OFFICE OF THE COMMANDING OFFICER
PECOS, TEXAS

December 11, 1942

To my fellow officers and the enlisted men of Pecos Army Flying School:

The undersigned fully understands and realizes the hardships, the ruggedness of flying operations, the lack of equipment, the lack of normal conveniences, and all other obstacles which you as individual members of this station had to overcome in order to open this school on schedule and continue it in full operation. Only your untiring loyalty and zealousness made the accomplishment possible.

I wish to take this opportunity to commend all members of this command for their loyalty, untiring devotion to duty, efficiency, long hours without complaint, and pride of accomplishment.

HISTORY OF THE PECOS ARMY FLYING SCHOOL

Someday, not too far away in the future, veterans of the present world struggle for Victory and Peace will greet each other, saying: "You were at Pecos, weren't you?" Then, as the veterans shake hands, there will come into their eyes, for a brief instant, a glance of understanding. That one brief glance of understanding between two veterans will summarize the history of the institution which we, today, proudly know as Pecos Army Flying School.

Army Air Force Basic Flying School is the official designation of a complicated human enterprise, a flying training air base located at Pecos in the dry lands of West Texas, between the Davis Mountains and the Pecos River. Seen from the air, the expansive array of neatly grouped buildings appears to be an artist's dream-plan of the City of the Future, where all the streets converge upon the flying line. These are the physical attributes of Pecos and many other flying schools. But, the real story of PAFS, the significance of its existence, is the story of the men who are building and operating Pecos as a unit in our national war effort. For PAFS, like all other accomplishments, is the tangible record of human endeavor and human achievement.

Commanding officer, Colonel Harry C. Wishart, has been associated with the construction of PAFS since its inception. As project officer, assigned to the responsible task of directing construction of the air base for the AAF, Colonel Wishart arrived in Pecos in June, 1942, while the engineers plotted the area and as the prairie land was cleared. With his executive officer, Major Robert M. Currier, Colonel Wishart set up temporary headquarters in the Pecos elementary school building. From these offices emanated the plans by which the opening of this flying school was coordinated with the large scale operations of the United States Engineers. From these offices came the plans necessary to the erection of the barracks, hangars and countless utilities as thousands of workmen, technicians and skilled laborers worked day and night as the contracted work was rushed to completion.

Hundreds of automobiles, trucks, tractors, jeeps, "recon" cars moved to and fro across the hot, flat, dust-driven dry-lands; endless trainloads of materials and equipment were moved along the spur-tracks into the military area; the night skies glowed with the reflection of the arc lights trained upon the giant asphalt mixers; all of these sights were but an indication of the human effort and multiple man hours that were, gradually, constantly, transforming a landsite into a military post. Weary, determined, disheveled men in mud-soaked, bleached denim dungarees plodded through endless weeks of constant work; weeks during which men worked and slept only to rise and work again. Time rolled on, relentlessly. Rains converted the newly turned land into a sea of yellow-brown, sticky mud and work continued as the hot Texas sun baked the ooze into powdery dust again.

Rain and dust, dust and rain; during all of these impatient weeks, enlisted men and officers were living in Tent City, the temporary encampment on the Rotary athletic field in Pecos Town. Enlisted men furnished much of the unskilled labor and carpentry work as the wooden buildings were finished for occupation. Hundreds of soldiers toiled beneath the broiling summer sun, clearing the soil of mesquite as the graders prepared the level land for the rapidly advancing runways and landing mats. During all of these weeks, transport and ferry pilots were bringing in flights of training planes, BT-13A Vultees, the basic training planes to be used in cadet training. The blue skies above Pecos Town were, for the first time, pulsating to the beat of Army Air Force propellers in low pitch. Line crews and mechanics were busy inspecting and maintaining the ships as the flying officers assembled and made plans for the instruction of the first class of the flying cadets.

Quite suddenly it was realized that a miniature city had appeared in the valley north of the Davis Mountains. Hospital, theater, chapel, mess halls, barracks, hangar, engineering offices, warehouses were occupied by a khaki-clad population, ready for action.

Early one morning, standing on a rain-soaked field, Colonel Wishart, Major Robert M. Currier and Colonel Sam W. Chevney watched the first class of cadets march to their instruction out on the flying line. Despite the rain, the early morning sun was bright and promising. The officers noticed the sun glittering on the wings of the planes, stretched row upon row along the flying line. At PAFS the first step toward Victory had been achieved.
