The Lawyer

THE life, services, and death of the ablest and best of the legal profession are ordinarily, and too often, left without any record more enduring than the recollection of his colleagues at the bar, or on the bench, than which nothing is more ephemeral. In other professions and callings the record of its foremost men is written in such ways and characters as serve to attract the attention of the masses, and make him temporarily, or for all time, seen and known of men. For the military hero the whole world is making and inscribing a record, while the government which he has served feels bound to honor his memory with monuments of brass or marble that transmit his name and deeds to posterity. The artist leaves the creation of his genius in lines and colors that hand down his name and genius to remote generations. The minister speaks from year to year—now before some great assembly of laymen, now before synod, presbytery or conference, and the measured utterances that befit the occasion are as surely and correctly taken and reduced to print as they are heard by his auditors. The physician, whether as a specialist or a general practitioner, by years of study, experience and ability, becomes an authority, and the record of his experience and his dissertations fill the pages of the medical journals, and his name and fame exist in records more enduring than brass. The statesman, whether real or fancied—provided only that he holds a place supposed to belong to statesmen—leaves a record, not alone in the legislative journals, but also in the memory of ten thousand partisan admirers, and on the pages of a thousand newspapers, whose columns will be filled with the record of his life and exaggerated accounts of his deeds, from the day of his birth to that of his death.

Not so with the lawyer who, during a life longer or shorter, has been “only a lawyer.” His achievements and victories are won, not by accident, or by stirring words, or emotional appeals; not by arguments addressed to friendly minds and sympathetic listeners, as is the case, in many instances, in political warfare, on the stump or in the halls of legislation. Neither have such efforts been the result of deliberate and careful preparation in the library, like those of the statesman, who is allowed his own time, both to prepare and to deliver what he will say. Unlike all of these, the lawyer usually finds himself bound to make his greatest and best efforts amid, or at the close, perhaps, of a lengthy or exhaustive trial, in which he must attempt, at least, to apply great fundamental legal principles to a new state of facts—facts which are constantly varying from hour to hour, thus rendering the exercise of all his powers of discrimination and reasoning, in the highest degree, immediate and necessary. He is thus called upon to take sides, and give a reason for opinions that must be formed and enforced on the spur of the moment and without delay or deliberation, and this he must do, not only thus hastily and without the deliberation that is allowed in every other calling, but in the face of, not a listening and applauding multitude, but in the presence of half a dozen lawyers, all of whom are watching, like the ancient warrior watched, for some vulnerable place, even though it be in the heel of his argument, for an opportunity to assail him, and all this, perhaps, under the depression of feeling arising from the fact that he knows both court and counsel are against him, and, however able his argument, it will be remembered only by the one, while he attempts to demolish it by authority, if he can, or rail at it as illogical and inconclusive if he cannot, while the "court" will recall it only while the matter is under advisement. In efforts before a jury, and in appeals addressed to it, it is still worse; for then not only must he appear without preparation and at the end of a tedious and tiresome trial, but if, as is here supposed, he is a lawyer, and not a legal kite, he is restricted to a discussion of certain facts in evidence, and from which, as a lawyer, he will not seek to depart, and also by the effect which the court gives of the law of such facts; and here, too, the record he makes is as fleeting as the facts and the wandering vagaries of the jury before whom he discusses them—a record remembered for an hour and then forgotten forever. Thus the small audience, the interests of opposing counsel, and the fact that the court who decides against one never thinks much of the effort of the one it holds against, and the further fact that, in the nature of the case, no record of such effort is possible, places the lawyer at a disadvantage under which no other profession or calling rests, so far as his record is concerned.

In the printed arguments which are addressed to the appellate courts, the case is but little better, since they are buried in the files of the court, read only by the counsel on the other side, and the court, and by it often not understandingly, and without sufficient attention to the facts to follow the argument, much less to give it the credit and weight which it deserves. So, while the judgment of the court on what the law is, is recorded, the argument of the lawyer as to what it should be, is recalled only to be forgotten.

Without disparagement to either of the other professions, or to the ability, or pretenses to ability, or to the character of those who are more strictly deemed public men, it must be admitted that the evidence of character and ability afforded by a reputation as a lawyer in the front rank of his profession, is, beyond all question, superior to that which is offered by the holding of any mere public position or office ever has, or in and of itself ever can afford. Nor is there in any other calling or profession so sure or accurate a measure afforded, by which any one may be tried and tested, as in this. The quack in medicine may meet with wondrous success; the minister of the Rev. Charles Honeyman's type exists not alone in fiction; the statesman, or rather the supposed statesman, since he is where a statesman ought to be, may be destitute alike of character and ability, or, if possessed of either, only in a very limited degree—the creature of circumstances or of accidents, a partisan, the creature of a compromise, perhaps, between a level-headed man and a lunatic, whose only qualification was his availability or his wealth. But the lawyer who contents himself with being a lawyer, who neither desires nor seeks anything else than that, and who, thus seeking, attains a standing at the head of his profession, reaches that place, not by accident or by wealth, or by the fostering care of interested partisans, but by reason, and by reason alone, of a combination of great ability, untiring industry and fair moral character, truthfulness and honesty. No man has attained, and no man ever "will" attain, to such a place, who has not all of these in more than ordinary measure. No lawyer has ever made a reputation as such, by mere "smartness," much less by trickery, untruthfulness or dishonesty, and no profession ever opened fairer fields for the exercise of all the essentials of character and ability than does the legal profession.

History of Bench and Bar of Colorado

WHEN the first seekers after gold pitched their camp upon the banks of Cherry Creek, near its confluence with the Platte, in the spring of 1858, and thus laid the foundation for what, in the course of a few years, developed into the City of Denver, the greater part of what today is known as Colorado was part of the Territory of Kansas. All the territory west of a straight line drawn from the northeast corner of New Mexico to the southern boundary of Nebraska and extending as far as the Utah line was embraced in the Kansas county of Arapahoe, and the first court in this region—the Pike's Peak country it was commonly called—was a Kansas court.

Buried in the archives of Kansas, among the records of that state's territorial days, is an act passed by the territorial legislature on August 25, 1855, which, among other things, provides for the appointment of one Allen P. Tibbitts as probate judge of Arapahoe county. Inasmuch as Arapahoe county contained the major part of our present-day Colorado, Tibbitts may rightfully be called Colorado's first judge, even though he never visited Arapahoe county, much less held court within its boundaries. Why Judge Tibbitts failed to assume the duties of his office is not recorded. Most likely he was aware of the fact that, with the exception of a few trappers and hunters, there were no white people in the country then, and he did not relish the long overland trip in those days when hostile Indians infested the region.

March, 1859, witnessed the organization of the first real court in the Pike's Peak country. With the arrival of a steady stream of gold seekers and others in the settlements along Cherry Creek and the Platte, the need of a court had made itself felt in the community. Accordingly the organization of a probate court, along with a full complement of county officers, such as sheriff, registrar of deeds, coroner, attorney, road supervisors, etc., was determined upon. An election was held in March, 1859, and S. W. Wagoner, one of the earliest arrivals in the Pike's Peak country, received most votes for the office of probate judge.

Memoirs of pioneer residents and the records of the State's early history fail to give any definite information regarding the territory over which the jurisdiction of this probate county extended—as a matter of fact, Judge Wagoner and the men who had elected him were not quite sure. In February, 1859, one month before Judge Wagoner's elevation to the bench, the Kansas legislature had enacted a law dividing the Arapahoe county of 1855 into four counties, Montana, Broderick, El Paso and Oro. The Cherry Creek settlements, where most of the people then lived, were within the confines of Montana, comprising practically the entire northwestern section of the State as constituted today.

Some contended that Wagoner was elected probate judge for the county of Arapahoe, as constituted by the Act of 1855, which had named Judge Tibbitts; others insisted that Wagoner's jurisdiction extended only over Montana county. Be this as it may, Wagoner duly qualified as probate judge, and the other officers elected with him assumed the duties of their office, among them Marshall Cook, the first county attorney.

Wagoner and his fellow officers had been in office but a few months when the settlers in the Rocky Mountain region, or at least a goodly portion of them, became imbued with the idea of seceding from Kansas and setting up an independent government. This movement, fostered chiefly in the Cherry Creek settlements, culminated in the establishment of what in history is known as the "Territory of Jefferson," and was, as far as the courts are concerned, responsible for a condition of affairs which may be called extraordinary. It brought into being a multiplicity of courts until there were so many of them that the law-abiding citizens, in sheer desperation, were compelled practically to take the law into their own hands when a serious crime had been committed.

The movement for an independent state or territory first sprung up late in the summer of 1859. Many level-headed men among the settlers full well realized that any attempt on the part of the settlers to create a territory was without warrant of law, and that such a government never would be recognized by Congress or any other state, but their warnings remained unheeded. Leaders in the movement insisted that the act creating Kansas territory provided that all lands to which the Indian title had not been extinguished, should not be considered within the Kansas jurisdiction. They pointed out that the title to the land in the Pike's Peak region was still held by the Indians, and consequently, they argued, Kansas had no jurisdiction over the region.

The warnings of the opponents of an independent government remained unheeded and the "Territory of Jefferson" became an accomplished fact at an election held on October 24, 1859. A few weeks prior to this election a constitution had been adopted which, besides a full complement of officers from governor down, provided for a chief justice of the Supreme Court, two associate justices and an attorney general. A. J. Allison was elected chief justice, J. N. Odell and E. Fitzgerald associate justices, and R. J. Frazier attorney general.

The legislature of the Territory of Jefferson went to work with a will. Its members were very much in earnest and actuated with a desire to give the territory a government and laws enjoyed by the states in the east. Criminal and civil codes, copied wholesale from eastern states, were adopted and approved by the "governor," R. W. Steele, an able lawyer who had come to Colorado early in 1859.

Courts and court procedure enjoyed the special attention of this first Jeffersonian legislature. In less than two months its members enacted, besides many other laws of a general nature, the following which directly affected the administration of justice: establishing a judicial system composed of a supreme, district, county, and justice of the peace courts, and defining the jurisdictions of each of these courts; appointing notaries public; providing docket fees; fixing terms of court; regulating and authorizing writs of attachment and garnishment; providing for the recovery of property by writs of replevin, and so forth. The legislature even authorized the appointment of commissioners for the codification of the laws.

While the men responsible for and active in the conduct of the "government" of the Territory of Jefferson were thus engaged in creating courts and enacting laws, a considerable portion of the citizens then living in this region, and not the least influential, absolutely refused to recognize the territorial government and the courts which had been created by the territorial constitution and the legislature. They maintained, and rightfully so, that the whole Rocky Mountain country was still a part of Kansas and that only officers elected under Kansas laws legally held office.

When the movement for the establishment of the Territory of Jefferson had assumed considerable momentum, the authority of the first probate court, presided over by Judge Wagoner, had begun to wane. As the territorial movement gained momentum, the people paid less and less attention to Wagoner and his court, until finally it passed completely out of existence. The disappearance of this court, recognized by them as the only court doing business legally within the territory, gave the champions of the Kansas cause their opportunity. They held an election in November, 1859, and elected a full set of officers, including a probate judge, for "Arapahoe County, Kansas."

About the time these Kansas officials assumed the duties of their office, courts under the Jeffersonian constitution were organized. The natural result was conflict between the two courts. To add to the confusion Denver City, under an act passed by the legislature, had organized an Appellate and Common Pleas Court for the territory embraced within the city limits, and, in addition, there was still another court conducted by the Arapahoe County Claim Club. Originally organized for the protection of its members against claim-jumpers, this club had gradually extended its jurisdiction until its "court" dealt with all classes of offenders.

Thus there were at least four courts doing business in Arapahoe county. With such a multiplicity of courts it is not surprising that the proper enforcement of law and order suffered. Litigants, of course, commenced what litigation they had in whatever court they knew was friendliest to them. When things did not go to suit them they would take a change of venue from one court to another until they found what they wanted. Criminals experienced little trouble in escaping just punishment, even though county attorney Robert Collier, was holding office in both the Kansas and Jeffersonian courts, having been elected by the adherents of both forms of government, and could prosecute in both courts.

Conditions in other counties created by the Kansas and Jeffersonian territories were not quite as bad as in Denver and Arapahoe county. The vast majority of the settlers lived in and near Denver and the other counties were only sparsely settled. On the plains east of the Rockies there were hardly settlers enough to keep a court busy, and in the mountains the miners had organized courts which were the recognized authorities of all the miners, and which made probate courts, such as provided by Kansas or Jefferson Territory, unnecessary. These courts in the mining communities, named "Miners' Courts," transacted all the court business there was to transact, and the miners paid little or no attention to any other courts.

As far as can be ascertained, the first of these Miners' Courts was organized in 1859, soon after the discovery of gold in the upper Clear Creek region. Its jurisdiction extended over what in those days was known as the Gregory district. All other Miners' Courts in the state were patterned after the Gregory district court. Their machinery was exceedingly simple, but they filled the wants of the people then digging for gold in the mountains.

The officers of a Miners' Court were a president, a probate judge, a sheriff or constable, a surveyor and recorder, a secretary and a treasurer. The probate judge was the chief executive officer. All officers were elected at a general meeting of the male residents of the district over which the court was to have jurisdiction. Codes, criminal as well as civil, were enacted. These codes were, as a rule, very simple. Anyone could understand them. The criminal laws, usually, were enacted with the one purpose in view of ridding the community of undesirables, either by the hangman or by banishment. The civil code dealt chiefly with those subjects in which the men who devised it were mostly interested—such as mining claims, mill sites, and other matters relating to mining.

The Miners' Courts worked with promptness and dispatch. Litigants and defendants had little cause to complain about the law's delays. Once a Miners' Court had taken jurisdiction over a case it was not long before the case had been disposed of. To prevent miscarriage of justice and give everyone a square deal provision for appeal was made in every one of the districts. Every litigant and defendant had the right to appeal from the decision of the court to a miners meeting, composed of all the men in the district. The decision of the miners' meeting in all cases was final.

The Miners' Courts, perhaps more than any other agency, were responsible for the maintenance of law and order in the mining communities. They enjoyed the universal respect of the law-abiding citizens and were feared by evildoers. The first assembly of the Territory of Colorado, in 1861, by special enactment, confirmed their judgments and also enacted into state-wide laws many of the provisions of their simple codes as they affected the mining industry.

Failure of the Kansas, Jeffersonian and municipal courts in Arapahoe county to punish evildoers, according to their deserts, resulted in the organization, by the better class of citizens, of what became known as Peoples' Courts. During the year 1860 there was an extraordinary influx of settlers into the Rocky Mountain region. Reports that gold had been discovered in the mountains and that men were growing rich fast had spread throughout the east. As the natural result, thousands flocked to the new El Dorado, and with them came scores of criminals of the worst type. Most of these undesirables made their headquarters in Denver.

It was with these criminals that the Peoples' Courts dealt. They were not courts in the usually accepted sense, though, in a way, all the forms of court procedure were observed in their proceedings. They have been compared with the vigilantes of other western communities of the early days, but this comparison is hardly fair because, unlike the vigilantes, they gave every accused man a fair trial and the benefit of a legal adviser before their sentences were pronounced and carried out.

Peoples' Courts were organized whenever an especially serious crime, such as a murder, had been committed. There were three judges and a jury of twelve, composed of substantial citizens. The man on trial was given every opportunity to present his side of the case and offer such testimony as would prove his innocence. The sentence of a Peoples' Court usually was death, though there are a number of cases on record in which the juries brought in verdicts of acquittal. In no case, as far as is known, did a People's Court ever make a mistake when it sent a man to the gallows. The sentence was usually carried out immediately after it had been pronounced.

In their methods and the speedy execution, the Peoples' Courts resembled the Miners' Courts of the mountain communities. There the similarity ends, because the Miners' Courts were regularly organized and permanent institutions, while the Peoples' Courts were called together only when the occasion required action by the law-abiding element. The Peoples' Courts did not possess any authority based upon law, other than the law of self-preservation, for had they not meted out justice, the communities might as well have been turned over to the lawless element. They, more than the courts organized in accordance with the law, either Kansas or Jeffersonian, were responsible for the maintenance of law and order.

Kansas and Jeffersonian courts held regular sessions in Denver and other towns of the region for several months. Gradually the influence of the government of the territory began to wane. The people began to realize that they had made a mistake and acted contrary to law when they had organized a territory, instead of letting Congress attend to the matter. In addition, the men in the mining communities refused to recognize the territorial "government" and pay the poll tax which was ordered to produce revenue with which to defray the expenses of the government. Through their own courts they were enabled to administer justice and regulate their own affairs to their entire satisfaction. They did not need the territorial government or its courts.

When the time for the second election of officers of the territorial government arrived, Jefferson territory had been abandoned by most of the people living within its boundaries. Out of a population of more than 25,000 less than a thousand went to the polls and cast their votes. Shortly after this election the people of Eastern Kansas Territory adopted a constitution for a State of Kansas, which was to extend west to the 102nd meridian, thus leaving out practically all the territory embraced by the Territory of Jefferson.

Far-seeing men, who realized that the time had come for the organization of a territory in accordance with the laws of the United States, interested President Buchanan and Congress, and in February, 1861, Congress passed the bill which created the Territory of Colorado, with boundaries corresponding with those of our state today. Jefferson Territory, and with it the judicial system which had been created under it and all of the laws passed by its legislature, passed out of existence in June, 1868. The last act of Robert W. Steele, the "Governor," was a proclamation asking that all officers, especially all judges, surrender their commissions and abstain from the exercise of the duties of their office.

With the inauguration of the territorial government in 1861 order was brought out of the judicial chaos into which the adherents of Jefferson Territory had plunged the whole Rocky Mountain region. All courts, whether Jeffersonian or Kansas, or holding authority from the various miners' districts or the City of Denver, ceased automatically to exist on the day the territorial officers took charge of affairs.

The organic act creating the new territory ordered the legislature, to be elected under it, to divide the territory into three judicial districts; each district to be presided over by a judge who was to have his residence in the district. These judges, the act provided, should sit separately as district judges in their respective districts, and jointly as supreme court judges.

The first three district and supreme judges appointed by President Lincoln were: Benjamin F. Hall of New York, Chief Justice; Charles Lee Armour of Ohio and S. Newton Pettis of Pennsylvania, Associate Justices. Chief Justice Hall's commission was dated March 25, 1861 while Justices Armour and Pettis received their commissions three days later. The court was organized on July 10, 1861.

When the legislature convened it created three judicial districts in accordance with the provisions of the organic act. The first district was known as the Central City District, with Judge Armour as its judge. The second district was known as the Denver District, with Denver as its headquarters; Chief Justice Hall presided over it. Judge Pettis was assigned to what was known as the Southern District. Canon City was originally named as the residence of the judge of this district, but later the legislature first changed it to Colorado City and then to Pueblo. The creation of the judicial districts was followed by the adoption of a code, which remained in force until it was amended in 1868.

Though the new territory had three judicial districts and three judges, some time elapsed before the courts got into good working order. Judge Pettis, from all that can be learned, was not favorably impressed with the district assigned to him and he returned to his home in Pennsylvania without ever having held a single session of court. Allan A. Bradford was appointed to fill the vacancy created by his resignation.

Judges Hall and Armour entered upon their duties soon after they had qualified. Hall remained in office two years, holding court in Denver. His successor was Stephen H. Harding, a former governor of Utah; a man who proved very unpopular, not alone with the attorneys practicing at the law, but with the people of his district generally.

Unpopular as Harding was, still he was better liked than Judge Armour, the third of President Lincoln's original appointees. Armour was a very eccentric man and managed to make himself very unpopular by his manners and his decisions from the bench. Lawyers who had cases pending in his court absolutely refused to try them before him. They either sought to remove them to one of the two other districts, on changes of venue, or had them continued and continued again, in hopes that the judge would resign or be removed. Petitions for his removal were circulated but without result.

Matters finally reached such a stage that the territorial legislature took cognizance of the enmity of the attorneys towards Judge Armour. A law was enacted creating a judicial district of Costilla and Conejos counties, inhabited largely by Mexicans. Judge Armour was assigned to this district, but the legislators had reckoned without their host.

Instead of taking up his residence in the new district, Judge Armour refused pointblank to go. He remained at Central City drawing his salary and enjoying life generally until 1865, when he left the state. In the same year Justice Harding resigned and emulated Judge Armour's example.

More than a year elapsed from the day that they had been inducted into office before the three judges were called upon to sit as a supreme court. With the slate swept clear, so to speak, with the inauguration of the territorial government and with the new government taking no cognizance of the courts which had existed before the organization of the territory, it was but natural that some time should have elapsed before an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court.

The first case to be decided by the Supreme Court was appealed from Park County. It was the case of Gardner vs. Dunn; an action in forcible entry and detainer, begun originally before one of the Park County justices of the peace, appealed to the District Court and thence to the Supreme Court.

The first criminal case to occupy the attention of the Supreme Court was one of the most celebrated murder cases in the early history of the state. William Franklin, known as "Billy" Franklin, had been sentenced to be hanged by the District Court of Gilpin County. His attorneys appealed upon the ground that the indictment, upon which he had been tried, failed to name the territory in which Gilpin County was located and, therefore, was void. The Supreme Court took the same view of the case and reversed the sentence of the District Court.

Franklin never was tried again. Released upon bail, he reported at the Gilpin County courthouse at every term of court for many years, fully expecting to be placed on trial again. His periodical visits to the courthouse gave rise to a standing joke among attorneys and court officials. Whenever Franklin made his appearance, they would say, "Here comes Billy Franklin to be hanged again." The records do not disclose why Franklin never was placed on trial again. He was a very popular man and public feeling was greatly in his favor.

That clause in the enabling act providing that the territory's three judges should sit separately as district judges and jointly as a supreme court, was the cause of many extraordinary situations. Sometimes the associate justices would join forces and reverse one of the chief justice's opinions, rendered by him as district judge. Again the chief justice and one of the associate judges would "sit on" the other associate justice. As a rule the judges got along very well and managed to dispose of all appeals in a manner satisfactory to all parties concerned, especially so after the original appointees had been replaced by better and abler men.

Holding of court in the early Colorado days was quite often difficult, if not positively dangerous. With no railroads to carry them to the towns, in which they were to hold court, the judges were compelled to use stages or private conveyances. The country was infested with hostile Indians and made unsafe by desperate characters who had fled from Eastern cities and sought refuge in the mountain fastnesses. As a result it often became necessary to provide the judges with armed escorts when they started to make the rounds of their districts. Accommodations, so far as courtrooms and as well as lodgings were concerned, were of the most primitive order.

The first three judges had retired from the bench by 1865. Judge Bradford, who had been appointed to fill the vacancy created by Judge Pettis' resignation, relinquished his office in 1865. He was succeeded by Charles F. Holly. William H. Gale was named to take the place of Judge Armour when the latter decided to leave the territory and return to his home in the east. Holly and Gale were followed on the bench in 1866 by W. H. Gorsline and Christian S. Eyster. Chief Justice Harding resigned late in 1866, and Moses Hallett, then one of the youngest members of the territorial bar, was appointed to fill his place. Judges Gorsline and Eyster were succeeded by James B. Belford and Ebenezer T. Wells. Andrew W. Brazee succeeded Judge Belford and Amherst W. Stone was appointed in place of Judge Wells. Chief Justice Hallett and Justices Brazee and Stone were on the bench when Colorado was admitted to the Union as a state.

The names of Justices Hallett, Wells and Belford are remembered by many of the attorneys of the present generation. Justice Hallett, appointed to the bench through the united efforts of the bar and the people of the territory, by his ability and great learning and fearlessness, soon gained the confidence of lawyers and litigants alike. His appointment to the federal judgeship, upon Colorado's admission to the Union in 1876, met with universal approval of lawyers and laymen alike. While filling the office of Chief Justice, Judge Hallett was called upon to decide many cases involving questions which had never been presented to a court before; notably cases growing out of the booming mining industry and irrigation. To this day our courts follow the law as laid down by him in his opinion.

Judge Belford, after serving on the Supreme and District Bench, retired to the private practice of law. At the first election held after Colorado had become a state, he was elected the state's first representative in the lower house of Congress. Three times afterwards his fellow citizens honored him by electing him a representative in Congress.

Judge Wells earned the everlasting gratitude of judges and lawyers alike by compiling the first revision of the statutes of the state, a work much needed and greatly appreciated. He is today the official reporter of the Colorado Supreme Court. His reports are, as every lawyer and judge in the state knows, distinguished by the same clearness which marked his decisions when he was on the bench.

The constitution adopted upon the state's admission to the Union in 1876 provided for a Supreme Court of three judges and for four judicial districts, with one judge for each of the district courts. The first election of Supreme Court judges resulted in the election of Henry C. Thatcher, Samuel H. Elbert and Ebenezer T. Wells. The latter resigned before the expiration of his term and his place was filled by the election of Wilbur F. Stone, one of the pioneer lawyers in the southern section of the state and one of the most active members of the bar. Judge Stone, hale and hearty, at 84 today, is the Commissioner of the United States Court for Colorado in Denver.

With a steady influx of settlers into the young state and the growth of the business of the courts, four judicial districts proved inadequate within a few years. In order to give relief and bring about a speedier administration of justice, the general assembly in 1881 increased the number of judicial districts to seven and provided for seven judges, one for each district. Seven judges soon were no more able to attend to all of the business of the district courts than four had been. Dockets became more and more congested, especially in Denver, Pueblo and Leadville, the largest cities in the state in those days. When the bill creating seven districts was enacted by the general assembly an attempt was made to further lighten the burdens of the Denver district judge by the creation of a special criminal court. The bill providing for such a court was passed but declared unconstitutional.

In 1883 the next general assembly, realizing that the congestion of the court business was becoming serious, again considered relief measures. The result was that a bill was passed creating special criminal courts in Arapahoe, Pueblo and Lake counties. These courts were given jurisdiction over all criminal cases, with the exception of capital offenses. In Arapahoe County further relief for the district court was provided at the same time by the establishment of a Superior Court. This court had concurrent jurisdiction with the district court but its jurisdiction did not extend beyond the limits of the City of Denver.

The criminal courts remained until 1889 when they, and with it Denver's Superior Court, were abolished by the Seventh General Assembly. That body of lawmakers simply failed to make any provision for the maintenance of these courts and ordered the cases pending in them transferred to the district court. During the six years of its existence the Denver Criminal Court had only two judges, Platt Rogers, still an active member of the Denver bar, and Wilbur F. Stone, who was appointed to this court after he had completed his term on the Supreme bench.

The abolishment of the Criminal and Superior courts in Denver had been foreshadowed by an act of the Sixth General Assembly in 1887, when it had increased the number of the Arapahoe County district judges to two and had created two additional districts. In order to provide enough judges in Arapahoe County to dispose of all of the business which the district court was bound to receive as the result of the doing-away with the Superior and Separate criminal courts, the Seventh General Assembly increased the number of the divisions of the district court to four, with a judge for each. The next general assembly, in 1891, added still another judge.

Though the population of Denver has more than doubled since, the number of judges has remained the same. Repeated efforts, the last before the Twenty-second General Assembly in 1917, to induce the law-making body of the state to increase the number of judges have failed. The natural result is a badly congested docket. The judges are not to blame for this condition of affairs. They work hard and earnestly; new cases simply are brought faster than the judges can dispose of them, if they wish to give them that consideration which they should give them.

At the same time that Arapahoe County was given five district judges, the General Assembly redistricted the entire state. A bill was passed dividing the state into thirteen judicial districts. These thirteen districts remain today as fixed by this bill. Elsewhere in this volume will be found a list of the districts and of the counties embraced by each of them and of the judges holding court in them today. Though the districts have not been changed since 1891, the number of judges has been increased from time to time. In 1893 the tenth or Pueblo District was given a second judge. Two years later the number of judges in the fourth or Colorado Springs district was increased to two. In 1903 the eighth district was given a second judge and the fourth a third. A second judge was provided for the third district in 1915. The number of judges remained unchanged until the present year, when the Twenty-second General Assembly saw fit to abolish one of the three judgeships in the fourth district. Today twenty-two district judges are disposing of the business which forty-one years ago four judges were able to handle satisfactorily. The only special court in Colorado today is the Denver Juvenile Court, created by an act of the General Assembly in 1909.

For ten years following Colorado's admission to the Union, the Supreme Court remained the only appellate court of the state. As the years passed and the district courts began to dispose of an ever-increasing number of cases, the number of causes submitted to the Supreme Court for final review grew also until finally the court's docket became as badly congested as that of any district court in the state. Litigants were compelled to wait a year or more before their cases were finally disposed of.

Many attorneys practicing at the bar advocated an increase of the number of judges of the Supreme Court as the best and speediest remedy to bring relief. They, however, were in the minority. Following the example set by a number of eastern states, the General Assembly in 1887 created what was known as the Supreme Court Commission as an auxiliary to the court. Under the provision of the act creating this commission, the Supreme Court judges assigned such cases as they selected to the commissioners, of whom there were three. The commissioners examined these cases and, their examination of the record finished, submitted opinions to the judges for approval. The plan would have worked excellently but for the fact that the judges, in order to be able to approve the opinions submitted by the commission, were compelled to look into the cases themselves to see whether they agreed with the commissioners or not. The result was that as much time was required for the disposition of a case as if a judge had handled the case from the very beginning.

Three years of the Supreme Court Commission convinced lawyers and laymen alike that some other remedy had to be found to bring about a speedier adjudication of civil action and criminal cases. The advocates of an enlarged Supreme Court again made an effort to have the number of judges increased, but, as before, their efforts were doomed to failure. Instead, the Eighth General Assembly in 1891 created a Court of Appeals, giving it jurisdiction over litigation coming up from the lower courts. George Q. Richmond, today an active member of the Denver bar, Gilbert R. Reed and Julius Bissell were the first judges appointed as judges of this court. For fourteen years this court assisted the Supreme Court in disposing of the litigation which had accumulated in the course of years. Altogether its judges decided not less than 2,631 cases.

The Court of Appeals was abolished by the Sixteenth General Assembly. In 1905 those lawyers and judges favoring an increased Supreme Court as the only satisfactory means of successfully disposing of the accumulation of appealed cases, were successful in their efforts to have the number of the judges of the state's highest tribunal increased to a number which, in their judgment, would be sufficient to take care of all appealed cases. Through their efforts the General Assembly was induced to pass a bill abolishing the Court of Appeals and increasing the number of Supreme Court judges from three to seven. The Court of Appeals passed out of existence on April 4, 1905, and on the following day the enlarged Supreme Court, with William H. Gabbert as chief justice, held its first session.

Accumulation of business again compelled the state's lawmakers to have recourse to a Court of Appeals in 1913. Despite the increase of its membership to seven, the Supreme Court had been unable to dispose of its cases as rapidly as was desirable in the interests of right and justice. For the purpose of helping the court to dispose of many cases of minor importance, the Court of Appeals was called into being again. It was composed of five judges, to whom were assigned cases of minor importance. It was created for the sole purpose of disposing of accumulated cases.

When that task was finished two years later, the court again passed out of existence.

With the ever-increasing court business it is but a question of time, in the opinion of attorneys, until it will become necessary to either increase the number of Supreme Court judges again, or once more create a Court of Appeals. Lawyers and litigants alike are entitled to and demand a speedier disposition of cases than a court of last resort of but seven members, with the utmost application and diligence can give them.

When Colorado was admitted to the Union as a state, a United States District Court was established with Denver as the seat of the judge presiding over it. Elmer S. Dundy, judge of the District of Nebraska, held the first session of the court on December 5, 1876. On January 23, 1877, Moses Hallett, for ten years chief justice of the Colorado Territorial Supreme Court, took the oath of office as United States judge, and until death called him thirty years later, he presided over the court. Westbrooke S. Decker was the first United States District Attorney for Colorado. He took office on the day that Judge Hallett ascended the federal bench.

Since the day it was established, the United States Court for Colorado has had only two judges: Moses Hallett and Robert E. Lewis, the present judge, appointed upon Judge Hallett's death in 1906.

No history of the bench and bar of Colorado, no matter how brief, would be complete without some reference to the men who were and are members of the bar, and called to the bench to administer the laws. It is no exaggeration to say that, from the days when the first gold-seekers flocked into the country at the base of the Rockies until the present day, Colorado has been fortunate in having lawyers and judges who have been a credit to the state, and who, in taking care of the interests of those in need of legal advice and assistance and in administering the law, have been and are second to none in the country.

Lawyers and judges of the early days of the state were called upon to deal with many questions which were entirely new to them. There was no precedent to guide them in their arguments and decisions. As the gold-seekers left the banks of the streams on the plains and discovered the yellow metal in the mountains, rules and regulations for the protection of the miners and their property became necessary. Colorado in those days was practically the only state in the Union in which mining, other than by placer methods, was carried on.

It was here that the pioneer lawyers of the state showed their ability and genius. As advisers of the Miners' Courts and Miners' Districts, they formulated the laws governing mining claims, millsites, and such other matters connected with the rapidly developing industry. These regulations formed the basis for many of the laws affecting mining enacted by the legislature after Colorado had been made a territory.

Farming by irrigation presented other knotty problems to the pioneer lawyers. As in litigation growing out of mining, there was no precedent to guide them. Step by step they were compelled to work out the solution of these problems until the rights of the users of water, the digging of ditches and establishment of reservoirs, had been settled. Years passed before many of the questions had been settled and the law laid down for all time.

It required men of unusual ability and resourcefulness to successfully meet all the questions which presented themselves to them in this region in the early days. Not only were these qualities required of the men practicing at the bar but also, and if not in a higher degree, of the judges on the bench. With very few exceptions, the judges proved themselves equal to the task. The few exceptions were political favorites, sent into the states by the powers-that-were at Washington—not because of their fitness for the high office, but because they happened to have influence enough to bring about their appointment. The judges who, after the first few appointments, were selected through the influence of the people within the territory, without an exception, were men of the highest character and ability.

There were quite a number of attorneys among the men who came West and settled in Colorado during the first few years. These men, aside from practicing their profession, took a great interest in public affairs. They were among the leaders in the movements which resulted in the organization of Jefferson territory, and later brought about the organization of the territory and the admission of the territory as a state. As members of the territorial legislatures and of the general assemblies, lawyers took a leading part in the framing of our laws and of the criminal and civil codes.

Many lawyers were not only honored by their elevation to the bench, but were placed in high positions by the people of the state. Among Colorado's governors, United States senators, congressmen, and other high officials, there are found scores of men whose names are famous in the court's annals of jurisprudence—men whose names are known from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf—men whose achievements have brought everlasting glory to the people of the state who elected them.

Colorado may well be proud of the men to whom her people have entrusted the administration of justice, and who are today practicing within her borders the noble profession of the law.

The Federal Court

INTERESTING from an historical viewpoint and replete with personalities and numerous humorous sidelights, is the glimpse of the Colorado Federal Court, as afforded by the address of T. J. O'Donnell at the dedication of the new government building in Denver a year ago.

On that occasion Mr. O'Donnell, the present president of the Colorado Bar Association, in part said:

The first session of this court and of that court which was its contemporary as well as its predecessor, was held in the building then known as Ford's Hotel, 1626 Larimer Street, December 5, 1876.

The event had been looked forward to by those who participated in it with an interest and enthusiasm far beyond that which animates this occasion. We celebrate a thing realized; they dedicated a hope. We dedicate an edifice of marble; they celebrated the creation of a state, for the opening of this court was the final act which evidenced the realization of the hopes of the heroic men who had builded the foundations and raised the superstructure of a new commonwealth, amid desert spaces and mountain wilds.

The glittering Centennial star had already taken its place in the constellation of the states, and this event marked the assumption, by the central planet, of one of the primary functions which hold them secure in their firmament.

Elmer S. Dundy, judge for the district of Nebraska, presided, but there was no bar. The genius of American institutions has no better illustration than the method by which the lawyers of the state were made members of the bar of the courts of these United States. Judge Samuel H. Elbert, who had been elected to the Supreme Court of the state, on its admission to the Union, was recognized, in his official capacity, by Judge Dundy, and moved the admission to the bar of—

Eugene P. Jacobson	Westbrooke S. Decker
Alfred Sayre	John W. Jenkins
Hugh Butler	Mitchell Benedict and Alfred I. Blake

as attorneys and counsellors at law, solicitors in chancery and proctors in admiralty.

All these are historic names in Colorado. The court records recite the indictment of one of them by the grand jury impaneled a little earlier on the same day, which shows that lawyers have improved in character, if not in capacity, since that time.

That the acknowledged versatility of this bar is no new thing, is evidenced by the fact that one of these seven selected leaders of the profession afterwards successfully combined the practice of law with the keeping of a livery stable.

Law, equity and admiralty (doubtless it was then thought the latter might draw unto itself jurisdiction over irrigation ditches) having been thus started on their course, with a nucleus of attorneys, solicitors and proctors, the admission of others, among the first of whom was Amos Steck, followed rapidly on the motion of divers of those first sworn in.

That was not quite forty years ago, but of the men who signed the roll that first day and thereafter during the first month of this court's existence,

Owen E. Lefevre	Robert E. Foote
George Q. Richmond	Alfred C. Phelps
William C. Kingsley	Robert S. Morrison and Clinton Reed

only, still answer at roll-call; the others, that brainy, brilliant host of pioneer lawyers, who foregathered on Larimer Street in 1876, alas!

“The winds have blown them all away.”

Judge E. T. Wells and Ex-Senator T. M. Patterson were not admitted to this bar until the following year. John M. Waldron's name was added to the roll in 1879, and our well-beloved and hoary friends, James H. Blood and Gustave C. Bartels, signed up, in this order, three days apart, in July, 1880—the first, last and only time they were ever known to do the same thing or anything, at different times.

Wilbur F. Stone went early to the Supreme bench of the state, and so the name of this much-esteemed historian of the pioneer bench and bar does not appear on this roll until many years later.

Edward O. Wolcott, "of Georgetown," was admitted here on the fifth day of the court's session. Senator Charles S. Thomas was admitted December 14th, and Frederick W. Pitkin, afterwards governor for two terms, about the same time. General Bela M. Hughes, Henry M. Teller, George W. Miller and Vincent D. Markham were enrolled in 1877.

These were honored in their generation and were the glory of the times, and there are of them that have left a name behind them.

General Hughes, the Nestor of the bar, and Chevallier Bayard of Colorado; Butler, walking statelier than Rome's tribune, master of logic and rhetoric, and able to contend with all the canniness of his Scotch, or the fervor of his Irish, ancestors, as the cause demanded; it was said of Butler that he never put forth his best efforts until he came to the petition for a rehearing, and that if he represented the defendant the case was never tried until both parties were dead, and generally not then; Wolcott, like Cariolanus, hating the many-headed multitude, but able to sway with his voice, juries and assemblies; Henry M. Teller, cold as the icicle on Dian's temple, but bold as a lion when aroused to righteous wrath; Miller, uncouth and not too learned, but with a fierce and savage imagery and posture and voice, an inheritance of his Indian blood, which drove all before him.

Miller was defending a man accused of manslaughter, in the Territorial Court at Colorado Springs. Judge Hallett was presiding. That the defendant killed the deceased was admitted; the plea was self-defense, and it was charged that the deceased had threatened the life of defendant with a loaded rifle. Miller seized the rifle, which was an exhibit in the case, and bringing it to bear upon the jury, charged, with a ferocious Indian yell. The jurors and everyone else in the court room except the judge, instantly became men of one mind and fled the room. Judge Hallett remained upon the bench, as imperturbable as he appears in that portrait upon the wall. The sheriff finally peeked in. Judge Hallett, calling him to the bench, said: "Mr. Sheriff, will you see if you can induce the jury to return to the court room and resume the consideration of the case, and you may assure them, sir, of the court's protection."

There was Markham, Virginia cavalier, whose learning and wit were seldom voiced standing, but who was a most formidable antagonist with pen and paper; Willard Teller, equally able and locally as well known as his more famous brother; Judge Steck, that quaint character, pioneer of California, as well as Colorado.

Judge Steck resigned from the county bench in 1883, and took offices in the old Tabor block at Sixteenth and Larimer streets, where I then had an office. Coming out of the building one day, I observed him walking with another man, whom he held by the arm, and to whom he was exhorting and gesticulating, in his pronounced and pugnacious manner, saying: "The Supreme Court will reverse it, the Supreme Court will reverse it, it's bound to reverse it." I stepped up and said: "What is that, Judge Steck, one of your decisions?"

"Yes, and a most damnably iniquitous decision it was, too!" he answered.

I wish that judges would recognize their limitations as readily when they are on the bench as when they are off. When they are off, it seems so easy.

Nor can any reference to the bar of that time omit mention of Major Edward L. Smith, urbane, soft-spoken and courteous, but who would spring with the quickness of a leopard at an antagonist off his guard; Tom Macon, primal man from Missouri, who never willingly ate any diet more civilized than corn pone and bacon, who could beat the devil quoting Scripture, who described a contemporary orator as placing all his emphasis on his prepositions, who could grill a witness until the lid of Satan's cook stove seemed cool to the touch.

While we have no Westminster Abbey for their sarcophagi, the cold, dull marble of the tomb is theirs. Splendid even in ashes, they rest quietly under the murmurings of many and mighty conquests, in that temple of silence and reconciliation which affords, at last, a quiet repose to those whose minds and bodies have been shattered by contentions, struggles and adversary blows in the defense of the rights of others.

Judge John F. Dillon sat with Judge Dundy the second and third days of the term, and many times afterward, and Judge McCrary and Judge Brewer frequently presided during their respective terms as circuit judges.

The late Justice Samuel F. Miller, of the Supreme Court, frequently came here, in the old days, when the judges of that august tribunal were generally appointed with some reference to the circuits, and made periodical visits to the one to which assigned.

The Union Pacific Railroad, under some one of its many corporate aliases, was a party in Cause No. 1 on the docket; No. 2, and several thereafter, were bills brought by the United States to set aside alleged frauds against the government in respect to public lands. Nothing changes, in forty years, but men! The grand jury—and I think the late Dennis Sullivan was the last survivor of the panel—returned numerous true bills, principally against Mexicans. The court seems to have taken up their cases under the maxim: First in time, first in right. Manuel Vigil, having drawn the lowest number on the docket, was tried first, and acquitted by a jury of Gringoes. The others followed.

A careful investigation of the facts will lead any careful man to the firm conclusion that each and every one was clearly guilty and most properly acquitted. Pioneer juries evidently applied the same principle, in the trial of Mexicans, that tenderfoot juries, in these soft days, apply upon the trial of young Piute Indian braves.

The court continued to occupy the Larimer Street quarters until May 6, 1884, when it was removed to the old Symes block, since destroyed by fire, at Sixteenth and Champa, where it remained until November 29, 1889, when it was shifted to the Gettysburg building. It did not move again until February 3, 1893, when it went into possession of the quarters prepared for it in the Federal building at Sixteenth and Arapahoe streets, which have housed it from thence until today. By the way, the circumstances of the erection of this building shows the celerity with which this great government of ours can act when driven to it—its capacity for quick preparation—the site of that building was selected in 1880, and the building was ready for occupancy thirteen years later!

There were many notable cases tried in that old Larimer Street court room. The Leadville apex cases brought political and financial fortune to a number of lawyers. Judge George G. Symes came here in the '70s. He had been territorial judge in Montana. He formed a partnership with Judge Decker, and became immediately prominent, through connection with the litigation over the Dives-Pelican mines at Georgetown. He espoused the apex side in the controversy over the Leadville formation, but was defeated. He purchased a corner on Sixteenth Street with his fees, built a block and went to Congress. Patterson & Thomas represented the defense. Both became rich, and the riches of one, at least, have continued to grow ever since. Both, at times, ran for governor, and one of them was finally elected. Both ran for the Senate many times, and each was ultimately elected senator. They defeated the apex for Leadville, but lost it for Aspen. The Aspen cases were tried later, and the apex side was espoused by Senator Teller, then in the very zenith of his power and influence.

C. J. Hughes first attained prominence in these Aspen apex litigations, through his association with Senator Teller, and laid the foundation of his fortune and subsequent senatorship.

On the day this court opened Colonel Edward F. Bishop, who had been a gallant soldier of the Union, in the conflict between the states, and who bore scars of that conflict, was appointed clerk of both the Circuit and the District courts, and his brother, Charles W., then a fat and chubby boy, occupied a desk in the little room where its meager records were to be written.

William A. Willard succeeded Colonel Bishop, when the latter resigned. On the death of Mr. Willard Capt. Francis W. Tupper, a one-legged veteran of the Civil War, was appointed by Judge Hallett clerk of the District Court, and Circuit Judge Caldwell appointed Capt. Robert Bailey, who had been his companion in arms, clerk of the Circuit Court.

Mr. Charles W. Bishop became clerk of the District Court on the death of Captain Tupper in 1900, and clerk of the Circuit Court on Captain Bailey's resignation in 1906. He held both places until the merger of the two courts, December 31, 1911, and still he serves, less changing than the law itself, immutable and inscrutable, but still believing:

"Life is not so short but that there is always time enough for courtesy."

The incumbent is the eighth marshal. His immediate predecessor, Dewey C. Bailey, served more than twice as long as the average term in this office.

Judge Moses Hallett took his seat on this bench January 23, 1877. How different the surroundings from those in which we are assembled! The venue of that day is laid in a poorly lighted, illy ventilated room, in a dilapidated building. The condition of the furniture is illustrated by a story which Judge Hallett told me, not long before he died.

It was shortly after Judge Hallett took his place upon this bench. Gen. Samuel E. Brown came in one day, and taking his seat on one of the chairs of the court room, the perforated bottoms of which were held in place with tacks, he quickly discovered that a tack had been inverted. Immediately arising and addressing the court, he said:

“This court is sharp at the wrong end.”

General Brown, first attorney general of the territory, was the wag and wit of the bar. Judge Markham said of him that he would rather get off a joke than get a verdict, and that if he had been paid a dollar apiece for all the suits he had appeared in, he'd have been the richest man in the world.

The unique and extraordinary character, who was first judge of this district, must necessarily occupy the foreground in any picture of this court for the period covered by this sketch. He presided here for thirty years, and thus rounded out a forty-year term upon the bench in Colorado. Nature is not sufficiently fecund, in departing from formula, to lend reasonable expectation that he will be approached, much less duplicated, within the century.

Dignified in bearing, austere in manner, unapproachable in demeanor, frigid in speech, there dwelt beneath this cold and forbidding exterior a heart in which the law of kindness was as well known as was the law of the land in the head above the heart.

When I had occasion to seek his aid and that of others for a pioneer lawyer who was in distress, he responded more liberally than any other man approached and in a spirit which showed that an ancient quarrel had left no bitterness. Behind the stern demand for the respect due the judicial office and judicial proceedings, there dwelt a modesty and a simplicity which few were privileged to know or understand. When with him in Washington, during and just before the Cleveland inaugural of 1885, he was turning away from the bar of the Supreme Court, because, on that day, only members of that bar were admitted within the rail. Another lawyer made known the position Judge Hallett was too modest to mention, and he was immediately seated inside the rail. I believe he had never before been present at a session of the Supreme Court.

The written law he knew; the precepts which are writ, in a dead language, upon the lintel of this building and upon these walls, were living sentiments in his heart and guide posts of his daily walk.

The Denver Bar Association

BY HUGH McLEAN

LOOKING back twenty-six years through the records of the Denver Bar Association to its organization meeting on October 31, 1891, one finds much interesting history and encounters the names of many who were well known, some of whom are still with us and still active at the bar and in the Association, many of whom have passed on. Judge Moses Hallett addressed the first meeting, speaking of the necessity for such an organization, and the purposes which it might serve. He seems to have been largely instrumental in its formation, as he was some years later in the organization of the Colorado Bar Association. J. E. Lomery, later for many years the faithful secretary and treasurer of the Association, did the active and necessary work of circulating a written call for the organization meeting, securing the signatures of one hundred fifty-nine members of the bench and bar to that document. Albert E. Pattison, later one of the Supreme Court Commissioners, was elected the first president. Among the names of those participating prominently in the early meetings, we find those of Charles S. Thomas, T. J. O'Donnell, R. D. Thompson, James B. Belford, William E. Beck, W. S. Decker, Hugh Butler, John H. Denison, George C. Manly, and others. A list of the presidents of the Association from its organization to the present time may be of interest. It is as follows:

It is interesting to note that the very first piece of business taken up by the Association in November, 1891, immediately after its organization was the matter of "The Delays Caused by the Rules of the District Court," and that Judge George W. Allen responded for the judges to the attacks made upon the rules. The advertising divorce lawyer, like the law's delays, seem to have been an evil present then as now in the practice. Very stringent resolutions were adopted at one of the first meetings against lawyers advertising to procure divorces "legally and quietly, without appearing in court. Good everywhere."

As early as May, 1894, the Association made its first attempt to take part in the selection of judicial candidates. It then, through a committee of which Harper M. Orahod was chairman, selected ten nominees from each of the then three prominent parties, as suggestions for the five district judgeships. Among the Republicans suggested we find George W. Allen, Owen E. Le Fevre, B. M. Malone, and George Q. Richmond. Among the Democrats were S. L. Carpenter, A. J. Rising, Harvey Riddell, Platt Rogers, and Caldwell Yeaman; while the People's Party list contained the names of Ezra Keeler, H. E. Luthe, Thomas Macon, George C. Norris, and E. J. Short. What the results of these suggestions were, if any, the Association's records do not disclose.

The first banquet of the Association was held in February, 1893. The cost of high living seems not to have troubled our predecessors of those earlier days, as five-dollar-a-plate banquets were the rule, and the record of the first banquet committee contains as one item, "67 bottles of wine at $4.00 each." Our friend, John Hipp, in this day of Prohibition triumph, must be somewhat amused to recall his first modest "dry" motion, made at a meeting of the Association in 1895, "that the banquet committee consider the question as to whether wine should be dispensed with at the coming banquet." The motion was carried, and the banquet committee seems to have "considered" it—adversely.

On August 19, 1903, the Association was incorporated, and its objects were epitomized in the following rather striking phrases:

"The objects for which said Association is formed and incorporated are: To advance the science of jurisprudence; to promote the administration of justice; to secure proper legislation; to encourage a thorough legal education; to uphold the honor and dignity of the bar; to cultivate cordial intercourse among the lawyers of Denver; to perpetuate a history of the profession and the memory of its members; to acquire, own and hold real and personal property, including a law library, club house, etc., in furtherance of said business and objects."

Without boasting, it may be said that our Association has striven constantly and with some measure of success towards the attainment of these ends, and that some of them, at least, are in a fair way towards accomplishment. The Association, through the voluntary contributions of its members, in the shape of three dollars set aside from every five dollars paid in, as the annual dues of each member, has expended ten thousand dollars on its law library in the court house, and is continuing to add to the library at the rate of about one thousand dollars per year. In addition to this, the City and County, in the earlier and more struggling days of the library; generously contributed three thousand dollars toward this fund, and still provides the library quarters in the court house.

“Cordial intercourse among the lawyers of Denver” has been cultivated, not only by the banquets, but by monthly luncheons, which it has been the custom during the past few years to hold. At these we have entertained and have heard interesting talks from many prominent visitors, and have discussed timely topics of local and professional interest, and have become better acquainted, judges and lawyers meeting in friendly companionship.

At the meetings, in the earlier days, the secretary's record shows that frequent adjournments had to be taken for lack of a quorum, a quorum consisting of thirteen members. In these later days we have had as many as one hundred seventy-five lawyers and judges at a single luncheon meeting. The present membership of the Association is four hundred thirty-three, constituting a large majority of the lawyers in active practice in the city; and there is no sign that in the increase of numbers and of money there has been any loss in effectiveness in upholding the honor of the profession, and in serving the administration of justice in this community.
