad to observe an announcement of the intended publication (N.Y., 1859) of Letters to Benjamin Franklin from his Family and Friends: a collection of about eighty original letters, 1751-90. These are in the possession of Franklin Bache, M.D., and are being carefully copied and annotated by Mr. William Duane, (great-grandsons of Benjamin Franklin.) Edition, 250 copies, (8vo, about 250 pp.) 10 copies on large paper, $10 each.

Franklin, Eleanor Ann, 1795-1825, a daughter of Mr. Porden, architect, was married in 1823 to Sir John Franklin, the unfortunate navigator. 1. The Veils; or, The Triumph of Constancy; a Poem, in six Books, Lon., 1815, 8vo. 2. The Arctic Expedition; a Poem, 1818. This poem, suggested by a visit to the Isabella and Alexander, discovery ships, led to an acquaintance with Sir John Franklin, one of the adventurers, which resulted in marriage. 3. Cœur de Lion; an Epic Poem on the third Crusade, 1824, 2 vols. 8vo. Mrs. Franklin died six days after the departure of her husband on his second expedition. See FRANKLIN, SIR JOHN.

Franklin, J. Hist. of anc. and mod. Egypt, from the most authentic records, Lon., 1800, 3 vols. 12mo.

Franklin, James. A Philos. and Polit. Hist. of the 13 U. States of America, Lon., 1784, 12mo.

Franklin, James. Present State of Hayti, Lon., 1828, cr. 8vo.

“The statements concerning the productions, commerce, resources, population, and government of Hayti, are minute and particular, and were obtained by personal inquiry during a residence in the West Indies.”—N. Amer. Rev.

Franklin, Sir John, an eminent navigator, b. 1786, at Spilsby, Lincolnshire, entered the Royal Navy as a midshipman in 1800, was present at the battle of Trafalgar in 1806 and the battle of New Orleans in 1814, and was selected in 1819 to head an expedition overland from Hudson's Bay to the Arctic Ocean. After encountering great hardships, and very frequently at the point of death from hunger and fatigue, he reached home in October, 1822. In the next year he was married to Miss Porden. See FRANKLIN, ELEANOR ANN. In 1825 he submitted to Lord Bathurst “a plan for an expedition overland, to the mouth of the Mackenzie river, and thence by sea, to the N. West extremity of America, with the combined object also, of surveying the coast between the Mackenzie and Copper Mine rivers.”

This proposition was accepted, and, to superintend the expedition, he embarked at Liverpool, February 16, 1825, after the “severe struggle of taking leave of his wife, whose death, then hourly expected, took place six days after his departure.”

After encountering great hardships, the moving masses of ice forced the heroic sailors to retrace their steps. September 1, 1827, Captain Franklin arrived at Liverpool, married a second time in November of the following year, and in 1829 received the honour of knighthood. The persevering zeal of Lady Franklin in stimulating the search for Sir John, for ten years past, is well known to the world. He was greatly disappointed at his unsuccessful attempts to accomplish the object of his voyages; remarking, with reference to his compulsory return in 1827:

“It was with no ordinary pain that I could now bring myself even to think of relinquishing the great object of my ambition, [the discovery of a North West passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean,] and of disappointing the flattering hopes which had been reposed in my exertions. But I had higher duties to perform than the gratification of my own feelings, and a mature consideration of all things forced me to the conclusion that we had reached that point beyond which perseverance would be rashness and the best efforts would be fruitless.”

The Montreal Gazette of Sept. 11, 1822, remarks:

“It appears that the toils and sufferings of the expedition have been of the most trying description, and that, if they do not exceed belief, they were at least of such a nature as almost to overcome the stoutest heart, and deter all future attempts of a similar tendency.”

But this writer little knew the iron stuff of which Sir John Franklin was made.

On the 26th of May, 1845, Sir John started upon a third expedition, in two ships, the Erabus and Terror; he was heard from on the 26th of July of the same year, and passed his first winter in a cove between Cape Riley and Beechey Island. Since that period, many expeditions from England and America have been despatched in search of the adventurer, but it was not until November, 1854, that news reached England which leaves little doubt that the whole party perished in the winter of 1850-51. See London Gent. Mag., Nov. 1854, 479; Dec., 1854, 594-95. Since the above was written, we have further intelligence,—by the return of Mr. James G. Stewart's expedition, despatched by the British Hudson's Bay Company, 18th Nov., 1854; arrived at St. Paul, Minnesota, 10th Dec., 1855,—which places beyond all doubt the loss of Sir John Franklin and his party. Some of their shoes, cooking-ntensils, &c., were found among the Esquimaux, who declared that they had died of starvation.

By a curious coincidence, on the day that we are penning this article, (Oct. 11, 1855,) the last expedition—sent specially in search of Dr. Kane and his party—which sailed from New York in June, 1855, has arrived at home. The explorers bring with them Dr. Kane and all of his company save three—a carpenter, a cook, and a seaman, lost by death. The remainder of the party are more or less frost-bitten. Of the last expedition—the steamer (propeller) Arctic, Lieut. Simms, and the barque Release, Lieut. Hartstene—the Arctic (Lieut. Hartstene was on board) made its way north to lat. 78° 32', when it was stopped by the ice. The Advance, Dr. Kane's vessel, had been pushed as far north as possible, (see "Geographical Results," below,) when she was frozen in, and of course had to be abandoned. The ship's company were found by the Arctic and Release on the island of Disco. They have been absent from home since May 31, 1853, and are received with great rejoicings. They have made several important discoveries, and added largely to our knowledge of the inhospitable region the perils and discomforts of which they have so bravely encountered. From a statement in the New York Tribune of Oct. 12, 1855, we extract the following résumé of the results of Dr. Kane's last voyage. For an account of his former explorations, see his work noticed at the end of this article.

"GEOGRAPHICAL RESULTS.

"I. Greenland has been followed and charted by Dr. Kane toward the Atlantic with a coast-line pointing due north, until a stupendous glacier absolutely checked their progress. This mass of ice rose in a lofty precipice five hundred feet high, abutting into the sea. It undoubtedly is the only barrier between Greenland and the Atlantic. It is an effectual barrier to all future exploration.

"This glacier, in spite of the difficulty of falling bergs, was followed out to sea by means of sledges; the party rafting themselves across open-water spaces on masses of ice. In this way they succeeded in travelling eighty miles along its base, and traced it into a new northern land. This glacier is, we believe, the largest ever discovered by any navigator.

"II. This new land thus cemented to Greenland by protruding ice was named Washington. The large bay which intervenes between it and Greenland bears the name of Mr. Peabody of Baltimore, one of the projectors of the expedition. This icy connection of the Old and New World seems to us a feature of romantic interest.

"III. The range of the sledge journeys may be understood from the fact that the entire circuit of Smith Sound has been effected and its shores completely charted. But the real discovery of the expedition is the open Polar sea. The channel leading to these waters was entirely free from ice; and this mysterious feature was rendered the more remarkable by the existence of a belt of solid ice extending one hundred and twenty-five miles to the southward. This sea verifies the views of Dr. Kane as expressed to the Geographical Society before his departure. The lashings of the surf against the frozen beach of ice was impressive beyond description. Several gentlemen with whom we have conversed speak of the matter as one of peculiar interest. An area of three thousand square miles has been seen, entirely free from ice. This channel has been named after the Hon. J. P. Kennedy, late Secretary of the United States Navy, under whose auspices the expedition was undertaken.

"IV. The land to the north and west of this channel has been charted as high as 82° 30'. This is the nearest land to the Pole yet known. It bears the name of Mr. Henry Grinnell, the founder of the enterprise."

Perhaps so long an article on this subject, in a Literary Dictionary, is rather out of place; but who can resist being led away by such themes? The reader who desires to pursue this interesting topic must refer to the following publications:—1. Capt. John Franklin's Narrative of a Journey to the Shores of the Polar Sea, 1819-22, with an Appendix on various Subjects relating to Science and Natural History, Lon., 1823, 4to, pp. 784; 34 Plates, and four Maps, £4 4s. The Appendix on Natural History is by Sir John Richardson, Sabine, Lieut. Hood, &c. The Plates are beautifully engraved by Finden (some of them coloured) after drawings by Lieuts. Hood and Baek. A second and third edit. were pub. in 1824, both in 2 vols. 8vo, without the plates.

Also an ed. in Phila., 8vo, same year.

"The unstudied and seaman-like simplicity of the style is not the least of its merits; and the illustrations and embellishments from the drawings of the late unfortunate Mr. Hood and Mr. Baek, are of a very superior kind."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

"A work of intense and indeed painful interest, from the sufferings of those who performed this journey; of value to geography by no means proportional to these sufferings; but instructive in meteorology and natural history."—Stevenson's Voy. and Travels.

2. Capt. John Franklin's Narrative of a Second Expedition to the Shores of the Polar Sea, 1825-27; including an Account of the Progress of a Detachment to the Eastward, by John Richardson, M.D., F.R.S., &c., Surgeon and Naturalist to the Expedition. Illustrated by numerous Maps and Plates, 1828, 4to, pp. 447, £4 4s. The Second Expedition has not in England been pub. in 8vo, but see below.

"The views of Arctic Scenery with which this volume is both illustrated and embellished are of extreme beauty. They supply, in a great measure, the absence of picturesque description, and delineate, with singular truth, the striking peculiarities which distinguish the aspect of these regions from that of the temperate climates."—Edin. Rev.

"It is difficult to do sufficient justice either to the skill and intelligence displayed in its conduct, or the information to be derived from it."—Amer. Quar. Rev.

There is an edit. pub. in 1829, Lon., 4 vols. 18mo, of Sir John Franklin's Two Journeys to the Shores of the Polar Sea in 1819-27, with engravings by Finden, £1. An edit. of the second expedition was pub. in Phila., 1828, 8vo.

"Valuable alike to the scientific student or the future wanderer over these wild plains, and the lonely settler whom European enterprise may locate among these far distant tribes. It is a book to study rather than to read; and yet so attractive in its style, and so instructive in its collation of facts, that many will be led to its study as a work of science whilst merely engaged in its perusal as a book of travels."—Britannia.

5. A Lecture on Arctic Expeditions, delivered at the London Institution, by C. R. Weld, Esq. Second edition, Map, p. 8vo.

"An intelligent general view of the subject of Arctic Discovery from early times, a rapid but well informed sketch of its heroes and its vicissitudes in modern days, a hopeful view of the chances of Franklin's return, and an account of the circumstances of the original expedition and of the voyages in search, which will be read with considerable interest just now."—*Lon. Nor must the Historical Accounts and numerous essays of Sir John Barrow upon this subject, be overlooked by the reader. We are promised another work from Dr. Kane, who, as mentioned above, has returned this day from a fruitless search after Sir John Franklin. Upon the subject of a North-West Passage, we append an interesting paper from the New York Herald of Oct. 12, 1855.

"THE EFFORTS MADE TO DISCOVER A NORTH-WEST PASSAGE.

"The attempt to discover a north-west passage was made by a Portuguese named Cortereal, about A. D. 1500. It was attempted by the English in 1553; and the project was greatly encouraged by Queen Elizabeth in 1585, in which year a company was associated in London, and was called the 'Fellowship for the Discovery of the North-West Passage.' The following voyages with this design were undertaken, under British and American navigators, in the years respectively stated:

Franuce is commended by George Peele as

"A peerless sweet translator of our time."—Poem of the Order of the Garter, sine anno, sed circa 1593, 4to.

"Franuce shines particularly as an English hexametrist. His Countess of Pembroke's Yuychurch and his translation of part of Heliodorus, are written in melodious dactyls and spondees, to the no small admiration of Sidney, Harvey, &c."

Harvey's Commendation—in his Four Letters and certain Sonnets—classes him in good company:

"I cordially recommend to the dear lovers of the Muses, and namely to the professed sonnets of the same, Edmund Spenser, Richard Stanburst, Abraham Franuce, Thomas Watson, Samuel Daniel, Thomas Nashe, and the rest, whom I affectionately thanke for their studious endeavours commendably employed in enriching and polishing their native tongue, &c."—Lett. iii., p. 29, 1592, 4to.

Gabriel Harvey is so far from being ashamed of his English hexameters, which have been violently attacked, that he exclaims, in the same publication from which we have just quoted,

"If I never deserve any better remembrance, let me be epitaphed the Inventour of the English hexameter; whose learned Mr. Stanburst imitated in his Virgill, and excellent Sir P. Sidney disdaind not to follow in his Arcadia, and elsewhere."

Mr. Park, in quoting the above, adds:

"Ascham in 1564 had well observed that 'carmen hexametrum doth rather trotte and hobble than runne smoothly in our English tong.'—Scholmaster, p. 60. Yet Stanburst strangely professes in his dedication to take upon him to execute some part of Maister Ascham's will, who had recommended carmen iambicum while he disprised carmen hexametrum." See Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

Some of our modern poets have revived English hexameter—we beg pardon, not revived, but exhumed; as a mummy is exhumed;—all that makes life, wanting, and even the form shrunken and uncomey. Where Southey and Longfellow have failed, the fault must be in the material, not the artist. Mr. Longfellow himself gives a happy illustration of the subject, when he says that "the motions of the English Muse [in the hexameter] are not unlike those of a prisoner dancing to the music of his chains."

We give an opinion upon the subject, in which our author is introduced, from an ancient authority; and he italics are our own:

"Abraham Franuce, a versifier in Queen Elizabeth's time, who, imitating Latin measure in English verse, wrote his Yuychurch and some other things, in Hexameter; some also in Hexameter and Pentameter with Philip Sidney in the pastoral interludes of his Arcadia, uses not only these, but all other sorts of Latin measure, in which no wonder he is followed by so few, since they no other become the English, nor any other modern language."—Phillips's Theatrum Pictarum Anglicanorum.

The Biog. Dramat. also is greatly disgusted at Franuce's choice of metre:

"He has written several things in the awkwardest of all verse, though at that time greatly in vogue. English hexameter."

Much of interest upon this subject may be found in the Preface and Notes to Southey's Vision of Judgment, and in the following papers upon English hexameters:

"This book is American in origin and completely American in character. No other country could have sent forth such a work,—so plain-spoken, so honest, so judicious, so reasonable. . . Mr. Freedley's is a capital book, and, considered as a representation of the daily dealings of the Americans, it raises them very much in our estimation. The work ought to be read by all traders, old and young. The old may find in it ennobling and delightful reminiscences; the young can only learn from it how to attain, in obedience to the strictest principles of morality, excellence in the conduct of business."—*Lon. Freind, John, M.D., 1675–1728, a native of Croton, Northamptonshire, educated at Christ Church, Oxford, was a distinguished classical scholar, and concerned in the publication of several Greek and Latin authors. His principal professional work is The History of Physic, from the time of Galen to the beginning of the 16th century, Lon. Pts. 1 and 2, 1725, '26, 8vo; 1727, 2 vols. 8vo; 1758, 2 vols. 8vo. In Latin, by J. Wigan, 1734, 8vo. In French, by Pomet, Leyd., 1727, 8vo. It was censured by Sir Clifton Winttingham in an anonymous tract, Observations on Dr. Freind's Hist. of Physic, 1726; and by John Le Clerc in the Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne. Its character, however, stands very high. A Defence of Dr. Freind's Hist. of Physic was pub. 1727, '28, 8vo. A collective ed. of his Latin Works—Opera Omnia Medica—was pub. by Dr. Wigan in 1733, fol.; Paris, 1735, 4to; Leyd., 1734, and in 1750, 3 vols. 8vo. Wigan included in his edit. of Freind's Works his trans. into Latin of Freind's Hist. of Physic. Freind had a controversy with Dr. Woodward in consequence of his (Freind's) pub. of Hippocrates de Morbis Popularibus, and on the subject of the fever in the small-pox. We have already referred to Freind in our articles on ALSOPI, ANTHONY; BENTLEY, RICHARD; BOYLE, CHARLES.

"His writings were admired, and the notions he advanced applauded, by the greatest men in the profession throughout Europe, such as Hoffman, in Germany; Helvetius and Hequet in France; and Boerhaave in Holland; which abundantly demonstrates his abilities in his profession."—Biography in Biog. Brit., q. v.

H. Frémont's and Emory's Accounts were pub. in London, 1849, 8vo. Will be pub., Phila., 1859, 2 vols. 8vo. Col. J. C. Frémont's Explorations; prepared by the Author, and embracing all his Expeditions, superbly illustrated with steel plates and woodcuts, engraved under the immediate superintendence of Col. Frémont, mostly from daguerreotypes taken on the spot, containing a new steel portrait of the author.

"The illustrations had the special attention of Hamilton, Darley, Schussler, Dallas, Kern, and Wallin, comprising masterpieces of each of these distinguished artists, and were engraved in the highest style of the art, under the supervision of J. M. Butler.

"This work was prepared with great care by Col. J. C. Frémont, and contains a résumé of the first and second expeditions in the years 1842, '43, and '44, and a detailed account of the third expedition during the years 1845, '46, and '47, across the Rocky Mountains through Oregon into California, covering the conquest and settlement of that country; the fourth expedition, of 1848–49, up the Kansas and Arkansas Rivers into the Rocky Mountains of Mexico, down the Del Norte, through Sonora into California; the fifth expedition, of 1853 and '54, across the Rocky Mountains at the heads of the Arkansas and Colorado Rivers, through the Mormon settlements and the Great Basin into California.—the whole embracing a period of ten years past-d among the wilds of America.

"The résumé of the first and second expeditions was prepared by George S. Hillard, Esq., whose acknowledged position as one of the most accomplished writers of America is a sure guarantee that it is ably executed.

"The scientific portion of the work is very complete, containing able articles from Professor Torrey on Botany, Blake on Geology, Cassin on Ornithology, Hubbard on Astronomy, &c., illustrated and compiled from material furnished by the author.

"The greatest possible care was taken to insure the accuracy of the maps, which fully illustrate all the above-named expeditions. They were engraved under the superintendence of the well-known hydrographers, Messrs. E. & G. W. Blunt, of New York."

Freneau, Peter, d. 1813, long resident in Charleston, South Carolina, was a brother of Philip Freneau. In 1795 he became editor and proprietor of the (Charleston) City Gazette, and contributed to it many articles of great literary merit. He was versed in the ancient and modern languages, and possessed a wide range of general knowledge. An interesting biographical account of Mr. Freneau, from the pen of Dr. Joseph Johnson of Charleston, will be found in Duyckinck's Cyc. of Amer. Lit.

Freneau, Philip, 1752–1832, a native of New York, descended of a French Protestant family, entered Nassau Hall, Princeton, New Jersey, in 1767, and graduated in 1771. Whilst residing in New York, in 1774 or 1775, he commenced writing those poetical satires on the royalists and their cause which have transmitted his name to posterity. In 1776 he visited the Danish West Indies, where he wrote two of his principal poems, The House of Night, and The Beauties of Santa Cruz. Two years later he was at Bermuda. In 1779 he was engaged in editorial labours in Philadelphia, having the superintendence of the United States Magazine, pub. by Francis Bailey. He subsequently became a sea-captain, and made many voyages between 1784 and 1789, and 1798 and 1809. In 1797 he commenced the publication in New York of The Time Piece and Literary Companion—a short-lived periodical,—and displayed considerable ability in its literary management. He was for some time Translating Clerk in the Department of State under Thomas Jefferson, and editor of the National Gazette. The attacks upon General Washington's administration which appeared in this paper are to be attributed to Jefferson and his clerk, if the latest assertions of the latter are to be believed. After leading a wandering life, and engaging in many literary undertakings, he perished in a snow-storm, in his 80th year, Dec. 18, 1832, near Freehold, New Jersey. In 1786, Mr. Bailey pub. at Philadelphia the first collection of Freneau's poems, in a vol. of upwards of 400 pages. A second ed. appeared in 1795, and a third in 1809. A collection of his poems connected with the war of 1812, and other subjects, written between 1797–1815, was pub. in New York in 2 vols. For further particulars respecting this patriotic poet, we must refer the reader to the source for which we are indebted to the above facts—Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America, 16th ed., Phila., 1855, and to Duyckinck's Cyclopaedia of American Literature, New York, 1856. The Reminiscences of Freneau by Dr. John W. Francis, in the valuable work last cited, possess peculiar interest.

"The productions of his pen animated his countrymen in the darkest days of '76, and the effusions of his muse cheered the desponding soldier as he fought the battles of freedom."—Mommouth Inquirer, 1832.

Dr. Francis of N. York remarks, in relating his reminiscences of Freneau:

"His story of many of his occasional poems was quite romantic. I told him what I had heard Jeffrey, the Scotch reviewer, say of his writings, that the time would arrive when his poetry, like that of Hudibras, would command a commentator like Grey."—From a paper read before the Hist. Soc'y of N. York, by Mr. E. A. Duyckinck.

Frere, Rt. Hon. John Hookham, of Roydon Hall, Norfolk, 1769–1846, who filled several important diplomatic posts—the most memorable of which was his ministry in Spain during the Peninsular War—evinced early in life the possession of great poetical abilities. His excellent jeu-d'esprit entitled Prospectus and Specimen of an Intended National Work, by Wm. and Robt. Whistlercraft, &c., intended to comprise the most interesting Particulars relating to King Arthur and his Round Table, doubtless suggested to Lord Byron his disreputable poem of Don Juan. The merit of the Whistlercraft poem is very great, and the author could have placed his name among the most distinguished poets of the age, if his ambition had been equal to his genius. His translation of the Saxon poem on the victory of Athelstan at Brunnenburgh, made by him at a very early age, elicited the following enthusiastic commendations from eminent authorities:

"A translation made by a school-boy in the eighteenth century of this Saxon poem of the tenth century into the English of the fourteenth century, is a double imitation, unmatched, perhaps, in literary history, in which the writer gave an earnest of that faculty of catching the peculiar genius and preserving the characteristic manner of his original, which, though the specimens of it be too few, places him alone among English translators."—Sir James Macintosh's Hist. of Eng.

"I have only met, in my researches into these matters, with one poem which, if it had been produced as ancient, could not have been detected on internal evidence. It is the War Song upon the victory at Brunnenburgh, translated from the Anglo-Saxon into Anglo-Norman, by the Right Hon. John Hookham Frere. See Ellis's Specimens of English Poetry, vol. i. p. 32. The accomplished editor tells us, that this very singular poem was intended as an imitation of the style and language of the fourteenth century, and was written during the controversy occasioned by the poems attributed to Rowley. Mr. Ellis adds—'The reader will probably bear with some surprise that this singular instance of critical ingenuity was the composition of an Eton schoolboy.'"—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Essay on Imitation of the Ancient Ballads, (written in 1830); see Poetical Works.

Some interesting particulars connected with Frere, who was one of the founders of the London Quar. Rev. and a contributor to the Etonian and the Anti-Jacobin, will be found in Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter Scott, and in Lon. Gent. Mag., March and April, 1846. Frere expressed a warm admiration of Scott's Sir Tristrem, declaring it to be "The most interesting work that has yet been published on the subject of our earlier poets, and, indeed, such a piece of literary antiquity as no one could have, a priori, supposed to exist."

This eulogy delighted Scott greatly, and he wrote to Ellis, who had quoted Frere's opinion,

"Frere is so perfect a master of the ancient style of composition, that I would rather have his suffrage than that of a whole synd of your vulgar antiquaries."—Ubi supra; and see Southey's Life and Corresp., and Miss Mitford's Recollec. of a Lit. Life.

Mr. Frere died at his residence in the Pieta Malta, where he had lived for a number of years.

He was a contributor to The North American Review, The Christian Disceptant, and The Monthly Anthology; and his writings are thought to display talents of no ordinary character. Some of his philosophical lectures, a number of his poems, and papers first pub. in periodicals, and a memoir of his life, were pub. in 1823, 8vo, by his friend, Prof. Andrews Norton.

Frith, or Fryth, John, Lurrt at Smithfield, July 4, 1533, was the son of an inn-keeper at Sevenoaks, in Kent. He studied both at Oxford and Cambridge, and was early distinguished for his proficiency in learning. His advocacy of the doctrines of the Reformation caused him to be sent to the Tower by Sir Thomas More, then Lord-Chancellor, with whom he held a personal controversy, without any change being effected in the opinions of either disputant. Remaining firm to his convictions, it occurred to his opponents that, if they could not out-argue him, they could burn him, and this charitable settlement of the matter was not delayed. He pub. Removed to Phila., 1828; conducted a private school for young ladies till 1838, when he was appointed Professor of Belles-Lettres in the Central High School, which situation he resigned in 1845. Since then he has been engaged in compiling books for popular use. He has published a great number of works, chiefly school and juvenile books, and historical and biographical compilations, intended for distribution by subscription agents. The Pictorial History of the United States, 3 vols. 8vo, seems to have been popular, as upwards of 50,000 copies have been sold. The Pictorial History of the World, 3 vols. 8vo, has also had a wide circulation. His principal poem is a version of The Phenomena or Appearances of the Stars, from the Greek of Aratus. His translations from the German have elicited warm commendations from those best qualified to judge of them.

"A singular grace of expression and refinement pervades the prose writings of Dr. Frothingham, and his poetry is also marked by exquisite finish and tasteful elegance. "The publication of Froude's Remains is likely to do more harm than — is capable of doing. The Oxford School has acted most unwisely in giving its sanction to such a deplorable example of mistaken zeal."—Robert Southey: Letter to Rev. John Miller, July 21, 1838.

He wrote two tragedies:—1. The Fall of Saganium, 1727, 8vo; 2. Phi-lotas; both unsuccessful in representation, yet not without literary merit.

"Mr. Frowde's tragedies have more poetry than pathos, more beauties of language to please in the closet, than strokes of incident and action to strike and astonish in the theatre; and consequently they might force a due applause from the reading, at the same time that they might appear very heavy, and even insipid, in the representation."—*Biog. Lady Holland gives us an interesting extract from a sermon preached by her father, the late Rev. Sydney Smith, after visiting Newgate with Mrs. Fry:

"Indeed the subject of imprisonment occupied his mind so much, that during a visit to town, having been much interested by the account of Mrs. Fry's benevolent exertions in prison, he requested permission to accompany her to Newgate; and I have heard him say he never felt more deeply affected or impressed than by the beautiful spectacle he there witnessed; it made him, he said, weep like a child. In a sermon he preached shortly after, he introduced the following passage:

"There is a spectacle which this town now exhibits, that I will venture to call the most solemn, the most Christian, the most affecting, which any human being ever witnessed. To see that holy woman in the midst of the wretched prisoners, to see them all calling earnestly upon God, soothed by her voice, animated by her look, clinging to the hem of her garment; and worshipping her as the only being who has ever loved them, or taught them, or noticed them, or spoken to them of God! This is the sight which breaks down the pageant of the world; which tells us that the short hour of life is passing away, and that we must prepare by some good deeds to meet God; that it is time to give, to pray, to comfort; to go, like this blessed woman, and do the work of our heavenly Saviour, Jesus, among the guilty, among the broken-hearted, and the sick, and to labour in the deepest and darkest wretchedness of life."

He has availed himself of the labours of previous translators, especially Bishop Percy and Dr. J. M. Good; after the latter of whom he considers the Song of Solomon as a collection of fables or little poems, which are designed for instruction and edification in the mysteries of our holy religion. "The love of system or hypothesis is carried to the utmost length. Mr. Fry is a Hutchinsonian or Horsleyan, to the very core. The Psalms are not translated, but travestied. The opinion or system of the translator rather than a version of the Psalms, is constantly obtruded on us. The utmost violence is often done to the meaning of words, to the construction of sentences, and to the design of the inspired writer, in order to support a useless and ungrounded hypothesis. The book contains learning, and is also orthodox; but is on the whole an indifferent performance."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Fulke, Wm., D.D., d. 1589, an eminent Puritan divine, a native of London, educated at and Fellow (1564) of St. John's Coll., Camb.; Rector of Warley, Essex, 1571; soon after Rector of Keddington, Suffolk. He was subsequently Master of Pembroke Hall, and Margaret Prof. of Divinity. 1. A Goodly Gallery, Lon., 1563, 16mo. With new title-page, 1571. Refers to meteors. 2. The Philosopher's Game. This is a treatise on Chess. Lowndes ascribes these two works to another Wm. Fulke. 3. Astrologorum Indus. Played after the manner of Chess, but with seven pieces representing the seven planets. 4. Serms., 1571. 5. Prælectiones in Apocalypsim, 1573, 4to. In English by George Gyffard or Gyfford, 1573, 4to. 6. The Text of the N. Test., translated out of the Vulgar Latin by the Papists of the traitorous seminarie at Rheims. Whereunto is added the translation out of the original Greek, commonly used in the Church of England; with a confutation of all such arguments, glosses, and annotations as contain manifest impieties, heresy, treason and slander against the Catholic Church of God, and the true teachers thereof, or the translations used in the Church of England, 1580, '89, 1601, fol. And in 1617 and 1633, fol., with a defence of the English trans. of the Scriptures, against Gregorio Martin. This last piece was repub. by the Parker Society, edited by the Rev. C. H. Hartshorne, Camb., 1843, 8vo; and the same society repub. Martini's Reply, edited by the Rev. Richard Gibbins, 1848, 8vo.

Fulke's Text of the N. Test., &c. is an invaluable assistant to the Protestant divine:

"This work may be said to embody the whole popish controversy respecting the Scriptures. And as it gives in parallel columns the Roman translation of the Vulgate, and the Bishop's Translation, it enables the reader to make an easy comparison of their respective merits. At the end of the volume is an elaborate defence of the English translations of the Scriptures against Gregory Martin, which contains much curious and learned information. Fulke was a very able man, and his work is entitled to a place in every critical library. Mr. (Charles) Butler, though a Catholic, very candidly recommends it as very curious and deserving of attention."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

We may add that the learned Mr. Butler was dissatisfied with the "Douay Bible." He remarks:

"Still the version is imperfect; a more correct version is, perhaps, at present, the greatest spiritual want of the English Catholics."

"That late elegant scholar and pious divine, the Rev. James Hervey, (though sometimes rather too candid and indiscriminate in his public recommendations of books) passed the following very just encomium on Dr. Fulke's noble performance:—He styles it 'a valuable piece of ancient controversy and criticism, full of sound divinity, weighty arguments, and important observations; adding,— would the young student be taught to discover the very sinews of popery, and be enabled to give an effectual blow to that complicated mass of errors, I scarce know a treatise better calculated for the purpose.'—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

See Horne's Introduction for an account of the controversy connected with this version.

"A very complete reply to the Romanists' notes."—Bickersteth's Chris. Stu.

Thomas Cartwright, q. v., also wrote a Confutation of the Rhemish Translation, &c., 1618, fol. Fulke wrote several other works, principally against the Church of Rome.

Fuller, Andrew, 1754–1815, an eminent Baptist minister, a native of Wicken, Cambridgeshire, was settled for a short time at Soham, and afterwards removed to Kettering, where he resided until his death. The works of this excellent man are greatly esteemed. We notice the principal: 1. The Calvinistical and Socinian Systems examined and compared as to their Moral Tendency, 1791, '96, 1802, 8vo. Repub. as No. 18 of Ward's Lib. of Standard Divinity.

"A highly valuable publication for the author's masterly defence of the doctrines of Christianity, and his acute refutation of the opposite errors."—Wm. WILBERFORCE, M.P.

"A most valuable work, with much power of reasoning and unction of spirit."—Bickersteth's Chris. Stu.

2. Socinianism Indefensible. In reply to Toulmin and Kentish. 3. The Gospel its own Witness, 1799–1800, 8vo.

"Convince him (the infidel) of sin, there is an end of his infidelity, root and branch. . . . Fuller in his Gospel its own Witness has pursued this train of argument, and made the infidel feel the point of the two-edged sword."—Bickersteth's Chris. Stu.

"Chiefly intended for family use."—WILLIAMS.

"His discourses are not critical, (for he was mostly a self-taught man), but they are shrewd, instructive, and touching. He seizes the principal points of the passage, and often illustrates them very happily."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Much originality of fertile remark must not be expected, nor must the reader be surprised if he often meet with a trite and obvious reflection; but we will venture to promise him, much more frequently, a manly, judicious, and useful train of observation, expressed in simple and vigorous language."—Lon. Eclectic Rev., O. S., 2d Pl., lt. 896.

"Judicious, evangelical, and practical."—Bickersteth's Chris. Stu.

"The author selects a paragraph of convenient length, and furnishes a concise exposition of its leading circumstances, accompanied with a few practical reflections."

"Those who have Fuller and Bush, with a prayerful mind, have every aid they can desire in the study of this book."—Lon. Evangel. Mag.

"The author of this work has long been known by his able publications on the absurdity of deism, and the immoral tendency of Socinian tenets."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

10. Sermons, on various subjects, 1814, 8vo.

11. Expos. Discourses on the Apocalypse, 1815, 8vo.

"There is, however, but little novelty in the work, but little to gratify the anxious curiosity of the age, or to elucidate the unfilled and more difficult parts of the Revelation. The general outline of the prophetic scheme is boldly sketched, and its various ramifications are marked with that precision which was common to the writer; but in general there is an extreme of modesty and diffidence, with scarcely any attempts to pass the usual boundaries of thought on these subjects, or any adventurous flight of speculation."—Morris's Memoirs of Mr. Fuller, where see (pp. 250–260) an abstract of F.'s scheme of the Apocalypse.

"His Genesis is superior to the Apocalypse; for the exposition of which he had neither sufficient reading nor leisure."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

12. The Harmony of Scripture; or, an attempt to reconcile various Passages apparently contradictory, 1817, 8vo. Posth.

"The Harmony contains some judicious observations on fifty-five passages, written originally for the use of a private friend."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

In 1815, 8vo. Mr. J. W. Morris pub. Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Andrew Fuller. A memoir by the author's son, Andrew Gunton Fuller, is prefixed to the complete edit. of the former's Works, 1831–32, 5 vols. 8vo. There have been also eds. of his Complete Works, 1838, imp. 8vo; 1840, imp. 8vo; 1845, imp. 8vo; 1852, imp. 8vo; 1853, imp. 8vo. There is also an excellent ed., in 3 vols. 8vo, pub. by the Baptist Publication Society of Phila., edited by the Rev. Joseph Belcher, well known as the editor and author of many valuable works. See the name in this Dictionary. Principal Works, with a Mem. by his son, Bohn's Standard Lib., 1852, p. 8vo. Reports of his serms. and a number of his treatises have been repub. from time to time. We conclude with some testimonies from eminent authorities to the value of this able writer and truly exemplary man:

"I am slowly reading Andrew Fuller's works. He was an interesting man; one of the wisest and most moral-minded of his day. He possessed wonderful strength of mind; and is an instance how Providence can draw forth instruments from the most unlikely quarters."—BISHOP JERR.

"A biographer of Fuller has justly remarked of him, that he thought with Owen, and wrote with the pointed pen of Baxter."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"He was a writer among the Baptists, but of the same good school of divinity as Scott. With a lively imagination and all the powers of a masculine mind, he maintains the distinguishing doctrines of the gospel, and insists on its practical holiness."—Bickersteth's Chris. Stu.

"The Rev. Andrew Fuller has been styled by the Americans, 'The Franklin of Theology;' and it is said of him, that all his writings bear the powerful stamp of a mind which, for native vigour, original research, logical acumen, profound knowledge of the human heart, and intimate acquaintance with the Scriptures, has had no rival since the days of President Edwards."

"Coming on to modern theological writers, I recommend you to familiarize yourselves with the works of the acute, the philosophical, the profound, the pious, Jonathan Edwards, and those of Andrew Fuller. I know nothing like the latter for a beautiful combination of doctrinal, practical, and experimental religion."—Counsels to Students of Theology on leaving College, by John Angell James.

The same author also remarks:

"Did our students and young ministers, yes, and old ones too, know the almost inexhaustible mine of truth in his works, not one that could afford to purchase them would be without them. They contain the most entire union of sound Calvinistic divinity of the moderate school, Christian ethics and religious experience, not even excepting the works of President Edwards, in the English language."

"Fuller was a man whose sagacity enabled him to penetrate to the depths of every subject he explored; whose conceptions were so powerful and luminous, that what was recondite and original appeared familiar; what was intricate, easy and perspicuous in his hands; equally successful in enforcing the practical, in stating the theoretical, and in discussing the polemical branches of theology."—ROBERT HALL.

Fuller, Thomas, 1608–1661, a native of Aldwinckle, Northamptonshire, at the early age of twelve entered Queen's Coll., Camb., and studied with such perseverance that he took the degree of A.B. in 1624, and that of A.M. in 1628. In 1631 he became Fellow of Sidney Coll., and in the same year was made Prebendary of Salisbury, after astonishing his hearers with his eloquence from the pulpit of St. Bennet's, Cambridge; and not long after was rewarded by the Rectorship of Broad-Windsor, Dorsetshire. Upon the death of his first wife, about 1641, he removed to London and became minister of the Savoy. We may here mention that, after remaining a widower for thirteen years, he was, in 1654, married to a sister of Viscount Baltin-glasse. After Charles had quitted London, (in 1642,) Fuller preached a sermon in which he displayed both his loyalty and the love of pertinent illustration which is observable in his works. To the great indignation of the Parliamentarians, he gave out his text, "Ye, let him take all, so that my lord the king return in peace."

This sermon was published, and brought the good preacher into disrepute with those whose purposes would not have been furthered by "bringing the king again in peace." Nothing daunted, when the Royalists took up "carnal weapons" to defend their sovereign, Fuller joined the army as chaplain, and, not content with praying for the success of his soldiers, he so excited their courage by his exhortations, that Sir William Waller was obliged to raise the siege of Basinghouse with great loss. This is just what one would expect from the hearty, vigorous, genial tone of the author of the Worthies of England. As regards its propriety, we are not called upon to express an opinion. After the surrender of Exeter, in April, 1646, he removed to London, where he found his lecturer's place filled by another preacher. His eloquence, however, was too well known to permit of his being long without employment. He was soon chosen lecturer at St. Clement's Lane, near Lombard Street; removed to St. Bride's in Fleet Street; was, in 1648, presented to the living of Waltham in Essex, which he left in 1658 for that of Crenford, Middlesex; recovered his prebend at the Restoration, readmitted to his Lectureship at the Savoy, and died in the year following. His principal works are the following:

1. David's Heinous Sinne, Heartie Repentance, Heavie Punishment; a Poem, 1631. This, his first publication, a tract of 46 leaves, is now very rare. Bindley, £5 15s. 6d. Hibbert, same copy, £6 6s. 2. The Historie of the Holy Warre, Camb., 1639, '40, '42, '47, '51, fol., with the Holy State, 1652, fol. Holy Warre, new ed., Lon., 1810, sm. 8vo. 3. The Holy and Profane State; a collection of Characters, Moral Essays, and Lives, ancient, foreign, and domestic, Camb., 1642, '48, '52, '58, fol. New ed., 1840, Lon., sm. 8vo. By Jas. Nichols, 1841, 8vo.

"Perhaps upon the whole it is the best of his works; and certainly displays to better advantage than any, his original and vigorous powers of thinking. It consists of two parts—the Holy and the Profane State; the former proposing examples for our imitation; and the latter their opposites, for our abhorrence. Each contains characters of individuals in every department of life, as 'the father,' 'husband,' 'soldier,' and 'divine'; lives of eminent persons as illustrative of these characters; and general essays. In his conception of character he has followed Bishop Earle and Sir Thomas Overbury, but his manner of writing is essentially different."—Lon. Retrosp. Rev., 1821, iii. 55.

The Holy State contains—Lives of Monica, Abraham, Eliezer, Lady Paula, Hildegarde, Paracelus, Dr. Whitaker, Julius Scaliger, Perkins, Dr. Metcalf, Sir Francis Drake, Camden, Haman, Cardinal Wolsey, C. Brandon, Duke of Brandon, Lord Burleigh, Sir John Markham, St. Augustin, Bishop Ridley, Lady Jane Grey, Queen Elizabeth, Gustavus Adolphus, Edward the Black Prince.

The Profane State contains—Lives of Joan Queen of Naples, Joan of Arc, Caesar Borgia, John Andronicus, the Duke of Alva.

4. Good Thoughts in Bad Times, Exeter, 1645, 12mo; Lon., 1646, 18mo; 1810, 18mo. The first fruits of the Exeter press, Fuller tells us. 5. Good Thoughts in Worse Times, Lon., 1640, 16mo; 1647. 6. Mixt Contemplations in Better Times, 1660, 12mo. A new ed. of Nos. 4, 5, and 6, in one 18mo vol., 1830. Nos. 4 and 5 pub. together, 1669, 12mo.

7. Andronicus; or, the Unfortunate Politician, 1649, 8vo.

"This is one of the least-known, if not the rarest, of the productions of the quaint writer whose name it bears. . . . The subject of this piece is the usurpation of Andronicus, an obscure portion of the history of the Eastern empire which the writer has chosen for the purpose of moralizing its facts and epitomizing the records that remain concerning it."—Lon. Retrosp. Rev., 1827, N. S., i. 396.

8. A Pis-gah-Sight of Palestine, and the confines thereof, with the Hist. of the O. and N. Tests, acted thereon. With Plates, 1650, '62, fol.

"This is one of the most curious works ever written on the Scriptures. . . . The View of Palestine is not a mere geographical work; it contains many things relating to Jewish antiquities, and to the manners and customs of the people, and incidentally illustrates a number of passages of Scripture."—Orme's Bibl. Bibl.

9. The Church History of Britain from the birth of Christ to 1648, 1655, fol. Contains a Hist. of the Univ. of Camb. from the Conquest to 1643, and of Waltham Abbey. A new ed. of the Church Hist., with the author's corrections, edited by James Nichols, 1837, 3 vols. 8vo; 1842, 3 vols. 8vo. Edited by the Rev. J. S. Brewer, 1845, 6 vols. 8vo.

"It is divided into eleven books, whereof the sixth gives the history of the allies of England from the first rise of monkery to the final eradication of it under Henry the Eighth. These are subdivided into lesser sections, which are severally dedicated to such patrons as were most likely to make their due acknowledgments to the author. Nor were these infant lords and rich adherents the only people he designed to flatter. He was to make his court to the powers then in fashion; and he well knew nothing would be more grateful to them, than squinting reflections on the management of the late King's chief ministers of state, eminent churchmen, &c. For such misbehaviour as this, he was severely taken to task by Peter Heylin, in his Examen Historicum; to which was added Dr. Cosin's Apology, in answer to some passages in that history which concerned himself. . . . Even the most serious and most authentic parts of it are so interlarded with pun and quibble, that it looks as if the man had designed to ridicule the annals of our church into fable and romance. . . . There are in it some things of moment, hardly to be had elsewhere, which may often illustrate dark passages in more serious writers."—Bishop Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib., 96.

"Bishop Nicolson was too censorious upon Dr. Fuller's Church History."—Biog. Brit., q. r.

"There are only two writers of the genuine History of our Church who deserve the name of historians. Collier and Fuller."—Bishop Warburton's Directions to a Student in Theology.

"Quaint and witty, but sensible, pious, candid, and useful; an invaluable body of information to the death of Charles the First."—Bickersteth's Christian Student.

"The historical works of Fuller are simply a caricature of the species of composition to which they professedly belong; a systematic violation of all its proprieties. The gravity and dignity of the historic muse are continually violated by him. But not only is he continually cracking his jokes and perpetrating his puns; his matter is as full of treason against the laws of history as his manner. . . . Never was there such a medley. First, each book and section is introduced by a quaint dedication to one or other of his many admirers or patrons. Nicolson in his English Historical Library is rather severe on his motives for such a multiplication of dedication. Second, the several paragraphs into which the Church History is divided, (most of them introduced by some quaint title,) are many of them as little connected with church history as with the history of China. Thus, in one short section, comprising the period from 1330 to 1361, we find 'paragraphs' relating to the 'ignorance of the English in curious cloths'—to 'fullers' earth,' which, he tells us, 'was a precious commodity'—to the manufacture of 'woollen cloth,' and to the sumptuary laws which 'restrained excess in apparel.' There is a strange mixture in one short chapter."—HENRY ROGERS: Edin. Rev., LXIV. 352-53, and in his Essays.

"All the charms of Southey's prose may please you in his Book of the Church, on turning to the old church historian, Thomas Fuller, you may find in his History of the Church in Great Britain (one of the most remarkable works in the language) the varied powers of learning, sagacity, pathos, an overflowing wit, humour, and imagination, all animating the pages of a church history."—Henry Reed's Lects. on Eng. Lit., Phila., 1855, 12mo.

10. The Appeal of Injured Innocence, 1659, fol.

"Soon after [the publication of Heylin's Examen Historicum] Th. Fuller came out with a thin fol., full of submission and acknowledgment, entit. The Appeal of Injured Innocence."—Athen. Ozon., q. v.

This volume is necessary to complete The Church History by the same author. The Appeal of Injured Innocence is a running commentary on each of the eleven books of The Church History.

"It embraces almost every topic within the range of human disquisition, from the most sublime mysteries of the Christian religion and the great antiquity of the Hebrew and Welsh languages, down to 'the tale of a tub,' and criticisms on Shakspeare's perversion of the character of Sir John Falstaff."

New ed. of the Hist. of the Univ. of Camb., edit. by Prickett and Wright, 1840, 8vo. The Hist. of the Univ. of Camb., of Waltham Abbey, and the Appeal of Injured Innocence, edit. by James Nichols, 1840, 8vo. See Bishop Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib., 129.

11. Hist. of the Worthies of England, 1662, fol. Posth.; pub. by his son. New ed., with Notes by John Nichols, 1811, 2 vols. 4to.

The learned and industrious editor of this present edition was assisted by Mr. Bindley, Mr. Malone, Mr. Alex. Chalmers, Sir Henry Ellis, Dr. Bliss, Sir Egerton Brydges, and the indefatigable author of Cathedral Antiquities, Mr. John Britton.

With Notes, Indexes, &c., by P. Austin Nuttall, LL.D., 1840, 3 vols. 8vo.

Bishop Nicolson is as severe upon this entertaining work as he is upon the Church History:

"It was huddled up in haste, for the procurement of some moderate profit for the author, though he did not live to see it published. It corrects many mistakes in his ecclesiastical history; but makes more new ones in their stead."—Eng. Hist. Lib., v.

But see a defence of Fuller in the Biog. Brit. His biographer there very pertinently reminds us of Fuller's own plea for himself, when excusing John Fox's error in asserting Marbeck to have been burnt at the stake, when Marbeck "lived"—for all that we know to the contrary—"a prosperous gentleman."

"And it is impossible for any author of a voluminous book, consisting of several persons and circumstances, (Reader, in pleading for Master Fox I plead for myself,) to have such ubiquitous intelligence, as to apply the same infallibility to every particular."

"His Worthies is, we believe, more generally perused than any of his productions, and is perhaps the most agreeable; suffice to say of it, that it is a most fascinating storehouse of gossiping anecdote, and quaintness; a most delightful medley of interchanged amusement, presenting entertainment as varied as it is inexhaustible. His Good Thoughts in Bad Times, and lesser works, are all equally excellent in their way, full of admirable maxims and reflections, agreeable stories, and ingenious moralizations. It was, however, in biography that Fuller excelled."—Lon. Retrosp. Rev., 1821, iii. 54.

Our Dictionary is greatly indebted to the Worthies of England, as our frequent acknowledgments testify.

The Catalogues of the Sheriffs and the lists of the Gentry, as they were returned from the several counties in the twelfth year of Henry the Sixth, are very useful.

But we have already given to honest Fuller more space than we can well afford, and must dismiss him after the citation of two or three more testimonies of his general excellence as a writer.

"Next to Shakspeare, I am not certain whether Thomas Fuller, beyond all other writers, does not excite in me the sense and emotion of the marvellous; the degree in which any given faculty, or combination of faculties, is possessed and manifested, so far surpassing what we would have thought possible in a single mind, as to give one's admiration the flavour and quality of wonder. Fuller was incomparably the most sensible, the least prejudiced great man of an age that boasted of a galaxy of great men. In all his numerous volumes, on so many different subjects, it is scarcely too much to say, that you will hardly find a page in which some one sentence out of every three does not deserve to be quoted for itself as a motto or as a maxim. . . . Fuller, whose wit (alike in quantity, quality, and perpetuity, surpassing that of the wittiest in a witty age) robbed him of the praise not less due to him for an equal superiority in sound, shrewd, good sense, and freedom of intellect."—S. T. COLERIDGE.

"A man of fancy."—BISHOP BURNET.

"The writings of Fuller are usually designated by the title of quaint, and with sufficient reason; for such was his natural bias to conceits, that I doubt not, upon most occasions, it would have been going out of his way to have expressed himself out of them. But his wit is not always lumen scicorum, a dry faculty of surprising; on the contrary, his conceits are oftentimes deeply steeped in human feeling and passion. Above all, his way of telling a story, for its ever liveliness, and the perpetual running commentary of the narrator happily blended with the narration, is perhaps unequalled."—CHARLES LAMB.

See the authorities cited above, and an article on Fuller and his Writings, in the Boston Christian Examiner: highly lauded by an eminent English authority. The reader must procure, also, Memorials of the Life and Writings of Thomas Fuller, by the Rev. Arthur T. Russell, Vicar of Caxton, Cambridgeshire, Lon., 1844, sm. 8vo. And see BROOME, REV. ARTHUR, in this Dictionary.

Fuller was remarkable for his piety, his wit, his kindness of heart, his learning, his conversational powers, and his wonderful memory.

"He had a memory so vastly comprehensive that he is deservedly known for the first inventor of that noble art [memoria technica; but this was known to the ancients] whereof he left no rules behind him, but many extraordinary proofs; as, after a walk from Temple-Bar to the furthest conduit in Cheapside his repeating all the signs on both sides of the way, orderly, without missing or misplacing one; and so he would do by the words of different languages to any number; [500, at least, after twice hearing them, it has been stated:] to the great astonishment of his hearers."—Biog. Brit.

Fuller, Thomas, M.D., 1654-1734, honourably distinguished for his kindness to the poor, (see Cotton Mather's Essays to do Good), was educated at Queen's Coll., Camb., and practised at Sevenoaks, Kent. 1. Pharmacopœia Extemporanea, Lon., 1701, &c., 8vo. 2. Grantly Manor, 1847, 3 vols. p. Svo; 2d ed., 1854, 12mo.

"The author is perhaps too elaborate in her diction, and is stirred too often by an ambition for the superfine, to catch that flowing felicity of style which should be the aim of the novelist—a style in which sentences should only represent thought or fact, and never dazzle away attention from the matter they convey. But with some faults of manner, and some blunders in plot, the novel evinces considerable dramatic power, and has a number of striking characters. The interest is well sustained, though rapidity of movement in the story is ever subsidiary to completeness of delineation in the characters."—P. P. WHIPPLE: Essays, ii. 465.

"Grantly Manor is the title of an exceedingly interesting volume, which we have read with more than ordinary pleasure. The style is elegant, the story, which involves a succession of mysteries and cross-purposes, is well developed, and the scene and character painting is full of spirit and truth. The authoress is certainly a woman of genius, which she has used to excellent purpose."—Southern Literary Messenger.

"Memory taketh leave of her disciples with the following pithy admonition:

"To him that would me gladly gaine,
These three precepts shall not be vaine:
The fyrst, is wel to understand
The thing that he doth take in hand.
The second is the same to place
In order good, and formed race.
The thyrde is, often to repeat
The thing that he would not forgete."

2. The Enimie of Idleness. Teaching the maner and stile how to endite, compose, and write all sorts of Epistles and Letters, &c., 1568, '98, 8vo and 16mo, consisting of "Sundry Letters belonging to Love, as well in Verse as in Prose."

All is in prose, save the last thirteen pages, which contain seven metrical love-epistles. We give a specimen of the poetry:

"A constant lover doth expresse
His griping griefes, which still increase."

"A lover, pearst with Cupide's bowe, Thinks long till he be rid from woe!"

"A lover hath his ladie's hart,
And writes to hir as is his part."

Quoted in Gen. Lit., x. 5.

"The author is a man whom to know is to love, who is deeply penetrated with the spirit of Christianity, and whose whole life and character have grown from intimate heart-communion with the objects of his religious faith. He is a man of a rich, active, and fruitful intellect, of the most liberal culture, of warm enthusiasm and glowing fancy. But he is neither a logician nor a critic. Aesthetic considerations weigh more with him than historical proofs, and vividness of conception than demonstration. So far is he from needing facts to verify his theories, that he is ready to reject the best authenticated facts, if they would not flow necessarily from his à priori reasoning. . . . A History of Jesus is a title worthy of the author's honesty. . . . The definite article would have been sadly out of place; for the work is not an exposition of the Gospels as they are, but an original Gospel, embracing and endorsing such portions of the record of the evangelists as accorded with his notions of what must and should have been, and telling the rest of the story as the evangelists would have told it had they belonged to his school of philosophy and theology. His theory is, we believe, entirely original and peculiar. It is naturalism in a form so irrational and untenable that he can hardly conceive of its ever finding a second advocate."—A. P. Fuseli, Henry, 1741–1825, a celebrated painter, a native of Zurich, visited England in 1763, and was persuaded by Sir Joshua Reynolds, who discovered his great abilities, to adopt the profession of an artist. In 1770 he visited Italy, where he remained for nine years, and on his return at once took a position among the first painters of the day. From this time until his death he annually contributed to the Royal Academy. He died at the ripe age of 87, when on a visit to the Countess of Guilford, at Putney Hill. For an account of his life, artistic labours, and his views of professional matters, we must refer the reader to his Life and Works, (Lectures on Painting, Aphorisms, History of Arts in the Schools of Italy, &c.) the former written, the latter edited, by John Knowles,

1831, 3 vols. 8vo. See also Autobiography of Haydon; by Tom Taylor, Lon., 1853, 3 vols. 8vo. His Lectures, two series, were also pub. separately, 1801, &c. As early as 1765, 8vo, he pub. Reflections on the Painting and Sculpture of the Greeks, with Instructions for the Connoisseur, and an Essay on Grace in Works of Art, trans. from the German of the Abbé Winkelmann; and in 1805 he gave to the world an improved ed. of Pilkington's Dict. of Painters, 4to. Of this work there have been later eds. See the name. The Life and Works of Fuseli must not be neglected by the student:

"These volumes are perhaps the most valuable, as regards the fine arts, ever published in England. Every one who possesses the lectures of Sir Joshua Reynolds should possess also those of Fuseli, comprised in the above work, together with the painter's Aphorisms on Art, and his History of the Italian Schools of Painting and Sculpture, all of which are included in the present edition."—*Lon. Mr. Robert Balduino, now (1858) living in Brooklyn, New York, was an intimate friend and one of the executors of Fuseli. As already stated, (see BALMANSO, ROBERT,) we have earnestly urged Mr. B. to give to the world some reminiscences of the departed great,—the friends who have passed before him into the world of spirits. We fear, however, that this desire must remain among the ungratified.

Gale, John, 1680-1721, an eminent Baptist divine, a native of London, studied at Leyden and Amsterdam, and on his return home became one of the ministers of St. Paul's Alley, near Barbican, London. Wm. Wall, D.D., pub. his Hist. of Infant Baptism in 1705, 2 vols. Svo; 2d ed., 1707, 4to. In 1711, Svo, Gale pub. (1) Reflections on Wall's Defence of Infant Baptism, 2d ed., 1720, Svo. New ed., 1820, Svo. Wall responded to Gale: see WALL, Wm., D.D. The reader must procure The History of Infant Baptism, together with Gale's Reflections and Wall's Defence. New ed., by the Rev. Henry Cotton, D.C.L., 1836, 4 vols. Svo; again, 1844, 4 vols. Svo.

"Both the works of these learned writers on this subject are worthy of examination on account of the learning and knowledge of ecclesiastical history which they contain."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

The publication of Gale's work gave him reputation, and it is still perhaps the best work on the subject.

"Gale and Booth are the principal standard works on the side of the Baptists."—BUCKERSTETH.

Gale, Theophilus, 1628-1678, a learned Nonconformist, a native of Devonshire, educated at, and Fellow of, Magdalen Coll., Ox., settled at Winchester, and became a popular preacher. Refusing to conform at the Restoration, he was ejected from his fellowship, travelled as tutor with the two sons of Lord Wharton, and on his return became assistant and subsequently successor to Mr. John Rowe, who had a congregation at Holborn. He bequeathed his library to the promotion of dissenting principles in England. He pub. four Serms., 1671, '72, '73, '74. The tru idea of Jansenism, 1669, 8vo; a biog. notice of T. Truganis, 1671; Ideæ Theologicæ, 1673, 8vo; Philosophia Generalis, 1676, 12mo; and The Court of the Gentiles; or, a Discourse touching the Original of Human Literature, both Philologic and Philosophic, from the Scriptures and Jewish Church, &c. In 4 Pts., but pub. in 5 vols., viz. Vol. i., Pt. 1, of Philologic, Books 1, 2, 3, 2d ed., revised and enlarged, Oxf., 1672, 4to. Vol. ii., Pt. 2, of Barbaric and Grecian Philologic, Books 1, 2, 3, 4, 2d ed., enlarged, Lon., 1676, 4to. Vol. iii., Pt. 3, The Vanity of Pagan Philosophic demonstrated, Books 1, 2, 1677, 4to. Vol. iv., Pt. 4, of Reformed Philologic, Books 1, 2, 1677, 4to. Vol. v., Pt. 4 continued, of Reformed Philologic, Book 3, 1682, 4to. It is this last part, treating of divine Predetermination, Book 3 of Pt. 4, which is so often wanting. The 1st eds. of the 5 Pts. were pub. 1669-77. This great work occupied the author for more than twenty years. It had a narrow escape from destruction by fire. See Athen. Oxon.

"They [the various parts of which the work is composed] shew the author to have been well read in, and conversant with, the writings of the fathers, the old philosophers, and those that have given any account of them or their works; as also to have been a good metaphysician and school-divine."—Athen. Oxon.

"This learned and elaborate work, after falling for a time into obscurity, is now in great repute. The leading object of it is, to trace all human learning, philosophy, and religion, to the ancient Scriptures and the Jewish church. Gale certainly carries his ideas too far; but he must be very prejudiced or stupid who does not see that the substance of his argument is made out. The style of the work is clumsy and verbose, the numerous quotations render it irksome to read, and the reasonings are, in some places, obscure and metaphysical; but it is a work of real merit and learning, and will repay a careful examination to those who are partial to the kind of subjects which it discusses."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Our countryman Gale is for deriving all arts and sciences, without exception, from the Jews. Who would not think the man was bantering us, had he not given so sad a proof of his being in earnest, as the writing three bulky volumes in support of these wonderful discoveries?"—BISHOP WARBURTON.

"I believe that Jacob Bryant, when writing his Ancient System of Mythology, was much aided by Gale's Court of the Gentiles."—DR. PARR.

"This learned work contains a vast body of information on Pagan Philosophy, and the light obtained by the ancients from the Scriptures."—Bickersteth's Chris. Stu.

Bickersteth also commends Gale's Discourse concerning Christ's Second Coming, 1673, 8vo; new ed., 1839, 18mo, as "A very practical and useful work."

We do not forget that the Ars Sciendi, 1682, 8vo, is ascribed to Gale by Wood, but Calamy expressly denies it to be his. He left in MS. an unfinished lexicon and concordance (in one) of the Greek Test., proposals for publishing which he issued in 1678. Why does not some enterprising bookseller republish the Court of the Gentiles? It is now rarely to be met with complete, and is worth not much less than £3. See authorities cited above; also Biog. Brit., and Brucker's Hist. of Philos.

Gale, Thomas, D.D., 1636-1702, father of Roger and Samuel Gale, one of the most eminent of English classical scholars, a native of Yorkshire, was educated at Westminster school and Trin. Coll., Camb., of which he became Fellow; Regius Prof. of Greek, 1666; Head Master of St. Paul's School, London, 1672; Preb. of St. Paul's, 1676; Dean of York, 1697. He pub. Opuscula Mythologica, Ethica, et Physica, Gr. et Lat., 8vo; Historia Poeticæ Scriptores antiqui, 8vo; Rhetores Selecti, 8vo; Jamblicus de Mysteriis; Platerium juxta Exemplar Alexandrinum; Herodoti Historiarum; Ciceronis Opera; Historia Anglicanæ Scriptores, fol.; Historia Britannicæ Saxonice Anglo-Danice Scriptores XV., accessit rerum et Verborum Index Locupletissimus, fol.; contains Gildas, Eddius, Nennius, Asser, Ralph Higden, Polychronicon, Guil. Malmshuriensis, Jo. Wallingford, Fordunus, Aleninus, et aliorum.

There were pub. after his death from his MSS. a vol. of serms. on the Holy Days of the Ch. of England, 1704, 8vo, and Antonini Itinerarium Britannia, pub. by his son, 1709, 4to. This is a good edit. A Discourse of Dr. Gale's on the Original of Human Literature, with Philology and Philosophy, will be found in Phil. Trans., vol. vi. The portion of the Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores veteres, edited by him, is not thought to be equal to that edited by Wm. Fulman: see the name. See Biog. Brit.; Knight's Life of Colet; Nichols's Lit. Ance.

"The reason why I troubled you with the question to Mr. Gale was, to know if there were such things preserved as Dean Gale's collated Latin &c., which I was sensible did not come down with his MSS. Gall, Richard, 1776-1801, a printer of Edinburgh, gained considerable reputation as a poet. His best-known songs are My only Jo and Dearie O, the Farewell to Ayrshire, There's waefu' news in you town, As I came through Glendochart Vale, The Braes o' Drunlike, I winna gang back to my Minny again, and Peggy wi' the gowden hair. The poem of Arthur's Seat has also been highly commended. A vol. of his Poems and Songs, with a Memoir, was pub. after his death, Edin., 12mo.

"The poem entitled Arthur's Seat displays, in many passages, the fervid feeling and buoyant force of a true poet; and of the songs, it is far higher praise than any criticism of ours can bestow, to mention, that some of them have been commonly mistaken for genuine effusions of Burns, and that others have long ago obtained in Scotland that extensive and settled popularity which forms the surest test of the author's adherence to truth and nature. A tender simplicity characterizes all his lyrical effusions."—Edin. Mag. and Lit. Miscell.

"Gall must henceforth stand on the list next to Burns, and by the side of Ramsay, Ferguson, Bruce, and Macneil. It is in his songs and short effusions that Gall's name is destined to live. There is nothing better or sweeter in the Scottish language than some of these; and whenever Gall's songs are set to appropriate airs, it is easy, without the spirit of prophecy, to foretell their popularity. My only Jo and Dearie O, and the Farewell to Ayrshire, are known to every lover of modern Scottish song."—Scottman. "I remember when this song [My only Jo and Dearie O] was exceedingly popular; its sweetness and ease, rather than its originality and vigour, might be the cause of its success. The third verse contains a very beautiful picture of early attachment—a sunny bank, and some sweet soft school-girl will appear to many a fancy when these lines are sung."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

Gallagher, Matthew, printer, Trinidad. Letters and Documents rel. to the Imprison and Discharge of the Author, Trinidad, 1810, 12mo.

Gallagher, William D., b. in Philadelphia in 1808, removed to Cincinnati in 1816, and in his seventeenth year entered the printing-office of a newspaper of that city. There his literary talents soon attracted attention, although the young author preserved his incognito for a number of years; and in 1830 Mr. Gallagher formed a connection with the Backwoodsman, a political journal pub. at Xenia, Ohio. In 1831 he became editor of The Cincinnati Mirror; in 1836 of The Western Literary Journal and Monthly Review, and in 1837 of The Western Monthly Magazine and Literary Journal. He has since been engaged in the management of several periodicals. When Mr. Corwin became Secretary of the Treasury in 1849, he appointed Mr. Gallagher his confidential clerk, and he resided in Washington until 1853, when he removed to Louisville, Kentucky, where he was for a brief period one of the editors of the Daily Courier. For further particulars respecting this laborious son of letters we must refer the reader to the source for which we are indebted to the above facts—Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America.

Mr. Gallagher is the author of many poems, some of which have elicited enthusiastic commendation. He has pub. three small vols. of his juvenile poetical compositions, under the title of Errata, 1835-37, and a vol., in 1846, of the productions of maturer years. Some of his pieces will be found in Selections from the Poetical Literature of the West, Cincinnati, 1841.

"The poems of Mr. Gallagher are numerous, various, and of very unequal merit. Some are exquisitely modulated, and in every respect finished with excellent judgment, while others are inharmonious, inelegant, and betray unmistakable signs of carelessness. His most unstudied performances, however, are apt to be forcible and picturesque, fragrant with the freshness of western woods and fields, and instinct with the aspiring and determined life of the race of western men. The poet of a new country is naturally of the party of progress: his noblest theme is man, and his highest law, liberty."—R. W. GRIFFOLD, ubi supra. And see Southern Literary Messenger, iv. 452.

Gallatin, Albert, 1761–1849, a native of Geneva, emigrated to America in his nineteenth year, and, entering into political life, became, in 1790, a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature; in 1792, a member of the national House of Representatives; in 1793, U. States Senator; in 1801, Secretary of the U. States Treasury; in 1813, commissioner to Ghent; subsequently, minister from the U. States to France, the Netherlands, and England, successively. He had great natural powers and enlarged erudition, and devoted much attention to ethnology, philology, and political economy. He pub. an Indian Vocabulary—a subject in which he took a lively and intelligent interest;—Views of the Public Debt in 1801; Reports and Letters rel. to the U. States Bank, 1810, '11; Considerations on the Currency and Banking System of the U. States, 1831; The Right of the U. S. of Amer. to the North-Eastern Boundary claimed by them, 1840, '43; some historical and other papers. He died at Astoria, New York, in 1849. Some interesting reminiscences of Gallatin will be found in Judge Story's Life and Letters.

"He is a most industrious and indefatigable man, and by the consent of all parties, of accomplished genius and great acquirements. . . . Let me say he is a truly great statesman. I rank him side by side with Alexander Hamilton. . . . Mr. Gallatin preserved a purity of character that is as valuable in a politician as it is rare. A man of great learning, he daily adds weight to his counsels, and glory to his name."—JUDGE STORY, ubi supra.

Dr. G. also pub. The Youth's Book of Natural Theology, N. York, 1852, a Family and School Dictionary, (in conjunction with Horace Hooker,) &c. For an account of his Life, Character, and Public Services, see the Discourse so entitled, by H. Barnard, Hartford, 1852, 8vo, and Barnard's Tribute to Gallaudet, N. York, 1852. Garrison, John, 1788–1820, a native of Marblehead, Massachusetts, a nephew of Chief Justice Sewall, educated at Cambridge University, practised law for a brief period in his native town, and subsequently removed to Boston, where, for a year or two, he edited the Weekly Messenger. In addition to his excellent Reports, he pub. an Address to the Peace Society, 1820, &c. Reports of Cases in Cir. Ct. U. States, 1st Cir., 1812–15; vol. i., 1815; vol. ii., 1817. 2d ed., with addit. Notes and References, Boston, 1845, 2 vols. 8vo. Of the judgments of Mr. Justice Story during his circuits in 1812 and 1813, (see vol. i.) only four were reversed by the Supreme Court; and of the judgments recorded in vol. i., no one was reversed. The leading cases in vol. i. are, The Rapid, The Grotius, The Julia, The Alligator, and U. S. v. Womson, all involving questions in Admiralty and Prize Law, as do most of the cases in this vol. The leading cases in vol. ii. are, Maissonnaire v. Keating, The Invincible, The Jerusalem, and the celebrated case of De Lovio v. Boit.

"I should omit doing justice to my own feelings, as well as to the cause of truth, if I were not to select the decisions in Gallison's and Mason's Reports as specimens of pre-eminent merit. They may fairly be placed upon a level with the best productions of the English Admiralty, for deep and accurate learning, as well as for the highest ability and wisdom in decision."—3 Kent, 20; 2: 527.

Judge Story sent these volumes (1st ed.) to Sir William Scott, who thus acknowledged their receipt:

"I have received with great pleasure the volumes of Reports, and an very glad to add my testimony to the acuteness and learning which are everywhere displayed in them. It is highly gratifying to us to see the same principles to which we think we owe so much in England, still adhered to in America, and built upon as occasion may require, with equal zeal, but with equal caution in all the deductions."—Sir William Scott to Judge Story, London, July 2, 1818. The Life and Letters of Joseph Story, i. 207.

From the same interesting work we extract the following anecdote:

"At an evening club, where Sir James Mackintosh was present with Lord Stowell, (then Sir William Scott.) Sir William Grant came in with a book in his pocket, which was no other than a volume of the Reports of the excellent and lamented Gallison, and which he drew out rather archly, observing to Sir William Scott, 'This Mr. Story appears to be a promising pupil,' adding, 'You must not expect these doctrines of yours to be confined to one belligerent power, but they must make the tour of all the belligerents.' This was done by Sir William Grant, as Sir James Mackintosh said, 'with malice prepense.'"

To Gallison's Report of Judge Story's decisions must be added those of WILLIAM P. MASON, (q. v.), Boston, 1836, 5 vols. 8vo, and those of CHARLES SUMNER, (q. v.), 1851, 3 vols. 8vo.

In Judge Story's admirable address upon the Progress of Jurisprudence, delivered before the Members of the Suffolk Bar, Sept. 4, 1821, will be found an eloquent tribute to the virtues of Gallison, who had died in the preceding year. We append an extract:

"I will not dwell upon his distinguished talents and virtues, his blameless innocence of life, his elevated piety, his unwearied diligence, his extensive learning, his ardent devotion to literature, his active benevolence, exhausting itself in good deeds and blushing to find it fame. You knew him well, and your sympathies have mingled with the tears and sorrows that embalm his memory. But I may propose him as an example, polished, if not perfect, of that excellence which the studies I have this day ventured to recommend, are calculated to produce."

Galt, John, 1779-1839, a native of Ayrshire, educated at Greenock, proving unfortunate in trade in London, commenced the study of the law, which he soon forsook for letters. He acted for some time as agent to a company for establishing emigrants in Canada, (see his novel of Lawrie Todd), but quarrelled with the Government, and was suspended by the Canada Company. After his return to England he supported himself by the labours of a most prolific pen.

The following list of works, many of them in two and three vols. each, exhibits a life of great literary industry. 1. Four Tragedies, viz.: Maddalen, Agamemnon, Lady Macbeth, Antonio and Clytemnestra. Severely criticized in the Lon. Quar. Rev., xi. 33-41. 2. Voyages and Travels in 1809, '10, '11. 3. Life of Wolsey, 1812. Severely criticized in the Lon. Quar. Rev., viii. 163-172. 4. Reflec. on Polit. and Commercial Subjects. 5. Letters from the Levant, 1813. 6. Life and Studies of Benj. West, 1816, and Pt. 2. 7. The Magojo, 1816. 8. Pictures from Eng., Scotch, and Irish Hist. 9. The Wandering Jew. 10. Andrew of Padua. 11. The Earthquake. 12. The Ayrshire Legatees, 1820. 13. The Annals of the Parish, 1821. Highly commended by Sir Walter Scott; see his Life. 14. Sir Andrew Wylie. 15. The Entail. 16. The Steam-Boat. 17. The Provost: thought by Galt to be his best novel. 18. Ringan Gilhaize. 19. The Spawwife. 20. Rothelan. 21. The Last of the Lairds. 22. Lawrie Todd. 23. Southeman. 24. Guide to the Canadas, by A. Picken. 25. The Omen, 1824. 26. Eben Erskine. 27. Glenfield. 28. Lives of the Players. 29. The Bachelor's Wife. 30. Rocking-Horse. 31. Gathering of the West. 32. Poems. 33. The Member. 34. The Radical. 35. Stories of the Study. 36. Apotheosis of Sir Walter Scott. 37. New British Theatre. 38. Memoirs of George the Third. 39. Life of Lord Byron, 1830. 40. Bogle Corbet, 1831. 41. Stanley Buxton, 1832. 42. The Stolen Child, 1833. 43. Autobiography of John Galt, 1833. 44. Literary Life and Miscellanies, 1834. Mr. Galt also edited an edit. of Henry Mackenzie's Works, and engaged in other literary labours.

"There is a thorough quaintness of phrase and dialogue in Mr. Galt's best works, which places him apart from all other Scotch novelists; much knowledge of life, variety of character, liveliness and humour, are displayed in these novels, and render them justly popular. This humour and truth were recognised as admirable by Sir Walter Scott. The public will not soon forget his Ayrshire Legatees, his Annals of the Parish, nor The Entail; which last we think one of his best novels. Mr. Galt's biographies, and many of his other later works, manufactured for the booksellers, are of a very different character."—Lon. Gent. Mag., July, 1839, 92-94.

"According to our judgment, he has never written better than second-rate books; though we have ever found, in what we considered his worst pieces, something of his best self, and something which carried us through the whole, at the same time leaving instruction fresh and precise upon our minds. And this is saying a great deal, when we consider the catalogue of his writings. Indeed, his mind is such, that it cannot give out any thing belonging to it, which partakes not of its original nature. Strong, and what is called rough good sense is ever there; familiar but most expressive thoughts find similar illustrations most readily with him, which we presume could not have been improved by long study. . . . He is, besides, strictly a moral as well as remarkably entertaining writer."—Lon. Month. Rev., vol. xxiv. N. S., 1833, 249-267.

"He has no classic predilections, and sets up no favourite author as a model; he aims at no studied elegance of phrase, cares nothing for formal accuracy of costume, seems not at all solicitous about the dignity of human nature, and thinks chivalry a joke. He leaves all these matters to take care of themselves, and sets to work to read us a chapter of living life, like one sure of securing listeners."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: *Biog. and Crit. Extract from the Certificate of Rev. Drs. Cone, Sharp, and Chase, Committee appointed by the Missionary Union to examine the Work:

"The undersigned having been requested by the Executive Committee of the Missionary Union to read, in manuscript, Prof. Gamuell's History of American Baptist Missions, are happy to state that, in our opinion, the work is well adapted to accomplish the important purposes for which it was written. Such a history we think to be much needed, and worthy of being read by all. It exhibits gratifying evidence of research, fidelity and skill. It sets before the reader, in a lucid manner, facts that should never be forgotten. Some of them in power to awaken attention and touch the heart, could scarcely be surpassed by fiction."

And see a review of this work in N. Amer. Rev., lxx. 57-78. Mr. Gamuell has also pub. several discourses, &c., and contributed many articles to Reviews, especially to the Christian Review, Boston, of which he was for three or four years associate editor.

Gardiner, Stephen, 1483-1555, a native of Bury St. Edmund's, educated at Trinity Hall, Camb., became Secretary to Cardinal Wolsey. In 1527, in company with Edward Fox, he visited Rome, and made an ineffectual attempt to persuade the pope to consent to the divorce of Henry VIII. from Queen Catherine. He however aided his royal master in the prosecution of his wicked design, and was made Secretary of State, and in 1531 Bishop of Winchester. Being opposed to the Reformation, he was imprisoned under Edward VI., but restored to his bishopric upon the accession of Queen Mary, and in 1533 made Lord Chancellor and Prime Minister. He used his power for the purposes of persecution, and the Protestants found in him a most determined foe. He was a man of great learning, judgment, and tact, and deeply versed in the knowledge of human nature. 1. De vera Obedientia, Lon., 1534, '35, 4to. In English, by M. Wood, Roan, 1553, 12mo. He wrote a number of letters to Smith and Cheke, respecting the proper pronunciation of the Greek tongue. See an account of this controversy in Baker's Reflections on Learning.

"Hoger Asham, with a courtly address, declares, that though the knights show themselves better critics, yet Gardiner's letters manifest a superior genius, and were only liable to censure, from his entering further into a dispute of this kind, than was necessary for a person of his dignity."

Godwin and Parker say that he died repeating these words: "Erravi cum Petro, et non flevi cum Petro."

Garrick, David, 1716-1779, the grandson of a Frenchman, and son of Peter Garrick, a captain in the Royal Army, was a native of Hereford. In 1735 he was placed at a school opened in Lichfield by Samuel Johnson; and when his master determined to try his fortune in London, the pupil thought that he could do no better than bear him company. The great eminence in their respective departments to which the adventurers attained is well known to our readers. After a short experience as a wine-merchant, Garrick indulged a darling passion which had long possessed him, and made his appearance on the stage, where his success was unbounded. For a period of forty years he trod the boards without a rival, and at his death left an estate valued at £140,000. He was equally at home in tragedy or comedy.

"Every passion of the human breast seemed subjected to his powers of expression; nay, even time itself appeared to stand still or advance as he would have it. Rage and ridicule, doubt and despair, transport and tenderness, compassion and contempt, love, jealousy, fear, fury, and simplicity, all took in turn possession of his features, while each of them in turn appeared to be the sole possessor of those features. One night old age sat on his countenance, as if the wrinkles she had stamped there were indelible; the next the gaiety and bloom of youth seemed to overspread his face, and smooth even those marks which time and muscular conformation might have really made there. These truths were acknowledged by all who saw him in the several characters of Lear, or Hamlet, Richard, Dorilas, Romeo, or Luignan; in his Ranger, Bays, Druggler, Kitey, Brute, or Benedict."

Mrs. Garrick, who was a Miss Viegel, (she subsequently changed her name to Violette), a native of Vienna, and a stage-dancer in London, survived her husband forty-three years, dying in 1822, in her 97th year. See Lon. Gent. Mag., Nov. 1822.

As an author, Mr. Garrick's talents were respectable. Of his original compositions, The Lying Valet, Miss in her Teens, and The Clandestine Marriage, (the last written in conjunction with Colman.) are the principal favourites. A list of more than forty pieces, written or altered by him, will be found in the Biog. Dramat.; and, in addition to these and others, he wrote epigrams, odes, and many prologues, epilogues, and songs. Dramatic Works, Lon., 1768, 3 vols. 12mo; 1798, 3 vols. 12mo.

"A wretched and imperfect collection."—Loumdes's Bibl. Man.

Poetical works now first collected, with Explan. Notes, 1785, 2 vols. 12mo. Of Garrick's Mode of Reading the Liturgy, a new ed., by R. Cull, was pub. in 1840, 8vo. See Davies's and Murphy's Lives of Garrick; Biog. Dramat.; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Boswell's Johnson; Cumberland's Life; Mason's Life of Whitehead; Colman's Random Records.

Much of interest relating to the literary history of the times will be found in Garrick's Private Correspondence with the most celebrated persons of his time, now first published from the originals, and illustrated with Notes and a New Biographical Memoir, splendidly printed, with fine portrait by Sir Joshua Reynolds, 1831-32, 2 vols. r. 4to, pub. at £5 5s.

This interesting work contains upwards of two thousand letters from many of the eminent men of the times in which Garrick lived—from Lords Lyttelton, Camden, Chatham, Dr. Johnson, Boswell, Goldsmith, Gibbon, Sheridan, Huone, Robertson, Murphy, George Stevens, Richard Cumberland, Dr. Warburton, Bp. Hoadly, Burke, Junius, Wilkes, Dr. Franklin, Churchill, Sir J. Reynolds, Gainsborough, George Colman, Mrs. Clive, Mrs. Montague, and fifty others. There are also numerous letters from foreign correspondents, among whom may be named Voltaire, Beau-marehais, Algarotti, Diderot, Baron Grimm, Helvetius, Riecohani, Baron Koch, and Wieland.

"Have you seen the second volume of the Garrick Correspondence? Is it not a treat? Glorious Garrick!"—The late C. Matthews.

"Garrick's appearance forms an epoch in the history of the English theatre, as he chiefly dedicated his talents to the great characters of Shakespeare, and built his own fame on the growing admiration of the poet. Before his time, Shakespeare had only been brought on the stage in mutilated and disguised alterations. Garrick returned on the whole to the true originals, though he still allowed himself to make some very unfortunate changes. It appears to me that the only excusable alteration of Shakespeare is, to leave out a few things not in conformity to the taste of the time. Garrick was undoubtedly a great actor. Whether he always conceived the parts of Shakespeare in the sense of the poet, I from the very circumstances stated in the eulogies on his acting should be inclined to doubt. He excited, however, a noble emulation to represent worthily the great national poet; this was ever since been the highest aim of actors, and even at present the stage can boast of men whose histrionic talents are deservedly famous."—*Schlegel's Lect. on Dramat. Garth, Sir Samuel, d. 1718-19, a native of Yorkshire, was educated at Peter House, Camb., where he took his degree of M.D. in 1691, and was admitted Fellow, June 26, 1693. In 1687 commenced a quarrel between the physicians and apothecaries, the latter of whom opposed the design of the former to furnish the poor with advice gratis and medicines at prime cost. To hold the apothecaries up to public reprobation and ridicule, Garth pub. in 1699, 4to, his satirical poem of the Dispensary, which pleased the town so much that it went through three editions in a few months, and many were subsequently pub. The 9th ed., which contains a number of episodes and inscriptions, appeared in 1706. Pope remarks that it had been "corrected in every edition, and that every change was an improvement." When Garth, in 1697, spoke what is now called the Harveian Oration, he followed up the blow in Latin, and the poor apothecaries were placed completely hors du combat. He also wrote the epilogue to Addison's tragedy of Cato, pub. a poem entitled Claremont, and in an ed. of Ovid's Metamorphoses, pub. in 1717, trans. the whole 14th book, and the story of Cippus in the 15th; the Preface is also his. Works, 1769, 12mo. He lived without religion, and, according to Pope—an intimate friend,—died a Roman Catholic.

"His poetry has been praised at least equally to its merit. In the Dispensary there is a strain of smooth and free versification; but few lines are eminently elegant. No passages fall below mediocrity, and few rise much above it. The plan seems formed without just proportion to the subject; the means end have no necessary connection. Resnel, in his Preface to Pope's Essay, remarks, that Garth exhibits no discrimination of characters; and that what any one says might, with equal propriety, have been said by another. The general design is, perhaps open to criticism; but the composition can seldom be charged with inaccuracy or negligence. The author never slumbers in self-indulgence; his full vigour is always exerted; scarcely a line is left unfinished; nor is it easy to find an expression used by constraint, or a thought imperfectly expressed. It was remarked by Pope, that the Dispensary had been corrected in every edition, and that every change was an improvement. It appears, however, to want something of poetical ardour, and something of general delectation; and therefore since it has been no longer supported by accidental and intrinsic popularity, it has been scarcely able to support itself."—Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets.

Returning to England, he became a courtier, and contributed to the festivities which enlivened the business of statesmen and the progress of the queen. The name of The Princely Pleasures of Kenilworth Castle, one of Gascoigne's masques, will remind many of our readers of Amy Robsart and Sir Richard Varney, of the ambitious Earl and his imperious mistress. Among Gascoigne's best-known pieces are: The Glasse of Government; a Tragical Comedie, Lon., 1575, 4to. The Steele Glas; a Satyre, 1576, 4to. A Delicate Diet for daintie mouthed Dronkards; wherein the fowle abuse of common carousing and quaffing with heartie draughts is honestly admonished, 1576, 8vo. The Droomie of Doomes Day; wherein the Frailties and Miseries of Man's Life are lively portrayed and learnedly set forth, 1586, 4to. The Comedie of Supposes, and the Tragedie of Iocasta, in the collective ed. of his Whole Workes, 1587, 4to. Warton says that the Comedie of Supposes was the first comedy written in English prose; and Dr. Farmer in his Essay on Shakspeare says that the latter borrowed part of the plot and of the phraseology of this play, and transferred it into his Taming of the Shrew. This was the opinion of Chalmers, Warton, and Gifford, also. Many of Gascoigne's works are reprinted in Chalmers's ed. of the Poets. For notices of early eds., and of the author, see Athen. "Mary Barton is a work of higher pretensions than an ordinary novel. It aims not only at the delineation of the joys and sorrows, the loves and hatreds of our common humanity, but it professes also to give a picture of the feelings, habits, opinions, character, and social condition of a particular class of the people—a class, too, which has of late years attracted a great share of public attention, and has probably been the subject of more misconception and misrepresentation than has fallen to the lot of any other. . . . The literary merit of the work is in some respects of a very high order. Its interest is intense; often painfully so."—Edin. Rev., lxxxix. 402-435.

Gataker, Charles, 1614?–1680, son of the celebrated Thomas Gataker, educated at Sidney Coll., Camb., and Pembroke Coll., Oxf., became Rector of Hoggeston, Buckinghamshire, about 1647, and continued there until his death. He wrote some treatises against the Papists, The Way of Truth and Peace, or a Reconciliation of St. Paul and St. James concerning Justification, another work on Justification, animadversions on Bull's Harmonia Apostolica, &c. See Athen. Oxon.; Genl. Biog. Diet.

Gatker, Thomas, 1574–1654, was educated at St. John's Coll., Camb.; preacher at Lincoln's Inn, 1601; Rector of Rotherhithe, 1611. He was for many years debarred from active pastoral duty by ill health. He was one of those who subscribed the Covenant, but professed his attachment to Episcopacy, and in the time of the Commonwealth sided with the Presbyterians rather than the Independents. He was one of the most learned critics of his day, and Salmusius, Aenius, Colomies, Morhof, Baillet, as well as the British scholars, united in his praise. Among his principal works are:—1. Of the Nature and Use of Lots; a Treatise, Hist. and Theolog., Lon., 1616, '19, '27, 4to.

"This publication made a great noise, and drew him afterwards into a controversy."

2. Serms., 1620, 4to; 1637, fol. He also pub. a number of other sermons, and discourses, 1620–1707.

"Gataker vindicates the purity of the Greek of the New Testament writers from Hebraisms and barbarisms against Pfschenius; and illustrates many of its difficult words and idioms. He was a profound Greek scholar, and applied his knowledge very successfully to the illustration of the Scriptures, and also of the classics; though his ideas of the correctness and elegance of the style of the New Testament were carried to an extreme. Some of his English writings, as his Essay on the Nature and Use of Lots, are also worth reading."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Gataker examines this subject [Lots] with great learning, judgment and accuracy."—Wordsworth's Chris. Inst.

His share of the annotations upon the Scriptures—the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations—written by divines of the Westminster Assembly, was so admirably performed, that Calamy does not scruple to assert that no commentator, ancient or modern, is entitled to higher praise.

See Mr. Hallam's comments upon Gataker's Cinnus, &c., Adversaria Posthuma, and Mareus Antoninus. The English reader should procure The Meditations of Antoninus, with Gataker's Preliminary Discourse, and Dacier's Life of the Emperor, trans. by Jeremy Collier, 1701, 8vo. After reading Gataker's Prelim. Discourse, he is not to read the Meditations in this trans., for it is inelegant, vulgar, and ludicrous, but must read the trans. by R. Graves, Bath, 1792, 8vo, or some other good version. Antoninus is well worth attention:

Gauden, John, D.D., 1605–1662, a native of Mayfield, Essex, educated at St. John's Coll., Camb., became Vicar of Clippenham, and subsequently Rector of Brightwell, Berkshire. Being appointed chaplain to Robert, Earl of Warwick, he preached before the House of Commons, Nov. 29, 1640, and so pleased the members that they gave him a silver tankard, and in the next year presented him to the rich deanery of Bocking, in Essex. When he discovered the murderous designs entertained by the Parliamentarians, he boldly opposed them in a published protest, (1648, fol.) and after the king had been put to death, he wrote A Just Inveective against those of the army and their abettors who murdered Ch. Charles I., &c.; written Feb. 10, 1648. But this was not pub. until after the Restoration, i. e. in 1662. In 1660 he was made Bishop of Exeter, and in 1662 translated to Worcester. He wrote a number of treatises in vindication of the Church of England and its ministers, among which are Hieraspistes, or A Defence of the Ministry and Ministers of the Ch. of Eng., 1653, 4to; The Case of Ministers' Maintenance by Tithes, 1653; Petitionary Remonstrance to Oliver Cromwell in behalf of the Clergy of Eng., 1659, 4to; Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Suspiria; The Tears, Sighs, and Complaints of the Ch. of Eng., 1659, fol.; Antisacerilegus, 1660, 4to; serms., &c.

The character of Gauden has been violently assailed; but he lived in days when prominent men of either party were not likely to meet with much mercy from their opponents. Without entering into any examination of his character, it is but fair to quote Wood's declaration, and thus give him credit for what cannot be disputed:

"While he continued there [tutor at Wadham College] the greatness of his parts were much improved by the greatness of industry, bestowing the most part of the day and night too in the study of divine matters; . . . esteemed by all that knew him a very comely person, a man of vast parts, and one that had been strangely improved by unweari'd labour."—Allen, Ozm.

But we must no longer delay the introduction of a subject which, more than all other causes of notoriety, has invested and still invests the name of Gauden with deep interest to the student of political and literary history:—the authorship of Eikon Basilike. In our articles on AN-

NESLEY, ARTHUR, EARL OF, and CHARLES I., King of England, we have already dwelt somewhat upon this vexed question, and referred the reader to the article he is now perusing, promising to direct him to the best sources of information on this subject. The "famous memorandum" in the Earl of Anglesey's copy of the Eikon Basilike was discovered by Mr. Millington, the auctioneer who sold his lordship's library. It is a MS. declaration by the Earl that K. Charles II. and the Duke of York had both assured him that the work in question

"Was none of the said King's compiling, but made by Dr. Gauden, Bishop of Chester, which I here insert, for the undeceiving others in this point, by attesting so much under my hand."

This memorandum was given to the world, and great was the controversy, and many were the books, to which it gave rise. As regards the work itself, we have already said so much under the name of CHARLES I. that we may be excused from lingering much on this point. Those who are disposed to pursue the subject at length can examine the dissertations upon this question by Milton, Jane, Ludlow, Hollingworth, Walker, Long, Wagstaff, Burnet, Dugdale, Nash, Birch, Granger, Burton; Gen. Mag. for 1754; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Lon. Quar. Rev.; Brydges's Restituta; see these and other authorities cited in Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; also see authorities cited in Biog. Brit.; Laing's Hist. of Scotland; Lloyd's Memoirs; Maty's Review; Dean Barwick's Life; Who wrote Icon Basilike? by Christopher Wordsworth, D.D., 1824, '25, '28, 3 vols. 8vo; and a review of vol. i. of this work by Sir James Mackintosh, in Edin. Rev., xlv. 1-47. It is fair to add that in his last vol. Dr. Wordsworth stoutly defends his position against Lingard, Todd, Broughton, the Edinburgh Review, and Hallam. Surely the good doctor had his hands full. Mr. Todd rejoined in the next year, 1829.

If the reader ask us "Who wrote Icon Basilike?" we shall be obliged to reply as we shall when he (by supposition) asks us "Who wrote Junius?"—Really, we cannot tell. To show him that we have no great reason to blush for our ignorance, we beg to tell him that the learned Dr. Wordsworth "proves" that King Charles I. wrote it, and the equally learned Sir James Mackintosh "proves" that Bishop Gauden wrote it. Now it is certain that both cannot be right, and it is just as certain that it would puzzle a wiser head than ours to prove that either is wrong. Those who wish to see Dr. Wordsworth supported can turn to the London Quarterly Review, xxxii. 467-505; and those who wish to see Sir James Mackintosh countenanced can consult Todd's answer to Wordsworth, and Henry Hallam's Introduction to the Literature of Europe. The quotation of the opinion of the last-named eminent authority may fitly conclude this article:

"The famous Icon Basilice ascribed to Charles I. may deserve a place in literary history. If we could trust its peneurylists, few books in our language have done it more credit by dignity of sentiment and beauty of style. It can hardly be necessary for me to express my unhesitating conviction that it was solely written by Bishop Gauden, who after the Restoration unequivocally claimed it as his own. The folly and impudence of such a claim, if it could not be substantiated, are not to be presumed as to any man of good understanding, fair character, and high station, without stronger evidence than has been alleged on the other side; especially when we find that those who had the best means of inquiry, at a time when it seems impossible that the falsehood of Gauden's assertion should not have been demonstrated, if it were false, acquiesced in his pretensions. We have very little to place against this, except secondary testimony, vague, for the most part, in itself, and collected by those whose veracity has not been put to the test like that of Gauden. The style also of the Icon Basilice has been identified by Mr. Todd with that of Gauden by the use of several phrases so peculiar that we can hardly conceive them to have suggested themselves to more than one person. It is nevertheless superior to his acknowledged writings. A strain of majestic melancholy is well kept up; but the personated sovereign is rather too theatrical for real nature, the language is too rhetorical and amplified, the periods too artificially elaborated. None but scholars and practical writers employ such a style as this."—Ed. 3d, Lon., 1847, vol. iii. 152, 153.

Here we had intended to stop. But fearful that the last quotation may settle the question with our reader, and having a charitable desire to leave him in the same pleasing uncertainty with which we shall dismiss him from the Junius controversy—in the same state, in short, in which we find ourselves—we throw out for his consideration the following comment, which has at least the authority of a great name:

"To go no further for a testimony, let his own writings witness, which speak him no less an author than a monarch, composed with such a commanding majestic pathos, as if they had been writ not with a pen but with a sceptre, and for those whose virulent and ridiculous calumnies ascribe that incomparable piece to others, I say it is a sufficient argument that those did not write it because they could not."—SOUTH.

Since we prepared the above article for the press, Mr.

Maeaulay has pub. vols. iii. and iv. of his Hist. of England, (Lon., Dec. 1855), and in this learned and instructive work we find the following expression of opinion upon that vexed question above noticed:

"In that year [1692] an honest old clergyman named Walker, who had, in the time of the Commonwealth, been Gauden's curate, wrote a book which convinced all sensible and dispassionate readers that Gauden, and not Charles the First, was the author of the Icon Basilike."

Gay, John, 1688-1732, a native of Barnstaple, the descendant of the ancient family of the Le Gays of Oxford and Devonshire, was at an early age apprenticed to a silkmere in London. A brief experience proved both to himself and his master that he was ill suited for the duties of active life, and, obtaining a discharge from his indentures, he determined to follow his literary inclinations. The amiability and unobtrusiveness of his character recommended him to the friendship of Pope, Swift, and other wits of the day, and his new attachments were strengthened by the evidence of poetical abilities displayed in his Rural Sports, a descriptive poem addressed to Pope, and pub. in 1711. In the next year he obtained the situation of domestic secretary to the Duchess of Monmouth; and two years later produced The Fan; a Poem, and The Shepherd's Week, in VI. Pastorals. Trivia; or, the Art of Walking the Streets, appeared in the succeeding year.

But during this period he had not neglected the stage—a successful appearance on which was the great object of ambition to the poets of his day and the preceding reigns. In 1713 his comedy of the Wife of Bath had been condemned; but in the next year the play of What D'ye Call It? a kind of mock tragedy, met with better success, and was honoured by the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Encouraged by his good fortune, he presented the town, in 1717, with the comedy of Three Hours after Marriage. This piece proved a failure, and Gay bore all the disgrace attaching to want of success; although Pope and Arbuthnot would probably have claimed a share in the authorship had any laurels been forthcoming. However, Gay's wounded feelings were somewhat soothed by a profit of £1000 on an edition of his Poems, pub. by subscription in 1720; and he also received about this time a present from Mr. Secretary Craggs of some South Sea stock. His interest in this famous bubble was supposed to be worth £20,000, but, not willing to accept this sum, he held his stock, and soon found it to be utterly worthless. In 1724 he wrote the tragedy of The Captives, which was tolerably successful on the stage, and seems to have pleased the Princess of Wales, who heard it read by the author in MS.; for she engaged him to write for the benefit of the Duke of Cumberland, then an infant, some fables in verse. This was the origin of the Fables, by which, next to the Beggar's Opera, Gay is best known to the present generation.

The famous play just named was produced in November, 1727, and immediately took the town by storm, enjoying a run of no less than sixty-three nights. The author and his friends were in ecstasies. The ladies carried about the favourite songs in fans, the morals of thousands of hopeful young people were corrupted for life, and, as if nobility itself must make a costly offering to the shrine of infamy—Lavinia Fenton, (the Polly Peachum of the play,) a notorious unmarried courtesan who had long known maternal responsibilities, was led to the altar in pomp by the Right Hon. Lord Charles, third Duke of Bolton.

We are not ignorant that the injurious influences which we charge upon the Beggar's Opera have been denied; and this might surprise us if any thing in the way of eponerony or sophistry could now excite our wonder. But the fact which we are about to quote is worth more than all the special pleading which has been lavished upon such subjects from the days of John D'Urfey to the present generation:

"In the year 1773, Sir John Fielding told the bench of Justices that he had written to Mr. Garrick concerning the impropriety of performing the Beggar's Opera, which never was represented without creating an additional number of thieves; and they particularly requested that he would desist from performing that opera on Saturday evening. Such also were the fears of the church as to the effects of this play, that Dr. Herring, then Archbishop of Canterbury, preached a sermon against it; and Dean Swift was writing in favour of it in the Intelligencer.

"Gay was called, in consequence of it, the Orpheus of Highway-men."

But excepting fame—or disgrace, as we should term it—Mr. Gay received but little compensation for the mischievous effects produced by the Beggar's Opera. He pocketed but £400, and perhaps this was hardly sufficient to soothe the punctious visitings naturally excited by such evil agency. He therefore wrote a sequel to the Beggar's Opera, entitled Polly, the representation of which was forbidden—for political reasons—by the Lord-Chamberlain. This refusal excited the ire of the party in opposition, and a profit of £1100 or £1200 accrued to Gay from the publication of the prohibited piece. Nor was this his only triumph. The Duke and Duchess of Queensberry adopted him as a member of their family, and his Grace became pecuniary guardian of the poet, who, like most poets, knew not how to keep his money. His lordship proved so able a financier, that on his death, Dec. 4, 1732, Gay left a property of £3000. In addition to the works already noticed, he wrote The Distressed Wife, a Comedy; Achilles, an Opera; Dione, a Pastoral, &c.; and many songs and ballads. The best-known specimen of his prose is the letter—in which he was assisted by Pope—from Lord Harcourt's seat in Oxfordshire, giving an account of the death of two village lovers by a stroke of lightning. Among his minor poems may be instanced The Hare with many Friends, The Court of Death, and Black-Eyed Susan. As a poet, his merits were great; as a man, he was indolent, amiable, and irresolute; as a moralist, he is entitled to no consideration whatever. He lived with no higher purpose than to please, and died with the consciousness that he had done little or nothing to profit or instruct.

His Poems on several occasions were pub. in 1720. 2 vols. 4to; Miscellanies, by Swift, Pope, Arbuthnot, and Gay, 1727, 3 vols. 8vo; Gay's Works, 1722-25, 6 vols. 12mo; Poems, 1727, 2 vols. 12mo; 1737, 2 vols. 8vo; 1762, 2 vols. 12mo; 1767, 2 vols. 12mo; Miscell. Works, 1773, 4 vols. 12mo; Poems never printed, 1820, 12mo; Fables, 1727-38, 2 vols. 4to; 1733-38, 2 vols. 8vo; with Notes and Life of the Author by W. Coxe, 1796, 12mo; new ed., with memoir by O. F. Owen, Lon., 1854, 12mo. They have been trans. into Latin, Italian, and French; a trans. en vers Français, par le Chevalier de Chatelein, was pub. by Mr. Whittaker in London, 1853, 12mo. For other eds. of Gay's Fables, pieces pub. separately, &c., see Bibl. Brit., Lowndes's Bibl. Man., and authorities subjoined.

"As a poet he cannot be rated very high. He was, as I once heard a female critic remark, 'of a lower order.' He had not in any degree the mens divinator, the dignity of genius. Much, however, must be allowed to the author of a new species of composition, though it be not of the highest kind. We owe to this the Ballad Opera; a mode of comedy which at first was supposed to delight only by its novelty, but has now by the experience of half a century been so well accommodated to the disposition of a popular audience, that it is likely to keep long possession of the stage."—Dr. Johnson's Life of Gay.

But Dr. Wharton condemns the Beggar's Opera as the parent of "that most monstrous of all absurdities, the Comic Opera."

"Gay's Fables are certainly a work of great merit both as to the quantity of invention implied, and as to the elegance and facility of the execution. They are, however, spun out too long; the descriptions and narrative are too diffusive and desultory; and the moral is sometimes without point. They are more like Fables than Fables. The best are, perhaps, The Hare with many Friends, The Monkeys, and The Fox at the Point of Death. His Pastorals are pleasing and poetical. But his capital work is his Beggar's Opera." Hazlitt's Lect. on the Eng. Poets.

Gayarre, Charles E. Arthur, b. Jan. 3, 1805, at New Orleans, is a descendant of one of the most ancient and historical families of the State of Louisiana, and has held many high posts of honour in his native State. 1. Historical Essay on Louisiana, in French, New Orleans, 1830, 2 vols. 12mo. 2. History of Louisiana, in French, 1816, 2 vols. 8vo.

"This work begins with the discovery of Louisiana, and comes down to 1769, when the Spaniards took final possession of the colony. It gives a full and authentic account of the French domination in Louisiana, and contains many interesting documents which are thus preserved in the vernacular language of the first settlers."

Mr. Gayarre has also pub. several political addresses, &c.

Gayler, Charles, b. 1820, in New York. At an early age commenced to write for the stage while editing a newspaper in Cincinnati; and, returning to his native city in 1850, has since been there connected with the newspaper and periodical press. Has written upwards of forty dramatic pieces of various kinds, every one of which has been successful on representation. Among those which have been published between 1846 and '58 are The Gold-hunters, a Drama; the operetta The Frightened Field; Taking the Chances, a Comedy; The Love of a Prince, a Comedy; The Son of the Night, a Drama; Galieno Falerio, a Tragedy; and Isms, a Comedy.

Gaylord, Lewis, and Luther Tucker. American Husbandry; being a series of Essays, &c. designed for its Improvement, N. York, 2 vols. 18mo.

Gayton, Edmund, or De Speciosa Villa, 1609-1666, wrote a number of humorous works, 1645-63, of which the Festivous Notes upon Don Quixote, 1654, &c., is the best known. Wood tells us that, when turned out of employment, he "Lived in London in a sharking condition, and wrote trite titles merely to get bread to sustain him and his wife."—Athen. Oxon.

Who would believe such presumption possible? Why did not Anthony teach "him and his wife" how to live without "bread"? No marvel that his honest indignation was aroused! Some of Gayton's works now bring high prices. See Athen. Oxon.; Bibl. Brit.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; Lon. Gent. Mag., lvii. 399.

Geddes, Alexander, 1737-1802, a Roman Catholic divine, was suspended from all ecclesiastical functions after the publication of vol. i. of his trans. of the Bible with Notes, which gave great offence to Christians generally.

1. The Holy Bible; trans. from the original, with Notes, Remarks, &c., Lon., 1792-97, 2 vols. 4to. 2. Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures, 1800, 4to. 3. New Trans. of the Psalms, with Notes, &c., 1807, 8vo.

Geddes did not complete his design. The books trans. are those from Genesis to Chronicles, and the Book of Ruth.

Geddes's version is admitted to contain many happy renderings, many just emendations of the text, and many profound and Ingenious observations on its sense, and to discover a profound knowledge in the Hebrew language. But the propriety of the greater part, both of his emendations and interpretations, has been questioned."—CHARLES BUTLER.

"Dr. Geddes applied the whole weight of his learning and talents to an artful attack upon the Divine authority of the Scriptures. Through the medium of a new translation he strives to show that these Scriptures are entitled to no other respect or veneration than what is due to them as curious remains of antiquity."—Bishop Van Alder's Boyle Lectures.

"The volume of Remarks only comprehends the Pentateuch. It is in these remarks that the sentiments of the translator are most offensively stated. All the freedom of the modern continental critics is used with the sacred writings, without the veil of a foreign language interposed, to conceal its unsightliness."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Dr. Boothroyd, in his trans., has availed himself of the labours of Geddes, but has not been misled by his errors. A review of Geddes's trans., attributed to Bishop Horsley, appeared in the British Critic, vols. iv., xiv., xix., and xx. In Dr. John Mason Good's Life of Geddes, 1804, 8vo, will be found some valuable criticisms on his writings. Animadversions on Geddes's trans. were reprinted in 1803, 8vo, from the British Critic for 1802.

Geddes's trans. of the Psalms noticed above, a posthumous publication, edited by Dr. Disney and Charles Butler, extends only to the 11th verse of Psalm cxviii.; the rest is added from an interleaved copy of Bishop Wilson's Bible corrected by Dr. G.

"Though many things have displeased us in the perusal of this work, we are not prepared to say that the learned editors should have altogether withheld this new version from the public. Dr. Geddes was undoubtedly a considerable scholar, and his lucubrations may be turned by other scholars to good account, though they cannot be implicitly adopted."—British Critic, O. S., xliii. 358.

Dr. G. also pub. trans. from Homer, Horace, &c., Letters, Sermons, &c., for an account of which see Bibl. Brit. and Good's Life of Geddes.

The Remains are commended by John Wesley. Charles Wesley took hints for some hymns from Gell's Notes.

Gell, Sir William, 1777–1836, an eminent classical antiquary, educated at, and Fellow of, Emanuel Coll., Camb., was knighted in 1803; subsequently, to 1820, he resided altogether at Rome or Naples. 1. Topography of Troy and its Vicinity, Lon., 1804, fol.

New ed., by E. H. Bunbury, 1846, 8vo. This excellent work should accompany Gibbon's Decline and Fall. To say nothing of the fatigue and trouble involved in this undertaking, the expense of surveys and measurement alone was upwards of £500.

"These volumes are so replete with what is valuable, that were we to employ our entire journal, we could after all afford but a meagre indication of their interest and worth."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

8. By Sir Wm. Gell and J. P. Gandy, Pompeiana; or, descrip. of the Topog., Edifices, and Ornaments of Pompeii, 1817–19, 2 vols. in 1, imp. 8vo and imp. 4to; 1824, 2 vols. r. 8vo; 1852, 2 vols. r. 8vo. Second series, 1830, 2 vols. r. 8vo, imp. 8vo, and 4to. The value of these works, which give the result of the excavations since the commencement in 1748, need not be enlarged on. By their aid, he who stays in his library will have a better idea of Pompeii than he who visits the entombed city without them. Sir Wm. Gell also contributed to the letter-press of the illustrations of the Antiquities of Iona, pub. by the Society of Dilettanti, (of which he was a member,) 1797–1840, 3 vols. imp. fol., pub. at £21. In this work will be found the illustrations of the ruins of those buildings which were distinguished by Vitruvius and other ancient writers for their elegance and magnificence; such as the Temple of Bacchus, at Teos, the country of Anacreon; the Temple dedicated to Minerva, at Priene, by Alexander of Macedon; and the Temple of Apollo Didymæus, near Miletus.

"Gell's notions of authorship were of a very aristocratic nature. All his works were brought out on so large and extensive a scale as to be out of the reach of that class of readers for whom his topographical and antiquarian researches would have been especially useful—for travellers in those countries whose remains were described by him."—Dr. Madden's Life of the Countess of Blessington, where will be found some interesting notices of Gell. Geoffrey de Vinsauf, temp. Richard I., is supposed by some to have written several works, but we can only attribute to him with certainty a metrical Latin treatise on the art of poetry, which bears the name of Nova Poetaria. For edits., and an account and specimens of this treatise, see Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit. There are many MSS. of it extant.
"It is, however, a heavy, tiresome poem, and is only interesting as being the key to the general style of the Latin poetical writers of the thirteenth century which was formed on the rules given in this work."—Un supra.

Geoffrey Gaimar, a distinguished trouvère of the reign of Stephen, was the first who pub. an Anglo-Norman version of the History of the British Kings by Geoffrey of Monmouth. Geoffrey, or Stephen, Dean of Llandaff, flourished 1120, wrote a Life of the Welsh saint Teliवास or Teilo, and is said to have composed the Register of the Church of Llandaff, pub. by the Rev. W. J. Rees, for the Welsh MSS. Society, Llandover, 1840, 8vo. See Wharton's Angl. Sac., ii. 662, Lon., 1691, fol.

Geoffrey of Monmouth, d. 1154, Archdeacon of Monmouth, was made Bishop of St. Asaph in 1152, but afterwards returned to the monastery of Abingdon, where he was abbot. He wrote a Latin version of the prophecies, &c. of Merlin, Chronicon sive Historia Britonum, (written about 1138?); and some other works are ascribed to him. His History became very popular, and there are few works of which so many MSS. are extant. Edits. in Latin, Paris, 1508, 4to; 1517, 4to; Heidelberg, 1587, fol., (in Rerum Britan.) &c. For a particular account of edits. of this work and its author, we refer to Thompson's Pref. to his trans.; Bale, Pits, and Tanner; Ep. Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib.; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry; Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit. Aaron Thompson's trans. into English was pub. Lon., 1718, 8vo. New ed., by J. A. Giles, LL.D., 1842, 8vo.
"It is impossible to consider Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the British Kings in any other light than as a tissue of fables. Its author was either deceived by his materials, or he wished to deceive his readers."—Biog. Brit. Lit.

Both Shakspeare and Milton have drawn from old Geoffrey's Chronicle. Of the Life and Prophecies of Merlin, forty-two copies were printed for the Roxburghe Club in 1830, 4to.

George, Anita, Mrs., a native of Cuba, who came to the U. States in 1848, and whilst in Boston completed Memoirs of the Queens of Spain, with Notes by Miss Pardoe, Lon., 1850, 2 vols. 8vo. Severely condemned in the London Athenæum, 1850, 918-19, 1375-76.
"It is unfortunate, however, for the present writer that this portion of Spanish history should have been so ably and so completely gone over by an historian of such high standing as Mr. Prescott—and we can easily believe the hesitation and anxiety which the writer modestly tells us she felt in entering on this part of her task. . . . We regret that Mrs. George should so repeatedly throw out insinuations as to the integrity of Isabella's motives, both in her war against the Moor, and in the severer measures adopted by her against the Jews. Mr. Prescott, who certainly has had access to every document which could throw light on her character, expressly maintains 'the unsuspected integrity of her motives.'"—Un supra.

Gibbon, Edward, April 27, 1737—Jan. 16, 1794, one of the most eminent of modern historians, was descended from an ancient family of Kent. His grandfather, Edward Gibbon, was one of the Commissioners of Customs during the last four years of Queen Anne; and his father, also Edward Gibbon, sat in Parliament in 1734 for Petersfield, and in 1741 for Southampton. The subject of this notice, born at Putney, in Surrey,—the eldest of five brothers and a sister, all of whom died in their infancy,—was admitted at Westminster school in 1749, and, three years later, in 1752, was matriculated as a gentleman-commoner of Magdalen College, Oxford. Not having received that preparatory training which could alone have qualified him for deriving much advantage from his collegiate course, we need not marvel that the fourteen months which he spent at this famous seat of learning were "idle and unprofitable." He tells us, indeed, that he brought to Oxford "a stock of erudition that might have puzzled a doctor, and a degree of ignorance of which a schoolboy would have been ashamed;" but the latter statement will be accepted with more readiness than the former. At the early age of sixteen he was led, by the perusal of the works of Bossuet and Parsons, to entertain doubts of the soundness of the principles of the Reformation, and in 1753 we find him solemnly abjuring these errors at the feet of a Roman Catholic priest in London. His father, anxious both for his mental improvement and spiritual benefit, sent him to Lausanne, in Switzerland, charging his instructor, the Rev. Mr. Pavillard, a Calvinist minister, to persuade him, if possible, of the unsoundness of the tenets which he had so lately embraced. Young Gibbon was not impregnable, and on Christmas day, 1754, only eighteen months after his conversion to Romanism, after "a full conviction," he received the sacrament in the church at Lausanne.

Having now none of the temptations to gay company which had robbed him of many of his college hours, he applied himself to study with a praiseworthy anxiety to store his mind with useful knowledge, and speedily acquired a creditable acquaintance with the Greek, Latin, and French languages, Jurisprudence, and Belles-Lettres. His hours of application were relieved by the society of a young lady of great beauty and many accomplishments, Mademoiselle Susan Curchod, to whom the attentions of the English student were not disagreeable. But the father of the object of his affections discouraging a matrimonial alliance, the young people bore their disappointment in a most philosophical manner. Gibbon tells us that his wound was insensibly healed by time, and that the lady was not unhappy: he returned to the classics, and Mlle. Curchod became the wife of the celebrated Mr. Necker, and the mother of Mme. de Staël. But the youthful lover did not seek consolation in the marriage state; he lived and died a bachelor. "Since the failure of my first wishes," he remarks, when over fifty. "I have never entertained any serious thoughts of a matrimonial connection."

In 1758 he returned to England, after an absence of nearly five years, and, through his acquaintance with David Mallett, gained admittance into a class of society which enabled him to display his own acquirements, and gather that general knowledge of current English literature in which he felt himself to be not so well versed as in more abstruse researches. Finding that Swift, Addison, Robertson, and Hume, were praised for various graces of style, or strength and perspicuity of diction, he read them with great care, and ardently longed to gain some measure of that distinction which had rewarded their efforts to instruct or please the world.

In 1761 Gibbon confided to Dr. Maty the secret that he had in a matured state an Essai sur l'étude de la Littérature, composed in French, and requested his opinion of its merits. His counsellor urged its publication, and when the young author hesitated to trust himself into the hands of critics, his father, ever anxious for his advancement, insisted upon its being given to the world. Accordingly, it made its appearance in 1761, in a 12mo vol. The foreign critics commended it, but at home it was scarcely noticed, and made no impression at all upon the public mind. Some years later it was sought for with avidity:

"The publication of my history, fifteen years afterwards, revived the memory of my first production, and the Essay was eagerly sought for in the shops; but I refused the permission of reprinting it, and when a copy has been discovered at a sale, the primitive value of 2s. 6d. has risen to the fanciful price of 20 or 30 shillings."—Autobiography.

About the time of the publication of this Essay he was appointed Captain of the South battalion of the Hampshire militia, and for two years and a half endured "a wandering life of military servitude." He discharged his duties with zeal and fidelity, but was not sorry to return to the ease of civil life, upon the disbanding of his regiment on the restoration of peace in 1762-63. At a later period he resumed his military duties, and attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and commandant of his regiment. In 1763 he again visited the continent, furnished with letters to persons of distinction in France from Horace Walpole, the Duke de Nivernois, Lady Horvey, and David Mallett. In Paris he was pleased to find that his Essay had made his name familiar to the leaders of fashion and letters, and he soon mingled on easy terms with D'Alembert, Diderot, Helvetius, Comte de Caylus, the Abbé de Bleteric, Barthelemy, Raynal, Arnaud, and others of more or less note.

Those who appear surprised at the deep-seated infidelity and easy effrontery in indecency which are so painfully manifest in the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, lay too little stress on the fact that a moral ruin in the better nature of the author had preceded the political decadence which he has so eloquently described. We have here, of course, no reference to habits of life or the economy of social duties. We go further: we speak of the "heart, out of which are the issues of life," and we affirm that, when the desire of the approbation and fear of the judgments of God have been banished, then the glory has departed from the temple, and the palace, however beautiful, can claim but the chilling grandeur of the tomb.

In May, 1763, Gibbon revisited Lausanne, where he had resided for nearly a year, and in 1764 we find him, with all that devotion which he had once cherished for Christianity transferred to the worship of classical antiquity, a pilgrim at the gates of the Eternal City.

He had long anxiously revolved in his mind many prominent eras in the history of the world, in the hope of acquiring by their happy treatment that fame which Robertson and Hume considered as an ample reward for their "days and nights" of patient research and wearisome toil.

The mind of Gibbon was therefore in a state peculiarly alive to the influence of strong emotion, and this visit to Rome decided the theme which should carry his name to posterity, gathering in its progress, we may add, the mingled admiration and reproach of successive generations to the end of time. That biographer will do the historian injustice who shall relate for him what he has so eloquently told himself—the inception and completion of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire.

"It was at Rome," he tells us, "on the 15th of October, 1764, as I sat musing amidst the ruins of the Capitol, while the bare-footed friars were singing vespers in the temple of Jupiter, that the idea of writing the decline and fall of the city first started to my mind. But my original plan was circumscribed to the decay of the city rather than of the empire; and, though my reading and reflections began to point towards that object, some years elapsed, and several avocations intervened, before I was seriously engaged in the execution of that laborious work."—Autobiography.

In 1767, Mr. Deyverdun, a Swiss gentleman, then in England, to whom Gibbon was warmly attached, united with him in the publication of a literary Journal, entitled Memoires Littéraires de la Grande Bretagne, of which only two vols. appeared, (1767-68.)

"It is not my wish to deny how deeply I was interested in these Memoirs, of which I need not be ashamed. . . . I will presume to say that their merit was superior to their reputation; but it is not less true that they were productions of more reputation than emolument."—Autobiography.

We may remark that the version of part of Anstey's New Bath Guide, in the Memoirs, has been declared equal to the celebrated Townley Iludibras: the Review of Walpole's Historic Doubts was written by David Hume. These two (12mo) vols. are now rare. Hanrott's copy sold for £6 16s. 6d. Gibbon's next publication—an anonymous one, in 1770—was Critical Observations on the Sixth Book of the Æneid. This was an attack upon Bishop Warburton's celebrated hypothesis in the Divine Legation of Moses, respecting the descent of Æneas to hell.

"According to Bishop Warburton the descent to hell is not a à la but a mimic scene; which represents the initiation of Æneas in the character of a lawyer, to the Eleusinian mysteries. This hypothesis, a singular character in the divine legation of Moses, had been admitted by many as true; it was praised by all as ingenious, nor had it been exposed in a space of thirty years, to a fair and critical discussion. . . . As the Bishop of Gloucester and his party maintained discreet silence, my critical disposition was soon lost among the pamphlets of the day; but the public coldness was overbalanced to my feelings by the weighty approbation of the last and best editor of Virgil, Professor Heyne, of Göttingen; who acquiesces in my confutation, and styles the unknown author 'doctus . . . et elegantissimus Britannus.' . . . In the fifteen years between my Essay on the Study of Literature and the first volume of the Decline and Fall, (1761-1776), this criticism on Warburton, and some articles in the journal, were my sole publications."—Autobiography.

From the year 1768, Gibbon devoted himself with zealous industry to the preparation of his great work, "the labour of six quartos and twenty years," and in 1776 gave the first volume to the world. Its success was immediate and complete.

"I am at a loss how to describe the success of the work, without betraying the vanity of the writer. The first impression was exhausted in a few days; a second and third edition were scarcely adequate to the demand; and the bookseller's property was twice invaded by the pirates of Dublin. My book was upon every table, and almost on every toilette; the historian was crowned by the taste or fashion of the day."

But though the "historian" was warmly and justly commended, the assailant of Christianity did not escape wrath and deserved rebuke. A list of the principal strictures elicited by the famous 15th and 16th chapters will be found in Chalmers's Biog. Dict., to which we refer the reader. Some of these works we have already had occasion to notice, and others will come under our consideration in future portions of this volume. Among those particularly noticed by Gibbon in his Autobiography are those of Davis, Watson, Apthorpe, Taylor, Priestley, Dalrymple, and White. Bishop Watson's work—An Apology for Christianity, in a Series of Letters to Edward Gibbon—is now the best-known of these vindications. It is not at all necessary that we should enlarge upon a theme which has received such ample consideration from so many who are well qualified to judge in the premises. That Gibbon was successful in deceiving even himself by his sophistry we do not at all believe; and that any candid inquirer can attach much weight to objections so specious it is still more difficult to credit. The aversion with which the mind of the historian contemplated the subject of Christianity can be no marvel when we remember the impenitent remorse which must have mingled with his assumption of philosophical skepticism. That he strove to be an infidel we have ample evidence; that he ever rested satisfied in the exchange which he had made for the faith of his early days we cannot concede. He speaks of Christianity as we may imagine the ingrate to speak of that friend whose kindness he had rewarded by an attempt to ruin his peace, betray his confidence, and blast his reputation. To use the admirable language of Mr. Milman,

"Christianity alone receives no embellishment from the magic of Gibbon's language; his imagination is dead to its moral dignity; it is kept down by a general tone of jealous disparagement, or neutralised by a painfully elaborate exposition of its darker and degenerate periods. There are occasions, indeed, when its pure and exalted humanity, when its manifestly beneficial influence, can compel even him, as it were, to fairness, and kindle his unguarded eloquence to its usual fervour; but in general he soon relapses into a frigid apathy; affects an ostentatiously severe impartiality; notes all the faults of Christians in every age with bitter and almost malignant sarcasm; reluctantly, and with exception and reservation, admits their claim to admiration. . . . The glories of Christianity, in short, touch on no cord in the heart of the writer; his imagination remains unkindled; his words, though they maintain their stately and measured march, have become cool, argumentative, and inanimate."

In 1774 Mr. Gibbon entered the House of Commons, in which he sat for eight years a silent supporter of Lord North's administration. His claims were not overlooked, and a seat at the Board of Trade, with an income of £700 to £800, which he enjoyed for three years, was an agreeable addition to the revenue derived from his paternal acres.

In 1781 appeared the 2d and 3d vols. of the Decline and Fall. The author complains of "the coldness and even prejudice of the town," but we are assured by contemporaneous authority that they were received with "eagerness and approbation." In September, 1783, the historian put into execution a plan long cherished and ardently anticipated,—a permanent establishment at Lausanne.

"From my early acquaintance with Lausanne, I had always cherished a secret wish that the school of my youth might become the retreat of my declining age. A moderate fortune would secure the blessings of ease, leisure, and independence: the country, the people, the manners, the language, were congenial to my taste; and I might indulge the hope of passing some years in the domestic society of a friend. After travelling with several English, Mr. Deyverdun was now settled at home, in a pleasant habitation, the gift of his deceased aunt: we had long been separated, we had long been silent; yet in my first letter I exposed, with the most perfect confidence, my situation, my sentiments, and my designs. His immediate answer was a warm and joyful acceptance: the picture of our future life provoked my impatience; and the terms of arrangement were short and simple, as he possessed the property, and I undertook the expense of our common house."—Autobiography.

In this delightful retreat, the charms of which the recluse has drawn with so exquisite a pencil, the concluding chapters of the Decline and Fall moved rapidly on to completion, and, in 1787, vols. iv., v., and vi., were ready for the press. Bearing in remembrance what we have remarked in a preceding page, we give the account of the author's feelings on concluding a work so grand, so truly great, in his own language:

"It was on the day, or rather night, of the 27th of June, 1787, between the hours of eleven and twelve, that I wrote the last lines of the last page, in a summer-house in my garden. After laying down my pen, I took several turns in a bower, or covered walk of acacias, which commands a prospect of the country, the lake, and the mountains. The air was temperate, the sky was serene, the silver orb of the moon was reflected from the waters, and all nature was silent. I will not dissemble the first emotions of joy on the recovery of my freedom, and, perhaps, the establishment of my fame. But my pride was soon humbled, and a sober melancholy was spread over my mind, by the idea that I had taken an everlasting leave of an old and agreeable companion, and that whatsoever might be the future date of my history, the life of the historian must be short and precarious."

Alas for that prospect which is bounded by the tomb! Had the hope of the Christian animated the breast of the scholar, the anticipation of a "life short and precarious," instead of being a cause of grief, would have been productive of joy. But the thought of the Morning of the Resurrection, if at all entertained by the skeptic, could have been a source of nothing but horror, surely not of desire. Thus did not Boerhaave, thus did not Grotius, nor Newton, nor Burke, regard the coming on of "that night when no man can work." The historian proceeds to remark:

"I will add two facts, which have seldom occurred in the composition of six, or even of five, quartos. 1. My first rough manuscript, without any intermediate copy, has been sent to the press. 2. Not a sheet has been seen by any human eyes excepting those of the author and the printer; the faults and the merits are exclusively my own."—Autobiography.

Gibbon now visited England, to superintend the publication of the conclusion of his work, for which he received a large sum from the publisher, Mr. Cadell. When the sheets were all printed, the day of publication was delayed, that it might coincide with the author's fifty-first anniversary of his birthday:

"The double festival was celebrated by a cheerful literary dinner at Mr. Cadell's house; and I seemed to blush while they read an elegant compliment from Mr. Bayley, whose poetical talents had more than once been employed in the praises of his friend."

The sale of the last vols. was rapid; and, to supply the demand, an edition of the whole work, in 12 vols. 8vo, was pub., 1788-90. Gibbon's profit on the whole is stated to have been £6000, whilst the booksellers netted the handsome sum of £60,000.

Mr. Gibbon returned to Lausanne, July 30, 1788, and in about a year from this time met with an irreparable loss in the death of his friend Deyverdun. He was now thrown more upon his own resources for amusement, and occupied himself in writing his own Memoirs,—to which we have been largely indebted in this sketch,—projecting a series of biographical portraits of eminent Englishmen from the time of Henry VIII. (never prepared), and some other literary labours.

The events which followed the first excesses of the French Revolution threatened the peace of Switzerland, and the blast of war startled the recluse in his library. With reluctant steps he left the charming retreat, endeared to him alike by the remembrances of boyhood and the tranquil satisfactions of mature years, and bent his way to the great metropolis of his native land. He arrived at London in June, 1793, spent some time in the city with his friend Lord Sheffield, and subsequently accompanied him to Sheffield Place, where they passed the summer. In October he paid a visit to Mrs. Gibbon, the widow of his father, and to Lord Spencer at Althorp, and then returned to London, where he expired, after a few hours' illness, January 15, 1794, from the effects of a rupture (resulting in hydrocele) of more than thirty years' standing.

"The voleur-de-chambre observed, that Mr. Gibbon did not, at any time, shew the least sign of alarm, or apprehension of death: and it does not appear that he ever thought himself in danger, unless his desire to speak to Mr. Darrell might be considered in that light."—Lord Sheffield's Memoirs.

His lordship informs us that, "twenty hours before his death, Mr. Gibbon happened to fall into a conversation not uncommon with him on the probable duration of his life. He said that he thought himself good for ten, twelve, or perhaps twenty years."

In 1799, Lord Sheffield, for many years his attached friend, pub. the Miscellaneous Works of Edward Gibbon, Esq., with Memoirs of his Life and Writings, composed by himself: illustrated from his Letters, with occasional Notes and Narrative, 2 vols. 4to. A 3d vol. was added in 1815; and a new ed. of the whole, with adds., in 5 vols. 8vo, was issued in the same year; also pub. in r. 8vo. New ed., in one large 8vo vol., pp. 848, 1837. The Antiquities of the House of Brunswick was printed (privately) separately in 1814. The forty-fourth chapter of the Decline and Fall, under the title of A Survey of the Civil Law, &c., has been printed separately several times at home and abroad.

There are several French edits., one corrected and enlarged by Professor Warnkœnig, Liège, 1821, 8vo. See also A Survey of the Civil Law, with Notes by Professor Hugo; trans. from the German by W. Gardiner, Edin., 1824, 12mo. The value of this Survey it would be difficult to exaggerate.

"Perhaps the most masterly and elaborate account of the Civil Law which is extant is to be found in the forty-fourth chapter of Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Lord Mansfield characterised it as 'beautiful and spirited.'"—Warren's Law Studies.

"We have no hesitation in strongly recommending this chapter to the attentive perusal of the student, as containing a succinct and masterly historical view of the Roman Law. As a summary it certainly stands unrivalled, and as a mere outline only is it to be read. . . . This chapter, for what it professes to be, is luminous, learned, succinct, and satisfactory.

"But the high estimation in which Mr. Gibbon's outline is held on the continent, where the Roman Law has for so many centuries been thoroughly studied, and elaborately written on, will be regarded as strong evidence of its high merit."—Hoffman's Legal Study.

Professor Hoffman censures the depreciating remarks upon Gibbon's Survey thrown out by the editor of Sir Wm. Jones's Treatise on Bailments. For other opinions upon the Survey, see 1 Brown's Civil Law, Pref., 2; Irving's Civil Law, 188.

We have already noticed two edits. of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, viz. —1. 1776–88, 5 vols. 4to; 2. 1788–90, 12 vols. 8vo. We proceed to notice, 3. 1802, 12 vols. 8vo; 4. Abridgt., by the Rev. Charles Hereford, 1789, 2 vols. 8vo; 5. Edin., 1811, 12 vols. 8vo; 6. Lon., 1815, 12 vols. 8vo; 7. Expurgated ed., by Thomas Bowdler, 1826, 5 vols. 8vo.

"The indecent expressions, and all allusions of an improper tendency, have been erased."

8. Corrected ed., particularly in the Greek Notes, Oxf., 1828, 8 vols. 8vo; 9. Pub. by H. Bohn, imp. 8vo; 10. By Chalmers, pub. by Longman, 8vo; 11. By Guizot, pub. by A. Hall, 2 vols. r. 8vo; 12. Pub. by Pickering, 8 vols. 8vo, and large paper; 13. By Westley and Davis, 1837, 1 vol. r. 8vo; 14. With the Notes of Guizot, Wenck, and the Editor, by the Rev. H. N. Milman, pub. by Murray, 1838, 12 vols. 8vo. (See Nos. 15 and 18.) 15. Second ed. of the preceding, with adds., 1846, 6 vols. 8vo; 16. Pub. by Virtue, illustrated, 1850, 2 vols., sup. r. 8vo; 17. With variorum Notes, including those of Guizot, Wenck, Niebuhr, Hugo, Neander, and other foreign scholars, edited by an English Churchman, pub. in Bohn's Brit. Classics, vols. i.–v., 1853–54; 18. Third ed. of Milman's ed., with additional Notes by Dr. Wm. Smith, portrait and maps, pub. by Murray, 1854–55, 8 vols. 8vo.

This edition includes the Autobiography of Gibbon, and is distinguished by careful revision of the text, verification of all the references to ancient writers, and notes incorporating the results of the researches of modern scholars and the discoveries of recent travellers.

The Life and Corresp. of Gibbon, edited by Mr. Milman, were pub. in 1839, 8vo; and an edit. of the Autobiography was pub. by Whitaker in 2 vols., 12mo and 18mo.

"The Life of Gibbon is a valuable and necessary companion to the Decline and Fall. No one who desires to be informed in the most engaging and dignified manner of the most important eras in the world's annals can allow himself to remain unacquainted with the life and correspondence of its very remarkable author."—Lon. Monthly Rev.

"It is perhaps the best specimen of autobiography in the English language. Descending from the lofty level of his history, and relaxing the stately march which he maintains throughout that work, into a more natural and easy pace, this enchanting writer, with an ease, a spirit, and a vigour peculiar to himself, conducts his readers through a sickly childhood, a neglected and desultory education, and a youth wasted in the unprofitable and unscholar-like occupation of a militia officer, to the period when he resolutely applied the energies of his genius to a severe course of voluntary study, which, in the space of a few years, rendered him a consummate master of Roman antiquity, and lastly produced the history of the decline and fall of the mighty empire."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xii. 375–391, q. v.

"The autobiography of Gibbon, attached to his Posthumous Works, edited by Lord Sheffield, has been perhaps the most popular production of its kind, of modern times. It is winning in an unusual degree. The periods flow with a sort of liquid cadence. The facts are beautifully brought together and ingeniously argued upon; and the life of a studious recluse has something about it of the air of a romantic Adventurer. This is attributable to the charm, the polish, the harmony of the style. But the Autobiography of Gibbon is, in fact, the consummation of ART; and never were pages more determinedly and more elaborately written for the admiration of posterity. How different is the Autobiography of HUME! But both these great writers were the same—in their own memoirs and their histories: the former, like Johnson's description of Gray, had generally a kind of strutting dignity, and was tall by walking on tip-toe; the latter, all simplicity and perspicuity, would rather be courted by, than court, the Græcs; and his style was grace itself."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

As regards the various edits. of the Decline and Fall, Dean Milman's (see No. 18, above) has no rival. For family reading, where it is not pleasant to be obliged to keep the eyes always a little in advance of the voice, if reading aloud, or where you hesitate to trust infidelity and indecency uncorrected to your children, Bowdler's edit. is to be preferred; and we should be glad to see a new edition, say in 3 vols. 8vo, price not over £2. Of course the scholar can by no means dispense with Milman's excellent edition, which contains the un mutilated text of Gibbon, carefully revised, particularly in the quotations; and illustrated with notes, to correct the errors of Gibbon, and especially to put the unwary reader on his guard against his misstatements regarding Christianity.

The chief works from which Mr. Milman derived his materials are:—I. The French translation, with Notes, by M. Guizot. II. The German translation, with Notes of Wenck. III. The new edition of Le Beau's Histoire du Bas Empire, both with Notes by M. St. Martin and M. Brosset. IV. Such works as have come to light since the appearance of Gibbon's History.

"There can be no question that this edition of Gibbon is the only one extant to which parents and guardians, and academical authorities, ought to give any measure of countenance. The editor's illustrations on subjects of secular and literary interest are in every respect such as might have been anticipated from his character, as one of the most accomplished scholars and writers of his age."—Rev. J. J. Blunt, in Lon. Quar. Rev., lxii. 360–386, q. v.

"Gibbon's History, especially as edited by Mr. Milman, is a work for all time and for all classes. It never before was a work which could be safely put into the hands of the young, or of those whose opportunities and means for detecting its perversions were few. Now, however, the errors of this luminous and imposing history have been skillfully and convincingly noted. The poison, if not extracted, has been made palpable."—Lon. Monthly Review.

"The name of Gibbon will occur to the student as a splendid, but in some respects dangerous guide, down to the close of the sixteenth century. We say he is a dangerous guide, in respect of his gross and malignant misrepresentations concerning the Christian religion; and we recommend the student to procure the Rev. H. Milman's edition of Gibbon, in which that great writer's errors and misrepresentations will be found exposed with candour, freedom, and learning."—Warren's Law Studies.

York Lit. and Theolog. Rev.*, ii. 38; Phila. Museum, xxiv. 526; Phila. Analectic Mag., vi. 89. The student must also peruse Porson's severe strictures, in the preface to his Letters on Travis, on the indecency of portions of the Decline and Fall, especially vols. v. and vi.; and the notices of Gibbon in W. H. Prescott's Biog. and Crit. Miscellanies, and in the other authorities from which we shall proceed to quote.

We confess to so ardent an admiration of this truly great author, that it is with pain we are obliged to advert to his grave errors, for which genius, however exalted, learning, however profound, and diction, however splendid, can make no adequate atonement. Not for the genius of Homer, the wealth of the Indies, nor "all the learning of the Egyptians," would we be willing to write one line calculated to disturb the faith of the humblest Christian in that inspired record which "hath God for its Author, Truth for its substance, and Salvation for its end!" In a world of trial, sorrow, and temptation, let no impious hand presume to assail that Ark of Refuge and Consolation which Divine mercy has provided for the guilt and misery of humanity.

We conclude our notice of this distinguished writer with some quotations from eminent authorities :

"After a first rapid perusal, which allowed me to feel nothing but the interest of a narrative always animated, and, notwithstanding its extent and the variety of objects which it makes to pass before the view, always perspicuous, I entered upon a minute and the examination of the details of which it was composed, and the opinion which I then formed was, I confess, singularly severe. I discovered, in certain chapters, errors which appeared to me sufficiently important and numerous to make me believe that they had been written with extreme negligence. In others, I was struck with a certain tinge of partiality and prejudice, which imparted to the exposition of the facts that want of truth and justice which the English express by their happy term misrepresentation. Some imperfect (troupees) quotations, some passages omitted unintentionally or designedly, have cast suspicion on the honesty (bonne foi) of the author; and his violation of the first law of history—increased to my eyes by the prolonged attention with which I occupied myself with every phrase, every note, every reflection—caused me to form on the whole a judgment far too rigorous. After having finished my labours, I allowed some time to elapse before I reviewed the whole. A second attentive and regular perusal of the entire work, of the notes of the author, and of those which I had thought it right to subjoin, showed me how much I had exaggerated the importance of the reproaches which Gibbon really deserved. I was struck with the same errors, the same partiality on certain subjects; but I had been far from doing adequate justice to the immensity of his researches, the variety of his knowledge, and, above all, to that truly philosophical discrimination (justesse d'esprit) which judges the past as it would judge the present; which does not permit itself to be blinded by the clouds which time gathers around the dead, and which prevents us from seeing that under the toga as under the modern dress, in the senate as in our councils, men were what they still are, and that events took place eighteen centuries ago as they take place in our days. I then felt that his book, in spite of its faults, will always be a noble work; and that we may correct his errors, and combat his prejudices, without ceasing to admit that few men have combined, if we are not to say in so high a degree, at least in a manner so complete and so well regulated, the necessary qualifications for a writer of history."—Guzoz. See Lon. Quar. Rev., 1. 230.

"Gibbon was not, like Hume, a self-thinking, deep-fathoming man, who searched into the nature of things, existence and thought, but was in these respects like the French, or like the Scotchman Brougham, who has also attained this Franco-Geneveuse capacity of quickly making other people's thoughts and investigations his own, and propounding them in an admirable manner. Like the great French writers, he can take a quick and comprehensive view of various departments of knowledge, and we can therefore learn most readily through his instrumentality the results of the learned labours of the great collectors of materials upon the theology, philosophy, and jurisprudence of the times of declining antiquity, and of the rising middle ages. Because his eloquence and his great skill in representation give a charm and splendour to the thoughts which he wishes to disseminate, he has the full right of all men who are great in politics and literature to claim that nobody should ask whether he was really in earnest, or how his language and his conduct harmonized."—Schlosser's Hist. of the Eighteenth Cent. &c.; trans. by D. Davidson.

As Schlosser has introduced the name of Lord Brougham in his review of the characteristics of Gibbon, it will not be inappropriate to quote some comments of the former upon the style of the great historian of the Roman Empire.

"He will not condescend to be plain; he forgets that the very business of the historian is to relate the history of events as they happened. He must always shine; but, labouring for effect, he wholly omits the obvious consideration that relief is absolutely necessary to produce it; and forgets that a strong, unbroken light may dazzle without pleasing, or may shine rather than illuminate, and that a broad glare may be as confused and uninteresting as darkness itself. The main fault of his style is the perpetual effort which it discloses. Hume may have concealed his art better than Robertson, yet the latter is ever at his entire ease, while Gibbon is ever in the attitudes of the Academy; he is almost acoustic. He can tell you nothing in plain terms, unadorned with figure, unseasoned with epigram and point."—Lord Brougham's Men of Letters and Science, second series.

The remarks of Mr. Prescott in this connexion—himself a historian of the very first rank—are worthy of consideration:

"The first two octavo volumes of Gibbon's History were written in a comparatively modest and unaffected manner, for he was then uncertain of public favour. And, indeed, his style was exceedingly commended by the most competent critics of that day, as Hume, Joseph Warton, and others, as is abundantly shown in their correspondence. But when he had tasted the sweets of popular applause, and had been crowned as the historian of the day, his increased consequence becomes at once visible in the assumed staidness and magnificence of his learning. But even after this period, whenever the subject is suited to his style, and when his phlegmatic temper is warmed by those generous emotions of which, as we have said, it was sometimes susceptible, he exhibits his ideas in the most splendid and imposing forms of which the English language is capable."—Biog. and Crit. Miscellanies.

It will now be interesting to see what was the author's own opinion of the comparative merits of his different volumes:

"The style of the first volume, in my opinion, is somewhat crude and elaborate; in the second and third it is ripened into ease, correctness and numbers; but in the three last I may have been seduced by the facility of my pen, and the constant habit of speaking one language and writing another may have infused some mixture of Gallic idioms."—Autobiography.

The tribute of the historian of Modern Europe to his great predecessor is truly eloquent:

"Gibbon, the architect of a bridge over the dark gulf which separates ancient from modern times, whose vivid genius has tinged with brilliant colours the greatest historical work in existence."—Alston.

A brief extract from the able critique of Professor Smyth is all for which we can find space:

"If his work be not always history, it is often something more than history, and above it; it is philosophy, it is theology, it is wit and eloquence, it is criticism the most unastutely upon every subject with which literature can be connected. If the style be so constantly elevated as to be often obscure, to be often monotonous, to be sometimes even ludicrously disproportioned to the subject, it must at the same time be allowed, that, whenever an opportunity presents itself, it is the striking and adequate representation of comprehensive thought and weighty remark. It may be necessary no doubt to warn the student against the imitation of a mode of writing so little easy and natural. But the very necessity of the caution implies the attraction that is to be resisted, and it must be confessed that the chapters of the Decline and Fall are replete with paragraphs of such melody and grandeur as would be the fittest to convey to a youth of genius the full charm of literary composition; and such as, when once heard, however unattainable to the immaturity of his own mind, he would alone consent to admire, or hope to emulate. . . . When such is the work, it is placed beyond the justice or the injustice of criticism; the Christian may have, but too often, very just reason to complain, the moralist to reprove, the man of taste to censure,—even the historical inquirer may be fatigued and irritated by the unseasonable and obscure splendour through which he is to discover the objects of his research. But the whole is, notwithstanding, such an assemblage of merits, so various, so interesting, and so rare, that the History of the Decline and Fall must always be considered as one of the most extraordinary monuments that have appeared of the literary powers of a single mind, and its fame can perish only with the civilization of the world."—Lect. on Mod. Hist.

"Gibbon is a writer full of thoughts; his language is in general powerful and exquisite, but it has, to a great excess, the faults of elaborateness, pompousness, and monotony. His style is full of Latin and French words and phrases. . . . The work of Gibbon, however instructive and fascinating it may be, is nevertheless at bottom an offensive one, on account of his deficiency in feeling, and his propensity to the infidel opinions and impious mockeries of Voltaire. These are things extremely unworthy of a historian, and in the pericardic and somewhat cumbersome style of Gibbon they appear set off to far less advantage than in the light and airy compositions of his master. He never seems to be naturally a wit, but impresses us with the idea that he would very soon be one if he could."—Frederick Schlegel's Lect. on the Hist. of Literature.

"Gibbon's manner, which many have censured, I think, in general, well suited to the work. In the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, there is too much to sadden and disgust; a smile in such a narrative on some occasions is far from unacceptable; if it should be succeeded by a sneer, it is not the sneer of bitterness, which falls not on debility; nor of triumph, which accords not with contempt. The colours, it is true, are gorgeous, like those of the setting sun; and such were wanted. The style is much swayed by the sentiment, would that which is proper for the historian of Fabius and Scipio, of Hannibal and Pyrrhus, be proper, too, for Augustulus and the Popes?"—WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

"Gibbon I detect a frequent poacher in the Philosophical Essays of Bolingbroke: as in his representation of the unsocial character of the Jewish religion; and in his insinuation of the suspicious cast by succeeding miracles, acknowledged to be false, on prior ones contended to be true. Indeed it seems not unlikely that he caught the first hint of his theological chapters from this work."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Literature.

We extract a part of the quotation which Gibbon himself quotes, with no little complacency, from the Bibliotheca of Meuselius:

"Summis avi nostri historicis Gibbon sine dubio adnumerandus est. Inter capitulos ruinas stans primum hujus operi scribendi consilium cepit. Florentissimos vite annos colligendo et laborando eidem impendit. Enatum inde monumentum ære perennius, licet passim appareat sinistræ dicta, minus perfecta, veritati non satis consentanea."

Dugdale, then Norroy. He pub. several works, the best-known of which is Introductio ad Latinam Blasoniam, Lon., 1682, 8vo.

"An original attempt, which Camden had desiderated, to define, in a Roman idiom, the terms and attributes of a Gothic institution. . . . His manner is quaint and affected; his order is confused; but he displays some wit, more reading, and still more enthusiasm; and if an enthusiast be often absurd, he is never lan-guit. An English text is perpetually interspersed with Latin sentences in prose and verse; but in his own poetry he claims an exemption from the laws of prosody."—Edward Gibbon's Autobiography.

Gifford, William. De Turco-Papismo contra Re-

Gifford, William, 1756-1826, an eminent critic, a native of Ashburton, Devon, was the son of poor parents, who left him an orphan before he had attained his 13th year. The youth tried the sea for a short time in a coasting-vessel, and was subsequently bound to a shoemaker, with whom he remained until he had almost reached the age of twenty, when he was sent to Oxford by the kind offices of Mr. Cokesley, a surgeon of the town. After leaving college, he travelled in Europe as companion to Lord Belgrave, and on his return settled in London and devoted his attention to literature.

In 1794 he pub. the Baviad, a poetical satire, in imitation of the first satire of Persius,—elicited by the effusions of Mrs. Piozzi, Bertie Greatheave, Robert Merry, William Parsons, &c. The history of the literary party at Florence is familiar to many of our readers. In 1795 appeared his Mæviad, an imitation of Horace, which was aimed at the low state of dramatic authorship then prevailing. These satires were so greatly admired that the 6th ed. of the two was pub. in 1800, in a 12mo vol. In 1797 he became editor of the Anti-Jacobin, a weekly paper, established by Mr. Canning and other gentlemen. During the twelvemonth of the existence of this paper, a difficulty with Dr. Wolcott elicited from Gifford a poetical Epistle to Peter Pindar. In 1802, 4to, he pub. a trans. of Juvenal, and in the next year issued an Examination of the Strictures of the Critical Reviewers on this trans.; a Supp. to the Examination was pub. in 1804. In 1805, 4 vols. 8vo, appeared his excellent ed. of Massinger, and in 1816 he gave to the world an ed. of Ben Jonson, 9 vols. 8vo. His eds. of Ford and Shirley, completed by other hands, were pub. after his death, the first in 1827, 2 vols. 8vo, and the latter in 1833, 6 vols. 8vo.

But it was as editor of the Quarterly Review, from its commencement in 1809 until 1824, that Mr. Gifford is best known to the world. Many interesting particulars connected with the editor, and this famous periodical, will be found in Lockhart's Life of Scott, Southey's Life and Correspondence, and other literary memoirs connected with the earlier years of the present century. He pub., with his trans. of Juvenal, 1802, an autobiographical narrative, which is well worth perusal as an indication of what can be accomplished by persevering industry. A list of the authors of many of the contributions to the Quarterly occurs in the Gent. Mag.:

1844, Pt. 1, 137-141, Writers in Vol. i.-xix.
1844, " 577-580, " " xxi.-xxxix.
1845, " 599-602, " " xli.-lix.
1847, Pt. 2, 34-37, " " lxi.-lxxviii.

See also a paper on the originators of the Quarterly, in Gent. Mag., 1844, Pt. 1, p. 246.

Gifford's trans. of Juvenal has been pronounced to be the "best poetical version of a classic in the English language," whilst Mr. Hazlitt declares it to be "the baldest, and, in parts, the most offensive of all others."

It is well known that the reviewer displayed but little mercy to unfortunate authors whose works failed to secure his approbation.

"He was a man with whom I had no literary sympathies; perhaps there was nothing upon which we agreed except great political questions. . . . He had a heart full of kindness for all living creatures except authors: them he regarded as a fishmonger regards eels, or as Isaac Walton did slugs, worms, and frogs. I always protested against the indulgence of that temper in his Review."—Southey's Life and Correspondence.

"Mr. Gifford was originally bred to some handicraft; he afterwards continued to learn Latin, and was for some time an usher in a school. till he became a tutor in a nobleman's family. The low-bred, self-taught man, the pedant, and the dependant on the great, contribute to form the editor of the Quarterly Review. . . . Mr. Gifford, as a satirist, is violent and abrupt. He takes obvious or physical defects, and dwells upon them with much labour and harshness of invective, but with very little wit or spirit. He expresses a great deal of anger and contempt, but you cannot tell very well why—except that he seems to be sore and out of humour. His satire is mere peevishness and spleen, or something worse—personal antipathy and rancour. We are in quite as much pain for the writer, as for the object of his resentment. . . . As an editor of old authors, Mr. Gifford is entitled to considerable praise for the pains he has taken in revising the text, and for some improvements he has introduced into it. He had better have spared the notes, in which, though he has detected the blunders of previous commentators, he has expressed his own ill-temper and narrowness of feeling more. As a critic, he has thrown no light on the character and spirit of his authors. He has shown no striking power of analysis, nor of original illustration, though he has chosen to exercise his pen on writers, most congenial to his own turn of mind from their dry and caustic wit; Massinger and Ben Jonson. What he will make of Marlowe, it is difficult to guess. He has none of the 'fery quality' of the poet."—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age.

"He was a man of extensive knowledge; was well acquainted with classic and old English lore; so learned, that he considered all other people ignorant; so wise, that he was seldom pleased with any thing; and, as he had not risen to much eminence in the world, he thought no one else was worthy to rise. He almost rivalled Jeffrey in wit, and he surpassed him in scorching sarcasm and currying irony. Jeffrey wrote with a sort of levity which induced men to doubt if he were sincere in his strictures; Gifford wrote with an earnest fierceness which showed the delight which he took in his calling."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the last Fifty Years.

"He was a man of rare attainments and many excellent qualities. His Juvenal is one of the best versions ever made of a classical author, and his satire of the Baviad and Mæviad squashed at one blow a set of coxcombs, who might have humbugged the world long enough. As a commentator he was capital, could he but have suppressed his rancours against those who had preceded him in the task; but a misinstruction or misinterpretation, nay, the misplacing of a comma, was in Gifford's eyes a crime worthy of the most severe animadversion. The same fault of extreme severity went through all his critical labours, and in general he flagellated with so little pity, that people lost their sense of the criminal's guilt in dislike of the savage pleasure which the executioner seemed to take in inflicting the punishment. This lack of temper probably arose from indolent health, for he was very valedictory, and realized two verses, wherein he says fortune assigned him

"One eye not over good,
Two sides that to their cost have stood
A ten years' hectic cough,
Aches, stitches, all the various ills
That swell the devilish doctor's bills,
And sweep poor mortals off."

"But he might also justly claim, as his gift, the moral qualities expressed in the next fine stanza—

"A soul
That spurns the crowd's malign control,
A firm contempt of wrong;
Spirits above affection's power,
And skill to soothe the lingering hour
With no inglorious song."

"He was a little man, dumpled up together, and so ill-made as to seem almost deformed, but with a singular expression of talent in his countenance."—Sir Walter Scott's Diary, January 17, 1827.

"William Gifford, the editor of the Quarterly Review, seems to have united in himself all the bad qualities of the criticism of his time. He was fierce, dogmatic, bigoted, malicious, and unsympathizing. Whatever may have been his talents, they were exquisitely unfitted for his position—his literary judgments being contemptible, where any sense of beauty was required, and principally distinguished for malice and word-picking. The bitter and snarling spirit with which he commented on excellence he could not appreciate; the extreme narrowness and shallowness of his taste; the laboured blackguardism in which he was wont to indulge, under the impression that it was satire; his detestable habit of carrying his political hatreds into literary criticism; his gross personal attacks on Hunt, Hazlitt, and others, who might happen to profess less liberal principles than his own; made him a dangerous and disagreeable adversary, and one of the worst critics of modern times. Through his position as the editor of an influential journal, his enmity acquired an importance neither due to his talents nor his character."—E. P. WHIPPLE: *N. Amer. Gilbertus Anglicus, or Gilbertus Legleus, flourished in 1210, is the earliest practical English writer on medicine. He is best known by his compendium of the medical doctrines prevailing in his time, entitled Compendium Medicinæ tam Morberum Universalium quam Particularium. It was corrected by Michael Cpenella, and printed at Lyons, ap. V. de Portonariis, 1510, 4to. It subsequently appeared under the title of Laurea Anglicana; seu Compendium totius Medicinæ, Genev., 1608, 4to. Some other works are ascribed to him. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.; Leland; Bale; Pits; Tanner, in art. Legleus; Recs's Cyc.; Freind's Hist. of Physic.

"His writings are principally compiled from those of the Arabian physicians, like the works of his contemporaries in other nations; sometimes, indeed, he transcribes whole chapters word for word, especially from Rhazes. He is represented as the first English physician who ventured to expose the absurd practices of the superstitious monks, who at the time engrossed much of the treatment of diseases, and is said to have contrasted with them the methods recommended by the ancients."

Gildas, or Gildus, surnamed the Wise, commences the catalogue of Anglo-Saxon writers. He is said to have flourished in the 6th century, but every thing concerning him, and even the existence of such a person, is involved in doubt and obscurity. We must refer the curious reader to Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., and the authorities there cited. The work attributed to him with the most confidence is the Epistola de excidio Britannia, et castigatio ordinis ecclesiastica; first ed., Lon., 1525, 8vo, and several eds. since. See authorities cited above. New ed., by Joseph Stevenson, pub. by the Historical Society, Lon., 1838, 8vo. Also pub. a new trans. with the works of Nennius, by J. A. Giles, LL.D., 1841, 8vo.

"Gildas's work gives a superficial sketch of British history under the Romans, and during the wars between the Britons and the Picts and Scots, and the Saxon invasions; and also an account of the vices of the kings, clergy, and laity of the time. This work is supposed to have been written about A. D. 581.

"The book contains little information, even if it be authentic. It is written in an inflated style, not much unlike that of Aldhelm. . . . There is no independent authority now existing which will enable us to test the historical truth of this tract, and we have no information relating to its writer which merits the slightest degree of credit." See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.

Gilderdale, John. 1. Nat. Religion, Lon., 1837, 8vo. 2. Hist. and Chronol., 4to. 3. Family Prayers, 1838, 12mo.

Gilding, Elizabeth. Poems and Essays, 1776.

Gildon, Charles, 1665–1723, a native of Gillingham, Dorsetshire, gained but little reputation as an author, and still less as an actor, but Pope has embalmed him in the Dunciad. In 1693 he pub., with an introduction, Charles Blount's Oracles of Reason, and subsequently, in 1705, to atone for this publication, he gave to the world The Deist's Manual. For an account of these works see Leland's Deistical Writers, and article BLOUNT, CHARLES, in this volume. He also pub. Miscell. Letters and Essays, 1694, 8vo; the Complete Art of Poetry, 1718, 2 vols. 12mo;—see Halliwell's Shaksperiana, p. 20, Nos. 3, 5, and 6;—five unsuccessful plays, 1697–1703; a Comparison between the two Stages, 1702, 8vo; a Life of Betterton, 1710; a New Rehearsal, 1714, 8vo; some other publications.

"A person of great literature, but a mean genius; who, having attempted several kinds of writing, never gained much reputation in any."—Boyer's Political State, xxvii. 102.

"Of those disciples [of Charles Blount] the most noted was a bad writer named Gildon, who lived to pester another generation with dogrel and slander, and whose memory is still preserved, not by his cwa voluminous works, but by two or three lines in which his stupidity and venality have been contemptuously mentioned by Pope."—Macaulay's Hist. of Eng., vol. iv., 1856.

Mr. Macaulay ably exposes the true character of Blount's Oracles of Reason.

Giles. Med. con. to Phil. Trans., 1697.

Giles, Henry, b. Nov. 1, 1819, near Gorey, co. of Wexford, Ireland, one of the most popular of the many literary lecturers who draw crowded audiences in the United States. 1. Lectures and Essays, Boston, 1850, 2 vols. 16mo.

"Those persons who have listened to the greater part of the contents of these two volumes in the various lecture-rooms throughout the country, will probably be even more anxious to read them than many who have only heard the name of the author. They will revive in the reader the delightful wit, the clear mental attraction, and the high pleasure which they uniformly excited in their delivery."

These lectures are also highly commended by Miss Mitford: see her Recollections of a Literary Life. 2. Christian Thought on Life; in a series of Discourses, 2d ed., 1851, 16mo. 3. Illustrations of Genius in some of its relations to culture and society, 1854, 16mo.

Giles, Rev. J. A., LL.D., upper Suevicus C. C. C., Oxon., has written and edited many valuable works, some of which we notice. 1. English-Greek and Greek-English Lexicon, new ed., 1816, 8vo.

"This is a worthy companion to Riddle's Latin Dictionary, containing all the information necessary to a student—and, what is of equal importance, no more. The author is generally successful in developing the structure and composition of the Greek language; avoiding the quibbling derivations which disfigured the older Lexicons, and especially that of Schrevelius: he points out the genuine radicals so far as they can be discovered with certainty."—Lon. Athenaeum.

2. Scriptores Græci Minores, 1840, 12mo. 3. Patres Ecclesiae Anglicanae, now first collected into one series, 35 vols. 8vo, £9 9s.; and a sup. vol., 10s. 4. Hist. of the Ancient Britons, 1847, 2 vols. 8vo.

"A valuable addition to every historian's library."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

"This is the most valuable work that has appeared of late years on the history of the Ancient Britons. Nowhere else has the subject been treated so fully with strict regard to real history, and in exclusion of all fabulous legends. Vol. II. consists of the original histories, from which this work has been compiled, viz.: Excerpta ex Scriptoribus Gr. et Lat.; Gildas; Nennius; Excerpta ex Bedæ; Ricardus Ciestrensis de Situ Britannia; Vita Gildæ auctore Caradoco; Vita Gildæ auctore Anonymo; Inscriptiones ex Nummis; Inscriptiones ex Lapidibus."

5. The Entire Works of the Venerable Bede, 1843–44, 12 vols. 8vo. See our article on BEDÆ.

"We trust that Dr. Giles will be encouraged to continue his exertions in thus diffusing a sound knowledge of mediæval divinity and ecclesiastical history."—Lon. Quarterly Review, Oct. 1844.

6. Hist. of the Town and Parish of Bampton, 2d ed., 1848, 8vo. 7. Lives of the Abbots of Weremouth and Jarrow, &c., 1845, 8vo. 8. Life and Letters of Thomas à Beckett, 1846, 2 vols. 8vo. We are also indebted to Dr. Giles for his new ed. of Thompson's Geoffrey of Monmouth, (see our article on GEOFFREY.) his labours on Zennius's Terence, his manuals of Latin and English Grammar, English History, &c.; nor must we omit to make special mention of one of the most valuable of his publications—The Life and Times of Alfred the Great, 2d ed., 1854, 8vo.

"The most valuable and authentic Life of Alfred the Great. Included are Alfred's Will, in Saxon, with translation; the Treaty between Alfred and Guthrum, in Saxon; Fulke's Letter to Alfred; Alfred's Preface to Gregory's Pastoral Care, in Saxon, with a translation; a Chronological Summary of Anglo-Saxon History, &c."

"Dr. Giles is in thorough possession of his materials and of his intention, which produces the clearness that arises from mastery; and he exhibits the same general bonhomme and chronicler disposition for minute and picturesque narrative which we noted in his Life of Becket, with more of a critical spirit."—Lon. Spectator.

Giles, John. The Pine Apple, Lon., 1767, 8vo.

Giles, Joseph. Poems, revised and corrected, by Wm. Shenstone, Lon., 1771, 8vo.

Giles, Mascal. Against Superstitious Jesu Worship, Lon., 1642, 4to.

Giles, Wm. Defence of Dr. Sherlock's Preservative against Popery, Lon., 1688, 4to.

Giles, Wm. 1. On Marriage, Lon., 1771. 2. Poems, 1775, 8vo.

Giles, Wm. Branch, d. 1830, Governor of Virginia, 1826–29, was for many years a member of the Congress of the United States. He pub. Political Letters to the People of Virginia, occasional letters, a speech, &c., 1808–25.

Gillilan, Rev. George, born 1813, at Cumrie, Perthshire, Scotland, was educated at Glasgow Coll., and at the United Secession Hall of the United Presbyterian Chur.h. In 1835 he was licensed to preach, and in the next year was ordained to the Schoolwound congregation, Dundee, where he still remains. About 1842 he was encouraged by Mr. T. Aird, editor of the Dumfries Herald, to write sketches of the principal characters of the day. These off-hand portraits were well received, and in 1845 they were published, with some others, as The Gallery of Literary Portraits, 2d ed., 1851. In 1849 Mr. G. pub. his Second Gallery of Literary Portraits; 2d ed., 1852; and in 1855 appeared the Third Series. In 1854 was pub., in 1 vol. p. 8vo, a new ed. of the 1st and 2d series; and vol. i. of the last ed. of the work appeared in 1857. In 1850 he gave to the world The Bards of the Bible, 4th ed., 1856; in 1851 he pub. The Book of British Poesy, Ancient and Modern; in 1852, The Martyrs, Heroes, and Bards of the Scottish Covenant, 2d ed., 1854; in 1854, The Grand Discovery, 2d ed., 1856; in 1856, History of a Man; and in 1857, Christianity and our Era. He has also pub. a Discourse on Hades, Five Discourses on the Abuse of Talent, &c., and edited Wm. C. Bryant's Poems, with Notes and an Introductory Essay, &c. He is now engaged in editing a new and splendid Library Edition of the Popular Poets and Poetry of Britain, with Biographical and Critical Notes. The issue for the first year comprised—

1. Milton's Poetical Works. 3. Thomson's Seasons and other Poems. 4. George Herbert's Poetical Works. 5. Young's Poetical Works. 6. The Poetical Works of Goldsmith, Collins, &c. The issue for 1854 comprised, 7. 8. Cowper's Poetical Works. 9. 10. Butler's Poetical Works. 11. Shenstone's Poetical Works. 12. Beattie, Blair, and Falconer's Poetical Works. This is by far the handsomest edition of the British poets ever published, and we see not how it can be surpassed. A vol. is pub. every alternate month, forming in the year 6 vols. averaging 350 pp. each; annual subscription one guinea, or in French morocco, gilt top, £1 11s. 6d. The series is intended to include the following authors:

Addison.	Wm. Drummond.	Peter Findar.
Akenside.	Falconer.	Pope.
Robert Blair.	Ferguson.	Prior.
Bloomfield.	Gay.	Francis Quarles.
Thomas Brown.	Gifford.	Allan Ramsay.
Bruce.	Goldsmith.	Rogers.
George Buchanan.	James Grahame.	Alexander Ross.
Burns.	Gray.	Scott.

Collins.	Leyden.	James Thomson.
Cotton.	Logan.	Waller.
Cowley.	Macpherson.	Thomas Warton.
Cowper.	Milton.	Watts.
Cralche.	Mrs. Opie.	Kirke White.
Denham.	Parnell.	Edward Young.
Dryden.	Dr. Percy.	Etc.

As a critic Mr. Gilfillan has been warmly praised, and not slightly censured. He possesses one of the most dangerous of arts for any one who would achieve solid and lasting reputation,—that of great verbal facility, approaching to conversational familiarity. He is sometimes happy in his metaphors and apt in his allusions, but is more likely to be extravagant in the one and grotesque in the other; reminding us forcibly of the bombast and egotism so generally observable in the prevailing style of second-rate American writers.

Mr. Gilfillan is by no means devoid of talent; and it is well worth his while, by a course of wholesome discipline of his natural abilities, to correct the errors of a critical pen which sometimes displays more passion than judgment and more vigour of language than depth of thought.

A critic in the Dublin University Magazine, in a review of Mr. Gilfillan's First Gallery of Literary Portraits, referring to the author's fondness for overstrained metaphor and ambitious style, justly remarks that "In all such habitual use of strong language a writer is throwing away his wealth, and making his style in reality poor and meagre. Words are lavished with profusion when they absolutely represent nothing, and none but the man who has read through a volume of words with the wish really to ascertain the amount of instruction it gives, can judge of the unutterable weariness produced by this careless habit of stating every thing in a temper of exaggeration. Simplicity of style is, however, seldom the distinguishing grace of a young writer's compositions."

We are happy to be able to add from the same article,—for it is more pleasant to quote praise than censure,—

"Mr. Gilfillan's effort to make his readers acquainted with the greatest men whom he has met on the highway of literature is no doubt an ambitious one, and has on the whole been successfully executed"—xxvii. (52-66).

The Bards of the Bible has elicited much rapturous commendation—in which we were never able to coincide—and severe censure, the justice of which we do not feel able to dispute.

His piety warms our heart, but his style shocks our taste. One of the most learned Orientalists of modern times, recently deceased, makes graver objections to the work than were want of literary taste:

"A pompous and gaudy style is exceedingly out of place when it appears in books that treat of sacred things. We feel that the subject is degraded. It is as if a painter were to attempt sketches of Isaiah, and Paul, and John, and should put on them the costume of a Bond street or Broadway exquisite. We enter a solemn protest against all such doings. God! Christ, eternity, heaven, hell, and man's immortal spirit and welfare are things beyond rhapsody. . . . The inconceivable majesty of such subjects should awe the mind that contemplates them into the most grave, and sober, and humble attitude. . . . There are some passages in it, and many single expressions, which convey vivid ideas, and present pleasing images. We concede to him fancy, imagination, and a very considerable acquaintance with the sources of poetical imagery. But these are not the only qualifications that are needed to write instructively on Hebrew poetry. His book reminds us very strongly of a passage in another poet and critic, somewhat different from the author of the Bards of the Bible. It runs thus:

"Inceptis gravibus plerumque et magna profectis,
Purpureis, late qui splendet, nunc et alter
Assuitur pannus.

Amphora cepit
Institui; currente rotâ, cur urceus exit?
Denique, sit quovis, simplex duntaxat et unum."

"Yes, this precious simplex! Of all the books on earth, the Bible exhibits it most. A comment on it, of any kind, which is spotted throughout with 'purpurei panni qui late splendet' seems to us one of the greatest of all incongruities."—Moses Stuart, late Prof. of Sacred Literature in the Theolog. Seminary of Andover. See N. Amer. Rev., lxxiii. 238-267.

Whatever other charges Mr. Gilfillan's critics may bring against him, he certainly cannot be accused of indolence, as, in addition to his professional duties, he contributes to no less than five or six periodicals. It is no slight commendation—but one to which he may justly lay claim—that a high moral purpose, a kindly spirit, and a hearty appreciation of the good, the right, and the true, are prominent characteristics of his writings. It will be seen, from a glance at the accompanying tables of contents of the Galleries of Literary Portraits, that Mr. Gilfillan has been by no means partial in his selection of subjects, but has employed his pencil upon representatives of almost all classes of opinion, both in church and state:

"This work contains as singular a proposition for a vernacular orthography as Tho. Campion's (Observations on the Art of English Poësis) for poetry. The work is quoted by Dr. Johnson."—Lowndes's Bibl. Mss.

3. Sacred Philos. of Holy Scrip.; or, a Comment, on the Creed, 1635, fol. The treatise on the Trinity is republ. at the end of this work.

"Esteemed by most persons to be a learned man, a noted Latinist, critic, and divine, and also to have such an excellent way of training up youth, that none in his time went beyond him. Whence 'twas, that many noted persons in church and state did esteem it the greatest of their happiness that they had been educated under him."—Allen, Oron.

Gill, Alexander, D.D., 1597-1642, son and successor of the preceding, educated at Trin. Coll., Oxf., became head master of St. Paul's School in 1635. Whilst usher of St. Paul's he had charge of the education of John Milton, who was his favourite scholar, and by whom he was greatly beloved. Three of the great poet's familiar letters to him in Latin, still extant, are "replete with the strongest testimonies of esteem and friendship. Milton also pays him high compliments on the excellence of his Latin poetry."

Most of his Latin poetry was pub. in a vol. entitled Poetici Conatus, 1632, 12mo, and Wood enumerates some other productions of his, printed, and in MS. He was for some time usher under the famous Thomas Farnaby. See Athen. Oxon.; Knight's Life of Colet; Warton's Milton; Letters by Eminent Persons, 1813, 3 vols. 8vo.

Gill, Jeremiah. Reform in II. Commons, 1785.

Gill, John, D.D., 1697-1771, a Baptist divine of great learning, a native of Kettering, Northamptonshire, received his early education at the Grammar School of his native town, but may be said to be self-educated, as he left school whilst yet very young. He was a preacher, first at Higham-Ferrers, then at Kettering, and in 1719 became pastor of the Baptist congregation at Horeslydown, Southwark, where he continued for fifty-one years. Whilst yet a mere boy, he was so fond of frequenting the bookstores that it became a current expression, "Such a thing is as sure as John Gill is in the bookseller's shop." We need not therefore be surprised that he became an excellent Latinist, Grecian, and Orientalist. He wrote many works, some of the principal of which we proceed to notice.

1. Exposition of Solomon's Song, 1728, fol.; 1751, '68, 4to; 1805, 2 vols. 8vo. In the later eds. the Targum is left out. This exposition, which differs from the one contained in his Comment, on the Bible, comprises the substance of 122 discourses delivered from the pulpit.

"A minute detail on the allegorical sense, and a spiritual improvement."—Dr. E. Williams.

"It is highly allegorical in its interpretation."—Horne's Bibl. Bèb.

2. Prophecies resp. the Messiah, fulfilled in Jesus, 1728. In answer to Collins's Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered. 3. The Cause of God and Truth, being an Examination of the several Passages of Scripture made use of by the Arminians. In four parts, 1735-38, 4 vols. 8vo; 1755, 4 vols. 8vo; 1772, '75, 4to; 1816, 2 vols. 8vo; 1838, 8vo. This is an answer to Dr. Whitby's Discourse on the Five Points.

"If you read Whitby on the Five Points, read Dr. Gill's reply. . . It is the fullest answer to Whitby. . . In Part IV. of this Work, Dr. Gill goes through the testimonies of the Fathers before Augustine, to five passages that support Calvinistic views."—BICKERSTETH.

"It is an elaborate work, and may be considered a very able defence of Calvinism."—Wilson's Dissenting Churches.

4. Exposition of the New Testament, 1746-47-48, 3 vols. fol. 5. Exposition of the Old Testament, 1748-63, 6 vols. New ed. of both Testaments, with a Memoir by Dr. Rippon, and a portrait, 1816, 9 vols. 4to. Pub. at £12 12s.; large paper, £16 16s. Still worth about £12 to £13, in good binding. Vol. i. of a new ed. of the Expos. of the O. and N. Test. was pub. by Aylott of London in 1852, r. 8vo, and a new ed. of his Exposition of the Old Test. was pub. by Collingridge in 1854, 6 vols. r. 8vo, £3 18s.

"The author always keeps sight of his creed. . . He was a very learned and good man; but has often spiritualized his text to absurdity."—Dr. ADAM CLARKE.

"It abounds with rabbinical and theological information; but, though upon the whole a very valuable work, it is often prolix and tautologous and sometimes injudicious."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"It is prized as an invaluable mine of knowledge by judicious Christians of every denomination."—Wilson.

"He moves through his exposition like a man in lead, and overwhelms the inspired writer with dull lucubrations and rabbinical lumber. He is an ultra-Calvinist in his doctrinal sentiments. . . If the reader be inclined for a trial of his strength and patience, he may procure the burden of Dr. Gill. He was, after all, a man of undoubted learning, and of prodigious labour."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"In rabbinical literature Dr. Gill had no equal, and he has hence been enabled to illustrate many important passages of Scripture.

. . . An occasional reference to this learned work is all, perhaps, that can be recommended."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

"Valuable for rabbinical learning; a variety of meanings suggested; Calvinistic in sentiment."—Bickersbth's C. S.

6. Dissert. on the Antiq. of the Hebrew Language, Letters, Vowel-points, and Accents, 1767, 8vo.

"This is also a laboured exposition and defence of the doctrines of the Massorets."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

7. A Body of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity, 1769-70, 3 vols. 4to. Several eds. New ed., 1839, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Gill was a very learned and pious man; but his notions of moral obligations were not correct; which led him to some peculiarities of sentiment respecting grace being the obliging as well as the efficient cause of evangelized duty, and which disposed him, in arguing with Arminians, too often to cut the knot of difficulty, instead of solving it, and to deal in round assertions with slender arguments."—Williams's C. P.

8. Serms. and Tracts, several of which were never before printed. To which are prefixed Memoirs of the Life, Writings, and Character of the Author, 1773, 2 vols. 4to.

"If any man can be supposed to have trod the whole circle of human learning, it was Dr. Gill. While true religion and sound learning have a single friend in the B. I. his empire, the works and name of Gill will be precious and revered. . . With a solidity of judgment and with an acuteness of discernment peculiar to few, he exhausted, as it were, the very soul and substance of most arguments he undertook."—TOLAND.

Gill pub. several treatises upon Baptism, and many occasional serms. See the Life prefixed to his Serms. and Tracts, No. 7 above, and Stennet's Funeral Sermon. A new ed. of his Expos. of Solomon's Song was pub. in 1854, r. 8vo; a new ed. of his sermons, in 3 vols. 8vo, has appeared; and Rippon's Memoirs of his Life and Writings has been pub. separately in 12mo.

"A good title to a good book. The endeavour to convey Rome only by those impressions which would naturally be made upon an American, gives the work a certain air of originality;—the rarest of all qualities in descriptions of the Eternal City. The style is pure and sparkling, although occasionally flippant and diletantesque. The tone of remark is much in the usual way—selon les regles—never very exceptionable, and never very profound."—Edgar A. Poe's Literary.

Jour. of Science*.

"It is, in all respects, the best work on this subject with which I am acquainted; being from its arrangement, comprehensiveness, and clearness, equally adapted to the wants of Students of Civil Engineering, and the purposes of persons in any way engaged in the construction or supervision of roads."—PROFESSOR MAHAJ, of the Military Academy.

"This work enters less into critical and reccondite details than that of Mr. Mitford, though sufficiently accurate and comprehensive for all historical purposes; and is, in style of composition, decidedly superior to it. It has been translated into the German and French languages."—SAMUEL WARREN.

Another authority thus compares the histories of Gillies and Mitford:

"These are works of considerable merit; the former is the most learned, the latter the most popular; the former is abrupt in the style, the latter is more fluent; by the perusal of the one the reader is more amused than instructed, by the study of the other he is more instructed than amused."—DR. 4. A view of the Reign of Frederic II. of Prussia, &c., 1789, 8vo.

"The work of Dr. Gillies I can in no respect admire. There appear some good observations about the king's military genius, and there are some incidents mentioned of a general nature, which I do not observe in other English works. On the whole, I can recommend it to the student only when he wishes to learn what can be said in the praise or defence of Frederic. Gillies appears to me only a warm preyrist, and on this occasion neither a historian nor a philosopher."—Prof. Smyth's Lect. on Mod. Hist.

5. The Hist. of the World from the Reign of Alexander to Augustus, 1807-10, 2 vols. 4to.

"It does not appear to present such a luminous and masterly view of the very interesting period which it embraces, as would have been given by Mr. Gibbon or Dr. Robertson; but it exhibits proofs of learned research, and may, upon the whole, we think, be read with pleasure and advantage. It deserves no praise on the score of style, which is commonly diffuse and overcharged; and often vulgar and slovenly."—Edin. Rev., xi. 40-61.

6. Trans. of Aristotle's Rhetoric, 1825, 8vo. The historical works of Dr. Gillies may still be consulted by the student with advantage, but should be followed by a careful perusal of the results of more recent investigations.

"Mr. Gillies has this advantage over many collectors of similar reminiscences, that he was not only an author among authors, but that his social position in early life gave him access to the best circles. Gilman, Mrs. Caroline, a daughter of the late Samuel Howard of Boston, was born in that city, October 8, 1794. At the early age of 16, she wrote a poem entitled Jephthah's Rash Vow, which was succeeded by another poetical effusion, Jairus's Daughter, which was pub. in The North American Review. In 1819 she was married to Samuel Gilman, D.D., who, shortly after this event, became pastor of the Unitarian Church in Charleston, South Carolina, which office he retained until his death, in 1858. In 1832 Mrs. Gilman commenced editing The Rosebud, a hebdomadal, perhaps the first juvenile newspaper pub. in the United States.

"From this periodical I have reprinted, at various times, the following volumes:—Recollections of a New England House-keeper; Recollections of a Southern Matron; Ruth Laymond; or, Love's Progress; Poetry of Travelling in the United States; Tales and Ballads; Verses of a Life-time; Letters of Eliza Wilkinson during the Invasion of Charleston. Also several volumes for youth, now collected in one, and recently published as Mrs. Gilman's Gift-Book." See Mrs. Hale's Records of Women, N. Y., 1853, r. 8vo.

To this list must be added Oracles for Youth, 1854; Oracles from the Poets; and Sibyl; or, New Oracles from the Poets, 1854.

Mrs. Gilman is best known by the Recollections of a New England House-keeper, and Recollections of a Southern Matron, of both of which there have been many editions.

Her works will long be valued for the spirit and fidelity with which she has painted rural and domestic life in the northern and in the southern states. Her Recollections of a New England House-keeper and Recollections of a Southern Matron are equally happy, and both show habits of minute observation, skill in character-writing, and an artist-like power of grouping. They are also pervaded by a genial tone, and a true love of nature and good sense. . . . The poems of Mrs. Gilman abound in expressions of wise, womanly feeling, and are frequently marked by a graceful elegance of manner."—Griswold's Female Poets of America.

Gilman, Samuel, D.D., b. 1791, in Gloucester, Massachusetts; entered Harvard College in 1807, in the same class with N. L. Frothingham and Edward Everett. He graduated in 1811, and was, from 1817 to 1819, tutor in his college. In 1819 he was married to Miss Caroline Howard, (see GILMAN, MRS. CAROLINE,) and removed to Charleston, South Carolina, where he remained until his death in 1858, as pastor of the Unitarian Church of that city. Dr. Gilman contributed many valuable papers to the North American Review on the Lectures of Dr. Thomas Brown, a trans. of several of the satires of Boileau, &c., and pub. other essays upon various subjects in the Boston Christian Examiner, the London Monthly Repository, &c., together with discourses, biographies, essays, and translations, which exhibit a wide range of knowledge and are "all executed with taste and scholarship." His Memoirs of a New England Choir, of which there have been three eds., has been greatly admired for the tone of humorous vivacity and graphic descriptiveness which distinguishes it. He pub., in 1852, the Pleasures and Pains of a Student's Life, and, in 1856, a vol. entitled Contributions to Literature, Critical, Humorous, Biographical, Philosophical, and Poetical. Noticed in N. Amer. Rev., July, 1856, 271, by A. P. Peabody, D.D. Of his poems, The History of the Ray of Light, and his Poem read before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard College, are among the best-known.

A review of some of Dr. Gilman's sermons will be found in the Boston Christian Disciple, iv. 33. See an interesting biographical sketch of Dr. Gilman in the Monthly Religious Magazine, Boston, April, 1858. Also Dr. Burnap's Funeral Discourse.

To Mr. Gilpin we are also indebted for the supervision of the publication, by authority of Congress, of The Papers of James Madison, vols. i., ii., iii., pp. 580, xxii.; 662; 382, cxlvi., 1840, Svo. These papers were purchased from Mrs. Madison by the Govt. of the United States for thirty thousand dollars. See a review of their character, by Charles Francis Adams, in N. Amer. Rev., liii. 41.

Mr. Gilpin edited and wrote many articles in prose and verse in the Atlantic Souvenir, the first literary annual pub. in America, Phila., 1826-32. He is also the author of many articles, literary and political, in the American Quarterly Review and the Democratic Review, and some in the North American Review. A large number of the Biographies of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence were written by him; and the second edition of that collection was entirely revised, enlarged with much fresh original matter, and edited by him. He has published biographical notices of Livingston, Wright, Forsyth, Poinsett, and other statesmen, now deceased, with whom he was associated. Numerous addresses and speeches of his have been printed, delivered on public occasions or before societies connected with literature, science, and the Fine Arts.

and Early Engravers, 1 vol. Together, 12 vols. 8vo, 1808, &c., with 187 aquatinta engravings. Pub. at £10 10s. Now (1856) worth about £3 10s. to £4 10s., according to condition.

"A gentleman by whose pen and whose pencil I have been almost equally delighted, and who, with an originality that always accompanies true genius, may be considered as having opened a new source of enjoyment in surveying the works of nature."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Literature.

"All these works [Gilpin's Tours] display a deep and sincere judgment, and are written in a style appropriate to the subject and worthy of the matter."—Sirvenon's Voyages and Travels.

"Gilpin has described, in several justly-esteemed tours, the Picturesque Beauties of Great Britain. All his volumes are accompanied by engravings in aquatint, executed by himself with the taste and feelings of a painter. He has in some measure created a new kind of tour, which has found bad imitators everywhere. All his works abound with ingenious reflections, proper to enrich the theory of the arts and to guide the practice of them."—Biographie Universelle.

Mr. G. has also held several other important public stations. 1. The State in its Relations with the Church, Lon., 1838, 8vo; 4th ed., 1841, 2 vols.

"If Mr. Gladstone were an ordinary character, we should be inclined to speak strongly of the singular vigour, depth of thought, and eloquence, which he has displayed in his essay. But he is evidently not an ordinary character; though it is to be hoped that many others are now forming themselves in the same school with him to act hereafter on the same principles."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxv. 97-153.

"We certainly cannot wish that Mr. Gladstone's doctrines may become fashionable with public men. But we heartily wish that his laudable desire to penetrate beneath the surface of questions, and to arrive, by long and intense meditation, at the knowledge of great general laws, were much more fashionable than we at all expect it to become."—*F. Glanvil, John, 1664-1735, grandson of the preceding, a native of Broad Hinton. Poems, Lon., 1725, 8vo. He made the first English trans. of Fontenelle's Plurality of Worlds.

Glanvil, or Glauvill, Joseph, 1626-1680, a native of Plymouth, entered Exeter Coll., Oxf., 1652; Rector of the Abbey-church, Bath, 1666; Preb. of Worcester, 1678. He was a man of learning and genius, a zealous member of the Royal Society, a warm opponent of the Aristotelean philosophy, and a firm believer in witchcraft. He pub. a number of sermons, philosophical treatises, &c., of which the following are the principal:—1. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, Lon., 1661, 8vo and 12mo; 1662, 8vo. With addits., and entitled Scep sis Scientiæ; or, Confest Ignorancee the way to Science, 1665, 4to.

"The whole work is strongly marked with the features of an acute, an original, and, in matters of science, a somewhat sceptical genius; and, when compared with the treatise on witchcraft [see Nos. 3 and 10] by the same author, adds another proof to those already mentioned of the possible union of the highest intellectual gifts with the most degrading intellectual weakness."—DUGGALD STEWART: Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

Could Glanvil read this complimentary reflection, doubtless he would have considered that it "added another proof to those already mentioned" of the Vanity of Dogmatizing.

"He was a person of more than ordinary parts of a quick, warm, spruce, and gay fancy, and was more lucky, at least in his own judgment, in his first hints and thoughts of things, than in his after-notions, examined and digested by longer and more mature deliberation."—Athen. Oxon.

Glanvil, Glanvill, or Glanville, Ranulph de, Chief-Justice of all England, accompanied King Richard in the Crusades, and fell at the siege of Acre, at an advanced age. The following work is generally ascribed to him:—Tractatus de Legibus consuetudinibus Regni Angliæ, tempore Regis Henrici Secundi, Lon., 1554, 57? '80, 1604, 73, 12mo. Best ed. by John Wilmot, 1780, 12mo. Trans. into English by John Beames, 1812, 8vo. This trans., the only one in English, is accurate, and the text is enriched with learned notes. It is by no means certain that this work was written by Glanvil. It has been ascribed to E. de Narbrough, and also to King Henry II. It resembles so closely the Regiam Majestatem, that no doubt one was copied from the other; and it seems most probable that the De Legibus is the elder work.

"But as on the one side, I dare not be confident that it is Glanvill's, so I make little question that it is as ancient as his time, if not his work."—JOHN SELDEN.

Glanvil is relied upon as authority by Coke, Spelman, Selden, Hale, Blackstone, &c.

"Whom I cite many times in these Reports for the fruit which I confess myself to have reaped out of the fair fields of his labours."—LORD COKE.

Reeves incorporated the principal part of Glanvil's Tractatus in his Hist. of the Common Law.

An eminent authority, well known for his partiality to old English law-writers, several of whom he had reprinted with his own annotations, thus compares Glanvil and Littleton:

"Voici l'opinion que j'ai euee du recueil de Glanville. Il indique la methode la plus saine pour faire exécuter la loi; et Littleton nous instruit des causes et du but de cette methode. Celui-ci propose toutes les maximes; et la compilation de Glanville comprend toutes les Procédures propres à mettre ces maximes en action. Ces deux ouvrages réunis suffisent pour instruire à fond des coutumes et de l'ordre judiciaire observés chez les anciens Normands."—M. HOCARD.

See the above authorities cited, and others referred to, in Marvin's Leg. Bibl. The Mirror declares that Glanvill was the inventor of the famous writ of Assize or De Novel Disseisin; but other authorities affirm this to be more ancient. Of the works referred to above, Bishop Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib. must be specially consulted.

Glass, Francis, educated in Philadelphia, taught school for some time in the interior of Pennsylvania, and in 1817 or '18 removed to Miami county, Ohio, where he performed the duties of a schoolmaster in different localities. An account of Mr. Glass will be found in Mr. Reynolds's preface to the following work by the former:

Georgii Washingtonii, Americæ Septentrionalis Civitatum Fæderatarum Præsidiis primi, Vita, Francisco Glass,

A.M. Ohioensi, Literis Latinis conscripta. Neo-Eboracopolis, 1835, 12mo. Typis Fratrum Harperorum. A review of this work, by J. L. Kingsley, appeared in the N. Amer. Rev., xliii. 37-42. This elicited some animadversions in the Knickerbocker Mag., viii. 473, which were replied to by Mr. K. in the N. Amer. Rev., xlv. 270-272. A notice of Glass's work will also be found in the South. Lit. Mess., ii. 52. Mr. Kingsley admits that Glass

"is often happy in the choice of words and phrases, and passages occur of terseness and strength; nor does the author seem to have been wanting in any thing to make this work a worthy companion of the modern histories in the same language but a freer access to books and the advantages of a more correct and thorough criticism."

But he thinks it his duty to add:

"We doubt, however, whether this Life of Washington can be used to advantage in schools; certainly not without constant attention on the part of the instructor to point out its errors and defects."—N. Amer. Rev., xliiii. 43.

The fairest advice which we can offer to the intelligent reader is that he should read the articles pro and con, and then examine the work for himself.

Gleig, George Robert, born in 1795, a son of the preceding, is one of the most voluminous writers of the day. He was educated at Oxford, which he left to join the army, then marching through the city for Lisbon; served in the Peninsula, (see the Subaltern,) and subsequently in the campaign of Washington, where he was severely wounded; took holy orders; presented to the living of Ivy Church, Kent, 1822; Chaplain of Chelsea Hospital, 1844; Chaplain-General to the Forces, 1846; devised a scheme for the education of soldiers, and appointed Inspector-General of Military Schools. 1. The reader should also peruse the Story of the Peninsular War. 28. Life of Lord Clive, 1848, 12mo. 29. School Series, 1850, &c., in 18 vols. This series, composed of works by Mr. Gleig and other writers, comprises many valuable contributions to the interests of education. It is still (1854) in course of publication by Longman. 30. Leipsic Campaign, 1852, 12mo. It is unnecessary, after such a long catalogue of works, following each other in rapid succession, to say that Mr. Gleig is a very popular writer. Without entering into any detailed examination of his merits or demerits, we cannot avoid entering a protest against his zealous advocacy of one of the most unscrupulous, cruel, and remorseless wretches who ever disgraced humanity in general, and the British name in particular—Warren Hastings. Mr. Gleig's Life of Hastings forms a proper companion to Abbott's Life of Napoleon. We can say nothing more condemnatory of both. To prove that we "do well to be angry" with the Chaplain-General's remarkable production, entitled The Memoirs of Warren Hastings, we shall fortify our position by a brief extract from an eminent critic, who adds to his multifarious erudition an intimate acquaintance with East India Affairs:

"This book seems to have been manufactured in pursuance of a contract, by which the representatives of Warren Hastings, on the one part, bound themselves to furnish papers, and Mr. Gleig, on the other part, bound himself to furnish praise. It is but just to say that the covenants on both sides have been most faithfully kept; and the result is before us in the form of three big bad volumes, full of undigested correspondence and undiscerning panegyric. If it were worth while to examine this performance in detail, we could easily make a long article, by merely pointing out inaccurate statements, inelegant expressions, and immoral doctrines. But it would be idle to waste criticism on a bookmaker; and, whatever credit Mr. Gleig may have justly earned by former works, it is as a bookmaker, and nothing more, that he now comes before us. More eminent men than Mr. Gleig have written nearly as ill as he, when they have stooped to similar drudgery. It would be unjust to estimate Goldsmith by the History of Greece, or Scott by the Life of Napoleon. Mr. Gleig is neither a Goldsmith nor a Scott; but it would be unjust to deny that he is capable of something better than these memoirs. It would also, we hope and believe, be unjust to charge any Christian minister with the guilt of deliberately maintaining some propositions which we find in this work. It is not too much to say, that Mr. Gleig has written several passages, which bear the same relation to the Prince of Machiavelli that the Prince of Machiavelli bears to the Whole Duty of Man, and which would excite amazement in a den of robbers, or on board of a schooner of pirates. But we are willing to attribute these offences to haste, to thoughtlessness, and to that disease of the understanding which may be called the Favor Biographical, and which is to writers of lives what the gout is to an Alpine shepherd, or dirt-eating to a Negro slave."—T. B. MACAULAY: Edin. Rev., Oct. 1841; and in his Miscellanies, under the title of Warren Hastings.

We have already referred to Mr. Gleig's Memoir in our article on EDMUND BURKE, pp. 292, 293, and perhaps in other parts of this volume. Mr. Gleig's sermons have been highly commended. Essays, Biographical, Historical, and Miscellaneous, contributed chiefly to the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews, 1858, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. "Whether this monument will turn out to be 'ære perennius,' or whether it will crumble to pieces under the somewhat severe weathering which it will most assuredly receive from European Ethnologists, is more than we will venture to prophesy. In any case, the Types of Mankind appears to us to be by far the most elaborate efficient brief which has yet been drawn up for the use of those who plead on the side of the original diversity of human races. Its writers are, at any rate, thorough-paced, and shrink before none of the consequences of their own logic."—Westminster Review, July, 1854, 131-134.

A Notice of the Types of Mankind, by John Bachman,

D.D., of Charleston, S. C., was pub. in that city, in 1854-55; and the work has been reviewed in several other quarters.

"It [Dr Bachman's Notice] is in tone dignified, gentlemanly, and at the same time exhorting. . . . The shallowness and positive ignorance of Nott, and the empty pretence of Gliddon, are shown up, and these men are left without much to boast of. Agassiz does not, with his hasty and crude conclusions, figure to much advantage, and we are sorry to say, that by an inevitable necessity, the reputation of Morton is damaged. . . . Where are the 'Types of Mankind' now? Sinking lower and lower. . . . The Presbyterian Quarterly Review for September [1854] contains an able and scathing review of the 'Types of Mankind,' recently ushered to the world by Messrs. Gliddon and Nott. It is at once instructive and amusing to see these gentlemen under the dissecting knife of a scholar, who not only exposes the malignity of their shallow sciences, but their utter unfitness in point of scholarship to dabble in the original languages of the Scriptures. Mr. Gliddon, especially, pretends to a critical acquaintance with the Hebrew text, and his pretension might have passed current had he not ventured on proofs of his critical acumen; but alas for him! he has written a book which has enabled his learned readers to detect his miserable shallowness. . . . Our own estimate of the 'Types of Mankind' has already been laid before our readers. A further examination of the book has only tended to confirm our first impressions. As a work of science it is worthless; full of pretension, and yet full of ignorance and contradiction."—LYMAN COLEMAN, D.D.: Phila. P. esbyterian.

"It did not take long to satisfy ourselves that Mr. Gliddon's exposition of Genesis xi., being a compilation without completeness, arrangement, or any philosophical method whatever, has no claim to be regarded as a literary work. It is not to our taste or inclination to rest content with condemning Mr. Gliddon's lucubrations in general terms. To express our sense of their character, we can find no epithets which have not lost their force from his profuse misapplication of them. Our duty requires us to enter into particulars to refute his arguments, if such his assertions may be called, from A to Z, as he is mistaken all through. It is a humiliating task, to be sure, to refute a work, which, to every Hebraist, carries its own refutation on the face of every page."—Boston Chris. Examiner.

Rt. Rev. Dr. Alonzo Potter, Bishop of the Episcopal Church in the diocese of Pennsylvania, remarks, with reference to the flippant sneers which some controversialists obtrude into discussions upon the truth of the Scriptures:

"We must confess, however, that we have never, in the whole extent of our reading, met any thing which, in this respect, is so offensive to good taste and to the first principles of Inductive Philosophy, as the elaborate work recently given to the world under the title of Types of Mankind. Written under the influence of ardent prejudices against certain races of men, and descending to the use of caricature in order to bring them into dispute, it stops at hardly any thing which can cast reproach on Scripture. No jests are too coarse, no revilings too bitter or contemptuous, no special pleading too perverse. It is mournful to find that such names as those of Morton and Agassiz are destined to go down to posterity associated with such unseemly exhibitions of spite and intolerance. A cenotaph to Morton, one of the calmest and most dignified philosophers that any age or country has seen, should be stained by no scurrility, defamed by no violence. It is an insult to his memory to suppose that he could have desired his unpublished writings to be given to the world, in close connection with an attack on the Bible the malice of which is only equalled by its impotence."—Introduction to Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity, delivered in Phila., 1853-54, Phila., 1855, 8vo.

Glover, Mrs. Caroline H., a daughter of Rev. Dr. Saml. and Mrs. Caroline Gilman, was born in Charleston, 1823; married in 1840. She was left a widow in 1846, and has since that period resided with her parents. She is known as the author of many contributions to periodicals, consisting of juvenile literature, &c., under the signature of Caroline Howard, Vernon Grove, N. York, 1858.

Glover, Richard, 1712-1785, a native of London, and a merchant of that city, was one of the best Greek scholars and most famous poets of his day. He was educated at the school of Cleam, in Surrey, and whilst there wrote, in his 16th year, his poem to the memory of Sir Isaac Newton, appended by Dr. Henry Pemberton, in 1728, to his View of Newton's Philosophy. In 1760 Glover became a member of Parliament, and for many years enjoyed considerable political influence. 1. Leonidas; a Poem, Lon., 1737, 4to; 1738, 8vo. It passed through 4 eds. in 1737-38. 5th ed., extended from 9 to 12 books, 1779, 2 vols. 12mo. With plates, 1798, 2 vols. 8vo. New ed., 24mo. This poem—now almost entirely neglected—which celebrates the defence of Thermopylae, was enthusiastically applauded, both for its poetry and politics:

"The whole plan and purpose of it being to show the superiority of freedom over slavery; and how much virtue, public spirit, and the love of liberty are preferable, both in their nature and effects, to riches, luxury, and the insolence of power."—LORD LYTELTON: in Common Sense.

2. London, or the Progress of Commerce; a Poem, Lon., 1739, 4to. 3. Hosier's Ghost, 1739. This poem, written to excite the nation against the Spaniards, became very popular. It was composed whilst Glover was a visitor at Stowe; and there is an amusing anecdote connected with its composition, in which Lady Temple's tulips bear a prominent part. 4. Application to Parl. rel. to Trade, 1751, 8vo. 5. Boadicea; a Tragedy, 1758, 8vo. This piece was performed for nine nights, but seems to have disappointed Glover's friends. 6. Medea; a Tragedy, 1761, 4to.

"Written on the Greek model, and therefore unfit for the modern stage."

7. Jason; a Tragedy, 1799, 8vo. Never acted, and, the Biog. Dramat. says, never pub.

"As it required scenery of the most expensive kind, it never was exhibited."—Biog. Dramat.

8. The Atheniad; a Poem, 1787, 3 vols. 12mo. This is a continuation of Leonidas:

"The Atheniad ought always to accompany the Leonidas. Mr. Chalmers censures it, because, he says, the events of history are so closely followed as to give the whole the air of a peetical chronicle. To this opinion we may oppose the fact of having ourselves repeatedly perused it in early youth, for the interest which the story continually excited. Glover endeavoured to imitate the ancients, but wanted strength to support the severe style which he had chosen. He has, however, many and great merits; this especially among others, that instead of treading in the sheep-track wherein the writers of modern epics, till his time, seruum pecus, had gone one after the other, he framed the stories of both his poems according to their subject, without reference to any model, or any rule but that of propriety and good sense."—Lon. Quar. Rev. xi. 498, 499.

"His Leonidas acquired extraordinary popularity in its day, and appears, like the pseudo-Ossian, to have obtained a higher, or, at least, a more lasting, reputation on the continent, than in its own country; where, however, it still retains its rank as an English classic. . . . The Atheniad was intended as a sequel to Leonidas, and embraces the remainder of the Persian war, from the death of Leonidas to the battle of Platea. It was the work of the author's old age, and its defects are, in part, attributable to the circumstance of its not having received his finishing hand. In this latter performance, accordingly, the abilities of the author shew themselves more matured, and his peculiar properties more fully developed."—Lon. Retrosp. Rev., ii. 105-133, 1820.

In 1813, 8vo, was pub., under a Diary or part of a Diary, written by Glover, Memoirs of a distinguished Lit. and Polit. Character, from 1742-57, &c.; and in 1815 appeared an Inquiry, &c. rel. to these Memoirs, designed to prove that Glover was the author of the Letters of Junius. To these publications we shall refer in our article on JUNIUS.

A writer in the Edin. Rev. remarks:

"The sole value of the Memoirs of this vulgar, bustling, self-important politician, consists in the particulars he has given of some private deliberations of opposition to which he was admitted."

But see this same periodical, xxii. 475-484.

"A portion of this history has lately been made public, and it is as interesting as any thing can be which relates to the politics of such unimportant times. . . . We should rejoice if this inquiry [see ante] should bring forth more of his remains, and lead to a collected edition of the works of an author who, though too highly extolled in his own day, must ever hold a respectable rank among the English poets."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xi. 498, 499.

"The historical writings of Guicciardini have not only entitled their author to the indisputable precedence of all the historians of Italy, but have placed him at least on a level with those of any age or of any country."—Roscoe's Life of Leo the Tenth.

"We have finished the twentieth and last book of Guicciardini's history; the most authentick I believe (may I add, I fear) that ever was composed. I believe it, because the historian was an actor in his terrible drama, and personally knew the principal performers in it; and I fear it, because it exhibits the woful picture of society in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries."—SIR WM. "This historian represents man in his darkest colours. Their drama is terrific. The actors are monsters of perfidy, of inhumanity, and inventors of crimes which seem to want a name. They were all princes of darkness, and that age seemed to afford a triumph to Manichæism. The worst passions were called in by all parties."—DISRAELI.

"The predominating love of narrative, more especially when the exploits of a favourite nation were the subject, rendered this book very popular; and it came recommended to the public by a title-page which promised almost the entertainment of a romance."—WARTON.

Goddard, Wm., d. 1817, at Providence, R. I., in his 78th year, was connected with the newspaper press in various parts of the United States. In 1762 he commenced the Providence, R. He was at one time connected with the publication of Parker's Journal in New York. An interesting account of Goddard will be found in Thomas's Hist. of Printing. His claim to a place in our volume is founded on the fact of his having pub. a list of the Penn. Chronicle, 1770. He married a Miss Angell, of Providence, and the name of the lady suggested to a friend of the groom the bon mot that Goddard had "taken an angel for his wife." It would appear, therefore, that wit is not entirely a recent invention. Whether Mr. Goddard's facetious friend deserved the commendation of Barrow—

"It seemeth to argue a rare quickness of parts, that one can fetch in remote conceits applicable; a notable skill, that he can dexterously accommodate them to the purpose before him"—we shall not stop to inquire.

Godfrey of Winchester, d. 1107, prior of St. Swithin's at Winchester, was the author of a number of Epistles, epigrams, verses, &c. The two last-named, all that are known to exist, are preserved in a MS. in the Cottonian Library, and in two MSS. in the Bodleian Library. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., and authorities there cited.

"Godfrey of Winchester was the first and best of the Anglo-Norman writers of Latin verse; in such of his works as are now extant, he rises more successfully than any other poet of his own or the succeeding age above the barbarisms of medieval style, and in some of his epigrams he approaches nearly to the purity of Martial, who was his model."—*Biog. "Whose sad mysterious death had, fifteen years before, produced a terrible outbreak of popular feeling. Michael was one of the ablest, most upright, and most opulent of the merchant princes of London. He was, as might have been expected from his near connection with the martyr of the Protestant faith, a zealous Whig. Some of his writings are still extant, and prove him to have had a strong and clear mind."—MACAULAY, ubi supra.

He was subsequently employed as a factor in North Carolina, and also as a supercargo in a voyage to the island of New Providence. His tragedy of The Prince of Parthia, which was offered to a company performing in Phila. in 1759, is supposed to be the first dramatic work written in America. The Court of Fancy, a Poem, Phila., 1763, 4to, was evidently written with an eye to Chaucer's House of Fame. Godman, John D., 1794-1830, a native of Annapolis, Maryland, was in his youth employed first as a printer, and subsequently as a sailor in the navy. In 1815 he commenced the study of medicine, and attained a high rank in his profession, especially in the department of anatomy. He was also distinguished for his knowledge of natural history and the ancient and modern languages. After receiving his medical degree, he practised for some time in Philadelphia and other places, and in 1821 was appointed Prof. of Anatomy in the Medical College of Cincinnati. In 1822 he removed to Phila., and four years later accepted a call to the Professorship of Anatomy in Rutgers Medical College, New York. Obligated by failing health to embark on a voyage to the West Indies, where he remained for a winter, he settled, on his return, at Germantown, Penna., where he died of consumption, April 17, 1830.

In addition to his work on American Natural History, Dr. Godman's principal works are—Anatomical Investigations; American Natural History, commenced in 1823 and completed in 1828, pub. in 3 vols. 8vo; Aect. of some Irregularities of Structure and Morbid Anatomy; Rambles of a Naturalist; an edit. of Bell's Anatomy, with Notes; Trans. of Levasseur's Aect. of La Fayette's Progress through the United States. He pub. many Addresses, delivered on various public occasions, contributed a number of articles to the American Quarterly Review and other periodicals, and wrote the articles in the Encyc. Americana to end of the letter C. He established the Western Quarterly Reporter, projected by Dr. Drake, and for some time assisted in Dr. Chapman's Medical Journal, pub. in Philadelphia.

For further particulars we must refer the reader to the Memoir of Dr. Godman, by Thos. Sewall, M.D., Prof. of Anatomy and Physiology in the Columbian College, Washington, D. C., 1830; and a Review, by Dr. Lindsley, of this Memoir, in the N. Amer. Rev., xl. 87-99. Of Godman's American Natural History the reviewer remarks:

"We do not intend to claim for this work very great merit. In such an enterprise, not to have failed is sufficient glory—especially when undertaken amidst such a multiplicity of other engagements. . . . But notwithstanding all the disadvantages under which Dr. Godman laboured—notwithstanding the paucity of materials at his command from which to select, and the limited period he allotted to himself to prepare and arrange such as he could procure, he has produced a work which will confer honour on his industry, judgment and talents, and which is undoubtedly superior to any previous publication on the same subject. . . . We consider Dr. Godman, in some respects, among the most extraordinary men that have adorned the medical profession of our country."

Dr. Sewall's Memoir of Dr. Godman has been pub. as a tract by the American Tract Society, and has also been appended to the Amer. ed. of Newman Hall's Narrative of the Closing Scenes of the Life of Dr. Wm. Gordon. See GORDON, Wm., M.D. Both of these distinguished physicians were zealous professors of the Christian faith, and died rejoicing in its consolations.

Wood refers to Godwin's first ed., 1601, 4to. See Athen. Oxon. for an account of the subsequent improvements, and for titles and particulars, of Godwin's other works. It is a curious fact that the first ed. of his catalogue caused Queen Elizabeth to give him the bishopric of Llandaff, and the

"It was translated in French, and became the model of Cyrano de Bergerac, as he was of Swift. Godwin himself had no prototype, as far as I know, but Lucian. He resembles these writers in the natural and veracious tone of his lies. The fiction is rather ingenious and amusing throughout; but the most remarkable part is the happy conjectures, if we must say no more of his philosophy. Not only does the writer declare positively for the Copernican system, which was uncommon at that time, but he has surprisingly understood the principle of gravitation, it being distinctly supposed that the earth's attraction diminishes with the distance."—*Haklun's Lit. Other works.

Godwin, Mary Wollstonecraft, 1759-1797, a native of London or its vicinity, was the daughter of a person who was alternately a tradesman and a farmer, without much profit from either occupation. There seems to have been an entire absence of all proper discipline in the household of this vacillating individual, and to this fact is doubtless to be imputed the beginning of many faults exhibited in Mary's wayward career. After residing for some time as a companion to a lady at Bath, in 1783, assisted by her two sisters and a friend, she established a day-school at Islington; but in a few months removed her seminary to Newington Green.

A trip to Lisbon interrupted her professional duties, and on her return she abandoned the school, and accepted the situation of a governess in the family of Lord Kingsborough, where she remained until 1787. In 1786 she pub. Thoughts on the Education of Daughters, which was followed by Mary, a fiction: Original Stories from Real Life; the Female Reader; trans. and abridgments of Salzman's Elements of Morality, Lavater's Physiognomy, &c.; and some articles in the Analytical Review. In 1791 she acquired considerable notoriety by the publication of her Answer to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution, and her Vindication of the Rights of Women. She now mixed a good deal in literary society, and, unaccustomed to restrain any feeling which happened to be uppermost, cherished an attachment for Fuseli, the artist, who was already married and very properly discouraged the advances of his enthusiastic admirer. Disgusted with the world, and perhaps with herself, Miss Wollstonecraft left England, and in 1792 we find her in France, where she formed an alliance—not of the most irreproachable character—with Mr. Imlay, an American. She was now perfectly satisfied, or professed to be so; but Mr. Imlay was not: he abandoned her to loneliness, and in her despair she made two attempts upon her own life. An acquaintance with Mr. William Godwin, soon to be noticed in our work, restored her to her former equanimity; and this acquaintance—in accordance with the lady's ideas of the Rights of Women—soon ripened into relations of the most intimate character, but without the usual formalities of legal sanction and priestly benediction. After residing together for about six months, the two friends were united by marriage. Mrs. Godwin died in September, 1797, leaving an infant daughter, who became the wife of Percy Bysshe Shelley.

In addition to the works noticed above, Mrs. Godwin pub. A Moral and Historical Relation of the French Revolution—one vol. only appeared;—Letters from Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, 1796; Young Grandison; a trans. of Necker on the Importance of Religious Opinions. After her death Mr. Godwin pub. her Miscellanies, Letters, and an unfinished novel, with a Life of the author, 1798, 4 vols. 12mo, and 1 vol. 8vo.

"Mr. Godwin wrote and published the Memoirs of Mary Wollstonecraft, a work disreputable to his name, as well as that of his wife; she appears to have been grossly irreligious, indelicate, and dissolute."—Lon. Gent. M.g., June, 1836.

Lawrence's Empire of the Nairs; or, the Rights of Woman; an Utopian Romance, 1813, 4 vols. 12mo, adopts the anti-marriage theory of Mrs. Godwin. Such speculations would provoke ridicule, were they not too mischievous to be laughed at.

"No woman (with the exception of the greatest woman, Madame de Staël) has made any impression on the public mind during the last fifty years, to be compared with Mrs. Godwin. This was perhaps more especially true in the provinces, where her new and startling doctrines were seized with avidity, and acted upon in some particulars to considerable extent, particularly by married women. . . . She was, I have been told by an intimate friend, very pretty and feminine in manners and person; much attached to those very observances she derides in her works; so that if any gentleman did not fly to open the door as she approached it, or take up the handkerchief she dropped, she showered on him the full weight of reproach and displeasure; an inconsistency she would have doubtless despised in a disciple. I have heard the late Miss Jewsbury express an intention of so remodelling the Rights of Women, that it would not fail to become attractive, and she thought useful."—Communication in Mrs. Elwood's Literary Ladies of Eng.

"He [Coleridge] asked me if I had ever seen Mary Wollstonecraft, and I said, I had once for a few moments, and that she seemed to me to turn off Godwin's objection to something she advanced with quite a playful, easy air. He replied that 'this was only one instance of the ascendancy which people of imagination exercised over those of mere intellect.' He did not rate Godwin high, (this was caprice, or prejudice real or affected,) but he had a great idea of Mrs. Wollstonecraft's powers of conversation; none at all of her talent for book-making."—HALLITT: My First Acquaintance with Poets.

Godwin, Morgan, d. 1645, Archdeacon of Shropshire, a son of Francis Godwin, D.D., trans., as we have noticed, his father's Annales. He was ejected by the Parliamentary Commissioners, and his family reduced to distress.

Berkeley. 1. The Negroes' and Indians' Advocate suing for their admission to the Church, Lon., 1680, 8vo. 2. Supplet., 1681, 8vo. 3. Serm. rel. to the Plantations; on Jer. ii. 34, 1685, 4to.

Godwin, Parke, b. February 25, 1816, at Paterson, New Jersey, is a son of General Godwin, an officer of the war of 1812, and a grandson of a soldier of the American Revolution. After graduating at Princeton College in 1834, Mr. G. studied law and was admitted to practice, but found a stronger charm in the cultivation of letters. From 1837 to 1853 he assisted his celebrated father-in-law, William C. Bryant, in the editorial duties connected with the New York Evening Post. In Feb. 1843, he commenced the publication of a weekly periodical entitled The Pathfinder. The title proved to be a mis-nomer, for, although admitted to be admirably conducted, it failed to find the path to public favour, and, after a brief existence of three months and fifteen numbers, it expired. Mr. G. has pub. Goethe's Autobiography, trans. and edited; Zschokke's Tales, trans.; a Popular View of the Doctrines of Fourier; Vala, a Mythological Tale; Hand-Book of Universal Biography, compiled from Maundier and other authorities; pub. as one of the vols. of Putnam's Home Cyclopædia; Constructive Democracy; articles in the Democratic Review; on Shelley; Democracy; Edward Livingston; Jeremy Bentham; Goethe; Free Trade; William Leggett; Political Economy; Washington Irving; Downing's Landscape Gardening; Carlyle's Chartism; England and China; Journalism; The Loggerheads; Bryant's Poems; American Poetry, &c.; also articles in Putnam's Monthly Mag.; on American Authors; The Works of American Statesmen; Our New President; Parties and Politics; Annexation; What impression do we make abroad? The Pacific Railroad; The Know Nothings; How they manage in Europe; Comte's Philosophy; A Few Days in Vienna; From Venice to Vienna; A Day on the Danube; French Almanacs; A Letter to John Bull; The Eastern Question, &c.; and most of the editorial notes.

Mr. Godwin has in preparation (we are glad to state) a work on The History of France, to which he has dev. led many years, one on the Nineteenth Century, with its Leading Men and Movements, and a book of Travels, to be entitled A Winter Harvest, giving an account of interviews with a number of French and English political reformers.

Expos. of the Roman Antiquities, Oxf., 1613, '23, '25, '33, 4to; Lon., 1658, '68, '85; 16th ed., 1686, 4to; 1668, '86, 8vo. "It was also translated into Latin by Reiz, and published with his notes in 1679. Hoffinger published it with considerable additions and improvements in 1710. Carpov's Apparatus of Hebrew Antiquities [The most elaborate system of Jewish antiquities, perhaps, that is extant.—Horne's Bib. Bib.] is a learned commentary on it; and Jennings's work on Jewish Antiquities is of the same nature. It is, on the whole, a valuable and accurate work. There is often bound up with it a work on Roman Antiquities, by Francis Rous, the four last chapters of which were written by the learned Zachary Bozan. The whole forms a useful and not expensive body of antiquities."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

"The presbyterian writers [Geo. Kendal and Dr. Saml. Clarke] say that the Dr. Godwin was a very learned man in the antiquities of the Hebrews, Greeks, and Latins; yet he was fitter to instruct Grammarians than deal with logicians, and had more power as master of a school at Abingdon than as a doctor of divinity. They further add, also, that Twisse did, by his writings and disputes, whip this old schoolmaster, and wrested that bridle out of his hands which he had enough used with pride, and exposed him to be derided by boys."—Alben, Oxon.

Godwin, William, 1756-1836, a native of Wisebeach, Cambridgeshire, where his father was a dissenting minister, was educated at the Dissenting College, Hoxton, where he remained for above five years, under the tuition of Doctors Rees and Kippis. In 1778 Godwin became minister to a dissenting congregation near London, and soon afterwards took charge of a meeting-house at Stowmarket, Suffolk. In 1782 he determined to relinquish the ministry and seek a livelihood by the use of his pen, and accordingly he removed to London as a permanent residence. For the particulars of his social life, we must refer the reader to the detailed account pub. in the London Gent. Mag. for June, 1836, shortly after his decease. This account is principally derived from a sketch, biographical and critical, prefixed to the novel of Caleb Williams, pub. in Bentley's Standard Novels. We need only remark, here, that in 1797 he became the husband of a woman of notoriously bad character—Mary Wollstonecraft (see ante)—with whom he had previously lived on disreputable terms, and after her death was again married. He was once principal conductor of the New Annual Register, for a time a book-seller, frequently a member of distinguished literary circles, and always a lover of letters. His few last years were rendered independent by an appointment to the sinecure office of Yeoman Usher of the Exchequer. He had considerable abilities, little judgment, and less wisdom; and in his efforts for reform lacked that foundation without which all such attempts are hopeless—a recognition of man's moral depravity, and the necessity of maintaining a constant sense of strict accountability to his Maker. We proceed to notice his publications:

1. Sketches of History, in Six Serms., Lou., 1784, 12mo.
2. An Enquiry concerning Political Justice, and its Influence on General Virtue and Happiness, 1793, 2 vols. 4to; 3d ed., 1797, 2 vols. 8vo. For this work he received £700. It at once attracted the public attention, but has long been neglected.

"No work in our time gave such a blow to the philosophical mind of the country as the celebrated Enquiry concerning Political Justice. Tom Paine was considered for the time as a Tom Fool to him; Paley an old woman; Edmund Burke a flashy sophist. Truth, moral truth, it was supposed, had here taken up its abode; and these were the oracles of thought. 'Throw aside your books of Chemistry,' said Wordsworth to a young man, a student in the Temple, 'and read Godwin on Necessity.'"—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age.

"This was a bold and astounding piece of writing, a very master-stroke of levelization, pardonable only as having been conceived in the madness of a distracting period in the history and affairs of Europe. We are told it became so popular, that the poorest mechanics were known to club subscriptions for its purchase, and thus was it directed to mine and eat away contentment from a nation's roots. In a very short time the author himself saw he had transgressed the bounds of prudence, and in what was called a second edition recanted many of the most erroneous and alarming doctrines of the first."—Biog. Notice in Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1836, 106-170.

"You sipped upon Godwin and oysters with Carlisle. Have you, then, read Godwin with attention? Give me your thoughts of his book: for faulty as it is in many parts, there is a mass of truth in it that must make every man think. Godwin, as a man, is very contemptible. I am afraid that most public characters will ill endure examination in their private lives. . . . Do not despise Godwin too much. . . . He will do good by defending Atheism in print, because when the arguments are known they may be easily and satisfactorily answered."—Robert Southey to G. C. Bedford, 1795-96. In another place Southey calls Godwin "the Goliath of the philosophical Cannanites."

"His Political Justice, with all the extravagance of its first edition, or with all the inconsistencies of its last, is a noble work, replete with lofty principle and thought, and often leading to the most striking results by a process of the severest reasoning?"—Sir T. N. Talford: Lon. New Month. Mag., and in his Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

"I cannot but consider the author of Political Justice as a philosophical reasoner of no ordinary stamp or pretensions. That work, whatever its defects may be, is distinguished by the most acute and severe logic, and by the utmost boldness of thinking, founded on a love and conviction of truth."—Hazlitt on the English Novelists.

"Whatever may be its mistakes, which we shall be the last to undertake, it is certain that works in which errors equally dangerous are maintained with far less ingenuity, have obtained for their authors a conspicuous place in the philosophical history of the eighteenth century."—Sir James Mackintosh: Edin. Rev., 488, and in his Misc. Works.

"Seldom has so bold, powerful and collected a thinker investigated questions of this nature. His Inquiry is scarcely tinged with the atmosphere of ordinary life. He takes up the subject like a new-comer to our planet, unswayed either by habit or association. His work may be described as the application of intellect to life. The result was, that he proved that reason is not the only guide, and, in doing this, he fulfilled a vast though negative service; besides incidentally contributing new impulse and information to the cause of individual culture and social progress."—H. T. Tuckerman: Characteristics of Literature: The Reformer: Godwin. "The influence of the work I can myself remember. In any ordinary state of the world it must have fallen lifeless from the press; highly metaphysical, continually running into general abstractions, into disquisitions, never ending still beginning, nothing was ever less fitted to attract a reader than this repulsive Inquiry concerning Political Justice; and if the state had not been out of joint, most assuredly scarce a reader would have been found. Some years after, when the success of the work had been established, Mr. Burke was asked whether he had seen it. 'Why, yes, I have seen it,' was the answer, 'and a mighty stupid-looking book it is.' No two words could better have described it. The late excellent Sir Samuel Romilly, who had then leisure to read every thing, told a friend who had never heard of it, that there had just appeared a book, by far the most absurd that had ever come within his knowledge, (this was the work of Godwin;) and Mrs. Barbauld, at length, by the progress of its doctrines, was compelled to look at it, declared, that what was good in the book was chiefly taken from Hume; and that it was 'borrowed sense, and original nonsense.' . . . It is no longer possible, I think, to read the book: the world is now in a more settled state, and people no longer make 'inquiries concerning political justice, and its influence on morals and happiness,' according to the title of his book. I will therefore endeavour to give you some general notion of the leading principles of the work, in the most concise manner I am able.

"This sentence was written many years ago, like the rest of the lectures I am now delivering; but, as I mentioned in my introductory lecture to this course, I have lived to see all the doctrines of Godwin revived. They are the same as those which now infest the world and disgrace the human understanding, delivered by Mr. Owen, by the Chartists, the St. Simonians, &c. &c., and by many other political theorists, in these kingdoms, in France, on the continent, and the 'Workees,' as they call themselves, in America. . . . Books like Mr. Godwin's (and I have therefore called your attention to his work, merely as a specimen of all other revolutionary works and reasonings) have a fatal tendency to animate and exasperate men of sanguine and benevolent minds with false ideas of the perfectibility of human nature, and erroneous estimates of the evils they see existing; they create in them a hasty, unreasonable impatience and scorn for the more humble and unassuming principles upon which those who would meliorate the condition of their fellow-creatures must proceed; they prepare the way for the appearance and success of daring and bad men; of revolutionists of the worst description; and while they profess to further the great cause of liberty, and the improvement of mankind, they bring into suspicion and contempt some of the noblest and best virtues of the human character; they make patriotism useless, and benevolence ridiculous."—Prof. Southey's Lects. on the Hist. of the French Revolution. See Green's Examination of Godwin's Political Justice, &c., Lon., 1798, 8vo.

Sir Walter Scott, who had the same difficulty in "sparing or passing by a jest," when writing, that Lord Bacon had when speaking, thus pleasantly rallies Godwin upon the maxims of property contained in his Political Justice. The remark occurs in Scott's review of Godwin's Life of Chaucer, and refers to the biographer's complaint that the owners of libraries refused to lend him the books which he required for consultation:

"We cannot help remarking that the principles of a modern philosopher continue to charm the public after the god man himself has abandoned them; just as the very truest tale will sometimes be distrusted from the habitual falsehood of the narrator. We fear this may have incommoded Mr. Godwin in his antiquarian researches, more than he seems to be aware of. When he complains that private collectors decline 'to part with their treasures for a short time out of their own hands,' did it never occur to Mr. Godwin that the maxims concerning property, contained in his Political Justice, were not altogether calculated to conciliate confidence in the author?"—Edin. Rev., iii, 437-452.

3. Things as they are, or the Adventures of Caleb Williams; a Novel, 1794, 3 vols. 12mo; 1796, 3 vols. 12mo; 1816, 3 vols. 12mo; 1832, 12mo; 1849, 12mo; 1854, 8vo. This work has also a political tendency:

"A general review of the modes of domestic despotism, by which man becomes the destroyer of man."

The author received for it the small sum of £84.

"A master-piece, both as to invention and execution. The romantic and chivalrous principle of the love of personal fame is embodied in the finest possible manner in the character of Falkland; as in Caleb Williams, (who is not the first, but the second character in the piece) we see the very demon of curiosity personified. Perhaps the art with which these two characters are contrived to relieve and set off each other has never been surpassed in any work of fiction, with the exception of the immortal satire of Cervantes."—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age.

"There is not a moment's pause in the action or sentiment; the breath is suspended, the faculties are wound up to the highest pitch as we read. Page after page is greedily devoured. There is no laying down the book till we come to the end, and even then the words still ring in our ears, nor do the mental apparitions ever pass away from the eye of memory."—Edin. Rev.

"Caleb Williams, the earliest, is also the most popular, of our author's romances, not because his latter works have been less rich in sentiment and passion, but because they are, for the most part, confined to the development of single characters; while in this there is the opposition and death-grapple of two beings, each endowed with poignant sensibilities and quenchless energy. There is no work of fiction which more rivets the attention—no tragedy which exhibits a struggle more sublime or sufferings more intense than this; yet to produce the effect, no complicated machinery is employed, but the springs of action are few and simple. The motives are at once common and elevated, and are purely intellectual, without appearing for an instant inadequate to their mighty issues."—Sir T. N. Talford: New Month. Mag., and in his Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

Mr. Gilfillan also commends Caleb Williams in the most eulogistic terms, and is taken to task for his enthusiasm by Mr. De Quincey, who remarks:

"It happens, however, that other men of talent have raised Caleb Williams to a station in the first rank of novels: whilst many more, amongst whom I am compelled to class myself, can see in it no merit of any kind."

Read this article, which is sufficiently amusing, in De Quincey's Essays on the Poets and other English Writers.

"Few there are who do not enter into and understand the workings of the mind of Caleb Williams, where the demon of curiosity, finding a youth of an active and speculative disposition, without guide to advise, or business to occupy him, engages his thoughts and his time upon the task of prying into a mystery which noway concerned him, and which from the beginning he had a well-founded conviction might prove fatal to him should he ever penetrate it. The chivalrous frenzy of Falkland, in the same piece, though perhaps awkwardly united with the character of an assassin, that love of fame to which he sacrifices honour and virtue, is another instance of a humour, or turn of mind, which, like stained glass, colours with its own peculiar tinge every object beheld by the party."—Sir Walter Scott: Blackwood's Mag., xx, 53.

"Caleb Williams is the cream of his mind, the rest are the skimmed milk; yet in that wondrous novel all must be offended with the unnatural and improbable character of Falkland: the most accomplished, the most heroic and lofty-minded of men murders one who had affronted him, allows others to hang for the deed, and persecutes to the brink of ruin a man whose sole sin was a desire to penetrate through the mystery in which this prodigy of vice and virtue had wrapped himself. Williams suffers merely because it was necessary for the story that he should; a single word would have set all right and saved him from such unnatural terror. In short, the fault is, that the actions which the dramatis persone perform are not in keeping with their characters."—Allan Cunningham: Biog. and Crit. List. of the Lit. of the last Fifty Years. See No. 18.

"Caleb Williams is probably the finest novel produced by a man,—at least since the Vicar of Wakefield. The sentiments, if not the opinions, from which it arose, were transient. Local usages and institutions were the subjects of its satire, exaggerated beyond the usual privilege of that species of writing. Yet it has been translated into most languages, and it has appeared in various forms on the theatres not only of England, but of France and Germany. There is scarcely a Continental circulating library in which it is not one of the books which most quickly require to be replaced. . . . There is scarcely a fiction in any language which it is so difficult to lay down. . . . The passages which betray the metaphysician more than the novelist ought to be weeded out with more than ordinary care."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Edin. Rev., xxv. 485-486, and in his Miscell. Writings.

4. Cursory Strictures on the Charge delivered by Lord Chief-Justice Eyre to the Grand Jury, Oct. 2, 1794, 8vo. This refers to the trial of Holcroft, Thelwall, and other would-be political reformers, who were tried for high treason. Godwin's pamphlet is thought to have secured their acquittal. See No. 11. 5. The Enquirer: Reflections on Education, Manners and Literature, in a series of Essays, 1797, 8vo; 1823, 12mo. 6. Memoirs of Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, 1798, 8vo. 7. Her Posthumous Works, 1798, 4 vols. 12mo. See our article on this person, and see No. 11 in this biography. 8. St. Leon; or a Tale of the 16th century, 1799, 4 vols. 12mo; 1832, 12mo; 1849, 12mo. This title was much ridiculed, and a humorous counterpart to St. Leon was pub. under the name of St. Godwin: a Tale of the 16th, 17th, and 18th century, by Count Reginald de St. Leon, 1800, 12mo. But Mr. Godwin had the laugh on his side, for he received 400 guineas for his copy-right.

"In St. Leon Mr. Godwin has sought the stores of the supernatural:—but the 'metaphysical aid' which he has condescended to accept, is not adapted to carry him farther from nature, but to ensure a more intimate and wide communion with its mysteries. His hero does not acquire the philosopher's stone and the elixir of immortality to furnish out for himself a dainty solitude, where he may dwell, soothed with the music of his own undying thoughts, and rejoicing in his severance from his frail and transitory fellows."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: New Month Mag., and in his Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

"After Caleb Williams, it would be injustice to Mr. Godwin to mention St. Leon, where the marvellous is employed too frequently to excite wonder, and the terrible is introduced till we have become familiar with terror. The description of Bethlem Gabor, however, recalled to our mind the author of Caleb Williams; nor, upon the whole, was the romance such as could have been written by quite an ordinary pen."—Edin. Rev., vi. 182. See No. 18.

9. Antonio, or The Soldier's Return; a Tragedy, Lon., 1801, 8vo.

"A miracle of dullness."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD.

And so the audience thought; for, after being bored beyond endurance, human nature gave way, and they hooted the actors from the stage, in the presence of the unhappy author. Talfourd gives an amusing account of the equanimity displayed by Godwin in this trying occasion. 10. Thoughts on Dr. Parr's Spital Sermon, 1802, 8vo.

"A clever though disordered composition."—Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1826.

11. The Life of Geoffrey Chaucer, &c., 1803, 2 vols. 4to; 2d ed., 1804, 4 vols. 8vo. We have already referred to this work, both in the present article and in our Life of Chaucer, but cannot let it pass without adding a few lines.

"In his Life of Mary Wollstonecraft he has written little and said much; and in his account of Chaucer, he has written much and said little. . . . It has been said that a spoonful of truth will colour an ocean of fiction; and so it is seen in Godwin's Life of Chaucer: he heaps conjecture upon conjecture—dream upon dream—theory upon theory; scatters learning all around, and shows everywhere a deep sense of the merits of the poet; yet all that he has related might have been told in a twentieth part of the space which he has taken."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"The perusal of this title excited no small surprise in our critical fraternity. The authenticated passages of Chaucer's life may be comprised in half a dozen pages; and behold two voluminous quartos. . . . We have said that Mr. Godwin had two modes of wire-drawing and prolonging his narrative. The first is, as we have seen, by hooking in the description and history of every thing that existed upon earth at the same time with Chaucer. In this kind of composition, we usually lose sight entirely of the proposed subject of Mr. Godwin's lucubrations, travelling to Rome or Palestine with as little remorse as if poor Chaucer had never been mentioned in the title-page. The second mode is considerably more ingenious, and consists in making old Geoffrey accompany the author upon these striking excursions. For example, Mr. Godwin has a fancy to describe a judicial trial. Nothing can be more easily introduced; for Chaucer certainly studied at the Temple, and is supposed to have been bred to the bar."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Edin. Rev., iii. 437-452.

Read the whole of this amusing review, which is replete with that exquisite humour in which the great magician was certainly never surpassed.

"His Life of Chaucer would have given celebrity to any man of letters possessed of three thousand a year, with leisure to write quartos: as the legal acuteness in his Remarks on Judge Eyre's Charge to the Jury would have raised any briefless barrister to the height of his profession."—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age.

The Life of Chaucer should by no means be neglected on account of its bulk, which perhaps the enthusiastic student of early English history would not have curtailed by a single page. This kind of desultory gossip is no ignoble treat for a long winter's evening.

12. Fleetwood, or the New Man of Feeling; a Novel, 1805, 3 vols. 12mo; 1849, 12mo.

"There is, perhaps, little general sympathy with the over-strained delicacies of Fleetwood, who, like Falkland in the School for Scandal, is too extravagant in his peculiarities to deserve the reader's pity."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Blackwood's Mag., xx. 53.

"In short, the New Man of Feeling, in his calm moments a determined egotist, is, in his state of irritation, a frantic madman, who plays on a barrel-organ at a puppet show, till he and the wooden dramatis personæ are all possessed by the foul fiend Pliberghiteb, who presides over napping and mozing."—Edin. Rev., vi. 182-193.

"Fleetwood has less of our author's characteristic energy than any other of his works."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: New Month Mag., and Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

13. Faulkner; a Tragedy, 1807, '08, 8vo. This met with the same fate as Antonio had experienced; see No. 9. 14. An Essay on Sepulchres; or, a Proposal for erecting some Memorials of the Illustrious Dead in all ages, on the spot where their remains have been interred, 1809, 8vo.

"Of all Mr. Godwin's writings, the choicest in point of style is a little essay on Sepulchres. Here his philosophic thought, subdued and sweetened by the contemplation of mortality, is breathed forth in the gentlest tone."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: New Month Mag., and in his Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

"This work is written in a pleasing style, and is a valuable accession to literary history."—Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1826.

"It cannot be denied that great accuracy is shown in assembling and weighing all the very minute circumstances from which their history must often be rather conjectured than inferred. It may appear singular that we, in this speculative part of the island, should consider the digressions from biography, and the passages of general speculation, as the part of the work which might, with the greatest advantage, be retrenched. But they are certainly episodes too large for the action, and have sometimes the air of openings of chapters in an intended history of England. These two faults, of digressions too expanded, and details too minute, are the principal defects of the volume; which must be considered hereafter as a necessary part of all collections respecting the biography of Milton."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Edin. Rev., xxv. 485-501, and in his Miscell. Works.

17. Letters of Verax to the Morning Chronicle, on the assumed grounds of the present War, 1815. 18. Mandeville; a Tale of the 17th century, Edin., 1817, 3 vols. 12mo. This work was written in accordance with a contract made with Constable, the bookseller, in 1816, when Godwin paid a visit to Edinburgh.

"Mandeville has all the power of its author's earliest writings, but its main subject—the development of an engrossing and maddening hatred—is not one which can excite human sympathy. There is, however, a bright relief to the gloom of the picture, in the angelic disposition of Clifford, and the sparkling loveliness of Henrietta, who appears 'full of life, and splendour, and joy.'"—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: New Month Mag., and Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

"His St. Leon and his Mandeville are ten degrees darker than his Falkland: in the latter, there are many ties to connect us with truth and nature, and we go on—as the sailors keep by a sinking vessel—in the hope that all must be righted soon. Mandeville is one of those unhappy persons whose minds are never so free from the storms of passion as to be fully rational, and yet cannot save in fits of fury, be considered wholly mad."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"This is, in our opinion, a very dull novel and a very clever book. . . . We are therefore obliged to pronounce this work intolerably tedious and disgusting, though its author has proved himself intimately skilled in the perversity of the human mind, and in all the blackest and most horrible passions of the human breast."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xviii. 176-177.

"The language of Mandeville is throughout nervous and manly. It has indeed many affectations; but these, as has always been the case in the writings of Godwin, vanish whenever he grapples with violent emotions. He is at home in the very whirlwind of terrors, and seems to breathe with the greatest freedom in the most tempestuous atmosphere."

"Like his other novels, it contains an important lesson, forcibly inculcated—it shows the futility and misery of a jealous, sullen, aspiring mind, that makes great claims on the world, without proper efforts to justify or enforce them."—W. PHILLIPS: N. Amer. Rev., vii. 92-105.

"The announcement of a new work of fiction by the author of Caleb Williams was enough to send the reading world distraught; but Mandeville did not answer its expectations, and is as much inferior to his former efforts."—Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1826.

noticed, and dissertations on the respective theories of Godwin and Malthus, in the Lon. Quar. Rev., xxvi. 148; Edin. Rev., xxxv. 362. See also notices of Godwin's work in the Edin. Month. Rev., v. 535; Lon. Month. Rev., xciv. 113. 20. History of the Commonwealth of England from the Commencement to the Restoration of Charles II., 1824, '25, '26, '27, '28, 4 vols. 8vo.

"During the progress of this history the author has derived an invaluable accession of authorities from the records of the proceedings of the Long Parliament, which, owing to the researches of Mr. Lennon, have been recently discovered in the State Paper Office. These documents, and the collection of Commonwealth Tracts given by George III. to the British Museum, have enabled Mr. Godwin to throw much new light upon the general history of the time, and especially to clear up certain mysterious and controverted points connected with the early transactions of the regicides."—Official advertisement at the time of publication.

"We cannot take leave of Mr. Godwin without expressing our gratitude to him for the new and correct lights he has thrown upon a page of history hitherto too much blotted by malice, and blurred and garbled by hostility. We rise from such a work with thoughts and feelings instructed and refined—instructed by its correct views and laborious research, and refined by the proofs it exhibits of the suavity and temperance, as well as unbending justice and principle, of the writer."—Lon. Critical Gazette.

So much for one side of the picture: now for the other: "The pains and extensive research evidently bestowed in the construction of these volumes, might have placed Godwin's name high as an historian of his country, had they not been tinged with a partial and democratic colouring, which must ever detract from the character and value of his work."—Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1836.

We are almost inclined to suspect some difference of politics between the two last quoted authorities.

But, whatever may be thought of Mr. Godwin's politics, his research and excellence of arrangement have elicited the following commendation from one of the most eminent of living critics:

"In the original ordinance the members of both houses were excluded during the war; but in the second, which was carried, the measure was not made prospective. This, which most historians have overlooked is well pointed out by Mr. Godwin."—Italian's Constitutional Hist. of Eng., 7th ed., 1854, p. 181, n.

"Mr. Godwin's History of the Commonwealth, a work in which great attention has been paid to the order of time."—Ibid., p. 196, n.

"Mr. Godwin has published a work which must be considered as the defence of the Republican party. . . . It should by all means be read; it is always interesting, and sometimes contains anecdotes and passages that are curious and striking—Godwin is always a powerful writer—and, above all, it is the statement of the case of the Republicans. But, on the whole, in these volumes of Godwin there is no sufficient instruction given of the religious hypocrisy and cant of the Presbyterians first, or of the Independents and Cromwell afterwards. The history is an effort in favour of the Republicans of those times, founded on the paramount merit of a republic at all times. It is also very nearly a panegyric of Cromwell—certainly, in so far as regard for the Republicans admitted."—Prof. Swayne's Lectures on Med. Hist.

"It is a political counterpart of that of Lord Clarendon; for the writer was of the radical school of politics, and of the atheistic school of philosophy."—CHANCELOR KENT.

22. Thoughts on Man; his Nature, Productions, and Discoveries. Interspersed with some Particulars respecting the Author, 1831, 8vo.

"The result of the thirty years' meditations of the Author of the Inquiry into Political Justice are well entitled to consideration. Sound reason and humane principles form the essence of this excellent volume; which, being the production of a thinking man, will be a fountain for thoughts in all his readers."—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

"A series of essays in the style and manner of his earlier works—full as irrelevant and almost equally as noxious; like the serpent, venomous, but enticing."—Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1836.

23. Lives of the Necromancers, 1834, 8vo.

"With every disposition to speak favourably of this production, we must acknowledge that an authentic history of Necromancy, and a faithful biography of its votaries, still remain a desideratum in our literature. A writer of patient research, and possessed of a competent knowledge of physics and chemistry, is alone capable of doing justice to the subject. . . . On the first perusal of Mr. Godwin's volume, we were disposed to quarrel with him on account of its irreligious character. It is enough, however, to have guarded our young readers against the snare which is laid for them. Religion is founded on far surer a basis to be thus shaken; and we might as well assail the truths of Animal Magnetism, as attempt to discredit Christianity because some of its professors believed in sorcery and practised magic."—Edin. Rev., ix. 37-54.

The Lives of the Necromancers was Mr. Godwin's last production. In addition to the twenty-three works which have come under our notice, he also wrote a number of minor educational and other juvenile works, when a bookseller,—about 1804, and the few following years,—under the assumed name of Edward Baldwin. Mr. Godwin was, indeed, a voluminous author, and it is a sad reflection, that of one so capable of benefiting the world by his talents, the condemnatory verdict should be recorded that,

"In weighing well his merits with his moral imperfections, it is melancholy to discover how far the latter preponderated, and we are led to the very painful though certain conclusion, that it might have been better for mankind had he never existed. . . . Eccentric notions are alluring, and the wildest theories are too often mistaken for the grandest and the deepest. The opinions maintained by Mr. Godwin, on the existing state of society and actions of mankind, are sour and unhealthy. Pride was the basis and the root of his philosophy. . . . As a novelist Mr. Godwin is to all intents original; he has taken no model but has been himself a model to the million. He heads that voluminous class of writers whose chief, nay whose only, aim is to excite the painful sensibilities by displaying, in a rigid depth of colouring, the darkest and the blackest passions which corrupt mankind. But his novels have not the moral effect of Hogarth's pictures, which reform vice by holding it to view; they rather contaminate the young and eager, by familiarising them with scenes and characters which it would be better that they never knew even in works of fiction, however artfully glossed over."—Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1836.

Godwin, William, Jr., d. of cholera in 1832, only child of the preceding by his second wife, was a parliamentary reporter, and contributed a number of papers to the periodicals of the day. He left in MS. a novel pub. by his father in 3 vols. p. 8vo, entitled Transfusion.

His melancholy fate is a warning to all bachelors:

"Taking to wife a meek Nantippe, the widow of his predecessor, notwithstanding he had always before professed himself an enemy to the female sex, and was esteemed by many another Joseph Swetnam, he was so much overtop'd by her and her children which she had by her former husband, that his life being much shortened thereby, he died at length in a manner heart-broken."—*Athen. Golding, Arthur, a poet and translator, of the 16th century, a native of London, was patronized by Sir Philip Sidney, secretary to Lord Cobham and other leading characters of the day. He completed a trans. of Mornay's Trewnesse of the Christian Religion, commenced by Sir Philip Sidney; and made translations from Calvin, Chytraeus, Beza, Marlorat, Hemingius, Justin, Cæsar, &c. His best-known trans. is that of Ovid's Metamorphoses; The first four books, 1565; The XV. Books, 1575, '87, 1603, '12; all in black letter, 4to.

"His style is poetical and spirited, and his versification clear; his manner ornamented and diffuse, yet with a sufficient observance of the original. On the whole, I think him a better poet than Phædrus. . . . Ovid's Metamorphoses, just translated by Golding, to instance no further, disclosed a new world of fiction, even to the illiterate. . . . I think his only original work is an account of an Earthquake in 15 O. [pub. 1580, 8vo.] Of his original poetry I recollect nothing more than an encomiastic copy of verses prefixed to Baret's Alveare, published in 1580. It may be regretted that he gave so much time to translations."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

An ancient critic ranks Richard Edwards with Phædrus, Haywood, Nevile, Googe, and our author, Golding:—

Puttenham, in his Arte of English Poesie, in his criticisms on contemporary English poets, commends

"Phædrus and Golding for a learned and well-connected verse, specially in translation, clear, and very faithfully answering their author's intent."

"The translations of ancient poets by Phædrus, Golding, Stanyhurst, and several more, do not challenge our attention: most of them, in fact, being very wretched performances."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

Golding thus feelingly complains of the innovations which were changing the character of the English tongue in his day:

"Our English tongue is driven almost out of kind,
Dismember'd, hack'd, maim'd, rent, and torn,
Defaced, patch'd, marr'd, and made in scorn."

Goldsmith, Oliver, November 10, 1728-April 4, 1774, one of the most distinguished ornaments of English literature, was a native of the village of Pallas, Pallice, or Pallasmore, in Leinster, Ireland, county of Longford, 1½ miles S. E. of Ballymahon. The character of his excellent father—the Rev. Charles Goldsmith, a clergyman of the Established Church, holding the living of Kilkenny West—has been so well described by his son in the characters of The Man in Black in The Citizen of the World, The Preacher in the Deserted Village, and Doctor Primrose in the Vicar of Wakefield, that no other portraiture can be needed nor should be tolerated. The good man lived to see five sons and two daughters surrounding the family board before he was called to his rest, which event occurred in the year 1740. His son Henry followed his calling, and his example and his virtues have been commemorated, in lines which the world will never "let die," by the same pen which depicted the amiable characteristics of the "Village Preacher." He who can peruse without emotion the impassioned burst of fervent gratitude and tender remembrance with which the houseless wanderer celebrates his brother's kindness and his brother's peaceful home has but little claim to the better feelings of our nature:—

"Remote, unfriended, melancholy, slow,
Or by the lazy Scheldt, or wandering Po;
Or onward, where the rude Carinthian boor
Against the houseless stranger shuts the door;
Or where Campania's plain forsaken lies,
A weary waste expanding to the skies;
Where'er I roam, whatever realms to see,
My heart, untravell'd, fondly turns to thee.
Still to my brother turns with ceaseless pain,
And drags at each remove a length'ning chain.
Eternal blessings crown my earliest friend,
And round his dwelling guardian spirits attend!
Blest be that spot where cheerful guests retire
To pause from toil, and trim the evening fire;
Blest that abode, where want and pain repair,
And ev'ry stranger finds a ready chair;
Blest be those feasts, with simple plenty crown'd,
Where all the ruddy family around
Laugh at the jests or pranks that never fail,
Or sigh with pity at some mournful tale;
Or press the lashful stranger to his food,
And learn the luxury of doing good.
But me, not destin'd such delights to share,
My prime of life in wand'ring spent and care,
Impell'd with steps unceasing to pursue
Some fleeting good, that mocks me with the view;
That, like the circle bounding earth and skies,
Allures from far, yet, as I follow, flies;
My fortune leads to traverse realms alone,
And find no spot of all the world my own."

The Traveller.

If we have somewhat anticipated our story by the quotation of the beautiful lines just cited, we shall be readily forgiven. Perhaps there could be no better introduction to a biography of Oliver Goldsmith. The warmth of his affections, the tenderness of his heart, his roving propensities and vacillation of mind, are all here presented to the reader in the poet's happiest and most graphic style.

At the age of six years Oliver was placed under charge of the village schoolmaster, Thomas Byrne, a retired quartermaster of an Irish regiment, who seems to have expended many of the hours which should have been devoted to instruction, in recitals of military adventures, in which the narrator himself had borne no obscure and un-honoured share. We do not find, however, that his youthful auditors—the future village Cromwells of the school—ever seriously complained of this want of faithfulness upon the part of their military preceptor. With a keenness of perception and politic wisdom which would not have disgraced practised courtiers, the subjects of this despotic ruler seem to have carefully studied his character and adapted their deportment to his changing mood :

“ Well had the hoding tremblers learned to trace
The day's disasters in his morning face;
Full well they laughed with counterfeit glee
At all his jokes, for many a joke had he;
Full well the busy whisper, circling round,
Convey'd the dismal tidings when he frown'd.”

Little Oliver was interrupted in his studies under Mr. Byrne by an attack of the small-pox, the signature of which he bore legibly inscribed on his face for the rest of his life. Upon his recovery, he was placed at school, first at Elphin, in Roscommon, then at Athlone, and subsequently at Edgeworthstown. It was whilst attending the seminary at Elphin, boarding meanwhile at his uncle's, John Goldsmith, that he displayed his juvenile wit by a celebrated epigram, which has been carefully preserved by all the poet's biographers. During an evening party at his uncle's, when the guests were engaged in the mazes of the dance, Oliver,—then only nine years old,—disposed to contribute his share to the amusements of the evening, undertook the execution of a hornpipe, which was probably performed with more zeal than elegance. The musician of the party, who was more forcibly impressed with the awkward form and pitted face of the juvenile Athlete than with his Terpsichorean proficiency, raised a laugh at his expense by calling him his little Æsop. But Oliver soon turned the laugh upon his assailant by the retort :

“ Our herald hath proclaimed this saying,
See Æsop dancing, and his munny playing.”

A large portion of the expenses of Oliver's early education was defrayed by his kind-hearted uncle, the Rev. Thomas Contarine, who was at all times one of his most devoted and generous friends.

On the 11th of June, 1745, Oliver entered Trinity College, Dublin, as a sizar, under the tutorage of the Rev. Theaker Wilder, from whose petty tyranny the youth suffered so acutely that at times his life was an almost intolerable burden. In our life of Edmund Burke we have noticed the fact that he was a contemporary at college with the subject of the present article. The poor sizar did not display either that genius or that application which gains collegiate distinctions, but he was so fortunate on one occasion as to secure one of the minor prizes, the value in money of which was about thirty shillings.

“ This turn of success and sudden influx of wealth proved too much for the head of our poor student. He forthwith gave a supper and dance at his chamber to a number of young persons of both sexes from the city, in direct violation of college rules. The unwonted sound of the fiddle reached the ears of the implacable Wilder. He rushed to the scene of unhallowed festivity, inflicted corporal chastisement on the ‘ father of the feast,’ and turned his astonished guests neck and heels out of doors.”—Ireling's Life of Goldsmith.

Mortified beyond measure at this inglorious termination to the evening's festivities, and ashamed to meet either the companions of his studies or of his feasts, Goldsmith left college the next day in a state of high disgust, determined to seek his fortunes in some land “ beyond the flood,” where he might hope to prosper by the exercise of his industry or of his wits. He lingered in Dublin until all his money was spent save a solitary shilling, and, when that was gone, several of his garments followed, until, at last, hungry and half-naked, he was saved from starvation, when on his way to Cork, by a handful of gray peas given him by a country-girl at a wake. He never forgot his humble benefactor. Poor fellow! he had fasted for twenty-four hours when this seasonable relief was accorded to him; and long afterwards, when applauded in the world of fashion and an honoured guest at great men's feasts, he declared to Sir Joshua Reynolds that of all the exquisite meats he had ever tasted that handful of gray peas was the most delicious.

By the kind offices of his brother Henry, he was again placed at college, where he remained for nearly two years longer. Feb. 27, 1749, he was made Bachelor of Arts, and turned his back upon his Alma Mater without the loss of many tears. It was now incumbent on him to select a profession, and he was induced by his kind but injudicious uncle Contarine to become an applicant for holy orders. The two years of probation were passed in a desultory manner, often in amusements not altogether of the most clerical character; and when, at the age of twenty-three, the candidate passed in review under the scrutinizing eye of the Bishop of Elphin, he was promptly rejected :

“ He was intended for the church and went to the Bishop of Elphin to be examined for orders, but, appearing in a pair of scarlet breeches, he was rejected.”—Dr. A. Steerin's Letter.

But other reasons are urged for the prelate's rejection of the application. His sister tells us that the bishop thought him too young; another version is that his habits were known to be unsuited to the gravity of the profession to which he sought admittance. Certain it is that the church lost nothing by the bishop's refusal. It is possible to weaken an army by increasing its numbers; and such a clergyman as Goldsmith would in all probability have proved would have done little to advance the cause which he professed to espouse. The candidate was not heart-broken by the bishop's decision :

Good old Uncle Contarine was sadly disappointed, but relaxed nothing in his efforts to serve his wayward nephew. He soon procured him employment as a tutor in the family of Mr. Flinn; but this situation was lost in consequence of a quarrel between the preceptor and one of the family over a game of cards. Oliver left Mr. Flinn's with what seemed to him an almost fabulous amount of money—no less than thirty pounds; but even this amount, vast as it was, was not proof against the repeated demands to which the owner subjected it, and in six weeks he returned to his mother's house at Ballymahon without a shilling in his pocket, and on the back of a steel of much humbler appearance than the one which shortly before carried in triumph the happy owner of thirty pounds sterling. Part of this sum, indeed, had been expended in the purchase of a passage to America; but, as the passenger was on an excursion in the country when the wind served in the harbour of Cork, the captain “ never inquired after him, but set sail with as much indifference as if he had been on board.”

How much depended upon that country excursion! What would have been the history of the author of the Vicar of Wakefield and the Deserted Village had he landed, a friendless stranger, on the shores of America? In all probability the world would never have seen these immortal productions; and Oliver Goldsmith, a Revolutionary leader, might have shed his blood at Bunker Hill, or a Western planter, in the enjoyment of a hale old age, have nursed on his knee his children of the third generation.

We have often thought that a most interesting narrative might be compiled of the real and supposed lives of the afterwards great men who at one time or other intended settling in America. As a colonist, Cromwell, “ guiltless of his country's blood,” would have passed his days in the useful pursuits of agriculture or commerce; and Edmund Burke would have contributed to the legislative sagacity and oratorical splendour which so proudly distinguished the first American Congress. John Hampden would not have been stigmatized by the great Clarendon as the modern Cinna; and the ruthless ambition of a Bonaparte would have been resisted by a spirit mightier than his own. But these are speculations: let us return to facts. What should be done now for the improvident youth who had already so sadly disappointed those who had striven beyond their means to advance his fortunes?

To be discouraged in his efforts for poor Oliver belonged not to the kind-hearted Contarine. If Oliver would be neither a clergyman nor a tutor, the law was still open, and here his abilities would at once command success. To plan and to do was the same with the good man; and he soon had nearly the sum of fifty pounds,—a large sum for his circumstances,—which he placed in Oliver's hands and dismissed him with his benediction. With this capital the young man must manage until he had secured a footing which should place him in a position to earn his own bread. But, alas! the attractions of a gaming-table were too strong for his virtue; he was persuaded to risk his whole capital, with the encouragement that it would be doubled; but, as might have been anticipated, his money, with the exception of a few shillings, passed into the possession of his dangerous acquaintances, and he was again a ruined man.

Goldsmith's mental agony was now indeed great. How unworthy had he proved himself of the kindness of his friends, especially of that uncle and brother who had strengthened him with words of good cheer when all others had lost faith in his resolutions and his promises! But offences repeated “ seventy times seven” would not have exhausted the fount of tenderness which yearned in the heart of that good uncle towards the repentant prodigal. "When he was yet a great way off," he was ready to run forth to meet him, to "fall on his neck," and again "kill for him the fatted calf." He took him in his own house, made him exhibit his talents in the long winter evenings by literary discussions, and, when his duties called him away, was delighted to see his daughter turn entertainer to the poor outcast, and join the music of her harpsichord to the notes of his flute. Not satisfied with this, he again anxiously considered how he could best promote his advancement in the world; and a hint which fell from the great man of the family—Dean Goldsmith, of Cloyne, then on a visit to the worthy pastor—was sufficient to cause him again to tax his narrow purse for further supplies for Oliver.

If neither the Church, the tutor's chair, nor the bar, were to afford a field for the exercise of his nephew's abilities, he should be a doctor of medicine! Many had attained a large and profitable practice who had started as late in life as Oliver: why could not Oliver do the same? At least, the experiment should be tried. Behold, then, our adventurer again starting, in the autumn of 1752, to try his fortune in the world.

Arrived in Edinburgh, he soon became famous in the social circles of that city as a teller of good stories and singer of Irish songs. But his eighteen months of residence here were not thrown away. He was too apt a scholar to be unprofitable by the excellent lectures to which he listened and the chemical experiments in which he took a part.

He now determined to visit the continent, that he might enjoy opportunities of completing his medical studies and gratify a taste for travelling, which was one of his strongest propensities. Uncle Contarine's purse was always ready, and to it the student again had recourse. Yet it is to be recorded, to his credit, that his economy was stringent, that his applications might be as few and as moderate as it was possible to make them. His gratitude, too, to his generous benefactor was deep and unfeigned:

"Let me acknowledge," he writes to him, when advising him of intended absence. "the humility of the station in which you found me; let me tell you how I was despised by most and hateful to myself. Poverty, hopeless poverty, was my lot, and melancholy was beginning to make me her own. When you . . ."
 "Thou best of men," he exclaims in another letter, written from Leyden, "may Heaven guard and preserve you and those you love!"

With this benediction, so richly deserved, we may take our leave of good Uncle Contarine, who breathed his last before his nephew, whom he had so dearly loved and for whom he had done so much, had attained that celebrity and prosperous fortune which no one would have rejoiced in more than himself. May the memory of that good man ever be fresh in the world's history!

Arrived at Leyden, Goldsmith seems to have devoted some attention to the pursuit of knowledge, gaining, meanwhile, a precarious subsistence by acting as tutor, and sometimes winning, but generally losing, by the gaming-table. In February, 1755, he left Leyden for the purpose of travelling on foot through Europe. His wardrobe, furniture, and finances, amounted exactly to "a guinea in his pocket, a shirt on his back, and a flute in his hand."

The manner in which he "disputed his way through Europe" by accepting university challenges, and gained many a night's lodging by the notes of his flute, are too well known, and have been too beautifully described by himself, to justify us in dwelling upon them here:

"Whenever I approached a peasant's house towards nightfall, I played one of my most merry tunes, and that procured me not only a lodging, but subsistence for the next day."—Vicar of Wakefield.

"Gay, sprightly land of mirth and social ease,
 Pleas'd with thyself, whom all the world can please,
 How often have I led thy sportive choir
 With tuneless pipe beside the murmuring Loire!
 Where shading elms along the margin grew,
 And, freshen'd from the wave, the zephyr flew:
 And haply, though my harsh touch, faltering still,
 But mock'd all tune, and marr'd the dancers' skill,
 Yet would the village praise my wondrous power,
 And dance, forgetful of the noon-tide hour."—The Traveller.

Whilst abroad, either at Padua or at Louvain, he took his degree of Bachelor of Medicine. On the 1st of February, 1756, Goldsmith landed at Dover, wiser in experience, but more destitute in pocket, than at any former period of his life. He made his way to London; and here starvation stared him in the face. In vain he begged for a situation as a compounder of prescriptions or as an errand-boy among the London apothecaries; no one would employ an assistant who could give no references. At last he obtained a situation as shop-tender with a chemist of the name of Jacob, where he remained until, by the aid of an old fellow-student,—Dr. Sleight,—he was enabled to set up, in an humble way, as a physician among the poorer classes. Prosperity did not smile upon his new vocation, but incidentally it opened the way to a better business.

He had a patient—a printer's workman—who had perception enough to discern that the doctor was himself the victim of a terrible malady—nothing less than consuming, soul-corroding poverty. The poor man had learned benevolence of his employer. He told Goldsmith that his master had a kind heart, and before this had relieved distress;—would he not let him speak a word for him? The kind offices of his humble patient were not in vain; and behold the quondam physician installed as reader and corrector of the press to Samuel Richardson, the author of "Clarissa."

About the beginning of 1757, (unless we adopt the earlier date assigned by Mr. Allport,) he obtained a situation as usher in the academy of Dr. Milner, at Peckham, and was still in this humble employment—the mortification of which he has so well described in the person of George Primrose—when he was engaged by Griffiths as a stated contributor to The Monthly Review. An agreement was made for one year, and Goldsmith moved his scanty wardrobe to the house of Mr. and Mrs. Griffiths. It is not without reason that we mention the latter; she was quite as much master of the house as her husband was, and ruled the poor contributor with so despotic a sway that at the end of five months he was glad to cancel his engagement.

From this time until the appearance of his first work of any pretensions, with the exception of another trial at ushership in Dr. Milner's school, Goldsmith earned a scanty subsistence as a hack-writer, with a ready pen always at the disposal of those who were able to pay a few shillings or a few pounds, as it might be, for the desired article. A Life of Voltaire and an unfinished tragedy are among the labours of this period. The disappointment of his hopes of a lucrative medical post at Coramandel, and his rejection by the College of Surgeons, added to the bitterness of his melancholy lot.

The Inquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe was pub. by Dodsley in April, 1759, 12mo. It appeared without the writer's name, but the authorship was no secret. Keurick's savage attack upon the new work was worthy of the base character of the man. The Inquiry was not without merit, though perhaps not entitled to the unqualified commendation of the learned. To quote the language of one of the author's late biographers:—

"In the present day, when the whole field of contemporary literature is so widely surveyed and amply discussed, and when the current productions of every country are constantly collated and ably criticised, a treatise like that of Goldsmith would be considered as extremely limited and unsatisfactory; but at that time it possessed novelty in its views and wideness in its scope, and, being indued with the peculiar charm of style inseparable from the author, it commanded public attention and a profitable sale."—Irvine's Life of Goldsmith.

Goldsmith's next literary undertaking was The Bee, a weekly periodical, pub. on Saturdays, the first number of which appeared on the 6th of October, 1759, and the eighth and last on the 29th of November. It possessed excellence of no ordinary character, but failed to command support.

On the 12th of January, 1760, Mr. Newbery, the famous publisher of children's books, commenced the publication of The Public Ledger, and Goldsmith contributed to it his celebrated Chinese Letters, which were collected and repub. by Newbery, at the close of 1760, in 2 vols. 12mo, under the title of The Citizen of the World; or, Letters from a Chinese Philosopher residing in London, to his friends in the East. They were commended by the British Magazine as "light, agreeable summer reading;" and even Keurick was forced by Griffiths to make an awkward apology for his brutal attack on the "Inquiry" and its author, and commended the Chinese Letters in high terms. Some opinions upon the merits of this work will be found on a later page. The reputation of his new work caused publishers to seek the aid of the author in various undertakings, and the editorship of The Lady's Magazine, contributions to The British Magazine, prefaces to a number of works, a revision of a History of Mecklenburg, Newbery's Art of Poetry, Compendium of Biography, and a Life of Beau Nash, were among the literary labours that replenished the exhausted coffers of The Citizen of the World. On the 31st of May, 1761, an event of no ordinary interest occurred to the now rising author. This was his introduction to Dr. Johnson, "The Great Cham of Literature," through the good offices of Dr. Percy, afterwards Bishop of Dromore. The strong attachment which the lexicographer at once formed for Goldsmith, notwithstanding his faults and foibles, and the friendly aid which he afforded him by the disposal of The Vicar of Wakefield, are pleasing incidents in the lives of these two truly great men. The noctes ambrosiæ of the Literary Club were now partaken of by Goldsmith, and he found himself the associate of men whom heretofore he had long worshipped at a distance. Still busily employed with his pen, we find him engaged on a revision of a Description of Millerium Halland of Dr. Brookes's System of Natural History, additions to the Wonders of Nature and Art, contributions to The Martial Review or General History of the late War, to the Critical and Monthly Magazines, prefaces to Universal History and several other works, and a compilation entitled A History of England, in a series of Letters from a Nobleman to his Son. This has passed through many edits, in English, been trans. into French, and was confidently attributed to Lord Chesterfield, Lord Orrery, and especially to Lord Lyttelton. Among his many literary projects which were never executed may be mentioned one, the title of which interests us not a little: A Chronological History of the Lives of Eminent Persons in Great Britain and Ireland. This book would doubtless have been one of the most charming in style and inaccurate in statement, one of the most delightful companions and unsafe guides, in the language. It was to be comprised in two octavo vols. of thirty-five sheets each, to be paid for at the rate of three guineas a sheet, and to be furnished in two years. But—for Dodsley well knew the habits of authors—the publisher stipulated that he should be subjected to no advance until the work was completed. This was enough to seal its fate with Goldsmith.

He sent a proposition to Tonson to prepare for him a new edition of the works of Pope. Tonson—not always the most amiable of mortals—returned an impertinent answer, and the disappointed author vented his indignation by immediately inflicting a caning upon Tonson's unhappy messenger.

It was in 1764 that the well-known incident just referred to occurred,—an incident so graphically described by Dr. Johnson himself, 'that we cannot do better than quote his own language:

"I received one morning a message from poor Goldsmith that he was in great distress, and, as it was not in his power to come to me, begging that I would come to him as soon as possible. I sent him a guinea, and I promised to come to him directly. I accordingly went as soon as I was dressed, and found that his landlady had arrested him for his rent, at which he was in a violent passion. I perceived that he had already changed my guinea, and had got a bottle of mad-ira and a glass before him. I put the cork into the bottle, desired he would be calm, and began to talk to him of the means by which he might be extricated. He then told me he had a novel ready for the press, which he produced to me. I looked into it, and saw its merit; told the landlady I should soon return; and, having gone to a bookseller, sold it for sixty pounds. I brought Goldsmith the money, and he discharged his rent, not without rating his landlady in a high tone for having used him so ill."—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

On the day of the sale of The Vicar of Wakefield, the Traveller received the last touches of the author. Johnson had greater hopes of the success of the poem than of the novel; he read the proof-sheets, substituted here and there a line of his own, (only nine verses in all,) and immediately prepared for it a warm reception, through the medium of the Critical Review, in a notice of his own composition.

It was published—the first production which bore his name—December 19, 1764, and dedicated to his brother Henry, to whom eighty of the last lines in it had been dispatched in a letter many years before, when the author was a "houseless stranger" in a foreign land. The lines inserted by Johnson were the one which now stands 420th in the poem, and, omitting the last couplet but one, the eight concluding lines.

The success of The Traveller was decided and immediate among the wits, but some time elapsed before it became a favourite with the public at large. Johnson pronounced it "a poem to which it would not be easy to find any thing equal since the days of Pope." The lexicographer read it aloud to Miss Reynolds, and the lady—who had recently roasted Goldsmith as the ugliest man of her acquaintance—declared that she should never again think him ugly.

"There is not a bad line in that poem of the Traveller," said Langton, as they sat talking at Reynolds's four years after the poet's death; "not one of Dryden's careless verses." I was glad, interposed Reynolds, "to hear Charles Fox say it was one of the first poems in the English language." "Why was you glad?" rejoined Langton; "you surely had no doubt of this before?" "No," exclaimed Johnson, decisively, "the merit of The Traveller is so well established, that Mr. Fox's praise cannot augment it, nor his censure diminish it."

Two months after its publication, the St. James's Chronicle, the leading literary paper of the time, remarked:

"The beauties of this poem are so great and various, that we cannot but be surprised they have not been able to recommend it to more general notice."

A month after this notice, a second edition appeared; the third soon followed, a fourth was issued in August, and the ninth appeared in the year of the author's death.

We have no evidence that Goldsmith received more than twenty guineas from the publisher, the elder Newbery. But the author felt that his reputation was on the ascendant, and he ventured to leave his own quarters in Wine-Office Court and removed to chambers on the library staircase of the Temple. Johnson paid him a visit shortly afterwards, and inspected the new apartments rather closely; which induced Goldsmith to exclaim, "I shall soon be in better chambers, sir, than these." "Nay, nay, sir," responded Johnson; "never mind that: Nil te extra questeris extra." Poor Goldsmith! did he remember then the miseries of Green Arbour Court, which have been so graphically described by Washington Irving in his Tales of a Traveller? We shall reserve for a later page some commendatory notices of this beautiful poem. In 1765, a number of his contributions to periodicals were pub. under the title of Essays by Mr. Goldsmith. Many of them had long been favourites with the public, (though their authorship was not generally known,) had been reprinted many times, and claimed by several who had no title to them. This volume paid the author a profit of twenty guineas only; it however extended his reputation, was trans. into French, and is still a favourite with the public.

It was at this period, also, that he wrote the beautiful ballad of Edwin and Angelina.

"Without interfering any of us [at the Club] he wrote and addressed to the Countess. afterwards Duchess of Northumberland, one of the first poems of the lyric kind that our language has to boast of."—Dr. JOHN HAWKINS.

Whether Goldsmith was really the author of a famous biography which appeared in this year, of less pretensions, but equal notoriety, with The Hermit,—the story of Goody Two Shoes,—we shall not pause to discuss.

Towards the close of this year he received from Newbery the respectable sum—judging by his former receipts—of sixty guineas for A Survey of Experimental Philosophy considered in its Present State of Improvement. He was engaged in the completion of this work in the year of his death, and it was pub. in 1776, 2 vols. 8vo. It should not be forgotten that at this period he essayed for a brief season to resume the practice of physic; but the experiment proved both unprofitable and unpalatable, and was soon abandoned. At last appeared, March 27, 1766, eighteen months after its memorable sale to Newbery the younger, the novel of The Vicar of Wakefield. The wits and critics were this time behind the public in their acclamations. In about two months a second edition was demanded; three months later the third appeared, and the sixth was pub. in the year of the author's death. This charming tale will be noticed more at large on a subsequent page. We have now reached a point in the literary history of Goldsmith when we may be permitted to take a rapid survey of the labours which employed his pen from the time of the publication of the Vicar of Wakefield until his death. For detailed information concerning these publications and their author, we must refer the reader to the sources to which every biographer of Goldsmith must acknowledge his obligations—the biographies of Percy, Brydges, Mitford, Scott, Prior, Forster, and Irving.

1766: Poems for Young Ladies, 12mo.

"A respectable selection of pieces, chiefly from Parnell, Pope, Thomson, Addison, and Collins, with additions of less importance from less eminent hands, and some of the occasional verses of his friend Robert Nugent."

For this compilation he received ten guineas; and for writing a "Short English Grammar" had but half that sum.

1767: Beauties of English Poesy, 2 vols. 12mo.

In this selection, for which he received fifty pounds, appeared two pieces,—The Ladle and Hans Carvel,—which were not of a character to promote the general circulation of the work.

1768: The Good-Natured Man; a Comedy, 8vo. This was not successful on the stage, but sold so well that the whole of the first edition was taken on the second day. The author's profits on the stage and by its sale amounted to about £500.

"His two admirable Comedies of 'The Good-Natured Man' and 'She Stoops to Conquer' are the greenest spots in the dramatic waste of the period of which we are speaking. They are worthy of the author of 'The Vicar of Wakefield,' and to praise them more highly is impossible. Wit without licentiousness; Humour without extravagance; brilliant and elegant dialogue; and forcible but natural delineation of character, are the excellences with which his pages are prodigally strewn."—Henry Neele's Lects. on Eng Dramat. Poet.

"The best, as we think, of his dramatic efforts."—PROF. BUTLER: Gallery of Illust. Irishmen: Dubl. Univ. Mag., vii. 38.

1769: Roman History, 2 vols. Svo.

"Sir, it is the great excellence of a writer to put into his book as much as his book will hold. Goldsmith has done this in his history. . . . Goldsmith's abridgment is better than that of Lucius Florus or Eutropius; and I will venture to say, that if you compare him with Vertot, in the same places of the Roman History, you will find that he exceeds Vertot. Sir, he has the art of compiling and of saying every thing he has to say in a pleasing manner."—DR. JOHNSON: Boswell's Life.

"Goldsmith's Abridgments of the History of Rome and England may here be noticed. They are eminently well calculated to introduce youth to the knowledge of their studies; for they exhibit the most interesting and striking events, without entering into controversy or dry detail."—SIR WALTER SCOTT'S Life of Goldsmith.

"Goldsmith's brief and enchanting epitome of Roman History."—CRANFELLER RENT.

"Though a work written for bread, not fame, such is its ease, perspicuity, good sense, and the delightful simplicity of its style, that it was well received by the critics, commanded a prompt and extensive sale, and has ever since remained in the hands of young and old."—Irvine's Life of Goldsmith.

"Intended for the perusal of the young, and certainly written in an interesting manner, but almost always superficial and frequently inaccurate."—N. Amer. Rev.

Of the author's abridgment of his History of Rome there have been edits. edited by Cox, Davis, Dymock, Pinnock, Simpson, &c. It was in this year that he contracted with Griffin for his Natural History, or the History of the Earth and Animated Nature. See years 1772 and 1774.

1770: Life of Dr. Parnell, prefixed to an edit. of his poems pub. in this year, Svo.

"Goldsmith's Life of Parnell is poor; not that it is poorly written, but that he had poor materials; for nobody can write the life of a man but those who have eat and drunk and lived in social intercourse with him."—DR. JOHNSON: Boswell's Life.

Life of Lord Bolingbroke, originally prefixed to his Dissert. on Parties, repub. in this year, Svo; afterwards to Bolingbroke's Works. It was in this year that Goldsmith accompanied Mrs. Horneck and her two beautiful daughters—Little Comedy and the Jessamy Bride—to France. He was now in the height of his reputation,—for two months before he left London the town was thrown into raptures by the publication of The Deserted Village, a Poem, 4to. The 1st edit., pub. May 6, was immediately exhausted, and by the 16th of August the 5th edit. was pub. Previous to its publication the author received from the publisher a note for the price agreed upon,—one hundred guineas. A friend remarked to Goldsmith that it was a great price (five shillings a couplet) for so small a poem:

"In truth," said Goldsmith, "I think so too: it is much more than the honest man can afford, or the piece is worth. I have not been easy since I received it."

He therefore returned the note to the publisher, and desired him to pay him when it should be ascertained what the poem was worth.

We shall reserve the citation of opinions upon this poem—criticism is hardly a proper word for (with one exception) unmix'd and enthusiastic eulogy—for a later page.

But we must here refer the reader to Prior's Life of Goldsmith and Howitt's Homes and Haunts of Eminent British Poets for graphic descriptions of The Deserted Village—Lissoy—and to the article from a London periodical, on the same attractive theme, quoted in Irvine's Life of Goldsmith. In the London Gentleman's Magazine for June, 1838, pp. 592, 593, will be found an ingenious argument, by Mr. John Cunningham, in which it is asserted that Springfield, near Chelmsford, England, (and not Lissoy, in Ireland,) is entitled to the honours which pertain to the far-famed Deserted Village of Goldsmith.

We must not fail to commend that beautiful volume, The Deserted Village, illustrated by 80 designs by the Etching Club, Lon., 1841, imp. Svo. £5 5s.; coloumbier 4to. £5 5s.; portfolio; coloumbier fol., £10 10s.; proofs, £13 13s. This is generally considered the chef-d'œuvre of the Etching Club. It is the united production of some of the most eminent artists of the day, including Webster, Redgrave, Creswick, Cope, J. Bell, Horsley, F. Tayler, Townsend, and C. Stonehouse.

"No poem in the language perhaps holds out so many opportunities to the artist. The exquisite little gems with which it is so thickly studded are all wrought out in a spirit of graceful poetry worthy of the genius of GOLDSMITH, and, by the beauty and delicacy of their execution, carry us back to the 'olden time,' when the greatest luminaries of Painting were also the first among the ERETERS."

1771: The Haunch of Venison; a Poem, Svo. This was a poetical epistle, acknowledging the receipt of a Haunch of Venison from Lord Clare, with whom Goldsmith spent some time in the country.

"Written with no higher aim than mere pleasantry; a more delightful piece of humour, or a more finished piece of style, has probably been seldom written."—FORSTER: Life of Goldsmith.

"Some of the lines pleasantly set forth the embarrassment caused by the appearance of such an aristocratic delicacy in the humble kitchen of a poet, accustomed to look up to mutton as a treat."

"Thanks, my lord, for your venison, for finer or fatter Never rang'd in a forest, or smok'd in a platter."

WASHINGTON IRVING: Life of Goldsmith.

History of England from the earliest times to the Death of George II., 1771, 4 vols. Svo; 2d ed., 1774, 4 vols. Svo. Abridgt., 1774, Svo. This is an acknowledged compilation from Rapin, Carte, Smollett, and Hume,—

"Each of whom," says Goldsmith in the preface, "have their admirers, in proportion as the reader is studious of political anti-quoties, fond of minute anecdote, a warm partisan, or a deliberate reasoner."

The Whigs of course detected a smack of Tory doctrine in the new History, and charged the compiler with betraying the liberties of the people. Goldsmith's defence against the attack is very characteristic of the man,—may we not say characteristic of an author?

"I had no thought for or against liberty in my head; my whole aim being to make up a book of a decent size, and which, as Squire Richard says, would do harm to nobody."—Goldsmith's Letter to Langton.

"The history on the whole, however, was well received; some of the critics declared that English History had never before been so usefully, so elegantly and agreeably epitomized; and like his other historical writings, it has kept its ground in English literature."—WASHINGTON IRVING: Life of Goldsmith.

"As a historian Goldsmith accomplishes all at which he aims. He does not promise much, but he does more than he promises. He takes it is true, facts which had been already collected, but he shapes them with an art that is all his own."—HENRY GILES: Lectures and Essays.

See Boswell's Life of Johnson for the lexicographer's comparison between Robertson and Goldsmith as historians. For this work Davies paid Goldsmith £500. Of this history there have been numerous eds. and abridgt's., edited by Coote, Lynam, Morell, Rose, Wright, Bigland, Cox, Davis, Dymock, Kenny, Pinnock, Simpson, Stewart, &c.

1772: In this year he was employed upon his History of the Earth and Animated Nature, (Natural History, as it is sometimes called,) for which he had contracted with Griffin in 1769,—8 vols., at 100 guineas per vol. The work was commenced in 1769, but not prosecuted systematically. It was not finished and pub. until 1774. It was in this year also that he wrote the latest of the Essays in the collection which now bears that title; and at this period he abridged his Roman History, and wrote portions of a tale for Newbery but rejected by him, intended to be of the same character as The Vicar of Wakefield. For an account of the announcement in Paris of Histoire de François Willis, see the biographies of Goldsmith.

1773: She Stoops to Conquer; or, The Mistakes of a Night, Svo. The plot of this play and the incident upon which it is founded are so well known that we shall not repeat them. And who can forget Richard Cumberland's graphic account of the first performance and that laughing Adam Drummond, who had almost ruined the whole affair?

Cumberland must tell his own story, which, whether exaggerated or true to nature, is told with admirable effect:

"We were not over-sanguine of success, but perfectly determined to struggle hard for our author. We accordingly assembled our strength at the Shakespeare Tavern, in a considerable body, for an early dinner, where Samuel Johnson took the chair at the head of a long table, and was the life and soul of the corps. The poet took post silently by his side, with the Burkes, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Fitzherbert, Caleb Whiteford, and a phalanx of North British, predetermined applauders, under the banner of Major Mills, all good men and true. Our illustrious president was inimitable glee; and poor Goldsmith that day took all his railleury as patiently and complacently as my friend Boswell would have done any day or every day of his life. In the mean time, we did not forget our duty; and though we had a better comedy going, in which Johnson was chief actor, we betook ourselves in good time to our separate and allotted posts, and waited the awful drawing up of the curtain. As our stations were preconcerted, so were our signals for plaudits arranged and determined upon in a manner that gave every one his cue where to look for them and how to follow them up."

"We had among us a very worthy and efficient member, long since lost by his friends and the world at large, Adam Drummond, of amiable memory, who was gifted by nature with the most sonorous and at the same time the most contagious laugh that ever echoed from the human lungs. The neighing of the horse of the son of Hyastepus was a whisper to it: the whole thunder of the theatre could not drown it. This kind and ingenuous friend fairly forewarned us that he knew no more when to give his fire than the cannon did that was planted on a battery. He desired, therefore, to have a flapper at his elbow, and I had the honour to be deputed to that office. I planted him in an upper box, pretty nearly over the stage, in full view of the pit and galleries, and perfectly well situated to give the echo all its play through the hollows and recesses of the theatre. The success of our manoeuvre was complete. All eyes were upon Johnson, who sat in a front row of a side box; and when he laughed, everybody thought themselves warranted to roar. In the mean time, my friend followed signals with a rattle so irresistibly comic, that when he had repeated it several times, the attention of the spectators was so engrossed by his person and performances, that the progress of the play seemed likely to become a secondary object, and I found it prudent to insinuate to him that he might halt his music without any prejudice to the author. But alas! it was now too late to rein him in; he had laughed upon my signal where he found no joke, and now, unluckily, he fancied that he found a joke in almost every thing that was said; so that nothing in nature could be more mal-apropos than some of his bursts every now and then were. These were dangerous moments, for the pit began to take umbrage; but we carried our point through, and triumphed not only over Colman's judgment, but our own."

The illustrious president of this band of Goldsmith's friends—Samuel Johnson—thus records his judgment on She Stoops to Conquer:

"I know of no comedy for many years that has so much exhilarated an audience; that has answered so much the great end of comedy, making an audience merry."

Davies remarks that the success of this piece

"Revived fancy, wit, gaiety, humour, incident and character, in the place of sentiment and moral preaching."

Davies is too honest to pretend that "the theatre is the school of morals," as is often foolishly asserted. Undoubtedly the modern stage is most emphatically the school of vice, and we see not how it can consistently be countenanced by those who pretend to a regard for morals, or even ordinary decency. But upon this theme we have already discoursed at large in our life of Jeremy Collier, q. v.

But we had almost forgotten to cite an extract referring to this comedy from a letter of Dr. Johnson to the late Bishop White, for many years the venerable diocesan of the Episcopal Church in the State of Pennsylvania:

"Dr. Goldsmith has a new comedy in rehearsal at Covent Garden, to which the manager [Colman] predicts ill success. I hope he will be mistaken. I think it deserves a kind reception."—To the Rev. Mr. White, [at Philadelphia], March 4, 1773.

And this extract very naturally reminds us of Bishop (the Rev. Mr.) White's visit to Goldsmith in 1770. Many a fellow-citizen of our own will thank us for the good Bishop's account of this memorable visit; and we shall not withhold it:

"We lodged, for some time, near to one another, in Brick Court, of the Temple. I had it intimated to him, by an acquaintance of both, that I wished for the pleasure of making him a visit. It ensued; and in our conversation it took a turn which excited in me a painful sensation, from the circumstance that a man of such a genius should write for bread. His 'Deserted Village' came under notice; and some remarks were made by us on the principle of it—the decay of the peasantry. He said, that were he to write a pamphlet on the subject, he could prove the point incontrovertibly. On his being asked why he did not set his mind to this, his answer was: 'It is not worth my while. A good poem will bring me one hundred guineas; but the pamphlet would bring me nothing.' This was a short time before my leaving of England, and I saw the Doctor no more."

We need hardly say that the Bishop's reminiscences of Johnson are also exceedingly interesting.

But our readers will fear that we have entirely lost sight of She Stoops to Conquer:

"The dramatic powers of Goldsmith—for a restricted space warns us to leave a too seductive topic—were not perhaps of the very highest order. Yet his plays are a valuable accession to our stage literature. They do not fall below Cumberland or Cibber in plot or character, while they surpass the former in liveliness of humour, and the latter in preservation of decorum."—PROF. BUTLER: Gallery of Illust. Irishmen, Dubl. Univ. Mag., vii. 47.

"The plot turns on what may be termed a farcical incident—two parties mistaking a gentleman's house for an inn. But the excellent discrimination of character, and the humour and vivacity of the dialogue throughout the play, render this piece one of the richest contributions which have been made to modern comedy. The native pleasantry and originality of Goldsmith were never more happily displayed."

"As a dramatist, Goldsmith is amusing; and if to excite laughter be, as Johnson asserts it is, the chief end of comedy, Goldsmith attains it. His plots, however, are extravagant, and his personages are oddities rather than characters. Goldsmith's plays want the contrivance which belongs to highest art; but they have all those ingenious accidents that are notable for stage effect. They are, in fact, deficient in that insight which pertains only to great dramatic genius. . . . Both of them [The Good-Natured Man and She Stoops to Conquer] abound in drollery and strong touches of nature; but they do not give the author an exalted position among dramatists, and they do not promise that he could have reached it."—HENRY GILES: Lectures and Essays.

See also the criticisms under the head of The Good-Natured Man, year 1768. She Stoops to Conquer produced to the happy author a clear profit of no less than £800. In this year he projected the compilation of a Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, which was never executed. Cradock tells us that Goldsmith's Introduction to it was excellent.

1774; Grecian History, from the earliest State to the Death of Alexander the Great, 2 vols. 8vo.

"A most desirable abridgment, and may be put most safely into young persons' hands; combining beauty and ability, and so attractive as to hold children from their play."

"This work, although elegantly written, and highly calculated to attract and interest young readers, enters into no critical discussion of disputed points, and is superficial and inaccurate."

"It would be unjust to estimate Goldsmith by the History of Greece."—T. B. MACCULLY: see GLEG, GEORGE ROBERT.

This work has been abridged, and many edits. have appeared, edited by Coxe, Dymock, Pinnock, Prince, Simpson, &c.

Retaliation; a Poem: including Epitaphs on the most distinguished Wits of the Metropolis, with explanatory Observations, 4to. Reprinted with other pieces of the author, 1777, 4to. A number of mock epitaphs had been composed on Goldsmith, and Garrick's is preserved:

"Here lies poor Goldsmith, for shortness called Noll,
Who wrote like an angel but talk'd like Poor Poll."

Goldsmith was called on for Retaliation, and he took it.

"Retaliation had the effect of placing the author on a more equal footing with his society than he had ever before assumed."—SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The portraits of Garrick and Reynolds in this poem have excited especial admiration.

History of the Earth and Animated Nature, 8 vols. 8vo.

"It is to science what his abridgements are to history; a book which indicates no depth of research or accuracy of information, but which presents to the ordinary reader a general and interesting view of the subject, couched in the clearest and most beautiful language, and abounding with excellent reflections and illustrations. It was of this work that Johnson threw out the remark which he afterwards introduced in his friend's epitaph.—'He is now writing a Natural History, and will make it as agreeable as a Persian tale.'"—SIR WALTER SCOTT.

"I remember him, when, in his chamber in the Temple, he showed the beginning of his Animated Nature. It was with a sigh, such as genius draws when hard necessity diverts it from its bent to drudge for bread, and talk of birds and beasts and creeping things, which Piddock's showman would have done as well. Poor fellow! he hardly knew an ass from a mule, nor a turkey from a goose, but when he saw it on the table. But publishers hate poetry, and Paternoster Row is not Parnassus."—Richard Cumberland's Memoirs.

"The descriptions and definitions are often loose and inaccurate, and the chief defect of the work arises from its being a mere compilation from books. It has therefore none of the freshness of personal observation; nothing which awakens the curiosity and inspires the confidence of the reader, as in the delightful pages of White, Montagu, or Rennie."—JOHN MITFORD: Life of Goldsmith.

Yet Mr. Mitford commends the work highly for the beauty of its style and justness of the occasional reflections with which its pages are interspersed. Another biographer, whilst freely admitting the defects of this work, remarks:

"There are yet many passages of exquisite country observation in it; and not a few in which the grace of diction, the choice of perfect and finely-finished imagery, and an elegant clearness and beauty in the tone of reflection, may compare with his best original compositions, in poetry or prose."—JOHN FORSTER: Life of Goldsmith.

"Goldsmith composed this work out of Buffon and others, in a manner both amusing and instructive, although the scientific acquirements of the author were not sufficient to guard him against numerous errors."

"He died in the midst of a triumphant course. Every year that he lived would have added to his reputation. There is assuredly no symptom of decadence in the picturesque pages of his last work, the History of Animated Nature: a book which, not possessing indeed the character of authority only to be granted to faithful reports of personal observation, is yet unequalled for clearness of expression, and all the charms of a most graceful style. Northcote tells us that he had just begun a novel before his death; and a second Vicar of Wakefield may have been buried in the tomb of Goldsmith."—PROF. BUTLER: Gallery of Illust. Irishmen: Goldsmith: Dubl. Univ. Mag., vii. 53.

Of the Animated Nature, the 2d edit. was pub. in 1779, 8 vols. 8vo. New edit., 1791, 8 vols. 12mo; 1804, 4 vols. 8vo; 1806, 6 vols. 8vo. With corrections, and adds. by W. Tarton, M.D., 1816, 6 vols. 8vo. Natural History of Birds and Beasts abridged, 1807, 12mo; 1807, 8vo; 1838, 4 vols. 24mo; 1850, 2 vols. r. 8vo; 1850, 18mo. Other eds.

The last quotation will have prepared the reader for the closing scenes of Goldsmith's life. He was at the Edgeware Cottage when he put the last touches to his Animated Nature; and here also he was completing the Grecian History, making another Abridgment of English History for schools, translating Scarron's Comic Romance, revising for James Doddsley (for the sum of five guineas) a new edit. of his Inquiry into Polite Learning, finishing his Survey of Experimental Philosophy, and writing his poem of Retaliation.

In the middle of March he arrived in London, labouring under severe indisposition produced by sedentary habits, and "continual vexation of mind, arising from his involved circumstances." On the afternoon of the 25th he took to his bed; but, instead of following judicious counsel, persisted, against the advice of his physician, in swallowing large doses of James's Powders, which greatly aggravated his disorder. "Towards the last it occurred to Doctor Turton to put a very pregnant question to his patient. 'Your pulse,' he said, 'is in greater disorder than it should be, from the degree of fever which you have. Is your mind at ease?' 'No, it is not,' was Goldsmith's melancholy answer. They are the last words we are to hear him utter in this world."

And now that death had forever removed from his familiar haunts this simple-hearted, affectionate man,—now that those who had rudely sported with his harmless eccentricities, and often made him the "butt of their clumsy ridicule," felt that they should see his face no more forever,—there was unaffected grief, and hearty, perchance profitable, contrition. Nor did such alone mourn him: the glory of his age and of the English nation, the most illustrious statesman and orator of his day, burst into tears when he heard the sad news. The messenger of death found Sir Joshua Reynolds in that studio from whence had emanated so many exquisite conceptions of the painter's genius:—but the mournful tidings took his heart from his work; he felt that his "hand had lost its cunning," laid by his pencil—"which in times of great family distress" he had not been known to do—and left the room for the day.

And there were mourners, too, of a different rank of life indeed, but those whose lamentations were as sincere, and their grief as heartfelt; those in whose sorrow for their departed benefactor there is in our eyes a value of no ordinary worth, as in their prayers for the living there is a peculiar benediction. When the poor and the needy, the outcast and the forsaken, the "ruined spendthrift" and the "aged beggar," heard that he who had out of his own poverty ministered to their necessities should greet them no more with the voice of kindness and the word and deed of consolation and relief, they forgot the awful distance which ordinarily excluded them from the presence of the great, and crowded their way to his humble lodgings, regardless of the presence of fashionable friends who had come to take their "last look at poor Goldsmith."

"On the stairs of his apartment there was the lamentation of the old and infirm, and the sobbing of women; poor objects of his charity, to whom he had never turned a deaf ear, even when struggling himself with poverty. . . . Mourners without a home, without domesticity of any kind with no friend but him they had come to weep for; outcasts of that great, solitary, wicked city, to whom he had never forgotten to be kind and charitable."

And the beautiful Jessamy Bride, whom perhaps poor Goldsmith loved more than he ever loved any other woman,—whose image was associated with his happiest days on earth,—she was not absent at this hour; the coffin was opened at her request; and she bore away a lock of his hair, which "she treasured to her dying day."

"I was abroad at the time of his death," writes Dr. McDonnell, a youth whom when in distress he had employed as an amanuensis, "and I wept bitterly when the intelligence first reached me. A blank came over my heart as if I had lost one of my nearest relatives, and was followed for some days by a feeling of despondency."

"Of poor dear Goldsmith," writes Johnson, three months after the event, "there is little to be told more than the papers have made public. He died of a fever, made, I am afraid, more violent by uneasiness of mind. His debts began to be heavy, and all his resources were exhausted. Sir Joshua is of opinion that he owed not less than two thousand pounds. Was ever poet so trusted before?"

The unhappy state of his affairs, thus alluded to, prevented that pompous funeral with which his friends proposed to testify their admiration of his genius and regret for his loss.

He was privately interred in the burial-ground of the Temple Church; but his monument in Westminster Abbey, dignified by the celebrated epitaph of Johnson, and not unworthy of the pen of the disciple of Sir Thomas Browne, arrests the steps of the contemplative stranger as he lingers in the aisles of the departed great. To that epitaph who would not be willing to add the emphatic testimony of its author to the genius of its subject?—"Let not his faults be remembered: he was a very great man."

And now, in the calm review of the chequered life of the author of the Traveller and the Deserted Village, his happy childhood, his youth of suffering, his manhood of alternate triumphs and mortifications, his last days of embarrassment and trial, and his lonely death among strangers, unattended by one friend of his early years, who can refuse the tribute of a tear to the touching lines in which the stranger and pilgrim on the earth had breathed out his earnest desire to die amidst the scenes of his childhood?

"In all my wad'rings round this world of care—
In all my griefs—and God has giv'n my share—
I still had hopes my latest hours to crown,
Amidst these humble bow'rs to lay me down;

To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flame from wasting, by repose:
I still had hopes, for pride attends us still,
Amidst the swains to show my book-learn'd skill,
Around my fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all I felt, and all I saw;
And, as a hare whom bounds and horns pursue
Pants to the place from whence at first she flew,
I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
Here to return—and die at home at last!"

We still have much to tell of Goldsmith,—many illustrations of his eccentricities, many anecdotes of his simplicity; many evidences of his benevolence of heart; but we have already extended his biography until, like Robin in the churchyard, we are afraid to look behind us, and compute the space. But let those who would find fault with us for dwelling so long on Oliver Goldsmith turn at once to the political economy, the commerce, the metaphysics, of our volume. They are not at home here: to quote Dr. Johnson's character of his Lichfield friend, their "talk is of bullocks." And, now that we have banished from our little company those who cannot sympathize with the enthusiasm of which we are not ashamed and for which therefore we offer no excuse, let us return to the contemplation of a character which we cannot but warmly love, even whilst unable at all times to commend.

The faults of Goldsmith, like the faults of other men, are neither to be denied nor excused. His improvidence, his fondness for games of chance, and his want of high moral and religious tone, are deeply to be deplored; but that genuine and ever-flowing benevolence of heart which few have equalled, and perhaps none excelled, calls for our unmixed admiration and hearty esteem. Of this amiable trait we could produce many instances,—taking the blankets from his own bed to cover a poor woman and her helpless children; leaving a gay party in the midst of his amusements, or his bed in the dead of night to relieve a poor creature in the street; pouring out his hard-earned profits like water to supply destitute authors with the comforts of life; spending the wages of an usher's servitude in gingerbread for the children and alms for those who lacked bread;—but we must be content with the touching narrative of one scene, which George Colman has himself told so well that we shall not attempt to tell it for him:

"I was only five years old when Goldsmith took me on his knee, while he was drinking coffee, one evening, with my father, and began to play with me; which amiable act I returned with the ingratitude of a peevish brat, by giving him a very smart slap on the face; it must have been a tingler, for it left the marks of my little spiteful paw upon his cheek. This infantile outrage was followed by summary justice, and I was locked up by my indignant father in an adjoining room, to undergo solitary imprisonment in the dark. Here I began to howl and scream most abominably; which was no bad step towards liberation, since those who were not inclined to pity me might be likely to set me free, for the purpose of silencing a nuisance.

"At length a generous friend appeared to extricate me from jeopardy, and that generous friend was no other than the man I had so wantonly molested by assault and battery,—it was the tender-hearted doctor himself, with a lighted candle in his hand, and a smile upon his countenance, which was still partially red from the effects of my petulance. I sulked and sobbed, and he fondled and soothed, till I began to brighten. Goldsmith, who in regard to children was like the Village Preacher he has so beautifully described,—for 'Their welfare pleased him, and their cares distressed,'— seized the propitious moment of returning good-humour: so he put down the candle and began to conjure. He placed three hats, which happened to be in the room, upon the carpet, and a shilling under each: the shillings, he told me, were England, France, and Spain. 'Hey, presto, coekolorum!' cried the doctor, and lo! on uncovering the shillings which had been dispersed, each beneath a separate hat, they were all found congregated under one. I was no politician at five years old, and, therefore, might not have wondered at the sudden revolution which brought England, France, and Spain, all under one crown; but, as I was also no conjurer, it amazed me beyond measure. Astonishment might have amounted to awe for one who appeared to me gifted with the power of performing miracles. If the good-nature of the man had not obviated my dread of the magician; but, from that time, whenever the doctor came to visit my father, a game at romps constantly ensued, and we were always cordial friends and merry playfellows. Our unequal companionship varied somewhat in point of sports as I grew older, but it did not last long; my senior playmate died, alas! in his forty-fifth year, some months after I had attained my eleventh. His death, it has been thought, was hastened by 'mental iniquitude.' If this supposition be true, never did the turmoils of life subdue a mind more warm with sympathy for the misfortunes of our fellow-creatures. But his character is familiar to every one who reads: in all the numerous accounts of his virtues and follies, his genius and absurdities, his knowledge of nature and his ignorance of the world, his 'compassion for another's woe' was always predominant; and my trivial story of his humouring a froward child weighs but a feather in the recorded scale of his benevolence."

'I pluck'd his gown to share the good man's smile;'

We should hardly feel that our duty as a biographer was entirely fulfilled did we omit to allude rather more fully than we have yet done to poor Goldsmith's ineffectual efforts to shine as a star of the first magnitude in that brilliant galaxy of conversationists which could at the same moment boast of a Johnson, a Burke, a Reynolds, a Beauclerc, and a Langton. Many amusing anecdotes of Goldsmith's colloquial essays—not always unrewarded with success—will be found in Boswell's Life of Johnson, and in other works which shall be cited before we conclude our notice.

"Of our friend Goldsmith he [Johnson] said, 'Sir, he is so much afraid of being unnoticed, that he often talks merely lest you should forget that he is in the company.' BOSWELL: 'Yes, he stands forward.' JOHNSON: 'True, sir, but if a man is to stand forward he should wish to do it not in an awkward posture, not in rage, not so as that he shall be exposed to ridicule.' BOSWELL: 'For my part, I like very well to hear honest Goldsmith talk away carelessly.' JOHNSON: 'Why, yes, sir, but he should not like to hear himself. The mistourne of Goldsmith's conversation is this: he goes on without knowing how he is to get off. His genius is great, but his knowledge is small. As they say of a generous man, it is a pity he is not rich, we may say of Goldsmith, it is a pity he is not knowing. He would not keep his knowledge to himself. . . . Sir, he knows nothing, he has made up his mind about nothing. . . . No man was more foolish when he had not a pen in his hand, or more wise when he had. . . . Goldsmith should not be forever attempting to shine in conversation: he has not temper for it, he is so much mortified when he fails. Sir, a game of jokes is composed partly of skill, partly of chance, as a man may be beat at times by one who has not the tenth part of his wit. Now Goldsmith's putting himself against another, is like a man laying a hundred to one who cannot spare the hundred. It is not worth a man's while.'"

Boswell gives us a characteristic illustration of the candid manner in which Goldsmith would let the company know what was passing in his mind:

"Goldsmith, in his diverting simplicity, complained one day, in a mixed company, of Lord Camden:—'I met him,' said he, 'at Lord Clare's house in the country, and he took no more notice of me than if I had been an ordinary man.'"

The laugh which Burke raised at his expense on the occasion of the visit of some foreign ladies to London is another proof that the popular poet, the charming novelist, the successful dramatist, and the witty essayist, was not disposed to underrate his claims to public admiration.

It is natural to wish to know something of the personal appearance and social manners of those in whose works or character we take an interest:

"In person," says Judge Day, "he was short, about five feet five or six inches; strong but not heavy, in make: rather fair in complexion, with brown hair; such, at least, as could be distinguished from his wig. His features were plain, but not repulsive,—certainly not so when lighted up by conversation. His manners were simple, natural, and perhaps on the whole, we may say, not polished; at least without the refinement and good breeding which the exquisite polish of his compositions would lead us to expect. He was always cheerful and animated, often, indeed, boisterous in his mirth; entered with spirit into convivial society; contributed largely to its enjoyments by solidity of information, and the naïveté and originality of his character; talked often without premeditation, and laughed loudly without restraint."

But we promised to gratify the reader with the citations of some opinions, in addition to the many which we have already recorded, respecting the merits of several of Goldsmith's most admired works, and his general characteristics as a writer. This promise it now becomes us to fulfil.

THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD:

"Now Herder came, and together with his great knowledge brought many other aids, and the later publications besides. Among these he announced to us the 'Vicar of Wakefield' as an excellent work, with the German translation of which he would make us acquainted by reading it aloud to us himself. . . . The delineations of this character [that of the 'excellent Wakefield'] on his course of life through joys and sorrows, the ever-increasing interest of the story, by the combination of the entirely natural with the strange and the singular, make this novel one of the best which has ever been written. . . . I may suppose that my readers know this work, and have it in memory; whoever hears it named for the first time here, as well as he who is induced to read it again, will thank me."—GOETHE: Truth and Poetry; from My Own Life, English trans.

The great German dwells at length upon the merits of the work, but we must be content with our brief quotation. He "Declared in his eighty-first year that it was his delight at the age of twenty, that it had in a manner formed a part of his education, influencing his taste and feelings throughout life, and that he had recently read it again from beginning to end, with renewed delight, and with a grateful sense of the early benefit derived from it."

This testimony will remind the reader of the eloquent tribute of the Great Magician of the North:

"The admirable ease and grace of the narrative, as well as the pleasing truth with which the principal characters are designed, make the Vicar of Wakefield one of the most delicious morsels of fictitious composition on which the human mind was ever employed. . . . We read the Vicar of Wakefield in youth and in age; we return to it again and again, and bless the memory of an author who contrives so well to reconcile us to human nature."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Life of Goldsmith.

"The humanity of the Vicar of Wakefield is less deep than that of Roderick Random, but sweeter tinges of fancy are cast over it. The sphere in which Goldsmith's power moved was never very extensive, but within it he discovered all that was good, and shed on it the tenderest lights of his sympathizing genius. No one ever excelled so much as he in depicting amiable follies and endearing weaknesses. His satire makes us at once smile at and love all that he so tenderly ridicules. The good Vicar's trust in Monogamy, his son's purchase of the spectacles, his own sale of his horse to his solemn admirer at the fair, the blameless vanities of his daughters, and his resignation under his accumulated sorrows, are among the best treasures of memory. The pastoral scenes in this exquisite tale are the sweetest in the world. The scents of the hay-field and of the blossoming hedge-rows seem to come freshly to our senses. The whole romance is a tenderly-coloured picture, in little, of human nature's most genial qualities."—SIR T. N. TALFOURD: Miscell. Writings.

"It is needless to expatiate upon the qualities of a work which has thus passed from country to country, and language to language, until it is now known throughout the whole reading world, and is become a household book in every land. The secret of its universal and enduring popularity is undoubtedly its truth to nature, but to nature of the most amiable kind; to nature such as Goldsmith saw it. . . . Rogers, the Nestor of British literature, whose refined purity of taste and exquisite mental organization rendered him eminently calculated to appreciate a work of the kind, declared that of all the books, which, through the fitful changes of three generations he had seen rise and fall, the charm of the Vicar of Wakefield had alone continued as at first; and could he revisit the world after an interval of many more generations, he should as surely look to find it undiminished."—WASHINGTON IRVING: Life of Goldsmith.

We give some opinions from other biographers and admirers of Goldsmith:

"Fortunately he had just finished his delightful history of the Vicar of Wakefield; a tale which, if I may without presumption speak my own opinion, I should for sweetness and simplicity of style, truth of circumstance, adherence to nature, easy change of incident, bright and clear delineation of character, apart from all violent exaggeration, and command at once of the humorous and pathetic, place among the very foremost productions of fiction. It has the truth of Richardson without his minuteness, and the humour of Fielding without his grossness: if it yields to Le Sage in the diversified variety of his views of life, it far excels him in the description of the domestic virtues, and the pleasing moral of the tale."—REV. JOHN MITFORD: Life of Goldsmith.

"With its ease of style, its turns of thought so whimsical yet wise, and the humour and wit which sparkle freshly through its narrative, we have all of us profitably amused the idle or the vacant hour; from year to year we have had its tender or witty incidents, its forms so homely in their beauty, its pathos and its comedy, given back to us from the canvas of our Wilkes, Newtons, and Stothards, our Leslies, Madlises, and Mulready's; but not in those graces of style, or even in that home-cherished gallery of familiar faces, can the secret of its extraordinary fascination be said to consist. It lies nearer the heart. A something which has found its way there; which, while it amused, has made us happier; which, gently unweaving itself with our habits of thought, has increased our good-humour and charity; which, insensibly it may be, has corrected wilful impatience of temper, and made the world's daily accidents easier and kinder to us all: somewhat thus should be expressed, I think, the charm of the Vicar of Wakefield."—JOHN FORSTER: Life of Goldsmith.

"His Vicar of Wakefield has charmed all Europe. What reader is there in the civilized world who is not the better for the story of the washes which the worthy Dr. Primrose demolished so deliberately with the poker—for the knowledge of the ginnea which the Miss Primroses kept unchanged in their pockets—the adventure of the picture of the Vicar's family, which could not be got into the house—and that of the Flauborough family, all painted with oranges in their hands—or for the story of the case of shagreen spectacles and the cosmogony?"—HAZLITT: Lectures on the English Poets.

"Look ye now, for one moment, at the deep and delicate humour of Goldsmith. How at his touch the venial infirmities and vanity of this good Vicar of Wakefield live lovingly before the mind's eye! How we sympathize with poor Moses in that deep trade of his for the green spectacles! How all our good wishes for aspiring rusticity thrill for the showman who would let his bear dance only to the genteelst tunes!"—WHIPPLE: Lectures; Wit and Humour.

THE TRAVELLER; A POEM:

"We talked of Goldsmith's Traveller, of which Dr. Johnson spoke highly; and while I was helping him on with his great-coat, he repeated from it the character of the British nation, which he did with such energy that the tear started into his eye:

"Stern o'er each bosom reason holds her state,
With daring aims irregularly great,
Pride in their port, defiance in their eye,
I see the lords of human kind pass by,
Intent on high designs, a thoughtful band,
By forms unfashion'd, fresh from nature's hand;
Fierce in their native hardness of soul,
True to imagined right, above control,
While even the peasant boasts these rights to scan,
And learns to venerate himself as man."

Boswell's Life of Johnson.

Here we have epigrammatic terseness indeed; but the character of a nation of a very different complexion is even still more concisely expressed:

"There is, perhaps, no couplet in English rhymes more perspicuously condensed than these two lines of The Traveller, in which the author describes the at once flattering, vain, and happy character of the French.

[They please, are pleased, they give to get esteem,
Till, seeming blest, they grow to what they seem.]

THOMAS CAMPBELL.

"The Traveller is indeed a very finished and a very noble poem. The sentiments are always interesting, generally just, and often new; the imagery is elegant, picturesque, and occasionally sublime; the language is nervous, highly finished, and full of harmony."—SIR S. EGERTON BRYDGES: Life of Goldsmith in Censura Litteraria.

"In The Traveller Goldsmith has expressed, in verse of unequalled grace, the philosophy of man and of society which in other forms pervades his entire writings. The doctrine he discloses in this poetical survey is the basis of all that strain of universal tolerance and moderation which constituted the whole extent of his political and moral views. And doubtless it is no bad philosophy. . . . However the philosophy of The Traveller may be praised or censured, there is, we presume, little dispute about the poetry. There has seldom been so much lively and varied description comprised in so small a space, and ornamented with moral associations so touching and true."—PROF. BUTLER: Gallery of Illust. Irishmen: Dubl. Univ. Mag., vii. 51, 52.

"The Traveller has the most ambitious aim of Goldsmith's poetical compositions. The author, placed on a height of the Alps, muses and moralizes on the countries around him. His object it appears, is to show the equality of happiness which consists with diversities of circumstances and situations. The poem is, therefore, mainly didactic. Description and reflection are subservient to an ethical purpose, and this purpose is never left out of sight. The descriptive passages are all vivid, but some of them are imperfect. Italy, for instance, in its prominent aspects, is boldly sketched. We are transported to the midst of its mountains, woods, and temples; we are under its sunny skies, we are embosomed in its fruits and flowers, we breathe its fragrant air, and we are charmed by its matchless landscapes; but we miss the influence of its arts, and the solemn impression of its former grandeur. We are made to survey a nation in degeneracy and decay; but we are not relieved by the glow of Raffael, or excited by the might of the Coliseum."—HENRY GILES: Lectures and Essays: Oliver Goldsmith.

THE DESERTED VILLAGE; A POEM:

"The Deserted Village has an endearing locality, and introduces us to beings with whom the imagination contracts an intimate friendship. Fiction in poetry is not the reverse of truth, but her soft and enchanted resemblance; and this ideal beauty of nature has been seldom united with so much sober fidelity as in the groups and scenery of the Deserted Village."—THOMAS CAMPBELL.

"The Deserted Village is a poem far inferior to The Traveller, though it contains many beautiful passages. I do not enter into its pretensions to skill in political economy, though, in that respect, it contains a strange mixture of important truths. My business is with the poetry. Its inferiority to its predecessor [The Traveller] arises from its comparative want of compassion, as well as of force and novelty of imagery. Its tone of melancholy is more sickly, and some of the descriptions which have been most praised are marked by all the poverty and flatness, and indeed are peopled with the sort of comic and grotesque figures of a Flemish landscape."—SIR S. EGERTON BRYDGES: Life of Goldsmith in Censura Litteraria.

Read this remarkable piece of criticism,—that on The Deserted Village,—with which we imagine few readers will concur.

"Goethe tells the transport with which the circle he now lived in hailed it, when they found themselves once more as in another beloved Wakesfield; and with what zeal he at once set to work to translate it into German. One tribute he did not hear, and was never conscious of; yet from truer heart or finer genius he had none, and none that should have given him greater pride. Gray was passing the summer at Malvern (the last summer of his life) with his friend Nicholls, when the poem came out; and he desired Nicholls to read it aloud to him. He listened to it with fixed attention from the beginning to the end, and then exclaimed, 'That man is a poet.' . . . All the characteristics of the first poem [The Traveller] seem to me developed in the second; with as chaste simplicity, with as choice selectness of natural expression, in verse of as musical cadence; but with yet greater earnestness of purpose, and a far more human interest. . . . Within the circle of its claims and pretensions, a more entirely satisfactory delightful poem than The Deserted Village was probably never written. It lingers in the memory where once it has entered; and such is the softening influence (on the heart even more than the understanding) of the mild, tender, yet clear light which makes its images so distinct and lovely, that there are few who have not wished to rate it higher than poetry of yet higher genius. 'What true and pretty pastoral images,' exclaimed Burke, years after the poet's death, 'has Goldsmith in his Deserted Village!' They beat all: Pope and Phillips, and Spenser too, in my opinion."—JOHN FORSTER: Life of Goldsmith.

"As we do not pretend in this summary memoir to go into a criticism or analysis of any of Goldsmith's writings, we shall not dwell upon the peculiar merits of this poem; we cannot help noticing, however, how truly it is a mirror of the author's heart, and of all the fond pictures of early friends and early life forever present there. It seems to us as if the very last accounts received from home, of his 'shattered family,' and the desolation that seemed to have settled upon the haunts of his childhood, had cut to the roots one fondly-cherished hope, and produced the following exquisitely tender and mournful lines:

"In all my wand'rings round this world of care,
In all my griefs—and God has giv'n my share—

[Quotation continued to and including the line "Here to return and die at home at last."]

"How touchingly expressive are the succeeding lines, wrung from a heart which all the trials and temptations and buffetings of the world could not render worldly; which, amid a thousand follies and errors of the head, still retained its childlike innocence; and which, doomed to struggle on to the last amidst the din and turmoil of the metropolis, had ever been cheating itself with a dream of rural quiet and seclusion:

"Oh blessed retirement! friend to life's decline, Retreats from care that never must be mine."

[Quotation continued to and including the line "His heaven commences ere the world be past."]

WASHINGTON IRVING: Life of Goldsmith.

"Yet even the Traveller had not shewn the perfection which Goldsmith's genius was capable of attaining. It remained for him still to present to his countrymen a poem which contains a more accurate portraiture of nature in one of its sweetest phases, a more profound pathos, and a more exquisite selection of affecting images than any production of its class in this or in any other language."—PROF. BUTLER: Gallery of Illust. Irishmen: Goldsmith: Dubl. Univ. Mag., vii. 52.

THE CITIZEN OF THE WORLD; OR, LETTERS OF A CHINESE PHILOSOPHER.

"Goldsmith's Citizen of the World, like all his works, bears the stamp of the author's mind. It does not 'go about to cozen reputation without the stamp of merit.' He is more observing, more original, more natural and picturesque than Johnson. His work is written on the model of the Persian Letters, and contrives to give an abstracted and somewhat perplexing view of things, by opposing foreign prepossessions to our own, and thus stripping objects of their customary disguises. Whether truth is eluded in this collision of contrary absurdities, I do not know; but I confess the process is too ambiguous and full of intricacy to be very amusing to my plain understanding. For light summer reading it is like walking through a garden full of traps and pitfalls. . . . Beau Tibbs, a prominent character in this little work, is the best comic sketch since the time of Addison; unrivalled in his fancy, his vanity, and his poverty."—MILNITZ: On the Periodical Essays.

"If in any of his writings Goldsmith could be truly said to have echoed the measured tone of Johnson, it was probably in his most varied and agreeable Citizen of the World, a work written at a period when his genius was scarcely yet independent enough to allow of abjuring allegiance to the reigning powers of literature. Yet even here an imitation is but sometimes perceptible, and whenever it occurred was, perhaps, only the involuntary work of the ear taking up the rich and elaborate harmony which it was most accustomed to hear, and which, in those days, was seldom heard unaccompanied by unequalled manifestations of almost rapturous applause. . . . of that gay and sparkling facetiousness which he himself was wont to admire so highly in other writers, the instances in this collection are innumerable."—PROF. BUTLER: Gallery of Illust. Irishmen: Goldsmith: Dubl. Univ. Mag., vii. 45.

Having thus given copious quotations from eminent authorities respecting the best-known of the productions of Goldsmith, we imagine that the reader will not be displeased if we enlarge our article by citing opinions on the general characteristics of an author so justly distinguished and so general a favourite.

"A man of such variety of powers, and such felicity of performance, that he always seemed to do best that which he was doing; a man who had the art of being minute without tediousness, and general without confusion; whose language was copious without exuberance, exact without constraint, and easy without weakness."—DR. JOHNSON: Life of Dr. Parrish.

"Whether, indeed, we take him as a poet, as a comic writer, or as a historian, he stands in the first class. . . . He deserved a place in Westminster Abbey; and every year he lived would have deserved it better."—DR. JOHNSON: Life by Boswell.

On another occasion, when Goldsmith's character was attacked by some who were dining at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, Johnson exclaimed with warmth, "Is there a man, sir, now, who can pen an essay with such ease and elegance as Dr. Goldsmith?"

"The wreath of Goldsmith is unshuffled; he wrote to exalt virtue and expose vice; and he accomplished his task in a manner which raises him to the highest rank among British authors. We close his volume with a sigh that such an author should have written so little from the stores of his own genius, and that he should have been so prematurely removed from the sphere of literature which he so highly adorned."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Life of Goldsmith.

"Goldsmith, both in verse and prose, was one of the most delightful writers in the language. His verse flows like a limpid stream. His ease is quite unconscious. Every thing in him is spontaneous, unstudied, unaffected; yet elegant, harmonious, graceful, and nearly faultless. . . . As a poet, he is the most flowing and elegant of our versifiers since Pope, with traits of artless nature which Pope had not, and with a peculiar felicity in his turns upon words, which he constantly repeated with delightful effect."—H. CLYDE.

"As for Goldsmith and Churchill, whatever they have appeared to owe to Pope, they are remembered and admired for what they possessed independent of him, each having wealth enough of his own to be a freeholder of Parmsass after paying off any mortgage on his little estate due to that enormous capitalist."—JAS. MONTCOMERY: Lect. on Mod. Eng. Lit.

"Goldsmith I have already had occasion to mention several times in the course of these Lectures, as the various classes of English Poetry in which he has written have come under our review. He now appears before us in the character of a Didactic Poet; and what can I say of him better than by repeating the true and eloquent eulogium in his Epitaph?

"Nullum quod fœtigat non ornavit."

The 'Traveller' and 'The Deserted Village' scarcely claim any notice from me. They are in every one's hands; they live in every one's memory; they are felt in every one's heart; they are daily the delight of millions."—HENRY NEELE: Lect. on Eng. Poet.

"There is something in Goldsmith's prose that to my ear is uncommonly sweet and harmonious: it is clear, simple, easy to be understood; we never want to read his periods twice over, except for the pleasure it bestows; obscurity never calls us back to a repetition of it. That he was a poet there is no doubt; but the paucity of his verse does not allow us to rank him in that high station where his genius might have carried him. There must be bulk, variety, and grandeur of design to constitute a first-rate poet."—RICHARD CUMBERLAND: Memoirs.

Prof. Butler criticizes Cumberland's comments—the whole of which we have not quoted, and the reader, we think, will be gratified with the professor's comments: see Gallery of Illust. Irishmen; Goldsmith; Dub. Univ. Mag., vii. 52, 53. See also Sir S. Egerton Brydges's criticism on Cumberland's comments; Censura Litteraria.

"Goldsmith, Cowper, Burns, are all original, and all unequalled in their way. Falconer is another whose works will last forever."—ROBERT SOUTHERY: Life and Corresp.; Letter to G. C. Belford, April 13, 1805.

"Where is the poetry of which one-half is good? Is it the Æneid? is it Milton's? is it Dryden's? is it any one's except Pope's and Goldsmith's, of which all is good?"—Lord Byron to Murray, April 23, 1820.

"His pictures may be small, may be far from historical pieces, amazing or confounding us; may be even, if severest criticism will have it so, mere happy tableaux de genre hanging up against our walls; but their colours are exquisite and unfading; they have that familiar sweetness of household expression which wins their welcome alike where the rich inhabit, and in huts where poor men live; and there, improving and gladdening all, they are likely to hang for ever."—JOHN FORSTER: Life of Goldsmith.

Washington Irving—the very sight or sound of whose beloved name never fails to excite pleasing emotions in thousands of bosoms at home and abroad—in the preface to his Life of Goldsmith pays the following beautiful tribute to his author:

"For my own part, I can only regret my shortcomings in what to me is a labor of love; for it is a tribute of gratitude to the memory of an author whose writings were the delight of my childhood and have been a source of enjoyment to me throughout life; and to whom, of all others, I may address the beautiful apostrophe of Dante to Virgil:

"Tu se' lo mio maestro, e l' mio autore:
Tu se' solo colui da cui' io tolsi
Lo bello stilo, che m' ha fatto onore."

"The prose of Goldsmith is the model of perfection, and the standard of our language; to equal which the efforts of most would be vain, and to exceed it, every expectation folly."—HEADLEY.

"Goldsmith is one of the most various and most pleasing of English writers. He touched upon every kind of excellence, and that with such inimitable grace, that where he failed of originality most he had over a freshness and a charm."—MRS. S. C. HALL.

"But none of us probably ever think of weighing his political opinions, or his claims to the title of a great philosophical poet. His fame and influence depend on neither. We are not grateful to him because he possesses extraordinary poetical power. There is so much of genuine feeling, just thought, true description, and sound moral distinction, in these poems, [The Traveller and The Deserted Village.] the language is so clear, the strain so liquid, the general style not quite magnificent, but yet of such an easy, natural elevation and dignity, that they glide into our affections and memory in youth, and are never displaced, we apprehend, by the more exciting pleasures, the more subtle and complicated conceptions, which we owe in later years to poetry of a far higher and infinitely more varied character."—E. T. CHANNING: N. Amer. Rev., xlv. 91-116.

It would not be difficult to greatly extend our quotations,—indeed the difficulty is to refrain from quoting, with so many authorities yet unnoticed at our elbow; but there must be an end to the longest article, and this is already sufficiently extended. Of the three principal biographies of our author we have already discoursed at some length in our notice of John Forster, to which the reader is referred.

Of edits. of Goldsmith's histories, the Vicar of Wakefield, the Deserted Village, and The Traveller, the name is legion. His Poet. and Dramat. Works were first collected and pub. in 1780, Lon., 2 vols. 12mo; 1786, 8vo; 1791, 2 vols. 12mo; 1803, 8vo; 1816. Miscell. Works, with Life and Essays, Perth, 1792, 7 vols. 12mo. With Life and Writings, Lon., 1801, 4 vols. 8vo; 1806, 5 vols. 12mo; 1807, 4 vols. 8vo; 1812, 4 vols. 8vo; 1820, 4 vols. 8vo. But these and all preceding edits. were thrown into the shade in 1836 by the publication of Prior's edit. of Goldsmith's Miscellaneous Works, with Life of the Author, 6 vols. 8vo. Contents: Vol. I. The Bee; Essays; Present State of Polite Learning, &c.; Prefaces and Introduction. II. Citizen of the World; Introduction to the Study of Natural History. III. Vicar of Wakefield; Biographies of Voltaire, Nash, Parnell, and Bolingbroke; Miscellaneous Criticism. IV. Poems: The Good-Natured Man; She Stoops to Conquer; The Grumbler; Criticism relating to Poetry and the Belles-Lettres. V., VI. Prior's Life of Goldsmith.

"This is the only complete edition containing additions made to previous collections of Goldsmith, which perhaps it would be safe to say constitute nearly one-half of the collection in the present edition. This edition is the only one having any just claim to a place, as embodying the full performances of Goldsmith, and as the fair exponent of his genius."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

The same eminent authority commends the letters of Goldsmith, collected by Mr. Prior's indefatigable industry, in researches extending from 1826 to 1836:

"No poet's letters in the world, not even those of Cowper, appear to us more interesting for the light they throw on the habits and feelings of the man that wrote them: and we think it will also be acknowledged that the simple gracefulness of their language is quite worthy of the author of the Vicar of Wakefield. We may differ from many of our readers as to all the rest, but we are confident that if Mr. Prior had done, and should do, nothing else, the services he has rendered to literature by recovering and recording these beautifully characteristic effusions would be enough to secure honour to his memory. And who will not be rejoiced to hear that in one instance at least the best secondary monument of a great Irish genius has also been erected by an Irish hand?"

Mr. Prior doubtless richly deserves all that can be said in praise of his labours; but even his excellent edition of the Works of Goldsmith has been superseded within the last year or two by Peter Cunningham's edition, 1854, 4 vols. 8vo, forming the first issue of Murray's British Classics. For an account of this edition, see CUNNINGHAM, PETER.

Of the many beautiful editions of The Vicar of Wakefield, we must especially note the one embellished with thirty-two Illustrations by Wm. Mulready, Lon., 1843, cr. 8vo.

"It is the nearest to perfection of any volume that has hitherto issued from the British press."—Lon. Art. Union Jour., Jan. 1843.

"One of the most beautiful editions of any standard author that has appeared for many years, and decidedly the best which has ever been published of this deservedly popular English classic."—United Service Gazette, Jan. 7, 1843.

"Briefly, we have no hesitation in asserting the superiority of these designs as works of art illustrative of family life over every thing that has been done in recent times either in France or Germany, or our own country."—Lon. Athenaeum, Jan. 21, 1843.

The reader must also procure the editions of the Vicar of Wakefield, illustrated respectively by Westall, Richter, Thomas, and Absolon. We must also notice, as a valuable companion to the modern editions of Goldsmith's Works, an edition of his Poetical Works, with Remarks attempting to ascertain from local observation the actual scene of the Deserted Village, embellished with seven illustrative engravings, by Mr. Aitkin, from drawings taken on the spot. By the Rev. R. H. Newell, B.D., 1811, 4to. Nor must the collector of a Goldsmith Library consider that he has done justice to his design until he can number among his treasures—a fit companion for the Deserted Village, illustrated by the Etching Club, before noticed—the beautiful edition of The Poetical Works of our great author, illustrated by Wood Engravings from the designs of G. W. Cope, A.R.A.; Thomas Creswick, A.R.A.; J. C. Horsley; R. Redgrave, A.R.A.; and Fred. Taylor, members of the Etching Club; with a biographical Memoir, and Notes on the Poems. Edited by Bolton Corney, 1845, 8vo. This beautiful volume has been already noticed. See CORNEY, BOLTON.

We have referred to that happy individual of good taste and excellent judgment,—perhaps you claim the appellation, gentle reader,—the collector of a "Goldsmith Library." He will thank us for indicating sources of information, in addition to any little aid our humble labours may have afforded him, respecting his favourite author.

Let him then consult—Life prefixed to Goldsmith's Works, Lon., 1801, also 1807, 4 vols. 8vo, principally written by Bishop Percy; Johnson's and Chalmers's English Poets, 1810; Life by Sir S. Good, John Mason, M.D., 1764-1827, one of the most profoundly learned Englishmen of modern days, was a native of Epping, Essex, and the son of a dissenting minister. At fifteen he was placed apprentice with a surgeon at Gosport, and in 1784 commenced practice at Sudbury. In 1793 he removed to London, where he practised as a surgeon and apothecary, and in 1820, having received a diploma from the University of Aberdeen, became a physician. An interesting biographical sketch of Dr. G. will be found in the Lon. Gent. Mag. for March, 1827; and a Memoir of his Life was pub. by his friend Dr. Olinthus Gregory, Lon., 1828, 8vo. 1. Maria; an Elegiac Ode, Lon., 1786, 4to. 2. Diseases of Prisons and Poor-Houses, 1795, 12mo. 3. Hist. of Medicine as far as it relates to the profession of an Apothecary, 1795, 12mo. 4. "Dr. Good considers the Song of Solomon neither a continued epithalamium nor a regular drama, but a collection of idyls on a common subject,—the loves of the Hebrew monarch and his fair bride. Into the mystical design of the poem (thou, h. with Louth and Horner, he believed it to have one) he enters little; so that the spirituality of the Bible now here appears in the version or the notes. Admitting his hypothesis to be correct, and considering the Song of Songs merely as an oriental collection of love-songs, Dr. Good's version cannot be denied the praise of elegance and general accuracy. He first gives a kind of literal prose translation, and then, on the opposite page, a metrical version. The notes follow at the end, and display a great profusion of ancient and modern learning. As far as religion is concerned, however, the reader may as well consult the odes of Horace or the pastorals of Virgil."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

The Nature of Things; a Didactic Poem, trans. from the Latin of Titus Lucretius Carus, with the original text and Notes philolog. and explan., 1805-07, 2 vols. 4to.

"These vast volumes are more like the work of a learned German professor, than of an ungraduated Englishman. They display extensive erudition, considerable judgment, and some taste; yet, upon the whole, they are extremely heavy and uninteresting, and the leading emotion they excite in the reader is that of sympathy with the fatigue the author must have undergone in the compilation. . . . The truth is, that Mr. Good, though very intelligent, is very indiscriminate in the selection of his information; and though, for the most part, sufficiently caudid and judicious in his remarks, is at the same time interminably dull and tedious. He has no vivacity; no delicacy of taste or fancy; very little originality; and a gift of extreme prolixity. His prose is better than his poetry; his reasonings are more to be trusted to than his criticism; and his statements and explanations are of more value than his argument."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., x. 217-234.

"Almost every polished language, Asiatic as well as European, is laid under contribution; and the versions which uniformly accompany the numerous parallels and quotations are, for the most part, executed in a masterly style."—Lon. Gent. Mag., xviii. 277.

10. Oration on the Structure and Physiology of Plants, 1808, 8vo. 11. Essay on Medical Technology, 1810, 8vo. This essay gained the Fothergillian Medal. 12. The Book of Job literally trans. from the Hebrew and restored to its natural arrangement: with Notes crit. and illust., and an Introduct. Dissert., 1812, 8vo. A critique on this version appeared in the Eclectic Rev. for Feb. 1816; to this Dr. Good replied, and a rejoinder followed in the number for Dec. 1816.

"No work of criticism in the language affords such a display of acquaintance with ancient and modern languages. . . . Dr. Good is a firm believer in the antiquity of the book, contends that Moses was the writer of it, and that it contains the great principles of the patriarchal faith. . . . His translation is the most valuable work on Job in the English language, and must materially assist any ind-vidual in the interpretation of that difficult book."—Orme's Bibl. Bibl.

"On the whole, we regard this work as a valuable accession to our stock of sacred literature; and we can recommend it with confidence to the liberal student, as containing a great mass of useful information and valuable criticism."—Lon. Christian Observer, xii. 306.

13. New ed. of Mason's Self-knowledge; with a Life of the Author and Notes, 1812, 8vo. Dr. Good's mother was Miss Peyto, the favourite niece of John Mason. 14. A Physiological System of Nosology, 1817, 8vo.

"It bids fair to supersede every attempt which has hitherto been made in the difficult province of medical technology and systematic arrangement."—Lon. Gent. Mag., xvii. 277.

15. Sketch of the Revolution in 1688. 16. In conjunction with Olinthus Gregory, LL.D., editor, and Newton Bosworth, Pantalogia; or Encyclopædia, comprising a General Dictionary of Arts, Sciences, and General Literature, pub. periodically, completed in 1813, 12 vols., with nearly 400 engravings, r. 8vo, £20. 17. The Study of Medicine, 1822, 4 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1832, 5 vols. 8vo, £3 15s.; edited by Samuel Cooper, M.D., F.R.S., Prof. of Surgery in the Univ. of London, &c.

"If the general tenor of his book . . . (what seems to me to be the fact) . . . be so excellent that no other modern system is, on the whole, half so valuable as the Study of Medicine, its imperfections will be indolently regarded by every liberal critic, and its genuine merit warmly admired."—Dr. Cooper, the editor.

"The additions to the text and notes by Mr. Cooper, as may have been expected are numerous and valuable, and the entire work merits our most unqualified recommendation. The surgeon whose library contains Good's Study of Medicine and Cooper's Surgical Dictionary, need look around him for little more that is either scientific, useful, or practical, in any branch of his profession."—Lon. Lancet, No. 304.

"We have no hesitation in pronouncing the work, beyond all comparison, the best of its kind in the English language."—Lon. Medico-Chirurg. Rev.

"As a work of reference, at once systematic and comprehensive, it has no rival in medical literature."—Lon. M. d. Gaz.

American ed. pub. by Harpers, N. York, 2 vols. 8vo, with Notes by A. S. Doane, M.D., &c. 18. The Book of Nature, 1826, 3 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., corrected, 3 vols. 8vo.

CONTENTS.—Vol. I. Nature of the Material World, and the Scale of Unorganized and Organized Tribes that issue from it. On Matter and a Material World; on Geology; on Organized Bodies, and the Structure of Plants compared with that of Animals; on the Principle of Life; on the Bones, &c.; on the Digestive Functions; on the Circulation of the Blood; on the Processes of Nutrition; on the External Senses of Animals. Vol. II. Nature of the Animate World; its Peculiar Powers and External Relations; Means of Communicating Ideas; Formation of Society. Vol. III. Nature of the Mind; its General Faculties and Furniture.

"This volume is designed to take a systematic, but popular, survey of the most interesting features of the general science of nature, for the purpose of elucidating what has been found obscure, controverting and correcting what has been felt erroneous, and developing, by means of original views and hypotheses, much of what yet remains to be more satisfactorily explained."—Preface.

"The work is certainly the best philosophical digest of the kind which we have seen."—Lon. Math. Rev.

19. Thoughts on Select Texts of Scripture, 12mo. 20. Historical Outline of the Book of Psalms, by Neale, 8vo; by Henderson, 1854, 8vo. Dr. Good contributed many papers to the periodicals of the day, and was for some time editor of the Analytical and Critical Review, and, we believe, of the New Annual Register, and the Gallery of Nature and Art. His review of the Junius controversy—see our article on JUNIUS—is one of the finest pieces of criticism of modern times. There are few names that cast greater lustre upon the archives of British Medical Science and philological learning than that of John Mason Good.

In 1840 he issued proposals for a society to be called the Dugdale Society, for the elucidation of British Family Antiquity. But the project was not encouraged.

The value of expositions of this character—when ability, accuracy of statement, and popularity of style, are combined—cannot be too highly estimated; and in Mr. Goodrich's work

"The powers of the general government and the relations of the Federal and State authorities and laws are very carefully and thoroughly stated and explained. It makes an admirable book of reference, and is not encumbered with legal technicalities or the repulsive show of dry learning."

Goodrich, Chauncey A., D.D., b. Oct. 23, 1790, at New Haven, Conn., graduated at Yale College in 1810. In 1812 he became a tutor in that institution, and, at the request of President Dwight, prepared a Greek Grammar, which was extensively used in the schools and colleges of New England. This was followed by Greek Lessons, and Latin Lessons, designed to lead the pupil by regular stages into a knowledge of the ancient languages, on a plan afterwards applied to modern languages by Ollendorff. After two years spent in the ministry, he was appointed in 1817 Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory in Yale College, the duties of which office, in part, he still performs, in connection with those of the professorship of Pastoral Theology, to which post he was appointed in 1839. In 1820 he was elected President of Williams College, Massachusetts, but declined the office. Soon after the publication of Dr. Noah Webster's (father-in-law to Dr. Goodrich) American Dictionary in 1828, he superintended an abridgment of the work, pub. in r. 8vo, for general use; and, with the author's consent, conformed the orthography, in most respects, to that which has been commonly received in the United States. In 1847 he pub. a revision of both the 4to and 8vo dictionaries, with large additions, the result of many years of labour, in which he was aided by his colleagues, Messrs. Silliman, Olmsted, &c. See N. Amer. Rev., lxxvi, 256, 257. For a number of years Prof. G. discharged the duties connected with the editorship of the Quarterly Christian Spectator. But perhaps the most important contribution made by him to the literature of the age is his vol. entitled Select British Eloquence, embracing the Best Speeches Entire of the most eminent Orators of Great Britain for the last two Centuries, with Sketches of their Lives, an Estimate of their Genius, and Notes Critical and Explanatory, N. York, 1852, Svo, pp. 947.

"This bulky volume performs more than it promises. It is not only a collection, made with excellent taste and judgment, of the best specimens of English eloquence, whether parliamentary, forensic or popular, but the biographical and illustrative matter annexed is copious enough to form a tolerably complete political history of England from Queen Anne's time to the present day. At any rate, a full acquaintance with the contents of this volume, taking the speeches and the commentary together, would be a very useful appendage to that knowledge of the political events of the period which may be derived from works professingly historical or biographical in their character."—N. Amer. Rev., lxxvi. 253-255.

Having perused this volume with care as well as delight, we are able to fully endorse the preceding commendation. No student of history, biography, political, forensic, or sacred eloquence, should be without this work. Those who have not seen it will be surprised to learn that Prof. G. gives us in this one volume one-sixth more of matter than is contained in Chapman's Seiect Speeches, or Williston's American Eloquence, in 5 vols. Svo each. It comprises the substance of Prof. G.'s lectures on the great English orators.

"A distinct volume," the author remarks, "would be necessary for American eloquence if the lectures on that subject should ever be published."

We trust the "distinct volume" will be published, and also the author's lectures on Demosthenes' Oration for the Crown. Such contributions to the cause of public education are beyond price.

In 1856, he edited a r. Svo ed. of Webster's American Dictionary of the English Language, exhibiting the Origin, Orthography, Pronunciation, and Definition of Words. To which are added a Synopsis of Words differently pronounced by different Orthoepists; and Walker's Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek, Latin, and Scripture Proper Names, revised and enlarged. With the Addition of a Vocabulary of Modern Geographical Names, with their Pronunciation; containing all the words in the Quarto Edition, and also an arrangement of Synonyms under the leading Words,—a new and important feature, and not to be found in any other work, and particularly useful to young writers. It embraces more than six hundred articles of this kind, being a larger number than is contained in any similar work in our language, with the exception of Crabbé. In the same year he pub. (Webster's University Dictionary) A Pronouncing and Defining Dictionary of the English Language; abridged from Webster's American Dictionary, Svo, pp. 610.

Goodrich, Frank Bott, b. 1826, in Boston, son of S. G. Goodrich, (Peter Parley.) For several years he was the Paris correspondent of the N.Y. Times over the signature of Dick Tinto. 1. Tri-Colored Sketches of Paris, N. Y., 1854, 12mo. 2. Court of Napoleon; or, Society under the First Empire, with Portraits of its Beauties, Wits, and Heroines, N.Y., 1857, r. 4to. An elegant volume. 3. Man upon the Sea; or, History of Maritime Adventure, Exploration, and Discovery, Phila., 1858, Svo. 4. Women of Beauty and Heroism, N.Y., 1859, r. 4to. This is a companion-volume to No. 2.

Goodrich, Samuel Griswold, alias Peter Parley, was born Aug. 19, 1793, at Ridgefield, Connecticut. Shortly after attaining his majority, he commenced the business of a publisher in Hartford, and devoted himself to this branch of trade for some years. In 1823-24, he visited England, France, Germany, and Holland, and not long after his return home commenced the publication of the famous Peter Parley volumes.

In 1828 Mr. Goodrich commenced the publication of The Token, an original annual, which he edited for fourteen years. In this series appeared many of his poems,—for Peter Parley is a poet of no mean rank,—afterwards pub., together with prose pieces, also contributed to The Token, &c. under the title of Sketches from a Student's Window, 1841. The Outcast and other Poems had preceded this vol. by four years, being pub. in 1837. In 1851 appeared a beautiful edit. of his Poems, (including The Outcast), with Pictorial Illustrations. The designs (about forty) are mostly by Mr. Billings, the engravings by Bobbett & Edmonds, Lossing & Barrett, Hartwell, and others, and the printing by Mr. John F. Trow.

Mr. Goodrich has had an eye to intelligent legislation as well as juvenile instruction; and his valuable parents' assistant, entitled "Fire-side Education," (1838, 12mo.) was composed in sixty days, while the author was occupied with the important duties devolving upon him as a member of the Massachusetts Senate. How greatly parents have been aided and encouraged—as well as children instructed and delighted—through the earlier volumes of Parley's Magazine, Merry's Museum, Parley's Cabinet Library, and his numberless volumes of many kinds, who shall estimate?

In 1851, the President of the United States—his Excellency Millard Fillmore—conferred a deserved compliment upon Mr. Goodrich by appointing him Consul to Paris. In 1855 Mr. G. returned to the United States, and is now (1858) residing in New York.

We have spoken of the volumes of this popular author as "numberless;" but here we are a little extravagant,—for the author has been obliged to "number" them in self-defence. See Recollections of a Lifetime; or, Men and Things I have Seen, by S. G. Goodrich, N. York, 1858, 2 vols. 12mo.

"List of Works of which S. G. Goodrich is the Editor or Author."

"My experience, as an author, has been not a little singular, in one respect. While on the other side of the Atlantic my name has been largely used, as a passport to the public, for books I never wrote, attempts have been made in this country to deprive me of the authorship of at least a hundred volumes which I did write. It requires some patience to reflect upon this with equanimity; to see myself, falsely, saddled with the paternity of things which are either stupid, or vulgar, or immoral,—or perhaps all together; and then to be deprived, also by falsehood, of the means of effectually throwing them off by appealing to genuine works—which have obtained general favor—through a suspicion cast into the public mind that I am a mere pretender, and that the real authorship of these works belongs to another person.

"This, however, has been, and perhaps is, my position, at least with some portion of the public. I have thought it worth while, therefore, to print a catalogue of my genuine works, and also a list of the false ones issued under my name, with such notes as seem necessary to set the whole matter clearly before the public.

"The following comprise all my works, to the best of my recollection:

The work continued under my exclusive editorship until I left for Europe in 1850: from that time, while I had a general charge of the work, Rev. S. T. Allen was the home editor. At the close of the fourteenth year, (the twenty-eighth semi-annual volume, 1854,) my connection with the work entirely ceased.]

"Remarks.

"I thus stand before the public as the author and editor of about one hundred and seventy volumes—one hundred and sixteen bearing the name of Peter Parley. Of all these, about seven millions of volumes have been sold; about three hundred thousand volumes are now sold annually.

"A recent writer in the Boston Courier has said that the late Mr. S. Kettell was the 'Veritable Peter Parley'—thereby asserting, in effect, and conveying the impression, that he being the author of the Parley Books, I, who have claimed them, am an impostor. He has, moreover, claimed for him, in precise terms, the actual authorship of various works which have appeared under my own proper name. For reasons which will appear hereafter, I deem it necessary to expose this impudent attempt at imposture—absurd and preposterous as it appears upon its very face.

"First, as to the Parley Books—it will probably be sufficient for me to make the following statement. In respect to the thirty-six volumes of Parley's Tales, in the preceding list, the earlier numbers of which began and gave currency to the entire Parley series, no person except myself ever wrote a single sentence.

"As to Parley's Historical Compendium—some nine or ten volumes—I had the assistance of N. Hawthorne and J. O. Sargent, Esqs., and others; but Mr. Kettell never wrote a line of any one of them! "As to Parley's Miscellanies—about fifty volumes—I had some assistance from several persons in about a dozen of them. Mr. Kettell wrote a few sketches for five or six volumes of the Cabinet Library, which I adapted to my purpose, and inserted: this is the whole extent of his participation in the entire Parley series—one hundred and sixteen volumes!

"Let me never write, planned, conceived, or pretended to be the author of a single volume bearing Parley's name. The pretence thus set up for him, since his death, is as preposterous as it is impudent and false. It would be, indeed, about as reasonable to claim for him the authorship of Don Quixote, or Gil Blas, or Voltaire's Progress, as thus to give him the title of the 'Veritable Peter Parley.'

"The writer above noticed also claims for Mr. Kettell the chief authorship of Merry's Museum, extending to about thirty volumes large octavo. This claim is disposed of by the following letter from Rev. S. T. ALLEN:—

"New York, Jan. 28, 1856.

"S. G. GOODRICH, Esq.:

"Dear Sir:—I have read the several articles in the Boston Courier, signed 'Veritas,' claiming for the late Mr. Kettell the authorship of Peter Parley's Tales, Merry's Museum, &c. As you request from me a statement as to my knowledge on the subject, I cheerfully give it, which you can publish if you please.

"I purchased, with an associate, the entire Merry's Museum in 1818 or 1841, from the beginning in 1841, and have been its publisher until October last; that is, over six years. I have nearly, from that time to the present, been its editor, wholly or in part. During this period, Mr. Kettell has never written any thing for the work. It is within my knowledge that he wrote some articles in the earlier volumes probably in all not exceeding one hundred and eighty to two hundred pages. His principal articles were the 'Travels of Thomas Trotter' and 'Michael Kastoff'; these possessed no particular merit, and did not aid or advance the reputation of the work.

"The articles by you, extending through fifteen volumes, nearly all of which I have since been separately published as Peter Parley's Tales, gave life, circulation, and character to the work. I have had large opportunity to judge of this matter, as I have been, for more than six years in constant communication with the subscribers, (ten or twelve thousand in number,) and I say, unhesitatingly, that your articles in the Museum have fully sustained your reputation as the ablest, best-known, and most popular writer for youth in this country.

"I may say, furthermore, that I have lately been in Europe, and it is within my knowledge that Parley's works have been published there in various languages, and are highly esteemed.

"I further state that I have read your reply to the Boston Courier and 'Veritas' of January 13, and so far as my knowledge extends and especially in respect to Merry's Museum, it is strictly correct.

"I need hardly say, in conclusion, therefore, that I consider these claims of the Boston Courier and 'Veritas,' in favour of Mr. Kettell, as wholly without foundation. All that can properly be said is, that, out of five or six thousand pages of Merry's Museum, he contributed about ten hundred pages, marked with no particular excellence. The only qualification that need be made is, that I have understood that Mr. Kettell had some general superintendence of the work for about six months, while you were absent in Europe; that is, from September, 1847, to March, 1848. Even during this period, Mr. Kettell's labors seem to have been confined to writing a few small articles and reading the proofs.

"Yours respectfully, STEPHEN T. ALLEN.

"Let me here, then, are eight-and-twenty volumes of Merry's Museum, in addition to eighty-eight volumes of Parley's works, rescued from the claims of this wholesale library burglar.

"Another claim in behalf of Mr. Kettell is, that he was the author of various valuable and important school-books, such as the Pictorial History of the United States, a Pictorial History of Greece, &c. &c. &c. I have just joined a letter from Mr. George Savage, of the late firm of Houghton & Savage, and now associated with Mr. J. H. Colton & Co., Map and Geography Publishers in New York, will settle this claim also.

"New York, Jan. 31, 1856.

"Mr. Goodrich:

"Dear Sir:—I have looked over the several attacks made upon you in the Boston Courier by 'Veritas,' claiming that Mr. Kettell was the author of several books which bear your name. I am acquainted with the history of several of these works; and, so far as my knowledge extends, the statements of 'Veritas' are entirely destitute of foundation. I can speak positively as to four of the books—the Geographical Parley's, the 'Primer,' the 'National,' and the 'Comprehensive' for I am, and have been for some years, their proprietor and publisher. I have also been interested in them from their beginning, and it is within my knowledge that you wrote them wholly and entirely. The statements of 'Veritas' as to Mr. Kettell's authorship of the Pictorial History of Greece and the United States are equally untrue.

"'Veritas' quotes a contract between you and Mr. Kettell of May 26, 1846, to show that Mr. Kettell had written some of the 'Parley's Compendiums of History.' If he will look at the books referred to in this contract, he will see that your name is given as the author, and not Parley's.

"I speak of these works, because I have been engaged in publishing them, or most of them. It is evident that the articles in the Courier are written, throughout, with great rashness; and, though I do not impugn the motives of the writer, I feel free to say that, so far as they depend upon him, they seem to me entirely unworthy of confidence.

"I have seen your replies, and, having had a large knowledge of your operations, I think your statements have been exact, reasonable, and just, and have no doubt the public will think so.

"Yours, truly,

GEORGE SAVAGE.

"Another claim, in behalf of Mr. Kettell, made by this adventurous writer, is, that the History of All Nations—a work of 1200 pages, royal 8vo, which appears under my name—was published, with the exception of a few dry pages, 'as it came from Mr. Kettell's graceful and flowing pen!' In reply, I offer the following letter, to which I invite the special attention of the reader, inasmuch as it not only refutes this audacious pretence, but it explains the nature of my connection with Mr. Kettell, the reason why I employed him, and the nature and extent of the services he rendered me:

"New York, Feb. 3, 1856.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE BOSTON COURIER:

"Sir:—I have read the controversy which has been progressing for some weeks in your journal, as to the alleged claims of Mr. Kettell to the authorship of several works which have appeared under my father's name.

"These claims, urged after Mr. Kettell's death, and by a person totally irresponsible, seem hardly to merit serious consideration; but as they have been pressed in a spirit of evident hostility and malice, it may be well for me to state what I know upon the subject.

"For the last ten years I have been familiar with my father's literary labours. I have seen the greater part of the manuscripts sent to the printing-office, and have read the greater part of the proofs returned, and can bear witness to the accuracy of the statements made in this connection, in my father's letter, published in the New York Times of the 31st December, having suffered severely from weak eyes for the past twenty-five years, he has been obliged to use the services of others in consulting authorities, and sometimes in blocking out work to be afterwards systematized and reduced to order by him. In this, Mr. Kettell was his principal assistant. He wrote always, as I understood it, as an assistant, and in no sense as an author. His manuscripts were never finished so as to be fit for the press. Their publication, as they were, would have been fatal to the reputation of any man who should have taken the responsibility of them. It was my father's task, after having planned these works, to read and remodel the rough drafts of Mr. Kettell, to suit them to his own views, and to prepare them for the public eye. This was, in some cases, a more serious and fatiguing labor than it would have been to write the work from the beginning. I may add that at one period Mr. Kettell's manuscripts were referred to me for examination, and that I was empowered to accept or reject them. Somewhat later I had, for a time, occasion to remodel, adapt, and partly to re-write such portions as were accepted.

"I have, naturally, no wish to detract from the merits of Mr. Kettell. But in regard to the History of All Nations, a work attributed by 'Veritas' to the 'graceful and flowing pen of Mr. Kettell,' I must state that five persons (Mr. Kettell, Rev. Mr. Robbins, of Berlin, Conn., Rev. Mr. Jenks, of Boston, myself, and my father) were engaged upon it; the heaviest share—the plan, the fitting, the refining, the systematizing, and the general views—falling upon the latter. Perhaps 'Veritas' will pardon me if I claim for myself the entire authorship of seventy-five pages, so confidently attributed by him to the 'graceful and flowing pen of Mr. Kettell.'

"Take notice, Mr. Editor, that I append my real name to this communication. In controversies of this kind, where honor, truth, and the maintenance of a good name are involved, anonymous correspondence is held by the community to argue in its author meanness, treachery, and cowardice. I think Mr. Kettell, were he living, would be the first to disavow this eager service in his behalf by his irresponsible advocate. I am yours, respectfully,

F. B. GOODRICH.

"I believe I may now leave this matter to the judgment of the public, with a few brief observations:

"The enormous claims in behalf of Mr. Kettell, set up by the Boston Courier and its anonymous correspondent 'Veritas,' have been disposed of as follows:

"1. Mr. Kettell never wrote a line of the thirty-six volumes of Parley's Tales; never a line of the ten volumes of Parley's Historical Compendiums, expressly and repeatedly claimed for him; and of the fifty volumes of Parley's Miscellanies he only wrote a few sketches in half a dozen of them. To pretend, therefore, that he is the 'Veritable Peter Parley,' is as gross an imposture as to call him the 'Veritable Author' of Pickwick, or Guy Rannering, or the Spectator.

"2. The claim for Mr. Kettell of the authorship of Merry's Museum—thirty volumes—is reduced to the writing of about two hundred pages of indifferent matter, as a correspondent.

"3. His claim to the authorship of the History of Greece, History of the United States, Parley's Geography, the Primer of Geography, National Geography, Comprehensive Geography and History,—positively asserted by 'Veritas,'—is shown to be false in the beginning, the middle, and the end.

"4. The audacious claim of the entire authorship of the History of All Nations comes to this: that Mr. Kettell was one of four persons who assisted me in the compilation of that work.

"5. It appears, inasmuch as my eyes were weak for a series of twenty-five years, rendering it sometimes impossible for me to consult books, that I employed Mr. Kettell to block out several works, according to plans minutely and carefully prescribed by me; and that the materials thus furnished were reduced to method, style, and manner, by me, so as to suit my own taste; and that the works were published as thus remodelled, and not as they were written by him. It appears, furthermore, that all this was done with Mr. Kettell's full consent, upon written and explicit agreements, and that he never did plan, devise, contrive, or finally prepare, any book published under my name, nor was he, nor did he ever claim to be, the author of any book thus published.

"6. It is material to state, distinctly, that while 'Veritas' claims for Mr. Kettell the entire authorship of over one hundred and twenty volumes of my works, he (Mr. Kettell) never assisted me, in any way or in any degree, in more than twenty volumes, and these only in the manner above indicated; that is, in locking out works, mostly historical, under my direction, and to be finished by me.

"7. I do not mean by this to depreciate Mr. Kettell's abilities; but, inasmuch as these audacious claims in his behalf have been pertinaciously and impudently urged, it is proper for me, in this formal manner, to reduce them to their true dimensions.

"8. While I thus acknowledge the assistance rendered me by Mr. Kettell in my historical compilations, it is proper to state that I had the aid of other persons—some of them of his own name and fame than he. Among my assistants were N. Hawthorne, E. Sargent, J. O. Sargent, S. P. Holbrook, Esq., Rev. Royal Robbins, Rev. E. G. Smith, Rev. W. S. Jenks, and others. The claims of 'Veritas,' if admitted, would not only rob me of the authorship of a hundred volumes, which I wrote, but would transfer to Mr. Kettell about twenty volumes, to which several other authors contributed with greater ability than he.

"9. I think it may be safely assumed that in the history of literature there is not a more impudent attempt at imposture than this, which originated in the Boston Courier. It is easy to comprehend why the author has not dared to give his name to the public but has continued to make his attacks behind the mask of an anonymous title. That I deem myself called upon to notice him arises from the fact that he derived a certain color of authority from the Editor of the Courier, and from publishing papers and documents belonging to Mr. Kettell's heirs—though these contributed in no degree either to refute the statement here made or to substantiate any portion of the claims here referred to.

"10. Literary history is full of instances in which littleness, allied to malignity, has signalized itself by seeking to deprive authors of their just claims; and, while thus doing wrong to their literary labors attempting also to degrade them in the eyes of the world as guilty of appropriating to themselves honors which do not belong to them. It is also a vice of base minds to believe imputations of this sort without evidence, or even against evidence, when once they have been suggested. I do not think it best, therefore, to leave my name to be thus dealt with by future pretenders, who may desire to emulate this Boston adventurer.

SUPERFICIOUS PARLEY BOOKS.

AMERICAN COUNTERFEITS AND IMPOSITIONS.

"In the United States the name of Parley has been applied to several works of which I am not the author, though for the most part from mistake and not from fraudulent designs. The following are among the number:

	Date of publication.	No. vols.
Parley's Washington.	18mo.	1
Parley's Columbus.	do.	1
Parley's Franklin.	do.	1

[The name of Parley is not in the title-page of any of these works, but is put upon the back, and they are sold as Parley books, but without authority, though at the outset, as I believe, with no improper design.]

Parley's Miscellanea.	18mo.	1
Parley's Consul's Daughter, and other Tales.	18mo.	1
Parley's Tales of Honor.	18mo.	1
Parley's Tales of Terror.	do.	1
Parley's Tales for the Times.	do.	1
Parley's Tales of Adventure.	do.	1

[The publication of this series, under the name of Parley, is, I believe, abandoned, as I remonstrated with the publishers against it, as a fraud upon the public.]

Parley's Picture-Books—12 kinds.	—	12
----------------------------------	---	----

[These I have not seen; they are, however, impositions.]

The Rose, by Peter Parley.	—	1
The Bud, by Peter Parley.	—	1
The Mines of different Countries, by Peter Parley.	—	1
The Garden, by Peter Parley.	—	1
The Gift, by Peter Parley.	—	1
The Flower-Basket, by Peter Parley.	—	1
Fairy Tales, by Peter Parley.	—	1

[The preceding seven volumes I have not seen, but I find them in some of the American catalogues. They are all spurious.]

Parley's Book of Books.	Square 16mo.	1
-------------------------	--------------	---

[This book, I believe, consists of extracts from Parley's Magazine. Its publication in this form, so far as it may convey the idea that it is written by me, is deceptive.]

Parley's Historical—A book for Home Education and Family Entertainment.	8vo.	1
Parley's Household Library.	8vo.	1

[These two works are from old altered plates of Parley's Magazine, and are designed to deceive the public by making it believe that they are original works, and by the author of Parley's Tales. They are a gross and shameful imposition.]

ENGLISH COUNTERFEITS AND IMPOSITIONS.

[The London publishers and authors have made a large business of preparing and publishing Parley books. Some of these are republications, without change, from the genuine American editions, to which I make no objection; some are the genuine works, more or less altered; and many others are counterfeits, every means being used to pass them off upon the public as by the original author of Parley's Tales. Among the most notorious of these are the following:

	Date of publication.	No. vols.
Peter Parley's Annual. A Christmas and New Year's Present. Published by Darton & Co.	1841	14
[This is a large 16mo. with colored engravings, and has been continued from 1841 to 1855—14 volumes.]
Peter Parley's Royal Victoria Game of the Kings and Queens of England.	18mo. Darton & Co.	1854
Parley's Book of Gymnastics.	Sq. 16mo. Darton & Co.	1840
Parley's Paring Gift.	do.	1846
Parley's Book of Industry.	do.	1855
Parley's Book of Poetry.	do.	1845
Parley's Ireland.	do.	1843
Parley's Wonders of Earth, Sea, and Sky.	do.	1853
Parley's Odds and Ends.	Square 16mo.	1840
Parley's Peeps at Paris.	do.	1848
Parley's Prize Book.	do.	1848
Parley's School Atlas.	do.	1842
Parley's Canada.	do.	1849
Parley's China and the Chinese.	do.	1844
Parley's Child's Own Atlas.	Square.	1853
Parley's Life and Journey of St. Paul.	Square 16mo.	1845
Parley's Lives of the Twelve Apostles.	Sq. 16mo.	1841
Peter Parley's Visit to London during the Coronation.	Sq. 16mo. Bogue.	1838
Peter Parley's Tales of England, Scotland, and Ireland.	Sq. 16mo. Tegg.	1842
Peter Parley's Mythology of Greece and Rome.	Sq. 16mo.	1811
Peter Parley's Tales of Greece, Ancient and Modern.	Square 16mo. Tegg.	1842
Peter Parley's Tales of Ancient Rome and Modern Italy.	Sq. 16mo. Tegg.	1840
Peter Parley's Tales about Christmas.	Sq. 16mo. Tegg.	1849
Peter Parley's Shipwrecks.	do.	1843
Parley's Plants.	do.	1850
Parley's Modern Geography.	do.	1837
Parley's Bible Geography.	Sq. 16mo. J. S. Holson.	1839
Parley's Child's First Step.	Sq. 16mo. Clements.	1839

[There are still other counterfeits of Parley's works, issued by various parties in London. The utter disregard of truth, honor, and decency, on the part of respectable British authors and publishers in this wholesale system of imposition and injustice, is all the more remarkable when we consider that the British public, and especially the British authors and booksellers, are denouncing us in America as pirates, for refusing international copyright.]

The conduct of all these parties places them, morally, on a footing with other counterfeiters and forgers; public opinion, in the United States, would condemn persons conducting in this manner to the same degree of reprobation. Can it be that, in England, a man who utters a counterfeit five-pound note is sent to Newgate, while another may issue thousands of counterfeit volumes and not destroy his reputation?

The above list certainly presents a tolerable proof that Mr. Goodrich has been no idler in the Republic of Letters. And his works are not among those which clog the bookseller's shelves and excite his periodical indignation on the annual review of his stock in trade. They may be emphatically called "Live Stock,"—for of some of them more than fifty thousand copies are circulated every year, and of all of them, as before stated, the aggregate sale amounts to about three hundred thousand volumes annually;—in all about seven millions of volumes have been sold! And here we must remark that it would be a great error to suppose that PETER PARLEY confines his energies to his personal aggrandizement only:

"Mr. Goodrich has been a liberal patron of American authors and artists; and it is questionable whether any other person has done as much to improve the style of the book manufacture or to promote the arts of engraving. It is believed that he has put in circulation more than two [seven] millions of volumes of his own productions; all of which include pure morality and a clear full view of life. His style is simple and unadorned, the few of his verse melodious; and his subjects generally such as he is capable of treating most successfully."—Goodrich's Deeds and Poetry of America.

Can an author desire higher commendation than that which follows?

"For twenty years he has preserved the confidence of parents and teachers of every variety of condition and opinion, by an indefatigable morality and strong practical sense, which are universally understood and approved."—International Magazine, II. 154.

"Mr. Parley has too much reputation as a popular instructor of the young, to need any very urgent recommendation on our part."—Lon. Monthly Repository.

"The honoured name of Peter Parley (S. G. Goodrich) when pronounced calls to mind many of the pleasant incidents of our youth. For more than twenty years his delightful compositions have instructed and edified children in both hemispheres; and it is to be regretted that unprincipled usurpers have invaded the field of his well-earned fame, even under his own banner."—*Traveller's Bibliographical Guide to Amer. Goodwin, John, 1593–1665, an independent divine, was a zealous republican, and promoted the condemnation of Charles I., and afterwards endeavoured to justify his course by writing a pamphlet called The Obstructors of Justice, 1649, 4to. This, together with Milton's Eiconoclastes, and Defensio pro Populo Anglicano, were, on the Restoration, burnt by the common hangman, Aug. 27, 1660. He was educated at Queen's Coll., Camb.; presented to the living of St. Stephen's, Coleman-Street, London, 1633; dismissed for refusing to baptize the children of his parishioners promiscuously, and to administer the Lord's Supper to his whole parish. He became a warm Arminian, and was a zealous supporter of his opinions. He pub. a number of theolog. and political works, of which the following are the best known. 1. Treatise of Justification, Lon., 1642, fol. New ed., by Wesley, 12mo.

"The public owes some gratitude to Mr. Jackson (the eminent Wesleyan) for the publication, in so very handsome a form, of this standard work of Goodwin's, in which the Arminian doctrine is most ably advanced. Goodwin's violence as a politician has prejudiced many against him, not without cause, we think; but as a theologian few have been more highly commended.

Goodwin, T. The Loyal Shepherd, or the Rustic Heroine; a Dram. Past. Poem, Lon., 1779, 8vo.

Goodwin, Thomas, D.D., 1600–1697, a high-Calvinist Independent divine, a native of Kolesby, Norfolk, was educated at Christ Church and Catherine Hall, (of which he became Fellow.) Camb.; Lecturer of Trinity Church, Camb., 1628; Vicar, 1632; relinquished his preferments, 1634, and became pastor of an Independent congregation at Arnheim, Holland; returned to London, and became a member of the Assembly of Divines; President of Magdalen Coll., Oxf., 1649; ejected at the Restoration; preached in London until his death in 1697. After his death a number of his works—valuable theological treatises—were pub. in 5 vols. fol., 1681, '83, '92, '97, 1704, but some pub. in his lifetime (1647, 4to) were not included,—viz.: Certain Select Cases Resolved; A Child of Light walking in Darkness; The Returne of Prayers; The Tryall of a Christian's Growth, &c.; Aggravation of Sinne, &c.; Vanitie of Thoughts; Christ set Forth; The Heart of Christ; Encouragements to Faith; and also—in the collective ed. of his works—Christ the Universal Peace-Maker. Some other treatises and separate series were also pub. before his death. See Bibl. Brit.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; Darling's Cyc. Bibl., and authorities below.

"Goodwin's pieces published in his lifetime are the most valuable. . . . Many accurate and valuable remarks on Scripture. The Child of Light walking in Darkness is very useful for afflicted consciences." See Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

Bickersteth styles Goodwin's Exposition of the 1st and part of the 2d chapter of Ephesians

"A remarkable display of the riches of the Scriptures, and full of evangelical matter."—Christian Student.

"His Works, besides many discourses, include an exposition of part of the Epistle to the Ephesians, part of the book of Revelation, and some other portions of Scripture; but, from their extent and prolixity, they are not likely to be much consulted. Dr. Goodwin was a learned man, said to be rather high in his Calvinistic sentiments, (though I have not observed much of this,) but excelled in expounding the Scriptures. He delighted to search into abstruse and difficult texts. The least particle of speech came under his notice, and in numerous instances he has made it appear how much depends upon the connecting particles in Scripture, which are generally overlooked."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Dr. Goodwin, with sentiments truly evangelical, and a most happy talent at opening, sifting, and displaying the hidden riches of Scripture."—HERVEY.

Anthony à Wood considered Owen and Goodwin the two Atlases and Patriarchs of Independency.

"Dr. Goodwin's Works are numerous, and, in point of sentiment, valuable. . . . He was a good scholar, and an eminent divine and textuary. His style is involved and obscure."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"A Puritan Divine of very superior powers, whose writings cast much light on the Scriptures on which he treats. He enters very fully into the peculiar mode of expression in the sacred writings, is very evangelical, and full of useful matter."—Bickersteth's C. S.

Goodwin's treatises—original edits.—had become very scarce and dear; but the new edits., 1840-51, pub. by Mr. Shaw, Seeleys, and the London Religious Tract Society, have reduced the value of the former. See Athen. Oxon.; Calamy; Neal's Puritans.

"A lamentable story without pathos."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

But not without passion: for thus the "Dolorous Louer" apostrophizes his Ladie Faire:

"O rubicunde ruby and perle most argente,
O glyoller gentyll and swete flowre delyce,
O daynte dyanionnde and moost resplendante,
O douclet blossom of a full grete pryce."

Trans. from the German of The Amber Witch: the most interesting Trial for Witchcraft yet known, Lon., 1844, p. 8vo. A new English ed. was pub. in 1849, 18mo.

"If this work be genuine, it is, undoubtedly, as it announces itself, the most interesting of all those strange trials for witchcraft, so absorbing and sometimes so inexplicable, which occur at a certain period in almost every country in Europe; if it be a fiction, it is worthy—we can give no higher praise—of Defoe. The editor professes to have found the manuscript in a manner by no means improbable, yet rather too like that which the author of Waverley, as well as many others of inferior name, have been so fond of playing off upon us. It was brought to him by his sexton out of a niche or closet in the church, where it had long lain hid among a heap of old hymn-books and useless parish-accounts. We have read nothing for a long time, in fiction or in history, which has so completely riveted and absorbed our attention."—Lon. Quar. Rev., June, 1844.

But hear the conclusion of the story:

"The Amber Witch is one of the 'Curiosities of Literature,' for in the last German edition the author is obliged to prove that it is entirely a work of imagination, and not, as almost all the German critics believed it to be when it appeared, the reprint of an old chronicle. It was, in fact, written as a trap for the disciples of Strauss and his school, who had pronounced the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, from historical research, assisted by 'internal evidence,' to be a collection of legends. Meinhold did not spare them when they fell into the snare, and made merry with the historical knowledge and critical acumen that could not detect the contemporary romancer under the mask of the chronicler of two centuries ago, while they decided so positively as to the authority of the most ancient writings in the world."—*Lon. "The translation is excellent, and a judicious compression of the original has added much to the effect."—Lon. Examiner.

"Lady Gordon possesses in a high degree the rare faculty of translation, to which she has a hereditary right. She has skillfully pruned the luxuriant details of some of the cases, and omitted the disputations on evidence and other legal topics, which, however valuable in themselves, would be uninteresting to general readers. The present collection of criminal cases forms, as far as we are aware, the most interesting specimen existing in our language."—Law Mag., N. S. 310; and see 4 Law Rev.

The legal student should add to this volume Dumas's Celebrated Crimes.

"Dumas's book is very striking. The tragedy of Truth—the serious side of what is called the Romance of Real Life—had never such startling illustration as this remarkable book affords. What a story is that of the Marchioness de Gauges!"—Lon. Examiner.

Gordon, Robert, of Straloch, Scotland, d. about 1650, wrote a topographical work entitled Theatrum Scotiae, illustrated with maps, and dedicated to Cromwell. It was printed at Amsterdam.

"On y trouve une description complète de l'Écosse, avec des cartes particulières de chaque comté. On y ajoute le livre de Buchanan, De Jure regni apud Scotos."—Bug. Univers.

Gordon, Sir Robert, of Gordonstoun, Bart., Gentleman of the Bedchamber to K. James I. and K. Charles I., &c. A Genealogical Hist. of the Earldom of Sutherland, Edin., 1813, fol. Bindley, Pt. 1, 2046, £1 13s. Largest paper, Brockett, 1329, £1 19s. One copy was struck off on vellum for the Marquis of Stafford. This splendid volume, edited by Henry Weber, was pub. under the auspices and at the charge of the Marchioness of Stafford, (in her own right Countess of Sutherland.)

"The paper, printing, and style of getting up are worthy of the intrinsic value of the volumes. Such works are sometimes not only highly curious and interesting, but are absolutely necessary to the Historian and Antiquary for the satisfactory completion of their historical labours. In this work we have materials which equally appertain to English and Scottish history."—Dublin's Bibl. Spenseriana.

The bibliographer must not fail to procure if he can—which is greatly to be questioned—A Catalogue of the Singular and Curious Library, originally formed between 1610 and 1650, by Sir Robert Gordon, of Gordonstoun, &c., with some adds. by his successors, comprising an extraordinary number of rarities in the literature of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Sold by auction, London, in March and April, 1816.

"These are orations, these are arguments, worthy of a high and permanent place in our theological literature. They display a vigour and originality of thought which it is truly refreshing to meet with in printed sermons, and are, at the same time, boldly explicit in the enunciation of the Gospel system."—*Lon. Mr. McCulloch heads the department devoted to Book-keeping and Mercantile Accounts in the valuable work from which we have just quoted, with the following apt citation from an eminent authority:

"The counting-house of an accomplished merchant is a school of method, where the great science may be learned of ranging particulars under generals, of bringing the different parts of a transaction together, and of showing at one view a long series of dealing and exchange. Let no man venture into large business while he is ignorant of the method of regulating books; never let him imagine that any degree of natural abilities will enable him to supply this deficiency or preserve multiplicity of affairs from inextricable confusion."—Dr. JOHNSON: Preface to Roll's Dictionary of Trade and Commerce.

"The History of Gordon, in four thick octavo volumes, will, in like manner, be consulted with best effect when other accounts have been perused. But audi alteram partem:

"This however is rather a collection of facts than a regular history, for the writing of which, indeed, the author had no talent; his style is vulgar and confused, and his reflections commonplace. The best parts of it occur where he made most use of Dodsley's Annual Register. The colouring he attempts to give, as may be expected, is entirely unfavourable to the English, nor does he endeavour to disguise his partialities."—Supp. vol. to the Dict. Hist., 1812.

This list might be lengthened by the addition of The Maid of Croissy, The Sledge-Driver,—dramas from the French,—The School for Coquettes, a Comedy; Life's Lesson, 1856; The Two Aristocracies, 1857, and a number of works pub. without the author's name. Mrs. Gore is said to have in preparation for the press, Memoirs of the Present Century, Social, Literary, and Political, (1858.)

The success of this popular novelist in her sketches of the prevailing tone of fashionable society is admitted by the ablest critics:

"The more respectable of Mrs. Gore's personages are affectors of an excessive prudery concerning the decencies of life,—may, occasionally of an exalted and mystical religious feeling. Whatever, therefore, they do, is a fair and absolute measure of the prevailing opinions of the class, and may be regarded as not derogatory to their position in the eyes of their equals. But the low average standard of morality thus depicted, with its conventional distinctions, cannot be invented. It forms the atmosphere in which the parties live; and were it a fictitious compound, fabricated at the author's pleasure, the beings who breathe it could not but be universally acknowledged as fantastical, and as mere monstrosities; they would, indeed, be incapable of acting in harmony and consistency with the known laws and usages of civil life. If the situations and dialogues of Mrs. Gore's novels be compared with these usages and laws, and with any of the records of the actual sayings and doings of high life,—such as a series of parliamentary reports, county meetings, race-course transactions, &c., they will be found, with a reasonable allowance for artistic colouring, to reflect accurately enough the notions current among the upper classes respecting religion, politics, domestic morals, the social affections, and that coarse aggregate of dealing with our neighbours which is embraced by the term common honesty.

"It is this average morality of the aristocratic classes that chiefly concerns society at large. The specific overt acts of high life are as much out of the reach of imitation by inferiors as its deportment and carriage."—Lon. Athenæum, 1839, 858, 859. Read the whole of this paper.

"Many of Mrs. Gore's novels are works in which the present state of society and manners is more or less clearly impressed: they are pictures of the time, and no more."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"Among the novelists of the day, Mrs. Gore is entitled to a high place."—Edin. Rev.

"Mrs. Gore's style is always animated light, and playful. It is sustained by originality of thought, and sparkles with satirical allusions."

"All the productions of Mrs. Gore afford evidence of great aptitude, cleverness, and talent."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

"Mrs. Gore is certainly foremost among the female novelists of the day, for wit, acuteness of observation, for originality of remark, and generally for her graphic powers."—Lon. Observer.

"The novel of conventional and artificial life belongs to no one so much as to Mrs. Gore. Who does not know the ring of her regular sentences?—the dialogue which chimes in exactly the same measure, whether the speakers speak in a club, or in the dowager-duchess's sombre and pious boudoir?"

The critic proceeds to notice the sameness of this lady's scenes and characters in her different works, and then continues:

"Nevertheless, Mrs. Gore's novels have a host of readers, and Mrs. Gore's readers are interested. People will be interested, we suspect, till the end of the world, in the old, old story how Edwin and Angelina fell in love with each other: how they were separated, persecuted, and tempted; and how their virtue and constancy triumphed over all their misfortunes. And there is much vivacity and liveliness, and a good deal of shrewd observation, in these books. They are amusing, pleasant beguilers of a stray hour; and, after all our grand pretensions, how valuable a property is this in the genus novel, which proclaims itself an ephemeron in its very name!"—Modern Novelists, Great and Small: Blackwood's M. G., May, 1855.

"This Dictionary is peculiarly valuable as a work of reference for the general reader, on account of information respecting prominent characters that have figured on the stage of life being more its object than an alphabetical list of individuals of various notes and merit; and upon this ground particularly it has a claim to distinguished notice. Gosson, Stephen, 1554-1623, a divine and poet, a native of Kent, educated at Christ Church, Oxf., became Rector of St. Botolph, Bishopgate Street, London, which post he retained until his death. It is much to his credit that he was distinguished for his opposition to the dramatic entertainments of the day. 1. Gotch, F. W. On the word BAITIZO, &c., Lon., 8vo, s. a.

Gother, John, d. 1704, a native of Southampton, a member of the Church of England, became a Roman Catholic priest, resided chiefly in London, and wrote a number of controversial works. His style is commended by Dryden as a masterpiece. His principal work, A Papist Misrepresented and Represented, 1665, 4to, which was answered by Sherlock, Stillingfleet, &c., we have already noticed, (see CHALLOXER, RICHARD, D.D.) and refer the reader to Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 1087, 1088. His Nubes Testium, 1686, 4to, also excited some controversy. See Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 1089. A new ed. of his Sincere Christian's Guide in the Choice of Religion was pub. in 1804, 18mo. A new ed. of his Lessons on the Feasts was put forth by Husebent, 1846, 2 vols. 12mo. A new ed. of his Sinner's Complaint to God was pub. by Mr. Dolman, bookseller, London, 1839, 12mo. There have been various eds. of separate treatises of Gother's; and a collective ed. of his Spiritual Works, consisting of his Moral and Devotional Writings, appeared in 1790, 16 vols. 12mo, Newcastle. To his literary merits we have the following testimony by an eminent authority:

"The reader of Gother's works will, perhaps, think with the present writer, that no composition in the English language approaches nearer to the severe and nervous simplicity of the best writings of the Dean of St. Patrick's."—CHARLES BUTLER.

Gotselin, d. 1098, a Frenchman, a monk of the monastery of St. Bertin, was brought to England by Hereham in 1058, and became a monk of Canterbury. His principal work was a series of lives and miracles of Saints more especially connected with Canterbury. For an account of Gotselin, his works, and edits. of them, we refer the reader to Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.

"We find little original matter of any importance in Gotselin's biographies. They consist chiefly of inflated versions of the simpler style of the older writers; on which account Fabricius compares him to the Greek hagiographer Simeon Metaphrastes."—Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.

Gott, Samuel. An Essay of the True Happiness of Man, Lon., 1650, 8vo.

Gouge, Thomas, 1605-1681, a native of Bow, justly celebrated for his zeal in good works, was the son of William Gouge, D.D. He was educated at Eton School and King's Coll., Camb., of which he became Fellow. In 1638 he was presented to St. Sepulchre's, and laboured there zealously in the discharge of his ministerial duties until 1662, when the Act of Uniformity silenced his preaching. He now devoted himself to the propagation of religion, especially in Wales, where his schools soon numbered in time between 300 and 400, all of which he visited at least once every year. He had printed 8000 copies of the Bible in Welsh, and had trans. into the same language The Practice of Piety, The Whole Duty of Man, The Church Catechism, &c. He used to say that he had "two livings which he would not exchange for two of the greatest in England." He referred to Wales and to Christ's Hospital, London, where he instructed the children in the principles of religion. But time—and surely our space—would fail to tell the tenth part of this good man's efforts for the glory of God and the salvation of man. When at last called, at the ripe age of seventy-seven, to rest from his labours, his death was regarded as a public loss. The great Dr. Tillotson, who preached a most affecting sermon in honour of his memory, declared that,

"All things considered, there have not since the primitive times of Christianity been many among the Sons of Men to whom that glorious Character of the Son of God might be better applied—that he went about doing good. And Wales may as worthily boast of this truly Apostolical Man as of their famous St. David."

We have other testimonies to the same effect:

"But Mr. Gouge's most eminent distinction was his unwearied diligence in doing good, in which he had a most singular sagacity and prudence in contriving the most effectual means for it."—DR. THOMAS BUCHT: Life of Archbishop Tillotson.

"I never heard any one person, of whatever rank, sort, or sect sever, speak one word to his dishonour, or name any fault that they charged on his life and doctrine."—RICHARD BAXTER: Narrative of his own Life and Times.

"The excellent Gouge! . . . My honoured Gouge! . . . It is lamentable to see the ignorance and wickedness yet remaining even in many parts of the British dominions in Wales, in the Highlands, and in Ireland. Are the Gouges all dead?"—CORON MATHUR: Essays to do Good.

This excellent man pub. a biography of his father, prefixed to the works of the latter, 1665. Several sermons, 1663, '73, '77, '79. The Principles of the Christian Religion Explained, 1679. The Young Man's Guide to Heaven, Christian Directions, and A Word to Sinners and a Word to Saints, 1681. An accession sermon was pub. after his death, 1717; and a collective ed. of his works, with Dr. Tillotson's Funeral Sermon, was pub. in 1706, 8vo.

"Gouge's Works are, like their venerable author, full of piety, charity, humility, and moderation; in a word, full of practical wisdom, accompanied with zeal for the glory of God and the salvation of souls."—Williams's C. P.

Of The Surest and Safest Way of Thriving, viz., by Charity to the Poor; a Sermon, on Matt. x. 41, 42, 1673, 4to. A new ed. was issued in 1852, 18mo; and another in the present month, May, 1856, fp. 8vo, with Prefatory Remarks by Baxter, and Drs. Owen, Manton, Bates, and T. Binney, and a Sketch of the Author's Life by the latter. The Young Man's Guide to Heaven has also been republished. The practice of this good man in the matter of "giving," accorded with his precept: for when his annual income was reduced to £150, he gave away the £100 and lived on the £50.

Gouge, William, D.D., 1575–1653, a native of Bow, king of the preceding, was educated at Eton School and King's Coll., Camb.; Rector of St. Ann, Blackfriars, London, 1608–53; one of the Assembly of Divines, 1643. He was one of those who protested against the murder of Charles I. 1. The World's Great Restoration, (written by H. Finch.) Lon., 1621, 4to. 2. Explan. of the Lord's Prayer, 1626, 4to. 3. Sermon, 1646, 4to. 10. Comment. on the Hebrews, with Life of Thomas Gouge, 1655, 2 vols. fol. This excellent work contains the substance of nearly one thousand sermons delivered on lectures on Wednesday for thirty years!

"A very full, evangelical, and practical commentary."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"Gouge was a learned and pious divine, and a good textman: he was counted (whilst he lived) the father of the London ministers."—LEIGH.

"For forty-five years he was the laborious, the exemplary, and the much-loved minister of St. Anne's, Blackfriars, where none ever thought or spoke ill of him but such as were inclined to think or speak ill of religion itself."—GRANGER.

Gouge, William M., b. Nov. 10, 1796, at Philadelphia, was for many years engaged in the preparation of the Documents in the Treasury Department of the U. S. 1. A Short History of Paper Money and Banking in the U. S., including An Inquiry into the Principles of the System, with considerations of its effects on Morals and Happiness, Philada., 1833, 12mo, pp. 396; 2d ed., Philad., 1842. This work has attracted considerable attention throughout Europe and America. A mutilated edition of the first part was republished in England by Wm. Cobbett, under the title of "The Curse of Paper Money." An abridgment of the work appeared in La Revue Universelle, Brussels. See McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ. 2. An Inquiry into the Expediency of dispensing with Bank Agency and with Bank Paper in the Fiscal Concerns of the U. States, 1837, pp. 56. 3. History of the American Banking System, 12mo, N. Y., 1835. 4. The Fiscal History of Texas, 8vo, pp. 327, Philad., 1852. Mr. Gouge has edited several journals, and has contributed for the last thirty years many valuable articles on banks and banking to various journals of the Union.

Mr. Gough has accomplished an incalculable amount of good by his advocacy of the only remedy for nine-tenths of the crime and pauperism which afflict Great Britain and the United States. See BECHNER, LYMAN, D. D.

Gough, Richard, 1735–1809, "The Camden of the 18th century," has been already noticed in our article on the illustrious antiquary just named; but a detailed account of Mr. Gough and his labours—principally from his own pen—will be found in Nichols's Lit. Anec., vi. 262–343; and see other vols. of that excellent work. He was a native of London, educated at Bene't Coll., Camb.; and, being the inheritor of a large fortune, devoted his life to the zealous prosecution of antiquarian research. Among his principal works, in addition to his edit. of the Britannica, already particularly noticed by us, are, 1. Anecdotes of British Topography, Lon., 1768, 4to. Enlarged, 1780, 2 vols. 4to. This last impression was corrected with a view to a third ed., and presented to the author's friend, John Nichols:

"Who will readily relinquish his right if the respectable Curators of the Oxford Press think proper to undertake a new Edition?" Nichols's Lit. Anec., vi. 273.

Respecting this subject, see Preface, p. 2, to Mr. Upcott's Bibliographical Account of the Principal Works relating to English Topography, Lon., 1818, 3 vols. 8vo. 2. Sepulchral Monuments in Great Britain, applied to illustrate the History of Families, Manners, Habits, and Arts at the different periods from the Norman Conquest to the 17th century. Vol. i., containing the first four centuries from the Conquest, 1786, fol. Vol. ii., containing the 15th century, 1796, fol. Introduction to vol. ii., 1799. Vol. ii. consists of three Parts, and the whole work is generally described as in 3 vols. fol., bound in 5. Many copies of this work, particularly of the 3d vol., were destroyed by fire, and the whole work is seldom found free from stains. A perfect set is worth from £55 to £62, according to binding and condition. See collation in Lowndes's Bibl. Man. Mr. Gough had made extensive preparations for a new edit., and the drawings, &c. collected with this design form part of his bequest to the Bodleian Library. Its appearance elicited enthusiastic commendations, of which we quote some specimens:

"I found here your most magnificent present of the Second Volume of Sepulchral Monuments, the most splendid work I ever saw, and which I congratulate myself on having lived long enough to see. Indeed, I congratulate my country on its appearance exactly at so illustrious a moment." &c.—HORACE WALPOLE.

"This truly magnificent work would alone have been sufficient to perpetuate his fame, and the credit of the Arts in England; where few works of superior splendour have before or since appeared. The independent master of an ample fortune, he was in all respects pre-eminently qualified for the labours of an Antiquary; the pain of whose researches can but rarely meet an adequate remuneration. This magnificent work must long ago have convinced the world that he possessed not only the most indefatigable perseverance, but an ardour which no expense could possibly deter."—Nichols's Lit. Anec.: ubi supra.

A minor work (1794, 4to) of Mr. Gough—but one of great interest to the bibliographer—is the Account of the Bedford Missal, presented by Henry VI. to the Duchess of Bedford; purchased by Mr. Edwards at the Duchess of Portland's sale. Mr. Edwards gave for this splendid MS., in 1786, £213. He was twice or thrice offered 500 guineas for it. It was purchased at his sale in 1815, by the Marquis of Blandford—the purchaser of the Valdarter Boecaccio for £2240!—for £687 15s. Mr. Gough pronounces it the finest example of the art of that period (opening of the 15th century) he had ever seen. Refer to Gough's Account, Dublin's Bibliographical Decameron, and Edwards's Sale Catalogue, 1815. Mr. Gough's library, prints, antiquities, &c. were sold in 1810, and produced £4069 9s. 6d. The bibliographer must possess this catalogue, and also the Catalogue of his Books relating to Topography, &c. bequeathed to the Bodleian Library, Oxf., 1814, 4to. The character of this eminent antiquary has been thus eloquently sketched by Dr. Dibdin:

"While the greater number of his associates might have been emulous of distinguishing themselves in the gaieties of the table or the chase, it was the peculiar feeling and master passion of young Gough's mind to be constantly looking upon every artificial object without as food for meditation and record. The mouldering turret and the crumbling arch, the moss-covered stone and the obliterated inscription, served to excite, in his mind, the most ardent sensations, and to kindle that fire of antiquarian research, which afterwards never knew decay; which burnt with undiminished lustre at the close of his existence, and which prompted him, when in the full enjoyment of his bodily faculties, to explore long-deserted castles and mansions, to tread long-neglected by-ways, and to snatch from impending oblivion many a precious relic, and many a venerable ancestry. He is the CAMDEN of modern times. He spared no labour, no toil, no expence, to obtain the best information; and to give it publicity, when obtained, in a manner the most liberal and effective."—Nichols's Typograph. Antiq. of G. Brit.

As an evidence of Gough's early love of letters, we may cite his trans. from the French of the History of the Bible (160 folio sheets) performed between the ages of 11 and 12½ years; and a trans. from the French of Claude Fleury's Custom of the Israelites, performed when in his sixteenth year.

No similar treatise exists; and, indeed, some of the topics have not been touched upon before, unless in a strictly technical form and in scattered articles."—Extract from the Preface.

"A work emanating from so high a source hardly requires commendation to give it currency. The volume is prepared for the student in zoological science; it is simple and elementary in its style, full in its illustrations, comprehensive in its range, yet well condensed, and brought into the narrow compass requisite for the purpose intended."—Silliman's Journal.

Mr. Everett, in his Discourse on the Uses of Astronomy, delivered at Albany on the 28th of August, 1856, on occasion of the inauguration of the Dudley Observatory, notices among the happy auspices under which the Observatory commenced its history that it was "committed to the immediate supervision of an astronomer (Dr. B. A. Gould, Jr.) to whose distinguished talent has been added the advantage of a thorough scientific education in the most renowned universities of Europe, and who, as the editor of the American Astronomical Journal, has shown himself to be fully qualified for the high trust."—p. 15.

Gould, Edward S., b. 1808, Litchfield, Conn., a merchant of N. York, is a son of the late Judge James Gould of Connecticut, author of a celebrated Treatise on the Principles of Pleading in Civil Actions; see post. 1. Travels in Egypt; translated from Dumas, 1838. 2. Democracy in France; trans. from Dumas, 1839. 3. Eugenie Grandet; trans. from Balzac, 1841. 4. Father Goriot; trans. from Balzac, 1842. 5. The Sleep-Rider; a burlesque tale, 1842. 6. Abridgment of Alison's Hist. of Europe, 1843. 7. The Very Age; a Comedy, 1850. Also a contributor to many literary and theological journals, and the author of several translations from Victor Hugo and A. Royer, in addition to those above noted.

Gould, Hannah Flagg, a native of Lancaster, Vermont, removed in early life to Newburyport, Massachusetts, where she has since resided. In 1822 she pub. a vol. of poems, which had originally appeared in the periodicals of the day. In 1835 a second, and in 1841 a third, vol. were given to the world. The number of edits. of these productions is the best proof of the extensive popularity of the author. Encouraged by such success, in 1846 she pub. a collection of her prose articles, under the title of Gathered Leaves, or Miscellaneous Papers, and in 1850 favoured the reading public with a volume of New Poems. In the same year appeared The Diadema: a perennial—a vol. of poems selected and original;—and The Youth's Coronet, a book of poems for little people. She has since pub.—in 1853—The Mother's Dream, and other poems.

"In truth, the great power of her poetry is its moral application. This hallows every object she looks upon, and ennobles every incident she celebrates. She takes lowly and homely themes, but she turns them to the light of heaven, and they are beautiful and refined and elevated."—Mrs. Hale's Woman's Record.

Gould, Judge James, 1770–1838, educated at Yale College, became widely known as Professor in the Law School at Litchfield, Connecticut. In 1816 he was appointed Judge of the Superior Court and Supreme Court of Errors in Connecticut. A memoir of this distinguished ornament of the legal profession will be found in G. H. Hollister's Hist. of Connecticut, vol. ii. A Treatise on the Principles of Pleading in Civil Actions, 1832, 8vo; 2d ed., N. York, 1836, 8vo; 3d ed., Burlington, 1849, 8vo. This work is compiled from the lectures delivered by Judge Gould in the course of his duties at Litchfield.

"We should be pleased to find Judge Gould's production in the hands of every student, alongside of Mr. Stephen's."—Hoffman's Leg. Stu., xxxviii. 1.

"The work does not enter much into details, but as a concise and accurate collection and statement of the principles of Pleading it is not equalled by any similar production except Serjeant Stephen's. Gould's Pleading is a legal classic of the highest order, and has placed its author among the very best legal writers of the age." See Marvin's Leg. Bill. 342; 8 A. J. 74; 15, 435; 1 L. R. 53.

Gould, John, an eminent naturalist, b. at Lyme, Dorsetshire, England, Sept. 14, 1804, displayed in early life a taste for those pursuits the successful prosecution of which has gained him such merited distinction. 1. A Century of Birds from the Himalaya Mountains, Lon., 1831-32, imp. fol., £14 14s. 2. Birds of Europe, 1832-37, 5 vols. imp. fol., £76 8s. 6d. 3. Monograph of the Ramphastidae; or, Family of Toucans, 1834, imp. fol., £7. 4. Icones Avium, 1837-38, Pts. 1 and 2, imp. fol., 35s. each. 5. Monograph of the Trogonidae; or, Family of Trogons, 1838, imp. fol., £8. In 1838 Mr. Gould visited Australia with the laudable design of studying the natural productions of that country. As the result of this visit, we have the following splendid work: 6. The Birds of Australia, 1842-51, 7 vols. imp. fol., £115. A Synopsis of this work has been pub. imp. 8vo, at 25s. each Pt. 7. Monograph of the Macropodidae; or, Family of Kangaroos, 1841-42, imp. fol., Pts. 1 and 2, each £3 3s. 8. Monograph of the Odontophorine; or, Partridges of America, 1844-46, imp. fol., £8 8s. 9. Mammals of Australia, 1845, Pts. 1 and 2, imp. fol., each £3 3s. 10. Trochilidae; or, Family of Humming Birds, 1850, Pt. I, imp. fol., £3 3s. To Mr. Gould's knowledge and taste the public is indebted for the collection of Humming Birds now exhibited in the Gardens of the Zoological Society, Regent's Park, London. This collection should be examined, after an attentive perusal of W. C. L. Martin's General History of the Trochilidae, with especial reference to the Collection of J. Gould, F.R.S., &c. This volume ranges with Jardine's Naturalist's Library, and completes the Humming Birds in that series. We should not omit to give Mr. Gould credit for his labours in aiding to prepare the department of "Birds" in the Zoology of the Voyage of H. M. S. Beagle. In this vol. will be found a notice of their habits and ranges by CHARLES DARWIN, q. v.

Gower, John, 1325?-1402, the contemporary and friend of Chaucer, is entitled to some share of the honours which principally pertain to the latter as the Father of English Poetry. The personal history of Gower—Sir John Gower, so some, Judge Gower, so others—is involved in great obscurity. All that can be considered settled is that he was a student of law in the Inner Temple, learned in his profession, a man of substance, and in high esteem with his contemporaries, and lost his sight about three years before his death. His monument, which retains "a considerable portion of ancient magnificence," is still to be seen in St. Saviour's Church.

"It is of the Gothic style, covered with three arches, the roof within springing into many angles, under which lies the statue of the deceased, in a long purple gown; on his head a coronet of roses, resting on three volumes entitled Vox Clamantis, Speculum Mediantis and Confessio Amantis. His dress has given rise to some of those conjectures respecting his history which cannot now be determined, as his being a knight, a judge, &c."

His principal work consists of three parts, only the third of which—finished in 1393—has been printed: I. Speculum Meditantis, or the Mirror of Meditation; in French rhymes, ten books; it is the mirror of the nature of virtue and vice; conjugal fidelity; the duty and mode of repentance. II. Vox Clamantis, or the Voice of one crying in the Wilderness, contains in seven books of Latin elegiacs a metrical chronicle of the insurrection of the Commons in the reign of Richard the Second. III. The Confessio Amantis, or the Lover's Confession, is an English poem in eight books, (said to contain 30,000 verses,) written by command of Richard the Second, who, "meeting our poet Gower rowing on the Thames near London, invited him into the royal barge, and after much conversation requested him to 'hook some new thing.'"

"It is on the last of these pieces—the CONFESSIO AMANTIS—that Gower's character and reputation as a poet are almost entirely founded. This poem, which bears no immediate reference to the other two divisions, is a dialogue between a lover and his confessor, who is a priest of Venus, and like the mystagogue in the PICTURE OF Cebes, is called Genius. Here, as if it had been impossible for a lover not to be a good Catholic, the ritual of religion is applied to the tender passion, and Ovid's Art of Love is bleuded with the breviary. In the course of the confession, every evil affection of the human heart which may tend to impede the progress or counteract the success of love, is scientifically subdivided, and its fatal effects exemplified by a variety of apposite stories, extracted from classics and chronicles. The poet often introduces or recapitulates his matter in a few couplets of Latin long and short verses. This was in imitation of Boethius."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry.

The reader must carefully peruse Warton's elaborate criticism on Gower's productions. For the biographical detail of the little that is known, and that which is surmised, respecting the author, he must refer to Dr. Campbell's Life of Gower, in the Biog. Brit., from which we shall quote some ancient opinions respecting Gower's merits as a poet. Even in the lighter strains of his muse he sought to be the instructor of the dark age in which his lot was cast. He is well entitled to the honourable appellation, conferred upon him by the most illustrious English poet of the times, of Moral Gower:

"O moral Gower! this hoke I directe
To the, and to the philosophical strode,
To vouchsafe there needs is for to correcte
Of your benignities and zelis gode."

Conclusion of Troilus and Cressida.

It is not perhaps altogether irrelevant to show that Gower was not insensible to the merits of his fellow-poet and literary disciple. In the Confessio Amantis he makes Venns pay the following tribute to Chaucer:

"And grete wel Chaucer, when ye mete,
As my disciple and my poete:
For in the flowers of his youth
In sundry wise, as he well couthe,
Of ditees and of songes glade
The which he for my sake made," &c.

Gower subsequently omitted these verses, and it is supposed that the friendship which subsisted between these eminent scholars and poets suffered some interruption in the latter part of their lives; but this presumption is not beyond doubt, nor is it a theme upon which we care to linger.

Berthelette, in dedicating Gower's Confessio Amantis to K. Henry VIII., is enthusiastic in its commendation:

"And who so ever in redyng of this worke doth consider it well, shall fynde that it is plentifully staffed and furnished with manifolde eloquent reasons, shapre and quicke argumentes, and examplis of great authoritie, perswadyng to vertue, not only taken out of the poets, orators, historie-writers, and philosophers, but also out of the holy scripture. There is to my done no man but that he maie by redyng of this worke get righte great knowledge, as well for the understandyng of many and divers auctours, whose reasons, sayenges, and histories, are translated in to this worke, as for the pleintie of English words and vulgars, beside the furtherance of the life to vertue."

Puttenham, treating of the parents of English poetry, remarks:

"I will not reach above the time of King Edward the third and Richard the second, for any that wrote in English metre; because, before their times, by reason of the late Norman Conquest, which had brought into this realm much alteration both of our language and lawes, and therewithall a certain martial barbarousnes, whereby the study of all good learning was so much decayed, as long after no man, or very few, intended to write on any laudable science; so as beyond that time there is little or nothing worth commendation to be founde written in this arte. And those of the first age were Chaucer and Gower, both of them, as I suppose, Knights. After whom followed John Lidgate, the Monke of Bury, and that nameless who wrote the Satyre called Piers Plowman."—Art of English Poesie.

"In the Italian language the first that made it to aspire to be a Treasure-House of Science were the poets Dante, Boccace, and Petrarch. So in our English were Gower and Chaucer, after whom, encouraged and delighted with their excellent foregoing, others have followed to beautifie our mother tongue, as well in the same kind as other arts."—Sir Phillip Sidney's Defence of Poesie.

"Gower being very gracious with King Henrie the fourth, in his time carried the name of the only poet; but his verses, to say truth, were poor and plaine, yet full of good and grave morality, but while he affected altogether the French phrase and words, made himself too obscure to his reader, beside his invention cometh far short of the promise of his titles."—Peacham: The Compleat Gentleman.

But Dr. Warton defends Gower and others, who share in the censure, against those critics who blame these writers for not adhering more closely to their own tongue:

"I close this section with an apology for Chaucer, Gower, and Ockleve, who are supposed, by the severer etymologists, to have corrupted the purity of the English language by affecting to introduce so many foreign words and phrases. But if we attend only to the politics of the times, we shall find these poets, as also some of their successors, much less blameable in this respect than the critics imagine."

Read this satisfactory vindication—Hist. of Eng. Poet., Section xx., and see Section xix. for an account of Gower's works still in MS.

Mr. Hallam's opinion of Gower's merits as a poet seems to coincide very nearly with that of Peacham:

"A vast interval must be made between Chaucer and any other English poet; yet Gower, his contemporary, though not, like him, a poet of nature's growth, had some effect in rendering the language less rude and exciting a taste for verse; if he never rises, he never sinks low; he is always sensible polished, perspicuous, and not prosaic in the worst sense of the word."—Lit. Hist. of Eur. Po.

We have referred to Warton's account of Gower's works in manuscript. In the History of English Poetry will be found copious extracts from the Cinquante Balades, or Fifty French Sonnets, which compose the "most curious and valuable part of Lord Gower's manuscript." In 1818, 4to, the entire contents of the MS., with the exception of the poem "De Pacis Commendatione," was printed by Lord Gower, subsequently Duke of Sutherland, for the Members of the Roxburghe Club. Sir M. M. Sykes, 1628, £5 5s. Boswell, 3045, £5 5s. Dent, Pt. 2, 1206, £4 10s. Of the Confessio Amantis, the Confession of the Loner, the first ed. was printed by Caxton in 1493, (misprinted 1483,) fol.:

"The Roxburghe copy of this book produced the enormous sum of 336l., purchased by the Duke of Devonshire. The Merly copy was purchased for 315l. by the Duke of Marlborough; and, at the sale of the Duke's books, brought the sum of 205l. 16s. The purchaser was Mr. George Watson Taylor; at the sale of whose library again in 1823, it was found to be imperfect, and sold for 57l. 15s."—Dublin's Lib. Comp.

In Dublin's Typ. Antiq. of G. Brit., i. 177-185, will be found a full account of the Caxtonian ed. of the Confessio Amantis.

Thomas Berthelette printed a second ed. in 1532, fol., and a third in 1554, fol. These have sold at prices ranging from £2 to £8 18s. 6d. each, according to condition, state of the bibliomania, &c. In addition to the authorities already cited, the reader must consult Todd's Illustrations of Gower and Chaucer, which has been noticed in our life of Chaucer; Ellis's Specimens of Early Eng. Poet.; Chalmers's British Poets; Brydges's ed. of Phillips's Theat. Poet. See an interesting anecdote respecting the Confessio Amantis, K. Charles I., and the Marquess of Worcester, in Mrs. Thomson's Recollections of Literary Characters and Celebrated Places, ii. 299-301. We may be excused for devoting so much space to an author who is almost unknown to the modern reader, when we have the high authority of Dr. Warton to justify us in the assertion that if Chaucer

"had not existed, the compositions of Gower would have been sufficient to rescue the reigns of Edward the Third and Richard the Second from the imputation of barbarism."

Grafton, Richard, an English printer to Edward VI., of the 16th century, is best known to posterity by the Chronicles which bear his name. In the time of Henry VIII. he was imprisoned six weeks in the Fleet for printing Matthew's Bible and the Great Bible without notes; and he was subsequently deprived of his patent for printing the proclamation of Lady Jane Grey, Queene of England, &c., 1563, fol. He pub. in 1562, 16mo, An Abridgment of the Chronicles of England,

"Reprinted the two succeeding years, and in 1572. And as Stowe had published his Summarie of the Englyshe Chronicles in 1565, Grafton sent out as a rival, an abridgement of his abridgement, which he entitled 'A Manuell of the Chronicles of England'; and Stowe, not to be behind with him, published in the same year his 'Summarie of Chronicles Abridged.' This rivalry was accompanied by harsh reflections on each other in their respective prefaces. In 1579 Grafton published his 'Chronicle in large, and meere History of the Affaires of Englande.' [and Kinges of the same,' 2 vols. folio,] some part of which seems to have been unjustly censured by Buchanan."

See Ames and Herbert's Typ. Antiq. of G. Brit., and Dibdin's edit. thereof, for an account of Grafton's publications. Grafton's Chronicle was repub., Lon., 1809, 2 vols. 4to, with his Table of Bailiffs, Sheriffs, and Mayors of London, 1189-1558, corrections, and copious index. Yet the edit. of 1569, 2 vols. fol., sometimes bound in one vol., is not to be had when perfect, save at a high price. The collector must observe that the copy which he buys has the original wood-engraved frontispiece, containing portraits of the Kings of England, also a portrait of Q. Elizabeth, and the table or index to the second vol., consisting of five leaves, on the last page of which is Grafton's woodcut device—a Tun. Such a copy, well bound, will hardly be sold at less than £10 to £12. As an authority, Grafton does not occupy the first rank. Bishop Nicolson speaks with but little respect of Hall's Chronicles, and with still less of our author's:

"A great borrower from this Hall was Richard Grafton, who, as Buchanan rightly observes, was a very heedless and unskilful writer; and yet he has the honour done him to be sometimes quoted by Stowe and others."—Eng. Hist. Lib., ed. 1777, p. 58.

But it is not to be forgotten on Grafton's behalf that he assures us that he himself wrote the completion of Hall's continuation of his Chronicle; and if Bishop Nicolson alludes to the continuation, he seems to do Grafton injustice. In 1543, 4to, Grafton pub. Harding's Chronicle, with a continuation of his own, in prose, to the thirty-fourth year of Henry VIII.

2. The Sabbath; a Poem. Anon., 1804, Svo; 2d ed., with Sabbath Walks, 1805, 12mo. 3 eds. same year.

"The greater part of it is written in a heavy and inelegant manner. . . . It contains a good deal of doctrine and argumentation, indeed, both in the text and in the notes; but nothing that is not either very trite or very shallow and extravagant. . . . The whole publication, indeed, though not entitled to stand in the first rank of poetical excellence, is respectably executed, and may be considered as very creditable, either to a beginner, or to one who does not look upon poetry as his primary vocation."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., v. 437–442.

"While the criticsasters of his own country were pronouncing sentence of condemnation upon it, for its pious dulness and inanity, the Sabbath had found its way from one end of Great Britain to the other."—ROBERT SOUTHBY: Lon. Quar. Rev., iii. 456–461.

"The poem of the Sabbath will long endure the name of James Grahame to all who love the due observance of Sunday and are acquainted with the devout thoughts and poetic feeling which it inspires."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: ubi supra.

3. Biblical Pictures. Lord Byron styles this and the preceding work "two volumes of cant, by sepulchral Grahame." The world would not have been the loser if his lordship had favoured us with some of the same kind of "cant" in lieu of his Don Juan and productions of a similar character.

4. Birds of Scotland, and other Poems, 1806, cr. Svo and 12mo.

"Grahame's Birds of Scotland is a delightful poem; yet its best passages are not superior to some of Clare's about the same charming creatures—and they are both ornithologists after Audubon's and our own heart."—PROF. JOHN WILSON: Recreations of Christopher North: An Hour's Talk about Poetry.

"The Birds of Scotland is a fine series of pictures, giving the form, the plumage, the haunts and habits of each individual bird, with a graphic fidelity rivalling the labours of Wilson."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: ubi supra.

"The work by which Mr. Grahame is already known to the public [The Sabbath] is distinguished by the abundance of faithful delineation of natural objects, and the interest thrown over them by the strong expression of characteristic sentiments; and the same truth and force of description, with the same interest arising from the development of the writer's mind, will be found in the Birds of Scotland."—Lon. Month. Rev.

"We need not add that the perusal of this volume has afforded us a very uncommon degree of pleasure. The sensibility, without any affectation, which the author on all occasions displays, cannot fail to interest every reader; he plainly feels every charm of nature he describes."—Lon. Literary Journal.

5. Poems, Lon., 1807, 2 vols. Svo.

"His Sabbath Walks, Biblical Pictures, and Rural Calendar, are all alike remarkable for accuracy of description, and an original turn of thought."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: ubi supra.

6. British Geologies, 1809, 4to.

"In The British Geologies, the last and most ambitious of Grahame's productions, we have disappointment, less from the falling off in power than from the unhappy selection of subject. . . . At all events, we know that the British agriculturist neglects James Grahame's Geologies for Henry Stephens's Book of the Farm."—D. M. Moir: Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

"No practical farmer, he may depend upon it, will ever submit to be schooled in blank verse, however near it may approach to prose, or will ever condescend to look into the British Geologies for instruction; while the lovers of poetry must be very generally disgusted by the tediousness of those discourses on practical husbandry, which break in every now and then, so ungracefully, on the loftier strains of the poet. They who do read on, however, will be rewarded, we think, by many very pleasing and beautiful passages; and even those whose natures are too ungente to admire this kind of poetry must love the character from which it proceeds, and which it has so strong a tendency to form."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xvi. 213–223.

"It does not exhibit any particular system of husbandry; it amuses rather than instructs, and recommends the study of the science rather than teaching of it. The work embraces a mixed description, and is lavish on rural modes and manners; the poetry is both lame and tame, and never rises beyond a feebleness of conception, and a descriptive halt. The portion of practical knowledge is very minute, with incidental notices of new introductions."—Donaldson's Agricult. Biog.

"If the poet has failed in his present attempt, the fault lies chiefly in the subject. There are the same marks of a pious mind, of amiable feelings, and of accurate observation of natural objects, as in his former works; but unhappily he has bound himself not merely to describe the operations of agriculture throughout the year, from January to December, but to give directions for them; for drying manure and lime, preparing compost, spreading manure, ploughing, paring, and burning, &c. What can be done with such subjects?"—Lon. Quar. Rev., iii. 456–461.

7. Poems on the Abolition of the Slave Trade, with engravings from pictures by Smirke, 1810, 4to.

Few poets have been more highly commended by eminent authorities than the author of the Sabbath:

"The genius of Grahame . . . is characterized by that cheerfulness which seeks and sees beauty in all the aspects of creation, and finds delight in whatever is high, holy, pure, and of good report." This must be felt by every one capable of dissociating fanaticism from true religion and of believing that Christianity and gloom, instead of being synonymous terms, are utterly irreconcilable and separated."—D. M. Moir: ubi supra.

"There is a quiet natural ease about all his descriptions; a light and shade both of landscape and character in all his pictures, and a truth and beauty which prove that he copied from his own emotions, and painted with the aid of his own eyes, without looking, as Dryden said, through the spectacles of books."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: ubi supra.

"His taste was singular, and his manner correspondent. The general tenour of his style is homely, and frequently so prosaic that its peculiar graces appear in their full lustre from the contrast of plainness that surrounds them. His readers may be few; but whoever does read him will probably be often surprised into admiration than in the perusal of any one of his contemporaries. The most lively, the most lovely sketches of natural scenery, of minute imagery, and of exquisite incident, unexpectedly developed, occur in his compositions, with every varying yet ever-assimilating features."—JAMES MONTGOMERY: Lects. on Genl. Lit., Poet., &c.

"Such glory, Grahame! thine: Thou didst despise
To win the ear of this degenerate age

By gorgeous epithets, all idle heard!
On theme of earthly state, or iller still,
By tinkling measures and unchosen days,
Warbled to pleasure and her siren-train,
Profaning the best name of poetry,
With loftier aspirations, and an aim
More worthy man's immortal nature. Thou
That holiest spirit that still loves to dwell
In the upright heart and pure, at noon of night
Didst fervently invoke, and led by her
Above the Aonian mound, send from the stuns
Of heaven such soul-subduing melody
As Bethlehem shepherds heard when Christ was born."

United States of North America till the British Revolution in 1688, Lon., 1827, 2 vols. 8vo. New ed. with a Continuation, bringing the history down to the year 1776, 1836, 4 vols. 8vo. Repub. in Phila., 1845, 4 vols. 8vo; 1846, 2 vols. 8vo; 1848, 2 vols. 8vo. The 2d Amer. ed. contains a Memoir by President Quincy, to which we refer the reader. "There can be no doubt that his researches after materials for his purpose have been extensive, and that his use of authorities has been laborious and careful. And his style, though susceptible of improvement, is in general clear, simple, and therefore agreeable. Its chief deficiency is in force: but it requires only a little more cultivation and revision to ensure for it the praise of perfect correctness and even elegance. The few marks of bad taste and defective judgment which Mr. Grahame has betrayed call rather for friendly admonition than severe censure."—Lon. Month. Rev., cxii, 407-419, 1827.

"A valuable acquisition to the History of the World. In these volumes Mr. Grahame has philosophically investigated the origin and progress of one of the most extraordinary revolutions that have ever occupied the attention of mankind."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"With an apparent desire to be above prejudice, with industry equal to a thorough investigation of facts, and with a spirit able to appreciate the value of his subject, Mr. Grahame has published what we conceive to be the best book that has anywhere appeared upon the early history of the United States. He has corrected, with a proper boldness, the mistakes, whether of ignorance or malignity, which his predecessors in the same labors had committed."—C. F. Adams: N. Amer. Rev., xxxii, 174-195, 1831.

"The most thorough work, and incomparably the best on the subject previous to the appearance of Mr. Bancroft's, is the well-known history by Mr. Grahame, a truly valuable book, in which the author, though a foreigner, has shown himself capable of appreciating the motives and comprehending the institutions of our Puritan ancestors. He has spared no pains in the investigation of such original sources as were at his command; and has conducted his inquiries with much candor, manifesting throughout the spirit of a scholar and a gentleman."—Wm. H. Prescott: N. Amer. Rev., lii, 83-84, 1841. See also Ferdinand and Isabella, 11th ed., vol. ii, 477, n.

"It is written with great gravity and dignity, moderation and justice."—CHANCELLOR KENT.

Yet this excellent work was suffered to lie on the booksellers' shelves in London: the reasons for which are satisfactorily stated by Mr. Adams and Mr. Prescott. We must not omit to call the attention of the reader to Mr. Grahame's amusing lamentations over the humour of the illustrious Chronicler of Kniekerbocker:

"If this writer had confined his ridicule to the wars, or rather bloodless buffings and squabbles, of the Dutch and the Swedes, his readers would have derived more unimproved enjoyment from his performance. Probably my discernment of the unsuitableness of Mr. Irving's mirth is quickened by a sense of personal wrong, as I cannot help feeling that he has by anticipation ridiculed my topic and parodied my narrative. If Sancho Panza had been a real governor, misrepresented by the wit of Cervantes, his future historian would have found it no easy matter to bespeak a grave attention to the annals of his administration."

He died in the latter place in 1767. 1. Historia Febris Anomalæ Batavæ. annorum 1746-47-48, &c., Edin., 1753, 8vo. 2. Poet. Trans. of the Elegies of Tibullus and of the Poems of Sulpicia, Lon., 1758, 2 vols. 12mo. Severely criticized by Smollett in the Critical Review. This criticism elicited—3. A Letter to Smollett, 1759, 8vo. 4. The Sugar-Cane; a Poem in 10 Books, with Notes, 1764, 4to. This subject was not the best that could have been selected for poetical treatment, and the language is not always of the most elevated description:

"In the West Indies this poem might have charms, if readers could be found; but what poetical fancy can dwell on the economy of canes and copper-brokers, or find interest in the transactions of planters and sugar-brokers? His invocation to his muse are so frequent and abrupt, that 'the assembled wits at Sir Joshua Reynolds's might have found a many passages as ludicrous as that which excited their mirth.'"

The "ludicrous passage" referred to is quoted in the following anecdote, which we find in Boswell's Life of Johnson:

"Having talked of Grainger's Sugar-Cane, I mentioned to him Mr. Langton's having told me that this poem, when read in manuscript at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, had made all the assembled wits burst into a laugh when, after such blank verse pomp, the poet began a new paragraph thus:

'Now, Muse, let's sing of rats.'

And what increased the ridicule was, that one of the company, who slyly overlooked the reader, perceived that the word had been originally moice, and had been altered to rats, as more dignified."

But this story requires an explanation, for which the reader is referred to Boswell. Miss Reynolds gives rather a different version, and tells us that when Johnson heard the poem read, and the author came to the line

"Say, shall I sing of rats?"

"No!" cried Dr. Johnson, with great vehemency.

Boswell remarks:

"Dr. Johnson said to me, 'Percy, Sir, was angry with me for laughing at the Sugar-Cane: for he had a mind to make a great thing of Grainger's rats.'"

The objectionable line was altered. Dr. Johnson certainly liked the poem, on the whole, and sent a favourable review of it to the London Chronicle of July 5, 1761. We quote some other opinions:

"The novelty of West Indian scenery inspired him with the unpromising subject of the Sugar-cane, in which the very poetically dignifies the poor negroes with the name of 'swains.'"—Campbell's Essay on English Poetry.

"If Grainger has invoked the muse to sing of rats, and metamorphosed in Arcadian phrase negro slaves into swains, the fault is in the writer, not in the lyric. The arguments which he has prefixed are indeed ludicrously flat and formal."—ROBERT SCOTNEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., xi, 489, q. r.

And see also Johnson and Chalmers's Poets, 1810; Chalmers's Biog. Diet.

The Great Cham of Literature was also greatly delighted with Grainger's Ode on Solitude, which appeared in Dodsley's Collection:

"When repeating to me one day Grainger's Ode on Solitude, I shall never forget the concordance of the sound of his voice with the grandeur of these images; nor, indeed, the Gothic dignity of his aspect, his look and manner, when repeating sublime passages."—MISS REYNOLDS.

"He praised Grainger's Ode on Solitude in Dodsley's Collection, and repeated, with great energy, the exordium, . . . observing, 'This Sir, is very noble.'"—BOSWELL.

"In it (the Ode) are assembled some of the sublimest images in nature."—BISHOP PERCY.

In this vol. will also be found the correspondence of Grainger with his friend Bishop Percy, who commends him in no measured terms: "He was not only a man of genius and learning, but had many excellent virtues, being one of the most generous, friendly, and benevolent men I ever knew."

James Granger and many of the most eminent literary men of his Time, &c., 1805, 8vo.

As Granger's passion for portraits has been but little understood by some readers, it is but just to quote his own words in his vindication:

"In every age and nation distinguished for arts and learning, the inclination of transmitting the memory and even the features of illustrious persons to posterity has uniformly prevailed. The greatest poets, orators, and historians were contemporaries with the most celebrated painters, statuarys, and engravers of gems and medals: and the desire to be acquainted with a man's aspect has ever risen in proportion to the known excellence of his character and the admiration of his writings."

The publication of Granger's work excited an eager competition for portraits, and unfortunately many of his disciples carried their zeal to the highly-censurable extreme of mutilating valuable works for the sake of the portraits which they contained:

"Previously to the publication of the first edition of this work in 1749, five shillings was considered a liberal price by collectors for any English portrait: and the late Lord Oxford, Sir William Musgrave, and Richard Bull, Esq., have declared to several persons still living, that the most valuable prints in their Collections were purchased by them at, or under, that sum. But on the appearance of Mr. Granger's work, the rage to illustrate it with portraits was so prevalent, that scarcely a copy of a book ornamented with portraits could be found in an uncut state: and books of this description rose in price to five times their original value. Holland's 'Herologia,' Anderson's 'Genealogical History of the House of Yeury,' Dugdale's 'Origines Juridicales,' Birch's 'Lives of Illustrious Persons,' Collins's 'History of the Noble Houses of Vere and Cavendish,' Rapin's 'Clarke's,' 'History of England,' Smith's 'History of Virginia,' Clarke's and Lupton's 'Lives of Eminent Divines,' Knight's 'Lives of Erasmus and Dean Colci,' and all works of a similar description, have been freely plundered for the sake of their attractive embellishments."—Pref. to 5th ed. of Granger's Biog. Hist. of Eng.

Rowe Mores, in his criticism upon Ames's Catalogue of English Heads, is loud in his complaint of these mutilators—often deplorators:

"If this good for prints and thieving continous, let private owners and public libraries look well to their books, for there will not remain a valuable book ungarbled by their connoisseuring villany; for neither honesty nor oaths restrain them."

This is a tempting subject, but we must fly from it. We have touched upon a branch of this illustrating mania in our article on BAGFORD, JOUN. The literary merit of Granger's History is of a high order:

"Granger's Biographical History is full of curious anecdotes, but might have been better done; the dog is a Whig."—DR. JOHNSON.

"I have, since I saw you, read every word of Granger's Biographical History. It has entertained me exceedingly, and I do not think him the Wag that you supposed."—Boswell to Dr. Johnson, Aug. 30, 1776.

It is a curious fact that this remark, to "exceedingly," is generally quoted as Johnson's instead of Boswell's. Even Wright, one of Boswell's commentators, commits this serious error.

"I have no hesitation in designating it as a delightful and instructive book; but whoever republishes it should add the portraits of the different characters which were unknown to the author. Considering that Granger may be said to have first walked the field alone, it is surprising what he has done. His catalogue of engraved heads is immense. His style is always clear, pointed, and lively: and if he talked and preached as he wrote in his biographical history, it would have been difficult to have withdrawn attention from so intelligent a quarter."—D'Udin's Lib. Comp.

See Noble's Continuation of Granger's Hist.; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Chalmers's Biog. Dict., and authorities there cited. Respecting Illustrated Copies of books, see Dibdin's Bibliomania, ed. 1842, 500-511.

In our article on DIBDIN, THOMAS FROGNALL, we have noticed a number of illustrated copies of several of his works. Among the most splendid examples of illustrated works are—1. The Shakspeare, containing more than 2300 prints, bound in 20 vols., sold at Harrott's sale for £556 10s. 2. The Shakspeare in the possession of Earl Spencer, illustrated by Lady Leman; the labour of sixteen years. See Dibdin's Bibliomania, ed. 1842, p. 498. 3. The Bowyer Bible, in 45 folio vols., with more than 6000 prints, valued at 3000 guineas; put up to raffle among 4000 subscribers at a guinea each, and sold by the winner at auction to Mr. Willis, of Covent Garden, for £105. It subsequently became the property of Mr. John Albinson, of Bolton, and was sold at the sale of his library, March, 1856, to Mr. Robert Heywood, of Bolton, for £550. 4. The copy of Clarendon's Rebellion, illustrated by Alexander Hendras Sutherland, at an expense of nearly £10,000. To add to the wealth of this copy, Mrs. Sutherland paid eighty guineas for one plate, containing the portraits of James I. and his Queen, Anne of Denmark, by Renold Elstrake. 5. The copy of Lefevre's edit. of Voltaire's works, 1829-34, 90 vols. 8vo; sold in Paris, in 1856, for £223; estimated worth, £800. The illustration of the works of this mischievous writer and bad man cost the labour of twenty years; 12,000 engravings, of which 10,000 are portraits, are inserted. Of Granger's own work, we observe that Mr. Joseph Lilly and Mr. George Willis, of London, have each on hand at this moment (1856) a magnificent illustrated copy. Mr. Lilly's copy (which includes Noble's continuation) is illustrated by more than 1300 portraits, bound in 27 vols. imp. 4to, price £42. Mr. Willis's copy contains more than 3000 portraits, bound in 19 vols. fol., price £38 10s. It cost the former owner nearly £200. But we cannot regard a volume of this character without pain, not that we love portraits less, but books more: and how many noble tomes have been pillaged to add to the ill-gotten gains of "ILLUSTRATED COPIES!"

Grant, Mrs. Anne, 1755-1838, known as Mrs. Grant of Laggan, was a native of Glasgow, and the daughter of Duncan MacVicar, an officer in the British army. The latter was ordered to America in 1757, and was followed by his wife and child in the next year. When about eight years of age she became acquainted with "Madame Schuyler," of Albany, the widow of Colonel Philip Schuyler, and aunt to the distinguished general of that name, and enjoyed the advantages of her society for the remaining four years which she spent in America. The gratitude of the child has been vividly recorded in the portrait of Mrs. Schuyler, entitled Memoirs of an American Lady, pub. in 1808.

In 1768, at the age of 13, Anne returned with her parents to Scotland, and in 1779 was married to the Rev. James Grant, minister of the parish of Laggan, Invernesshire, who in 1801 left her a widow with eight children. After the death of her husband she resided for some time on a small farm near Laggan, subsequently in the vicinity of Stirling, and in 1810 removed to Edinburgh, where she remained until her death in 1838, at the age of 83. She enjoyed the friendship of Bishop Porteus, Sir Walter Farquhar, Sir William Grant, and Sir Walter Scott, by whose hand the memorial was drawn up which procured her a pension of £100 from the year 1826 until her death.

1. The Highlanders, and other Poems, Edin., 1803, 8vo. 3000 copies subscribed for. Repub., 1804, 8vo.

"Her Poetry is really not very good; and the most tedious, and certainly the least poetical, volume which she has produced, is that which contains her verses. The longest piece,—which she has entitled The Highlanders,—is heavy and uninteresting; and there is a want of compression and finish—a sort of loose, rambling, and indigestible air—in most of the others. Yet the whole collection is enlivened with the sparklings of a prolific fancy, and displays great command of language and facility of versification. When we write our article upon unsuccessful poetry, we shall endeavour to explain how these qualities may fall of success;—but in the mean time, we think there is an elegy upon an humble friend, and an address from a fountain, and two or three little pieces, which very fully deserve it,—and are written with great beauty, tenderness, and delicacy."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xviii. 481-482.

"Mrs. Grant in her Highlanders and other Poems respectfully assisted in sustaining the honours of the Scottish muse."—D. M. MOIR: Sketches of the Hist. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

2. Letters from the Mountains; being her Correspondence with her Friends, 1773-1803, Lon., 1806; 6th ed., edited, with Notes and Additions, by her son, J. P. Grant, 1845, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 1845, 2 vols. 24mo; 7th ed., 1853, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"No person, I believe, was so astonished at their success as myself."—MRS. GRANT.

"Her Letters from the Mountains, notwithstanding the repulsive affectation of the title, are among the most interesting collections of real letters that have lately been given to the public; and being indebted for no part of their interest to the celebrity of the names they contain or the importance of the events they narrate, afford, in their success, a more honourable testimony of the talents of the author. The great charm of the correspondence, indeed, is its perfect independence on artificial helps, and the air of fearlessness and originality which it has consequently assumed."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xviii. 481.

"The engaging volubility of youth apparent in the early part of the correspondence, and the good sense of more ripened years, are here equally pleasing. The sentiments of the author when occupying the various relative situations of a daughter, wife, mother, and protégée, are truly praiseworthy; while the display of a warm and lively imagination, correct and animated language, and strokes of real genius, with which the letters abound, present still further title to our approbation."—Lon. Monthly Review.

It is not surprising that Mrs. Grant is sometimes inaccurate in her statements, and we observe in a work just published the following criticism upon her account of the Massacre of Glencoe:

"I quote Mrs. Grant's authority only for what she herself heard and saw. Her account of the massacre was written apparently without the assistance of books, and is grossly incorrect. Indeed she makes a mistake of two years as to the date."—T. B. MACAULAY'S Hist. of Eng., vol. iv. 1856.

3. Memoirs of an American Lady; with Sketches of Manners and Scenery in America, as they existed previous to the Revolution, 1808, 2 vols. 12mo; 2d ed., 1809; N. York, 1809. The "American Lady" is MRS. SCHUYLER, (see ante;) but we have also the autobiography of the author's American life, and much other interesting matter.

"The Memoirs of an American Lady contains a very animated picture of that sort of simple, tranquil, patriarchal life, which was common enough within these hundred years in the central parts of England; but of which we are rather inclined to think there is no specimen left in the world;—and which is rendered more interesting in the present striking memorial, by the contrast of its sober and regulated tenor with the wildness of a settlement in the desert, and its combination with some peculiarities in the structure of society derived from the adopted usages of Switzerland and Germany."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xviii. 482.

"The character of the Lady, her way of keeping house on a large scale, the state of the domestic slaves, the customs of the young men of Albany, their practice of robbing one another in joke, &c., are novel and curious."

"Exceedingly instructive concerning the manners and customs which prevailed in New York Colony at the close of the Eighteenth Century."—W. H. SEWARD, (late Governor of New York): Preface to Nat. Hist. of New York.

"A faithful narrative of the manner and modes of life of the anti-revolutionary residents of Albany chiefly."—PRES. CHARLES KING.

"On the basis of her very youthful recollections, affected, without doubt, by the imaginations and prejudices of after-years, she constructed this work at the age of fifty-two. It is not without interest, as may appear by the references which we have made to it; but no one will suppose that it can make much pretension to accuracy."—ANDREWS NORTON: N. Amer. Rev., ix. 149; where see an account of Miss Lovell's remonstrances with Mrs. Grant respecting the injustice charged upon the Memoirs of the latter.

4. Essays on the Superstitions of the Highlanders of Scotland. To which are added Translations from the Gaelic, and Letters connected with those formerly published, 1811, 2 vols. 12mo.

"She has very great powers of description, both of character and scenery—much force of conception, acuteness, and reach of mind in reasoning—great occasional brightness, and perpetual activity of fancy,—and a fine enthusiasm for virtue, simplicity,—and the Highlands. . . . Though it be difficult, however, to keep pace with her enthusiasm in behalf of this singular race, we agree perfectly in her censure of the invidious indifference with which they have been hitherto regarded by the very same philosophers who think themselves well employed in collecting uncertain notices of far less interesting and less accessible nations. . . . The Letters annexed to these Essays are, like all Mrs. Grant's letters, lively, impressive, and original; though sometimes in bad taste, and generally verbose. For the benefit of those who have not seen her former collection, we annex a few specimens. . . . This, to be sure, is not exactly the style of Madame du Defand,—and yet there are very many people who will like it quite as well. And even those who would be most scandalized at the comparison must confess, that it indicates a far loftier, a far purer, and a far happier character, than that of the witty lady with whose it may be contrasted."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xviii. 482-4 3. 507, 510.

5. Eighteen Hundred and Thirteen; a Poem, 1814, 8vo. 6. Memoir and Correspondence of Mrs. Grant of Laggan, 1844, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1845, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1853, 2 vols. p. 8vo. These vols. consist of a sketch of Mrs. Grant's life, drawn up by herself, (in 1825, &c.) to the year 1806, and continued by her son, and of her letters between 1803—when she left Laggan for Woodend—and within a few months of her death in 1838. The following commendations of these vols.—from authorities of widely different character—are all for which we can find room:

"Most of Mrs. Grant's letters are rich in moral sentiment, and all are pre-eminent in refined social feeling. Her style of writing is so pure, and her modes of thinking and expressing herself upon every subject so true to nature, that no one of correct taste can rise from the perusal of her letters without a consciousness of real delight."—Lon. Evangelical Magazine.

"Abounds in anecdotes of many celebrated persons, well told, novel, and full of interest. Mrs. Grant discovers an astounding acuteness of intellect, a sagacity of discrimination, and what is better still, a fervour of religious feeling, rarely met with in any collection of letters in the whole range of English literature."—Court Journal.

This estimable lady was as great a favourite in the social circle as she was with those who only knew her through her enchanting volumes. Dr. Munro gives a graphic account of the pleasure which he experienced in her company at an evening party in Edinburgh:

"Mrs. Grant is really a woman of great talents and acquirements, and might, without offence to any one, talk upon any subject she pleases. But I assure you any person who hopes to meet with a blue stocking, in the ordinary sense of this term, in this lady, will feel sadly disappointed. . . . The sound and rational enjoyment I derived from my conversation with this excellent person would indeed atone for much more than all the blue stocking sisterhood have ever been able to inflict upon my patience."

Mr. De Quincey accidentally encountered Mrs. Grant and her beautiful daughter in a stage-coach, in 1808. The charms of the daughter of course were not lost upon the enthusiastic temperament of the Opium-Eater; but the conversation of the mother seems to have impressed him more deeply. In a review of his life, written many years later, he tells us, with much feeling:

"Her kindness to me was particularly flattering; and to this day I retain the impression of the benignity which she—an established wit, and just then receiving income from all quarters—showed in her manners to me—a person utterly unknown."—Literary Reminiscences.

Undoubtedly the writings of Mrs. Grant did much to awaken that taste for Scotland and its scenery, its traditions and its superstitions, which was at once stimulated and gratified by the poems, the novels, and the histories, of the author of Waverley. Than his there can be no higher commendation; and we are glad to be able to add it to the many tributes which have been offered to the eminent merits of Anne Grant of Laggan:

"Her writings, deservedly popular in her own country, derive their success from the happy manner in which, addressing themselves to the national pride of the Scottish people, they breathe a spirit at once of patriotism and of that candour which renders patriotism unselfish and liberal. We have no hesitation in asserting our belief that Mrs. Grant's writings have produced a strong and salutary effect upon her countrymen, who not only found recorded in them much of national history and antiquities which would otherwise have been forgotten, but found them combined with the soundest and the best lessons of virtue and morality."

Such is a brief extract from the application to King

George IV. for a pension to Mrs. Grant, written by Sir Walter Scott, and signed by himself, Lord Jeffrey, Henry Mackenzie, and other gentlemen. We have seen that it was successful. "We think that Mr. Grant has surpassed any of his former efforts, as respects his style, care, and industry, in the getting up of these sketches. There is everywhere manifested the most sincere desire to be accurate and just; or, if there be a leaning, it is never but to the favourable side. Above all, the reader cannot fail to perceive and fall in with the earnest sentiments of the author and the strain of piety which pervades the entire work."—Lon. Month. Rev.

"He imitated Waller; but, as that poet has been much excelled since, a faint copy of a faint master must strike still less."—HORACE WALPOLE: R. & N. Authors.

Yet it seems that his lordship had poetry enough for a nobleman, for great authorities thus laud his muse:

"Auspicious poet, wert thou not my friend,
How could I envy what I must commend;
But since 'tis Nature's law in love and wit,
That youth should reign, and withering age submit,
With less regret these laurels I resign,
Which, dying on my brows, revive on thine."
Dryden to Lord Lond-dunne on his "excellent tragedy," Heroic Love.

"'Tis yours, my lord, to bless our soft retreats,
And call the Muses to their ancient seats;
To paint anew the flow'ry sylvan scenes,
To crown the forests with immortal greens;
Make Windsor's hills in lofty numbers rise,
And lift her turrets nearer to the skies;
To sing those honours you deserve to wear,
And add new lustre to her silver star."

Grattan, Rt. Hon. Henry, M.P., 1750–1820, a native of Dublin, educated at Trinity College, in that city, entered the Irish Parliament in 1775, and distinguished himself by his eloquent advocacy of the rights of his country. For his services in procuring the repeal of the act which declared the legislative authority of the British Parliament over Ireland, he was voted £50,000 (reduced at his own request from £100,000) by the Irish legislature. After the Union he represented Malton, and subsequently the city of Dublin, in the Imperial Parliament. 1. Speeches in the Irish and in the Imperial Parliament. Edited by his son, Henry Grattan, Lon., 1822, 4 vols. 8vo. 2. Miscellaneous Works, 8vo. 3. Speeches; with a Commentary on his Career and Character, by D. O. Madden, Dublin, 1845, 8vo. 4. Memoirs of his Life and Times, by his son, Lon., 1839–45, 5 vols. 8vo.

"This truly valuable work will unquestionably form one of the most important and interesting additions to our biographical and historical literature that our own day has produced. It offers us a complete history of Ireland during the period of Grattan's life—and the only efficient one which has yet been placed on record."—Lon. Naval and Military Gazette.

"The splendid success which has imprinted his name to all ages upon the annals of his country, and the extraordinary merit by which that distinction was gained and his life still further illustrated in after-years, are by no means his highest praise. To him may be applied, with perhaps but one exception, the affectionate and beautiful words of Cicero respecting his son-in-law Plao:

"Verer, ne amore videri plura, quam fuerint in illo, dicere: quod non ita est; alia enim de illo majora dici possunt: nam nec continentia, nec pietate, nec ullo genere virtutis quendam ejusdem a-tatis cum illo conferendum puto."—Edin. Rev., xxxvii, 48–54, q. v.

Rev.*, xxviii, 113; a biographical and critical notice, and some of his speeches, in C. A. Goodrich's Select British Eloquence.

"Mr Grattan was the sole person in modern oratory of whom it could be said that he had attained the first class of eloquence in two parliaments, differing from each other in their tastes, habits, and prejudices as much, probably, as any two assemblies of different nations. The purity of his life was the brightness of his glory. . . . If I were to describe his character briefly, I should say, with the ancient historian, that he was 'Vita innocentissimus, ingenio florentissimus, proposito sanctissimus.'"—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

"He was a man of singular candour and of great moderation; and, from his entrance into public life to the close of his illustrious career, gave signal proofs of his moderation, of his extreme forbearance, nay, of his gentleness."—LORD BROUGHAM: Speech in House of Commons June 26, 1825. Grattan, Thomas Colley, an Irish novelist, b. in Dublin, in 1796, whose works have obtained considerable celebrity, has spent much time on the continent of Europe, and was from 1839 to 1853 British Consul at Boston, where he wrote two of his most popular works. 1. Philibert; a Poetical Romance, Bordeaux, 1819, r. 8vo; Lon., 8vo. This tale is founded on the History of the false Martin Guerre, reported in the Causés Célebres. 2. High-Ways and By-Ways; or, Tales of the Road-Side, pecked up in the French Provinces, by a Walking Gentleman, 1823, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 2d series, 1824, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 3d series, 1827, 3 vols. p. 8vo. New eds. have been pub.

"Having thus amply allowed the author and his book to speak for themselves, we have only to observe that the style is throughout sustained with equal vigour as in the above specimens; and we may safely pronounce this work to be executed in a manner worthy of the patriotic motive which the author proposed to himself in its composition—the eradication of national prejudices."—*Edin. "In this second series of the adventures of this famous regiment, the author extends his narrative from the first formation of the gallant 88th up to the occupation of Paris. All the battles, sieges, and skirmishes in which the regiment took part are described. . . . The work bears all the characteristics of a soldier's straightforward and entertaining narrative."

"He (Sir William Petty) is author of the ingenious deductions from the bills of mortality which go under the name of Mr. Graunt."—Evelyn's Memoirs.

"This work is not only one of the earliest, but also one of the best, of its class. It is said by Evelyn in his Memoirs, (i. 475, 4to ed.) and by Dr. Halley in his paper referred to below, that Sir William Petty was the real author of the Observations. But, notwithstanding the deference due to their authority, it may be doubted whether there be any good ground for this statement."—*McCulloch's Lit. of Publ. Graves, Richard, 1715–1804, a native of Gloucestershire, Rector of Claverton, near Bath, and of Kilmersdon, was author of a number of popular works, now generally forgotten. Among the best-known are The Festoon, or Collection of Epigrams; Lucubrations in Prose and Verse, pub. under the name of Peter Pomfret; The Spiritual Quixote; Eugenius, or Anecdotes of the Golden Bull; Columella, or the Distressed Anchorite; Plexippus, or the Aspiring Plebeian; political pieces, under the name of Euphrosyne; Sermons on various subjects; Recollections of Shenstone; translations from Antoninus, Herodian, Xenophon, &c. His last publication was The Invalid, with the obvious means of enjoying Life by a Nonagenarian. His most popular work, often reprinted, was The Spiritual Quixote; which was intended as a satire on the itinerant and illiterate preachers among the Methodists. The subject was hardly a suitable one for a divine; nor, indeed, for any one else.

Graves, Richard, D.D. 1763-1829, a native of Kilmarnock, Limerick, was educated at Trin. Coll., Dublin, of which he became Fellow in 1786; Dean of Ardagh, 1813; and Regius Prof. of Divinity in the University. He pub. a number of sermons and theological works, of which we particularly notice—1. Essay on the Character of the Apostles and Evangelists; designed to prove that they were not Enthusiasts, Lon., 1799, 8vo.

"A book which deserves to be consulted."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

2. Lects. on the 4 last Books of the Pentateuch. These Lects. were delivered at the Donellan Lecture, 1797-1801. They were originally pub. in 2 vols. 8vo, 1807. Three Lectures were added to the second and subsequent eds. Last ed., 1846, 8vo. Few works of the kind are more highly esteemed.

"This is a work of learning and merit. Dr. Graves examines very minutely the authenticity and truth of the Mosaic history, and the theological and moral principles of the Jewish law; and replies, at great length, to the most plausible objections. With Dr. Geddes in particular, he maintains a very determined conflict, and exposes, very successfully, the infidel reasonings of that arrogant writer. He also frequently combats Le Clerc and Warburton."—Orme's B. Bib. Bib.

"Indispensably necessary to the biblical student."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

Gray, Asa, M.D. Fisher Prof. of Natural History at the University of Cambridge, Massachusetts, b. at Paris, Oneida county, New York, Nov. 18, 1810; took the degree of M.D. at Fairfield College, 1831, but relinquished the medical profession for the purpose of prosecuting the study of botany; appointed botanist to the U. States Exploring Expedition, 1834, but, in consequence of the delay of that enterprise, resigned his post in 1837; elected Prof. of Botany in the University of Michigan, and before that institution went into operation, elected to his present situation in 1842. In addition to his lectures at the University, he has delivered three courses of Lowell Lectures in Boston. In the prosecution of his botanical studies, he visited Europe, 1838-39 and in 1850-51. See Men of the Time, N. York, 1852. The reputation of this distinguished gentleman is too widely extended to render any commendation upon our part at all necessary.

He resided in Boston until his decease, and filled several important public positions, having been a representative, a senator, and a member of the governor's council.

Mr. Gray's publications are as follows:

1. Address to the Massachusetts Charitable Fire Society at their annual meeting, Oct. 10, 1817. 2. Speech in the House of Representatives of Mass., on the bill to abolish capital punishment, March 19, 1836. 8. Poem before Φ B K Society at Cambridge, Aug. 27, 1840.

"The spirit of the composition is thoroughly patriotic and American, and this we rejoice to see; for Mr. Gray is deeply read in the literature of Europe, and knows, by personal observation, what there is attractive in foreign associations and foreign modes of life. His mind is richly stored with various and accurate knowledge, gathered by study and travel; and he can judge, if any man can, what sources of poetical inspiration are to be found in American history and scenery as compared with Europe. The glowing strain that patriotic feeling dictates to so enlightened a mind as Mr. Gray's cannot fail to make a strong impression."—N. Amer. Rev., iii, 262-265.

Gray, Thomas, Dec. 26, 1716—July 30, 1771, the celebrated author of the Elegy written in a Country Church-yard, was a native of Cornhill, London, in which city his father followed the occupation of a money-scrivener. The latter was a man of violent passions and brutal manners, and it was to his excellent mother that the future poet was indebted for those opportunities of education which he enjoyed, first at Eton School, and subsequently (1734-38) at Peter-house, Cambridge. In 1738 he returned to London, with the intention of pursuing the study of the law. He was soon discouraged, however, by the difficulties of the preliminary branches, and not unwilling to accede to his friend Horace Walpole's request to accompany him on a tour on the continent. "In the study of the law," says Gray in a letter to West, "the labour is long, and the elements dry and uninteresting; nor was there ever anybody (especially those that afterwards made a figure in it) amused, or even not disgusted, at the beginning." In such a frame of mind, the invitation to visit the classic land of Italy, in company with the lively Horace, must have been received with no little delight.

In the spring of 1739 the travellers left London, and continued together until 1741, when they parted at Reggio, after many unhappy disputes, for which Walpole, according to his own confession, was most to blame. At a later period of life their friendly relations were renewed in consequence of Walpole's amicable overtures, which were received in a proper spirit by the poet.

In September, 1741, Gray returned to London, and in 1742 took his degree at Cambridge of Bachelor of Civil Law. His father was now dead, and he resolved to settle permanently at Cambridge; and, with the exception of occasional trips to Wales, Scotland, and the Lakes of Westmoreland, and a three years' residence in London, for convenience of access to the British Museum, he resided in this place for the balance of his life. In 1756, in consequence of the annoyance which he experienced from the "rudeness and boisterous practical jokes of some riotous young men in the same college building," he removed from Peter-house, which was endeared by the acquaintance of more than twenty years, to Pembroke-hall, where now resided some of his intimate friends. In 1757 he declined the office of Poet-Laureate, vacated by the death of Cibber. In 1762 he made an unsuccessful application for the professorship of Modern History at Cambridge, worth £400 per annum; but this post was conferred upon him by the Duke of Grafton in 1768. For this act of kindness his Grace was rewarded by Gray's Ode on the Installation of the Duke of Grafton to the Chancellorship of the University of Cambridge, to which he was elected in 1769. The duties of his professorship were practically neglected by the new incumbent, although he taught the languages by proxy, and contemplated the delivery of a course of lectures, the preparation of which was cut short by his death. On the 24th of July, 1771, while at dinner in the college-hall, he was seized with gout in the stomach, which proved fatal on the evening of the 30th of the same month.

A detailed account of the literary life and literary dreams of this ripe scholar and estimable man—his warm friendships, his embarrassing sensitiveness, and the magnificent visions of immortal labours which haunted his mind but never saw the light—will not be expected in the narrow limits to which we are confined. In the biographies of Johnson, Mathias, Chalmers, Mason, Mitford, and of Henry Reed,—prefixed to his edit. of the Poems of Gray pub. by Henry C. Baird, Phila., 1850, 12mo,—and in the letters, &c. of Walpole, Nicholls, Forbes, Boswell, Bowles, Beattie, and other notices of the men of the times in which the poet lived, will be found sufficient to gratify the curiosity and delight of the most enthusiastic of his admirers.

It now becomes our duty to lay before the reader the opinions of a number of eminent critics upon the merits of the principal productions of an author who must always occupy an exalted rank among the greater poets of England.

1. Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College. Written in 1742; pub. in 1747, fol.

"The Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College is more mechanical and commonplace [than the Elegy in a Country Church-yard]; but it touches on certain strings about the heart, that vibrate in unison with it to our latest breath. No one ever passes by Windsor's 'stately heights,' or sees the distant spires of Eton College below, without thinking of Gray. He deserves that we should think of him; for he thought of others, and turned a trembling, ever-watchful ear to 'the still sad music of humanity.'"—Hazlitt's Lectures on the Eng. Poets.

Of Dr. Johnson's comments on this Ode it is enough to quote the first six lines as a specimen of the hypercriticism in which this great writer sometimes unwarrantably indulges:

"The Prospect of Eton College suggests nothing to Gray which every other beholder does not equally think and feel. His supplication to Father Thames, to tell him who drives the hoop or tosses the ball, is useless and superfluous. Father Thames has no better means of knowing than himself."—Life of Gray.

This undignified sneer has been well rebuked by Mr. Mitford:

"Are we by this rule of criticism to judge the following passage in the twentieth chapter of Rabelais? 'As they were sitting together, the princess cast her eyes on the river that flowed before her.' 'Answer,' said she, 'great Father of Waters, thou that rollest thy floods through eighty nations, to the invocation of the daughter of thy native king. Tell me, if thou wastest, through all thy course, a single habitation from which thou dost not hear the murmurs of complaint?'"

This is an admirable specimen of the argumentum ad hominem. But, if Dr. Johnson has unduly appreciated this Ode, a later authority, of no contemptible rank, has perhaps greatly overrated it:

"Gray has, in his ode on Eton College, whether we consider the sweetness of the versification or its delicious train of plaintive tenderness, rivalled every lyric effort of ancient or modern times."—DR. DRAKE: Literary Hours.

2. Ode on Spring. Written in 1742.

"His Ode on Spring has something poetical, both in the language and the thought; but the language is too luxuriant, and the thoughts have nothing new."—DR. JOHNSON: Life of Gray.

3. Hymn to Adversity. Written in 1742.

"The hint was at first taken from 'O Diva, gratum quæ regis Antium;' but Gray has exceeded his original by the variety of his sentiments, and by their moral application. Of this piece, at once poetical and rational, I will not, by slight objections, violate the dignity."—DR. JOHNSON: Life of Gray.

4. Elegy written in a Country Church-yard. Commenced in 1742, revised from time to time, and completed in 1749; pub. by Dodsley in Feb. 1751. There is a tradition that the Elegy was composed in the "precincts of the Church of Granchester, about two miles from Cambridge; and the curfew is supposed to have been the great bell of St. Mary's."

The popularity of this exquisite composition was immediate and extensive. Gray himself tells the story in a note on the margin of a manuscript copy of the Elegy preserved at Cambridge among the poet's papers:

"Published in Feb. 1751, by Dodsley, and went thro' four ed-tions in two months; and afterwards a 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th; printed also in 1753 with Mr. Bentley's Designs, of which there is a 2d edition, and again by Dodsley in his Miscellany, vol. iv., and in a Scotch collection call'd the Union, translated into Latin by 'Mr. Anstey, Esq., and the Rev. Mr. Roberts, and publish'd in 1762; and again in the same year by Rob. Lloyd, M.A."

The reader is, of course, an ardent admirer of the Elegy, and therefore will not be displeas'd to read the enthusiastic encomiums which have been lavished upon it by critics who have earned a right to be heard with respect:

"It is a poem which is universally understood and admir'd; not only for its poetical beauties, but also, and perhaps chiefly, for its expressing sentiments in which every man thinks himself interested, and which at certain times are familiar to all men."—DR. BEATTIE.

"Had Gray written nothing but his Elegy, high as he stands, I am not sure that he would not stand higher; it is the corner-stone of his glory. . . . Gray's Elegy pleased instantly and eternally."—LORD BYRON.

The eulogy of General Wolfe is almost too well known to bear repetition. The night before the attack on Quebec, in which he lost his life, he declared to his fellow-soldiers—"Now, gentlemen, I would rather be the author of that poem than take Quebec."

"I know not what there is of spell in the following simple line: 'The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep;'" but no frequency of repetition can exhaust its touching charm. This fine poem overcame even the spiteful enmity of Johnson, and forced him to acknowledge its excellence."—SIR S. EGERTON BRIDGES: Imaginative Biography.

The remark—"spiteful enmity of Johnson"—is in very bad taste, and moreover very unjust; but Sir Egerton was not the most amiable of mortals. Johnson's commendation of the Elegy is hearty, enthusiastic, and gladly accorded:

"In the character of his Elegy I rejoice to concur with the common reader; for by the common sense of readers, uncorrupted with literary prejudices, after all the refinements of subtilty and the dogmatism of learning, must be finally decid'd all claim to poetical honours. The Churchyard abounds with images which find a mirror in every mind, and with sentiments to which every bosom returns an echo. The four stanzas beginning 'yet even these bones,' are to me original; I have never seen the notions in any other place; yet he that reads them here persuades himself that he has always felt them. Had Gray written often thus, it had been vain to blame and useless to praise him."—Life of Gray.

Yet there is much truth in the remark of a modern critic, that the Elegy owes its popularity not altogether to "the strain of thought:"

"There is a charm in metre, as there is in music; it differs of the same kind, though the relation may be remote; and it differs less in degree, perhaps, than one who has not an ear for poetry can believe. . . . Gray's Elegy owes much of its popularity to its strain of verse; the strain of thought alone, natural and touching as it is, would never have impressed it upon the hearts of thousands and tens of thousands, unless the diction and metre in which it was embodied had been perfectly in unison with it. Beattie ascribed its general reception to both causes. [see above]. . . . Neither cause would have sufficed for producing so general and extensive and permanent an effect, unless the poem had been, in the full import of the word, harmonious."—Southey's Life of Cooper.

"Gray's Pindaric Odes are, I believe, generally given up at present, [not so] they are stately and pedantic; a kind of methodical borrowed phrensy. But I cannot so easily give up, nor will the world be in any haste to part with, his Elegy in a Country Church-yard; it is one of the most classical productions that ever was penned by a refined and thoughtful mind moralizing on human life. Mr. Coleridge (in his Literary Life) says that his friend Mr. Wordsworth had undertaken to show that the language of the Elegy is unintelligible; it has, however, been understood!"—Hazlitt's Lectures on the English Poets.

"Of smaller poems, the Elegy of Gray may be considered as the most exquisite and finished example in the world of the effect resulting from the intermixture of evening scenery and pathetic reflection."—Drake's Literary Hours.

This is a specimen of the censurable extravagance of which enthusiasm is so often guilty. Had Mr. Drake read all the poetry of this species "in the world" and, if so, (of course an impossibility,) did his memory retain it with such faithfulness as to enable him to make the comparison with the results of which he favours us?

In a similar strain of hyperbole, Mr. Mathias assures us that, as a poet, Gray is "second to none."

Such exaggeration is in very bad taste. We shall see, before we have done with our examination of Gray's poetry, that this is not the only instance in which Mr. Mathias's enthusiasm has caused the critic to degenerate into the rhapsodist.

An interesting subject connected with the Elegy is the number of translations of it which have been made in various languages. And here we cannot do better than quote an extract from the biography of Gray—already referred to—by our valued and lauded friend, the late Professor Henry Reed:

"One peculiar and remarkable tribute to the merit of The Elegy is to be noticed in the great number of translations which have been made of it into various languages, both of ancient and modern Europe. It is the same kind of tribute which has been rendered to 'Robinson Crusoe' and to 'The Pilgrim's Progress,' and is proof of the same universality of interest, transcending the limits of language and of race. To no poem in the English language has the same kind of homage been paid so abundantly. Of what other poem is there a polyglot edition? Italy and England have competed with their polyglot editions of 'The Elegy.' Torri's, bearing the title, 'Elegia di Tommaso Gray sopra un Cimitero di Campagna, tradotta dell' Inglese in più lingue. Verona, 1817; Livorno, 1843; and Van Voorst's London edition.

"The following list of the translations will perhaps best illustrate this unwonted tribute to a poet's genius:

"Hebrew, by G. Venturi, an eminent Italian Oriental scholar, who in his version limited himself to use of words, and, as far as possible, phrases, found in the Old Testament.

"Greek, by Professor Cooke, Cambridge, 1775; Dr. Norbury, Eton, 1793; Bishop Sparke, London, 1794; Dr. Coote, London, 1794; Stephen Weston, London, 1794; Edward Tew, London, 1795; and the Epitaph alone, by J. Plumtree, 1793; and the Elegy by Cypriano.

"Latin, by Robert Lloyd, 1762; W. H. Roberts, Cambridge, 1762, and London, 1778; Signor Gio. Costa, Padua, 1772; Gilbert Wakefield, Cambridge, 1776; Christopher Anstey, London, 1778; Anonymous, Cambridge; S. N. E., London, 1824; W. Hillyard; J. H. Macaulay, in the 'Arundines Causi'; G. F. Barbieri; Ben del Bene; G. Venturi.

"Italian, by M. Cesarotti, Padua, 1772; G. Gennari, Padua, 1772; Dr. Giannini, London, 1782; G. Torelli, Verona, 1776; D. Trant, (prose); M. Lastri; A. Buttura; P. Baraldi; M. Castellani; Elisabetta Secler Bondi, (prose); M. Leoni; L. Mancini; Cavazzola D. Grevori, Rome, 1821.

"Portuguese, by Boulard.

"French, by De Berchère, Hookham, 1778; L. D. Chatham, 1806; Anonymous, (prose), Paris, 'an vi.'; Le Tourneur, Dubois, Cabanis, Chénier, Fayolle, Kérivantant, Gréjus, Charriin, Le Mièrre, Villeneuve, Fontanes, Chateaubriand.

"German, by Gotter, Gotha, 1778; Senne, Riga, 1801; Kosegarten, 1793; Mason; Müller; Rupprecht.

"This list is compiled from several authorities, but chiefly from an article selected from a German miscellany for 'The Literary World,' New York, Oct. 1849; and from several communications to that novel and useful periodical, 'Notes and Queries,' London, 1850."

An interesting account of the sale of the Library of Gray (27th Nov., 1845) will be found in the Gentleman's Magazine for January, 1846, 29-33. From another authority we quote a graphic description of the sale of the original manuscript of the Elegy:

"The original manuscript of Gray's Elegy was lately sold at auction in London. There was really 'a scene' in the auction-room. Imagine a stranger entering in the midst of a sale of some rusty-looking old books. The auctioneer produces two small half-sheets of paper, written over, torn, and mutilated. He calls it 'a most interesting article,' and apologizes for its condition. Picking bids ten pounds! Rodd, Foss, Thorpe, Bohn, Holloway, and some few amateurs quietly remark, twelve, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, thirty, and so on, till there is a pause at sixty-three pounds! The hammer strikes. 'Hold,' says Mr. Foss. 'It is mine,' says the amateur. 'No, I bid sixty-five in time.' 'Then I bid seventy.' 'Seventy-five,' says Mr. Foss; and five are repeated again, until the two bits of paper are knocked down, amidst a general cheer, to Payne & Foss, for one hundred pounds sterling! On these bits of paper are written the first drafts of the Elegy in a Country Churchyard, by Thomas Gray, including five verses which were omitted in publication, and with the poet's interlinear corrections and alterations,—certainly an 'interesting article;' several persons supposed it would call for a ten-pound note, perhaps even twenty. A single volume, with 'W. Shakspeare' in the fly-leaf, produced, sixty years ago, a hundred guineas; but probably, with that exception, no mere autograph, and no single sheet of paper, ever produced the sum of five hundred dollars!"

The purchaser of this precious MS. was Mr. Penn, of Stoke Pogis, who also purchased the MS. of The Long Story, for £45. The MS. of the Elegy was sold in August, 1854, to Mr. Wrightson, of Birmingham, for £131. See Gent. Mag. for Sept. 1854, 272. At this sale the entire collection of Gray MSS. sold for £418 7s. See also the London Athenæum, 1854, 941, 696.

5. The Alliance of Education and Government: an unfinished ethical poem of 107 lines; commenced in 1748. The first fifty-seven lines of this poem were transmitted by Gray to Dr. Wharton:

"I fill my paper with the beginning of an essay; what name to give it I know not; but the subject is the Alliance of Education and Government: I mean to show that they must both concur to produce great and useful men."

Of this poem Dr. Johnson remarks
"The fragments which remain have many excellent lines."—Life of Gray.

But these "excellent lines" elicited a warmer commendation from the historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire:

"Instead of compiling tables of chronology and natural history, why did not Mr. Gray apply the powers of his genius to finish the philosophic poem of which he has left such an exquisite specimen?"

Mr. Nicholls put the same question to Gray himself, and the poet gave a prompt and frank response to the query: see Nicholls's Reminiscences of Gray.

6. Ode to Vicissitude. The fragment to which this title was given was written in 1754.

"Sir Egerton Brydges, through whose multifarious works there is scattered much fine appreciation of both the strength and the weakness of Gray's character, has spoken of this poem as the 'sublime lyrical fragment on Vicissitude,' 'in which' (he adds) 'I do not hesitate to pronounce the following stanza among the most perfect specimens which the poetry of any country can produce:

'Yesterday the sullen year

Saw the snowy whirlwind fly;

Mute was the music of the air;

The herd stood drooping by;

Their raptures now that wildly flow,

No yesterday nor morrow know;

'Tis man alone that joy describes

With forward and reverted eyes."

HENRY R. ED. Memoir of Gray.

7. The Progress of Poesy; a Pindaric Ode. Completed in 1755. 8. The Bard; a Pindaric Ode. Commenced in 1755. Both 7 and 8 were printed at the Strawberry-Hill Press, by Horace Walpole, in 1757, 4to.

"I found Gray in town last week. He brought his two odes to be printed. I snatched them out of Dodsley's hands, and they are to be the first-fruits of my press."—WALPOLE.

The Pindaric Odes were not popular: they were neglected by the public and laughed at by the wits,—nay, openly burlesqued by George Colman the elder, and Robert Lloyd, in the odes To Obscurity and To Oblivion,—the first intended for Gray and the second for Mason:

"Little did the two wits think how small, in comparison with Gray, they would appear in the eyes of posterity; and that 'The Bard, which was then neglected by the public, would in the course of the next generation, become the most popular ode in the English language.'—SOUTHEY: Life of Unper.

But Colman, in his Miscellaneous Works, pub. in 1787, amply vindicates Lloyd and himself against the charge of ill-nature.

The best proof of their want of adaptation to the public comprehension and taste is the fact of their general neglect. Dr. Johnson describes them as

"Two compositions at which the readers of poetry were at first content to gaze in mute amazement. Some that tried them confessed their inability to understand them, though Warburton said that they were understood as well as the works of Milton and Shakspeare, which it is the fashion to admire. Garrick wrote a few lines in their praise. Some hardy champions undertook to rescue them from neglect; and in a short time many were content to be shown beauties which they could not see."—Life of Gray. Read the whole of this critique.

Walpole admired the Odes greatly, but admitted their unpopularity:

"'You are very particular,' he remarks to Montague, 'in liking Gray's Odes; but you must remember the age likes Akenside and did like Thompson! Can the same people like both!'"

Mr. Forster thinks that Walpole's admiration was rather extravagant:

"Two noble productions, it must surely be admitted, whatever of evil can be urged against them: though not to be admired as Walpole admired."—Life of Goldsmith.

Gray himself draws an amusing picture of the public distaste:

"Even my friends tell me they (the Odes) do not succeed, and write me moving topics of consolation on that head. In short, I have heard of nobody but an actor [Barriek] and a doctor of divinity [Warburton] that profess their esteem for them. Oh yes! a lady of quality, (a friend of Mason's), who is a great reader. She knew there was a compliment to Dryden, but never suspected there was any thing said about Shakspeare or Milton till it was explained to her, and wishes that there had been titles prefixed to tell what they were about."—Letter to Mr. Hurd, afterwards Bishop of Liefield and Coventry.

Forster remarks that Gray might have added to the admirers of the Odes "the poor monthly critic of The Dunciad."

The "poor monthly critic" thus referred to was no less a person than Oliver Goldsmith, then a hack-writer for Griffith. See our Life of Goldsmith, in this volume.

The original review lies before us now, and we would fain quote from it copiously, to show both the merits of the reviewer and his hearty and intelligent appreciation of his author. As for us, we never read six lines of Goldsmith—either his poetry or his prose—without finding our rather familiar fondness for the man awed into admiring respect for the writer. Where, excepting in the epigrammatic conciseness which distinguishes some of his descriptions of national characteristics in his poem of The Traveller, shall we find so exquisite and faithful a miniature of a whole people as in the following lines?

"He speaks to a people not easily impressed with new ideas, extremely tenacious of the old; with difficulty warmed, and as slowly cooling again. How assaulted then to our national character is that species of poetry which rises upon us with unexpected flights! where we must hastily catch the thought, or it falls from us; and, in short, where the Reader must largely partake of the Poet's enthusiasm in order to taste of his beauties."—Review of Odes by Mr. Gray, Len. Month. Rev., xvii. 230-243; Sept. 1757.

The critic proceeds to declare that certain passages of The Bard, which he cites,

"Will give as much pleasure to those who relish this species of composition as any thing that has hitherto appeared in our language, the odes of Dryden himself not excepted."

"His Odes did not, nor yet do they, please like his Elegy."—LORD BYRON.

We have already quoted with dissent a disparaging comment on the Odes, by Hazlitt, and promised to quote a eulogy from the extravagance of which we also dissent, by Mr. Mathias:

"There is not another ode in the English language which is constructed like these two compositions: with such power, such majesty, and such sweetness, with such proportioned pauses and just cadences, with such regulated measures of the verse, with such master-principles of lyrical art displayed and exemplified, and at the same time, with such a concealment of the difficulty, which is lost in the softness and uninterrupted flowing of the lines in each stanza, with such a musical magic that every verse in it in succession dwells on the ear and harmonizes with that which has gone before."

Much of the above, considered as description, is undoubtedly true; perhaps all of it is true: but this lavish use of superlatives which has, unfortunately for the interests of legitimate criticism, become so common—this "best in the language,"—"the best in any language,"—"unrivalled,"—"unsurpassed"—is our special aversion. It is generally ignorance and vulgarity, always arrogance and bad taste. No writer is "the best," no woman "the handsomest," no man "the wittiest," no gallant "the most polite;" or, if so in fact, it can never be established by demonstration.

9. Ode on the Installation of the Duke of Grafton to the Chancellorship of the University of Cambridge. Written in 1769. Pub. 1769, 4to.

"I thought myself bound in gratitude to his grace, unasked, to take upon me the task of writing these verses, which are usually set to music, on this occasion. I do not think them worth sending you, because they are by nature doomed to live but a single day; or, if their existence is prolonged beyond that date, it is only by means of newspaper parodies and witless criticisms. This sort of abuse I had reason to expect, but did not think it worth while to avoid."—Gray to Beattie.

This Ode has also been rewarded by the praises of critics of no ordinary authority. Mr. Hallam dwells with pleasure upon "That beautiful stanza where he has made the founders of Cambridge to pass before our eyes like shadows over a magic glass."—Const. Hist. of Eng.

"I think there is something very majestic in Gray's Installation Ode."—COLERIDGE.

10. Letters of Gray, written at various times to West, Walpole, Wharton, Mason, Nicholls, and Bunnetten. These comprise all of his letters, with the exception of about twenty. They are his chief prose compositions, and certainly support the theory that the best poets are also the best writers of prose.

"I once thought Swift's letters the best that could be written, but I like Gray's better. His humour, or his wit, or whatever it is to be called, is never ill-natured or offensive, and yet, I think, equally poignant with the Dean's."—COWPER.

"He that reads his epistolary narration wishes that to travel and to tell his travels had been more of his employment; but it is by studying at home that we must obtain the ability of travelling with intelligence and improvement."—DR. JOHNSON: Life of Gray.

"I am acquainted with many parts of your excursion through the north of England, and very glad that you had my old friend Mr. Gray's Letters with you, which are indeed so well written that I have no scruple to pronounce them the best letters that have been printed in our language. Lady Montagu's are not without merit, but are too artificial and affected to be confided in as true, and Lord Chesterfield's have much greater faults.—Indeed, some of the greatest that letters can have: but Gray's letters are always sensible, and of classical conciseness and perspicuity. They very much resemble what his conversation was."—DR. BEATTIE: Letter to a Friend.

"His letters are infinitely fine. If his poems are sometimes finical and pedantic, his prose is quite free from affectation. He pours his thoughts out upon paper as they arise in his mind; and they arise in his mind without pretence or constraint, from the pure impulse of learned leisure and contemplative indolence. He is not here on stilts or on buckram, but smiles in his easy-chair as he moralizes through the loopholes of his retreat on the bustle and rattle-show of the world, or 'those reverend bedlams—colleges and schools.' He had nothing to do but to read and think, and to tell his friends what he read and thought. His life was a luxurious, thoughtful dream."—HAZLITT: Lectures on the English Poets.

When there is so much to be done in this world, so much ignorance to be instructed, error to be rectified, vice to be reformed, and impiety to be extirpated and misery to be consoled, we envy not that man who has no better record to meet him on the Great Day than that "his life was a luxurious, thoughtful dream."

But to continue our quotations respecting Gray's Letters: "Delightful indeed are these Letters: evincing the taste of a virtuoso, the attainments of a scholar, and the gaiety of a classical wit."—DIBBIN: Lib. Comp.

"Read Gray's Letters on his Tour to the Lakes. He saw little, and that little hastily; but what he did see he sketched with the pen infinitely. The touches with which he occasionally gives life and spirit to the delineation are exquisite. Yet in Gray's prose, as in his verse, there is something affected; and his wit, though very refined and pure, has the air of being forced. The description of the sunrise (Let. 6) is incomparably fine."—GREEN: Diary of a Lover of Lit.

Having thus noticed the principal productions of Gray, we presume that the reader will be gratified by some quotations respecting the general characteristics of an author so justly distinguished in the Republic of Letters.

"Perhaps he was the most learned man in Europe. He was equally acquainted with the elegant and profound parts of science, and that not superficially, but thoroughly. He knew every branch of history, both natural and civil; had read all the original historians of England, France, and Italy; and was a great antiquarian. Criticism, metaphysics, morals, politics, made a principal part of his study; voyages and travels of all sorts were his favourite amusements; and he had a fine taste in painting, prints, architecture, and gardening."—REV. WM. TEMPLE: Letter to James Boswell.

The grandiloquent phrase—"the most learned man in Europe"—is very observable. What were Mr. Temple's opportunities and capacity for gauging all the learning of all Europe? But upon this fault of exaggeration we have already desecrated at length, here and elsewhere, in the present volume.

Gray undoubtedly possessed some knowledge of architecture. In our article on EDWARD BENTHAM we have taken occasion to correct an error respecting Gray's supposed share in the History of Ely Cathedral.

"I am sorry you did not see Mr. Gray on his return. You would have been much pleased with him. Setting aside his merit as a poet, which, however, in my opinion, is greater than any of his contemporaries can boast, in this or any other nation, I found him possessed of the most exact taste, the soundest judgment, and most extensive learning."—DR. BEATTIE: Letter to a Friend.

"What has occurred to me from the slight inspection of his Letters in which my undertaking has engaged me is, that his mind had a large grasp; that his curiosity was unlimited and his judgment cultivated; that he was a man likely to love much where he loved at all, but that he was fastidious and hard to please. His contempt, however, is often employed, where I hope it will be approved, upon scepticism and infidelity. . . . He has a kind of strutting dignity, and is tall by walking on tiptoe. His art and his struggle are too visible, and there is too little appearance of ease and nature.

"To say that he has no beauties would be unjust: a man like him, of great learning and great industry, could not but produce something valuable. When he pleases least, it can only be said that a good design was ill directed. His translations of Northern and Welsh Poetry deserve praise; the imagery is preserved, perhaps often improved; but the language is unlike the language of other poets."—DR. JOHNSON: Life of Gray.

The "fastidiousness" and effeminacy of the poet would appear to have formed prominent points in his character:

"There is no character without some speck, some imperfection; and I think the greatest defect in his was an affectation in delicacy, or rather effeminacy, and a visible fastidiousness, or contempt and disdain of his inferiors in science."—REV. WILLIAM TEMPLE: Letter to James Boswell.

"His faculties were endowed with uncommon strength; he thought with a manly nervousness; and he penetrated forcibly into every subject which engaged his attention. But his petty manners were disagreeably effeminate and fastidious; his habits wanted courage and hardness; and his temper and spirits were a prey to feebleness, indolence, and trivial discouragements. His heart was pure; and his conduct, I firmly believe, stained with no crime. He loved virtue for its own sake, and felt a just and never-slackened indignation at vice. But the little irritations of his daily temper were too much affected by trifles; he loved to assume the character of the fine gentleman—a mean and odious ambition in any one, but surely to be forgiven in a man of genius! He would shrug his shoulders and distort his voice into fastidious tones, and take upon himself the airs of what folly is pleased to call high company."—SIR S. EGERTON BRIDGES: Traits in the Literary Character of Gray the Poet: Cms. Lit., ed. 1815, viii. 216-221, q. v.

But Mason remarks in Gray's defence that his effeminacy was affected most

"Before those whom he did not wish to please; and that he is unjustly charged with making knowledge his sole reason of preference, as he paid his esteem to none whom he did not likewise believe to be good."

"There has always appeared to me an effort and elaboration in Gray's compositions very remote from the general spirit of poetical effusion. They are exquisite pieces of mosaic, curiously wrought, of the rarest precious gems; but in which we vainly look for the bold design, free handling, and glowing excellencies of a great painter."—GREEN: Diary of a Lover of Lit.

As regards the success of Gray in his efforts to imitate the poetry of the classical age, there can be but little room for debate: that this success has been unduly exaggerated is no matter of surprise. Indiscriminate eulogy is treason to the object of our adoration; and had Gray's friends been less fervid Dr. Johnson had been less frigid.

Mason could not well have said more when he announced, as a dictum of undoubted truth,

"No more the Grecian Muse unrival'd reigns;

To Britain let the nations homage pay:

She boasts a Homer's fire in Milton's strains,

A Pindar's rapture in the Lyre of Gray."

Perhaps there will be thought to be something of exaggeration in the glowing eulogy of an eminent authority of our own day:

"Gray, whose burning thoughts had been condensed in words of more than classic beauty."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe.

Probably some modern Akenside, devoted to the worship of the ancients, would write on the margin of this dictum, dele "more than."

Certain it is that, notwithstanding the vehement protests of Gray's modern admirers, the reputation of their favourite's Pindaric Odes received a fatal blow on the day when Johnson's Lives of the English Poets were given to the world. To quote the words of a modern critic of great taste and refinement,

"The Lyrical crown of Gray was swept away at one fell swoop by the ruthless arm of Dr. Johnson. That the Doctor's celebrated critique was unduly severe must be admitted; but the stern censor had truth on his side, nevertheless. There is more of Art than Nature in Gray; more of recollection than invention; more of acquirement than genius. If I may use a colloquial illustration, I should say that the marks of the fool are too evident on all that he does."—Noble's Lectures on English Poetry.

Lord Jeffrey, in a review of Weber's edition of Ford's Works,—see our biography of FORD,—remarks:

"After Young there was a plentiful lack of poetical talent, down to a period comparatively recent. Akenside and Gray, indeed, in the interval, discovered a new way of imitating the ancients; and Collins and Goldsmith produced some small specimens of exquisite and original poetry."—Edin. Rev. xviii. 22.

But it was not alone the poets of classical antiquity which engaged the studious attention of Gray. Philosophy, also, had its claims acknowledged by him. His comments on Plato elicited the ardent admiration of no less a scholar than Dr. Parr:

"When I read the poet Gray's observations on Plato, published by Mr. Mathias, my first impulse was to exclaim, 'Why did not I write this?' Gray alone possesses the merit of avoiding the errors into which other commentators have fallen; there are no fine-spun observations—no metaphysical absurdities—in Gray."—Ford's Life of Parr.

But we must not further lengthen a long article. It is time that we had noticed some of the editions of an author who has now—not unpleasantly, we trust—so long engaged the attention of our reader.

1. Ode to Eton College, Lon., 1747, fol. 2. Elegy written in a Country Church-yard, 1751. The translations of this Elegy into other languages have already been considered at length. Of the many beautiful illustrated edits, we may be permitted to notice that of Van Voorst, of London, with 33 Illustrations, 1839, 8vo; (Mr. Van V. has also pub.—in 1837, 8vo—an edit. of The Bard, with Illustrations from drawings by the Hon. Mrs. J. Talbot;) the edit. illustrated by the London Etching Club, 1847, fol.; the one illuminated by Owen Jones, 1846, r. 8vo; and the edit. illustrated by Birket Foster and others, 1853, cr. 8vo; 2d ed., 1854. 3. Poems, with designs by R. Bentley, 1753, r. 4to. These designs were executed at the suggestion of Horace Walpole, by his friend Richard Bentley: see the name in this Dictionary. Gray repaid the compliment by his Stanzas to Mr. Bentley. 4. Odes. Printed at Strawberry Hill, 1757, 4to. 1000 copies. 5. Poems, Lon., 1768, 12mo. 6. Ode at the Installation of the Duke of Grafton, Cambridge, 1769, 4to. 7. Poems, Dubl., 1771, 4to. This beautiful edit. was "Published to remove the reproaches which Ireland has long laboured under for had printing."—Thomas Erving's (the printer) dedication to the Rt. Hon. Sam. Oliver, Esq.

8. Poems, with Memoirs of his Life and Writings, by W. Mason, York, 1775, 4to; 1778, 4 vols. cr. 8vo; Lon., 1789, 4to. Also pub. in 2 vols. 8vo, 2 vols. p. 8vo, and 1807, 2 vols. 12mo.

"Reluctant indeed should I be to dismiss these pages to the world without not only the mention, but the strong recommendation, of Mason's Life of Gray, 1775, 4to, with a portrait of that eminent poet prefixed. I should rather perhaps call this book Gray's Memoir of Himself, as the biography is composed chiefly of the poet's own letters. . . . The neatest and best edition of Mason is that printed in 1778, at York, in 4 vols. crown 8vo, worth about 2s.; but of all the portraits of Gray, I consider that prefixed to the quarto as decidedly the best."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

"The taste, the zeal, the congenial spirit of Mr. Mason certainly produced, though with some faults, arising principally from want of erudition, one of the most elegant and classical volumes in the English language."—Lon. Quar. Rev. xi. 304.

9. Poems, 1775, fol. 10. Latin Odes in English Verse, &c., 1776, 4to. 11. Poetical Works, with Notes by Gilbert Wakefield, 1786, 8vo.

"Looked through Wakefield's Notes on Gray's Poems. His style is wonderfully luxuriant, and he seems perfectly to enter into and feel the spirit of the poet whom he criticises. The fertility too with which he discovers similitudes is marvellous: but if Johnson's penurious in his praise of Gray, Gilbert Wakefield, I think, is lavish. . . . Against Johnson, Wakefield is severe, even to violence; and there is a sentiment at the close of the annotations on the Bard, at which I revolt with disgust: 'If at any time we feel ourselves dazzled by Dr. Johnson's bright and diffusive powers of understanding, we may turn for relief to his criticisms on Gray, His Prayers, and Meditations."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit.

12. Poetical Works, Glasg., 1787, fol. 13. The Traveller's Companion in a Tour through England and Wales, Lon., 1787, 12mo. Supp., 1787, 12mo. New ed., 1799, 12mo. This catalogue was originally written by Gray on the blank leaves of Kitchin's English Atlas. 14. Poems, Parina, 1793, 4to. Printed by Bodini. 200 copies. Large paper, 100 copies. 15. Poems, 1800, 8vo. 16. English and Latin Poems, with Critical Notes and a Life of the Author, &c. by the Rev. John Mitford, Lon., 1814, 8vo; 1816, 2 vols. 4to. Also pub. in 2 vols. 8vo.

"From the Advertisement, p. 40. the reader is informed of the chief causes which render this edition so desirable to a genuine lover of Gray's high intellectual character: the great importance however which the editor attaches to this volume is, that it enables the public for the first time to read the genuine and uncorrupted correspondence of Gray, exactly in his own language and printed from his own Manuscripts."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

Of Mitford's edit., and edits. with Mitford's Life, there have been several issues, 1816, 2 vols. 4to; also pub. in 2 vols. 8vo; illustrated and edited, with introductory stanzas, by John Moultrie, Eton, 1845, 8vo; 2d ed., 1847, 8vo; 3d ed., 1851, 8vo; 4th ed., 1853, 8vo. Pickering's edit., 1835–43, 5 vols. fp. 8vo. A list of contents will be found at the end of this article. 17. Works, with Extracts, Philological, Poetical, and Critical, by T. J. Mathias, 1814, 2 vols. r. 4to. This edit. contains the Poems, Letters, and the Memoirs by Wm. Mason.

"A magnificent edition of Gray's Works, which derives so large a share of its value from the taste, learning, sagacity, and moral principles of an editor peculiarly qualified to do justice to the merits of such a scholar and such a poet as Mr. Gray."—Dr. Parr's Will.

"Of the qualifications which pointed out Mr. Mathias as the editor of the present Extracts, Philological, Poetical, and Critical, it is impossible to think or speak otherwise than with sincere respect. His spirit is congenial with that of his author, his admiration, though he professes 'nunquam vidisse Virgilium,' not inferior to that of personal friendship."—Lon. Quar. Rev. xi. 304–318. q. v.

"As a poet, the warmest of Mr. Gray's admirers may safely trust him with Fate; viewing him as an amiable and irreplicable private character, we may be contented to take his portrait sketched by the hand of friendship in Mr. Mason's account of him; but, for a delineation of him with all the mastery of talent, not only as a prodigy of learning but as that most exalted character, a Platonist made perfect by Revelation, the world is indebted to Mr. Mathias."—Lon. Month. Rev. lxxviii. 384–387, q. v.

Dr. Dibdin does not speak so enthusiastically of this edition:

"The more recent edition of the works of Gray, by Mr. Mathias, in two widely-spread quartos, (concerning which read the Quarterly Review, vol. xi., p. 304.) sunk with the weight of lead upon the market. Huge as is the ordinary size of these tomes—and little calculated as were the works of Gray for such a ponderous superstructure—there are yet LARGE PAPER COPIES!! at a price which at first appalled the timid, and startled the rich. [£12 12s.: the copies of 'the ordinary size' were pub. at £7 7s.] The prices, however, both of the small and large paper, are materially abated in 1842–25. . . . and I prophesy. . . . but—hence, ΜΑΥΡΑ ΧΑΡΩΝ!—methinks I hear one of the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press exclaim. Yet, note well! An edition of the Pursuits of Literature was struck off, on paper of the same size, in both forms; as if Thomas James Mathias had been the principal author of this latter work! What will be the verdict of posterity?"—Lib. Comp.

The "verdict of posterity" is no secret. 18. Letters, edited by Rev. J. Mitford, 8vo. 19. Criticisms on Gray's Elegy, 8vo. 20. Life of Gray, by Mason, 24mo. 21. Poems, 32mo. 22. Poems, with Memoir by Mitford, 24mo. 23. Poems, with Westall's Designs, 16mo. 24. Addit. Notes to the Corresp. of Gray and Mann, 1855, 8vo. The edit. of Gray's Poems pub. by Mr. H. C. Baird, Phila., 1850, sm. 8vo, already referred to, and that pub. by Messrs. Little, Brown & Co., Boston, 1854, 18mo, deserve warm commendation. We promised to give a list of the contents of Pickering's edit. of Gray's Works, edited by Mitford, Lon., 1835, '43, fp. 8vo. Vol. I. Life by Mitford; Poems. II. Essay on the Poetry of Gray; Letters. III. Letters. IV. Letters: Journal of Tour in Italy. V. Mathias's Letter on the death of Nicholls; Reminiscences of Gray, by Nicholls; Correspondence of Gray with Nicholls; Correspondence of Brown and Nicholls relative to Gray; Letters of Nicholls; Notes by Mitford; Gray's Notes on Walpole's Lives of the Painters; Extracts from a poem on the letters of the alphabet; Observations on English Metre, Pseudo-Rhythm, Use of Rhyme, and on the Poems of Lydgate.

Reprinted in London. This vol. was repub. in Edinburgh, 1822, by John Galt, with a dedication to Richard Rush, Esq., American Minister at London. Mr. Galt remarks in his dedication that "It is remarkable that a production so rich in the various excellencies of style, description, and impartiality, should not have been known in this country, especially as it is perhaps the best personal narrative which has yet appeared relative to the history of that great conflict which terminated in establishing the independence of the United States."

The London Quarterly Review gives an amusing review of this work, and, referring to Mr. Galt's eulogy, remarks:

"He now appears as the editor and eulogist of these Memoirs, which—notwithstanding his high and solemn praise, both of their matter and manner—we venture to pronounce to be in matter almost worthless, and in manner wholly contemptible. . . . We scarcely remember to have met with an emptier pretender to literature, or a grosser apostate in politics. . . . We can honestly assure Mr. Galt—without overrating his talents and taste in the least—that he is himself capable of adding a thousand times more lustre to the English language than the author of such an absurd farrago as he has here thought proper to reprint."—xxvi. 364-374.

A new ed. of this work, rearranged, with biographical and historical notes, and an index, was pub. by Mr. John Stockton Littell, of Germantown, in 1846, Phila., 8vo. Pp. 504.

Mr. Graydon was a contributor to the literary and political journals of the day. A number of his essays, very popular at the time, will be found in the Phila. Portfolio, under the title of Notes of a Desultory Reader. In these papers he communicates to the public his opinions respecting his favourite authors.

Greeley, Horace, b. Feb. 3, 1811, at Amherst, New Hampshire, commenced life as a printer, and was employed in this capacity in several New York establishments. As a journalist his name has been connected with "The Constitution," "The New Yorker," "The Jeffersonian," "The Log Cabin," and (commenced in 1841) "The Tribune." In 1848 he was elected to the United States Congress. For particulars of his life, see The Life of Horace Greeley, by James Parton, N. York, 1855, 12mo.

"This book is singularly well written; and its mingling of private incidents with public history is so managed that its popularity will not be transient. . . . Recommending the Life of Mr. Greeley to general attention, we have to speak in particular commendation of the admirable style in which the author has collected his materials and wrought them up. The book did not reveal to us the power of Horace Greeley. We knew that before. But we did not know the power in research, in mastery of the English language, and in strong good sense, of Mr. Parton, who is its author."—N. Amer. Rev., lxxx. 545-548, q. v.

But a critic in Blackw. Mag. for March, 1856, does not appear to admire either Mr. Greeley or the labours of his biographer, and declares, with respect to the latter, that "Any man would accept his chance against a Kentucky rifle sooner than a biography at the hands of Mr. J. Parton."—Biography gone Mad; ubi supra.

W. Bartlett, N. York, 1855, 12mo, q. v.

"His writings embrace every variety of style—classic beauty, exquisite poetry, graphic description, rapid commonplace, the full semblance of originality, the moon in the mist, and the ignis fatuus light of whimsical nonsense. . . . His widely-circulated journal contains good specimens of acute wit, critical reasoning, solid argument, brilliant invective, profound philosophy, beautiful poetry, and moving eloquence, mixed with the opposite of these. . . . He is the great recording secretary of this Continent, employed by the masses to take notes and print them."—Life of Horace Greeley, in Off-Hand Takings, by G. W. Bangay, N. Green, Ashbel, V.D.M., 1762-1848, a native of Hanover, New Jersey, served for some time in the Revolutionary army, and afterwards taught school; graduated at Princeton College in 1783; Prof. of Mathematics and natural philosophy in the college, 1785-87; ordained in 1787; chaplain to Congress, 1782-1800; President of Princeton College, 1812-22. For particulars respecting the ministerial and official career of this excellent man, the reader is referred to the Life of Ashbel Green, V.D.M. Begun to be written by himself in his eighty-second year, and continued to his eighty-fourth. Prepared for the Press, at the Author's request, by Joseph H. Jones, Pastor of the Sixth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. N. York, 1849, 8vo, pp. 628. Dr. Green pub. ten occasional Sermons, 1790-1836; six Addresses, Reports, &c., 1793-1836; Hist. of Presbyterian Missions, 1 vol.; Lectures on the Shorter Catechism, 2 vols. 12mo; Discourses on the College of New Jersey, together with a History of the College, 1822; a large proportion of the contents of The Christian Advocate, 12 vols., Phila., 1822-34.

"The character of his mind is impressed on his writings. His lectures on the Shorter Catechism, the sermon on the union of science and religion, which he prepared and published while President of the College of New Jersey, and the Christian Advocate, a religious periodical, which he for a number of years conducted with so much ability and usefulness, will long remain clear proofs that he possessed a mind of high order."—REV. J. J. JANeway, D.D.

"On the whole, I esteem him as among the ripest scholars, the most able divines, the most useful men, which our country has produced. His name will be more closely connected with the history and progress of the Presbyterian Church, one hundred years hence, than that of any of his predecessors. He well deserves a name and a place among 'The Lights of the American Pulpit.'—REV. N. MURRAY, D.D. See conclusion of this article.

"We always read his writings with approbation of the just sentiments and the vigorous thinking which they indicate; but sometimes feeling as if the writer would have attained a still more spirited and nervous style if he had been less painfully scrupulous in weighing every sentence which he penned in the scales of the strictest historical verity."—REV. SAMUEL MILLER, D.D.

"As a writer, his style is not unlike that of his model, Dr. Witherspoon, remarkably perspicuous, showing a clear perception of his subject; it is chaste, wholly free from all that is quaint, affected, foreign and barbarous. The grand quality of Dr. Green's style may be said to have been strength; by means of which, even when the thought was familiar, it was carried to the mind with unusual condensation and force. . . . His Lectures on the Shorter Catechism are probably the most useful and generally popular of all his instructive works."—REV. JOSEPH H. JONES, D.D.: Life of Dr. Green, to which we are indebted for the preceding extracts.

She has since pub. The Mechanic, 1841; Might and Right, an account of the Dorr Insurrection, 1844; Nanuntenoo, a Legend of the Narragansetts, in six cantos, of which the first three were pub. in Phila. in 1848; Analytical Class-Book of Botany, 1855. 4. In 1856, Dr. Green pub. a Report, with a Statistical Table, of 106 Cases of Pulmonary Diseases treated by Injections into the Bronchial Tubes with a Solution of Nitrate of Silver.

"I have only to say that I have confirmed the statements made by Dr. Horace Green: I have introduced the catheter publicly in the clinical wards of the Royal Infirmary, in seven patients. I think it important that these facts should be known to the profession, as a homage justly due to the talents of a distinguished transatlantic physician, and with a view of recommending a practice which, if judiciously employed, may form a new era in the treatment of pulmonary disease."—PROF. Green, Joseph, 1706-1780, a native of Boston, Mass., graduated at Harvard in 1726, and subsequently became a distiller. He was a man of great wit, and wrote a number of satirical poems, &c., among the best-known of which are Entertainment for A Winter's Evening; a burlesque on a Psalm of Mather Byles; The Land-Bank; Account of the celebration of St. John; and A Mourning Lamentation for the Death of Old Mr. Tenor. His political pieces were in favour of the principles of freedom. An interesting account of Green will be found in Duyckinck's Cyc. of Amer. Lit.

"In closing this last review of the work, we cannot finally part from Mrs. Green without again bearing our testimony to the careful research and diligent examination of authorities which each volume displays. Along the line of six hundred years much incidental light has been thrown, not only on English but on Continental history; and as a valuable contribution towards both we recommend these volumes."—*Lon. Green, Matthew, 1697-1737, an officer in the London Custom-House, was noted for his wit and poetical abilities. 1. The Grotto, 1732, privately printed, afterwards inserted in Dodsley's Collection, vol. v. 2. The Spleen; a Poem, 1737, 8vo. Published by Glover, the author of Leonidas, who had urged the author to its completion as it now stands. It was subsequently pub. in Dodsley's Collection, and also in the 2d ed. of Dr. Johnson's Poets. In 1796, 8vo, Cadell and Davies pub. The Spleen and other Poems, with a Pref. Essay by Dr. Aikin. Green's Poetical Works were pub. in 1854, by the Rev. R. A. Willmot, in the same vol. with those of Gray, Parnell, Collins, and J. Warton. See Lon. Athenæum, 1854; 1840; Lon. Gent. Mag., 1849, Pt. 2, 468. Pope remarks that there is a great deal of originality in The Spleen; and Gray, in his correspondence with Horace Walpole, observes of Green's poems, then pub. in Dodsley's Collection:

"There is a profusion of wit everywhere; reading would have formed his judgment and harmonized his verse, for even his woodnotes often break out into strains of real poetry and music." See Johnson and Chalmers's Poets, 1810.

Greene, Albert G., b. in Providence, Rhode Island, Feb. 10, 1802, was educated at Brown University, and on leaving college became a member of the bar. Since 1834 he has occupied a post under the city government of his native place. He has contributed a number of poetical pieces to periodicals, but never published a volume. Among his best-known compositions are The Baron's Last Banquet, Oh! Think not that the Bosom's Light, and Old Grimes. Mr. G. has a valuable collection of American poetry, and it is hoped that he will give the results of his researches in this department to the public.

Greene, George Washington, b. April 8, 1811, at East Greenwich, Kent county, Rhode Island, is a son of N. R. Greene, the son of the celebrated General Nathanael Greene of the Revolutionary Army. The subject of this notice was educated at Brown University, in which institution he subsequently became Instructor in Modern Languages. For many years he resided in Europe, chiefly in Italy, and was from 1837 to '45 United States Consul to Rome. Since 1852 he has resided in the city of New York.

"As an introduction to the study of the Middle Ages, it is all that can be desired; and as a manual of reference for advanced students in history, and even for those who have traversed the whole ground in detail, it cannot be otherwise than a most useful book. For readers of every class, the usefulness of the book is greatly increased by the felicitous and scholar-like manner in which it is written."—N. Amer. Rev., lxxiii. 271-273, q. v.

8. Addison's Complete Works,—the first complete edition ever published,—including all of Bishop Hurd's edition, with numerous pieces now first collected, and copious notes, by Prof. G. W. Greene. A new issue, in 6 vols. 12mo, with Vignettes, &c., New York, 1854. See ADDISON, JOSEPH.

Mr. G. devoted several years while in Europe to the history of Italy; but his studies were interrupted on his return home, and he has never resumed it. He is now engaged in editing the papers of his grandfather, Gen. Greene, with a new and elaborate life.

In addition to the works above enumerated, he has contributed many papers on historical and critical subjects to The North American Review, The Christian Review, The Knickerbocker Magazine, Harper's Magazine, and Putnam's Magazine.

In 1829 he became postmaster of Boston. He has pub. a number of translations from the Italian, German, and French. 1. Storia d'Italia, di G. Sforzosi, Italia, 1820. This work was trans. by Mr. Greene for Harper's Family Library.

"Some praise is due to Sforzosi, who has condensed into one volume the whole history of Italy, ancient and modern. His work has been happily translated into English by a competent scholar in this country. It however had no higher aim than to be an elementary work, and is only to be recommended in that character."—N. Amer. Rev., lviii. 350.

2. Tales from the German. Trans. by N. Greene, Bost., 1837, 2 vols. 12mo.

"Mr. Greene has been favourably known by his previous translation of Sforzosi's Italian History, for Messrs. Harper's Edition of the Family Library. We hope he will find leisure to continue his literary pursuits, and that, since he has the power, he will also have the inclination, to enrich his native literature by transplanting such beautiful exotics into the Tales from the German."—Wm. H. Prescott: N. Amer. Rev., xlv. 137-141, q. v.

Greene, Robert, 1560?-1592, an English poet and miscellaneous writer, noted alike for his good advice and bad example, was a native of Ipswich, and educated at St. John's Coll., Camb. After leaving college he travelled on the continent, and upon his return home is supposed to have taken orders and received the living of Tollesbury in Essex, June 19, 1584. He was a boon companion with the dissipated wits of the day, deserted a lovely wife, lived a profligate life, occasionally chequered with partial repentance, and died of a surfeit of pickled herrings and Rhenish wine. In his Great's Worth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance, written not long before his death, and other pieces of a similar character, he laments his profligate career and exhorts his former companions to forsake their evil ways. His works, which consist of plays, poems, fictions, and tracts upon the manners of the day, are very numerous. Mr. Haslewood, in the Censura Literaria, i. 288-300, gives a list of forty-five, to which he adds five which have been ascribed to him; and Mr. Octavius Gilchrist increases the catalogue (Cens. Lit., x. 380) by the names of three more. Further information respecting his works will be found in the authorities cited below. The following is a list of the contents of the edit. of Greene's Works pub. in 1831, 2 vols. cr. 8vo, by the Rev. A. Dyce:

Vol. I. Account of Greene and his Writings; Orlando Furioso; A Looking-Glass for London and England; Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay; Specimen of the famous Historie of Fryer Bacon. II. Alphonsus, King of Arragon; James the Fourth; George-a-Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield; History of George-a-Greene; Ballad of the Jolly Pinder of Wakefield, with Robin Hood, Scarlet, and John; Poems; Addenda, and Index to the Notes.

Of the manner in which Mr. Dyce has discharged his editorial duties we have already had occasion to speak; see DYCE, REV. ALEXANDER. As an author, Greene's merits are undoubtedly considerable; and it is greatly to be regretted that he was not always in the moral vein which presents so striking a contrast to his loose habits. Wood does not speak of his productions with much respect;

"He was a pastoral sonnet-maker, and author of several things which were pleasing to men and women of his time. They made much sport, and were valued among scholars; but since they have been mostly sold on ballad-mongers' stalls."—Past. Ozon.

We quote some more recent opinions:

"These I have perused display a rich and glowing fancy, much originality and universal command of language, combined with an extensive knowledge of the world. His crowd of smiles are in unison with those of the period when he wrote, and prove him a disciple of the then fashionable Ephean sect: they are in general well selected, appositely applied, and quaintly amused while his moral instructs. He possessed considerable, if not first-rate, abilities, and it is inconsistent to measure either poetry or prose by any standard of criticism erected two centuries after the decease of the author."—HASLEWOOD: Censura Literaria, ii. 288-300, q. v.

"He had great vivacity of intellect, a very inventive imagination, extensive reading, and his works abound with frequent and successful allusions to the Classics. It is surprising to see how polished and how finished some of his pieces are when it is considered that he wrote most of them to supply his immediate necessities, and in quick succession one to another."—BLOE: Anec. of Lib. and Scarce Books.

"It must be confessed that many of the prose tracts of Greene are licentious and indecent; but there are many also whose object is useful and whose moral is pure. They are written with great vivacity, several are remarkable for the most poignant railery, all exhibit a glowing warmth of imagination, and many are interspersed with beautiful and highly-polished specimens of his poetical powers. On those which are employed in exposing the machinations of his infamous associates, he seems to place a high value, justly considering their detection as an essential service due to his country; and he fervently thanks his God for enabling him so successfully to lay open the 'most horrible Cozenages of the common Cony-Catchers, Cozeners, and Cross-Biters,' names which in those days designated the perpetrators of every species of deception and knavery. . . . Though most of the productions of Greene were written to supply the wants of the passing hour, yet the poetical effusions scattered through his works betray few marks of haste or slovenliness, and many of them, indeed, may be classed among the most polished and elegant of their day. To much warmth and fertility of fancy they add a noble strain of feeling and enthusiasm, together with many exquisite touches of the pathetic, and so many impressive lessons of morality, as, in a great measure, to atone for the licentiousness of several of his prose tracts."—DR. DRAKE: Shakespeare and his Times, i. 424-427.

"As a writer of novels and pamphlets, he is full of affectation, but generally elegant, and sometimes eloquent: it is a misfortune which runs through his works, that he often imitated the popular but puerile allusions of Lily. His invention is poor from the want of a vigorous imagination, but his fancy is generally lively and graceful. In facility of expression, and in the flow of his blank verse, he is not to be placed below his contemporary Peck. His usual fault (more discoverable in his plays than in his poems) is an absence of simplicity; but his pedantic classical references, frequently without either taste or discretion, he had in common with the other scribbling scholars of the time. It was Shakspeare's good fortune to be in a great degree without the knowledge, and therefore, if on no other account, without the defect."—J. PAYNE Collier; Hist. of Eng. Dram. Poet., iii. 133-134.

"Professor Tuck, in the Preface to his Shakspeare's Vorschule, says that Greene had 'a happy talent, a clear spirit, and a lively imagination,' which, he adds, 'characterize all his writings.' I can by no means concur in this praise to his full extent," &c.—Ibid., iii. 148.

"Greene succeeds pretty well in that florid and gay style, a little redundant in images, which Shakspeare frequently gives to his princes and courtiers, and which renders some unpassioned scenes in his historic plays effective and brilliant. There is great talent shown, though upon a very strange canvas, in Greene's Looking-glass for London and England."—HALLAM; Lit. Hist. of Europe. ii. 173.

Mr. Hallam speaks of Greene's novels as "deplorable specimens," and cites the Dorastus and Fawnia as an example of "Quaint, affected, and empty Euphuism."—Ibid., ii. 218.

"Greene's style is in truth most whimsical and grotesque. He lived before there was a good model of familiar prose; and his wit, like a stream that is too weak to force a channel for itself, is lost in rhapsody and diffuseness."—THOMAS CAMPELL: Lives of the Eng. Poets.

But this was not the judgment of his contemporaries.

"She does observe as pure a phrase, and use as choice figures in her ordinary conversation, as any be in the Arcadia.

"Carlo.—Or rather in Greene's works, where she may steal with more security."

And Oldys does not hesitate to style Greene

"One of the greatest pamphleteers and refiners of our language in his time."

"He was obliged to have recourse to his pen for a maintenance; and indeed we think he is the first English poet that we have on record as writing for bread."—Biog. Dramat.

But this is a position which cannot be demonstrated, though it has frequently been adopted as true by those who blindly follow authorities. In addition to the many authorities cited above, we also refer the reader to Winstanley's Eng. Poets; Langbaine's Dram. Poets; Whalley's ed. of Ben Jonson; British Bibliographer; Restituta; Collier's Poet. Decam.; Ritson's Bibl. Poet.; Berkenhout's Biog. Man.; Dunlap's Hist. of Fiction. A specimen of Greene's poetical powers will be no unwelcome conclusion to this long article:

"Sweete are the thoughts that savour of content,

The quiet mind is richer than a crowne;

Sweete are the nights in careless slumber spent,

The pious estate scornes fortune's angry frowne;

Such sweete content, such mindes, such sleepe, such bliss,

Beggars enjoy, wh-n Princes oft doe miss."

"Christian Reader! thou hast here all Maister Greenham's Works, as they have been heretofore gathered and published by the industrie of that worthy and painefull Precher, Maister Henry Holland."

"Greenham on Psalm cix., in his works, is admirable, for the time in which it was written, both for method and style; and, like all the productions of this author, is full of spiritual unction."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"Greenham excelled in experimental divinity, and knew how to stay a weak conscience—how to raise a fallen—how to strike a remorseless one."—BISHOP HALL.

"ON MR. GREENHAM'S BOOK OF THE SABBATH.
"While Greenham writeth on the Sabbath's rest,
His Soul enjoys not what his pen exprest;
His work enjoys not what itself doth say,
For it shall never find one resting day,
A thousand hands shall toss each page and line,
Which shall be scanned by a thousand eyne.
This Sabbath's rest, or that Sabbath's unrest,
'Tis hard to say which is the happiest."—BISHOP HALL.

Greenleaf, Simon, LL.D., 1783-1853, a native of Newburyport, Mass., was the son of a captain in the Revolutionary Army, and a connection on the mother's side of the family of the late Chief-Justice Parsons; commenced the practice of the law in Standish, Maine, 1806, and in the same year removed to Gray, where he remained for twelve years; removed to Portland, 1818; appointed Reporter of the Supreme Court of Maine, 1820-32; succeeded Prof. Ashmun as Royall Prof. of Law in the Dane Law School, 1833; transferred to the Dane Professorship, vacant by the death of Judge Story, 1846; resigned this post in consequence of failing health, 1848. Mr. Greenleaf left a widow, to whom he was married in 1806, and two sons and two daughters, the only remaining members of a large family of children. Professor Greenleaf's principal works are—1. A Full Collection of Cases, Overruled, Denied, Doubted, or Limited in their application, taken from American and English Reports, Portland, 1821; 3d ed., by E. Hammond, N. York, 1840. Mr. Greenleaf was induced to prepare this work in consequence of having relied upon a decision which was proved to have been overruled.

"Mr. Greenleaf will have rendered to his profession a most eminent service if, by presenting so many examples of corrected error, he shall induce his brethren to examine decisions without fear, and the courts to revise them without reluctance."—T. METCALF: N. Amer. Rev., xv. 65-72, q. v.: also vol. xxiii. 30.

"I am glad to hear that your Overruled Cases are printed. I want to get a copy, and interleave it, so as to provide gradually for a new edition. . . . I send you an additional list of late overruled cases, which you can use when you have occasion. I mean to enlarge it from time to time, as I read and write."—JUDGE STORY, Dec. 11, 1821: Story's Life and Letters, i. 404.

"You must not feel too anxious about your Reports. A young author is apt to be unduly sensitive as to the fate of his productions. I have no doubt as to the success of yours; and I am sure that the profession will join heartily in your favour."—JUDGE STORY, Dec. 11, 1821: Story's Life and Letters, i. 404.

"Mr. Greenleaf is of the order of compendious reporters. He is lucid and direct in his statement of cases; his arguments of course are arranged with logical exactness and a well-conceived brevity, which give us their outline well, and yet without any sinuosities. He is happy in his discrimination of the onus of the reasoning and his consequent exposition of it. Mr. Greenleaf is always concise, while throughout he never fails to be just; and this is no small praise, when the longest or most important case in the volume will be found to allow not above two pages to the argument of counsel."—N. Before the appearance of this work, the American Bar was dependent upon the manuals of Starkie and Phillips. Mr. Greenleaf's treatise took at once, and has ever since maintained, the highest rank.

"I am glad to hear that you are going on with your work on Evidence, which I shall look to with deep interest as a noble contribution to the common stock of the school."—JUDGE STORY, Feb. 6, 1840: Story's Life and Letters, ii. 328.

"It is no mean honour to America that her schools of jurisprudence have produced two of the first writers and best-esteemed legal authorities of this century; the great and good man [Judge Story] who has just been taken from us, and his worthy and eminent associate, Professor Greenleaf. Upon the existing Law of Contracts, and the Law of Evidence, more light has shone from the New World than from all the lawyers who adorn the courts of Europe."—Lon. Law Mag.

"He [Judge Story] had studied the evidences of Christianity with professional closeness and care and had given to them the testimony of his full assent; and he has often been heard to declare, that, in his judgment, the great facts of the gospel history were attested by a mass of evidence which, in any court of law, would be perfectly satisfactory and conclusive."—*Prof. Greenleaf's Discourse Commemorative of the Life and Character of the Hon. A Discourse commemorative of the Life and Character of the Hon. Joseph Story, LL.D., &c., 1845, 8vo. This is an eloquent tribute to the merits of a truly great man, between whom and his eulogist there existed ties of the closest intimacy and of the most endearing character. Associated intimately for thirteen years in the Dane Law School, the friendship and attachment with which they had entered upon the joint discharge of their duties invigorated and enlivened their arduous efforts for the benefit of the institution whose prosperity they had so much at heart. It was at the instance of Judge Story that his friend was called to supply the place; but we shall do injustice to the subject by using any other language than that which has already been eloquently employed upon this theme:

"Our connection has been to me, indeed, a source of inexpressible pleasure and satisfaction. I recollect, with pride, that when Professor Ashmun died my thoughts turned upon you as the man of all others best fitted to supply his place; and the corporation, with an unanimity and promptitude which deserve the highest commendation, seconded the choice. . . . But for you the School would never have attained its present rank. Your learning, your devotion to its interests, your untiring industry, your steadfast integrity of purpose and action, have imparted to all our efforts a vigour and ability, without which, I am free to say, that I should have utterly despaired of success. Nay, more: but for your constant co-operation and encouragement in the common task I should have drooped and lingered by the wayside. But what I dwell on with peculiar delight, is the consciousness that we have never been rivals, but in working together have gone hand in hand throughout; that not a cloud has ever passed over our mutual intercourse, and that we have lived as brothers should live; and, I trust in God, we shall die such. . . . Most truly and affectionately,

"Your faithful friend,

"JOSEPH STORY.

Many of the facts recorded in Prof. Greenleaf's Discourse on the Life and Character of Judge Story (see No. 7, ante) will be found in his biographical sketch of this eminent jurist in The National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans. Of this sketch Judge Story remarks, in a letter to the author, dated April 15, 1835,

"I think it one of the most finished and elegant compositions I ever read, and I am only too conscious that the main attractions of the picture you have drawn are due to the skill and touching kindness of the artist."—Story's Life and Letters, ii. 97.

"They were constantly read in the families of Dr. Huntford, late Bishop of Hereford, and of Dr. Van Mildrat late Bishop of Durham, the latter of whom often regretted he could not discover the author, that he might distinguish him by preference in the Church, concluding the sermons to have been written by a clergyman of no common ability."—Preface to the 5th Edition.

We shall have occasion to notice several of the members of this distinguished family, the most illustrious in the annals of British science. For two centuries the name of Gregory has accumulated fresh honours with each succeeding generation, and sixteen of the family have held British professorships. Whilst the subject of this memoir was Professor of Mathematics at Oxford, his brother James occupied the same post at Edinburgh, and another brother, Charles, discharged similar duties at St. Andrew's. Here is nobility, indeed, far outshining

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,

And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave!"

Gregory, Duncan Farquharson, d. 1844, aged 30, Fellow and Sub-Lecturer of Trin. Coll., Camb., a distinguished mathematician, was a descendant of James Gregory, (1639–1675,) the celebrated author of the Reflecting Telescope, the son of James Gregory, M.D., (1753–1821.)

Prof. of Medicine in the Univ. of Edinburgh, and the brother of William Gregory, M.D., until his death Prof. of Chemistry in Univ. of Edinburgh. He pub. a work of great merit on The Differential and Integral Calculus, Lon., 1841, 8vo; 2d ed., by W. Walton, 1846, 8vo; and left unfinished a work, afterwards completed and pub. by W. Walton, on the Application of Analysis to Solid Geometry, 1846, 8vo; 2d ed., 1853, 8vo.

Gregory, James, 1639-1675, the first of the long line of great men of an illustrious family, (see GREGORY, DAVID,) was a native of Aberdeen, and educated at the grammar school of that place and at Marischal College. In 1663 he pub. his Optima promotio, in which he gave an account of his discovery of the reflecting telescope. He subsequently gave to the world Vera Cirenii et Hyperbolæ Quadratura, Patav., 1667, 4to; Exercitationes Geometricæ, Lon., 1668, '78, 4to; and some other publications. In 1668 he was elected Prof. of Mathematics in the Univ. of St. Andrew's, and in 1674 was called to the same chair in the Univ. of Edinburgh. He was a friend of Sir Isaac Newton, who highly valued his remarkable genius. See Biog. Brit.; Hutton's Dict.; *Martin's Biog. Gregory, James, M.D., 1753-1821, a native of Aberdeen, Prof. of the Prac. of Medicine in the Univ. of Edinburgh, was a descendant of the preceding, and the father of the late Duncan F. Gregory, of Trin. Coll., Camb., who displayed, even at the early age at which he died, the remarkable mathematical genius which distinguished his great ancestor, and many of his successors for the last two centuries. Gregory, John, 1607-1646, a learned divine, a native of Buckinghamshire, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford; Chaplain to Bishop Dupper, 1638; Preb. of Salisbury, 1641; deprived at the Rebellion. 1. Notes and Observ. on some Passages of Scripture, Oxf., 1646, 4to; Lon., 1660, '65, '71, '83. This work is the first part of the Posthuma. It was trans. into Latin, and remitted into the Critica Sacra. 2. Gregorii Posthuma, with Life, pub. by John Gurgany, 1649, '50, '61, '65, '71, '83, '84, 4to. Part 1 is composed of the Notes, &c. above; Part 2 consist of eight pieces: two discourses, one serm., two theolog. treatises, a tract upon Time, one upon the Assyrian Monarchy, and one upon the Terrestrial Globe.

"This volume contains things learned, curious, and fanciful. The author possessed a considerable portion of learning, but was very eccentric in his flights. Some of the notes are important, and contain a good deal of rabbinical lore. The Dissertation and plates on the Boy-bishop and the Monk-fish, are curious, and exhibit some of the follies of former times. His discussions on the Song of the Bow, the Golden Mice, the Silver Shrines, and Cain's Thau, or mark, show how much erudition may be needlessly expended on very trifling subjects. The book is still worth having, but at no great expense."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

In 1634 he pub. a 2d ed. in 4to, with Notes, of Sir Thomas Ridley's View of the Civil and Ecclesiastical Law. He also wrote a tract, entitled Alkiblay, "in which he endeavoured to vindicate the antiquity of worshipping towards the east;" and left three pieces in MS., trans. by him from Greek into Latin, which were pub. by Edward Bysshe in his own name, q. v. Gregory also left, in MS., Observationes, &c. Johannis Maleke Chronographia; and he intended to have pub. a Latin trans. of that author, with annotations.

"The miracle of his age for critical and curious learning."—Athen. Ozon, q. v.

Greenville, George Nugent, Lord. 1. Portugal; a Poem, 2d ed., Lon., 1812, 4to.

"Twice, with the most patient attention, have we read every line of this poem, and twice have we risen from the perusal perplexed in the extreme." Lord George Nugent Greenville has, it is certain, published a poem under the title of Portugal; but, though the stream of verse is sufficiently smooth, it is so prodigiously deep that our plummet has in very few places indeed been able to find the bottom."—*Lon. Considerations on the Commerce and Finances of England. 2. The Present State of the Nation, 1769, Svo. This was ascribed to Mr. Greenville, and also to his former secretary, Mr. Knox. It was answered by Edmund Burke in Observations on a late Publication entitled The Present State of the Nation, 1769, Svo.

"It is not going too far to say that there is scarcely one of Mr.

Greenville's positions, except the last, which Mr. Burke has not completely overthrown. His tract is indeed one of the very best specimens of a review that has ever been published, displaying all his deep thinking, with much of his eloquence and sarcasm."—*McCall's Lib. of Polit. Mr. Greenville noticed Mr. Burke's strictures in An Appendix to The Present State of the Nation, &c., 1769, Svo. Mr. Greenville and his brother Richard—Earl Temple—were actively engaged in the politics of the day; and much valuable information will be found in their correspondence, entitled The Grenville Papers, from the Original MSS., preserved at Stowe. Edited by W. J. Smith, (late librarian at Stowe,) 4 vols. Svo., 1852-53. In the third vol. will be found some matter offered as evidence to prove that Lord Temple was author of The Letters of Junius. Greville, Mrs. Frances, was a daughter of James Macartney, the wife of Fulke Greville, and the mother of the celebrated beauty, Mrs. Crewe, and of Capt. William Fulke Greville. She wrote, about 1753, a short poem, entitled Prayer for Indifference, which obtained wide popularity, and elicited several responses, of which the best-known is that by the Countess of C——, presumed to be Isabella, Countess of Carlisle, who died in 1793.

Greville, Fulke, Fulk, or Foulk, Lord Brooke, 1551–1628, was son to Sir Fulke Grevill, of Beauchamp Court, in Warwickshire. He was entered of Trinity College, Cambridge, and subsequently completed his studies at Oxford. After attaining distinction at court and being honoured by a seat at the Privy Council, he was assassinated by one of his domestics, named Ralph Heywood. He was so much attached to an illustrious contemporary poet that he styled himself on his tombstone "THE FRIEND OF SIR PHILIP SIDNEY;" and he wrote—1. The Life of the renowned Sir Philip Sidney, pub. in 1652, 12mo. Reprinted by Sir Egerton Brydges at the private press of Lee Priory, Kent, 1816, 2 vols. r. 8vo. 2. A Letter to an Hon. Lady. 3. A Letter of Travell. 4. Cælia; a collection of 109 Songs. 5. A Treatise of Human Learning, in 15 stanzas. 6. An Inquisition upon Fame and Honour, in 86 stanzas. 7. A Treatise of Warres, in 68 stanzas. 8. Alaham; a Tragedy. 9. Mustapha; a Tragedy. These tragedies, with a Letter to a Lady and the Poems mentioned above, were pub. in a "squab folio," Lon., 1633, under the title of Certain Learned and Elegant Workes of the Right Honourable Fulke, Lord Brooke, written in his Youth, and Familiar Exercise with Sir Philip Sidney. Some of the smaller pieces had appeared in England's Helicon, 1600. 10. A Speech in Parliament, recorded by Lord Bacon. 11. Remains; being Poems on Morality and Religion, 1670, 8vo. The two following have been ascribed to him, but are disputed:—12. Five Yeares of King James, 1643, '51, 4to. 13. M. Tullius Cicero; a Tragedy. Lord Brooke's works, whatever their merits, are certainly not of that character which can command attention beyond their own age.

"A man of much note in his time, but one of those admired wits who have lost much of their reputation in the eyes of posterity. A thousand accidents of birth, court-favour, or popularity, concur sometimes to gild a slender proportion of merit."—Walpole's R. & N. Authors.

"Notwithstanding Lord Orford's detracting estimate of this nobleman, he appears to have had a taste for all kinds of polite learning, though his inclination as well as his genius led him particularly to poetry and history; and Phillips or Milton [Theatrum Poetarum] remarks, that in all his poems is observable a close, mysterious, and sententious way of writing, but without much regard to elegance of style or smoothness of verse."—PARK.

"The author has been so careful (in Mustapha) in observing the Rules of Aristotle and Horace, that whereas Horace says, he has in no scene throughout introduced above two Speakers, except in the Chorus between each Act; and even there he observes all the Rules laid down by that great Master in the Art of Poetry."—Langbaine's Dramatick Poets.

'Neo quarta loqui persona laboret.'

Bolton, in his Hypercritica, styles this tragedy the "Matchless Mustapha;" and Davies of Hereford inscribed fourteen lines "to the immortal memory and deserved honour of the writer of the tragedy of Mustapha." Sir Philip Sidney thus welcomes his two "worthy friends and fellow-poets, Sir Edward Dyer and Mr. Fulke Grevill."

"Welcome my two to me!
The number best beloved,
Within my heart you be
In friendship unremov'd.
Joyne hands and hearts, so let it be,
Make but one minde in bodie three."

Other stanzas; vide Davidson's Poetical Rhapsody, 1602.

Bishop Corbet thought his lordship's accomplishments worthy of commemoration:

"The phrase and welcome of the knight did make
The seat more elegant; every word he spake
Was wine and music."

Vizit to Lord Brook, in his Iter Boreale.

Baxter, the celebrated Nonconformist, thus refers to his Poems of Monarchy and Religion:

"Sir Fulk Grevill, Lord Brooke, a man of great note in his age, hath a poem lately printed (1670) for subject's liberty, which I greatly wonder this age could bear."—Prefatory Address to Baxter's Poetical Fragments, 1681.

"These two Tragedies of Lord Brooke (Alaham and Mustapha) might with more propriety have been termed political treatises than plays. Their author has strangely contrived to make passion, character, and interest, of the highest order, subservient to the expression of state dogmas and mysteries. . . . Whether we look into his plays, or his most passionate love-poems, we shall find all frozen and made rigid with intellect."—CHARLES LAMB.

"The titles of Lord Brooke's poems, A Treatise of Human Learning, A Treatise of Monarchy, A Treatise of Religion, An Inquisition upon Fame and Honour, lead us to anticipate more of sense than fancy. In this we are not deceived; his mind was pregnant with deep reflection upon multifarious learning, but he struggles to give utterance to thoughts which he had not fully endowed with words, and amidst the shackles of rhyme and metre which he had not learned to manage. Hence, of all our poets he may be reckoned the most obscure; in aiming at condensation he becomes elliptical beyond the bounds of the language, and his rhymes, being forced for the sake of sound, leave all meaning behind. Lord Brooke's poetry is chiefly worth notice as an indication of that thinking spirit upon political science which was to produce the riper speculations of Hobbes, and Harrington, and Locke."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

"As to Fulke Greville, he is like nothing but one of his own 'Prologues spoken by the ghost of an old king of Ormus,' a truly formidable and inviting personage: his style is apocalyptic, calististical, a knot worthy of such an apparition to untie; and for the unravelling a passage or two, I would stand the bunt of an encounter with so portentous a commentator."—Hazlitt's Table Talk: Of Persons One Would Wish to Have Seen.

3. Two Speeches at Guildhall, 1642, 4to. 4. Answer to the Speech of Philip, Earl of Pembroke, &c., 1642, 4to. Not the production of Greville, but drawn up by the Earl of Clarendon as containing Greville's sentiments. 5. Speech at Election, 1643, 4to.

Lord Clarendon considered that Greville's death was a judgment of Providence:

"It is observable that the same man who was by one party looked upon as a monument of divine vengeance was by the other revered as a saint. Baxter has placed Lord Brooke in heaven together with White, Pym, and Hampden."—Granger's Biog. Hist. of Eng.

"A person who for the nobleness of his extraction, and many personal endowments, deserved a better fate; at least to have fallen in a better cause; and who, had he lived, (it is believed by his friends) would soon have seen through the pretences of a faction."—Sir Wm. Douglas's Barons.

But this supposition elicits the violent indignation of Horace Walpole:

"There is not the least reason to suppose that this Lord Brooke would have abandoned his principles."—Id. and N. Authors, q. v.

"The first book of his Anatomy of Plants, which is the title given to three separate works, when published collectively in 1682, contains the whole of his physiological theory, which is developed at length in those that follow. The nature of vegetation and its processes seem to have been unknown when he began, save that common observation and the more accurate experience of gardeners and others must have collected the obvious truths of vegetable anatomy."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, q. v.

Grey, Lady Jane, 1537-1554, a descendant of Edward IV. and Henry VII., and still more illustrious for her virtues and accomplishments, has already largely claimed our notice in our Life of ROGER ASCHAM. Her Literary Remains—which consist of Latin Epistles and Verses, English Letters, devout treatises, &c.—were pub. in 1 vol. p. 8vo, 1825, by Sir N. H. Nicolas. In addition to the histories of England, see Biog. Brit.; Fox's Martyrs; Ballard's Memoirs; Strype's Memoirs; Park's Wal- pole's R. and N. Authors; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; Nichols's Leicestershire under Broadgate Park; and see conclusion of this article. Although only between sixteen and seventeen years of age at the time of her death, Lady Jane was one of the best scholars England has produced. Edward VI. was considered a prodigy of learning, but Lady Jane far excelled him. Indeed, the fame of this learned child was sounded throughout Europe, and was the pride of the great Latinists and Grecians at home:

"The French, Italian, Latin, and Greek, especially, were as natural to her as her own; for she not only understood them perfectly, but spoke and wrote them with the greatest freedom; and this not in the opinion of superficial judges, but of Mr. Ascham and Dr. Aylmer, men who in point of veracity are as much above suspicion as in respect to their abilities they were incapable of being deceived: men who for their learning were the wonder of their own times and of ours; the former famous for Roman accuracy, the latter one of the severest critics in those learned times. She was versed likewise in Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic, and all this while a perfect child."—Biog. Brit.

"Aristotle's praise of women is perfected in her. She possesses good manners, prudence, and a love of labour. She possesses every talent without the least weakness of her sex. She speaks French and Italian as well as she does English. She writes readily and with propriety. She has more than once spoken Greek to me."—ROGER ASCHAM.

"She had the innocence of childhood, the beauty of youth, the solidity of middle, the gravity of old age; . . . the birth of a princess, the learning of a clerk, the life of a saint, yet the death of a martyr for her parents' offences."—Fuller's Holy State.

Grey, Richard, D.D., 1694-1771, a native of Newcastle, entered of Lincoln Coll., Oxf., 1712; Rector of Hinton, Northamptonshire, 1721; became Rector of Kincote, Leicestershire, and Preb. of St. Paul's. His principal works are:—1. Memoria Technica, Lon., 1730, '32, '75, '92. Last ed., 1851, 12mo. Abridged by J. H. Todd, 1840, 18mo. 2. Eng. Eccles. Law, 1730, '32, '36, '43, 8vo. The last is the best ed. 3. Hebrew without Points, 1738, 8vo. 4. Liber Jobi, in Versiculos Metricæ Divisus, &c., 1742, 8vo.

"A learned and valuable work."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

Grey's Liber Jobi was criticized by Mr.—afterwards Bishop—Warburton, and Gray responded in (5) An Answer to Mr. Warburton's Remarks, &c., 1744, 8vo.

"Dr. Grey was a disciple of Schultens and Hare. In his Job he adopts the translation of the former and the metrical arrangement of the latter."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Grey, Zachary, LL.D., 1687-1766, educated at Jesus Coll., Camb., became Rector of Houghton Conquest, Bedfordshire, and Vicar of St. Peter's and St. Giles's, Cambridge. His best-known work—the edit. of Hudibras— has been already noticed in our life of SAMUEL BUTLER. Among his other publications are An Examination of the 2d, 3d, and 4th books, &c. of Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, (pub. by Grey, 1736, '37, '39, '44.) many pieces against the Dissenters, and several pamphlets against Bishop Warburton, Oldmixon, &c. Grey was a contributor to Peck's Desiderata, and assisted Whalley in his ed. of Shakspeare. For a detailed account of his literary labours consult Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Cole's MS. Athenæ in Brit. Museum; Chalmers's Biog. Dict.

Warburton's attack on Grey's Hudibras was not considered especially complimentary. In his Preface to Shakspeare he does not hesitate to say that he "hardly thinks there ever appeared in any learned language so execrable a heap of nonsense under the name of Commentaries as hath lately been given us on this satiric poet."

Fielding refers to our author as

"The laborious, much read Dr. Zachary Grey, of whose abundant notes to Hudibras I shall only say that it is, I am confident, the single look extant in which above 500 authors are quoted not one of which could be found in the collection of the late Dr. Mead."—Preface to Voyage to Lisbon.

Yet Dr. Warton remarks that "If Butler is worth reading he is worth explaining; and the remarks used for so valuable and elegant a purpose merit the thanks of genius and candour, not the satire of prejudice and ignorance."

Edmund Dorr, 1804-1830, a native of Wyoming, Pennsylvania, was the son of George Griffin, LL.D., a member of the New York Bar, and the author of a volume pub. in 1850, entitled The Gospel Its Own Advocate, N. York, 12mo. The subject of this notice entered Columbia Coll., N. York, 1819; graduated, 1823; ordained deacon in the Episcopal Church, 1826. On his return from a trip to Europe in 1830, taken with the hope of benefiting his health, he delivered a course of lectures in Columbia College on Roman, Italian, and English Literature, which gave great satisfaction. Literary remains, edited by his brother, F. Griffin, with a Memoir by Rev. John McVicker, D.D., N. York, 1831, 2 vols. 8vo. These vols. contain poems, journals from his tour in Europe, and extracts from his lectures.

Griffin, Gerald, 1803-1840, a novelist of some note, was a native of Limerick, emigrated to London in his twentieth year, and became first a reporter for the daily press, and subsequently an author. In 1838 he joined the Christian Brotherhood (R. Catholic) of Cork, and two years later was cut off by a fever. His first publication—Holland-Tide, or Munster Popular Tales—appeared in 1827; and their reception was so encouraging that he was induced to give to the world, in the same year, his Tales of the Munster Festivals. The contents of the collective ed. of his works, pub. in 8 vols. fp. 8vo, 1842-43, and again in 1846, are as follows: Vol. I. Life, by his Brother. II. Collegians. III. Card-Drawing; The Half Sir; Suil-Dhuv. IV. The Rivals; Tracy's Ambition. V. Holland-Tide. VI. Duke of Monmouth. VII. Tales of the Jury-Room. VIII. Poetry. He also wrote a Discourse on the Virginia Convention of 1776, which was delivered before the College of William and Mary in Virginia, on the 3d of July, 1855; pub. in the same year.

"It treats in a clear, concise style, which frequently rises to the level of high oratory, and which is throughout well sustained and deeply attractive, the entire history of the Convention in question, embracing admirable biographies of its members. Among the many glimpses which we have had of late months of Revolutionary History—thanks to the patriotism and zeal of our Historical Societies—we can recall none more deserving of commendation than this, as set forth in the volume before us. We commend it with the assurance that every one interested in American history will add it to his library."

Grimbold, Grimald, Grimbald, or Grimoald, Nicholas, d. about 1563, an English poet, educated at Cambridge and Oxford, opened a rhetorical lecture in the refectory of Christ Church, Oxford, wrote verses, and a Latin tragedy, and made translations from the Greek and Latin poets. His Latin tragedy of John the Baptist was pub. in 1548; trans. from Cicero, 1553, '56, '58, '68, '74, '96; from Virgil, 1591; Oratio, 1583; and his Songs ("written by N. G.") will be found annexed to the Songs and Sonnettes of uncertain Authors, printed by Tottell. For further particulars, see authorities cited below.

"He is the second English poet after Lord Surrey who wrote in blank verse. Nor is it his only praise that he was the first who followed in this new path of versification. To the style of blank verse exhibited by Surrey, he added new strength, elegance, and modulation. . . . Grimoald, as a writer of verses in rhyme, yields to none of his cotemporaries for a masterly choice of elaste expression, and the concise elegance of didactic versification. Some of the couplets, in his poem IN PRAISE OF MODERATION, have all the smartness which marks the modern style of sententious poetry, and would have done honour to Pope's ethic Epistles."—Harton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

"Nor was this polish of language peculiar to Surrey and his friend [Wyatt]. In the short poems of Lord Vaux, and of others about the same time, even in those of Nicholas Grimoald, a lecturer at Oxford, who was no courtier, but had acquired a classical taste, we find a rejection of obsolete and trivial phrases, and the beginning of that we now call the style of our older poetry."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

"In the disposition and conduct of his cadences he often approaches to the legitimate structure of the improved blank verse, though not entirely free from those dissonances and asperities which still adhered to the general character of our diction."—Ellis's Spec. of the Early Eng. Poets.

This comedy was written when the author was only thirteen years of age. He subsequently bought up all the copies he could find. When he was a candidate for the borough of St. Alban's, Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, repub. his lordship's juvenile effusion, (1736, 12mo,) and had it circulated among the electors. His lordship, who was really a most worthy man, was ridiculed both by Pope and Swift. The former, referring to the peer's residence at Gorbamby, near St. Alban's, exclaims:

"Shades that to Bacon did retreat afford
Are now the portion of a booby Lord."

And Swift says:

"The leaden crown devolv'd to thee,
Great poet of the Hollow Tree."

This is all very absurd when considered as levelled against the effusions of a bard of thirteen years of age. See Whincop's List of Dramat. Poets; Biog. Dramat.

Grindal, or Gryndall, Edmund, D.D., 1519-1583, a native of Hingsingham, Cumberland, educated at Magdalen Coll., Christ's Coll., and Pembroke Hall, Camb.; Fellow of Pembroke Hall, 1538; President, 1549; Preb. of Westminster, 1552; fell to Strasburg on the accession of Mary in 1553; returned home on the accession of Elizabeth, 1558, and assisted in compiling the new liturgy; Bishop of London, 1559; Archbishop of York, 1570; trans. to Canterbury, 1575. He was an eloquent preacher, and so zealous for the advancement of religion that he refused to obey Elizabeth when she ordered him to substitute the reading of homilies for pulpit ministrations—to "abridge the number of preachers and put down the religious exercises." This firmness led to his being sequestered for a time by her majesty. 1. Profitable and Necessary Doctrine, &c., Lon., 1555, 4to. 2. A Sermon, 1564, 4to and 8vo. Grinfield, Rev. Edward William. 1. Novum Testamentum Græcum, Editio Hellenistica, 2 vols. Scholia in N. T. instructivæ atque ornativæ E. Grinfield, 2 vols.; Lon., 1843-48, 4 vols. 8vo. Designed to show the close connexion of the Greek Testament with the Septuagint. It contains upwards of 30,000 doctrinal and grammatical illustrations, which are arranged respectively under each verse for the convenience of the Student and Divine. We need hardly say that the labours of the editor have been great indeed: to quote from his Preface:

"Per decem annos in hæc Editione concientiâ operam studiumque impensè elecevi."

He intended to have increased his labours by the addition of a threefold collation of the Hebrew, LXX., and New Testament. For an account of this truly great work we must refer to Horne's Bibl. Bibl., and the London Chris. Rememb. for April, 1848.

Griswold, Rufus Wilmot, D.D., 1815-1857, a native of Benson, Rutland county, Vermont, is a descendant in the ninth generation from George Griswold, of Kenilworth, England, and on the mother's side is descended in the eighth degree from Thomas Mayhew, the first Governor of Martha's Vineyard. The subject of this notice seems to have divided the earlier years of his life between his duties as a minister in the Baptist Church and the literary management of a number of journals in several of the principal cities of the Union. Among these may be mentioned The New Yorker, The Brother Jonathan, and The New World. In 1812-43 he was the editor of Graham's Magazine; and from August, 1850, to April, 1852, conducted The International Magazine, the plan of which was projected by himself. Dr. Griswold was a voluminous author, and had achieved an amount of labour at an early period of life—for the productions upon which his reputation is chiefly founded have been before the public for a number of years—highly creditable to his literary industry. In addition to the works which we are about to notice, he gave to the world from time to time, without his name, partly or entirely written by himself, six or eight works on history and biography, a novel, seven discourses on historical and philosophical subjects, and contributions to magazines and newspapers sufficient to fill a dozen octavo volumes.

4. The Curiosities of American Literature. This was pub. as an appendix to an American ed. of Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature. 5. The Poets and Poetry of America, Phila., 1842, 8vo; 16th ed., continued to the present time, 1855. This work was a great advance upon all attempts of a similar character which had preceded it; and in this volume and the two works which followed it—The Prose Writers of America and The Female Poets of America—we had presented for the first time A Survey of the Literature of the United States. From the many notices before us of these invaluable volumes—to which the present work has been greatly indebted—we regret that our quotations must be so few in number and so brief in extent.

From Baron Frederick Von Raumer, of Prussia:

"It is performing a valuable service when a man of taste and information makes a suitable, well assorted selection, and guides the friend of Poetry in his rambles through those groves from which he might otherwise be deterred by their immensity. Such service has been rendered by Mr. Griswold in his Poets and Poetry of America."

From the London Examiner:

"We must not forget to thank Mr. Griswold for his good taste and good feeling. It would be difficult to overpraise either."

From Thomas Campbell, author of The Pleasures of Hope:

"Mr. Griswold's work is honourable to the character and genius of the American people."

From Bishop Potter's Hand-Book for Readers:

"The critical and biographical notes are brief but discriminative and elegant."

From the North American Review, lviii. 1-39, Jan. 1844, by E. P. Whipple:

"Although we deem Mr. Griswold deserving of a little gentle correction for his literary beneficence, we are not insensible to his merits. The work before us must have demanded the labour of years. . . . We think therefore that Mr. Griswold has succeeded as well in his task as the nature of the case admitted; that his patient research and general correctness of taste are worthy of praise; that his difficulties and temptations would have extenuated far graver errors than he has committed, and that his volume well deserves the approbation it has received."

From Edgar A. Poe's Literati:

"We know no one in America who could or who would have performed the task here undertaken, at once so well in accordance with the judgment of the critical, and so much to the satisfaction of the public. The labours, the embarrassments, the great difficulties of the achievement are not easily estimated by those before the scenes."

Sixteenth edition. From the Knickerbocker Magazine for October, 1855:

"We can ask no better attestation of the value of a book so pretentious and expensive as this, than the simple words sale with edition upon the title-page. The successive editions of The Poets and Poetry of America have all been, more or less, improvements upon their predecessors; but the present one is so much of a new work. . . . Printed separately as a series of critical biographies, Dr. Griswold's Lives of the American Poets would constitute a work of remarkable elegance and of signal historical value."

From the North American Review for Jan. 1856, by the editor, Rev. Dr. Peabody:

"In these sketches we find reason to admire the author's impartiality and kindness. We have been unable to find a single instance in which he has suffered any of the usual grounds of prejudice to warp his judgment or to scant his eulogy; and where it has been his duty to refer to obliquities of temper and conduct, he has done so with singular delicacy and gentleness."

6. The Prose Writers of America, 1846, 8vo; 4th ed., 1852.

From Wm. H. Prescott, author of Ferdinand and Isabella:

"It will be an important and interesting contribution to our national literature. The range of authors is very wide; the biographical notices full and interesting. I am surprised that the author has been able to collect so many particulars in this way. The selections appear to me to be made with discrimination, and the criticism shows a sound taste and a correct appreciation of the qualities of the writers, as well as I can judge."

From Wm. C. Bryant :

"We are glad to possess, in this form, portions of many authors whose entire works we should never own, and, if we did, should probably never find time to read. We confess our obligations to the author also for the personal information concerning them which he has collected in the memoirs prefixed to their writings. These are written in a manner creditable to the research, ability, and kindness of the author."

From Literary Criticisms, by Horace Binney Wallace :

"He has done a useful work, and he has done it well. The book now before us is more than respectable; it is executed ably, and in many parts brilliantly. In some respects it is an extraordinary work; such as few men in America, perhaps, besides its author, could have produced, and he only after years of sedulous investigation, and under many advantages of circumstance or accident. He has long shown himself to be of Cicero's mind: 'Mita quidem nulli satis eruditio valentur, quibus nostra ignota sunt.' The distribution of the various writers into their classes, and the selection of representatives of each class or type, exhibit much skill. Many passages present fine specimens of acute, original, and just criticism, eloquently delivered. We differ from Mr. Griswold sometimes, but never without feeling that we owe it to the public in all cases to give a reason why we do not assent to the conclusions of so candid and discriminating a judge."

From the Knickerbocker Magazine :

"We commend The Prose Writers of America to a wide national acceptance; with the especial advice to the reader not to overlook the excellent introductory Essay on the Intellectual History, Condition, and Prospects of the Country, which contains many noteworthy suggestions and much valuable information."

From Henry T. Tuckerman's Sketch of American Literature, appended to the Amer. ed. of Shaw's Outlines of Literature :

"For the chief critical and biographical history of literature in the United States, we are indebted to Rufus W. Griswold, whose two copious and interesting volumes, [Nos. 5 and 6,] so popular at home and abroad, give an elaborate account of what has been done by American writers from the foundation of the country to the present hour. These works are the fruit of great research and an enthusiasm for native literature as rare as it is patriotic."

From Edgar A. Poe's Literati :

"The best of the series [Nos. 5, 6 and 7] is, beyond all question, The Prose Authors of America. This is a book of which any critic in the country might well be proud, without reference to the mere industry and research manifested in its compilation. These are truly remarkable; but the vigour of eloquent and force of style are not less so; while more independence and self-reliance are manifested than in any other of the series. There is not a weak paper in the book; and some of the articles are able in all respects."

From the American Review, by E. P. Whipple :

"No one can glance at Mr. Griswold's volume without being impressed with the fertility of the present century in original poetry. There is one view in which the author of a work like the present may be considered fortunate. Through his diligent labours large bodies of the people, who cannot or will not read extensively, are enabled to obtain an image of the imaginative literature of a great age. And what a world of thought and feeling does its contemplation reveal to us!"

14. The Works of Edgar A. Poe; Poems, Tales and Miscellanies; with a Memoir by R. W. Griswold, and Notices of his Life and Genius, by N. P. Willis and J. R. Lowell, N. York, 1850, 3 vols. 12mo; 1856, 1 vol. 12mo. It is considered by many critics that Dr. Griswold has not done justice to Poe's memory in this volume. 15. The Republican Court; or, American Society in the Days of Washington, with 21 portraits of Distinguished Women, engraved from original pictures by Wollaston, Copley, Gainsborough, Stuart, Trumbull, Malbone, and other Contemporary Painters, N. York, 1854, 4to. New ed., enlarged, with additional portraits, issued 1856, &c. In this sumptuously-printed and richly-illustrated work, a view of American society in the days of the Father of the Republic is presented, for the most part from original materials, consisting of private correspondence, &c.

From the North American Review, lxxxi. 26-50, July, 1855, by H. T. Tuckerman :

"The Republican Court is the most beautiful specimen in this department that has yet appeared, and has the peculiar merit of a national subject. It consists of a fluent narrative, intended to convey an authentic and picturesque idea of social life in this country in the days of Washington. . . . In the preparation of this elegant quarto, the memoirs and correspondence of the period have been searched, the diaries of leading members of society gleaned, the reminiscences of survivors drawn upon, and such works as Sullivan's Letters on Public Characters, Doer's Recollections of New York, the autobiographies of French officers engaged in the war, the letters of Mrs. Adams, and Graydon's Memoirs, carefully examined."

From the Christian Examiner, No. CXC., July, 1855, by the Rev. Samuel Osgood :

"This elegant volume was received by acclamation on its first appearance. We are quite certain that the sober second judgment of the public will confirm the first opinion, and in some respects magnify its approbation. . . . Its solid literary merits are yet to be fully appreciated. We do not know where else one half so much information respecting our early American history can be found. . . . Dr. Griswold has evidently been much favored in the use of private family memorials, and he has worked up his material with much artistic taste in the grouping and great spirit in the narrative. The volume stands among our important historical monuments."

From an interesting account, by Mr. Fletcher, of the interest manifested by the Emperor of Brazil in an exhibition of American products, collected (in 1855) by the enterprise of the former, we extract some remarks by his majesty, not without interest in this connexion :

"After spending a long time in the exhibition, he exclaimed to his suite: 'That which I find the most desirable is the perfection of typography and binding, (alluding to the Republican Court, which he held in his hand,) the beautiful specimens of steel engravings and chromo-lithography, and the clearness of the photographic portraits.' Now, it is just in those departments that the Brazilians had believed us deficient; for almost every thing of this kind comes from England, France, and Germany."

"He was a plodding, industrious, and careful writer, extremely well informed on American literature, but by no means an elegant, nor even a correct, though very ambitious, writer. He was inclined to be metaphysical and transcendental, but would get out of his depth and become unintelligible. Though he had no genius whatever, Dr. Griswold has done some service to literature. He will be remembered by his compilations."—DR. R. SNEEL'S MACKENZIE.

The reader who desires to learn more respecting Dr. Griswold's characteristics as an author is referred to The Knickerbocker Magazine, xxxvi. 162, xlvii. 398, and to Literary Criticisms and Literary Portraits, by Horace Binney Wallace. From the last-named authority we make a brief extract, which may appropriately conclude this article.

"The literary abilities displayed in the original portion of these works [see Nos. 5, 6, 7, and 13] are entitled to very high rank, and are undoubtedly the sufficient cause of their popularity and permanence. Dr. Griswold's style is fresh, brilliant, delicate, perhaps over-delicate, but never feeble, and rarely morbid. With unerring accuracy he always indicates the strong points of his subject; yet he indicates rather than seizes them. The outlines of truth are always traced with acuity and precision; yet they are traced rather than channelled. His coloring is refined, soft, suggestive; dealing in half-tones or mixed hues more usually than in simple and contrasted colors. His perceptions are keenly intelligent, and full of vitality and vividness; but they are too mercurial, fugitive, and hasty; they want fixity, persistency, and prolongation. He touches some rich element of truth or beauty, but he does not linger upon it to develop and unfold its deep and full resources."—p. 239.

Grocyn, Wm., 1442-1519, a native of Bristol, England, a man of great learning, was educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford. In 1479 he was made Rector of Newton-Longville, Buckinghamshire, and in 1485 Preb. of Lincoln. He also filled the place of divinity-reader in Magdalen College, Oxford. Being enthusiastically devoted to the study of the Greek language, probably from the influence of Vitelli, he visited Italy for the sake of perfecting his knowledge of this tongue, and studied for some time under Demetrius, Chalcondyles, and Politian. In 1491 he settled at Exeter College, Oxford, and publicly taught the Greek language, advocating a new pronunciation, which encountered violent opposition. The University divided itself into two factions, the Greeks and the Trojans, who, not content with philological polemics, and forgetting that inter arma leges silent, resorted finally to open hostilities. Of Grocyn's earnest devotion to Greek literature we have ample evidence on record :

"Receus tunc ex Italia venerat Grocynus qui primus eâ etate Græcæ literas in Angliam invexerat. Oxoniique publicè professus fuerat, à cujus sodali Thoma Lynacro (Morus) Græcæ literas Oxoniè didicit."—STAPLETON: In lib. cui tit. De Tribus Thomis, in The More, esp. i.

"Grocynus, qui prima Græcæ et Latine lingue rudimenta in Britannia hausit, mox solidiorum libere operam sub Demetrio Chalcondyle et Politiano preceptoribus in Italia hausit."—LILLY: Elogia virorum doctorum; in Knight's Life of Chet. p. 24.

"Ipse Grocynus, cujus exemplum affert, nonne primum in Angliæ Græcæ lingue rudimenta didicit? Post in Italia profectus audivit summos viros, sed inter illos fuit illa prius à quibuscunque didicisset."—ERASMUS: Epist. CCLXXIII.

A Latin epistle of Grocyn's to Aldus Manutius is prefixed to Linaere's trans. of Proclus de Sphæra, printed at Venice, 1449, fol.

"There is nothing extant of his but this epistle: indeed, a very elaborate and acute one, and written in good Latin. . . . He was of so nice a taste that he had rather write nothing than write ill."—ERASMUS.

Erasmus was the friend, perhaps the pupil, of Grocyu, and may therefore be supposed to have been well informed; but Bale, Tanner, and Leland ascribe some other works to Grocyu. See these authorities; also Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon.; Wood's Annals; Jortin and Knight's Lives of Erasmus; Knight's Life of Colet; Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

But this is also attributed to Henry Bunbury. Grose's habits, especially in early life, were of too convivial a character for either his purse or reputation; and many a jolly circle of "good fellows" could answer promptly in the affirmative the query of Burns the poet,

Grosseteste, Grostète, or Grosthead, Robert, 1175?-1253, a native of Stradbroke, Suffolk, was educated at Oxford and Paris; Archdeacon of Leicester, 1222; Bishop of Lincoln, 1234. His name has no less than twelve different modes of spelling. He was a man of great learning, and an undaunted opposer of the usurpations of the See of Rome. For an account of his life and works—theological, philosophical, poetical, &c.—we refer to S. Pegge's biography of him, 1793, 4to; to Milner's Church Hist.; and to Archæol., vol. xiii. "By a knowledge of Greek, when we find it asserted of some mediæval theologian like Grostète, we are not to understand an acquaintance with the great classical authors, who were latent in eastern monasteries, but the power of reading some petty treatise of the fathers, or, as in this instance, [Grostète's trans. of the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs from Greek into Latin,] an apocryphal legend, or at best, perhaps, some of the later commentators on Aristotle. Grostète was a man of considerable merit, but has had his share of applause."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

Grote, George, M.P., the historian of Greece, b. 1794, at Clay Hall, near Berkenham, Kent, England, is a son of Mr. Grote, of the well-known banking-house established by Mr. George Prescott, and the grandfather of the subject of this notice. Mr. Grote was for some time a clerk in the banking-house, and at a later period of life divided his attention between literature and politics, but for some time past has devoted his hours exclusively to the former. In addition to the great work by which he is best known and will be honoured to the latest period of time, he is the author of a pamphlet (pub. anonymously in 1821) in reply to Sir James Mackintosh's Essay on Parliamentary Reform, in the Edinburgh Review; a work on the Essentials of Parliamentary Reform; an article on Mitford, in the Westminster Review, and one on Niebuhr's Heroic Legends of Greece, in the London and Westminster Review. The name of Niebuhr appropriately introduces the expression of his warm interest in Mr. Grote's History of Greece, which was commenced 1823:

"Endeavour to become acquainted with Mr. Grote, who is engaged on a Greek History: he, too, will receive you well if you take him my regards. If you become better acquainted with him, it is worth your while to obtain the proof-sheets of his work, in order to translate it. I expect a great deal from this production, and I will get you a publisher here."—Niebuhr, the Historian, to Professor Lieber, in 1827.

The publication of the vols. of Mr. Grote's History was as follows:—Vols. I., II., 1846; III., IV., 1847; V., VI., 1849; VII., VIII., 1850; IX., X., 1852; XI., 1853; XII., 1855. Of Vol. XII., 1200 copies were sold in one week. 2d ed. of Vols. I., II., III., and IV., 1849; 3d ed., 1851. 2d ed. of Vols. V. and VI., 1851. In commendation of this truly great production, critics who seldom agree are glad to unite their suffrages. The London Quarterly declares that the author has "Incontestably won for himself the title not merely of a historian, but of the historian, of Greece."—xcix. 384.

The Edinburgh Review assures us that "He will be remembered not only as the first who has seriously undertaken a philosophical history of Greece, but as one who will have made great steps towards accomplishing it."—lxxxiv. 345.—Notice of vols. i. and ii. The succeeding volumes are noticed in the same laudatory terms.

The Athenæum styles the history

"A great literary undertaking, equally notable whether we regard it as an accession of standard value in our language, or as an honourable monument of what English scholarship can do."

The Spectator remarks that

"His familiarity with the great highways and the obscure by-paths of Grecian literature and antiquity has seldom been equalled, and not often approached to, in unlearned England; while those Germans who have rivalled it have seldom possessed the quality which eminently characterizes Mr. Grote, of keeping historical imagination severely under the restraints of evidence."

The Examiner is not less enthusiastic in the expression of its admiration:

"If there existed any doubt of Mr. Grote's qualifications for this weighty undertaking, it was, whether he would bring to it the amount of imaginative feeling necessary to sustain and inform his scholarship. We confess that these volumes are a surprise to us in that respect. The acute intelligence, the discipline, faculty of intellect, and the excellent erudition, every one would look for from Mr. Grote; but they will here also find the element which harmonizes these, and without which, on such a theme, an orderly and solid work could not have been written. Poetry and Philosophy attend the historian on either hand, and do not impede or misguide his steps."

The eulogy of the distinguished historian of modern Europe is no insignificant reward for even such protracted and laborious researches as have tested the patience, the learning, and the fidelity of the historian of Greece:

"A decided liberal, perhaps even a republican, in politics, Mr. Grote has laboured to counteract the influence of Mitford in Grecian history, and construct a history of Greece from authentic materials, which should illustrate the animating influence of democratic freedom upon the exertions of the human mind. In the prosecution of this attempt he has displayed an extent of learning, a variety of research, a power of combination, which are worthy of the very highest praise, and have secured for him a lasting place among the historians of modern Europe."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe from the Fall of Napoleon, in 1815, to the Accession of Louis Napoleon, in 1852.

"In approaching the consideration of its merits, we are struck with the singular correctness, force, and often eloquence, of the style in which it is written. The style would do high credit to any native, and to the manner born; in a foreigner it seems wonderful. . . . The idiom of our language, which is often so subtle, and eludes the grasp of the severest study, Mr. Grund uses with great and almost unerring accuracy. An English critic has said that he has scarcely ever offended in this particular, except when he attempts poetical versions from Schiller or Goethe. . . . To a foreigner who is interested in the country Mr. Grund's work will be of great value, from the amount of information which it conveys. No other work, within our knowledge, presents a view so complete of our resources in every department of life. . . . Mr Grund is a thorough democrat. He upholds the cause of the many against the few, and takes every opportunity to enforce the importance of religious and political freedom. The latter he estimates as the two most prominent moral causes which promoted the trade of Holland and the United States."—CHARLES SUMNER: N. Amer. Rev., xvi. 106-120, q. v.

York, Charles B. Norton, Agent for Libraries, MDCCCLVIII., sm. 4to, pp. 304. Beautifully printed in Old English character. The First Part consists of a descriptive list of 495 separate works, comprising 1967 volumes of such bibliographical works as are considered to be of the first importance for a library apparatus. The Second Part contains historical sketches of fourteen of the largest public libraries in Europe and America. We recommend Mr. Guild's volume to all who take an interest—and every lover of books should take an interest—in the important subject of which it expressly treats.

Guild, Wm., D.D. 1586-1657, a native of Aberdeen, educated at Marischal Coll., became minister of the parish of King Edward, and in 1631 one of the ministers of Aberdeen; Principal of King's Coll., Aberdeen, 1640; deposed for his attachment to the royal cause, 1651. He was a man of learning, ability, and great benevolence of character. In addition to the following works, he pub. a number of tracts against popery, and upon other subjects. 1. The Harmony of all the Prophets conc. Christ's Coming, &c., Lon., 1619, 8vo; 1658, 12mo. 2. Moses Unveiled; or, The Types of Christ in Moses explained, 1620, 8vo. Often reprinted. Gummere, John, 1784-1845, a native of Willow Grove, Penn., for more than forty years an esteemed and successful teacher of youth, discharged the duties of tuition successively at Horsham, Rancocas, West Town, Burlington, and Haverford. Upon his retirement from the Friends' Coll. at Haverford, he resumed his Boarding-School at Burlington, (previously conducted by him from 1814 to 1833,) in connection with his eldest son, Samuel J. Gummere, "who is his worthy successor, both in scientific attainments and in the happy art of imparting instruction." His celebrated treatise on Surveying was first pub. in 1814, has run through 14 edits., and is now stereotyped. Of his Elementary Treatise on Theoretical and Practical Astronomy, the 1st ed. was pub. in 1822, and the last (the 6th) in 1854. The excellence of this work elicited the warm commendations of Dr. Bowditch, Prof. Bache, and other competent judges. An interesting biographical sketch, entitled Memorials of the Life and Character of John Gummere, was privately printed by Wm. J. Allinson, of Burlington. It is a well-merited tribute to the learning and virtues of a ripe scholar and an excellent man. James I., when in the plenitude of his glory as the master of three kingdoms, acknowledged that he never even then saw his stern old schoolmaster, Buchanan, without an emotion of fear. It may be truly said—we speak from our own experience—that the former disciples of John Gummere never in after-life approached their old master without sentiments of affection and esteem.

Gummere, Samuel R., brother of the preceding, b. in 1789, at Willow Grove, Penn., was from 1821 to 1837 the head of a popular boarding-school for girls, at Burlington, N. Jersey. He is the author of a Treatise on Geography, which was first pub. in 1817, and has passed through six or eight edits.: and he revised the Progressive Spelling-Book in 1831. Gurney, Joseph, and Gurney, William Brodie, short-hand writers. Joseph pub. Brachygraphy, Lon., 1751, 12mo; 15th ed., improved by Thomas Gurney, 1825, 12mo.

Gurney, Joseph John, 1788-1847, an eminent philanthropist, and a distinguished minister of the Society of Friends, was a native of Earham, near Norwich, where the family have possessed great influence for the last two centuries. Mr. Gurney was the brother of the excellent Elizabeth Fry, and a zealous co-labourer with her in many enterprises of Christian benevolence. After passing through a course of preparatory study, the subject of this notice resided for some time at Oxford, under the charge of a private tutor, and attended the lectures of the University without becoming a member and without subscribing to the Thirty-Nine Articles. Upon the completion of his education Mr. Gurney became a member of the eminent banking-house established by his father, and henceforth devoted much of his time to secular business, but was also actively engaged in many philanthropic researches, and in the zealous discharge of his duties as a minister (recognised in 1818) of the religious society to which he was attached. In addition to missionary tours among the prisons of Scotland, England, and Ireland, Mr. Gurney paid three visits to the Continent in 1841-43, and passed three years (1837-40) in travelling in America. For the particulars connected with the life of this truly excellent man, we refer the reader to his Memoirs, by J. B. Braithwaite, Norwich, 1854, 2 vols. 8vo; Phila., 1854, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1855, 2 vols. 8vo. See also his Memoirs, by J. Alexander, Lon., 1847, 12mo; London Christian Observer for February and March, 1847; Lon. Gent. Mag. for March, 1847; Memorial of J. J. Gurney, a Poem, by B. Barton, 1847, 4to; An Examination of the Memoirs and Writings of J. J. Gurney, by Wm. Hodgson, Jr., Phila., 1856.

Mr. Gurney was the author of numerous works which gained him a highly respectable rank in the Republic of Letters, of which the following are the principal:—1. Notes on Prisons and Prison Discipline, Lon., 1819, 12mo. Reviewed by Rev. Sydney Smith, in Edin. Rev., xxxv. 286-302. 2. Letter to a Friend on Christianity, 3d ed., 1824, 12mo. 3. Observations on the Religious Peculiarities of the Society of Friends, 1824, 12mo and 8vo. It passed through seven eds. in the lifetime of the author.

"The best defence of the Quakers; it was ably met in the British Review."—B. Clerestell's C. S.

4. Essays on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Practical Operations of Christianity, 1827, 8vo. Trans. into German and Spanish.

"A very valuable summary and defence of evangelical views."—Bielertelli's C. S.

"Mr. J. J. Gurney, if he had been a clergyman instead of a Quaker, would have deserved a bishopric for his book upon the Evidences of Christianity."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

5. Biblical Notes to confirm the Deity of Christ, 1830, 8vo. "An able, solid and profitable critical illustration of texts on the subject."—Bielertelli's C. S.

6. Brief Remarks on the History, Authority, and Use of the Sabbath, 1831, 18mo.

"Like every thing which proceeds from this author's pen, it displays solid erudition and acute reasoning, united to true simplicity of mind and fervent piety."—London's Brit. Lib.

7. Portable Evid. of Christ's, 2d ed., 1832, 18mo. New ed., 1841, 18mo. 8. Four Lects. on the Evid. of Christ's, 1834, 18mo. 9. Treatise on the Habitual Exercise of Love to God considered as a Preparative for Heaven, 18mo and 8vo; 7th ed., 1818, 18mo. 10. Letter to a Clerical Friend on the Accordance of Geological Discovery with Natural and Revealed Religion, 1835, 12mo.

"We greatly mistake if this tract, from the pen of our excellent friend, Mr. Gurney, will not be found eminently serviceable to the interests of revealed religion."—Lon. Evang. Mag.

11. Sabbatical Verses, 1837, 8vo.

"We do not consider that he was a poet of a very high order; but we might select from that volume, and from others of his verses, some effusions which evince taste and feeling, attuning devout ideas to the voice of melody."—Lon. Christian Observer.

12. Familiar Sketch of Wm. Wiberforce, 1840, 18mo. 13. A Winter in the West Indies, described in Familiar Letters to Henry Clay, of Kentucky, 1840, 8vo; 4th ed., 1841, 18mo. 14. Terms of Union in the Bible Society. 15. Puseyism traced to its Root, 2d ed., 1845, 8vo. 16. Thoughts on Habit and Discipline, 12mo and 8vo; 2d ed., 1844, 12mo; 6th ed., 1852, 12mo.

"His tone is decidedly religious, but its method is philosophical, while its style is popular."—Lon. Athenaeum.

Mr. Gurney also pub. Treatises on the Right Application of Knowledge, and on other subjects. His Minor Works have been pub. by Gilpin, of London, in 2 vols. 8vo.

Mr. Gurney was thrice married: first, to Jane Birbeck, who died in 1822; secondly, to Mary Fowler, who died in 1836; and, thirdly, to Eliza P. Kirkbride, who survives him. As a Christian, a philanthropist, and a man of extensive and accurate learning, Mr. Gurney was amply entitled to the extraordinary respect and veneration which was accorded to him by men of all ranks of life and all classes of opinion.

Gurwood, Colonel John, R.N., C.B. and Deputy-Lieut. of the Tower of London, d. 1845, entered the army in 1808, and served under the Duke of Wellington in the Peninsula and at Waterloo. He filled the post of private secretary to the Duke, and was therefore well calculated for the laborious duty of editing his Despatches and Orders, which he performed in a highly creditable manner. The mental toil and anxiety involved in this undertaking perhaps proved indirectly the cause of the colonel's death; he committed suicide in a fit of insanity produced "by relaxation of his nervous system, in consequence of his great work, 'The Wellington Despatches,' being concluded,"—Lon. Gent. Mag., Feb. 1845; where will be found an interesting biography of this distinguished soldier. The Despatches of the Duke of Wellington, 1799-1818,—which may be entitled a history of British military operations for that period,—were pub. in 13 vols. 8vo, including the Index, 1835-38. New ed., 8 vols. r. 8vo, 1843-48; also in 1853, 8 vols. 8vo. Selections from, 1842, r. 8vo; also in 1850, r. 8vo. To the Despatches must be added the General Orders of the Duke, 1809-18,—also compiled by Colonel Gurwood;—1837, 8vo.

"Colonel Gurwood takes occasion, but much too seldom, to introduce short notes of his own, in order to elucidate circumstances which the text of the letters does not explain. We greatly wish that he had been less diffident on this score. . . . The Duke's high-spirited and able Editor."—ROBERT SOUTHEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., lviii. 82-107.

"The most authentic and valuable of biographical productions. It is analogous to Sparks's Life and Writings of Washington."—CHANCELLOR KENT.

Colonel Gurwood also arranged The Duke's Speeches in Parliament, pub. in 1853, 2 vols. 8vo. For a notice of The Despatches and Orders, and estimates of the literary character of the author, see WELLINGTON, ARTHUR WELLESLEY, DUKE OF.

Gutch, J. W. G. Literary and Scientific Register, Lon., 32mo. Pub. annually, 1842-56.

Gutch, John, d. 1831, aged 86, Registrar of the Univ. of Oxford, Rector of St. Clement's, and Chaplain of All-Souls' College. 1. Collectanea Curiosa; or, Miscell. Tracts rel. to the Hist. and Antiq. of Eng. and Ireland, the Univ. of Oxford and Camb. &c., chiefly from the MSS. of Archbp. Sancroft, Oxf., 1781, 2 vols. 8vo. 2. Hist. and Antiq. of the Univ. of Oxford; now first pub. in English, from the original MSS. of Ant. Wood, with a Continuation by the Editor, 1786, 4to. 3. Fasti Oxonienses, by Wood; with a Continuation, &c. by the Editor, 1790, 4to. 4. The Antiq. and Annals of the Univ. of Oxford, from the MS. of Wood, 1792-94-96, 3 vols. 4to. See WOOD, ANTHONY. A biography of Mr. Gutch will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag., Sept. 1831.

Gutch, John Mathew, ed. of Farley's Journal, d. 1858. A Lytell Geste of Robin Hood, 1847, 2 vols. 8vo.

"These handsome volumes, both in richness of matter and correctness of text, exceed the precious labours of even Kitson himself."—Lon. Gent. Mag.

"If any one wants to know bold Robin Hood as he was, let him straightway possess himself of those two delightful volumes for which we are indebted to Mr. Gutch. We have here not only the consecutive series of ballads known as The Lytell Geste of Robin Hood, but every ballad, tale, and song, relating to the famous outlaw; and the whole are beautifully illustrated. Mr. Gutch thoroughly understands the duty of an editor, and has applied himself heart and soul to the task; in consequence, he has given us by far the best collection of English ballads which for years has issued from the press."—Blackwood's Mag.

The graphic lines of the poet will occur to many of our readers:

"In this our spacious Isle, I think there is not one
But he of Robin Hood hath heard, and Little John.
And to the end of time the tales shall never be done,
Of Scarlock, George & Green and Much the Miller's Son,
Of Tuck the merry Friar, which many a Sermon made
In praise of Robin Hood, his outlaws, and their trade."
DRAYTON.

Gutch, Rev. Robert. A Discourse, Lon., 1803, 8vo.

Guthrie, G. J., an eminent surgeon, has pub. a number of professional treatises of high reputation, 1815-53.

Guthrie, or Guthry, Henry, d. 1676? Bishop of Dunkeld, 1664. Memoirs, temp. Charles I., Lon., 1702, 8vo; 2d ed., Glasg., 1747, 12mo.

Guthrie, Mrs. Maria, wife of Dr. Matthew Guthrie, and Acting Directress of the Imperial Convent for the education of the Female Nobility of Russia. A Tour in 1795-96 through the Taurica or Crimea, Lon., 1802, 4to.

"This work contains a lovely description of the various tribes that inhabit the Crimea; their manners, institutions, natural history, and remarks on the migrations of the Asiatic tribes. That part of the work which relates to antiquities was written by her husband, Dr. Guthrie."—Stevenson's Voyages and Travels.

Guthrie, Matthew, M.D., husband of the preceding, d. at St. Petersburg in 1807. Dissert. sur les Antiquités de Russie. &c., Petersh., 1795, 5vo. He con. papers to Phil. Trans., 1778, '79; Trans. Edin. Soc., 1790; Nichol. Jour., 1798.

Guthrie, Thomas, D.D., b. 1800, minister of Free St. John's, Edinburgh, was born at Brechin, Forfarshire, Scotland. 1. A Sufficient Maintenance and an Efficient Ministry: a Sermon, with Notes, Edin., 1852, 8vo.

"We earnestly recommend this discourse."—Baptist Mag.
2. The Gospel in Ezekiel, 1855, 12mo; 20th thousand.
"The most eloquent of the present range of Free Church preachers."

"In the excellent work before us, these lights of the glorious Gospel, as revealed to an ancient prophet, are collected, arranged, and illustrated, by the hand of a master."—Chris. Observer.

Dr. Guthrie has also pub. A Plea in behalf of Drunkards against Drunkenness, and edited a new ed. (Edin., 1856, 8vo) of Berridge's Christian World Unmasked. He was one of the four leading men—the other three being Drs. Chalmers, Cunningham, and Candlish—connected with the disruption of the Established Church of Scotland and the institution of the Free Church of that country. To him also humanity is indebted for the establishment of the Edinburgh original Ragged or Industrial School, which has been productive of vast benefit to the poorer classes.

Guthrie, Wm., 1620-1665, minister of the parish church of Finwick, 1644-64. The Christian's Great Interest. New ed., Lon., 1705; Glasg., 1755, 8vo. With Memoirs of the Author, &c., Edin., 1797, 12mo; 4th ed., with Introd. by T. Chalmers, D.D., Glasg., 1844, 12mo; 7th ed., 1850, 12mo. Trans. into French, High and Low Dutch, and (at the expense, it is said, of the Hon. Robert Boyle) into one of the Eastern languages.

Dr. John Owen called this book his Vade-Mecum, and added,
"I have wrote several folios, but there is more divinity in it than them all."

"An excellent work."—Bickersteth's C. S.
A sermon of Guthrie's on Sympathy, and Memoirs of his Life by Rev. Wm. Dunlop, will be found in the Select Biographies edited for the Woodrow Society by Rev. W. K. Tweedie, Edin., 1845-47, 2 vols. 8vo.

Guthrie, Wm., 1708-1770, a native of Brechin, a schoolmaster in Aberdeen, and subsequently an author in London, pub. a number of works and trans. from Cicero and Quintilian. 1. Hist. of England to 1688, Lon., 1744-51, 3 vols. fol. Reprinted in 1771.

"A Tory history of England, by no means destitute of merit." "Now [18-4] rarely consulted."—Diddin's Lib. Comp.

Ralph's Hist. of England may be read as a continuation of Guthrie's. 2. Hist. of the English Peasage, 1763, 4to. 3. General Hist. of the World, 1761-67, 12 vols. 8vo. 4. A General Hist. of Scotland to 1746, 1767, 10 vols. 8vo. 5. New System of Modern Geography, or a Geog., Hist., and Commercial Grammar, &c., 1770, 8vo. Many edits.; last, by Davenport, 1843, 18mo; last ed. of the Atlas, 1840, 8vo. It is asserted that the bookseller, and not Guthrie, was really the compiler of this popular work. 6. Chronological Table, 1744, 8vo. Guthrie was a contributor to the Gentleman's Magazine and to the Critical Review, and the author of many political pamphlets, &c. pub. without his name. See Lysons's Environs, vol. iii.; Nichol's Lit. Anecdotes; Boswell's Life of Johnson; Disraeli's Calamities of Authors.

"Sir, he [Guthrie] is a man of parts. He has no great regular fund of knowledge, but by reading so long and writing so long he has no doubt picked up a good deal."—Dr. Johnson to Boswell.

Gutzlaff, Rev. Charles, D.D., 1803-1851, a native of Pyritz, Pomerania, a missionary in Java, Singapore, Siam, and China, from 1826 until his death at Canton, was the author of many works—theolog., historical, philological, legal, critical, &c.—in Dutch, Latin, Siamese, Cochin-Chinese, and English. An interesting account of his life and labours will be found in the London Gent. Mag. for Dec. 1851. See also The International Mag. (N. York,) vol. i. 317-318; iv. 797. Three or four of Dr.

G.'s works are well known to the English reader, viz.: 1. Chinese History, Lon., 1834, 2 vols. 8vo.

"We cordially recommend this exceedingly interesting account of this very interesting country."—Lon. Review.

"An authentic and interesting picture of China"—CHANCELLOR KENT.

2. China Opened; ed. by Rev. A. Reed, 1838, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"A superficial, yet, on the whole, pretty good, sketch of China and its inhabitants."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ.

"By far the most interesting, complete, and valuable account of the Chinese Empire that has yet been published."—Lon. Sun.

3. A Journal of Three Voyages along the Coast of China, 1831-33; 3d ed., 1839, p. 8vo.

"The work of a man who has done more to break down the barrier which prevents the entrance of Christian missionaries into China than any other human being."—Lon. Eclectic Review.

"Mr. Gutzlaff's voyages are replete with surpassing interest. He is a wonderful man, a heroic Christian, and a zealous philanthropist."—Scottish Publ.

4. The Life of Taon Kwang, late Emperor of China, 1852, p. 8vo. Reviews of Mr. Gutzlaff's accounts of China will be found in the Amer. Quar. Rev., xvii. 100, ("a learned and masterly production."—CHANCELLOR KENT;) Lon. Quar. Rev., li. 468; by E. G. Smith, in Chris. Quar. Spec., v. 591; by B. B. Edwards, in Amer. Quar. Obs., i. 330. Gyse, John, D.D., 1680-1761, a Calvinistic Independent divine, settled at Hertford, and subsequently in New Broad Street, London, pub. a number of Sermons, Discourses, &c., but is best known by The Practical Expositor; or, An Exposition of the N. Test. in the form of a Paraphrase, with Notes, &c., Lon., 1739-42, 3 vols. 4to; 1760, 3 vols. 4to; called the best ed. Other eds., in 6 vols. 8vo, Edin., 1775, 1808, '14.

"Dr. G. has shown his solid judgment and learning; and, without affectation and needless pomp of criticism, has given the reader as full a view of the sense of the best interpreters and as comprehensive an insight into the scope and meaning of the New Testament, as is likely perhaps to be met with in the same compass of words."—MIDDLETON.

"A heavy work. In the paraphrase various and often discordant senses are brought together. The notes do not throw much light on the text. It is far inferior to the similar work of his friend and contemporary, Dr. Doddridge, [The Family Expositor.]"—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"It is this work has not an air of elegant criticism and modern refinement, like the Family Expositor, (of Dr. Doddridge,) it is very sound and judicious, expressed in a style significant, perspicuous, and correct, though not ornamented."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"Very useful to a minister, though too heavy for the general reader."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"His paraphrase has never been very popular."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

"It displays sound judgment, an intimate acquaintance with the original, considerable critical acumen, with much seriousness and zeal for truth."—B. GUE AND BENNETT.

His work on the Holy Spirit (greatly admired) has been recently (Lon., 1840, r. 8vo) repub. His sermons, pub. separately and collectively, and at various dates, have been highly commended:

"His discourses the reader will find judicious, weighty, serious, evangelical, and instructive."—Wilson's Disserters.

Habington, Thomas, d. 1647, collected the materials which formed the basis of Treadway Nash's Hist. of Worcestershire, and was engaged in some other literary labours. He was implicated in Babington's and in Essex's conspiracies, and in the Gunpowder Plot. See Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon.

Habington, William, 1605-1645, son of the preceding, was educated at the College of St. Omer, and intended for a Jesuit, but in preference he married Lucy, daughter of William Herbert, first Lord Powis, by Eleanor, daughter of Henry Percy, first Earl of Northumberland. This lady, first as the object of his courtship and secondly as his wife, he has celebrated in his poems under the title of Castara. Under this name also his poems were collected and pub. in 1634, Lon., 4to; 2d ed., 1635, 12mo; 3d ed., 1640, 12mo. New ed., with a Pref. and Notes by C. A. Elton, Bristol, 1814, 8vo. Also in Johnson and Chalmers's Eng. Poets, 1810.

"They possess much elegance, much poetical fancy; and are almost everywhere tinged with a deep moral cast, which ought to have made their fame permanent. Indeed I cannot easily account for the neglect of them."—SIR S. EGERTON BRYDGES: Oms. Ld., viii. 227-233; and see p. 387-396.

"Some of his pieces deserve being revived."—Headley's Anc. Eng. Poet.

"As an amatory poet he possesses more unaffected tenderness and delicacy of sentiment than either Carow or Waller, with an elegance of versification very seldom inferior to his more favoured contemporaries."—THOMAS PARKER.

But audi alteram partem:

"He was a middling poet of the worst school of poetry, possessed the coldness without the smoothness and polish of Waller, and sacrificed grace and feeling to the utterance of clever or strange things; his amatory poetry is without passion, his funeral elegies without grief, and his paraphrases of scripture without the warmth or elevation of the original."—Lon. Retrosp. Rev., xii. 274-286; 1825.

"The poetry of Habington is that of a pure and amiable mind, turned to versification by the custom of the day, during a real passion for a lady of birth and virtue, the Castara whom he afterwards married; but it displays no great original power, nor is it by any means exempt from the ordinary blemishes of hyperbolical compliment and far-fetched imagery."—Hollan's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

2. The Queene of Aragon; a Tragi-Comedie, 1664, fol. And in Dodsley's Collec. of Old Plays.

"The play, indeed, possesses little that can be praised either in incident, character, or imagery."—Petrosp. Rev., ubi supra.

3. Hist. of Edward the IV., King of England, 1640, fol. Written and pub. at the desire of K. Charles I. It is reprinted in vol. i. of Kennett's Hist. of England. 4. Observations upon Historie, 1641, 8vo.

Wood observes that the Hist. of Edward IV. was

"By many esteemed to have a stile sufficiently florid and better becoming a poetical than historical subject."—Athen. Oxon., q. v.; and also Blog. Dramat.; and Johnson and Chalmers's Eng. Poets, 1810.

As a theologian he was a zealous Protestant and a moderate Calvinist; as a man he was in great reputation for piety, hospitality, generosity, and benignity. 1. Comædia Lolita, data per Joh. Hackett Epis. Litchfield, Lon., 1648, 8vo. This Latin comedy was twice acted before James I. 2. Serm., 1660, 4to. 3. A Century of Serms., with the Author's Life, by Thos. Plume, D.D., 1675, fol.

"Bishop Hacket and I go on well after supper. His are comical sermons: half Roman Catholic in their conceits, full of learning which would be utterly unprofitable if it did not sometimes call forth a shrewd remark, seasoned with piety, and having strong good sense mixed up with other ingredients, like plums in a pudding which has not too many of them."—Southey's Life and Correspondence.

4. Serinia Reserta: the Life of Archbishop Williams, 1693, fol. Abridged by Ambrose Philips, 1700, 8vo. Abridged by W. Stephens, 1715, 4to.

"Full of curious matter."—DISRAELI.
 "What a delightful and instructive book Bishop Hacket's Life of Archbishop Williams is! You learn more from it of that which is valuable towards an insight into the times preceding the Civil Wars, than from all the ponderous histories and memoirs now composed about that period."—COLERIDGE.

Another critic remarks that this work,
 "Though full of elaborate and pedantic absurdity, inasmuch that it was roundly declared by a great judge of style to be the worst-written book in the language, nevertheless abounds with new and curious matter."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

A new ed. of his Christian Consolations, with a Memoir, was pub. in 1840, fp. 8vo; and a treatise of his on Fasting will be found in Tracts of Angl. Fathers, iv. 163.

"He abounded not only with great learning, acute wit, excellent judgment and memory, but with an incomparable integrity, prudence, justice, piety, charity, constancy to God and to his friend in adversity, and in his friendship was most industrious to fulfil it with good offices. Haddon, Walter, 1516-1572, a native of Buckinghamshire, one of the revivers of the learned languages in England, Fellow of King's Coll., Camb., became President of Magdalen Coll., Oxf., and Prof. of Rhetoric and Oratory in the University. He was one of the authors of The Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum. A collective edit. of his works, consisting of 10 Latin Orations, 14 letters, and some poems, was pub. in 1567, Lon., 4to, under the title of Lucubrations, &c. His Poemata were pub., with his Life, in 1576, 16mo.

When Queen Elizabeth was asked whether she preferred Haddon or Buchanan in point of learning, she replied,

"Buchananum omnibus antepono, Haddonum nemini postpono."

An eminent modern critic considers that Haddon's merits as a Latinist have been overrated:

"Many of our own critics have extolled the Latinity of Walter Haddon. His Orations were published in 1567. They belong to the first years of this period. [1550 to 1600,] but they seem hardly to deserve any high praise. Haddon had certainly laboured at an imitation of Cæsar, but without catching his manner or getting rid of the florid, semi-poetical tone of the fourth century."—Italian's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

Hakewill, George, D.D., 1579-1649, a native of Exeter, educated at St. Alban's Hall, Oxf., became Archdeacon of Surrey, 1616. He pub. several theolog. treatises and sermons, 1608-41, and the following work, by which he is best known:—An Apologie or Declaration of the Power and Providence of God in the Government of the World, Oxf., 1627, '30, '35, fol.

"There have been many great inquests," remarks Joshua Sylvester,

"To find the cause why bodies still grow less, And daily nearer to the pigmies' size."

Hakewill, however, contends that the earth does not decay as it grows old, and that nature is not debilitated with age. He has treated his subject with much ability, and his work has been highly commended by Abp. Usher, Dr. Warton, Dugald Stewart, and others.

2. Modus tenedi Parliamentum, 1641, 71, 8vo; 1659, 12mo.

Hakluyt, Richard, 1582?-1616, Preb. of Bristol and of Westminster, and Rector of Wetheringset, Suffolk, was a native of London or its vicinity, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He took great interest in the voyages made by his countrymen and others; and it is to his industry and enterprise that we are indebted for the preservation of accounts which would otherwise, in all probability, have been entirely lost to the world.

1. Diners Voyages touching the Discouerie of America and the Islands adjaçant unto the same, &c., Lon., 1582, 4to.

2. Four Voyages unto Florida, &c., by Capt. Louidonnie and others. Trans. from the French, by R. Hakluyt, 1587, 4to.

The year preceding he had this work pub. at Paris, in French. He also had pub. at Paris, in 1587, an improved ed. of Peter Martyr's work, De Orbe Novo, 8vo; and at his suggestion this work was afterwards trans. into English, by M. Lok, and pub. under the title of The Historie of the West Indies. It is repub. in the Supp. Vol. to the reprint of Hakluyt's Voyages, 1809-12, 5 vols. 4to.

See Lon. Retrosp. Rev., xi. 100-123; 1825. 3. The Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffiques, and Discoueries of the English Nation, made by sea or over land, to the most remote and farthest distant quarters of the Earth, at any time within the compass of these 1500 years, 1589, fol.

This is the first ed. of the celebrated collection to which Hakluyt principally owes his fame. It is exceedingly rare; and Jadis's copy, (see his cat., 339.) with a map referred to in the preface, (see next sentence,) and an account of Sir F. Drake's Voyage, 6 leaves, inserted between pp. 643-644, sold for £26 5s.

"But the best map of the sixteenth century is one of uncommon rarity, which is found in a very few copies of the first edition of Hakluyt's Voyages. This contains Davis's Straits, (Fretum Davis,) Virginia by name, and the lake Ontario. . . . It represents the utmost limit of geographical knowledge at the close of the sixteenth century, and far exceeds the maps in the edition of Ortelius at Antwerp in 1588."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, q. v.

An enlarged ed., comprehending 1600 years, appeared 1598-99-1600, in 3 vols. fol., bound in 2. In some of the copies, the Voyage to Cadiz, forming pp. 607-619 of the 1st vol., is wanting, or supplied by a reprint. It was suppressed by the order of Q. Elizabeth, after the disgrace of the Earl of Essex. The serenity of these vols. induced Mr. Evans to publish a new ed., edited by Mr. G. Woodfall,

1809-12, 5 vols. r. 4to, £15 15s.—250 copies printed; large paper, imp. 4to, £31 10s.—75 copies printed. This ed. contains an accurate reprint of the best folio ed., with the addition of those voyages which were pub. in the 1st ed. and omitted in the 2d. The above reprinted matters are included in vols. i., ii., and iii., and part of vol. iv., of the new ed. The latter part of vol. iv., and the whole of vol. v., are taken up with voyages printed by Hakluyt, or at his suggestion, subsequent to the publication of his Collection, and a tract from a MS. entitled The Omission of Cales Voyage stated and discussed by the Earl of Essex, and a MS. of Broequirère. This Supp. was also pub. in a separate vol., 1812, 4to. The contents are as follows—reprints:

1. Galvano's Discoveries of the World, 1601.
2. Davis. The World's Hydrographical Description, 1595.
3. Broequirère, Voyage d'Outremer. From a MS.
4. Eden, Navigation and Voyages of Lewis Vertomannus.
5. A Voyage made by certain ships of Holland to the East Indies, 1598.
6. The prosperous and speedy voyage to Java, performed by 8 ships of Amsterdam, in 1598-99, (1600.)
7. Newses from the East Indies; or, a Voyage to Bengalla, 1638.
8. The Fardle of Facions, 1555.
9. The Conquest of the grand Canaries, 1599.
10. The History of the West Indies. A trans. of P. Martyr's Decades.
11. Virginia richly valued, by the description of the maine land of Florida, 1609.
12. A Discovery of the Bermudas, set forth by Silvanus Jordan, 1610.
13. A true copy of a discourse on the late voyage to Spain, 1589.
14. The omissions of Cales Voyage stated by the Earl of Essex. From a MS.

In the original edits. of Hakluyt's Collection—see No. 3—which are contained in vols. i., ii., iii., and part of vol. iv., of the reprint of 1809-12, will be found narratives of nearly 220 voyages, with many relative documents, consisting of patents, letters, instructions, &c. The first part of the Collection consists of Voyages to the North and the Northeast; the true state of Ireland; the defeat of the Spanish Armada; the expedition under the Earl of Essex to Cadiz, &c. The second part entertains us with voyages to the South and Southeast; and in the third portion our curiosity is gratified and our mind enriched by the account of expeditions to North America, the West Indies, and round the world. Of this invaluable storehouse of entertaining, amusing, and instructive matter, and of its collector, we shall have more to say presently. 4. Two Remembrances of things to be undiscovered in Turkey, touching our Cloathing and Dying, 1592. 5. A Trans. from the Portugese of Antonio Gulvare's Hist. of the Discoveries of the World, from the first Original to A.D. 1555, 1601, 4to. 6. A Trans. from the Portugese of Virginia, richly valued, &c., 1609, 4to. Reprinted in Supp. to new ed. of Hakluyt's Voyages, 1809-12, 5 vols. 4to. 7. Hist. of the Travailles, Discouery, and Conquest of Terra Florida, by Don Ferdinando de Soto, 1611, 4to. 8. Hakluyt's MSS. Remains, which would have formed another vol., fell into the hands of Samuel Purchas, and were dispersed by him throughout his Pilgrimes, (Hakluyt Posthumus.) 5 vols. fol., 1625-26. For further particulars respecting Hakluyt and his publications, see Biog. Brit.; Oldys's Librarian; Athen. Oxon.; Loek's Explan. Cat. of Voyages prefixed to Churchill's Collection of Voyages; Clarke's Progress of Maritime Discovery; Dibdin's Lib. Comp.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.

As few—very few—bibliographers can ever hope to exult in the possession of a set of the Voyages of De Bry, it is no small consolation to be able to secure, at a trifling expense, the five goodly quartos, 1809-12, which compose the Hakluyt Collection.

"But what a bibliographical cord am I striking," says that amiable enthusiast, Dr. Dibdin, "in the mention of the Travels of De Bry! What a Peregrination does the possession of a copy of his labours imply! What toil, difficulty, perplexity, anxiety, and vexation attend the collector—be he young or old—who sets his heart upon a PERFECT DE BRU! How many have started forward in this pursuit with gay spirits and well-replenished purses, but have turned from it in despair, and abandoned it in utter hopelessness of achievement!"—Library Companion.

But what a tempting, yet what a hydra-headed, theme, have we almost unconsciously approached! But we cannot linger even over a dish so epicurean and highly flavoured. Let the veritable bibliographer, who longs for a rich repast, refer to the Bibliotheca Grenvilliana, 184-194. The grand series of vols. there described now reposes in the British Museum, and, with the addition of those which were already in the library, may claim to be one of the principal ornaments of that noble institution. But we are happy to add that the most complete set of DE BRU in existence is in the possession of an American gentleman, Mr. James Lenox, of New York, collected by the anxious toil of many of his agents in various parts of the world, and at an expense, it is asserted, of not less than £4000.

But to return to Hakluyt: it is amusing to observe the diffidence with which old Anthony à Wood ventures a timid vaticination respecting the future status of the wild country to which so many adventurers recorded by Hakluyt's industry steered their barques:

"Which work," says Anthony, referring to Hakluyt's Collection, "being by him performed with great care and industry, cannot but be an honour to the realm of England, because possibly many ports and islands in America, that are bare and barren, and only bear a name for the present, may prove rich places in future time."—Athen. Ozon.

Could Anthony now open his eyes upon the twenty-five millions of people in the United States, doubtless he would claim no small credit for his discernment. The author of the Explanatory Catalogue of Voyages prefixed to Churchill's Collection of Voyages, said to be the celebrated John Locke, characterizes Hakluyt's Collection as "Valuable for the good there to be picked out—but it might be wished that the author had been less voluminous, delivering what was really authentic and useful, and not stuffing his work with so many stories taken upon trust, so many trading voyages that have nothing new in them, so many warlike exploits not at all pertinent to his undertaking, and such a multitude of articles, charters, privileges, letters, relations, and other things little to the purpose of travels and discoveries."

But we think that this criticism is open to severe animadversion. Every item excepted against is a valuable portion of the great whole.

An eminent authority thus compares the respective merits of Hakluyt and Purchas as compilers of voyages:

"We have in our own language as good and as bad collections as ever were made: one instance of each may suffice. Mr. Hakluyt was an able, ingenious, diligent, accurate, and useful compiler; and his collections are as valuable as any thing in their kind; on the other hand, Purchas his Pilgrims are very voluminous, and for the most part a very trifling and insignificant collection; his manner, for I cannot call it method, is irregular and confused; his judgment weak and pedantic; his remarks often silly, and always little to the purpose. This shows how much depends upon the care and skill of the collector: who on the one hand is to provide what may entertain and please, and on the other is to be careful that knowledge and instruction be conveyed with pleasure and amusement."—Dr. John Harris's Collec. of Voyages, Int. vol. See PURCHAS, SAMUEL.

An abstract of Hakluyt's labours will be found in Oldys's Brit. Lib., 136-158. The compiler declares that "this elaborate and excellent collection"

"Redounds as much to the Glory of the English Nation, as any Book that ever was published in it."

"Every reader conversant in the annals of our naval transactions will cheerfully acknowledge the merit of Richard Hakluyt, who devoted his studies to the investigation of those periods of English history which regard the improvement of navigation and commerce. . . . Thus animated and encouraged, [by Sir Francis Walsingham and Sir Philip Sidney] he was enabled to leave to posterity the fruits of his unwearied labours—an invaluable treasure of nautical information preserved in volumes which even at this day affix to his name a brilliancy of reputation which a series of ages can never efface or obscure."—Zuch's Life of Sir Philip Sidney.

"Works like these [Hakluyt and Purchas] are very curious monuments of the nature of human enterprises, human testimony and credulity—of the nature of the human mind and of human affairs. Much more is, indeed, offered to a refined and philosophic observer, though buried amid this unwieldy and unsightly mass, than was ever supposed by its original readers, or even its first compilers."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.

"Richard Hakluyt, the enlightened friend and able documentary historian of those commercial enterprises, [Voyages to New England] a man whose fame should be vindicated and asserted in the land which he helped to colonize."—Bancroft's History of the United States, 15th ed., i. 113: 1854.

The collector must place on the same shelf with his Hakluyt's Collection the publications of the Society which bears the honoured name of the enthusiastic and laborious compiler. The Hakluyt Society was established in 1846, and its publications to 1854 are as follows:

- Hakluyt Society's Publications:

Haldane, Robert, 1764-1842, a brother of the preceding, entered the Royal Navy, 1780, but retired in 1783, and became an Independent itinerant minister. He laboured with great zeal for the propagation of the Gospel, both at home and on the Continent. He expended £30,000 in the erection of houses of worship, and educated 300 young men under Dr. Bogue and Mr. Ewing, as preachers to officiate in them and in other stations. For an account of his abundant labours, see the Memoirs, &c. of Alexander Haldane, ante. As a writer he gained considerable reputation by the following works:—1. The Evidence and Authority of Divine Revelation, Edin., 1816, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1839, 2 vols. fp. 8vo. Hale, Enoch, M.D., b. 1790, took the degree of M.D. at Harvard University, 1813, and entered immediately upon the practice of medicine at Gardiner, Maine, which he continued at that place with distinguished success until the year 1816, and from that time to his death in Boston, Nov. 12, 1814. He was an active member of the Massachusetts Medical Society and of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and during the active practice of his profession he contributed to the cause of medical science by several independent publications of high authority, and by frequent essays and papers in the medical journals.

Hale, Horatio, a son of Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, graduated at Harvard College in 1837, where he was so highly distinguished for his aptitude in the acquisition of languages, that whilst still an undergraduate he was selected to fill the post of philologist to the United States Exploring Expedition commanded by Captain Wilkes. The result of his learned investigations will be found in vol. vii.—Ethnography and Philology—of the series of works which compose the history of that noble enterprise. Mr. Hale's intelligent labours have elicited warm commendation from highly respectable authorities, both at home and abroad. The distinguished English philologist, Dr. Latham, in his recent work on the Natural History and Varieties of Man, remarks that Mr. Hale's work contains "the greatest mass of philological data ever accumulated by a single inquirer." The following lines give perhaps as good an account of this great work as could be conveyed in a brief description:

"The first 225 pages are devoted to Ethnography, or an account of the customs, religion, civil polity, and origin of the nations of the several countries and islands visited by the Expedition. The remaining 449 pages comprise the Philology of the same regions. The various dialects of Polynesia are treated of under the general head of a comparative grammar of Polynesia, followed by a Polynesian lexicon. The languages of the Feejee Islands, the Kings-mills, Rotuma, Australia, and northwest coast of America, and some dialects of Patagonia and Southern Africa, come next under consideration. We feel assured that a glance at the work will excite surprise in all at the amount of information collected, and pleasure at the system and perspicuity with which the whole is presented."—Amer. Jour. of Science.

An interesting account of Mr. Hale and his work will be found in the North American Review for July, 1846, to which we must refer our reader. It is no slight praise to award an author that he has "Succeeded in giving a certain classical completeness to his work, which makes it a model for future labourers in the same or in similar fields of research. The style of this volume is marked by rare excellences, and those of the highest order. It is terse, compact, and business-like, to a remarkable degree. . . . It is a transparent medium of expression for a richly-informed, clear-thinking, straight forward mind; it presents the meaning of the writer strongly and directly to the mind of the reader, instructing while it gratifies."—N. Amer. Rev.: ubi supra.

After the completion of this work Mr. Hale visited Europe and other portions of the Eastern Continent, and on his return was admitted to the bar. He is now engaged in the duties of his profession, but occasionally steals an hour from his briefs to contribute a prize essay on his favourite theme to some periodical in this country or in Great Britain.

Hale, Sir Matthew, 1609–1676, one of the most eminent of lawyers and excellent of men, was a native of Alderley, Gloucestershire, entered Magdalen Hall, Oxford, 1626, and admitted of Lincoln's Inn, 1629. He refused to take any part in the political troubles of his time, though strongly opposed to the murder of Charles I. In 1652 he was one of those appointed to effect a reformation of the law, and in the next year was by writ made sergeant-at-law, and one of the judges of the Common Bench. Upon the Restoration, Charles II., in 1660, made him Chief-Baron of the Exchequer, and in 1671 he was promoted to the high dignity of Lord Chief-Justice of England. For the particulars respecting his life, and legal, theological, and scientific publications, we refer to authorities cited below, and also to a recent publication—Memoirs of the Life, Character, and Writings of Sir M. Hale, by J. B. Williams, Lon., 1835, 12mo.

"A volume which clearly and agreeably presents the legal rise and progress of a great lawyer and worthy man. The book should of necessity occupy a place in the library-shelf devoted to British worthies."—Lon. and Westminster Rev.

A collective ed. of his Moral and Religious Works, now first Collected and Revised, edited by the Rev. T. Thirlwall, with the Life by Bishop Burnet, and an Appendix, etc., Lon., 1805, 2 vols. 8vo. A new ed. has been pub. Among his best-known miscellaneous works are his Contemplations, The Primitive Origination of Mankind, The Knowledge of Christ Crucified, (new ed., by the Rev. David Young, Glasg., 1828, 12mo.) and his Letters to his Children. Several of his minor works have been separately republished within the last few years. Of his law treatises—one only of which, London Liberty, was pub. in his lifetime—the following are the principal. 1. Jurisdiction of Parliaments, Lon., 1707, 8vo. 2. The Jurisdiction of the Lords' House of Parliament, by F. Hargrave, 1796, 4to. 3. Pleas of the Crown, 7th ed., 1773, 8vo. An incorrect summary, and not intended by the author for the press, but as a sketch or plan of the following work. 4.

Historia Placitorum Coronæ; the Hist. of the Pleas of the Crown: first pub., from the author's MS., by S. Emlyn, 1736–39, 2 vols. fol.; 2d ed., by G. Wilson, 1778, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., by Thos. Dogherty, 1800, 2 vols. 8vo; 1st Amer. ed., by W. A. Stokes and E. Ingersoll, Phila., 1847, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The following Treatise, being the genuine offspring of that truly learned and worthy Judge, Sir Matthew Hale, stands in need of no other recommendation than what that great and good name will always carry along with it. Whoever is in the least acquainted with the extensive learning, the solid judgment, the indefatigable labours, and, above all, the unshaken integrity, of the author, cannot but highly esteem whatever comes from so valuable a hand."—From Euclid's Preface.

To the Pleas of the Crown should be added—And. Anos's Ruins of Time exemplified in Sir M. Hale's Hist. of the Pleas of the Crown, 1856, 8vo.

5. The Hist. of the Common Law of England, and an Analysis of the Civil Part of the Law; 6th ed., with a Life of the Author, by Chas. Runnington, 1820, 8vo. Serjeant Runnington's notes are of great value.

"So authentic an History of the Common Law of England, written by so learned an author, requires neither preface nor commendation. It has ever been justly held in the highest estimation, and, like the virtues of its author, been universally admired and venerated. Here the student will find a valuable guide, the barrister a learned assistant, the court an indisputable authority."—SERJEANT RUNNINGTON.

6. Sheriff's Accounts, The Trial of Witches, and Provision for the Poor. These three tracts were separately pub. See Biog. Brit.; Granger's Biog. Hist.; Life by Burnet; Life by Runnington; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Life and Letters of Judge Story; Lowndes's Leg. Bibl., and the authorities there cited.

There are few more illustrious names on the roll of British history than that of Sir Matthew Hale:

"Sir Samuel Sheperd mentioned him as the most learned man that ever adorned the bench; the most even man that ever blessed domestic life; the most eminent man that ever adorned the progress of science; and also one of the best and most purely religious men that ever lived. . . . Lord Northington pronounced him one of the ablest and most learned judges that ever adorned the profession. Mr. Justice Grose declared he was one of the most able lawyers that ever sat in Westminster; as correct, as learned, and as humane a judge as ever graced the bench of justice. Lord Kenyon said that the operations of his vast mind always called for the greatest attention to any work that bears his name; . . . and mentioned him as one of the greatest and best men that ever sat in judgment."

"With respect to Lord Hale, it is needless to remind those whom I am now addressing, of the general character for learning and legal knowledge, of that person, of whom it was said, that what was not known by him was not known by any other person who preceded or followed him; and that what he knew, he knew better than any other person who preceded or followed him."—CHIEF-JUSTICE DALLAS.

"A luminous order in the distribution of subjects, an uncommonness of materials for curious records and manuscripts, a profoundness of remark, a command of perspicuous and forcible language, with a guarded reserve in offering opinions on great controverted points of law and the constitution, characterized the writings of Judge Hale."—Hargrave's Tracts. Pref.

Having offered the opinions of so many legal luminaries in evidence, we may now be permitted to adduce the testimony of two distinguished divines:

"His writings have raised him a character equal to his greatest predecessors, and will always be esteemed as containing the best rationale of the grounds of the law of England. Nor was he an inconsiderable master of polite, philosophical, and especially theological, learning."—DR. BIRCH: Life of Archbishop Tillotson.

"He was most precisely just; inasmuch that I believe he would have lost all he had in the world rather than do an unjust act; patient in hearing the most tedious speech which any man had to make for himself; the pillar of justice, the refuge of the subject who feared oppression, and one of the greatest honours of his majesty's government; for, with some other upright judges, he upheld the honour of the English nation, that it fell not into the reproach of arbitrariness, cruelty, and utter confusion. Every man that had a just cause was almost past fear if he could but bring it to the court or assize where he was judge; for the other judges seldom contradicted him. . . . I, who heard and read his serious expressions of the concernments of eternity, and saw his love to all good men, and the blamelessness of his life, thought better of his piety than my own."—RICHARD BAXTER.

This is indeed a noble tribute from a noble source. The glowing eulogium of Cowper must not be entirely unnoticed:

"In whom
Our British Themis glori'd with just cause,
Immortal Hale! for deep discernment praised,
And sound integrity, not more than famed
For sanctity of manners undefiled."

The Task, book iii.

And here we might enlarge, did our space permit, upon the distinguishing traits of the piety of this truly excellent man:—his reverence for the Word of God; his strict observance of the day more especially set apart for the public worship of the Supreme Being; his conscientiousness in carrying out in every-day affairs the spirit of those Resolves, which he adopted as the Law of his Life:—but the secret spring of his piety is best told by himself in a few words of solid wisdom and certain truth, which we cannot too earnestly commend to the heart and conscience of the thoughtful reader:

"Any man that sincerely and truly fears Almighty God, and calls and relies upon him for his direction, has it as really as a son has the counsel and direction of his father; and though the voice be not audible nor discernible by sense, yet it is equally as real as if a man heard a voice saying, 'This is the way, walk ye in it.'"

Hale, Nathan, LL.D., b. 1784, at Westhampton, Mass., grad. at Williams College, 1804; admitted to the Massachusetts Bar, 1810; editor of the Boston Weekly Messenger, 1811–14; editor and publisher of the Boston Daily Advertiser, (the first daily established in Boston,) 1814 to the present time, 1858; editor and publisher of the Monthly Chronicle, 1840–42. Mr. H.'s name is well known in connexion with his Map of New England, a standard geographical authority, first pub. in 1825, and reprinted from time to time with the necessary revisions. In 1816 Mr. Hale was married to Sarah Preston Everett, a daughter of Judge Oliver Everett, of Dorchester, Mass., and sister of Edward Everett, the distinguished American orator, scholar, and statesman. Mr. Hale was a contributor to many of the early numbers of the North American Review, and has for the last forty-two years contributed many valuable articles to the Boston Daily Advertiser on questions of politics, political economy, and internal improvements, &c. Nathan Hale was among the first to make known in this country the importance of the great railroad-improvement, and earnestly urged its immediate introduction into Massachusetts by effective legislative aid. He was the acting President of the Massachusetts Board of Internal Improvement, under whose superintendence the first surveys were made for a system of railroads for the State; and he was the first President of the Boston and Worcester Railroad, one of the pioneer works of that kind, in which office he took an active part in the original construction and extended improvements of that work and its branches, and in digesting its system of operations. As a member (repeatedly elected) of both branches of the Legislature of Massachusetts, Mr. Hale has rendered important service to his constituents. He was also chairman of the Board of Commissioners by whose labours the people of Boston are supplied with pure water; and few men have contributed more largely to the physical wealth of Massachusetts, and to the improvement of the city which claims him as one of the most valuable of her adopted sons.

Hale, Nathan, Jr., son of the above, b. in Boston, 1818, grad. at Harvard University, 1838; admitted to practice in the courts of Mass., 1841; editor of Boston Miscellany of Literature, 1842; co-editor of Boston Daily Advertiser, 1842–53.

"As far as we have observed, Mr. Hale has executed his task with fidelity and skill. The materials appear to be drawn from authentic sources, and the simple and lucid style places the book within the comprehension of all classes of readers. But the principle of arrangement is a faulty one; for the history of each colony stands by itself being carried on without interruption from its origin to the war of 1756."—*N. Amer. Hale, Mrs. Sarah Josepha, formerly Miss Buell, of Newport, New Hampshire, is the widow of David Hale, a distinguished lawyer, who died at an early age in 1822. In 1828 Mrs. Hale became the editor of The Ladies' Magazine, pub. at Boston, and discharged the duties of this responsible position until 1837, when this periodical was united with the Lady's Book of Philadelphia. With this well-known and truly popular magazine Mrs. Hale has ever since been connected, and since 1838 she has been a resident of Phila. The following list of this lady's productions evinces an extraordinary amount of literary industry: 1. The Genius of Oblivion, and other Original Poems, Concord, 1823. 2. Northwood; a Novel, Bost., 1827, 2 vols. Repub. in London; also in N. York, in 1852, 12mo. 3. Sketches of American Character, Phila., 18mo. 4. Traits of American Life, 1835, 2 vols. 12mo. 5. Flora's Interpreter, Bost. Reprinted in London. 6. The Ladies' Wreath, Bost., 12mo. 7. The Way to Live Well and to be

Well while we Live. S. Grosvenor; a Tragedy, 1838. 9. Alice Ray; a Romance in Rhyme, 1846. 10. Harry Guy, the Widow's Son; in verse, Bost., 1848. 11. Three Hours; or, The Vigil of Love, and other Poems, Phila., 1848. 12. The Poet's Offering; edited by Mrs. Hale, Phila. 13. Miss Acton's Cookery; edited by Mrs. Hale. 14. Ladies' New Book of Cookery and Complete House-keeper. New ed., N. York, 1852, 12mo. 15. A Complete Dictionary of Poetical Quotations, Phila., 1852, 8vo. 16. The Judge; a Drama of American Life. 17. New Household Receipt-Book, 1853, 12mo. 18. Woman's Record; or, Sketches of Distinguished Women from "the Beginning till a.d. 1850." N. York, 1853, 8vo. New ed., 1856. This work, by far the most important of Mrs. Hale's productions, though in some points open to criticism, may yet be justly commended as an invaluable manual for the library-shelf and the parlour-table. 19. Liberia, or Mr. Peyton's Experiments; edited by Mrs. Hale, 1853, 12mo. 20. The Bible Reading-Book, Phila., 1854, 12mo. 21. The Letters of Mme. de Sevigné to her Daughter and Friends, N. York, 1856, 12mo. The merits of this charming writer have elicited the enthusiastic commendations of the highest authorities:

"Madame de Sevigné shines both in grief and gaiety; every paragraph has novelty; her allusions, her applications, are the happiest possible. She has the art of making you acquainted with all her acquaintance, and attaches you even to the spots she inhabited. . . . Madame de Sevigné's language is correct, though unstudied; and when her mind is full of any great event, she interests you with the warmth of a dramatic writer, not with the chilling impartiality of an historian."—HORACE WALPOLE.

"She has so filled my heart with affectionate interest in her as a living friend, that I can scarcely bring myself to think of her as being a writer, or having a style; she has become a celebrated probably an immortal, writer, without expecting it."—SIR J. MACINTOSH.

22. The Letters of Lady Mary W. Montagu, 1856, 12mo.

In addition to the labours here enumerated, Mrs. Hale has edited several Annuals,—The Opal, The Crocus, &c.—prepared a number of books for the young, and contributed enough matter, in the way of tales, essays, and poems, to fill several large volumes. It is certainly high praise accorded to this lady, in a review of her poetry, by a critic of her own sex:

"A religious spirit breathes through the whole. It is plain that Mrs. Hale's constant aim is to show the true source of strength and cheerfulness amid the trials of life; and to inspire the hope that looks beyond it."—MRS. E. F. ELLET; N. Amer. Rev. lxxviii. 422.

For critical reviews of her productions we refer the reader to Griswold's Female Poets of America; Amer. Month. Rev., iv. 239; Phila. Lady's Book, 1850; an article by Mrs. E. F. Ellet, entitled Female Poets of America, in N. Amer. Rev., lxxviii. 413–436. We append a short extract from the first of the above-named authorities:

"Mrs. Hale has a ready command of pure and idiomatic English, and her style has frequently a masculine strength and energy. She has not much creative power, but she excels in the aggregation and artificial disposition of common and appropriate imagery. She has evidently been all her life a student; and there has been a perceptible and constant improvement in her writings ever since her first appearance as an author. . . . They are all indicative of sound principles, and of kindness, knowledge, and judgment."—Griswold's Female Poets of America.

Hales, John, The Ever-Memorable, 1584–1656, a famous scholar and divine, a native of Bath, was entered of Corpus Christi Coll., Oxf., 1597; elected Fellow of Merton College, 1606; Fellow of Eton College, 1613; attended the Synod of Dort in 1618, and there became a convert to Arminianism through the argument of Episcopius; Canon of Windsor, 1639; ejected in the Rebellion. His writings principally consist of sermons, theological tracts, paraphrases of portions of Scripture, and letters. He was so modest that during his lifetime he permitted nothing of his to be published save an oration delivered at the funeral of Sir Thomas Bodley, a treatise upon schism, and one or two sermons. Three years after his death a collective ed. of many of his pieces was pub., under the title of Golden Remains, Lon., 1659, 8vo; 1673, 4to; 1688, 8vo. The 1st ed. contains nine sermons, letters and miscellanies. The 2d ed. was enlarged by the addition of four more sermons. In 1765 Lord Hailes pub. Hales's Whole Works, now first collected together, 3 vols. sm. 8vo. With a want of taste which we are at a loss to understand in so eminent an antiquary, Lord Hailes committed the gross error of modernizing his author's language. For this he is properly censured by Dr. Johnson:

"An author's language, Sir, is a characteristic part of his composition, and is also characteristic of the age in which he writes. Besides, Sir, when the language is changed, we are not sure that the sense is the same. No, Sir, I am sorry Lord Hailes has done this."—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

We have already expressed our views upon this subject in our article on Chaucer: see p. 364. Respecting the works of Hales, an authority of eminence remarks:

"Their merits are unequal. The best seem to be his discourse on Schism, that on the abuse of hard places of Scripture, and his letters to Sir Dudley Carleton from the synod of Dort, in which he gives a good account of that far-famed convention. He was evidently a man superior to many of the prejudices of his age; but if the reader's expectations are raised very greatly by his high-sounding title and the testimonies referred to, he will probably be disappointed even by his Golden Remains."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

But surely it does not follow that all of a man's wisdom finds its way into his books. As regards the comprehensiveness and accuracy of his learning, we have the most abundant testimony. Lord Clarendon, Lord Say and Seal, Bishop Pearson, Dr. Heylin, Andrew Marvel, Anthony à Wood, Bishop Stillingfleet, and Bishop Hoadley,—"the testimonies" referred to by Orme,—were not men to err in a matter of this kind.

"A man of as great a sharpness, quickness, and subtilty of wit, as ever this or perhaps any nation bred. His industry did strive, if it were possible, to equal the largeness of his capacity, whereby he became as great a master of polite, various, and universal learning, as ever yet conversed with books. . . . While he lived, none was ever more solicited and urged to write, and thereby truly teach the world, than he; but none was ever so resolved, pardon the expression, so obstinate, against it."—BISHOP PEARSON.

"Thro' the whole course of his bachelorship there was never any one in the then memory of man (so I have been informed by certain seniors of that coll. at my first coming thereunto) that ever went beyond him for subtle disputations in philosophy, for his eloquent declamations and orations, as also his exact knowledge in the Greek tongue, evidently demonstrated afterwards, not only when he read the Greek lecture in that coll., but also the public lecture of that tongue in the schools. . . . He was a man highly esteemed by learned men beyond and within the seas, from whom he seldom fail'd to receive letters every week, wherein his judgment was desired as to several points of learning."—Athen. Oxon.

"He had read more and carried more about him, in his excellent memory, than any man I ever knew; he was one of the least men in the Kingdom, and one of the greatest scholars in Europe."—LORD CLARENDON.

His lordship tells us that "nothing troubled him more than the brawls which were grown from religion;" and Mr. Bickersteth supposes that he "would perhaps have given up too much for peace, having seen the evil of division."

In this surmise there is but little doubt that Mr. Bickersteth is correct, for a late eminent authority, referring to Hales's tract on Schism, remarks:

"The aim of Hales, as well as of Grotius, Calixtus, and Chillingworth, was to bring about a more comprehensive communion; but he went still farther: his language is rough and audacious; his theology in some of his other writings has a scent of Racow, and though these creep slowly to light, there was enough in the earliest to make us wonder at the high name, the epithet Ever-memorable, which he obtained in the English church."—Hallan's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

Notwithstanding the grave nature of his studies, the EVER-MEMORABLE sometimes wooed the Muses; and a critic of the day has given him a place (if he indeed refers to our Hales) in his curious and amusing portrait-gallery:

"Hales, set by himself, most gravely did smile
To see them about nothing keep such a coil;
Apollo had spied him, but, knowing his mind,
Past by, and called Falkland that sat just behind."

Hales, Stephen, D.D., 1677–1761, a natural philosopher of great eminence, a native of Beekesbourn, Kent, was educated at Bene't Coll., Oxf., took holy orders, and was advanced successively to the perpetual curacy of Toddington, and to the livings of Portlock and Farringdon. He was especially distinguished for his experiments on the physiology of plants. His principal works were—1. Vegetable Staticks, Lon., 1727, 31, 8vo. 2. Statistical Essays: this consists of No. 1 (vol. i. of the Essays) and a vol. entitled Flamastatics, pub. in 1733, &c., 1769, 2 vols. 8vo. Hales also pub. several sermons, philosophical experiments, papers on Phil. Trans., &c. He is to be remembered with great respect as an early advocate of the great cause of TEMPERANCE. His Friendly Admonition to the Drinkers of Gin, first pub. in 1734, 8vo, has been frequently reprinted, and doubtless accomplished much good. See *Masters's Hist. of C. C. Highly commended. 2. A New Analysis of Chronology, 1809–14, 3 vols in 1, 4to, £8 8s.; 2d and best ed., 1830, 4 vols. 8vo, £3 3s.

"This is perhaps the most valuable chronological work that has ever been published. Possessed of the caution of Newton, and the learning of Usher, Dr. Hales proceeds on better data than either of these distinguished chronologists; and pours a flood of light on some of the darkest and most difficult points in sacred and profane history. . . . Dr. Adam Clarke, who makes a very liberal use of the work in his Commentary, bestows on it the highest commendation."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

Haliburton, Thomas Chandler, long a Judge of Nova Scotia, popularly known as Sam Slick, contributed, in 1835, to a weekly paper of Nova Scotia, a series of letters professing to depict the peculiarities of Yankee character.

These sketches were received with so much favour that in 1837 they were collected into a vol. entitled The Clockmaker; or, the Sayings and Doings of Samuel Slick of Slickville. A Second Series appeared in 1838, and a third in 1840. In 1842 the writer visited England as an attaché of the American Legation, and in the next year embodied the results of his observations on English Society in his amusing work, The Attaché; or, Sam Slick in England, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Second Series, 1844, 2 vols. p. 8vo. New ed., 1846, 4 vols. p. 8vo. Reprinted, 1849. Judge Haliburton has also given to the world An Hist. and Statist. Account of Nova Scotia, 1828, 2 vols. p. 8vo; repub. 1839; see N. Amer. Rev., xxx. 121; Bubbles of Canada, 1839, p. 8vo; The Old Judge, or, Life in a Colony; Letter-Bag of the Great Western, 1839, p. 8vo; Rule and Misrule of the English in America, 1851, 2 vols. p. 8vo; Yankee Stories, 1852, 12mo; Traits of American Humour, 1852, 3 vols. p. 8vo; Nature and Human Nature, 1855; new ed., 1858.

How far he has succeeded in the attempt at depicting Yankee manners and customs is a matter of debate. An eminent authority, well qualified to give an opinion upon the subject, decides against Slick's pretensions as a painter:

"On this point we speak with some confidence. We can distinguish the real from the counterfeit Yankee, at the first sound of the voice, and by the turn of a single sentence; and we have no hesitation in declaring that Sam Slick is not what he pretends to be; that there is no organic life in him; that he is an impostor, an impossibility, a nonentity. A writer of genius, even if he write from imperfect knowledge, will, as it were, breathe the breath of life into his creations. Sam Slick is an awkward and highly infelicitous attempt to make a character, by heaping together, without discrimination, selection, arrangement, or taste, every vulgarity that a vulgar imagination can conceive, and every quavery that a man blinded by national and political prejudice can charge upon neighbours whom he dislikes."—PROF. C. C. FELTON: N. Amer. Rev., lviii. 212.

"He deserves to be entered on our list of friends containing the names of Tristram Shandy, the Shepherd of the Neetes Ambrasiense, and other rhapsodical discourses on time and change, who, besides the delights of their discourse, possess also the charm of individuality. Apart from all the worth of Sam Slick's revelations, the man is precious to us as a queer creature—knowing, impudent, sensible, sagacious, vulgar, yet not without a certain tact; and overflowing with a humour as peculiar in its way as the humours of Andrew Fairservice or a Protestant Miss Mizgs. (that impersonation of 'shrewish female service'.)—Lon. Ateneum.

"Original and witty, it is always refreshing to fall in with this humilitable story-teller. His mixture of sound sense with genuine humour, his fund of information and peculiar way of putting it on record, his fun and his force,—the fun being part and portion of that force,—are at the same time qualities so entertaining and instructive, that we know not in the end whether to be better pleased with the intelligence we have acquired or the amusement we have received."—*Lon. "Wit is not to be measured, like broadcloth, by the yard. Easy writing, as the adage says, and as we all know, is apt to be very hard reading. This brings to our recollection a conversation, in the presence of Captain Basil Hall, in which some allusion having been made to the astounding amount of Scott's daily composition, the literary arcanist remarked, 'There was nothing astonishing in all that, and that he did as much himself nearly every day before breakfast.' Some one of the company unkindly asked 'whether he thought the quality was the same?' It is the quality, undoubtedly, which makes the difference."—*Wat. II. PRECOTT: N. Amer. Hall, Edward, 1499?–1547, an English lawyer and judge in the Sheriff's Court, is known to posterity by his Chronicle, already noticed in our article on Richard Grafton. His work is entitled The Union of the two noble and illustrious Families of Lancaster and York, Lon., 1518, fol. This is supposed to be the first edition, but it is alleged there is one bearing date 1542. Respecting this question, see authorities referred to below. This work was continued only to 1532. Hall left the continuation in MS., and Grafton completed it and printed it in 1550, fol. In 1555 it was prohibited by proclamation. Reprinted, 1809, 2 vols. 4to. We have already referred to Bishop Nicolson's opinion of this work:

"He wrote a large account of the fore-mentioned wars, which, in a very flattering epistle, he dedicated to Henry VIII. If the reader desires to know what sort of cloaths were worn in each king's reign, and how the fashions altered, this is an historian for his purpose; but in other matters his information is not very valuable."—Eng. Hist. Lib.

But Hearne disputes this:

"All the copies I have yet seen or heard of are dedicated to Edw. VI., and the dedication is far from being flattering. The Informations, too, are all along so very good, abating that the chronology is here and there wrong, that they have been, and will always be, highly valued by the most curious men. He declines giving any account of cloaths and fashion, excepting upon some solemn occasion in King Henry the Eighth's reign, and contents himself with what is truly momentous."—Appen. to Henning's Chart. Eccles. Wgor., ii. 673, &c.

Hearne supposes that Bishop Nicolson refers to the ed. of 1542(?) and Hearne to one of the other edits. But no such theory will reconcile statements so directly opposed to each other. Shakspeare and the other dramatists of his day drew largely from Hall's Chronicles for materials for their plots. See Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon.; Cole's MS. Athenæ. Cantab., in *Brit. "Mr. Hall is a clever, lively man, very much above the common race of writers. . . . It is certainly somewhat rare to meet with an original thinker, an indulgent judge of manners, and a man tolerant of neglect and familiarity, in a youth covered with tags, feathers and martial volery."—REV. SYDNEY SMITH: Edin. Rev., xxxi. 133, and in his Miscellanies.

"He has good sense enough to think that a country is not to be judged by its tavern-keepers and hostlers, and too much good-humour to rail at a whole people because he meets with occasional instances of fraud and churlishness."—J. GALLISON: N. Amer. Rev., ix. 135–155.

"Hall's is a pleasant and lively work, unfolding many of the peculiarities of the manners, customs, &c. of Canada and the adjacent parts of the United States."—Stevenson's Voyages.

Hall, Rev. Gordon, d. 1826, in India, aged about 36, a native of Berkshire, Mass., was the first American missionary at Bombay, where he laboured for thirteen years with great zeal. He had just revised the New Testament in the Mahratta tongue, when he was seized with cholera, of which he died in eight or nine hours. In conjunction with S. Newell, he wrote The Conversion of the World, &c., 2d ed., 1818, 8vo.

Hall, George, 1612–1668, son of the Bishop of Norwich, Fellow of Exeter Coll., Oxford, Prob. of Exeter, 1639; Archdeacon of Cornwall, 1641; Bishop of Chester, 1662. He pub. Serms., 1655, '66, both 4to, and The Triumphs of Rome over despised Protestantism, 1655, '67, 8vo. "Had the seeds of virtue sown in him very early by his said father."—Alben Ozon.

Hall, Harrison, of Philadelphia, b. 1785, a brother of Judge James Hall and of John E. Hall, (see post.) wrote a work on Distillation, first pub. in 1815, which passed through two edits. in America (2d ed., 1818, 8vo) and one in England. This work elicited the commendation of Dr. Hare and of other scientific men of the day.

Hall, James. Serms., Lon., 1814, '15, both 8vo.

Hall, James, an eminent American writer and Judge, b. in Philadelphia, Aug. 19, 1793, after spending some time in the study of the law, entered the U. States Army, and distinguished himself in the battle of Lundy's Lane, at Niagara, the siege of Fort Erie, and on various other occasions during the last war with Great Britain. He resigned from the army in 1818, and in 1820 removed to Shawneetown, Illinois, where he edited the Illinois Gazette and practised at the Bar. Whilst living in this State, he was elected by the Legislature Judge of the Circuit Court, and for four years held the responsible post of State Treasurer. In 1833 he removed to Cincinnati, where he has since resided. Since 1836 he has been connected with monetary pursuits; was for some time the Cashier of the Commercial Bank, and has been since 1853 President of an institution of the same name. Phila. and Washington, 20 Nos. fol.; vol. i., 1838; ii., 1842; iii., 1844; $120 per copy for the set. Repub. in London. For an account of this splendid work, written entirely from authentic original materials collected with vast labour, see N. Amer. Rev., xlvii. 134-148; London For. Quar. Rev., xxxvii. 479; Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 300-307. The letter-press was written chiefly by Judge Hall:

"Colonel McKenney has an accomplished coadjutor in Judge Hall, of Cincinnati, who is associated with him in the literary part of the enterprise. Judge Hall's well-known grace and liveliness of style, and his knowledge of events in the West, and of the Indian character as unfolded in the wars of recent times, besides the advantages he derives from his proximity to the scenes he describes, enable him to make contributions which adorn and give additional value to the work."—*N. A new and uniform edit. of Judge Hall's works, revised by the author, to be comprised in four vols., uniform with Putnam's edit. of Irving's Works, is now (1856) in course of publication. Vol. i., Legends of the West, appeared in 1853; and vol. ii., The West, Historical, Descriptive and Statistical, is now ready for the press. In 1857 appeared Romance of Western History, Cin., 12mo. Judge Hall has been a contributor to The Amer. Quar. Rev., The Phila. Port-Folio, The Knickerbocker, The Boston Token, &c. He founded, published, edited, and contributed largely to The Illinois Magazine, (monthly,) issued for three years at Vandalia, and then removed to Cincinnati, where its name was changed to The Western Monthly Magazine. Under this title it enjoyed a large circulation for three years, when it was discontinued. He also edited and contributed largely to The Western Souvenir for 1829, (pub. at Cincinnati,) the first annual attempted in the West. When we add to this long list of labours the editorial duties connected with several newspapers,—The Illinois Gazette, The Illinois Intelligencer, &c.—it will be readily admitted that few men have done so much for the cause of Western civilization and the intellectual improvement of the country at large. Such men should be "counted worthy of all honour."

Hall, John E., 1783-1829, a son of Mrs. Sarah Hall, and brother of Judge James Hall and Harrison Hall, was admitted to the Bar in 1805, and commenced practice in Baltimore; he subsequently removed to Philadelphia. Whilst in Baltimore he was elected to the responsible post of Professor of Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres in the University of Maryland. From 1808 to 1817 he pub. The American Law Journal, Phila., 6 vols. 8vo. In 1821 was pub. one vol. of The Journal of Jurisprudence, a new series of The American Law Journal, Phila., 8vo. Hall's Law Journal contains some Decisions of the Federal Courts not pub. in the regular reports. See 23 Amer. Jour., 135. In 1816 he became editor of The Port-Folio, and contributed to its pages from time to time a number of articles which excited considerable attention. He also wrote a life of Dr. John Shaw, prefixed to the poems of the latter, pub. at Baltimore in 1810; collected, arranged, and contributed to an edit. of The British Spy; edited the Philadelphia Souvenir in 1827; and in the same year pub. Memoirs of Eminent Persons, &c., written and in part selected by the Editor of The Port-Folio. In consequence of the failure of Mr. Hall's health, the Port-Folio was discontinued in 1827. See Dryckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit. Mr. Hall also pub. The Practice and Jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, Balt., 1809, 8vo; an English edit. of Emerigon on Maritime Loans, with other matter, 1811, 8vo; and Traets on Constitutional Law, containing Mr. Livingston's Answer to Mr. Jefferson, Phila., 1813, 8vo.

Hall, Joseph, D.D., 1574-1656, one of the most eminent of English divines and scholars, was a native of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, and educated at Emmanuel Coll., Cambridge, where for a short time he read the Rhetoric Lecture in the schools. He became Rector of Halsted, was subsequently presented by Lord Denny to Waltham Holy Cross, and next made a Prebendary of the collegiate church of Wolverhampton. In 1618 he was sent to the Synod of Dort, was made Bishop of Exeter in 1627, and trans. to Norwich in 1641. On the occurrence of the Rebellion, after suffering imprisonment and enduring various other hardships, he was sequestered and reduced to great poverty. He retired to Higham, near Norwich, where he spent the rest of his days on a strained income, but in the active discharge of ministerial duty. As a man of profound learning, fervent piety, and practical philanthropy, his name should be "had in everlasting remembrance." He was distinguished both as a poet and as a prose writer, and wrote many sermons, controversial tracts against Romanism, and other theological treatises. For particulars of his life and writings, see Biog. Brit.; his Autobiography, in his Specialities; Johnson and Chalmers's Eng. Poets, 1810; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Wordsworth's Eccles. Biog.; Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe; Lowndes's Bibl. Man. A new edit. of his Works, now first collected, with his Autobiography, Notes, Index, &c., by Rev. Josiah Pratt, was pub., Lon., 1808, in 10 vols. 8vo, £4 4s. A still later edit., by his descendant, Rev. Peter Hall, was pub., Oxf., 1837-39, in 12 vols. 8vo, £5. This edit. the collector must secure. Its contents are as follows:

I. I. Biographical Pieces; Contemplations on the Old Testament, Books 1-17. II. Contemplations on the Old Testament, Books 18-21; Contemplations on the New Testament. III. Paraphrases on Hard Texts, Genesis to David. IV. Paraphrases on Hard Texts, Hosea to Revelation. V. Sermons. VI. VII. Practical Works. VIII. Devotional Works; Miscellaneous Theology. IX., X. Poetical Works. XI. Latin Theology, with Translations. XII. Mundus Alter et idem; Quo Vadis? A Censure of Travel; Poetical Works; Appendix; Indices. Of separate pieces, and selections from his writings, there have been many edits. The most comprehensive of these is Selections by the Rev. Josiah Pratt, 1808, 5 vols. 8vo, £2 2s. We proceed to quote a number of opinions by eminent authorities respecting the merits of a number of the works of this profound scholar and excellent man:

1. SATIRES: VIRGIDEMARUM: pub. 1597-98. These were pub. at the early age of twenty-three. It is proper to quote in this connexion the remark of Dr. Drake:

"Poetry was the occupation merely of his youth; the vigour and decline of his days being employed in the composition of professional works, calculated, by their piety, eloquence, and originality, to promote, in the most powerful manner, the best interests of morality and religion."

"The first professed English satirist, to speak technically, is Bishop Joseph Hall. . . . These satires are marked with a classical precision, to which English poetry had yet rarely attained. They are replete with animation of style and sentiment. The indignation of the satirist is always the result of good sense. Nor are the thorns of severe invective unmix'd with the flowers of pure poetry. The characters are delineated in strong and lively colouring, and their discriminations are touched with the masterly traces of genuine humour. The versification is equally energetic and elegant, and the fabric of the couplets approaches to the modern standard."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet., ed. 1840, iii. 404-441. Read this "masterly piece of criticism."

"The best Poetry and the truest Satire in the English language. . . . I wish I had seen them sooner."—ALEXANDER POPE.

"This powerful and truly original writer is the earliest professed Satirist among our Poets; and he has himself alluded to that fact with a proud and pardonable egotism:

I first adventure; follow me who list,
And be the Second English Satirist."

His Satires, besides their own intrinsic poetical excellences, are valuable to the Antiquary as presenting a most vivid and faithful picture of the manners of our ancestors; their fashions, follies, vices, and peculiarities. These Hall has touched with a powerful and inspiring hand. Scribblers, Lawyers, Parsons, Physicians, all those unfortunate classes of men, who have, from time immemorial, enjoyed the unenvied privilege of attracting the peculiar notice of the Satiric Muse, are by him laid bare and shrinking to the scorn and hatred of Mankind."—Henry Noel's Lects. on English Poetry.

"In many instances, Hall redeems the antiquity of his allusions by their ingenious adaptation to modern manners; and this is but a small part of his praise: for in the point, and volubility, and vigour of Hall's numbers, we might frequently imagine ourselves perusing Dryden."—Thomas Campbell's Notices of the British Poets.

But Mr. Hallam questions Hall's claim, asserted by himself and since generally allowed, to be considered the first English satirist:

"In a general sense of satire, we have seen that he had been anticipated by Gaseigne; but Hall has more of the direct Juvenalian invective, which he may have reckoned essential to that species of poetry."

He considers, also, that Hall's Satires have been "praised by Campbell, as well as by Warton, full as much in my opinion as they deserve," and remarks:

"Hall is in fact not only so harsh and rugged that he cannot be read with much pleasure, but so obscure in very many places, that he cannot be understood at all, his lines frequently bearing no visible connexion in sense or grammar with their neighbours."—Lit. Hist. of Europe.

2. EPISTLES: pub. 1608-11.

"An able inquirer into the literature of this period has affirmed that Hall's Epistles, written before the year 1613, are the first example of epistolary composition which England had seen. 'Bishop Hall,' he says, 'was not only our first satirist, but was the first who brought epistolary writing to the view of the public; which was common in that age to other parts of Europe, but not practised in England till he published his own Epistles.' And Hall himself in the Dedication of his Epistles to Prince Henry observes, 'Your grace shall herein perceive a new fashion of discourse by EPISTLES, new to our language, vsual to others; and, as novelty is new without plea of vsè, more free, more familiar.'"—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

But Warton assigns to Roger Ascham the first and to Howell the second place, in order of time, in this department of letters.

Campbell also falls into the error of denominating Bishop Hall "the first who gave our language an example of epistolary composition in prose." See his Notices of the British Poets.

3. CONTEMPLATIONS UPON THE PRINCIPAL PASSAGES OF THE HIST. OF THE NEW TESTAMENT: pub. 1612-15.

"Incomparably valuable for language, criticism and devotion."—Dr. Doddridge.

"The first and last terms are justly applied, but not the middle one; as there is very little criticism, in the proper meaning of the term, in any of the works of Hall. . . . There is a great variety of sentiment, and great richness of thought and expression, in these Contemplations. The historical passages are often very happily illustrated; and a pure and elevated devotion, combined with a fine imagination, pervades the whole."—Bickersteth's Bib. Bib.

"Very devotional and useful."—Bickersteth's Chris. Stu.

"A vein of piety, and even an original cast of observation, runs through the greater part of his performances; and his Contemplations, in particular, breathe the fire of poetry as well as of devotion."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

"The Contemplations of Hall are among his most celebrated works. They are prolix, and without much of that vivacity or striking novelty we meet with in the devotional writings of his contemporary, [Jeremy Taylor,] but are perhaps more practical and generally edifying."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

4. THE OLD RELIGION; or, the Difference between the Reformed and the Romish Church: pub. 1628.

A very able work.

"Quo ostenditur evangelicam religionem esse antiquam atque apostolicam; Romanam contra novam atque ab hominibus excogitatum."—WALLEN.

5. EXPLICATION OF ALL THE HARD TEXTS OF THE WHOLE DIVINE SCRIPTURE: pub. 1633-34.

"These expository notes are very valuable, especially for showing the spirit and force of many expressions that occur."—Dr. Doddridge.

"They do not, however, contain much learned criticism. Most of them, if not all, are inserted in the valuable Commentary of Bp. Mant and Dr. D'Oyly."—Horne's Bib. Bib.

"This paraphrase includes many texts which are not hard; and on many hard texts it throws little light. Occasionally a critical remark occurs, and frequently the point and energy of a particular sentiment is happily noticed; but the reader who repairs to these volumes for the solution of many difficulties in the language or doctrine of the Bible will certainly be disappointed. He who undertakes too much must always fail to afford satisfaction. An explication of all the hard texts in the Bible was too vast an undertaking even for Bishop Hall, though his learning was greater than that of most of the men of his age, and his industry not inferior to any."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

"Very devotional and useful."—Bickersteth's C. S.

6. CHRISTIAN MEDITATIONS: pub. 1640.

"Next to his Contemplations are his Meditations, Letters, and Balm of Gilead."—Dr. Doddridge.

"Best of all in his Meditations."—Fuller's Worthies of Leicestershire.

"Bishop Hall's beautiful Meditations were not less suited to our day than to his."—REV. CHARLES BRIDGES: Memoir of M. J. Graham.

7. EPISCOPACY BY DIVINE RIGHT ASSERTED: pub. 1640.

"In this the good Bishop endeavours to fix Episcopacy upon the same basis of apostolical institution, and to demolish the system of the Puritans, by demonstrating that Presbytericism had no existence for the first fifteen centuries of the Christian era, and that it owed its being to the inventive faculties of Calvin."—BOGLE.

8. MUNDUS ALTER ET IDEM: SIVE TERRA AUSTRALIS ANTE HÆC SEMPER INCOGNITA AUCTORE MERCURIO BRITANNICO: pub. 1643. An English version was pub. by John Healey, under the title of Discovery of a New World, 8vo.

"I can only produce two books by English authors in this first part of the seventeenth century which fall properly under the class of novels or romances; and of these one is written in Latin. This is the Mundus Alter et Idem of Bishop Hall, an imitation of the latter and weaker volumes of Rabelais. A country in Terra Australis is divided into four regions, Crapulia, Virginia, Moronea, and Lavernia. Maps of the whole land and of particular regions are given; and the nature of the satire, not much of which has any especial reference to England, may easily be collected."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

The other novel referred to by Mr. Hallam is Francis Godwin's Man in the Moon. It has been supposed that Swift borrowed the idea of Gulliver's Travels from Hall's Mundus Alter et Idem; but see our life of FRANCIS GODWIN. We conclude with some opinions respecting the general merits of this eminent divine as a scholar and an author:

"He was noted for a singular wit from his youth: a most acute rhetorician and an elegant poet. He understood many tongues; and in the rhetoric of his own he was second to none that lived in his time."—REV. JOHN WHITEFOOTE: Bishop Hall's Funeral Sermon.

"He was commonly called our English Seneca, for the pureness, plainness, and fulness of his style. Not unhappy at controversies, more happy at comments, very good in his character, better in his sermons, best of all in his meditations. . . . A witty poet when young, a painful preacher and solid divine in his middle, a patient sufferer in his old age."—THOMAS FULLER.

"It is much to our present purpose to observe that the style of his prose is strongly tinged with the manner of Seneca. The writer of the satires is perceptible in some of his gravest polemical or scriptural treatises, which are perpetually interspersed with excursive illustrations, familiar allusions and observations in life. Many of them were early translated into French."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

The obligations of the author of the Sentimental Journey to Bishop Hall have been exposed by an ingenious critic, whose merits we have already considered:

"There is a delicacy of thought and tenderness of expression in the good Bishop's compositions, from the transfusions of which Sterne looked for immortality."—Dr. FERRIAR.

The next authority to be quoted is not noted for enthusiastic eulogy of the old English divines; but he can hardly say enough in favour of Bishop Hall:

"Imaginative and copious eloquence, terse and pointed sentences, full of piety and devotion. Few writers more likely to be useful to [Divinity] students. Let them thoroughly read and digest such a writer, and they will be furnished for most of the calls upon them."—Bickersteth's C. S.

Here we must conclude, not from paucity of matter, but narrowness of space. The similarity between Jeremy Taylor and Bishop Hall has not escaped the eye of criticism. A late eminent authority happily defines the points of likeness and contrast:

"A writer as distinguished in works of practical piety was Hall. His Art of Divine Meditation, his Contemplations, and indeed many of his writings, remind us frequently of Taylor. Both had equally pious and devotional tempers; both were full of learning, both fertile of illustration; both may be said to have strong imagination and poetical genius, though Taylor let his prebeminant a little more. Taylor is also rather more subtle and argumentative; his copiousness has more real variety. Hall keeps more closely to his subject, dilates upon it sometimes more tediously, but more appetitely. In his sermons there is some excess of quotation and far-fetched illustration, but less than in those of Taylor. In some of their writings these two great divines resemble each other, on the whole, so much, that we might for a short time not discover which we were reading. I do not know that any third writer comes close to either.—Hullam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

Hall, Joseph, pub. the posthumous Works of Rev. Jeremiah Seel, Lon., 1750, 2 vols. 8vo.

Hall, Mrs. Louisa Jane, a daughter of Dr. James Park, of Newburyport, Mass., was born in that city, Feb. 7, 1802. In 1840 she was married to the Rev. Edward B. Hall, a Unitarian minister of Providence, Rhode Island. Mrs. Hall has attained considerable reputation as the author of Miriam, a Dramatic Poem, illustrative of the early conflicts of the Christian Church. Although partly written in 1825, and completed not long after this date, it was not pub. till 1837. In 1828 she gave to the world Joanna of Naples, an Historical Tale, in prose; and has also pub. a Life of Elizabeth Carter, and contributed to the periodicals of the day. Few American poetical compositions have been more highly commended than Mrs. Hall's Miriam. See Griswold's Female Poets of America; Mrs. Hale's Records of Woman; *Duycokincks' Cye. of Amer. Hall, Robert, 1764–1831, one of the most eminent of modern divines, a native of Arnsby, in Leicestershire, where his father was settled as pastor to a congregation of Baptists. At a very early age he gave evidence of uncommon genius, which will readily be admitted when we are assured upon undoubted authority that "Before he was nine years of age he had perused and reperused, with intense interest, the treatises of that profound and extraordinary thinker, Jonathan Edwards, on the 'Affections' and on the 'Will.' About the same time he read, with a like interest, 'Butler's Analogy.' Before he was ten years old he had written many essays, principally on religious subjects, and often invited his brothers and sisters to hear him preach."—Dr. Ottnthus Gregory's Memoir.

He was placed in the academy of Mr. John Ryland, of Northampton, and afterwards removed to the institution at Bristol connected with the Particular Baptists. In 1780, at the early age of sixteen, he was "set apart" by his father and some other members of the Baptist communion for "public employ" as a preacher of the word. In little more than a year after this ceremony Robert was sent to King's College, Aberdeen, where he formed a close intimacy with Mr.—afterwards Sir James—Mackintosh. Sir James said he became attached to Robert Hall "because he could not help it."

"They read together; they sat together at lecture, if possible; they walked together. In their joint studies they read much of Xenophon and Herodotus, and more of Plato; and so well was all this known, exciting admiration in some, in others envy, that it was not unusual, as they went along, for their class-fellows to point at them and say, 'There go Plato and Herodotus.' . . . There was scarcely an important position in Berkeley's Minute Philosopher, in Butler's Analogy, or in Edwards on the Will, over which they had not debated with the utmost intensity."

In 1783 Mr. Hall accepted an invitation from the church at Broadmead to associate himself with Dr. Caleb Evans as the assistant pastor. His first sermon had been preached, when only sixteen years of age, to a congregation of ministers, and we are told that in the elucidation of his text, "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all," he treated "this mysterious and awful subject with such metaphysical acumen, and drew from it such an impressive application, as excited the deepest interest." We need not be surprised, therefore, that, after three years' intense application to metaphysics and studious perusal of the best pulpit models, he produced such an impression on his auditors as to "crowd the place of worship to excess." In 1791 Mr. Hall assumed the pastoral charge of the Baptist congregation at Cambridge, in which important post he succeeded the unhappy Mr. Robinson. Mr. Hall's devotion to study was carried to an excess which resulted in the most painful consequences.

"Often has he been known to sit close at his reading, or yet more intensely engaged in abstract thought, for more than twelve hours in the day; so that, when one or two of his kind friends have called upon him, in the hope of drawing him from his solitude, they have found him in such a state of nervous excitement as led them to unite their efforts in persuading him to take some mild narcotic and retire to rest. The painful result may be anticipated. This noble mind lost its equilibrium; and he who had so long been the theme of universal admiration now became the subject of as extensive a sympathy. This event occurred in November, 1804. Mr. Hall was placed under the care of Dr. Arnold, of Leicester, whose attention, with the blessing of God, in about two months, restored him both to mental and bodily health."

But it is painful to add that, in about twelve months from this time, "sleepless nights, habitual exclusion from society, a complete self-absorption," and the incessant struggle between a sense of duty and a proper regard to his health, produced a recurrence of mental derangement. The judicious measures of Dr. Cox, with the Divine aid, soon restored the "complete balance of his mental powers." It was considered necessary, however, that he should resign the charge of his congregation at Cambridge, and for a year at least seek retirement and avoid all mental excitement. A connexion was thus terminated which had subsisted for fifteen years.

In about two years from this time he felt himself sufficiently re-established in health to take charge of a congregation in Harvey Lane, Leicester, where he was married in March, 1808.

"The people are a simple-hearted, affectionate, praying people, to whom I preach with more pleasure than to the more refined audience at Cambridge."—Letter to Dr. Ryland.

He little foresaw that he would be the successor of the friend to whom this letter was written; but such was the fact. Dr. Ryland "entered into rest" in 1825, and in the next year Mr. Hall resigned his post at Leicester, which he had occupied for nearly twenty years, and returned, after an interval of forty-five, to the scene of his first continuous labours, the church at Broadmead, Bristol.

"Some of the friends of his early life still survived to welcome his return among them; and many others, who had profited by his pulpit exertions on his periodical visits to Bristol, congratulated themselves that he to whom, under God, they owed so much, had become their pastor."

His separation from his flock at Leicester, among whom he had gone in and out for almost twenty years, was truly affecting.

"The day of separation—the last sacrament-Sabbath—was a day of anguish to him and them, of which I shall not attempt the description. Suffice it to say, that he went through the ordinary public duties of the day with tolerable composure; but at the sacramental service he strove in vain to conceal his emotion. In one of his addresses to the members of the church, on alluding to the pain of separation he was so much affected, that he sat down, covered his face with his hands, and wept; they, sharing in his distress, gave unequivocal signs of the deepest feeling. Mr. Eustace Carey, who was present, continued the devotional part of the service until Mr. Hall was sufficiently recovered to proceed. At the close of the solemnity the weeping became again universal, and they parted, sorrowing most of all that they should see his face no more!"—Dr. GREGORY.

Mr. Hall continued actively engaged in the discharge of ministerial duty at Bristol until February 12, 1831, when he was attacked by a severe complaint in the chest, which terminated fatally on the 21st of the same month. He died "the death of the righteous," and was never greater than in that last scene, which so often evinces at the same time the weakness of human nature and the efficacy of that strength wherewith God endues the souls of his faithful children. "Over such the second death hath no power," and the pangs of the first are swallowed up in the foretaste of that exceeding glory which "God hath prepared for them who love him."

A friend remarked to the dying believer, "Thy God will be our God!" "Yes, He will," was the reply; "He will be our guide even unto death." Surely

"The chamber where the good man meets his fate
Is privileged beyond the common walks of life."

In the controversy excited by the French Revolution of 1789 Mr. Hall was induced to take a part. He afterwards regretted that he was so much under the influence of the general excitement as to be drawn aside from his higher obligations. To use his own words—

"The Christian ministry is in danger of losing something of its energy and sanctity by embarking on the stormy element of political debate."

The principal works of this eminent writer and orator were as follows:—1. Christianity consistent with a Love of Freedom; being an Answer to a Sermon by the Rev. John Clayton, Lon., 1791. Mr. Hall never would consent to the republication of this essay. The principles he considered correct, but he regretted the tone of animadversion as "severe, sarcastic, and unbecoming."

"It contains some powerful reasoning, as well as some splendid passages."

2. Apology for the Freedom of the Press, 1793.

"I went home to my lodgings and began to write immediately; sat up all night, and, wonderful for me, kept up the intellectual ferment for almost a month, and then the thing was done."

3. Modern Infidelity Considered, 1800. See an interesting account by Dr. Gregory of the history of this sermon.

"I mistake greatly if, after the perusal of this simple narrative, the reader will not turn to the sermon with additional relish, and meditate with augmented pleasure upon the peculiarities of this most valuable production and the singular character of its author's mind."

4. Reflections on War, 1802.

"Consious that what is here advanced was meant neither to flatter nor offend any party, he is not very solicitous about those misconstructions or misinterpretations to which the purest intentions are exposed."—Author's Preface.

5. The Sentiments proper to the Present Crisis, Fast-day, 1803.

"From a due consideration of the temper of the times he thought it expedient to direct the attention to what appeared to him the chief source of public degeneracy, rather than insist at large on particular vices."—Author's Preface to the second edition.

6. The Discouragements and Supports of the Christian Ministry; a Discourse delivered to the Rev. James Robinson at his ordination. 7. On Terms of Communion; with a particular view to the case of the Baptists and the Pædo-baptists, 1815. Mr. Hall was a warm advocate of "Mixed Communion," while Mr. Kinghorn was a zealous champion of exclusion. 8. The Essential Difference between Christian Baptism and the Baptism of John more fully stated and confirmed. 9. A Sermon occasioned by the death of her late Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte of Wales, 1817; 6th ed. pub. in 1818. Mr. Hall preached three sermons on this occasion, of which many of the auditors affirm the one published was by no means the best.

"It by universal acknowledgment bore the palm above all the numerous valuable sermons that were then published. . . . In felicity of diction, in delicacy and pathos, in the rich variety of most exquisite and instructive trains of thought, in their cogent application to truths of the utmost moment, in the masterly combination of what in eloquence, philosophy, and religion was best calculated to make a permanent and salutary impression, this sermon probably stands unrivalled."

So great was his reputation as a preacher, that some persons were in the habit of travelling two nights, coming and returning, for the pleasure of hearing him on Sunday. His friend, Dr. Gregory, gives us a graphic account of one of these occasions:

"From the commencement of his discourse, an almost breathless silence prevailed, deeply impressive and solemnizing from its singular intensesness. Not a sound was heard but that of the preacher's voice—scarcely an eye but was fixed upon him—not a countenance that he did not watch, and read, and interpret, as he surveyed them again and again with his rapid, ever-exercised glance. As he advanced and increased in animation, five or six of the auditors would be seen to rise and lean forward over the front of their pews, still keeping their eyes upon him. Some new or striking sentiment or expression would, in a few minutes, cause others to rise in like manner: shortly afterwards still more, and so on, until, long before the close of the sermon, it often happened that a considerable portion of the congregation were seen standing,—every eye directed to the preacher, yet now and then for a moment glancing from one to the other, thus transmitting and reciprocating thought and feeling:—Mr. Hall himself, though manifestly absorbed in his subject, conscious of the whole, receiving new animation from what he thus witnessed, reflecting it back upon those who were already alive to the inspiration, until all that were susceptible of thought and emotion seemed wound up to the utmost limit of elevation on earth.—when he would close, and they reluctantly resume their seats."

With this lifelike picture of preacher and congregation fresh in their minds, let our readers peruse the Sermon on the death of the Princess Charlotte, or that entitled "The Lamb of God," and imagine such a discourse so delivered, and they will not marvel when told that when Robert Hall preached "the place of worship was crowded to excess," and that men considered the hearing of one sermon cheaply purchased by the loss of two nights' rest. A writer in "The Pulpit," who enjoyed the privilege of hearing Mr. Hall's sermon on the "Power of God," thus describes it:

"It was, without exception, the most wonderful sermon I ever heard. Every quality which could have been called into exercise on such an occasion seemed concentrated in this one sermon. Profoundly metaphysical, without bewildering himself or his hearers, and elegant without the shadow of affectation—rapid in delivery, without confusion—mergotic, without rant—devout, without enthusiasm—commanding, without austerity—affectionate, without cant—argumentative, without pedantry: the whole effect was beyond what it is possible to conceive of pulpit eloquence."

Another writer gives us a speaking picture of this great orator:

"His figure was not commanding; the general cast of his countenance was heavy; his voice was feeble and tremulous, and incapable, in itself, of expressing or conveying any deep emotion. About action or gesture he was perfectly indifferent: he usually began in so low a tone as to be scarcely audible; and preserved, to the last, one fixed, though unconstrained, position. As he was warmed with his subject, his countenance became animated, and his voice, still retaining its character of breezy softness, swelled into a volume of delightful melody. While he was preaching, such was the unassuming simplicity of his style and manner, and natural fervour with which he carried his hearers along, that they entirely lost sight of the man for the moment. As he approached the end of his discourse, he became peculiarly animated, though not declamatory,—his audience were interested, and with a rapidity of utterance which fixed the reporter, like a statue, in admiration, and frequently defied all attempts at writing, he poured forth the various stores of his vast imagination, and produced an effect of which few can conceive who have not witnessed it themselves."

Mr. Bosworth tells us

"When he began, he was usually calm and collected; speaking in a low tone, and looking onward as he went, as if to survey afresh the region of thought he was about to traverse, but not often giving an indication of those torrents of eloquence that were soon to be poured from his lips. Sometimes, at the commencement, he hesitated, and seemed perplexed, as if dissatisfied with what he had intended to say; at others, when he was about to establish a truth or enforce a general principle, he would enter upon a course of clear and powerful reasoning, rendered equally attractive and astonishing by the delectable purity and beauty of his style. In this latter case, his sentences were finished with such exquisite care, that he appeared to have selected, not merely the most appropriate, but the only words which served his purpose, and yet delivered with such freedom and ease, that they seemed the first which came into his mind. As he proceeded, he increased in animation and strength of utterance: in the application of the principles he had advanced, or the doctrine he had discussed, he grew more intense and ardent; and when he had risen to a certain pitch of holy excitement, his brow would expand, his countenance brighten, and drawing back his majestic form in the pulpit, he would come forward again, charged with the fulness of his message to his hearers and address them in tones and language which made every heart vibrate. But it was not with his lips only that he spoke—his eloquence was more intellectual and spiritual than audible sounds could make it. His speaking eye told volumes; whether beaming with benignity, or blazing with intense and hallowed feeling, that eye indicated sentiments and emotions which words were not made to express."

"The richness, variety, and extent of his knowledge are not so remarkable as his absolute mastery over it. He moves about in the loftiest sphere of contemplation, as though he were native and ended to its element." He uses the finest classical allusions, the noblest images, and the most exquisite words, as though they were those which came first to his mind, and which formed his natural dialect. There is not the least appearance of straining after greatness in his most magnificent excursions, but he rises to the loftiest heights with a childlike ease. His style is one of the clearest and simplest—the least encumbered with its own beauty—of any which ever has been written."—From a paper by Sir T. N. Talford, on Pulpit Oratory, in the London Magazine, February, 1821, and quoted in "The Georgian Era," i. 465, 466.

A clerical critic tells us that,

"Although Mr. Hall possessed considerable learning, he rarely displayed it; generally preferring the most simple phrases he could select, to express his meaning, to those of a less familiar or more ambitious class. On one occasion, being called upon to conclude a service with prayer, after a sermon by Dr. Chalmers, who had been even more than ordinarily brilliant, he clothed his address to the Deity with such affecting plainness of style, that the congregation, who had been wrought up to a painful pitch of admiration by the dazzling eloquence of the preacher, felt a delightful repose in the chaste natural, tender simplicity of language in which Mr. Hall embodied his supplications."

The reader will no doubt be pleased to read more upon this theme:

"The bold diction, the majestic gait of the sentence, the vivid illustration, the rebuke which could scathe the offender, the burst of honest indignation at triumphant vice, the biting sarcasm, the fervid appeal to the heart, the sagacious development of principle, the broad field of moral vision—all these distinguish the compositions of Robert Hall; and we bear our most willing testimony to their worth."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

"His diction displays an unlimited command, and an exquisite choice of language. His copious use of Scripture phrases bestows upon his style an awful sanctity. The same purity of taste which appears in his choice of words is equally apparent in the forms of expression into which they are combined. The turn of his phrases is gracefully idiomatic. In the construction of his periods, he is, perhaps, superior to any other writer. He seems to have employed every elegant and harmonious form of which the language admits; always gratifying, often ravishing, the ear, but never cloying it."

"The originality with which he views every subject, and the master hand with which he grasps it, are altogether very remarkable. He follows in no track of other men: neither his thoughts nor his language are borrowed. A prodigious power of memory in the use of Scripture, an exquisite judgment in the disposition of his materials, are united with a boldness of conception, and a creative force of imagination, which stamp an impress of originality and independence on all his productions."—A writer in the Lon. Christian Observer.

"I cannot do better than refer the academic reader to the immortal works of Robert Hall. For moral grandeur, for Christian truth, and for sublimity, we may doubt whether they have their match in the sacred oratory of any age or country."—Professor Sturgeon, in his Discourse on the Studies of the University.

"The works of this great preacher are, in the highest sense of the term, imaginative; as distinguished not only from the didactic, but the fanciful. He possesses 'the vision and faculty divine' in as high a degree as any of our writers in prose. His noblest passages do but make truth visible in the form of beauty, and 'clothe upon' abstract ideas until they become palpable in exquisite shapes. The dullest writer would convey the same meaning in so few words as he has done in the most sublime of his illustrations."—SIR T. N. TALFORD: Pulpit Oratory, in Lon. Mag., Feb. 1821.

The same critic remarks that, in the Discourse on the Prospect of an Invasion by Napoleon, Mr. Hall

"Blends the finest remembrance of the antique world—the dearest associations of British patriotism—and the pure spirit of the Gospel—in a strain as noble as could have poured out by Tyrtæus."

"His mind is little to be envied, if from the perusal of Robert Hall he do not find himself a more accomplished, a wiser, and a better man."—Church of England Quarterly Review.

"The sermons and treatises which he committed to the press are worthy of his elevated character, and will ever rank among the choicest specimens of sacred literature. They show the strength and beauty of which the English language is capable."—Dr. Williams's C. P.

"The excellence of Mr. Hall does not consist in the predominance of any one of his powers, but in the exquisite proportion and harmony of all."—SIR T. N. TALFORD: see ante.

"Hall, the most distinguished ornament of the Calvinistic dissenters, has long been justly ranked with the highest of our classics. His sermons are admirable specimens of pulpit eloquence, not to be surpassed in the whole compass of British theology. Those which received the author's own imprimatur are vastly superior to any that are either taken from his MSS. or supplied from the notes of short-hand writers."—Lownley's Brit. Lib.

We quote some comparisons instituted between Hall and other writers. On these expressed opinions we forbear to make any comment. Some of our readers will unhesitatingly concur with them; others will qualify, and not a few stoutly contest them.

"Hall's style is as purely English as Addison's, without its occasional inaccuracies and pervading fulness; as energetic as Warburton's, without his coarseness, and, we may add, as classical as Burke's, without his pomp and artificialness."—Lon. Eclectic Rev. for 1832.

"He is more massive than Addison, more easy and uncontrained than Johnson, more sober than Burke."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

Hear Dugald Stewart, in the same strain:

"Whoever wishes to see the English language in its perfection must read the writings of that great divine, Robert Hall. He combines the beauties of Johnson, Addison, and Burke, without their imperfections."

For Hall's opinion of Dugald Stewart, see Memoir by Dr. Gregory: we have not room for an extract here. If these criticisms savour of extravagance, we think the one subjoined hardly does Mr. Hall justice:

"Hall is, even in print, much of the orator; although his language, with all its richness, betrays, in his published writings, symptoms of anxious elaboration. Probably there could not be cited from him any thing equal in force or originality to some passages of Foster's, but it would still more certainly be impossible to detect him indulging in feeble commonplaces."—SPALDING: Hist. of Eng. Lit.

An ardent admirer of Hall declares that "He had the intellect of an angel, the piety of a saint, and the humility of a worm."

"One of the most able of modern writers, with a clear, argumentative, powerful, masculine mind, and a correct statement of evangelical truth; . . . of similar views in general doctrine to Scott and Fuller. . . . A powerful and faithful writer, excepting his political pamphlets, which are a beacon to warn ministers from such subjects. . . . A remarkable vigour of intellect and power of language distinguish his writings."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"In his higher flights, what he said of Burke might, with the slightest deduction, be applied to himself. That his infernal fancy hid all nature under tribute, and collected riches from every scene of the Creation and every walk of art; [see BURKE in this volume,] and at the same time, that could be affirmed of Mr. Hall which could not be affirmed of Mr. Burke,—that he never fatigued and oppressed by gaudy and superfluous imagery. . . . His inexhaustible variety augmented the general effect. The same images, the same illustrations, scarcely ever recurred."—DR. GREGORY.

"It is to be observed that imagination had always been a subordinate faculty in his mental constitution. It was never of that prolific power which threw so vast profusion over the oratory of Jeremy Taylor or of Burke; or which could tempt him to revel, for the pure indulgence of the luxury, as they appear to have sometimes done, in the exuberance of imaginative genius. As a preacher, none of his contemporaries who have not seen him in the pulpit, or of his readers in another age, will be able to conceive an adequate idea of Mr. Hall. . . . He displayed in a most eminent degree the rare excellence of a perfect conception and expression of every thought, however rapid the succession."—JOHN FOSTER.

"We know no one whose style is so strictly after the classic model. Like the ancient statuary, its high finish proves that it must have been elaborated; but all art is hidden."—A contributor to the Church of Ireland Mag.

"His published sermons will always be ranked amongst the finest specimens of pulpit eloquence ever given to the world. And yet the unanimous testimony of all who heard him is that his discourses when spoken in the fervid glow of imagination and when the mind was full of the subject, were far superior to what was afterwards recorded from his own memory or the notes of others."—DR. JAMESON: Cyc. of Mod. Rel. Bing.

"In the eloquence of the pulpit, Robert Hall comes nearer Massillon than either Cicero or Æschines to Demosthenes."—LORD BROUGHAM.

"Mr. Hall, like Bishop Taylor, has the eloquence of an orator, the fancy of a poet, the acuteness of a schoolman, the profoundness of a philosopher, and the piety of a saint."—DR. PARR'S Spital Sermon.

We conclude this imposing array of distinguished commendations by the testimony of Hall's attached friend and sincere mourner, Sir James Mackintosh. From this accomplished person a biography of Hall was expected, when—"what shadows we are!"—Sir James was gathered to his fathers, and became himself the theme of an epitaph and the subject of the biographer's pen!

"His sermons are distinguished by solid and profound philosophy, and breathe a spirit of humility, piety, and charity, worthy of that pure and divine religion to the defence of which the author has consecrated his talents. His eloquence is of the highest order, the natural effusion of a fertile imagination and of an ardent mind, while his style is easy, various, and animated. On a review of all his various excellencies, we cannot but expect with confidence that the name of Robert Hall will be placed by posterity among the best writers of the age, as well as the most vigorous defenders of religious truth, and the brightest examples of Christian charity."

There have been several publications of portions of Hall's works, and a number of collective editions. Works, with a Memoir of the author by Dr. O. Gregory, and Observations on his character as a preacher, by John Foster, Lon., 1831-33, 6 vols. 8vo; 1839, 6 vols. 8vo; 1845, 6 vols. 8vo; 1846, 6 vols. 8vo; 11th ed., 1853, 6 vols. 8vo. Contents: Vol. I. Sermons; Charges; Circular-Letters. II. Works on terms of Communion; Difference between Christian Baptism and the Baptism of John; Reply to Kinghorn, being a Further Vindication of Free Communion. III. Christianity Consistent with Love of Freedom; Apology for the Freedom of the Press; On the renewal of the Charter of the East India Company; Appeal in behalf of the Frame-work Knitters' Fund; Reply to Objections against this Society; Slavery in the West Indies; Fragments; Christian in opposition to Party Communion; Miscellaneous Pieces. IV. Articles from the Eclectic Review; Miscellaneous Pieces. V. Notes of Sermons; Letters. VI. Memoir by Gregory; Hall's Character, by Foster; Sermons; Index.

"Are there any of you, my readers, who have not read the Life of Robert Hall? If so, 'when found, make a note of it.' Never mind your theological opinion, orthodox or heterodox—send for Robert Hall! See HALL, MRS. SAMUEL CARTER, No. 11.

"We may say, on the whole, that the literary, legendary, and antiquarian portions of the work are compiled with laudable diligence; the illustrations are, for the most part, clear and interesting; and the statements and opinions are in general as sensible, candid, and trustworthy, as could be expected from writers who fairly confess their unwillingness to say any thing discreditabie to the country and the majority of its people."—Lon. Quar. Rev., Sept. 1849.

Mr. Hall was formerly the editor of The Amulet, The New Monthly Magazine, and The British Magazine. He has assisted Mrs. Hall in several works, in addition to the one above noticed.

Hall, Mrs. Samuel Carter, formerly Miss Ann Maria Fielding, wife of the preceding, is a native of Wexford, Ireland, but removed to London at the early age of fifteen. As a graphic delineator of Irish peculiarities, and a skilful painter of those domestic experiences which are much alike among all nations, Mrs. Hall has acquired great reputation. The following are her principal works: 1. Sketches of Irish Character, 1829, r. 8vo; 1844, r. 8vo; 1846, r. 8vo; 1849, r. 8vo; 1854, 8vo. 2. Chronicles of a School-Room, 1830, 12mo. 3. Sketches of Irish Character: Series Second, 1831; see No. 1. 4. The Buccaneer; a Novel, 1832, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 1849, fp. 8vo. 5. Tales of Woman's Trials, 1834, r. 8vo; 1846, r. 8vo; 1852, 8vo. 6. The Outlaw; a Novel, 1835, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 1848, fp. 8vo. 7. Uncle Horace; a Novel, 1835, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 8. Lights and Shadows of Irish Life, 1838, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 9. Marian; or, A Young Maid's Fortunes, 1840, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 1847, 12mo. 10. Tales of the Irish Peasantry, 1840, 8vo. 11. Ireland, its scenery, character, &c., 1841-43, 3 vols. imp. 8vo. See HALL, SAMUEL CARTER. 12. The White Boy; a Novel, 1845, 2 vols. p. 8vo. 13. Midsummer Eve; a Tale of Love, 1847, 8vo. 14. Pilgrimages to English Shrines, 1850, 8vo. 15. Popular Tales and Sketches: 18 Tales, now first collected for the "Amusing Library," 1856. As stated in the preceding article, Mrs. Hall has published several works in conjunction with her husband. She has also written several minor dramas, of which the first—the French Refugee—was brought out with great success in London in 1837. Mrs. Hall has also been a large contributor to the periodicals of the day. We quote some opinions respecting the merits of this popular writer.

"Mrs. Hall has already shown her fitness for the task by an intimate acquaintance with that class of Irish life which affords the animated portion of her descriptions. She paints the peasantry and working-classes of the country with fidelity, and her pen is powerfully assisted by the productions of the pencil which she has called to her aid."—Lon. Athenæum: notice of Sketches of Irish Character.

"The Irish Sketches of this lady resemble considerably Miss Mitford's beautiful English sketches in Our Village; but they are more vigorous and picturesque, and bright with an animated and warm nationality, apologetic and defensive, which Miss Mitford, writing of one class of English to another, had no occasion to use."—Blackwood's Mag., vol. lxxvii.

"Mrs. Hall is really a charming writer; and her Irish stories more especially—not at all like Miss Edgeworth's Tales or Crofton Croker's Fairy Legends, both admirable in their way—are full of life and character, with that mixture of humour and pathos which seems the native temperament of the children of Erin."—Lon. Eclectic Rev.

"In her Irish stories Mrs. Hall excels. Her rustic maidens are copied from the cottage; nothing can be more faithful and lively; nor are her hind and husbandmen any thing inferior. We nowhere see the Irish character more justly or so pleasantly represented. She sees Nature in her proper dimensions; there is fancy, but no exaggeration, and life always."—ALAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"There is about them [Tales of Woman's Trials] a still, and a solemn, and a holy, beauty that is worthy of the sacred subject which they illustrate; and what subject is better fitted to appeal to every generous sympathy, to every tender emotion, of man's nature? What subject better fitted to be delineated by woman's pen?"—Dubl. Univ. Mag., vii. 205-213.

"Whatever expectations the name of Lights and Shadows of Irish Life may excite in the reader from its resemblance to the name of the exquisite volumes on Scottish Life which bear a similar title, it is not too much to say they will be satisfied."—Ibid., xii. 218-225.

It is indeed high praise which has been awarded to this lady, that "There is, also, in every thing she has published, the still higher merit—and without which all other pretensions to praise are worse than different—of belonging to the most unexceptionable school of morals. She never tries to enlist our sympathies on the side of vice."—Dubl. Univ. Mag., xvi. 146-147.

Hall, Mrs. Sarah, 1761-1830, a lady of great virtues and accomplishments, a native of Philadelphia, was a daughter of the Rev. John Ewing, D. D., for many years Provost of the University of Pennsylvania and Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. In 1782 Miss Ewing was married to Mr. John Hall, of Maryland, and after this event resided alternately in the latter State and in Philadelphia, with the exception of four years passed in Lambertton, New Jersey. Mrs. Hall is best known as the author of Conversations on the Bible, of which four edits. were pub. in this country and one or two in London; 1st edit., 1818, 18mo. A 2d vol. was added and the whole issued in 1821, 2 vols. 18mo; 5th ed., 1837, 12mo, pp. 360. This volume has been highly commended:

"This work is written with that ease and simplicity which belongs to true genius, and contains a fund of information which could only have been collected by diligent research and mature thought."—PROFESSOR JOHN S. HART, of Philadelphia.

Mrs. Hall was a contributor to the Portfolio, of which her son, John E. Hall, was for more than ten years the editor; and her essays and criticisms pub. in that periodical "May readily be distinguished, as well by their vivacity as the classic purity of their diction."—Mrs. S. J. HALE.

A small vol., containing selections from her miscellaneous writings, was pub. in Philadelphia in 1833, r. 18mo, by her son, Mr. Harrison Hall. This vol. contains a sketch of her life, to which we must refer the reader for further information respecting this accomplished woman, brilliant writer, and devout Christian. "This is the most important publication that has appeared respecting our late contest with China."—Lon. Naval and Military Gazette.

Hall, Wm. Henry, d. 1807, compiled an Encyclopædia, and was the author of several other works.

Hall, Wm. W., M.D., b. 1810, at Paris, Kentucky, grad. at Centre Coll., 1830; received the degree of M.D. at Transylvania Univ., 1836. 1. Treatise on Cholera, 8vo. 2. Bronchitis and Kindred Diseases, 8th ed., N. York, 1853, 8vo. Dr. Hall is the editor of the Journal of Health which bears his name.

Hallam, Arthur Henry, 1811-1833, a grandson of Sir Abraham Elton, and a son of the distinguished author of A View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages, &c., was born in London, graduated at Trin. Coll., Cambridge, 1832, entered the Middle Temple, and died in Germany in September, 1833. An interesting biographical sketch of this gifted young man, written by his father, is prefixed to The Remains, in Verse and Prose, of Arthur Henry Hallam, Lon., 1834. Privately printed. Mr. Hallam was betrothed to a sister of the poet Tennyson, and the In Memoriam of the latter is a dirge for the departed. See estimate of the literary character of young Hallam in the North British Review, xiv. 261; Lon. Gent. Mag., Oct. 1852: 353; Blackwood's Mag., xxxviii. 738. See also Loekhart's Life of Scott for a specimen of young Hallam's poetical powers.

Hallam, Henry, LL.D., one of the most distinguished of modern authors, was born about 1778, and was educated at Eton and Oxford. After leaving college he settled in London, which has ever since been his principal place of residence. He was a valued friend of Sir Walter Scott, and the two were engaged about the same time as contributors to the Edinburgh Review. As a zealous co-operator with William Wilberforce in the abolishment of the Slave Trade, Mr. Hallam gained great and deserved reputation. Mr. Hallam is a Foreign Associate of the Institute of France. In 1830 he received one of the two fifty-guinea gold medals instituted by George IV. for eminence in historical composition. The other was awarded to our celebrated countryman, Washington Irving. Mr. Hallam is the author of three great works, either of which is of sufficient merit to confer upon the author literary immortality.

1. View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages, Lon., 1818, 2 vols. 4to; 10th ed., 1833, 3 vols. 8vo; 11th ed., 1855, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. In these edits, the Supplemental Notes pub. in an octavo vol. in 1848 have been incorporated with the original work, partly at the foot of the pages, partly at the close of each chapter.

"It is the object of the present work to exhibit, in a series of historical dissertations, a comprehensive survey of the chief circumstances that can interest a philosophical inquirer during the period usually denominated the Middle Ages. Such an undertaking must necessarily fall under the class of historical abridgments: yet there will perhaps be found enough to distinguish it from such as have already appeared." See Preface to First Edition.

Mr. Hallam's View comprises the period from the middle of the fifth to the end of the fifteenth century: from the establishment of Clovis in Gaul to the invasion of Italy by Charles the Eighth.

"It would be difficult to appreciate exactly the merits, and invidious to point out the defects, of the numerous precursors of Mr. Hallam in this branch of historical investigation. It is sufficient to remark that the plan of his work is more extensive than that of our countryman, Dr. Robertson, its arrangement more strictly historical, its views more comprehensive, and its information more copious and critical. Mr. Hallam appears to have bestowed much time and reflection on his subject. . . . To a familiar acquaintance with the early chronicles and original histories of the Barbarians, Mr. Hallam has added a diligent examination of their laws; and wherever records throw their steady and certain light on the progress of events, he has consulted them with care. But it is not the labour and industry employed by Mr. Hallam in the composition of this work, nor even the valuable and interesting information it contains, that constitute its chief or peculiar merit. It is written throughout with a spirit of freedom and liberality that do credit to the author. A firm but temperate love of liberty, an enlightened but cautious philosophy, form its distinguished excellence. We never find the author attempting to palliate injustice or excuse oppression; and whenever he treats of popular rights, or pronounces on the contentions of subjects with their sovereigns, we meet with a freedom and intrepidity of discussion that remind us of better times. But, though a decided enemy to the encroachments of arbitrary power, Mr. Hallam is no infatuated admirer of ancient turbulence nor blind apologist of popular excesses. If, indeed, there is any quality of his work that merits our unqualified approbation, it is the spirit of fairness and impartiality that pervades the whole. We have sometimes found him careless, and have sometimes thought him in the wrong; but we have not met with an uncandid misrepresentation, an ungenerous sentiment, or a narrow-minded prejudice, in his book."—Edin. Rev., xxx. 140-172.

"Mr. Hallam has not made his work so much a regular history as a characteristic portraiture of the times to which it refers. It has not the sterile dryness of an abridgment, though it does not possess the fertile copiousness of a circumstantial narrative: but it is instructive, luminous, and animated; and it may be pursued with profit as well as amusement."—Lon. Month. Rev., lxxxvii. 1-14, 136-150.

"The most complete and highly-finished of his valuable works. It is a series of finely-drawn historical sketches."—N. Amer. Rev.

"An able and interesting performance, connected in a good measure with our earlier history. . . . His work is a sort of introduction to the earlier histories of the ensuing countries, [France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, and Germany,] and should be read with promptitude and diligence by every one interested in such studies. The notes are full of erudition."—Dublin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825.

"The State of Europe during the Middle Ages is full of information for all who desire to be informed of the political and social condition of those kingdoms and states which arose out of the ruins and ashes of the empire of Rome. To show order emerging from confusion, the decisions of law taking place of those of violence and passion, and a line of defence raised to protect the weak and the peaceable against the strong and the tyrannous, was the task which Hallam assigned to himself; and he has accomplished all he undertook."—Allen Cunningham's Crit. and Biog. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"All the subjects that have been glanced at in these earlier lectures are there [in Hallam's work on the Middle Ages] thoroughly considered by this author with all the patience of an antiquarian and the spirit and sagacity of a philosopher: the French history,—the feudal system,—the history of Italy,—the history of Spain,—the history of Germany,—of the Greeks and Saracens,—the history of ecclesiastical power,—the constitutional history of England,—the Anglo-Saxon and the Anglo-Norman,—afterwards to the end of the civil wars between the Roses,—with a concluding dissertation on the state of society during the Middle Ages. I should have been saved many a moment of fatigue, some almost of despair if these volumes had appeared before I began my lectures."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.: Lect. VIII.

"Mr. Hallam's View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages is indispensable to the historical student."—Warren's Law Studies.

"A work of profound research, and displaying a free and vigorous spirit of inquiry and criticism."—CHAN. ELLER KENT.

"The learned author, in his View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages, investigates, with great ability, the origin and progress of the English Constitution, commencing with the Anglo-Saxons, and carried down to the extinction of the House of Plantagenet. Vide vol. iii. chap. viii. His work entitled The Constitutional History of England from the accession of Henry VII. to the death of George II. is the sequel of that history through a much more important period: the whole of which furnishes a more thorough, learned, and impartial view of the subject than is elsewhere to be found. These two works ought to be in every lawyer's library, and merit to be studied, not merely read."—Hoffman's Leg. Stu.

"Notwithstanding the interesting character of the Aragonese Constitution, and the amplitude of materials for its history, the subject has been hitherto neglected, as far as I am aware, by continental writers. Robertson and Hallam, more especially the latter, have given such a view of its prominent features to the English reader, as must, I fear, deprive the sketch which I have attempted, in a great degree, of novelty."—WM. H. PRESCOTT: Ferdinand and Isabella, 11th ed.; Introd., to vol. i, 124.

"Do you know Hallam? Of course, I need not ask you if you have read his Middle Ages? It is an admirable work, full of research, and does Hallam honour. I know no one capable of having written it, except him; for, admitting that a writer could be found who could bring to the task his knowledge and talents, it would be difficult to find one who united to these his research, patience, and perspicuity of style. The reflections of Hallam are at once just and profound, his language well chosen and impressive. I remember being struck with a passage, where, touching on the Venetians, he says, 'Too blind to avert danger, too cowardly to withstand it, the most ancient government of Europe made not an instant's resistance. The peasants of Unterwald died upon their mountains; the nobles of Venice clung only to their lives.' This is the style in which history ought to be written, if it is wished to impress it on the memory."—LORD BYRON: Lady Blessington's Conversations with Lord B.

2. The Constitutional History of England, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II., 1827, 2 vols. 4to; 7th ed., 1854, 3 vols. 8vo; 8th ed., 1855, 3 vols. cr. 8vo.

Lord Brougham falls into an error, in commenting on the principal theme discussed in this work, hardly to be expected from one who has devoted so much attention to its subject-matter. His lordship assigns as one of his principal reasons for entering at large, in his Political Philosophy, into the earlier stages of the British Constitution, Mr. Hallam's having commenced his work with the reign of Henry VII.:

"His treatise, and that of Lord John Russell, have one great defect in common—they begin with the Tudors. Now, it is quite undeniable that the foundations of our constitution were laid many centuries before the fifteenth; nor can any one hope thoroughly to comprehend it who has not gone back to the earlier times. I have never been able to understand why those able and learned authors have both begun with Henry VII."

But had his lordship not forgotten Chapter VIII. of the Middle Ages? See Mr. Warren's correction of this grave error, Law Studies, 2d ed., 269, 270.

In his disquisitions into the theology, the politics, and the learning of the Middle Ages, Mr. Hallam was not likely to provoke any other criticism than that which was connected with the subjects discussed without reference to prejudice or party feeling. But he could not write the Constitutional History of England without soon proving to himself and to the world that he was walking upon ashes under which the fire was not extinguished:

"Incidens per ignes

Suppositos cineri doloso."—HOR.: Od. II., l. 7.

Mr. Southey, in a review extending over no less than sixty-six pages, rated the historian in no gentle terms for his real or alleged offences against historic veracity. We have room for a brief extract only:

"The book is the production of a decided partisan; presenting not the history itself, but what is called the philosophy of history, and to be received with the more suspicion, because it deals in deductions and not in details. There are many ways in which history may be rendered insidious; but there is no other way by which an author can, with so much apparent good faith, mislead his readers. . . .

"Unto thee

Let thine own times like an old story be,"

is the advice which Donne gives to him who would derive wisdom from the course of passing events. A writer of contemporary history could take no better motto. Mr. Hallam has proceeded upon a system precisely the reverse of this; and carried into the history of the past, not merely the maxims of his own age, as infallible laws by which all former actions are to be tried, but the spirit and the feeling of the party to which he has attached himself, its acrimony and its arrogance, its injustice and its ill-temper."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvii, 194-200.

It is to this review that Wilberforce refers, when he says:

"Southey, a bitter critic, and works Hallam with great acuteness and force."

But audi alteram partem. The critique from which we have just quoted was published in January, 1828, and in the September following there appeared a paper of great brilliancy and power—with its political merits or demerits we have here no concern—in the Edinburgh Review, the production of one who has since himself gained a great name in the walks of History. It will be seen that his estimate of Mr. Hallam's honesty as a historian is very different from that recorded by Mr. Southey:

"Mr. Hallam is, on the whole, far better qualified than any other writer of our time for the office which he has undertaken. He has great industry and great acuteness. His knowledge is extensive, various, and profound. His mind is equally distinguished by the amplitude of its grasp, and by the delicacy of its tact. His speculations have none of that vagueness which is the common fault of political philosophy. On the contrary, they are strikingly practical. They teach us not only the general rule, but the mode of applying it to solve particular cases. In this respect they often remind us of the Discourses of Macchiavelli. . . . His work is eminently judicial. Its whole spirit is that of the bench, not that of the bar. He sums up with a calm, steady, impartiality, turning neither to the right nor to the left, glossing over nothing, exaggerating nothing, while the advocates on both sides are alternately biting their lips to hear their conflicting misstatements and sophisms exposed. On a general survey we do not scruple to pronounce the Constitutional History to be the most impartial book that we ever read."—T. B. MACAULAY: Edin. Rev., xlviii, 96-109.

The following testimony to the same effect, from a very eminent authority, should not be omitted in this connexion:

"Mr. Hallam's Constitutional History of England I must earnestly recommend, for it is a work of great research, great ability, great impartiality, often of very manly eloquence; the work of an enlightened lawyer, an accomplished scholar, and a steady assertor of the best interests of mankind. It is a source of great satisfaction to me that such a work exists, for every page is full of statements and opinions on every topic and character of consequence since the reign of Henry the Seventh; and these sentiments and opinions are so learned and well reasoned, that I am quite gratified to think that the student can now never want a guide and an instructor worthy to conduct and counsel him in his constitutional inquiries. Mr. Hallam is, indeed, a stern and severe critic, and the student may be allowed to love and honour many of our patriots, statesmen, and divines, in a more warm and unqualified manner than does Mr. Hallam; but the perfect calmness of Mr. Hallam's temperament makes his standard of moral and political virtue high, and the fitter on that account to be presented to youthful minds.

"There are objectionable passages, and even strange passages, more particularly in the notes; but they are of no consequence in a work of so vast a range, and of so much merit. And Mr. Hallam may have given offence, which could never have been his intention, to some good men, to whom their establishments are naturally so dear; but I see not how this was to be avoided, if he was to render equal justice to all persons and parties, all sects and churches, in their turn,—and if he was to do his duty, as he has nobly done, to the civil and religious liberties of his country."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., 1828.

A great historian of our own country pays the following high compliment to Mr. Hallam's treatment of one of the principal characters of his History:

"The unprejudiced reader may perhaps agree that the balance of this great queen's [Elizabeth's] good and bad qualities is held with a more steady and impartial hand by Mr. Hallam than any preceding writer."—WM. H. PRESCOTT: Ferdinand and Isabella, 11th ed., iii, 261.

The value of Mr. Hallam's work to the legal student need hardly be enlarged upon; but here we shall address an authority which will be more valued than our own:

"No one can understand or appreciate this admirable work, who has not, before entering upon it, become familiar with at least the leading events of English history; and no one has made any sensible advances towards the enviable character of a sound constitutional lawyer, who is not thoroughly familiar with the work. Not that it is altogether free from error; but where is to be found any other political author exhibiting such a rare union of candour, learning, and sagacity, as characterizes this bold and independent writer?"—Warren's Law Studies, 2d ed., 248, 249.

See Allan Cunningham's Crit. and Biog. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

3. Introduction to the Literature of Europe, in Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries, 1837-39, 1 vols. 8vo; 4th ed., 1854, 3 vols. 8vo; 5th ed., 1855-56, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. In the 4th ed. the text was revised, and such errors as the author discovered were removed. The few additional notes are distinguished by the dates of the publications of the different edits, in the years 1842, '47, and '53.

"The advantages of such a syncretical view of literature as displays its various departments in their simultaneous condition through an extensive period, and in their mutual dependency, seem to manifest to be disputed."—Preface.

Mr. Hallam then proceeds to give a rapid sketch of the bibliography of Literary History.

"The most important single volume that it has for some years been our duty to comment on. By this specimen [vol. I.] Mr. Hallam will confirm the solid and substantial reputation which he had already gained with all the sound and mature judges of literary excellence. By his completion of the work with the same care and in the same spirit, he will enable English literature to least of the first full, impartial, and general view of the simultaneous progress of letters in every part of Europe."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lviii, 29-60; ascribed to Southey, but incorrectly.

Mr. Prescott, noticing the fact that the English have made but slender contributions to the history of foreign literature, remarks:

"The deficiency, indeed, is likely to be supplied, to a certain extent, by the work of Mr. Hallam, now in progress of publication; the first volume of which—the only one which has yet issued from the press—gives evidence of the same curious erudition, acuteness, honest impartiality, and energy of diction, which distinguish the other writings of this eminent scholar. But the extent of his work, limited to four volumes, precludes any thing more than a survey of the most prominent features of the vast subject which he has undertaken."—Review of Chateaubriand's Eng. Lit., N. A. Rev., Oct. 1839.

We quote a few notices of the whole work:

"The most important contribution to literary history which English libraries have received for many years. . . . That his work will be popular we can hardly predict. . . . We have already suggested some defects, to our apprehension, which will materially impede its present success. To these must be added a dry and austere style, uniformly clear, indeed, and English, but sometimes chastised to a degree of tameness, sometimes, though not often, laboriously figurative, and loaded with rather heavy ornament. But most assuredly the reader who does not employ it merely to fill up the leisure of a few hours, but consults it for guidance, and refers to its authority, will never use it without an augmented sense of its value, and respect for its author. He will be struck with the modest simplicity with which its stores of very extensive erudition are displayed. He will be struck with an honesty, even in the mere conduct of the work, rarely found in publications pretending to any thing like the same amount of research."—Edin. Rev., lxxii. 194-226.

"The subject which he has now treated is one of more general interest than those discussed in his previous publications; and as the work was known to embody the labors of many years, it was received with curiosity and respect, and is likely to establish for him a wide and enduring reputation. . . . We close with the expression of gratitude to him for undertaking an important and difficult task, and of respect for the ability, learning, and taste with which it is executed."—FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lvi. 44-50.

"This is a production of the greatest value, and distinguished, like his other work, [on the Middle Ages,] for research, judgment, taste, and elegance."—CHANCELLOR KENT. See Blackwood's Mag., xli. 614; xlix. 150.

No writer can traverse so wide a field of inquiry without offending somebody; and Bishop Monk, the biographer of Bentley, to quote his own language, felt himself "aggrieved" by a criticism of Mr. Hallam's on his (the bishop's) notice of Le Clerc. The correspondence between his lordship and Mr. Hallam on this matter will be found in the London Gent. Mag., 1844, Pt. 2, 157-160. A vol. entitled Literary Essays and Characters; selected from an Introduction to the Literature of Modern Europe, was pub. in London, 1852, 12mo.

We have now quoted a number of testimonies to the value of Mr. Hallam's Literary History; but we should display a strange insensibility did we omit to add our hearty concurrence in the highest commendation which we have recorded. Undoubtedly many of the most brilliant gems of criticism of which our own gallery—the work now in the reader's hands—can boast, will be found credited to the distinguished scholar whose name stands at the head of this article. But, desirous of concluding, as we commenced and have continued, by offering higher tribute than our own to the merits of this eminent writer, and preserving the rule established in our Critical Court of citing the most competent testimony in each case which should be presented for judgment, we shall now adduce the evidence of the historian of Modern Europe, and that of the author of Ferdinand and Isabella, in favour of the annalist of the Middle Ages, the Literature of Europe, and the Constitutional History of England:

"The cold academic style of Robertson may suit the comparative calmness of the eighteenth century, but the fervour and animation of its close communicated itself to the historical works of the next. HALLAM was the first historian whose style gave token of the coming change; his works mark the transition from one age and style of literature to another. In extent and variety of learning, and a deep acquaintance with anti-quarian lore, the historian of the Middle Ages may deservedly take a place with the most eminent writers in that style that Europe has produced; but his style is more imaginative than those of his laborious predecessors, and a fervent eloquence or poetic expression often reveals the ardour which the heart-stirring events of his time had communicated to his disposition."—SIR ARCHAIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815-52, chap. v.

"The most eminent illustrations of the system of historical writing which we have been discussing that have appeared in England in the present century are the works of Mr. Hallam, in which the author, discarding most of the circumstances that go to make up mere narrative, endeavours to fix the attention of the reader on the more important features of constitutional policy, employing his wide range of materials in strict subordination to this purpose."—WM. H. PRESCOTT: N. Amer. Rev., October, 1829.

The following little piece of pleasantry of Sydney Smith's can hardly fail to provoke a smile from the amiable reader: "In his voyage up the Rhine, Campbell met on the steambot the historian of the Middle Ages. 'Hallam is a most excellent man,' said the poet, in one of his letters; 'of great neatness, and of immense research in reading. I believe him to have neither gall nor bitterness; and yet he is a perfect bene-volent!' His powers of study are like those of the scholars of the Alexandrian Academy, whose viscera were alleged to be made of brass. He batters Sydney Smith himself with his provoking accuracy as to matters of fact. Smith once said to me, if Hallam were in the midst of a full assembly of scientific men, and if Euclid were to enter the room with his Elements under his arm, and were to say, Gentlemen, I suppose no one present doubts the truth of the Forty-fifth Proposition of my First Book of Elements, Mr. Hallam would say, Yes, I have my doubts."

"A valuable treatise on philosophic reasoning"

Halleck, Fitz-Greene, an eminent American poet, b. at Guilford, Connecticut, in August, 1795, entered a banking-house in New York in 1813, and resided in that city, engaged in mercantile and kindred pursuits, until 1849, when he returned to his native town in Connecticut, where he now resides. For many years he acted as confidential agent for John Jacob Astor. Mr. Halleck commenced contributing to the papers of the day at an early age, and, when settled in New York, soon became an associate of the wits of the town, comprising the "mob of gentlemen who wrote with ease." In 1819 he made the acquaintance of Joseph Rodman Drake, who was so much pleased with his new friend that he admitted him into partnership in the composition of the Croker Papers, pub. in the New York Evening Post, 1819. The history of these sprightly sallies has been already referred to in our notice of the senior partner of this literary firm. The death of his chosen friend and literary colleague was mourned by Halleck in those exquisitely beautiful lines—

"Green be the turf above thee, Friend of my better days!" &c.

In 1821 Mr. Halleck pub. his longest poem,—Fanny,—a satire upon the literature and politics of the time, in the measure of Don Juan. In 1822 and '23 the author visited Europe; and it is to the reflections engendered by his travels that we are indebted for the poems on Burns and Alnwick Castle, which, with Marco Bozzaris and some other pieces, were pub. in a vol. in 1827. Another edit. of his poems appeared in 1826; a third, with illustrations, in 1847; and a fourth, with additions to the poem Connecticut, in 1852. The table of contents runs as follows: 1. Alnwick Castle. 2. Marco Bozzaris. 3. Burns. 4. Wyoming. 5. On the Death of Joseph Rodman Drake. 6. Twilight. 7. Psalm CXXXII. 8. To *****. 9. The Field of the Grounded Arms. 10. Red Jacket. 11. Love. 12. A Sketch. 13. Domestic Happiness. 14. Magdalen. 15. From the Italian. 16. Translations from the German of Goethe. 17. Woman. 18. A Poet's Daughter. 19. Connecticut. 20. Music. 21. On the Death of Lieut. Allen. 22. Fanny. 23. The Recorder.

Epistles, &c.: 1. To Walter Browne, Esq. 2. To *****. 3. A Fragment. 4. Song by Miss . . . . 5. Song for the Drama of the Spy. 6. Address at the Opening of a New Theatre. 7. The Rhyme of the Ancient Coaster. 8. Lines to her who can understand them. 9. Extracts from an Unpublished Poem. 10. Notes.

When we state that the thirty-two pieces above enumerated are all contained in a single 12mo vol., in large print, comprising but about 4000 lines, the point of the regret so often expressed, that one who can write so well should write so little, will be immediately understood. It is certainly not from want of public appreciation that Mr. Halleck so seldom strikes a lyre from which he evokes such "eloquent music," for few American poets have been so highly lauded by critics, few so often read and ardently admired in the social circles of the land. The narrowness of our limits is continually restricting the exercise of our inclination in the way of quotations; but we are not willing to pass by the name of this graceful and elegant yet at the same time animated and energetic poet, without a few lines of comment:

"There is in his compositions an essential pervading grace, a natural brilliancy of wit, a freedom yet refinement of sentiment, a sparkling flow of fancy, and a power of personification combined with such high and careful finish, and such exquisite nicety of taste, that the larger part of them must be regarded as models almost faultless in the classes to which they belong."—Criswold's Poets and Poetry of America.

"The poems of Fitz-Greene Halleck, although limited in quantity, are perhaps the best-known and most cherished, especially in the latitude of New York, of all American verses. . . . The school-boy and the old Knickerbocker both know them by heart. In his serious poems, he belongs to the same school as Campbell; and in his lighter pieces reminds us of Beppo and the best parts of Don Juan. Fanny, conceived in the latter vein, has the point of a fine local satire gracefully executed. Burns, and the lines on the death of Drake, have the beautiful impressiveness of the liest elegiac verse. Marco Bozzaris is perhaps the best martial lyric in the language; Red Jacket the most effective Indian portrait; and Twilight an apt piece of contemplative verse; while Alnwick Castle combines his grave and gay style with inimitable art and admirable effect."—Henry T. Tuckerman's Sketch of American Lit.ature.

An exquisite American poet, a most unexceptionable judge in the premises, ably justifies Mr. Halleck in those rhythmical inequalities which have sometimes been censured as inartistic and ungraceful. We give a brief extract:

"He is familiar with those general rules and principles which are the basis of metrical harmony; and his own unerring taste has taught him the exceptions which a proper attention to variety demands. He understands that the rivulet is made musical by obstructions in its channel. In no poet can be found passages which flow with more sweet and it mild smoothness; but he knows very well that to make this smoothness perceived, and to prevent it from degenerating into monotony, occasional roughness must be interposed."—WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

"It may be said of his compositions, as it can be affirmed of few American verses, that they have a real innate harmony, something not dependent on the number of syllables in each line, or capable of being dissected out into feet, but growing in them, as it were, and created by the fine ear of the writer. Their sentiments, too, are exalted and ennobling; eminently genial and honest, they stamp the author for a good man and true,—Nature's aristocracy."—Frazer's Magazine.

The late Mr. Rogers was an ardent admirer of Mr. Halleck's poetry, and paid a glowing tribute to his genius in a letter to Washington Irving, read by the latter at a literary dinner in New York in 1837.

We have many testimonies before us to the merits of Mr. Halliwell's productions, but want of space compels us reluctantly to omit them.

The above list exhibits evidence of no ordinary literary industry; but the magnum opus of Mr. Halliwell remains to be mentioned. This is a grand edition of The Works of William Shakespeare, with a new collation of the early editions, all the original novels and tales on which the plays are founded: copious archæological illustrations to each play; and a life of the Poet. This magnificent work is to be completed in 20 folio vols., of which 5 have appeared, (1856,) at a cost of £63. It was at first settled that the cost would be £2 2s. each vol., or £12 in all, but it was subsequently advanced to £63. The edition is limited to 150 copies. The illustrations are to be by, and under the care of, Mr. F. W. Fairholt. This will be indeed the noblest monument to the memory of the illustrious bard. See *Lon. Gent. Hamilton, Major-General Alexander, 1757-1804, one of the most distinguished of the soldiers and statesmen of the American Revolution, was born in the island of Nevis, of which his mother was a native, his father being a Scotchman. At the age of fifteen he was entered as a private student in King's (now Columbia) College. When only seventeen, he pub. a series of admirable essays on the Rights of the Colonies; before he was nineteen, he entered the Revolutionary army as a captain of artillery; in 1777 he became aide-de-camp to General Washington, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; in 1780 he was married to the second daughter of General Schuyler, who survived her husband half a century; in 1782 he was elected a member of Congress from the State of New York; in 1786 he was chosen a member of the Legislature of New York; in 1787 he was a delegate to the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States; in 1788 he pub., in conjunction with Madison and Jay, the celebrated essays entitled The Federalist; in the same year he was a member of the State Convention of New York, summoned to ratify the Constitution proposed for the United States; in 1789 he became Secretary of the Treasury; in 1795 he applied himself to the practice of the law in the city of New York; in 1798 he was, at Washington's request, appointed second in command of the provisional army, summoned to repel an apprehended invasion of the French; on the death of Washington, in 1799, he succeeded to the chief command of the army; on the disbanding of the army he returned to private life, and practised at the Bar until 1804, when, on the 12th of June, his life was terminated by a wound received the day preceding in a duel with Colonel Aaron Burr.

He was a man of extraordinary intellectual capacity, and of great firmness and energy of character; and to no one, with the exception of the illustrious Washington, are the people of the United States more deeply indebted for the republican freedom which they now enjoy. His political essays abound with choice specimens of argumentative rhetoric and logical precision. An edit. of his works, comprising Official Reports, The Federalist, &c., was pub. in 1810, 3 vols. sm. 8vo. His Official and other Papers, edited by Francis L. Hawks, D.D., appeared in 1842, 8vo; and in 1851 a carefully-prepared edit. of his Works, pub. from the original MSS. in the Department of State, and edited by the original son, John C. Hamilton, was issued in 7 ols.

Svo. The edit. of 1810, 3 vols. sm. Svo, must accompany this last edit., as the former contains matter not to be found in the latter. Memoirs of his Life were pub. by his son, John C. Hamilton, in 2 vols. Svo, 1834-40; and Mr. Coleman pub. in 1804, Svo, a Collection of the Facts and Documents relative to the death of Major-General Alexander Hamilton. In Mr. John C. Hamilton's History of the Republic, &c., vol. i., 1858, Svo, will be found a sketch of Hamilton's career. This vol. has been severely criticized. The best-known of his works are the papers entitled The Federalist, a collection of Essays on the American Constitution, pub. in 1788, under the signature of "Publius," in the interval between the publication and the adoption of the Constitution, and designed to explain its merits to the people at large. There are eighty-five of these political essays, and their authorship is distributed as follows:

By Alexander Hamilton: Nos. 1, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 59, 60, 61, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85. Fifty-one Nos.

By James Madison: Nos. 10, 14, 18, 19, 20, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 62, 63. Twenty-nine Nos.

By John Jay: Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 64. Five Nos.

These celebrated essays have elicited enthusiastic commendation on both sides of the water; and indeed it would be difficult to exaggerate the merits of The Federalist:

"It ought to be familiar to the statesmen of every nation."—DE TOCQUEVILLE.

"A work which exhibits an extent and precision of information, a profundity of research, and an acuteness of understanding, which would have done honour to the most illustrious statesmen of ancient or modern times."—Edin. Rev., xii. 471: Review of Hillhouse on Amendment of American Constitution.

"The whole of the letters combined present to us a masterly commentary on the American Constitution, which ought to be placed by the side of Blackstone in the library of every Englishman."—Lon. Month. Rev., cxii. 518: Review of the Federalist.

"It is a work, altogether, which, for comprehensiveness of design, strength, clearness and simplicity, has no parallel—we do not even except or overlook those of Montesquieu and Aristotle—among the political writings of men."—Blackwood's Mag., xvii. 56: American Writers, No. 4.

"No constitution of government ever received a more masterly and successful vindication. I know not, indeed, of any work on the principles of free government that is to be compared, in instruction and intrinsic value, to this small and unpretending volume of the Federalist; not even if we resort to Aristotle, Cicero, Machiavel, Montesquieu, Milton, Locke, or Burke. It is equally admirable in the depth of its wisdom, the comprehensiveness of its views, the sagacity of its reflections, and the fearlessness, patriotism, candour, simplicity, and elegance, with which its truths are uttered and recommended. Mr. Justice Story acted wisely in making the Federalist the basis of his Commentary."—CHANCELLOR KENT: Com. on Amer. Law, ed. 1854, i. 256, 257.

We shall now proceed to quote some testimonies to the merits of Hamilton exclusively, although, indeed, by far the larger share of each of the eulogies cited above belongs by right to him:

"It was from him that the Federalist derived the weight and the power which commanded the careful attention of the country, and carried conviction to the great body of intelligent men in all parts of the Union."—GEORGE FICKES CURTIS: Hist. of the Const. of the U. States, 1854, vol. i. 417. Read Mr. Curtis's observations on the Edits. of the Federalist.

"His are easily distinguished by their superior comprehensiveness, practicalness, originality, and condensed and polished diction."—R. W. GRISWOLD: Life of Hamilton, in The Prose Writers of America.

But to proceed with our promised quotations:
"Hamilton must be classed among the men who have best known the vital principles and fundamental conditions of a government,—not of a government such as this, (France,) but of a government worthy of its mission and of its name. There is not in the constitution of the United States an element of order, of force, or of duration, which he has not powerfully contributed to introduce into it and caused it to predominate."—Guisot's Character and Influence of Washington.

"Of Hamilton, in an especial manner, I admire your warm and characteristic eulogy. I have always believed that his title to renown was as great as you have portrayed it. I never knew him; but I have deemed him a giant among his contemporaries, of whom it might truly be said, lato vertice supra se."—Judge Story to Chancellor Kent, Dec. 22, 1836: Life and Letters of Judge Story, ii. 258. "The model of eloquence and the most fascinating of orators. With all his failings, he possessed a high and ennobled spirit, and acquired an influence from his overwhelming talents which death alone swept away."—JUDGE STORY: Letter to Mrs. Story, Feb. 7, 1810: Life and Letters, i. 196.

In the letter from which we have just quoted, Judge Story refers to an interview which he had with Mrs. Hamilton,—General Hamilton's widow,—in the city of Washington, and the melancholy feelings thereby excited. The death of Hamilton is indeed a sad theme, and nothing can be said in vindication of the fatal step which was the cause of his untimely removal from patriotic usefulness and unbounded honours. How long shall the "public opinion" of fools, braves, and cowards—for of these degraded classes nine-tenths of your duellists and their apologists are composed—have power to terrify such noble characters as Alexander Hamilton into open and impious defiance of the laws of God and man? Yet it is no small satisfaction to know that he deeply regretted his error, and sought reconciliation with his Maker with "unfeigned humiliation and a trembling hope." Immediately before participating in that solemn rite by which the Church reminds the departing believer of the effectual atonement once offered for the sins of men, he declared:

"I have a tender reliance on the mercy of the Almighty through the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ."

He was a careful student of the oracles of Divine Revelation; and, as the author of this Dictionary was assured by his respected widow, his Bible still retains the pencilled indications of the interest excited in his mind by the perusal of particular passages of the Scriptures.

But we do not feel willing to leave the contemplation of his memory without some further quotations to the eminent abilities of this illustrious man:

"The name of Hamilton would have honoured Greece in the age of Aristides. May Heaven, the guardian of our liberty, grant that our country may be fruitful of Hamiltons, and faithful to their glory. . . . Virtue so rare, so pure, so bold, by its very purity and excellence inspired suspicion as a prodigy. His enemies judged of him by themselves; so splendid and arduous were his services, they could not find it in their hearts to believe that they were disinterested."—FISHER AMES: Sketch of the Character of Alexander Hamilton, 1804.

In the following sentence Ames is thought to have admirably expressed the public virtues and social attractions of Hamilton:

"It is not as Apollo, enchanting the shepherds with his lyre, that we deplore him; it is as Hercules, treacherously slain in the midst of his unfinished labours, leaving the world overrun with monsters."

"Melancholy, most melancholy news for America—the premature death of her greatest man, Major-General Hamilton! . . . His most stupendous talents, which set him above rivalry, and his integrity, with which intrigue had not the hardihood to tamper, held him up as the nation's hope and as the terror of the unprincipled."—REV. DR. JOSEPH M. MASON: Letter to a Friend in Scotland, Aug. 11, 1804. And see his Eulogy on Hamilton before the Society of the Cincinnati, in New York.

"Writing to a European correspondent who had taken some exceptions to portions of this Oration in honour of Hamilton, Dr. Mason remarks as follows in defence of the high position which he had ascribed to the soldier-statesman of the Revolution:

"It is very natural that readers on your side of the water should suspect the eulogium to be overcharged. So do some among ourselves; but not one who knew him. I knew him well, and I assure you that what I have said is sober, literal truth. Such a human being I never saw, and probably never shall see in this world."

"In another letter, soon after the calamity of Hamilton's death, he writes:

"The greatest statesman in the Western World, perhaps the greatest man of the age, has been cut off in the 48th year of his age by the murderous arm of Vice-President Burr. The death of Major-General Alexander Hamilton has created a waste in the sphere of intellect and probity which a century will hardly fill up. He has left none like him: no second, no third, nobody to put us in mind of him. You can have no conception of such a man unless you knew him."

"That the Eulogy of Hamilton as pronounced by Dr. Mason was not exaggerated in its admiring portraiture is the testimony of a judicial mind like that of John Marshall. In acknowledging the receipt of a copy of Dr. M.'s oration, that pure-minded jurist wrote as follows:

"I lament sincerely the loss of the great man whose character you have drawn so well. While I truly deplore his fate, I may be permitted to indulge a hope that it may have some tendency to cast odium on a practice which deserves every censure you have bestowed upon it."

Dr. Mason was engaged for a number of years in preparing materials for a life of Hamilton, but never completed his design. See Van Vechten's Life of Dr. Mason, N. York, 1856.

The marvellous effects of the genius of Hamilton, when applied to the disordered finances of the young American republic, exhibit one of the most remarkable evidences of his pre-eminent abilities:

"At the time when our government was organized we were without funds, though not without resources. To call them into action and establish order in the finances, Washington sought for splendid talents, for extensive information, and, above all, be sought for sterling, incorruptible integrity. All these he found in Hamilton."—GOVERNOR MORRIS: Federal Oration by the dead body of Hamilton.

"He smote the rock of the national resources, and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth. He touched the dead corpse of the Public Credit, and it sprang upon its feet. The fabled birth of Minerva from the brain of Jove was hardly more sudden or more perfect than the financial system of the United States as it burst forth from the conception of Alexander Hamilton."—DANIEL WEBSTER: Speech at a Public Dinner in New York, Feb. 1831.

The vital energy thus infused into the financial system of the United States by Hamilton did not expire with the source from which it drew its life. So far from this is the truth, that, to quote the language of Mr. Gallatin, Secretaries of the Treasury have since enjoyed a sincere, the genius and labours of Hamilton having created and arranged every thing that was necessary for the perfect and easy discharge of their duties. Indeed, the rapidity with which Hamilton planned, digested, and executed his designs, was one of his most striking peculiarities:

"He was capable of intense and effectual application, as is abundantly proved by his public labours. But he had a rapidity and clearness of conception in which he may not have been equalled. One who knew his habits of study said of him, that when he had a serious object to accomplish his practice was to reflect on it previously; and, when he had gone through this labour, he retired to sleep, without regard to the hour of night, and, having slept six or seven hours, he rose, and, having taken strong coffee, seated himself at his table, where he would remain six, seven, or eight hours; and the product of his rapid pen required little correction for the press."—WILLIAM SULLIVAN: Sketch of Hamilton, from the Familiar Letters.

"Where, among all the speculative philosophers in political science whom the world has seen, shall we find a man of greater acuteness of intellect, or more capable of devising a scheme of government which should appear theoretically perfect? Yet Hamilton's unquestionable genius for political disquisition and construction was directed and restrained by a noble generosity, and an unerring perception of the practicable and the expedient, which enabled him to serve mankind without attempting to force them to his own plans, and without compelling them into his own views."—GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS: Hist. of the Amer. Constit., 1854, vol. i. 287, 288.

"Among all the remarkable men of the Revolution, we know of no one who, for the attributes which usually mark genius, was more distinguished. He was endowed with a singularly comprehensive mind, which enabled him to originate forms of government and systems of administration, whilst he united with it an intrepidity and an energy equal to the task of putting them in execution."—CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS: N. Amer. Rev., liii. 70: Review of the Madison Papers.

"In Hamilton's death the Federalists and the country experienced a loss second only to that of Washington. Hamilton possessed the same rare and lofty qualities, the same just balance of soul, with less, indeed, of Washington's severe simplicity and awe-inspiring presence, but with more of warmth, variety, ornament, and grace. If the Doric in architecture may be taken as the symbol of Washington's character, Hamilton's belonged to the same grand style as developed in the Corinthian.—if less impressive, more winning. If we add Jay for the Ionic, we have a trio not to be matched, in fact not to be approached, in our history, if indeed in any other. Of earth-born Titans, as terrible as great,—now angels, and now foeds and serpents.—there are everywhere enough. Of the serene and benign sons of the celestial gods, how few at any time have walked the earth!"—RICHARD HILDRETH: Hist. of the U. States.

"Next to Washington stands the name of Hamilton on the roll of American fame and in its demands on the gratitude of his country. We, at least, have grown gray in that faith, and the events of every succeeding day serve but to confirm our early and unchanged creed. The working of the political institutions of our country, whether for good or evil, has never ceased to indicate a prophetic mind in Hamilton."—FRANCIS L. HAWKS, D.D.: N. York Review, viii. 121: Review of John C. Hamilton's Life of Alexander Hamilton.

Read this eloquent sketch of the public character of Hamilton. See also Amer. Quar. Rev., xv. 311; Walsh's Ann. Rev., i. 201; ii. 1; Dem. Rev., xi. 142; Chris. Exam., xxix. 243; McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ.

The conjunction thus presented of the names of Washington and Hamilton affords us an opportunity of quoting the glowing tribute of the latter to the merits of his illustrious friend and compatriot:

"When the decease of the illustrious and beloved commander-in-chief in 1799 was officially announced to the army of the United States by General Hamilton, who of all his honoured and trusted associates stood highest, I think, in the affections and confidence of the chief, it was truly said by him in his general orders, that 'the voice of praise would in vain endeavour to exalt a name unrivalled in the lists of true glory.'"—EDWARD EVERETT: Oration on Washington, delivered in many of the principal cities of the Union in 1856.

But we have already far transcended the limits which we had assigned for the extent of this article. Yet we feel unwilling to conclude without gratifying the reader by quoting for his benefit the following letter from Mr. George Ticknor, of Boston, the distinguished author of the History of Spanish Literature, to Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, the author of the History of the Constitution of the United States:

"While these sheets are passing through the press, Mr. Ticknor writes to me as follows: 'One day in January, 1819, talking with Prince Talleyrand, in Paris, about his visit to America, he expressed the highest admiration of Mr. Hamilton, saying, among other things, that he had known nearly all the marked men of his time, but that he had never known one, on the whole, equal to him. I was much surprised and gratified with the remark; but still, feeling that, as an American, I was in some sort a party concerned by patriotism in the compliment, I answered, with a little reserve, that the great military commanders and the great statesmen of Europe had dealt with larger masses and wider interests than he had. "Mais, monsieur," the Prince instantly replied, "Hamilton avait deviné l'Europe."'

Hamilton, Count Anthony, d. at St. Germain's, 1720, aged 74, a native of Ireland, of an ancient Scotch family, followed both Charles II. and James I. into exile. He was distinguished as a wit, a man of fashion, and an author. He wrote—1. Mémoires du Comte de Grammont, 1713, 12mo. 2. Le Béliér; Conte, 1749, 4to. 3. Les Quatre Faucardins et Zénéide; Contes, 1749, 12mo. 4. Histoire de Fleur d'Épine; Conte, 1749, 12mo. There have been several edits. of the Mémoires of Grammont, and of the collected works of the author.

"The best edition of Hamilton's Works (of course including these Mémoires) is by Renouard, in 1812, 4 vols. 8vo."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., q. v.; and see also, for an account of edits., Lowndes's Bibl. Man., and Watt's Bibl. Brit.

The edit. of the Mémoires of Grammont, in English, pub. in 1811, 2 vols. 8vo, with 64 portraits, and notes by Sir Walter Scott, is highly valued. The Eastern Tales of Grammont were intended to ridicule the passion which prevailed at the time for marvellous fictions:

"It is possible that Count Anthony Hamilton may have written those tales which have made him famous before the end of the century, though they were published after. But these, with many admirable strokes of wit and invention, have too forced a tone in both these qualities; the labour is too evident, and thrown away on such trifling, excites something like contempt; they are written for an exclusive coterie, not for the world; and the world in all such cases will sooner or later take its revenge. Yet Hamilton's Tales are incomparably superior to what followed."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

The Mémoires of Grammont are now much better known than the Tales.

"The Mémoires of Grammont, by Anthony Hamilton, scarcely challenge a place as historical, but we are now looking more at the style than the intrinsic importance of books. Every one is aware of the peculiar felicity and fascinating gaiety which they display."—HALLAM: ubi supra.

"A classic work, the delight of every man and woman of taste."—GIBBON.

Mr. Gibbon forgets to tell us what kind of taste he refers to: his own was not always unimpeachable. Dr. Dibdin's comment upon this volume should not be omitted in this connexion:

"One hardly knows wherefore, but the leaves of this book are turned over by hands and perused by eyes which are forbidden to be exercised on other books of comparatively less mischief. It may indeed be called, in too many instances, a privileged volume of systematic profanity."—Lib. Comp.

A new ed. of the Mémoires was pub. in 1846, 12mo; and a new ed. of the Fairy Tales, in 1849, sq., (Bohn's Lib.): trans. from the French by M. Lewis, H. T. Ryde, and C. Kenny.

"These tales appear to us cumbersome and entangled, their satire insipid, and their meaning rather unmeaning. Measured against Voltaire's philosophical stories, or Dean Swift's bitter caricatures, they are pigmies indeed; and their popularity with him who loved to quote them [Horace Walpole] is but another proof of the factitious value with which genius can invest that which is essentially mediocre—at once giving to trifles the importance and turning them to the use of treasures."—*Len. Hamilton, James, "author of the Hamiltonian system," excited much attention in the learned world by his publications (Lon., 1824, &c.) of interlinear English translations of books in various languages. The authority of Ascham, Cardinal Wolsey, Erasmus, Milton, and Locke, are adduced in support of the excellence of the theory:

"We do amiss to spend seven or eight years in scraping together so much miserable Latin and Greek as may be learned otherwise easily and delightfully in one year."—JOHN MILTON: Letter to Horrib.

"When, by this way of interlining Latin and English one with another, he has got a moderate knowledge of the Latin tongue, he may then be advanced a little farther. Nor let the objection that he will then know it only by rote frighten any one. This, when well considered, is not of any moment against, but plainly for, this way of learning a language. The languages are only to be learned by rote; and he that speaks them well has neither rule but that."—JOHN LOCKE: Essay on a System of Classical Instruction.

The Hamiltonian system is warmly defended, and we think very ably, by the Rev. Sydney Smith, in the Edin. Rev., xlv. 47-69; repub. in his Miscellanies. We quote the conclusion of this amusing and yet convincing essay:

"In fine, we are strongly persuaded that, the time being given, this system will make better scholars; and, the degree of scholarship being given, a much shorter time will be needed. If there is any truth in this, it will make Mr. Hamilton one of the most useful men of his age; for, if there is any thing which fills reflecting men with melancholy and regret, it is the waste of mortal time, parental money, and puerile happiness, in the present method of pursuing Latin and Greek."

"It is undoubtedly as we have said, in point of literary execution, one of the best that have yet appeared upon the United States. The style is not deficient in strength or spirit, and evinces at times a remarkable power of description, as in the passages on the Falls of Niagara and the river Mississippi. On the other hand, it is far from being uniformly so pure and correct as might be wished,—is often unparadoxably coarse, and is pervaded throughout by an affected pertness and a silly air of pretension, which are offensive from the beginning, and finally become by repetition completely nauseous. . . That a spirit of unjust depreciation is the one that predominates in his work, is—as we shall have occasion abundantly to show—very certain."—A. H. EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xxxiii. 210-270.

Hamilton, William, 1704-1754, an early Scotch poet, was a native of Ayrshire, and a man of fortune and family. In 1748, Glasgow, 8vo, an ed. of his poems was pub. without his consent, and subsequently reprinted. The first genuine ed. was pub. by his friends in 1760, Edin., sm. 8vo. The best-known composition of his is The Braes of Yarrow. This poem elicited Wordsworth's three pieces—Yarrow Unvisited, Yarrow Visited, and Yarrow Revisited.

"Hamilton's mind is pictured in his verses. They are the easy and careless effusions of an elegant fancy and a chastened taste; and the sentiments they convey are the genuine feelings of a tender and susceptible heart, which perpetually owned the dominion of some favourite mistress but whose passion generally evaporated in song, and made no serious or permanent impression."—LORD WOODHOUSELEE.

Hamilton, Sir William, Bart., of Preston, of the ancient Scottish family of this name, one of the most distinguished of modern metaphysicians, was born at Glasgow in 1788, and educated at Balliol College, Oxford, where he obtained first-class honours. In 1813 he was called to the Scottish Bar, but never engaged in extensive practice. In 1820 he was an unsuccessful competitor with John Wilson for the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh; but in 1821 he was appointed Professor of Universal History in that institution, and in 1836 was called to the chair of Logic and Metaphysics, which he still retains, (1856.) He is also Her Majesty's Solicitor for Teinds, in Scotland, a Corresponding Member of the Institute of France, and an Associate of many learned bodies. See Men of the Time, Lon., 1856. A brief history of Sir William's contributions to Mental Philosophy will be found in Rich's Cyclopaedia, Lon. and Glasg., 1854. In 1852 (Lon. and Edin., 8vo, pp. 758) there appeared Discussions on Philosophy and Literature, Education and University Reform, chiefly from the Edinburgh Review; Corrected, Vindicated, Enlarged in Notes and Appendices, 2d ed., 1853, 8vo. Repub., N. York, 1855, 8vo, with an Introductory Essay on the history of philosophical speculation, by Robert Turnbull, D.D.

His principal essays have been trans. into French by W. Peisse, and into Italian by S. Lo Gatto. Sir William pub. in 1846, Lon. and Edin., 8vo, pp. 914, the works of Thos. Reid, D.D., now fully collected, with Selections from his Unpublished Letters, Prefaces, Notes, and Supplementary Dissertations, 3d ed., 1852. He is now engaged in the preparation of the works of Dugald Stewart; Vol. VIII. was pub. in April, and Vol. IX. in May, 1856. (Sir William did not live to complete his editorial labours; see conclusion of this article, and see also Lon. Athenæum, May 10, 1856, and Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1856.) A vol. entitled The Philosophy of Sir William Hamilton, arranged and edited by O. W. Wight, was pub. in N. York in 1853, 8vo; 3d ed., 1855. This vol. is compiled from the Supp. Disserts. on Reid, some of the foot-notes to Reid, and a portion of the Philos. Discussions. Dr. James Walker, President of Harvard College, has pub. Reid's Essays on the Intellectual Powers; abridged, with Notes and Illustrations from Sir Wm. Hamilton and others, Bost., 12mo. It is a matter of regret that the limited space to which we are necessarily confined precludes us from quoting largely from the enthusiastic commendations before us of the distinguished abilities and profound erudition of this eminent philosopher. In an interesting paper by De Quincey, giving an account of his recollections of Sir William's early reputation for general knowledge, he remarks:

"The immensity of Sir William's attainments was best laid open by consulting him (or by hearing him consulted) upon intellectual difficulties, or upon schemes literary and philosophical. Such applications, come from what points of the compass they would, found him always prepared. Nor did it seem to make any difference whether it were the erudition of words or things that was needed."—Essays on Philosophical and other Men of Letters, l. 35, Edin., 1854.

"We regard Sir Wm. Hamilton as the profoundest analyst who has appeared since Aristotle; and his erudition, both in its extent and in its exactness, is perfectly provoking."—O. W. WIGHT: Trans. of Cousin's Hist. of Mod. Philos., ii. 335, N. York, 1854.

"Sir Wm., though metaphysically the most formidable man in Europe, is an humble Christian; though the most learned of men, he is ready to bow before the spirit that informed the mind of Paul."—W. WARR; Introduction to his edit. of the Philosophy of Sir William Hamilton, p. 13, 18-5.

"It would be difficult to name any contributions to a review which display such a desperate command of all the resources of logic and metaphysics as his articles in the Edinburgh Review on Cousin, Dr. Brown, and Bishop Whately. Apart from their scientific value, they should be read as specimens of intellectual power. They evince more intense strength of understanding than any other writings of the age; and in the blended merits of their logic, rhetoric, and learning, they may challenge comparison with the best works of any British metaphysician. He seems to have read every writer ancient and modern, on logic and metaphysics, and is conversant with every philosophical theory, from the lowest form of materialism to the most abstract development of idealism; and yet his learning is not so remarkable as the thorough manner in which he has digested it and the perfect command he has of all its stores. Every thing that he comprehends, no matter how abstruse, he comprehends with the utmost clearness and employs with consummate skill. He is altogether the best-trained reasoner on abstract subjects of his time."—L. P. WHIPPLE; Essays and Reviews, ii. 117-122, Bost., 1851; and in N. Amer. Rev., lxi. 485-489.

"Sir William Hamilton has attained to the very highest distinction as a philosopher, and in some respects he is decidedly superior to any of his illustrious predecessors,—Reid, Stuart, or Brown. With a remarkable power of analysis and discrimination he combines great decision and elegance of style, and a degree of erudition that is almost without a parallel."—Edinburgh Review.

"We know not any other writer who has proved in how great a degree books may stimulate the intellect into independent action, nor any recent philosopher who has interpreted the theories of the past and the present less biased by an exaggerated opinion of the exclusive importance of history, or by preconceptions of the historic course of speculation in its manifold phases in each successive age."—N. Brit. Rev., xviii. 191-213.

"The slightest perusal of Sir William's philosophical writings will be sufficient to convince the reader that he is in intercourse with a mind of the most extraordinary comprehension and acuteness. He combines in a degree unequalled since the time of Aristotle (of whom, indeed, he is a devout, though not a blind and indiscriminating, worshipper) the power of analysis and generalization. . . . The degrees in which these two counter-powers of analysis and generalization exist in any mind together with their relative proportion, determines a man's philosophical character."—Brit. Quar. Rev., xvi. 47-51.

The remarkable erudition which has rendered the name of Sir William Hamilton so famous is brought into good service when engaged in the illustration and vindication of his philosophical tenets:

"In the first of the citations with which some of his essays are overgrown it would be difficult to put out one which is either inappropriate or superfluous, except that the point being already established, it might be regarded as a needless accumulation of evidence."—N. Amer. Rev., lxxvi. 55-103.

An authority entitled to be heard with respect does not hesitate to give the following verdict respecting Sir William's Dissertations, contained in his edit. of Reid's writings:

"On the whole, we cannot but regard these dissertations as the most valuable contribution to the progress of a true philosophy in our country, within the present century."—Morell's Hist. of Mod. Philos.

The author of the article in the British Quarterly Review from which we have given some quotations, refers to the great respect entertained on the Continent of Europe for the philosophical character of the subject of this notice, and cites in evidence the following passages:

"Il n'est pas peut-être en Europe un homme qui possède une connaissance aussi complète et aussi minutieuse, une intelligence aussi profonde des livres, des systèmes et des philosophes d'Allemagne. . . . L'érudition de M. Hamilton n'est pas cette érudition morte qui s'occupe plus des livres que des idées, et qui étouffe l'esprit philosophique au lieu de le nourrir; c'est une érudition active, qui laisse à la pensée toute son indépendance; elle n'est pas à elle-même sa propre fin, mais seulement un instrument pour la recherche de la vérité. Quoique infiniment variée, car elle embrasse presque tout le champ des sciences morales et rationnelles et de la littérature générale, elle est en même temps complète et profonde, principalement en philosophie ancienne et moderne et en matière d'instruction publique. Peu d'hommes en Europe sont aussi familiers avec la philosophie, et en particulier avec Aristote."—M. FESSE; Prof. to Fragmens de Philosophie par Sir Wm. Hamilton; pp. lxxxii, lxxxiii.

When engaged in the preparation of the above article, but a few days since, we little thought that the illustrious philosopher to whom it is devoted would have ceased from his labours ere our tribute saw the light. It is, however, "so written": Sir William Hamilton died of congestion of the brain, after ten days' illness, on the 6th day of May, 1856, at his residence, Great King Street, Edinburgh. We are glad to learn that his lectures on logic and metaphysics are in a state of preparation for the press. They are announced for 1859, Edin. and Boston, to be edited by Prof. Mansel and Mr. Veitch. The death of this eminent scholar and profound philosopher painfully reminds us of the large number of those recorded in its pages who have exchanged time for eternity since we commenced this voluminous record of those who have sought to instruct or amuse their fellow-pilgrims in a world of trial and of temptation, of folly and of wisdom, of sorrow and of joy.

As summer and winter, seed-time and harvest, have still found us, year after year, engaged upon the present work, we have at times thought it not improbable that we also might be added to the long list, already chronicled, of those who left unfinished monuments of good intentions; whose devices were arrested by the "inexorable hour," and whose "purposes"—to use the affecting language of the patriarch—"were broken off" in the midst.

Hamilton, William Gerard, M.P., 1729-1796, a native of London, who held several important political posts, made in the House of Commons, Nov. 13, 1755, that splendid display of eloquence which has given him the name of SINGLE-SPEECH HAMILTON. But, indeed, he made a second great speech in the month of February. Hamilton was one of the many to whom without a shadow of probability the Letters of Junius were attributed. He was educated at Oxford, and when young wrote some poetry, which he printed—but never published—in a quarto volume, 1757, 4to. These were subsequently pub. by Mr. Malone. After his death there appeared, pub. from his MSS., Parliamentary Logick: to which are subjoined Two Speeches delivered in the H. of C. of Ireland, and other Pieces, &c., Lon., 1808, Svo. This collection contains an Essay on the Corn Laws, by Dr. Saml. Johnson, never before printed. A review of this vol. by Lord Jeffrey will be found in the Edin. Rev., xv. 163-175. The reviewer considers it rather remarkable that a "short practical treatise in parliamentary oratory, by a man who was long popularly supposed to have rivalled the eloquence of Chatham, and to have guided the pen of Junius," should have made such a "feeble impression on the public." Our surprise, however, will be somewhat diminished when we observe the character which he gives of this production:

"In addition to the other causes of repulsion to which we have alluded, the style of the work, we ought to observe, is extremely affected and peculiar. Sometimes the author mingles the pregnant brevity of Bacon, but without his force or felicity. At other times he emulates the obscurity and harsh technical brevity of Aristotle, but without his science or accuracy. On one occasion he affects to give general and sweeping maxims; at another, he enters into the most minute details and suggestions. Now and then he is cunning and sagacious; and very frequently quite frivolous or stupid."

Dr. Francis Lieber, referring to this work in his treatise on Civil Liberty and Self-Government, remarks,

"The copy which I own belonged to Dr. Thomas Cooper. That distinguished man has written the following remark on the fly-leaf: 'This book contains the theory of deception in parliamentary debate; how to get the better of your opponent, and how to make the worse appear the better reason. It is the well-written work of a hackney and politician. . . . The counterpart to it is the admirable tract of Mr. Jeremy Bentham on Parliamentary Logic, the book of Eulacius. No politician ought to be ignorant of the one book or the other. They are well worth (not perusing, but) studying.'—T. C."—Vol. ii., p. 268.

Dr. Johnson had a great esteem for Hamilton, and, says Boswell, paid his conversation this high compliment:

"I am very unwilling to be left alone, sir, and therefore I go with my company down the first pair of stairs, in some hopes that they may, perhaps, return again; I go with you, sir, as far as the street door."—Life of Johnson.

Hammond, Henry, D.D., 1605-1660, a native of Chertsey, Surrey, after preparatory studies at Eton, was sent to Magdalen Coll. Oxford, and was elected Fellow in 1625; Rector of Peshurst, Kent, 1633; Archdeacon of Chichester, 1643; Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, 1645, and Sub-dean, 1648. Being warmly attached to the royal cause, he was ejected by the Parliamentary Visitors. At the Restoration Charles II. intended to nominate him to the bishopric of Worcester, but he died whilst preparing for his journey to London. Charles I. declared that Hammond was the most natural orator he ever heard. His works—among which are a number in defence of the Church of England against Romanists and other Dissenters—were collected and pub. by his amanuensis, Wm. Fulman, in 4 vols. fol., 1674-84: a collection of his Letters (nineteen in number) was pub. by Mr. Peck, 1739, 8vo; his Life, by Bishop Fell, 1661, 12mo; reprinted in 1806, and in 1849;—also in Wordsworth's Eccles. Biog., iv. 213;—and a new ed. of his Miscellaneous Theological Works was pub. in the Lib. of Anglo-Cath. Theol., Oxf., 1847-51; 3 vols. in 4, 8vo. New ed. of his Parænesis; or, Seasonable Exhortatory, edited by Manning, 1841, 8vo. The following are his best known productions. 1. A Practical Catechism, Lon., 1644, '48, 4to. A vindication of the same, 1648, 4to; 1700, 8vo; 16th ed., in the new ed. of his Miscellaneous Works, 1847, vol. i.

"Hammond's Catechism is an excellent explanation of the duties of our religion."—Dr. Wotton.

"A book of great use; but not to be begun with as too many do. It does not cure a good deal of previous study before the force of his reasonings is apprehended; but when one is ready for it, it is a rare book, and states the grounds of morality and of our duty upon true principles."—BISHOP BURNET. And see WALCHLI BIBLE, Theolog. Selecta.

2. Serms., 1614, fol. See vol. iv. (1684) of his collected works, and vol. iii. (1847) of the new ed. of his Miscellaneous Works. 3. Paraphrases of the Old and Annotations upon the New Testament, 1653, '56, 8vo; 1659, '71, '75, '79, '81, 1702, fol. The last is the best of the old eds. New ed., 1845, 4 vols. 8vo. The Annotations form vol. iii. (1675) of his collected works. In 1698 (Amster., fol.) Le Clerc trans. it into Latin, with animadversions. Also pub. Franckf., 1714, 2 vols. fol. These were trans. into English, and pub. as a Supp. in 1699, 4to. A Defence of Hammond against Le Clerc appeared in 1699, to which Le Clerc replied. Both of these books should be added to the Annotations. Dr. Doddridge preferred Le Clerc's edit. of Hammond in Latin to the original. We give some opinions of the Annotations:

"Hammond was a man of very considerable learning and piety, alloyed with a portion of superstition. He often succeeds in illustrating the force and meaning of the Greek words and phrases of the New Testament. His stock of classical and rabbinical information was very respectable, and furnished him with some valuable illustrations. He was a moderate Arminian in doctrinal sentiment; a great stickler for the divine origin of episcopacy; and held some peculiar notions about the Gnostics, to whom he supposes there are many more allusions in the New Testament than any one else is likely to find."—ORNE'S B. B. B.

One of the most excellent of Biblical critics complains that Hammond

"Finds the Gnostics everywhere, which is his principal fault; many of Le Clerc's animadversions upon these places are very good; and his edition of his book in Latin I think much preferable to the original."—Dr. DODDRIDGE.

Orme remarks that Le Clerc's Supplement, 1699, 4to, "Is necessary to complete Hammond, and contains many things worth reading."

Mr. Bickersteth gives us his opinion of both: "Valuable for criticism, but deficient in evangelical views. Le Clerc wrote many additions with Socinian tendencies."—CHRISTIAN STUDENT.

"Le Clerc has observed, that Hammond in his Annotations on the New Testament borrowed largely from Grotius and Ipi-scopus, and Tillotson has been called a disciple of the latter."—BISHOP WATSON.

A late eminent modern authority remarks that Hammond's work is "In great and growing reputation. There are many good criticisms, but many that are much mistaken."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

Girlestone says that he "Gives us the result of laborious study."

"Hammond excels in learned criticism to be read 'cum grano salis.'"—Dr. E. WILLIAMS.

"I would recommend Lowth and Patrick on the Old Testament, and Hammond on the New."—Dr. SAMUEL JOHNSON.

"He [Dr. Johnson] was extremely fond of Dr. Hammond's works, and sometimes gave them as a present to young men going into orders. He also bought them for the library at Streatham."—Boswell's Johnson, MS. note by J. O. C.

"The Paraphrase and Annotations of Hammond on the New Testament give a different colour to the Epistles of St. Paul from that which they display in the hands of Beza and the other theologians of the sixteenth century."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

4. Paraphrase and Annotations upon the Book of Psalms, 1659, '83, fol. This work is in vol. iv. (1681) of his collected works. New ed. by Brauer, 1850, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The notes are most learned, and embrace many things which are omitted by others, on which account Hammond is to be reckoned among the best interpreters of the Psalms."—WALCH.

"I think his plan of interpretation is the right one; he endeavours first to give the literal sense, and thence deduces the mystical."—BISHOP LOWTH.

"The substance of the remarks on the New Testament is applicable to the Annotations on the Psalms. There is a great deal of very dry criticism, which does not interest the reader much in the subject of these sacred compositions. Hence this work is less known and respected than the former."—ORNE'S Bibl. Bib.

"Dr. Hammond's notes are exceedingly valuable, and contain many learned observations that had escaped preceding commentators on the Book of Psalms."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

"Of use chiefly for its critical hints."—Williams's C. P.

"A valuable critical exposition."—Bickersteth's C. S.

5. A Pacific Discourse of God's Grace and Decrees, 1660, 8vo.

"Written in a good spirit on the Arminian side, endeavouring to shew that Bishop Sanderson accorded with him."—Bickersteth's C. S.

6. Paraphrases and Annotations upon the X. first Chapters of the Proverbs, 1683, fol. This forms vol. iv. (1684) of his collected works.

"Great were his natural abilities, greater his acquired, and in the whole circle of arts he was most accurate. He was eloquent in the tongues, exact in ancient and modern writers, was well vers'c in philosophy, and better in philology, most learn'd in school divinity, and a great master in church antiquity, made up of fathers, councils, ecclesiastical historians, and liturgies, as may be at large seen in his most elaborate works."—Athen. Ocean.

"His death was an unspeakable loss to the church; for, as he was a man of great learning, and of most eminent merit, he having been the person that during the bad times had maintained the cause of the church in a very singular manner, so he was a very moderate man in his temper, though with a high principle, and would probably have fallen into healing counsels. He was also much set on reforming abuses, and for raising the clergy to a due sense of the obligations they lay under."—BISHOP BERNET.

"He was the tutelar angel to keep many a poor royalist from famishing; it being verily believed that he yearly gave away more than two hundred pounds."—Fulton's Worthies.

"Dr. Hammond had extended learning and real piety, and is valuable for criticism and antiquity; but his views are far from the simplicity of the principles of the Reformation. He is not sound on justification by faith; righteousness by faith in Christ has ever been a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence. Rom. ix. 30-33.

"Yet one golden sentence of his deserves recording: 'O what a glorious thing, how rich a prize for the expense of a man's whole life, were it that he were the instrument of rescuing one soul from ruin!'"—Biebersteth's C. S.

Hammond, James, M.P., 1710?–1742, second son of Anthony Hammond, M.P., cherished an unfortunate—because unavailing—passion for Miss Dashwood, which sought relief in his Love Elegies, pub. after his death with a recommendatory preface by Lord Chesterfield. But Dr. Beattie insists on it that Hammond was not in love when he wrote these elegies: they are, indeed, principally translations from Tibullus. Poetical Works, Glasg., 1787, 8vo. Reprinted in vol. xi. of Johnson's and Chalmers's Eng. Poets, and bound up in the same vol. with Collins's poems in Bell's pocket ed.

"Where there is fiction, there is no passion; he that describes himself as a shepherd, and his Næra or Delia as a shepherdess, and talks of goats and lambs, feels no passion. He that courts his mistress with Roman imagery deserves to lose her; for she may with good reason suspect his sincerity."—Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Eng. Poets.

This is about as wise as are many other of the lexicographer's oracular decisions.

"Hammond was a young gentleman who appears to have fallen in love about the year 1740, and who translated Tibullus into English verse to let his mistress and the public know of it."—Hazlitt's Lect. on the Eng. Poets.

We must not forget to give Dr. Hampden credit for his able articles on Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle, in the Encyclopædia Britannica, and the review of the writings of Thomas Aquinas and the scholastic philosophy in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana. See a notice by Sir William Hamilton of the article on Aristotle's Philosophy in the Edinburgh Review for April, 1833; also pub. in Sir William's Discussions on Philosophy, &c. Sir William remarks that

"Dr. Whately's errors relative to Induction are, however, surpassed by those of another able writer, Mr. Hampden, in regard both to that process itself, and to the Aristotelian exposition of its nature."

The review of the writings of Aquinas and the scholastic philosophy has been highly commended by a very eminent authority:

"Dr. Hampden, in his Life of Thomas Aquinas and view of the scholastic philosophy, published in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, has the merit of having been the only Englishman, past or present, so far as I know, since the revival of letters, who has penetrated far into the wilderness of scholasticism."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, vol. i. 14, n.; see also p. 8, n. 13.

As regards the celebrated controversy which has made the name of Dr. Hampden so famous over the ecclesiastical world, we of course have no right to express an opinion in these pages. Indeed, we do not profess to have made any attempt to master so hydra-headed a subject. But, for the benefit of those who have more curiosity or more leisure than ourselves, we append the following list of publications upon this quæstio vexata.

1. Letters to the Archbishop of Canterbury, by Jortin Redivivus, 3d ed., 1836, 8vo, pp. 40. 2. State of Parties in Oxford, 1836, 8vo, pp. 61. 3. Elucidations of Dr. Hampden's Theolog. Statements, 1836, 8vo, pp. 47. 4. Corresp. between Dr. Hampden and the Archbishop of Canterbury, 2d ed., 1838, pp. 38. 5. Statements of Christian Doctrine from the pub. Writings of Dr. Hampden, 1836, pp. 26, 6. Dr. Hampden's Theolog. Statements and the Thirty-Nine Articles Compared, 1836, pp. 62. 7. Dr. Hampden's Past and Present Statements Compared, 1836, pp. 22. 8. The Official and Legal Proceedings connected with the Appointment of Dr. Hampden to the see of Hereford; the numerous Extracts from the Canonists collated with the original authorities and translated, with Notes and an Appendix, 1848, 8vo. See also the following articles in periodicals: 9. Edin. Rev., lxxiii. 225. 10. Brit. and For. Rev., xv. 169. 11. N. Brit. Rev., viii. 256. 12. Blackw. Mag., xxxix. 425, 428, 431, 468. 13. Fraser's Mag., xxxvii. 105. 14. Ecler. Rev., 4th Ser., xxiii. 2221. 15. N. Haven Church Rev., i. 246.

Dr. Southey partook of the indignation which was excited by the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the Regius Professorship, and thus expresses himself in a letter to Herbert Hill:

"James H.'s conduct in obtruding a Romish president upon Magdalen was not worse than that of the present ministry in appointing Dr. Hampden to the professorship of divinity. If they had given him any other preferment, even a bishopric, it would have been only one proof among many that it is part of their policy to promote men of loose opinions; but to place him in the office which he now holds was an intended insult to the University. In no way could the Whigs expect so materially to injure the Church as by planting Germanized professors in our schools of divinity. Thank God, there is too much sound learning in the land for them to succeed in this."—Keswick, April 2, 1836.

It is not a little curious, considered in connexion with the above, that the bishopric followed the professorship.

On the other hand,—for it is our wont to let each side speak for itself,—the Edinburgh Reviewer (supra) can hardly find terms strong enough to express his indignation at the persecution to which he alleges Dr. Hampden has been subjected:

"And for such persecution," he tells us, "the plea of conscience is not admissible; it can only be a conscience so blinded by wilful neglect of the highest truth, or so corrupted by the habitual indulgence of evil passions, that it rather aggravates than excuses the guilt of those whom it misleads."—April, 1836: 239.

Hampden, Rob. Trevor, Vice-com. de Britannia, Latham, Villa Brouhamensis, Poemata, nunc primum curante Filio Joan. Trevor edita, Parmæ, Typis Bodonianis, 1792, fol. 115 copies printed. Hanvil, John, a monk of St. Alban's, of the 12th cent., wrote a long Latin poem, in nine books, entit. Architrenius, Paris, 1517, 4to. There are two MSS. of it in the Bodleian Library, with some epistles, epigrams, and other poems, by the same author.

Hanway, James. Brit. Troops in America, 1760, 8vo.

Hanway, John. 1. Psalmi Davidis I., &c., Lon., 1723, fol.; 1726, 8vo. 2. Trans. and Poems, 1730, 8vo.

Hanway, Jonas, 1712–1786, a native of Portsmouth, England, resided for some years in Russia, engaged in mercantile business. On his return he pub. the work by which he is best known: An Hist. Account of the Brit. Trade over the Caspian Sea, with a Jour. of Travels from London through Russia into Persia, and back again through Russia, Germany, and Holland, Lon., 1753–54,

4 vols. 4to. This is a work of considerable value; but some years later Jonas gave to the world an account of a much less extensive tour, viz.: A Journal of Eight Days' Journey from Portsmouth to Kingston-upon-Thames, through Southampton, Wiltshire, &c. To which is added an Essay upon Tea and its pernicious consequences, 1756, 2 vols. 8vo. Dr. Johnson's notice of these works deserves to be quoted:

"Jonas," says he, "acquired some reputation by travelling abroad, but lost it all by travelling at home."—Boswell's Johnson:

Where see also the account of Johnson's defence of his favourite beverage against Jonas's onslaught upon it, and the good philanthropist's rejoinder.

Hanway took a lively interest in the promotion of religion and the welfare of the poorer classes, and pub. many treatises upon these subjects. See Pugh's Life of Hanway; Johnson's Works, by Hawkins; Walt's Bibl. Brit.; Forster's Life of Goldsmith; McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ.: Lon. Gent. Mag., vol. lxx. Jonas deserves a kindly remembrance every rainy day, for to him the male sex are indebted for the use of the umbrella. The great Christian institution of the Sunday-School, which no Christian or patriot should neglect, found a zealous advocate in the excellent Hanway. He was also the principal founder of the Marine Society and the Magdalen Hospital.

Harbaugh, Henry, b. 1817, Franklin co., Penna., pastor of the First German Reformed Church, Lancaster, Penna. 1. Heaven; or, The Sainted Dead, Phila., 1848, 12mo. 2. Heavenly Recognition of Friends, 1851, 12mo. 3. Heavenly Home, 1853, 12mo. 4. Birds of the Bible, 1854, 4to. 5. Union with the Church, 1856, 18mo. 6. The Fathers of the German Reformed Church in Europe and America, 1857-58, 3 vols. 12mo. 7. The Life of the Rev. Michael Schlatter, 1857, 12mo. 8. The True Glory of Woman, 1858, 12mo. Mr. Harbaugh's works have been widely circulated and highly commended.

Harbin, Rev. George. See BEDFORD, HILKIAH.

Harbin, Thomas. Traveller's Companion, Lon., 1702.

Harby, Isaac, 1788-1828, a native of Charleston, S. C., was the author of the Gordian Knot, a Play, 1807; Alberti, a Play; an Address before the Reformed Society of Israelites, 1825; and numerous essays in the periodicals of the day. In June, 1828, he removed to New York, where he contributed to the Evening Post, and other Journals. A selection from his Miscellaneous Writings was pub. 1829, Charleston, Svo, by Henry L. Pinckney and Abraham Moise. See Duyckinck's Cyc. of Amer. Lit.

Harby, Thomas. Passages of Scripture, 1678, fol.

Harcourt, James, D.D. Serms., 1721, '35, both 4to.

Harcourt, Leveson Vernon, Chancellor of the Cathedral, and Preb. of York. 1. The Doctrine of the Deluge, Lon., 1838, 2 vols. Svo. A valuable work. 2. A Remonstrance to the Bp. of Exeter, &c., 1850, Svo. 3. Lects. on the Four Gospels Harmonized, 1851, 3 vols. Svo.

Harcourt, Robert. A Relation of a Voyage to Guiana, Lon., 1613, '26, 4to. La même, traduite en Hollandais, Leyden, 1707, Svo. This will be also found entire in the Harleian Miscell., and a portion of it is in Purchas's Pilgrimages, vol. iv. Lowndes, by a misprint doubtless, makes it read Voyage to Guinea!

Harcastle, David, Jr. 1. Letters on the Currency, Lon., Svo. 2. Banks and Bankers, 2d ed., 1842, p. Svo. The bankers of a country—the Hopes and Welles' and Baring's of the Old World, and the Wards, the Drexels, the Clarks, and the Corcorans of the New—are powerful auxiliaries to the enterprise and energy developed in the walks of Commerce and the marts of Trade.

Harcastle, Thomas. Christian Geography and Arithmetic, being a Survey of the World in several Serms., Lon., 1674, Svo.

Harcastle, Wm. 1. Genealog. Text-Book; Brit. Hist., Lon., 18mo. 2. Cat. of Astronomy, &c., 1845, 18mo.

Harding, or Hardying, John, an old English chronicler, b. 1378, lived at least to the age of 87. He was employed in collecting documents for the purpose of ascertaining what fealty was due from the Scottish kings to the kings of England, and is said to have forged papers where he did not find what he looked for: but it is possible that Harding himself was deceived. Certain it is that he acquired a taste for such researches, and drew up a Metrical Chronicle of England from the earliest times to the reign of Henry IV. It was first printed by Grafion, with a continuation to the 34th year of Henry VIII., by the same, in prose, in 1543, sm. 4to. This edit. is very rare: the Roxburghe copy was sold for £13 13s., which we believe to have been the highest price ever paid for it. In 1812 a new ed. was pub. in r. 4to, with a biographical and literary preface by Sir Henry Ellis. To this preface, and to the authorities subjoined below, we refer the reader.

"This work is almost beneath criticism, and fit only for the attention of an antiquary. Harding may be pronounced to be the most impotent of our metrical historians, especially where we recollect the great improvements which English poetry had now received. I will not even except Robert of Gloucestre, who lived in the infancy of taste and versification. The chronicle of this authentic and laborious annalist has hardly these more modest graces which could properly recommend and adorn a detail of the British story in prose. He has left some pieces in prose; and Winstanley says, 'As his prose was very useful, so was his poetry, as much delightful.' I am of opinion that both his prose and poetry are equally useful and delightful. What can be more rigid and unamiable than these lines?"

"King Arthur then in Avalon so did d. &c.?"

Horton's Hist. of Eng. Pict., ed. 1841; ii. 370.

Good old Thomas Fuller estimates Harding's poetry at a much higher rate:

"In my judgment, he had drank as hearty a draught of Helicon as any in his age."—Worthley's York. State, ed. 1840, iii. 428.

Mr. Hallam remarks that, whilst Lydgate and Bishop Peverok are not read with ease by the modern student, the Pastor Letters, Sir John Fortescue's Discourse on Monarchy, and Harding's Chronicle, present scarcely any difficulty. Hare, Francis, D.D., d. 1740, a native of London, admitted of King's Coll., Camb., where he subsequently became tutor, 1688; Dean of Worcester, 1708; Dean of St. Paul's, 1726; Bishop of St. Asaph, 1727; trans. to Chichester, 1731. To Dr. Hare as a classical critic and as a theologian we have already had occasion to allude in our lives of RICHARD BENTLEY, see p. 171; ANTHONY COLLINS, see p. 412; and THOMAS EDWARDS, see p. 548. We may readily believe that

"Hare was excessively piqued at the utter annihilation of his Terence and Phœdrus, the one soon after its birth, the other before its birth, by Bentley's edition of both together in 1756, who never once names Hare."

For further information respecting this learned critic—for such he certainly was, though no Bentley—consult authorities referred to below. He took a lively interest in the Bangorian Controversy, and pub. a number of pieces against Hoadly, which were included in the collective ed. of his Works, 1746, 4 vols. 8vo. Again, 1755, 4 vols. 8vo. The following works of his deserve a special notice:

1. Difficulties and Discouragements which attend the Study of the Scriptures in the Way of Private Judgment, 1714, '25, '43, 8vo.

"With all the merit of this beautiful satire, I believe that had the author foreseen that the liberty which animates this fine-turned piece of railery would have given scandal to any good man, he would have made abatement in the vigour of his wit and arguments."—BE. WARBURTON.

2. Psalmorum Liber in Versiculas Metricè divisus, etc., 1736, 2 vols. 8vo.

"This work does more honour to the genius and industry of the author than to his judgment. That the Psalms are poetical is very obvious; but that they are constructed on similar principles with Greek and Latin verse the learned bishop has failed to prove. The true pronunciation of Hebrew is irretrievably lost, and the discussions of Meibomius, Gomarus, and Le Clerc, have thrown little light on it. The hypothesis of Hare met with an able antagonist in Bishop Lowth, and a defender in Dr. Edwards."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

Mr. Orme refers to Bishop Lowth's Metricæ Hareanæ Brevis Confutatio, annexed to his Lectures, De Sacra Poesi

Hæbræorum. The Edwards whom he names is Thomas Edwards, in whose life we have already referred to this controversy. See Whiston's Life; Swift's Works; Cole's MS. Athenæ in Brit. Mus.; Gent. Mag.; Blackwood's Mag., xxviii. 653.

This learned gentleman pub. The Mission of the Comforter, The Victory of Faith, and other sermons, a number of theological and other works. He is best known to general readers as one of the authors—in conjunction with his brother, Augustus William Hare, and others—of Guesses at Truth, and as joint translator with Bishop Thirlwall of vols. i. and ii. of Niebuhr's History of Rome.

The 1st ed. of Guesses at Truth appeared in 1827, and the 3d in 1847: Series Second, 2d ed., 1848. Thirlwall and Hare's trans. from Niebuhr was first pub. in 1828-32, 2 vols. 8vo. A new ed. was issued in 1855. In 1848 Mr. Hare edited the Essays and Tales of John Sterling, with a Memoir of his Life, in 2 vols. 12mo. Mr. Carlyle evinced but little satisfaction with the labours of the editor. For further information respecting Archdeacon Hare and his literary labours, see *Lon. Gent. Hare, Robert, M.D., 1781-1858, an eminent chemist, Emeritus Prof. of Chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania. He distinguished himself by a number of important scientific discoveries, among which the agency of the compound hydro-oxygen in obtaining a greater amount of heat than had ever before been developed is perhaps the best known. This discovery was made by Dr. Hare when he was but about twenty-one years of age. In 1810 he pub. a pamphlet entitled Brief View of the Policy and Resources of the United States, and he is the author of more than one hundred and fifty papers contributed to various periodicals. Hargrave, Francis, 1741–1821, an eminent law-writer, educated at the Univ. of Oxford, has been already noticed in our lives of CHARLES BUTLER, SIR EDWARD COKE, and SIR MATTHEW HALE. He removed to Lincoln's Inn in 1764, and in 1772 distinguished himself in the Ilabeas Corpus of James Somerset, a negro for whom he was counsel. In addition to his labours upon Coke on Littleton, his ed. of Hale's Jurisdiction of the Lords' House of Parliament, and the published report of the case of Somerset, his best-known works are—1. An Argument in Defence of Literary Property, 1774, cr. 8vo. 2. Collec. of State Trials, 1776, 11 vols. fol.; usually bound in 6. Howell's State Trials is the best collection: see the article State Trials in Marvin's Leg. Bibl., 660–661, and authorities there cited; and see HOWELL, T. B., in this Dictionary. 3. A Collection of Tracts rel. to the Law of England, from MSS. never before pub., 1787, 4to. See 3 Kent, 426; 4 Barn. & Cres., 505; 15 East, 304; 5 Barn. & Ald., 285; Hoff. Leg. Stu., 186; Brooke's Bib. Leg. Ang., 241; 80 Lon. Month. Rev., 484. 4. Collectanea Juridica: consisting of Tracts rel. to the Law and Constitution of England, Titles of Honour, and Constitutional Subjects, 1791–92, 2 vols. 8vo. 5. Judicial Arguments and Collections, 1797–99, 2 vols. 4to. 6. Juris Consult Exerecitations; consisting of Tracts upon the Laws of England, Titles of Honour, and Constitutional Subjects, 1811–13, 3 vols. 4to. Mr. Hargrave was possessed of a vast fund of legal erudition.

"His legal power, and the extent of his knowledge, have rarely been equalled, and perhaps never surpassed."

"Mr. Hargrave, a gentleman of great and profound learning, than whom no man that ever lived was more conversant with the law of the country."—Speech of Lord Lyndhurst on Life-Peerage in England, delivered in the House of Lords, Feb. 7, 1856.

Mr. Hargrave's valuable Law Library was purchased by Government in 1813 for £8000, and was deposited in the British Museum.

2. Harmony of the Four Gospels, 1733, 8vo. Anon.

Both works are creditable to the author's acquaintance with the Scriptures.—Orme: ubi supra.

The two were pub. with Harley's Abstract of the Historical Part of the O. Test., &c., and Observ. thereupon, by the Bishop of Sodor and Man, in 1735, 2 vols. 8vo. Vol. ii. includes the two works first noticed.

Harley, George. Circumstances respecting the late Charles Montford, Esq., 1804, 8vo.

Harley, George Davies, a comedian, pub. a number of Poems, &c., 1787–1806.

Harley, Robert, Earl of Oxford and Mortimer, 1661–1724, eldest son of Sir Edward Harley, and a distinguished statesman, was an eminent patron of letters and a great collector of literary treasures. His library was perhaps the most extensive ever collected by a private individual, with the exception of that of Richard Heber. The Harleian Collection of MSS. was purchased by the government for £110,000, and is now deposited in the British Museum. An Index to the Harleian Collection of MSS. was pub. in 1759–63, 2 vols. fol. But a very complete one, compiled by Messrs. Wanley, Casley, Hoeker, Nares, Shaw, and Douce, was pub. in 1808, 3 vols. fol. Another vol.—being Indices of Persons, Places, and Matters, by the Rev. Dr. T. Hartwell Horne—was pub. in 1808, fol. This catalogue was formerly sold at £8 s. It is now (1856) worth £2 s. Every historical and legal student should have it in his library.

"This Catalogue is a key to inexhaustible sources of information on almost every subject; but to those who are interested in historical, antiquarian, or biographical literature, it is indispensable, and, as well as the Cottonian and Lansdowne Catalogues, will well repay an attentive perusal; for so infinite is the variety of the subjects which occur, that the general Indexes furnish but an imperfect idea of the contents of these matchless collections."

—SIR N. HARRIS NICOLAS: see a Descrip. of the Contents, &c. of the various Works printed by Authority of the Record Commission, Lon., 1831, 8vo.

The Printed Books of the Harleian Library were purchased by Thomas Osborne, the bookseller. He gave only £13,000 for the collection; although Lord Oxford had expended £18,000 on the binding only of the least part of them! Osborne employed Dr. Johnson, Oldys, and Mattaire, to prepare a catalogue of this noble collection. It appeared in 1743–45, 5 vols. 8vo, under the title of Catalogus Bibliothecæ Harleianæ in Locos Communes distributus, cum Indice Auctorum. The Latin dedication to Lord Cartaret was written by Mattaire; vols. i. and ii., in Latin, were written by Dr. Johnson; vols. iii. and iv., which are a reprint in English of the two former, were prepared by Oldys. Vol. v. does not properly belong to the other four, as it is simply an enumeration of Osborne's old stock. The Preface, which was originally issued as a Prospectus to the work, was written by Johnson:

"His account of that celebrated collection of books, in which he displays the importance to literature of what the French call a catalogue raisonné, when the subjects of it are extensive and various, and it is executed with ability, cannot fail to impress all his readers with admiration of his philological attainments."—BOSWELL: Life of Dr. Johnson.

"In my humble apprehension, the preface is unworthy of the doctor; it contains a few general philological reflections, expressed in a style sufficiently stately, but is divested of bibliographical anecdote and interesting intelligence."—DR. DIBBIN: Bibliomania; q. r. for an interesting analysis of the Harleian Library.

Having thus disposed of the MS. and Printed Books, we at length reach the pamphlets of the library; and here we are at once overwhelmed with the amplitude of the field, for Gough assures us that the number was computed to be 400,000! See Brit. Topog., v. i. 669. From this vast treasury the indefatigable Oldys extracted between 600 and 700, which were pub. in 8 vols. 4to, 1744-46. A new ed. was pub. by Mallam in 1808-11, 12 vols. 8vo, £5 8s.; r. 8vo, £14 8s. Another ed., by Thomas Park, was issued in 1808-13, 10 vols. r. 4to, 2 vols. being composed of additional matter, £33 12s. A Selection from the Harleian Miscellany of Tracts which principally regard English History, of which many are referred to by Hume, was pub. in 1793, 4to. The value of this work is not to be measured by money nor expressed by words. It should always accompany The Somers Collection, Howell's State Trials, Harrington's Nuzze Antiquæ, Evelyn's and Pepys's Diaries, and the standard histories of England.

"To the importance of this collection of Tracts and Papers for elucidating many historical occurrences no person who feels interested in the discovery of truth can be inattentive."—EDITOR.

"I hardly know of any one collection, or set of volumes, likely to be productive of more varied entertainment, especially if the reader have a philological turn."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

A Collection of Voyages and Travels, compiled from the curious and valuable Library of the Earl of Oxford, was pub. by Thomas Osborne in 1745, 2 vols. fol. This is called the Harleian Collection of Voyages. See CURCHILL, OWNSHAM and JOHN. A Catalogue of his Lordship's Pictures, Coins, and Medals, was pub. in 1741, 4to. But, in our admiration of the Earl's literary treasures, we must not forget the only thing which enables us to introduce an account of his library, viz.: that he was himself an author. To him are ascribed (1.) A Scriptural and Rational Account of the Christian Religion, Lon., 1695, 8vo. 2. An Essay on Public Credit, 1710. Inserted in the Somers Collection. Reprinted, with short Hist. Notes, 1797, 8vo. 3. An Essay upon Loans. 4. A Vindict. of the Rights of the Commons of Eng.; signed Humphry Mackworth. 5. Answer to Articles against him, 1715. 6. The Secret Hist. of Arlus and Adolphus, 1720, 8vo. An Account of the conduct of Robert, Earl of Oxford, 1715, 8vo, is supposed by Park to be the composition of his lordship, on account of the favourable representation given of his character. But this is but doubtful evidence. For further particulars respecting the Earl of Oxford see Collins's Peerage, by Sir S. E. Brydges; Park's Walpole's R. and N. Authors; Swift's Works; Spence's Anecdotes; Dibdin's Bibliomania, and his Bibl. Decam.; Coxe's Life of Walpole; histories of England;—especially note Macaulay's Hist. of England, vol. iv.

Harmer, Rev. Thomas, 1715-1788, a learned Dissenting divine, a native of Norwich, England, became minister of a congregation at Watesfield, Suffolk. 1. Observations on various Passages of Scripture; placing them in a light altogether new, from Relations in Books of Voyages and Travels, Lon., 1764, 8vo. Enlarged ed., 1776, 2 vols. 8vo. Two addit. vols., 8vo, 1787; 4th ed., with addits. by Adam Clarke, LL.D.: 5th and best ed., by A. Clarke, with Life, 1816, 4 vols. 8vo. Bishop Louth, on the pub. of the first two vols., was so pleased with this work, that he lent to the author the unpub. MSS. of the celebrated Chardin, from which Harmer obtained much new matter. This work should be in the library of every Biblical student and Oriental antiquary. A trans. of the 1st ed. was made into German by John Ernest Faber, and pub., with notes and addits. of his own and of Prof. Seybold, in 1772 and '75, 2 vols. 8vo. A third vol. appeared in German in 1776.

"This fact shows the estimation of the work abroad, which all classes at home have agreed to commend."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

2. Outlines of a New Comment. on Solomon's Song, drawn by the help of instructions from the East, 1768, 8vo; 2d ed., 1775, 8vo.

"This is an uncommonly ingenious work, to which all subsequent interpreters of the Song have been much indebted. Harmer does not consider it as an epithalamium properly, but as relating to a royal marriage.—that of Solomon to the daughter of Pharaoh,—and this event as designedly symbolical of the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles. This idea he supports with great ingenuity, and certainly throws much light on various parts of this beautiful but difficult portion of Scripture."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"In it very many difficult passages of Solomon's Song are happily elucidated, and hints are offered of which subsequent commentators have not failed to avail themselves. It bears a high price."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

"Many good illustrations."—Bickersteth's C. S.

Harrington, Henry, M.D., 1729-1816, an eminent physician, long resident at Bath, a son of the preceding, pub. An Ode to Harmony; An Ode to Discord; The Witch of Wokey, a ballad in the Old English Style; The Geometrical Analogy of the Doctrine of the Trinity, 1806, 4to.

Harrington, James, 1611-1677, a native of Northamptonshire, educated at Trin. Coll., Oxford, under Chillingworth, acquired great celebrity as a warm supporter of political freedom. He lived for some time on the continent, and doubtless imbibed whilst resident at Venice and the Hague those republican principles which distinguished him. His principal work is entit. Oceana, pub. in 1656, fol.:

"A kind of political romance, in imitation of Plato's 'Atlantic Story,' where by Oceana Harrington means England; exhibiting a plan of republican government, which he would have created here, in case these kingdoms had formed themselves into a genuine commonwealth. This work, however, pleased no party, and, as it reflected severely upon Oliver's usurpation, met with many difficulties in the publishing."

Harrington pub. also several other political treatises, 1658-60, an Essay upon Vigil, 1658, and a trans. of four books of the Æneid into English poetry, 1659. A collective ed. of his writings was pub. by Toland in 1700, fol.; a better ed. by Toland, Dubl., 1737, fol.; another ed., Lon., 1747, fol.; and the best one, by Thomas Brand Hollis, with the Life by Toland, in 1771, 4to. As an early supporter of political liberty in England, the name of Harrington will always be entitled to the respect of posterity, whatever may be thought of the practicability of some of his speculations.

"Harrington's Oceana was well adapted to that age, when the plans of imaginary republics were the daily subjects of debate and conversation; and even in our time it is justly admired as a work of genius and invention. The idea, however, of a perfect and immortal commonwealth will always be found as chimerical as that of a perfect and immortal man. The style of this author wants ease and fluency; but the good matter which his work contains makes compensation."—Hume's Hist. of Eng.

"The only valuable model of a commonwealth that has yet been offered to the public."—Hume's Essays and Treatises.

"It is strange that Harrington, so little while ago, should be the first man to find out so evident and demonstrable a truth as that of property being the true basis of power. His Oceana, allowing for the different situation of things, (as the less number of Lords then, those Lords having no share in the Parliament, and the like,) is certainly one of the best-founded political pieces that ever was writ."—DEAN LOCKIER.

"Harrington, whose Oceana is justly regarded as one of the boasts of English literature."—Dugald Stewart's Prelim. Ess. to Encyc. Brit.

"In general it may be said of Harrington that he is prolix, dull, pedantic, and seldom profound, but sometimes ridiculous himself by just observations. Like most theoretical politicians of that age, he had an excessive admiration for the republic of Venice. His other political writings are in the same spirit as the Oceana, but still less interesting."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

Harrington, Sir James. Divine Meditations, 1682, fol.

Harrington, James, d. 1693, in his 29th year, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and subsequently entered the Inner Temple. He contributed some verses to the Muse Anglica, wrote the preface to the 1st vol. of Wood's Athenae, and the introduction to vol. ii.; edited, with a Life and Preface, the works of Dr. George Stradling, and pub. a number of tracts respecting the University of Oxford.

"His death was much deplor'd by those that knew him, because, 1. That he was a prodigy, considering his age, in his knowledge of the common law; 2. That he was a person of excellent parts; and, 3. That he was very honest in his dealing, and of a good and generous nature."—Athen. Oxon. See Bliss's ed.; and Nichols's Alterbury.

Harrington, John, of Stepney, 1534–1582, father of Sir John Harrington, wrote some poetical pieces, &c., which were pub. in the Nugæ Antiquæ. See next article. His lines are thought to exhibit a polish not common in the writers of the day. The "Verses made on Isabella Markhame" have been greatly extolled;

"If the poem here selected be rightly attributed to him by the Harrington papers, he cannot be denied the singular merit of having united an elegance of taste with an artifice of style which far exceeded his contemporaries."—Ellis's Specimens.

"But hardly any light poem of this early period is superior to some lines addressed to Isabella Markham by Sir John [John, not Sir John] Harrington, bearing the date of 1564. If these are genuine and I know not how to dispute it, they are as polished as any written at the close of the queen's reign. These are not in the Paradise of Dainty Devices."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

Harrington, Sir John, 1561–1612, son of the preceding, was a great favourite with his godmother, Queen Elizabeth, although temporarily banished from court for writing a witty work upon an objectionable theme, entitled The Metamorphosis of Ajax, Lon., 1596, 8vo. A license was refused for printing this work, yet it nevertheless went through three impressions. A new ed. of 100 copies was printed, Chiswick, 1814, 8vo. See Lowndes's Bibl. Man. and Bibl. Anglo-Poet., 316–325. Sir John also pub. (2.) Orlando Furioso, trans. into Heroical English Verse, Lon., 1591, 1607, fol.; 3d ed., including the Epigrams, (dated 1632, pp. 46), 1634, fol. This is the first English version of Ariosto. The first fifty stanzas of Book xxxii. were trans. by Francis Harrington, Sir John's younger brother.

"Although executed without spirit or accuracy, unanimated and incorrect, it enriched our poetry by a communication of new stories of fiction and imagination, both of the romantic and comic species of Gothic machinery and familiar manners."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

"Much admired at the time, though now found to be inaccurate and feeble."—Ellis's Specimens.

Another eminent authority, comparing Harrington's Ariosto with Fairfax's Tasso, remarks:

"The translation of Ariosto by Sir John Harrington, in 1591, is much inferior."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

3. The most elegant and witty Epigrams of Sir J. H., 1615, 4to. This ed. contains only 115 Epigrams, and forms the 4th book of the entire collection, pub. 1618, sm. 8vo; 1625, sm. 8vo; 1634, fol.; with the Orlando, 1633, fol. The Orlando in this vol. is the 3d ed., and is dated 1634, although the Epigrams are dated 1633.

"Sir John Harrington, no less noted for his book of witty epigrams than his judicious translation of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso."—Parsons's Theat. Poet.

"Formed his most popular production."—Ellis's Specimens.

"The epigrams if some reputation, possess no poetical merit. They are flat, colloquial rhymes, of that low tone above which it seems to have been difficult for the genius of Harrington to rise."—Censura Literaria.

7. Nugæ Antiquæ: being a Miscell. Collect. of Original Papers in Prose and Verse, temp. Henry VIII., Ed. VI., Mary, Eliz., and James, by Sir J. H., and by others who lived in those times, Lon., 1769–75–79, 3 vols. 12mo. Pub. by the Rev. Henry Harrington, of Bath; 2d ed., 1792, 3 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., newly arranged, with Illust. Notes by Thomas Park, 1804, 2 vols. 8vo. Prefixed is a life of the author.

"In reconducting this miscellany to the press, I have taken the liberty of rejecting several prose pieces which had appeared in preceding editions, and of inserting others that seemed to possess stronger claims for admission into a mélange suranné."—Park's Advert.

These vols. should be in the library of every historical student.

"Sir John Harrington appears to have been a gentleman of great pleasantry and humour; his fortune was easy, the court his

Of this province he pub. an account, entit. A Briefe and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia, &c., Lon., 1588, fol. This work was pub. in Latin by De Bry & Sons, Franc., 1590, fol.; also in French and German. The English version is the rarest of the De Bry set of voyages; a copy sold at the Nassau sale produced £100, and Lord Oxford paid the same sum for his. But we have already given more space than we can well afford to the Voyages of De Bry and Sons in our article RICHARD HAKLUYT, q. v., and authorities there cited. Harriott's account of Virginia will be found in vol. iii. of Hakluyt's Voyages. Harris, James, M.P., of Salisbury, 1709-1780, a nephew of Lord Shaftesbury, the celebrated author of the Characteristics, was educated at Wadham Coll., Oxf., and removed from thence to Lincoln's Inn. In 1761 he entered Parliament; in 1762 became a Lord of the Admiralty; in 1763 Lord of the Treasury; and in 1774 Secretary and Comptroller to the Queen. He was a man of great erudition, and especially skilled in the Greek and Latin classics. 1. Three Treatises: I. Art; II. Music, Painting, and Poetry; III. Happiness, Lon., 1744, 8vo. Other eds. in 1765, '71, '72. This is a valuable work. An eminent authority commends the treatise on Art, as "The best specimen of the dividing or diacritic manner, as the ancients called it, that is to be found in any modern book with which I am acquainted."—LORD MONTAGU.

2. Hermes; or, a Philosophical Inquiry concerning Language and Universal Grammar, Lon., 1750, '51, '71, '75, 1806, 8vo. The title of this learned work has sometimes occasioned its being purchased for a novel; but a pupil of the Minerva Press school would soon find himself beyond his depth. A celebrated philologist, in the Preface to his English Grammar, thus warmly commends Mr. Harris's treatise:

"Those who would enter more deeply into this subject will find it fully and accurately handled, with the greatest acuteness of investigation, perspicuity of application, and elegance of method, in a Treatise entitled Hermes, by J. Harris, Esq., the most beautiful and perfect example of analysis that has been exhibited since the days of Aristotle."—BISHOP LOWTH.

"On the means of acquiring just taste: written with the precision of Aristotle, and the elegance of Quintilian."—COLERIDGE.

"We ought not either to omit the mention of Mr. James Harris, the learned and accomplished author of one of the most beautiful specimens of metaphysical analysis on the theory of Language, which exist in our language; I mean the work entitled Hermes."—Morrell's Hist. of Mod. Philos.

Works, with Life, by his son, the Earl of Malmesbury, Lon., 1801, 2 vols. 4to and r. 4to; 1802, 5 vols. 8vo.

"His profound knowledge of Greek, which he applied more successfully, perhaps, than any modern writer has done, to the study and explication of ancient philosophy, arose from an early and intimate acquaintance with the excellent poets and historians in that language."—EARL OF MALMESBURY: Life of his father, q. v.

"Mr. Harris had long left the University of Oxford before he began even to read Aristotle, or to inquire into the Greek philosophy; and he was led to the consideration of universal grammar by no book of the academic! cycle, either then or since, but by the Minerva of Sanctius. That Mr. Harris was a tardy student of philosophy is shown, perhaps, in his want of self-reliance, in his prejudice in favour of authority—at least of ancient authority. But truth is not the property of the old or of the new; 'non dum occupata,'—it frequently belongs to neither."—SIR W. M. HAMILTON: Oxford as it might be: Appnd. to Discussions, &c., 2d ed., Lon., 1853, 8vo.

Mr. Harris's personal character was most estimable:

"The deep sense of moral and religious obligation which was habitual to him, and those benevolent feelings which were so great a happiness to his family and friends, had the same powerful influence over his public as his private life."—EARL OF MALMESBURY: supra.

"Mr. Harris's style is flat and heavy; and Dr. Johnson observed to Mrs. Piozzi, that in the fourteen lines of which the dedication of the Hermes consists, there were no less than six grammatical faults."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxix. 543; Mrs. Piozzi: Anec., p. 6.

"At Lord Monboddo's, after the conversation upon the decrease of learning in England, his lordship mentioned Hermes, by Mr. Harris of Salisbury, as the work of a living author for whom he had a great respect. Dr. Johnson said nothing at the time; but when we were in our post-chaise, told me he thought Harris 'a coxcomb.'"—BOSWELL: Life of Johnson.

Harris, James, M.P., first Earl of Malmesbury, 1746-1820, son of the preceding, educated at Merton College, Oxford, and at the University of Leyden, was for many years ambassador from Great Britain to Spain, Prussia, Russia, the Hague, and France, respectively. In 1843-44 his grandson, the third Earl, pub., in 4 vols. 8vo, his grandfather's Diaries and Correspondence, 1767-1809.

As to literary merit, the volumes have none at all. In his style, the son of the author of Hermes follows his father's example rather than his precepts. It is flat and ungrammatical; and, what is more surprising, vulgar—"to a degree!"—to use one of his own slip-slop phrases—and we do not know that we ever read so many letters in which there was so little of that occasional ornament and relief which literature and wit can impart even to the driest business."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxiv. 518-544.

Harris, John, D.D., a Dissenting divine, Principal of New College, St. John's Wood, London, was born at Ugborough, Devonshire, in 1804, and entered Hoxton College as a student of divinity in 1823. He preached for some time at Epsom, and in 1827 became Prof. of Theology in Cheslunt College. On the occasion of the amalgamation, in 1850, of the Independent colleges of Highbury, Homerton, and Coward, into New College, Dr. Harris became Principal of the Institute, and its Professor of Theology. Dr. Harris died December 21, 1856. As an author, Dr. Harris attained a wide celebrity both in Europe and America. 1. The Great Teacher, Lon., 1835, p. Svo. 2. The Christian Citizen; a Sermon, cr. 5. Covetousness the sin of the Christian Church, 1836, p. Svo. New ed., 1851, p. Svo. This essay obtained a prize of one hundred guineas. About 90,000 to 100,000 copies have been sold to the present time, (1856.) We have already alluded to the censure which it elicited: see ELLABY, JAMES, and A. S. THIELWALD; *Lon. "We cordially recommend the Essay to our readers. It appears to us more than worth all the schemes of comprehension that have ever been propounded, or all the hereticonous or concordats that have ever been imagined."—Lon. Eclectic Review.

"All the writings of Mr. Harris are excellent, and deservedly popular. It is very remarkable that they tend to elevate the tone of Christian principle, and to kindle and purify the zeal of God's professing people, more than those of any other living author. That this subject has been undertaken by Mr. Harris is to us matter of high gratification. It is one very worthy of his mastermind, and one, the claims of which he has rendered forcibly attractive, if not in every part absolutely irresistible."—Lon. New Connection Mag.

"We desire to give it the most cordial recommendation, as a production which evinces a bright intellect, a pious disposition, and a catholic and loving spirit."—Lon. Baptist Repository.

7. The Great Commission, 1842, p. Svo. New ed., 1852, p. Svo. This essay on Christian Missions obtained a prize of two hundred guineas.

"The production, in all its departments, bears the impress of the hand of a consummate artist. The symmetry, the proportion of parts to parts, is all but perfect. The materials are skillfully selected; they are rich, varied, and appropriate. Nothing is wanting that knowledge, research, or invention, could supply. The work throughout bespeaks the Christian, the philosopher, the man of letters, and, rarest of all, the man of business."—Lon. Eclectic Review.

"It is a magnificent production. Comprehensive in plan; admirable in arrangement; elegant in diction; happy in illustration; cogent and conclusive in reasoning, and powerful in appeal. It is a volume which the church of Christ, if true to her interests and faithful to the responsibilities of her high vocation, never must, never can, willingly let die. It is an honour to our country, a boon to our churches, a blessing to the world."—Lon. Christian Examiner.

"The work exhibits great research and power of analysis, clear and profound reasoning and demonstrations. The attempt is made, and we think successfully, to show that there is a theology in nature which is ultimately one with the theology of the Bible."—Lon. Biblical Repository.

"We estimate highly Dr. Harris's book. In many respects it is the best book of the kind we have seen. . . . To those who will take the trouble to read it through, we feel assured that it will prove a source of instruction and elevating thought."—Lon. Athenæum.

10. Patriarchy; or, The Family, its Constitution, &c., 1855, Svo. A collective ed. of the Works of Dr. Harris was pub. in 1838, Lon., 4 vols. r. 12mo. We have quoted but from a few of the commendations before us of the works of this distinguished divine. We feel unwilling to close without brief citations from two well-known authorities:

"Harris's Great Teacher, Mammon, The Great Commission, &c. have been received with extraordinary approbation by almost all classes of religious people; and are justly entitled to the applause which they have commard. They are not more remarkable for the elegance of their diction than for the spirit of pure and fervent devotion by which they are pervaded."—Dr. E. Williams's Christian Preacher.

"His great power is the exhaustion and ingenious illustration of topics. This manner of writing has a quiet earnestness about it which is very impressive, and which characterizes his mode of public address. He deserves great praise for the lively graces of Mammon, for the manful and masterful execution of the Great Teacher, a book which contains the most successful full-length portraiture of the Divine Man we have read, and since the first edition of this work appeared, for two very vigorous and original books on the Pre-Adamite earth, and Man Primeval."—Gillman's First Gallery of Literary Portraits, 3d ed. Harris, Joseph, Assay-Master of the Mint, d. 1764, pub. mathematic and other treatises, 1730-75, of which the following is the best-known: An Essay upon Money and Coins; in Two Parts, Lon., 1757, Svo.

"This is one of the very best treatises on money and coins that have ever been published."—McCalloch's Lit. of Brit. Econ., q. v.

Harris, Joseph, Secretary to Vice-Admiral Milbanke, d. 1789, aged 31. Naval Characters, &c.

Harris, Moses, 1. The Aurelian; or, Nat. Hist. of English Moths and Butterflies, Lon., 1766, fol., 1776, '82, 4to. A copy on vellum, in Edwards's Catalogue for 1796, was marked £52 10s. See a learned paper upon this subject, with a review of this work, in the Lon. Retrosp. Rev., N. S., i. 230-245, 1827. A new ed. of the Aurelian, by J. O. Westwood, was pub. by H. G. Bohn in 1840, sm. fol., 44 plates, £4 4s. This is the only work which contains the English moths and butterflies of the full natural size, in all their changes of Caterpillar, Chrysalis, &c., with the plants on which they feed.

2. The English Lepidoptera; or, The Aurelian's Pocket-Companion, 1775, Svo. 3. An Exposition of English Insects, in Eng. and French, Lon., 1776, '82, r. 4to, 50 plates. A work of great value.

Harris, Thaddens Mason, D.D., 1768-1842, a native of Charlestown, Mass., graduated at Harvard College in 1787, and was librarian of that institution from 1791 to 1793. In 1793 he became pastor of a Congregational church in Dorchester, and retained this post until his death. He pub. many Sermons and Addresses, and several valuable works. We notice:—1. Discourses in favour of Free-Masonry, Charlestown, 1801, Svo. 2. The Minor Encyclopædia, 1803, 4 vols. 3. Journal of a Tour into the Territory northwest of the Alleghany Mountains in 1803, Bost., 1805, Svo. 4. A Natural History of the Bible, 1821, Svo. Other eds., some of which are entitled, A Dictionary of the Nat. Hist. of the Bible, Lon., 1824, Svo: 1825, 12mo. New ed., with additions, and corrections by Josiah Conder, 150 wood-cuts, 1833-34, 12mo. In German, at Leipsic, 1825, Svo. We have already noticed this excellent work in our article on CARPENTER, WILLIAM, q. v.

"We cheerfully recommend the work both to the learned and the unlearned reader, as containing all that can be known on the subjects which successively occur. Many of the articles will be read with great interest; and in those in which curiosity is most concerned, the author, in a form as much abridged as their nature would admit, has exhausted all the learning of naturalists and travellers; and, as we believe, has generally come to the right results."—S. WILLARD: N. Amer. Rev., xi. 86-92.

This encycloptic notice is "cheerfully adopted" by the distinguished Biblical scholar, the Rev. T. Hartwell Horne, D.D.: see his Bibl. Bib. Mr. Bickersteth also commends Dr. Harris's work: see his Christian Student.

"This is an excellent book, containing descriptions of all the animals, insects, and precious stones, which are mentioned in the Scriptures. They are alphabetically arranged; and thus, while the volume cannot fail to be valuable and interesting to the young reader, it is well adapted to the more mature and experienced."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

5. Memorials of the First Church in Dorchester; in Two Discourses, Bost., 1830, Svo. 6. Biographical Memoirs of James Oglethorpe, Founder of the Colony of Georgia in N. America, 1841, Svo.

"Considering the nature of his materials, the author's task was neither involving nor easy; but it has been well executed, and he has rendered a just tribute to the memory of a distinguished benefactor of mankind, and a valuable service to the history of his country."—JARED SPARKS: N. Amer. Rev., liii. 448-478.

A biographical notice of Dr. Harris, by Dr. Frothingham, will be found in the Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th S., ii. 130. "A man of a good deal of learning in New England antiquities."—HON. EDWARD EVERETT: see conclusion of the next article.

Harris, Thaddeus William, M.D., grad. at Harvard College, 1815, d. 1856, son of the preceding, was a resident of Cambridge, Mass., and had been Librarian of Harvard College from 1831 to the time of his decease. Dr. Harris was a distinguished entomologist, and as an author was extensively known by A Report on the Insects of Massachusetts Injurious to Vegetation, Cambridge, 1841, Svo.

"We hardly know where to find a summary so condensed, and, at the same time, so complete. It removes all difficulty at the outset; and thus, while this Report is sufficiently scientific in its execution to meet the expectations of the learned, it answers the more important purpose of placing the means of knowledge in every man's hands."—N. Amer. Rev., liv. 73-101.

A second impression of this Report, somewhat enlarged, was pub. by the author in 1842, Svo, pp. 459, under the title of A Treatise on some of the Insects of New England which are Injurious to Vegetation. A new ed. of this valuable work, revised and enlarged by the addition of about fifty pages, was pub. (under the title just quoted) in 1852, Svo. See a notice in N. Amer. Rev., lxxvi. 255-256. Dr. Harris's Report was drawn up by him in an official capacity; and we cannot confer a greater honour upon his memory than by quoting the following high testimony to his scientific erudition:

"The late Dr. Thaddeus William Harris was one of the commissioners appointed for the Zoological and Botanical Survey of Massachusetts while I was Governor of the state, in 1837. The entomological department was entrusted to him; and in this country he had, at the time, no superior, if he had an equal, which I doubt."—HON. EDWARD EVERETT: in a Letter to the Author of this Dictionary, May 27, 1856.

Harris, Wm., D.D., 1675?-1740, a Dissenting divine, pastor of a congregation in Crouch-Friars, London, for thirty years one of the preachers of a Friday Evening Lecture, and one of the continuators of Matthew Henry's Commentary on the Bible. He pub. a number of occasional serms., &c., 1704-37; The Life of Dr. Thos. Manton, 1725, Svo, and in Manton's Works; 20 Serms. against Woolaston, 1728, 8vo.; and the following series of Discourses, by which he is best known:—1. Practical Discourses on the Principal Representations of the Messiah, 1724, Svo. 2. Funeral Discourses, 1736, Svo. Dr. Harris "was reckoned the greatest master of the English tongue among the Dissenters. His style is plain and easy, his thoughts substantial."—Dr. DODDRIDGE.

"Ranks among those who have embellished our language."—BOGUE AND BENNETT.

Harris, Wm., D.D., 1720-1770, a Dissenting divine, a native of Salisbury, pub. a number of valuable biographies, viz.: of Hugh Peters, 1751, Svo; of James I., 1753, Svo; of Charles I., 1758, Svo; of Oliver Cromwell, 1762, Svo; of Charles II., 1766, 2 vols. 8vo. New ed. of all, with a Life of the Author, 1814, 5 vols. 8vo. The "Regal Biographies" are after the manner of Bayle: i. e., illustrated with copious notes. The historical reader should not fail to procure these invaluable vols. In his opinions Harris favoured republican sentiments:

"His reasonings are strongly tinged with his early prejudices; but his facts are, in general, narrated with fidelity, and the evidence on both sides is given without mutilation."

"Crabbed as may be the composition and combatable the opinions of the author, yet these volumes must have a place in a well-stored library. Harris is perhaps, with two exceptions, the most note-able writer in the English language. All his works are professed to be 'taken from Original Writings and State Papers.'"—Dublin's Lib. Comp.

Harris's faithfulness as an historian is endorsed by one of the most eminent of modern historical students, Prof. Smyth.

Notice of the Life of Charles the First:

"A general summary of the particulars of this reign, not very favourable to the king, will be found in Harris's Life of Charles the First. Harris fortifies the positions in his text, like Bayle, by copious notes, which will, at least, bring the subject, and all the learning that belongs to it, in full review before the reader."

Notice of the Life of Oliver Cromwell:

"There is a Life of Cromwell, by Harris, in the manner of his other historical treatises, and equally valuable."

Notice of the Life of Charles the Second:

"After the perusal of Mr. Hume, we may turn to the Life of Charles the Second, by Harris. The notes are full of information, and of particulars which the reader may not have an opportunity of selecting from their original sources, or, indeed, of readily finding in any other manner."

Harris contributed a paper on Roman antiquities in G. Brit. to the Archæol., 1770.

This work was trans. into German, with a Pref., Notes, and Corrections, by John Gottlieb Bohme.

"Johnson much commended him as a scholar, and a man of the most companionable talents he had ever known. He said the defects in his History proceeded not from imbecility, but from foppery. . . . It was unlucky in coming out on the same day as Robertson's History of Scotland. . . . Mr. Elliot said it was a very good book in the German translation."—Boswell's Life of Dr. Johnson.

"A work strongly commended by Lord Chesterfield on the score of matter. The style is literally execrable."—Dublin's Lib. Comp.

Robertson's Hist. of Scotland was pub. a month before this, but Hume's House of Tudor came out in the same week. "George Harkins, his bookseller, we are told, sometimes objected to his uncouth words or phrases, while the work was in the press; but Harte refused to change them, and used to add, with a complacent sneer, 'George, that's what we call writing!'"

"The life of this extraordinary man [Gustavus Adolphus] has been written by Mr. Harte with great activity of research, and a scrupulous examination of his materials, which are understood to be the best, though they are not sufficiently particularized. The book will disappoint the reader; Mr. Harte writes often with singularly bad taste, and never with any masterly display of his subject; but it may be compared with Coxe, and must be considered."—*Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. He settled as a physician first at Newark, afterwards at Bury-St.-Edmund's, subsequently at London, and finally at Bath. He pub. some tracts upon Mrs. Stephens's famous medicine for the stone,—of which he was a victim,—and some other professional treatises, but is best known by his Observations on Man, his Frame, his Duty, and his Expectations, Lon., 1749, 2 vols. 8vo. Repub. by his son, 1791, 4to, with Notes and Additions, from the German of H. A. Pistorius, Rector of Poseritz, in the Island of Rugen, and a sketch of the Life and Character of Dr. Hartley. Again, with additions, by Dr. Joseph Priestley, 1801, 3 vols. 8vo.

"This is the most valuable edition of this excellent work."—DR. PRIESTLEY.

In 1775, 8vo, appeared Hartley's Theory of the Human Mind, on the Principle of the Association of Ideas; with Essays relating to the Subjects of it, by Joseph Priestley, LL.D. Again, 1790, 8vo. Hartley's philosophical theory

"Regards the brain, the nerves, and the spinal marrow, as the direct instruments of sensation. External objects, he conceives, excite vibrations in these medullary cords, which vibrations, once communicated, are kept up by a certain elastic fluid called ether. After a sufficient repetition of these vibrations, the sensations leave behind them types and images of themselves. Frequent repetition excites association, and association in its turn imparts to any one idea the power of exciting all the related ideas,—a power which belongs likewise to the vibratiles and their miniature images. Upon this principle and theory of association, he attempts to account for all the phenomena of the mental constitution of man."

The hypothesis of vibrations, it is well known, has been completely overthrown by Haller's demonstration that there can be no such thing as vibrations in the nervous system. Priestley endeavours to prove that Hartley was a materialist like himself; but Hartley "dreaded nothing so much" as this imputation, though certainly he is to be read with caution, and cannot be proposed as a sound guide in theology. As regards his obligations as a philosopher to Newton, Locke, Gay, and even to Aristotle, and how far he concurs with Hobbes, can be ascertained by an examination of the authorities referred to below. As an expositor of the "Law of Association"—we use the term Law not without scruple—Hartley is certainly entitled to some credit, and he has been fully paid. We quote some opinions respecting his philosophical speculations as displayed in the Observations on Man:

"Something was done in this field of knowledge by Descartes, very much by Mr. Locke, but most of all by Dr. Hartley, who has thrown more useful light upon the theory of the mind, than Newton did upon the theory of the natural world."—DR. PRIESTLEY: Remarks on Reid, Beattie, and Oswald, 1774.

"Johnson, one day, observing a friend of his packing up two volumes of Observations on Man, written by this good and great man, to take into the country, said, 'sir, you do right to take Dr. Hartley with you; Priestley said of him, that he had learned more from Hartley than from any book he had ever read, except the Bible.'"—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

"Hartley has investigated the principle of Association more deeply, explained it more accurately, and applied it more usefully, than even his great and venerable predecessor, Mr. Locke."—DR. PARR: Sermon on Education, 1774.

"The writer who has built most upon Hobbes, and may be reckoned, in a certain sense, the commentator, if he who fully explains and develops a system may deserve that name, was Hartley."—Dillon's Lib. Hist. of Europe, q. v.

"That there is great value to be attached to much which Hartley has drawn from the law of association, and that he has afforded an explanation of many phenomena, before very imperfectly understood, cannot be denied. The very labour, however, with which he threw himself into his system, and the very closeness with which he analyzed the facts in the case, necessarily imparted a one-sidedness to his philosophy, and led to the neglect of some other facts equally important."—Morrell's Hist. of Mod. Philos.

"It is the first attempt to join the study of intellectual man to that of physical man."—Cousin's Hist. of Mod. Philos., O. W. Wight's Trans.

Cousin is a high authority,—but does he not forget philosophical caution when he styles Hartley's the "first attempt"? We offer no counter-statement, but we think it exceedingly hazardous to pretend to designate "the first attempt" in any branch of human speculation. We have ventured to hint some doubts respecting the extraordinary merit which has been claimed for Hartley's speculations; and, if we err here, we err with great examples:

"The capital fault of Hartley is that of a rash generalization, which may prove imperfect, and which is at least premature. All attempts to explain or instruct by this principle have hitherto been unavailing. Many of the most important processes of reasoning have not hitherto been accounted for by it."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: 2d Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

"The intentions of both [Bonnet and Hartley] are allowed, by those who best knew them, to have been eminently pure and worthy; but it cannot be said of either, that his metaphysical writings have contributed much to the instruction or to the improvement of the public. On the contrary, they have been instrumental in spreading a set of speculative tenets very nearly allied to that sentimental and fantastical modification of Spinozism which for many years past has prevailed so much and produced such mischievous effects in some parts of Germany."—DUGALD STEWART: 1st Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

Bishop Watson reprinted in his Collection of Tracts one on the Truth of the Christian Religion, prefaced by the remark:

"This tract is printed from the second volume of Dr. Hartley's Observations on Man; it is written with singular closeness of thought, and to be well understood must be read with great attention."—BISHOP WATSON.

Hartlib, Samuel, the son of a Polish merchant, emigrated to London in the 17th century, and engaged in a mercantile agency. He was a man of great public spirit, much practical wisdom, and greatly esteemed by his contemporaries. Milton addressed to him his Tractate on Education, about 1646; Sir Wm. Petty inscribed to him Two Letters on the same subject, 1647, &c.; and there are other such evidences of the high respect in which he was held at home and abroad. He was the author of some theological and educational treatises, and several works on husbandry were pub. in his name. Those which we have numbered 1, 2, and 3, in the list which follows, were written by others.

1. The Discourse of Husbandry used in Brabant and Flanders, Lon., 1645, '50, 4to. 2. Legacy; an enlargement of the above, 1651, '52, '55, 4to. 3. The Reformed Husbandman, 1651, 4to. 4. Essay on the Advancement of Husbandry and Learning, &c., 1651, 4to. 5. The Complete Husbandman, 1659, 4to. He pub. two treatises—1653 and '54—on the Silk-Worm in Virginia. Harvey, D. W. Public Amusements, 1805.

Harvey, Gabriel, LL.D., 1545?-1630? an excellent English and Latin poet, equally well known as the friend of Spenser and as the enemy of Nash, was educated at Christ's College and at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and in 1585 became Doctor of Laws. The following are his principal English publications:—1. Three proper and witty Familiar Letters: lately passed between two Universities Men, Lon., 1580, 4to. Bibl. Anglo-Poet., 344, £30. The University men were himself and Edmund Spenser. 2. Fovre Letters and certaine Sonnets, 1592, 4to. Bibl. Anglo-Poet., £25. Reprinted in the Archaica. This contains many literary notices of his contemporaries, and is therefore of great value to the antiquary. 3. Pierces Supererogation; or, a new Prayse of the Old Asse, 1593, 4to. 4. A New Letter of Notable Contents, 1593, 4to. The two last, bound in one vol., produced, at the Bindley's sale, £17 17s. The same vol. is now (1856) offered by Mr. Joseph Lilly, of London, for £8 18s. 5d., exactly one-half. Harvey's poem of Iobbbinal, prefixed to Spenser's Færic Queene, has been highly praised. Harvey was fond of using the Latin versionification in English poetry, and exerted his influence with his illustrious friend to induce him to follow his example:

"I like your English Hexameters so well, that I also enure my pen sometimes in that kind."—EDMUND SPENSER: in a letter to Harvey.

Harvey, William. Serms., 1657-1705.

Harvey, William, M.D., 1578-1657, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood, a native of Folkestone, Kent, was educated at Cains College, Cambridge, and subsequently studied anatomy at Padua under the celebrated Fabricius ab Aquapendente. In 1602 he returned to England; in 1615 was appointed Prof. of Anatomy and Surgery to the Royal College of Physicians; and about 1616 to 1619 publicly stated the great discovery which has conferred upon him such celebrity, but the announcement of which was received with unsparing ridicule and for more than twenty years provoked unrelenting persecution. His exposition of his theory was not pub. until 1628: it is entitled Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis et Sanguinis Circulatione, Francf., 4to. His Exercitationes de Generatione Animalium was pub. in 1651, Lon., 4to. This valuable work would have been much more complete, had it not been for the loss of the author's papers, relating principally to the generation of insects. This loss, which occurred when his house was plundered during the Civil Wars, he feelingly deploras many years after the event. Harvey contributed to Phil. Trans. (1669) an Anatomical Account concerning Thomas Parr, who died at the age of 152 years and 9 months. In 1654, on the resignation of Dr. Praujean, Harvey was unanimously nominated as his successor in the Presidency of the College of Physicians; but his advanced age and bodily infirmities induced him to decline the proffered honour. An ed. of his works—Opera Omnia, &c.—was pub. in 1727, Lugd. Bat., 2 vols. 4to; but a better ed., with a Life of the Author, in Latin, by Dr. Lawrence, was issued by the College of Physicians in 1766, Lon., 2 vols. 4to. A new ed. of his works was pub. by the Syd. Soc., 1846-47, pp. 624. The Latin style of Dr. Harvey has been greatly admired for its perspicuity, fluency, and elegance. There were many attempts to deprive this great man of the credit of his discovery; but by modern writers (if we except Dr. Wm. Hunter, see his Two Introd. Lects. to his Anat. Lects., 1784, 4to, and Dr. J. R. Coxe) his claim has been honourably allowed.

As regards the value of Harvey's discovery as contrasted with the results of previous investigations, the true state of the case is well summed up by an eminent modern authority, who has felt justified in treating this question at considerable length:

"It may indeed be thought wonderful that Servetus, Columbus, or Cesalpin should not have more distinctly apprehended the consequences of what they maintained, since it seems difficult to conceive the lesser circulation without the greater: but the defectiveness of their views is not to be alleged as a counter-balance to the more steady sagacity of Harvey."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, q. v.

If the student who desires to pursue this subject further inquire as to the best sources of information, we refer him to the authorities cited below, and especially to Harvey's own exposition, for—to quote the language of Dr. Freind—

"As it was entirely owing to him, so he has explained it with all the clearness imaginable; and, though much has been written upon that subject since, I may venture to say, his own book is the shortest, the plainest, and the most convincing of any, as we may be satisfied, if we look into the many apologies written in defence of the circulation."

To this testimony we may add that of Mr. Hume:

"Harvey is entitled to the glory of having made, by reasoning alone, without any mixture of accident, a capital discovery in one of the most important branches of science. He had also the happiness of establishing at once this theory on the most solid and convincing proofs; and posterity has added little to the arguments suggested by his industry and ingenuity."—Hist. of England: The Restoration.

See Life by Dr. Lawrence; Freind's Hist. of Med.; Aikin's Biog. Mem. of Med.; Lives of Brit. Physicians, in Murray's Family Library, vol. xiv.; The Gold-Headed Cane: Physic and Physicians; Ambrey's Letters of Eminent Persons, 1813, 3 vols. 8vo; Biog. Brit.; Rees's Cyc.; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Hist. of Medicine to 19th cent., by P. V. Renouard.

Here we had intended to close; but we feel unwilling to omit Harvey's own account of the difficulties which encompassed his path when engaged in those laborious investigations which were crowned at last with such ample recompense. On a subject of such importance to the general interests of humanity, the doctors, we trust, will not be unwilling to forgive a little enthusiasm, even in a laic:

"Devoting myself to discern the use and utility of the movements of the heart in animals, in a great number of dissections, I found at first the subject so full of difficulties that I thought for a long time, with Fracastor, that the secret was known to God alone. I could distinguish neither in what manner the systole and diastole took place, nor at what moment the dilatation and constriction occurred, owing to the celerity of the movements of the heart, which in most animals is executed in the twinkling of an eye, or like the flash of lightning. I floated undecided, without knowing on what opinion to rest. Finally, from my doubled care and attention, by multiplying and varying my experiments, and by comparing the various results, I believed I had put my finger on the truth, and commenced unravelling the labyrinth. I believed I had seized the correct idea of the movement of the heart and arteries, as well as their true use. From that time I did not cease to communicate my views either to my friends, or to the public in my academical course."

3. The New Test., collated with the most approved MSS., with select notes in English, critical and explanatory, 1776, 2 vols. 12mo.

"This edition is certainly entitled to a place among the critical editions of the New Testament, though it is not accompanied with various readings: for, though Dr. Harwood has adopted the common text as the basis of his own, he has made critical corrections wherever the received reading appeared to him to be erroneous. The manuscripts which he has generally followed when he departs from the common text are the Cantabrigiensis, in the Gospel and Acts, and the Claronontanus in the Epistles of St. Paul."—Bishop Marsh's Michaelis.

There surely, however, must be more in it than this. I once asked a professional gentleman, who had particular opportunities of experience on the subject, whether he always found the brain of maniacs in a preternatural or disordered state. He said that he frequently, perhaps generally, did; but that in many cases where the faculties were most completely deranged, that organ had every appearance of being in a perfectly sound and healthy condition."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., June 5, 1798.

"Ex his omnibus, longe sunt humanissimi qui Cantium incolunt, Artes erantur fortibus et bonis, Nec imbellem Fervorem progenerant."

Second ed., improved, corrected, and continued to the present time, 1797-1801, 12 vols. 8vo. This work is now scarce and high in price. It is the result of labour extending over a period of forty years.

"The whole exhibits more research than taste, either in arranging the information, or in style; and it is very defective in notices of manners, arts, or biographical and literary history. Its highest praise is that of a faithful record of the property of the country, and of its genealogical history."

Hastings, Thomas, an American author, has pub. several collections of music for churches, schools, &c., some of them in conjunction with Wm. B. Bradbury, and other works relating to Musical Taste, &c.

Hastings, Warren, 1733-1818, Governor of Bengal, a wicked and unscrupulous tyrant, has been already sufficiently noticed in these columns in our lives of EDMUND BURKE, and GEORGE ROBERT GLEIG. He was the son of a clergyman; was educated at Westminster School; entered the East India Company as a writer in 1750; became Governor-General of Bengal in 1774; was arraigned for high crimes and misdemeanours (committed in his official capacity) in 1786; and, nine years after the commencement of proceedings, was acquitted in the House of Lords, in 1795. Those who desire to know more of his history must peruse his life by the Rev. G. R. Gleig; a review of this work by T. B. Macaulay in Edin. Rev., lxxiv. 160-255; the works of Edmund Burke; the account of the Trial pub. by Hastings himself, (Debates of the House of Lords, &c., 1797, 4to); the periodicals, &c. of the day. Hastings was the author of several publications relating to the East India Company, fugitive poetry, essays, &c. See *Watt's Bibl. Hatton, Sir Christopher, d. 1591, Lord-Chancellor of England, 1587, educated at St. Mary Hall, Oxford, had had ascribed to him A Treatise concerning Statutes or Acts of Parliament, and the Exposition thereof, Lon., 1677, 8vo, which it is asserted he did not write,—the fourth Act of the Tragedy of Tancred and Gismund—which Warton thinks he did write,—and some legal tracts, which he may or may not have written. See Athen. Oxon.; Lodge's Illustrations; Park's Walpole's R. and N. Authors; Lloyd's State Worthies; Peck's Desiderata; Fuller's Worthies; Hume's, and other histories of Eng.; Lord Campbell's Lives of the Lord-Chancellors; Memoirs of the Life and Times of Sir Christopher Hatton, by Sir N. H. Nicolas, 1847, 8vo.

"But what was the astonishment of courtiers, of lawyers, and of citizens, when on Saturday, the 29th of April, it was announced that Her Majesty had chosen for the Keeper of her conscience,—to preside in the Chancery and the Star-Chamber, and the House of Lords,—and to superintend the administrations of Justice throughout the realm.—a gay young cavalier never called to the bar, and chiefly famed for his handsome person, his taste in dress, and his skill in dancing.—Sir Christopher Hatton!"—LORD CAMPBELL: Lives of the Lord-Chancellors.

The new Lord-Chancellor seems to have borne himself in his high office better than could have been generally anticipated: but Fuller thinks the queen not to have greatly erred in her judgment or fancy:

"His parts were far above his learning, which mutually so assisted each other, that no manifest want did appear; and the queen at last preferred him Lord Chancellor of England."—Worthies of Northamptonshire.

Another authority also assures us that "He was a person that besides the graces of his person and dancing, had also the adjectments of a strong and subtle capacity,—one that could soon learn the discipline and garb both of the times and the Court."—NAUGHTON.

Lloyd cannot say enough in his praise:

"His features set off his body, his gait his features, his carriage his gait, his parts his carriage, his prudence his parts, and his close patience his prudence."—State Favourites.

Oakland, in his character of Elizabeth's ministers, is not behind Lloyd in his eulogies:

"Splendidus Hatton,
Ille Satelliti regalis ductor, ovanti
Pectore, Mæcenas studiosis, maximus altor
Et fautor veræ virtutis, munificus ipse."

And a greater than all yet cited withheld not a noble tribute to the fortunate salvator who danced himself into the woollack:

"TO THE R. H. SIR C. HATTON, Lord High-Chancellor of England.

"Those prudent heads, that with their counsels wise,
Whilom the pillars of th' earth did sustain;
And taught ambitious Rome to tyrannise,
And in the neck of all the world to reign.
Oft from those grave affairs were wont t' abstain,
With the sweet lady-muses for to play.
So Ennius, the elder African;
So Maro oft did Cesar's cares allay;
So, you, great Lord! that with your counsel sway
The burden of this kingdom mightily;
With like delights sometimes may eke delay,
The rugged brow of careful policy;
And to those idle rhymes lend little space,
Which, for their title's sake, may find more grace."

Haven, Mrs. Alice B., formerly Miss Bradley, a native of Hudson, N. York, was married in 1846 to the late Joseph C. Neal, the popular author of the Charcoal Sketches. After his decease she superintended the Gazette which had long borne her husband's name, and contributed to it and to other periodicals many prose and poetical articles. Having been from a very early age a contributor to the literary journals of the day, she now found the advantage of the possession of a practised pen. In 1853 Mrs. Neal was married to Mr. Joshua L. Haven. In 1850 she gave to the world The Gossips of Rivertown, with Sketches in Prose and Verse,—a graphic description of every-day life in the country. But it is as a writer for the young that Mrs. Haven has acquired honours of the most substantial, truly valuable, and enduring character. The excellent "Cousin ALICE" is a favoured guest in many a household circle,—the "Parents' Assistant" and "The Children's Friend."

The volumes entitled Helen Morton's Trial, No Such Word as Fail, Contentment Better than Wealth, Patient Waiting No Loss, All's Not Gold that Glitters, Pictures from the Bible, Watch and Pray, A Place for Everything and Everything in its Place, Nothing Venture Nothing Have, Out of Debt out of Danger, The Coopers, have doubtless improved the heart whilst gratifying the imagination, and instructed the conscience as well as pleased the taste.

Hawes, Miss Mary Virginia, a native of Richmond, Virginia, daughter of Samuel P. Hawes, late of Dorchester, Mass., has pub. three popular novels under the nom de plume of Marion Harland. 1. Alone; a Tale of Southern Life and Manners, Richmond, 1854, 12mo. Repub. in London in the same year. Noticed in the Lon. Athenaeum, 1854, 1397. In America the 19th ed. was pub. in February, 1856. 2. The Hidden Path, N. York, 1855, 12mo.

"This is an improvement upon the author's last story of Alone, reviewed by us on its appearance. There is more pith and consistency in the plot, and very much less fine writing; fewer provincialisms, both of thought and expression. The incidents of ordinary life are still treated too grandly."—Lon. Athen.

Hawes, Stephen, an English poet, Groom of the Privy Chamber to Henry VII., is best known by his Temple of Glasse, 4to, The Conversion of Swerers, 4to, and The Pass Tyne of Pleasure, 1517, 4to.

"If the poems of Rowley be not genuine, the PASTIME OF PLEASURE is almost the only effort of imagination and invention which had appeared in our poetry since Chaucer."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

"Those who require the ardent words or the harmonious grace of poetical diction will not frequently be content with Hawes. Unlike many of our older versifiers, he would be judged more unfavourably by extracts than by a general view of his long work, [The Pass Tyne of Pleasure]. He is rude, obscure, full of pedantic Latinisms, and probably has been disfigured in the press; but learned and philosophical, reminding us frequently of the school of James I."—Hollam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

"That he is greatly superior to many of his immediate predecessors and contemporaries, in harmonious versification and clear expression, will appear from the following stanza:

"Besydes this gyantt, upon every tree," &c.

Hawker, Robert, 1753-1827, a Calvinistic divine, a native of Exeter, Vicar of Charles-the-Martyr, Plymouth, for fifty years, pub. many serms. and theolog. works, among the best-known of which are The Commentary on the Old and N. Test., 1816, 9 vols., 40 Parts, 8vo; new ed., 1842, 3 vols. 4to; The Poor Man's Comment on the N. Test., 1816, 4 vols. 12mo; The Poor Man's Comment on the Old Test., 1822, 6 vols. 12mo; Concord and Dict. to the Bible, new ed., 1846, 12mo; Zion's Pilgrim, 15th ed., 1854, 18mo; Poor Man's Morning and Evening Portion, new ed., 1855, 12mo. There are two vols. of selections from his Commentary on the Bible:—Spiritual Reflections on the Several Chapters of Holy Scripture, 1845, p. 8vo. A collective ed. of his Works, with a Memoir of his Life and Writings, by the Rev. John Williams, D.D., of Stroud, was pub. in 1831, in 10 vols. 8vo, £4 4s.; r. 8vo, £5 15s. 6d. His commentary is better suited for the closet than the library. Mr. Bickersteth describes it as

"Calvinistic and full of the Saviour, but wanting in just criticism."—Christian Student.

"It was said of the celebrated commentators Cocceius and Grotius, that the one found Christ everywhere, and the other nowhere. Dr. Hawker is of the former school, and Jesus is the name which he everywhere 'delighteth to honour.' He writes with great modesty: the general design is good, and its tendency excellent."—DR. WILLIAMS.

The plan is as follows:—1. An introduction to every book, and a table of contents to each chapter. 2. References to other passages of Scripture, by way of illustration, with occasional elucidations and remarks. 3. Reflections at the close of each chapter, by way of improvement.

Hawkesworth, Miss. Relics of Antiquity: forty-eight Plates, with descrip., 1811.

Hawkesworth, John, LL.D., 1715 or '19–1773, a native of London, is best known as the editor of The Adventurer, (pub. Nov. 7, 1752–March 9, 1754), and the author of 70 or 72 of its 140 numbers. He was also a contributor to the Gentleman's Magazine; pub. some Tales,—Edgar and Emmeline, and Almorán and Hamet,—1761; edited Swift's Works and Letters, with his Life, 1765–66; pub. a trans. of Telemachus in 1763; wrote Zimri, an excellent oratorio, and other plays; and in 1773 (3 vols. 4to) gave to the world an Account of the Voyages of Byron, Wallis, Cartaret, and Cook. By this last publication, for which he was engaged by the Government, he gained £6000,—not unalloyed by severe censure for moral improprieties in his description of savage life, for alleged nautical errors and scientific defects. Vol. i. contains the voyages of Byron, Wallis, and Cartaret. Captain Cook's first voyage occupies vol. ii. and iii. They were trans. and pub. in German and French in the following year. See COOK, CAPTAIN JAMES. He was an imitator of Dr. Johnson, and in his youth was one of the few pupils of which the doctor's school could boast. He was a zealous promoter of the interests of religion and morality, and, we have reason to believe, deeply regretted the faults for which his work on the Voyages of Byron, &c. was justly blamed.

As a writer he occupies the first rank among English classical essayists. Dr. Johnson, in his Lives of the English Poets, referring to Hawkesworth's Life of Swift, characterizes the author as one "Capable of dignifying his narrations with elegance of language and force of sentiment."—Life of Swift.

The two biographies are thus contrasted by a diligent student of English literature:

"Read Hawkesworth's Life of Swift: of whose character and conduct but an imperfect idea is given by the narrative of Johnson. Hawkesworth is much more communicative and interesting; and the minuteness and simplicity with which he details the few but deplorable incidents of the last four years of Swift's life are highly affecting. The circumstance of his struggling to express himself after a silence broken but once for more than a year, and finding all his efforts ineffectual, leaving a deep sigh, quite cleaves the heart."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Literature, Oct. 11, 1796.

One of the ablest and most elegant critics in the language presents us with a most agreeable portrait of Dr. Hawkesworth, from which we give a brief extract:

"His imagination was fertile and brilliant; his diction pure, elegant, and unaffected; . . . his manners were polished and affable, and his conversation has been described as uncommonly fascinating—as combining instruction and entertainment with a flow of words which, though unstudied, was yet concisely and appropriately eloquent."—Literary Life of Dr. Hawkesworth: Dr. Drake's Essays, vol. v., q. 2.

Hawkins, Sir John, 1719–1789, a descendant of the eminent naval commander of the same name, was designed for his father's trade,—house-building and surveying,—but preferred the study of the law, and became an attorney and solicitor. In 1749 he was admitted a member of a club which originated with Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Johnson, composed of nine members, and meeting on Tuesday evenings at the King's Head, in Ivy-lane, near St. Paul's. In 1733 he was married to Miss Sidney Storer: and, having thus come into the possession of a large fortune, he retired from business, and devoted himself to literary pursuits and magisterial duties. In 1760 he edited Walton's Complete Angler, with Notes, 1 vol. 8vo, and a Life; in 1761 he became Justice for the County of Middlesex; in 1763 he was elected one of the first members of The Literary Club; in 1772 he was knighted; in 1773 and '78 he contributed some notes to Johnson's and Steevens's edit. of Shakspeare; in 1776 he pub., in 5 vols. 4to, his General History of the Science and Practice of Music; and in 1787 pub., in 11 vols. 8vo, an edit. of The Life and Works of Dr. Johnson. He was highly valued by his distinguished friend, drew up his will at his request, and consented to serve as one of his executors. Of Sir John's principal work, to which he devoted the labour of sixteen years,—the History of Music,—we have already had occasion to speak at length in our life of CHARLES BURNEY, Mus. Doc., to which the reader is referred. Some interesting criticisms upon Sir John's History, impugning its accuracy and judgment, will be found in the London Athenæum, 1819, 284, 338; 1854, 436; and in Blackwood's Mag., 1830, 475-476. We have already stated—see p. 300—that in 1819 Dr. Busby pub. a General History of Music, abridged from the works of Burney and Hawkins, in 2 vols. 8vo. Since we wrote Burney's life, a new edit. of Sir John's work has appeared, with the author's Posthumous Notes, Lon., 1854. This reprint is thus noticed by an eminent authority:

"Sir John's book, if it is to be consulted as an authority in competition with Burney's, demands skilled and searching editorship, and such verification of every statement as few possess either sufficient time or knowledge to administer. No process of the kind, it is needless to say, has been attempted with regard to the present edition; and this makes the tone of panegyric or apology in the preface unadvisable, as provoking comparison and reply."—Lon. Athenæum, 1854, 436.

As regards Sir John's Life and Works of Dr. Johnson, the reader of Boswell—and who is not?—must receive the censures of the latter on this publication cum grano salis. A competent judge remarks in one of the first of his many excellent annotations upon Boswell's Life of Johnson:

"I will here observe, once for all, that Mr. Boswell is habitually unjust to Sir J. Hawkins, whose Life of Johnson (published in 1787) is by no means so inaccurate or unsatisfactory as he represents it. He borrowed largely from it, and it contains a great deal of Johnsonian life which Mr. Boswell had not the opportunity of seeing."—JOHN WILSON CROKER.

In early life Sir John was a contributor to the Gentleman's Magazine, the Universal Spectator, and the Westminster Journal. In some of the essays thus contributed, the author favoured the public with specimens of his poetical abilities. In addition to the works already noticed, he pub. Observations on the Highways, in 1763, 8vo, a Charge to a Grand Jury, in 1770, 8vo, and another Charge to a General Jury, in 1780, 8vo, and a Dissertation on the Armorial Ensigns of Middlesex and Westminster, in 1780, 4to. For further information respecting Sir John Hawkins, who was really a very respectable character both in public and private life, we refer the reader to an interesting memoir in Chalmers's Biog. Dict., drawn up from materials furnished by the deceased knight. See also Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting; Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors; Gent. Mag., June, 1814, 551-553; July, 1814, 12.

This ed. contains an Introduction, endeavouring to throw some light on the author, with notices of the various persons to whom the authorship has been attributed. Amongst others to whom this celebrated work has been ascribed are Archbishops Sancroft and Frewen, Bishops Fell, Chapel, and Atterbury, Lawrence Sterne, Abraham Woodhead, Wm. Fulman, Richard Allestree, and Lady Dorothy Pakington. The first ed. was pub., Lon., 1659, 12mo. In English there have been many eds., and it has been trans. into Latin, French, &c. A vol. entitled The Works of the Author of the Whole Duty of Man was pub. in 1682, 2 vols. 12mo; 1684, '87, '95, 1704, '26, fol. Respecting the questio verata of authorship, we must refer the reader to Mr. Hawkins's Introduction, just noticed; Dr. Lort's essay in Nichols's Lit. Anec., ii. 597-604; Dr. Hickeys's dedication of his Anglo-Saxon Grammar; Nash's Hist. of Worcestershire, i. 352; Lowndes's Brit. Lib. 620, 691; Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 1942; Miller's Fly-Leaves, 1st Ser., 1854, 89; and the Lives of ALLESTREE, RICHARD, D.D.; FELL, JOHN, D.D., in this Dictionary. For a table of the contents of the Works of the Author of the Whole Duty of Man, see Darling's Cyc. Bibl., 3194. The question, perhaps,—like the authorship of the ICON BASILIKE and of the LETTERS OF JUNIUS,—may still be considered an open one:

"The author still remains undiscovered. Millions of his books have been dispersed in the Christian world."—Curiousities of Literature.

Undoubtedly the merits—both theological and literary—of The Whole Duty of Man are very great, although as a divinity-treatise Mr. Bickersteth thinks it not unexceptionable:

"The Whole Duty of Man was a practical book to counteract the Antinomians, and contains an impressive Introduction on the care of the soul; the devotional part is full and useful, and it has a good statement of relative duties, but it does not exhibit prominently the only principles and strength on which man can perform them."

"Happy is the man that can form his style upon that of Archbishop Tillotson, and in plain, practical preaching upon the rational, instructive, and familiar way of the Whole Duty of Man."—DEAN STANHOPE.

"The writer deserves to be numbered with Cowley as one of the earliest purifiers of English style from pedantry. After the lapse of one hundred and seventy years they contain scarcely a word or phrase which has become superannuated."—Edin. Rev.

Hawks, Francis Lister, D.D., LL.D., one of the most eminent of living pulpit orators, was born at Newbern, North Carolina, June 10, 1798. He graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1815, and commenced the practice of the law in 1819; was elected to the Legislature of his native State in 1821; ordained a minister of the Episcopal Church in 1827; became assistant minister of St. James's Church, Philadelphia, in 1829; Rector of St. Stephen's Church, New York, in 1830; Rector of St. Thomas's Church, New York, 1832-43; elected, by the General Convention of the Episcopal Church, Missionary Bishop of the South and Southwest in 1835, but declined the office; removed to Mississippi in 1843, and elected bishop of that diocese in 1844,—but not consecrated, in consequence of some intervening difficulties; Rector of Christ Church, New Orleans, 1844-49; Rector of Calvary Church, New York, 1849, to the present date, 1855. Since his last removal to New York, Dr. Hawks had declined (about 1853) the bishopric of Rhode Island.

in Harper's Boys' and Girls' Library under the title of Uncle Philip's Conversations; has contributed to the Protestant Episcopalian of Philadelphia, 1830-31; to the New York Review, (established by him in 1837, and pub. until 1843); to the Church Record, pub. 1840-42; to Arcturus, a Journal of Books and Opinions; and to Putnam's Monthly Magazine. He also edited the Official and other State Papers of the late Major-General Alexander Hamilton, 1842, 8vo. In the early political annals of the country Dr. Hawks is peculiarly at home, and perhaps some of his best compositions will be found in the historical articles contributed to the New York Review. We should not omit to add that this eloquent divine and lucid historian possesses also some claims to the bays of the poet. Dr. Hawks has been engaged for several years in the preparation of a work on the Monuments of Central and Western America, which will doubtless prove a valuable contribution to a most interesting department of antiquarian research. An occasional hour snatched from professional duties is devoted to the laborious task of a History of North Carolina,—a subject which has long engaged the anxious interest of the author. Vol. i., 1854-91, was pub. 1857, 8vo.

Hawthorn, John, Light Dragoon in the Inniskilling Regiment. Poems, Lon., 1779, 4to.

Hawthorne, Nathaniel, a popular American writer, was born at Salem, Massachusetts, about 1807, and graduated at Bowdoin College, Maine, in 1825. His earliest volume was an anonymous romance, pub. in Boston in 1832. This work he has never thought proper to claim, though doubtless, if it could be identified by the public, it would be read with great interest and no little curiosity. In 1837 he pub. his Twice-Told Tales; and in 1842 he gave to the world a second series, and a new edit. of the first. A number of these sketches had originally made their appearance in The Token,—an annual edited by S. G. Goodrich,—and in other periodicals. The title Twice-Told Tales was therefore no misnomer. In 1845 he edited The Journal of an African Cruiser, from the MS. of Mr. Horatio Bridge, of the U. S. Navy. In 1846 he pub. a third collection of magazine-papers, under the title of Mosses from an Old Manse. In the Introduction to this work will be found some interesting autobiographical sketches, to which we must refer the reader for information which our narrow limits exclude. In 1843 he became an occupant of the Old Manse in Concord, where he resided for three years, passing his hours in literary leisure, and in the composition of some of his most charming sketches. In 1846 he received the appointment of Surveyor in the Custom-House at Salem, which post he retained for about a twelvemonth, when a change of administration—that grand evil of American politics—vacated a desk the duties of which had been as faithfully discharged as if the “Ingenious dreamer, in whose well-told tale

Sweet fiction and sweet truth alike prevail,” had been the most practical and every-day character ever venerated by a merchant or worshipped by a politician.

In 1850 he pub. The Scarlet Letter, a romance of intense interest, and exhibiting extraordinary powers of mental analysis and graphic description. This was succeeded in 1851 by The House of the Seven Gables, one of the most popular of his productions, and in 1852 by The Blithedale Romance, a novel founded upon his experience as a member of The Brook Farm Community. Mr. Hawthorne has also pub. another selection from his contributions to magazines and annuals, entitled The Snow Image, and other Twice-Told Tales, and several vols. for the Young:—Grandfather's Chair, True Stories from History and Biography, (1851,) The Wonder-Book, for Girls and Boys, (1851,) and Tanglewood Tales, for Girls and Boys, (1853.) A new ed. of Mosses from an Old Manse was issued in 1854, 2 vols. 12mo, and a new ed. of Twice-Told Tales in 1855, 2 vols. 16mo.

We should not omit to mention, among Mr. Hawthorne's literary labours, his Life of His Excellency Franklin Pierce, President of the United States, pub. in 1852, 16mo. In 1853 Mr. Hawthorne was appointed by President Pierce American Consul at Liverpool, which post he occupied until 1857.

We have many reviews before us of Mr. Hawthorne's productions, but our limits oblige us to be brief in citations. The generous enthusiasm with which the advent of the rising star was hailed by a brother poet (we use the term advisedly) will be perused at this day—twenty years later—with no little interest:

“When a new star rises in the heavens, people gaze after it for a season with the naked eye, and with such telescopes as they may find. In the stream of thought which flows so peacefully deep and clear through the pages of this book, we see the bright reflection of a spiritual star after which men will be fain to gaze with the naked eye, and with the spy-glass of criticism.” This star is but newly risen; and ere long the observations of numerous stargazers, perched up on arm-chairs and editors' tables, will inform the world of its magnitude and its place in the heaven of poetry.—whether it be in the paw of the Great Bear, or on the forehead of Pegasus, or on the strings of the Lyre, or in the wing of the Eagle. Our own observations are as follows:—“To this little work we would say, ‘Live ever, sweet, sweet book.’ It comes from the hand of a man of genius. Every thing about it has the freshness of morning and of May. These flowers and green leaves of poetry have not the dust of the highway upon them. They have been gathered fresh from the secret places of a peaceful and gentle heart. There flow deep waters, silent, calm and cool: and the green leaves look into them and ‘God's blue heaven.’ The book, though in prose, is never-theless written by a poet. He looks upon all things in the spirit of love, and with lively sympathies: for to him external form is but the representation of internal being, all things having a life, an end and aim.”—HENRY W. LONGFELLOW: Review of Twice-Told Tales, 1837, 12mo, pp. 434, in N. Amer. Rev., July, 1837, xlv. 59-73.

Miss Mitford, after a hasty review of the writings of Irving, Cooper, Ware, and Dr. Bird, remarks:

“These excellent writers have been long before the public; but a new star has lately sprung into light in the Western horizon, who in a totally different manner—and nothing is more remarkable among all these American novelists than their utter difference from each other—will hardly fail to cast a bright illumination over both hemispheres. It is hardly two years since Mr. Hawthorne, until then known only by one or two of those little volumes which the sagacious hold as promises of future excellence, put forth that singular book, The Scarlet Letter, apropos to which, Dr. Holmes, who so well knows the value of words, uses this significant expression:

“I snatch the book, along whose burning leaves

His scarlet web our wild romancer weaves.”

“And it is the very word. We do snatch the book; and, until we have got to the end, very few of us, I apprehend, have sufficient strength of will to lay it down. . . . Scarcely a twelvemonth has passed, and another New England story—The House with the Seven Gables—has come to redeem the pledge of excellence given by the first.”—Recollections of a Literary Life: American Prose Writers, Lon., 1852.

NOTICES OF THE SCARLET LETTER:

“With all the care in point of style and authenticity which mark his lighter sketches, this genuine and unique romance may be considered as an artistic exposition of Puritanism as modified by New England colonial life. In truth to costume, local manners, and scenic features, the Scarlet Letter is as reliable as the best of Scott's novels; in the anatomy of human passion and consciousness it resembles the most effective of Balzac's illustrations of Parisian or provincial life; while in developing bravely and justly the sentiment of the life it depicts, it is as true to humanity as Dickens.”—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN: The Prose Poet; Nathaniel Hawthorne, in Mental Portraits, Lon., 1853.

“The frivolous costume and brisk action of the story of fashionable life are easily depicted by the practised sketcher; but a work like The Scarlet Letter comes slowly upon the canvas, where passions are commingled and overlaid with the deliberate and masterly elaboration with which the grandest effects are produced in pictorial composition and coloring. It is a distinction of such works that, while they are acceptable to the many, they also surprise and delight the few who appreciate the nicest arrangement and the most high and careful finish. The Scarlet Letter will challenge consideration, in the name of Art, in the best audience which in any age receives Cervantes, Le Sage, or Scott.”—DR. RUFUS W. GRISWOLD: International Mag., May, 1851.

“No one who has taken up the Scarlet Letter will willingly lay it down till he has finished it; and he will do well not to pause, for he cannot resume the story where he left it. He should give himself up to the magic power of the style, without stopping to open wide the eyes of his good sense and judgment and shake off the spell; or half the weird beauty will disappear like a ‘dissolving view.’ To be sure, when he closes the book, he will feel very much like the giddy and bewildered patient who is just awaking from his first experiment of the effects of sulphuric ether. The soul has been floating or flying between earth and heaven, with dim ideas of pain and pleasure strangely mingled, and all things earthly swimming dizzily and dreamily, yet most beautiful, before the half-shut eye.”—N. Amer. Rev., July, 1850, lxxi. 135-148.

“The Scarlet Letter glows with the fire of a suppressed, secret, feverish excitement: it is not the glow of natural life, but the hectic of disease, which burns upon the cheeks of its actors. . . . The whole sky and air are tropical; and, instead of the gentle monotony of ordinary existence, its long, wearing, languid sorrows, its vulgar meanness and sleep, we have a perpetual strain of excitement,—a fire that neither waxes nor lessens, but keeps at its original scorching heat for years.”—Modern Novelists, Great and Small, in Blackwood's Mag., May, 1855.

“We are by no means satisfied that passions and tragedies like these are the legitimate subjects for fictions: we are satisfied that novels such as Adam Blair, and plays such as The Stranger, may be justly charged with attracting more persons than they warrant by their excitement. But if Sin and Sorrow in their most fearful forms are to be presented in any work of art, they have rarely been treated with a loftier severity, purity, and sympathy, than in Mr. Hawthorne's Scarlet Letter. The touch of the fantastic befitting a period of society in which ignorant and excitable human creatures conceived each other and themselves to be under the direct ‘rule and governance’ of the Wicked One is most skillfully administered. The supernatural here never becomes grossly palpable: the thrill is all the deeper for its action being indefinite and its source vague and distant.”—Lon. Athenaeum, June 15, 1850, p. 634.

NOTICES OF THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES:

“The scenery, tone, and personages of the story are imbued with a local authenticity which is not for an instant impaired by the imaginative charm of romance. We seem to breathe, as we read, the air, and be surrounded by the familiar objects, of a New England town. . . . We may add that the same pure, even, unexaggerated, and perspicuous style of diction that we have recognised in his previous writing is maintained in this.”—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN: The Prose Poet; Nathaniel Hawthorne, in Mental Portraits, Lon., 1853.

“It is not less original, not less striking, not less powerful, than the Scarlet Letter. We doubt, indeed, whether he has elsewhere surpassed either of the three strongly-contrasted characters of the book. . . . The House of the Seven Gables is the purest piece of imagination in our prose literature.”—RUFUS W. GRISWOLD: International Mag., May, 1851.

“The successive scenes of this bold and startling fiction are portrayed with a vividness and power unsurpassed, and rarely equalled. The terrible Nemesis that waits on the extortion of the ancestor, and pursues the wages of his iniquity till the injured family receives its own again, reminds one of the inexorable fate of the Greek tragedy; and, in describing the successive foxtails of the angel of retribution in that ill-starred mansion, the author rises into a fearful sublimity worthy of the theme. In other portions the narrative is sprightly, quaint and droll, the dialogues seldom otherwise than natural and well managed, (though the dapperreotypist talks more than anybody but I should care to hear), and the denouement free, for the most part, from abruptness and improbability. To many readers the book has an additional charm from its truth in numberless minutiae to life, speech, manners, and appearances, as they were in and about Salem thirty years ago. We should have recognised the locality under any disguise whatever of names or pretexts.”—N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1853, lxxvi. 227-237. Read also the review of The Blithedale Romance, in same article, pp. 237-248.

“It would be difficult to deny the gift of ‘poetic insight’ to this mixture of admirable detail with something at once higher and deeper. Balzac, the great novelist of modern France, known only to those among us who thoroughly possess his language, (for he is untranslated and untranslatable), has in certain romances of provincial life the same perfection of Dutch painting and of homely tragedy. But Mr. Hawthorne is free from Balzac's scuff.”—Miss Mitford's Recollections of a Literary Life: American Prose Writers, Lon., 1852.

“The House of Seven Gables is not less remarkable nor less unwholesome than its predecessor. The affectation of extreme homeliness and commonplace in the external circumstances, and the mystery and secret of the family with which these circumstances are interwoven, is very effective in its way; and if it were not that its horrors and its wonders are protracted into tedious long-windedness, we would be disposed to admire the power with which these figures were used, and these situations made. . . . For it is no particular gratification for us to know how Mr. Hawthorne studies his subjects,—how he sets them in different lights, like a child with a new toy, and gets new glimpses of their character and capabilities: we want the result, and not the process: the story completed, but not the photographs from which it is to be made."—Modern Novelists, Great and Small, in Blackwood's Mag., May, 1855.

In this article will be found an extended notice of Mr. Hawthorne's characteristics as a writer of fiction, and particular notices of his principal works. The characteristics referred to are thus happily delineated by four of Mr. Hawthorne's countrymen, each of whom has earned a right to a respectful hearing in the discussion of a question of literary criticism:

"It may safely be asserted that by virtue of his individuality every author and artist of genius creates a peculiar mood, differing somewhat according to the character of the recipients, yet essentially the same. If we were obliged to designate that of Hawthorne in a single word, we should call it metaphysical, or perhaps soulful. He always takes us below the surface and beyond the material; his most fanciful stories are eminently suggestive: he makes us breathe the air of contemplation, and turn our eyes inward. . . . His utterance, too, is singularly clear and simple; his style only rises above the colloquial in the sustained order of its flow; the terms are apt, natural, and fitly chosen. Indeed, a careless reader is liable continually to lose sight of his meaning and beauty, from the entire absence of pretension in his style."—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN: Mental Portraits: Nathaniel Hawthorne, Lon., 1853.

"The characteristics of Hawthorne which first arrest the attention are imagination and reflection; and these are exhibited in remarkable power and activity in tales and essays of which the style is distinguished for great simplicity, purity, and tranquillity. . . . His style is studded with the most poetical imagery, and marked in every part with the happiest graces of expression, while it is calm, chaste, and flowing, and transparent as water."—RUFUS W. GRIESEL: Praise Writers of America, 4th ed., Phila., 1852.

"And here, though we cannot do him justice, let us remember the name of Nathaniel Hawthorne, deserving a place second to none in that band of humorists whose beautiful depth of cheerful feeling is the very poetry of mirth. In ease, grace, delicate sharpness of satire,—in a felicity of touch which often surpasses the felicity of Addison, in a subtlety of insight which often reaches further than the subtlety of Steele,—the humor of Hawthorne presents traits so fine as to be almost too excellent for popularity, as, to every one who has attempted their criticism, they are too refined for statement. The brilliant atoms till, hover, and glance before our minds, but the remote sources of their ethereal light lie beyond our analysis.

"And no speed of ours avails
To hunt upon their shining trails."

EDWIN P. WHIPPLE: Lectures on Subjects connected with Literature and Life: The Ludicrous Side of Life, 3d ed., Boston, 1852.

"Another characteristic of this writer is the exceeding beauty of his style. It is clear as running waters are. Indeed, he uses words merely as stepping-stones, upon which, with a free and youthful bound, his spirit crosses and re-crosses the bright and rushing stream of thought. Some writers of the present day have introduced a kind of Gothic architecture into their style. All is fantastic, vast and wondrous in the outward form, and within is mysterious twilight, and the swelling sound of an organ, and a voice chanting hymns in Latin, which need a translation for many of the crowd. To this we do not object. Let the priest chant in what language he will, so long as he understands his own mass-book. But if he wishes the world to listen and be edified, he will do well to choose a language that is generally understood."—HENRY W. LONGFELLOW: N. American Review, xlv. 63-64.

Those who possess a set of the Democratic Review will find many of Hawthorne's Tales and Sketches scattered through its vols. See ii. 129, 360; iii. 18, 321; v. 51; xii. 146, 253, 360, 515, 604; xiii. 85, 186, 627; xiv. 78, 269, 605; xv. 23, 454, 545; xvi. 337; xviii. 31, 97, 360, 457.

An interesting biographical sketch of Hawthorne, by George William Curtis, accompanied with a representation of the 'Old Manse' in Concord, made so famous by Hawthorne's inhabitation, will be found in The Homes of American Authors. Sublime, to mighty aspirations wrought.

Are thine, by thirst of great achievement fired.

Hayley, William, D.D., Dean of Chichester, Rector of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and Chaplain-in-ordinary. Serms., 1687–1702.

Hayley, William, 1745–1820, grandson of the preceding, and a native of Chichester, was educated at Eton, and at Trin. Coll., Cambridge, and, on leaving the university, retired to his paternal estate of Earham, at Sussex, and devoted his hours to literary pursuits. In 1792 he became acquainted with the poet Cowper, and as the biographer of his friend has already claimed our notice in the life of the latter. As the friend of Gibbon, also, his name occurs on p. 662 of this Dictionary. About the year 1800, Mr. Hayley's spirits were greatly depressed by the loss of his natural son, Thomas Alphonso Hayley, a sculptor of much promise; and he removed to Felpham, where he resided until his death in 1820. He pub. (1778–1811) many occasional works, both in prose and poetry. Epistles, Essays, Elegies, Dialogues, plays, biographies, translations from Milton's Latin and Italian Poems, &c.—almost all of which are now forgotten. A collective ed. of his Poems and Plays was pub. in 1785, 6 vols. sm. 8vo; 1788, 6 vols. cr. 8vo. The following are his principal productions. 1. Poetical Epistle to an eminent Painter, (George Romney,) 1778, 4to. 2. Essay on History, in 3 Epistles to Edward Gibbon, 1780, 4to. 3. The Triumphs of Temper; a Poem, in six cantos, 1781, 4to. 4. Essay on Epic Poetry; in 5 Epistles, 1782, 4to. 5. Essay on Old Maids, 1785, 3 vols. 12mo. 6. Dialogues. Anon. 7. Life and Poetical Works of John Milton, 1794–99, 3 vols. fol. 8. Life of Milton, 1796, 4to. Originally prefixed to Boydell's ed. of Milton, 1791–97, 3 vols. fol. 9. Essay on Sculpture; Epistles to Flaxman, 1800, 8vo. 10. Life, Works, and Letters of Cowper, 1803–04, 3 vols. 4to. Reviewed in Edin. Rev., vi. 56-63. 12. Ballads founded upon Original and Curious Anecdotes relating to the Instinct and Sagacity of Animals, 1805, Svo. "Mediocrity, as all the world knows, is forbidden to poets and to punsters; but the punster has a privilege peculiar to himself—the exceeding badness of his puns is imputed as a merit. This privilege may fairly be extended to Mr. Hayley: his present volume is so incomparably absurd as that no merit within his reach could have amused us half so much."—ROBERT SOUTHLEY: Aikin's Annual Review, iv. 675-676.

13. Latin and Italian Poems of Milton, trans. into English verse; with a Fragment of a Comment. on Paradise Lost, by Cowper, 1808, 4to; 1810, 4 vols. Svo. 14. Life of George Romney, Esq., 1809, 4to.

"Much of what he relates of Romney has been contradicted or questioned by his son; he takes higher ground, too, than the painter's genius can warrant."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

15. Three Plays, 1811, Svo. 16. Memoirs of the Life and Writings of William Hayley, written by himself, &c. Edited by John Johnson, LL.D., 1823, 2 vols. 4to.

"Mr. Hayley received a very considerable annuity, during the last twelve years of his life, as the price of his own Memoirs, which he was to leave in a fit state for publication. . . . Hayley is, perhaps, the only person who ever dealt with his posthumous reputation as a post-obit, and converted it into a present income."—ROBERT SOUTHLEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxi. 265-311. Read this review, which displeas'd Gifford greatly; for Southley tells us:

"My paper upon Hayley was so offensive to Mr. Gifford, that after it was printed he withheld it for two successive numbers, and if he had not then ceased to be editor and had persisted in withholding it, I might have probably withdrawn from the Review. There neither was nor could be any reason for this, but that he could not bear to see Hayley spoken of with decent respect."

Vide Southey's Letter, in Sir S. E. Brydges's Autobiography; see also Southey's Life and Correspondence for other notices of Hayley.

Respecting Hayley's Memoirs, see also Lon. Mouth Rev., ciii. 267; cv. 1; Blackwood's Mag., xiv. 184, 303; and see remarks on Southey's review of the Memoirs, Blackwood's Mag., xvii. 477.

It may be difficult for some of us to believe that Hayley was, "in his time," to quote Southey's words, "by popular election, king of the English poets;" but, as Mr. Moir truly observes,

"The popularity of Hayley in an age so artificial and so pragmatical as that wherein he flourished—an age of minuets, and hoops, and pomatum, and powdered queues, and purple velvet doublets, and flesh coloured silk stockings—is not much to be wondered at, when we consider the subjects on which he wrote, and the real graces of his style. Such poetry was relished, because it was called forth by the exigencies and adapted to the taste of the particular time at which it was written. It was a reflection of existing modes and habits of thought; and it must be allowed that his mastery over versification was of no common order. True it is that his mawkish or overstrained sentiment might at times expose him to ridicule; but the praise he received from Cowper is a strong proof of the influence which his writings at that time exercised over society. That power and that popularity have now utterly passed away, for he was deficient in truth and nature: his house was built on the sand; and, except the case of Churchill. It would be difficult to point out another whose reputation had assumed so much the aspect of a fixed star, and yet only proved 'the comet of a season.'"—Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

Doubtless much of his reputation was owing to his general popularity in polite society,—a popularity not undervalued; for, as Southey emphatically declares,

"Every thing about that man is good except his poetry."—Letter to Samuel Taylor Coleridge, August 4, 1802: Southey's Life and Correspondence.

"He lived in days," says Allan Cunningham, "when polish held the place of vigour, and harmony that of feeling, and poetry was judged of as a song is now,—by the sweetness of its music. In all the externals of verse he was a master; as he moved in good society, his opinions spread and prevailed; and, though he penned odd quartos both in prose and verse, no one imagined that the weariness they felt in perusal could come from the accomplished author of The Triumphs of Temper."—Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

But we should not forget, whilst making large deductions from the extravagant adulation of our fathers, to concede to this amiable, if not brilliant, writer, all the merit which he can justly claim. Perhaps this happy medium has been accurately stated by a critic of large comprehension and great refinement of taste:

"Hayley's Epistles on Painting, History, and Epic Poetry, written in smooth, correct, and flowing versification, but not unfrequently deficient in energy and compression, inculcate much elegant and judicious criticism, and diffuse much light over their respective subjects."—DR. DRAKE.

Hayne, Paul H., b. at Charleston, S.C., 1831, is a son of Lieut. Hayne, of the U.S. Navy, and a nephew of Col. Robert Y. Hayne, the eloquent senatorial antagonist of Daniel Webster. Mr. Hayne has contributed a number of articles to the Southern Literary Messenger and to other periodicals, has been editor of the Charleston Literary Gazette, and is now connected with the editorial department of the Charleston Evening News. In 1855 he pub. a vol. of Poems, Boston, 16mo, which possess extraordinary merit. The Temptation of Venus is the principal poem in this collection. See Graham's (Phila.) Magazine, Feb. 1855. We are authorized to expect much from Mr. Hayne in the future.

Hayne, Robert Y., 1791-1839, a native of the parish of St. Paul, South Carolina, was a grandnephew of Col. Isaac Hayne, a Revolutionary patriot, who was executed by the British in 1781. Robert Y. Hayne filled in succession the offices of member of the State legislature, Speaker of the House, Attorney-General of the State, United States Senator, and Governor of the State. His speech in the U.S. Senate, Jan. 25, 1830, which elicited Daniel Webster's celebrated rejoinder, has rarely been equalled, in all that constitutes true eloquence, in the American Congress. Hazlitt, William, 1778-1830, the son of a Unitarian minister of Shropshire, after receiving his education at the Unitarian College at Hackley, began life as an artist, and executed a number of paintings, which pleased every taste but that of the too fastidious artist, who threw away the pencil in disgust, even amidst the commendations of his admiring friends. Removing to London, he secured a situation as Parliamentary reporter for some of the daily papers, and thus commenced a literary career of great digence, which was prosecuted until his death in 1830. He contributed largely to various periodicals; and many of his most popular essays, afterwards collected into volumes, originally thus appeared as fugitive essays. He was one of the contributors to the Edinburgh Review, and also officiated as home editor of "The Liberal."

His first acknowledged production (pub. anonymously) was—1. An Essay on the Principles of Human Action, which has been commended as indicative of considerable metaphysical acuteness. This work was succeeded by the following publications:—2. The Eloquence of the British Senate, 1808, 2 vols. 8vo. 3. English Grammar for Schools, &c., 1810, 12mo. 4. The Round Table; a collection of Essays, 1817, 2 vols. 8vo. Gifford*. 19. Journey through France and Italy, 8vo. 20. Essays and Characters; written at Winterslow, 12mo. 21. Conversations with James Northcote, p. 8vo. We might also include his treatise on the Fine Arts, contributed to the 7th ed. Encyc. Brit., (see HAYDON, BENJAMIN ROBERT,) a volume of Characteristics, &c. After his decease, his son pub. his literary Remains, with Life, by his son, and Thoughts on his Genius and Writings, by Sir E. L. Bulwer and Sir T. Noon Talford, 1836, 2 vols. 8vo. New ed., 1839, 2 vols. 8vo. This the reader must procure, and also the revised edits. of his best-known works, edited by his son, (1845, &c.) viz.: Table-Talk, 2 vols.; Plain Speaker, 2 vols.; Lects. on Dramatic Lit.; on the English Stage; on English Poets; on English Comic Writers; Characters of Shakspeare's Plays; Criticisms on Art, 2 series, 2 vols.; Winterslow Essays and Characters, &c. Messrs. Carey & Hart, Philadelphia, pub. in 1848, (in 5 vols. 12mo.), The Miscellaneous Works of William Hazlitt: Vols. I., II. Table-Talk; III. Lects. on the Dramatic Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth; Characters of Shakspeare's Plays; IV. Lects. on the English Comic Writers; Lects. on the English Poets; V. The Spirit of the Age. Mr. H. C. Baird, of Phila., has added to these 5 vols. a reprint of the Life of Napoleon, in 1 vol. 8vo. A 2d ed. of this work, revised by the author's son, was pub. Lon., 1852, 4 vols. 12mo. Hazlitt also edited An Abridgment of the Light of Nature, originally published in seven volumes, under the name of Edward Search, Esq., 1807, 8vo.

As an essayist, a critic, and a sketcher of literary portraits, both the merits and demerits of Hazlitt were undoubtedly great. In testimony of this assertion we could summon many witnesses, but our limits will admit of but brief citations:

"In critical disquisitions on the leading characters and works of the drama, he is not surpassed in the whole range of English literature; and what in an especial manner commands admiration in their perusal is the indication of refined taste and chastened reflection which they contain, and which are more perspicuous in detached passages than in any entire work. He appears greater when quoted than when read. Possibly, had his life been prolonged, it might have been otherwise, and some work emanated from his gifted pen which would have placed his fame on a durable foundation."—SIR ARCHEBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815-52.

"We are not apt to imbibe half opinions, or to express them by halves; we shall, therefore, say at once, that when Mr. Hazlitt's taste and judgment are left to themselves, we think him among the best, if not the very best, living critic on our national literature. . . . As we have not scrupled to declare that we think Mr. Hazlitt is sometimes the very best living critic, we shall venture one step farther, and add, that we think he is sometimes the very worst. One would suppose that he had a personal quarrel with all living writers, good, bad, or indifferent. In fact, he seems to know little about them, and to care less. With him, to be alive is not only a fault in itself, but it includes all other possible faults. He seems to consider life as a disease, and death as your only doctor. He reverses the proverb, and thinks a dead ass is better than a living lion. In his eyes, death, like charity, 'covereth a multitude of sins.' In short, if you want his praise, you must die for it; and when such praise is deserved, and given con amore, it is almost worth dying for."—PROFESSOR JOHN WILSON: Bacon's Mag., iii. 75; notice of Hazlitt's Lects. on English Poetry.

"When we reflect upon the manner in which he brings things before those who attended his lectures, some of his old acquaintances and their friends, we feel nothing but disgust at him, and doubt of the true refinement of an age in which a polite and well-educated audience would allow of such gross personalities. If Mr.

Hazlitt is blind to the beauties of the living poets, it is of little consequence to them or to us; but we are offended at the vulgarity of the attacks upon the characters of Wordsworth and Coleridge; nor does he rise in our estimation by seeking to make, out of the faults of Burns, a defence for licentiousness and a rude attack upon a well principled man."—RICHARD HENRY DANA: N. Amer. Rev., viii. 27, vi. 322; review of Lects. on English Poetry.

Hazlitt indeed dwelt more with the dead than the living, and the enthusiasm he evinces when he has exchanged the drawing-room for the graveyard—especially when garnishing the sepulchre of the greatest of English poets—is well described by a late eminent critic:

"He seems pretty generally, indeed, in a state of happy intoxication—and has borrowed from his great original, not indeed the force and brilliancy of his fancy, but something of its playfulness, and a large share of his apparent joyousness and self-indulgence in its exercise. It is evidently a great pleasure to him to be fully possessed with the beauties of his author, and to follow the impulse of his unrestrained eagerness to impress them upon his readers."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xxviii. 472.

Mr. Tuckerman estimates Hazlitt's abilities very highly, and asserts that he "Possessed, in a very eminent degree, what we are inclined to believe the most important requisite for true criticism.—a great natural relish for all the phases of intellectual life and action."

But he makes a large deduction from his praise when he admits that "There is scarcely a page of Hazlitt which does not betray the influence of strong prejudice, a love of paradoxical views, and a tendency to sacrifice the exact truth of a question to an effective turn of expression."—Characteristics of Literature, Second Series: The Critic: William Hazlitt.

Certainly one of the best criticisms elicited by the writings of Hazlitt is the review, by Sir T. N. Talfourd, of the Lectures on the Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth, originally published in the Edinburgh Review, xxxiv. 438–449, and since reprinted in the author's Miscellaneous Writings. "So far, it is a creditable contribution to literature, opening to the English eye fresh passages and characteristics of the romantic Venetian annals. . . . The result is to expose, even more signally than had previously been done, the comparative worthlessness of Dary,—the quarry whence most English compilations have of late been drawn."—*Lon. These rapid journeys obtained from the hurried traveller the sobriquet of "Gallop Head," from "the manner in which he scoured across the Pampas."

"The gay captain scampers across the Pampas plains at the rate of a hundred to a hundred and twenty miles a day. . . . "Sir Francis Head's Narrative is a very remarkable one, being one of the most clear, unreserved, and honest accounts ever rendered by a public servant, of the arts, the principles, and the policy of an unpopular administration. Few provincial governors could have to relate so interesting, so arduous, and so successful a struggle."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

"The most minute and accurate autobiography could hardly have done more to explain Sir Francis Head's character and career than the little work before us. . . . We have now pretty well picked our crow, and we may safely dismiss the political history and theories of Sir Francis Head into the region of chimeras and confusion."—Edin. Rev., lxxxv. 358–397.

"It is calculated to rouse all the old women in the country. Such a fee-fa-fum of a book we never read. The Duke's letter to Sir John Burgoyne was nothing to it; and it beats even Lord Ellesmere hollow."—Lon. Examiner.

"To a large class of persons he will appear to have done more good than harm, even by the publication of a book so full of exaggeration that it is difficult to say whether it should be classed with our serious or with our imaginative literature."—Lon. Athenæum, 1850, 1189.

"It is indeed our sense of the real danger, and our anxiety for a practical remedy, that have induced us to combat at such length Sir Francis Head's various propositions—some of which, we think, are too slight to support his arguments, and others too vast and too vague to satisfy the common sense of the country."—*Lon. ## 9. A Fortnight in Ireland, 1852, Svo.

"Having blown his 'bubbles' in Germany, and burnt up his French fagot," the author seeks on Irish ground to amuse himself and his readers by comic sketches interspersed with general reflections made in his own peculiar style."—Lon. Athenæum, 1852, 1201.

10. A Faggot of French Sticks; or, Paris in 1851, 2 vols. p. Svo, 1852; 3d ed., 1855, 2 vols.

"He took with him to his task the kindly spirit and minute observation for which he is distinguished, and, on his return to England, cast his notes and reminiscences into volumes, summoning to his aid the easy cheerful style and sly humour which have long caused his name to sound harmoniously in the ears of all lovers of a genial and amusing book. We rejoice that this book is one we can honestly praise."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"Very curious, readable, and in some sense informing; but, perhaps, its most remarkable feature is, how much may be seen in Paris in a short time by a man who resolutely sets about it."—Lon. Spectator.

"If Sir Francis knew how much we admire his books, we almost think (though that is saying much) that his feelings towards the American Republic would become somewhat kinder and gentler. . . . From the delightful Bubbles from the Brunnen, with its quaint, half-deprecatory motto,—"Bubble" (bothed, Dutch), any thing that wants solidity and firmness; (Johnson's Dictionary)—down to the Faggot, and including the more recent work on Ireland, we find everywhere the same freshness, the same vividness of narration, and the same good sense. The Bubbles are not altogether empty and fragile; the faggot is not wholly composed of dry and crooked sticks."—N. Amer. Rev.: Travellers in France, lxxvi. 597-428.

4. Rome; a Tour of Many Days, 1849, 3 vols. Svo.

"The present work is intended for the general public,—to furnish to the numerous readers at home and abroad a simple and distinct account of Rome and its Antiquities."—Preface.

"It is out of the question to convey by such means as are at our command any just idea of the mass of intelligence collected by Sir George Head. He seems to make us acquainted with every inch of Rome, and to leave nothing for future workmen to do in revealing its smallest features. The roads, the streets, the palaces, the churches, the relics of every kind, and the inhabitants also, are all set before us in the best possible order. In short, it is a standard work, to last like Rome."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

Head, Mrs. Thomasen. The Pious Mother; or, Evidences for Heaven, Lon., 1839, 16mo. Written in 1650.

Headlam, John. Lett. to the Rt. Hon. Robert Peel on Prison Labour, Lon., 1823. Reviewed by Rev. Sydney Smith, in Edin. Rev., Jan. 1824.

Headlam, Thomas E., M.P., Q.C. 1. Trustee Act of 1850, &amp;c., Lon., 1850, Svo; 3d ed., 1855, 12mo. 2. Supp. to Daniell's Chancery Practice, bringing it down to 1851, Svo, 1851. 3. New Chancery Acts, &amp;c., 1852, Svo.

"The eminent position of Mr. Headlam entitles his work on the New Chancery Acts to an early notice in our pages; and his opinions on the recent changes in Equity Jurisdiction and Practice deserve the most respectful consideration."—Legal Observer, Jan. 1, 1853.

Headlam, John. Serms., 1804, Svo.

Headland, Frederick W. Essay on the Action of Medicines in the System, Lon., 1850, Svo; 2d ed., 1855, Svo.

"The very favourable opinion which we were amongst the first to pronounce upon this essay has been fully confirmed by the general voice of the profession: and Dr. Headland may now be congratulated upon having produced a treatise which has been weighed in the balance and found worthy of being ranked with our standard medical works."—Lon. Lancet.

Headley, Henry, 1766-1788, a native of Norwich, educated at Trin. Coll., Oxford, pub. n vol. of Poems and other Pieces in 1786, Svo, contributed to the Gent. Mag. under the signature of C. T. O., wrote No. 16 of the Olla Podrida, (2d ed., Lon., 1788, Svo.) pub. several papers in The Luceubrations of Abel Slug, and gave to the world, in 1787, Select Beauties of Ancient English Poets, with Remarks, 2 vols. cr. Svo. A new ed. of this work appeared in 1810, 2 vols. cr. Svo, with a Biographical Sketch of the author, by the Rev. Henry Kett, Fellow of Trin. Coll., Oxford. Headley designed and pub. two vols. similar to the preceding.

"We included, under the anastentations and general term Remarks, a Preface, Introduction, Biographical Sketches, Notes, and a Supplement. . . . His principles of criticism are sound, his remarks are pertinent, and they are often made with a degree of acuteness, force, and discrimination, that would have done credit even to a Johnson or a Walpole. . . . The collection of the twenty-nine Biographical sketches of the old English Poets may be considered as a rich cabinet of exquisite portraits, finished with all the truth and spirit of a Vandeyke. They possess a peculiar delicacy of touch and fidelity of character. The colours are vivid; the features of each person are discriminated with the greatest precision; and we have only to regret that we have no more compositions of the kind from the same masterly hand. The following selections afford ample specimens of his diligence as well as of his talents and taste."—REV. HENRY KETT: Biog. Sketch, ubi supra.

Headley, Rev. Joel Tyler, b. at Walton, Delaware county, New York, Dec. 3, 1814, graduated at Union College in 1839, and subsequently pursued his theological studies at the Auburn Theological Seminary. After being licensed in the city of New York, he removed to Stockbridge, Mass., and, for about two years and a half, officiated as pastor of a church in that place. Obligated from failure of his health to abandon his intention of devoting himself to the ministry, he determined to test the effects of foreign travel upon his constitution, and, in pursuance of this resolution, passed the years 1842-43 in Italy and other portions of the Continent. Upon his return home, in 1844, he gave to the world the results of his observations, in two vols., which met with a reception sufficiently favourable to make the tourist henceforth an author by profession. In May, 1850, Mr. Headley was married to Miss Anna A. Russel, a niece of Rev. Dr. Wm. Ellery Channing; and in 1851 he erected a villa on the banks of the Hudson, just above the Highlands, "commanding a view of surpassing beauty and grandeur." In 1854 he was elected a member of the Legislature of New York.

Mr. Headley's first American ancestor was the eldest son of an English baron, and of the same family as the present Sir Francis Headley. We subjoin a list of Mr. H.'s productions:

1. A translation from the German, 1844. Anon. 2. Letters from Italy, 1845, 12mo.

"A work upon which a man of taste will be gratified to linger. It possesses the unfatiguing charms of perfect simplicity and truth. . . . We meet everywhere the evidences of manly feeling, pure sympathies, and an honorable temper. In many of the passages there is a quiet and almost unconscious humour, which reminds us of the delicate rally of the Spectator. The style is delightfully free from every thing bookish and commonplace. It is natural, familiar, and idiomatic. It approaches, as a work of that kind ought to do, the animation, variety, and ease of spoken language."—R. W. GRISWOLD: Prose Writers of America, 4th ed., Phila., 1852.

See South. Rev., x. 85; Democratic Rev., (by H. T. Tuckerman,) cxvii. 203; Lon. Athenæum, 1845, 957-60.

3. The Alps and the Rhine; a Series of Sketches, 1845, 12mo.

"In a former number of this journal (Ath., No. 936) we characterized Mr. Headley's Letters from Italy as 'teeming with egotism, somewhat meagre in detail, and ambitious in execution.' We find the Alps and the Rhine yet more open to such a criticism."—Lon. Athenæum, 1846, 291.

"That it is a pleasant miscellaneous tour is all that can be said about it."—Lon. Literary Gazette, 1846, 379.

4. Napoleon and his Marshals, 1846, 2 vols. 12mo.

"He has taken the subject up with ardour, but with little previous preparation; the work, therefore, indicates imperfect information, immature views of character, and unconsidered opinions. The style has the same melodramatic exaggeration which the whole design of the work exhibits. Yet unquestionably there is power manifested even in the faults of these brilliant sketches."—R. W. GRISWOLD: ubi supra.

The authorized edit. is pub. by Scribner. 12. The Old Guard of Napoleon, from Marengo to Waterloo, 1851, 12mo. This is based principally upon the history of Emile Mareo de St. Hilaire. See Lon. Athenæum, 1852, 1117. 13. Lives of Winfield Scott and Andrew Jackson, 1852, 12mo. 14. Hist. of the Second War between England and the United States, 1853, 2 vols. 12mo. 15. The Sacred Plains of the Bible, 1855, 12mo. This work was written by J. H. Headley, an Englishman who died in Buffalo in 1858. 16. Life of General Washington, N. York, 1857. A uniform ed. of Mr. Headley's Works, in 12 vols., was pub. previously to the appearance of several of his later productions. So great has been the demand for his writings that the sale had reached 200,000 vols. up to 1853. In addition to the criticisms above noticed, the reader will find further remarks on Mr. Headley's writings in Amer. Whig Review, vol. ii.; Meth. Quar. Rev., viii. 84; and articles by E. O. Dunton, in New Englander, v. 402; vi. 482.

Headley, Rev. Phineas Camp, b. at Walton, Delaware county, New York, June 24, 1819, is a brother of the preceding. 1. Historical and Descriptive Sketches of the Women of the Bible, Auburn, 1850, 12mo. 2. Life of the Empress Josephine: new ed., N. York, 1850, 12mo. 3. Life of Lafayette: new ed., 1855, 12mo. 4. Life of Louis Kosuth, &c., Auburn, 1852, 12mo. 5. Life of Mary, Queen of Scots, 5th ed., 1856, 12mo. "It is impossible to read it without feeling a deep interest, and without reflecting on and cherishing the inestimable blessings of civilized society."—Lon. Month. Rev.

Hearne, Thomas, 1678-1735, an eminent antiquary, a native of White-Waltham, Berkshire, educated at Edmund Hall, Oxford, Assistant Librarian of the Bodleian Library, compiled and edited forty-one works, which he enriched to a greater or less extent by his annotations. Among the best-known of his publications, which were principally pub. by subscription at Oxford, are—1. Ductor Historicus; or, a Short System of Universal History, 1704, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed. of vol. i., 1705, 8vo; 1714, 2 vols. 8vo; 1724, 2 vols. 8vo. Best ed. A good work in its day, but now superseded. 2. Reliquiæ Bodleianæ, 1703, 8vo. 3. Livy, 1708, 6 vols. 8vo. 4. Spelman's Life of Alfred the Great, 1709, 8vo. 5. Leland's Itinerary, 1710-12, 9 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1744-45, 9 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1768-70, 9 vols. 8vo. 6. Leland's Collectanea, 1715, 6 vols. 8vo. Editio altera, &c., 1770 vel 1774, 6 vols. 8vo. 7. Acta Apostolorum, 1715, 8vo. See Horne's Introduct. to the Scriptures. 8. Titi Livii Foro-Julienis Vita Henrici Quinti, Regis Angliæ, 1716, 8vo. 9. Aureddi Bevarlacensis Annales, 1716, 8vo. 10. Gulielmi Roperi Vita D. Thomæ Mori Equitis Aurati, 1716, 8vo. 11. Gulielmi Camdeni Annales Rerum Anglicarum et Hibernicarum Regnantio Elizabetha, 1717, 3 vols. 8vo. 12. Gulielmi Neubrigensis Historia, 1719, 3 vols. 8vo. 13. Thomæ Spouti Chronica, 1719, 8vo. 14. A Collect. of Curious Discourses written by Eminent Antiquaries upon English Antiq., 1720, 8vo; 1765, 2 vols. 8vo; 1773, 2 vols. 8vo. This edition has all the Dissertations contained in the original work, with the addition of a complete collection of the discourses delivered by the founders of the Antiquarian Society. New ed., 1829, 2 vols. 8vo. This collection contains discourses on the Ancient Britons, Etymology, Duelling, Money, Epitaphs, &c. 15. Textus Roffensis, 1720, 8vo. 16. Roberti de Avesbury Historia de Mirabilibus Gestis Edwardi III., 1720, 8vo. 17. Johannis de Fordun Scotichronicon Genium, 1722, 5 vols. 8vo. 18. Hist. and Antiq. of Glastonbury, 1722, 8vo. 19. Hemingi Chartularium Ecclesiæ Wigorniensis, 1723, 2 vols. 8vo. 20. Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle, 1724, 2 vols. 8vo; 1810, 2 vols. 8vo. 21. Peter Langtoft's Chronicle, 1725, 2 vols. 8vo; 1810, 2 vols. 8vo. Mr. Bagster reprinted the two last-named works, and had intended to issue a uniform ed. of Hearne's publications; but the project lacked encouragement. 22. Liber Niger Senecarii, 1728, 2 vols. 8vo; 1774, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The Black Book of the Exchequer, a thing of great note and curiosity, and the most authentic on record of its kind that we have for our families, next to Domesday Book."—Hearn to Richardson.

23. Thomæ Cæli Vindiciæ Antiquitatis Academiæ Oxoniensis, 1730, &c., 1730, 2 vols. 8vo. 24. A Vindict. of those who took the Oath of Allegiance to King William, 1731, 8vo.

Hearne afterwards became a Nonjuror, and this treatise was published by the opposite party in his lifetime. The preface contains a satirical biography of him. The address to the reader contains some interesting memorials of Hearne, and bibliographical notices of his works.

In 1737, r. fol., Mr. West had printed, for presents, 50 copies of Ecypsa varia ad Historiam Britannicam illustrandum, ære olim inæsulpta studio et cura Thomæ Hearne. Bindley's copy of this work was sold for £11 11s. Many of Hearne's publications come under our notice in our accounts of their respective authors. For further information concerning this eminent antiquary, see Impartial Memorials of the Life and Writings of Thomas Hearne, M.A., by several Hands, Lon., 1736, 8vo; Lives of Leland, Hearne, and Wood, Oxf., 1772, 2 vols. r. 8vo; *Biog. In some comments upon the investigations into ancient English historical treasures, Gibbon remarks:

"The last who has dug deep into the mine was Thomas Hearne, a clerk of Oxford, poor in fortune, and, indeed, poor in understanding. His minute and obscure diligence, his voracious and undistinguishing appetite, and the coarse vulgarity of his taste and style, have exposed him to the ridicule of idle wits. Yet it cannot be denied that Thomas Hearne has gathered many gleanings of the harvest; and, if his own prefaces are filled with crude and extraneous matter, his editions will always be recommended by their accuracy and use."—An Address, etc.: Miscell. Works, ed. 1837, 857.

Among the "idle wits" who made Hearne the "butt of their clumsy ridicule," the most famous is Pope, who honours Thomas with a place in the Dunciad:

"But who is he, in closet close ypent,
Of sober face, with learned dust besprent?
Light well mine eyes are'de the myster wight.
On parchment scraps y-to'd and Worms hight."

A Brief Chronicle of the late Intestine War in the three Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, Lon., 1661, 8vo. Afterwards enlarged and completed from 1637 to 1663. 4 Pts., 1633, in a thick 8vo vol. With a continuation from 1663 to 1675, by John Phillips, Milton's nephew, 1675, fol. Another ed., continued to 1691, fol. Heath's Chronicle is principally valued for its portraits, and copies have been sold at very high prices. See Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 898-899. The work gave great offence to the High Church party in England. Wood thus expresses his indignation:

"Some copies have in them the pictures of the most eminent soldiers in the said war, which makes the book valued the more by some covetous. [Unkind cut at the Grangerites!] But this Chronicle being mostly compiled from lying pamphlets and all sorts of news-ticks, there are innumerable errors therein, especially as to name and time, things chiefly requisite in history."—Athen. Oxon.
"James Heath, whose wretchedly-printed, but by no means wholly useless, performance, seems to have been put forth rather as a vehicle for cuts of the sorriest possible description."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

2. Elegy upon Dr. Thomas Fuller, 1661. 3. Restoration of Charles II., 1662, 8vo. 4. Elegy on Dr. Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln, 1662. 5. Flagellum; or, The Life and Death, Birth and Burial, of Oliver Cromwell, the late Usurper, 1663, 8vo; 3d ed., 1665, 8vo; 4th ed., 1669, 8vo. Also in 1672, 8vo, and in 1679, 8vo. 6. Heber, Reginald, 1728-1804, a native of Marston, Yorkshire, Fellow of Brasenose College, Rector of Hodnet. 1. An Elegy written among the Tombs in Westminster Abbey, 1762. Printed in Dodsley's Poems. 2. Verses to King George III. on his Accession. Among the Oxford Poems, 1761.

Heber, Reginald, D.D., April 21, 1783-April 3, 1826, son of the preceding, was a native of Malpas, Cheshire, and educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his Latin Poem, Carmen Se- cular, his English poem of Palestine, and a prose essay of great merit, entitled The Sense of Honour. After leaving college, he travelled for some time in Germany, Russia, the Crimea, &c., and, on his return, was in 1807 admitted to holy orders, and subsequently received the family living of Hodnet. In 1809 he was married to Amelia, daughter of Dr. Shipley, Dean of St. Asaph. In 1822 he was elected to the office of Preacher to Lincoln's Inn, and in the next year he succeeded Dr. Middleton in the Bishopric of Calcutta. In this vast diocese he laboured with great zeal and success, until cut off by an apoplectic fit whilst bathing, April 3, 1826, in his 43d year. He was a man of extensive learning, great elegance of taste, untiring energy, and profound piety. As a poet, his Palestine, and his translations from Pindar, deservedly place him in a high rank; his Biblical attainments were evinced by his contemplated Bible Dictionary, many articles of which had been long prepared at the time of his death; his powers of description are admirably manifested in his Journal of a Tour in India; and his Life of Bishop Taylor, an excellent edition of his works, prove his qualifications as a biographer and an editor. 1. Palestine; a Poem: to which is added The Passage of the Red Sea: a Fragment, 1809, 4to. Frequently reprinted. Palestine gained an Oxford Prize in 1802, when the author was but nineteen years of age.

"Such a poem, composed at such an age, has indeed some, but not many, parallels in our language. Its copious diction, its perfect numbers, its images so well chosen, diversified so happily, and treated with so much discretion and good taste, and, above all, the ample knowledge of Scripture, and of writings illustrative of Scripture, displayed in it—all these things might have seemed to bespeak the work of a man who had been long chusing and beguiling Life? rather than of a stripling of nineteen."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxv, 451.

"It is the fashion to undervalue Oxford and Cambridge Prize Poems; but it is a stupid fashion. Many of them are most beautiful. Heber's Palestine! A flight, as upon Angel's wing, over the Holy Land! How fine the opening!"

"Reft of thy sons! amid thy foes forlorn, Mourn, wid' wh'd Queen! forgotten Zion, mourn!"

CHRISTOPHER NORTH: Nectes Ambras, No. 22.

"Fine as some of these Oxford prize poems have unquestionably been, more especially Porteus's Death, Glynn's Day of Judgment, Gemt's Restoration of Learning, and Wrangham's Holy Land, still, it is doubtful whether Heber has been equalled either by any preceding or succeeding competitor. It is admirably sustained throughout; and indeed the passages relating to the building of the Temple, and to the scenes on Calvary, pass from the magnificent almost into the sublime."—D. M. MOIR: Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

On the other hand, Mr. Southey considers Palestine to have elicited more laudation than it can justly claim:

"As a poet he could not have supported the reputation which his Palestine obtained, for it was greatly above its deserts, and the character of the poem, moreover, was not hot-air: it was too nicely fitted to the taste of the age. Poetry should have its lights and shades, like painting; like music, its sink and swell, its relief and its repose. So far as the piece was intended for success in a competition for a prize, and for effect in public recitation, it was certainly just as well done for matter, every line fell upon the ear. But to all such poetry the motto under one of Quarles's Emblems may be applied—Ton t. name est?"—Letter to Henry Taylor, July 10, 1830: Southey's Life and Correspondence.

2. Europe: Lines on the Present War, 1809, 8vo. Reprinted, with Palestine, The Passage of the Red Sea, translations from Pindar, and some miscellaneous verses, in 1812, sm. 8vo. Of Heber's Poetical Works there have been a number of eds., and several within the last few years; 5th ed., Lon., 1855, 1p. 8vo.

"Although more vigorous and elaborate, it [Europe] wants the freshness and the salient points of his earlier one, Palestine; and, although not derogatory to, did not enhance, his reputation."—D. M. MOIR: ubi supra.

3. The Personality and Office of the Christian Comforter asserted and explained: Serms. at the Bampton Lectures, 1815, 8vo, 1816; 2d ed., 1818, 8vo. Included are two Lectures on the Inspiration of the New Testament.

"Very learned, but not so experimental and devotional as might have been wished. There are beautiful views of the subject, combined with some speculative and fanciful notions."—Bickerstaff's Chris. Stu.

"We venture to assure those readers who form their anticipations of the merit of this production from the established character of the author of Palestine, that they will not be disappointed in the actual perusal."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xvii, 335-47.

4. Hymns written and adapted to the use of the Weekly Church Service of the Year, principally by Bishop Heber, 1827. Fifty-eight by the Bishop; several by the Rev. H. H. Milman; the others by Bishop Ken, Bishop Taylor, Watts, Pope, Cowper, Addison, Tate, Brady, Sir Walter Scott, &c.: 11th ed., 1842, 18no.

"These Hymns have been by far the most popular of his productions, and deservedly so; for in purity and elevation of sentiment, in simple pathos, and in eloquent earnestness, it would be difficult to find any thing superior to them in the range of lyric poetry. They have the home truth of Watts, but rank much higher, as literary compositions, than the Moral and Divine Songs of that great benefactor of youth; and all the devotion of Wesley or Kettle, without their languor and diffuse verbosity. Heber always writes like a Christian scholar, and never finds it necessary to lower his tone on account of his subject."—D. M. MOIR: ubi supra.

"The hymns thus given to the world will help to dissipate that delusion which hangs, like a cold spell, over many minds of much feeling and understanding—that not much is to be expected from a poetical vein applied to religious subjects."—Blackwood's Mag., xxii, 617-633.

5. Sermons Preached in England, 1829, 8vo. 6. Sermons Preached in India, 1829, 8vo. 7. Parish Sermons: on the Lessons, the Gospel, or the Epistle, for every Sunday in the Year and for Week-day Festivals, preached in the Parish Church of Hodnet, Salop, 1837, 3 vols. 8vo; 5th ed., 1844, 2 vols. 8vo.

"I believe that these Sermons will add a new interest and lustre to the name of Reginald Heber, and will awaken a fresh regret for his loss."—Sir Robert Inglis's Preface.

"He was a man of great reading, and in his Bampton Lectures has treated a most important part of the Christian faith with great learning and ability. His other published sermons are such that I am not surprised if my brother Henry should think him the most impressive preacher he ever heard."—Robert Southey's Letter to Henry Taylor, July 10, 1830: Southey's Life and Correspondence.

8. A Journey through India, from Calcutta to Bombay, with Notes upon Ceylon, and a Journey to Madras and the Southern Provinces, 1828, 2 vols. 4to; 1828, 3 vols. 8vo; 1844, 2 vols. 12mo. Sold for Mrs. Heber by Sir Robert Inglis for £5000.

"This is another book for Englishmen to be proud of. . . . It surveys every thing with the vigilance and delight of a cultivated and most active intellect,—with the eye of an artist, an antiquary, and a naturalist,—the feelings and judgment of an English gentleman and scholar,—the sympathies of a most humane and generous man,—and the piety, charity, and humility of a Christian. Independently of its moral attraction, we are induced to think it, on the whole, the most instructive and important publication that has ever been given to the world on the actual state and condition of our Indian Empire."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xviii, 312-535.

"It forms a monument of talent, sufficient, single and alone, to establish its author in a very high rank of English literature. It is one of the most delightful books in the language; and will, we cannot doubt, command popularity as extensive and lasting as any book of travels that has been printed in our time. Certainly no work of its class that has appeared since Dr. Clarke's can be compared to it for variety of interesting matter, still less for elegance of execution. . . . He possessed the eye of a painter and the pen of a poet; a mind richly stored with the literature of Europe, both ancient and modern."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvii, 100-147.

"One of the most perfectly charming books I ever read; gentle, tolerant, humane, and full of wisdom; a religious book in the best sense of the word, because full of charity. It is lively without effort, and abounds in valuable judgments of men and things, without one harsh, sarcastic, or illiberal word. We envy those who have it now in their power to read for the first time Bishop Heber's Indian Journal."—Lon. Examiner.

"Beautiful contributions, full of benevolent feeling, simple, beautiful delineations, and varied and gratifying details of official labours."—Lon. Evangelical Mag.

"Has all the charm of romance with the sterling value of truth. It is eminently the most Christian—because the most charitable and tolerant—work of the kind ever written. Residents in India have repeatedly borne testimony to the fidelity of its notices of men and things."—Oxford Herald.

"Bishop Heber's charming Indian Journal."—Camb. Chronicle.

See Blackwood's Mag., xxii, 789; xxxiii, 785; British Critic, iv, 200. The reader should add to Heber's Indian Journal, Letters from Madras in 1826, or First Impressions of Life and Manners in India, by a Lady, Lon., 1816, cr. 8vo.

9. The Whole Works of Bishop Jeremy Taylor, with a Life of the Author, and a Critical Examination of his Writings, 1822, 15 vols. 8vo; 1828, 15 vols. 8vo; 1830, 15 vols. 8vo. Revised by Charles Page Eden, 1847-51, 10 vols. 8vo. Heber's Life of Bishop Taylor has been separately pub., 1824, 2 vols. 8vo; 1828, 8vo.

"A charming and instructive piece of biography. . . . Written with all the glow of poetical feeling, and all the elegance of refined scholarship."—DR. DIBBIN: Lib. Comp. See Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxv, 455.

10. Bishop Heber's Life, by his Widow: with his Correspondence with Eminent Literary Characters, Miscellaneous Papers and Poems, and an Account of his Travels in Russia, Norway, &c., 1830, 2 vols. 4to. With this work must be perused The Last Days of Bishop Heber, by Thomas Robinson, A.M., Archdeacon of Madras, and late Domestic Chaplain to his Lordship, 1830, 8vo. The two works are reviewed in the Lon. Quar. Rev., xliii, 366-411; Edin. Rev., lii, 431-471; Lon. Month. Rev., cxvii, 517-529. Lon. Gent. Mag., Nov. 1826; Essays on the Lives of Cowper, Newton, and Heber; or, an Examination of the Course of Nature being interrupted by the Divine Government, 1830, 8vo; Jamieson's Cyc. of Religious Biography; Lives of Heber, by Bonner, by Taylor, and an abridgment of Mrs. Heber's Memoir by a clergyman, Bost., 1856, 8vo. A specimen—perhaps the earliest extant—of Heber's poetical powers, entitled The Whippiad, a Satirical Poem, will be found in Blackwood's Mag., July, 1843. Many extracts from Heber's MS. Journal while travelling in the Northern countries of Europe were incorporated by Dr. E. D. Clarke into his travels in Germany, Russia, &c. Nor should we omit to mention that Heber was one of the contributors to the London Quarterly Review. Heber designed writing a work on Scythia; but clerical duties prevented the completion of this project.

The character of this estimable man has been drawn in such eloquent language by a late eminent critic, that we cannot do better than quote his glowing tribute,—equally honourable to himself and to the subject of his eulogy:

"Learned, polished, and dignified, he was undoubtedly; yet far more conspicuously kind, humble, tolerant, and laborious;—zealous for his church too, and not forgetful of his station; but remembering it more for the duties than for the honours that were attached to it, and infinitely more zealous for the religious improvement, and for the happiness and spiritual and worldly good of his fellow-creatures of every tongue, faith and complexion;—indulgent to all errors and infirmities;—liberal, in the best and truest sense of the word;—humble, and conscientiously diffident of his own excellent judgment and never-failing charity;—looking on all men as the children of one God, on all Christians as the redeemed of one Saviour, and on all Christian teachers as fellow-labourers, bound to help and encourage each other in their arduous and anxious task."—LORD JEFFREY: Elin. Rev., xviii. 314.

Heber, Richard, M.P., 1773–1833, half-brother to the preceding, who was by his father's second wife, was also educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, where he was distinguished for his classical attainments. No other evidence of this assertion is needed than his edition of Silius Italicus, (1792, 2 vols. 12mo.) pub. when he was a youth of nineteen, and his Claudian Carmina, printed (but not pub.) in 1793, 2 vols. 12mo. The latter was not entirely completed by Heber; but the last five leaves of the second vol., with the title and address, were supplied by the late Rev. Henry Drury, and recently the work has been put in the market. Mr. Heber's original design was to issue edits. of such of the Latin poets as were not printed in Barbour's collection. The abatement of his classical zeal—so far at least as regards this congenial project—is not a little surprising. Mr. Heber also pub. an edit. of Brewster's trans. of Persius, with the Latin text, and superintended the publication of the 3d edit. of Ellis's specimens of the English Poets. From 1821 to 1826 he represented the University of Oxford in Parliament.

Here perhaps we might pass on to the next article without censure, so far as the general reader is concerned; but what BIBLIOMANIA would forgive us did we omit to pay a passing tribute to Richard Heber as the most voracious HELLO LIBRORUM in the annals of bibliography? The passion of book-collecting first developed itself in Richard Heber when he was but a child, and it "grew with his growth and strengthened with his strength." As library after library was dispersed under the hammer, Heber added their choicest treasures to his own enormous collection, until he could call himself master of many of the coveted tomes which had once graced the shelves of Dr. Farmer, Isaac Reed, J. Brand, George Steevens, the Duke of Roxburgh, James Bindley, Benj. Heath, J. Perry, G. Wakefield, J. Kemble, E. Malone, R. Wilbraham, J. Dent, Dr. Gosset, Sir M. M. Sykes, and many others.

"On hearing of a curious book, he has been known to put himself into the mail-coach, and travel three, four, or five hundred miles to obtain it, fearful to entrust his commission to a letter."

Thus did the indefatigable Heber add book to book, and manuscript to manuscript, until, one day, Death—that remorseless disperser of libraries—summoned the owner of this vast collection of literary wealth; and Richard Heber fell "in the harness," still striving after "rare copies" and "early editions." The inventory of his treasures is thus briefly told:

"Some years ago he built a new library at his house at Hodnet, which is said to be full. His residence in Picnic, where he died, is filled, like Magliabecchi's at Florence, with books from the top to the bottom:—every chair, every table, every passage containing piles of erudition. He had another house in York-street, leading to Great James-street, Westminster, laden from the ground-floor to the garret with curious books. He had a library in the High-street, Oxford, an immense library at Paris, another at Antwerp, another at Brussels, another at Ghent, and at other places in the Low Countries and in Germany. In short, there is neither end nor measure to his literary stores."—Obituary notice in Gent. Mag., Jan. 1834.

The cost of this immense stock of books and manuscripts may be estimated at about £180,000,—more than $800,000; and this without any estimate for the loss of interest on the investment. After Heber's death, the books in England were confided to the care of Messrs. Payne and Foss, and sold at auction by Sotheby and Son, Mr. Evans, and Mr. Wheatley. The net proceeds of the sale were about £55,000. It we suppose that the 3622 vols. brought from Holland and subsequently sold by Wheatley in London, the books in Paris, and elsewhere on the Continent, and the MSS., coins, and drawings sold in London, produced a net result of £10,000 additional, we have aggregate receipts of £65,000 against £180,000 expenditure, or a loss of about half a million of dollars, exclusive of interest!

Here indeed we have the development of the Bibliomania in its most furious type. What an amount of ignorance might have been enlightened, vice reformed, sorrow comforted, and misery gladdened, by the judicious application of this vast sum! The collecting of books to a certain extent is laudable, and to be encouraged; but such enormous private accumulations tend rather to lock up knowledge than to diffuse it.

Dr. Dibdin estimates Heber's collections in England to have contained about 105,000 vols.; but, not satisfied with a loose estimate, we—some years before we fell into this habit of writing Dictionaries—made a careful computation, and find the result to be as follows:

Books in collections in England, vols. about.....	113,195
Brought from Holland.....	2,632
Boutard's Library, purchased by Heber in Paris.....	39,000
	146,827

To this number is to be added a large quantity of pamphlets, bound and unbound. The number of the days consumed by the London sale was no less than 216. How many more books Mr. Heber possessed in various parts of Europe, at the time of his death, we have no means of knowing; but the volumes already enumerated exceed by about fifty per cent. the contents of the largest library in America.

Much more we might discourse of Richard Heber,—the famous Atticus of Dibdin's Bibliomania,—the beloved friend of Scott, who has immortalized him in the Introduction to Marmion,—the generous lender of scarce volumes to needy scholars and black-letter editors; but respecting these matters we must refer the reader to Dibdin's Decameron, Bibliomania, Library Companion, &c.; Gentleman's Magazine, January, 1824; Southey's Life and Correspondence; Lockhart's Life of Scott; and see DIBDIN, THOMAS FROGNALL, D.D.; FERRIAR, JOHN, M.D.

Heberden, William, M.D., 1710–1801, an eminent English physician, a native of London, educated at St. John's Coll., Camb., practised first at Edinburgh, and subsequently, from 1746–1801, in London. In addition to his Essay on Mithridatium and Theriaca, (Lon., 1745, 8vo.) and profess. papers in Phil. Trans., Med. Transac., and Med. Obs. and Inq., (1750–85.) he left in MS. the following important work, pub. by his son: Commentarii de Morborum Historia et Curatione, Lon., 1802, 8vo. Also pub. in English, at the same time, Cura Soemmerring, Frank., 1804, 8vo. A new ed. has recently been pub. in Phila. This valuable work contains 102 articles in alphabetical order, the results of observations made at the bedsides of his patients. He was a man of profound piety, and greatly esteemed by all classes of men.

"Dr. Heberden was one of the best classical scholars of his time, and one of the most perfectly-instructed medical men England has ever possessed."—DR. MCCONNELL.

Heckwelder, Rev. John, 1743–1810, a Moravian missionary, a native of Bedford, England, laboured for many years with great zeal among the Delaware Indians. He was persuaded by Dr. Wistar to give the results of his observations to the world. The following appeared in Trans. of the Hist. and Literary Committee of the Amer. Phil. Soc., Phila., vol. i.:

1. An Account of the History, Manners, and Customs of the Indian Nations who once inhabited Pennsylvania and the neighbouring States, pp. 350. This was trans. into English by P. S. Duponceau, and pub. at Paris, 1822, 8vo, pp. 571. 2. Correspondence between Mr. Heckwelder and Mr. Duponceau on the Languages of the American Indians, pp. 100. 3. Words, Phrases, and Short Dialogues in the Language of the Lenni Lenape, pp. 16. Mr. Heckwelder also pub. (4.) A Narrative of the Mission of the United Brethren among the Delaware and Mohegan Indians, from 1740 to 1808, interspersed with Anecdotes, Historical Facts, Speeches of Indians, &c., 1820, 4to; some papers in Barton's Medical Journal; and several on natural history, in Trans. Amer. Soc., vols. iv., vi., and xii. His account of the Indians excited considerable attention, and was favourably received by Nathan Hale, in the North American Review, ix. 155-178, and by J. Pickering, in the same periodical, ix. 179-187; it was unfavourably noticed, with the admission of some merits, by General Lewis Cass, in the same journal, xxii. 64; xxvi. 357-403. It was also attacked by John Penington, an intelligent antiquary of Philadelphia, in a Review of Yates and Moulton's History of New York, pub. in the United States Review, January, 1834. There also appeared upon this subject A Vindication of the Rev. Mr. Heckwelder's History of the Indian Nations, by Wm. Rawle; read at a Meeting of the Council of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Feb. 15, 1826. Pub. in the Memoirs of the Society, vol. i. Pt. 2. This paper is noticed by General Cass in his article in N. Amer. Rev., xxvi. 357-403. As a specimen of the decided difference of opinion respecting Heckwelder's History entertained by two of the eminent authorities above cited, two brief extracts will suffice:

"The work abounds in facts and anecdotes, calculated not merely to entertain the reader, but to lay open, in the most authentic and satisfactory manner, the character and condition of this people. There is no other work extant, in which this design has been so extensively adopted, or in which the object is so fully accomplished. There is no work upon the North American Indians which can bear any comparison with it for the means of correct information possessed by the author, or for the copiousness of its details."—NATHAN HALE: N. Amer. Rev., ix. 178.

But audi alteram partem:

"His account is a pure unmixed panegyric. The most idle traditions of the Indians with him become sober history; their superstition is religion; their indolence, philosophical indifference or pious resignation; their astonishing improvidence, hospitality; and many other defects in their character are converted into the corresponding virtues. And Mr. Rawle is not the only respectable writer who has been deceived by these partial representations. No one can look upon the passing literature of the day without being sensible of the effect upon the public mind which has been produced by this worthy old missionary."—GENERAL LEWIS CASS: N. Amer. Rev., xxvi. 366-367.

Hedge, Frederick Henry, D.D., b. in Cambridge, Mass., Dec. 5, 1805, is a son of the late Professor Levi Hedge, of Harvard University. From 1818 to 1823 he resided in Germany, engaged in his studies, graduated at Cambridge in 1825, and was ordained in 1829. In 1835 he assumed the pastoral charge of a church in Bangor, Maine. In 1850 he became pastor of the Westminster Church in Providence, Rhode Island, from whence in 1856 he removed to Brookline, near Boston. In 1858 he was made Professor of Ecclesiast. History in the Theological School connected with Harvard University. At the same time he assumed the editorship of the Christian Examiner, one of the oldest of American periodicals. Dr. Hedge is distinguished for his intimate knowledge of the various schools of philosophy, and has written many essays upon this attractive theme. He has pub. numerous articles in the Christian Examiner, &c., poetical and prose contributions to annuals, sermons, and discourses, and the following valuable work: Prose Writers of Germany, illustrated with Eight Portraits, Phila., 1848, r. 8vo, pp. 567. In this book Dr. Hedge gives us extracts from twenty-eight authors, from Martin Luther to Chauvissou. The selections from each author are preceded by a sketch of his life, character, and writings. The value of this compilation may be judged of from the following commendation of an eminent authority:

"There is no book accessible to the English or American reader which can furnish so comprehensive and symmetrical a view of German literature to the uninitiated; and those already conversant with some of the German classics will find here valuable and edifying extracts from works to which very few in this country can gain access."—A. "These essays seem to be written for no definite purpose; they have the air of themes very carefully composed out of pure love, and for the practice of composition. . . . Mr. Helps has written and thought in so much more effective manner since their publication, that he would probably now agree with us that many of them should have been treated as college exercises,—themes that we turn into Johnsonian English, or Ciceroian Latin, and there leave."—Blackwood's Mag., Oct. 1851.

7. Companions of my Solitude, 1851, 12mo; 4th ed., 1854, 1p.

"It is altogether a thoughtful book, full of wisdom as well as of gentleness and beauty. There is scarcely a page in the volume from which we might not extract some truth, no matter how old it may be, made fresh by the manner in which it is presented. Hemans, Mrs. Felicia Dorothea, 1794-1835, a native of Liverpool, where her father was a merchant, may almost be said to have "lisp'd in numbers," and printed a volume of poems—"Early Blossoms"—before she was fifteen years of age. Doubtless the wild scenery of Grwyth, in North Wales, where the youthful poetess resided from her ninth to her sixteenth year, had a stimulating effect upon that love of nature which was one of the strongest characteristics of her mind. A year after the publication of this book, unfortunately for her future happiness, she met with Captain Hemans, of the Fourth Regiment, to whom, after an attachment of three years, during which the captain was on duty in the Peninsula, she was married in 1812. Soldiers are proverbially susceptible to the charms of feminine beauty; and, when we read her sister's graphic description of the young poetess as she appeared when she first attracted the gaze of her warlike admirer, we are not surprised that he became at once a wooer:

"The mantling bloom of her cheeks was shaded by a profusion of natural ringlets, of a rich golden brown; and the ever-varying expression of her brilliant eyes gave a changeful play to her countenance, which would have made it impossible for a painter to do justice to it."—Memoir of Mrs. Hemans, by her sister.

Alas, that so lovely, so loving, and so formed to be beloved, should have had occasion, for seventeen years—from the sixth year of her marriage until her death, in 1835, she never saw her husband's face—bitterly to "bewail that worship" which had been the brightest dream of her young and confiding heart! In 1818 Capt. Hemans removed to Italy, avowedly for the benefit of his health, leaving to his wife the responsibility connected with the education of their five sons, and—as we have seen—never returning to England to demand an account of her stewardship. Mrs. Hemans took up her residence with her mother and sister, Miss Mary Anne Browne, afterwards Mrs. Gray, and devoted such time as she could spare to the cultivation of her poetical talents. In 1828 she met with a severe affliction in the loss of her mother, and in consequence of this event removed to Wavertree, near Liverpool. In the next year she visited Scotland, where she met with a cordial greeting from Sir Walter Scott, Jeffrey, and the other literary stars of Edinburgh and its vicinity. In 1830 she paid a visit to the lakes of Westmoreland and the poet Wordsworth; and, on leaving this attractive spot, she determined to settle at Dublin, where her brother, Major Browne, resided. In this city she remained, the object of devoted affection in the social circle, until her death in 1835, after a painful and protracted indisposition.

Collective ed. of her Works, with a Memoir of her Life by her Sister, 1839, 7 vols. 12mo. Again, 1850, 6 vols. 12mo. Works, chronologically arranged, 1848, 1 vol. r. Svo. In America Mrs. Hemans's poems are very popular, and many eds. of her works have been issued, with Memoirs and critical notices, by Mrs. Signourney, Mr. Thatcher, Andrews Norton, H. T. Tuckerman, &c. For particulars respecting the life and works of this truly lovely woman and gifted writer, the reader must refer to the Memoir by her sister; Memorials of Mrs. Hemans, by H. F. Chorley, 1836, 2 vols. sm. Svo; Mrs. Elwood's Literary Ladies of England; Howitt's Homes of the Poets; Miss Jewsbury's Three Histories, where Mrs. Hemans is delineated in the portrait of Egeria. Much excellent criticism on her writings will be found in several of the sources indicated below, from some of which we proceed to give brief citations:

"We think the poetry of Mrs. Hemans a fine exemplification of Female Poetry; and we think it has much of the perfection which we have ventured to ascribe to the happier productions of female genius.

"It may not be the best imaginable poetry, and may not indicate the very highest or most commanding genius; but it embraces a great deal of that which gives the very best poetry its chief power of pleasing; and would strike us, perhaps, as more impassioned and exalted, if it were not regulated and harmonized by the most beautiful taste. It is infinitely sweet, elegant, and tender;—touching, perhaps, and contemplative, rather than vehement and overpowering; and not only finished throughout with an exquisite delicacy and even serenity of execution, but informed with a purity and loftiness of feeling, and a certain sober and humble tone of indulgence and piety, which must satisfy those who are most afraid of the passionate exaggerations of poetry. The diction is always beautiful, harmonious, and free; and the themes, though of infinite variety, uniformly treated with a grace, originality, and judgment, which mark the master-hand. . . . We do not hesitate to say that she is, beyond all comparison, the most touching and accomplished writer of occasional verses that our literature has yet to boast of."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., 1, 32-47.

"The genius of woman at this period produced a rival to Coleridge, if not in depth of thought, at least in tenderness of feeling and beauty of expression. Mrs. Hemans was imbued with the very soul of lyric poetry; she only required to have written a little less to have been one of the greatest in that branch that England ever produced. . . . Melancholy had marked her for its own; she was deeply impressed with the woes of life; and it is in the working up mournful reflections and images with the utmost tenderness and pathos that her great excellence consists. There she is, perhaps, unrivalled in the English language."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815-52, chap. v.

"As a woman, I felt proud of the homage he [Lord Byron] paid to the genius of Mrs. Hemans, and as a passionate admirer of her poetry, I felt flattered at finding that Lord Byron fully sympathized with my admiration."—Countess of Blessington's Conversations with Lord Byron.

"Mrs. Sigourney, as her letters will show, was well aware of Lady Blessington's admiration for the writings of Mrs. Hemans. That lady was never spoken of by her except in terms of the highest praise; and her admiration of the poetry of Mrs. Hemans was no less enthusiastic than just and discriminating. In one of her works she says, 'The exquisite poems of Mrs. Hemans affect one like sacred music; they never fail to excite solemn feelings of an elevated and spiritual character, and sentiments of a pensive caste. Of calm resignation and serenity.'"—Madden's Life and Corresp. of the Countess of Blessington, vol. ii.

There can be no more proper occasion than the present for the introduction of Mrs. Sigourney's beautiful tribute to Mrs. Hemans:

"Every unborn age
Shall mix thee with its household charities:
The hoary sire shall bow his deafened ear,
And greet thy sweet words with his benison;
The mother shine thee as a vestal flame
In the lone temple of her sanctity;
And the young child who takes thee by the hand
Shall travel with a surer step to heaven."

The heart-felt offering of our friend, the Shepherd, must not be forgotten in our register of tributes:

"It's no in that woman's p'wer, sir, to write ill: for, when a feeling heart and a fine genius forger in the bosom o' a young matron, every line o' poetry is like a sad or cheerful smile frae her een, and every poem, whatever be the subject, in a sense a picture o' herself—sae that a' she writes has an affectin' and an enduin' misinnerin' and moralisn about it, that inspires the thoughtfu' reader to say in to himself—That's Mrs. Hemans."

"North.—From very infancy Felicia Dorothea was beloved by the Muses. I remember putting her fair head when she was a child of nine years and versified even then with a touching sweetness about sylphs and fairies."—Notes Ambrosiana, Nov. 1828.

"Felicia Hemans is the authoress of many a plaintive and mournful strain. She has shown high sentiment and heroic feelings occasionally, but her affections are with the gentle, the meek, and the wounded in spirit. . . . Her genius is of the domestic kind, and her best songs are rightly named of the Affections."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"By far the most popular of our poetesses, alike at home and beyond the Atlantic; nor do I say undeservedly. . . . In her poetry, religious truth, moral purity, and intellectual beauty ever meet together; and assuredly it is not less calculated to refine the taste and exalt the imagination because it addresses itself almost exclusively to the better feelings of our nature. Over all her pictures of humanity are spread the glory and the grace reflected from virtuous purity, delicacy of perception and conception, sublimity of religious faith, home-bred delights, and the generous, expansive ardour of patriotism; while, turning from the dark and degraded, whether in subject or sentiment, she seeks out those verdant cases in the desert of human life on which the affections may most pleasantly rest. Her poetry is intensely and entirely feminine; and, in my estimation, this is the highest praise which, in one point of view, could be awarded it. It could have been written by a woman only. . . . Mrs. Hemans, above all female writers, was distinguished for her rich tones, the voice at once sweet and full, that carried them to the heart, awakening the feelings as well as the imagination."—D. M. MOIR: Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

"From the hour of Mrs. Hemans's acquaintance with the German literature, you perceive that she had discovered her own forte, and a new life of tenderness and feeling was manifest in all she wrote. She became an almost constant writer in Blackwood's and Colburn's Magazines, Schiller, Goethe, Körner, and Tieck—how sensibly is the influence of their spirit felt in The Forest Sanctuary; how different was the tone of this to all which had gone before! The cold, classical model was abandoned; the heart and the fancy spoke out in every line, warm, free, solemn, and tenderly thoughtful."—Howitt's Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets.

"Many fragments of poems and plans of works never completed remain to attest the eagerness with which her mind was busying itself in the reproduction of the thoughts and images of beauty which she could not refrain from storing up."—HENRY F. CHOLEY: The Authors of England.

"Had her writings been merely harmless, we should not have entered into an analysis of them; but the moral charm which is spread over them is so peculiar, so full of nature and truth and deep feeling, that her productions claim at once the praise of exquisite purity and poetic excellence. She adds the dignity of her sex to a high sense of the duties of a poet; she writes with buoyancy, yet with earnestness; her poems bear the impress of a character worthy of admiration. In the pursuit of literary renown she never forgets what is due to feminine reserve. We perceive a mind endowed with powers to aspire, and are still further pleased to find no unsatisfied cravings, no passionate pursuit of remote objects, but the high endowments, grace'd by contentment."—GEORGE BANCROFT, The Historian; N. Amer. Rev., xxiv, 433-435.

"Her inspiration always pauses at the feminine point. It never oversteps the modesty of nature nor the dignity and decorum of womanhood. She is no sylph tossed to and fro in the tempest of furious excitement, but ever the calm mistress of the highest and stormiest of her emotions. The truest compliment we can pay her, perhaps the finest compliment that it is possible to pay a woman as a moral being, is to compare her to one of Shakespeare's women; and to say, had Imogen or Isabella or Cordelia become an author, she had so written."—Giffman's Second Gallery of Literary Portraits.

"She seldom reached the sublime; but her thought was often profound, and her nice analysis of the least affections, her delicate perception of the minute circumstances that awaken and guide the sensibilities, the readiness with which she seized upon the noble, the picturesque, the graceful, and the tender, designate her above every English writer but one as the poet of the heart."—GEORGE W. BETHUNE, D.D.: British Female Poets.

Mrs. Grant of Laggan seems to have experienced the "embarrass de richesses" in perusing the poetry of this popular author, for she tells a correspondent—

"I am quite of your opinion as to the too uniform splendour of Felicia Hemans. She keeps us hovering constantly on the wing, like birds of paradise, for want of a perch to repose upon."—Mrs. Grant's Memoirs and Corresp., ed. 1844, vol. ii, 148.

Yet Mrs. Grant, when writing to Mrs. Hemans herself, remarks, when referring to Shenstone's lonely existence:

"How very different is your case! Praised by all that read you—loved by all that praise you—and known in some degree wherever our language is spoken."

Henley, Anthony, M.P., d. 1711, was a contributor to the Tatler, the Medley, and other periodicals, and wrote poetry for music. Garth eulogizes him in the preface to the Dispensary.

Henley, Rev. John, 1692-1756, known as Orator Henley, was a native of Melton-Mowbray, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. Disappointed in obtaining preferment in London, he commenced the delivery of his famous Lectures or Orations upon theology, politics, fashions, and matters in general. He continued these lectures for nearly thirty years, and was certainly one of the lions of London. Pope celebrates him in the Dunciad as the "zany of his age," and Hogarth introduced him in his humorous delineations. He pub. many Sermons, Homilies, translations from Pliny and Montfaucon, Letters, &c., and the following works, by which he is best known: 1. Complete Linguist; or, an Universal Grammar of all the considerable Tongues in Being, Lon., 1719-21, 2 vols. 8vo. 2. Oratory Transactions: No. 1, 1728, 8vo; Nos. 2, 4, 5, 1729, 8vo. 3. Esther; a Poem. 4. The Ilyp Doctor; a Weekly Paper. By this periodical he is said to have cleared £100 per annum. See Stevens's account of Henley, in Nichols's Biog. Anec. of Hogarth; Lon.
