ELECTORAL COUNT OF 1877.

The disputes as to the votes cast in some of the States by the respective sets of persons claiming to have been chosen electors at the popular elections held therein on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, were of such a nature as to lead to grave fears that difficulty might ensue if there were no further provision for the case than was contained in some of the sections of the act of Congress of March 1, 1792, and the act of March 26, 1804, embodied in the Revised Statutes from section 135 to 143, which sections contained all the legislation that had been provided for any such contingency and that seemed to be entirely inadequate. When the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress convened, the subject immediately attracted attention in both Houses. On the 14th of December, 1876, the House of Representatives passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee of seven, with power to act in conjunction with any similar committee appointed by the Senate, to prepare and report without delay a measure for the removal of differences of opinion as to the proper mode of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States and as to the manner of determining questions which might arise as to the legality and validity of the returns of such votes made by the several States, to the end that the votes should be counted and the result declared "by a tribunal whose authority none can question and whose decision all will accept as final."

On the 18th of December the Senate referred the message of the House of Representatives communicating its resolution, to a select committee, to be composed of seven Senators, with power "to prepare and report, without unnecessary delay, such a measure, either of a legislative or other character, as may, in their judgment, be best calculated to accomplish the lawful counting of the electoral votes and best disposition of all questions connected therewith, and the due declaration of the result," and also with power "to confer and act with the committee of the House of Representatives."

The committees provided for by these resolutions were composed, on the part of the Senate, of George F. Edmunds of Vermont, Oliver P. Morton of Indiana, Frederick T. Frelinghuysen of New Jersey, Roscoe Conkling of New York, Allen G. Thurman of Ohio, Thomas F. Bayard of Delaware, and Matt. W. Ransom of North Carolina, and on the part of the House of Representatives of Henry B. Payne of Ohio, Eppa Hunton of Virginia, Abram S. Hewitt of New York, William M. Springer of Illinois, George W. McCrary of Iowa, George F. Hoar of Massachusetts, and George Willard of Michigan.

On the 18th of January, 1877 these committees submitted a report to the respective Houses, signed by all their members except Senator Morton, recommending the passage of a bill, which, after discussion in both Houses, became a law on the 29th of January, in the precise words reported, as follows:

AN ACT to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March fourth, anno Domini eighteen hundred and seventy-seven.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the hall of the House of Representatives, at the hour of one o'clock post meridian, on the first Thursday in February, anno Domini eighteen hundred and seventy-seven; and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. Two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates, and papers purporting to be certificates, of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted as in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the journals of the two houses. Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper when there shall be only one return from a State, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one Member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two houses. When the two houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.

SEC. 2. That if more than one return, or paper purporting to be a return from a State, shall have been received by the President of the Senate, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, (unless they shall be duplicates of the same return,) all such returns and papers shall be opened by him in the presence of the two houses when met as aforesaid, and read by the tellers, and all such returns and papers shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision as to which is the true and lawful electoral vote of such State, of a commission constituted as follows, namely: During the session of each house on the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, eighteen hundred and seventy-seven, each house shall, by viva voce vote, appoint five of its members, who with the five associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be ascertained as hereinafter provided, shall constitute a commission for the decision of all questions upon or in respect of such double returns named in this section. On the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, anno Domini eighteen hundred and seventy-seven, or as soon thereafter as may be, the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States now assigned to the first, third, eighth, and ninth circuits shall select, in such manner as a majority of them shall deem fit, another of the associate justices of said court, which five persons shall be members of said commission; and the person longest in commission of said five justices shall be the president of said commission. The members of said commission shall respectively take and subscribe the following oath: "I, _____, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to the commission of which I am a member, and a true judgment give thereon, agreeably to the Constitution and the laws: so help me God;" which oath shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate. When the commission shall have been thus organized, it shall not be in the power of either house to dissolve the same, or to withdraw any of its members; but if any such Senator or member shall die or become physically unable to perform the duties required by this act, the fact of such death or physical inability shall be by said commission, before it shall proceed further, communicated to the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be, which body shall immediately and without debate proceed by viva voce vote to fill the place so vacated, and the person so appointed shall take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed, and become a member of said commission; and, in like manner, if any of said justices of the Supreme Court shall die or become physically incapable of performing the duties required by this act, the other of said justices, members of the said commission, shall immediately appoint another justice of said court a member of said commission, and, in such appointments, regard shall be had to the impartiality and freedom from bias sought by the original appointments to said commission, who shall thereupon immediately take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed, and become a member of said commission to fill the vacancy so occasioned. All the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of each State shall be opened, in the alphabetical order of the States, as provided in section one of this act; and when there shall be more than one such certificate or paper, as the certificate and papers from such State shall so be opened, (excepting duplicates of the same return,) they shall be read by the tellers, and thereupon the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration; which decision shall be made in writing, stating briefly the ground thereof, and signed by the members of said commission agreeing therein; whereupon the two houses shall again meet, and such decision shall be read and entered in the journal of each house, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless, upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order shall govern. No votes or papers from any other State shall be acted upon until the objections previously made to the votes or papers from any State shall have been finally disposed of.

SEC. 3. That while the two houses shall be in meeting, as provided in this act, no debate shall be allowed and no question shall be put by the presiding officer, except to either house on a motion to withdraw; and he shall have power to preserve order.

SEC. 4. That when the two houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or upon objection to a report of said commission, or other question arising under this act, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each house to put the main question without further debate.

SEC. 5. That at such joint meeting of the two houses, seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators in the body of the hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform. Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the count of electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, or otherwise under this act, in which case it shall be competent for either house, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such house not beyond the next day, Sunday excepted, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon. And while any question is being considered by said commission, either house may proceed with its legislative or other business.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws to question, by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States, the right or title of the person who shall be declared elected, or who shall claim to be President or Vice-President of the United States, if any such right exists.

SEC. 7. That said commission shall make its own rules, keep a record of its proceedings, and shall have power to employ such persons as may be necessary for the transaction of its business and the execution of its powers.

Approved, January 29, 1877.

SIR: I have the honor to inform the House of Representatives that the Commission constituted under the act of Congress approved January 29, 1877, entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," has met and (the members thereof having taken and subscribed the oath prescribed by law) organized, and is now ready to proceed to the performance of its duties.

Very respectfully,

NATHAN CLIFFORD,
President of the Commission.

HON. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

THURSDAY, February 1, 1877.

Prior to the hour fixed for the joint meeting of the two Houses, the appointment of the tellers for each House was announced by the presiding officer thereof. The Speaker of the House of Representatives (Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania) appointed as tellers on the part of the House Mr. Philip Cook, of Georgia, and Mr. William H. Stone, of Missouri; and the President pro tempore of the Senate (Mr. Thomas W. Ferry, of Michigan) appointed Mr. William B. Allison, of Iowa, and Mr. John J. Ingalls, of Kansas, tellers on the part of the Senate.

In the Senate, at twelve o'clock and fifty-eight minutes,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will announce that by the provisions of an act approved on the 29th instant, known as the electoral act, the Senate is required to appear in the Hall of the House of Representatives at one o'clock on this day. It is now within two minutes of that time.

Mr. Senator EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms, thereupon proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

In the House of Representatives, at one o'clock the Doorkeeper announced the Senate of the United States.

The Senate entered the Hall, preceded by its Sergeant-at-Arms and headed by its President pro tempore and its Secretary, the members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

In accordance with the law, seats had been provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; for the Senators, in the body of the hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as presiding officer of the joint convention of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying a chair upon his left.

Senators INGALLS and ALLISON, the tellers appointed on the part of the Senate, and Mr. COOK and Mr. STONE, the tellers appointed on the part of the House, took their seats at the Clerk's desk, at which the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House also occupied seats.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress for the counting of votes for President and Vice-President of the United States will now come to order. In obedience to the Constitution, the Senate and House of Representatives have met to be present at the opening of the certificates, the counting and the declaring of the result of the electoral votes for President and the Vice-President of the United States for the term of four years commencing on the 4th day of March next. In compliance with law, the President of the Senate will now proceed, in the presence of the two houses, to open all the certificates of the several States, in alphabetical order, beginning with the State of Alabama.

Having opened the certificate of the State of Alabama, received by messenger, the Chair hands to the tellers the certificate, to be read in the presence and hearing of both Houses.

Mr. Senator ALLISON (one of the tellers) read in full the certificate of the electoral vote of the State of Alabama, giving 10 votes for Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, for President, and 10 votes for Thomas A. Hendricks, of the State of Indiana, for Vice-President of the United States.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The certificate of the vote of the State of Alabama having been read, the Chair has opened and hands to the tellers the duplicate certificate received by mail from the same State, which will likewise be read.

Mr. Representative STONE (one of the tellers) proceeded to read the duplicate certificate.

Mr. Senator CONKLING. I venture to interrupt the reading to suggest that it can hardly be necessary to read in extenso the duplicate certificates received by mail; and, if that should be the impression of the Presiding Officer and of the two Houses, I make the further suggestion that hereafter when tellers read a certificate the tellers not reading had better overlook the duplicate certificate at the same time, in order that a comparison may thus be made.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The suggestion of the gentleman from New York has been heard. Is there objection to following that suggestion? The Chair hears none and it will be followed hereafter.

Mr. Representative STONE (one of the tellers) then concluded the reading of the duplicate certificate of the State of Alabama.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any objections to the certificate of the State of Alabama? The Chair hears none, and the votes of the State of Alabama will be counted. One of the tellers will announce the vote, so that there can be no mistake.

Mr. Representative COOK, (one of the tellers.) The State of Alabama gives 10 votes for Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, for President of the United States, and 10 votes for Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, for Vice-President.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hands to the tellers the certificate of the electoral vote of the State of Arkansas, received by messenger, and the corresponding one received by mail. In accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from New York, but one will be read, and the other will be examined as the original is read. The tellers will follow the reading of the one received by messenger in every case with the one received by mail.

The tellers then proceeded, in the manner indicated, to announce the electoral votes of the States of Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, and Delaware, it being mentioned in each case that the certificate of the election of the electors was signed by the governor and countersigned by the secretary of state, and in each case the Presiding Officer asked whether there were any objections to the certificate; and, there being none, the vote in each case was thereupon counted.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hands to the tellers a certi-ificate from the State of Florida, received by messenger, and the corresponding one by mail.

Mr. Representative STONE (one of the tellers) read the certificate, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Tallahassee, Florida :

I, W. D. D. 1876, for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, for and on behalf of the State of Florida, and of the result thereof, as the same appears of record in my office.

In attestation whereof I hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of my office, at Tallahassee, the capitol, this twenty-sixth day of January, A. D. 1877.

W. D. BLOXHAM,
Secretary of State.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Tallahassee, Florida :

I, George F. Drew, governor of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the above attestation of W. D. Bloxham, secretary of state of the State of Florida, is in due form, and that it is made by the proper officer, to whose act as such full faith and credit are due.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed, at the capitol, at Tallahassee, this 26th day of January, A. D. 1877.

[SEAL.]

GEO. F. DREW,
Governor.

An act to declare and establish the appointment by the State of Florida of electors of President and Vice-President.

Whereas at the general election held in this State on the 7th of November, 1876, according to the returns from the several counties on file in the office of the secretary of state, and according to a canvass and a statement and a certification thereof, made by the secretary of state, treasurer, and comptroller of public accounts, under an act of this legislature, entitled "An act to procure a legal canvass of the electoral vote of the State of Florida, as cast at the election held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876,"

Robert Bullock received twenty-four thousand four hundred and thirty-seven votes for the office of elector of President and Vice-President of the United States,

Robert B. Hilton received twenty four thousand four hundred and thirty-seven votes for the said office,

Wilkinson Call received twenty-four thousand four hundred and thirty-seven votes for the said office,

James E. Yonge received twenty-four thousand four hundred and forty votes for the said office,

Charles H. Pearce received twenty-four thousand three hundred and forty-five votes for the said office,

Frederick C. Humphries received twenty-four thousand three hundred and forty-nine votes for the said office,

William H. Holden received twenty-four thousand three hundred and fifty votes for the said office,

Thomas W. Long received twenty-four thousand three hundred and forty-four votes for the said office;

And whereas, as shown by the said returns, the said Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge were duly chosen and appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States by the State of Florida, in such manner as the legislature of the said State had directed;

And whereas the board of State canvassers constituted under the act approved February 27, 1872, did interpret the laws of this State defining the powers and duties of the said board in such manner as to give them power to exclude certain regular returns, and did, in fact, under such interpretation, exclude certain of such regular returns, which said interpretation has been adjudged by the supreme court to be erroneous and illegal;

And whereas the late governor, Marcellus L. Stearns, by reason of said illegal action and erroneous and illegal canvass of the said board of State canvassers, did erroneously cause to be made and certified lists of the names of the electors of this State containing the names of the said Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, and did deliver such lists to said persons, when in fact the said persons had not received the highest number of votes, and on a canvass conducted according to the rules prescribed and adjudged as legal by the supreme court, were not appointed as electors or entitled to receive such lists from the governor, but Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge were duly appointed electors, and were entitled to have their names compose the lists made and certified by the governor, and to have such lists delivered to them:

Now, therefore, the people of the State of Florida, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. That Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge were, on the 7th day of November, 1876, duly chosen and appointed by and on behalf of the State of Florida, in such manner as the legislature thereof has directed, electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and were, from the said 7th day of November, 1876, and are, authorized and entitled to exercise all the powers and duties of the office of electors as aforesaid, and had full power and authority, on the 6th day of December, 1876, to vote as such electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to certify and transmit their votes as provided by law, and their acts as such electors are hereby ratified, confirmed, and declared to be valid to all intents and purposes; and the said Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge are hereby appointed such electors as on and from and after the said 7th day of November, 1876.

SEC. 2. The governor of this State is hereby authorized and directed to make and certify in due form, under the great seal of this State, three lists of the names of the said electors, to wit, Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E.

Yonge, and to transmit the same, with an authenticated copy of this act, to the President of the Senate of the United States; and said lists and certificates shall be as valid and effectual to authenticate in behalf of this State the appointment of such electors by this State as if they had been made and delivered on or before the 6th day of December, 1876, and had been transmitted immediately thereafter, and the lists and certificates containing the names of Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long are hereby declared to be illegal and void.

SEC. 3. The governor of this State is further authorized and required to cause three other lists of the names of said electors, to wit, Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge, to be made and certified, and forthwith delivered to the said electors; and the said electors shall thereupon meet at the capitol in Tallahassee, and make and sign three additional certificates of all the votes given by them on the said sixth day of December, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, one of the votes for President and the other of the votes for Vice-President, and annex to each of the certificates one of the lists of the electors which shall have been furnished to them by the governor pursuant to this section, and the certificates so made shall be sealed up, certified, and one of them transmitted by messenger and the other by mail to the President of the Senate, and the third delivered to the judge of the district, as required by law.

SEC. 4. An authenticated copy of this act shall be transmitted by the secretary of state to the President of the Senate of the United States, and another copy to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Approved January 26, 1877.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Tallahassee, Florida:

I, W. D. Bloxham, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Tallahassee, the capital, this 26th day of January, A. D. 1877.

[SEAL.]

W. D. BLOXHAM,
Secretary of State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there objections to the certificates from the State of Florida?

Mr. Representative FIELD. The following is an objection to the votes, certificates, and lists mentioned in the return first read. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (having examined the paper sent up.) The objection complies with the law, having attached the signatures of Senators and Representatives. The Clerk of the House will read the objection.

OBJECTION TO No. 1.

The undersigned, Charles W. Jones, Senator of the United States from the State of Florida; Henry Cooper, Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee; J. E. McDonald, Senator of the United States from the State of Indiana; David Dudley Field, Representative from the State of New York; J. Randolph Tucker, Representative from the State of Virginia; G. A. Jenks, Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and William M. Springer, Representative from the State of Illinois, object to the counting of the votes of Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long as electors of President and Vice-President of the United States in, for, or on behalf of the State of Florida; and to the paper purporting to be a certificate of M. L. Stearns, as governor of the said State, that the said Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long were appointed electors in, for, or on behalf of the said State; and to the papers purporting to be the lists of votes cast by the said Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long for President and Vice-President of the United States; and to the votes themselves, in the reasons and upon the grounds following, among others, that is to say:

1. For that the said Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long were not appointed by the said State of Florida in such manner as its legislature had directed, or in any manner whatever, electors of President and Vice-President of the United States.

2. For that Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock were appointed by the said State in such manner as its legislature had directed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States.

3. The manner of appointing electors of President and Vice-President of the United States in, for, or on behalf of the State of Florida was by the votes of the qualified electors at a general election held in said State on the 7th day of November, 1876; and the qualified electors of the said State did, on the said 7th day of November, 1876, execute the power by appointing Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock to be such electors, which appointment gave to the appointees an irrevocable title that could not be changed, or set aside, or conferred on any other person.

4. For that the pretended certificate, or paper purporting to be a certificate, signed by M. L. Stearns, as governor of said State, of the appointment of Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long to be electors, was and is in all respects untrue, and was corruptly procured and made in pursuance of a conspiracy between the said M. L. Stearns, the said Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, and other persons to these objectors unknown, with intent to deprive the people of the said State of their right to appoint electors, and to deprive Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock of their title to said office, and to assert and set up fictitious and unreal votes for President and Vice-President, and thereby to deceive the proper authorities of this Union.

5. For that the said papers, falsely purporting to be the votes for President and Vice-President of the State of Florida, which are now here objected to, are fictitious and unreal, and do not truly represent any votes or lawful acts, and were made out and executed in pursuance of the same fraudulent conspiracy by the said persons purporting to have cast said votes.

6. For that the said pretended certificate, and the pretended lists of electors connected therewith, so made by the said M. L. Stearns, if the said certificates and lists ever had any validity, which these objectors deny, have been annulled and declared void by a subsequent lawful certificate of the executive of the State of Florida, duly and lawfully made, in which the said Wilkinson Call, Robert Bullock, James E. Yonge, and Robert B. Hilton are truly and in due form declared to have been duly appointed by the said State in the manner directed by its constitution, and also by an act of the legislature of the said State, in which the title of the said Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock as such electors is declared to be good and valid, and, further, by the judgment of the circuit court of the said State of Florida for the second judicial circuit, that being a court of competent jurisdiction, upon an information in the nature of quo warranto brought on the 6th day of December, 1876, before said pretended electors in any form voted for President or Vice-President, as aforesaid, by the State of Florida on the relation of the said Wilkinson Call, Robert Bullock, James E. Yonge, and Robert B. Hilton against the said Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, whereby the defendants, after having appeared, pleaded, and put in issue the question of their own right and title, and that of the relators, to act as such electors, and after full hearing, it was duly and lawfully adjudged by said court that the said Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long were not, nor was any one of them, elected, chosen, or appointed, or entitled to be declared elected, chosen, or appointed, as such electors or elector, or to receive certificates or certificate of election, or appointment, as such electors or elector; and that the said respondents were not, upon the said 6th day of December, or at any other time, entitled to assume or exercise any of the powers and functions of such electors or elector, but that they were, upon the said day and date, mere usurpers, and that all and singular their acts and doings as such were and are illegal, null, and void.

And it was further considered and adjudged that the said relators, Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge, all and singular, were, at said election, duly elected, chosen, and appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States; and were, on the said 6th day of December, 1876, entitled to be declared elected, chosen, and appointed said electors, and to have and receive certificates thereof, and upon the said day and date, and at all times since, to exercise and perform all and singular the powers and duties of such electors, and to have and enjoy the pay and emoluments thereof.

For that the four persons last named did, as such electors, on December 6, 1876, cast the four votes of Florida for Mr. Tilden as President and Mr. Hendricks as Vice-President; and, as well in that respect as in all others, acting in entire and perfect conformity with the Constitution of the United States, they certified the same votes to the President of the Senate.

They did everything toward the authentication of such votes required by the Constitution of the United States or by any act of Congress, except the section 136 of the Revised Statutes. And, in conformity with the aforesaid judgment of the Florida court, a governor of Florida who had been duly inducted into office subsequently to December 6, 1876, did, on the 26th day of January, 1877, give to the last-named four electors the triplicate lists prescribed by said act of Congress, (R. S. of U. S., § 136,) which they forwarded, as prescribed by the acts of Congress, as a supplement to their former certification in that behalf.

And in support of the said objections and claims, the undersigned beg leave to refer to the reasons and documents submitted herewith, and to such petitions, depositions, papers, and evidence as may be hereafter produced, and as may be competent and pertinent in considering the said objections and claims.

Among the papers herewith submitted are the following :

1st. So much of the official Congressional Record of February 1, 1877, as contains the report of the House committee on the recent election in Florida.

2d. The original report of said committee.

3d. The certified copy of the act of the legislature of Florida, approved January 17, 1877, entitled "An act to procure a legal canvass of the electoral vote of the State of Florida as cast at the election held on the seventh (7th) day of November, 1876."

4th. The certificate of the State canvassers of the election held November 7, 1876, dated January 19, 1877.

5th. The certified copy of the act of the legislature of Florida, approved January 26, 1877, entitled "An act to declare and establish the appointment by the State of Florida of electors of President and Vice-President."

6th. The certificate of George F. Drew, governor of the State of Florida, of the names of the electors chosen on the 7th day of November, 1876, bearing date January 26, 1877.

7th. The certificate of Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert Bullock, and Robert B. Hilton, electors appointed by the State of Florida, of the votes cast for President and Vice-President by them, bearing date January 26, 1877.

8th. The record of the proceedings and judgment of the circuit court of Leon County, second judicial circuit, State of Florida, on the information in the nature of quo warranto in the name of the State of Florida ex rel. Wilkinson Call, Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, and James E. Yonge vs. Charles H. Pearce, F. C. Humphries, W. H. Holden, and T. W. Long.

Also, the certified copy of the act of the legislature of Florida, approved January 26, 1877, aforesaid, and the certificate of State canvassers, aforesaid, and the proceedings and judgment on the information aforesaid, transmitted to and received by the House of Representatives on the 31st day of January, 1877.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates from the State of Florida ?

Mr. Senator SARGENT. In behalf of certain Senators and members of the House of Representatives who have signed the same, I present three papers containing objections, the first one of which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have now read.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

OBJECTION TO No. 2.

An objection is interposed to the certificates, or papers purporting to be certificates, of the electoral votes of the State of Florida, as having been cast by James E. Yonge, Wilkinson Call, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock, upon the ground that the said certificates or papers are not authenticated according to the requirements of the Constitution and laws of the United States, so as to entitle them to be received or read, or votes stated therein, or any of them, to be counted, in the election of President of the United States or of Vice-President of the United States.

The other papers presented by Senator SARGENT as objections were read by the Secretary of the Senate, as follows :

OBJECTION TO No. 2.

An objection is interposed to the certificates, or papers purporting to be certificates, of the electoral vote of the State of Florida, as having been cast by James E. Yonge, Wilkinson Call, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock, upon the ground that said certificates or papers do not include, and are not accompanied by, in the package or inclosure in which they are produced and opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, any certificate of the executive authority of the State of Florida of the list of the names of said electors, James E. Yonge, Wilkinson Call, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock, or of any of them, as being said electors. Nor are said certificates or papers objected to accompanied by any valid or lawful certification or authentication of said electors, James E. Yonge, Wilkinson Call, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock, or any of them, as having been appointed, or as being electors to cast the electoral vote of the State of Florida, or entitling the votes of said James E. Yonge, Wilkinson Call, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock, or of either of them, to be counted in the election of President of the United States or of Vice-President of the United States.

OBJECTION TO NOS. 2 AND 3.

An objection is interposed to the certificates, or papers purporting to be certificates, of the electoral votes of the State of Florida, as having been cast by James E. Yonge, Wilkinson Call, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock, upon the ground that, by a certificate of the electoral vote of the State of Florida, in all respects regular and valid and sufficient under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and duly authenticated as such and duly transmitted to and received by and opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, it appears that Frederick C. Humphreys, Charles H. Pearce, Thomas W. Long, and William H. Holden, and each of them, and no other person or persons, were duly appointed electors to cast the electoral vote of the State of Florida, and that said above-named electors did duly cast the electoral vote of the State of Florida and did duly certify and did transmit the said electoral vote of the State of Florida to the President of the Senate, by reason whereof the said certificates or papers purporting to be certificates objected to are not entitled to be received or read, nor are the votes therein stated, or any of them, entitled to be counted, in the election of President of the United States or of Vice-President of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates from the State of Florida?

Mr. Representative KASSON. I present a further objection, duly signed by members of the Senate and House of Representatives, to the last paper purporting to be a certificate read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

OBJECTION TO NO. 3.

The undersigned object to the last paper read, purporting to be a certificate of electors and of electoral votes of the State of Florida, and to the counting of the votes named therein :

1st. Because the same is not certified as required by the Constitution and laws of the United States—the certificate being by an officer not holding the office of governor or any other office in said State with authority in the premises at the time when the electors were appointed, nor at the time when the functions of the electors were exercised, nor until the duties of electors had been fully discharged by the lawful college of electors having the certificates of the governor of Florida at the time, and the action of said lawful college duly transmitted to the President of the Senate as required by law.

2d. Because the proceedings as recited therein as certifying the qualifications of the persons therein claiming to be electors are ex post facto, and are not competent under the law as certifying any right in the said Call, Yonge, Hilton, and Bullock, to cast the electoral vote of the said State of Florida.

3d. Because the said proceedings and certificates are null and void of effect as retroactive proceedings.

S. A. HURLBUT, H. R.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any further objections to the certificates from the State of Florida?

Mr. Senator JONES, of Florida. I send up to be read a further objection.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

OBJECTION TO ELECTOR HUMPHREYS.

The undersigned object to the counting of the vote of F. C. Humphreys as an elector from the State of Florida, upon the ground that the said Humphreys was appointed a shipping-commissioner under the Government of the United States at Pensacola, Florida, heretofore, &c., on the 3d day of December, 1872, and qualified as such thereafter, &c., on the 9th day of December, 1872, and continued to hold the said office continuously from the said last-named day until and upon the 7th day of November, 1876, and thereafter until and upon the 6th day of December, 1876. Wherefore, and by reason of the premises, the said F. C. Humphreys held, at the time of his alleged appointment as an elector for the said State, and at the time of casting his vote as elector therefor, an office of trust and profit under the United States, and could not be constitutionally appointed an elector as aforesaid.

CHAS. W. JONES,
Of the Senate.
CHARLES P. THOMPSON,
Of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates from the State of Florida? [A pause.] If there are none, the certificates and papers, together with other papers accompanying the same, as well as the objections presented, will now be transmitted to the electoral commission for judgment and decision. And the Senate will now withdraw to its chamber.

Accordingly (at three o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate withdrew.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

THE FLORIDA CASE.

THURSDAY, February 1, 1877.

The Commission met at 3 o'clock p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Present, the President and Commissioners Miller, Field, Strong, Bradley, Edmunds, Morton, Frelinghuysen, Thurman, Bayard, Payne, Hunton, Abbott, Hoar, and Garfield.

The journal of the preceding sessions was read, corrected, and approved.

Mr. GEORGE C. GORHAM, Secretary of the Senate, appeared (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) and submitted a communication from the President of the Senate presiding over the two Houses of Congress in joint meeting.

The communication was received and handed to the Secretary of the Commission, who read it as follows :

HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 1, 1877.

To the President of the Commission :

More than one return or paper purporting to be a return or certificate of electoral votes of the State of Florida having been received and this day opened in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, and objections thereto having been made, the said returns, with all accompanying papers, and also the objections thereto, are herewith submitted to the judgment and decision of the Commission, as provided by law.

T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Mr. President, I understand there are three certificates from the State of Florida that have been sent to us. I should think that the proper course would be to have those three certificates read, and then as each is read let the parties be called upon to state whether it is objected to and who are the objectors. Until we read those certificates, or hear them read, we do not know what we have before us. After that it will be time to take such other order in regard to proceeding as may be necessary.

The PRESIDENT. I will adopt that suggestion without a vote.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. I had the pleasure, sir, if it was a pleasure, of listening to the reading of those documents in the House of Representatives. If the papers about the State of Florida are read, it will take an hour to read them. The objectors' names are to the papers making the objections. I presume they will be printed; they certainly ought to be printed; and then everybody can read them without our consuming an hour of time in doing that which every man will want to do for himself more carefully. I think if Brother Bradley had known as I do the length of these papers, he would perhaps withdraw his motion.

The PRESIDENT. Does Justice Bradley withdraw his motion?

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. I did not make a motion; I merely made a suggestion.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. Now I move that the certificates, with the papers, be printed at as early an hour as possible.

The PRESIDENT. The motion before the Commission is that the three certificates in the case of Florida be printed, and the objections thereto. If that is your pleasure you will say ay, [putting the question.] It is a vote.

Mr. Commissioner FIELD. Should we not have copies of the papers presented?

The PRESIDENT. I suppose the certificates and objections may be printed in a very short time. The Secretary will understand that the motion is intended to include the certificates and the objections and the papers that accompany the certificates, and nothing else. It is desirable that they should be printed with as little delay as possible.

That matter being disposed of, I am requested to inquire if there are counsel present who will take part after the managers or objectors have stated the case on the one side and the other.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, Mr. Senator Sargent has come in and will state what he has to say in that regard.

The PRESIDENT. I will withdraw the inquiry as put, and say to Mr. Sargent that inquiries have been made as to the objectors.

Mr. Senator SARGENT. The objectors on our side, the persons whose names are signed to the papers, are Senators Conover, Sargent, Sherman, and Teller, and Mr. McCrary, Mr. Kasson, Mr. Woodburn, and Mr. Durnell, Members of the House. There has been no opportunity up to this moment of consulting with these gentlemen to ascertain which of them will state their objections to the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. Two objectors may represent the case in this tribunal.

Mr. Senator SARGENT. So we understand by the rules.

The PRESIDENT. Who are the two?

Mr. Senator SARGENT. There has been no opportunity to consult to ascertain which of the objectors will present the matter to the court.

The PRESIDENT. Please make it known to the Commission as soon as convenient.

Mr. Senator SARGENT. We will.

The PRESIDENT. Will Mr. Field state the names of the objectors on the other side?

Mr. Representative FIELD. The objectors to the first return are Senators Jones of Florida, McDonald, and Cooper, and Representatives Thompson, Jenks, Tucker, Springer, and myself.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether the motion made in reference to printing covers the printing of all papers that are sent here with the objections, because it seems to me that we are to consider all papers sent with the objections, and it is just as material for us to have those papers printed, so that we can consider them, as it is to have the objections themselves.

The PRESIDENT. I do not understand the vote in that way at present. It is that the certificates, with the objections and the papers which accompany the certificates, shall be printed; not all the papers that may have been sent.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I suggest, then, that at some point of time, if we are to consider the papers accompanying the objections, they may be so made part of the cause. The objections themselves would hardly be understood without the papers; and we should have those papers printed, or put in some form that we can act on them.

The PRESIDENT. There is no motion on that subject.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I move, then, that the papers accompanying the objections be also printed.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I submit that it is possible under the statute under which we are acting that there may be no papers, lawfully and within the statute, accompanying an objection. The statute provides for papers that accompany certificates; but, as I remember at this moment—I speak subject of course to correction—it does not provide for papers accompanying the objections; so that I think it will be a matter for the consideration of the Commission in consultation how far in printing the testimony that may be offered, whether by objectors or anybody else, we ought to go. It may be a question for consideration whether time would warrant us in receiving and printing everything that may be proposed on either side.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Mr. President, it is true that the statute requires the papers accompanying certificates to be laid before the Commission; but it also authorizes the Commission to take into view all documents, depositions, and other papers that may be competent and pertinent in this inquiry; and, if we have received papers from either of the Houses which in the estimation of the Houses it is proper to send to us, it seems to me we must look at them and see whether they are competent and pertinent. I think, therefore, that the motion to print ought to be adopted. That will not delay us in having by to-morrow morning, as early as we see fit to meet, a print of the certificates and the objections. We can give directions that they shall be sent to us immediately; and the printing of these other papers could go on; and, knowing the great rapidity with which work is done at the Government Printing-Office, I do not think we should have to wait very long to get them all.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Mr. President, I think on looking at the law that objections only are to be sent here; and I fancy that those papers, if they are sent here at all, must come as part of the objections, so that perhaps the motion to print the objections would carry with it, necessarily, the printing of those papers. I do not see how they get here except as papers accompanying the certificates or as part of the objections. Of course, I have no desire to impede the printing of the objections and certificates, but I wish to get them as soon as possible.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. President, in order that we may consider that topic, I move that the motion of Judge Abbott be for the time being laid upon the table, so that we may consider about it a little afterward.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is to lay the motion of Judge Abbott upon the table.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I withdraw the motion for the time, to be renewed at a subsequent time.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn. [A pause.] I am requested now to call for the names of counsel who appear in the case on each side.

Mr. Representative FIELD. We have several counsel on our side. We have Mr. O'Connor of New York, Judge Black of Pennsylvania, Judge Trumbull of Illinois, Mr. Merrick of Washington, and Mr. Green of New Jersey.

The PRESIDENT. Counsel not exceeding two in number on each side are allowed to participate in argument.

Mr. Representative FIELD. We have not selected those two. I only mention to you in answer to the question how many there are who are concerned in the case. We shall arrange that matter in the course of the evening.

The PRESIDENT. That will answer. Who are counsel on the other side?

Mr. EVARTS. As representing objectors to other certificates than those that have been represented in the enumeration by Mr. Field, I will state that Mr. Stoughton, Mr. Stanley Matthews, Mr. Shellabarger, and myself are expected to represent objectors in some of the cases which will appear, and I would ask the instruction of the court—it is pertinent now to make the inquiry—as to what is included in the phrase “on the merits of any case presented to it;” whether that means any issue joined on objections to any particular certificate or whether it includes all that arises in the case of a particular State.

The PRESIDENT. I think the counsel will have to judge of that matter for themselves. Unless they have some question to submit to the Commission, it is hardly within the province of the Presiding Justice to determine that.

Mr. EVARTS. We understand, then, if the Commission please, that the designation of two counsel will be sufficiently early enough made when the case is up?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That is merely for the final argument.

The PRESIDENT. After the objectors have opened the case.

Mr. EVARTS. So we understand.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. I suggest to Mr. Evarts that probably the construction of that would be "the case on its merits;" the principal question would be included in that term; and all interlocutory or other motions would not be included in that phrase.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. It covers the whole subject of a particular State.

Mr. Senator SARGENT. In reply to the question of the Commission as to which of the objectors would present the case on behalf of the objectors to certificates Nos. 2 and 3, aside from counsel, on conference it is determined that Mr. McCrary and Mr. Kasson will so appear.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I move that the public sitting of the Commission be now adjourned until half past ten in the morning unless counsel or objectors have something further to say at this present time.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I think there was one objection filed that no action has been taken in regard to—an objection, I believe from Senator Jones; and as I have heard the President of the Commission make no allusion to it, I inquire whether there is any special hearing on that objection. I think it was different from the other objections which have been filed. I refer to it because it makes a distinct case, being a different objection in its character from either of the other two that have been referred to.

The PRESIDENT. My impression is—although I do not make that decision in behalf of the Commission—that the several objections to the returns from a State constitute one case, and two objectors will be heard upon one side and two on the other; and after they shall have been heard, two counsel will be heard upon one side and two upon the other. Unless otherwise advised by the Commission, that will be the ruling.

Mr. Representative FIELD. Will you allow me to say that perhaps there may be some misunderstanding in regard to that rule unless I state to you precisely the facts?

The PRESIDENT. Proceed, sir.

Mr. Representative FIELD. There are objections to the 4 votes of Florida on each side; that is to say, we object to the 4 votes mentioned in the first return—

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Which are they?

Mr. Representative FIELD. They are, if I may use the names of the candidates, the Hayes electors. We object on our part to those votes, certificates, and lists.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. And the other gentlemen object to the others?

Mr. Representative FIELD. Mr. Sargent, Mr. Kasson, and the gentlemen on the other side specifically object to ours. Then there is the additional objection made by Senator Jones, of Florida, and others, to one of the Hayes electors as ineligible under the Constitution. That is a distinct matter, and we supposed it would be taken up quite distinctly. It is a minor affair and should not encumber the principal one. And if the Commission will allow us, we will designate Mr. Thompson and Mr. Jenks. I suppose the discussion of that will not take up much of the time of the Commission; but at all events, as a matter of form, if you will allow us, we will suggest that Mr. Thompson and Mr. Jenks be the objectors in those, and then as to counsel we will advise to-night and inform the Commission to-morrow what counsel represent us.

The PRESIDENT. When you are advised what you desire, you will submit a motion to the Commission and I will have it determined. At present I am not prepared to rule otherwise than I have. If there be no further suggestion to be presented, I will put the question to the Commission on the motion that when this Commission adjourns it adjourn to meet at half past ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I will move—so that we shall not keep here gentlemen who wish to prepare their matters—that the public sittings of the Commission be now adjourned until half past ten o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. But the Commission to continue in session?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Yes, for consultation.

The PRESIDENT. Under the circumstances I will put the motion, with the consent of the mover, that when the Commission adjourns it adjourn until to-morrow at half past ten o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. I will notify all who are present that there will be no more public business transacted by the Commission to-day.

Mr. Commissioner FRELINGHUYSEN. I was about to suggest that it would be well to understand from the objectors and counsel whether they will be prepared to go on to-morrow morning.

Mr. Representative FIELD. On our part we are prepared to go on at any moment—to go on now if you wish.

The PRESIDENT. The gentlemen present may understand that there will be no further public business transacted by the Commission to-day. The Commission will remain for private consultation.

The room having been cleared, the Commission remained for consultation.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS, it was—Ordered, That Mr. Abbott and Mr. Hoar be a committee to consider and report whether certain papers referred to in the objections of C. W. Jones and others ought to be printed for the use of the Commission.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner HOAR, it was Ordered, That no action be taken by the committee referred to in the resolution of Mr. Commissioner Edmunds until the next meeting of the Commission for consultation.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER moved that the objections to certificates in the Florida case be heard as one objection to each set of electors, and be argued together; which was adopted.

The Secretary of the Commission, on motion of Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS, was directed to prepare and have printed on slips the names of the members of the Commission in alphabetical order for the purpose of being used in taking the votes.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR moved that the Secretary have printed for the use of the Commission such laws as may be directed by the President of the Commission.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON moved an amendment to include the election-laws of the States of Florida, Louisiana, Oregon, and South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion, as amended, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner STRONG, (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.,) the Commission adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 2, 1877.

The Commission met at half past ten o'clock a. m., pursuant to adjournment, all the members being present.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT. The case before the Commission is that of Florida. Inquiries were made yesterday "what is the case?" to which I beg leave to respond that it consists of three certificates with the accompanying papers, and the objections to the same. Two of the objectors on each side will be allowed to speak in the opening of the case. Those representing the objections to certificate No. 1 will speak first, and I would remind them that the fourth rule allows them two hours in which they will state the case in the opening arguments in support of their objections, and also in support of any other certificate which they claim to be valid. When they have concluded, two objectors on the other side will speak under the same rules and limitations. I will not give any direction now as to counsel; that will come afterward.

Mr. Representative FIELD. Allow me to ask whether after the two objectors have spoken on the other side, we shall not be allowed the opportunity of a reply within our two hours?

The PRESIDENT. The rules make no provision for any reply on the part of the objectors. Applications for further time or further counsel must be made to the Commission, the Presiding Justice having no discretion in the matter whatever. When counsel speak, it will be under different regulations; perhaps they need not be stated now; but as it seems that I am rather expected to state it, I will say that my view is that one of the counsel in favor of the objections to certificate No. 1 should open; two counsel in favor of the certificate No. 1 and against the objections should reply; and then the other counsel in favor of the objections to certificate No. 1 should have the close.

Mr. Representative TUCKER. May I ask whether the two hours of the objectors to the first-named certificate must be consumed in the opening?

The PRESIDENT. If at all. There is no provision made for a reply. One of the objectors to certificate No. 1 may proceed. I am told that some time would be spent in reading the certificates and accompanying papers and the objections, if they were read; but they will soon be printed and laid on our tables, and it is suggested that unless it produces inconvenience the statement or opening should proceed without reading the papers. If it is desired I will direct that they shall be read, though I understand the reading will consume some time. If that is not desired, the statement of the case will proceed.

Mr. Representative KASSON. If the Commission please, I ought to state on behalf of the objectors on this side that, while we have no objection to the proceeding this morning as far as the objectors to the first certificate are concerned, my associate and myself find that so many more questions are involved in the objections to that certificate than it was supposed would be found—we not having had the opportunity to examine them until this morning—that it is probable we shall be obliged to ask the court for some time before proceeding on our behalf.

I make that statement now, not desiring to object to gentlemen going on this morning who are ready, but simply to save our right to make that suggestion to the tribunal at the completion of the argument on that side on behalf of the objectors.

The PRESIDENT. The suggestion calls for no ruling on the part of the presiding officer. You will proceed, gentlemen on the side of the objectors to certificate No. 1; I shall designate them as Nos. 1, 2, and 3, for convenience.

Mr. Representative FIELD. Before proceeding, if you will allow me, I beg to speak to a preliminary matter. I observe that Rule 5 speaks of evidence. Now, I am in some doubt about the course of proceeding. If evidence is admissible it should be stated, we suppose, before beginning the argument. We are prepared with witnesses from Florida to show at the bar or in any manner that the court may indicate, by deposition or otherwise, all that is necessary to prove the allegations of our objection. We suppose that the papers which have been presented here contain sufficient evidence and are receivable; but I ought to state in limine that I do not wish to proceed with the argument under the impression that we have not other evidence. Of course, saving the question whether the evidence is competent, I wish to say that we have the evidence and we can produce it here or anywhere that the Commission may direct, and offer to do it now or at any other time or in any other manner.

I thought I ought not to proceed with my statement without making that preliminary suggestion.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Mr. President, it seems to me that the rules which we have adopted place the objectors in precisely the same position that counsel are placed in who open a case before it is submitted to a jury. We propose—such is my understanding of the rule—that the objectors shall occupy exactly that position in their statement of their objections—state what the objections are, and how they propose to support them. The other questions will come up afterward in regard to the admissibility of evidence.

Mr. Representative FIELD. That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. That is my understanding at this time.

The PRESIDENT. You can proceed, Mr. Field, with the case at a quarter before eleven. Your side will have two hours.

Mr. Representative FIELD. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Electoral Commission: It will be my endeavor, in the statement which I shall make, to set forth with as much conciseness as I may the facts that we expect to prove and the propositions of law which we hope to establish.

The power devolved by the Federal Constitution upon the States of this Union was, in the State of Florida, exercised by the legislature of the State directing the appointment of presidential electors to be made by the qualified voters of the State at a general election. That election was held on the 7th of November, 1876. It was quiet and orderly, so far as we are informed, throughout the State, and it remained only to gather the result of the voting. That result was a majority in favor of the electors who, for convenience sake, I will designate as the Tilden electors. Nevertheless, a certificate comes here signed by the then governor of the State certifying that the Hayes electors had a majority of the votes. By what sort of jugglery that result was accomplished I now take it upon me to explain.

By the laws of the State the counties are divided into polling-precincts and the votes of the polling-precincts are returned to the county clerk at the county-seat, where they are canvassed, and the county canvassers certify to the State canvassers. I have occasion to mention canvassers only in one county. That county was decisive of the result; but if it were not, ex uno disce omnes. The county to which I refer is Baker County. The canvassers were by law to be the county judge, the county clerk, (or rather I think he is called the clerk of the circuit court for the county, but I call him for convenience the county clerk,) and a justice of the peace to be by them called in for their assistance. In case either the judge or the clerk is absent or cannot attend, the sheriff of the county is to be called in his place. The law provides that the canvass by the county canvassers shall be on the sixth day after the election, or sooner if the returns are all received.

In this county there were but four precincts, and the returns from them were all received in three days. On the 10th of November the county clerk, considering that the returns being in, further delay in the canvass might be embarrassing—for what reasons it does not devolve on me to say—requested the county judge to join him in the canvass. The county judge refused. The clerk then asked the sheriff to join him, but he declined. The clerk thereupon called to his assistance a justice of the peace and made the canvass, and a true canvass it was, as all parties agree, I think. I have never heard anywhere the suggestion that the votes as certified by them were not the true votes. But it so happened that the county judge, on the same day, the 10th, issued a notice to the county clerk and to a justice of the peace to attend him at the county seat on the 13th, which, as you will remember, was just six days after the election, at noon, for the purpose of making the count. On that day and hour the county clerk and the justice thus requested attended. The county judge, however, absented himself, though he had given the notice. He was invited and urged to go on with the canvassing. The record shows that he laughed, and said he thought that what had been already done was enough. The sheriff was then applied to and he refused. Thereupon the county clerk and a justice of the peace—another justice called in—re-canvassed the votes, giving the same result precisely, and certified them to the State canvassers, stating in the certificate the reasons why neither the county judge nor the sheriff was present. The office of the clerk was then closed for the day.

In the evening of that day the same county judge and the same sheriff, taking to their assistance a justice of the peace who had been commissioned by Stearns only on the 10th, and who had never acted before, entered the office surreptitiously, opened a drawer, and took out the returns, threw aside two precincts, certified the two remaining, and sent that certificate to the State canvassers. You are now to say whether this certificate of these men, under these circumstances, in the darkness of the night, throwing out two precincts, and certified to the State canvassers without any reason why the county clerk was not present, shall be taken as the voice of that county of Florida. That I do not misrepresent the exact state of facts let me read you the testimony as it will appear upon the record to be laid before you. Here is the testimony in respect to this third canvass, this false and fraudulent canvass, which I will read as given by the sheriff.

He testified that he first received notice from Judge Drieggars to assist him in making the canvass of Baker County probably between four and five o'clock in the afternoon of the 13th; that they went to the clerk's office; that the clerk's office was closed when they got there. He thinks this was about six o'clock, "it might have been seven o'clock." That they lit up the office; that they knew that the clerk had made the canvass on that afternoon; that there was no one then in the office.

The law providing that the canvass should be public, the record thus proceeds, as follows, and I give it verbatim :

Question. What did you do then?—Answer. We just made the return, throwing away two precincts in the county.

Q. What two precincts in the county did you throw away?—A. One was Darbyville precinct and the other was Johnsville precinct.

Q. Which did you throw away first?—A. The Johnsville precinct.

Q. And then you threw away the Darbyville precinct?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any witnesses at all before you?—A. None at all.

Q. Did you have anything before you except the returns?—A. No, sir.

Q. Why did you throw away Johnsville precinct?—A. We believed that there was some intimidation there: that there was one party prevented from voting.

Q. Did you have any evidence before you to that effect?—A. No, sir; there was only his statement.

Q. Did you not have a particle of evidence before you?—A. No, sir.

Q. You believed that one party had been intimidated and prevented from voting?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And therefore you threw out the Johnsville precinct?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there any reason for throwing it out?—A. No, sir.

Q. None whatever?—A. No, sir.

Q. No other reason suggested but that, was there?—A. No, sir.

Q. You next threw out Darbyville precinct?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. For what reason did you do so?—A. We believed that there was some illegal votes cast there.

Q. Did you have any evidence before you at all?—A. No, sir.

Q. Not a particle?—A. No, sir.

Q. But you had an impression that some illegal votes were cast there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You had no proof of it at all?—A. No, sir.

Q. How many illegal votes did you have an impression were cast there?—A. About 7, I think, as well as I can recollect.

Q. Therefore you threw out the precinct without any evidence at all?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then you made up your returns?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who wrote those returns?—A. I did.

Q. You wrote them yourself?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the judge signed them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. Green signed them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You made return to the secretary of state that you had canvassed the vote?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And also sent one to the governor that you had canvassed the vote?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The returns, so far as you knew, appeared to be regular from the different precincts, did they?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who was the chairman of the board of canvassers?—A. The judge.

Q. Who made the suggestion to throw out Johnsville?—A. He did himself.

Q. Who made the suggestion to throw out the Darbyville precincts?—A. He did.

Q. And you sustained him in it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. Green sustained him in it also?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Green was the justice appointed by Stearns on the 10th.

Q. How did you know that one man was intimidated at Johnsville precinct?—A. Well, we just heard it rumored around at the time.

Q. Was there any other cause operating in your mind in rejecting the Johnsville return but the fact that you had heard that one party was intimidated?—A. No, sir; that was all.

Q. Where did you and the judge and the justice of the peace, Green, find the returns when you went to the clerk's office to make the canvass?—A. After we got the light, when I saw them first, the judge had them in his hands.

Q. Do you know where he got them?—A. I do not; I think he got them out of a desk.

Q. Out of what desk?—A. In the clerk's desk, in the clerk's office.

Q. Was the desk unlocked that contained these papers?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And nobody was in the clerk's office?—A. No, sir.

Now let me go from this county canvass to the State canvass. When the State canvassers were at work there were certain significant telegrams passed between Florida and Washington; I omit the names of the correspondents except that of the governor, Stearns, the same whose certificate is before you certifying to the election of the Hayes electors. The examination is thus reported:

Q. Do you recollect any telegram at Lake City about the 25th of December, asking—

(I will say the chairman of the national republican committee)— any questions about attacking the returns?—A. I remember one dispatch (I cannot give the date) asking on what grounds they should assail these counties, or words to that effect.

Q. What was the answer?—A. There was a dispatch subsequently received, (whether or not it was the answer to it, you must draw your own conclusion.) The words in it were “fraud, intimidation.” There was another word which may have been “violence;” but I am not sure that it was “violence.”

Thereupon the State canvassers did what? They took the third canvass from Baker County and amended it, as appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 1, page 65, and added “amended by canvassing all the precinct returns,” and that statement in the full canvass is the true one as to Baker County; that is, they got at a true result in respect to that county by taking the false certificate and amending it so as to take in all the returns. But what did they then do? Stearns was a candidate for the office of governor. He was then governor and he was a candidate for the succession. His opponent was Mr. Drew. The canvassers were Stearns’s appointees, to go out of office with him and to remain in office if he was counted in. They took the returns from the other counties and threw out enough to give the State to the Hayes electors and to Stearns as governor.

Thus the matter stood upon the State canvass thus made. You will observe that it gave the true vote of Baker County, but eliminated from the votes of other counties certain precincts enough to elect their patron Stearns. But it did not remain so, as I will show in a moment; for this elimination being declared by the supreme court illegal, the canvassers thereupon, in order to prevent a majority appearing for the Tilden electors, recalled their amendment of the Baker County false return, and used it in all its falsehood.

These are all facts, which we offer to make good by evidence as the Commission may prescribe, by a cloud of witnesses and by a host of documents.

This monstrous fraud being thus far accomplished, the people of the State took it upon themselves to see if they could right the wrong, and they did it with a spirit and a success which does them all honor. Not even your own native State of New Hampshire, Mr. President, could have more manfully stood up for its rights. If such a fraud had been perpetrated there, you would have heard a voice from her people that would have shaken the everlasting foundations of her granite hills. From peak to peak, and from the easternmost peak to the shining sea, you would have heard a roar of dissent and of indignation. So their brethren of Florida raised their voices through all the flowery peninsula, and they accomplished the result which I will now give. First, Drew, the candidate for governor on the other side, went into the courts of law as a law-abiding citizen should do and will ever do so long as he can get justice in the courts, but when he finds that he cannot get it there he will get it elsewhere. He went into the supreme court of the State and applied for a mandamus to compel this canvassing-board to restore to their canvass the eliminated precincts, and the supreme court decided that the State canvassers had no power under the laws of Florida to eliminate votes, but they were bound to count every lawful vote put into the ballot-box; that they were neither electors nor judges otherwise than of what votes were put in; and in obedience to that they restored to the canvass the rejected precincts and certified a majority for Drew, and Drew took his place and is now the lawful and accepted governor of the State.

What did the Tilden electors do? They commenced in a circuit court of Florida, which had competent jurisdiction, an information in the nature of quo warranto against the Hayes electors. They charged in the information that they, the relators, were the lawful claimants of the office, and that the others were usurpers. That information was commenced before the Hayes electors voted on the 6th of December. The case proceeded in the regular course of legal proceedings until it came to trial and judgment, first upon a demurrer, and then, the demurrer being overruled and an answer interposed, upon the issues and proofs; and here is the judgment of the court. After the recitals—

It is, therefore, considered and adjudged that said respondents—

Who were the Hayes electors, Humphreys and so on—were not, nor was any one of them, elected, chosen, or appointed as such electors or elector, or to receive certificates or certificate of election or appointment as such electors or elector, and that the said respondents were not, upon the said 6th day of December, or at any other time, entitled to assume or exercise any of the powers and functions of such electors or elector; but that they were, upon the said day and date, mere usurpers.

Mr. Representative KASSON. Will the objector allow me to state to the court that I presume we are not considered as agreeing to the presentation of those as being in the case at all?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. They are merely referred to for information.

The PRESIDENT. We are hearing the statement of one side now.

Mr. Representative FIELD. The whole record is certified and exemplified in due form.

I will go on with the reading:

And it is further considered and adjudged that the said relators, Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge—all and singular, were at said election duly elected, chosen, and appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and were, on the said 6th day of December, 1876, entitled to be declared elected, chosen, and appointed as such electors, and to have and receive certificates thereof, and upon the said day and date, and at all times since, to exercise and perform all and singular the powers and duties of such electors, and to have and enjoy the pay and emoluments thereof. It is further adjudged that respondents pay to relators the costs of the action.

So much for the action of the judicial department of Florida. Everything was done, I take it upon me to say, which it was possible to do; so that I am warranted in asserting that if there be any way known to the law by which in such a case a defrauded State can right itself through the courts of the State, that way has been taken.

In the mean time the Hayes electors had voted and sent their lists of votes to the President of the Senate, with the certificate of Stearns to their appointment.

There was no canvass or certificate of the State canvassers to their appointment, other than that first made, which the supreme court had ordered to be rectified on the application of Mr. Drew, and the rectification of which, therefore, could go no further than the canvass of the governor's vote. The same rectification, applied to the electoral votes, would of course give the majority to the Tilden electors, but to avoid the appearance of this the canvassers pretended to alter the vote first given by them to Baker County, and reduce it to the two precincts mentioned in the third and false return of the county canvassers. This attempt was rebuked by the supreme court, in an order directing the State canvassers to confine their action under the mandamus to the votes for governor; so that there really appears upon the records of the State canvassers no semblance of any authority for Stearns's certificate other than the first canvass, which the supreme court branded as illegal and false.

Now look at what the legislature of Florida has done. The legislature is the department of the Florida government which could alone direct how the power devolved by the Federal Constitution could be performed. This legislature has passed two acts to which I call your attention. In view of the fact that the supreme court had made the decision which I have mentioned, the legislature passed—

An act to provide for a canvass according to the laws of the State of Florida, as interpreted by the supreme court, of the votes for electors of President and Vice President cast at the election held November 7, 1876.

The law was approved January 17. It provides that the secretary of state, attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall meet forthwith at the office of the secretary of state, pursuant to a notice to be given by the secretary of state, and proceed to recanvass the votes. They did meet and recanvass pursuant to that law, and they certified the result according to the fact, giving the majority to the Tilden electors. The second law declared that the Tilden electors, naming them, were elected on the 7th day of November, and that they had voted; and directed that the same electors should meet, that the governor should give them a certificate of their election, pursuant to the recanvass, and that they should make out duplicate lists of the votes, and transmit them to the President of the Senate at Washington; and the proceedings under that law make up the third return which has been read.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. What was the second return?

Mr. Representative FIELD. The second return to the President of the Senate was the return of the Tilden electors.

The return No. 1 was made by the Hayes electors and sent with the certificate of Stearns as governor. Return No. 2 contains the certificates of the Tilden electors without the certificate of the governor, but with a certificate of the attorney-general, the only dissenting member of the board of State canvassers, certifying that they were elected. Then return No. 3 contains the action of the State authorities subsequently to the two first, for the purpose of ratifying and confirming, so far as it was possible for the State authorities to do it, the second return; and they therefore not only passed a law for the recanvass of the votes, which recanvass took place and resulted in a certificate of the election of the Tilden electors, but they passed another act, reciting that the election had been in favor of the Tilden electors, and that the Tilden electors had met and voted on the 6th of December, but without a certificate of the governor, and directing the governor of the State to forward a supplementary certificate for its confirmation; and directing, moreover, for abundant caution, that there should be new lists made out and a new certificate by these electors who were to be re-assembled for the purpose, the certificates all to be forwarded to the President of the Senate, as they would have been, but for the conspiracy, in November. Those papers make the third return. I will read the recital in this act of the legislature of Florida:

And whereas the board of State canvassers constituted under the act approved February 27, 1872, did interpret the laws of this State defining the powers and duties of the said board in such manner as to give them power to exclude certain regular returns, and did in fact under such interpretation exclude certain of such regular returns, which said interpretation has been adjudged by the supreme court to be erroneous and illegal;

And whereas the late governor, Marcellus L. Stearns, by reason of said illegal action and erroneous and illegal canvass of the said board of State canvassers, did erroneously cause to be made and certified lists of the names of the electors of this State, containing the names of the said Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas Long—and did deliver such lists to said persons, when in fact the said persons had not received the highest number of votes, and, on a canvass conducted according to the rules prescribed and adjudged as legal by the supreme court, were not appointed as electors or entitled to receive such lists from the governor, but Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge—were duly appointed electors, and were entitled to have their names compose the lists made and certified by the governor, and to have such lists delivered to them:

Those are the Tilden electors—

Now, therefore, the people of the State of Florida, represented in senate and assembly, do enact, &c.

The certificate is in effect that the electors who met and voted on the 6th of December were the true choice of the people of Florida; and the same electors re-assembled and made new lists; they did not vote anew because they were to vote on the 6th of December, but they did certify anew that they had thus voted on the 6th of December, and that certificate, with the other certificate, was forwarded in due form, as I have stated, to the President of the Senate at this Capitol.

Now, if the Commission please, we are told that the certificate of the governor, Stearns, which has been forwarded to Washington annexed to the lists of votes of the Hayes electors, countervails all this evidence, and that no matter what amount of testimony we may offer, documentary or oral, we can never invalidate the signature of Marcellus L. Stearns; and it is to that question that I shall devote what remains of my address. It is putting the question in an erroneous form to put it thus, "You cannot go behind the certificate." The form should be reversed, Can the certificate go before the truth and conceal it? I prove these facts or offer to prove them. On the other side—if I have rightly understood the objections made yesterday in the joint convention—on the other side there is no suggestion that we are not right in the facts; there is no averment that the true and lawful vote of the State of Florida was not given for the Tilden electors; but the claim is that "there is the certificate of M. L. Stearns, and that stands as a barrier against all these witnesses, and the truth cannot be proven. The truth is buried under this certificate. Neither you exercising for this occasion the powers of the two Houses of Congress, nor the two Houses themselves, acting separately or together, can consider any fact whatever to the contrary of which Stearns has certified."

Let me ask in the first place upon what foundation that doctrine rests? Who tells you that you are to take that certificate as conclusive evidence against anything that can be proved on the other side? By what rule of evidence, by what precept of law, are you deprived of the right to investigate the truth? Is it not a universal rule that every judge is invested ex necessitate with the power to take into consideration all pertinent evidence in respect to the facts upon which his judgment is to be pronounced, unless there is some positive law declaring that certain certificates or other documentary evidence shall be conclusive? I venture to say that that is the universal rule, and that there is no court of general jurisdiction known to American or Anglo-Saxon law in which it is not a fundamental principle that whenever a court can inquire into facts necessary to its judgment, it may take all the pertinent evidence, that is to say all evidence that tends to prove the fact, unless it is restricted by some positive law. Now, then, show me a positive law that makes the certificate of Stearns evidence against the truth? Where is it? In what book? It is not in the Constitution. It is not in the laws of Florida. Is it in any law of Congress? The only act of Congress applicable is that which provides that the executive of the State shall deliver to the electors a certificate that they are such electors, but that act does not declare that his certificate shall be conclusive—neither declares it, nor implies it. Suppose I offer to prove that the certificate is wholly false, fabricated for the purpose of cheating the State out of its vote and the other States out of their rights. Take the State, one of the oldest and proudest in this Union of States—the State of Massachusetts, of which my friend Mr. Commissioner Abbott is so worthy a representative, and suppose that the honored governor of that State were so debased as to certify that the Tilden electors had received the votes of a majority of the good and true voters of Massachusetts; will any man tell me that it must be taken as absolutely true, that you cannot prove it to be false? Where is the law for that? Nay, more, I venture to affirm that if an act of Congress had declared that that certificate should be conclusive, the act would have been unconstitutional. For what reason? For this reason: The Constitution, as if the foresight of the fathers grasped the conflicts of future years, declares that the person having the highest number of votes shall be the President, not that the person declared to have the highest number of votes, but “the person having the highest number.” No certificate can be manufactured to take that away. If you had declared by act of Congress in the most express and positive terms that the certificate of the governor delivered to the electors should be conclusive against all proof, you would have transcended the limits of the organic law. You cannot say that the certificate of the governor of Massachusetts shall override the votes of the electors of Massachusetts in their choice of President. Therefore it is I say not only that you have not done it, but you could not do it; you could not do it if you would, as I am sure you would not if you could.

The language of the act of Congress is not as strong as the language of the State laws generally respecting the canvass of votes. Take the case in Wisconsin, which arose in the courts, of the contest for the office of governor. There a law of the State had declared that the State canvassers should determine—I think that is the language—should determine, certify, and declare who was governor. A person came into the office of governor upon such a certificate declaring that he was elected, and a rival claimant went into the courts with a writ of quo warranto, and was met there by the ablest counsel in the State with the argument, “You cannot inquire, because the certificate of the State canvassers is conclusive.” “No,” said the court, in an opinion which does them great honor and will stand as a record of their learning, their patriotism, and their inflexible firmness; “the title of governor depends upon the votes of the people, upon those little ballots that declare their supreme will; the question is not who have certified but who have voted;” and the court declared the claimant entitled and threw out the usurping governor.

Is not your right to inquire into the very truth implied by the law under which you act? What are you to do? You are to declare whether any and what votes are the votes provided by the Constitution, not to declare what are the votes certified by Governor Stearns. That was known well enough beforehand. You are to certify what are the lawful votes upon which a President of forty-five millions of people is to be inducted into office.

Is not the same right implied in the notion which I find to prevail everywhere, that Congress might authorize a writ of quo warranto to try the title of President within the purview of the Constitution? Can that be doubted? The Constitution has declared that the person having the highest number of votes shall be the President; not the one certified. Congress has not as yet invested any tribunal with the power to try the title to the Presidency by quo warranto. No such law exists, I am sorry to say. Such a law, if I might be permitted to say so, ought to be made. It is no small reproach to our statesmanship that for a hundred years no law has been provided for this great exigency. I know that one eminent member of this Commission has labored assiduously to procure the passage of such a law, and of all his titles to respect I am sure that will be especially remembered hereafter.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Does not the law of the District apply to the case?

Mr. Representative FIELD. I think not, sir. I should be very glad to learn that it does. The judiciary act of 1789, as if ex industria, omitted to mention writs of quo warranto. It gave the several courts power to issue writs of mandamus and certain other writs, but not that of quo warranto. I know that the statutes lately passed give a right to a quo warranto in respect to certain offices, enumerating them, arising out of the amendments to the Constitution providing for the emancipated slaves; but I do not find any provision whatever for a writ of quo warranto to try the title to any such office as that of President or presidential elector.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. You are aware, of course, that the whole body of the Maryland law as existing in 1801 is the municipal law of this District, so far as not modified.

Mr. Representative FIELD. I am.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. I do not know whether there is any such provision in those laws or not.

Mr. Representative FIELD. Of course I speak entirely under submission to the better knowledge of the court. I have not been able to satisfy myself that there is any provision for a writ of quo warranto in the case of President. But my argument is that, whether there be a law now existing or not, it is competent to Congress to pass such a law, and if a law to provide for a writ of quo warranto would be constitutional, then it is constitutional to impose a like duty on any other tribunal to investigate the title. That is to say, if you could devolve that duty upon any tribunal by means of a writ of quo warranto, you can devolve it by other means. If the governor's certificate would not be conclusive there, it is not conclusive here. The right to inquire into the fact exists somewhere, and, if nowhere else, it must be here.

Thus thinking that Congress could devolve upon some tribunal the authority to inquire into the title of the President, and that such authority would necessarily give to the tribunal investigating the right to go into the truth notwithstanding any certificate to the falsehood, I argue that here before this Electoral Commission, invested with all the functions of the two Houses, you can inquire into the truth, no matter what may have been certified to the contrary.

Furthermore, I submit to the Commission that there is another rule of law which necessarily leads us to answer affirmatively the question whether the truth can be given in evidence notwithstanding the certificate; and that is that fraud vitiates all transactions and can always be inquired into in every case except possibly two. I will not argue now that the judgment of a court of record of competent jurisdiction can be impeached collaterally for fraud in the judge. Opinions differ. If it cannot be impeached, it must be because such an impeachment would lead to an inquiry that would be against public policy. It would be a scandal to inquire into the bribery or corruption of a judge while the judge is sitting to administer justice; and, therefore, from motives of public policy, it may be the rule that until the judge is impeached and removed you cannot inquire into the corruption of his acts. And it may also be true that you cannot inquire into the validity of an act of a legislature upon the ground of fraud or bribery. But, with those two exceptions, I venture to claim that there is no act and no document anywhere that you cannot impeach for fraud. Now, this canvassing-board and this governor were not invested with any such sanctity as are judges of courts of record. They were not dispensing justice between litigating parties, and it would not be against public policy to inquire into the corruption or invalidity of their acts. Not a single consideration that I have ever heard of or which I can imagine would lead us to the conclusion that you cannot inquire into the truth of their certificates; and I put it to the Commission that if they corruptly acted, if they were bribed or led astray by hunger for office, or the thirst for power, or the thirst for gold, you can impeach their acts. Who is it whose acts we are now seeking to impeach? It is the then governor of Florida, Stearns; Stearns, the man who sent the telegram asking on what grounds the votes of counties could be thrown out, and who received for answer, fraud, intimidation, or something else; Stearns, the man who controlled the canvassing-board sitting to certify whether he and they were to continue in office.

Is it a true proposition of law that you cannot inquire whether he has acted fraudulently? If it be true that the certificate of the governor is conclusive evidence that these persons were elected, then it follows that the certificate would be sufficient if there were no election at all. Yes; suppose I prove or offer to prove that in point of fact on the 7th day of November there was no election at all in the State of Florida, that no man cast a vote, no polls were opened, no man thought of voting, would this certificate, signed "M. L. Stearns," prove that the four Hayes electors were duly chosen?

To that complexion must it come at last.

There is no middle ground. If you can inquire into the truth of that certificate, you can inquire into every certificate of fact and show whether it be true or false.

Such, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, is as brief a statement as I could make of the facts and the law as we understand them to be. The greatness of the question in respect to the dignity of the presidential office and the vast interests depending upon it, is as nothing compared with the moral elements involved; for true as it is that the person upon whom your decision will confer the office for four years will be the Chief Magistrate of forty-five millions of people, Commander-in-Chief of your Army and Navy, the organ between you and all foreign states, the bestower of all offices, the fountain of honor and the distributor of power, the executor of your laws, that is as nothing compared with the greater question whether or not the American people stand powerless before a gigantic fraud. Here is the certificate; one feels reluctant to touch it. Hold it up to the light. It is black with crime. Pass it round; let every eye see it; and then tell me whether it is fit to bestow power and create dignity against the will of the people. One of the greatest poets of the palmy days of English literature, writing of the coming of our Saviour, has said:

— And ancient Fraud shall fail,
Returning Justice lift aloft her scale.

Ancient fraud! Was there ever fraud like this? In previous ages fraud has succeeded only because it has been supported by the sword, and protesting peoples have been powerless before armed battalions. Never yet in the history of the world has a fraud succeeded against the conscience and the will of a self-governing people. If it succeeds now, let us hang our heads for shame; let us take down from the dome of this Capitol the statue which every morning faces the coming light; let us clothe ourselves with sackcloth and sit in ashes forever.

Mr. Representative TUCKER. With submission to the Commission, the objections which are made by members of the two houses of Congress to the counting of the votes of the electors who voted for Messrs. Hayes and Wheeler are to be found printed this morning in a form to which I call the attention of the Commission for a moment. The first objection is:

That the said Charles H. Pearce—were not appointed by the said State of Florida in such manner as its legislature had directed.

The second is:

That Wilkinson Call—

And others, the Tilden electors—were appointed by the said State in such manner as its legislature directed.

The third states that the qualified electors of the said State, in manner as provided by the law of Florida, did elect Wilkinson Call and others, the Tilden electors.

The fourth is:

That the pretended certificate, or paper purporting to be a certificate, signed by M. L. Stearns as governor of said State, of the appointment of the said Charles H. Pearce * * * was and is in all respects untrue, and was corruptly procured and made in pursuance of a conspiracy between the said M. L. Stearns—

And the said Pearce and others, and so on—to assert and set up fictitious and unreal votes for President and Vice-President.

The fifth is:

That the said papers falsely purporting to be the votes for President and Vice-President of the State of Florida, which are fictitious and unreal and do not truly represent any votes or lawful acts, * * * were made out and executed in pursuance of the same fraudulent conspiracy.

The sixth states at length what I will state succinctly, that by a quo-warranto proceeding initiated prior to the vote given for Hayes and Wheeler by these pretended electors on the 6th of December, and which resulted in a judgment on the 25th or 26th of January, their election their title to the office of electors for the State of Florida, was declared, utterly null and void, and that they were usurpers and pretenders to the said office.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. May I inquire of the counsel, who were made parties to that proceeding?

Mr. Representative TUCKER. The State of Florida ex relatione Wilkinson Call and others, the Tilden electors, as plaintiffs, against Pearce and others, the Hayes electors.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. Was the governor a party to the proceeding?

Mr. Representative TUCKER. No; he was not a party. Now, sirs, these are succinctly the objections made, and they may be summarized thus: We object to these votes being counted, because we say that these men were not elected according to the law of Florida, and not being so elected can have no title to the office; secondly, we hold that, even if they had been elected according to the forms of the law of Florida, their election was tainted with fraud and is void; and the whole question presented to this tribunal, the question presented to the two Houses of Congress, and which they have substituted this tribunal in their stead to decide, is simply this: Is there any power in the Constitution under which we live by which a fraudulent and illegal title to the office of President can be prevented? Must a man that everybody knows to be a usurper be pronounced by the two Houses of Congress, or by this tribunal in their stead, to have a valid title to the office when all the world knows he has not? I will not ask whether the decision of a returning-board is to screen the illegality and fraud from your vision, but whether the returning-boards can run their fingers into the eyes of this tribunal and prevent their seeing what all the world sees? Shall the two Houses of Congress, the sentinel-guards appointed by the Constitution against the usurpation of this high office, shall this tribunal as the substitute for those sentinel-guards, permit fraud to crawl with slimy trail into the executive seat, whence it may spring from its coil and sting with fatal fang the life-blood of the grandest republic in the world? Is the power of a returning-board, tainted with fraud, based upon lawlessness, to conclude the judgment of the American people and put a usurper in the seat of Washington? That is the question.

Now, sirs, whatever may be the decision of this tribunal, I shall die in the faith of my fathers, that the fathers of the Constitution never framed an instrument of that kind and said that their posterity were to live under it.

What is the power of these two Houses? I have discussed that question elsewhere. If your honors will save me the labor of repeating it here, I will, as soon as I can get advance sheets of it, lay before your honors a copy of the speech delivered by me in the House of Representatives on that point; but I take it, summarizing the proposition, that when the Constitution declared that these votes were to be counted in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, when it declared that they were to be counted, they were the votes of electors to be counted, they were the votes of electors, real electors, not pretended electors, to be counted; it was intended that the two Houses of Congress, and therefore that this tribunal in their place, should see that there was no fraudulent counting of pretended votes for President of the United States.

Now, taking up the line of argument which was presented by my able and distinguished friend on my left, [Mr. Field,] I apprehend that the powers of the two Houses of Congress and of this tribunal as their substitute are not less in this inquiry than the powers of a court upon a quo-warranto proceeding. We are now standing as the guards to the entrance of the executive department, and we are to let no man pass that has not the pass-word of the people of the United States. We have a right to question his title, and if he has no title never to permit him to enter.

What says a distinguished authority upon this subject, which I found this morning on the table? I must beg the pardon of the Commission that what I shall say shall not be overloaded with learning, for I have had no opportunity of looking into this question. In High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, section 760, it is stated:

Judgment of ouster may be given against one who was not duly elected to the office claimed, notwithstanding the return or certificate of a board of canvassers of the election in his favor, since such return is by no means conclusive and the courts may go behind it and examine the facts as to the legality of the election. Nor will the holding of a commission for the office prevent the court from giving judgment of ouster if the incumbent was not legally elected, since the title to the office is derived from the election and not from the commission. Even though the incumbent were properly elected in the first instance, yet if he was never sworn into the office judgment of ouster may be given.

That is the key-note of the remarks that I shall make to your honors. Who appoint electors? The Constitution declares that each State shall appoint so many electors as it is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. "Each State shall appoint." What is the meaning of that? I apprehend that the word "State" in the Constitution has three or four meanings, one indicating the territory in which the population lives; another the people themselves as an organic body-politic, a sovereign power—I trust I trench upon no proprieties in saying that a State is a sovereign power and a body-politic—and another is the State government. In this particular case, I apprehend it means the State as a body-politic, as an organic society, not its government, because the next sentence says that each State shall appoint "in such manner" as its "legislature may direct." There you have the functional power of election in the State as a body-politic; the manner of the election to be prescribed and directed by its legislature. The law-making power of the State directs the manner; the substantial power is in the State.

Now, let us look at this for a moment, and I beg the Commission to bear with me in making a distinction which I have not seen made as clearly as it appears to my mind; and if there is any value in it, I hope I may be permitted to make it clear. It is this: In every appointment or election two elements enter: first, the exercise of the elective function; second, the exercise of the determining function. The elective function is in the State; is, in Florida, in the body of the sovereign. The determining function is in a returning-board. Now, wherever the determinant power usurps the elective function, then it must be set aside and adjudged void; that is to say, wherever, under the name of determining and deciding who is elected, the board or the body which so decides really elects, then it is a usurping power and it has transcended its authority; it has acted ultra vires; and its act must be declared void by any tribunal before whom its action comes for adjudication. I therefore say that in Florida the elective function was in the body of the people of the State; whoever the body of the people of the State elected to be its electors were its electors and had title to the office, according to the language of the authority I have read. The question of whether they should be determined to have been elected by the board of canvassers is an entirely different question. If the board of canvassers, either contrary to law, or transcending their legal authority, or under their legal authority, fraudulently counted in as elected those who were not elected by the people, their act was void.

I will go no further in this controversy than just to say that if it can be shown that the returning-board or the executive of the State of Florida transcended their legal authority in giving the return to these electors, then their action is simply ultra vires and a nullity; or if, acting within the limits of their authority, they used their legal power fraudulently and falsely, then that also is a usurpation of the elective function and is void, because I apprehend that if I can show, as it has been shown or seems to have been shown in some part of this Capitol very recently, that if a returning-board tells its clerk to take 178 votes bodily from one side, for Tilden, and put them over to Hayes, that is not a determining power; that is the elective function; and if this tribunal permitted such a thing as that to stand, it would permit an oligarchic board in Louisiana or Florida to elect the electors against the law of the State and against the will of the people. The power of determination can never be valid where it usurps the elective function which is vested by the law in any other body.

I go a step further. I apprehend that if the primary determinant, if I may invent a term, should decide in favor of certain electors and there should be provided by the proper authority an ultimate determinant authority, or, to come down to the concrete proposition, if the primary determinant authority in Florida was the returning-board and there was provided by the laws of the State an ultimate determinant authority in the form of a judicial tribunal, then your honors are not going behind State authority to pick a flaw in the election of their electors if you give force and validity to the action of the returning-board as reviewed by the judicial authority and as adjudged by the judicial authority. In other words, the judicial procedure in that case becomes a part of the determinant authority in the election provided by the State, and therefore you say that a man is elected in the manner prescribed by the State law, when he is determined to be elected by the State law, and that determination is revised and adjudged upon by the State judiciary.

I apprehend, therefore, that unless the primary determinant authority, that is, the board under State law, is conclusive, not only in its action, but conclusive as to the extent of its own powers, then we must regard the judicial proceedings in Florida upon the action of these electors as a part of that determinant power which the State has provided against fraud and illegality in the exercise of the elective function; and therefore I apprehend that, if there was nothing in the law of Florida which gave a judicial power of supervision to the action of the board, the two Houses of Congress, and this Commission as substituted for the two Houses of Congress with all the powers vested in both or either of them, have a right to plunge down into this mass of corruption and unkenneled fraud; and that this tribunal has not only the power, but it is its solemn duty under God and before this people to see whether these pretended electors are mere pretenders or the real representatives of the voice of Florida.

There can be no plainer proposition, in my judgment, than that all action in court even, particularly a court of inferior and limited jurisdiction, which is ultra vires, is void, and that every act done by an inferior tribunal, even within the forms of law, if it be fraudulent, is void. To say that the two Houses of Congress—I will not use the illustration in reference to this honorable Commission—that the two Houses of Congress, in the presence of whom these votes are counted, are to sit with their fingers in their mouths and see a fraud which they cannot prevent, and witness an illegality the triumph and victory of which they have only to countenance, is to say that our fathers meant that their posterity should be handed over to the power of those who would practice a fraud and an illegality upon their rights.

I need not refer your honors to any authority upon these points. The great leading authority of the Duchess of Kingston's case as to the validity or invalidity of a fraudulent judgment, of course is familiar to you all. Your honors will find that case elaborately discussed in Smith's Leading Cases.

I state these propositions as clear law:

First, that where a determinant power in these elections transcends its authority, it usurps the elective function and is void. It elects instead of determining.

Second, where the determinant power fraudulently decides, it assumes to elect and its act is void.

I beg this Commission to keep distinctly in their minds, as I have no doubt they will, what to my mind is perfectly clear and lies at the very root of this whole controversy, the distinction between the power of election and the power of determining on the election. The power of election is in the suffragans of Florida and the power of determining on the election was in this board of three. Now, if the board of three transcend their merely determining power and under color of determining really exercise the elective power, it is an usurpation that must be trampled upon not only by this tribunal but by the two Houses of Congress.

I hold that every illegal or fraudulent act of a returning-board or of any determining board in an election is open to inquiry. We may inquire into their jurisdiction. If they have not transcended their jurisdiction, then the question is have they executed it bona fide or mala fide? If they have not transcended their jurisdiction and have exercised it in bad faith, it is void. Fraud taints the whole act. I beg your honors and the other gentlemen of the Commission to refer to what is very familiar to your honors, that class of cases that began in a decision of the case of Pearce vs. Railroad Company, 21 Howard, p. 442,* where the court take the distinction between the exercise of a corporate power ultra vires and the exercise of a corporate power infra vires, and against the internal order of the board. In every case where a corporate act is ultra vires, no matter whether with the whole sanction and faith of all the corporators, it is void, as the corporation can only act under the powers of its charter. So I hold here. Here is a petty corporation, this trio of oligarchs, who are set there to determine upon an election, and if they trench upon the elective function and transcend their authority, their act is void.

This being so, I advance another proposition. If the election is determined by a board, and a State court of competent jurisdiction decides its action to be illegal or fraudulent, decides that it was an usurped authority, or an authority infra vires, but exercised fraudulently, I say that that judgment is conclusive upon these two Houses and upon this tribunal, unless the court so deciding was itself without jurisdiction or acted mala fide. Therefore I say to gentlemen here, if they want to stand upon the ground of not being permitted to go behind State authority in these matters, they must take the whole of the State authority; and the trio of oligarchs, with Governor Stearns at their head, making a quartette, are not the only authority of the State of Florida, but the authority of its judiciary pronouncing upon the title of this trio, and the authority of its supreme court must be taken into consideration as a part of that State authority which we are called upon so to respect.

Now I say that this quo warranto by the supreme court in the case of the State of Florida ex relatione Drew against Stearns and others—

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. Tucker, do your papers contain the petition for the writ of quo warranto or the writ itself? I see here the judgment.

Mr. Representative TUCKER. The original papers are here. They are not printed; only the judgment was printed.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I was looking to see whether the application was for a writ of quo warranto to determine a title to an office which the respondent formerly held, or one which he held at the time of issuing the writ.

Mr. Representative TUCKER. I cannot go into that just now, if you please. My time has nearly run out. It was served on the 6th, before the parties had perfected their act, while they were performing their function, and therefore before they had cast their vote. It was served upon them then; and my idea, my belief is in the doctrine of law that by relation the judgment rendered in January goes back to the first stage in the proceeding and avoids the whole. I beg Judge HOAR to understand me. This writ of quo warranto was served upon Pearce and others, the Hayes electors, five minutes after twelve o'clock on the 6th of December, before they had performed the function of voting for President and Vice-President, and therefore by relation now the judgment sweeps away the whole of the action of those electors under their pretended right and title. But the judgment of the supreme court in the case of Drew vs. Stearns settles the question of the power of this board, that their duty was merely ministerial; that they had no right to throw out votes; that they had a right merely to enumerate the votes as they were sent up from the counties, but that they had no right to reject on the idea that there was fraud or intimidation, or on such loose evidence as my friend read this morning, that they had heard somewhere the air was full of rumors of bull-dozing "and intimidation, and therefore we threw out any amount of votes."

Then I say that the proceeding in the quo warranto of Call vs. Pearce settles the question of the title of Pearce and others, the Hayes electors; utterly avoids it; declares that they are usurpers and that all their acts are void. That decision is unreversed, is the decision of a court of competent jurisdiction, and is conclusive as we maintain, and has stamped as the stamp of the State "usurpation" upon the power of these men who claim to have voted for President.

But we are told that the executive of the State has certified, M. L. Stearns has certified, and that is conclusive. Who made him a ruler or a judge over us? The act of Congress, it is said, says that the executive shall send on three certificates. Can the act of Congress make his certificate conclusive against the voice of the State? Then if it can, I beg gentlemen to follow to its legitimate conclusion their proposition. If the act of Congress has the effect (I think not by a fair interpretation of the statute) of giving conclusiveness to the return by the executive of the election in the State, then Congress has usurped the function of determining the manner of the election and determining the elective function of the State. "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct;" and the manner of election must include the manner of determining the election. There can be no such power in the executive of a State.

Now I apprehend that the thing just comes down to this: that whether this be a Federal or State office (and I believe it to be a State office) the elector must be appointed by the State in such manner as the legislature directs, and that we must refuse—I speak now of the two Houses and of this Commission as a substitute for them—we must refuse effect to any certificate which belies the fact; and to assert that we have no right to say a thing is a lie when we see it is a lie is to say you might as well disband and go to your respective functions prior to the organization of the Commission.

As I have but a few moments left, I will, as preachers say sometimes, give practical application to this discourse. The question is, are the Hayes electors appointed, not are they returned by the trio or by Mr.

Stearns, but are they appointed by the people of Florida; not who gave them commission, but who gave them title to speak for Florida? The title comes from the body of the people. The commission may come from the trio of oligarchs. Do I hear "yes"? Who says so? The board and governor. Have they the legal right to say it? The judgment of the court answers no. Did they fraudulently make the return? The court answers they did. Now shall this tribunal, in the teeth of this ultimate State determinant power, give title to any such commission, or give title under the voice of the people? Shall you hold the commission which the State court of Florida has declared to be invalid, to be valid, in order to stifle the elective power of the people and give power to the determinant functions of the oligarchy? That is the question.

May it please the Commission, there is only one other question that I desire to speak to, and that is one which it is proper I should mention before I sit down. I will not go into the facts of this case any further. Baker County was never thrown out for any informality until the exigency of the second count required. Upon the first count there was no informality or irregularity in Baker County, and its return was counted; but when the court ordered them to count those counties that they had thrown out, they found that the only way to procure the election to the Hayes electors was then to throw out Baker County instead of those that they had already thrown out and were now ordered to count.

Now I come to this point only about Mr. Humphreys, who was an officer of the Government. On page 70 of the document as to the recent election in Florida, the testimony taken before the select committee of the House of Representatives, the Commission will find the evidence is:

United States circuit court, northern district of Florida.

And that evidence is here printed from the original certificate of the clerk of the court.

Ordered, By the court, that Frederick C. Humphries, of Pensacola, be, and he is hereby, appointed shipping-commissioner for the port of Pensacola.

That is with the objection made by two gentlemen.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Is that the objection of Mr. Jones and Mr. McDonald?

Mr. Representative TUCKER. Yes, sir, that Frederick C. Humphreys was appointed, and then there is a certificate that he took the oath to discharge the duties of shipping-commissioner to the best of his ability, sworn to and subscribed, &c., and then here is the certificate of the clerk:

I, M. P. De Rioboo, clerk, &c., do hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy as the same remains on file in my office. I further certify that no resignation of said office of shipping-commissioner has been filed in my office by the said Frederick C. Humphries.

So that here is a man who was appointed in 1872 shipping-commissioner; continued to hold the office on the day of election; continued to hold the office on the day he voted, contrary to the Constitution of the United States, and continues to hold it now, as far as I know; and upon that point, I refer to page 425 of the testimony taken by the House committee:

He has been United States shipping-commissioner.

So that a man who was an elector was United States shipping-commissioner. Let me refer you to one single fact. The question is whether he was an officer of the United States. In the Revised Statutes, page 876, you will find the section providing for the appointment of such shipping-commissioner by the court.

Thanking the Commission for their kind attention and having exhausted my time, I have only to say that we are prepared, as soon as the court shall advise us of the mode in which we shall unkennel this fraud, to go into the evidence in any shape or form that either the tribunal will indicate or that the gentlemen on the other side may desire. We have the evidence that has been taken by the committees of both Houses. We apprehend that, as both Houses would have been entitled to use this upon the determination of the question, this Commission has the same power. There may be evidence in reference to these other counties, but not knowing what would be the rules established by this tribunal—of course, it was impossible to know—we have not submitted it. I only mean to say that of course all the evidence taken before either House and now in the hands of either House, which they could have used in the determination of this question, is before this tribunal, and we apprehend that this tribunal is competent to go into any further evidence that may be necessary to elucidate the subject for decision, and to unearth the fraud and illegality which affects the title of either of these parties to the election. It relates to Duval County and Clay County, as well as Baker.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I want to ask you if your last reference—I have not the book before me—tended to show that this person who was an elector was the person appointed shipping-commissioner?

Mr. Representative TUCKER. No, sir; it only showed what was the nature of his office under the Revised Statutes.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I alluded to the reference in the evidence.

Mr. Representative TUCKER. The last reference to the evidence was to show that he was the very man and performed the duties.

Mr. Representative FIELD. He has been acting as such.

The PRESIDENT. One of the objectors on the other side will now be heard.

Mr. Representative KASSON. On consultation, Mr. President, as I intimated before the opening of the argument on the other side, my associate [Mr. McCrary] and myself have thought it due to the interests represented that we should ask further time to examine the certificates which are all involved in these objections, asking it specially upon this ground, that instead of the certificates and papers to which the objections apply appearing in print in the RECORD this morning as we expected them to do, so that they might be directly considered by us, they have not yet been in print; the certificates are not before us; we have had no access to them until counsel in this printed document just this moment laid them upon the table before us.

In addition to that I have only to say that the magnitude of the questions presented by the argument here, also, is a reason why we should attempt to aid the Commission more than we can do by hastily proceeding now to the consideration of these great constitutional questions. My colleague and myself only saw the objections yesterday and were only notified after the meeting of this Commission that we were to present them on our part.

The PRESIDENT. How much delay do you ask? I have no authority to grant it; I must have something definite to submit to the Commission.

Mr. Representative KASSON. I think it will be sufficient, inasmuch as we can have access to the original papers now, they being in possession of the Commission, to ask to be allowed to go on to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT, (to the members of the Commission.) The objectors to the second certificate, and who support the first one, ask for a postponement of their reply to the two objectors who have already spoken this morning, until to-morrow morning. The question before the Commission is whether the delay shall be granted. Are you ready for the question?

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. I should like to inquire whether it would not be possible for one of the objectors to go on this afternoon, and then the Commission might possibly assent to a postponement of the hearing of the other one until morning.

Mr. Representative KASSON. That would be practicable, except for the fact that we are both in the same situation, and we have not been able to distribute the two branches of the subject between us.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Can you not go on at three o'clock?

Mr. Representative KASSON. That would exhaust the time of the objectors with ten minutes additional.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Mr. Kasson, much as I would like to oblige you, for myself I must say that looking to the emergency and the necessity of getting along and the number of persons to be heard in all these cases, if we set this example the Commission probably would never get through. I must for myself vote against any delay unless it be till three o'clock, so as to allow an opportunity to take lunch in the mean time.

Mr. Representative KASSON. If that be the disposition of the Commission I certainly interpose no objection, and we shall avail ourselves of the time.

The PRESIDENT. You only ask now for delay until three o'clock?

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Mr. President, I move that these objectors have till three o'clock to present their statement.

The PRESIDENT. The question before the Commission is whether a delay until three o'clock shall be granted to the objectors on the other side.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Now I move that the Commission take a recess until three o'clock.

Mr. Representative KASSON. Before that vote is put may I inquire whether the Commission has in its possession the certificates and the objections?

The PRESIDENT. It has. It is moved that the Commission take a recess until three o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Commission took a recess until three o'clock.

The Commission re-assembled at 3 o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDENT. One of the objectors to the second certificate will now be heard on the same rules and conditions prescribed in respect to objectors to the first.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. President and gentlemen, I am requested to lay before the Commission the Senate report upon Florida containing the laws of Florida and other matters pertinent to this discussion.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. We take it as part of the statement, not as evidence.

The PRESIDENT. We will take it as part of the statement on that side.

Mr. Representative KASSON. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, in what I have to say I shall be mindful of one of the traditions of that very honorable court which usually occupies the bench now filled by this Commission. It is said of Chief-Justice Marshall that, after listening for a day and far into the second day to a young counselor who had by that time only passed Littleton, and Coke, and Blackstone, and got down to Kent's Commentaries, the Chief-Justice ventured to remind him that it must be presumed that the Supreme Court of the United States itself was partially cognizant of the law, and he might be able to abbreviate his argument. In that spirit I shall to-day endeavor as early as possible to free our part of the case from the charges, allegations, and arguments which have been presented and which do not seem to us pertinent to the question to be considered by the Commission.

What is the case before the Commission? First, a certificate, as required by the Constitution and laws of the United States and in conformity with the statutes of the State of Florida, certifying the electoral votes of one of these States which my honorable friend who last spoke before the recess [Mr. Tucker] was pleased to call "sovereign States" of this Union. That certificate is the one which was first opened and read in the joint session. There is a second so-called certificate opened in the joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress in which the persons signing the same preface their own certificate by one signed by an officer not recognized by the laws of the United States nor by the statutes of Florida as a certifying officer, being the attorney-general of the State of Florida. He certifies that there is no provision of the law of Florida "whereby the result of said returns can be certified to the executive of said State," admitting by that certificate, if it has any force at all, that his action is without the law and without any sanction of the statutes of the State. Next, the self-styled electors certify to their own election and their own qualifications, and that they themselves notified the governor of their own election. That is the certificate No. 2, a certificate of unauthorized persons and uncertified persons in the view of the laws, State and national, and that was presented and opened in pursuance of the recent act of Congress for what it is worth.

There is a third certificate still more extraordinary, still more wanting in all the legal elements of electoral verification, and which asks for itself consideration. It is a certificate which is thoroughly ex post facto, certified by an officer not in existence until the functions of the office had been exhausted; a certificate which recites or refers to posterior proceedings in a subordinate court and in a superior State court, the latter expressly excluding the electoral question; a certificate which is accompanied by that sort of a return which a canvassing board might under some circumstances report to the State officers, but which has never been sent to the Congress of the United States or to the President of the Senate for their consideration in the one hundred years in which we have been a Republic. Every date of the judicial orders and of the laws authorizing the executive acts certified, the official existence of the very officers who certify them, the proceedings in the court as recited in them, are all subsequent to that time which by the Constitution and laws of the United States is the date fixed for the final performance of electoral functions.

These two certificates, therefore, are wanting in all the elements of constitutional and legal validity which should exist to give them audience before this Commission. They conform in no respect to the laws of the country as they now are, or to the laws of the State as they were on the 6th day of December, when the functions of the electors were ended. More than that, if the first certificate, designated as certificate No. 1, is a constitutional and legally certified expression of the vote of the State of Florida, that question being settled in favor of this certificate obviates the necessity for considering the certificates numbered 2 and 3. I ought, perhaps, to say to the honorable Commission that it is fortunate they did not grant the request of our objectors for an adjournment till to-morrow. The next mail might have brought to you certificate No. 4 or 5, reciting to you new proceedings, a new action before the courts, and no end would come to the papers that might be presented in party or personal interest as establishing a retroactive right to exercise an electoral function in the State of Florida.

I shall, therefore, cheerfully confine the argument to certificate No. 1, because if the objections to that certificate are invalid, and the certificate itself is valid, of course that dismisses all need of consideration of the other certificates, and we shall have ascertained what is the constitutional and legal electoral vote of the State of Florida.

The objections to this certificate are substantially one, namely, that there was fraud, or conspiracy, or both somewhere behind it, and behind the college, not by reason of anything which appears in connection with the electoral college or its proceedings or on the face of the certificate, but because of action on the part of local or State canvassing officers, or of the people, and away behind all action of the presidential electors themselves. Hence it is that we have heard this morning, chiefly, instead of a constitutional and legal presentation of the question within your jurisdiction, a speech before this Commission as if it were a jury in a court having original jurisdiction to determine law, to determine fact, to establish titles to office, to oust and to install officers, to decide rights between parties, to decide State rights, to decide national rights, an assertion that State or county officials, wholly outside of national control, have somehow acted fraudulently under State law, and that this electoral return has been vitiated thereby.

Now, it is not within the scope of my purpose to answer otherwise than generally that argument which took up most of the time of the objectors who opened this discussion. I must affirm, however, to this Commission that the first objector was in error in saying that we on this side had nothing to say contradicting his assertions of fraud. We say everything in denial of fraud in the State officers. We affirm fraud in directly the reverse sense, and frauds which you would ascertain in the very steps to which he calls your attention, in the action of certain county canvassers certifying results for Tilden electors. For example, when he refers to Baker County, I entirely dissent from his view of the facts as existing of record in that case; but if you go into that question in Baker County to verify his assertions, we should inevitably ask that you go into Jackson County, where, under other political domination, they rejected 271 votes actually cast for the Hayes electors. We should ask you to go into Alachua County and find at one precinct a railroad train of non-resident passengers getting off on their passage through and voting the ticket which was supported by the objector [Mr. Field] who made the allegation against Baker County. We should invoke your attention to Waldo precinct of the same county to find that they had vitiated that poll also by what is called stuffing the ballot-box. And so on with other counties passed upon by the State board.

We answer, then, the allegation that their charges of fraud have not been denied by us, by stating that if they are ever reached in the exercise of your jurisdiction, we propose to show, and shall show in that contingency, that there was such a case of fraud in the incipency of that vote which they claim should elect their candidate as would astonish not only this Commission, but the whole country by its presentation. I unite with my friends in condemning fraud wherever it exists. It should not only vitiate the result which it produced when it is ascertained by the proper tribunals, but it should also condemn every man, public or private, who participated in it. We are not here to defend fraud. We are here, however, to say not only that the allegation of it as made on the other side is not correct, but that the very next step behind the county canvassers confronts you with some of the grossest cases of the violation of the popular right to freely cast the vote, and to have that vote counted, which have ever been found in the history of this country.

If we go for fraud, let us go to the bottom of it; let us go where that fraud is found in such a degree and with such force, in more than one State, North and South, as to penetrate the very foundation of the popular sovereignty of this country, and to lead every patriot to consider whether the highest duty of legislators is not first to put their guards where alone fraud is essentially to be feared, namely, at the ballot-box, because it is further removed from the sight of the general public and from the control of supervising authority.

I leave that question now. I do not believe that this Commission by the Constitution or laws was ever intended, or has the power, to go to the extent that would be required if it attempted to probe these mutual allegations of fraudulent voting and fraudulent canvassing to the bottom by judicial investigation and judicial decision.

It seems to me that our honorable friends on the other side have been misled by the judicial atmosphere of this hall, consecrated usually to the jurisdiction of a constitutional court of justice. Under the influence of these columns as pillars of a supreme court; and with the judicial associations of this chamber, they have addressed you, honorable gentlemen of the Commission, as if you were a constitutional court, vested with the power to try causes without a jury, vested both with the powers of a subordinate and an appellate court in a proceeding by quo warranto, and vested with unlimited discretion in the determination of rights to hold the electoral office. They have presented to you the following questions upon which it is absolutely necessary to come to a decision, upon their theory of your jurisdiction :

First. Is this Commission a general canvassing-board with power to canvass the popular vote of the State of Florida?

Second. Is this Commission a national court of appeal from the State canvassing-boards?

Third. Is this Commission a judicial court of appeal from the State circuit court of Florida in proceedings by writ of quo warranto?

The gentlemen on the other side affirmed that your jurisdiction was co-extensive with that of a court in a proceeding by quo warranto; and I add in response to the alleged decision of this subordinate court, Judge White's court in Florida, that it is not a final determination of that proceeding by quo warranto. We are informed, and so claim the fact to be, that it is now pending on appeal in the supreme court of the State of Florida. Hence I ask the question whether this Commission can take jurisdiction from the supreme court of Florida, after regular appeal from the circuit court, of the proceedings in quo warranto.

The affirmative of all these propositions is taken by our opponents. They do affirm that you are a canvassing-board with power to canvass the vote of Florida cast by the people; they do affirm that you are not merely a canvassing-board, but a national court of appeal from the action of the canvassing-board of Florida; they do affirm that you are a court so judicial that from the action of the State circuit court of Florida you can take jurisdiction by reviewing that action; and they do affirm that there is no limit to your power to investigate into the honesty and integrity of the action of the returning-board of Florida, and to determine originally, with the powers of a court, to whom the certificate of election should have been awarded.

This represents the legal position of our opponents. I ask, therefore, what are the powers of this Commission? I need not remind the honorable gentlemen composing it that the assumption of these powers implies that we are to have no election of a President and Vice-President of the United States by the time limited for the commencement of the functions of their offices. You cannot say to those gentlemen, "We will go behind the regular certificates provided by the Constitution and the law just so far as will accommodate you to find whether it is true or not that what you allege to be fraud was done against your interest in one or two counties. We must, if we go behind the electoral college, go where all the allegations of fraud on both sides assert its existence." It is the popular vote that those gentlemen say you are to review, to recanvass, and to ascertain. Where does this Commission get its power for that? By the act organizing the Commission you are vested with the right to consider just so much of this alleged case as Congress might consider; and when I say "Congress," I include, of course, the two Houses. Let me ask then what is that limit? We must clear our minds from what has grown within the later years to be most dangerous to the reserved rights of the States and to the rights of the people, namely, the assertion of unlimited universal power of each House, or of both Houses, to assume jurisdiction over all things or questions having a national aspect or relation. No such undefined grasp was intended by the Constitution. Suppose this act—and I beg the attention of gentlemen to it—suppose this act had provided that, instead of surrounding the President of this Commission with these gentlemen and conferring these indefinite powers, Congress had chosen to surround the President of the Senate with only the representatives of the Senate and of the House, would you have thought of attributing judicial power to them? The same power that justifies Congress under the Constitution of the United States in providing that the counting should be done by this Commission would have justified them in providing that the counting should be done by the President of the Senate alone. Admitting that Congress has power to that extent to regulate the counting, you must guide yourselves by the same principles in determining your jurisdiction that you yourselves would decide limited the jurisdiction of the President of the Senate as sole counting agent were he designated by this act to count the votes alone.

Now suppose that act in existence, and you have it by law that the Vice-President shall not only open, but shall himself count the votes. If the Constitution had said "and the votes shall then be counted by him," the same result would have been attained. If instead of "by him" you add the two words "by Congress," you do not vary the power at all. Whatever counting is to be done is to be done either by the President of the Senate or by the two Houses of Congress. In either case it is only to "count." That is the substance. The rest is agency. Would you maintain for one moment, if that were the provision, either of Constitution or law, that the President of the Senate should count the votes, that he had the right to send out commissioners to take depositions, "to take into view" all other papers, to reach evidence at will, to recanvass the popular vote of the State of Florida, to organize the whole machinery alike of executive canvassing-boards of a State and of all the judicial courts of the State? Is there a gentleman on this Commission from either House of Congress or from the Supreme Bench who would tolerate for a moment the exercise of such power under the simple language "shall count the votes?" If not, then the act has given no additional power to fifteen men beyond that power which by the like terms would have been conferred upon one man; and hence I affirm that there is in this law no power whatever to do more than is necessarily implied in the words "and the votes shall then be counted."

If that be so, then we come to the next question, What does the word "count" mean? and is the power of that sort that implies something not ministerial, or within the narrow circuit of discretion that belongs to the ministerial power? Does it imply, as gentlemen on the other side claim, the unlimited circuit of the judicial power? If it does, your Constitution in its very frame-work and organization is violated.

The first three articles of the Constitution divide the functions of this Government into legislative, executive, and judicial. The third article affirms positively that the judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court and in inferior courts to be established. So the first article says that all legislative power granted is vested in the Congress of the United States. So the second article says that the executive power is vested in the President. Your limits are drawn by the Constitution of your country, which tells you that the several powers of this Government, the three great powers, shall not by any contrivance be merged or mingled in any tribunal, whether constituted of the three divisions, or of any or either of the three. The safety of our people hangs on it; the safety of our States hangs upon it; all the elements of national safety hang upon the observance of that division of the functions of government. It is the greatest act in the progress of modern civilization as contrasted with the ancient and the Eastern, which combined all functions in one supreme head. It withholds each department of power from assuming either of the other essential powers of the Government, that the people may be saved from the tyranny of irresponsible authority.

The claim made on the other side confuses and merges them in so far as you are asked to exercise judicial functions in the determination of rights. The very language used this morning was that your powers were co-extensive in this matter with those of a court trying a proceeding by quo warranto. Are you, then, a court under the third article of the Constitution?

I therefore think it may be assumed that the indefinite language of this act of Congress confers no such powers as claimed upon this delegated Commission, organized to tide over a difficulty, and to do the ministerial act of counting the votes in the stead of the President of the Senate.

I have spoken of the narrow circuit of discretion that surrounded the ministerial act of counting. I beg to renew the distinction that there is no difference made by adding, as this act implies, the words "by Congress" at the end of the constitutional clause, so that it would read "shall then be counted by Congress." It is the same as if the words were added "shall then be counted by him," meaning the President of the Senate. The essential factor of the phrase is the "count."

Now what is that narrow circuit of discretion? It is broad enough to ascertain whether the papers before you as certificates are genuine and not counterfeit, and are duly and truly verified by State authority, as required under the Constitution and laws. It is broad enough to ascertain whether the electoral college has complied with the law. This is a ministerial examination. Do the papers upon their face contain evidence of fraud, of doubt, of irregularity, of error? Is certificate number two on its face more regular, more free from apparent fraud, more worthy of being received in evidence than certificate number one? Is certificate number three a truer certificate, more in compliance with law, and bearing upon its face greater evidences of its authenticity? Which is the authentic certificate and the authenticated vote? These are the questions to be ministerially settled. Neither Congress nor any officers created by it have the right to recount popular votes; for the Constitution says expressly, it is the electoral votes that are to be counted, not the popular vote. Over this Congress has no power under the presidential clauses of the Constitution.

Every phase of the discussion confronts us in a narrower or broader circle of reasoning with this one question: Are you to revise and adjudicate all the proceedings of State elections for electors of President and of all State tribunals relating thereto appointed by State laws? We always come around to that. Or are you to count what is properly certified and presented to you? If you affirm the first proposition, you must declare the Constitution amended by this tribunal, ipso facto amended, so that it shall read: "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal," &c., subject, however, to revision by the Congress of the United States, who shall have power to overrule the State authorities in determining the college of electors. Would the Constitution ever have been adopted with that construction?

We are brought inevitably to such an amendment by construction. Yet the Constitution sought to preserve absolutely the right of the State to appoint its electors without Federal dictation. It required every ballot to be cast on the same day throughout the Union, that it might be free from every centralized influence. Every member of the Commission knows what the history of the adoption of this clause is, and yet we are brought perpetually by the claims of the other side to this one question: Shall we now go on and complete the absorption of this most absolute, independent, and unquestioned right of the States to appoint their electors in their own way, and hold that it is subject to revision and change by the two Houses of Congress?

The objectors ask are we, then, to take the certificate of the proper State officers against the truth? Is there any reason why, on the other hand, it should not be asked, are we to take the certificate of these fifteen gentlemen against the truth? There is a necessity in public affairs and, in the very organization of society and of political communities, an absolute necessity to have some final jurisdiction. There must be somewhere an authority by which we stand, even if it be impeached by charges of fraud. Where is that authority? Is it here? Is it in the governor? Is it in the canvassing-board? Is it in the State legislature? Is it in the State judiciary? Where is it? I submit that for the purposes of this case, and under the Constitution and laws, it is found where the State authority concludes, and that if the Constitution and laws of the United States in manner, in time, in substance, so far as shown by the duly-certified results, are conformed to, there is the determination of the case.

I regret to pause, may it please the Commissioners, to repel the suggestions made against this returning-board. It was said that the court had found their return fraudulent. There is no evidence in the records of the court that that allegation is true. I have read the decision, and in answering their argument I must say there is not an allusion to the fact that that canvassing-board acted fraudulently. It was alleged that their action, which had conformed to the action two years before, was a misinterpretation of their rights under the law; and in the document submitted a few moments ago to the commissioners, I think, on the second page, there is a copy of the essential section of the law. The important language of the act to which I wish to call the attention of the Commissioners in the statutes of Florida regulating the powers of this board is this :

If any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Can you give us the date of that statute?

Mr. Representative KASSON. That is the old statute, under which the election was held, passed February 27, 1872, and was the law in force at the time of the canvass, at the time of the certificate of the electors, at the time of the voting of the electors, and until the 17th of January, 1877.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Has the paper been filed?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Not as evidence.

Mr. Representative KASSON. I simply use it for reference, because in it is found this statute of Florida. I refer to it here and for that purpose. This document was handed to the Commissioners for the law-references in it.

Thus it will be seen that the canvassing-board of Florida were to inquire if these returns appeared to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board was unable to ascertain the true vote. That was their function. In exercising that function they not merely passed upon the returns of the county canvassers but upon the certified results in precincts.

The court said they had overstepped the law. And here I must remind the gentlemen composing the Commission that, when they made the recanvass which I have styled canvass number two under order of the supreme court of Florida, it will appear they then reported not only the result in respect to governor, but they also reported the result in respect to electors. That result of the second canvass showed the election of the Hayes electors, but by a reduced majority. These electors appear to have run two or three hundred votes ahead of the State ticket, and the recanvass left them still some two hundred majority. That appeared on the record. It does not appear on the printed document which has been submitted on the other side here, I suppose because the court ruled that they intended their order to only apply to State officers; and therefore they struck out, after it had once gone in the record, the result as to the electors; but it was originally a part of the proceedings under order of the court, which, if gone into, will disclose the fact that not only canvass number one showed the election of the Hayes electors, but canvass number two "had under the order and in accordance with the ruling of the supreme court" showed both the election of the democratic State ticket and the election of the Hayes electors.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Was that called in question at all in that case of Drew against the other party?

Mr. Representative KASSON. It was said not to be raised by the pleadings or by the order, but was in the return of the canvass as to the election of governor. The canvass had under the order of the court in that case showed both classes of elections, that of the electoral college and that of the State officers. The result of that count, when made under that ruling, was what I have stated, and then objection was taken to its record, and the court said they were not considering the electoral count, and struck it out.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. My only desire was to learn whether that was ruled at all in the case.

Mr. Representative FIELD. Please to state that in the recanvass this canvassing-board put back Baker County so as to include only two precincts.

Mr. Representative KASSON. That is only to say that the gentlemen on the other side want to take just so much of that action under order of the court as suits their case, and reject all the rest. They applied the rule and determined the result, and they made changes in several counties both ways; they put back some democratic votes, they put back some republican votes. I only allude to it in answer to the statement here, because the printed proceedings do not contain all the proceedings in that case. This is left out. But if the case is gone into those facts must also appear.

Then we come to canvass No. 3, made after the college was functus officio, and here you find that, not satisfied at all, they appointed a new board of State canvassers. From that new board they left out the attorney-general of the State. This I suppose was owing to the fact that his opinion had been, as to the law of the case in many points of the canvass, with the republican members of the board. These papers which have been laid on your desk show that, instead of the attorney-general being a member of the new State canvassing-board, the treasurer of the State was substituted.

Now, I ask, if you are to recognize canvass after canvass and the changing results of partisan affiliations, the changing desires of individuals, the changing influences surrounding the canvassing-board and the whole political aspect of the State? Are you to change your rules of law, and to say that canvass after canvass may be made after the electoral function was exhausted, and that the last canvass made under the circumstances should prevail, ex post facto entirely, ex post facto by law authorizing it, ex post facto by executive authority, ex post facto by the constitution of the board, ex post facto by the exhaustion of the functions of the officers themselves elected, ex post facto because the very terms of the officers elected had expired?

This ex post facto certificate No. 3 is dated January 26, 1877, and when opened in the joint meeting of the two houses was stated by the President of the Senate to have been received only the day before the joint meeting. This certificate recites a law of January 17, 1877, and also a law of January 26, 1877, as the authority for the certificate. It recites the third canvass of which I have already spoken, and which was made on the 19th of January, 1877, and the copy of that canvass is certified under date of January 26, 1877. Then this canvass No. 3 was legislated to be the canvass by act dated January 26, 1877. These are the essential points of certificate No. 3.

The objector next me [Mr. Field] proposed at the opening to explain in his argument what he styled the "jugglery" by which the Hayes electors got their certificates. I ask this Commission, if there be a prima facie presumption of fraud, whether it exists against those officers elected before fraud could have been contemplated, against a board that acted at the time required by the State law, against a board that acted at the time provided by congressional law, against a board that acted in ignorance of the electoral vote in other States, as it was contemplated by our fathers they should do; or does that presumption of fraud exist against the men who knew the importance of a change of the result in Florida, against men who acted in full knowledge of the necessity of the action they took to accomplish their result, against men who organized a new tribunal and enacted a new law to accomplish that result?

If there be fraud, if there be conspiracy as alleged, where does the presumption of law under these circumstances place it? Inevitably it places it where the motive of the act, the knowledge requisite to give the motive effect, and the purpose to be accomplished, were all before the eyes of the persons participant in it. Fraud cannot be so presumed against the parties who acted in conformity with law and in discharge of duty at the time required by law, and in the mode required by law, and in the presence of a political opponent, as that presumption would exist against those who do it at irregular times, outside the provisions of the law, and with the full knowledge of the effect which would be produced upon the general result. The conspiracy is not with the first, but with the last canvass.

A few words more before I close. I believe I have expressed already my great regret that we have not been able on both sides to argue these questions exclusively on points where we all see and all know are to be found the hinges on which this decision is hung. But my honorable friend from Virginia [Mr. Tucker] in his argument not only spoke of the fact, which was unsupported by any evidence, but which he said he could support by some evidence, that there was bad motive and fraudulent conduct on the part of the canvassing-board, of which I have seen no evidence whatever; but he went further and asked, are we to submit this great question of the supreme Magistrate of the United States to the determination of a trio of oligarchs in Florida? Trio of oligarchs! What shall I say of the quartette of oligarchs in my State who exercise corresponding functions? What shall I say of the quartette or the quintette of oligarchs that exist in every State of this Union, save perhaps two or three, who are empowered in the same manner to preserve the rights of their respective States as canvassing-boards? Nay, more, I should like to ask my honorable friend, what shall I say of the solo of oligarchy in Oregon and his right to determine the election of Chief Magistrate? Is there any significance in giving a name of this sort to a tribunal which is acting under and because of the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States or of the State? I answer to all that, that the question is, where does the law put the power to arrive at that determination on which action is based? Whether that be one man or five men, or three men, that determination is prima facie valid, and can be vitiated only in the modes provided by the laws of the local or general jurisdiction, as the case may be.

The case is made when it is found to be in accordance with Constitution and law in time, manner, and due certification of authenticity. Can it be upset? Yes, if legal provision is made therefor. Where? asks the gentleman. I answer, within the jurisdiction where the laws provide for the appellate or original determination of rights. But, says the gentleman, suppose no such provision of law is made? Then, I answer that a casus omissus of proper authority is no reason for the usurpation of that authority where not a scintilla of constitutional law has placed it. If the allegation were true, it simply shows the necessity of further legislation where that legislation ought to exist. If it be untrue, the whole ground and fabric of the argument here falls to the ground.

The Constitution says that we have very little to do with this matter of elections by States. The history of it shows that it was intended that we should have very, very little to do with the determination of the result. It gave us no authority to overrule State action; and the alleged right to change a duly certified result contains within itself a claim of right, and without appeal, to deny to the States that exclusive right which the Constitution took such extraordinary pains to confirm to them.

If you have the right to say that another set of votes must be counted in Florida, you have the right to say that another set of votes must be counted in New York; and if you take jurisdiction to allow the mere ninety votes which constitute the alleged majorities in Florida, and which would change the electoral college of that State, a partisan Congress may assert that the sixty thousand majority of my State shall be overthrown, and we cannot question it nor take appeal.

I speak to you as if you were Congress, because the act says that whatever Congress might do in the consideration of certain questions you may do. I say that Congress itself in no element of its character contains a justification for such a construction of its power as it is proposed now to give to it. It is the legislative body of the country, and may inquire into all these facts, which they have perhaps in both branches inquired into, because they may be needed to amend the Constitution or amend the law.

But the act which creates the board of fifteen says, not that you have the same powers which Congress has, but you have the same powers which Congress has "for this purpose." What purpose? For counting the votes, as the President of the Senate would do it if Congress had chosen to give him that power. There stand the great bulwarks of the Constitution, where they divide the three powers of the Government, and they cannot be overthrown.

You cannot be judges of this or any other question for judicial action. If both Houses were unanimous, it would be usurpation for them to determine judicially who was entitled to the vote of the State of Florida as constituting its electoral college; and without that power this Commission is limited to the determination of the relative validity and authentication of these three certificates, which is the certificate that is duly certified to be counted. Go behind this certificate, unless simply to determine the verity of the several authentications and their conformity to law, and you launch yourselves into a tumultuous sea of allegations of fraud, irregularity, and bad motive, and, as my honorable friend on the other side says, greed of office or undue ambition to secure the honors of the State. There is no limit unless we draw the constitutional line narrowly. You cannot expand it without launching this vessel of our Constitution upon a sea full of rocks and dangers, where there is every prospect that it will be shattered, and the very structure preserving the rights of the States and the nation will go to pieces.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Will it interrupt your argument, Mr. Kasson, if I make an inquiry? Do I understand your argument to go to this length, that if the State of Florida had elected four members of Congress or four persons under the disability of the fourteenth amendment, and they had cast their votes for President, we should be bound to count them?

Mr. Representative KASSON. I have borne in mind that a question would arise as to Tennessee and some other States touching individual electors, as it is also presented in one of the objections that have been submitted in the House. I have not had time since last evening to do more than to become possessed in my own mind of the general arguments and the results of those arguments applicable to the general principles of this case.

I have no doubt that the provision of the Constitution touching offices of trust, profit, and emolument, and that also relating to persons disqualified by participation in the rebellion, are imperative upon the several States, and it is expected that they will conform to them. Whether we can go behind, whether it was intended that we should go behind, the action of the States upon the assumption that they had violated that constitutional duty, or to prove that they had violated it, is a question that I leave to the consideration of those who shall follow me.

Of course I understand that one of the objections in Florida, if you do permit yourselves to go behind and examine it, does involve that point; but as my time has now nearly expired, I have not the opportunity to go into it and will leave it to counsel.

The PRESIDENT. You have five minutes of your hour.

Mr. Representative KASSON. May it please the Commission, I have said all that I regard essential in that part of the case which has fallen to me, and I trust my honorable friend who is associated with me will address himself still more effectually to points which I have alluded to and to the remaining points of the case.

My great anxiety and my belief in the great importance of this case all rest upon the fact that it is proposed that Congress shall, through you, usurp judicial powers for the first time in the history of this country. It is a usurpation which loses sight of the great divisions of authority in the Constitution of the United States and of the original reserved rights of the States.

I wish, in addition, to simply call the attention of the Commission to the recent decision in Florida, which has been published, and in which that court bases its decision against a judicial quality in the returning-board of Florida upon the constitution of Florida, which has the same division of powers to which I have referred as existing in the Constitution of the United States. The court therefore says that this canvassing-board cannot do anything except the ministerial act of determining upon the face of the returns irregularity, fraud, &c.; and by a strange inconsistency of argument, the gentlemen on the other side, coming to Washington in the case of Florida, ask this Commission to take the other ground, which has been overruled as law in Florida, and say that we, who have not the powers conferred by statute upon the Florida board, have immensely larger powers, which have not been hinted at in the Constitution and laws of the United States, and do have the right to exercise judicial functions.

I commend to the consideration of the Commission that decision, to which I refer, in the case of Drew vs. Stearns. And with that I submit this part of the case to the consideration of the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. The second objector will be heard on the same conditions and limitations.

Mr. Representative MCCRARY. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, I think I ought to say in justice to myself that perhaps no counsel ever appeared in so important a case upon so short a notice and with such inadequate opportunity for preparation. It was not until about four o'clock yesterday that I was made aware of the rule which the Commission had promulgated during the day, providing that gentlemen of either House uniting in objections to these votes should be heard before the tribunal; but appreciating the great importance of dispatch in the conduct of this case, I have not felt at liberty to ask for any greater indulgence than that which the tribunal has already awarded.

The question which this Commission is to decide is tersely and clearly set forth in the act of Congress under which it has been organized, and it is "by a majority of votes" to "decide whether any, and what, votes from such State, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States."

How broad is the jurisdiction given by this act? How far can the Commission go in this inquiry? It has been asserted by counsel who addressed the tribunal this morning that you sit here as a court possessing all the functions and powers of a judicial tribunal clothed with authority to hear, try, and determine a case of quo warranto, in order to settle the title to an office. The announcement of the learned counsel of this proposition, I must confess, was a startling one to me. If it be true, what are to be the consequences? If this tribunal shall so construe the Constitution, and shall hold that it sits here as a court with these judicial powers to try the title of every one of the three hundred and sixty-nine presidential electors chosen at the recent election or at any election, it will follow that the two Houses of Congress sit as a court clothed with this great power to review and revise and set aside and hold for naught the action of all the States of this Union. If one case can be made against one elector in the United States, requiring Congress or this tribunal to go down among the forty-five millions of people and decide how many votes were legally cast for this candidate or that, a case can be made against every one of the members of the electoral college of the United States, and the result is—I say it with deliberation—that, unless the two Houses of Congress shall consent, the people of the United States can never again be allowed to choose a President and Vice-President. It is not necessary for me to say to this tribunal that it is utterly impossible for the two Houses of Congress to exercise such a jurisdiction as this. It is utterly impossible for this tribunal to exercise it with any degree of discretion or deliberation even in the few cases that will be brought to your attention and adjudication. If the Constitution clothes the two Houses with the power now asserted to try the title of all the electors, not upon the credentials that come here under the seal of the States of the Union, not upon the evidence which the laws of the land prescribe as evidence of title to this office, but by an inquiry into the question how many people have voted for this candidate and that, and in all the States of the Union, I say it is utterly impossible for either the two Houses of Congress or this tribunal to exercise a jurisdiction like that.

How are we to determine what are the votes of a State provided for by the Constitution? The Constitution has provided the extent of this inquiry, has limited and defined it:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

The election of President of the United States is by the States, and the States appoint the electors. Gentlemen have argued, and their whole case rests upon the argument, that the appointment of electors is by the votes of the people at the polls; that that constitutes the appointment; and that, therefore, the Commission must inquire how the people have voted at the polls in order that Congress may decide who have been appointed electors. But, may it please the Commission, the appointment of the electors is not by the votes of the people at the polls. That may possibly be one of the steps required by the laws of the State, but the appointment of the electors is by the vote of the people cast at the polls, by the action of such tribunals as the State laws have created, canvassing, determining, and ascertaining the result of that vote, and by the issuing in pursuance of that canvass of the evidence showing the election of the electors. The State acts through its officials, through its constituted authorities, and the State declares who has been appointed. Therefore when the Constitution says that we shall inquire who have been appointed electors by the State in accordance with the laws of the State or as directed by the legislature of the State, we are simply to inquire what persons have been declared to be electors by the tribunal and the authority which the State law has created for that purpose. Now, the law of Florida, which has already been called to the attention of the Commission, provides :

On the thirty-fifth day after the holding of any general or special election for any State officer, member of the legislature, or Representative in Congress, or sooner, if the returns shall have been received from the several counties wherein elections shall have been held, the secretary of state, attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall meet at the office of the secretary of state, pursuant to notice to be given by the secretary of state, and form a board of State canvassers, and proceed to canvass the returns of said election, and determine and declare who shall have been elected to any such office or as such member, as shown by such returns. If any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration.

By that statute this tribunal was created with the power to canvass the votes and declare the result. The tribunal did canvass the votes and the canvass will be found on the third page of the same document, which I will not take the time now to read; but acting under the authority given them by that statute, they ascertained the result. How far they went in the exercise of the discretionary power which is given them by the statute, may not be material; but it is a fact, which will appear if this Commission shall go into the inquiry, that on three separate occasions, the first and regular canvass, the second canvass made under the mandamus proceedings and in relation to the office of governor, and on a third canvass made subsequently, this board constituted by the laws of the State of Florida ascertained and declared that the gentlemen known as the Hayes electors had a majority of all the votes cast.

Now, Mr. President and gentlemen, what law of Florida is to be looked at in order to determine the mode prescribed by the legislature of that State for appointing these electors? Are we to look at the law as it existed at the time of their appointment, or may we consider statutes that have been passed since? One of the papers which is presented is based entirely upon an adjudication of one of the inferior courts of that State and upon an act of the legislature of that State made long after the appointment of these electors, and long after they had discharged the functions of their office. It appears that a proceeding in quo warranto was commenced by the filing of a petition on the 6th day of December, the day upon which the electors met to cast their votes; that a summons was served upon that day at an hour in the day which is named in the papers; and that the electors were cited to appear and answer on the 18th day of the same month. The suit thus commenced continued and passed through various stages until the latter part of January, when a judgment was finally rendered in favor of the gentlemen known as the Tilden electors; but in the mean time—whether before or after the commencement of the original suit does not appear; I have seen nothing in the record that shows at what time in the day the votes were canvassed, but it is entirely immaterial—the electors appointed according to the laws of Florida proceeded to discharge their duties; they cast their votes; they adjourned sine die.

It is claimed by counsel that this quo warranto proceeding, which went into judgment nearly two months after the casting of the vote of Florida for President and Vice-President by the electors, relates back to the date of the filing of the petition and vacates and vitiates everything that was done in the mean time. That I think is not the law. The writ of quo warranto is a proceeding to test the right of an incumbent of an office. It does not restrain him from acting from the time that the original summons may be served. It does not oust him from the office until there is a final judgment of ouster; and there is no authority for the declaration of counsel, I undertake to say, that the judgment in quo warranto relates back to the time of the filing of the original petition and vitiates the acts of the officer in the mean time. The authorities are the other way, and I beg to cite a few cases upon that point.

I refer to section 756 of High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies:

The effect of judgment of ouster upon the officer himself, where the information is brought to test the right of one usurping an office, is to constitute a full and complete amotion from the office and to render null and void all pretended official acts of the officer after such judgment, and the party thus amoved is entirely divested of all official authority and excluded from the office as long as the judgment remains in force.

In 55 Illinois Reports, page 173, will be found the case of The People vs. Whitcomb, and there the court say:

The question sought to be raised by the information in this case is, whether the city officers can extend the city government beyond the original limits of the town, and can levy taxes and enforce ordinances in the portion of territory annexed by the act of February 23, 1869, and which is used exclusively for agricultural purposes, and whether that act is not unconstitutional and void. The demurrer to the answer of respondents brought the whole record, as well the information as the answer, before the court to determine its sufficiency. The first question presented by the demurrer is, whether the remedy, if any exists, has not been misconceived; whether the question of power to extend the city government over this territory thus annexed can be raised by quo warranto.

This writ is generally employed to try the right a person claims to an office, and not test the legality of his acts. If an officer threatens to exercise power not conferred upon the office, or to exercise the powers of his office in a territory or jurisdiction within which he is not authorized to act, persons feeling themselves aggrieved may usually restrain the act by injunction.

I next refer to 2d Johnson's Reports, page 184. The whole opinion is very brief, and I will read it:

This court has a discretion to grant motions of this kind or to refuse them, if no sufficient reasons appear for allowing this mode of proceeding. The office of Sweeting, the acting supervisor, will expire in April, and before the remedy now prayed for can have any effect. There must be an issue joined, and a trial, which could not take place before the next election, so that it would be impossible to restore Teel to his office. It would, therefore, be idle and useless to grant the motion.

That was an application for the writ of quo warranto to try a title to this office.

If the justices have been guilty of any misdemeanor, the party aggrieved must seek a different remedy.

Here, if the Commission please, is a case in Florida, where at the time of the judgment every function of the office of presidential elector had been exercised. The office had ceased to be. The officer had ceased to be and was functus officio. What is the extent of the term of office of a presidential elector? There is no period of time given in the statute during which he shall act; but he is an officer chosen for the discharge of a particular public duty. When that duty has been performed the term of his office has expired.

I call attention also to a case in Massachusetts decided as early as 1807, the case of Commonwealth vs. Athearn, 3 Massachusetts Reports, page 285:

At the last July adjournment in Suffolk, B. Whitman filed a motion for a rule of court against the respondent to show cause why an information in the nature of a quo warranto should not be awarded against him for claiming to hold the office of town clerk of Tisbury, in Dukes County. The court granted a rule, de bene esse, returnable at this term.

And now the chief-justice suggested to Whitman that since granting the rule to show cause the court had considered the subject more fully and doubted whether, from the impracticability of giving a remedy in the case, an information ought to be awarded against an officer holding by election for a year only. Whatever may be the authority of the court to issue process of this kind, from the present organization of the terms of the court, it will in no case be possible to come to a decision of the question until a year has expired. In the mean time another election will pass, and the respondent will be either out of office or lawfully in by virtue of a new choice. * * *

PARKER, J. I should not be for granting an information in any case where the judgment of the court upon the information can have no effect. The officer may be liable to a fine in case judgment of a motion be rendered, but not otherwise, as I now recollect. When the information comes to a hearing, this man's tenure in the office he claims will have expired.

And therefore they refused to grant the writ, because the functions of the officer would have ceased before there could be a judgment of ouster, and because a judgment of that character, if the man had ceased to act in his official capacity, would be null and void.

I refer also to the case of the State upon the relation of Newman vs. Jacobs, 17 Ohio Reports, and I read a sentence from page 153:

But further, there is an objection to the proceeding in this case, even as to the appointment of February the 28th, because the term of office has at this time expired. In England it seems not to be considered necessary that the person should continue to hold the office at the time of applying for the information. In New York, however, and Massachusetts, the information has been refused when the time must expire before the inquiry would have any effect, leaving the parties to their common remedies.

I next cite a case decided by the supreme court of Georgia, and read from 19 Georgia Reports, page 563, the case of Morris et al. vs. Underwood et al.:

In England, notwithstanding the term of office has expired for which the incumbent has been elected who is sought to be removed, still the courts of that country will grant leave to file the information for the purpose of inflicting a fine for the usurpation; and that, too, perhaps, where no judgment of ouster can be awarded. It will be found, however, that even this is only done in those cases where the office illegally held is one of a public nature, such as mayor, &c. But the American courts, from the peculiarity of their constitutions, laws, and forms of government, or for some other cause, have, with great unanimity, repudiated this doctrine of imposing a penalty. It has never been enforced in this State, even where the proceeding was directly at the instance of the State. Much less would it be in a case like this, where the effort making is not to forfeit the charter of the bank, but to redress the wrongs of the relators within the corporation. In such a case it is strictly a civil proceeding.

In this case, the term for which these directors were elected had expired by efflux of time six months before the rule was made absolute. There could, therefore, be no judgment of a motion rendered.

There was an attempt in this quo warranto proceeding in Florida to render a judgment of a motion or of ouster nearly two months after the expiration of the term of office by the discharge of every duty and every function which belongs to an elector under the laws of the land.

And if no fine could be inflicted, why order the information to be filed? Why trouble the country with a trial which could result in nothing beneficial to the applicants or prejudicial to their opponents? In New York and Massachusetts, the information has been refused when the time must expire before the inquiry would have any effect, leaving the parties to their common remedies. (Angell and Ames on Corporations, 436-7.) Much less, then, will the suit be entertained where the term of office has already expired.

The case of The People on the relation of Koerner et al. vs. Ridgley et al., in the supreme court of Illinois, is to the same purport, but I will not detain the Commission by reading it. It is in volume 21 of Illinois Reports, page 65. That goes to the point that the proceeding in quo warranto must be against a person who holds and executes the functions of an office. It is not against the man, not against the individual, it is against the officer; and when he ceases to be the officer the action falls to the ground as much as a personal suit against an individual falls when the individual dies.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Do I understand Mr. McCrary to say that the case cited decides that an action of quo warranto properly commenced against the incumbent of an office abates by reason of the expiration of his term?

Mr. Representative McCRARY. That is not the point in the case precisely. It is stated in the syllabus thus:

The information should allege that the party against whom it is filed holds and executes some office or franchise, describing it, so that it may be seen whether the case is within the statute or not.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. At the time of the commencement?

Mr. Representative McCRARY. At the time of the commencement; but these other cases do hold that no judgment can be rendered in a quo warranto proceeding against a party out of office, and there is no authority to the contrary so far as I can find, after a somewhat diligent search through the Library, to be discovered in this country, although a different rule has sometimes been followed in England.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Is there any English case in which a judgment of amotion has been rendered after the expiration of the term?

Mr. Representative McCRARY. I have not consulted the English authorities; I only judge of their character from what I see in the American cases.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. The cases of fine are reasonable enough; but my inquiry is whether there is one of amotion.

Mr. Representative McCRARY. I think perhaps there is no case of that kind even in England. They retain jurisdiction for the purpose of assessing the fine, and for no other purpose whatever, after the expiration of the term of office.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. How about the judgment for costs?

Mr. Representative McCRARY. The judgment for costs would go against the party perhaps, though I have not gone into that question.

Now, in the very nature of things, this whole proceeding in the courts of Florida must have been after the functions of the electors had been fully discharged. The Constitution of the United States does not prescribe the time when the electors in the States shall cast their votes; it does prescribe that Congress may fix the time, and that it shall be upon the same day in all the States of the Union. In pursuance of this power, Congress has fixed the time by an act passed in 1792 fixing the first Wednesday in December as the time for the casting of the votes.

The record which has been filed in the quo warranto case shows that the petition was filed on the 6th of December; that the appearance was ordered for the 18th of December; that the order was that the respondents should demur or answer by the 28th of December. Those were in the original orders, and it was at a much later period when the case finally came to judgment, late in January.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Commission to the acts of Congress passed in pursuance of the power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, to show how impossible it is that such proceedings as these can have any force or validity whatever. I refer to sections 135 and 136 of the Revised Statutes. The first declares:

The electors for each State shall meet and give their votes upon the first Wednesday in December in the year in which they are appointed, at such place, in each State, as the legislature of such State shall direct.

Section 136 provides that—

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required, by the preceding section, to meet.

The electors, then, are to be appointed; they are to receive from the executive authority of the State the evidence of their appointment on or before the first Wednesday in December. How can it be possible that any court in Florida could have jurisdiction in the last days of January to decide a question who were the electors in that State? The gentlemen who exercised these functions on the 6th of December under the credentials given to them by the regular State authorities of Florida met on that day, in accordance with the Constitution and the laws. They cast their votes. They made their return. They certified their proceedings. They transmitted them to the President of the Senate. They discharged every function that belonged to them under the Constitution and the laws on the 6th day of December; and it was impossible for them to have discharged it after that date, unless in a certain contingency which is provided for in another section, and which it is not pretended arose in this case. Section 140 provides, among other things:

The electors shall dispose of the certificates thus made by them in the following manner:

One. They shall, by writing under their hands, or under the hands of a majority of them, appoint a person to take charge of and deliver to the President of the Senate, at the seat of Government, before the first Wednesday in January then next ensuing, one of the certificates.

Two. They shall forthwith forward by the post-office to the President of the Senate, at the seat of Government, one other of the certificates.

Three. They shall forthwith cause the other of the certificates to be delivered to the judge of that district in which the electors shall assemble.

That is a statute passed in pursuance of the provision of the Constitution which requires, for the greatest and most important of public reasons, that the electors in all the States shall assemble and discharge their duties upon the same day. Now, if it be true that after the college in any State has in accordance with the law assembled upon that day and discharged its duties, it remains to any court in the State to review its decision after its action has been transmitted to the seat of Government, then I say the Constitution in one of its most vital provisions has been trampled upon and violated, for in that case, after the time fixed by the law, after the result of the election in the whole Union has been ascertained, after it has been discovered that by changing the vote of a single State the result of the election in the whole nation may be changed, parties may institute their proceedings, may bring their action of quo warranto, may proceed to try the case, and may determine that the electors who have discharged this duty on the day fixed by the Constitution and the laws were not the legal electors. In one State an inferior court having power to issue the writ of quo warranto, being attached to one side of the question, will entertain a petition of this character and will decide in favor of one set of electors, and send up to the President of the Senate the record of its proceedings declaring that the men who had voted on the day fixed by the law were not the electors. In another State another judge will perhaps render a judgment in favor of a set belonging to the other side. And so we shall be called upon, instead of counting the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the land, to investigate the decisions of all these courts in all the States.

I come back then to the position with which I started, and I repeat what my associate has said, in substance, that the Constitution devolves upon the two Houses, or upon the President of the Senate, or upon the person who counts the votes, whoever that may be, the narrowest possible ministerial duty. The framers of the Constitution chose that word which better than any other word in the English language expresses the idea of ministerial duty, contradistinguished from judicial power and authority: "the votes shall then be counted." What do we mean by the word "counted"? To count is to enumerate one by one. It is a narrower term than the word "canvass," which we find used in laws that regulate proceedings of this character, for to canvass implies the right to examine into; but the word "count" expresses the idea of a ministerial duty far more strongly than any other word in our language, or as strongly certainly as any other word.

I will add one other word with reference to this quo warranto proceeding. I feel confident that this Commission will determine that the whole proceeding is wholly null and void in so far as the duties of this Commission are concerned. But if that question is to be gone into, we propose to present to this Commission the record of the fact that an appeal has been regularly taken in that case and that it is now pending in the supreme court of the State of Florida; and whatever may have been the value or the force of the original judgment of the circuit court, it is vacated by that appeal; and I presume to say that this Commission will not undertake to decide a case that is now pending before the supreme court of Florida. I will not presume to anticipate what might be the result if this tribunal, entertaining jurisdiction of that case, should decide it one way, and the supreme court of Florida when they reach it in order should decide it the other way. Whether it would form a ground for that proceeding in quo warranto under which one of my learned friends proposes to contest or thinks he might contest the right of the President of the United States to hold his office, is a matter that I need not discuss.

I come to the objection that one of the electors of Florida was a shipping-commissioner at the time he cast his vote. I am advised that such is not the fact, and that if the Commission will go into an inquiry as to the facts, it will appear that the gentleman referred to had resigned his office at the time of the election. Of that I have no personal knowledge, but I have no doubt from the information I have received that such is the fact. But how does that question come before this tribunal? The objection states that it has been proven by some testimony taken before a committee. The act under which this tribunal is organized and acting prescribes what papers shall come before it:

When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forth with submitted to said commission.

Now, there are no papers accompanying any of the votes, or papers purporting to be votes, that relate at all to this matter of the alleged ineligibility of one of the electors. I apprehend that it is not competent under this act for any member of either House to make any objection he pleases and refer to any papers he pleases. He must base his objection upon the papers accompanying the votes or the certificates alleged to be votes. Upon this question I think that all we have said with regard to the finality of the action of State tribunals will apply, perhaps not with the same force as to the question whether we can inquire as to the individual votes of the citizens; but still the State authorities have certified that these parties are their electors; they present the evidence which the Constitution and the laws require; they have discharged the functions of that office; they have cast their votes; the State through them has voted; it is not the vote of the elector, it is the vote of the State that has been registered; and I hold that no inquiry can now be made even upon that question. The vote of a State when deposited in the hands of the President of the Senate, certified and evidenced as required by the legislature of that State, "shall," in the language of the Constitution, "be counted."

I desire, if the Commission please, to yield the residue of my time, which I think is some six or seven minutes, to my colleague, who has another suggestion to make.

Mr. Representative KASSON. I do not, Mr. President, desire the time, except a very brief portion of it, to answer after a little reflection the question put to me by the honorable Commissioner from Ohio, and I wish to say that I answer it according to my best judgment, submitting it very deferentially to the able counsel who are likely perhaps to consider the same question, for I understand it is presented by an objection, though not in any proper form appearing upon any of the certificates. I answer the question in accordance with the spirit of the division of powers of the different branches of Government. Congress, under its power to give effect by legislation to constitutional provisions, might probably provide by law for investigation of the question of personal and constitutional disqualification by judicial adjudication, because it is a judicial proceeding in its nature, not executive or legislative; but without such legislation, it is not, in my judgment, a question to be considered in counting, and the question cannot be tried as an incident of count by either an executive or legislative board.

I think I have enabled the Commissioner to understand the principle on which I consider the question as decided, that it is in its nature the determination of a judicial right, and cannot be taken up as an incident to a ministerial function of counting, nor is it within the narrow range of discretion associated with the phrase "ministerial count."

The PRESIDENT. For the information of the Commission I desire to inquire of the objectors to the first certificate whether they propose before the argument by counsel to offer evidence. I inquire of counsel for the information merely of the Commission, that we may know how to act in consultation, do you propose to offer evidence before proceeding to the argument?

Mr. Representative KASSON. While the other side are considering that question I desire to state the position of our side on another matter that was omitted. We regard as not within the act the concluding part of the objection to certificate No. 1, and I simply want to state that we waive no right to exclude that objection as not within the jurisdiction of the tribunal.

The PRESIDENT. I think the Commission prefer that the answer to my inquiry should come from the counsel rather than from the objectors.

Mr. Representative FIELD. It is our opinion, if the Commission please, that we should offer at some stage of the proceedings evidence, and we will do it if the Commission desire——

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Are you speaking now as an objector, Mr. Field?

Mr. Representative FIELD. I am speaking as an objector.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I submit, as one member of the Commission, that the objectors have exhausted their functions, and the rest of the case belongs to counsel.

Mr. Representative FIELD. I was simply answering the question put to me.

The PRESIDENT. In the first place I addressed it to the objectors, but I changed it and asked counsel whether they proposed to offer evidence before proceeding with the argument.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. O'Connor requests me to answer your honor that we expect to offer evidence, which is now here, before proceeding with the argument. We have been under the impression that the evidence was already before the Commission, without any necessity for a further offer on our part.

The PRESIDENT. That is sufficient, sir. What is the proposition of counsel on the other side?

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Before proceeding with that, I wish to say, as one of the Commissioners, that I do not understand that any evidence has yet been admitted in this case; and I suggest to the counsel who propose to offer evidence to-morrow morning, that they make a brief synopsis or a brief statement of what it is they propose to offer altogether, instead of offering it in detail and having objections raised to every particular piece of testimony. This is a mere suggestion from myself.

The PRESIDENT. Now we will hear the reply of the counsel on the other side.

Mr. EVARTS. We have no evidence to offer, unless there should be a determination to admit evidence inquiring into facts, and evidence should be produced against us which we should then need to meet.

The PRESIDENT. Should the Commission decide to receive evidence, you expect to have the privilege of offering it afterward?

Mr. EVARTS. We do. To apply it to this particular fact of Humphreys, whenever it is made to appear by evidence which is admitted by this Commission that Mr. Humphreys at any time held an office, we shall need to give evidence, perhaps, that he resigned it before the election.

The PRESIDENT. Of course no such question would arise if the Commission should decide that it was not admissible.

Mr. EVARTS. Undoubtedly; and we suppose we may say on this point that if there is to be an inquiry which adduces evidence, that evidence is to be proved according to the rules which make its production evidence—by the system of the common law.

The PRESIDENT. I did not put the inquiry by direction of the Commission. It was merely, as we are to have private consultation, that we might know what was expected on one side or the other.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I beg leave to make a suggestion. I suppose it is the inclination of counsel to aid the Commission and facilitate its labors as much as possible. There are a number of facts, I suppose, about which there is really no controversy; I mean as to the existence of the facts themselves. Whether proof of them is admissible in this proceeding is a question of law, and wholly different from the question of whether the facts exist or not. Now, if counsel would agree, as far as they can, in respect to those facts of which there can be no controversy, leaving the question of their admissibility as a question of law to the decision of the tribunal, it would very much tend to save our time, much more than to have proof of the facts offered piecemeal and objections argued pro and con. I should suppose that counsel would be inclined to aid our deliberations and facilitate our investigations by agreeing, as far as they possibly can, upon what are the facts of the case without at all prejudicing themselves upon the question whether they are legally applicable to this investigation.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move that the Commission adjourn until half past ten o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and three minutes p. m.) the Commission adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 3, 1877.

The Commission met at half past ten o'clock a. m. pursuant to adjournment, all the members being present. There were also present:

The journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT. I will state to the counsel at the bar that the proceedings under rule 4 are concluded. Proceedings will now take place under rule 3, two counsel on a side being allowed.

Doubtless some question will arise as to the best mode of proceeding. It occurs to the Chair, without speaking for the Commission, that a convenient and just mode may be that counsel representing the objectors to certificate No. 1 should make their offers of proof in a concise, well-arranged, classified form, and then that the counsel representing the objectors to the second certificate should make their offers of proof, based of course upon the condition that proof should be admitted, it being understood by the Chair that they probably may object to all proofs on the part of the counsel representing objections to certificate No. 1. They can therefore make their provisional offers of proof in case there shall be a decision that proofs are admissible. Then the Commission will have before it a case, and so will the bar. The case then would be, if that course should be adopted and pursued, the certificates with the accompanying papers, the objections, and the offers of proof, upon which the counsel on the one side and the other would be heard. Then the Commission would in a great degree have before it the whole case and all the questions that arise under it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, advised of the position which this controversy stood in and the stage of it at which we had arrived, by the question somewhat suddenly propounded last evening to us before the adjournment, I have endeavored in the interim to adjust a statement of what seemed to me to be desirable matter in the nature of evidence to be laid before this Commission—as distinct, and as succinct, and as brief, and as explanatory and intelligible a statement as, by the utmost efforts I could possibly make, having in view the act of Congress under which this Commission is acting, which seems to contemplate great promptitude, or at least a great effort at celerity upon the part of all concerned, so that the possibly numerous matters of investigation that may be presented may be gotten rid of within the limited time allowed by the circumstances, and the many observations that have fallen from the bench evincing on the part of the honorable Commissioners a strong desire to second this object on the part of Congress, and to accelerate as much as possible the proceedings.

I did not prepare that exactly in the form of an offer of evidence; but, although that be not its form, that is the substance of what I have written, which presently I will read, there not having been time even to make a fair copy of it, much less to have it printed.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. O'Connor, will you allow me to say a word?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President and gentlemen, if we are to assume that the intimations of the President are the order of the Commission as to the manner of the conduct of the trial, it is the first knowledge we have that that order will be the method of this trial.

The PRESIDENT. It is not the order of the Commission; it was a suggestion from the presiding officer.

Mr. EVARTS. No objection was made by any of your associates; and if Mr. O'Connor was to proceed I supposed it was upon that idea; and I do not question that fact; I only wish to say that if that is the order of this Commission as to the method of this trial, it is the first instruction which we as counsel have received that that would be the method, and we have not prepared and are not ready to proceed upon that method of trial so far as affirmative action on our part is to go.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I do not think it is understood, Mr. Evarts, certainly it is not by myself, that supposing you object to the proofs offered by Mr. O'Connor you are necessarily called upon at the same time to state what you expect to prove in reply if his proofs shall be received. That comes later.

Mr. EVARTS. That comes later, of reply to their proofs; but the President laid down a proposition that we were to propose——

The PRESIDENT. No proposition.

Mr. EVARTS. That is our first instruction that we should have that right or authority.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I think all we need do to-day, Mr. Evarts, is to hear any objections you may make to the proofs offered on the other side.

Mr. EVARTS. And we shall not be called upon to proceed further to-day?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. You will not be called upon to offer proofs on your own side, so far as I understand, because it may not be necessary.

Mr. O'CONNOR. With great respect, I hope the learned Commission is not committed to any of the propositions which have been casually mentioned either by counsel or by any one of its members.

The PRESIDENT. Or by the presiding officer.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Or by the presiding officer, who I understood rather hastily to rule—

The PRESIDENT. I have no authority to make any ruling until the Commission instruct me, and they have not instructed me.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I was not instructed, nor had I any earlier notice nor had any of us any earlier notice than the learned counsel upon the other side, of the probable course of things this morning, save what sort of instruction we might conceive we had in drawing our own inferences from the observations that fell from the Chair and from the learned Commissioners on both sides of the Chair yesterday. And my object in framing what I propose to read to the court—which I have not myself read a second time yet—was not to conform to any particular view that I have heard exactly from any quarter, but to place the Commission in possession of the general facts of the case in this brief and condensed form, so that the proper course of proceeding might go on and that proper course be adjudged of and determined in a fair view of the matter by the Commission.

The chief consideration which induced me to adopt this course was this: One of your rules indicates that something like a general argument upon this whole case and its merits was to be presented to this court by opposing counsel, each being allowed a period of two hours on the main question and, say, fifteen minutes to present their views on any incidental question that might arise. With these rules before me and the record proper, consisting of the certificates opened by the President of the Senate and the objections to them, and I may add as part of the record the statements made to this honorable Commission by the managers on both sides, I was led to believe that there would be something possibly quite incongruous and unprofitable, owing to the special condition of this proceeding, in such a course as takes place ordinarily in the subordinate courts before a jury, who are presumed to be entirely incapable of discriminating and apt to be led astray if they hear anything which is not to be taken into judgment in the final consideration of the case. It would be very inconvenient if such a course were to be taken here, because the issue as made by these papers to which I have referred—the certificates and the objections—the issue as made at least by the counsel in favor of the Hayes electors, as I will take the liberty of calling them, makes the question whether any evidence outside of that record shall be received the whole question in controversy. No other can arise except only some possible infirmity in the extrinsic evidence or some possible contradiction. I have supposed, from a careful though very recent view of this case, that there was neither any infirmity in any evidence which the supporters of the Tilden electors desire to present, nor any desire to offer evidence to contradict that evidence, so as to raise a question; and thus I am led to conclude that the admissibility of this so-called extrinsic evidence, its effect, and the final merits of the point which you have to decide on this trial between two sets of electors or two classes of certificates—that is, these three heads, fairly resolve themselves into one and the same question. Whenever a piece of evidence of this extrinsic character shall be offered, there will be literally nothing which the supporters of the Hayes electors can desire to say or desire to present to this Commission in any branch of this controversy that will not then be relevant.

Nor can I perceive that a decision interlocutory upon one of these incidental questions would not, if favorable to the exceptant or the objector, be conclusive as to the whole case; because that decision would almost to a certainty go upon an affirmation of the principal point, or the so-called merits on which the supporters of the Hayes electors rely. Consequently, in this debate of fifteen minutes about the admissibility of particular evidence, we should have to argue the whole case. There would be then a difficulty which from the flexibility of your honors' rules could be obviated by your giving additional time. But it has not appeared to me that that was the true course. On the contrary, with great respect to the better judgment of my learned opponents, if they shall differ with me, or to any honorable member of this Commission who may have taken a different view of it, my conception of the matter is, that all the needful evidence should come in subject to such questions as to its competency and its effect as may exist, for the reason that they necessarily incorporate themselves with the main question that you have finally to decide.

And I would just take leave to add here, before reading the paper which I mean to present, that such is the usual course of all tribunals where the matter of fact is judged of by judicial experts, such as your honors must all be deened; and the rule of snapping promptly an exception to some bit of possibly irrelevant testimony in order to prevent an ignorant jury being misled by some improper considerations growing out of it has no application to a proceeding before learned experts, learned judges. It is unusual, according to the practice of those courts in which the judges determine the fact as well as the law, to hear any argument in relation to the admission of a particular piece of evidence before the final hearing, unless it should chance to be found quite convenient to take some very simple and isolated point by a motion to suppress a particular deposition; as, for instance, if counsel had been examined whose deposition ought not be read, or something of that kind.

I have said that I conceive the true remedy would not be to enlarge the time under the fifteen-minute rule; but to pursue the other course, to take the evidence that may be offered subject to the exceptions, to be considered with the whole case, and for the reasons which I have already stated—

The PRESIDENT. Mr. O'Connor, I am obliged to ask you to submit your propositions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will submit them in one minute. I merely wish to state one single proposition: you would have to listen over and over again to the same precise, identical arguments in the final hearing as in this fifteen-minute hearing enlarged. Now if the—

Mr. EVARTS. Shall we be heard on this preliminary inquiry or await the submission of the proposition?

The PRESIDENT. I think you had better wait until you hear the proposition.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The learned counsel has said something to the court under his view of what was convenient to be said, and your honors have extended the privilege to me. That is all I consider that I am doing.

The PRESIDENT. We will hear your proposition first.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am not speaking to any order of the court, but making a suggestion which your honors have been pleased to permit. I will speak no longer than may be agreeable. I now proceed to read the paper on which I have written our propositions:

"First. On December 6, 1876, being the regular law day, both the Tilden and the Hayes electors respectively met and cast their votes, and transmitted the same to the seat of Government. Every form prescribed by the Constitution, or by any law bearing on the subject, was equally complied with by each of the rival electoral colleges, unless there be a difference between them in this: The certified lists provided for in section 136 of the Revised Statutes were, as to the Tilden electors, certified by the attorney-general; and were, as to the Hayes electors, certified by Mr. Stearns, then governor. All this appears of record, and no additional evidence is needed in respect to any part of it."

Perhaps I convey no new light by saying that, but it is for the sake of presenting as distinct matter the view we take.

"Secondly. A quo warranto was commenced against the Hayes electors in the proper court of Florida on the said 6th day of December, 1876, before they had cast their votes, which eventuated in a judgment against them on the 25th of January, 1877. It also determined that the Tilden electors were duly appointed. The validity and effect of this judgment is determinable by the record; and no extrinsic evidence seems to be desirable on either side, unless it be thought (1) that the Tilden electors should give some supplemental proof of the precise fact that the writ of quo warranto was served before the Hayes electors cast their votes, or (2) unless it be desired on the other side to show the entry and pendency of an appeal from the judgment in the quo warranto."

With these two possible and very slight exceptions the whole case on this branch of it depends upon the record.

"Thirdly. To show what is the common law of Florida and also the true construction of the Florida statutes, the Tilden electors desire to place before the Commission the record of a judgment in the supreme court of that State on a mandamus prosecuted on the relation of Mr. Drew, the present governor of that State, by force of which Mr. Stearns was ousted and Mr. Drew was admitted as governor. This judgment, together with the court's opinion, is matter of record, and they require no other proof; nor is there any technical rule as to the manner in which this Commission may inform itself concerning the law of Florida."

If I may be permitted to interject, it will be seen that I am endeavoring to show how very little there is in the shape of proof to delay this Commission in proceeding directly to an argument on the merits.

"Fourthly. The legislation of Florida subsequently to December 6, 1876, authorizing a new canvass of the electoral vote, and the fact of such new canvass, the casting anew of the electoral votes, and the due formal transmission thereof to the seat of Government, in perfect conformity to the Constitution and laws except that they were subsequent in point of time to December 6, 1876, are all matters of record and already regularly before the Commission.

"Fifthly. The only matters which the Tilden electors desire to lay before the Commission by evidence actually extrinsic will now be stated.

"I. The board of State canvassers, acting on certain erroneous views when making their canvass, by which the Hayes electors appeared to be chosen, rejected wholly the returns from the county of Manatee and parts of returns from each of the following counties, to wit: Hamilton, Jackson, and Monroe."

I trust I have omitted none, but I have had no consultation.

"In so doing the said State board acted without jurisdiction, as the circuit and supreme courts in Florida decided. It was by overruling and setting aside as not warranted by law these rejections, that the courts of Florida reached their respective conclusions that Mr. Drew was elected governor, that the Hayes electors were usurpers, and that the Tilden electors were duly chosen. No evidence that in any view could be called extrinsic is believed to be needful in order to establish the conclusions relied upon by the Tilden electors, except duly authenticated copies of the State canvass," [that is the erroneous canvass as we consider it,] "and of the returns from the above-named four counties, one wholly and others in part rejected by said State canvassers.

"II. Evidence that Mr. Humphreys, a Hayes elector, held office under the United States."

What is next stated may be deemed anticipatory and perhaps not proper to come from me.

"Sixthly. Judging from the objections taken by those supporting the Hayes electors and the opening argument offered in their behalf, the supporters of the Tilden electors are led to believe that no evidence is needed or intended to be offered by the supporters of the Hayes electors unless it be: first, that the above-mentioned appeal was taken, and, secondly, that Mr. Humphreys had resigned before the election."

If I may be permitted to say a word, the Commission will perceive that I have acted here with a view to support my idea that the facile method is to take these proofs subject to all question; that there is not enough of matter to produce delay or confusion or conflict in respect of those extrinsic proofs that could give rise to a judgment in discretion that the course proposed might be inconvenient. On the contrary, there is so little, and that is almost all matter that might be called of record, that we can give evidence very promptly and easily and beneficially as to time and as to results. We therefore trust that the Commission will not adopt such a method as will force us, on the first little scrap of testimony being offered, to present our whole case on both sides and have the whole merits decided on a mere preliminary exception.

I will cause this paper to be printed, and will deliver it up as quickly as it can be printed.

Mr. BLACK. If your honors please, I think the suggestions that have come from the Commissioners and what has been said by Mr. O'Connor, as well as what has fallen from the gentlemen on the other side, relate to the most important duty that you have to perform; and, therefore, I shall be pardoned, I trust, for making a remark or two at this moment.

The PRESIDENT. Do you desire to make further offers of proof?

Mr. BLACK. No, sir; I desire to suggest the course of proceeding which I think this tribunal is bound by its legal duties to take for the purpose of reaching the justice of this cause.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Black, I think we ought to give Mr. Evarts an opportunity to explain his views before we hear you.

Mr. EVARTS. I waive my privilege to precede.

Mr. BLACK. I am perfectly willing that he shall be heard.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Evarts waives his privilege. I have indicated to him that he would be heard.

Mr. EVARTS. I waive the privilege to precedence.

Mr. BLACK. If your honors please—

The PRESIDENT. It is not the moment for argument now.

Mr. BLACK. It is the moment for suggesting the course of proceeding and our rights with reference to the evidence which is to be given. I insist upon it that the evidence is in, and that we are not bound to make any offer at all.

The PRESIDENT. That, I think, is part of your argument after the cause is set down for argument, and not a preliminary statement.

Mr. BLACK. Then is it to be decided that this evidence is out or in now?

The PRESIDENT. Not by the presiding officer.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Let me suggest that Mr. O'Connor has made a proposition to submit certain evidence. If counsel on the other side have no objection to it, there is no occasion for further argument. If counsel on the other side submit to have that evidence come in, it will come in, and we can go on. I do not understand precisely what it was that Mr. Evarts waived.

Mr. EVARTS. I waived my privilege of preceding Judge Black.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. If you want to object to this proposition for evidence, now is the time to object, certainly.

Mr. EVARTS. That I understand, if the Commission please.

The PRESIDENT. I think Judge Black had better defer until we hear from Mr. Evarts; otherwise there may be misunderstanding. We will hear Mr. Evarts.

Mr. EVARTS. The question whether the certificates transmitted from the States, that fall within the warrant of such transmission by the Constitution and laws of the United States, constitute the material upon which the duty of counting the vote of the State is to proceed, or whether the authority vested by the Constitution with the power to count can seek or receive extrinsic evidence of any kind, in any form, to be added to the certificates in the hands of the President of the Senate under the Constitution, is no doubt a principal inquiry of law and of jurisdiction in this Commission, which, once settled upon principle and by your decision, will go to a certain extent in superseding or predetermining your action upon the merits.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Mr. Evarts, allow me to suggest that perhaps I do not understand Mr. O'Connor's position. I have not understood Mr. O'Connor as offering evidence at all. He has suggested what he supposes to be in evidence and suggested what he might offer; but there has been no offer made, so far as I have understood him. If there has been an offer made, your province, it seems to me, is simply to withhold objection or to object to the admission of the evidence so offered.

Mr. EVARTS. Am I to understand that my objection cannot be accompanied with any observation?

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. If you object we will hear argument. We cannot hear argument before anything is offered.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. I understand Mr. O'Connor to suggest that the extrinsic evidence mentioned by him be received provisionally for the purpose of the argument, and not to be decided upon by the Commission at present. If that is his position, then it is simply a question of convenience whether that would be the better course or whether we had better have an argument upon the question of the admissibility of evidence now alone, before going into an argument on the merits. As the argument on the admissibility of evidence would necessarily greatly involve the merits, it seems to me, unless counsel on the other side have forcible objections to that plan, Mr. O'Connor's suggestion is a good one, because it would then unify the argument, make one argument of the whole case; and the court upon the close of it would decide both questions: first, whether the evidence was admissible, and if it was, then as to its effect.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. President, suppose Mr. O'Connor's offer of testimony be objected to by the other side, and then the Commission hear the argument of the case as it then stands, resembling, more nearly than any other judicial proceeding that I think of, an argument made on a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, the evidence not being considered as in, but as offered?

The PRESIDENT. That was the view of the Chair.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Now if we should hear the counsel on both sides on the case presented by the certificates which are before the Commission, upon the offer of evidence made by Mr. O'Connor and objected to by the other side, it seems to me that that would present (I do not know what other questions may arise in the case) one principal question of the case in the most clear, convenient, and quick form.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of counsel who support certificate No. 1, what objection they have to all the evidence being received subject to all exceptions, not precluding any objection to it whatsoever? It appears from the statement of Mr. O'Connor that the testimony to be produced by him is in a very small compass. How great may be the volume of testimony, if any, produced on the other side, I do not know. But what objection is there, as this is a trial not by jury but by a court, to receiving all this testimony subject to all exceptions, and then arguing its admissibility with the main argument in the cause, allowing counsel, if it become necessary by the adoption of that course, more time than the third rule allows, such further time as may be necessary, in order to consider the question of the admissibility of the evidence as well as the main question? What objection is there to that? I should like Mr. Evarts to answer.

The PRESIDENT. In the absence of other discussion I will state the view of the Chair. I shall regard the paper read by Mr. O'Connor as an offer of proof. Nothing, therefore, remains to the other side except to object or waive objections.

Mr. EVARTS. Then I am not permitted to reply to Mr. Commissioner THURMAN?

The PRESIDENT. It is hardly necessary, because you are to have full argument as well as a brief explanation of the objection.

Mr. EVARTS. I rose to speak to the precise point—

The PRESIDENT. Do you object to the offer of proof?

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I suggest that Mr. Evarts ought to answer my inquiry.

Mr. EVARTS. I rose originally to speak to the very point to which Mr. Commissioner THURMAN has drawn my attention.

The PRESIDENT. Very well, sir; you may reply to that inquiry. I wished to get at the case as soon as may be. That was my purpose.

Mr. EVARTS. I will be as brief as I can, and certainly fall quite within the fifteen minutes. The proposition is that the preparation of the case as ready for argument upon its exhausted and completed merits on either alternative of the views of this Commission as to the exclusion or admission of evidence, shall be made up by provisional acceptance of the mass of proof, whatever it may be, to be discussed as to admissibility and pertinency and efficacy in the conclusions of the tribunal as a part of the final argument. That I understand to be the proposition.

The difficulty with that is it requires the inclusion of all the counter-vailing proof that we, opposing their certificate or supporting ours, have a right to present under some determination of this court as to that right; for if you go beyond the evidence furnished from the hands of the President of the Senate into an inspection and scrutiny of the election in the State as upon a trial of right to the office, then we say that the tribunal that accepts that task and is to fulfill that duty is to receive evidence that will make the scrutiny judicial and complete from the primary deposit of the votes to the conclusion of the election. Now this Commission, as I suppose, does not contemplate a provisional introduction of all that evidence, oral, documentary, record, and otherwise, on our part, which comes in without objection and subject only to the sifting of a final argument. That is my suggestion in reference to this intimation of convenience of a de bene esse introduction of evidence. The evidence by which under the instruction of this Commission that we have the right, we are let into a scrutiny of the election in Florida is a scrutiny which can only be exhausted by oral testimony and by the fundamental original transactions of the election. That is the difficulty in selecting a part of the evidence to be admitted provisionally as furnishing the ground and area of a final discussion, because it does not include the evidence upon both sides which under some post hac determination of the court on the final argument may be properly introduced.

I object to the evidence now offered.

Mr. BLACK. Am I in order to say a word or two in reply to Mr. Evarts?

The PRESIDENT. A brief explanation. I wish to get to the argument as soon as may be.

Mr. BLACK. We insist that the whole of the evidence, including that mentioned by Mr. O'Connor in this paper of his, has been given already, and is a part of the record. A question arose before the two Houses of Congress whether certain votes offered for President and Vice-President ought to be counted or not. Whether they ought or not depended upon the question whether they were votes or papers falsely fabricated. Not with any purpose of going behind the appointment of the electors, but for the purpose of ascertaining what electors had been appointed, who were the true agents of the State in casting its vote, the two Houses proposed to use their verifying power. Their purpose was not to entertain an appeal from the decision of the State, but to ascertain what that decision was. This involved a question of fact. It was absolutely necessary that the conscience of the two Houses should be informed concerning the truth of the case which they were to decide, and accordingly they took a perfectly legitimate and proper mode of ascertaining it. They sent their committees and had evidence taken. These committees collected the documents, put the whole thing into a proper form, and then came back and offered it to the two Houses, by whom it was received and made part of the record of this case. And when you were appointed as a substitute for them and became the keepers of their conscience, they required you to tell them what they ought to do and to make the decision which upon the evidence that was before them they ought to make. That evidence I say was put in, and the portion of it which was taken by committees of the House of Representatives was laid before that House after a fierce struggle and the filibustering of half a night to keep it out.

The President of the Senate, the president of the two bodies, handed this evidence, all of it, over in bulk to be used here by this Commission. You have seen it. I cannot conceive of anything more unjust or more wrong than to talk about the necessity of our producing this evidence piecemeal, here a little and there a little, line upon line, in order that it may be submitted to the scrutiny of counsel who will apply to it those snapperadoes of nisi prius practice which might do if this case, instead of concerning the rights of a whole nation, related to the price of a sheep. If your honors suppose that it is to be taken up de novo and that everything is to be done, then of course you are to proceed, how? According to some approved rule of fair play and natural justice. What is that? The rule that prevails in courts of chancery, and not the artificial rules that are provided for by the common law of England in cases of trial by jury. You know surely, I need not say, that when a party files his bill in chancery, he may put in along with it all the evidence that he has in his possession. There can be no objection to the evidence in a court of equity. There is no such thing known as objecting to the admissibility of evidence there. The defendant cannot object to it because he is not in court at the time the bill is filed. And when the defendant puts in his answer he may accompany it with all the evidence he has. If either of the parties needs any more, the court does exactly what the two Houses have done in this case. They appointed their own agents to take the evidence and report it. An examiner, a master in chancery, an auditor, or other assessor of the court who takes evidence for the court, is doing precisely the office for the court that these committees have done for the two Houses of Congress. There is no such thing when the evidence is taken, as objecting to it before it is made a part of the record. It is as a matter of course filed whenever it is offered by the party if he does it regularly upon a rule day. He need not even come into the court and get a special allocatur of the chancellor for it.

Now the rule about admitting and rejecting evidence, the rule of procedure for that purpose always throws the burden of proving that it ought to go out upon the party who does not like to have it in. The question of materiality or relevancy, what its value and weight are, as well as what probative force ought to be given to it by the court, is a question which, as one of the judges said a moment ago, is always to be discussed upon the hearing, and determined by the final decree of the court. Evidence may come from an improper source or it may come through an illegal channel. There it is the duty of the party who makes any objection to it to move for its suppression, but it is never in order for him to make objection to it when it is filed or when it comes before the court and is made a part of the record.

If your honors please, you cannot safely adopt an artificial rule of the common law which prevails in a trial by jury, and where evidence is offered piece by piece to the court, and is there sifted and scrutinized before it is allowed to go to the jury. That rule is made necessary by two considerations: First, that it is deemed most important to the interests of justice that the jury, so far as possible, should be kept in utter ignorance of everything that is not material, lest their judgments might be misled. The court looks at the evidence when it is offered, and refuses to let anything be heard which is not a necessary and proper element of a just verdict. This rule prevails nowhere, even in the common-law courts, except where the trial is before a jury. In all other cases, causes in chancery as well as in all equity and ecclesiastical cases, and in all admiralty cases, the doctrine is, that whenever the evidence is offered it becomes a part of the record by the fact that it is put on the record. I do not say that you are bound to believe whatever is here; I do not say that you are bound to give to it more force or weight than it is entitled to; not more force and weight perhaps than a judge at a court of nisi prius would give to evidence which he rejects; but you are to sift it and scrutinize it and to separate the chaff from the wheat upon the final hearing of the cause, and it is impossible for you to proceed otherwise without a very great amount of trouble, without an expenditure of more time than you have got to expend upon this subject.

For every reason, for purposes of justice as well as the purposes of convenience, it is necessary that you should pursue the course of courts of equity and not come the quarter-sessions rule over us.

The PRESIDENT. Judge Black, I must regard this as an interlocutory question. The third rule is that—

In the hearing of interlocutory questions but one counsel shall be heard on each side, and he not longer than fifteen minutes.

Your time has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Has already expired?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Mr. President, I move that counsel on each side be allowed two hours to discuss the question raised by Mr. Evarts's objection to testimony, as to whether any other testimony will be considered by this Commission than that which was laid before the two houses by the presiding officer of the Senate.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Mr. President, suppose then that the Commission should decide that further evidence should be considered, we should not have determined one thing as to what that further evidence should be. We should only have decided that evidence beyond the mere face of the papers presented by the President of the Senate to the two Houses should be received, but we should not have advanced one single step toward deciding what kind of evidence should be received. Here the two Houses have sent this inquiry to this Commission with all the powers that the two Houses acting separately or together possess, and obviously on that bare statement the question arises what powers have the Houses; what may the Houses, not by main force, but what may they constitutionally receive as testimony, and that question is for us to decide; for whatever they may constitutionally receive as testimony in deciding this question, it will be certainly admitted that we, having their powers, may receive. And that brings up the question suggested by the counsel who last spoke. I think, therefore, while I am perfectly willing that this question shall be argued, and indeed it ought to be argued, that the scope of the argument must go much further than that suggested by Mr. Justice Miller, and it must embrace the question of whether or not we are to take into consideration the testimony which has been taken by either of the Houses, and also the question what further testimony may be offered here. Therefore, I think the question to be submitted for argument ought not to be narrowed to the mere question of whether we can go beyond the face of the papers that were handed in and opened by the President of the Senate, for when we have decided that, if it be decided one way that we can go further, we have not advanced one single step toward deciding what we can receive, and we should have to have another argument.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. I have no objection to the argument taking the scope that the Senator suggests. My only object was to give ample time for the argument of this proposition, whatever it may be, which is of very great importance, as to whether any evidence shall be received, and what evidence. Let there be one argument to determine it.

The PRESIDENT. First I will state the motion as made. Judge Miller moves that counsel be allowed two hours on each side to discuss the question whether any evidence will be considered by the Commission that was not submitted by the President of the Senate to the Houses of Congress.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. I am willing to modify the motion in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I suggest that in the modification the Justice so enlarge it that we may hear from the counsel on the scope of our powers under the law. It seems to me that is as vital as the question of the mere rule of evidence that we shall adopt. I offer that suggestion to the Justice.

The PRESIDENT. I will state the question as soon as the motion is modified by the mover, and then it will be open to amendment.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I desire, if it be a proper time, to suggest a substitute for the motion of Judge Miller.

The PRESIDENT. As soon as the modified motion is presented to the Chair, you will have an opportunity. The motion as modified is as follows:

“That counsel be allowed two hours on each side to discuss the question whether any evidence will be considered by the Commission that was not submitted to the two Houses by the President of the Senate; and if so, what evidence can properly be considered, and also the question what is the evidence now before the Commission.”

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I will read what I had drawn up:

“That counsel be now heard for two hours on each side upon the effect of the matters laid before the two Houses by the President of the Senate and of the offer of testimony made by Mr. O’Conor and objected to by Mr. Evarts.”

The PRESIDENT. Do you offer that as a substitute?

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Yes, sir. The result of that will be that if the effect of these two matters were to require us to go into further evidence, we should say that. If the effect were a final and total decision of the whole case, we should also say that.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that it appears to me the proposition of Judge Miller, as modified at the suggestion of Judge Thurman, covers the whole ground. There are two points for consideration. The first is whether anybody, the Houses or this tribunal, has the power to go behind the formal certification of the State authorities. The second is, if so, by what species of evidence and inquiry below that may be sustained or affected. It is claimed by Judge Black that it may be sustained and affected by evidence in the nature of testimony taken by committees, &c., and reported to either of the Houses, and I suppose it is contended on the other side that it cannot be. Now I think that Judge Miller’s suggestion covers all these grounds, and I suggest to my learned friend that he had better withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. In view of the suggestions made by the honorable Senator, I will withdraw it. I do not think there is much difference practically between the two.

Mr. Commissioner FIELD. I renew the amendment.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Justice Field renews the amendment as a substitute. I must put the question first on the substitute. Are you ready for the question?

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. Please let it be stated again.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment offered as a substitute reads as follows:

That counsel be now heard for two hours on each side on the effect of the matters laid before the two Houses by the President of the Senate and of the offer of testimony made by Mr. O’Conor and objected to by Mr. Evarts.

The question is on adopting the substitute.

The question being put, it was determined in the negative.

The PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the original motion of Mr. Justice Miller, as modified.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. We must ask the instruction of the Commission as to whether there is also an allowance of the division of this labor between two counsel, if this is to be treated as interlocutory argument.

The PRESIDENT. Of course, the two hours can be divided between counsel.

Mr. EVARTS. Then you will allow us to suggest that the two hours that Mr. Justice Miller's proposition allowed for one discussion are now extended over what is undoubtedly very much additional in area and consideration—I speak of that in respect to time—so that if two hours were thought by the proposer of this first resolution, before it received Mr. Commissioner Thurman's modification, as a suitable time for the single question—

The PRESIDENT. A single word, Mr. Evarts. Notwithstanding the resolution is adopted, I think it is quite in order for you to ask for additional time.

Mr. EVARTS. So I understand. I do not think it requires any modification for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT. How much do you ask in addition? Another hour?

Mr. EVARTS. I think we should desire another hour on our side.

The PRESIDENT. The usual course in the Supreme Court is, if we allow it on one side to allow it to both.

Mr. EVARTS. Of course.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. What time would be agreeable to the gentlemen opposing the first certificate?

Mr. O'CONNOR. We shall be obliged to conform to the view of the court, as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT. Is one hour additional on a side enough? [A pause.] Shall an additional hour be allowed on each side? The Chair will submit that question to the Commission.

The question, being put, was decided affirmatively.

The PRESIDENT. The extension of time is allowed. The order of speaking will be that indicated yesterday, unless otherwise instructed by the Commission. One of the counsel supporting the objections to certificate No. 1 will open. Both the counsel supporting the objections to certificate No. 2 will follow. Then the other counsel supporting the objections to certificate No. 1 will close. The case is before you under the motion of Mr. Justice Miller already adopted by the Commission, and, if the counsel are ready, the Commission is ready to hear them.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As this view has been presented somewhat suddenly, we are a little embarrassed about the array, as to who shall proceed first.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. I have no doubt the court will take a recess of half an hour, if you desire it, before commencing.

The PRESIDENT. I think fifteen minutes should be sufficient.

Mr. EVARTS. On our part, if the Commission please, we will say that this introduces a very important and principal inquiry, no doubt, and under the previous intimations that these questions of an interlocutory nature might precede what would be called an argument on the substantive merits of the case, we should, if it is at all conformable to your sense of duty, prefer not to go on until a day is given us; but we of course submit that simply as our indication of what we regard our duty.

The PRESIDENT. Several members of the Commission suggest to me that we take a recess for half an hour.

Mr. EVARTS. Allow me to ask whether any hour has been fixed as the purpose or habit of the Commission at which to adjourn daily.

The PRESIDENT. Not regularly. I am still under the direction of the Commission.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Allow me to say, Mr. Evarts, that we set a precedent yesterday by refusing to the objectors themselves half a day for preparation. This Commission is of opinion that it cannot delay, but must go on with the hearing of the case. It is willing, however, to take a short recess now.

The PRESIDENT. It seems to be the view of the Commission that it will now take a recess until half past twelve o'clock. I now declare a recess till that time.

The Commission (at twelve o'clock noon) accordingly took a recess till half past twelve o'clock, at which time it re-assembled and was again called to order.

The PRESIDENT. The counsel will be allowed three hours on each side to discuss the question whether any evidence will be considered by the Commission that was not submitted to the two Houses by the President of the Senate, and, if so, what evidence can properly be considered; and also the question what is the evidence now before the Commission. Counsel representing the objectors to the first certificate will now be heard.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, it has been a subject of consideration among the counsel, and if it would be at all suitable to the views of the Commission that one counsel on each side should be heard to-day, and that we should have until Monday for the replies on each side, or for the further reply on our side and the final reply on the other, we should feel that we were able to present the matter in better form.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Mr. President, I move that that be the course to be pursued.

The PRESIDENT. Will that be agreeable to the other side, that one counsel on each side only be heard to-day?

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. What is the understanding as to the length of time that one counsel on each side will occupy?

The PRESIDENT. They have three hours on a side. What portion of it they will use to-day, I do not know; and two will have the right to reply afterward.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Mr. President, would not that allow the counsel who address the Commission to-day to address them for fifteen minutes each, and throw the whole bulk of the argument into Monday?

The PRESIDENT. They are to occupy half the time to-day—make a full opening.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. It is satisfactory, if that is understood.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Let it be understood that three hours shall be consumed in the argument to-day; otherwise there might be one hour or half an hour occupied to-day and the argument practically put off until Monday.

The PRESIDENT. The understanding of the Chair is that half the time is to be occupied to-day.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have understood from the beginning of this case, and it has repeatedly fallen from the Chair, that the two counsel assigned to speak might divide the time between themselves as they pleased.

The PRESIDENT. That is subject always to this condition, that there shall be a full opening.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I agree. If your honors please, I understand that it would be indecorous and unbecoming and unprofessional not to present a full opening in the commencing argument; but I do not perceive that it would be expedient to lay down any such distinctive rule as that the counsel speaking must speak an hour and a half.

The PRESIDENT. No; that is not it; but there must be a full opening.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is as fair for the other side as it is for us. I presume it is very possible that they might have an hour apiece, about as much as was necessary for the opening for the purposes of the argument; but I do not know anything about it.

Mr. EVARTS. We understand ourselves to be subject to that professional obligation, here as well as elsewhere, to make a proper division of the matter between the counsel; but beyond that we can hardly agree.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT. That is entirely satisfactory. The motion is that there be two arguments to-day, one on each side. [Putting the question.] The motion is carried.

Mr. BLACK. Is it understood that three counsel may speak, provided they do not take more time than is assigned to the two?

The PRESIDENT. There has been no request of that sort, and consequently no such understanding. Usually, in the Supreme Court, such an application is granted on the condition that they take no more time; but there has been no request of the kind offered.

Mr. EVARTS. We should concur, perhaps, in that wish.

Mr. BLACK. I ask the court, inasmuch as there is no other way under the heavens by which we can do what your honors seem to require, that is, make a full opening and give the gentlemen on the other side full notice of the grounds upon which we sustain our side of the case, to permit me to make some general remarks which it is desired by my colleagues that I should make, and then allow Mr. Merrick to go fully into the details of the case by way of opening; that is, let us splice the opening.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I hope I may be allowed to say, Mr. President, that your direction to proceed immediately in an argument which appears to us to involve essentially the whole merits, has rather confused our order of battle. We bow to it, however, most respectfully; but it somewhat embarrasses us; and it has not been thought that it would answer any useful purpose to make the counsel who is expected to deliver the reply to also deliver an opening. It would be clumsy and inconvenient in a great many respects; and we have had some difficulty in arranging so as to present a fair and proper argument covering the whole ground to-day, without consuming too much of our three hours. It appears to us that Judge Black and Mr. Merrick should be allowed to divide the time that we consider it proper to occupy to-day, if that is agreeable to the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. I will submit the question to the Commission on the condition that two counsel shall speak in the opening, and that only one is to reply.

Mr. EVARTS. We shall have the same privilege of division, I presume?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly. [To the Commission.] Shall three counsel be allowed to speak on each side if they desire, without enlarging the time? That is the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, the order passed by the honorable Commission this morning, as remarked by Mr. O'Connor, has somewhat changed our order of battle, and we are compelled, though but indifferently prepared, to enter upon the discussion of the grave and important questions which you have required us to argue. We came into court expecting to proceed regularly with the Florida case; and believing that the testimony taken by the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives upon this subject was regularly before the Commission as testimony in the case, without being liable to any objection on account of its formality, supposed that its effect and ultimate admissibility would be considered by the court when it came finally to determine the main questions involved in the cause. But that case is practically suspended for the present, and the counsel are required to argue an abstract proposition of law submitted by the Commission, involving an inquiry into the general powers of this Commission under the organic act, and as to what evidence is now before you, and what further evidence it may be competent for counsel to offer and introduce.

First, then, may it please your honors, as to the powers of the Commission.

The law of the United States under which this Commission has been established and organized, provides as follows in regard to electoral certificates from States which have sent up duplicate or triplicate certificates, and to any of which objections may be made at the time such certificates are opened in the presence of the two Houses:

When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers, so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said Commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing law be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

The language that I have read from the law embraces a succinct and clear declaration of the powers of this Commission, and is the only part, I believe, that has direct reference to the testimony which we regard as at present before the Commission. As to the formal regularity of the evidence that is already before you, I presume there can be no objection. A question was raised in each of the two Houses of Congress after the late presidential election, early in their session, as to what votes, if any, should be counted from the States of Florida, Louisiana, South Carolina, and Oregon. Upon that question committees were duly appointed under the authority of the respective Houses to take testimony. In reference to the case of Florida, the committees from the two Houses respectively proceeded to that State and took testimony in accordance with the uniform methods and custom adopted by committees representing Congress and discharging duties similar to those imposed upon these committees. That testimony having been so taken, was returned to the two Houses of Congress, and when objection was made to the counting of the votes from that State at the time the certificates were opened by the President of the Senate, in pursuance of the mandate of that portion of the law to which I have referred, the certificates from the State of Florida, being three in number, with the papers accompanying those certificates and the objections and the evidence that had been taken by the Committees of the House in reference to the regularity and the legality of the vote contained in these certificates, were all transmitted to this Commission. I respectfully submit that this evidence so transmitted is now before this Commission and properly in the cause. Wherever either House of Congress has assumed to exercise the power of instituting an inquiry into a disputed fact, it has uniformly appointed special committees or invested standing committees with authority to summon witnesses and take testimony in regard to that fact; and in this case each of the two Houses appointed its committee to take testimony upon the issue raised in reference to the electoral vote of Florida. That testimony was regularly returned to the two Houses, that were to act upon that vote under the Constitution of the United States, and such as was taken by the committee of the House has been transmitted by the Houses in joint session to this Commission, which possesses and is to exercise all the power of the two Houses, or either of them, in the premises.

I therefore presume, may it please your honors, that there can be no question in reference to the regularity of that testimony, whatever question may be raised in reference to its admissibility under the issues you are to try and in reference to its effect upon those issues. I speak now of the mass of testimony, generally, that was laid upon this table, and respectfully submit that it is now before the Commission, and, so far as I am advised, there is no other evidence, with the exception, possibly, of that relating to the particular hour of the day at which the writ of quo warranto was served upon the persons called the Hayes electors; and, with that exception, as stated in the paper read by Mr. O'Connor this morning, I believe there is no question upon which the counsel for the objectors propose to offer any extrinsic evidence whatever.

This evidence, which has thus been sent to the Commission by the two Houses, is of two separate and distinct characters. First, there is the evidence that was inclosed in the certificates returned from the State of Florida. There were, as I have stated, three certificates; the first certificate being that of the Hayes electors, accompanied by the certificate of the governor of Florida given to those electors. The second certificate was accompanied by the certificate of the attorney-general of Florida; and the third was accompanied by certain judicial records, which, under the express language of the organic act, were referred to this body for its consideration.

The other testimony to which I have already referred was extrinsic evidence, taken by the committee acting under the authority of, and in obedience to the mandate of, the House of Representatives.

And I may remark that when the House committee took this testimony there was full opportunity given to all parties interested in the result of the inquiry to summon whatever witnesses they might desire to have examined and to cross-examine all that were brought forward. The examination-in-chief was taken subject to the established rules of evidence, and cross-examination was permitted with the broadest latitude those rules allow. And if we were required to repeat the experience of that committee under the authority of this Commission and re-take that evidence, there would probably be no witness summoned who was not before the committee, possibly no question propounded that was not propounded by some of the members of that committee, and no cross-interrogatory propounded that was not propounded and the answer to which is not now before this honorable tribunal.

But as this Commission is invested with all the powers of Congress, under the law, the question recurs upon the materiality and admissibility of the evidence without regard to its form, and this brings me to the inquiry as to what are its powers. I owe your honors an apology for undertaking to argue so important a subject, for I did not come into court prepared to perform that duty, and in assuming to discharge it now I am submitting myself to that subordination which prevails in the profession and obey the orders of my senior counsel.

It was said in the opening statement made by the objectors upon the other side that this Commission possessed no other than simply a power to perform a ministerial duty; that it possessed no other than a power to enumerate the votes; that the certificate of the governor of the State was final and conclusive; and that there was no authority in this Commission, whatever might be the proof, to correct that certificate for mistake or vacate it for fraud. They told you that it imported absolute verity beyond the reach of any evidence, however strong and however conclusive, and beyond the reach of the power of the State itself either to correct, modify, or annul it; and, carrying out the position assumed by the objectors on the other side, it would follow that if, in reference to the certificate of Governor Stearns, Governor Stearns himself had, subsequent to the date of that certificate, come before the two Houses of Congress in sackcloth and ashes, begging on behalf of his State to have some error in that certificate corrected, it could not be done. If he had come with penitential sorrow, confessing himself to have been guilty of any fraud, however enormous—I am merely supposing a case—and made it patent that that certificate was the representative of a falsehood and a fraud, and not of truth, yet the certificate was beyond reach of the truth and that it was necessary to canonize its falsehood into a practical fact.

May it please your honors, in view of that position upon the other side, as well as in taking appropriate positions in the opening of this argument, it becomes necessary to look at that paper and see what it is, and whence it derives this extraordinary sanctity; infinitely holy, beyond any judicial record, and beyond any record that can be made between nations in their most solemn compacts. By the act of Congress, section 136 of the Revised Statutes, it is provided as follows:

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet.

There is nothing in this section declaring that the certificate to which it refers shall be conclusive evidence of anything. There is nothing in this section declaring in words as to what particular fact that certificate shall be directed. There is nothing in this section making it mandatory upon the governor to issue that certificate; and if there had been it would have been something transcending the powers of Congress under the Constitution to put there, for Congress could not reach the executive of a State by any enactment as to his official duty. It is not within the power of Congress to make it mandatory upon the governor to issue that certificate; and if it is not within the power of Congress to make it mandatory upon the executive of a State to issue that certificate, can it be possible that it is within the power of Congress to say that the certificate, if issued, should be conclusive, or that the certificate should be necessary evidence in the absence of which the electoral vote should not be counted? Congress could not have required the executive to issue the certificate, and could not have declared that the certificate should be the conclusive and only evidence of the election of the electors, because, in addition to what I have already submitted, the Constitution of the United States itself provides for the authentication of those electors, and that requirement is for an authentication from themselves; and if Congress superadds to that authentication an additional authentication which it makes a condition-precident to counting the vote, it would be an act in violation of that provision of the Constitution, as well as in contravention of the relations of the Federal to the State government. I do not question the power of Congress to require authentication, and to specify whatever manner of authentication it desires, in order to relieve any difficulty in determining who are the agents appointed by a State to cast its electoral vote; but the power that I deny to exist is the power to specify some authentication as an absolute condition-precident to counting the vote, and to declare that, in the absence of that authentication so required by Congress, the electoral vote shall not be counted at all.

Recurring to that section of the law in the Revised Statutes which I have read, I respectfully submit, as a proposition of law, that where certificates are required as matters of evidence, or where the law specifies evidence of any kind going to a particular fact with which the law so specifying the evidence is dealing, such evidence is never regarded in any court of law as conclusive beyond the power of rebuttal, unless the law specially provides that it shall be conclusive. Where the law says that such and such a paper or fact shall be evidence of a certain conclusion, that fact and that paper so specified as evidence of that conclusion are never beyond the power of rebuttal, unless the law has declared in specific terms that it shall be the only evidence and shall be unimpeachable.

I have referred to that clause of the Constitution which requires the electors to certify to their own appointment, and the manner in which they have executed their office; and I submit in this connection that it is not within the power of Congress to tie its hands so that it can never inquire into the truth of the due appointment of the electors and the true electoral vote. It is not within the power of Congress to estop the two Houses from ascertaining what is the true vote. The language of the article referred to requires the return of the vote by the electors, requires them to name in their ballots the persons voted for as President and Vice-President, to make distinct lists, to return the certificate of their vote to the President of the Senate, and then it proceeds as follows:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

The learned objectors upon the other side stated yesterday that the word "counted" was the controlling word in the sentence, and that giving that word its proper and only signification, the clause that I have read conferred no other power upon the two Houses of Congress than the power of enumeration. I respectfully submit that the controlling word in that sentence is "votes"—"the votes shall then be counted"—and that the word "votes" controls the word "counted;" and when you refer to the word "counted" you have to go back and see what it is that you are required to count. What is it, may it please your honors, that is to be counted? It is "the votes," and if those votes are cast by persons not duly appointed electors under the law of the State, they are not votes, and when you count them you count something the Constitution did not authorize you to count. Therefore, in executing your duties under this clause, you must, before you count, ascertain what are votes. Having ascertained what are votes, you count those votes, throwing aside whatever ballots you may find that are not votes. Under this article of the Constitution, and this particular clause of the article, I respectfully submit that there is in the two Houses of Congress a power to determine what are votes.

Then the question arises as to how far you shall go in taking testimony to determine what are votes; but as preliminary to that question I beg leave to add that if the Constitution has devolved upon the two Houses of Congress the duty of counting the votes, the true votes, and the necessary power of determining what are the true votes, Congress possesses no power to say what shall be conclusive and unimpeachable evidence of those votes; but, in the performance of their high function, the two Houses must ascertain what are the true votes, without any limitation placed upon them by Congress, and without being so restrained that they cannot go into the inquiry as to the truth. Congress may prescribe modes of authentication, but merely modes of authentication as aids and not as conclusive evidence or restraints upon the Houses in their action. We therefore submit that any legitimate evidence going to determine what are the true votes is proper and competent evidence before this tribunal.

And, may it please your honors, upon the question of whether you can go behind the certificate of the executive of the State, and whether the certificate is conclusive or not upon Congress, I beg to refer you to a high and most responsible authority, an authority that has the sanction of some of the most distinguished names that now adorn the passing history of the Republic. In 1873 the question came before Congress as to the counting of the Louisiana vote. The electors met; they voted; they sent up to the President of the Senate the certificate required by the twelfth article of amendments to the Constitution, stating for whom they had voted, and inclosed in that certificate so sent up the certificate of the recognized governor of Louisiana certifying to their due appointment; and all their proceedings were regular on their face from beginning to end. There was no objection made, and none intimated, to those proceedings, because of their non-conformity to the statutes of the United States. When that vote was opened, objection was made to it; but prior to the time when the vote was opened, it was understood that there was some difficulty in reference to that vote, of some kind or other. The Senate of the United States directed its Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire into the circumstances attending the election of the electors of that State. That committee entered upon the inquiry; it examined witnesses, and they were also cross-examined. All the facts that were needed and desired lying behind that certificate were gone into fully by that committee. Having gone into all those facts, they made their report to the Senate. In that report, made February 10, 1873, (which is to be found on page 1218 of the Congressional Globe, part 2, third session of the Forty-second Congress,) the chairman of the committee, one of the honorable Commissioners whom I have now the privilege of addressing, states as follows:

If Congress chooses to go behind the governor's certificate, and inquire who had been chosen as electors, it is not violating any principle of the right of the States to prescribe what shall be the evidence of the election of electors, but it is simply going behind the evidence as prescribed by an act of Congress; and, thus going behind the certificate of the governor, we find that the official returns of the election of electors, from the various parishes of Louisiana, had never been counted by anybody having authority to count them.

In the conclusion of the report Senator MORTON says:

Whether it is competent for the two Houses, under the twenty-second joint rule, (in regard to the constitutionality of which the committee here give no opinion,) to go behind the certificate of the governor of the State, to inquire whether the votes for electors have ever been counted by the legal returning-board created by the law of the State, or whether, in making such count, the board had before them the official returns, the committee offer no suggestions, but present only a statement of the facts as they understand them.

Now, in reference to the power of the joint rule of the two Houses, it is proper, before I proceed further, that I should make a single remark. That joint rule could give to the two Houses no power they did not possess under the Constitution. It could neither enlarge nor abridge their constitutional powers. It is beyond the authority of Congress or of any other tribunal to enlarge or abridge the powers with which the Constitution has vested that body. A joint rule might formulate that power; a joint rule might indicate the manner in which that power should be exercised; a joint rule might prescribe the methods of proceeding in the execution of that power; but it could neither give power nor diminish power. In this report the only objection made to the vote of Louisiana is that the returns for electors in that State had never been canvassed or counted. It was conceded that the certificate of the governor was regular, perfectly regular on its face; and the honorable chairman of the committee, after stating those facts, says that he declines to make any suggestion to Congress as to what disposition ought to be made of the vote.

May it please your honors, the evidence taken by that committee was before the two Houses of Congress when they met to count the vote four years ago. The intimation of the objection in the report was before those two Houses, and that intimation found shape and substance and form in a motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin, that the vote of Louisiana should not be counted. I am aware that that Senator, at the time, maintained that Louisiana was not a State bearing such relation to the Federal Union as authorized her to participate in the election of a Chief Magistrate, but in that position it is a well-known political and historical fact that few or none of the Senators sympathized. He made his motion, stating different grounds for the motion, but the only ground before the Senate, conceding that Louisiana was a State and could participate in that election, the only ground before the two Houses of Congress upon which her vote could be excluded by any possibility, or under the process of any sophistry or logic, was that, although the certificate of the governor to the election of the electors was regular in form, yet the return lying behind that certificate, and upon which that certificate purported to be founded, had never been canvassed. The question came up for determination in the Senate on the 12th day of February, 1873, (as will be seen by reference to page 1293 of the same volume,) and it was voted upon. Mr. Carpenter's resolution that the vote should not be counted was determined in the affirmative and the vote was not counted.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Have you there, and will you read, the resolution adopted by the Senate on that occasion?

Mr. MERRICK. The only one I have been able to find is Mr. Carpenter's resolution "that the vote should not be counted." He objected to the vote, stating various grounds, but the only resolution I have been able to find is a simple resolution that the vote of Louisiana should not be counted.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Without stating in terms the grounds on which it proceeded?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir; I indicated that.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I was only inquiring for information.

Mr. MERRICK. But I supplemented the indication by this further statement: that there was no ground before the Senate upon which the vote could have been excluded, as far as I can ascertain from the record, except that the vote for electors had not been canvassed. If there is any other ground stated in the report of the committee I have been unable to find it. Mr. Carpenter entertained a different opinion from nearly every Senator as to the peculiar relations of Louisiana to the Federal Union. He may have voted upon that ground; but I believe that no other Senator, or not more than one or two, shared his opinion. I believe his honor who made the inquiry of me voted in the affirmative on the resolution that the vote should not be counted.

Now, may it please your honors, I refer to this precedent as authority for two propositions: First, that the testimony taken by a committee of either of the Houses inquiring into the regularity and legality of an electoral vote is competent testimony to be considered when the question arises as to what disposition you shall make of that vote; secondly, that it is competent for Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, to go behind the certificate of the governor and throw out a vote, where the testimony proves that that certificate does not properly indicate the wishes of the people in the individuals that certificate designates as the agents of the State, and those facts being established, it is competent to discard the vote.

But, may it please your honors, in the case of the State of Florida we shall not ask for evidence going behind the certificate. This case presents itself to the court in a peculiar aspect. The evidence which we shall offer and which we claim to be admissible as to that State, is evidence furnished by the State herself as indicated in the proposition read by the distinguished gentleman with whom I have the honor to be associated, [Mr. O'Connor.]

Two propositions as to evidence, then, come before your honors.

First, whether the United States, through its Congress, or either or both Houses of Congress, can, in reference to an electoral vote, institute an original inquiry itself, and by a committee of either House take testimony going behind the certificate of the State, and invalidate that certificate on its own motion, when the State still adheres to the regularity of that certificate. That is one question, and a very important one; but there is another totally different from that.

Second, whether when the Houses of the Congress of the United States come to inquire into the electoral vote, and ascertain which vote shall be counted, it is competent for them to receive evidence furnished by the State herself in reference to the certificate her governor may have given.

Your honors perceive at once the wide difference in the two cases; and I respectfully submit in connection with this proposition, that if the power does not exist in the two Houses of Congress as a primary and original power separately to take testimony going behind the certificate, then it must exist in the State to correct its own certificate or impeach it for fraud or falsehood; else we may be irrevocably tied to an accident or mistake, and a presidential election may turn upon a certificate which is known to all the world to be an accident, a falsehood, or a fraud, which can neither be impeached by the State that gave it, because of fraud, accident, or mistake, nor interfered with in any way by the Federal Government to which it is addressed, but must become a substantial and perpetual truth in the presence of convincing evidence that it is an active and living lie.

In the case of the State of Florida, taking up the second proposition, the State herself, after the meeting of the electors, ascertaining that this certificate given by Governor Stearns, was given either in mistake or fraud, and founded upon an irregular and illegal canvass of the votes according to the laws of Florida, by her legislature passed a law directing another canvass to be made. But she did not pass that law, even, until she had appealed to her judicial tribunals to interpret the laws previously existing, and relating to the subject. Having appealed to those tribunals to interpret those laws, and in the mandamus case having received from her tribunal of last resort an opinion giving construction to those previously existing laws, by which opinion it became apparent that the returning-board had transcended its jurisdiction and made a return which was erroneous under the law, her legislature then, on the basis of that opinion, directed another canvass of the vote to be made in accordance with the judicial construction of the law. When that canvass was made and returned to the legislature, her legislature passed another act on the basis of that canvass, declaring that the parties to whom the certificate had been issued by Governor Stearns, had not been appointed, and designating the persons who had been chosen as the agents of the State to speak her voice in the electoral college. But she has gone further. A quo warranto was issued against these parties who assumed to exercise the electoral office under the certificate granted by Governor Stearns, and that quo warranto having come before her judicial tribunals, they, in the exercise of a jurisdiction given to them by the State laws of Florida, decided that the men who had received that certificate were not elected, but that other men were elected; and those other men so elected received a certificate from the governor of Florida, and, in the execution of the office to which they had been appointed by the people in the previous November, discharged their duties as electors and voted for President and Vice-President on the day designated by the law of the United States.

Now, then, may it please your honors, you have from that State this mass of evidence—evidence from her legislature, evidence from her executive, evidence from her judicial tribunals—that the electors to whose vote we object, were not the duly appointed electors of Florida; and, through all the departments of her government, Florida therefore comes to the United States Congress and begs that you (for you now exercise that power and it is vested in you) will protect her people from the enormity of having their voice simulated by parties never appointed to speak in her behalf. Is not that competent evidence to go before the Houses of Congress? If it is not, and if Congress itself cannot in the exercise of its original power go forward and inquire into the due election of these electors, then you have placed the whole Government and administration of the United States in the power of any executive who may issue his certificate to a party never voted for at all, while the unanimous vote of the State may have been in favor of another party. You may take the whole population of Florida, and although they may never have voted for A and B at all, and though the vote may have been unanimous in favor of other parties, if the governor chooses to issue his certificate to A and B, that certificate becomes binding upon Congress and may determine a presidential election. If this be the law, may it please your honors, then who will deliver us from the body of this death? It is beyond the power of Congress to grant relief; and relief is beyond the power of the State.

I find that I have consumed, may it please your honors, more than the time allotted me.

The PRESIDENT. Fifty minutes you have occupied.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, the time allowed for the opening of this argument on our side is nearly consumed. I do not presume to do more than merely supplement or enforce by a few general propositions Mr. Merrick's admirable statement of our case, which is as well calculated to impress the true nature of it on the minds of this court and to give a full notice to the gentlemen on the other side of what we intend to rely upon as anything that could possibly have been said. I am only "gilding refined gold" when I attempt to add anything to it.

You have before you the question whether this case is to be decided by you upon the evidence taken for the purpose of enabling the Senate and House of Representatives to do the duty which the Constitution cast upon them of counting the votes and of seeing that votes only were counted. For all the reasons that I gave this morning, and for many other reasons which I might add if I had time, I insist upon it that the evidence being once reported and filed in the cause is to be treated as a court of equity treats evidence in the same condition. You may throw it out; you are not required to give it, because you have admitted it, any particular amount of force or weight or value in your final judgment; but you are to look at it and determine the case upon all that is in it. And I can give you an assurance, founded upon some little experience, that a judge never decides upon any subject much the worse for knowing a little about it before he does decide. This notion of determining the whole case upon an offer to admit evidence is a thing that you have got to forget. It is impressed upon those who practice the common law very strongly by that peculiar and anomalous system which is adopted in the common-law courts upon jury-trials. It is not natural; it does not belong to any other kind of tribunal. If there be any evidence here which comes through illegal channels, or from any improper source, let the other side move to suppress it. But being in already, and therefore part of the case now, you cannot ask us to offer it over again.

I need not certainly produce Chitty's Pleading, Daniell's Chancery Practice, or Starkie on Evidence, or any of the rest of the books in which these rules are laid down. I need not show you what is the code of procedure in courts of admiralty and courts of equity; for I take it for granted that these are things on which I may speak as unto wise men. One of the gentlemen who spoke yesterday repeated what had been said by Judge Marshall, and which I am glad he did. We have heard it before, but it cannot be told too often, for it contains a very wholesome moral. The judge said to a counselor who was addressing him that a judge of the Supreme Court was presumed to know something. I hope that no decision which you make in this case will repel that presumption. Indeed, I think it will be extended and enlarged, and that the presumption after this will be not only that the judges of the Supreme Court know something, but that members of the Senate and House of Representatives also know something.

There has been much talk here about getting behind the action of the State. I do believe firmly in the sovereign power of the State to appoint any person elector that she pleases, if she does it in the manner prescribed by the legislature; and, after she has made the appointment in that manner, no man has a right to go behind her act and say that it was an appointment not fit to be made. A man, whether he be an officer of the State or an officer of the General Government, who undertakes to set aside such an appointment is guilty of a usurpation and his act is utterly void. Therefore, if the governor of the State of Florida, after this appointment of electors was made by the people, undertook to certify that they were not elected and to put somebody else in the place which belonged to them, his act was utterly void and false and fraudulent. We are not going behind the action of the State; we are going behind the fraudulent act of an officer of the State whose act had no validity in it whatever.

This is a question of evidence. Who are the electors? Two sets of persons come here, each of them pretending to be the agents of the State of Florida, for the purpose of performing that important function of the State, the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States. It is the business of the two Houses to count the votes. Now, remember the argument that Mr. Merrick made upon that Constitution; let it sink into your hearts, and do not forget it, because it is the God's truth. The word "votes" it is that controls the meaning of it. "The votes shall then be counted;" the votes, mind you; not the frauds nor the forgeries. But they on the other side tell us that if the President of the Senate lays before the two Houses when the votes are to be counted a false paper, a paper which was absolutely counterfeited, that is an end of it; you cannot produce any extrinsic evidence for the purpose of showing that it is a forgery or any evidence to show that it is not genuine. The doctrine goes that far if it is to be adopted at all. Carry that proposition to its logical consequences, and where does it take you? That you must simply receive whatever anybody chooses to fabricate and lay before Congress through the President of the Senate, and that neither the President of the Senate, nor either of the two Houses, nor both of them together, can do anything but just take what is given to them, without inquiring into its genuineness at all. I affirm, everybody affirms, and I hope to God that nobody here, even on the other side, will attempt to deny, that the Congress of the United States has the verifying power, the power that enables it to inquire whether this is a forgery or not; and, if you have the right to inquire whether it is counterfeit, you have a right to inquire whether it is or is not invalidated by the base fraud in which this thing was concocted. The work of the counterfeiter is as well entitled to be received for truth as this spawn of a criminal conspiracy got up to cheat the State and the Union, overturning and overthrowing the great principle that lies at the foundation of all our security.

Why, this doctrine that a thing which is false, willfully false, is utterly void and good for nothing, has been by this court (I mean by the Supreme Court) asserted a thousand times. Nay, I undertake to say that the contrary doctrine has never yet been set up by any judge or any lawyer whose authority is worth one straw. Suppose you have a case of a patent issued by the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the validity of which depends upon a confirmation by the court, and he falsely recites that the court delivered a judgment which the record shows it never did pronounce, and upon that basis puts the patent. Is the patent worth anything? Why is it worthless? Because it is based upon a fact which is untrue. "False" is "fraudulent" in all cases of this kind. When a man undertakes to say "I certify to this fact," and at the time he does it there glares upon him from the record that lies before him the evidence that the fact is the other way, is not that a fraudulent certificate? And if it be fraudulent, is it not as void in law and as corrupt in morals as if it were a simple counterfeit?

In this case we show that it was fraudulent. How? By producing the evidence which the governor was as well aware of as we are, which every man and woman and child in this whole nation knew or had reason to believe was true, namely, that the other set of electors had a decisive and clear majority of the votes that were received and counted at the polls. He knew it, because it was recorded in every county of his State; the votes were collected together and filed in the office of the secretary of state. That is one way in which we show the falsehood and the fraud; but we show it again by the evidence of an act of the legislature containing the solemn protest of the State against the cheat which her de facto governor attempted to palm off upon her and upon the nation. We prove it again by showing that the governor himself—not the same person but the same officer—rebuked this fraud, declaring that the other parties, and not those whose votes are now offered, were elected and chosen and authorized exclusively to cast the vote of the State.

Thus acted two departments of the State government of the State. But the State, determined not to be cheated out of her vote and determined that she would ascertain it in some undeniable form by a proceeding the correctness and truth of which could never be impeached, took these usurpers by the throat and dragged them into a court of justice, and there, in the presence of a competent tribunal, she impleaded them, charged them with the offense, brought the other parties who also claimed to be her agents for this purpose and set them face to face. The proofs were given upon both sides, and it ended in a solemn adjudication by that court of competent jurisdiction that the persons who claimed to cast these votes for Hayes and Wheeler had no right, nor authority, nor power whatever to do that thing.

Now look at this. Whenever a cause has been decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, the determination of that court, as a plea is a bar, as evidence is conclusive of every fact and every matter of law which was or could have been adjudged there, and neither law nor fact there determined shall ever afterward collaterally or directly be drawn into controversy again. Is not that the rule? It was so laid down in the Duchess of Kingston's case, which has been followed in every court in Christendom from that day to this. There is not in England or America one judge or one lawyer who has undertaken to assert that the law is otherwise stated nor has it ever been attempted to be clothed in any other words than the clear and felicitous language used by Chief-Justice De Grey in that case.

This doctrine has been applied over and over again to election-returns, as well as to all other things. It would be perfectly absurd to say that, when the title to a horse is in question before a justice of the peace, the doctrine that makes the title void may be applied so as to save the horse to the honest owner of it, and should not be applied to a case in which the rights of a whole nation are involved.

False returns have been made many times; false counts have been made at the polls; election-officers have altered the count afterward. No man that I know of has ever said that an election fraud ought to be held to be successful merely because it was put into the forms of law; never before this time, except on two occasions. In New Jersey the governor of that State stamped the broad seal upon a commission as members of Congress for five gentlemen whom he knew not to be elected. Congress said that certificate was void. Then the House of Representatives did precisely what we ask the two Houses of Congress and you, their substitute, to do in this case. It was contended then, as now, that the certificate of the governor was conclusive evidence of the right of the commissioned men to take their seats in the first place and participate in the organization of the House. Do not let it be said that this arose out of the right of a legislative body to pass on the qualifications of its own members. They had no right to pass on the qualifications of their own members until they were organized. The right of those men to hold their seats until the time when their seats were declared vacant upon a petition of their adversaries to unseat them was as conclusive as anything can be, supposing it to be honest. But it was not honest, and that made it all void.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Were those persons who held the certificate of the governor of New Jersey admitted to their seats at all?

Mr. BLACK. They were not.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Not allowed to take seats and participate in the organization?

Mr. BLACK. Not allowed to take seats at all.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. I understood you to say that they were.

Mr. BLACK. I do not know but that your honor was in Congress at that time.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. No, sir.

Mr. BLACK. I supposed you were. That was in 1839. You were not in Congress then. There was a very great struggle over it and it lasted for four or five weeks, one set of men pressing the fraud with as much vigor as any of our friends can press this one, and it being resisted at the same time with perhaps more firmness than we are resisting now.

There is another case, however, that one of the judges upon this bench will recollect more distinctly. I do not say that there was any judicial or legislative determination of that question which makes it authority in this case, but it is an illustration of the condition in which we are to be thrown if a mere fraud, a counterfeit, is to be accepted as sufficient to carry everything before it.

In 1838 Mr. Porter was elected governor of Pennsylvania by a majority of about fourteen thousand. It was thought desirable that the election should be set aside and treated as though it had not been held, and in order to do that, it was necessary that his opponents should have possession not only of the senate and executive, which they had already, but of the other house of the legislature, the lower house; and in order to effectuate that, they just simply manufactured, fabricated impudently and boldly, a fraudulent and false return of eleven members from the county of Philadelphia. The law was that the returns were to be made to the secretary of the commonwealth and he was to make out from those returns a list of the persons who were entitled to be members of the house. They said that certificate was conclusive evidence, and it was conclusive evidence if the fourth section of the act of Congress in this case makes the governor's certificate conclusive of the electors' election, because it is very nearly in the same language. You know what came of it—the Buckshot war. They intended to carry that out at the expense of covering the whole commonwealth with blood and ashes, and would have done it only they could not get General Patterson and his men to fire on the people who were there assembled.

Until now, except in those two cases, nobody in this country has ever had the portentous impudence to offer a fraudulent vote and insist that the fraud could not be inquired into because forsooth it came wrapped in the forms of law.

I believe my time is out, and I am not going to trespass upon your honors any further.

Mr. MERRICK. May it please the Commission, I desire to file a brief prepared by Hon. Ashbel Green, of New Jersey, associated with us in the case, which is a clear, full, and able discussion of the question now before the Commission and which brief counsel have unanimously adopted.

The PRESIDENT. It will be received and filed.*

Mr. BLACK. There is one thing which I omitted to mention and which it is necessary to call the attention of the court to; and that is the evidence which we have produced here to show that one of the Hayes electors was ineligible on account of his being an officer of the Federal Government on the day the election took place. I suppose that makes a clear case as against him.

Mr. EVARTS. Judge Black, will you allow me to ask a single question? A certain mass of evidence not otherwise described than generally in argument, and which we have never seen and inspected, is argued to be already in, upon some chancery notion that it has been attached to something that has brought it in. What is it contended that it is attached to?

Mr. BLACK. O, it is in the record, a part of the record in this case made up by the House of Representatives before the case was sent over here.

Mr. EVARTS. What is it attached to?

Mr. BLACK. "Attached to." Do you mean to ask me the book-binder's question, whether it is stiched?

Mr. EVARTS. No. What is it? A bill in chancery?

Mr. MERRICK. It was attached to the objection made when the vote was offered in the House, and is recited in the objection as being the basis upon which the objection rests.

Mr. EVARTS. The question is answered.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. Evarts will find it on page 3 of the objection signed by Charles W. Jones and others. It comes in in support of the objection and is referred to as evidence to support it.

The PRESIDENT. The side that has been opened has spoken one hour and twenty minutes. We will now hear the other side.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, unused as I am to appearing before tribunals so unprecedented and august as this, and equally unused to handling such high themes as form the subject of the jurisdiction of this Commission, I rise with the most unaffected diffidence to undertake the discharge of that duty which has been assigned to me by my learned associates; and while I hope that I may say something which will assist the Commission in solving the questions which are submitted for argument, I shall be only too happy if, after I take my seat, I shall be able to recollect that I have said nothing which may injure the cause I represent.

I take the earliest opportunity to correct a serious misapprehension on the part of the learned gentlemen who have argued as counsel in the opening of this question, in respect to the position which they seem to assume has been already taken upon our side. I refer to the conclusive effect that they suppose we attribute to the certificate of the governor of a State accompanying a list of those whom he certifies as having been duly appointed electors for that State. I am authorized to say, by the gentlemen who are objectors to the second and third certificates, that that statement is an incorrect representation of their position, and I respectfully submit that when I have stated ours the gentlemen on the other side will understand our case differently.

I think I may also take this immediate opportunity of relieving the apprehensions of my very learned friend [Judge Black] who spoke last and has spoken so often, in respect to the possible effect of excluding the consideration of what he has been pleased to call exhibits or evidence, upon the judgment of this tribunal. It is, Mr. President and gentlemen, the fortunate feature of your legal constitution that you can make no mistakes. It was a quaint saying, I believe, of Selden, in an essay on papal councils, where he was treating of the doctrine that they were enlightened by the presence of the Holy Ghost, that he had generally found that the Spirit dwelt in the odd man. So, in the exercise of the constitutional function, whatever that may be, devolved upon Congress in its participation in the count of the electoral votes, effectual provision has been made against the defeat of the transaction by referring it to a tribunal that cannot be equally divided.

And now, Mr. President and gentlemen, allow me to state in very general terms, and yet as precisely as I have been able to accomplish it, the various propositions by which and through which we lead ourselves, and hope to lead you, to the conclusion for which we contend in respect to the point to which you, as the representatives of congressional jurisdiction, may go in this inquiry, and that point where you must stop.

What is the transaction that is the subject of the general investigation? It is stated, in its final result, as the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States. In what does that consist? It is not a single act; it is a series of acts. The election of those two high officers is not a popular election, according to the spirit of the Constitution, the meaning of its framers, the interpretation of the generation which adopted it, or the practice under it. There is a selected body of men in each State who compose the constituent body which is to make that election; and I need not remind the tribunal that they have a right to make a selection as well as an election; and it is altogether a mistake, in my judgment, to consider this electoral body as delegates representing a State or the people of a State, as agents accomplishing their will. They not only have power in the sense of might, but they have power in the sense of right, to vote, on the day named, for the persons who, in their judgment, ought to be, all things considered, the chief executive officers of the nation.

Each State under the Constitution has the right to prescribe the mode in which these electors shall be appointed. No one else has any right or authority in that business. They may elect by the general assembly or legislature; they may appoint by the governor, or any other officer whom they may choose to designate; they may cause that appointment to be based on the result of a popular election; and that, in the case of Florida and now in all the States, except the new State of Colorado, is, I believe, the universal practice; so that the appointment of electors in a State is based on a popular election.

Now, what is that election? That also consists not of one act, but of a series of acts, beginning with the deposit in the ballot-box, if it be by ballot, as we may assume it to have been, in each locality prescribed by law, called a parish, or a precinct, or a township, or a school-district, or whatever small division of territory may be adopted. The voter deposits his written or printed ballot into the hands of one, or two, or three judges of election, who inscribe his name in a list of voters, and put his ballot into the box, and then at the conclusion of the election make a return of the result, showing how it has been attained. That is carried from the primary voting-places to the county-seat, and there county officers compile these various returns, acting with more or less powers according to the statutes of the State from which they derive their appointment; and the result of that choice in that county as it appears to them, based on the returns which they have received from the primary officers, is reported by them again to a third and highest and last returning-officer or canvassing-board, who, receiving these returns from all the counties in the State, exercise the powers conferred upon them by law and make that which in my judgment is the completion and the consummation of this appointment. That board sitting upon these returns make their final return of the fact, as it appears to them, sitting under their responsibility as public officers and in the exercise and discharge of public functions and public duties; and having accomplished their task, they deposit the record of their finding and declaration in the public archives of the State, and there they remain in perpetual memorial of the fact which they have found.

Up to that point the State alone acts in the appointment. That last act completes the appointment, and that appointment completed and finished is unchangeable except by State authority exerted upon that act within an interval of time; and what is that? Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, has had reserved to it control in certain particulars over this appointment; that is to say, it may designate the day on which the appointment shall be made, and it shall designate the day on which the electors so appointed shall deposit their ballots for President and Vice-President. In that interval I do not know and I do not care to discuss, I will neither deny nor affirm, but I am willing to admit, any and everything that may be claimed on the other side as to the existence of State authority to inquire into and affect that record. But when the day has passed when in pursuance of the authority of law conferred by that appointment under the statutes of the State, on the day named by Congress, the body which has, according to the forms of law, been invested with the apparent title to act as the constituents of that great electoral body, and when they are required by Constitution and law to accomplish the act for which and for which alone they have been brought into being, then that transaction, so far as State authority is concerned, has passed beyond the limit of its control. It then becomes a Federal act. It then becomes one of those things which pass into the jurisdiction, whatever that may be, of Federal power. It is the deposit of the vote of the elector in the ballot-box of the United States, and the nation takes charge of its ballot-box. Whatever power, then, may be exerted after that must be exerted under that power which is conferred by the Constitution upon any constitutional national authority which is invested with authority over the subject. These electoral votes so given are to be sealed and transmitted to the seat of Government, delivered into the custody of the President of the Senate, the Vice-President of the United States, who is ex officio President of the Senate, by him kept unopened until the day named when he is to open the certificates, and then the votes shall be counted.

What, then, are we engaged in doing? What, then, is this Commission organized to effect? It is to assist in that business which under the Constitution is called counting the electoral vote. This is all the power that Congress has on that subject. It makes no difference who is to do it. The debate up to the passage of this act was whether the President of the Senate should do it or whether the two houses of Congress should participate with him in it; and a variety of opinions from the year 1800 up to now has been entertained and expressed by distinguished statesmen on both sides as to where the power was lodged. But it is immaterial now. The question is not who does it, but what is it that is to be done.

It was said by the objectors on our side—I think it cannot be controverted—that counting in its primary meaning is merely enumeration, and is limited to that, in all cases where the subjects of the count are definitely ascertained. To be sure, it is an important question as put by the learned counsel on the other side, what is to be counted? There is no dispute on that. It is the electoral votes; and the cases which are referred to this tribunal are those of two sets of votes, and the power, therefore, is implied to distinguish between these several sets of votes and ascertain which is the vote lawfully to be counted.

What is the nature and extent of that implied power, incident to this right to separate the lawful from the unlawful electoral votes? for upon the question of the limit of the inquiry which this body is authorized to make under the act which organizes it, depends the solution of the question as to what evidence it may look to for the purpose of determining the fact which is the subject of its inquiry. I think it involves undoubtedly the exercise of certain discretion and judgment. It may involve the decision of some questions of fact not determinable merely by inspection of the paper purporting to contain the vote or to constitute the vote; as, for example, the very case put by one of the learned gentlemen on the other side, its genuineness or whether it be a forgery; whether, if it be proven by a seal, the seal be the genuine seal. It may also involve the decision of some question of law, as for example whether the paper offered is one known to the law or made in conformity with the law.

But this power, however described, whether as ministerial, administrative, political, or otherwise, must be carefully distinguished from that judicial power which is exerted by judicial courts under the jurisdiction to try the title to an office by the prerogative writ of quo warranto. In the exercise of that jurisdiction, the court, armed with its proper forms and the machinery of trial by jury and for the enforcement of evidence, goes to the very truth and right of the matter without regard to the paper title. It ascertains by a scrutiny and the testimony of witnesses who in fact received the legal number of legal votes to vest him with actual title to the office. Is it proposed here to do that? Why, if your honors please, what length of time would be required to investigate by recounting and recanvassing the popular vote that lies at the foundation of the electoral vote in every State in the Union, or even in those which are the subjects of dispute in this count? And if you cannot go down to the bottom, if you cannot in probing and searching for frauds and errors and mistakes go through the long and black catalogue of crime, why stop at the first in order to take advantage of all the rest? If this work is the work of this tribunal, then it is to be made thorough and searching; certainly there is not any principle of law or good morals which, if the door be opened to that inquiry, requires you to stop before you have got through.

I think it is plain that this Commission is not engaged in the exercise of that jurisdiction. It is not invested with any portion of that judicial power which is conferred or constituted by the Constitution of the United States; and Congress, not possessing it itself, could not confer it upon such a body as this, which is created for the mere purpose of assisting in the count of the votes, because it is not such a court as Congress is authorized to create for the purpose of receiving a grant of the judicial power of the Constitution. I do not doubt that the jurisdiction to try the title to the office of President and Vice-President, being judicial and properly exercised under the power to issue writs of quo warranto, may be vested by law in the Federal courts, as a case at common law arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States; but until vested it remains dormant. Whether in point of fact such legislation exists, either by a direct act of Congress or indirectly by the adoption of the Maryland statutes in the District of Columbia, is a question upon which I am not advised; but the fact that such a jurisdiction either has been or may be evoked out of the Constitution is an unanswerable reply to the doctrine that Congress, or this tribunal sitting in its stead, has a right to make judicial inquiry as in quo warranto into the title of any office. I claim, provided there be no actual legislation such as I have spoken of by Congress in respect to quo warranto in regard to President and Vice-President, that there is no law, either State or Federal, in reference to the office and function of an elector; I maintain that there is no law, either State or Federal, whereby that title can be judicially investigated and determined after he has cast his vote.

I maintain that no State can exercise such jurisdiction after that event, because although by the terms of the Constitution of the United States each State by its legislature may determine the mode of the appointment and in fact make the appointment of its electors, yet the function of voting for President and Vice-President is exercised under the authority of the Constitution of the United States; and if it were possible that such jurisdiction existed in State tribunals under the authority of State laws, it would be an easy matter in the great strife and struggle of political parties in the various States that constitute the Union, after the election to interpose by judicial process such delays in respect to the quieting of the title of the parties having the regular and formal appearance of election as to defeat by an injunction as well as a quo warranto the right to cast the vote at the time when by the Constitution and laws of the United States it is necessary that it should be cast. And so it would be in the power of party and faction at any time, when beaten at the polls by the popular vote, to resort to these extraordinary writs under State authority and defeat their adversaries by the interminable delays of litigation.

It was the policy of our fathers, it is the policy of the Constitution, to provide a machinery which, let it work as it will, must nevertheless by the 4th day of March after the election necessarily work out the result of having some President and some Vice-President. It was of far more consequence, and was so esteemed by the framers of the Constitution, as it will be by every lover of law and order, that we should have some constituted authority, far more important than the line of continuous authority should be preserved, than that either A or B should hold the place and receive the power and the emoluments of the office.

I say, therefore, that although I admit that the State may provide as it pleases any mode by which the appointment may be made, and by which the fact of appointment may be verified, so as to furnish such machinery and mode of proof as it may choose to verify its own appointment, yet, nevertheless, it must take effect, if it have any power whatever, prior to the time when, by the Constitution of the United States, those who have the indicia of office and the color of office are called upon, as the appointed electors of a particular State, to discharge the constitutional duty of depositing their vote for President and Vice-President; so that when the person appointed, or who appears to have been appointed, having in his possession formal evidence of his appointment, in fact exercises the authority conferred upon him under the Constitution of the United States, actually discharges the duty of casting the vote which it is his business to deliver, the transaction to which he has been a party has passed beyond the control of State power and authority.

Then, Mr. President, if I be right, the actual question before this Commission is not which set of electors in Florida received a majority of popular votes; it is not which set appears from the return of the votes made at the primary voting-places to have had a majority of votes so returned; it is not which set, by looking at the county-returns, appears to have had a majority of the votes so compiled; but it is this: Which set, by the actual declaration of the final authority of the State charged with that duty, has become entitled to and clothed by the forms of law with actual incumbency and possession of the office. That body of electors which, with an apparent right and a paper title, and in possession of the function, franchise, or office, actually exercises it, is for the purposes of this tribunal the lawful body whose votes must be counted. It is not necessarily the body which upon subsequent proceedings may be ascertained to have had de jure title; but it is that body which, by color of office, having the formal external proofs of authority, was in point of fact inducted into possession of the power to cast that vote, and who did it; in other words, who, under the law of Florida, were on the 6th day of December, 1876, de facto electors for that State.

The gentlemen say there were two sets. Why, Mr. President and gentlemen, it is as absurd to say that there are or can be two sets of de facto officers in the same office as it is to say that there or can be two sets of de jure officers. It is as absurd in law as it would be in physics to say that two bodies can occupy the same space in the same moment of time. The man who is in the office, who has possession of it, who has been inducted into it, who exercises its authority, who does the thing which that office authorizes whomsoever is in it to do, is the man for whom we are inquiring, for he is the man that votes. Nobody else votes. Everybody else is a mere volunteer, unorganized, illegal, without authority, no matter although his ultimate and final right be better than that of the man who has intruded.

There is no safety and there is no sense—I speak it with great respect to this tribunal and to the gentlemen who differ with me; I am bound to say it—there is neither safety nor sense in any other doctrine. You may talk as eloquently as may be on questions of fraud. It is said, “Fraud vitiates everything.” No, it does not. It makes things voidable, but it does not vitiate everything. If my friend, [Mr. Black,] by the arts and stratagems of other people, (which I know his guileless soul does not possess,) should hoodwink me by fraudulent misrepresentation into voting for his candidate—if that be a possible supposition—I cannot retract my ballot, nor can the scrutiny set aside the result, because fraud upon private persons is sometimes insignificant when compared with public interests. Frauds by trustees or persons in fiduciary capacities do not make void their fraudulent transactions. They may be avoided, but only by judicial process, and the defense of laches is always a sufficient answer; and lapse of time may be an element in a matter of such transcendent public interest as this, that no man, after the time had elapsed, can be heard to allege it.

And, Mr. President, the only alternative, as I think I have already once said, is, upon the doctrine of our learned friends on the other side, that if the inquiry is opened, it must be opened to all intents and purposes; it must be opened for all inquiries and investigations; it must be opened for all possible proofs. It will not do to stop at the first stage in the descent; but you must go clean to the bottom. And, although it be not pertinent to a forensic discussion, perhaps the example set to me by the learned gentlemen on the other side will warrant the expression, on my part, of my personal confidence that if that true result, setting aside all the forms and the fictions of the law, could be ascertained, there would be no question here as to who ought to be entitled to have counted in his favor the vote of Florida.

Mr. President and gentlemen, an argument has been made upon the effect of the act of Congress of 1792, which provides for the certification by the governor of a State of those who have been duly appointed electors in that State. I have already corrected the misapprehension of the learned gentlemen on the other side that we regard that as so conclusive as that inquiry might not be made into its falsity, whether a forgery or genuine; but, nevertheless, it is evidence; it is evidence provided by existing law; it is the evidence which Congress, of which you are the advisers and constituent parts in this matter, has made and declared to be regular, ordinary, usual, formal evidence of the facts which it contains, and if it be not conclusive, yet it is sufficient.

I admit that the mere certifying act is not conclusive. It may be dispensed with. Congress, who provided it, furnished it, made it a part of the transaction, may disregard it. They need not tie themselves hand and foot; they need not estop themselves; but they have directed this Commission to receive only that which is competent and pertinent by existing law, and the existing law makes the governor's certificate pertinent and competent and sufficient.

But, Mr. President and gentlemen, if you go behind the certificate what are you limited to by the necessity of the thing? In my judgment, you are limited to this: to an inquiry into what are the facts to which he should have certified and did not; not what are or may be the ultimate and final facts and right of the case. The facts to be certified by the governor in this or in any case are the public facts which by law remain and constitute a part of the record in the public offices and archives of the State, and of which, being governor for the time being, he has official knowledge. So, then, the case stands, that on the day and at the time when, if ever, the title and right to the possession and incumbency of this function became complete, Governor Stearns was the lawful governor of Florida, and the fact to be certified was just what appeared at that time in his office or in the office of the secretary of state, to wit, that by the judgment and finding of the final authority of the State canvassing that election the gentlemen whom he certified to be electors had, in fact and according to law, been appointed.

How shall I treat the pretense that a subsequent governor coming in at an after-time, or that a court, acting upon the status of the parties subsequently when it rendered its judgment—if it rendered any at all—could, by relation, change the de facto situation, or the pretense, more groundless still, that an act of legislation could unsettle and otherwise determine that which had already passed beyond the control of mortal power? For, Mr. President and gentlemen, I believe it is a saying of one of the sages of the common law that though Parliament be omnipotent, it cannot alter a fact, and facts are rights. All our rights are founded on facts. All the theory and practice of our law and of judicial tribunals and all that system of government and society under which we live, depend not upon abstractions, however beautifully they may be defined, but upon the facts of human nature and of human life. Stare decisis! where does that come from? You perpetuate an error because if you do not, you will commit a wrong.

Will the President inform me how much time I have consumed?

The PRESIDENT. You have spoken forty-five minutes. I will notify you when the hour is up.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The quo warranto proceedings in Florida which seem to be relied upon in this matter, in my judgment, cannot be alleged against the truth of the facts recited in Governor Stearns's certificate, mainly for the reason which I have already given, because all State power had passed away. But the record of that proceeding does not in anywise correspond with the description of what constitutes an estoppel by judgment, according to the decision of Chief-Justice De Grey in the Duchess of Kingston's case. In the quo warranto in Florida the inquiry was not what it is here. The inquiry there was what was the actual, real, final right; not who in fact according to law on the day exercised the power and was entitled to possession. One man may be entitled to possession; another man may have the right. Nothing is more common than that. Gentlemen have sat in both Houses of Congress upon a certificate of election and they had the right of possession, when perhaps some unnamed person outside the area and not entitled to the privileges of the floor may have had residing within him all the time the real right.

That leads me to say that the analogy drawn between this case and the celebrated New Jersey case, by my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Black,] fails utterly, because by the express terms of the Federal Constitution the House of Representatives was the judge not only of the qualification and return of the members but of their election. Therefore it could set aside the broad seal of the State of New Jersey and the prima facie right, to inquire into the real right. I have already undertaken to show to this Commission that they are not sitting here with any such jurisdiction as that.

But so far from availing anything as proof against the position which I deem to be the right and constitutional one here, that record establishes for us, by the very verity which is claimed for it on the other side, the essential fact on which, in my judgment, rest all the rights involved in this discussion; and that is, that on that day, on the 6th of December, the day appointed by law, the respondents in that proceeding, who are certified in certificate No. 1, were in possession of, and exercising, and discharging the functions and duties of the office of elector, and that the complainants or relators were not, because, as they said, we kept them out, we were unlawfully intruding and had ousted them, and thereupon they asked to have themselves re-instated. But the fact is, that on that day, the critical day, the day of days, the respondents in that record are shown by the gentlemen to have been in the undisturbed exercise of the actual franchise of electors for the State of Florida, and hence they cast their votes and hence their votes are entitled to be counted; and inasmuch as the relators appear by the record not to have been in possession, not to have been situated so that by law they could exercise that function, they complain and admit that the form of their vote was mere dumb-show without meaning or significance and without the least particle of legality or constitutional force.

Mr. President, I am exceedingly obliged to yourself and the gentlemen of the Commission, and will now suspend the argument so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT. You have occupied fifty-five minutes. Is there another gentleman to be heard on the same side this afternoon?

Mr. EVARTS. It was agreed that Mr. Stoughton and myself would divide the remaining two hours and five minutes, but we were not expecting to proceed to-day.

The PRESIDENT. The understanding of the Chair was that during this day two would speak on each side, if three were to speak altogether.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. There is to be but one closing argument on each side on Monday, as I understood the arrangement.

The PRESIDENT. There is only one person to close on each side on Monday. That was my understanding.

Mr. EVARTS. That was the arrangement when there were but two on each side to speak; but then when there were three introduced, it was required that two should open.

The PRESIDENT. On each side, I meant.

Mr. EVARTS. We all three speak, one after the other?

The PRESIDENT. I think two had better speak to-night.

Mr. EVARTS. If it is your honor's instruction, we will submit.

Mr. STOUGHTON. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, although my brother Evarts and myself propose to divide between us the remainder of our time, I shall occupy, I think, but a very small portion of it.

The question which the court or rather this tribunal has directed us to argue, as I understand it, is whether any, and, if any, what, testimony can be received in this case of any nature, independent of the documents which were transmitted to the President of the Senate, and opened in the presence of the two Houses.

In the first place it seems to me appropriate to ask what is the jurisdiction of this tribunal and what are its powers? Upon it is devolved by legislation of Congress such power, if any, to count the electoral vote, in the special cases referred to it, as is possessed by the two Houses of Congress acting separately or together. The jurisdiction as conferred is, therefore, an unknown quantity until it shall be ascertained what are the powers of the two Houses acting separately or together; and the purpose of this Commission is—assuming the power of the two Houses or of either to be to count the electoral vote—to ascertain what duties, what powers are involved in the exercise of that function. The purpose to be attained is the count of the electoral vote. The power devolved upon this tribunal is to count that vote in special cases. It is to count the electoral vote, and not to count the votes by which the electors were elected. That is a discrimination which I think hardly need be enforced by argument. The electoral vote is to be counted, and this tribunal has no power, it has no duty to count the vote by which the electors were elected. If it has, it will be compelled to descend into an unfathomable depth and to grope its way in paths hitherto untrodden by judicial feet and amid voting-polls and places whence it cannot emerge in many days.

Now, what is proposed by the testimony in question? The general inquiry which counsel are to answer is, what, if any, testimony is admissible in this case; and, for the purpose of ascertaining this, it is well to learn precisely what this case is and what is the purpose of the testimony proposed. There are some facts of which this tribunal can take judicial notice. One is, the laws of the State of Florida. What are they in reference to this subject, and what was done in pursuance of them, and what is proposed to be done by testimony—as it is called—for the purpose of overthrowing what was done in pursuance of the laws of that State?

In the first place, its statute, by a clause a part of which I will take the liberty of reading, authorized the creation of an ultimate returning-board having capacity to certify the number of votes cast for electors and who were elected; and, if that board performed its duty, however mistaken, however crowded with error, however, if you please, tainted by fraud, if that board discharged the duty cast upon it by law, and did ascertain and did declare how many votes for particular sets of electors were cast, and did certify and declare who were the persons elected electors, that ends all inquiry here, assuming that you may go behind the governor's certificate, unless, indeed, you may retreat behind the action of the returning-board, the final tribunal for that purpose created by the laws of the State, and ascertain whether it did or did not, according to your judgment, faithfully return the votes cast and faithfully declare who were the persons elected. I read as to the constitution of the returning-board, may it please this tribunal, from the fourth section of the act of 1872, which will be found on page 2 of the report made by Mr. Sargent of the Senate. It provides that:

On the thirty-fifth day after the holding of any general or special election for any State officer, member of the legislature or Representative in Congress, or sooner, if the returns shall have been received from the several counties wherein elections shall have been held, the secretary of state, attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall meet at the office of the secretary of state, pursuant to notice to be given by the secretary of state, and form a board of State canvassers, and proceed to canvass the returns of said election—and determine and declare who shall have been elected to any such office or as such member, as shown by such returns. If any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration.

Will your honors mark the language—

There was committed to this board by that statute a capacity to determine and decide—finally and conclusively—how many lawful votes were cast and who were elected electors. A majority of that board were authorized to perform that duty; and it appears here, before this tribunal, that, in the discharge of that duty, a majority of its members—omitting the attorney-general—did, in the exercise of the discretion thus confided to them, certify and declare that the Hayes electors, so called, were duly elected by the lawful voters of that State. If we go behind that finding we disregard the determination of a tribunal which the State of Florida has declared by her legislature to be empowered to determine what persons she has constituted to declare her will in the electoral college; for it is her will as a sovereign State—wise or foolish—which is to be thus expressed.

Now, it seems to me that if this Commission shall go behind the finding of that board it will go behind it upon the theory that it may exercise its will, irrespective of judicial power, upon some theory that it has the capacity of both Houses or of either House to do as it pleases, not in subjection to the Constitution of the country, but in obedience to an unlicensed will and purpose; and I expect, as my brother Black did, a conclusion which will rescue this tribunal from falling into so fatal an error as that of undertaking to interfere with the final declaration of the tribunal which the legislature of a State has declared shall finally and at last certify who may deposit the expression of its will in the national ballot-box, as it has been called.

I suppose it will not be denied—I presume no one will deny—that a State of this Union, by its legislature, may in any mode it pleases declare who shall be its instrument for selecting electors. I suppose that, if the State of Florida had declared that one of its sheriffs should select the electors, that would be final when done. Peradventure some theorist, upon the notion that you should go to the people as the source of power to elect judges as well as all other officers, might say such a mode of selection and appointment would hardly be in harmony with republican institutions; but I think he who would venture to go behind the expressed will of the State as to the method in which the electors should be appointed would find himself engaged in an effort to invade its sovereignty and interfere with the supremacy of a State.

I am perfectly aware that, if this tribunal were empowered to appoint committees by which it could through them proceed to different States and, irrespective of the rules of evidence or of law, gather together testimony, and then if it had the capacity upon that to do as it should please, it might go behind and upset any final lawful declaration of any returning-board in any State in the country. But Congress, while it conferred in the shape of an unknown quantity a jurisdiction upon this tribunal—declaring it should possess the powers, if any, possessed by the two Houses, or either, for the purpose of performing the duty of counting the vote—took care not to permit it to found its conclusion upon testimony inadmissible in a court of justice. The distinction between the uncertainty of language which conferred jurisdiction and the certainty and precision of language which conferred power to receive testimony is marked and apparent, and I will, with your honors' permission, refer to it.

All such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said Commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

“Competent and pertinent” in view of what? In view of the action of Congress through its committees? I mean no disrespect when I say that such mode permits the breath of calumny to be blown in a way which, thank God, courts of justice take care to prevent; and your honors, being endowed with power to hear depositions, papers, and petitions competent and pertinent within the meaning of the Constitution and existing laws—it being not expressed precisely what they are—will look at those rules of law which guide in administering justice upon the bench, and will determine what are the depositions and papers which you may thus receive. Turning over the pages of the law, you find, printed in characters unmistakable, your utter incapacity to receive other proof than that which the common law has sanctified by usage and through the lips of its judges as fit to be employed to affect the rights of men, to say nothing of the rights of States and nations. Here we have a tribunal of special and limited jurisdiction, incapable of moving out of the narrow orbit in which it is placed, proceeding for a particular purpose, liable in the language of the act, theoretically but not practically, to have its decision overturned by a concurrent order of the two Houses acting finally, and therefore a tribunal thus created exerts no powers not specially conferred, and can receive no testimony not in harmony with principles of law long since settled.

Then, may it please your honors, your jurisdiction is to count the electoral votes; your power is in counting to resort to such proof, if any, as the Constitution and laws permit. You are dealing with a delicate subject when the question of jurisdiction is reached. You are dealing with the supremacy of a State when you undertake to touch its final tribunal for the purpose of overhauling and upsetting its action.

Now I have in a general way, perhaps very imperfectly, presented my view of the jurisdiction and the power and the purpose of this tribunal. I propose to say a very few words in addition.

I have said that the purpose of the testimony offered is to go behind, not merely the governor's certificate—for that undoubtedly, upon questions of forgery, upon questions of mistake, upon many questions, this tribunal could deal with—but, designing to get behind that, the purpose is to get behind the action of that tribunal which the State has set up, and to cancel its finding; or else the testimony offered is senseless and worthless. What is specially offered? To maintain the right to have the votes counted for Mr. Tilden, we have before us the certificate of the attorney-general of Florida, who dissented from the majority of the returning-board, stating in that certificate—with frankness, as he does—that there is no method of authenticating their title beyond his mere certificate, by obtaining the certificate of the governor, because it would be in violation of the laws of Florida for him to certify to the election of electors who had been returned as such by but a minority of the board empowered to perform that duty.

What next do we find? We find a statute of the State of Florida thrust upon us, passed on the 17th of January—long after these electors had voted—authorizing a new canvass—of what? In harmony with the authority to canvass previously authorized? No, but a canvass of the votes, precisely indicating them, then in the office of the secretary of state; and we find under that act a board of canvassers meeting; a canvass made and certified, stating the Tilden electors to have been found by that board on the 25th of January to have been elected in the November previous. That is the authority for going behind the certification of the electors by the lawful returning-board. Coupled with this is a proceeding by quo warranto, ultimating in a judgment on the 25th of January declaring that these persons who performed all their duties on the 6th of December were not then electors, but that all their acts were illegal and invalid; and the learned gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Tucker] who yesterday addressed this tribunal said that decision swept away all prior acts of these officers de facto; but for this he gave us no authority. My memory immediately carried me to case after case in which it had been held that where an officer de facto is ousted by such a proceeding, all his prior acts are necessarily considered as valid and binding. Society could not exist without the application of such a rule. Judges go upon the bench, property passes under their decrees, men are hung by their judgments, and finally some one after a litigation of years obtains possession of the office. Is the virtue of that decree to sweep away the past, restore to life, yield back property? No. So here the act of the electors lawfully appointed, declared to be such in the mode prescribed by the legislature of Florida, doing what they were commanded to perform, is valid and irreversible.

Not content with this effort to succeed by quo warranto through the aid of an active and willing court, or with the finding of the new returning-board, the legislature passed another act declaring the canvass of the latter board valid and binding, and the Tilden electors by it declared elected to be duly qualified electors of the State. These judicial and statutory contrivances are unavailing and cannot disturb the electoral votes duly cast.

The alleged fault of the lawful returning-board was not fraud—at which my friends are so shocked—but mistake. After electors are thus appointed lawfully, but possibly by a mistaken view of the law by the board declaring their election, its conclusion must forever stand. The electors who by virtue of such an appointment have cast their votes are not to allow the day prescribed by Federal law to cast the vote of the State to pass, and the vote of the State to be lost, upon the theory that possibly their work may be undone by subsequent judicial action or ex post facto legislation.

It seems to me, may it please your honors, in view of the jurisdiction and capacity of this tribunal, in view of its powers to take testimony, in view of the purpose of introducing this testimony, which I have undertaken to state, that the application to introduce testimony should be overruled.

The PRESIDENT. One hour and thirty-two minutes are left, Mr. Evarts, of the time allotted to your side.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner STRONG, the Commission adjourned until eleven o'clock on Monday morning, the 5th instant.

MONDAY, February 5, 1877.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT. The concluding counsel on the part of the objectors to the first certificate is entitled to an hour and forty minutes. Mr. Evarts, on the other side, who will speak first, is entitled to an hour and thirty-two minutes.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, the order of the Commission inviting the attention of counsel lays out for their consideration three topics:

First, whether, under the powers possessed by the Commission, any evidence beyond that disclosed in the three certificates from the State of Florida, which were opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses of Congress and under the authority of the recent act of Congress are transmitted to this Commission, can be received;

Second, if any can be received, what that evidence is; and Third, what evidence other than these certificates, if any, is now before the Commission.

I will dispose of the last question in the order of the Commission first. It requires but brief attention to express our views sufficiently, and will, I think, require but little consideration, in point of time, however important it may be in substance, from the Commission.

It is suggested that certain packages of papers which were borne into the presence of the Commission by the messenger that brought the certificates and objections are already evidence in the possession of the Commission. What those packages contain, what degree of authenticity, or what scope of efficacy is to be imputed to or claimed for them as particular matters of evidence and particular forms of proof, is unknown to us and unknown to the Commission. The proposition upon which it is claimed that this evidence, whatever it may be—subject, undoubtedly, to discussion and to rejection by the Commission as not pertinent and not important and not authentic—the proposition is that, being mentioned in one of the objections interposed against the first certificate as matter on which the objection was founded, instead of being a warrant as it were to the objector which he vouches, he, the objector, thereby makes it a part of the evidence before the Commission; and our learned friend, Judge Black, has proposed that, except as against objectors who prevail in their arts and efforts in common-law courts and whom he has been polite enough to designate as “snapperadoes,” this evidence is, by authentic principles of jurisprudence, made evidence by this attachment to this objection. He instances the case of a bill in equity which may append exhibits and which, of course, brings the exhibits; as a part of itself, into the possession of the court. But that, thereby, they were made evidence any more than his bill, except upon such weight as should be imputed to them by the answer of the defendant admitting, or not denying, or establishing a rule of necessary contradiction by two witnesses, instead of one, I have never heard that the plaintiff made the exhibits evidence in the cause by appending them to his bill.

Now, the provisions of the recent act that at all touch this matter are very few. In the first place, the objections are not conclusive of anything. They bind nobody. They are merely the occasion upon which the reference to this Commission arises. If there be no objection, the case provided for the exercise of your authority is not produced. If the objection is made, however inartificial or imperfect, the case has arisen; but that the objection narrows and limits and provides the issue or affects the controversy upon which your jurisdiction attaches, is a pure fabrication out of utterly unsubstantial and immaterial suggestions in the law. Certainly, if volunteer objectors on one side and the other were permitted to lay down the issues, and adduce the evidence, and make up the packages of the evidence, it would be a strange commitment of your great authority to casual, to rash, to disingenuous suggestion.

So much, I think, entirely disposes of the question of whether there is any evidence here. The other question, as to whether evidence in the possession of either or both of the Houses of Congress, in the shape of committees' reports or conclusions of either of those great bodies, in any form, is transmissible, and may be proposed to this Commission and may be accepted and received by it after it is unfolded, after it is understood, after the paper is scrutinized and is opposed, is a question that is but a subordinate part of the main question, whether any evidence beyond the certificates can be received.

I wish to preclude, at the outset, anything that should carry for a moment the impression that there has been overpassed by some stroke of astuteness or of diligence the question of what you can receive and what you must reject. I find myself, then, unimpeded in the inquiry, as open to me as it is open to you, whether any evidence can be received, and, if any, what, beyond the certificates opened by the President of the Senate. On that question I shall think it quite attentive to the instruction of the Commission and much more suitable to a practical and definite discussion and a practical and definite determination by this Commission, that whatever of general principles, and however far-reaching the decision on those general principles in this matter of evidence may be, the evidence that is now actually proposed should be taken as the apparent limit of the inquiry whether evidence should be received, not from any particular defect as to form or manner of proffer, but as to whether it falls within evidence that may be received extraneous to, in addition to, the certificates opened by the President of the Senate. I am enabled by the memorandum presented by the learned counsel, Mr. O'Connor, which is found on the forty-second page of the Congressional Record of yesterday, to present the quality and character, the office and effort, of extraneous evidence that it is supposed might be, within the powers of this Commission, received and entertained by it.

In the first place, he excludes from the area of consideration one of the certificates, to wit, that which contains the vote of the Tilden electors; for that they need no extrinsic proof, and it is mentioned only that it may be excluded. Then, secondly, there are statements concerning the quo warranto suit in Florida, commenced on the 6th of December and ending on the 25th of January. In regard to that the record is supposed to contain in itself the particular means of its use according to established rules of jurisprudence as a record or as an authority. It is suggested in respect to that, therefore, that extraneous proof only would need to reach the point of the precise hour of the day on the 6th of December on which the writ commencing that action was served, and on our part perhaps proof that an appeal had been taken from that judgment and is still pending.

Then are enumerated some other matter that require no proof, as it is supposed. Again, the acts of the legislature mentioned are public acts and matters of record; and it is supposed that they are regularly before the Commission, so far at least as they appear in the third certificate, by virtue of that transmission, and besides I suppose that they are matters of public record as the action of the legislature of the State.

We come now to the following:

Fifthly. The only matters which the Tilden electors desire to lay before the Commission by evidence actually extrinsic will now be stated.

1. The board of State canvassers, acting on certain erroneous views when making their canvass, by which the Hayes electors appeared to be chosen, rejected wholly the returns from the county of Manatee and parts of returns from each of the following counties—

Naming them.

In doing so the said State board acted without jurisdiction, as the circuit and supreme courts in Florida decided.

That is, by their recent judgments in mandamus and quo warranto.

"It was by overruling and setting aside as not warranted by law these rejections, that the courts of Florida reached their respective conclusions that Mr. Drew was elected governor, that the Hayes electors were usurpers, and that the Tilden electors were duly chosen. No evidence that in any view could be called extrinsic is believed to be useful in order to establish the conclusions relied upon by the Tilden electors, except duly authenticated copies of the State canvass," (that is—the erroneous canvass as we consider it,) "and of the returns from the above-named four counties, one wholly and others in part rejected by said State canvassers."

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is your canvass that you rely on.

Mr. EVARTS. So I understand. I was reading your language.

And of the returns from the above-named four counties, one wholly and others in part rejected by said State canvassers.

It is proposed, therefore, as the matter extraneous that it is desired to introduce, and that it is claimed is open to your consideration, not that the certificate of Governor Stearns falsifies the fact he was to certify; not that it falsifies the record that makes the basis of the fact which he was to certify; but that the record at the time on which by law he was to base his certificate, departing from which his certificate would be false, is itself to be penetrated or surmounted by extraneous proof, showing that by matters of substance occurring in the progress of the election itself errors or frauds intervened. This means that somewhere in the steps of the election between the deposit of the ballots in the boxes at the precincts and the original computation of the contents of those boxes there, and the submission to a correct canvass in a county of the precincts thus canvassed at their own ballot-boxes, or between the returns of the county canvass to the State canvassers, or in the action of the State canvassers in the final computation of the aggregates to ascertain the plurality of votes as for one or the other candidate, and so declare the result of the election, frauds or mistakes occurred. In other words, that in the process of the election itself, from stage to stage, on the very matter of right and on the question of the title de jure there has occurred matter of judicial consideration which should be inquired into here. For I need not say that, however simple and however limited the step to be taken behind the record of the final State canvass, to serve the needs and to accomplish the justice as proposed by the learned counsel for the objectors against the Hayes certificate, the principle upon which this evidence is offered, if their occasions required it, if justice required it, if the powers of this commission tolerated it, would carry the scrutiny and the evidence to whatever point this complete correction or evisceration of the final canvass would demand.

I am at once, therefore, relieved from any discussion as practical in this case, except so far as illustration or argument may make it useful, pro or con, of any consideration whether a governor's certificate could be attacked as itself being not a governor's certificate, but a forgery. That is not going behind the governor's certificate. That is going in front of the governor's certificate and breaking it down as no governor's certificate. That is not the question you are to consider here. There is certainly no reason, on principle, that when a governor's certificate is required for any solemnity or conclusiveness of authentication, a forged paper should be protected because it is called a governor's certificate. Neither does their offer of proof suggest any debate as to whether the fact to be certified by the governor, the substance that his certificate is to authenticate, can be made the subject of extraneous evidence with a view to show that the fact to be certified is discordant with the certificate, and that the fact must prevail over the interpolated false certificate of the fact.

There can be no escape from this criticism on their offer of proof, unless our learned opponents ask your assent to a claim that when the act of Congress requires the governor's certificate as to the list of persons that have been appointed electors it requires from the governor a certificate that every stage and step of the process of the election has been honest and true and clear and lawful and effectual, and free from all exception of fraud. Unless you make that the fact to be certified by the governor, you lay no basis for introducing evidence of discord between the fact to be certified and the fact that has been certified. Without disguise, therefore, the proposition is that, whether or no there might be occasion for extraneous proof to falsify a governor's certificate on the ground of its own spurious character, or on the ground of its falsely setting forth the fact professed to be stated, and admitting the governor's certificate to be genuine, and admitting the final canvass, duly filed and recorded, to be in accord with the certificate, this Commission stands at the same stage of inquiry and with the same right to investigate the election itself to the bottom as a judicial court exercising the familiar jurisdiction of quo warranto.

There is also a suggestion that extraneous proofs may be necessary on the point "that Mr. Humphreys, one of the Hayes electors, held office under the United States;" and, in our behalf, it is then suggested by the learned counsel that we might need to introduce evidence that he had resigned. The interposition of this objection was a surprise to us; for it was a matter of inquiry before the Florida State canvassing-board on the 4th day of December, 1876, antecedent to the completion of the final and conclusive canvass. The evidence thus taken I am able to read from page 32 of the Congressional Record of Saturday, in the report of the minority of the House committee:

Extract from testimony before the Florida State canvassing-board, Monday, December 4, 1876.

FREDERICK C. HUMPHREYS sworn for the republicans.

Examined by the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Are you shipping-commissioner for the port of Pensacola?—Answer. I am not.

Q. Were you at one time?—A. I was.

Q. At what time?—A. Previous to the 7th of November.

Q. What time did you resign?—A. The acceptance of my resignation was received by me from Judge Woods about a week or ten days before the day of election, which I have on file in my office. I did not think of its being questioned, or I would have had it here. He stated in his letter to me that the collector of customs would perform the duties of the office, and the collector of customs has since done so.

On the nature of an objection for disqualification as a subject of proof before the two Houses or the President of the Senate, in their attribution of authority under the clause of the Constitution governing their joint meeting, a word needs to be said; and I will attempt at the same time to answer the inquiry made very pertinently and forcibly by Mr. Commissioner THURMAN the other day.

There is, as I understand the matter, (and I will not anticipate a discussion that must come later in this argument,) a consideration in the first place of whether the Houses of Congress in the matter of the count, at the time of the meeting for the constitutional duty of opening and counting the votes, have any power by law for any intervention or any methods of extraneous proof. Whatever may be thought as to whether disqualifications of this nature were proper for the scrutiny of the votes to be counted, and however proper it might have been for Congress to provide by law for the production of extraneous proof in that transaction, and for the manner in which it might be adduced and considered, there is no act of Congress on the subject. Our proposition is that, at that stage of the transaction of the election, the two Houses cannot entertain any subject of extraneous proof. The process of counting must go on. If a disqualified elector has passed the observation of the voters in the State, passed the observation of any sentinels or safeguards that may have been provided in the State law; when these are all overpassed and the vote stands on the presentation and authentication of the Constitution—that is, upon the certificate of the electors themselves and of the governor—it must stand unchallengeable and unimpeachable in the count. Of course, the provision of means of inquiry at that stage by Congress, if they had thought fit to provide means, would have involved the delays of such inquiry, the proof of the alleged infirmity in the elector, and the counter-proof of its removal, all matters ordinarily manageable, perhaps in point of time not leading to much prolixity, but still, in supposable cases, involving contradiction of witnesses and discussion as to the effect of testimony which would involve delay.

Mr. Commissioner Thurman asked this question: "Suppose that the electoral vote, when opened, disclosed the fact that the four electors were then present members of Congress, and had been such members at the time of appointment as electors, what then?" That involves an element, you will perceive, that is not touched by the considerations that belong to proof. That impeachment of qualification in the electors supposed is of ocular and personal observation at all times by the President of the Senate and by the two Houses of Congress, and is of record at the Capitol. But if the instance is merely that of a member of Congress not presently a member and thus involving extraneous proof of his retirement from the office in season to qualify him for appointment as elector, then the case falls back into the class of cases which I have just considered, where there has been no provision for extraneous proof, and where the office accorded to the governor's certificate cannot be overpassed without extraneous proof. There is, as we suppose, no safe rule, except to say that this injunction laid upon the States, that they shall not appoint the excluded persons, does not execute itself under the Constitution, and if unexecuted in the laws of the State, is only to be executed by laws of Congress providing the means and time and place for proof and determination on the fact of disqualification. This is all that I need to say on the question of personal disqualification.

I have said that this Commission cannot receive evidence in addition to the certificates, of the nature of that which is offered; that is, evidence that goes behind the State's record of its election, which has been certified by the governor as resulting in the appointment of these electors. One reason of this proposition, and on which sufficiently it rests, is that that is a judicial inquiry into the very matter of right, the title to office. This inquiry accepts the prevalence of the formal, the certificated, the recorded title of the electors, and proposes then to investigate as inter partes, as a matter of right, which of two competing lists of electors is really elected on an honest and searching canvass and scrutiny of the State election. It undertakes a function that is judicial; and the powers for its exercise are attempted to be evoked by their necessity for the exercise of the function assumed. What are adequate means? Adequate means for that judicial investigation are plenary means. No means are adequate for that inquiry that are not plenary. But no plenary judicial powers, no plenary powers for inquiry into fact and determination of law judicially, can be communicated by Congress except to tribunals that are courts inferior to the Supreme Court, and that are filled by judges appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate. Will any lawyer, expert or inexpert, mention a topic or method of judicature, of jurisprudence, that involves the possession of means of larger reach and a more complete control of powers than the trial of a quo warranto for an office that is to search an election? But not only is it beyond the power of Congress to transfer to this Commission the powers of a court of this plenary reach and efficiency, but on the topic of quo warranto to try the title of an office they would find a subject of jurisdiction in regard to which the Constitution had interposed an insurmountable barrier to its devolution on a court like this. The quo warranto is a matter and an action of the common law. It involves as matter of right the introduction of a jury into its methods of trial. No title to office on a contested election was ever tried without a jury. The seventh article of amendments to the Constitution requires that in suits at common law the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and their verdict shall never be re-examined in any court of the United States except by the rules of the common law.

I may ask your attention, in connection with the topic that I last discussed, and in pertinent relation to the present, to the case of Groome vs. Gwynn, in 43 Maryland Reports, 572, especially at page 624. This case shows that this argument, that a duty attributed by law or the Constitution, must carry to itself, in the functionary charged with its exercise, all the powers necessary, upon the ground that the duty must involve the powers, finds no place in our jurisprudence; the argument is the other way. If the functionary, if the Commission has not been clothed with the necessary faculties, then the duty is not accorded or, the means of its exercise not being furnished, it cannot be discharged. There the governor had, by the State constitution, the power to determine a contest for the elective office of attorney-general of the State of Maryland. The governor, finding by his own inspection of the constitution that he lacked the means of carrying out the scrutiny that must decide, held that he could not exercise it and he would not exercise it, unless compelled by judicial authority. The court of appeals, on an application for a mandamus to compel the governor to give the certificate to the candidate appearing to be elected by the canvass, held that he was vested by the constitution with an authority to decide the contest, but that the laws of Maryland had not executed the constitution by furnishing him with powers to perform the duty assigned to him, and that the mandamus must go against him to compel him to deliver the certificate to the candidate that, on the fraudulent election, was returned as having the plurality of votes. Thus the preliminary contest before the governor that might have been effectual to redress the frauds of the election, was defeated for want of necessary legislation. The contest could only be had under the judicial powers of the State lodged in the courts, and in the shape of quo warranto on a suit against the inducted candidate that the governor might or would have decided not to be entitled to take the office.

I find in this act of 1877 no such purpose in the arrangement of this Commission or its endowment with powers as to make it a court under the Constitution. I find no appointment of these judges to this court under the powers of the Constitution. I find no means provided for writs and their enforcement, nor for the methods of trial that must belong to a discussion on a quo warranto. Now, I understand that the proponents of this proof lay out as the nature and the limit of your inquiries, of your duties and your powers, that of judicial investigation upon quo warranto. Mr. Representative Field assigned to you what he described as "powers at least as great as of a court on quo warranto," and, of course, in that nature. Mr. Merrick claimed the same. Judge Black did not in terms, yet in assigning the nature and the searching character of the transaction that you are to enter upon, gave it that character and implied that demand. The brief handed in by Mr. Green, in the praise of which I am happy to join with his learned associates, makes the claim distinctly that you are not adequate as a revising canvassing-board, but you must have the powers of a court on quo warranto. And why this claim if anything less magnificent and anything less intolerable could have been found sufficient area for your action as desired? It is because in the methods and machinery of elections, as they insist, the steps are onward, from one canvass to the next, and if you are made only a superior canvassing-board to determine whether Governor Stearns's certificate that these electors were appointed is valid, and you are nothing but a returning-board, surmounting the final returning-board to see whether their returns justified that certificate, that, at once, you must find that it does, that the de-facto title and possession are complete, and that nothing but a jurisdiction that concedes the de-facto title and possession can begin, can find the case for beginning, the consideration of the question of right. This quo-warranto suit in the Florida court, if it becomes a subject of evidence, declares absolutely, on the petition of the Tilden electors, that the Hayes electors are in possession of the faculty, the office, or whatever it may be, and are exercising it, and they ask that an inquiry may then proceed in due course of law to inquire whether that possession and that exercise, as matter of right, between them and the Hayes electors, are or are not according to law and truth.

And the Commission will be good enough to look at an act, not reprinted in the little collection of the acts so usefully laid before us, of February 2, 1872, in the laws of Florida, in relation to the proceeding upon writs of quo warranto. The general statute of procedure excludes any possible writ of quo warranto except by the State through the action of the attorney-general, and this quo-warranto suit begins by evidence that the attorney-general refused to bring the writ for the State, and that led to an inquiry how it happened that it was brought at all, and to the discovery of this law of 1872, providing that when the attorney-general refuses, then claimants may make themselves relators and use the name of the State; but in such case the suit is a mere private suit, that is good between the parties, but does not affect the State. It is in terms so provided, and it is provided that the judgment shall not be a bar to a subsequent suit by the attorney-general in the public right. So much to explain that situation.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Will you give us the page of the session laws?

Mr. EVARTS. Page 28 of the session laws of 1872.

There is but one other point that I wish to call to the attention of the Commission in the legislation of Florida, for I can spend no time to rehearse the statutes. On page 53 of the pamphlet that has been printed for the use of the Commission there are found sections 31 and 32. One is a provision that—

The secretary of state shall make and transmit to each person chosen to any State office immediately after the canvass—showing that the canvass as completed is the basis of the State's authentication of the right of every State officer—a certificate showing the number of votes cast for each person, which certificate shall be prima facie evidence of his election to such office.

That gives him the office. Subsequent inquiry is as to the final right. Then section 32:

When any person shall be elected to the office of elector of President and Vice-President, or Representative in Congress, the governor shall make out, sign, and cause to be sealed with the seal of the State, and transmit to such person a certificate of his election.

That is the State's final designation of the person that has been appointed an elector under the Constitution of the United States. Had these contestants any such authentication of their right, and have they proposed any such evidence of right as in existence on the 6th day of December? Have they questioned the completeness of the Hayes electors' warrant to attend and discharge their duty that clothes the vote when cast with the complete qualification under the State laws and the State's action? We have the governor's certificate—and he is the very person that passed officially upon that question which furnishes the authority to the electors to meet and act—that this is the list of the electors appointed. Omnia præsumuntur rite acta; but there is no presumption needed here. These certificates under the State law form no part of the return to the President of the Senate; but when the same governor executes under Federal law the same duty and upon the same evidence as under State law, we have in his certificate, now here, adequate authentication of the completion of the transaction by which the State appointed the Hayes electors.

Now we come to consider the general doctrine as to what the powers are, and what the arrangement and disposition of those powers are, under the Constitution of the United States in the transaction of choosing a President. In the first place, the only transaction of choosing a President begins with the deposit, so to speak, in the Federal urn of the votes of certain persons named and described in the Constitution as electors. From the moment of that deposit the sealed vote lies protected against destruction or corruption in the deposit provided for it, the possession of Federal officers in Federal offices. The only other step, after that, is the opening of those votes and their counting. All that precedes the deposit of the votes by electors relates to their acquisition of the qualifications which the Constitution prescribes. Those qualifications are nothing but appointment by the State, and with that the act of Congress and the Federal Constitution, with due reverence to State authority, do not interfere. It has been provided under a rule of prudence that the electors shall all be appointed on the same day in all the States. It has been provided that they shall meet and cast their votes on the same day. The latter provision fixes a duty in the transaction of voting for President. The other is the only intrusion upon State authority in the absolute choice of the time and manner of appointment; Congress may prescribe that the time of voting shall be the same in all the States, and Congress has so prescribed.

What are we to gather in respect to the stage of this transaction which is the deposit of the Federal vote for President by the qualified electors? It is their own vote. They are not delegates to cast a vote according to the instruction of their State. They are not deputized to perform the will of another. They are voters that exercise a free choice and authority to vote, or refrain from voting, and to vote for whom they please; and from the moment that their vote is sealed and sent forward toward the seat of Government no power in a State can touch it, arrest it, reverse it, corrupt it, retract it. Nothing remains to be done except count it, and count it as it was deposited. The wisdom of the secret ballot and of its repose in the possession of the President of the Senate secures the object, ut nihil innovetur. The vote is to be opened and counted, in contemplation of law, as freshly as if it had been counted on the day it was cast, in the State.

These electors, at our present election three hundred and sixty-nine citizens in number, not being marked and designated by any but political methods, are by the Constitution made dependent for their qualification upon the action of the State. If the State does not act there are no qualified electors. If the State does act, whatever is the be-all and the end-all of the State's action, up to the time that the vote is cast is the be-all and the end-all of the qualification of the elector, and he is then a qualified elector depositing his vote to accomplish its purpose, and to be counted when the votes are collected.

Our ancestors, whom we revere—let us not at the same time despoil them of their right to our reverence—were not wanting either in forecast or in circumspection in this provision. Every solicitude, every safeguard that a not very credulous view of human nature could exact for the supremacy of the Constitution in this supreme transaction under it was provided. At the bottom of everything was a determination that this business should proceed to fill the office; that that terror of monarchies and of republics alike, a vacant or a disputed succession to the occupancy of the Chief Magistracy, should not possibly exist.

Let me find for you those constitutional limitations upon the supposed quo warranto procedures that were to cover investigations into thirteen or thirty-eight States before the votes could be counted. Why, the second substituted election, on the failure of the first, must end by the 4th of March. What room is there to interpolate quo warranto proceeding in any stage from the deposit in the primary ballot-box in the State up to the counting of the votes which declares a President elected, or the failure to elect, upon which the States resume their control through their delegates in the lower House of Congress upon the basis of State equality? The substituted election must come to an end by the 4th of March; and whoever introduces judicial quo warranto anywhere in the transaction introduces a process of retardation, of baffling, of obscuring, of defrauding, of defeating the election, and gives to the Senate, by mere delay, the present filling of the Presidency with an acting officer and compels a new election. That much for delay. Now it is an absolutely novel proposition that judicial power can put its little finger into the political transaction of choosing anybody to an elective office.

The bringing into office a President, bringing into office a governor, bringing into office any of the necessary agents of the frame and structure of the State, without which in present action it will be enfeebled and may fall, is a political action from beginning to end. It comes to furnish a subject of judicial post hac investigation only after it has been completed. If judges are to intrude and courts with their proceedings at the various stages that are to be passed in the business of filling the office, so that there shall be no vacant and no disputed succession de facto, who does not see that you introduce the means of defrauding and defeating the political action entirely, and turning it into a discussion of the mere right that shall leave the office vacant till the mere right is determined?

It is an absolute novelty, unknown in the States, unknown in the nation, that judicial inquiries can be interposed to stop the political action that leads up to the filling of office. The interest of the State is that the office shall be filled. Filling it is the exercise of a political right, the discharge of a political duty. Such safeguards as can be thrown about the ballot-box, about the first canvass, the second canvass, the third canvass, the final canvass in the States, about the final counting before the two Houses, and that shall not retard or defeat the progress to the necessary end, are provided. These are provided; these are useful; but you do not step with a judicial investigation into a ballot-box upon a suggestion that it has been stuffed, and stop the election till that quo warranto is taken; and then when you get to the first canvasser stop his count from going on, because it is a false count, and have a court decide, and so with the county canvassers, stop their transaction in the rapid progress to the result aimed at, to wit, filling the office, with a quo warranto there, and then in the State canvass, and then here. It is an absolute novelty. No judicial action has ever been accepted and followed except the mandamus to compel officers to act, nothing else. That was not retarding; that was ascertaining; that was compelling; that was discarding delays on the question of right.

In our supreme court in New York, not very many years ago, an attempt was made to obtain an injunction against inspectors canvassing votes, the primary deposit in the ballot-box of their election-district, because they had been sworn on the directory and not on the Bible. They had no right to discharge their function without taking an official oath, the preliminary oath. The court refused it necessarily. However much this irregularity might find play and place in a quo warranto investigation of the whole transaction, piecemeal inquiry cannot be made and no injunction of a court can intrude into the course of the political action of an election.

The position that I have assigned to the States is the appointment as they please. Now, let me call your attention to a provision in the act of Congress, the application of which may not have occurred to your observation. It is provided in the act that if the State shall have failed to appoint on the day for appointment, it may make a subsequent appointment as the legislature may please. It was not intended, then, that the process of finding out whether there had been an election or not should, by its method and its regular action, be exposed to frustration. Even the failure itself, disclosed by the political canvass, was the basis on which the State was renewedly to exercise its right in time for transmission here. Now, you have in this act of Congress a provision which shows that they recognized that the method of progress and result was to be cherished above all others that its success might end in time to confer the qualifications or its failure in time that the substituted appointment reserved to the States should be accomplished.

But now it is said that a failure of election may be retarded in its declaration so as to deprive the State of its power to act on that failure, and it is said that by the act of Congress the contemplated ascertainment may involve judicial proceedings in the State. Why, if there be anything that in election laws is provided in every State, it is that there shall be no reconsideration, no steps backward, no delays except of ministerial and apparently easy duty; and if discretion is given, by departures from that general policy in particular States, it is always found to have its origin in a motive of correcting a special mischief for which it is framed, some abnormal condition of the body-politic that requires a departure from the general method of absolute ministerial transaction. Our proposition, as has been laid down so well by my learned associates, is that, under the State law of Florida, that is the method, that is the purpose, that is the action, and that every step and stage of that action, rightly or wrongly, honestly or dishonestly, purely or fraudulently, has conferred qualifications such as the Federal Constitution requires in the appointment by the State through the methods that it had provided.

If support were needed for the point that the line of demarkation between the inception of the Federal authority and the culmination and consummation of the State's action precludes an inquiry, at the furthest, beyond the facts certified as of record and the accuracy of the certificate, is to be found in the legislation proposed in the Congress of 1800, when the wisdom was still of the fathers. Enlightened by their experience of the working of the great scheme they had framed, it was declared that the demarkation should be observed, and that the powers should not include nor be deemed to include any inquiry into the votes as cast in the States.

The novelty, as I have said, of the situation produces strange results. Never before has there been the retardation of the political transaction of counting an election, and to accomplish that almost a miracle has been needed, for the sun and the moon have been made to stand still much longer than they did for Joshua in the conflict in Judea. You will find that an attempt to bring judges—I do not now speak of judges in the official capacity that some portion of this bench occupy in the Supreme Court, but I mean judges in the nature of judicial function and its exercise—into the working of this scheme of popular sovereignty in its political action, will make it as intolerable in its working, will so defraud and defeat the popular will, by the nature and necessary consequences of the judicial intervention, that, at last, the government of the judges will have superseded the sovereignty of the people, and there will be no cure, no recourse but that which the children of Israel had, to pray for a king.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. O'Connor, the Commission will now hear you.

Mr. EVARTS. I ask your honors to take a reference to very recent cases in the seventy-eighth volume of Illinois Reports, Dickey vs. Reed. It is a long case and an important case. On pages 267, 268, 269, the matter pertinent to this inquiry is to be found. I refer also to 25 Maine Reports, page 566, an opinion of the supreme judicial court of that State on the powers that are included in the authority to open and count votes. In 38 Maine Reports, page 598, is a similar judicial instruction; and in 53 New Hampshire Reports, page 640, there is a similar judicial action under the constitution of that State. I refer also to a recent case, called Cæsar Griffin's case, in the district of Virginia, in Johnson's Reports, page 364, a decision of Chief-Justice Chase on the authority of de-facto officers proved not to have been de jure in all the efficacy of their conduct of affairs.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission: I will not say probably, because it may be said certainly, that the most important case that has ever been presented to any official authority within these United States is now brought before this honorable Commission for its investigation and decision. It is brought here under circumstances that give absolute assurance, as far as absolute assurance can exist in human things, of a sound, upright, intelligible decision that will receive the approval of all just and reasonable men. The great occasion which has given rise to the construction of this tribunal has attracted the attention of every enlightened and observing individual in the civilized world. This Commission acts under that observation. The conclusion at which it may arrive must necessarily pass into history, and, from the deeply interesting character in all their aspects of the proceedings had and the judgment to be pronounced, that history will attract the attention of students and men of culture and intelligence as long as our country shall be remembered; for it cannot be supposed that a question will ever arise and be determined in a similar manner which, by its superior magnitude, importance, delicacy, and interest, will obscure this one or cause it to be overlooked.

The selection of members to this Commission was made by a choice of five individuals equal, assumed to be equal, pronounced to be equal, if not superior to, any others to be found in the House of Representatives, and a similar choice of similar individuals taken from the Senate, thus placing the entire legislative representation of our whole country under the observation of present and future times in respect to whatever shall here be done. To that has been added a selection of five other members from the highest judicial tribunal known under our Constitution and laws, and certainly a tribunal equal in official majesty and dignity, as well as in intellectual power, to any that has ever existed. Evidently, from the whole frame of the procedure, these appointments were made with an earnest intent, and indeed a fixed resolution, to have here represented in this tribunal whatever of perfect impartiality and fairness, whatever of purity and integrity, whatever of learning and dignity of position our country could afford. This, too, is a public act of the highest authority that could be invoked to express the sovereign will of the whole people.

The questions to be considered are of a public character and of a judicial nature. Every member of the Commission has been a jurist by profession during his life, and has devoted his time and his study to the apprehension and comprehension of legal questions.

It was said by a great English judge, and an eminent writer and historian, in the highest court of that country, in a conspicuous case, that "jurisprudence is the department of human knowledge to which our brethren of the United States of America have chiefly devoted themselves, and in which they have chiefly excelled."

With all these elements affording guarantees in respect to the result, I think it may be confidently asserted that such result cannot be other than the intelligent judgment of mankind in present and future times will approve. With that assurance, and with a deep sense of my own incapacity to fulfill the part assigned me in arguing the great question presented, but a conviction that all deficiencies of this kind will be supplemented by the learning and ability of the tribunal, I proceed to lay before your honors what may seem proper to be now said on our part in relation to the issues that have been raised for consideration by the Commission's resolve adopted on Saturday.

The questions, in short, without repeating details, are expressed by the inquiry, what powers have been vested in this Commission for the purpose of enabling its members to guide through its determination the action of the political authorities as to the election of President and Vice-President? And here let me observe on a mistake which the other side has made in relation to a paper presented to the court on our part on Saturday. It has been construed as in some sense prescribing limits or giving our view of some limit proper to be assigned to the power and authority of this Commission. This is a mistake. That paper was designed for no such purpose and expresses no such idea. With a view to facilitate the action of the court, we presented in that paper a statement which we believe to be correct, and true in point of fact, showing the very narrow range of inquiry into matters of fact that would actually become necessary.

In reference to the question, what elements of inquiry are within the competency of this court, we stand in direct conflict with the other side, and the issue formed between us is this:

We maintain, as representing what are called the Tilden electors, that this tribunal has full authority to investigate by all just and legitimate means of proof the very fact, and thereby to ascertain what was the electoral vote of Florida.

On the other hand, it is claimed that this learned Commission is greatly trammelled by technical impediments, and has no power except merely to determine what may be the just inferences from the documents returned to the President of the Senate from the State of Florida. While thus contending, however, the Hayes electors mainly repose themselves on the proposition that they are officers de facto. Admitting for the sake of argument that their claim to be electors is without right, and is simply clothed with a false and fabricated color of title, the Hayes electors claim through their counsel that inasmuch as they cast their vote while possessed of some documents which gave to them the mere color of a right to perform that duty, the fact that they acted upon this color, and did, of their own motion, of their own personal will, through their own right of selection, cast the votes for Mr. Hayes that are sent here as the vote of Florida, completely precludes all inquiry, and that it is impossible for any earthly tribunal or any individual to investigate or to declare the invalidity of their claim.

This issue, thus I trust not too narrowly stated, raises the question, What are the powers of this Commission? I proceed to state our views on the subject.

Those powers are distinctly and briefly expressed in the electoral bill under which you are acting—that admirable act of legislation, destined to the immortal honor of those concerned in its preparation, to pass into history with your action. The language defining your powers declares that you shall possess—

The same powers, if any, now possessed—

For the purpose in hand—

by the two Houses acting separately or together.

You have then (and this is the test) all the powers of those two Houses which they could possibly exercise under the Constitution and by the pre-existing statutes, for the purpose of enabling you to determine the inquiries submitted to you. Let us see, then, what powers are possessed by the two Houses separately or together in deciding as to the electoral vote upon the facts that exist or that might exist and may be proven. And this calls upon us to say what those powers are, and requires us to answer whether, in relation to the action which has here been called counting, any powers under the laws existing when this electoral bill was passed, and which were needed to a proper ascertainment of the vote, were vested in the President of the Senate.

Now, that no power of any description deserving the name of a power to investigate and decide resided in the President of the Senate is most plain from the very words of the Constitution. He is authorized to receive certain packets, and he has no authority whatever by the Constitution save and except only to present himself to the two Houses of Congress and in their presence to open these packets. The phrase is "open the certificates," but this evidently means open the packets. He has no right to open them at any previous time; he has no power whatever to investigate what is contained in the packets before thus opening them. He has no means of taking testimony; he has no right to judge of anything; and he is positively precluded, not only by the Constitution itself but by the physical laws of nature, from knowing what may be within any packet thus received by him until the moment at which he opens that packet in the presence of the two Houses; of course the packets which he is thus authorized to open are to present the basis of subsequent action.

Nothing further is prescribed to him, and I humbly submit that it is most manifest that he has none but the merest of clerical powers nor any ability to do anything except to open the packets at that time and at that place and in that presence. He cannot even know what is in the packets until he opens the packets. But it is manifest that the packets which he thus opens may require a decision by some authority of a preliminary question, that is to say, what are the votes in respect to which a count may take place? No person or functionary or body is specially pointed out as having power to make that count. Now, a great deal has been said, which I consider not very applicable or very instructive, in reference to this word "count," as if it were the operative and principal word here and were used to determine the faculty and point out the power of those who have authority to count. Now, I humbly insist that the count itself is so purely a simple arithmetical process that in reference to it there never could be a possible difference of opinion anywhere or among any persons.

I apprehend that there is a word in this constitutional provision that ought not to be overlooked. The President of the Senate is to receive these packets. They are not required to have any note or ear-mark of any description to indicate to him what they are, and he can only learn by external inquiry or report that they are sent him by persons pretending to be electors of President and Vice-President; and the Constitution, proceeding to declare his duty, says that he shall "open all the certificates." The word "all" would perform no function, and it would be entirely useless, if it were to be confined to indicating the certificates before spoken of. The simple phrase "shall open the certificates" would suffice; but he is to "open all the certificates;" and this provision of the Constitution, not granting powers of investigation but dealing with visible facts, declares that he shall "open all the certificates." This I apprehend means all packets that may have come to him under color of being such packets as the Constitution refers to; that is, packets containing electoral votes or appearing to be of that character. He is bound to open all such packets in the presence of the Houses, and there ends his duty. But when we come to the prescription that there shall be a count, we are not told that there shall be a count of all the certificates presented, or of the certificates, or of anything in the certificates, but that there shall be a count of "the votes." This, I humbly submit, introduces a necessary implication that somehow and by some authority there shall be made, if necessary, a selection of the actual votes from the mass of papers produced and physically present before the Houses. Any investigation that the nature of the case may happen to require in order to determine what are "the votes" must be made by some functionaries having competency to make it. This is a preliminary inquiry, and whether you denominate it judicial or ministerial or executive, it is to be an inquiry, and the power to institute or carry it on is neither granted in terms, nor are there any possible means of its exercise so far as the President of the Senate is concerned. This is left to an implication that it is to be exercised by those who may have occasion to act officially on the result of the electoral vote.

Who are they that are to act officially by the terms of the Constitution in performance of duty resulting from the count of the votes? The Constitution is plain. The votes—meaning of course the legal votes—are to be counted. The count is the merest ceremony in itself; but the ascertainment of what are legal votes presented, necessarily devolves upon that body or those bodies that must act on that which is produced as a result by the count. The authorities compelled by duty to see that the count is justly and truly made and to act on the result are the two Houses.

Unquestionably the first and primary duty of the Houses, if there is a count showing the election of a person to the Presidency and another to the Vice-Presidency, is to recognize them as constituting that co-ordinate department of the Government called the Executive. As to a mere count, all the world may make it; no mortal man can doubt about the effect of a count; but I presume the general world is not called upon to act in reference to the count until that count has been officially recognized by some lawful authority. But what is more certain is this: It is the duty of the House of Representatives at that point in the process to determine whether an exigency has arisen which renders it their duty to recognize that a person has been elected as President by a majority of votes, of the legal votes, or whether there has been a failure to elect by reason of a tie; and in that event, if it should occur, that House is bound to act upon the result, and in this exigency itself is to elect a President. The same observations apply to the Senate with reference to the Vice-President; that body is bound in like manner to recognize the fact of an election, to allow it, admit it, and accept it as a fact, or to deny it and say that it is not so, and themselves to proceed in the election of a Vice-President.

I attach no importance to the word "count;" but I claim from the very nature of the thing, from the laws inwrought into the constitution of human beings and governing human transactions, that those who have thus to act officially on the count are the persons who must do whatever may be needful for the purpose of enabling a count to be made. Those who are bound to act in the one direction or in the other, as the case may require, must possess the power of making any preliminary investigation that may become necessary.

The result of this construction is that that officer who has no power but to open them is set aside from the moment he opens the packets, and the duty of exercising the higher function, preliminarily, of inquiring what are the votes, prior to this mere formal act, "counting," must devolve upon those who must take notice what are the legal votes and act upon the count of them. This no one is authorized to make or to declare unless it be themselves. This implied power is not introduced by any forced construction, but from the absolute necessity of the case. And, consequently, we claim that the needful powers of preliminary investigation were in the Houses. It cannot fairly be disputed that Congress by united action might have constituted some public body to conduct the investigation; and how far they might have gone toward making the result absolutely obligatory on the Houses themselves respectively, we need not inquire.

They did not exercise such a power prior to the election of 1876, and they have not otherwise exercised it subsequently, except by the constitution of this tribunal, and they have reserved to themselves the privilege of establishing a different determination by a concurrent vote.

The competency of each House to ascertain the truth is unquestionable. Each has complete powers of investigation; they can take proof through their committees or otherwise as to any matter on which they may be obliged to decide, and, either before or after the opening of all the votes, they can thus investigate, though not, it must be admitted, with the aid of a jury, nor in the precise forms of a judicial proceeding. They can investigate, as political and legislative bodies may, touching all the facts and circumstances that are necessary to be known in order to enlighten their judgment and guide them to a just and righteous decision.

Our construction thus recognizes in those two bodies on such a contingency as is here presented full power to do whatever may be needful to the accomplishment of justice.

What is the objection to this construction? The whole argument against it resolves itself simply into the argument ab inconvenienti. Those who would seek to grasp a high office by illegal, irregular, and fraudulent means claim that it would be inconvenient to take so much trouble as might become necessary in order to investigate rightly and rightly to determine, on proofs, the question of their delinquency and the falsehood of their claim. This is a common plea among persons who set up a falsely and fraudulently contrived title. When an effort is made to strip them of their pretended authority by demonstrating before a court or other appropriate tribunal the fallacy of their claims and the necessity to the ends of justice of having that fallacy declared and their pretensions set aside, they point out the trouble involved in the task. But let us see how stands that argument. Let us test it by ordinary and familiar principles.

It is suggested that it might lead, and if entered upon must necessarily lead, if the parties think fit, to an investigation of the personal qualifications of every one among millions of electors, and that if you lay down the rule or adopt the principle that you have a right to investigate at all, you open the door to that inconvenient and boundless sea of litigation. The mischief of this, they say, would be so great that it is better to let injustice triumph and permit a usurper to enter the executive office by the most unholy of avenues, that which is paved with falsehood, fraud, and corruption. They say it is better to submit to all that or any other more enormous evil, if a more enormous one can be imagined, than to submit to the shocking and monstrous inconvenience that is thus to result from any attempt to inquire into the validity of the election!

There is really nothing in this broadly presented picture of overwhelming inconvenience. They say no matter how we should limit our inquiries to a very narrow range, for if you allow any investigation you will establish the doctrine, you will open the door to intolerably protracted litigation. This suggestion is not warranted by law or the practice of courts in such investigations. True it is that in a writ of quo warranto to inquire into the title of an individual to an office it is competent to investigate all the particulars down to the qualifications of each individual voter, and on a point of identity similar to that which occurred in the Tichborne case one trial might take many years. This is presenting a "raw head and bloody bones" to frighten this Commission and the whole country from its propriety.

The answer to all that is as simple as can possibly be imagined. The objection you perceive applies as much to ordinary writs of quo warranto in reference to ordinary offices as it does to this inquiry if it should take place before Congress. For this argument ab inconvenienti is as fatal to the general procedure of courts of justice in actions of quo warranto as it is to the proceeding here suggested.

But, if the learned Commission please, the investigation which might be allowed to take place before either House of Congress or any commission appointed by them, would be governed by the same principles of general jurisprudence which apply to the determination of proceedings by quo warranto; and one of those principles is that no man has a right to the writ of quo warranto as of course or merely because he makes out an apparent title. It has always been a matter of discretion. Numerous cases are cited here for that purpose on the other side. It has always been treated as a matter of discretion in the power of the supreme tribunal, acting in the name and majesty of the sovereign power, when applied to for a writ of quo warranto, to allow it or not as under all the circumstances may be thought most consistent with the public interest and the ends of justice and the convenience of society; and, by consequence, this expanded inquiry could never take place in the writ of quo warranto; it never would be allowed; no court would ever permit the writ to issue without a statement of the points intended to be made; and, if it were necessary in allowing the writ the court would lay their restraint on the party as to what points or questions he might make.

So it appears that in all investigations, judicial or otherwise, as to the right of a particular individual to hold and exercise a public office, it is in the discretion of the tribunals how far they will go, and it is in your discretion, as it would be in the discretion of either House of Congress investigating for its own advice and direction, as to the election of President or Vice-President, to determine whether they would permit any of these intolerably prolix investigations.

So much for the argument ab inconvenienti. It has no application. Standing upon the ancient practices of the law, the authority that might be called upon to institute an investigation would look at the difficulty presented and say under the influence of a due regard to the argument ab inconvenienti, "thus far you may go; no farther shall you go."

Now in reference to the legal question presented, as to what powers each House of Congress has, under existing laws, and what powers consequently you can exercise, we say, as the learned manager from the House said in opening this case, that there is no technical legal limit or barrier, but that you exercise the same high power of the Government which has always been exercised in such questions even in the courts of the common law to which application must be made to obtain the writ of quo warranto. You exercise the same discretion, but you can limit the inquiry, when the point arises, within those limits that are prescribed by necessity and convenience.

Now this is our view stated as fully as it is in my power to state it in the brief time I am permitted to occupy the attention of your honors. We say that there is no limit to the power of investigation for the purpose of reaching the ends of justice, except such as a due regard for public convenience and the interests of public justice and society at large may impose in the exercise of this discretionary authority.

Well, what is our condition and the condition of all cases of this kind? There is no judicial court of the United States clothed with authority to deal with the premises. We assert that, without stopping to cite books and to prove it to you negatively. It seems to be conceded that, if such a power might have been created, it has remained dormant and has not been exercised. And consequently we are told that here we stand, in the second century of this Republic's existence, in such a condition that there is no possible remedy against the most palpable fraud and forgery that could be perpetrated or against any outrageous acts in violation of the rights of the people of the respective States and of the whole nation; that Congress must sit by blind and silent and permit an alien to be counted into office as President of the United States; they must sit by and permit a set of votes plainly and palpably fraudulent, votes given by individuals not only disqualified for want of having been chosen by the States but being themselves absolutely disqualified by the Constitution from acting in the office or casting the vote, and must permit the usurpation contemplated to take place merely because our wise fathers—one would think that the compliment was intended as a sarcasm—had so chosen to constitute the Government they created that injustice, however flagitious, might be perpetrated in open day without the possibility of having any remedy or even uttering decorously a complaint.

This, we humbly submit, cannot be the Constitution and the law. Reason forbids. All acts, however solemn, however sacred, from whatever quarter coming, by whatever body perpetrated, are liable to review in some manner, in some judicial or other tribunal, so that fraud and falsehood may shrink abashed and defeated and may fail in the attempt to trample upon the right.

It seems to be virtually conceded here that the governor's certificate is not conclusive. I have not time to say much about that. It is not required by the Constitution. It is only required by an act of Congress. The governor could not have been compelled to give it. Many circumstances might prevent his giving it, and he might have given it under circumstances of plainly flagitious falsehood, without any election, without any proceeding had to sanction it. He might have given his certificate to his own four little boys and constituted them an electoral college, and the vote which they gave pursuant to his bidding, by force of his certificate, would be absolutely conclusive, forsooth, and binding upon all the authorities of the United States that had any power to act in the premises!

I submit to your honors that this is not so, and I beg you to turn, when you come to consider this matter, to the citations of the Amistad case in Mr. Green's brief, 15 Peters, 594, where the Supreme Court, speaking by the voice of Judge Story, pronounced all decisions of every description, however solemn, impeachable for fraud and capable of being reversed. In the case of the State of Michigan vs. Phoenix Bahk, in 33 New York—I will refer to the particular page, though I will not stop to read it—page 27, your honors will find that the most solemn judgments of any court may be overhauled and reviewed and be shown to have been procured by a trick, a deception, or a falsehood, and may be completely reversed and defeated.

The inquiry then is, How far are we to go in this case? The Florida laws to which you have been referred show that it may not be necessary to go further, and we have not asserted that it will be necessary to go further, than to make a correction of the unlawful extrajudicial acts of the canvassing-board. When you come to look at the law which is contained in the little document placed before you, at page 55, you will find that there is no such sanctity attending the action of this State board as is supposed. They have but little power in the matter.

If any such returns—

That is, the county returns to them—

shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration; and the secretary of state shall preserve and file in his office all such returns, together with such other documents and papers as may have been received by him or by said board of canvassers.

One of which must be the certificate of their action rejecting these returns. The law itself provides for and contemplates an investigation of the action of the board of State canvassers; and turning back to the laws in relation to the county board of canvassers, and to the inspectors of elections, you find that neither of those bodies has any power whatever except simply to compute and return the vote as received. Such is the case as to the primary board of canvassers and the second board of canvassers, and the last and ultimate board of canvassers have these very limited powers, which they seem to have exercised only in respect to one single county if you are to take our assertions as an evidence of the probable line of proof before you, because they rejected some little fragments of three other counties, but did not exercise the power of rejecting the whole of these returns, which was the only power that they possessed. In one single county they seem by some human possibility to have acted within the limits of their power and authority; I say it may be supposed rather that by some human possibility they did act within them. We purpose to show that they did not. We show it by their own certificate which the law compelled them to file and place along with the canvass which they made, and which very short, brief, and simple proof will demonstrate the monstrosity of the deed that we seek to set aside.

We claim that the quo warranto is admissible. You will perceive by looking at that same statute to which we have referred that unless the electors are State officers this canvassing-board had no authority whatever to deal with the subject, and you would be called upon to disregard the canvass which they made and to look at the county returns which the law does authorize to be made in reference to presidential electors as well as State officers, in terms. If they are State officers, surely they were subject to correction by the State if there were any possible means or contrivance by which they could be corrected at all; and the familiar, ordinary, regular course of proceeding by quo warranto was commenced in due season, before they had actually cast their vote, and their authority was determined to be utterly void, it was annulled, and that, too, long before their vote had reached the seat of Government or could possibly have been subjected to count. If they are not State officers, then we have done with the canvass of the State board, and have only to look, in case you pass by the governor's certificate, to the next element of proof, and that is the whole set of county returns, which being footed up would show the result to be as we claim, and that the governor's certificate was utterly false.

Subsequent legislation has been placed before your honors and a subsequent investigation for the purpose of a recanvass, or will be before your honors if necessary; indeed, it is before your honors already in the original documents opened by the President of the Senate and which, at least, are here.

We claim that on these principles and on these proofs and such full proofs as may be offered to you, subject only to the restraint to which I have referred that you may exercise in your discretion, you have a right to go on to investigate this matter and to determine two things: first, whether the Hayes electoral vote is valid; and, secondly, whether the Tilden electoral vote is valid. The final decision at which you may arrive might reject either or might reject both. They are not involved in precisely the same question necessarily. Different questions might possibly apply, and the vote for Mr. Hayes might be pronounced invalid and the vote for Mr. Tilden equally so. I have not time to discuss more fully the question as to the right of setting up the Tilden vote in case the Hayes vote should be rejected.

Perhaps in the little time that is left to me I have hardly an opportunity of saying one word in reference to that which is the main reliance of these parties, and that is the doctrine of officer de facto.

What is this doctrine of officer de facto? The best definition of an officer de facto that I have fallen in with is given by Lord Ellenborough, in The King vs. The Corporation of Bedford Level, 6 East, 368:

An officer de facto is one who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, and yet is not a good officer in point of law.

One who somehow has clothed himself with a reputation of being the officer; and in relation to that person the law, with its wise conservatism, has declared that during the period that the person pretending title to the office was in apparent possession of all its powers and functions and exercised the duties of it, his acts, as it respects persons who in the ordinary course of things were obliged to recognize him and to act under him and in conformity with his directions and his power, shall be esteemed valid, that individuals may not be deceived by this species of disorder or temporary insurrection that has broken in upon the functions of government.

It is the duty of individuals, and they are under a necessity also for their own business purposes, of bowing to the existing authorities who have thus color of right and are the only authorities to which they can refer, and in that action, as a reward for their humble obedience and respect for order, regularity, and the apparent law, they are held to be entitled to protection, and in all forms, ways, and places that may be needed they are protected. The officer himself, however, is never protected. That this is the precise rule in relation to that class of officers, I would take leave to prove by referring your honors to Green vs. Burke, 23 Wendell, 502, where a very able opinion was written by one of the most elaborate investigators of legal authorities that I have known or ever heard of, Judge Cowen, formerly of the State of New York. The cases, to be sure, have gone pretty far. He examined all the authorities, and what he says is:

I know the cases have gone a great way; but they have stopped with preventing mischief to such as confide in officers who are acting without right.

A summing up of the authorities and of the principle.

Now, what is the proposition here contended for? That these officers, having acted under color of right, and having completely exercised and perfected the function with which they appeared, it is said, to be charged, and with which, if they were duly elected, they were charged, any subsequent attempt to set it aside would be contrary to that principle, contrary to convenience, and mischievous to society. Is this so? Is not that principle of necessity confined to acts affecting private persons? Is not that necessity confined to cases where the act of the officer de facto is consummated and perfected and has taken effect in some manner before it is ascertained that he is not entitled to his office and he is ousted? Are the bank-notes of a bank not having authority to issue them, though signed, perfected, and finished, and put in the hands of an agent, valid and effectual under this principle until some person has confided in them, has received them, and thus been misled by the appearance of right with which the bank had improperly clothed itself?

We maintain that neither the public good, nor the protection of men from deception, nor any rule of convenience or policy, requires the allowance of pretended electors, whose title, on an investigation by competent authority before the votes have been opened and counted, has been ascertained to be groundless.

Referring to the facts of the case, what do we find? These four gentlemen sat down with a false governor's certificate or a sham certificate from a board of State canvassers, and they of their own authority, certifying their acts themselves, cast four votes in a given direction, put them in a packet, and sent it to an officer, who cannot look at it until the time of its presentation for the purpose of being considered and counted. Before the time arrived at which that act of theirs could deceive anybody, could have any operation, could take any effect, could get into such a condition that its preservation and maintenance was necessary to the cause of public justice or private right, their lack of title was ascertained by a solemn writ of quo warranto to be groundless; it was determined that they were usurpers, had no right to the office, and that their acts were void. Is there any such principle as that the inchoate, partial action of an officer de facto shall be carried onward, carried forward, and given its perfection by the acceptance of the act as a due and valid act after the invalidity of that officer's claim has been established? Here we repose, upon the quo warranto under your honors' allowance, or repose upon the proofs which may be here offered, admitted, and passed upon by your honors, for the purpose of showing the utter invalidity of these gentlemen's claim to the office of electors. In whichever shape this matter is presented or carried forward, that the act of these officers de facto fails to have reached the point where it could have or take any effect, or mislead or deceive anybody, is shown and established by competent means to be an act of those who had no authority to perform it.

And the position of the thing is very striking in this singular attitude which the other side have assumed, the attitude of an undoubted, undisputed, convicted usurper. They claim to be received and that their act shall have an effect which as yet it never has had, although since the time they performed the initiatory and preliminary step they have been shown to be utterly without right to their pretended offices. It may be said that this sharpened arrow aimed at the heart of the nation, aimed for the purpose of establishing falsehood, seating a usurper, and trampling down the right of the State and of the Union—it may be said that this arrow was placed in the bow of the false elector, that adequate force and strength were imparted to it to carry it to the bosom that was to be wounded and stung to death by it; but it cannot be denied, if the quo warranto is effectual, or if we have a right now to prove the facts of the case, that a shield is interposed between the wrong-doer's arrow and the bosom he designed to pierce, by which that arrow, steeped in guilt and fraud, designed for the perpetration of injustice and the consummation of an atrocious wrong, has been arrested in its flight and deprived of its poison and its force.

In this connection, under this strange head of a claim to have a de facto President by force of a set of de facto electors, I would call your honors' attention to a single view of which this case is susceptible. Although there may be an officer de facto, it seems to be in the nature of things that there cannot be an unlawful, unauthorized tribunal or body de facto acting without right. These persons could not act except by constituting what has been well enough called an electoral college, of which they were to be the members. They undertook to constitute it. It was an electoral college of their own. They filled it up with their own wrongful claims and intrusive persons, and thus sought to create by wrong and without one single element of right but this mere color or reputation resting in these individuals a lawful electoral college. I would ask your honors for the purpose of showing that that distinction is entitled to considerable weight, to refer to the case of Hildreth's Heirs against McIntyre's Devisee, (1 J. J. Marshall's Kentucky Reports, 206,) where certain persons, being no doubt de facto officers, claimed that they had established a de facto court; and the determination, upon very good reasoning which I submit to your honors' consideration, was that there could not be a de facto court, although there might be a de facto judge or a de facto officer; and we say, by the same reasoning, there cannot be an unlawful de facto electoral college composed of mere pretenders to that office who have no right.

In this connection you have exactly the case that was before the court there and which, perhaps, exists in other States of this Union about this time. You have the case of two distinct bodies existing at the same time, one rightful and the other wrongful; I mean formal bodies attempted to be created. The Tilden electors who, though they had not documentary evidence to establish their title, had actually been elected, if our evidence is to be believed, convened their electoral college, performed every ceremony that the Constitution of the United States enjoined upon them, performed every ceremony that the laws of the United States enjoined upon them and that it was possible to perform, failing only in this, that they did not obtain the certificate of the governor. They met; they constituted a college; they acted; and they sent forward their votes. Thus you have two rival bodies acting at, to be sure, the right time and in the right place, as prescribed by all laws bearing on this subject; two rival colleges, one of which was composed of persons truly elected, the other of which was composed of persons who had no right, but only the mere color of pretense of right, who were usurpers, as has been ascertained in one form, and will be ascertained in any other that will be satisfactory to you, if you will permit us to present the evidence.

This, then, is the actual condition of this case. The Constitution prescribes no forms save such as have been complied with by the Tilden electors; the laws of Congress prescribe no forms that were not complied with by the Tilden electors, save and except only that they could not obtain the governor's certificate; and it is pretty much conceded, I think, that the governor's certificate is not absolutely indispensable, and might be gainsaid and contradicted even if it had been given.

So then, in this case of rivalry between these two sets of electors, it appears to me that we present the best legal title. That we have the moral right is the common sentiment of all mankind. It will be the judgment of posterity. There lives not a man, so far as I know, upon the face of this earth, who, having the faculty of blushing, could look an honest man in the face and assert that the Hayes electors were truly elected. The whole question, therefore, is whether in what has taken place there has been such an observance of form as is totally fatal to justice, and beyond the reach of any curative process of any description.

I have just about time left to say that it was not intentional that the law of Florida in relation to writs of quo warranto was omitted. I have copies of it, enough, I think, to deliver to the court; but I found, on looking about after an observation was made about it, that I have not any of them here. I will have them delivered to the court. They were printed long ago, with the view of having them sent up, but the gentleman who prepared the pamphlet copies of some of the laws here did not insert it. Perhaps it was because he knew it was already printed, and thought it was already here. I have not had time to inquire into that, nor is it at all necessary. That law is to be found in the laws of Florida for 1872, page 29. It will be found that it does not confine the effect of the quo warranto to the parties prosecuting; that it does not in any way impair or diminish or lessen the force and effect of the judgment in quo warranto at the suit of the rival claimant, who was justly entitled to the office, except in this: it provides in section 3 that, while the judgment is to have full effect and to entitle the relator to be placed in the office until he is ousted, the judgment in the case shall not have conclusive effect as against the State in case the State shall prosecute another quo warranto in its own behalf against the party who was successful in the first. That is all that that law requires. It in no way changes or diminishes the effect.

Now, I think I have observed as much as was any way needful upon the other questions as to what evidence is admissible here. I conceive that the propositions we have advanced have the effect of entitling us to produce any evidence here which either of the Houses of Congress prosecuting an investigation of this description might lawfully receive, and that we are subject here only, as we would be before one of the Houses of Congress, to the discretion which I have before referred to, by which you can restrain us as you can restrain the other party from going into interminable and absurd inquiries.

As to what is actually here, the course of my argument has been intended to establish and, if of any value, has established that each House of Congress had jurisdiction of the matter, each of them at least of one section of it, and, therefore, that the evidence which, according to the customs and usages of legislative bodies, either House has taken and has upon its files and will consent to send in here or has sent in here at our request, is already in evidence in the case, so far as to be here, to be read if it comes within the range of subjects as of matter of fact which you will allow us to investigate; it is as good evidence as if we produced witnesses or documents here at the bar and examined them according to the usages of the common law.

Mr. EVARTS. Your honors will allow me to refer to page 32 of the Congressional Record of February 3, which I omitted to do, though I had the passage marked, to indicate the result of the different computations under the new statute and under the quo warranto and under the mandamus, all ending in canvasses that resulted in favor of the Hayes electors.

Mr. O'CONNOR. This matter in a newspaper is certainly not to be accepted here as evidence. It is a report of a minority of a committee of Congress.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. We have not admitted any evidence of this kind yet.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But your honors will permit us to say that this is brought forward as matter of fact. We have not relied on being able to establish facts by the reports of certain gentlemen in Congress. It is the evidence which they took on which we rely. If these reports as reports, the opinions of these gentlemen, are evidence, very well; let us understand it.

The PRESIDENT. The reference to it does not make it evidence.

Mr. EVARTS. I do not offer it as evidence, but I offer it for your honors' information, and in answer to the intimation of the learned counsel that every man, woman, and child knew that, if the canvass was not so, then the Hayes electors were not chosen.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It will be very apparent.

Mr. EVARTS. This is the matter to which I refer :

As a summary of the various ways of estimating the vote of the State of Florida on the 7th of November, the minority submit the following :

I. If the vote be reckoned by the face of the returns which were opened by the board on the 28th of November, and unanimously declared, (Attorney-General Cocke concurring,) under the rule of the board, to be the regular returns, having all the legal formalities complied with, the majority for the Hayes electors is 43.

II. If the vote be reckoned by the official statutory declaration of the canvassing-board exercising its jurisdiction under the State statute, in accordance with the practice adopted without objection, and by the advice of the democratic attorney-general, Cocke, and never disputed until the result of this canvass was about to be determined, which declaration in the belief of the minority is final and irreversible, the majority for the Hayes electors is 925.

III. If the vote be reckoned upon the principles laid down by the supreme court in their order to re-canvass in the case of Drew vs. Governor Stearns, of not purging the polls of illegal votes and retaining the true vote, but of rejecting the whole county return when appearing or shown to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the true vote could not be ascertained, the result would be, according to the declaration of the board, a majority for the Hayes electors of 211.

IV. If the board had thoroughly reconsidered, according to the decision of the supreme court, the various county returns for the purpose of throwing out in toto all that could be shown to be irregular, false, or fraudulent, instead of purging the returns of their illegalities and returning the true vote, there should be thrown out the returns from the following counties:

| Counties. | Tilden electors. | Hayes electors. |
|----------------|------------------|-----------------|
| Baker | 238 | 143 |
| Clay | 287 | 122 |
| Hamilton | 617 | 330 |
| Jackson | 1,397 | 1,299 |
| Manatee | 262 | 26 |
| Total | 2,801 | 1,920 |

eaving a majority for the Hayes electors of 791.

V. If the vote of the State were to be estimated according to the honest and true vote of the people at the polls, without regard to precinct, county, or State canvassers, the result would be, according to the judgment of the minority, a larger majority for the Hayes electors than the declared majority of 925.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Can counsel on either side furnish the Commission with a copy of the Florida quo-warranto law mentioned to-day?

Mr. EVARTS. I have handed it to the clerk, who will have it printed. I believe the court understands that that is a law amending the general quo-warranto law, which is found in another place.

Mr. MERRICK. If your honors please, may we be allowed to file with the Secretary in a very short time a memorandum of authorities and citations from them, which we have had printed for the convenience of the Commission, and which was to have been here this morning, but has not yet come to hand, although we expect to receive it in the course of a very few minutes?

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Merrick asks leave to file a printed list of authorities which he hopes to receive in a few minutes. Shall he have that leave?

Leave was granted.

Mr. EVARTS. We ought to be able to place in your honors' hands a printed list of authorities.

The PRESIDENT. It is so eminently just, if allowed on one side, that the same right ought to be accorded to the other, that I will take the privilege of giving the consent without putting the question to the Commission.

On motion, the Commission took a recess for three-quarters of an hour. On re-assembling at three o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m., the Commission proceeded to deliberate with closed doors.

The room being cleared, and the doors closed, the Commission, at three o'clock and fifteen minutes, met for deliberation as to whether any, and what, evidence would be considered in the matter of the electoral vote of the State of Florida.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner THURMAN,

Ordered, That the public session of the Commission be adjourned until day after to-morrow, (Wednesday, the 7th instant,) at eleven o'clock a. m.

After some time spent in deliberation, at three o'clock and forty-five minutes the Commission adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, noon.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner FRELINGHUYSEN, it was

The Commission resumed its session for deliberation on the question pending in the matter of the electoral vote of the State of Florida.

After debate,

The hour of eleven o'clock a. m. having arrived, and the doors being considered as open,

On motion of Mr. Commissioner MORTON, it was Ordered, That the public session of the Commission be adjourned until eleven o'clock a. m. to-morrow, the 8th instant.

Thereupon, the Commission resumed its session for deliberation with closed doors.

After further debate,

The hour of three o'clock having arrived, being the time designated by an order of the Commission at which the question on the matter pending should be submitted,

Mr. Commissioner MILLER moved the following order:

Ordered, That no evidence will be received or considered by the Commission which was not submitted to the joint convention of the two Houses by the President of the Senate with the different certificates, except such as relates to the eligibility of F. C. Humphreys, one of the electors.

The question being on its adoption, it was determined in the affirmative :

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT. The proceedings to-day are under the orders adopted yesterday, of which, on motion of Mr. Thurman, counsel were notified last evening. The Secretary was directed to notify counsel that at eleven o'clock to-day the Commission would proceed with the case now before it, subject of course to the two orders which have been read in the proceedings of yesterday; one, that no evidence will be received except what was submitted to the two Houses by the President of the Senate; and the other, that in the case of Florida this Commission will receive evidence relating to the eligibility of one elector named.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. President and gentlemen, will you give the marshal an order to admit the witnesses for the objectors? There are two or three witnesses in attendance who are not allowed to enter without such an order.

The PRESIDENT, (to members of the Commission.) Shall the marshal be so directed? [Putting the question.] The motion is adopted. The marshal will admit the witnesses designated by the counsel who made the motion.

Mr. EVARTS. May I ask for an order that a witness in attendance on our part, Mr. Humphreys, may be admitted?

The PRESIDENT. I will give the order without putting the question. The marshal will admit the witness.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President and Commissioners, we propose to call as a witness George P. Raney, of Florida.

The PRESIDENT. The witnesses who are called will be sworn by the Secretary.

The Secretary administered an oath to the respective witnesses in the following form:

You do solemnly swear that the evidence you shall give in the case now before the Commission shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

GEORGE P. RANEY sworn and examined.

By Mr. GREEN:

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. I reside in Tallahassee, Florida.

Q. What is your occupation or profession?—A. I am a lawyer by profession.

Q. What official position do you hold, if any?—A. I am attorney-general of the State of Florida.

Q. Where were you on the 6th of December, 1876?—A. I was in the city of Tallahassee, in the State of Florida.

Q. Have you any knowledge as to the time of the service of the writ of quo warranto?

Mr. EVARTS. One moment. That is not within the license, as we understand, of the order of the Commission.

Mr. GREEN. I should like to hear the objection stated.

Mr. EVARTS. The objection is that it is not within the order of the Commission admitting evidence concerning the eligibility of Mr. Humphreys and excluding all other evidence.

Mr. GREEN. We propose to prove by this witness the simple fact as to the precise time when the writ of quo warranto was served upon Messrs. Humphreys and others, known as the Hayes electors. It is apprehended upon our side that the order which has been made by the Commission does not in its spirit exclude the consideration of the quo warranto proceedings which have been laid upon the table, and it is in aid of what may be perhaps considered a question as to the precise moment when the writ of quo warranto was served upon Humphreys and others, that we desire to make this proof this morning.

The PRESIDENT. I will submit the question to the Commission. Gentlemen of the Commission, is the objection well taken? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the objection is sustained. Proceed with the examination of the witness.

Mr. GREEN. We can now dispense with this witness and will call James E. Yonge.

JAMES E. YONGE sworn and examined.

By Mr. GREEN:

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. At Pensacola, Florida.

Q. Do you know Frederick C. Humphreys?—A. I do.

Q. Where does he reside?—A. At Pensacola, Florida.

Q. How long have you known him?—A. I have known him for about ten years.

Q. What is his business or occupation?—A. Agent for an express company, and has been United States shipping-commissioner.

Q. Have you known him to act in the capacity of United States shipping-commissioner?—A. I have.

Mr. EVARTS. We submit that if an official position is to be proved as by authority communicated from the Government, in the absence of some reason to the contrary, the official appointment should be given.

The PRESIDENT. Perhaps it is about to be produced.

Mr. GREEN. This is evidence of his use of the office.

Mr. EVARTS. That is my objection, that use is not sufficient on a matter depending upon authority.

Mr. GREEN. We propose to follow that—

The PRESIDENT. You had better introduce the commission at once, to save time.

Mr. GREEN. I offer in evidence an order of the United States circuit court for the northern district of Florida at the December term, 1872:

United States circuit court, northern district of Florida. December term, 1872.

DECEMBER 3, 1872.

In the matter of the appointment of Frederick C. Humphreys, shipping-commissioner of the port of Pensacola.

Ordered by the court that Frederick C. Humphreys, of Pensacola, be, and he is hereby, appointed shipping-commissioner for the port of Pensacola.

Further ordered that said commissioner may enter upon the duties of his said appointment upon taking and filing the oath prescribed by law. And it is further ordered that the clerk of this court do furnish said commissioner with a certified copy of this order.

I. J. E. Townsend, clerk of the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, do certify that the above and foregoing is a true copy of the original order as of record in this office.

[SEAL.]

J. E. TOWNSEND, Clerk.

I do solemnly swear that I will support the Constitution of the United States; and that I will truly and faithfully discharge the duties of a shipping-commissioner to the best of my ability and according to law.

F. C. HUMPHREYS.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 9th day of December, A. D. 1872.

GEO. E. WENTWORTH,

United States Commissioner for the United States Circuit Court,
Northern District of Florida.

Filed December 9, 1872.

M. P. DE RIOBOO, Clerk.

Northern District of Florida :

I, M. P. De Rioboo, clerk United States circuit court, in and for said district, at Pensacola, do hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy as the same remains on file in my office. I further certify that no resignation of said office of shipping-commissioner has been filed in my office by the said Frederick C. Humphreys.

Given under my hand and seal of said court, at Pensacola, this January 24, 1877.

[SEAL.]

M. P. DE RIOBOO, Clerk.

Q. (By Mr. Green.) Do you know Frederick C. Humphreys, one of the persons who was voted for as an elector for President and Vice-President of the United States at the election in November, 1876?—A. I do.

Q. Is he, or is he not, the same Frederick C. Humphreys of whom you have spoken as being United States shipping-commissioner?—A. He is the same person.

Q. Have you seen Mr. Frederick C. Humphreys in the exercise of any acts as United States shipping-commissioner?—A. I have had transactions with him in that capacity.

Q. How late and when?—A. I had transactions with him from time to time from the early part of 1873 up to the date of my leaving Pensacola, some time between the middle and latter part of August of last year.

Q. Describe the business you had with Mr. Humphreys as shipping-commissioner.—A. I frequently had occasion to communicate with him on the subject of the discharge of American seamen. His duties in the capacity of shipping-commissioner related to such matters between American seamen and shipping-masters.

Q. Did you testify as to your occupation?—A. I did not.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. I am a lawyer.

Q. Engaged in the practice of your profession where?—A. In Pensacola.

Q. And as a lawyer have you from time to time had transactions with Mr. Humphreys as United States shipping-commissioner?—A. I have.

Q. Have you appeared before him from time to time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How late?—A. From time to time, as I answered before, up to the date of my leaving Pensacola, which was between the middle and latter part of August of last year, 1876.

Q. Did Mr. Humphreys, as United States commissioner, take cognizance of any, and, if so, what, questions which may have been from time to time presented to him?—A. The ordinary questions of difference between seamen and masters of vessels—questions of the right to their discharge and the right to receive their wages.

Q. Did he hold court there for that purpose?—A. It was a sort of informal court.

Q. In which parties appeared before him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he hear evidence?—A. He heard the testimony.

Q. And arguments of counsel?—A. When arguments were presented. It was seldom that arguments were presented in such cases.

Mr. GREEN. That is all.

The PRESIDENT. Do the other side desire to cross-examine?

Mr. EVARTS and Mr. STOUGHTON. No.

Mr. GREEN. That is all that we propose to offer on that point by way of affirmative evidence, unless there may be something which may be required to be offered by way of rebuttal when the other side shall have presented their testimony.

The PRESIDENT. Is there anything to be offered on the other side?

Mr. EVARTS. Without commenting upon the state of the proof thus far reached as calling upon us to offer any evidence in rebuttal, principally upon the point that as yet no evidence has been adduced which shows that he held and exercised the office of shipping-commissioner at the date of the November election, we will introduce the proof on our part and leave any question for discussion hereafter.

F. C. HUMPHREYS sworn and examined.

By Mr. STOUGHTON:

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. In Pensacola.

Q. Were you a candidate for elector?—A. I was.

Q. On the republican ticket?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had you prior to being such candidate held any office?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What?—A. I was United States shipping-commissioner for the port of Pensacola.

Q. When did you cease to act as such?—A. On the 5th day of October, when acceptance of my resignation was received from Judge Woods.

Q. Did you resign your office?—A. I did.

Q. By resignation to whom?—A. By resignation through the mail.

Q. To whom?—A. To Judge Woods.

Q. Have you the acceptance of that resignation?—A. I have.

Q. Have you that in your possession?—A. I have.

Q. Be kind enough to let me see it.—A. [Producing a paper.] That is the paper.

Q. Judge Woods is one of the circuit judges of the United States?

The PRESIDENT. The court is aware of that.

Mr. MERRICK. We object, if your honors please, to the production of this paper as the acceptance of a resignation, as it is the act of an individual and not the act of the court.

The PRESIDENT. The simple question now is whether you object to its admissibility. Its effect will be a subject of argument afterward.

Mr. EVARTS. Its authenticity is not objected to.

Mr. MERRICK. It is hardly anticipating the main question, but of course I will waive it at the suggestion of the President of the Commission for the present.

The PRESIDENT. Its effect can be judged of afterward.

Mr. MERRICK. If I shall not be understood as waiving my objection, very well.

The PRESIDENT. The question of its effect will be considered as reserved.

Q. (By Mr. Stoughton.) You received from Judge Woods, in reply to your resignation, this paper?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. It had better be read.

Mr. STOUGHTON. I will read it.

NEWARK, October, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I inclose the acceptance of your resignation as shipping-commissioner. The vacancy can only be filled by the circuit court, and until I can go to Pensacola to open court for that purpose, the duties of the office will have to be discharged by the collector.

Respectfully, yours,

W. B. WOODS.

Major F. C. HUMPHREYS,
Pensacola, Fla.

To F. C. HUMPHREYS, Esq.,
Pensacola, Fla.:

Your letter of the 24th of September, 1876, resigning your office of United States shipping-commissioner for the port of Pensacola, in the State of Florida, has been received, and your resignation of said office is hereby accepted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. B. WOODS,
United States Circuit Judge.

Oct. 2, 1876.

Mr. MERRICK. What place is it dated?

Mr. STOUGHTON. Newark.

Mr. EVARTS. What State?

Mr. STOUGHTON. There is no State on it.

The PRESIDENT. If no objection be made, the paper will be filed with the Secretary.

Mr. STOUGHTON. I have another, may it please your honors. [To the witness.] Did you receive the paper I now hold in my hand, dated October 1, 1876, from Hiram Potter, collector of customs at Pensacola?

A. I did.

Q. Is this his signature?—A. It is.

Mr. MERRICK. We object to that paper being received.

Mr. STOUGHTON. It connects itself with the other two, as the Commission will see.

Mr. MERRICK. I make the objection, reserving the consideration of the question.

The PRESIDENT. It will be received subject to the decision of the Commission as to its effect.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir; and as to its admissibility, also.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. STOUGHTON. This letter is:

CUSTOM-HOUSE, PENSACOLA, FLORIDA,
Collector's Office, October 5, 1876.

F. C. HUMPHREYS, Esq.,
Pensacola, Fla.:

SIR: I am informed by Judge Woods that he has accepted your resignation as U. S. shipping-commissioner, and that it devolves upon me to assume the duties of the office until a regular appointment shall be made by the circuit court. I respectfully request, therefore, that you will turn over to me such public books, papers, records, &c., as may pertain to the business.

I remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HIRAM POTTER, JR.,
Collector of Customs.

(To the witness.) Was he the collector?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

Q. (By Mr. STOUGHTON.) Did you cease to act in your office from the time of the receipt of the letter accepting your resignation?—A. I did.

Q. Have you acted at all in that capacity since?—A. No, sir.

Q. Has the collector acted in your place?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you turn over to the collector whatever you had of public papers or property connected with the office, if you had any?—A. I had none. The blanks were my personal property, bought and paid for with my own money.

Cross-examined by Mr. HOADLY:

Q. Have you a copy of your letter of resignation?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did you convey it to Judge Woods?—A. Through the mail.

Q. To what point did you address that?—A. To Newark, in the State of Ohio. He was there on a visit.

Q. Judge Woods was on a visit to Newark, Ohio?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Has there been any open session of the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Florida since the date of that resignation?—A. No, sir.

Q. When did you receive Judge Woods's reply to your letter?—A. On the 5th of October.

The PRESIDENT. Is there anything further?

Mr. STOUGHTON. Nothing further.

The PRESIDENT. Anything in rebuttal?

Mr. MERRICK. Nothing further.

The PRESIDENT. The testimony is closed. The third rule is as follows:

Counsel, not exceeding two in number on each side, will be heard by the Commission on the merits of any case presented to it, not longer than two hours being allowed to each side, unless a longer time and additional counsel shall be specially authorized by the Commission.

I consider myself instructed to say that the whole case is now open for argument under that rule. If members of the Commission entertain a different view they will suggest it. That is my understanding on the construction I give. I think the order should be as before, that one counsel representing the objections to certificate No. 1 should open, that two on the other side should reply, and then the other counsel having the affirmative should have the close.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. President, we would ask, if it be agreeable to the Commission, that there should be allowed three counsel to be heard for the objectors to certificate No. 1.

The PRESIDENT. I will allow that without submitting the question to the Commission, provided no additional time is asked.

Mr. MERRICK. We were going to ask for some slight addition to our time.

The PRESIDENT. That is for the Commission.

Mr. MERRICK. The reason for asking that three be heard is that there is a new and quite important question raised by the testimony this morning in reference to Mr. Humphreys, and it enlarges very considerably the sphere of the argument.

The PRESIDENT. How much more time do you want?

Mr. MERRICK. An hour. We desire to have that question in its first presentation to the court fully presented, and it is a question upon which Mr. Hoadly has prepared himself with some careful examination, and it is one which before the Commission finally disperses may again arise; and we deem it important that it should be fairly, fully, and ably discussed when first presented to your consideration.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Mr. Merrick, nearly all the other questions were discussed in the first argument. The effect of the papers submitted by the President of the Senate was fully discussed in the opening argument by counsel on both sides, and it does seem to me, as we must get along and discharge this business, that we should get through with the argument to-day.

The PRESIDENT. What, if anything, is said on the other side? What are the views of the other side? Do they wish to be heard by three counsel?

Mr. EVARTS. We shall not want more than two hours, even if three should be allowed to speak.

The PRESIDENT. Will more than two counsel speak on your side?

Mr. EVARTS. I think not.

The PRESIDENT. The question submitted to the Commission is whether an additional hour shall be allowed to counsel for the time of argument.

The question being put, it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. HOADLY. May it please the Commission, it has been established by the proof that Frederick C. Humphreys held the office of shipping-commissioner by appointment of the circuit court of the United States in Florida. It has been established by the proof that before the November election he attempted to divest himself of this office by forwarding to the city of Newark, in the State of Ohio, a paper resignation of the office, and by receiving from the judge, not the court, acting not in Florida but in Ohio, an acceptance of that resignation.

The powers of this office are derived from section 4501 of the Revised Statutes:

The several circuit courts within the jurisdiction of which there is a port of entry, &c., shall appoint, &c.

The resignation cannot be made except to the same authority that appointed. The resignation could not, therefore, be made by letter addressed to the judge in Ohio. The acceptance of the resignation could not emanate from the judge in Ohio. The court has not since held a session. The court which clothed the officer with the power has not relieved him from the performance of the duty, and I respectfully submit that this proposition is sustained by a cause recently decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, the opinion in which has just been placed in my hands, the case of Badger and others vs. The United States on the relation of Bolton, a copy of the decision in which will be furnished to your honors. It is also, I am advised, according to the practice of the Government as shown by Document No. 123, Twenty-sixth Congress, second session, House of Representatives, and by the second volume of the Opinions of the Attorneys-General, pages 406 and 713. Therefore, considering that Frederick C. Humphreys had been duly appointed to this office, that by the laws of the United States it is shown to be an office of profit and trust, is by the Revised Statutes so made; considering that the judge of the circuit court acting in Ohio was not the circuit court and was not the power that clothed him with the authority, and could not relieve him from the performance of the duty with which he had been intrusted by another power; considering that the judge of the circuit court of the United States acting in chambers could not in Ohio release him from a trust with which the court not in chambers clothed him in Florida; considering these circumstances, we respectfully submit that he held an office of profit and trust on the day of the November election for electors of President and Vice-President, and that therefore the vote that he cast as an elector in December cannot be counted.

The provision of disqualification contained in the first section of the second article of the Constitution I will read, that I may have freshly before my own mind the text in reference to which this debate must proceed.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Before you proceed with that, will you state whether this was an office a resignation of which must be accepted, or could the officer resign of his own motion at any time?

Mr. HOADLY. There is nothing in the statute with regard to the resignation of this office at all. Having accepted the office, given bond, and taken oath to perform its duties, we submit that he could not divest himself of it by his own act. I will read the whole section which authorized the appointment:

The several circuit courts within the jurisdiction of which there is a port of entry which is also a port of ocean navigation shall appoint a commissioner for each such port which in their judgment may require the same, such commissioners to be termed shipping-commissioners; and may, from time to time, remove from office any commissioner whom the court may have reason to believe does not properly perform his duties, and shall then provide for the proper performance of his duties until another person is duly appointed in his place.

I submit that where the legislative body have created an office, and the judicial authority has, according to the law, clothed a person with the trusts of that office, public policy requires that it should not be held at his will and pleasure, it being an office of public convenience and necessity, for the performance of which bond is required to be given, and the filling of which may be at all times essential to the performance of public duty.

Turning to the constitutional provision, I read :

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress ; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

The form is mandatory ; it is negative ; that is, the provision of disqualification is negative. It is coupled with the grant of power by the word "but," which, together with the words of the context, shows that it is a limitation, a qualification, a diminution of the grant of power. The grant of power is to the State, not to the people of the State, but to the State as a legal entity, as an organized body-corporate in its character ; and to this grant thus given to the State is attached a limitation introduced by words of exception, "but no Senator or Representative shall be entitled." It is clothed in negative language. "Negative language," it is said, "will make a statute imperative ; and this is incontestable. Negative words will make a statute imperative. Affirmative words may ; negative must," as is stated in Sedgwick on Constitutional and Statutory Law, page 370 ; Copley on Constitutional Limitations, 75 ; Potter's Dwarrris on Statutes, 228 ; Rex vs. Justices of Leicester, 7 Barnewall & Cresswell, 6, 12.

But what is of more consequence than the form, although the form is indicative of the purpose of the authors in using the words of substance, the provision is in substance imperative and admits of no evasion. Lord Mansfield distinguishes mandatory from directory clauses in statutes by reference to "circumstances which are of the essence of a thing required to be done" as distinguished from circumstances which are "merely directory." Rex vs. Loxdale, 1 Burr., 447.

Having relation, as Lord Mansfield says, to that which is essential as different from that which is merely directory, I suggest that several circumstances show that our fathers, who framed this provision, considered it essential. It seems to have been first adopted into the Constitution on the motion of Mr. Gerry and Mr. Gouverneur Morris, in a slightly different form from that in which it now appears. On July 19, 1787, Mr. Gerry and Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved "that the electors of the Executive shall not be members of the National Legislature, nor officers of the United States, nor shall the electors themselves be eligible to the Supreme Magistracy. Agreed to nem. con." (Madison Papers, 343.)

On September 6, Mr. Rufus King and Mr. Gerry moved to insert in the fourth clause of the report, after the words "may be entitled in the Legislature," the following :

But no person shall be appointed an elector who is a member of the Legislature of the United States, or who holds any office of profit or trust under the United States.—Madison Papers, 515.

It passed nem. con. It was the unanimous will of our fathers, therefore, that this disqualification should attach ; that it should attach in the nature of an exception or proviso to the grant of power to the States to elect electors; that it should attach by disqualification of the persons who might be appointed electors; that it should attach by disqualification of the State in the appointment of electors. The State is disqualified from appointing, the elector from accepting the trust. The disqualification, therefore, is imposed both upon the appointing power and upon the candidate, and the effect of such disqualification, it is respectfully submitted, is to render the action of the State in the appointment null and void. The disqualification is of the action of the State; of the State in all its departments; of the voters of the State as well as of the government of the State. The disqualification binds every citizen of the State, every functionary of the State, and attaches to and qualifies and limits the corporate action of the State, and is equivalent to saying "the State may appoint from among the number of qualified persons." I submit that the substance and real meaning of the sentence, although it is cast in the negative and inhibitory form, is that from among the number of those who do not occupy positions of profit and trust the State may appoint electors. The object of our fathers in introducing, without dissent, this provision, was to prevent the Federal power, the officers controlling Federal agencies, from continuing their power through the influence of the offices of trust with which they were clothed for Federal and State benefit. It was not merely to protect the State in which the candidate might be elected from the intrusion of a Federal office-holder into the electoral office, but it was to protect every other State, each State, all the States, and the people of each and every State by a mutual covenant in the form of a limitation of power, that no State should appoint a disqualified person. Each State, therefore, through the agencies of the Federal Government, is entitled to be protected from the illegitimate use of Federal power in any State. Delaware, Oregon, the smallest of our States, are entitled to ask, through their Senators and Representatives, that the Federal power shall enforce this provision for their protection against the corruption of the elections in the larger States by means of the election of disqualified persons.

If it be said—but I do not think it will—that the remedy which our fathers provided for the evil which they apprehended has but little value, and that their forecast was not great, so much the more reason for rigidly insisting upon such value as it possesses now; for surely time has not proved, experience has not shown that the evils which our fathers apprehended, as they clearly manifested and showed by the text of the provision itself, are any less than they supposed they would be. The influence of Federal power through the candidacy of Federal officers for electors is explicitly here prohibited. The object is to diminish and prevent and restrict Federal interference in the election of electors. It is the duty, not of the States, in purging the votes of electors, but of the Federal Government, for the protection of each State, to insist upon and carry into full force this provision.

Again, the occasions upon which this provision has been considered during our history emphasize this suggestion as to the purpose of our fathers in adopting it. In 1837 five postmasters, or five persons bearing the same names as certain postmasters, were appointed or attempted to be appointed electors. Mr. Clay submitted, on January 27, 1837, this instruction, which he asked to be given to the joint committee of the Senate and House appointed to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, namely, that they should article of the Constitution; and if any such votes were given, what ought to be done with them; and whether any and what provision ought to be made for securing the faithful observance, in future, of that section of the Constitution.

Inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any votes were given at the recent election contrary to the prohibition contained in the second section of the second

The members of this committee on the part of the Senate were Felix Grundy, Henry Clay, and Silas Wright; on the part of the House, Francis Thomas, Churchill C. Cambreleng, John Reed, Henry W. Connor, and Francis S. Lyon, the latter of whom, I was informed in Mobile a few days since, is the only survivor, now living in Alabama at a great age, and deeply interested in this discussion. Mr. Grundy submitted a report of the committee on February 4, from which I desire to read the following quotation:

That the short period at which they were appointed, before the day on which the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States have to be counted, has prevented them from investigating the facts submitted to their examination as fully as might have been done had more time been allowed. The correspondence which has taken place between the chairman of the committee and the heads of the different departments of the executive branch of the government accompanies this report, from which it appears . . . that in two cases persons of the same names with the individuals who were appointed and voted as electors in the State of North Carolina held the office of deputy-postmaster under the General Government.

I suggest, in passing, that the course taken by this committee of the most eminent men of that generation indicates that I am right in the suggestion that the duty was then considered, as we now claim it should be, as imposed on the Federal power to take testimony so as to ascertain the facts and by Federal agencies enforce the prohibition for the protection not merely of the State in which the disqualified elector has voted, but of the States in which the disqualified elector has not voted for the election of President and Vice-President, and thus that it concerns all the States, and relates to the deepest and most vital interests of all the States. The disqualification cannot therefore be permitted to be evaded in one State without a blow struck at every other State.

I will continue reading the report:

It also appears that in New Hampshire there is one case; in Connecticut there is one case; in North Carolina there is one case in which, from the report of the Postmaster-General, it is probable that at the time of the appointment of electors in these States respectively the electors or persons of the same name were deputy postmasters. The committee have not ascertained whether the electors are the same individuals who held or are presumed to have held the office of deputy postmasters at the time when the appointment of electors was made; and this is the less to be regretted, as it is confidently believed that no change in the result of the election of either the President or Vice-President would be effected by the ascertainment of the fact in either way, as five or six votes only would, in any event, be abstracted from the whole number, for the committee cannot adopt the opinion entertained by some, that a single illegal vote would vitiate the whole electoral vote of the college of electors in which it was given, particularly in cases where the vote of the whole college has been given for the same persons.

From this sentence it appears that at that time, forty years ago, the question in debate was whether the single illegal vote vitiated more than the vote itself, and the committee were of opinion that it did not.

The committee are of opinion that the second section of the second article of the Constitution, which declares that "no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector," ought to be carried, in its whole spirit, into rigid execution, in order to prevent officers of the General Government from bringing their official power to influence the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States. This provision of the Constitution, it is believed, excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors; and the disqualification relates to the time of the appointment, and that a resignation of the office of deputy postmaster after his appointment as elector would not entitle him to vote as elector under the Constitution.

I submit that when it appears that two such minds as those of Henry Clay and Silas Wright, statesmen of such opposite political education and modes of thought, concur in a statement with reference to the reasons and meaning of the Constitution, it comes to us with a weight and with an authority that is not to be gainsaid. Fortunately or unfortunately, however, our American habit of not bridging chasms until we reach them prevented any action by Congress such as Mr. Clay suggested; and accordingly the question re-presents itself to-day without any further elucidation by legislation than it had then.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. What did the committee say ought to be done, Mr. Hoadly, if anything?

Mr. HOADLY. Only this, "that the article ought to be carried in its whole spirit into rigid execution;" but, inasmuch as the disqualification, if admitted in its whole spirit and carried into rigid execution, did not change the result of that election, as Martin Van Buren was elected President, and the election of Vice-President went to the Senate, they reported no steps as necessary to be taken, and no steps were taken.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Have you read the conclusion of the report?

Mr. HOADLY. I cannot answer the question. I think I have read the conclusion of the report, but unfortunately copying not from the Congressional Globe but from an excerpt which, working in great haste, I had to use for my own convenience, I cannot answer the question.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I had the impression that the committee had added something else.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. What is the date of the report?

Mr. HOADLY. February 4, 1837.

If we are right in our proposition with regard to the facts, Humphreys held the office at the time when he cast his vote. The only two questions, therefore, which present themselves for debate are, first, did he hold at the time an office of profit or trust; secondly, as to the effect of the holding, provided the fact has been shown. As the questions thus present themselves, we are not concerned to consider the authorities decided in cases of resignation after the election, except so far as they indicate the views of courts with regard to the effect of the disqualifying facts. In Rex vs. Monday (Cowper, page 536,) Sergeant Buller, afterward Mr. Justice Buller, states the rule thus, arguendo :

Two requisites are necessary to make a good election: first, a capacity in the electors; second, a capacity in the elected; and unless both concur the election is a nullity. With respect to the capacity of the electors, their right is this: They cannot say there shall be no election, but they are to elect. Therefore, though they may vote to prefer one to fill an office, they can not say that such a one shall not be preferred, or by merely saying, "We dissent to every one proposed," prevent any election at all. Their right consists in an affirmative, not a negative declaration. Consequently there is no effectual means of voting against one man but by voting for another; and even then, if such other person be unqualified and the elector has notice of his incapacity, his vote will be thrown away.

Such is the well-settled English rule, as affirmed by a multitude of cases since.

Lord Chief-Justice Wilmut, in the same volume, note to page 393, in the case of Harrison vs. Evans, discussing the statute of 13 Charles II, which enacted that no person should be elected into any corporation-office who had not received the sacrament within a twelvemonth preceding his election, and in default of doing so the election and choice should be void, said:

The provision is not only addressed to the elected and a provision upon them, but a provision laid down upon the electors if they have notice. The legislature has commanded them not to choose a non-conformist, because he ought not to be trusted. Consequently, with respect to any legal effect of operation, it is as if there had been no election.

So in a multitude of cases in England since, as I said, which need not be here more particularly referred to, but with a reference to which your honors will be furnished in my brief. The same doctrine is applied in many American cases also, and it is respectfully submitted that there is no case to the contrary. American cases have differed widely upon the question whether the non-eligibility of the candidatè receiving the largest vote has the effect to elect the next highest competing candidate; but no American case, it is respectfully submitted, treats the election of one who at the time was non-qualified and who attempted to act as other than an absolutely null appointment. To this effect is the case of Searcy vs. Grow, 15 California, 118, which was a contest for the office of sheriff of Siskiyou County, where Grow was returned as having been elected and was found to be the holder of an office of profit and trust under the constitution of California, to which a disqualification was attached by the constitution, and who had resigned after the election and before induction into the shrievalty, but was holding the disqualifying office at the time of the election. Mr. Justice Baldwin (Cope, J., and Field, C. J., concurring) said :

The people in this case were clothed with this power of choice. Their selection of a candidate gave him all the claim to the office which he has. His title to the office comes from their designation of him as sheriff. But they could not designate or choose a man not eligible—that is, not capable of being selected. They might select any man they chose, subject only to this exception: that the man they selected was capable of taking what they had the power to give. We do not see how the fact that he became capable of taking office after they had exercised their power can avail the appellant. If he was not eligible at the time the votes were cast for him, the election failed.

Of course your honors will see the pertinency of this quotation to other questions that may arise in other cases, and I am compelled to read portions of the opinion which do not refer to the particular case in hand, in order to use intelligently those portions that do :

If he was not eligible at the time the votes were cast for him, the election failed. We do not see how it can be assumed that by the act of the candidate the votes which, when cast, were ineffectual because not given for a qualified candidate, became effectual to elect him to office.

So in the case of the State of Nevada on the relation of Nourse vs. Clarke, (3 Nevada, 566,) which, it is true, may be treated as obiter dictum, because it was found there that the resignation had been effectually made before the election, the court discussed this question with this result: "That a person holding the office of United States district attorney on the day of election was incapable of being chosen to the office of attorney-general of the State, because of a provision in the State constitution to the effect that no Federal office-holder 'shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this State.' 'Which word eligible,' says this learned court, 'means both capable of being legally chosen and capable of legally holding.'"

The word here is "appointed;" that no person holding an office shall be appointed an elector. Who appoints? The State appoints; not the voters of the State; not the legislature of the State; not the governor of the State; but the State appoints. The State appoints from among qualified persons; or, which is the same thing, the State appoints, but may not appoint a disqualified person. Now the State does appoint a disqualified person, and the disqualification is one contained in the same constitutional provision as a qualification, limitation, restriction of the same constitutional clause which gives the right to appoint, a part of the same sentence attached to the grant of power. The appointment refers to the act of the State, the act of the State on the day which Congress has named as the day upon which only the choice of elector can be made. On that day the State shall appoint, but shall not appoint a person not legally qualified to hold the office.

In Commonwealth vs. Cluly (56 Pennsylvania State Reports, 270) the election went back to the people. In the Indiana cases the next highest competing candidate was declared elected—going beyond the rule we ask to be applied to the Florida electoral college. In Searcy vs. Grow, I suppose the result of the contest was to unseat the disqualified person without seating the next highest competing candidate. In all the cases which are commented upon in the decision of Gulick vs. New, in 14 Indiana, 93, and by the various authorities and text-writers on this subject, no one, I submit, will be found which favors the idea that the election of one constitutionally disqualified can by any possibility result, if it do not elect the next highest candidate, in anything else than a failure to elect; and Congress by its legislation on the subject has indicated its purpose in the same direction. Thus the one hundred and thirty-third section of the Revised Statutes provides for a case of vacancy occurring when the college of electors shall meet to cast their votes. Section 134 provides for a case where the State shall fail to elect; that, where the State shall fail to elect on the day provided, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the legislature of such State may direct. These provisions of law, which have been in force since the act of January 23, 1845, in that statute were attached, and not separated as in the Revised Statutes and thrown into two separate sections; these two provisions of law, which were then attached to each other, indicate the meaning of the law-makers of this generation and the last to furnish a remedy in case of the election of one disqualified under the Constitution.

If it be shown that the State of Florida has acted under the one hundred and thirty-fourth section of the Revised Statutes, then the vote of Florida is not diminished by reason of the fact that on the 7th of November one of the persons voted for was disqualified.

SEC. 134. Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such a manner as the legislature of such State may direct.

If it were true, as ruled in Furman vs. Clute, 50 New York Reports; in Commonwealth vs. Cluly, 56 Pennsylvania State Reports; in Searcy vs. Grow, in 15 California Reports; if it were true, as ruled in all the American cases, which have held that the next highest competing candidate was not elected, that the case was one of non-election, and rendered necessary a new election, then I respectfully submit that the one hundred and thirty-fourth section of the Revised Statutes provided for the State of Florida a remedy for the mischief to which she was found on the 7th of November to have been subjected. She could have provided by law, as I shall presently show to your honors was done in the State of Rhode Island, to meet the exact contingency. It is not the case of an absolute non-election, or one where there has been no attempt to hold an election, to which this section refers. This provision of law operates whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law. Then the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the legislature of such State may direct.

If every elector in every State in the United States were disqualified, would it not be true that there was an election held and a failure to make choice? If every elector in the State of Florida was disqualified, would it not be true that there was an election held, but without choice? If, in the State of Pennsylvania, in the case of Oluly, the people had again to elect; if, in New York, in Furman vs. Clute, the people had again to elect; if, in California, in the case of Searcy vs. Grow, the people had again to elect, then it would follow that, if all the four electors of the State of Florida were disqualified, it would be clearly a case of failure to make choice, and the people would have to elect again, provided the legislature confided to the people, under section 134, the function of electing for the second time and did not exercise it themselves, as was done in Rhode Island. Omne majus continet in se minus.

If it be a failure to make choice where a single disqualified candidate runs against another officer, if it be a failure to make choice so that he can be ousted and a new election is required to be held, and if there be a provision of statute law of the United States contemplating the emergency and providing a remedy, and if the power of appointment be with the State, and if the opportunity of remedy be with the State, then I submit that it must be shown that the State has taken advantage of this provision of the Revised Statutes, section 134, or the single vote is lost.

The question came directly before the judges of the supreme court of Rhode Island, in the case of George H. Corliss, who held the office of member of the Centennial Commission under the United States on the day of the presidential election. The governor, under the authority of the statutes, submitted to the judges of the supreme court of that State five questions: First, whether the office of centennial commissioner was an office of trust and profit, which they answered, by a majority of voices, it was, such as disqualified the holder for the office of elector of President and Vice-President. Secondly, whether the candidate who received a plurality of votes created a vacancy by declining the office. Thirdly, whether the disqualification was removed by the resignation of the said office of trust or profit. Fourthly, whether the disqualification resulted in the election of the candidate next highest in number of votes, or in failure to elect. Fifthly, if by reason of the disqualification of the candidate who received the plurality of the votes given there was no election, could the general assembly in grand committee elect an elector?

The judges answered the first question, as I said, by a majority of voices, that it was a disqualifying fact, this office of commissioner of the United States Centennial Commission, and, by all their voices agreeing, answered that "such candidate who received a plurality declining the office did not create a vacancy; that the disqualification was not removed by the resignation of the office, but that the disqualification did not result in the election of the candidate next in vote, but did result in a failure to elect, and that there was no election, so that the general assembly in grand committee might elect, and the general assembly in grand committee did elect."

The opinion is signed by all the judges, Thomas Durfee, W. S. Barges, E. R. Potter, Charles Matteson, and Stiness. It was a question submitted under the constitution and laws of that State. I read it at this time in order that I may if possible satisfy the Commission that the construction which I place on section 134 of the Revised Statutes is the correct construction.

In answer to the fourth question, which was this, "If not, does the disqualification result in the election of the candidate next in vote or in a failure to elect?" the court answered :

We think the disqualification does not result in the election of the candidate next in vote, but in a failure to elect.

In England it has been held that where electors vote for an ineligible candidate, knowing his disqualification, their votes are not to be counted any more than if they were thrown for a dead man or the Man in the Moon, and that in such a case the opposing candidate, being qualified, will be elected, although he has had a minority of the votes.

And such is the rule in Indiana and as was established at an early day in Maryland by Chief-Justice Samuel Chase, of that State, and has continued in force, as I am informed, down to this time, and been enforced very recently. The judges of Rhode Island sustain this by the following references: King vs. Hawkins, 10 East., 210; Reg. vs. Coaks, 3 El. & B. 253.

But even in England, if the disqualification is unknown, the minority candidate is not entitled to the office, the election being a failure. (Queen vs. Hiornes, 7 Ad. & E., 960; Rex vs. Bridge, 1 M. & Selw., 76.) And it has been held that to entitle the minority candidate to the office it is not enough that the electors knew of the facts which amount to a disqualification, unless they likewise knew that they amount to it in point of law. (The Queen vs. The Mayor, &c., Law Rep., 3 Q. B., 629.)

In this country the law is certainly not more favorable to the minority candidate. (State vs. Giles, 1 Chandler, (Wis.,) 112; State vs. Smith, 14 Wis., 497; Saunders vs. Haynes, 13 Cal., 145; People vs. Clute, 50 N. Y., 451.) The question submitted to us does not allege or imply that the electors, knowing the disqualification, voted for the ineligible candidate in willful defiance of the law; and certainly, in the absence of proof, it is not to be presumed that they so voted. The only effect of the disqualification, in our opinion, is to render void the election of the candidate who is disqualified, and to leave one place in the electoral college unfilled.

The answer to the fifth question, "If, by reason of the disqualification of the candidate who received a plurality of the votes given, there was no election, can the general assembly, in grand committee, select an elector," was in the affirmative. The court, in discussing another question, had cited the seventh section of the General Statutes of Rhode Island, chapter 11, to wit :

If any electors, chosen as aforesaid, shall, after said election, decline the said office, or be prevented by any cause from serving therein, the other electors, when met in Bristol in pursuance of this chapter, shall fill such vacancies.

They had decided that disqualification did not create a case of vacancy. They then considered another statute of Rhode Island, which they held to have been passed under the authority confided to the State of Rhode Island by the one hundred and thirty-fourth section of the Revised Statutes of the United States :

Our statutes (General Statute, chapter 11, section 5) provides that "if, by reason of the votes being equally divided, or otherwise, there shall not be an election of the number of electors to which the State may be entitled, the governor shall forthwith convene the general assembly at Providence for the choice of electors to fill such vacancy by an election in grand committee." We think this provision covers the contingency which has happened, and that, therefore, the general assembly in grand committee can elect an elector to fill up the number to which the State is entitled. The law of the United States provides that "whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day, in such manner as the legislature of the State may direct."

We have, then, the unanimous opinion of all the judges of Rhode Island to the effect that the distinction on which we insist is well taken, that the acts of Congress are furnished for the purpose of covering all the cases that may arise, in order that the constitutional provision may have full force and effect, and yet that the State may not be deprived of its opportunity to be fully represented in the electoral college. The inhibition of the constitution being peremptory, and like all the inhibitions, whether express or implied, self-enforcing, were there no such provision as that contained in section 134, the vote of the State would necessarily be lost, unless it could be shown by some principle of law, by the authority of some decided case, that the election of a disqualified candidate is possible, notwithstanding the disqualification contained in a constitutional inhibition of the character here referred to.

But peradventure by mistake, and without the intent to violate the spirit of the constitutional provision, by mere misadventure the State may have selected as one of its electors, or as all of its electors, persons holding disqualified offices, and, therefore, said Congress, whenever there be a case of non-election in any State the legislature may provide a method of supplying the defect; and whenever there be a case of vacancy the legislature may provide a method of supplying the defect; a vacancy which occurs when the college of elected electors meets, a non-election which occurs when an election has been held. If no election has been held, there is no provision of statutory law to meet the case at all; but the one hundred and thirty-third section provides for the case of a vacancy when there has been a qualified person elected, and the one hundred and thirty-fourth section provides for the case of non-election when an election has been held. It does not contemplate the case where no election at all has been held, but it explicitly provides for a case where an election has been held which has not resulted in the choice of a competent and qualified candidate, and furnished to the people of the State of Florida, as it did to the State of Rhode Island, ample opportunity to save themselves from all misadventure, from all the consequences of mistake, or ignorance, or innocent evil, by enabling them to have a second opportunity, notwithstanding the constitutional provision that Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Electoral Commission, that portion of the duty which has been assigned to me consists in submitting, by way of opening, the views which the counsel for the objectors to return No. 1 feel it necessary to make under the order of the Commission read to them this morning. That portion of the opening argument which relates to the second branch of the order has been disposed of by my friend, Judge Hoadly, and we leave it just there with a single additional suggestion which I have been desired to make, namely, that this office of shipping-commissioner, being one to be filled by the court, could be only surrendered up or resigned to the court itself; that the so-called letter of resignation sent to Judge Woods, and for aught this Commission knows by him still retained, fails to perform the office sought to be imputed to it until it reaches the records of the court or receives some official recognition from the court itself. If that letter had been sent by mail, it could have no effect until it reached its destination. Had it been sent by messenger, no effect could have been given to it until it reached the archives of the court; and the mere fact of its reception by Judge Woods himself gives it no other or greater validity than if it had been in the pocket of the messenger or in the mail-bag.

Moreover, I am desired to call the attention of the Commission to the certificate of the clerk of the circuit court read in evidence this morning. I have not the paper before me, and therefore may not state its date with accuracy; but my recollection of it is that it contains a certificate that up to a very recent period, certainly subsequent to the time when Humphreys acted as an elector, no resignation of his office had yet reached the archives of the court; and with these suggestions I pass to the other branch of the case.

The order which has been read to us this morning directs the reception and consideration of all evidence submitted to the joint convention of the two Houses by the President of the Senate, together with the certificates which were also presented by him to the joint convention; and in order that we may distinctly understand where we have arrived in the progress of the discussion of this great question, it is proper for us to consider what were the papers presented by the President of the Senate to the joint convention of the two Houses.

They were, first, what is known as return No. 1, which has been printed for the use of the Commission. It consists of three documents. The first one is the certificate of Governor Stearns, dated 6th December, 1876, under the seal of the State, and attested by the secretary of state. It purports to be the list which is contemplated by the act of Congress. Although that list may not state the exact and true fact, it would seem to be not objectionable in point of form. Next follows the certificate signed by Humphreys, Pearce, Holden, and Long, the Hayes electors, stating that they had, pursuant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, been appointed electors, and had assembled at the State capitol and had voted by ballot for President and Vice-President in two distinct ballots, stating in the first certificate the result for President, and with a like preamble stating the result for Vice-President in the second certificate. This, if the Commission please, is all that is contained in what is known as certificate or return No. 1.

Certificate or return No. 2 consists of a certificate of Mr. Cocks, the attorney-general of the State of Florida, to the effect that he is attorney-general of the State of Florida and a member of the State board of canvassers, and that by the authentic returns of the votes cast in the several counties of the State of Florida at the election held in November, 1876—

Said returns being on file in the office of the secretary of state, and seen and considered by me, as such member of the board of State canvassers of the said State of Florida, it appears and is shown that Wilkinson call—

And the other Tilden electors, naming them—were chosen the four electors of President and Vice-President of the United States.

And he further certifies—

That, under the act of the legislature of the State of Florida establishing said board of State canvassers, no provision has been enacted, nor is any such provision contained in the statute law of this State, whereby the result shown and appearing by said returns to said board of State canvassers can be certified to the executive of the said State.

Next follows an oath of office on the part of Call and the other so-called Tilden electors, and then the certificate of Call and the other electors of their having met according to law and having balloted for President and also Vice-President by distinct ballots, and certifying that the result is that Samuel J. Tilden, of the State of New York, received 4 votes for President, and Thomas A. Hendricks, of the State of Indiana, 4 votes for Vice-President. Attached to this certificate is another one:

And we further certify that, having met and convened as such electors, at the time and place designated by law, we did notify the governor of the State of Florida, the executive of said State, of our appointment as such electors, and did apply to and demand of him to cause to be delivered to us three lists of the names of the electors of the said State, according to law, and the said governor did refuse to deliver the same to us.

This return No. 2, made by the attorney-general and by the electors, accompanied by the oath of office on the part of the electors, being an official document under the sanction of an official oath, being a declaration made by these electors and by the attorney-general, who was also a member of the board of State canvassers, solemnly in this manner, is at least some evidence before this Commission to support the facts which are stated in it. It appears from this official certificate, thus made by the attorney-general, that by the returns of the election on file in the office of the secretary of state, seen and considered by him as a member of the board of State canvassers, Call and the other Tilden electors were duly chosen and appointed electors for the State of Florida; and it also supplies the evidence necessary to satisfy the inquiry why the attorney-general should make this certificate and why the governor did not, because the electors themselves certify that they made an application to the governor for a proper certificate and that he refused to give it to them.

Certificate or return No. 3, which was received, as it appears from the statement made by the Presiding Officer of the joint convention, on the 31st day of January, 1877, and so stated by him to the joint convention on Thursday last, consists of several papers, and I proceed now to call the attention of the Commission to what those papers are.

First in order is a certificate of Governor Drew, the governor of the State of Florida, bearing date the 26th day of January, 1877, under the great seal of the State and attested by the secretary of state. It recites first an act of the legislature of the State of Florida of the 17th of January, 1877, being an act to procure a recanvass of the electoral vote of the State of Florida, as cast at the election held on the 7th of November, 1876. It recites the making of the canvass under the authority of the act, according to the laws and the interpretation thereof by the supreme court of the State of Florida. It recites that by the said canvass the Tilden electors were duly determined, declared, and certified to have been elected electors at the election held in November, 1876, as shown by the returns of the votes on file in the office of secretary of state. It recites that in quo-warranto proceedings wherein the said Robert Bullock and others, the Tilden electors, were relators, and Pearce and others, the Hayes electors, were respondents—

The circuit court of this State for the second judicial circuit, after full consideration of the law and the proofs produced on behalf of the parties respectively, by its judgment, determined that said relators were, at said election, in fact and law, elected such electors as against the said respondents and all other persons.

So that, with whatever force, as to its weight or as to the sufficiency of its mode of proof, this Commission has before it this day such evidence as must carry conviction to the mind of every member of the commission that in a court of the State of Florida in quo-warranto proceedings, by the judgment of that court upon the pleadings and upon the proofs, it was held and determined, not merely as matter of law but also as matter of fact, that the Tilden electors were entitled to office as against the Hayes electors and all the world beside. The governor then, in pursuance of another act of the legislature of the State of Florida of the 26th of January, 1877, makes and certifies a list of the names of the electors chosen, appointed, and declared as aforesaid, which contains the names of the Tilden electors. That is the first paper in what is known as return No. 3.

The second paper consists of a certificate under date of the 26th of January, 1877, signed by the Tilden electors, reciting that the executive had caused three lists of electors to be made, certified, and delivered to them, one of which was thereto annexed, by which it appeared that they had on the 7th of November, 1876, been duly appointed electors, and then that they did on the first Wednesday of December, 1876, meet at the capitol at Tallahassee to give and cast their votes as electors, and did as such electors by ballot vote for President and Vice-President of the United States, and, the ballots having been opened, inspected, and counted, the ballots were given for what are called the Tilden electors, and then follow the distinct lists of votes cast for President and Vice-President in the form required.

The next paper in order in this return is an act of the State of Florida under the date of the 17th of January, 1877, certified by the secretary of state under the great seal. This act provides for a board of State canvassers, and directs them to meet forthwith at the office of the secretary of state and to proceed to canvass the returns of the election of electors and determine and declare who were elected and appointed electors at the election, as shown by the returns on file in the office of the secretary of state. It then goes on to provide that the mode which shall be adopted by this board of canvassers for determining and declaring the votes shall be the law as prescribed by the supreme court of the State of Florida in two cases named, the case of Bloxham vs. Gibbs and the case of Drew vs. McLin, the latter one of which has been known as the mandamus proceeding instituted by Governor Drew as against McLin and the other members of the State canvassing-board, and which proceedings by mandamus and the opinion of the court in regard thereto the Commission have before them and will find in House Document No. 35, part 3, and known as the exhibits.

These documents of course are not in evidence before the Commission in the strict sense of that word; but we respectfully submit to the Commission that inasmuch as in order to determine this question they must arrive at a construction of the statutes of the State of Florida, it is their duty, as it is the rule of every court in the United States, to consider such decisions as binding and conclusive upon them, and to follow the construction given by the State courts to the State statutes. Therefore, in considering what are the powers of this State board of canvassers originally, the law creating it and defining its duties is to be taken into consideration in connection with the determination of the highest court of the State of Florida; and it is with a view that the Commission may be informed as to the precise facts which were under consideration in this mandamus case, that I call your attention to the exhibits mentioned in that document. It will be found, upon inspection of the document and of the record, that it arose out of transactions of the same board of canvassers at the same election, and passes directly upon the legality of the same action of the board of canvassers as is involved in the presidential contest. The Commission will learn from the opinions and from the exhibits that the decision of the supreme court of the State of Florida is full upon the point which has been argued before them heretofore. They clearly demonstrate that the action of the State board of canvassers in November last, by which the Hayes electors claimed to have been rightfully elected, has been solemnly pronounced by adjudication of the supreme court of that State to be unauthorized, illegal, and void.

Now, is it necessary for me to interject just here any authority upon the point as to the binding effect of this decision of the State courts? And yet, perhaps, it will be as convenient to do so here as at any other time. If the Commission please, from the time of the case of Shelby vs. Gray, in 11 Wheaton, 361, through Green vs. Neal, 6

Peters, 291; Christy vs. Pritchett, 4 Wallace, 201; Tioga Railroad vs. Blossburg Railroad, 20 Wallace, 137, down to Elmwood vs. Macy, 2 Otto, 289, an unbroken line of decisions will be found; and, if we correctly apprehend the force and effect of this current of judgment in the Supreme Court of the United States, it is that the adjudications of the highest tribunal of the State are to be deemed and taken as a part of the very statute itself, and that other courts, in considering what is meant by the statute, what is the legislative intent, exercise no independent judgment or criticism upon the language itself, or upon its scope, meaning, or effect, but accept, as if it were incorporated into the very body of the legislative act, the construction thus placed upon it by the highest judicial authority in the State. The court say, in the case of Green vs. Neal:

The decision of this question by the highest tribunal of a State should be considered as final by this court, not because the State tribunal in such a case has any power to bind this court, but because a fixed and received construction by a State in its own court makes it a part of the State law.

Returning now to the consideration of this return No. 3, the Commission will find that by the third section of the act the board is to "make and sign a certificate containing in words written at full length" the result of that election, and that that certificate is to be recorded in the office of the secretary of state in a book kept for that purpose.

Next following this act of the legislature is the certificate of the board of State canvassers organized under this law which I have just read, and dated the 19th-day of January, 1877, and which presents to the consideration of this tribunal, county by county, all the returns for presidential electors on file in the office of the secretary of state, with all the details of the number of votes cast in each county for each one of the persons voted for, and at the end of it is a summary or tabulation, the result of which shows the election of the Tilden electors, one and all.

So that the Commission thus far have not only the certificate of the governor of the State to the main fact at issue before this tribunal, but they have in detail, county by county, all the votes cast for electors of President and Vice-President, and a tabulated statement showing the election of the Tilden electors. It is true that they have not all this mass of documents, sent in with the objections filed to the returns; it is true they have not all the original precinct-returns before them; but they have that before them which answers practically the same purpose. They have a certificate made in due form of law by the State authority showing, so far as needs to be inquired into just here and now, precisely how many votes were cast for the Hayes electors and precisely how many votes were cast for the Tilden electors in every county of the State of Florida.

Then follows another act of the legislature. The executive has spoken; the canvassing-board erected under State authority has spoken; and now the legislature, another branch of the government, speaks in the same unmistakable tones by an act of the legislature of the 26th of January, 1877. The preamble recites that according to the returns from the several counties on file in the secretary of state's office, that according to the canvass made by the board, the Tilden electors were chosen in such manner as the legislature of the State had directed; that the original canvassers had interpreted the law defining their powers and duties in such a manner as to give them power to exclude certain regular returns, and did under such erroneous interpretation exclude certain returns, which interpretation had been solemnly adjudged by the supreme court to be improper and illegal. It also recites that Governor Stearns by means of such illegal action misled, deceived—no allegation of fraud it is true there, but misled, deceived—by this erroneous interpretation of the board of State canvassers, founded upon their erroneous interpretation of the law, and deceived by the illegal and erroneous canvass of the canvassers, did erroneously cause to be made a certified list containing the names of the Hayes electors, when in fact such persons had not received the highest number of votes, and on a canvass conducted according to the rules prescribed and adjudged by the supreme court, were not appointed electors or entitled to receive such lists from the governor, and that the Tilden electors were truly appointed electors and entitled to have their names made upon a list and certified by the governor. This is the preamble to this confirmatory act.

It then, in section 1, declares that the Tilden electors were duly appointed and authorized to act, and their acts are ratified and confirmed and declared to be valid, and that they were appointed on, from, and after the 7th of November, 1876. The second section authorizes the governor to make and certify three lists of electors; to transmit them in the manner therein mentioned; provides that the electors are to meet at Tallahassee, and that they are to give an additional certificate of the votes which had been cast by them on the 6th of December, and to send that to the President of the Senate as required by law.

So then, if the Commission please, in this return No. 3 we have practically all the branches of the government of the State of Florida speaking with unanimous and united voice to the same effect, and certifying to the same fact which is the question now before this tribunal for decision.

It is upon this evidence that this question is now to be determined; and the different kinds of evidence may be thus classified: They consist, first, of lists purporting to be made by the electors under the twelfth article of amendments to the Constitution, the certificates and lists made out under and in pursuance of that article of the Constitution. If these prove themselves, they both have the same force and effect, and this Commission would be at a loss to determine which one of these pieces of conflicting evidence is to be potential, and in any event this testimony must be deemed inconclusive. The second class of evidence are the lists of the executive under the one hundred and thirty-sixth section of the United States Revised Statutes. I shall not presume at this stage of the case to re-argue the question as to the conclusiveness of the governor's certificates. It would not be necessary to do so after what has already been said. Moreover I conceive that the order itself practically determines that question in the negative, for it permits other evidence. These governor's certificates are not essential. They are not made indispensable or conclusive or exclusive or invested with any particular force or effect by the statute. Their permanent absence would not be fatal to the validity of the vote of the electors. They are mere requests, not obligatory on the executive; there is no mode of compelling the performance of the duty imposed on him. And here, if the Commission please, I beg leave to call attention to the message of Governor Hancock of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, which will be found appended to a brief which we shall hand up, bearing the date of the 8th day of November, 1792. It is as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate and the House of Representatives:

By the Constitution of the United States of America, each State is to appoint, in such manner as the legislature shall direct, electors of President and Vice-President. By a late act of Congress it is enacted "that the supreme executive of each State shall cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the first Wednesday in December."

I feel the importance of giving every constitutional support to the General Government, and I also am convinced that the existence and well-being of that Government depends upon preventing a confusion of the authority of it with that of the States separately. But that Government applies itself to the people of the United States in their natural, individual capacity, and cannot exert any force upon, or by any means control, the officers of the State governments as such; therefore, when an act of Congress uses compulsory words with regard to any act to be done by the supreme executive of this commonwealth, I shall not feel myself obliged to obey them, because I am not, in my official capacity, amenable to that Government.

My duty as governor will most certainly oblige me to see that proper and efficient certificates are made of the appointment of electors of President and Vice-President; and perhaps the mode suggested in the act above mentioned may be found to be the most proper. If you, gentlemen, have any mode to propose with respect to the conduct of this business, I shall pay every attention to it.

Gentlemen, I do not address you at this time from a disposition to regard the proceedings of the General Government with a jealous eye, nor do I suppose that Congress could intend that clause in their act as a compulsory provision; but I wish to prevent any measure to proceed through inattention, which may be drawn into precedents hereafter to the injury of the people or to give a constructive power where the Federal Constitution has not expressly given it.

This injunction, therefore, is not mandatory in its character; it is not obligatory upon the State officers; it is not addressed to the electors who cast the votes or to the tribunal which counts them; but to a third party to do an act for the convenience of the electors and of the counting tribunal. But it has been intimated, and it may be argued perhaps, that this certificate or return No. 3 did not arrive at the seat of Government before the first Wednesday in January, according to a forced construction, as it seems to us, of the one hundred and fortieth section of the Revised Statutes of the United States. We respectfully submit to the Commission that this provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States in section 140, as well as the direction contained in section 136 as to the delivery of the lists by the executive to the electors, is merely directory. Upon that subject I desire to call the attention of the Commission—I shall not stop to read it—to what is said in Sedgwick on Statutory and Constitutional Law, page 363 of the edition of 1857, and also to recall to the attention of the Commission what was said by Lord Mansfield in the case of the King vs. Loxdale in 1 Burrows's Reports, page 447.

There is a known distinction between the circumstances which are of the essence of the thing required to be done by an act of Parliament and clauses merely directory. The precise time in many cases is not of the essence.

Now, if the Commission look at the purpose of this enactment, if they will consider what were the reasons which induced the Congress of the United States to prescribe the times therein mentioned, we submit that they will come to the conclusion that the time or times mentioned therein within certain prescribed limits are not of the essence, and that they are not essential to the purpose which the legislature had in view when they made the enactment. Delay in the transmission of the certificates within proper limits cannot produce any invalidity or work any legal consequences. The reason the governor is directed in section 136 to furnish the list on or before the meeting of the electoral college was doubtless that the college may not be hindered in annexing the lists on the first day of their meeting if they choose then to annex them to their statements of the votes they cast for President and Vice-President. There is no express direction anywhere which requires that the electoral college, after it shall have met and cast its ballots, shall immediately proceed to make out the lists which are to be transmitted to the President of the Senate. There is no express declaration anywhere, either in the Constitution or in the laws, that if they do not immediately proceed to make out and certify their lists, which are to be sent to the President of the Senate, their action shall be nugatory. The main fact which is to be determined is, did the electors vote according to the constitutional requirement? If they did so vote, the lists which they are to send to the President of the Senate may as soon as can conveniently be done be made out and sent; but there is no absolute requirement that they shall be so made out and sent immediately.

The first Wednesday in December is fixed by the statute for the meeting of the electors. The delivery of the statement by the electors of their votes by messenger to the President of the Senate at the seat of Government is to be made at any time before the first Wednesday in January. Thirty days are thus allowed for transmission and delivery. No doubt, we submit, it would be a perfect compliance with this provision if the electors' statement of their votes were made out and the list of the governor obtained and annexed at any time so that the delivery should be made within the thirty days. It is true that the statement of the votes to be forwarded by mail and the statement to be deposited with the district judge are required to be sent forthwith; but the one transmitted by messenger would be good whether the others reached the seat of Government or not. And practically it is matter of public notoriety that the occasion has never, or if ever very seldom, arisen when the certificate deposited with the district judge has been called in requisition or has reached the seat of Government. No time is fixed by any of the statutes of the United States for the arrival at the seat of Government of the certificate deposited with the district judge. If it was received at any time before it was to be used in the counting of the votes, we submit that that would be sufficient. The vote could not be objected to because it had not arrived earlier.

Now, taking all these statutory provisions together, they exhibit careful precautions that the votes shall be received before the count. That is the point to be arrived at, that the votes shall be received before the counting takes place. Whether they get here one day after the meeting of the electoral college or thirty days after the meeting of the electoral college is immaterial. The point to be arrived at is that they get to the seat of Government before the count.

The specifications of the times at which, or before which acts shall be done to furnish evidence to the counting tribunal as to who have been appointed electors and for whom those electors have voted are merely directory. The times are fixed so that each act shall be done in season to enable the next step to be promptly taken and in season to enable any failures to be remedied. These limitations of the time are precautionary and remedial; they are intended to save and give effect to the votes. They are not snares to betray and destroy the votes.

This line of argument is carried out more fully in the printed brief which we shall submit to the Commission, and I therefore pass to another point. We contend that these certified lists which are contained in return No. 3, and furnished afterward, are effectual. We submit the proposition that such acts of public officers, if not done within the time prescribed by law, do not thereby become incapable of being done afterward. They do not only remain capable of being done, but the duty of public officers to do them subsists in full vigor and operation, and the right to compel their performance by public officers accrues for the very reason that the time limited by the law has passed.

I beg to call the attention of the tribunal upon that point to what is said by the court of Queen's Bench in 11 Adolphus and Ellis:

It would be too great a triumph for injustice if we should enable it to postpone forever the performance of a plain duty only because it had done wrong at the right season.

This same idea is illustrated by the doctrine of the courts in regard to mandamus. It is often invoked on the very ground that the time fixed by law for specific acts has expired. In the case of The Mayor of Rochester vs. The Queen, in 1 Blackburn and Ellis, page 1024, the court say:

We are of opinion that the court of Queen's Bench was right, and ought to be affirmed. It seems to us that Rex vs. Sparrow, 2 Strange, 1123, and Rex vs. Mayor of Norwich, 1 B. and Adolphus, 310, are authorities upon the point, and that the principle of those cases establishes the doctrine that the court of Queen's Bench ought to compel the performance of a public duty by public officers, although the time prescribed by statute for the performance of them has passed.

And in particular I refer to what is said by the supreme court of New York in the case of ex parte Heath, 3 Hill R., 42, which was an election case coming up on proceedings for mandamus:

Ward inspectors of New York City were required by statute to certify the result of the ward election "on the day subsequent to the closing of the polls, or sooner." A ward election was held on the 12th of April; the result was not certified until the 14th.

The return was held valid notwithstanding, and the mandamus was directed to go commanding the mayor to administer the oath to the persons returned as elected. In the opinion of the court it is said:

The idea which we understood to be thrown out in argument, that the return from the sixth ward was void because not completed till the 14th of April instead of the 13th, is altogether inadmissible. Nothing is better settled, as a general rule, than that where a statute requires an act to be done by an officer within a certain time, for a public purpose, the statute shall be taken to be merely directory; and though he neglects his duty by allowing the precise time to go by, if he afterward perform it, the public shall not suffer by the delay.

I next call the attention of the tribunal to another piece of evidence which is of the third class, namely, the act of the legislature of January 17, 1877. This is a curative act, simply allowing and requiring a piece of evidence to be supplied after the time within which the law required the public officers to furnish it. I shall not trouble the Commission with going over it again. I simply call their attention to the fact that this is what it seeks to accomplish. It is a curative act. It simply allows and requires this piece of evidence to be supplied after the time within which the law required the public officers to furnish it, but before it is needed for the use intended; it is allowing an act to be done nunc pro tunc in furtherance of right and justice, as courts sometimes do, curing a defect of form, which the law-making power has a large discretion to do and frequently and habitually does.

It has been suggested to this Commission, rather than gravely argued, that this act, as well as the other act of the State of Florida, is to be considered in some sense as an ex post facto law. I submit to this tribunal that neither of these laws comes within the definition of ex post facto laws. They are retrospective and retroactive, but not ex post facto laws. It certainly will not be necessary for me to do more than to refer the Commission to what is said upon that subject by Mr. Justice Chase in 3 Dallas, in the celebrated case of Calder vs. Bull, more particularly to what he says on the three hundred and ninetieth page:

I will state what laws I consider ex post facto laws, within the words and the intent of the prohibition. First. Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal; and punishes such action. Second. Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was when committed.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Green, it is hardly necessary to cite authorities to us that that is not an ex post facto law within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. GREEN. I am very happy to be relieved from further discussion of the character of these legislative acts.

The PRESIDENT. I do not suppose anybody in the Commission has any doubt about that.

Mr. GREEN. Then the next piece of evidence is the actual canvass on file in the secretary of state's office, showing in detail the votes of the several counties and the election of the Tilden electors. Superadded to all this, we submit to the Commission, that even under the order which was read to us this morning, in the light of the governor's certificate, this Commission has a right to look into these quo warranto proceedings with a view of seeing what they are. I shall not discuss that; I shall simply call the attention of the Commission in passing to the fact that they will find noted on the brief already handed up that the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the State of Florida is ample and full, that the authorities are there cited, and I beg leave to ask the Commission to refer to them. I only allude to it now in order that our learned friends on the other side may take notice that we conceive and shall insist that, even under the order of the Commission read to us this morning, by virtue of the governor's certificate which is the commencement of return No. 3, this Commission may look into and consider the quo warranto proceedings and their effect upon the question now before us.

The only additional authorities that we desire to call the attention of the Commission to on the subject of that quo warranto are, the Commonwealth vs. Smith, 45 Pennsylvania State Reports, page 59, where Mr. Justice Woodward, delivering the opinion of the court, held this language:

I have no doubt that quo warranto brought within the term of an office may be well tried after the term has expired.

And the case of Hunter vs. Chandler, 45 Missouri, page 435, where the court held that an information in the nature of a quo warranto to try the right to a public office may be tried after the term has expired or the officer holding has resigned, if the information was filed or the proceedings begun before resignation took place or the term had expired.

The sixth class of evidence is the confirmatory act of January 26, 1877. I shall say nothing on that subject, except to ask the attention of the tribunal to what is stated on the brief which we shall hand up.

Now, if the Commission please, we rest here upon the testimony before you, and we humbly submit to the tribunal that even upon that testimony, meager as it is contended to be, there is but one proper conclusion to be arrived at, namely, that this voice of the State of Florida which is uttered not only by its executive and legislative, but by its judicial departments, shall be respected, and that this Commission cannot come to any other determination than that the vote of the State of Florida is truly contained in the returns 2 and 3, and is not correctly returned in the return No. 1.

No one can be more aware than I am how inadequately I have endeavored to rise to the height of this great argument. If I have failed to convince your judgments as judges, I shall not appeal to your patriotism as statesmen; but here in this place consecrated by the memories of those early senatorial conflicts which resulted so often in the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the Constitution, as well as by the recollection of the decisions of the most august tribunal upon earth which is accustomed here to assemble in favor of human freedom and of human rights; in the name of the American people; in the name of that Constitution which we all have sworn to uphold and maintain; in the name of that Union to form and perpetuate which the Constitution was framed, and of that liberty which is at once the origin and the result of that Union; not as a partisan; not as an advocate of Mr. Tilden or Mr. Hendricks; nor yet as an opponent of Mr. Hayes or Mr. Wheeler, but as an American citizen, speaking to American citizens, I demand your judgment for the right.

The PRESIDENT. We will now hear the other side.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, this morning before I knew how thoroughly all that part of the papers that were laid before this Commission which relate to those matters occurring subsequently to the date of the electoral vote had been disposed of by your order, I had arranged to speak a very few minutes in regard to those matters—their competency in this case. Since I came into court and heard the decision of the Commission excluding the offer of testimony touching the date of the service of process in the quo warranto case, all that part of the case of Florida which I had proposed to discuss seems to me to be thoroughly disposed of and such discussion rendered unnecessary. It is only because on the other side discussion has been indulged in with regard to the effect of matters subsequent to the electoral vote that I venture to do what I would not otherwise do, make some few remarks in regard to the legal value of those matters that follow in point of time the date of that vote.

It will be observed by reading what has been here called certificate No. 3, that there can reasonably be no possible claim that the record in the proceedings in quo warranto is in any sense or way before this Commission. The only papers before the Commission are those which were submitted to the Commission by the President of the Senate or submitted to the Houses and thence here. In those papers, thus submitted, there is but one allusion to this proceeding in quo warranto, and that is where the governor, Drew, states that—

In a proceeding on the part of the State of Florida, by information in the nature of quo warranto, wherein the said Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge were relators, and Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long were respondents, the circuit court of this State for the second judicial circuit, after full consideration of the law and the proofs produced on behalf of the parties respectively, by its judgment determined that said relators were, at said election, in fact and law, elected such electors as against the said respondents and all other persons.

That being the only thing that is before this Commission, it will not be claimed, I think, even on the other side, that there is any evidence in the record before this body that any judgment in quo warranto was ever pronounced. The governor cannot make you acquainted with the existence of the record in that way. The action of the Commission in excluding that manuscript copy of the record of such judgment tendered as evidence, in moreover excluding all evidence about the date of service of process, taken in connection with all else which has transpired, makes it entirely and utterly certain that we have reached a stage in the case where at least that proceeding and judgment in quo warranto are excluded. So, too, in regard to the certificates No. 2 and No. 3. These are, as we regard the matter, and for precisely the same reasons which exclude the quo warranto case, now excluded by the order that has already been made. Still, since discussion by the other side in regard to the effect of these papers, Nos. 2 and 3, has been indulged in, I desire to make a few statements in the way of mere propositions rather than of extended argument, in regard to the whole matter of the legal effect upon the electoral vote of transactions of the State functionaries occurring after the date of such vote.

Now I state my foundation proposition in regard to all these post-election matters—whether it be the mandamus, the legislation of January, the quo warranto, the canvass by the improvised returning-board, or any other act post-dating the electoral vote—in these words, that “this power bestowed by the Constitution upon the State, of appointing an electoral college for the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States, is such, in its very nature, and by the necessities of the case, that every act of the State in accomplishing the ‘appointment’ must antedate the performance of that one single function which the appointee is competent to discharge under the Constitution.” If that proposition is sound, then of course all that the gentlemen say in regard to the effect of the decisions of the courts in determining the signification of their own statutes, all the decisions which have been referred to in regard to the obligation of all Federal tribunals to follow the interpretation which the State courts put upon their own statutes, lose all significance in this case. In other words, if when the electoral vote of a State has once been cast by men endowed with every muniment of title to the office of elector which the laws of the State enabled them to hold at the date when they must do their first and last official act, the power of the State to manipulate that vote, its jurisdiction over it, has gone away from the State to the nation, then, of course, these acts of Florida done after the electoral vote, in the frantic effort to change the result of a national election, lose every semblance of legal significance.

The strongest statement I have heard of the position of the gentlemen on the other side in regard to the grounds on which they rest their claim of right in these States to handle, by means of quo warranto and the like, the electoral vote after it has gone under seal to the President of the Senate is in its substance this: It is, they say, competent for the States, not to appoint electors after the voting-day, not to qualify them after the voting-day, but competent for them through their courts, after the voting-day has passed, to make interpretations of their own election laws which shall act backward, shall throw light on and bindingly decide the question who of rival claimants were the true functionaries of the State on that voting-day and thus competent for the States to settle the question which of the two rival bodies were really the lawful electors of the State. That is, I think, about the substance of the strongest statement I have seen of this claim, so zealously pressed by the other side, alleging power in the State after the electoral vote is cast to destroy it, and to unseat a President, though elected by electors who held in favor of their title every judgment, determination, and certificate which it was possible for the State to bestow under her existing laws, before the time when the electoral vote must be cast and sent off, under seal, to its Federal custody.

Let us analyze that claim for a moment, and see if it is not utterly unsound. The Constitution in its express terms limits the powers of the State to that matter which it has denominated tersely by the word “appoint.” About this first point there can be no debate. The utmost power, the furthest reach of the State in regard to this matter of making a President stops when “appointment” stops; not a hair’s breadth beyond that anywhere can the State go in creating your President by the popular vote. Then when we get the true sense of the word “appoint” we know the boundary of the powers of the State in this regard.

Now, sirs, what gentleman of this Commission, so learned as it is in all these great constitutional and legal ideas, will say to me, “There are some functions in the nature of ‘appointment’—functions which go to make up 'appointment'—which the States may exercise after the office has passed away and all its duties are done forever?" Such a proposition as that simply reduces the Constitution and this whole debate, I submit, to the most intense and unmitigated absurdity. Therefore every act of the State in the way of exercising power must be "appointment," and "appointment" in the very nature of the case cannot follow the day when the first and the last and the only act of the functionary must, by the Constitution and law, be completely and forever discharged. Is it not plain, therefore, thus far, that it was the design of the Constitution, is the express requirement of the Constitution, that every act of the State, being all appointment and appointment only, shall antedate the vote?

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. If it does not interrupt you, let me ask this: Suppose it to be granted that every act which constitutes the appointment must be done before the day when the electors cast their votes, does it follow that there can be no inquiry afterward as to whether any appointment was made?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I shall come to that in a moment, and I thank the Senator and member of the Commission for the suggestion. It is really the same idea to which I alluded when I undertook to state the position of the other side as well as I could, as to whether acts subsequently to the day of voting and to the appointment may not be looked to as throwing light or deciding upon the matter as to who the appointee really was, as made on the day of the vote. That is a fair question. It deserves a fair, frank, and square answer, and I shall make it as I proceed, as well as I can.

First of all, when the Constitution is confessed to design that the power of the State over the votes shall stop at the moment it puts them under seal, then that confession involves the admission that that is the moment at which the State must have completed all the scrutinies and trials it can employ in adjudging who are its electors. In other words, if an elector on the voting-day is endowed with all the insignia of right, with all the apparent title of office that can, according to the then existing State machinery, be held on that day, he is, to every possible legal intent, as against the State, the elector both de facto and de jure. If after that any power can try the title, it is not the State, but the nation. That arises out of the very nature of this sui generis thing with which we deal, this dual government of ours, having no likeness anywhere else in the governments of the world or in the law-books of the world. It is a case where two sovereignties combine, not in the mere process of making an election—for it is more than that—combine their powers in the process of inaugurating government and of creating the executive branch of a powerful people, in transmitting succession; a process wherein the boundary-line between the powers of the two sovereigns is carefully marked in the Constitution. That boundary is at the point where the vote is sealed and goes to the capital. At that time, before that vote, the State must have done her last act in adjudging who are her electors and bestowing the evidences of their title.

When that process is complete on the part of the State, when all that she is permitted to transact in the way of appointing her electors has been discharged according—to repeat what I said a moment ago, and I wish to state it with the utmost care about my words—when that political transaction by the State has been discharged according to the requirements of the law of the State as it existed upon the day of voting, then the power of the State over the subject-matter is an accomplished process of government on the part of the State, and the power of the State over the subject-matter has passed forever away. It becomes from that moment a matter of Federal care and solicitude, and not of State. In other words, and to state my proposition in still another form, every part of the machinery of a State which it proposes to make use of in the business of making a Federal elector must be placed in point of time in front of the exercise of the office of an elector. No part of it can be placed behind, because on that day the power of the State over the subject-matter is completely and forever ended.

Now, in the way of enforcing this view, let me take some propositions that seem to me to be exceedingly conclusive in regard to it. In the first place take the common, plain, practical, every-day, non-lawyer sense of the thing, and how does it look then? Everybody agrees that the trial of the matter as to who is appointed is a part of the appointment itself. Therefore I concede that it is within the power of the State to try the title of her electors. She can try it by quo warranto; she can try it by any machinery she pleases. It is within the province of the State to try the question by her own machinery as to whom she has selected to cast her vote; but if she makes any part of that machinery up in such a way that the trial cannot come until after the office is performed, then she must content herself with such scrutinies as she has arranged in advance of the discharge of the function of the elector. How would an act of a legislature sound which read: "Be it enacted, That this State reserves to herself the power to try by quo warranto who were her Federal electors after the time when they are compelled to cast the electoral vote?" Would not such an act be, on its very face, simply a monstrosity? Would it help it any to add the proviso: "Provided, That somebody shall start the quo warranto suit before the vote is cast?"

Suppose you should see a system of government that deliberately placed any part of the trial or "contest" of an election to an office after the office by the very organic law must have been performed and passed away! You would say, would you not, that such a system was simply insane? To give to the States the power here claimed would be not only this degree of insanity, but would also enable the States to contest an election after every possible function of the office must have been discharged, and also it places this contest and destruction of the vote by the State after the time when all the State's power over the vote is carefully withdrawn. More even than this; it enables any one who can manipulate the courts of the States to render an election by the people impossible, or, at best, within the mercy of the courts. Surely, such is not the insanity of the Constitution. In this view, therefore, I repeat that the State must, by the very nature of the case, place her election machinery for testing or determining, whether by her returning-board, or by courts in quo warranto, or in whatever tribunal she may please, the question whom she has selected, before the time when the office expires, her powers over the vote have ended, and her act has become an investiture of government by act of the State.

But take another step. Everybody agrees—the Constitution's terms and its history both combine to make everybody agree—that the reasons why the Constitution held back from the State and kept within the nation the power to fix the day for counting the vote, also the requirement that the day shall be the same in all the States, also the requirement that the vote shall be by ballot and that it shall remain under seal from the moment of its casting until the day of its counting—those requirements are confessed all to be in the Constitution for the vital purpose of rendering it impossible for the States to intrigue after they knew the votes of sister States, for the changing of the result of the election. They meant that no post hac judgments, no political intrigues, no subsidized courts, should be enabled to destroy the votes of States and unseat a President after they had found out just how many votes must be destroyed, by purchased judgments in quo warranto, in order to unseat a President elected and even inaugurated according to all the forms of law. And here let it be remembered forever that in order to unseat Presidents by this modern plan of post-election quo warranto, it is not necessary that any rival electors should have voted on the election-day. All that is needed is that enough quo warrantos shall be got to adjudge bad enough of the electors of the successful party to change the result.

The third volume of Elliot's Debates, page 101, Story on the Constitution, section 1475, and every other commentator on that subject, state the reason of the stopping the power of the States over the votes at election-day, sealing them up, and casting of them on the same day, just as I have stated it now. No debate is possible with regard to that vital object, or about that being the design, or at least the leading design, of these provisions. Now, what will be the effect upon these provisions of the Constitution of suffering the States, by judgment in quo warranto or acts of legislation or any other act destructive of a State's vote after they have found out how their sister States have voted, to change the result by placing some part of the machinery of the State for contesting this election after the election is over, and all power over the subject-matter of the election has passed over to the nation? Plainly, most manifestly, right on its face, it completely destroys every object for which those provisions making the voting-day the same, and the like, were put into the Constitution.

Your honors, if I, in my own State, being an earnest partisan, after I have found out how my sister States have voted and after I have learned that it only requires, say, nineteen votes to be destroyed in order to change the presidential election, can go to work in my local nisi prius court, and get a judgment in quo warranto, and this in my own name, and without the leave of my State, (as is done in Florida,) that will unseat the electors of my State and unseat a President, then I have turned the Government into a farce and the Constitution into a sham. I know such a caricature of our form of government is revolting to every mind that I now address; and yet I defy the ingenuity of counsel to devise a reply which will show that these opportunities for mischief, nay, sir, these mischiefs themselves, will not come if you suffer the determination by the States of who were their electors to come after they have found out how the other States have voted.

But the reply is made to that, "We commenced our quo warranto before the vote was cast." Pray, gentlemen of the Commission, tell me how does that relieve the subject of its difficulties? It puts you just in this position: Mark you, this was an information (and so it may be in every State if they so enact) upon the part, not of the State, but of a set of defeated candidates. It therefore puts it in the power of every individual who is disappointed, who is unhappy about results, or who is "enterprising," to attack and destroy the title to the greatest office of the world, and to precipitate the nation in revolution and unutterable disaster. The mere fact that such a one chooses to launch such a speculative—a private, speculative, or tentative quo warranto, before the voting is done, and thus putting himself in the position of preparing for emergencies after he finds out how his sister States have voted—putting himself in the position of "commanding the situation," in the situation of taking time by the forelock, of getting hold of the reins, puts him in the position of defeating and defying the provisions of the Constitution setting bounds to the power of the States over the votes, thereby causing them all to be trampled down.

All this is to be done by the simple act of a private individual in a nisi prius court, in a partisan court, starting a suit that cannot be tried until long after the election is over—starting a suit for the purpose of holding the reins and commanding the situation. How does that launching of a suit before the vote relieve the subject of its difficulties? Not in the slightest degree. I submit with the utmost deference both to the learned counsel on the other side and to the Commission, not the slightest. You cannot travel an inch in that direction without destroying the guarantees that the Constitution has so wisely furnished whereby a presidential election is an accomplished fact so far as the States are concerned contemporaneously throughout the Union. Was that not wise—do not the debates on the Constitution show you the sagacity and the marvelous foresight of your fathers when they made it so that it was impossible for the States to find out, in advance of their own action, how their sisters had voted? Do not the perils of this hour, nay, the appalling dangers which now we trust in God are passing away, in which we see these attempts to overthrow the votes of the States because so few overthrown will change the result, impress us anew with the wisdom of the provision which requires all the States to take off all their hands at the same hour from all presidential votes?

But, gentlemen of the Commission, there is another part of this great theme that is equally conclusive; and indeed I have not followed the points that I had marked in my brief at all. I have gone over as many of them as I care to go over at this time, except the one that I now come to.

In the very able argument that was offered by Mr. O'Connor, he stated what seemed to me to be the strongest proposition on his side that he did state at all. It was stated in reply to our proposition that the elector who on the election-day was endowed with all the insignia of office which the State laws enabled him to hold on that day, and who thus endowed cast the vote of the State, that such an officer, so endowed, had in fact and in law then and thereby accomplished an act of government; that whether he were an officer de jure or de facto, still being upon that day so endowed, so IN OFFICE, so acting in the actual occupancy of office, with all apparent right, that in such case such act constituted an act of government, that thereby the act of the State was accomplished in law—it was government, not mere election, but government—government inaugurated, accomplished, endowed. That was our proposition, and that, therefore, whether de jure or de facto an elector, provided he had all the evidences and insignia of right, the act was good as the act of the State, and I stand by that. But it was met by what, I say, was the strongest position that can be taken against it, and it was about this, as near as I can state it; I shall be pardoned if I state it with less strength than it was stated by the distinguished author of it. It was about this: "You are mistaken, gentlemen; that is not an act of government; it is not an exercise of official power by one in office, which, if not sustained, if stricken down, would hurt some third person, some public, some other person." "That is not your case," says Mr. O'Connor, "but this is your case: your case is that of an attempted vote, that vote by a man having no power to cast it, and it is arrested on its way to Government in transitu; it is arrested by our process in the nature of a quo warranto, and therefore it is not at all the case of a de facto exercise of authority."

One of the errors of that position, the one that strikes me as the fatal one, and I submit it with the utmost deference, is that it misstates the nature of the legal characteristics of this business of a State casting its vote by its electors. That is government, bless you; that is more than an election; it is government. It is the last act of the State in exercising its part of the creation of a President. It is, therefore, when done, government accomplished, irrevocably done.

My friend's position is, if I conceive the truth of this point, utterly fallacious in that it assumes a legal status that does not belong to the case you are dealing with, a case where a State has endowed her elector with all the right which her machinery enables that elector to hold on the day that he must vote. He has it all; every appearance of right. Now the law says, the Constitution says, the necessities of the case say that a man thus endowed on that day when the act must be accomplished, if ever, can perform an act of government, and he does do it. Therefore the public is hurt, the community is hurt, your country is hurt, the Constitution, all its designs are hurt, if you strike down an act of government performed and forever performed on the only day that it could be performed, by men who had every insignia of right that the State laws enabled them to have on the day when it was performed. Therefore it is the act of a man de facto, an officer whether de jure so or not, and his act is government accomplished when it is performed under all the apparent rights of office that our electors were surrounded with.

In enforcement of that view, suffer me to call your attention to some language in the case of Potter vs. Robbins, in Clarke and Hall's Contested Elections, pages 900 and 901. I ought to say in regard to this case what, if I am in error about, the very learned gentlemen of the Commission will correct me, that I understand that ever since its announcement it has been admitted and held to be, in so far as it goes in the way of exposition, the law of the Constitution upon the subject to which it relates. It was pronounced in the year 1834 by the Senate of the United States, in one of the most celebrated debates that ever occurred, so far as I know, in the history of the Senate, in regard to the question of a right to a seat in that body. Among the men who debated it and who sustained the position that is here stated that I am about to read, you will find such names as Bell, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, Mangum, Poindexter, Preston, Webster, and others, embracing of course some of the most illustrious names of our country, nearly all of whom participated in this debate and who voted to sustain the proposition that I am about to read. It was a case where the legislature of Rhode Island, after it had elected Mr. Robbins to the Senate, undertook at a subsequent meeting of the legislature to declare that election worthless, to take it back, to put in the place of Mr. Robbins Mr. Potter, whom they elected six months after they had elected Mr. Robbins. The report in the case discusses the power of the State to withdraw the act of election on the one hand and the power of the Senate on the other hand to look into the question whether or not some members of that legislature were or were not entitled to vote. Upon the question of the power of the State to take back any part of its act in creating a Senator, and also the question of the power of the Senate to look into the question of the individual right of members to vote in the body that composed the legislature, the report in that case used language that I now read:

In the performance of this duty, the State acts in its highest sovereign capacity, and the causes which would render the election of a Senator void, must be such—

And I call attention to this language because it is the most terse, the best stated that I have seen on the subject—as would destroy the validity of all laws enacted by the body by which the Senator was chosen.

It must go to the destruction of the body itself, and cannot inquire into the eligibility of the persons that made the election. Now, omitting some, I read this:

But where the sovereign will of the State is made known through its legislature, and consummated by its proper official functionaries in due form, it would be a dangerous exertion of power to look behind the commission for defects in the component parts of the legislature, or into the peculiar organization of the body for reasons to justify the Senate in declaring its acts absolutely null and void. Such a power, if carried to its legitimate extent, would subject the entire scope of State legislation to be overruled by our decision, and even the right of suffrage of individual members of the legislature, whose elections were contested, might be set aside. It would also lead to investigations into the motives of members in casting their votes, for the purpose of establishing a charge of bribery or corruption in particular cases. These matters, your committee think, properly belong to the tribunals of the State, and cannot constitute the basis on which the Senate could, without an infringement of State sovereignty, claim the right to declare the election of a Senator void, who possessed the requisite qualifications and was chosen according to the forms of law and the Constitution.

What now is the application of that to this occasion? Manifestly this: The closest analogy which we have at all under our system of government to this choice by the States of electors is the one I have just read from, is the choice of a Senator. The language of the Constitution in regard to the election of Senators is that they shall be chosen by the legislature, and that that choice shall be in such manner as the legislature shall prescribe—almost the precise words of the Constitution in regard to the manner of choosing electors.

It is true that the Senate itself, having the large, unlimited range of vision that belongs to courts when trying quo warrantos, having the power of trying the election of its members, cannot without invading the rights of the States go behind the action of the legally-constituted legislature for the purpose of inquiring into the eligibility of the men who created the appointment, cannot strike down that act of the legislature except, to adopt the words of this report, for causes that would render the laws passed by the legislature invalid. If that be so, I say, in regard to this limitation on the powers of the Senate on one side to overthrow the action of the States in making the election, and also on the other side limiting the powers of the States to take back an election that is accomplished according to the forms of law, if that be true in this case, as it is, then it must be true, I submit, utterly true beyond fair room for debate, that when the States, whose power is limited to a single act of appointing according to the requirements of the legislature electors, have made that appointment, have made it on the only day that they could, have made it by the men who held on that day every vestige and indication of right which it was possible to hold on the day of election—if it be true, I say, that such is the limitation as between the Senate and its members, how much more thoroughly true must it be that this body having no power but the power to count—I care not now how latitudinarian you may make that word signify for the purposes of this Commission, still it is but a power to count—how much more true must it be that under your power to count you cannot assume that these officers, appointed according to the form of every law that existed on election-day, holding all the authority that the legislature enabled them to hold on that day, certified by every certificate that it was possible to hold under the laws of the States on that day, you, with no other power than the power to count, cannot go back and destroy by quo warranto or anything else that act after the accomplishment of the election of a President, and thus throw away, destroy, overthrow an election accomplished according to all the forms of law.

Gentlemen, I say without exaggeration and without falling into any extravagance that comes from heat of debate, that it is inevitably true that if you suffer men to start away down in the piepoudre courts of our country, on their own private motion, quo warrantos, or bills in the legislature, or any act that shall unseat the President of the United States before the day of counting, you can unseat him after. I challenge gentlemen to show where that rule of law is that shall say, "thus far thou mayest go, and no farther." If you can unseat Mr. Tilden to-day, he being the President, by a judgment of a republican court in my republican State you can do it after he is in office, for there is no limitation upon the power; and there is no principle that compels the courts that have jurisdiction in quo warranto, and whose case is simply started before the vote, to make their decision before the count in February; no principle that compels them to make their decision before the inauguration-day; and you establish that rule, and you have at once put it in the power of the States, as I have already remarked, to overthrow the Constitution, to destroy it in this, its very citadel, and to end the life of the state.

I thank you, gentlemen, for the very singular kindness with which I have been listened to.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, the wisdom of the method and order of this examination adopted by the Commission has fully proved itself in its execution. The intelligent and experienced and learned minds acting in the Commission saw at once that the decisive lines of the controversy were to be determined upon the limitation of their powers and the limitation of the subjects and the means for producing those subjects upon which those powers were to act. In the full discussion accorded to counsel, and in the deliberations of the Commission extended during the periods of their private session, the result is disclosed in this form and to this effect, that this Commission will receive no evidence, and will merely inspect the certificates that the Constitution and the laws of the United States have authorized for transmission, and as such, received by the President of the Senate, have been opened to the two Houses, save in one particular, that in aiding them to inspect these certificates, and, within the limits of the information there disclosed, determine and advise the two Houses of Congress how many and what votes shall be counted for the State of Florida, it will receive evidence touching the eligibility of one of the named electors appointed. In that determination I do not understand the Commission to have overpassed the question, what the effect is as to the acceptance or rejection of a vote thus challenged for ineligibility, but to have decided that on that point they will receive the evidence that may be offered in order that they may determine in the first place whether upon the facts the exception taken to Humphreys's vote is maintainable; and secondly, whether, if maintainable and maintained upon the facts, the methods of the Constitution and the duty now presently being discharged permit of any rejection from the certificated vote transmitted and opened of the vote of an elector upon that ground.

I will first deal with the question of fact. I call the attention of the Commission to the proposition that the point of exception under the Constitution, the matter proposed of disqualification under the Constitution, is simply this: that at the time of his appointment he filled an office of honor or emolument under the United States. I except to the mode of proof as to its effect when it stops where it did, that was used by the excepting party to his qualification, that they used a commission of the date of 1872 and proved no occupation of the office later than August, 1876. I understand that when, under the certificate of a governor the vote of a State is in the very process of counting, to be questioned in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, no exception that shall proceed for its prosperity upon the power of the exceptor to find an old commission and then take advantage of the unreadiness or want of notice that the exception was to be raised is admissible, to argue from the ancient case that all things remain as they were until contradicted. The danger of that proposition in a transaction of this nature can be at once discerned. Let whosoever take up the burden of proving that on the 7th day of November one of these certified electors having the warrant of the seal and authority of the State as having been elected was disqualified for that election, he must prove it down to and as of that day. But when the proof stops there, the neighbor, the friend, the lawyer whose dealings are to fill out with living effect the dead commission, stops with his necessary proof in the month of August, you have failed to find that actual possession and use of the office, even presumptively, beyond the date, for no reason was given in the witness's evidence why his knowledge stopped there unless the action of the officer stopped there.

You must dispose of this question of fact upon some method of strictness suitable to the nature of the transaction in which you are engaged and suitable to the exercise of the duty, not under an organized and arranged Commission like this, but as an ordinary discharge of constitutional duty by the two Houses in their joint convention; and I submit that there is no claim, the proof there stopping, that it is to be regarded as a challenge which requires the fact that he was in office on the 7th of November to be presumed.

I now come to the counter-proof, supposing that that step is passed; and the counter-proof, not challenged in form, comes to this, that, early in October, Humphreys resigned in writing his office to the circuit judge of that circuit, and received from him an acceptance of the resignation; such judge proceeding to instruct him to turn over whatever of public means for the exercise of the office he held to the collector of customs, who would discharge the office, such judge at the same time advising the collector of the accepted resignation and of the devolution of the office upon him, followed by the evidence of Mr. Humphreys that thereafter, from the early day in October, he himself discharged no part of its duties and held out no professions of capacity to discharge them, and moreover that the collector from that time thenceforth until after the period of inquiry, the 7th of November, and perhaps till now, occupied the office and discharged its duties.

Upon this plenary and apparently conclusive proof, an objection is made that as the appointment was made by the circuit court, the resignation could only be made to and received by the court in session, and that no such session having taken place, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States which prescribes as a qualification for an elector that he should not exercise an office under the United States, Mr. Humphreys was an officer of the United States on the 7th day of November. Now, this office had no term whatever prescribed by statute; it had no enlargement by necessity or by prescription beyond the present will of resignation. The office itself was secured for the public by no clause requiring it to be occupied and exercised until a successor was qualified. There was no need of the office being refilled. The act took care of the service by prescribing that when there was no officer of this kind the collector should discharge the duty of this act of Congress.

Upon that state of law, in view of the existing legislation of Congress on the subject of resignations to which I shall call your attention, is it to be pretended for a moment that there was any power to hold an occupant of that office to the performance of its duties one moment beyond his will? Can it be pretended that, beyond the necessity of the conveyance of the resignation as determining that will, executed and placed in the power of the authority thus made its depositary, he could be held under any law, if there had been any, or his sureties under any law or jurisprudence enforcing the obligations of sureties, for the failure to perform acts or to do duties after his office was thus resigned?

Besides, look at the nature of this disqualification as proposed to the voters in the State of Florida and those who produce the candidates and name them to be voted for. Is the title, the paper-title back in the archives of courts or offices, to be searched for by electors in determining whether their fellow-citizen Mr. Humphreys shall receive their votes? They know who are in the possession and in the exercise of offices under the Government of the United States by their action, by their public possession and exercise of office; and now when Mr. Humphreys, to the knowledge of his neighbors in Pensacola and the community throughout the State of Florida, is out of his office, and its constant duties are performed by another from and after the date in October, are they to lose the effect of their suffrage by the production of a certificate that in 1872 he held the office? I think not.

I have said I would ask your attention to the only provisions in the statutes of the United States that bring their bearing upon the question of resignation; and they are found at three pages of this volume—233, 251, and 277.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Are you quoting by pages or sections?

Mr. EVARTS. Pages.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. The Revised Statutes?

Mr. EVARTS. Yes. They relate only to resignations of military officers or enlisted soldiers in the nature of desertion. Now, under a scheme of law that from the foundation of the Government until now has never lifted finger to restrict the right of citizens to retire from office at their mere will, who shall say that within the property of this electoral qualification and this count of it on this evidence any question is to be made?

But the authorities seem to be very clear as to the right of resigning without even acceptance. In section 260 of Mr. McCrary's book I read:

Where the law requires an officer resigning to do so by a written resignation—

Where the law in terms requires an officer resigning to do so by a written resignation—to be sent to the governor, it is not necessary that the governor should signify his acceptance of a resignation to make it valid. The tenure of office, in such a case, does not depend upon the will of the executive, but of the incumbent.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Is not that a case where the law expressly provides that the office may be resigned by the party by a written resignation without any acceptance?

Mr. EVARTS. I have not examined the law.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I think you will find it so.

Mr. EVARTS. It is spoken of as a law which requires a resignation in writing. This careful commentator quotes it as a law that requires "an officer resigning to do so by a written resignation."

A civil officer has the absolute right to resign his office at pleasure, and it is not within the power of the executive to compel him to remain in office.

And the authorities for this are given in the first volume of McLean's Reports, page 512, where that learned judge says :

There can be no doubt that a civil officer has a right to resign his office at pleasure ; and it is not in the power of the executive to compel him to remain in office. It is only necessary that the resignation should be received to take effect ; and this does not depend upon the acceptance or rejection of the resignation by the President. And if Fogg had resigned absolutely and unconditionally, I should have no doubt that the defendant could not be held bound subsequently as his surety.

This was a question of suretyship. There is a case in California, The People vs. Porter, 6 California Reports, 27. "Resignation of office" is the head-note. "A resignation is effectual without its acceptance by the appointing power." You will observe that under this condition of law, all the circumstances of this office making its application a necessary result from the nature of the office and the tenure not limited in any way, all that was necessary was to make a permanent vacation of the office, evidenced by the conduct of the resigning officer, and followed not necessarily by any necessary proof, but if followed by the public possession and discharge of the office by another, it took the officer out of his place within the disqualification or qualification concerning it.

I might refer to a very important proposition made by Mr. Manager Hoar on the impeachment of Mr. Belknap, found on page 62 of the Record, volume 4, part 7, of this Congress, the two concluding paragraphs on the first column of that page. I will not occupy time by reading them ; but it was there laid down by the authority of the House of Representatives through their managers that in this country the acceptance of a resignation was not essential to vacate office, and that the English authorities to the contrary turned upon the peculiarity of their laws and their system which exacted maintenance of office against the will of an officer.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. With the exception there stated, that of the class of offices which a person could be compelled by mandamus to accept.

Mr. EVARTS. So I understood ; but that was drawn from the English cases.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. And the early New England cases. The office of constable a person could be compelled by mandamus to accept.

Mr. EVARTS. But there it was I believe contended, certainly it is matter of public knowledge and history, that in the United States service there are no such civil officers ; and no pretense of any such obligation has been set forth. We have been satisfied to rest upon the working maxim of our politics that none resign.

Now, I will consider, and very briefly, the question of ineligibility made apparent by proof aliunde, as bearing upon the question whether the vote is to be omitted in the count. That question, if not open for discussion, will nevertheless occupy me but a very brief period, and I must assume that it is open, that there has been no determination that ineligibility made to appear by extraneous proof would lead to the rejection of the vote. This clause of the Constitution, which simply prescribes an exclusion from the office of elector, left open to the appointment of the States, of persons filling seats in Congress or occupying office under the United States, is a clause of the Constitution not executing itself and not executed by law; and when, therefore, in the presence of the two Houses, the transaction commences of counting the presidential votes, no objection of that kind can be heard or entertained, because Congress has not filled out the legislation necessary to provide the means of adducing proof in advance, one way and the other, and the effect that is to be given to the presence of a disqualified elector. Let me call your attention to a case of the greatest weight in all our discussions of matters before the Supreme Court—the case of Groves vs. Slaughter, in 15 Peters; I read from page 500. Look at that question as it was presented. The constitution of Mississippi contained this provision:

The introduction of slaves into this State as merchandise or for sale shall be prohibited from and after the 1st day of May, 1833.

After that date they were imported for sale; they were sold; and the buyer gave his notes for the price; and the question was whether the notes could be collected. The courts of Mississippi held that they could not; and the Supreme Court of the United States, with but two dissenting judges, held that the constitution did not execute itself and that until legislation was provided that was to have that effect, it was not executed. The court had the advantage in their decision of the arguments of the ablest men at the bar; Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster both appeared in this case and other very eminent lawyers. At pages 500 and 501, Mr. Justice Thompson, giving the opinion of the court, said:

Admitting the constitution is mandatory upon the legislature, and that they have neglected their duty in not carrying it into execution, it can have no effect upon the construction of this article. Legislative provision is indispensable to carry into effect the object of this prohibition. It requires the sanction of penalties to effect this object. How is a violation of this prohibition to be punished? Admitting it would be a misdemeanor, punishable by fine, this would be entirely inadequate to the full execution of the object intended to be accomplished. What would become of the slaves thus introduced? Will they become free immediately upon their introduction or do they become forfeited to the State? These are questions not easily answered. And although these difficulties may be removed by subsequent legislation, yet they are proper circumstances to be taken into consideration when we are inquiring into the intention of the convention in thus framing this article. It is unreasonable to suppose that, if this prohibition was intended, per se, to operate without any legislative aid, there would not have been some guards and checks thrown around it to secure its execution.

Now, suppose this injunction of the Constitution is mandatory on the States not to appoint as electors those who are within the prescribed disqualification, Congress has not undertaken to execute it; the States have not undertaken to execute any procedure by which votes for disqualified persons shall cause the failure of the vote of the State. They have provided no means; none have been exercised here; and I submit to this Commission that, laying down, as you must, a rule that is suitable to the ordinary and orderly and unretarded progress of the proceedings of the two Houses, when the President of the Senate opens the certificates, and, dealing only with the certificates as your judgment about evidence is they must deal unless in this particular, you must hold that in this particular also, unless there be statutory provisions of the United States or of the State purging the lists, you must count the vote that the State sends forward and that its governor certifies, where there is no question of objection of any other nature, which, of course, the case now being considered contains. You are undertaking to deal, in the process of counting the vote, with a question to be settled by fact antecedent to the appointment, and you are exposed to a final and irrevocable rejection of a vote from the mere casual impression or uncertainty of evidence.

This subject, then, being rejected from a further consideration, I understand there is no matter left but for the execution by this Commission of the duty accorded to it by the act of Congress under which it is organized, to determine out of the materials of these three certificates what and how many votes are to be counted for the State of Florida.

The first certificate is subject to no criticism. You have rejected all means whatever of questioning it by evidence as to what occurred before the vote was cast, before the vote was certified by the governor, or after either of those parts of the transaction up to the time of the counting. No fact can intervene. This vote, then, is to be counted, not because it is the best that is seen, but by the absolute fullness of its title in complying with all the laws that have been imposed by Congress concerning the complete verification of a certificate. The fact certified is not gainsaid by proof, for it is excluded. There was no offer of proof between the fact of the canvass closed and recorded and the governor's certificate.

This certificate then includes, with every degree of certainty and assurance, the votes of the State of Florida, and there are four votes here, and there is room for no more. To make it, therefore, of any practical importance in the further discussion, there must be apparent on the two other certificates either such disparagement of the first or such authenticity in the latter as should displace the one and substitute the other, or there must be such production of rival and competing certificates as leaves the Commission to rest in doubt and uncertainty as to which votes are to be counted.

Now, as you will not allow evidence outside of this first certificate as bearing directly upon its actual affirmative authenticity and sufficiency, you will not allow any evidence collaterally on the mere presentation or support of any other certificate. If another certificate comes here that, by its own credit, is made superior to ours, it displaces it. If it is made equal to ours, then there are two certificates, and then you must determine which of the two, or whether either, is entitled to consideration. That leads me to ask attention to these other certificates, so called. By the only certificate that relates to an apparent act in the election of President of the United States on the part of the State of Florida, it is shown to have been wholly without authority of law, and this second certificate, so far from competing with the first or disparaging the first, confirms it in all respects; in the first place negatively, for it wants the certificate of the executive that is prescribed; in the second place, by an entirely superfluous and worthless paper, so far as the Constitution and laws of the United States are concerned and so far as the laws of Florida are concerned, of an attorney-general of that State, having no more power or authority to certify anything about the election than the commander of the militia of the State, carrying therefore on its face no invitation to your hospitality and excluding itself from consideration by its being wholly without legal support in the laws of Florida and wholly unrecognized under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

But if you treat it as a paper, read it for what it says. It shows you that the recorded canvass as it lay in the secretary of state's office was the only transaction in that election that the governor of the State by its laws could certify to, and that his certificate rested upon that fact and could not be questioned for reason of its not observing the executive duty. Let me ask your attention to the true result of this certificate, as was well and firmly stated by my associate, Mr. Stoughton, when he said that it showed that it would have been a violation of duty on the part of the governor of the State of Florida to have certified or looked at anything else, provided you take this attorney-general's certificate of what the law is. He describes himself as an attorney-general, and by virtue of that office one of the members of the board of State canvassers of the State of Florida, and he undertakes to certify "that, by the authentic returns of the votes cast in the several counties of the State of Florida, * * * said returns"—that is, the county returns—"being on file in the office of the secretary of state, and seen and considered by me as such member of the board of State canvassers of the said State of Florida, it appears and is shown" that the four gentlemen named "were chosen the four electors of President and Vice-President of the United States."

And I do further certify that, under the act of the legislature of the State of Florida establishing said board of State canvassers, no provision has been enacted, nor is any such provision contained in the statute law of this State, whereby the result shown and appearing by said returns—to said board of State canvassers can be certified to the executive of the said State.

If that is not as complete an exclusion of the possibility of there being any reliance or resort by the laws of Florida on the part of the executive to any of this evidence, these returns, or any part of them, what could supply such a conclusion? And when you look at the law of Florida already brought to the attention of the Commission, you find that, as a part and the final part of the transaction of appointing electors, the canvassers having made their report, it is the governor's duty thereupon to issue his certificate to the electors thus shown to be elected, which is the final warrant by the State of Florida of their appointment and the justification of their action in voting.

I come now to a third certificate, so called, and we are to proceed to inquire whether there is anything on that which disparages or overtops the paramount authority of the first certificate. In regard to this certificate, I say that it is a paper having no warrant whatever under the Constitution or laws of the United States or of the State of Florida—I mean the laws of the State of Florida as they existed when the appointment was completed and when the vote was cast and certified and transmitted here. It is a posthumous certificate of post-mortem action, never proceeding from any vital or living college of electors, but only by the galvanic agency of interested party purpose, taking effect after the whole transaction was ended. I submit to your honors, without making any imputation as between political parties, that the inspection of this certificate shows that, the transaction having gone on and been completed within the purview of the Constitution and the laws of the United States and the laws of the State of Florida, a government, coming into being on the subsequent 1st of January by the change of political parties, undertakes to undo what has already been done.

That proposes (without offense to the arrangement of the two parties in this transaction) that one party was in possession of power during the procedure of the transaction and was succeeded by a change of party. It would be just the same if the reverse situation in the names of the parties were concerned. If it can be done, then all the care and all the wisdom and all the contrivances that are to make this transaction in the States final at some point, certifiable at some point, and in some manner and by some officer, are to go for nothing, if when there are new officers, new interests, new legislators, by either or all the powers of the changed government, the vote that has been deposited can be corrupted, subtracted, obscured, or substituted; if legislature, governor, judiciary, all enter into the transaction that is to substitute for the deposited vote of the State a vote that they then presently seek to deposit, or that its efficacy, if not adequate for its own counting, shall displace the counting of the completed transaction.

This certificate, opened by the President of the Senate, and by that mere act therefore laid before the Houses of Congress, and transmitted here, when the contents are opened and read, is shown to be no certificate under the Constitution of the United States or the act of Congress or the laws of Florida in existence at the time of the casting of the electoral vote of that State within its borders. It is, under the aspect and the cover of a certificate, transmitted to the President of the Senate, connected with the election, made the vehicle of carrying into the physical presence and power of the two Houses, and thus of this Commission, what is utterly nugatory, utterly ineffectual, utterly unauthorized by any provision of the Constitution.

You cannot count that, then, as an electoral vote. Nobody pretends that that certificate, coming here on the 31st of January, reciting legislation not completed, I think, until the 26th, and some quo warranto judgment referred to that was terminated on the 23d or 17th—the dates are utterly immaterial—is a paper that the President of the Senate was by the Constitution required to receive. It is not a paper that is a certified vote of a State. It is not a paper that can carry any means of furnishing you with the vote of the State to be counted. So in respect of evidence it is wholly without authority.

It will be observed that the certificate of Governor Drew, by public knowledge shown to have come into his office on the 1st of January or later perhaps, but the term of his office dates from then, undertakes by authority of an act passed January 17, 1877, which had ordered a new "canvass of the returns of said votes on file," which canvass "was, on the 19th day of January, made according to the laws of the State and the interpretation thereof by the supreme court," to recite that four gentlemen named "were duly determined, declared, and certified"—that is, by these canvassers taking up the transaction in January under a law passed in January, and making a scrutiny ending on the 17th—"to have been elected electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Florida" at the past election in November, "as shown by said returns;" and it further recites that—

In a proceeding on the part of the State of Florida by information in the nature of quo warranto wherein the said Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge were relators, and Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long were respondents, the circuit court of this State for the second judicial circuit, after full consideration of the law and the proofs produced on behalf of the parties respectively, by its judgment determined that said relators were, at said election, in fact and in law, elected such electors as against the said respondents and all other persons:

Now, therefore, and also in pursuance of an act of the legislature entitled "An act to declare and establish the appointment by the State of Florida of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States," approved January 26, A. D. 1877, I, George F. Drew, governor of the State of Florida, do hereby make and certify the following list of the names of the said electors chosen, appointed, and declared as aforesaid, to wit:

The certificate required was a certificate to be delivered to the college of electors at or before the day, and that is the only certificate which can have any force; and here we have a certificate of a governor who was not governor at that time.

Then, besides, we have all that is here stated, absolutely post hac, subsequent to the transaction, and only allowed to present itself on the 31st day of January just past, to have some influence upon the transaction that had been completed and been certified; and that when the two competing certificates of the rival electors had been finished and placed in possession of the President of the Senate long before this authority arose. What becomes of the authority in Congress, exercised under the Constitution, to say that the votes shall all be delivered on the part of the States on the same day? Is not that a substantive provision? Is not that a hold that Congress by the Constitution was given concerning the deposit of the electoral vote? Certainly it was. What becomes of the provision of the act of Congress, justified by the Constitution, that the elections or other methods of appointment that the State may use shall be on the same day? What does it mean? Does it mean anything? Did our fathers trifle upon questions of punctilio and order? No. If it means anything, it means that it must be done on one day, that it shall not be undone on any other day. It is to be done on one day; it is to be finished on one day; and they would laugh at the triviality of the wisdom of their successors in the great places of the Constitution, the Senate and the House and the great judges of the land, if on the first occasion that it became necessary or at all effectual to undo, it should be held as constitutional law that when it was provided it should all be done on one day, that meant that after what was done was known, and after the importance of undoing it was understood, and after the change of parties or the ambition of human nature made it important to undo in separate parcels and at various times what had been supposed to have been concluded and made sacred in the deposit that the Constitution had assigned for a finished transaction, that courts, that legislatures, that governors remote from responsibility, or seconded in their transgressions by the opinion of party and the applause of political interests, should have the fingering of every vote for President until the counting was concluded.

What are the prodigious claims here? That by a lawsuit, and a lawsuit in a State court, begun and ended it may be afterward, begun if you please before but ended afterward, by virtue of that transaction the State's completed vote is to be retrieved and reversed; and that when a justice's court of the first instance has so decided, as my learned brother, Mr. Green, has said, the courts of the United States make a low obeisance to Mr. Justice White, and say, "That is the end of the law; that is the fiat of the State." Well, supposing that we had succeeded in counting a President in under quo warranto, justified under the Constitution and the laws as they now are or that shall be opened by legislation to the tribunals of the country, and suppose that then a quo warranto is started to prove that the President in his seat should be dislodged because some of the votes counted for him were not by de-jure electors, and then it is proposed that the decision of the State court is "the be-all and the end-all" of that inquiry; that whichever of these candidates takes his seat as President of the United States in a situation of evenly-balanced elections, his continued possession of the Federal office upon the judgment post hac of a State court that holds, whenever a quo warranto comes to an end by due procedure of their laws, that the title of the President that acquired the count of the votes of Ohio or of New York was a miscount, a count of spurious votes, so held and determined by the State in the independence of its judiciary passing upon the question. What sort of a government, what sort of a presidency, what sort of muniments and protections of regularity and permanence of authority under the Constitution are provided by a scheme of perpetual four years' dependence upon a quo warranto in the State of Nevada or of Florida?

You then must never lose sight of the matter that you are to advise what votes and how many shall be counted by the two Houses that stand in a present duty, never intended by the Constitution to be interrupted by a day or by an hour. When you have determined that evidence shall not invade the regularity of the finished transaction of the State or defeat the regularity of the certification under the acts of Congress at the time when the votes are sealed up in their packages and transmitted—when you have determined that that shall not be invaded by extraneous evidence, you have determined as by a double decision that it shall not be invaded, disparaged, or exposed to any question by a mere certificate that is its own agent and author and volunteer in disturbance of the counting of the votes.

The PRESIDENT. Will any other gentleman speak on your side, Mr. Evarts?

Mr. EVARTS. We have, I believe, a little unoccupied time.

The PRESIDENT. O, yes.

Mr. EVARTS. We do not propose to occupy it.

The PRESIDENT. The case is submitted on your side?

Mr. EVARTS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT. There are fifty-five minutes left for reply to the other side.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, the duty of closing this argument has, I regret to say, been imposed upon me, and I especially regret that its performance should be required at so late an hour of the day and after so protracted a session of the Commission; but, may it please your honors, I know the importance of a speedy termination of the labors of this Commission, and shall proceed to the discharge of my duty as best I can without asking the indulgence of any delay.

The counsel on the other side in their arguments to-day seem to have taken a step even in advance of that taken on the occasion of the preceding argument, and now seek to exclude even any inquiry whatever into the subject-matter submitted to this Commission for their consideration; and while the learned counsel who has just closed has so eloquently called your attention to the painful condition that might follow should we proceed to an election of a President of the United States subject to the delays that would be incident to the various judgments that might be rendered on quo warrantos instituted in different States for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of the due election of electors, he omitted to call your attention to the counterpart of that picture, viz: the condition of government we should have with a President walking up to the presidential chair along a pathway strewn with recognized frauds, perjuries, and crime, into which the people of this country are neither allowed to inquire through their representatives in the Federal Congress nor through their representatives in the governments of the States. I apprehend that this Commission, in considering the picture the learned gentleman has presented to you, will find in the counterpart a picture more painful to contemplate than that which he has drawn, and one from which the mind and the heart of every patriotic citizen will start back pained and shocked and agonized.

All that we have asked, may it please your honors, and all that we ask now, under the rules of evidence prescribed by this tribunal, is that the truth shall be ascertained in these matters in regard to which you are to act, and that when that truth is ascertained it may become in its necessary and legal results substantially and practically incorporated into the political history of the country.

The point to which the learned gentleman first addressed himself was that raised by the counsel for the objectors this morning to the vote of Humphreys because of his position as an official under the Federal Government, and both gentlemen have taken the position that we are so fastened to fraud and illegality, if either should exist in this matter, that there can be no inquiry by the Congress of the United States, or this Commission, or the two Houses of Congress, to ascertain whether an elector coming forward and depositing his ballot is within the class of persons inhibited from holding the office of elector by the Constitution of the United States. I beg pardon, may it please your honors, for using the word "inhibited," for to speak of a person as inhibited by the Constitution from holding a certain Federal office or to speak of a person as ineligible for certain reasons is to convey a very erroneous impression of the provision of the Federal Constitution on the subject now under consideration.

This provision is not directed immediately to any personal disability of the individuals to whom it refers, nor is it directed immediately to any personal disqualification under which such person may be, but the limitation operates upon the power given to the State, and disables the State from appointing such persons, rather than disables the person from holding the office. This, probably, is the only article in the Constitution of the United States in which there is anything in the nature of a grant from the Federal Government to the States. Throughout our entire system the Federal Government becomes the recipient of power from the States, and is the grantee of powers and not the grantor, or to speak more correctly in the phraseology of the law, is the donee and not the donor; but in this particular instance a power is given to the States to appoint electors in such manner as their legislatures respectively may think proper. But, says the article, in its further provision limiting the power granted:

No Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

You will see from the phraseology of the article that it is a limitation upon the power of appointment rather than a specification of any disability in the appointee. A State has the power to appoint whom it pleases within certain limitations; and when it transcends those limitations it does not execute a power which is given to it, but assumes to act beyond the given power, and the attempted appointment is therefore absolutely null and void. And yet the learned counsel on the other side contend that, whether the State regards this requirement of the Federal Constitution or not, whether the State in the execution of the power delegated to her shall appoint one whom it is beyond her power to appoint or not, we are not permitted to enter into the inquiry, but must accept as final and conclusive in a presidential election the vote of one whom the Constitution of the United States has declared the State shall under no circumstances appoint.

In contrast with this provision of the Constitution, and by analogy to develop more distinctly the view I have presented, recur, may it please your honors, to those provisions that relate to the personal disqualifications of citizens of the United States to occupy the offices of Representatives and Senators in Congress. Those provisions ordain that no person who has a certain disability, or who fails to have certain qualifications, shall be a Senator or Representative; for instance, no person shall be a Representative until he attains the age of twenty-five years; no person shall be a Senator until he attains the age of thirty. Under the clauses of the Constitution referred to, if an individual is elected to the House of Representatives before he is twenty-five years of age, but reaches that age prior to the time of taking his seat, he is capable of occupying the position; and if a Senator is elected before he reaches the age of thirty, but attains that age before he takes his seat, he is capable of occupying that position. But in the case of a State as to its electors, it is not a personal disability that either the lapse of time or anything on earth can cure, remove, or dispense with, for it is a limitation upon the power, and if the State exceeds the power granted, the act is void from the very day it was attempted to be performed, and the individual who assumes to cast the ballot, when appointed in excess of the power of appointment, casts a piece of paper that must, in every view of constitutional law, and under every ordinary and known principle relating to the law of powers, be regarded as a blank.

Now, may it please your honors, we maintain that the State of Florida, if it should be that you hold the first certificate valid, has appointed as one of her electors an office-holder under the Federal Government, and thus exceeded her power. Upon that question there are two matters of fact arising—first, was the elector referred to an office-holder, and, second, if so, was he such at the time of the appointment? The learned counsel on the other side require that we should be limited to the strictest possible proof of the fact of his incumbency on the day of the appointment. I apprehend that, as far as legal principles are known and recognized, when you have once proved the incumbency of an individual, the presumption of law follows and goes with you, and the burden of proof is upon him to show that that incumbency has ceased to exist. It is not for us to trace the fact of his continuing in office down from the day of his appointment. If we prove the commission under the broad seal by which he holds the office, and then superadd to that commission the fact that he has discharged the functions of the office at a period of time somewhat near in date to the period of his appointment, the presumption of law is that he acted under the commission from the date of his appointment and up to the present time.

But the learned counsel on the other side had the officer himself upon the stand; and if the resignation as proved by that officer is not a sufficient resignation, then, as a matter of course, he did not resign at all according to his own evidence, and was still in office on the day of his pretended appointment as elector. The resignation, as shown by him, was a private letter addressed to the judge of the circuit court, who was then in Ohio—I forget the particular locality in Ohio to which the letter was addressed—

Mr. STOUGHTON. Newark.

Mr. MERRICK. Newark, Ohio; and the receipt of a letter by him from the judge indicating his acceptance of that resignation. The statute of the United States requires that this appointment shall be made by the circuit court, and if any resignation is necessary at all, as we hold that it is, that resignation can only be made to the power that gave the appointment, and the power that gave the appointment is the only power capable of accepting the resignation and relieving the party from the incumbency of the official position.

The circuit court being the power that gave the appointment, it was to the circuit court that the resignation should have been sent; and if an acceptance was necessary it was the circuit court that should have given that acceptance, and the acceptance should have appeared upon the records of that court, if ever given, alongside of the commission, nullifying the commission by the same sanctity of record which the commission possessed that bestowed the office. But it is in proof before this honorable Commission that there is no record of that resignation; that the commission stands upon the records of the court to-day unimpeached and unimpaired by any recorded resignation of the officer that it clothed with official power; and I respectfully submit that, until that resignation is there recorded, until that resignation is accepted by the power which gave it and appears of record, this party still continues in office.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. Merrick, I should like to ask you a question which perhaps it will be convenient to state now, and you can answer it at such time as you choose. Section 6 of article 1, to which you have just referred, provides that no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office. Now if this gentleman had been elected a Senator or Representative of the United States, and the judge of the circuit court had refused to accept his resignation as shipping-commissioner, do you hold that he never could have taken the office of Senator or Representative? If not, how do you distinguish the case from the present one?

Mr. MERRICK. I will answer the question. I do not hold that if his resignation had never been accepted he would not have been competent to act as a Senator of the United States; but when elected to the Senate of the United States the acceptance by the Senate of the United States of that individual as a Senator would have been his discharge from that office, provided he had, prior to that time, tendered his resignation to the court.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Then if taking upon himself the incompatible office be a sufficient discharge from the other one in that case, is not the taking upon himself the office of elector?

Mr. MERRICK. If this were a personal disability it would have been. If it were a personal disqualification in the man, it would have effected that result. But where the difficulty in taking the office is not a personal disqualification in the individual, but a limitation upon the power that is to give the office, it does not have that effect.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. The acceptance in that way would be at a time very much later than the appointment, would it not?

Mr. MERRICK. Necessarily so. It rests upon the distinction that in the one case there is a limitation upon the power and in the other there is a disqualification of the person.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Mr. Merrick, I understand you to claim in this case that an acceptance is not necessary, but still the resignation must be to the party or court or person appointing.

Mr. MERRICK. It must be, unquestionably. If a resignation even is not necessary, as I stated to Judge HOAR, I think, in my reply, yet if he had resigned, whether his resignation had been accepted or not, the offer of the resignation is necessary, and that offer must be made to the power that gave the appointment. Suppose he had resigned to the clerk of the court, addressed the clerk at Newark, Ohio, a private letter saying, "I as shipping-commissioner beg leave to tender my resignation to you," or "beg leave to tender my resignation," how would it have been understood? It would have been understood as a resignation intended for the clerk to present to the court, and until it got to the court it could not operate as a resignation of his office, either with or without any acceptance.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Merrick, if a commissioner of the circuit court tenders his resignation to the judge and the judge directs it to be filed in the court, is that an acceptance?

Mr. MERRICK. When the court is in session it is an act of the court; and if the commissioner sends that resignation to the clerk's office it is there to wait for the sitting of the court, and is then filed during the session.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Mr. Merrick, allow me to ask you, do you hold that in case there should be a long vacation of the court, or the court should be abolished by law, or the judge should die and for a year or two no appointment be made in his place, this commissioner could never have resigned?

Mr. MERRICK. I should refer that case to one of the returning-boards of the South. I hardly know in such an extreme case what reply to make.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I understand your position to be that he cannot resign except when the court is in session.

Mr. MERRICK. He cannot resign except when the court is in session; but I presume that death and the abolition of an office and the extinction of a government and the wiping out of a country and the destruction of a whole people would make exceptions to all principles of law.

The PRESIDENT. I shall not take these interruptions out of your time, Mr. Merrick.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, may it please your honors, I pass from that branch of the case.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Before you pass from that, Mr. Merrick, I should like to ask you a question. You have been very much taxed, but I know your ability to reply. You say that the distinction between a man who accepts the office of Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, who is ineligible by holding another office, and the man who accepts and acts in the office of elector, being in the same situation, is that in one case the disability or inhibition goes to the power of the State and in the other it does not. Now, if the language is precisely the same, that no man shall be elected to the office of Senator unless he is thirty years old and no man shall be appointed to the office of elector who holds another office, where is the difference in the question of power in the State?

Mr. MERRICK. I am not prepared to answer that the language quoted is the exact language used in the Constitution.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. I do not know that it is the exact language, for the text is not before me.

Mr. MERRICK. Allow me to look at the Constitution before I answer the question.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Are not both State officers in one sense at least; both elected by the power of the State?

Mr. MERRICK. No person of a certain description shall be a member of either House. Says the Constitution:

No Senator or Representative [shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, &c.

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years.

No person shall be a Senator, who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years.

But in reference to the electors it is that "no person shall be appointed," following a previous grant of power to appoint; and according to the rules of law, wherever there is a power given to do an act, the donee of the power can only execute it legally according to the grant, and when he pursues strictly the limitations and the directions of the donor. You will perceive there is marked difference in the two cases.

I pass, then, may it please your honors, from that subject. My first inquiry in passing from it is as to what through the labors of this honorable Commission we have reached in reference to a definite conclusion with regard to the testimony before you for consideration. The learned counsel who last addressed you seemed to be under the impression, and endeavored to force that impression upon your consideration, that by the order passed no extrinsic evidence should be taken as to certificate No. 1, and therefore no evidence contained in certificates Nos. 2 and 3 could be used to invalidate certificate No. 1. I do not understand the order passed by this tribunal as the learned counsel on the other side seem to have understood it. I understand the scope and meaning of that order to be that while you, in the exercise of the powers of the two Houses of Congress, and representing the Federal Government in that regard, will not go behind the certificates, so to speak, to impeach them by extraneous evidence, yet you will consider whatever the State has sent to you in those certificates for the purpose of ascertaining which certificate represents the true wishes and will of the State. The order is:

That no evidence will be received except such as was laid before the two Houses by the President of the Senate with the different certificates.

If what is contained in the three certificates be evidence before you, it is evidence for all the purposes of this case; and whatever evidence there is in certificate No. 3 to show that that certificate contains the names of the persons duly appointed electors by the State of Florida must, either directly or indirectly, operate to invalidate or affect certificate No. 1.

Now what is before you in those certificates? In certificate No. 1 you have the statement of Governor Stearns as to the appointment of certain individuals as electors, and in certificate No. 2, which the counsel seemed to treat with a good deal of indignation, if not contempt, you have the certificate of the attorney-general of Florida as to the appointment of certain other parties as electors of the State of Florida, and the further certificate from those electors that they applied to the governor of the State for a certificate, which was refused. Now, I submit as a principle of law, sound in itself, and furnishing a full reply to the argument made by the counsel who opened for the other side, and as giving a satisfactory assurance against those serious consequences that he seemed to apprehend from the practical application and experience of the positions advanced by us, that where a party entitled to receive a piece of evidence from an official applies for it and does not get it, but is refused, he is in as good a position before a court of justice as though he had received it. You cannot and will not charge upon that individual or upon the interests and rights of the persons, the State, or the nation which that individual claims to represent, the consequences of the delinquency of an official who has failed or refused to perform his duty. It was not, as the learned counsel on the other side have intimated, that we waited until after it was seen how the election had gone. There is no danger from this case, as he would suggest, that hereafter, if the precedent of a favorable decision to the objectors should be reached, the door would be thrown open to fraud and to the bad passions of men, to the excitements of politics, and the acerbity of party hatreds, to interfere with the just result of popular expression; none whatever. On the contrary, we ask that those excitements should be suppressed by the calm voice of the reason of this august tribunal, and that men who would hereafter seek to perpetuate political power through the instrumentalities of fraud, deceit, and bad practices should find in the recorded judgment of this tribunal, as part of the history of the Government, the declaration that all such iniquitous proceedings, schemes, and designs will be utter failures and unavailing for the production of any result. Instead of waiting to see how these elections had gone, as intimated by the counsel, or instead of its being a case from which hereafter parties might be induced so to wait, it is apparent to this court from these certificates that the men who claimed to be elected as the so-called Tilden electors of Florida went to the governor, carrying with them a majority of the votes of the electors of that State, and asked the governor to give them the certificate which under the statute law of the United States they were entitled to receive. That governor, possibly influenced by some of those motives which the gentleman has so kindly ascribed as impelling the action of other people, declined to give that certificate, and they were left to look for the next best evidence they could find.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. If it does not interrupt you, I should like, Mr. Merrick, to hear you upon this point: Suppose that what you call the Tilden electors had never voted at all; the question I should like to hear counsel upon is this: is it competent, by subsequent State proceedings, to show that the men who did vote, the Hayes electors, had no title to vote?

Mr. MERRICK. Most unquestionably. The State cannot have her voice simulated. It happens that on this occasion the true voice of the State was spoken; but if it had not been, there could have been no more power and vigor in the simulated tones of her voice to reach the councils of the Federal Government than there is when those simulated tones come ringing along with the true sentiments of her people. The State is not to be deceived and cheated in that way. She might on the day after her people voted have instituted her quo warranto, and, standing in the presence of her own judicial tribunals, clothed with the majesty of her power, and appealing to her judicial authority, asked these men, "By what right do you assume to exercise the power of this State?" And she could have stripped from them the garments they had stolen; stripped from their shoulders her livery which they had no right to wear. She could proceed against them, whether others spoke in her behalf or not. In this case the proceeding was by individuals under circumstances which the State subsequently felt constrained to recognize. But in the case supposed by Senator Thurman the proceeding would have been directly by the State herself in her courts or through her legislature.

Could she not have proceeded in her courts; could she not, in conjunction with proceedings in her courts, also have proceeded through her legislature? The power is given to the State to appoint electors in such manner as her legislature may prescribe. That power so given to appoint necessarily carries with it and implies a power to certify to that appointment, and it is for her to authenticate the appointment which she makes in the exercise of the power conferred upon her under that provision of the Constitution. I do not mean to question or deny that the United States, through its statutes, may provide also for a mode of authentication, as it has done; but, as seems to have been concluded by the Commission, that mode of authentication is not by any means conclusive, and, I respectfully submit, is not the best evidence of the appointment. The best evidence of the appointment is from the State herself in obedience to her own law and in the execution of the power of providing for the authentication of the appointment she is authorized to make. The legislature of the State would have the right in the canvass of the vote even, as over and above any returning-board, to ascertain who were the parties really and truly appointed.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Do you maintain that, Mr. Merrick, as an act of legislative will notwithstanding the previous law that had provided some other method?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, may it please your honors, notwithstanding the previous law may have provided some other method. If the legislature of Florida, having the power under the Constitution to appoint electors, found that under the previous law there had been proceedings by the ministerial officers of the State out of which proceedings had come a commission authorizing individuals not appointed in fact to exercise a power instead of those who were truly appointed, she might by her legislature enact a law to proceed not to change the relation, not to divest vested rights, not to create new rights and new relations, but in the exercise of legislative authority to ascertain who had been in point of fact duly appointed according to existing laws.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. By that you mean that the legislature is the judge of who had been appointed in fact?

Mr. MERRICK. The legislature could proceed to ascertain who had been in point of fact appointed according to the law of the State, and the result of the inquiry coming from the State is evidence, the best evidence, and therefore better evidence than the mere certificate of the governor.

But I do not need to assume this position in the pending case; and the interrogatories propounded upon abstract questions evoke from me abstract answers that are applicable to those questions only, for in this case the legislature of Florida proceeded to execute the decree of the courts of the State of Florida. The question had been before her judicial tribunals and the legislature did not primarily and of its own motion enter into the consideration of this question and act upon it, but the question having come before the courts of Florida and the courts having construed the law of Florida, the legislature gave effect to that judicial construction of the State law.

Now it appears in certificate No. 3 that the governor issued this certificate in obedience to the acts of the legislature of Florida and in obedience to the decision of her courts, and this certificate No. 3 is the only certificate before this tribunal that contains a canvass of the votes of Florida.

The learned counsel spoke of the incoming of a new administration and the displacement of an old, and of their belonging to hostile political parties; but I apprehend that such a circumstance is a matter of very little importance in this inquiry, for the State as a political organization goes on forever and never dies, and whatever the governor who was governor at the time the electors voted could do after that event, his successor can do just as well. The change of the administration makes no difference whatever in the gubernatorial power.

This certificate, then, contains, as I have stated, the only canvass that is before your honors; it contains a canvass of the votes of the people of Florida made under the authority of an act of the legislature of Florida. There is no other canvass here. It states that the canvass has been made and that a certain result has been reached in virtue of a decision of the court of last resort in Florida; and these documents are here under the sanction of State authority. Now how far will this tribunal regard this paper as representing the facts in reference to the condition of these two claimants who hold these certificates, the first certificate unaccompanied, the second accompanied by this evidence?

I suppose that your honors, according to the rule you have laid down, have concluded that the right to ascertain who were really the agents of the State, who were really authorized to represent the State, was limited to the evidence laid before the two Houses of Congress and in or accompanying the certificates. According to this certificate No. 3, a canvass of the votes of Florida was made under legislative enactment in pursuance of her judicial decision. I speak not now of the quo warranto; I speak of a case that occurred prior to the decision of the quo warranto. How far are we bound in this regard by the judicial decision of the court of Florida? The learned counsel who addressed this Commission last on behalf of the other side seemed disposed somewhat to sneer at the idea that the tribunals of the United States should be bound by the decisions of the courts of the State in matters so grave as this. For my part, it seems to me that the graver the subject, and the higher it rises, the more binding become the obligations of the law; and I submit to your honors as a proposition of law that in reference to all matters having local concern of a statutory character, in reference to all local municipal laws of the States upon all subjects, the Supreme Court of the United States without exception invariably accepts as final and conclusive the decisions of the courts of the States, even although it may not approve the correctness of their logic or the wisdom of their conclusion. I beg leave to refer to one or two cases upon that subject. In the case of the Tioga Railroad Company vs. The Blossburg Railroad, in 20 Wallace, 143, the court uses the following language:

These decisions upon the construction of the statute are binding upon us, whatever we may think of their soundness on general principles.

In those few lines is contained the rule I have just now indicated to your honors. This was an opinion in reference to the operation under certain conditions and circumstances of the statute of limitations of New York; and the learned justice, in delivering the opinion on behalf of the court and accepting it of course for himself, announced the doctrine that the decisions of the State tribunals "upon the construction of its statutes are binding upon" the Supreme Court "whatever we may think of their soundness."

The opinion was delivered by his honor Mr. Justice Bradley, following a long line of preceding opinions of the same character.

In the case of Green vs. Neal's lessees, 6 Peters, the same doctrine was announced. In the case of The Township of Elmwood vs. Macy, 2 Otto, 294, the same rule was announced. It is unnecessary for me to read from the case, for I shall have occasion to refer presently to the dissenting opinion on another point.

In the case of Thompson vs. Whitman, 18 Wallace, 467, where the opinion was delivered by his honor Mr. Justice Bradley, the same general principle was announced:

Where a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause, and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, until reversed, is regarded as binding in every other court. But, if it act without authority, its judgments and orders are regarded as nullities.

And in the case in 4 Wallace, referred to by Mr. Green in his opening to-day, the same rule is announced, his honor Mr. Justice Field, if I mistake not, giving the opinion of the court and declaring in effect that the State decision is incorporated into the State statute, and that the courts of the United States in considering and applying the statute apply it as modified, enlarged, or limited by that decision, giving to the decision the same effect as though in so many words it had been incorporated into the statute at the time of the passage of the act.

After submitting these few suggestions in reference to the authority of the State courts, I beg leave to suggest some views in reference to the time of the appointment of electors and as to what constitutes the appointment.

The learned counsel on the other side have regarded the appointment as made up of several acts reaching their culmination in the giving of the certificate by the governor at or about the time of the meeting of the electoral college. That certificate has nothing to do with the appointment whatever, and I submit is simply evidence of a previously existing fact which became a consummated fact on the day of election at the hour when the polls were closed. A certificate, whether it be the certificate of the governor, or of the attorney-general, or of the canvassing-board, is only evidence that the appointment has been made by the people, but itself is no part of the appointment, in no way essential to it, and in no way connected with it. It seems to be the theory and the basis of the argument of the counsel who preceded me that this appointment had depended in some way upon the muniment of the title, and if it did not—

Mr. EVARTS. I spoke of the governor's certificate under the law of Florida which was given to each elector as his warrant to execute his duty, and not the congressional certificate.

Mr. MERRICK. Even that has as little reference to the appointment as the certificates required by Congress; for these certificates, each of them, are only evidence that something has been done—are evidence that the individual to whom they are given has been invested with a power, not granted by the governor, not granted by the executive power of the State, but that he has been invested with a power granted by the people, and of which grant this shall be the muniment of title.

Now, may it please your honors, this principle has been very clearly stated in several cases, to one or two of which I beg leave to refer, among them the twenty-seventh volume of New York Reports, the case of The People vs. Pease, at pages 54 and 55:

It is made the duty of the board of county canvassers, upon the statement of votes given, to determine what person—

Very similar to the law organizing some of our present returning-boards—to determine what person, by the greatest number of votes, has been duly elected to any office mentioned in said statement. (1 Revised Statutes, fifth edition, page 438, section 10.) County treasurers of the several counties of this State are to be elected at a general election, and hold their office for three years. (Ibid, page 406, section 17.) And the certificate of the board of canvassers authorized to canvass the votes given for any elective office is made evidence of the election of the person therein declared to have been elected.

What is it that confers title to the office, and the legal right to the reception of its emoluments? It surely is the fact that the greatest number of qualified voters have so declared their wishes at an election held pursuant to law. It is not the canvass, or estimate, or certificate which determines the right. These are only evidences of the right, but the truth may be inquired into, and the very right ascertained. When it is so ascertained, the legal consequences follow that the person usurping the office is ousted, the person legally entitled takes the office and its fees, &c., and recovers from the usurper the fees or emoluments belonging to the office received by him by means of his usurpation thereof.

It is not the canvass, then, or the estimates, or the certificates which determine the right. The right is determined by the vote of the people, and the canvass is only to ascertain what that vote was, and the certificate is evidence as to who received the larger majority of votes.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Was that a quo warranto, Mr. Merrick?

Mr. MERRICK. It was a proceeding by quo warranto. There are other authorities of a similar nature to which I will refer the court, and taking a suggestion from the inquiry made by the Senator, I would remark that it is quite immaterial whether it was a proceeding by quo warranto or not, for the same rule would apply in all cases, barring the fact claimed by the other side in behalf of a proceeding or an action involving the acts of an officer de facto. The rule is the same, no matter what may be the form of action, as to whether the appointment is derived from executive appointment or derived from the people. By the act of the legislature of Florida, which legislature was authorized to appoint her electors in such a manner as it might deem proper, it was provided that the electors should be appointed by the people. They were voted for and appointed by the people. The State did not provide that her electors should be appointed by her executive or by her returning-board, but that they should be appointed by the people; and whatever other machinery of the government was dedicated to use in this direction was machinery dedicated to the office of ascertaining whom the people had appointed and providing those whom the people had appointed with the proper muniments of title in order that no one might be deceived or led astray, and no inconvenience might result from their claim to the official position.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Mr. Merrick, are you not arguing a question that is settled by the Constitution and the act of Congress? The Constitution says that Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors. The act of Congress says:

Except in case of a presidential election prior to the ordinary period, as specified in sections 147 to 149, inclusive, when the offices of President and Vice-President both become vacant, the electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed in each State, on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, in every fourth year succeeding every election of a President and Vice-President.

They are to be appointed on that day.

Mr. MERRICK. The Senator is correct. I am engaged in possibly a useless discussion on this point. The electors are to be appointed on the day specified, and being appointed on that day whatever transpires after that day with regard to them has relation to that appointment and is simply evidence of that appointment. It is hardly necessary that I should refer your honors to any other authorities upon that subject after Senator THURMAN'S remark.

Permit me now a word or two in reference to the writ of quo warranto; and I regret that my time is so nearly spent that on this important branch of the case it can only be a word or two. The counsel on the other side have stated that they considered that the quo warranto judgment was no longer before the Commission. I understand the order of the court to refer to the certificates and to state that all that the certificates contain is in evidence, and as certificate No. 3 makes recital of the quo warranto as being the basis of executive action in issuing the certificate, the judgment on this quo warranto is therefore before this Commission. It is before the Commission as a judgment of the court of the State, independent of this certificate. We have that judgment here in a proper form; and although it may not be proper under the order to use it before this court as evidence in this particular case as to these parties, it is before the court as evidence of what is the construction of the law of Florida by her judicial tribunals.

The PRESIDENT. I have already allowed you five minutes for interruptions. I must consider your time as closed.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. Merrick has been interrupted so much that I think he ought to have five minutes more.

Mr. MERRICK. I am much obliged to the Senator for his consideration; and while I accept with grateful acknowledgment the privilege conferred, I beg to say that the time allowed would scarcely compensate for the interruptions. They have diverted me to such an extent from the line of argument I was pursuing as to have entirely broken the direction of thought and reasoning I had intended to follow.

I submit that the quo warranto is then before you at least as evidence of what is the law of Florida. If it is not evidence as to the title of these particular individuals, it is before you as evidence of the law of Florida, and it tells you that according to the law of Florida the so-called Hayes electors were not appointed; it tells you that according to the law of Florida the so-called Tilden electors were appointed. It is a judgment of the court of Florida rendered upon an issue of fact to which the law of Florida was applied. If you will look into the record of this quo warranto you will find that it was not decided upon a simple demurrer, not upon a simple question of jurisdiction, although the court decided that it had jurisdiction, that question being directly brought before it; but it was decided upon the facts in the case. A plea having been interposed by the respondents in the quo warranto to the effect that they were the duly-elected electors and had received a majority of the votes of the people, and issue being joined upon that plea, a jury being waived by agreement of counsel and the cause having been submitted to the court to be tried upon the facts, it was tried upon the facts. All the facts were brought before the court. The canvass was before the court; the county returns were before the court; all the evidence that the Hayes electors desired to bring before the court to have the fact of their appointment according to law adjudicated was there; and upon all that evidence, so before the court, that court decided that according to the law of Florida as applied to the case made before it the Hayes electors were not appointed, and the Tilden electors were appointed.

I then submit, may it please your honors, in reference to this quo warranto, in the first instance, that it is before you as part of certificate No. 3, so intimately connected with it and interwoven with it that you cannot fail to regard it as part of the legitimate evidence to be considered when you come to determine which of these certificates you will accept, and that if it is not before you in that character it is then before you as a judicial decision of the courts of Florida bearing testimony as to what is the law of Florida, not in its general conclusion and general result, but bearing testimony as to that law in specific details found throughout the case as the various points were made and presented, and as you will find them decided upon looking into the record.

May it please your honors, I have endeavored in the remarks I have made to present this case, as far as I possibly could, as I would present any ordinary case at law, keeping far away from my heart and lips all feeling or expression of a partisan character. If, in the heat of the argument or in response to inquiries made of me, I should have broken in any particular the resolution I had formed in that regard, I can only beg pardon of the sacred traditions that cluster about this chamber of justice.

Mr. GREEN. The brief to which I alluded in my argument is now here, and, with the permission of the Commission, I will have it distributed among its members.*

* This brief will be found in the appendix of briefs as brief No. 2. A brief was also filed by Mr. Whitney which will be there found as brief No. 3.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN. I will also ask permission to state that the brief which had been prepared for what is known as the Oregon case, to which Judge Hoadly alluded in his argument, has not yet come from the printer, but that we expect to have it during the afternoon. He requests me also to state that that brief having been prepared for use in the Oregon case, necessarily contains some matters which he would not use in this argument if he had had time to prepare a brief specially for this case.

The PRESIDENT. I will state to the bar that there will be no further public business transacted to-day by the Commission.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I move that the Commission take a recess for half an hour.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. I move as a substitute that the Commission adjourn until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT. The motion to adjourn takes precedence. The question is on the motion to adjourn until to-morrow at ten o'clock.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 7; as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Bradley, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—8.

Those who voted in the negative are: Messrs. Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—7.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Commission adjourned until to-morrow at ten o'clock a. m.

FRIDAY, February 9, 1877.

The Commission met at ten o'clock a. m., pursuant to adjournment, all the members being present.

The journal of yesterday was read, corrected, and approved.

The PRESIDENT. The case in regard to Florida having been submitted, shall the doors be closed for consultation?

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I move that the doors be now closed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Commission proceeded to deliberate with closed doors in the matter of the electoral vote of the State of Florida.

After debate,

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN (at one o'clock and thirty-seven minutes p. m.) moved that the Commission take a recess for half an hour.

The motion was agreed to.

At two o'clock and seven minutes p. m., the recess having expired, the Commission resumed its session for deliberation.

After further debate,

Mr. Commissioner STRONG moved that general debate on the question pending be closed on or before six o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS moved that after six o'clock p. m. each Commissioner be allowed to speak but once, and not longer than five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That F. C. Humphreys was not a United States shipping-commissioner on the 7th day of November, 1876.

After debate,

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN withdrew his resolution.

After further debate,

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS offered the following resolution :

Resolved, That the following be adopted as the decision of the Commission in the case of Florida :

ELECTORAL COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 9, A. D. 1877.

To the President of the Senate of the United States, presiding in the meeting of the two Houses of Congress, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, A. D. 1877 :

The Electoral Commission mentioned in said act having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates, and papers accompanying the same, of the electoral votes from the State of Florida, and the objections thereto submitted to it under said act, now report that it has duly considered the same, pursuant to said act, and has decided, and does hereby decide, that the votes of Frederick C. Humphreys, Charles H. Pearce, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, named in the certificate of M. L. Stearns, governor of said State, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by the certificate submitted to the Commission, as aforesaid, and marked "number one," by said Commission, and herewith returned, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely: Four (4) votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and four (4) votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice-President.

The Commission also has decided, and hereby decides and reports, that the four persons first before named were duly appointed electors in and by said State of Florida.

The brief ground of this decision is, that it appears upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject that the before-mentioned electors appear to have been lawfully elected such electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, 1877, of the State of Florida, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the law.

The Commission has also decided, and does hereby decide and report, that, as a consequence of the foregoing and upon the grounds before stated, neither of the papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of said State of Florida numbered two (2) and three (3) by the Commission, and herewith returned, are the certificates or the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that they ought not to be counted as such.

Done at Washington the day and year first above written.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON offered the following as a substitute :

That the electors named in certificate No. 2, to wit, Wilkinson Call, J. E. Yonge, Robert Bullock, and Robert B. Hilton, are the four persons who were duly appointed electors by the State of Florida on the 7th day of November, 1876, and that their votes as certified in such certificate are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute, it was decided in the negative :

| | |
|------------|---|
| NAYS | 8 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Thereupon the resolution offered by Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS was withdrawn.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD offered the following resolutions :

Resolved, That the four persons, to wit, Frederick C. Humphreys, Charles H. Pearce, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, were duly appointed electors of President and Vice-President for the State of Florida, and that the votes cast by the aforesaid four persons are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That Mr. Edmunds, Mr. Bradley, and Mr. Miller be appointed a committee to draft a report of the action of the Commission, as required by law.

The question being on the adoption of the first resolution, it was decided in the affirmative:

YEAS 8
 NAYS 7

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

The question being on the adoption of the second resolution offered by Mr. Commissioner Garfield, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS (at six o'clock and five minutes p. m.) moved that the Commission take a recess for one hour.

The motion was agreed to; and a recess was accordingly taken until seven o'clock and five minutes p. m.

The recess having expired, the Commission resumed its session for deliberation.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS, on behalf of committee appointed to prepare the report of the Commission in the matter of the electoral vote of the State of Florida, offered the following order:

Ordered, That the following be adopted as the final decision and report in the matters submitted to the Commission as to the electoral vote of the State of Florida:

ELECTORAL COMMISSION,
 Washington, D. C., February 9, A. D. 1877.

To the President of the Senate of the United States, presiding in the meeting of the two Houses of Congress, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, A. D. 1877:

The Electoral Commission mentioned in said act, having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates, and papers accompanying the same, of the electoral votes from the State of Florida, and the objections thereto submitted to it under said act, now report that it has duly considered the same, pursuant to said act, and has decided, and does hereby decide, that the votes of Frederick C. Humphreys, Charles H. Pearce, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, named in the certificate of M. L. Stearns, governor of said State, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by the certificate submitted to the Commission as aforesaid, and marked "number one" by said Commission, and herewith returned, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely: four (4) votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and four (4) votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice-President.

The Commission has also decided, and hereby decides and reports, that the four persons first before named were duly appointed electors in and by said State of Florida.

The ground of this decision, stated briefly, as required by said act, is as follows:

That it is not competent under the Constitution and the law, as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence alivnde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Florida, in and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the board of State canvassers of said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, and that all proceedings of the courts or acts of the legislature or of the executive of Florida subsequent to the casting of the votes of the electors on the prescribed day, are inadmissible for any such purpose.

As to the objection made to the eligibility of Mr. Humphreys, the Commission is of opinion that, without reference to the question of the effect of the vote of an ineligible elector, the evidence does not show that he held the office of shipping-commissioner on the day when the electors were appointed.

The Commission has also decided, and does hereby decide and report, that, as a consequence of the foregoing, and upon the grounds before stated, neither of the papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of said State of Florida, numbered two (2) and three (3) by the Commission, and herewith returned, are the certificates or the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that they ought not to be counted as such.

Done at Washington the day and year first above written.

The question being on the adoption of the report of the committee, it was decided in the affirmative :

YEAS 8
 NAYS 7

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

So the report of the Commission was adopted; and said decision and report was thereupon signed by the members agreeing therein, as follows :

SAM. F. MILLER,
 W. STRONG,
 JOSEPH P. BRADLEY,
 GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
 O. P. MORTON,
 FRED'K T. FRELINGHUYSEN,
 JAMES A. GARFIELD,
 GEORGE F. HOAR,
Commissioners.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS offered the following order :

Ordered, That the President transmit a letter to the President of the Senate, in the following words :

The Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JOINT MEETING.

SATURDAY, February 10, 1877.

The action of each House having been communicated to the other,

At one o'clock p. m. the appearance of the Senate was announced to the House of Representatives.

The Senate entered the hall of the House, preceded by its Sergeant-at-Arms and headed by its President pro tempore and its Secretary, the members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as Presiding Officer of the joint convention of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying a chair upon his left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of Congress for counting the electoral vote resumes its session. The two Houses, having separated pending the submission to the Commission of objections to the certificates from the State of Florida, have re-assembled to hear and to coincide or otherwise with the decision of that tribunal, by a majority of the Commission, in writing and signed by the members agreeing therein, which will now be read by the Secretary of the Senate and be entered in the Journal of each House.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows:

ELECTORAL COMMISSION,

Washington, D. C., February 9, A. D. 1877.

To the President of the Senate of the United States, presiding in the meeting of the two Houses of Congress, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, 1877:

The Electoral Commission mentioned in said act having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates, and papers accompanying the same, of the electoral votes from the State of Florida, and the objections thereto, submitted to it under said act, now report that it has duly considered the same, pursuant to said act, and has decided, and does hereby decide, that the votes of Frederick C. Humphreys, Charles H. Pearce, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, named in the certificate of M. L. Stearns, governor of said State, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by the certificate submitted to the Commission, as aforesaid, and marked "number one" by said Commission and herewith returned, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely: Four votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and four votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice-President.

The Commission has also decided, and hereby decides and reports, that the four persons first before named were duly appointed electors in and by said State of Florida.

The ground of this decision stated briefly, as required by said act, is as follows :

That it is not competent under the Constitution and the law, as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses, to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Florida, in and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the board of State canvassers of said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, and that all proceedings of the courts or acts of the legislature or of the executive of Florida, subsequent to the casting of the votes of the electors on the prescribed day, are inadmissible for any such purpose.

As to the objection made to the eligibility of Mr. Humphreys, the Commission is of the opinion that, without reference to the question of the effect of the vote of an ineligible elector, the evidence does not show that he held the office of shipping-commissioner on the day when the electors were appointed.

The Commission has also decided, and does hereby decide and report, that, as a consequence of the foregoing, and upon the grounds before stated, neither of the papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of said State of Florida, numbered two (2) and three (3) by the Commission and herewith returned, are the certificates, or the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that they ought not to be counted as such.

Done at Washington the day and year first above written.

W. STRONG,
JOSEPH P. BRADLEY,
GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
O. P. MORTON,
FRED'K T. FPELINGHUYSEN,
JAMES A. GARFIELD,
GEORGE F. HOAR,

Commissioners.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there objections to this decision ?

Mr. Representative FIELD. I submit an objection to the decision and report just read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The member from New York [Mr. Field] submits an objection to the decision ; which will be read by the Clerk of the House.

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

An objection is interposed by the undersigned Senators and Representatives to the decision made by the Commission constituted by the act entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," as to the true and lawful electoral vote of Florida, upon the following grounds :

First. For that the decision determines that the vote cast by Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, as electors of President and Vice-President of the United States in and for or on behalf of the State of Florida, is the true and lawful electoral vote of said State, when, in truth and in fact, the vote cast by Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock is the true and lawful vote of said State.

Second. For that said Commission refused to receive competent and material evidence tending to prove that Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long were not appointed electors in the manner prescribed by the legislature of the State of Florida, but were designated as electors by the returning-board of said State corruptly and fraudulently, in disregard of law, and with the intent to defeat the will of the people expressed in the choice of Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock, who were legally and regularly appointed electors by the State of Florida in the manner directed by the legislature thereof.

Third. For that the decision aforesaid was founded upon the resolution and order of said Commission previously made, as follows :

"Ordered, That no evidence will be received or considered by the Commission which was not submitted to the joint convention of the two Houses by the President of the Senate with the different certificates, except such as relates to the eligibility of F. C. Humphreys, one of the electors."

Fourth. For that said decision excludes all the evidence taken by the two Houses of Congress and by the committees of each House concerning the frauds, errors, and irregularities committed by the persons whose certificates are taken as proof of the due appointment of electors.

Fifth. For that said decision excludes all evidence tending to prove that the certificate of — Stearns, governor, as also that of the board of State canvassers, was procured or given in pursuance of a fraudulent and corrupt conspiracy to cheat the State of Florida out of its rightful choice of electors and to substitute therefor those who had not been chosen or appointed electors by said State in the manner directed by the legislature thereof.

Sixth. For that said Commission refused to recognize the right of the courts of the State of Florida to review and reverse the judgment of the returning-board or board of State canvassers, rendered through fraud and without jurisdiction, and rejected and refused to consider the action of said courts after their decision that Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long were not entitled to cast the electoral vote of Florida; which said decision was rendered by a court of said State in a case lawfully brought before said court, which court had jurisdiction over the subject-matter thereof and whose jurisdiction over the said Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long had attached before any act was done by them as electors.

Seventh. For that said decision excludes all evidence tending to prove that the State of Florida, by all the departments of its government, legislative, executive, and judicial, has repudiated as fraudulent and void the certificate of — Stearns, governor, as well as that of the State canvassers, upon which certificate of the said governor the said Commission has acted, and by means of which the true electoral votes of Florida have been rejected and false ones substituted in their stead; and Eighth. For that to count the votes of Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long as electors for President and Vice-President would be a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

CHS. W. JONES, Florida,
HENRY COOPER, of Tennessee,
FRANCIS KERNAN, of New York,
ELI SAULSBURY, Delaware,
J. E. McDONALD, Indiana,
W. H. BARNUM, Connecticut,
On the part of the Senate.

J. PROCTOR KNOTT,
DAVID DUDLEY FIELD, of New York,
W. S. HOLMAN, of Indiana,
J. R. TUCKER,
CHARLES P. THOMPSON,
G. A. JENKS, of Pennsylvania,
J. J. FINLEY,
MILTON SAYLER,
E. JNO. ELLIS,
W. R. MORRISON,
ABRAM S. HEWITT,
WILLIAM M. SPRINGER,
On the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the member from New York, who submitted this objection, a duplicate, so that each House may have a copy?

Mr. Representative FIELD sent to the Clerk's desk a copy of the objections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the decision? [A pause.] If there be none, the Senate will retire to its chamber, that the Houses respectively may consider and determine on the objection.

The Senate then withdrew.

Resolved, That the decision of the Commission upon the electoral vote of the State of Florida stand as the judgment of the Senate, the objections made thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

Saturday, February 10, 1877—1.20 p. m.

The Senate having retired,

Mr. Representative LYNDE moved that the House take a recess until ten o'clock a. m. of Monday, February 12.

Mr. Representative HALE made the point of order that under the act of Congress of January 29, 1877, known as the electoral act, no such recess could be taken, and that therefore the motion was not in order.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order; from which decision Mr. Representative HALE appealed.

On motion of Mr. Representative COX, the appeal was ordered to lie on the table.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. Representative LYNDE, it was agreed to—yeas 162, nays 107; and the House (at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) took a recess until Monday, February 12, at ten o'clock a. m., the action of the Senate being communicated to the House during the call of the roll on the motion for a recess.

Kellogg, governor of the State of Louisiana, hereto attached, namely: William P. Kellogg, elector for the State at large; J. Henri Burch, elector for the State at large; Peter Joseph, elector for the first congressional district; Lionel A. Sheldon, elector for the second congressional district; Morris Marks, elector for the third congressional district; Oscar Joffrion, elector for the sixth congressional district, met at the State-house, at the city of New Orleans, the seat of government of the State of Louisiana, as required by law, on the first Wednesday of December, A. D. eighteen hundred and seventy-six, being the sixth day of said month.

The certificate of the governor was read, and the following persons answered to their names: William P. Kellogg, J. Henri Burch, Peter Joseph, Lionel A. Sheldon, Morris Marks, Oscar Joffrion. Not answering: Aaron B. Levissee and Orlando H. Brewster.

On motion of Peter Joseph, J. Henri Burch was elected to preside; and on motion of Oscar Joffrion, Morris Marks was appointed secretary.

On motion of Lionel A. Sheldon, a recess was taken till the hour of three-thirty p. m., when the electors re-assembled.

On the roll being called, it was found that Aaron B. Levissee and Orlando H. Brewster were not present. At the hour of four p. m. the said Aaron B. Levissee and Orlando H. Brewster having failed to attend, the electors present proceeded to supply such vacancies by ballot, in accordance with the statute of the State of Louisiana in such case made and provided, which is in words and figures as follows:

"If any one or more of the electors chosen by the people shall fail from any cause whatever to attend at the appointed place at the hour of four p. m. of the day prescribed for their meeting, it shall be the duty of the other electors immediately to proceed by ballot to supply such vacancy or vacancies."

Lionel A. Sheldon and Peter Joseph were appointed tellers, when, after balloting, it was found that Aaron B. Levissee received six votes, being all the votes cast, to supply the vacancy in the fourth congressional district occasioned by the failure of Aaron B. Levissee to attend, and Orlando H. Brewster received six votes, being all the votes cast, to supply the vacancy in the fifth congressional district occasioned by the failure of Orlando H. Brewster to attend. The said Aaron B. Levissee and Orlando H. Brewster were thereupon declared elected to supply the vacancies in the fourth and fifth congressional districts respectively, and being sent for, soon after appeared and were in attendance as electors.

The said electors then proceeded to vote by ballot for President of the United States, when William P. Kellogg and Lionel A. Sheldon were appointed tellers, and upon counting the ballots for President of the United States, Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, did receive eight votes for President of the United States, being all the votes cast.

The said electors then proceeded to vote by ballot for Vice-President of the United States, when Peter Joseph and Oscar Joffrion were appointed tellers, and upon counting the votes for Vice-President of the United States, William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, did receive eight votes for Vice-President of the United States, being all the votes cast, whereupon the said electors signed three certificates, one of which is hereto attached, which certificates are herewith placed separately in envelopes and sealed up carefully, and on each envelope was indorsed that "The within contains a list of all the votes cast by the electors for the State of Louisiana for President and Vice-President of the United States," one of which is given to the person appointed to convey the vote to the President of the Senate of the United States, and another indorsed in the same way is put in the post-office, and the other deposited with the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.

On motion of Peter Joseph, the electors proceeded to appoint a person to take charge of and deliver to the President of the Senate at the seat of the Government, before the first Wednesday in January next ensuing, one of said certificates, when Thomas C. Anderson was appointed to the above service, and said electors made and signed a certificate of such appointment in the following form:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF LOUISIANA, OFFICE SECRETARY OF STATE,
New Orleans, December 6, 1876.

I, P. G. [SEAL.]

P. G. DESLONDE,
Secretary of State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This closes the reading of the certificates from the State of Louisiana. Are there objections to the certificates which have been read?

Mr. Senator McDONALD. On behalf of the Senators and Representatives whose names are subscribed thereto, I submit the following objections to the counting of the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana as cast for Hayes and Wheeler.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objections to counting the vote will be read by the Secretary of the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows:

OBJECTION NO. 1.

The undersigned Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States object to the lists of the names of electors made and certified by William P. Kellogg, claiming to be, but who was not, the lawful governor of the State of Louisiana, and to the electoral votes of said State, signed by W. P. Kellogg, J. H. Burch, Peter Joseph, L. A. Sheldon, Morris Marks, A. B. Levissee, O. H. Brewster, and Oscar Joffrion, being the two several certificates, the first and third presented by the President of the Senate to the two Houses of Congress in joint convention, for the reasons following;

I.

Because, on the 7th day of November, 1876, there was no law, joint resolution, or other act of the legislature of the State of Louisiana in force directing the manner in which electors for said State should be appointed.

II.

Because, if any law existed in the State of Louisiana, on the 7th day of November, 1876, directing the manner of the appointment of electors, it was an act of the legislature which directed that electors should be appointed by the people of the State in their primary capacity at an election to be held on a day certain, at particular places, and in a certain way; and the people of the State, in accordance with the legislative direction, exercised the power vested in them at an election held in said State November 7, 1876, in pursuance of said act and of the laws of the United States, and appointed John McEnery, R. C. Wickliffe, L. St. Martin, F. P. Poché, A. De Blanc, W. A. Seay, R. G. Cobb, and K. A. Cross to be electors, by a majority for each of six thousand and upward of all the votes cast by qualified voters for electors at said election, and said electors received a certificate of their due appointment as such electors from John McEnery, who was then the rightful and lawful governor of said State, under the seal thereof; and thereupon the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross became and were vested with the exclusive authority of electors for the State of Louisiana, and no other person or persons had or could have such authority or power, nor was it within the legal power of any State or Federal officer, or any other person, to revoke the power bestowed on the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross, or to appoint other electors in their stead, or to impair their title to the offices to which the people had appointed them.

III.

Because the said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion were not, nor was either of them, duly appointed an elector by the State of Louisiana in the manner directed by the constitution and laws of said State and of the United States, and the lists of names of electors made and certified by the said William P. Kellogg, claiming to be, but not being, governor of said State, were false in fact, and fraudulently made and certified by said Kellogg, with full knowledge at the time that the said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion were not duly appointed electors by the qualified voters of the State, and without any examination of the returns of the votes cast for electors as required by the laws of the State.

IV.

Because the pretended canvass of the returns of said election for electors of President and Vice-President by J. Madison Wells, T. C. Anderson, G. Casanave, and Louis Kenner, as returning officers of said election, was without jurisdiction and void, for these reasons:

First. The statutes of Louisiana, under which said persons claim to have been appointed returning officers, and to have derived their authority, gave them no jurisdiction to make the returns, or to canvass and compile the statement of votes cast for electors of President and Vice-President.

Secondly. Said statutes, if construed as conferring such jurisdiction, give the returning officers power to appoint the electors, and are void, as in conflict with the Constitution, which requires that electors shall be appointed by the State.

Thirdly. Said statutes, in so far as they attempt to confer judicial power, and to give to the returning-officers authority, in their discretion, to exclude the statements of votes, and to punish innocent persons without trial, by depriving them of their legal right of suffrage, are in conflict with the constitution of the State of Louisiana, and are anti-republican and in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, in so far as they leave it to the discretion of the returning-officers to determine who are appointed electors.

Fourthly. If said Louisiana statutes shall be held valid, they conferred no jurisdiction on said Wells, Anderson, Casanave, and Kenner as a board of returning-officers to make the returns of said election, or to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of said election, for the reason that they constituted but four of the five persons to whom the law confided those duties; that they were all of the same political party; and that there was a vacancy in said board of returning-officers, which the said Wells, Anderson, Casanave, and Kenner failed and refused to fill as required by law.

Fifthly. Said board of returning-officers had no jurisdiction to exercise judicial functions and reject the statement of the votes at any poll or voting-place, unless the foundation for such jurisdiction was first laid as required by the statute, which the papers and records before said board of returning-officers show was not done to such an extent as to change the result of the election as shown on the face of the returns.

Sixthly. Said returning-officers, with the full knowledge that a true and correct compilation of the official statements of votes legally cast November 7, 1876, for presidential electors in the State of Louisiana, showed the following result, to wit:

| | Votes. |
|-----------------------|---------|
| John McEnery | 83, 723 |
| R. C. Wickliffe | 83, 859 |
| L. St. Martin | 83, 650 |
| F. P. Poché | 83, 474 |
| A. De Blanc | 83, 633 |
| W. A. Seay | 83, 812 |
| R. G. Cobb | 83, 530 |
| K. A. Cross | 83, 603 |
| W. P. Kellogg | 77, 174 |
| J. H. Burch | 77, 162 |
| Peter Joseph | 74, 913 |
| L. A. Sheldon | 74, 902 |
| Morris Marks | 75, 240 |
| A. B. Levissee | 75, 395 |
| O. H. Brewster | 75, 479 |
| Oscar Joffrion | 75, 618 |

And that said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross were duly and lawfully elected electors, illegally and fraudulently changed, altered, and rejected the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election and the returns of supervisors of registration, and declared the following to be the state of the vote, to wit:

| | |
|-----------------------|---------|
| John McEnery | 70, 508 |
| R. C. Wickliffe | 70, 509 |
| L. St. Martin | 70, 553 |
| F. Poché | 70, 335 |
| A. De Blanc | 70, 536 |
| W. A. Seay | 70, 525 |
| R. G. Cobb | 70, 423 |
| K. A. Cross | 70, 566 |
| W. P. Kellogg | 75, 135 |
| J. H. Burch | 75, 127 |
| Peter Joseph | 74, 014 |

| | |
|---------------------|---------|
| L. A. Sheldon..... | 74, 027 |
| Morris Marks..... | 74, 413 |
| A. B. Levissee..... | 74, 003 |
| O. H. Brewster..... | 74, 017 |
| Oscar Joffrion..... | 74, 736 |

And the said returning-officers thereupon falsely and fraudulently certified that said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion were duly elected electors, when the fact was that, omitting the statements of votes illegally withheld by supervisors, those before the returning-officers, which it was their duty to, but which they did not canvass and compile, showed majorities for McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross, ranging from three thousand four hundred and fifty-nine to six thousand four hundred and five.

Seventhly. That said returning-officers, before making any declaration of the vote for electors, offered for a money consideration to certify and declare the due election of the persons who, according to the face of the returns, received a majority of the votes and were duly and properly elected. Failing to find a purchaser, they falsely, corruptly, and fraudulently certified and declared the minority candidates elected, after having first applied for a reward for so doing.

Wherefore the undersigned object to the certificate or declaration of the election of electors made by said returning-officers as utterly void by reason of the fraud and corruption of said board of returning-officers in thus offering said certificate or declaration for sale.

V.

The undersigned respectfully object to counting the vote cast by the said A. B. Levissee, for the reason that the State of Louisiana was forbidden by the Constitution of the United States to appoint the said A. B. Levissee an elector, because he was, at the time of the appointment of the electors in said State, to wit, on the 7th day of November, 1876, and for a number of days previous and subsequent thereto, holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, to wit, the office of commissioner of the United States circuit court for the district of Louisiana, and his subsequent appointment by the electors was not only without authority of law and void, but it was knowingly and fraudulently made for an illegal and fraudulent purpose.

VI.

The undersigned especially object to counting the vote cast by the said O. H. Brewster, for the reason that the State of Louisiana was forbidden by the Constitution of the United States to appoint the said Brewster an elector, because he was, at the time of the appointment of electors in said State, to wit, on the 7th day of November, 1876, and for a number of days previous and subsequent thereto, holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, to wit, the office of surveyor-general of the land-office of the land-district of the State of Louisiana; and any subsequent appointment of the said Brewster as an elector by the other electors was not only without warrant of law and void, but was made knowingly and fraudulently for an illegal and fraudulent purpose.

VII.

The undersigned object and insist that under no circumstances can more than six of the eight electoral votes cast in Louisiana for Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler be counted, for the reason that at least two of the persons casting such votes, to wit, A. B. Levissee and O. H. Brewster, were not appointed electors by said State; and they further object, especially to the vote given and cast by William P. Kellogg, one of the pretended electors of said State of Louisiana, because the certificate executed by himself as governor of that State to himself as elector of that State is void as to him and creates no presumption and is no evidence in his own favor that he was duly appointed such elector, and there is no other evidence whatever of his having been appointed an elector of said State. And they further object to the said William P. Kellogg, that by the constitution of Louisiana he was not entitled to hold both offices, but was disqualified therefrom, and that on the day of casting the vote aforesaid, and on the day of the election for electors, and before and after those days, he continued to act as governor of the State, and that his vote as elector is null and void.

VIII.

Because the certified lists of the names of the said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion, as the duly appointed electors for the State of Louisiana by W. P. Kellogg, claiming to be, but who was not, governor of said State, were falsely, fraudulently, and corruptly made, and issued as part of a conspiracy between the said Kellogg and the said returning-officers Wells, Anderson, Casanave, and Kenner, and other persons, to cheat and defraud the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross, of the offices to which they had been duly appointed as aforesaid, and to defraud the State of Louisiana of her right to vote for President and Vice-President according to her own wish, as legally expressed by the vote of their people at the election aforesaid.

For which reasons the said lists of names of the said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion, as electors, and the votes cast by them, are utterly void, in support of which reasons the undersigned refer to the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Louisiana, and among other, to the evidence taken at the present session of Congress by the Committee and subcommittees on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, the Select Committee and subcommittees of the House of Representatives on the Recent Election in the State of Louisiana, and the Committee of the House of Representatives on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House of Representatives in Counting the Electoral Vote, together with the papers and documents accompanying said evidence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates from the State of Louisiana?

Mr. Representative GIBSON. I have the honor to offer objections to the certificates of the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana signed by William Pitt Kellogg on behalf of the State of Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House will read the objections presented by the member from the State of Louisiana (Mr. Gibson.)

The Clerk of the House read as follows:

OBJECTION No. 2.

The undersigned Senators and members of the House of Representatives of the United States object to the certificates and electoral votes of the State of Louisiana, signed by W. P. Kellogg, J. H. Burch, Peter Joseph, L. A. Sheldon, Morris Marks, A. B. Levissee, O. H. Brewster, and Oscar Joffrion, for the following reasons:

First. The government of the State of Louisiana as administered at and prior to the 7th day of November, 1876, and until this time, was and is not republican in form.

Second. If the government of the State of Louisiana was and is republican in form, there was no canvass of the votes of the State made on which the certificates of election of the above-named alleged electors were issued.

Third. Any alleged canvass of votes on which the certificate of election of said alleged electors is claimed to be founded was an act of usurpation, was fraudulent and void.

Fourth. The votes cast in the electoral college of said State by Oscar Joffrion, W. P. Kellogg, J. H. Burch, and Morris Marks are not electoral votes, for that the said Oscar Joffrion, W. P. Kellogg, J. H. Burch, and Morris Marks are and were ineligible by the laws of Louisiana, are and were disqualified; for by the constitution of Louisiana (sec. 117) it is provided, "No person shall hold or exercise at the same time more than one office of trust or profit, except that of justice of the peace or notary public." Whereas on and prior to the 7th day of November, 1876, and until after the 6th day of December, 1876, W. P. Kellogg was acting de facto governor of said State; Oscar Joffrion was supervisor of registration for the parish of Pointe Coupée, in said State; Morris Marks was a district attorney for one of the districts of said State, and candidate for district judge and was elected at said election; and J. H. Burch was a member of the senate of said State, also a member of the board of control of the State penitentiary, administrator of the deaf and dumb asylum, both salaried offices, and treasurer of the school board of the parish of East Baton Rouge.

Fifth. In addition thereto, said Oscar Joffrion was specially disqualified by the thirteenth section of the act of the legislature of said State, dated 24th day of July, 1874, which provides that no supervisor of registration shall be eligible for any office at any election when said supervisor officiates, and the said Oscar Joffrion, at the election held on the 7th day of November, 1876, did act and officiate as supervisor of registration for the parish of Pointe Coupée, in said State.

In support hereof inter alia there is herewith submitted the testimony taken before the special committee of the House of Representatives to investigate the election in Louisiana; also, the testimony taken before the Committee on Powers and Privileges of the House of Representatives; also, the testimony taken before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates from the State of Louisiana?

Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York. I present, on behalf of the Senators and Representatives who have signed it, a further objection.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection submitted will be read by the Clerk of the House.

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

OBJECTION No. 3.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1877.

The undersigned Senators and Representatives object to the counting of the votes of O. H. Brewster, A. B. Levissee, W. P. Kellogg, Oscar Joffrion, Peter Joseph, J. H. Burch, L. A. Sheldon, and Morris Marks, as electors for the State of Louisiana, for the reason that the said persons were not appointed electors by the State of Louisiana in the manner directed by its legislature.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates from the State of Louisiana?

Mr. Senator HOWE. I submit some concise objections to counting the vote certified here by John McEnery and his associates.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The objections will be read by the Secretary of the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

OBJECTION No. 4.

The undersigned respectfully object to the counting of any vote for President and Vice-President of the United States given or purported to have been given by John McEnery, R. C. Wickliffe, L. St. Martin, F. B. Poché, A. De Blanc, W. A. Seay, R. G. Cobb, and K. A. Cross, of Louisiana, or by either of them, for the reason that there is no evidence that either of said persons has been appointed an elector of said State in such manner as the legislature thereof has directed; and for the further reason that there is evidence conclusive in law that neither of said persons has been appointed to be an elector for the State of Louisiana in such manner as the legislature thereof has directed.

They respectfully object to the reading, the recording, or acknowledging of any commission, license, certificate of appointment, or of authentication signed or purporting to be signed by John McEnery as governor of the State of Louisiana, for the reason that there is no evidence that John McEnery is now, or ever was at any time during the year 1876, governor of the State of Louisiana, and for the further reason that there is conclusive evidence that William P. Kellogg was, during the whole of the year 1876, and for several years prior thereto, governor of that State; was recognized as such by the judicial and legislative departments of the government of that State and by every department of the Government of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates from the State of Louisiana? If there be no further objections, all the certificates from that State, and the papers accompanying the same, together with the objections thereto, will now be submitted to the Electoral Commission for its judgment and decision. The Senate will now retire to their Chamber.

Accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate withdrew.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

LOUISIANA.

MONDAY, February 12, 1877.

The Commission met at half past two o'clock p. m. pursuant to adjournment.

Present: The President, and Commissioners Miller, Field, Strong, Edmunds, Bradley, Morton, Frelinghuysen, Bayard, Payne, Hunton, Abbott, Garfield, and Hoar.

On motion by Mr. Commissioner HOAR, the Commission took a recess until four o'clock p. m.

The Commission re-assembled at four o'clock p. m.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

At four o'clock and forty minutes p. m., a communication from the two Houses of Congress in joint session was presented by Mr. GORHAM, Secretary of the Senate, and read as follows :

HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 12, 1877.

To the President of the Commission :

More than one return or paper purporting to be a return or certificate of electoral votes of the State of Louisiana having been received and this day opened in the presence of the two Houses of Congress and read, and objections thereto having been made, the said returns, with all accompanying papers, and also the objections thereto, are herewith submitted to the judgment and decision of the Commission, as provided by law.

T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate.

Mr. Commissioner FIELD. I move that the certificates and papers accompanying the same, and the objections thereto, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. Who represent the objectors ?

Mr. Representative FIELD. Mr. President, Mr. McDonald of the Senate and Mr. Jenks of the House will represent the objectors. I understand they are coming now.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. The objectors to which certificate ? I assume that there are several.

Mr. Representative FIELD. They will explain for themselves.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There are three certificates.

The PRESIDENT. And an objection to each, I presume ?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir. The objections to the first and third are represented by Senator McDonald and by Mr. Jenks of the House of Representatives.

Mr. EVARTS. The objections to the second certificate will be represented by Mr. Howe of the Senate and Mr. Hurlbut of the House.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Will the gentlemen be prepared to go on this evening ?

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. Senator Thurman sent word to me that he would not be able to be here to-day, and preferred that the argument be not commenced until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. I will then, with the consent of the Commission, state that two objectors to certificates numbered 1 and 3, if I am correctly informed, may be heard in oral argument in support of their objections and to advocate the validity of any certificate the validity of which they maintain. In like manner two objectors to certificate No. 2—as I now assume it to be without having looked at the papers—will also be heard under like circumstances and to the same extent. “Under this rule not more than four persons shall speak, and neither side shall occupy more than two hours.”

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I move an adjournment to 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. Commissioner FIELD. I should prefer eleven.

The PRESIDENT. I will put the longest time first. The motion of Mr. Justice Field is that the Commission adjourn until to-morrow at eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

The motion was agreed to ; there being on a division—ayes 8, noes 3 ; and (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Commission adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock a. m.

TUESDAY, February 13, 1877.

The Commission met at eleven o'clock a. m. pursuant to adjournment. Present: The President, and Commissioners Miller, Field, Strong, Bradley, Edmunds, Morton, Frelinghuysen, Bayard, Payne, Hunton, Abbott, Garfield, and Hoar.

The various objectors to the certificates from Louisiana and the respective counsel were also present.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT. Three certificates are before the Commission, to each of which there are objections. For my own convenience I have numbered them one, two, and three. Two of the objectors to certificates numbered one and three will now be heard under the fourth rule.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Are the certificates numbered in the order they were presented to the two Houses?

The PRESIDENT. I have so numbered them, as I am assured by the Stenographer.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I wish to understand if they are in the chronological order of their presentation.

The PRESIDENT. They are. Each side will be entitled to two hours. Two who support the views of the objectors to certificates numbered one and three will be heard, and two of the objectors who support the objections to certificate number two. First those supporting the objections to numbers one and three will be heard.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. Mr. President, as the Commission is not full, I would prefer to wait a few moments to see whether it cannot be filled before proceeding.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, we shall wait a few moments. We cannot wait long, I suppose.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. If a member of the Commission is absent, what is the rule in reference to proceeding?

The PRESIDENT. There is no rule on the subject; but the law provides for cases of physical inability to attend, and points out measures for filling the vacancy. There is nothing in the rules on the subject.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. I have understood, but do not know personally, that Senator Thurman has been ill for some days, at least not very well able to give his attention to business. If it is not likely that he will be present this morning, I would rather some action should be taken in regard to his absence, before proceeding.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. McDonold must be aware that we can scarcely assume that Judge Thurman is physically unable to be present and proceed to notify the Senate in order that the place may be filled, without some sort of proof. Undoubtedly, I presume, if Judge Thurman thought himself unable to attend, he would so inform the Commission in writing.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. I should judge so; and, therefore, I suppose if he is able he will be here in a short time, unless the Commission receives a message from him to the contrary.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. It does not appear to me that we should be justified in waiting on account of the absence of a single member of the Commission or of any number less than a quorum, in the present state of affairs. We have only reached the second of what are understood to be four causes submitted to us. The first one having occupied nine or ten days, we have now only sixteen days, including this one, before the presidential office begins; so that it appears to me we should avoid our duty under the statute if we were not to proceed. Of course, if Senator Thurman be ill, we ought to be advised, so that his place may be filled; but without any evidence of that, it appears to me due to all parties concerned that we should proceed, as we have done occasionally when one or more gentlemen may have been temporarily absent.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. We have constantly proceeded in the discharge of the duties of this Commission with members of it absent for the time; it is no reason for delaying proceedings.

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. I have just sent a message to the Senate Committee room on Private Land-Claims, of which Mr. Thurman is chairman, to ask the clerk there in regard to the probability of his presence. The last communication he made was to Mr. Commissioner Morton yesterday, to whom he sent some message asking that the argument might not proceed yesterday afternoon in his absence. From that I presume he expected to be here this morning.

The PRESIDENT. By general consent we can wait a few minutes until the messenger returns from his committee-room.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, allow me to ask the attention of the Commission to certain laws of Louisiana which are not included in the compilation we have received that was printed under the direction of the Commission, and which are important for the consideration of the principal questions of law.

The PRESIDENT. Would it be convenient for you to make a note of them and hand it to us?

Mr. EVARTS. I simply ask, by giving a note to the Clerk, that they may be printed in season for to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT. I take it all the members of the Commission desire the laws to be printed, and if you will furnish a note to the Secretary, any omissions will be supplied.

Mr. EVARTS. We supposed it was proper we should ask the consent of the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. I suppose it is hardly necessary to submit it to the Commission.

Mr. EVARTS. One law was printed last night since the compilation, but the other it seems had been printed and was omitted from the compilation under the notion that it was repealed; but we still desire its use, and it may be there are copies of it already in print.

The PRESIDENT, (after the expiration of five minutes.) Senator Thurman's clerk reports that Senator Thurman is suffering from neuralgia, but will be out to-day. Shall the business of the Commission proceed? [Putting the question.]

The question was determined in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT. One of the objectors to certificates Nos. 1 and 3 will now be heard.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, the certificates announced by the President as first under consideration embrace the electoral votes cast for Hayes for President and Wheeler for Vice-President.

The PRESIDENT. You may not only support the objections, but any other certificate which you claim to be valid within the allotted time—two hours for your side.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. If the votes contained in these certificates are the votes provided for in the Constitution, then they are to be counted. To constitute them the votes provided for in the Constitution, they must have been cast by electors who were competent and who had been appointed electors in the manner prescribed by the legislature of the State. The objections that we make to these votes are—

First. That the legislature did not provide the manner of the appointment of the electors who cast them ;

Second. That they were fraudulently returned by the officers intrusted with the canvass and return of the votes ;

Third. That two of them were incompetent under the Constitution of the United States ;

Fourth. That others of them were disqualified from serving or acting by the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana ; and Fifth. That at the time of their appointment the State of Louisiana did not have a government republican in form.

With respect to the laws of the State authorizing the appointment of electors, I shall call the attention of the Commission to the statutes which have been heretofore enacted, and which are understood to stand still upon the statute-book. It will be found in the session laws of 1868 that a special law was enacted for the appointment of presidential electors ; and that this special law was re-enacted in the revised code of 1870, and it will be found at page 550 of that revised code. It is also printed in one of the compilations of laws that have been printed under the order of this Commission, at page 93.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Which one, the first or the second print ? We have had two.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. I am not able to determine, but the second, I think. It is entitled in this revision "Presidential Electors, Session Laws, 1868, No. 193," Revised Statutes of Louisiana of 1870, page 550.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is the last publication of the compilation.

(Mr. Commissioner Thurman appeared and took his seat,)

Mr. Senator McDONALD. It will be observed that this special law does make specific provision for the appointment of presidential electors by a popular vote. It also provides for the manner of the return and canvass of that vote. It will be seen by section 2826 that—

Immediately after the receipt of the return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November, if the returns should not sooner arrive, the governor, in the presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns and ascertain therefrom the persons who have been duly elected electors.

At the session at which this revision was adopted, there was another act passed. It is also published in one of these compilations at page 924.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. That is in the compilation without a cover.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. There are two sets of compilations without covers and one of them is the same as the covered pamphlet to which I previously referred ; the other has this act of 1870 ; and it will be necessary to obtain the proper copy in order to follow these citations. Your honors will see by the first section of this act that the elections provided for in it are styled "the general elections of the State." Section 35 specifically provides for the election of presidential electors. That section is as follows :

That in every year in which an election shall be held for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, such election shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November in such year, in accordance with an act of the Congress of the United States, approved January 23, 1845, entitled "An act to establish a uniform time for holding elections for electors for President and Vice-President in all of the States of the Union," and such elections shall be held and conducted and returns made thereof in the manner and form prescribed by the law for general elections.

Not merely the elections shall be held and conducted and returns made, but the returns shall also conform to the provisions prescribed in the laws for general elections. The repealing section of this act, which is the eighty-fifth section, reads as follows:

That all laws or parts of laws contrary to the provisions of this act, and all laws relating to the same subject-matter, are hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

It was approved March 16, 1870; and so your honors will see that two laws covering the same subject seem to have been enacted or recognized at the same session; the special law of 1868 carried forward into the code of 1870 and the session act of 1870. By the enacting clause attached to the code, the provisions of the code were to take effect on the 1st day of April, 1870, and this was after the close of the session of 1870, at which this general law was passed. And to meet any questions that might arise out of a conflict between the session act of 1870 and the provisions embodied in the code, another act was passed, one to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] called the attention of the court.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. When you speak of "the code," you refer to the revised statutes?

Mr. Senator McDONALD. Yes, sir; it is called in Louisiana, I believe, the code.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. No; the code is a different thing.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. The revised statutes.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Can you give us the date of the approval of the revising act?

Mr. Senator McDONALD. March 14; and to take effect on the 1st of April.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That I understood; but I did not get the date of the approval before.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. It will be found in the revised statutes. I have not the volume here. The act I now refer to is an act printed this morning to be a part of this compilation of statutes that have been printed under the direction of the Commission. It is entitled "An act giving precedence in authority to all the other acts and joint resolutions passed by the general assembly at this session over the acts known as the Revision of the Statutes and of the Civil Code and Code of Practice, when there exists any conflict in the provisions of said acts and revisions." It is a single section, and is as follows:

That all the acts and resolutions passed during the present session of the general assembly which may be contrary to or in any manner in conflict with the acts of the present session known as the "revision of the statutes of a general character," and of the Civil Code and Code of Practice, shall have precedence of said revisions, and be held as the law in opposition thereto, and as repealing those acts so far as they may be in conflict therewith.

This presents a question, and a very grave one, as to which of these acts was in force at the close of the session of the legislature of 1870, (and upon the taking effect of the revised statutes,) and upon that fact depend very important questions arising hereafter. If the session laws of 1870 had the operation which the legislature enacting those revised statutes expressly determined that they should have, and repealed the provisions of the revised statutes wherever there was a conflict between the session laws and the revised statutes—if the repealing statute has this effect, then the special law providing for the election of electors, first enacted in 1868 and carried forward into the revised statutes, was thereby repealed. Ordinarily, and perhaps almost universally, the last expressed will of the legislature must stand; and where several acts are passed at the same session of the legislature and they are in such conflict that they cannot be reconciled, the last act must stand and the first give place. But this presents a little different question from that. These acts embraced in the revised statutes were a revision of laws compiled by the authority of the legislature and to take effect by its will, and at the same session in which it acted upon that revision it was passing laws. Its session acts were from day to day considered and passed by it, and in contemplation that there might be conflicts between those session acts and this revision of laws that was being prepared they declared the force and effect of their session acts with respect to those revised statutes, so that it is not to be said that when they passed this act thus restricting the operation and effect of the revised statutes, yet, notwithstanding the clear intent and purpose of the legislature in so doing that, the revised statutes contained the last will of the legislature, because they took effect in April at a later period than the passage of this law.

I have not time to elaborate this proposition, and can but state it for the consideration of the Commission. But if it has the effect which the will of the legislature designed it should have, then the act of 1870 (and I call it the act of 1870 to distinguish it from the special law of 1868) went upon the statute-book as the election law of the State of Louisiana, and provided the mode and manner which the State designed to carry into effect the provisions of the Constitution with reference to her right and authority to appoint electors, for the section of that law to which I have called your honors' attention fully covers this question, and in point of fact it was so considered by the authorities in the State of Louisiana; and when the election for the appointment of electors in 1872 took place it was conducted under the session act of 1870, both as to the election and the returns. The act of 1868 carried forward into the revised statutes was ignored, and the act of the session of 1870 was the one regarded as in force, and so regarded until the 20th day of November, 1872, when another act was passed to which I shall call your honors' attention. Your honors perhaps know the fact judicially that at that time the legislature of Louisiana was not in session. The act had been passed at the previous session, but had not been signed by the governor, and was not signed by him until the 20th of November, 1872. This he was authorized to do under their constitution. The law took effect from the date of his signature. This act is found on page 96 of this second compilation of statutes. That is entitled:

An act to regulate the conduct and to maintain the freedom and purity of elections; to prescribe the mode of making returns thereof; to provide for the election of returning-officers, and defining their powers and duties; to prescribe the mode of entering on the rolls of the Senate and House of Representatives; and to enforce article 103 of the constitution.

The first section declares that the elections therein provided for shall be styled the general elections. The seventy-first section, which is the repealing clause, is as follows:

That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

This unquestionably repealed the session act of 1870. It is an act upon the same subject throughout, so far as the general elections of the State of Louisiana are concerned, but it omits to make any provision for the appointment of electors. Section 29 is the only section that makes any reference to the subject of presidential electors, and it is as follows :

That in every year in which an election shall be held for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, such election shall be held at the time fixed by act of Congress.

But it fails to provide, as the act of 1870 did in the section that applied to the same subject, that such election should be held under the provisions of this act or that the canvass and return should be under the provisions of this act. Your honors will see, by comparing this section with the one I have already quoted in the session acts of 1870, that while it refers to presidential electors and their appointment it makes no provision, as the other act does, for their election or appointment.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. Have you looked at the thirty-second section ?

Mr. Senator McDONALD. I have noted the thirty-second section. It is—

That the provisions of this act, except as to the time of holding elections, shall apply in the election of all officers whose election is not otherwise provided for.

If the act of 1868 stood unaffected by the legislation of 1870, then this section would have something to apply to; but if the session laws of 1870 repealed the act of 1868, if that was their force and effect both in reference to the conflict between them and as to the proper construction of the repealing act passed in the session of 1870, then this could not be held to apply; for there can be no question but what the act of 1870 in toto was repealed by this act of 1872. If the provisions had not been such as to bring them in conflict, the repealing clause of 1872 unquestionably embraced it.

Again, I may state to your honors that the authorities of Louisiana regarded the act of 1872 and the amendments subsequently made as the only laws in force regulating the election of all officers and of all persons; and if it should be held that under this twenty-sixth section and the reference there made there might be held an election for electors, still it leaves this difficulty yet unprovided for, that there is not anywhere in the act of 1870 or in the act of 1872 or its amendments any provision whatever for filling vacancies in the electoral college, as it is termed, except by election. No other provision exists in either of these laws for filling vacancies of this class except by popular election.

I will simply place these statutes before your honors for your due consideration, and shall not undertake further to discuss their bearing at present. I have already stated that the election of 1872 for the appointment of electors took place under the session acts of 1870, and that the election of 1876 took place under the act of 1872 and the amendments that have been since made. So far as a construction has been given to these statutes by the authorities of the State, it has been to hold that the act of 1870 took the place of all other laws on the subject of the appointment or election of officers, and the act of 1872 took its place and repealed all other laws on the subject—"all election laws," to use the language of the repealing clause; and there is not to be found in the act of 1872 any provision, specific or otherwise, providing for the election of presidential electors; and if there is any provision that could be under any circumstances made to embrace that subject, then there is no provision whatever for filling any vacancies that may exist in the electoral college except by popular election.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Were there any vacancies filled in this case ?

Mr. Senator McDONALD. Yes, sir; two vacancies were filled by electing the same persons who, it was claimed, had been elected by the popular vote.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Why do you say "except by popular election?" Is there a section that provides for that?

Mr. Senator McDONALD. Yes, sir; section 24 is, "All elections to be held in this State to fill any vacancies shall be conducted," &c.

Then, as the fact was that the officers in charge of the administration of the laws in the State of Louisiana, with respect to her elections, did hold the election under the act of 1872, I propose to consider in what manner they held it, for we charge that the persons who have undertaken to cast the electoral votes now under consideration were fraudulently returned by the officers intrusted with the canvass of the votes cast by the people. In considering this branch of the subject it will be only necessary for me to examine the acts and conduct of those who are termed "the returning-officers of the State of Louisiana." Their powers and duties are defined in sections 3 and 26 of the act of 1872. They are the same precisely as those conferred upon similar officers by the law of the session of 1870. First, however, your honors, as to the constitution of this board, the second section provides:

That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning-officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning-officers.

Your honors will see that the board herein provided consists of five, and that in its political caste it shall represent all the political parties, and if a vacancy occurs, the remaining members of the board shall fill it. This is a very peculiar statute, a very singular law. Here a board, organized with powers over the election-returns of all elections, is made perpetual, with the power within itself to continue that perpetuity. When once established, the board has gone out from the State authorities, from the people, from the popular control, into the hands of these men, and they continue on and on and on forever.

I have already said that their duties were prescribed and their authority circumscribed; and you honors will see that it is very necessary to circumscribe such authority. The sections to which I have made reference have been under review before; they are not here to be considered for the first time. Such has been the condition of affairs in Louisiana, that it has become the duty on former occasions of Congress, on the part of the Senate and on the part of the House, to investigate the matter of popular elections there and the powers of this board. The powers so far as canvass and return are concerned, I have already stated, as embraced in the act of 1872, are the same as those embraced in the act of 1870.

Now let us see what construction has been given to those powers heretofore. I will first call your honors' attention to the report made by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, (Report 417 of the Forty-second Congress, third session, under date of February 10, 1873,) submitted by Senator Morton, the chairman, in which the following language is used:

The statute of Louisiana authorizes the supervisors of registration in the parishes, or the commissioners of election, to make affidavit in regard to any violence, tumult, fraud, or bribery by which a fair election had been prevented, which shall be forwarded to the returning-board, along with the returns, and upon which the returning-board may reject the vote of a poll in making the count; and if the evidence of the officers of the election is not sufficient to satisfy the minds of the returning-board in regard to the matter charged, they are authorized to send for persons and papers and take further testimony upon the matter; but they have no authority to make such investigation unless the foundation is first laid by the sworn statements of the officers of the election, as before mentioned.

That report was made to the Senate of the United States, and upon that report and the facts therewith connected the Senate acted in 1873 upon the electoral vote of that State.

In the House of Representatives also a committee report was made on the 23d of February, 1875, signed by honorables George F. Hoar, William A. Wheeler, and W. P. Frye, members of the committee. They quote at length sections 3 and 26, and I will read them as they have quoted them:

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, &c. That in such canvass and compilation the returning-officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile first the statements from all the polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever, from any poll or voting-place, there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 26 of this act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented, or tended to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors, entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning-officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statement of votes from such poll or voting-places until the statements from all other polls or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning-officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning-officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If, after such examination, the said returning-officers shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning-officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns: Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning-officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election.

There is their authority; there is the direction by which they are to be guided; and section 26 provides for the character of these papers that are thus to assail and attack these polls; and that is:

SEC. 26. Be it further enacted, &c. That in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town in which, during the time of registration or revision of registration, or on any day of election, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place or place of registration, or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences shall prevent, or tend to prevent, a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervisor of registration of the parish if they occur during the time of registration, or revision of registration, to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, and the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riots, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences from registering or voting, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish.

When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or a supervisor of registration, he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish, if in the city of New Orleans to the secretary of state, one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning-officers provided for in section 2 of this act when he makes the returns of elections in his parish. His copy of said statement shall be so annexed to his returns of elections by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance that the same can be kept together, and the other copy the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish for the use of the district attorney.

After quoting these sections as I have read them, the report proceeds:

Upon this statute we are clearly of the opinion that the returning-board had no right to do anything except to canvass and compile the returns which were lawfully made to them by the local officers, except in cases where they were accompanied by the certificate of the supervisor or commissioner provided in the third section. In such cases the last sentence of that section shows that it was expected that they would ordinarily exercise the grave and delicate duty of investigating charges of riot, tumult, bribery, or corruption on a hearing of the parties interested in the office. It never could have been meant that this board of its own motion, sitting in New Orleans, at a distance from the place of voting, and without notice, could decide the rights of persons claiming to be elected.

But an examination of the law will clearly disclose that such was its purpose and intent; for when you consider the second section, as to what these officers shall do, it will be seen that their primary duty is to canvass and compile the votes returned to them. They are first required to take an oath of office that "they will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of a returning-officer as prescribed by law; that they will carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes, and make a true and correct return of them, so help them God."

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Is there any evidence now before us that they threw out returns that were not accompanied by a protest?

Mr. Senator McDONALD. I shall call the attention of the Commission, before I am through, to what I claim to be evidence on that subject.

Within ten days after the closing of the election said returning-officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state.

They are to canvass and compile "the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election," those primary officers who receive the ballots from the people, and then to make a sworn statement of them.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. What section do you read that from?

By Senator McDONALD. Section 2. That is what they are to do; canvass the statements of the votes made by the commissioners of election. Then, when they have made this canvass according to law and followed the law, their act gives a prima facie right to the party receiving a certificate, and but a prima facie right by the express terms of the statute itself.

These constructions of the authority of the returning-board in Louisiana have been affirmed by each House of Congress in its dealings with the popular elections there; and in the case of the presidential electors of 1872 the vote of the State of Louisiana was cast out and not counted because there had been a failure to comply with the law of the State on the part of these officers; not that there had not been an election, not that the people had not voted there, but that there had been a failure on the part of those intrusted, as it is termed, with the "machinery of the election" in that State to make that kind of return that gave faith and credit to their acts. (See pages 396-407 Compilation of Proceedings of Counting the Electoral Votes.)

electors in Louisiana, the democratic electors received majorities ranging from 5,300 to 8,990; on the face of the returns, as made by the supervisors of registration to the board of returning-officers, their majorities ranged from 3,459 to 6,405, but by the canvass and the return made by the returning-officers majorities were certified in favor of the republican electors ranging from 3,437 to 4,800. To produce this result sixty-nine polls were rejected, embracing twenty-two parishes in whole or in part.

In the canvass thus made by the returning-officers there were actually frauds committed by them in this, that they failed and refused to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election, and pretended to consider only the consolidated statements made by the supervisors of elections. In this manner the parish of Grant was rejected entirely, because the statement of votes made by the commissioners of elections, although before them, had not been returned by the supervisor of registration. They also refused for the same reasons to consider 2,914 votes cast for the democratic electors and 651 votes cast for the republican electors, mainly in the parishes of East Baton Rouge and Orleans. They transposed 178 votes from democratic electors cast in the parish of Vernon to the republican electors, which transposition has never been corrected. They rejected poll No. 4 in the parish of Iberia, in which were cast 322 votes for the democratic electors, and 11 votes for the republican electors, for no other alleged cause than that the commissioners' statement did not show that the word "voted" had been written or stamped on the certificates of registration presented by the voters. They rejected polls 1, 3, and 10 in the parish of Vernon, aggregating 179 votes for the democratic electors and none for the republican electors, upon affidavits fraudulently made and filed after they had closed their public sessions, and they added to the votes as returned by the supervisors of registration over 500 votes to five of the eight republican electors in the parish of Concordia, and over 500 votes in the parish of Natchitoches, upon no sufficient proof that such votes had been actually cast, and without the knowledge of the democratic electors interested in the question.

In some instances polls were rejected because, from the necessities of the case, commissioners of elections at such polls were democrats, the supervisors of election not being able to find qualified republicans to fill such positions.

From these and other facts of a like nature, it is charged and claimed that the action of the board of returning-officers was so corrupt and fraudulent as to destroy all faith and credit in their canvass and return.

Again, in rejecting the polls the board of returning-officers acted without lawful authority, there being but few, if any, cases in which the returns made to them had been accompanied by any proper certificate or statement of the supervisors of registration or commissioners of election, as provided for in the law under which they claimed to act, contesting the fairness of the registration or election, but arbitrarily, and without any sufficient foundation being laid therefor and upon false and fraudulent affidavits manufactured for that purpose, rejected such polls on charges of riot, tumult, bribery, &c., without any proper hearing on the part of the parties interested.

The election laws of 1870 and 1872 had placed under control of the governor of the State all the machinery of election and vested in him an authority and power "scarcely exercised by any sovereign in the world." He appointed the State superintendent of registration and the supervisors of registration in each parish in the State, and they in turn fixed the polling-places in the several parishes and appointed the commissioners or judges of election, who received the ballots of the people. All of these appointees, with but very few exceptions, were members of the republican party, and in this instance all this vast power was aided by Federal officers, civil and military, and particularly by the United States marshal for the district of Louisiana, who, claiming to act under the instructions from the Department of Justice, increased the number of his deputies to over eight hundred, and distributed them through the different parishes under the pretense of aiding in preserving order and protecting the purity of the ballot-box. All of these combined official forces acted in unison and harmony with the republican State committee in conducting the canvass and in controlling the election.

HEADQUARTERS REPUBLICAN PARTY OF LOUISIANA,
ROOMS JOINT COMMITTEE ON CANVASSING AND REGISTRATION,
MECHANICS' INSTITUTE, September 25, 1876.

DEAR SIR: It is well known to this committee that, from examination of the census of 1875, the republican vote in your parish is 2,200 and the republican majority is 900.

You are expected to register and vote the full strength of the republican party in your parish.

Your recognition by the next State administration will depend upon your doing your full duty in the premises, and you will not be held to have done your full duty unless the republican registration in your parish reaches 2,200 and the republican vote is at least 2,100.

All local candidates and committees are directed to aid you to the utmost in obtaining the result, and every facility is and will be afforded you; but you must obtain the results called for herein without fail. Once obtained, your recognition will be ample and generous.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. J. M. A. JEWETT, Secretary.

SUPERVISOR OF REGISTRATION,
Parish of Assumption, Louisiana.

Notwithstanding this immense power wielded for the purpose of procuring in the returns to be made a majority for the republican electors and republican State ticket, the local returning-officers were compelled to and did return the majorities heretofore stated in favor of the democratic electors. It was then that the duties of the returning-officers, in the language of J. Madison Wells, president of the board, "augmented the magnitude of the destiny of the two great parties," and, by the fraudulent and unlawful means already charged, reversed the popular verdict, and fraudulently issued the certificates, which are the foundation of the authority for the vote cast for Hayes and Wheeler, and which this Commission is called upon to pronounce to be the true and lawful vote of the State of Louisiana.

The evidence to support these charges of fraud and illegality on the part of the canvassing-officers of Louisiana has already been taken by the Senate of the United States, in pursuance of the resolution adopted December 4, 1876, requiring the Committee on Privileges and Elections, among other duties, to inquire whether the appointment of electors, or those claiming to be such, in any of the States had been made either by force, fraud, or other means, otherwise than in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the respective States; and by the House of Representatives through a special committee appointed to investigate the recent election and the action of the canvassing or returning board of the State of Louisiana in reference thereto, and report all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the electors of said State for President and Vice-President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT. I do not know, Mr. McDonald, what the arrangement between you and your associate is, but half the time has elapsed. One hour has been consumed.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. I shall not take up his time, but I shall leave him to present in extenso these questions. I will only occupy a few minutes further.

It is the duty of this Commission, under the law creating it, exercising for that purpose all the powers now possessed by the two Houses of Congress acting separately or together, to determine and decide whether any and what votes from the State of Louisiana are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in said State, and it may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing laws, be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

In vesting these powers in this Commission Congress created a judicial, and not a clerical, board.

As a judicial board, this Commission is not bound to accept as "the votes provided for in the Constitution of the United States" such as may have been cast by persons fraudulently certified as electors nor to accept them as duly appointed electors, and must consider, in reaching its determination, such proof as would be admissible in either branch of Congress if engaged in the consideration of the same question; and, therefore, the proofs already taken by either of said Houses with respect to these questions are to be deemed "depositions and other papers pertinent in such consideration."

If these proofs, or any other evidence which the Commission may properly receive, shall establish the fact that the electors who cast the votes in question had been appointed by fraud or other means otherwise than in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the State of Louisiana, or that any of them were incapable of being chosen, then the votes cast by such must be rejected, for they are not "the votes provided for in the Constitution."

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, may I in conclusion conjure you to meet these questions on their merits?

Say that the charges are true or false.

Here are charges of fraud against the perpetration of which every honest instinct of our nature rebels—a villainy in their perpetration that is ringing through the land.

Do not, by closing your eyes to them, exhibit a degree of judicial blindness that all good men must deprecate and the whole country condemn.

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. I should like to ask you to refer to the statute of Louisiana providing for filling vacancies in the college of electors, recited in the certificate of Mr. Kellogg.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. That is the act of 1868.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will be found in the pamphlet at page 93.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Allow me to ask a question, Mr. McDonald. You have stated that the electoral vote of Louisiana was discarded in 1872 on the ground that there was no regular machinery for counting the electoral vote.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. No, sir; not that; but that there had been a fraudulent return of that vote. That was one of the grounds of objection made at the time the certificates were opened. It does not appear upon which one of the several grounds the action was based, but there were quite a number. The Senate and House acted, and they each passed resolutions that it was not the electoral vote of the State.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. I am aware of that. I only wanted to ask you to furnish the Commission with that evidence.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. In the book entitled Presidential Counts you will find the whole of it.

Mr. Representative JENKS. I would ask, Mr. President, how much time I have?

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I move, if Mr. Jenks desires it, that he may have a full hour. Some ten minutes of it, I think, were taken by Senator McDonald and interruptions of him, and there are many questions to be discussed here which are of importance.

Mr. Senator McDONALD. I trust, Mr. President and gentlemen, it may be so. The questions put to me necessarily led me to occupy more time than I intended.

The PRESIDENT. Are you satisfied, Mr. Jenks, to take five minutes in addition to the time left?

Mr. Representative JENKS. I prefer a full hour; I do not know that I shall consume it.

The PRESIDENT. I will submit the question to the Commission: Shall Mr. Jenks have an hour?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. And of course the same time will be extended to the other side if they wish it.

Mr. Representative JENKS. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, by the organic act under which this tribunal is constituted, with the decision that has been rendered thereon and adopted by the Houses, the principle has been established that the Houses of Congress shall count the votes. That being fixed as a fact from which to start, the inquiry is, what is implied in counting the votes? Counting any given thing implies two different actions of the mind; one of discrimination or determination to find that the thing to be counted is generically of the kind that is to be counted, and the counting an act of enumeration or finding the result from these acts of determination. To throw out either word from the sentence, "the votes shall then be counted," would be to destroy its sense.

Now I will assume that the Constitution has said the Houses of Congress shall count the votes. When a power is conferred by the Constitution, every power that is necessarily implied to perform that power is also granted; and when a power is granted and the emergency arises when that power should be exercised, the execution of that power becomes a duty, and when that emergency has arisen, the implied powers, whatever are necessary to discharge that duty, are granted; and if they are a necessary implication from the Constitution, they are as much a part of it as though there written; and if the Constitution has written therein that they have the power to intelligently do the act, neither Congress nor any one else can lawfully deprive them of that power. Hence, if the act of Congress which says that the executive certificate shall be the only evidence received contravenes the grant of power which is necessarily implied to find the truth, that statute is a simple nullity, because here are the legislative bodies of a great nation; they are required to attest by their journals a fact which is to go down through all history as the truth over their signatures, and no power on earth can say that you shall put upon those journals that which you and every one else knows to be false. So there can be no such thing as blinding the eyes. If Congress had passed an act that the members of the Senate and House of Representatives with bandages over their eyes, under the superintendence of the President of the Senate, bandaged in a like manner, should count the votes, you would say that absurdity cannot be tolerated; and the same fact exists here. Truth is the moral sunlight of the world, and if you dare cut out the truth from the physical eye, you dare from the moral eye or the mind's eye; but you cannot from one more than from the other unless you propose to defy the intelligent judgment of the world.

Then, this being the duty of the Houses, to count the votes, and the counting implying the fact that there must be an intelligent judgment and an accurate enumeration, no power can deprive the Houses of the necessary intelligence to do that duty.

Then I wish to call the attention of the Commission to another distinction. It has been rather assumed that this is a judicial tribunal. I am unable to concur in this view. It is essentially legislative to determine the succession of the Chief Executive; nothing more and nothing less. A merchant turns to his clerk and says to him, "Go to yon pile of goods and determine which are the calicoes and count the number of webs." It is not a judicial act for that clerk to obey the order. There are no parties to it. The merchant is the owner; he is to do it for himself, and not another; it is not a judicial act at all. The United States says to her two Houses of Congress, "All certificates, true and false, being opened, you are required to make a truthful count of those which are genuine, and repudiate those which are false." It is the nation doing it for herself. It is not parties.

This discussion has been somewhat depreciated in its character, I apprehend, in that it has been to some extent assumed that this is a contest between parties. It is forty-five millions of people speaking for themselves through their own representatives, and saying "you, for me, and in my name and stead, count these votes." It is legislative action, and not judicial, but it must be truthful; and it was conferred upon the legislative power from the very fact that the Senate representing the States, the Representatives representing the people of the whole nation, the question of succession being known as the question that would ultimately involve the greatest danger to our institutions, and that there could be no human foresight that could conceive of every possible emergency that might arise, and in order that there might be no casus omissus, it was put into the hands of the States and the people, intending that from the broad view of the legislator, from the broad range of evidence that he takes into view, and from his mode of thought, he should decide upon this counting on principles of original justice with discretionary application, which is the definition given by Mr. Burke of legislative power. So that from original justice, not as a court with discretionary application, intended by those who conferred the power upon the States and the people, you are to count this vote, not for candidates, but for your country, and count it truly. There should be no blinding of the eyes before we assume to count it.

With these preliminary views, we will proceed to consider the count of the votes. Here are two certificates presented, each of which represents eight electors, each of which bears the seal of a State, each of which bears the signature of a governor. Shall both be counted? Shall either? Or shall neither? If I ask whether both shall not be counted, what is the response? The response is in the language of the Constitution, very simple, very short. Both cannot be counted, because the Constitution provides that a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress, only, shall be appointed. The Constitution at once meets you, because the number is prescribed therein. You immediately say, "Both cannot be counted." Then that is disposed of, and disposed of because the Constitution says that only a fixed number shall be counted; but the Constitution in identically the same clause fixes the other qualifications. It fixes as to the manner of their choosing and as to the qualifications these men shall have who shall be chosen. If you settle it peremptorily and speedily when the Constitution meets you in reference to the number, have you a right on some man's certificate to say, "I will ponder awhile whether I will recognize the Constitution as to manner or as to qualification?" The answer should be equally prompt. All that the legislatures of the States direct is the manner, with the qualification that no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector. Then let us meet the question, if we find the facts to show a violation of the provision of the Constitution as to manner or as to qualifications, with the same promptness with which we would meet it with reference to the number.

Then let us proceed to the count. You cannot count both, because the Constitution limits the number. Then they must be chosen as the legislature directs. They are not both genuine, then, is the conclusion you come to. The inquiry would be, if you were investigating something else and found some real and some false, which is the genuine? And the same principle you would apply to such an inquiry should be applied here now; which is genuine? If either one conforms to the law of the land in all essential particulars, that is genuine. If either fails to conform to the law of the land in any essential particular, that is false. Then it necessarily involves the inquiry as to which conforms to the law of the land. If either does, it is to be counted; but if neither does, you cannot count either.

Then, what are the provisions of the law of the land? With reference to the McEnergy certificate, the certificate No. 2, as it has been designated by the Commission, we claim and are prepared to prove that those electors were elected in the manner prescribed by the State of Louisiana. Second, we are prepared to prove that the electors that are certified to by Mr. Kellogg were not elected in conformity to the laws of Louisiana. Will you accept the proof? That is our offer, and we can establish it.

Then, if we establish that the one is elected according to the legislative provisions of the State of Louisiana, you have it precisely on the same principle on which you rule that both shall not be counted. The constitutional provision is identical and equally imperative. We are also prepared to prove that, in pursuance of the statutes of the United States, the one set, the McEnergy electors, were elected on the 7th day of November, and the other, the Kellogg electors, were not elected until the 6th day of December; so that affirmative law, in addition to the Constitution, will be in favor of counting certificate No. 2. We are also prepared to show that those who claim under certificate No. 2 voted, exercised their right of office, on the day prescribed by law.

Thus, in every essential particular, certificate No. 2 is in precise conformity to law. Certificates Nos. 1 and 3 lack, first, the qualification that the men named therein were not elected in pursuance of the mode prescribed by the legislature, and they were not elected on the day prescribed by the act of Congress. It would seem, if these facts are established, that certificate No. 2 most nearly conforms; but we may consider whether it is sufficiently evidenced hereafter, because the questions of evidence arise even after the real merits shall have been established; but if we establish these facts, certificate No. 2 is that which most nearly conforms to law, and, as we claim, in every essential particular.

If these two certificates come in collision, shall the provision which says the executive shall certify override the provision of the Constitution which prescribes the mode of choice, and override that provision of the act of Congress which fixes that the time of election shall be on a given day, the 7th day of November in this case? It seems to me it ought not, and if the formal be preferred to the substantial, it ought not to be. Then suppose the element of fraud enter into the formal, and we propose to prove that the certificate as signed by Governor Kellogg was procured through the fraudulent acts of a returning-board. But it may be objected that we have no right to inquire into that. I was struck somewhat with the argument made concerning the successive steps in an election, as they were announced a day or two since by one of the honorable gentlemen, and the peculiar feature which marked it was that he stopped just at the place that suited his argument, and thereby eliminated the whole power of the United States Government. He stepped right up until the electors have cast their votes, and then announced, "Then the thing is ended;" then every avenue of truth is cut off. A State may do what she pleases, fraudulently, and the United States cannot inquire into it. Is this true? Is it intended that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States shall be compelled to certify to what they know to be false, and transmit it into history in this way? It does not seem to me to be possible. Has the State of Louisiana, or Florida, or any other State, the right to put in the food, that we all must eat, poison, and require us to eat it? It seems to me we have some say-so in such a matter. The thirty-seven other States have an interest, as well as Louisiana, or Florida, or any single State; and the United States Government, until the votes are opened in the Houses, has no opportunity to know whether it is food or poison. If a State violates the Constitution of the United States by force, we call a million of men to crush her; but if by fraud, we are to take the poison and let the nation die. Is that true or is it false? It is not true. This nation has power to guard against fraud as she has against force; and when it is our duty to count, the two great bodies, representing the States and representing the people, have a right to say, when fraud is injected therein, "We will exclude that, and accept only that which is honest and bona fide."

But suppose the certificate of the governor had been procured by a band of buccaneers sailing up the river to New Orleans, capturing Governor Kellogg, taking him on board their ship, and forcing him to sign his name to that certificate, and thus perpetrating it upon the United States, would you hesitate a moment to inquire concerning that? If, instead of that, a band of more insidious scoundrels deceive him and induce him to sign that certificate, does that render it more sacred? It seems to me Mars, the god of war, was more respectable than Mercury, the god of thieves. Insidious villainy does not commend itself to us as much as actual force. In no judicial tribunal nor in any legislative tribunal ought it to be accepted as worthy of any more sanctity. But suppose, in addition (and this we expect to prove) to the returning-board poisoning these returns, that the governor who issued the certificate was himself a party to it; does the fact that he was dishonest, a member of the same band of conspirators, render it more sacred than if he had been an honest man? Can he by his own villainy sanctify his villainous act? Can he take advantage of it himself for his own aggrandizement? It seems to me these propositions need no argument; hence I merely state them.

I may here call attention to the only explanation I know of giving any sufficient probability by which to account for the "certificates" 1 and 3, as found in the evidence as taken before the congressional committee. Each member of the returning-board had sworn that the canvass of votes on which they promulgated their result was not obtained earlier than eight o'clock in the evening of the 5th of December. A newspaper reporter by the name of Smith, investigating, as is their wont, around the State-house, discovered that in the afternoon of the 5th, about two or three o'clock, the certificate of election for the republican electors had been made out; and yet the returning-board swore they never knew nor had any idea until after they had finished their counting that there was a majority for one side or the other; but their certificates were already prepared. This passed into the newspapers, and as a consequence it became necessary to make two certificates, and they were made, we say the second set as well as the first, so that if you have difficulty in arriving at the fact, why there are these double certificates. That is the only explanation I find in the evidence.

But I will proceed with the facts, for it was not my intention to have entered on a legal discussion at all, because the facts are sufficiently important as a groundwork for future action to be laid before the Commission. With reference to the facts, the first fact we present would be this: that the legislature has directed that the electors shall be appointed by a popular vote. I need not refer to the statute to establish that; the evidence is in the revised statutes. The second fact is that on the popular vote cast in that State, undisputed by any one, and as proven from the only record-evidence of the State, there is a majority of between 6,000 and 9,000 in favor of the Tilden electors, an average of 7,639, I believe, depending upon which you compare with the others; but the majority is not less than 6,000 and it is not in excess of 9,000. That is the second fact.

Here I may call attention to the only mode of arriving at the truth of this case in reference to this point. The papers that pass into the hands of the returning-board are only ephemeral. They are not made records. There is no place for their preservation. They pass into the hands of this board, and where they go from that no one knows by law. As a fact they distribute themselves pretty miscellaneously; but the law provides no place for their preservation, and they are only intended for the temporary purpose of a canvass. Then from the returning-board there is no record-evidence or mode of testing the veracity of their acts; but the law has provided a record-evidence, and that is this: Every commissioner of election shall file his statement with the supervisor of registration in duplicate. The supervisor of registration shall make out his statements in duplicate. Of those duplicates of the commissioners of election and supervisors of registration, one is to be sent to the clerk of the court in the parish, and the other to the returning-board. That of the returning-board is temporary; the other goes as a standing muniment in evidence of title. Then from these, the only muniments of title, placed on record in that State with the several courts of record, this is the result; but the result was changed in some way, and it was changed so that a certificate was given by Governor Kellogg; it was done by the excluding of 13,236 democratic votes and 2,178 republican votes, a difference of 11,058.

In this connection, in order that I may answer the question suggested by the honorable Senator from Ohio, I will give a statement of the different parishes and the facts with reference to them. So far as protest is concerned, it has already been elaborated before the Commission that where there is a protest filed, if the law be constitutional, there is power on the establishment of certain facts to exclude certain votes or certain polls. Now, this is a law conferring special jurisdiction, and, as we know, it must receive a strict construction. If there be any element that is necessary to give this jurisdiction not in the evidence before it, it has no jurisdiction, and its acts so far as this extraordinary power is concerned are entirely void. In order to obtain jurisdiction there must be a protest filed by the supervisor of registration if there be intimidation or fraud during the period of registration or revision of registration. He has no power to file a protest with reference to violence or anything of the kind on election-day; but it is only during the registration and revision of registration that he has any authority to file any protest. Then the commissioners of election on election-day may file protests for violence on election-day. If it be not done by one of these parties, there is no power to inquire concerning it, and if inquiry be made it is a usurpation; and in addition to that we will prove the exercise of such power is a fraud which was intentionally perpetrated in the alleged canvass by the returning-board of Louisiana in this case.

Of these protests there must be duplicates; of the duplicates one is transmitted to the returning-board, the other filed in court. That filed in court is placed there in order that there may be a prosecution by the district attorney for the crime, and for the additional purpose that the people of a parish, poll, or whatever may be objected to, may know what is charged against them, in order that they may stand for their rights; because it is not possible that the right of suffrage of the people of a whole parish may be taken from them by the inquisitorial proceedings before such a board as this, and of which they never had notice, when the law says duplicates shall be filed in the courts. Hence if there be no duplicate filed in court there is no jurisdiction; and I may now state, as a generality, that with the exception of the parishes of Bossier and Concordia there was not a single protest filed in court in the State of Louisiana. In Concordia there was not a single vote thrown out, because it was republican in all its polls. In Bossier there were some one hundred votes or so thrown out, because there were democratic polls in that parish. We will now go over the several parishes.

Here it may be necessary to explain that the supervisor of registration is to receive the returns of the commissioners of election, and within twenty-four hours of the date of their receipt send them by mail, sealed up, to the returning-board. He has no more power or discretion concerning the votes that are cast, their reception or their exclusion, than has the mail-boy to determine whether the letters in his mail-bag are such as should be carried or not—not a mite of discretion, but simply that of an instrument of transmission; nothing more and nothing less. Although the constitution of the State requires that all her officers shall be citizens of the State, and the parish officers citizens of the parish in which they officiate and citizens of the State, F. A. Clover was appointed a supervisor of registration for East Baton Rouge, being a citizen of Mississippi, holding two offices in the State of Mississippi until the 1st of January, 1876, and it takes one year to acquire a residence in Louisiana. After that he came some time in March to Louisiana, and engaged as a runner, or in the technical parlance of that vicinity he became a roper-in for a snake-show; that is, a caller-in to a gambling tent on the wharf. He continued in that vocation until the 27th of August, when he was appointed supervisor of East Baton Rouge, because East Baton Rouge it was known was becoming strongly democratic.

Clubs had been organized there in which there were from five hundred to seven hundred colored voters, and it became necessary to put this parish under the charge of a particularly appropriate supervisor of registration. This supervisor of registration of East Baton Rouge filed no protest with the clerk of the court; none is found on file; it is so proven by the testimony as taken according to law, because we say that the testimony taken by Congress is a part of this record. This is a legislative tribunal as to practice in proceeding. The law says you shall receive petitions, depositions, &c., as provided by the law of the land. What law? The law with reference to legislative bodies who have the counting of this vote. If all the citizens of the United States who choose send a petition in, it would be your duty to receive it in evidence, giving it its proper weight. If the different Houses of Congress have taken testimony, it is your duty to receive it, because by the law of the land, through all time, that has been the mode of taking testimony in the several Houses of Congress, and this body is acting with the powers and under the obligations substantially as though it were a congressional body. Then the supervisor of registration of East Baton Rouge threw out 1,147 democratic votes and 47 republican votes, making a change of 1,100 in that parish.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. The supervisor of registration, not the returning-board?

Mr. Representative JENKS. Not the board; it was before they got to the board that this roper-in for the snake-show did this, and the evidence was before the returning-board as to what the true vote was; and they, with that fidelity which was indicated by a dispatch sent by their attorney, John Ray, that by throwing out five parishes the State would be republican, (and this was one of them,) accepted his act and never inquired concerning it. Eleven hundred were thrown out by an officer with no more power than a mail-carrier; and with notice to the board that he had done it, with the actual vote placed before them, they by their act reply, "that takes that much burden off our shoulders and we leave it so."

After the supervisor of registration had thrown out 1,100 votes, that is, 1,100 of a difference, the board then took two polls, 12 and 14, and at poll No. 12 threw out 162 democratic votes and 4 republican votes; at poll No. 14 they threw out 144 democratic votes and 6 republican votes in that parish, making a difference of 1,396; and no protest filed in court, no notice to a single citizen of East Baton Rouge, and yet they were being disfranchised by the thousand; and this purports to be a free government!

The next is West Feliciana. There was no protest filed in court in that parish. There were 1,010 democratic votes thrown out and 154 republican; no protest filed, no opportunity for the citizens to know the truth; making a difference of 856.

In East Feliciana there was no protest filed with the clerk of the court. There were 1,736 democratic votes thrown out and 1 republican, and this is the parish over which they rejoice as conclusive evidence of intimidation. The governor of the State, we are prepared to prove, had notice in advance that the colored people were passing into the democratic party in large masses. The supervisor of registration it was first contemplated should not go there at all, and thereby prevent an election. But in consequence of hoping to carry two members of the legislature he was instructed to go back and did go back; but there were no republican tickets sent there, and hence there was but 1 republican vote cast. The arrangement was made to keep the tickets away; they did not go, and the consequence of it was 1 republican vote and 1,736 democratic, and that was intended as evidence of intimidation. But we stand on the legal proposition that there was no protest filed, and being without jurisdiction the act of throwing out was usurpation.

The next was New Orleans. There were none thrown out by the board, but there were three polls thrown out by the supervisors of registration, these mail-carriers. There were 993 democratic votes thrown out and 346 republican votes, making 647 of a difference in New Orleans. They were thrown out on very different pretexts. One was thrown out because for the single elector De Blanc it was uncertain on the commissioner's statement whether the number of votes cast was 247 or 249; that is, the figure 7 was not made with sufficient accuracy by the commissioner of election to know certainly whether it was a 7 or a 9; and because the supervisor of registration could not decipher that figure he threw out the whole poll; and although that fact was called to the attention of the returning-board, they went over it, and excluded it in their count. If this is not an abomination that a great nation is not bound to submit to, I would ask you what you would call an abomination?

The next is Claiborne. There was no protest filed of any kind with the board or elsewhere, and 184 votes were thrown out. In Caldwell there was no protest filed whatever, and 141 democratic votes were thrown out and 74 republican, making 67 of a difference. In Franklin 74 democratic and 28 republican votes were thrown out, a difference of 46, and there was no protest. In Catahoula there was no protest whatever, and 97 democratic votes were thrown out and 20 republican, making 77 of a difference. In Richland there was no protest filed with the clerk of the court, and there was no protest filed, either, with the returning-board until the 30th day of November. When the supervisor of registration brought in his returns, instead of sending them by mail he carried them, and that brought him in connection with the custom-house, and the custom-house was in need of witnesses, as they stated. The consequence was they gave this supervisor of registration $150 to pay witnesses, and he filed a protest on the 30th of November with the returning-board, and the consequence was that they excluded 770 democratic votes and 157 republican votes, making 613 of a difference in majorities; and you are asked to sanction that. The supervisor of registration received $150 under the nominal pretext of searching for witnesses, and some seventeen days after he has made his original return his conscience then becomes enlightened, and he files a protest with the board, but not in court; and you are to count the votes as so manipulated and say it is right!

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Was the protest in regard to registration?

Mr. Representative JENKS. The protest was a general one, that there was intimidation. There is not a single one of these protests that in a legal tribunal or before an honest board comes up to the requisition of the law.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. If I understood your statement before, the supervisor of registration has no duty to perform in protesting in respect to the election, but only in respect to registration.

Mr. Representative JENKS. None at all in reference to election-day, but during the period of registration and the revision of registration.

His official right to protest began on the 28th of August and terminated on the evening before election-day, and only extends to such acts as interfered with registration and revision, and whenever election-day comes his power is exhausted and the commissioners of election then make the protest. That is the way the law divides the duty.

The next parish is Morehouse. There was no protest filed of any kind. The number of democratic votes thrown out by the board was 985, of republican 357, making a difference of 628. In Ouachita Parish there was a protest filed with the board, but not in court. There were 1,517 democratic votes thrown out and 48 republican, making a difference of 1,469. In Madison there were 63 votes added to the republican vote as returned by the commissioners of election to the supervisor of registration. That was an act of extended discretion, I presume. Whenever a vote was not what they (the board) conceived it ought to be, they assumed the right, as in Vernon Parish, to make it what they thought it should be; and if this be republican in form, how will you define a republic? If a board has a right to say how an election shall result at its own discretion, without regard to the vote actually cast, how are you to define what a republic is?

Then in Webster there was no protest filed whatever. There were 436 democratic votes thrown out and 194 republican, making 242 of a difference. In Bossier there was a protest by the supervisor of registration, but not by the commissioners of election. Bossier, as I stated before, and Concordia are the only two parishes where there were any protests filed with the clerks of the courts. Here was a protest filed by the supervisor of registration, but it related to acts of violence on election-day, over which he had no jurisdiction, and hence that action was void. The number thrown out there against the democracy was 342 of a majority.

In Natchitoches there was no protest of any kind. The number of democratic votes thrown out was 343, republican 7, making a difference of 336. No protest was filed whatever; that is, no protest filed with the clerk of the court. There was a protest filed with the board, made after the election by the supervisor of registration, with reference to transactions that occurred on election-day principally and after the time limited by law for him to make protest.

Here it is claimed the statute is directory as to the time of the protest. As the duty of the supervisor of registration is a simple one, he only being empowered to pack up the statements and put them in an envelope and mail them, he has but twenty-four hours to do it, and the statute required that he should send them from the place where they were received and not carry them in person, in order that there might not be a comparison of results at the capital, as there was in this case, and then go to cutting and fitting to match results as they might desire. So that that part of it is not directory. It is not necessary it should be so considered; but if it be directory and they violated it unnecessarily, that is presumptive evidence of fraud.

In Vernon there was no protest whatever. They took jurisdiction without evidence. They threw out 178 democratic votes and added 179 to the republican side—a difference of 357. In Iberia there was no protest and 333 democratic and 11 republican votes were thrown out, making a difference of 322. The reason these votes were thrown out was that the law requires that when the voter shall have voted there shall be written on the back of his certificate of registration "voted." In the morning the officers of election at one poll did not write on the back of the certificate of the electors "voted" until about one hundred votes had been cast. After that, finding it was their duty to so do, they did write it. This fact was communicated to the board, and the upshot of it was that they threw out the whole poll because it gave 322 of a democratic majority.

Then in La Fayette there was no protest filed in court. Two polls were rejected by the supervisor of registration. The number thrown out was 518 democratic and 7 republican.

In La Fourche no protest was filed in court. Two polls were thrown out by the supervisor of registration, in one of which 142 votes were democratic as against 104 republican, making 38 of a difference, and in the other 127 of a difference in majorities against the democratic electors.

In Livingston there was no protest filed of any character. The democratic majority of 328 was thrown out. In Saint Landry there was no protest filed, and poll No. 9 was thrown out with a democratic majority of 82. In Tangipahoa there was no protest filed in court. Poll No. 10 was not compiled; that is, it was thrown out by the supervisor of registration; and poll No. 3 was excluded, making 76.

There is a coincidence that I wish to call attention to here. If accidents do happen, it is a little singular that they always happen in one direction; and if you find this fact to exist that the accidents happen in the direction that the person who occasions their happening would desire accidents to happen, it is a ground for suspicion that possibly it may not have been an accident. Then when you take the fact into consideration that the acting governor of the State was a republican, that he appoints the State supervisors of registration and he also appoints every supervisor of registration in the State, the supervisors of registration appoint every commissioner of elections in the State, (the clerks of the supervisors of registration were usually republicans,) I believe there were one or two instances in which there were exceptions—every single mistake that was made happened to cut just one way. That suggests the possibility that there might be design in it so strong, that when we give some additional facts which we will state directly, it seems to me almost conclusive of design.

But it is probably now my duty to answer what they may say. I have stated that there were no protests at all in certain cases. That is evaded by a proposition that parties in interest may have a hearing before the board under the provisions of the third section of the act. After stating that the supervisor of registration shall file protests, &c., it proceeds:

Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning-officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election.

That provides for a hearing. This tribunal cannot entertain an original pleading between parties, because if it did it would be clearly and wholly judicial. If the claimant of an office has a right to come before this board and allege that he was elected, of course his opponent has a right to deny that allegation. We then find every element constituting a court. There are the actor, the reus, the judex, full judicial characteristics in all particulars; and yet the constitution of Louisiana says that all judicial powers shall be vested in certain courts, and that none shall be exercised by any other authority. So it is not possible that the "hearing" contemplated was that certain men might go over the State and file protests, as they did in this case, against nearly every parish in the State; so that when I say there was no protest, I say the protest by the officers who claimed to have been elected was no protest at all as contemplated by this act, and was a nullity; and if you count the others who filed no protests in court, and throw out every vote that was thrown out under them, and say that this general protest was not lawfully filed—and you can say nothing else as to this alleged general protest as I understand the law—it still leaves a very considerable majority in favor of the McEnery electors.

I have gone through seriatim the statements of the several parishes. I will now pass to more general evidence of fraud. However, there is another system of facts which it is my duty to call the attention of the Commission to, in order that there may be a full opening. There are certain persons who are alleged to be disqualified. A. B. Levissee and O. H. Brewster are disqualified under the Constitution of the United States. We will prove that Levissee was a commissioner appointed by a circuit court of the United States holding at the time of the election. We will prove that Mr. Brewster was surveyor of the land-office for the land-district of Louisiana. He swears himself that three or four days after the election he wrote a letter resigning and asking that it might take effect as of the 4th of November. This letter was written on the 10th or 11th of November. It was mailed to Washington and received at Washington on the 18th. On the 23d he received a reply accepting his resignation as of the 4th. Hence on the day of the election he was disqualified from holding this office; and as we decide very promptly when the number is limited by the Constitution, it is our duty to decide equally promptly that the qualification is equally as binding on us.

The disqualification of the Constitution does not extend to the officer alone, but it goes down and pervades the whole country. The voter who casts his vote for a disqualified person does the same as though he cast a blank vote, for he is as much bound by the Constitution as is the officer who claims to be elected. It pervades all. It is the supreme fundamental law, reaching every citizen from the lowest to the highest, and the disqualification made it equivalent to the absolute not voting of the party who threw a vote for a constitutionally disqualified man.

Then, in reference to the other officers, we find that J. H. Burch was a State senator of the State of Louisiana. By the constitution of the State of Louisiana it is provided that no person shall hold any two offices under the said State except those of justice of the peace and notary public. Burch was a State senator, we will prove, prior to the election, and continues so up to this day by virtue of the holding under which he held before. Then the disqualification of the State constitution rendered the vote of the citizen as to this Burch the same as though it had not been cast. He was not elected, even if he had a majority of the votes.

Morris Marks, another elector in certificates Nos. 1 and 3, was district attorney for the district in which the parish of Saint James is, prior to the election and has continued to hold down to this day. He is disqualified by the State constitution. We will also show that Oscar Joffrion was supervisor of registration for Point Coupee Parish. He is disqualified by the constitution of the State, article 117, and he is also disqualified by express enactment, because in the registration law, section 13, you will find that a supervisor of registration is expressly disqualified from being a candidate for any office being voted for during the time of his officiating as supervisor of registration. The language is:

That no supervisor of registration appointed under this act, and no clerk of such supervisor of registration, shall be eligible for any office at any election when said officers officiate.

So that, in addition to the constitutional disqualification, there is express statutory disqualification with reference to Joffron, and we will prove that he was acting and did act clear through this election as supervisor of registration for the parish of Point Coupee. These are disqualifications, and we will establish all of them by affirmative evidence.

Then with reference to actual fraud we have some testimony to offer, to which I will call your attention very briefly and from memory. In the first instance we are prepared to prove that prior to the election those who had the conduct of the campaign on behalf of the republican party alleged in advance that, no difference how the election went by the people, the returning-board would make it all right. This was declared by Mr. Lewis and by Judge Dibble, the acting attorney-general. Lewis is the one who claims to have been elected to the United States Senate by the late legislature created by virtue of the action of this returning-board. We will show that in addition to this, prior to the meeting of the returning-board, there was a telegram sent by John Ray, who was attorney for the returning-board and went through all of its sessions, public and private, in which he states:

NEW ORLEANS, November 16, 1876.

Hon. J. R. WEST, Washington, D. C. :

Returns to date leave us majority, throwing out five parishes.

JOHN RAY.

That is dated on the 16th of November, before the returning-board met, showing that the attorney that they selected to discharge the functions of their adviser stated in advance that five parishes were to be thrown out. We will corroborate that by predictions coming from many sources. On the 17th of November, 1876, J. R. G. Pitkin, United States marshal, who used the funds of the Government with a very generous hand in reference to procuring witnesses to upset the right in that State, telegraphed J. R. West as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, November 17, 1876.

Hon. J. R. WEST, Washington, D. C. :

Louisiana is safe. Our northern friends stand firmly by us. The returning-board will hold its own.

J. R. G. PITKIN.

Showing that there was no reliance upon the votes of the people, but their hopes concentrated in the returning-board. Then on the 3d of December, prior to the time that Governor Wells swears he knew anything about what the results were, we have the following telegram:

NEW ORLEANS, December 3, 1876.

Hon. J. R. WEST, Washington, D. C. :

Democratic boast entire fallacy. Have northern friends on way North—answer telegram of this morning; also, have Senate anticipate House in sending committee to investigate outrages. Have seen Wells, who says, "Board will return Hayes sure. Have no fear."

J. R. G. PITKIN.

And Mr. Pitkin swore before the congressional committee that Wells did tell him before he sent the telegram that the board would return Hayes sure, to have no fear.

Then, taking these predictions and taking their action, we will add, besides, to many other things that I have not time to recapitulate, that this board offered by some of its members to sell the result in that State to two different men, to one for a consideration of $200,000, to another asking a million. The price was changed in conformity to the probabilities of the purchase. The constant succession of accidents all on one side would be sufficient in itself. Then, again, the attention of the board was called to the fact that it was their duty to fill the board to deliver themselves from suspicion. . Every one felt and knew that prior to this these very men had been found guilty of doing dishonest acts with reference to elections. They were asked to fill the board. The law was laid before them; they admitted it was the law, but said it was directory. Assuming that they were not bound to obey a directory law, but had a discretion to regard or disregard it as they pleased, they interpreted the word "directory" as discretionary; they used their discretion to exclude any person from knowing what they did who would have an interest in contradicting any false assertion which they might make or dishonest trick which they might perform with reference to the canvass of the election.

Then their attention was called to the fact in reference to making their compilations from the statements of the votes. They made, in violation of law, their compilations from the supervisors of registration, and thereby threw out the whole parish of Grant, and excluded the statements which were not returned by the supervisors of registration, by which they made 2,900 of a difference in their action in favor of their own party.

Now, is a great nation to submit to all this? Must forty-five millions of people drink from a foul sink the ordure that flows through such a fetid sewer? It is not right. Truth should be admitted to shine upon this. You cannot erect a false god and bow down to it and worship it, and be blameless. Truth ought to be permitted to shine upon this transaction; and if truth shine upon it, but one single result can possibly be attained. The wisest of men or the strongest of men cannot make that which is false true. Solomon, the wisest of men, set up the false god Moloch, and in the glowing arms of the monster children wailing died; but his wisdom, his power, and his glory have not been able to efface the stain or to prevent posterity ever since from regarding it as pollution on his name and his character. If you set up the false for the true, if you attempt to blind the eyes of a mighty nation, and to say the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives of the United States shall put upon their journals as a perpetual memorial to all generations that which they know to be false, and command all to bow down and worship it, your edict will be vain; because history will judge and will know the truth. We ask now that the simple truth, the great moral light of the universe, may be permitted to shine upon this transaction, to clear out all this pollution, and to let our country be free from the disgrace of being poisoned by the act of this vile returning-board.

Mr. Representative HURLBUT. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, I wish my mind could be relieved of the difference of opinion expressed by the several members who objected in advance of me, and that the important question could be determined either as claimed by Senator McDonald, that this is a judicial tribunal, or as claimed by Mr. Jenks, of the House, that it is a legislative tribunal. If indeed there be any claim of special and peculiar jurisdiction belonging to this Commission, it comes under the act of Congress. The judicial power is limited by the Constitution, and you certainly possess not that. The legislative power is equally limited by the Constitution to Congress, and you certainly possess not that. I apprehend that the constitution of this Commission is as a means, as a committee, if I may call it so, appointed by the two Houses, as a convenience to them, to determine upon certain questions which have arisen with regard to this presidential election, and that this committee or this Commission is bound to pass upon these questions in conformity to well-settled and regularly-established law, and not at all in conformity to any vague suggestions of matter which is dehors the record, which is not among the things committed to you by the President of the Senate, and which already, if I understand the decision of this Commission, is barred by the spirit and reason of the decision made in the Florida case.

I am here in the discharge of the duty which has been cast upon me, to do two things: first, to object to the paper known as No. 2, the McEnery certificate. That may be done, as I understand it, in two ways: first, by showing that the certificate itself is not good; second, by showing that McEnery himself is not governor. That is an attacking process to the certificate and to the title of the man who gives it. The attack may be made just as well by supporting by the law and the evidence the existence and legal effect of the other and counter-certificate purporting to be given by William P. Kellogg as governor, and the establishment of the fact to the satisfaction of this Commission and of the world that William P. Kellogg was at the time the certificate was given the only legal and recognized governor in the State of Louisiana. Fortunately, there is an abundance of proof upon that question. There is no governor who has held office in these United States that is so abundantly bolstered up by proof of his existence as governor, not only stricti juris by the fact of election, but by the fact of the declaration of that election by the only legal returning-officers of the State, by the fact of the counting of the votes by the only legal legislature of the State, by the fact of the entrance into office under that count, by the fact that when in pursuance of the system which prevails in that most wretched State the course of law, sovereign and supreme as it ought to be in every republican government, was violently overthrown, when in 1874 rebellion by arms was inaugurated and civil war brought into the streets of the capital city, armed forces organized deliberately to overthrow it, and a skirmish which bore a near approach to the dimensions of a battle took place, the avowed object being to overthrow the existing government, and to substitute the other one, of which this man McEnery was the figure-head, the intervention of the United States was asked under the Constitution. The United States was asked to lend her strong arm to sustain the right. Which was the government to be sustained there in the case of these two conflicting governments, was by the act of 1795 delegated by Congress to the President of the United States, and that delegation gives until his decision is overthrown by both branches of Congress absolute validity to his recognition on the part of this Government in determining which was the rightful government of the State. The President of the United States so recognized it. The President of the United States did more; he used the military arm of the country, put down the rebellion by force of arms, by conquest, and placed Kellogg back again in the seat from which he had been deposed.

This is not the end of the record. I allude to these facts without giving the dates, which I will do hereafter for the consideration of the tribunal. It does not end here. The question comes up, as to the propriety of the President's action, in the Senate of the United States. The Senate of the United States adopted eventually a resolution offered by Mr. Anthony in terms as follows; I quote from the Senate Journal of 1874-'75, page 475:

Resolved, That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence, and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

There is the senatorial recognition of the determination made by the President of the United States, under the power delegated to him in the law of 1795, and the approval of his action, and the committal of one branch, at all events, of Congress to the validity of Kellogg's tenure of office.

But in reading through that record I find a still more pointed action of the Senate, because the negating of a proposition sometimes, which is antagonistic to the main proposition, adds peculiar vigor and force to the proposition itself. I find, that resolution being pending, Senator Thurman offered an amendment, which appears on page 473 of the Journal, that nothing in that resolution should be considered as recognizing Kellogg as de jure governor of Louisiana; and that amendment was rejected by the vote of the Senate.

The House also has taken some action on this matter. The committee of the House known as the Louisiana Committee, which has been referred to by Mr. Jenks in his argument, reported certain resolutions, and in the Journal of the House of Representatives, page 603, of the session of 1874-'75, this resolution appears:

Resolved, That William Pitt Kellogg be recognized as the governor of the State of Louisiana until the end of the term of office fixed by the constitution of that State.

That resolution was adopted by a vote of 165 to 89. The same committee, of which Mr. Hoar and Mr. Wheeler were members, were anxious, as all true men ought to be, to put an end to the bad state of things which confessedly prevailed there in Louisiana, and to that end they undertook, at the request of these parties—John McEnery, this contesting governor, being one—to make an award which was to be carried out by certain changes, by resignations on the one side and putting men into office on the other, in the legislature of that State; in other words, they undertook to do equity, and an award was made by them, and in pursuance of that award the legislature of Louisiana passed a resolution by which—I am quoting from memory—they agreed that the tenure of office of William Pitt Kellogg during the term for which he had been elected and until his successor should be appointed, should not in any way be interfered with by that legislature of the State of Louisiana in consideration of this award.

Now I will come back, first, to the question of his election. In 1872 the contest was between John McEnery and William P. Kellogg for governor of the State of Louisiana. Governor Warmoth, who undertook to manipulate more things than he could carry, endeavored to complicate the matter by breaking up the legal board of returning-officers, which existed under the act of 1870, and create a board, creatures of his own, so that in fact at that election of 1872 there were two conflicting boards of returning-officers of election of the State of Louisiana; one of them known as the Lynch board and the other as the Forman board. The supreme court of the State of Louisiana has settled all that question. The supreme court of the State of Louisiana, in 25 Louisiana Annual Reports, in the case of The State ex rel. vs. Wharton et al., rendered this decision; I read from page 14:

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the board of returning-officers composed of H. C. Warmoth, F. J. Herron, John Lynch, James Longstreet, and Jacob Hawkins was the legal board of returning-officers of elections of the State of Louisiana.

And that was the board by whose certificate of election Kellogg derived his title. Now, if it be true that William P. Kellogg was governor of the State of Louisiana on the 6th day of December, 1876, it is manifestly true that John McEnery was not; and whatever virtue or value in the way of evidence this Commission may attach to the certificate of a governor must be given to the governor who, by election, recognition, and all other steps known to the law, was at the time the actual governor, and not to a mere pretender who retired from that contest, of his own will, in 1874 and has not in any way undertaken to assert or exercise any possible control over the office of governor of that State from that day to this.

Again, I call the attention of the Commission to the peculiar wording of the certificate given by John McEnery. He was careful, as far as he could, not to commit himself to a statement of any essential fact appearing by evidence:

This is to certify that the following is a true and correct list of the names of the electors of the President and Vice-President of the United States for the next ensuing regular term of the respective offices thereof, being electors duly and legally appointed by and for the State of Louisiana, having each received a majority of the votes cast for electors at the election in the State of Louisiana, held in accordance with law; this certificate being furnished as directed by law, by the executive authority of said State of Louisiana.

There is no reference there to any source known to the laws from which he derives his information; there is no reference there to any returns appearing on file in his office, because he had no office; he had no returns; he had no secretary of state; he had no man in all Louisiana who would come forward and verify the seal of the State and the signature of the governor by signing, "By the governor: So-and-so, secretary of state."

This brings me to consider, in the line of argument which I have marked out for myself, what are the evidences that ordinarily in the regular course of law in all cases of election come up before a canvassing or determining tribunal. Does any one contend for a moment that this Commission has the power, the authority, or the means or time to purge the election in Louisiana, to pass through the whole system as it was displayed there on the 7th day of November, to examine into every poll, or even to read that mass of balderdash under the name of evidence that is sent up here and half yet unprinted? Is it not true that this Commission is exercising to a certain extent a political and not a judicial power, that you are exercising it as all determining bodies pass upon elections, not upon the very facts that may have taken place away down to the remotest poll in the different parishes, but upon the regular returns of the officers constituted for that purpose and sent forward to you? In other words, I draw very clearly in my own mind this distinction—the distinction between the power of a political tribunal to determine an election upon the apparent right, the prima-facie right, as it appears upon the papers that are sent up, and the right of a judicial tribunal when two parties are properly before it, one claiming to have been veritably elected and that the other has not been. In that case no man denies that the judicial tribunal, if clothed by law with that power, can pass behind the returns and papers and inquire into the veritable fact of the case and determine according to the very right. Now, I do not believe that either by any fair construction of the law, or by any proper construction of the powers of the two Houses as given by the Constitution, there exists either in the two Houses or in this tribunal the power of examining into the very right as if you were a court sitting to-day to try the case of a quo warranto brought by one candidate for the presidency against another in occupation, if such a proceeding be known to the laws, on which I confess I do not propose to give any opinion.

It was stated, and stated correctly, by the distinguished counsel who argued another cause before your tribunal, [Mr. Matthews,] that an election necessarily consists of certain steps moving forward. It does so everywhere; in all States, in all governments where elections are and where they involve anything larger than the single political unit; and, if the Commission will excuse me, I will endeavor to show the distinction that exists under the laws of Louisiana in their mode of scrutinizing their elections and of handling elections from what exists, so far as I know, in any other State in the Union, and the reasons for it.

Where you have a community in which general education is diffused, in which there is a general desire to maintain fair dealing and support of law, as prevails fortunately in most of the States of this Union, but not in Louisiana, then the election processes begin from the bottom; they commence in the unit, the lowest possible subdivision of political power; the people themselves are trusted, are fit to be trusted, and ought to be trusted with the power of determining in those little local communities, under the inspection of their neighbors, who shall be judges of their elections. And so you have and can have judges of election; and from that base the election processes go up by returns from township to county, from county to district, from district to the State canvassing-board; and in every one of those processes the subordinate election tribunals, every one of them, have and exercise the power properly meant by the power of making returns. They are returning-officers; and, as a rule, in the States with which I am most acquainted, the State board of canvassers has no duty to perform excepting a ministerial one. All questions of eligibility of voters, of their right to vote, and all those matters, are in such communities safely intrusted to the local tribunals. But in Louisiana the case is altogether different, and it is different because of the difference of the population, the difference of the character of the people. The laws which they have there are as good laws as the people will permit themselves to have. All laws reflect the condition of society. Thus in Louisiana the election processes, instead of beginning from the bottom and coming up, begin from the top. There is not in that community that diffused education—and I am saying these things with no unkindness to that community, but as a matter of fact—there is not that diffused education, above all things there is not that reverence for law, which permits trusting local neighborhoods with this power. And so, in recognition of that fact, in recognition of the fact that by the processes of reconstruction a vast body of uneducated men had been suddenly elevated to the position of citizenship and of eligibility to office, in recognition of the fact that from the beginning in that most unfortunate State there has been armed, deliberate resistance to the law, there has been deliberate, settled, persistent resolution to crush out by violence and force all those things, no matter what they were, which stood in the way of the party that sought to make itself dominant by force when it was not dominant by numbers, the legislature commenced in 1868 by first creating a sort of returning-board, consisting of the governor and certain officers, but using a judge for the purpose of determining these facts of intimidation.

This Commission is acquainted with the history of this country, and even of that remote part of it. It knows as part of the current history of the country that that change in the system of election laws in the State of Louisiana was brought about by the murders, the assaults, the violent breaking into the regular course of law which swept that State in 1868 and compelled the legislature which sat in 1868 to undertake to devise some remedy. That was one of the remedies they devised.

But that did not answer; and so, in 1870, the legislature of the State went a step further, and they took all the power of making returns in any sense of the word from all these local and subordinate ministers of election, and they did not allow them even to say in a ward-district whether a police-justice or a constable had been elected, the lowest form of subdivision in that State being these precincts or polls in parishes. They took all that away, and took away any power on the part of the commissioners of election even to pass upon the right of a voter to vote. They gave by that law to the supervisor of registration controlling power to determine whether or not a man was a legal voter in a parish, and his determination once made bound every officer of the election. There was positively nothing left to these local commissioners of election except to examine and determine whether the man who offered his vote was the identical man registered by the supervisor of registration. That was all. So their office became simply ministerial and clerical. Their returns were no longer dignified by the name of "returns," but dropped down in the law to what they ought to be, "statements of votes." These statements of votes passed up to the supervisor, who is also—Mr. Jenks has stated it correctly in that particular—deprived of any judicial power whatsoever. He is simply a compiler of the statements, and is bound by the law to send forward his compilation and all the original papers he receives—he passes no judgment on them—to the returning-board of elections for the State of Louisiana; and the entire power and faculty all over the State of giving any declaration whatsoever which should amount to prima-facie evidence on which the governor could commission is solely and exclusively vested in this State board of returning-officers. All this appears from the very terms of the law itself, and if it were worth while I could read the decision of the supreme court of that State which sustains, as it could not help sustaining, the plain, emphatic, and undeniable words of the law.

Having constituted them judges, not of all State elections—that is not what they say, but they make them the final judges and only tribunal which has the right to give a prima-facie certificate of election for all elections held in the State—the question gravely resolves itself back to this: whether the presidential election of 1876, in which certain persons were chosen as electors, was an election held within the State of Louisiana. If it was, these men had jurisdiction. I shall not have time to follow all the points that have been made. I shall leave that to be done far more ably and better by the counsel. Permit me, however, to follow this one.

There is another consideration. The point having been raised, as I understand, by the objectors on the other side, that as a matter of fact there exists no law to-day by which the right of appointing electors in Louisiana was delegated to the people, that is a question to be determined on the inspection of the laws themselves, and I will simply read from the list of all the laws on this point, section 29 of the act of 1872, though I believe it has been read before:

Be it further enacted, That in every year in which an election shall be held for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, such election shall be held at the time fixed by act of Congress.

The presidential election—that is, the election of electors by the people—stands in Louisiana upon two statutes; not one, but two. There is one statute in the revised code—I do not know where it is printed in this compilation—which is on the question of elections; it makes the provision :

SEC. 1410. That in every year in which an election is to be held for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, such election shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November; and such election shall be held and conducted in the same manner and form provided by law for general and State elections.

That is the general-election law under the revised statutes.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Is that section put in in any of these compilations that we have?

Mr. Representative HURLBUT. I have not been able until a few minutes since to obtain a copy of the compilations, and cannot say.

Mr. Representative HOAR. It is on the ninety-fourth and ninety-fifth pages of the pamphlet with the paper cover.

Mr. Representative HURLBUT. Now there is another law that is in the revised statutes under the title of "Presidential electors" on page 551; it is section 2823. It is simply a repetition of section 1410; and section 2824 proceeds to direct the manner in which they shall vote, and sections 2826 and 2827 and others relate to a special mode of return provided by that revision.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. What is the date of that book on the title-page?

Mr. Representative HURLBUT. This volume is the Revised Statutes of Louisiana of 1870 that I am quoting from.

I apprehend that in considering the effect of statutes that are claimed to repeal the one or the other, the first question is what the probable intent and meaning of the legislature was. No man pretends that it was the probable intent and meaning of the legislature of Louisiana at any time, that it was their purpose, to repeal the right of the people to cast their votes for electors of President and Vice-President. Why? Because it is inconsistent with the actual state of things that has prevailed since that time, for there has been a presidential election held since that, held in 1872, and held by this same process of voting by the people. There has been a presidential election held in 1876, and held in the same manner and by the same process of ascertaining the choice of the people in this matter of the appointment of electors. So the construction to be derived by the usage of the Government itself is against the theory of repeal.

Besides, there comes in another great principle of interpretation, that subsequent laws repeal only so much of the preceding law as is inconsistent with the one to be enacted; and hence it has been held in practice in Louisiana, and undoubtedly is the clear law of the case, that the repealing act of 1872 creating this returning-board only interfered with the act in regard to presidential electors so far as to do away with the special tribunal provided under the former act, and to submit that election as all other elections held in the State to the arbitrament and determination of this board of returning-officers.

Now, I may perhaps be pardoned in saying that whatever may be the amplitude of the power committed by these statutes under the will of the people of Louisiana to this board of returning-officers, whatever may be the peril (and I can see it) of giving so large a jurisdiction to any board, the thing which was behind it, the cause of the enactment, is infinitely worse and deserves the condemnation of every man who loves his country or believes in the right of the down-trodden and the oppressed; for I say here from some knowledge of the fact and close investigation, that the history of Louisiana since reconstruction has been nothing more nor less than a series of deliberate attempts to overthrow existing law by force. The old Anglo-Saxon method by which existing evils are corrected in the form of law never seems to have entered into the imagination of that hot-headed, rash, and impetuous people. They have adopted rather the Latin form that their neighborhood to Mexico brings about, sending pronunciamientos of revolution followed up by confiscation and forced loans on the commerce and interests of the country to support an illegal and irregular armed force in breaking down that which the Constitution and the laws have given to the people of that State; and therefore the board, with all its powers, came into existence.

The mode in which that board may have discharged its duties, the detail, if you please, of the various steps which it took to acquaint itself with the condition of the various parishes, all these things are evidence aliunde, outside; and the simple and direct proposition is made by the objectors upon the other side that this Commission shall resolve itself into a tribunal to try the question who did vote and who did not vote yonder at every poll in Louisiana. You cannot rest upon ex parte testimony taken by a congressional commission; for although I have the honor to be a member of one branch of Congress, my experience is that, of all tribunals or pretended tribunals that ever were gotten up by the ingenuity of man for the purpose of inquiring into political questions, there is not any so likely to be unfair and to do injustice as a congressional committee. It is necessarily so. Look at the time. Does this Commission expect to read several thousand pages of the results of the so-called investigation held by the committee of which I had the honor to be a member, down in Louisiana? There are only four thousand pages printed. The other three thousand will be printed when your printer gets money enough. You cannot read intelligently the mass that is there within the time that lies between now and the 4th of March. You cannot take the synopsis of any gentleman as the existing fact in the case. You have no right to do so. If you undertake to try, you must try by law, and as the law prescribes. This tribunal, at all events, it is to be trusted and believed, will not suffer itself to be the mere vehicle of wholesale and continuous slander against men, and giving them no opportunity for rebuttal or explanation.

So much for the idea of opening up this entire matter, passing into the reasons which guided the returning-board, passing behind their judgment as given and recorded under the forms of law in pursuance of the constitution of their State and the power granted to them by this legislature. You are asked to pass behind all that and inquire. Well, if you undertake to do that, you will do what the supreme court of the State of Louisiana has declined to do; for the supreme court of that State has decided—I read from the case of Collin vs. Knoblock, 25 Louisiana Annual Reports, page 265 :

The returns made by a legal State board and officially promulgated—

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. When was that decision given?

Mr. Representative HURLBUT. In March, 1873.

To determine the validity of a commission, they cannot, under this act, go beyond the returns and report of the legal returning-officers for all the elections of the State. The returns made by a legal State board and officially promulgated by that board as the general returning-officers for the State at large, constitute the basis upon which the governor is authorized to issue commissions. These returns are, by the act of 16th March, 1870, made "prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers until set aside after a contest according to law of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected."

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. What was the nature of that action ?

Mr. Representative HURLBUT. An action under their statute for intrusion into office.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Was it not, therefore, in the nature of a quo warranto ?

Mr. Representative HURLBUT. It is a modified form of quo warranto.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Who gave the opinion there ?

Mr. Representative HURLBUT. The opinion was given by Judge Taliaferro. The same opinion is repeated in other cases which I do not desire now to take up the time of the Commission in quoting, as a reference to them will be printed.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Has that case reference to an election conducted under the act of 1870 or under the act of 1872 ?

Mr. Representative HURLBUT. This is a case in which they decide, as of course they had to do, that the election of November, 1872, was governed by the law of 1870, a proposition which seems so self-evident that I hardly thought it would require the decision of a court, inasmuch as an act approved fourteen days after an election takes place could not, I think, anywhere outside of Louisiana, be claimed to have anything to do with the election that took place fourteen days before.

Thus the supreme court of the State itself, as regards its own local elections, has decided that the returns made by this board and required by the law to be filed with the secretary of state, and also required to be promulgated by publication in the newspapers, are the evidence on which the governor gives commissions to all officers of the State, and that those returns and declarations are prima facie evidence which can only be gone behind in a judicial trial touching the right to hold and enjoy office. I apprehend that the case here is somewhat analogous to that. I apprehend that this Commission is not sitting, nor can it sit, as a judicial tribunal, to try which of the two gentlemen named for President has actually been elected, which is entitled to hold and enjoy the office. You are not sitting as a judicial tribunal for that; you are sitting to determine what, on the regular mode of authorization established by each State according to its own act and pleasure under a delegated right in the Constitution, appears. Is there any end to the inquiry if the other view be taken ? Is there any possibility of ever deciding this question of the presidential election that occurred last fall ? Is it not manifestly not only contrary to law, but impossible in fact, that this immense mass of allegations pro and con can be gone into ? Where are you to stop ?

My friend, Mr. Jenks, I recollect, was very pointed in his remarks about an innocent person of the name of Clover, who acted as supervisor of the parish of East Baton Rouge; and, in order to show that Mr. Tilden got the votes of Louisiana, he proposed to this Commission, as a matter of proof, that this man once kept a snake-show, or was a roper-in for a snake-show, as he called him. Will the Commission inform me whether that is a traversable fact that we can take issue with ? If so, every other allegation connected with this matter, all these points that are made, some under the law, some under a misconception of the law, require evidence; they are to be sustained by testimony pro and con, and I confess that on deliberate study of the law which organized this Commission I do not know any means that this Commission has of testimony on these questions, or to compel its production, or to judge of its validity.

Now, all this is simply a repetition—and I am glad of it—on a modified and far more respectable scale before this tribunal, of the utterances with which we have been favored for the last four weeks in direct prejudgment of the whole question that is submitted to this tribunal; and I deeply regret that the echo of those utterances, bad enough and ill enough even in the license of debate in deliberative bodies, should come within this hall whose memories are all sanctified by adherence to great principles of justice, and most of all I regret that the speech of my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Jenks] should have closed with a style of warning to this Commission that amounted to an implied menace. That sort of thing may do yonder in Louisiana, where the physical force and organized deviltry of a whole race are on the one side, and God and the law and a clear majority of humble American citizens are on the other; but it is infinitely bad taste that here, catching his inspiration from his clients, he should venture to attempt to bulldoze this Commission. I pray you, gentlemen, to do simply what I know you will do, and what you need no prayers from me to do, pass upon this question, not in obedience to any popular clamor got up by self-interest and repeated time after time by a ribald press, but determine this question on your oaths according to the tenor of the Constitution and the law, and the event will justify the confidence that all sound and well-judging men repose in the integrity and the stern purpose of duty of the Commission itself.

Mr. Senator HOWE. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission: I am somewhat mortified, I confess, coming to the discharge of the duty which has been assigned me, of saying something in support of objection No. 4, to find how very small a thing it is in comparison with this volume of objections which has been urged on the other side. It is a very small piece of paper to put in here. I feel bound to say of it as, I believe, Mercurio said of his sword-cut, that it really is not as capacious as a well, but I am inclined to think " 'twill serve." We respectfully object that you shall not count the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States tendered here by John McEnery and Robert C. Wickliffe and by their associates, any of them, for this reason, to begin with: You have no evidence before you, none whatever, that either of those was ever appointed as directed by the legislature of Louisiana to vote for President and Vice-President of the United States. You ought to have some evidence before you receive those votes, ought you not? The statute—not of Louisiana, but the statute of the United States—commands that you should seek for and should find their authority so to vote, certified to you by the governor of that State. Can you dispense with that evidence, substitute anything else for it? It is conceded all about me on all these papers that no man can have his vote counted for President and Vice-President of the United States unless his right so to vote is certified by the governor of the State. Those gentlemen who urge you to accept the votes tendered here by McEnery and Wickliffe do not seek to derogate from the authority of the statute of the United States nor to dodge it at all; their effort is, you find, to elevate John McEnery himself to the dignity of governor of Louisiana; and so you find him certifying, as governor of that State, to the authority of that board of electors at the head of which you find his own name. There is a practical difficulty which imperils the success of that effort, and it is this: John McEnery was not in November last, he never was, governor of Louisiana. How do we know that? Simply because we are rational beings, and, as such, we are bound to know it. We may be ignorant of a great many things in this world, and we are, God knows; but there is one thing of which we are not permitted to be ignorant. We are bound to know who is the governor of a State in this Union; and being bound to know that no State can have more than one governor, when we come to know who that man is, then we know that all the rest of God's beings are not.

But I do not content myself merely with the proposition that we are bound to take, as I believe the lawyers say, judicial notice of who is the governor of a State; a sort of notice that every man must take, no matter whether he be judge, or statesman, or citizen, a lighterman on the Atlantic coast or a lumberman in the forests of Michigan. I say we are not only bound to take this sort of notice, but every one of you sitting there has helped to give notice, has served notice on the world that John McEnery was not governor of Louisiana and that William Pitt Kellogg was. So many of you as occupy seats there and who belong to the Senate of the United States have often seen this signature of John McEnery attached to the credentials of some aspiring citizen of that State knocking for admission to the Senate; but you never have opened your doors to any such demand. So many of you as belong to the other House of this National Legislature have seen that same name appended to the credentials of those who asked to be admitted to the deliberations of that body, and you have uniformly turned them away and said, "We do not know you, John McEnery." I do not know that in the character of governor he has ever appeared before the Supreme Court of the United States; but another man has appeared before that court, has been impleaded before it as the governor of Louisiana, and judgment has been given in that court upon the issue there formed. The justices of that court will remember the case to which I refer. I think it is the Board of Liquidation vs. McComb. So that you have all in your several capacities been called upon directly to pass judgment upon this pretended governor and have all given judgment against him. When a committee of one House of Congress went to Louisiana a few years ago and undertook to compose that State by compiling a government for it, no such calico as John McEnery got into that patch-work; another man was recognized as the governor then and there.

And yet that man comes here again, now in these last days, and undertakes to certify to the right of men to vote for President and Vice-President of the United States in the name of Louisiana. I have heard something said here in this presence this morning about fraud and corruption. Do you know, have you heard, of any indication of fraud anywhere or in anybody so bald and palpable as this of John McEnery's attempting to pass himself off, not only upon this high Commission, but upon the nation itself, as governor of Louisiana? Very cunning men, I know, sometimes attempt to pass and do pass upon business men spurious notes as genuine, and you take it as the trick of a knave, to be sure, but of a smart knave. What would you say of a man who should bring to a bank of issue a note pretending that it was manufactured on its own plates, but which had actually been stamped "counterfeit" by half the receiving tellers in the United States, and offer that as genuine to the bank from which it purported to be issued? You would not say that was the effort of a smart knave, would you? But here this man comes again, this man whose pretensions, as I say, have been repudiated just as often as they have been thrust forward; he comes in here once more, once again, with all the sprightliness and vivacity with which a half eagle is thrown out that has just come from the mint. "Here we come again, sirs," he says, "Governor John Mc-Enery, of Louisiana." No, Mr. President, no; I think I will not spend more time on Mr. John McEnery.

I said you have determined that another man was governor of Louisiana, William Pitt Kellogg. For good or for ill, for four years past, William Pitt Kellogg has presided over that State as its governor, recognized as such both by the legislative and judicial departments of that State, recognized expressly as such by the Senate of the United States, more than once by the Senate, recognized expressly as such by the House of Representatives when the pretensions of both men, Kellogg and McEnery, were before the House, one certifying that Spencer was entitled to a seat, and another certifying that Morey was entitled to a seat. This House of Representatives said: "We know Kellogg; we do not know McEnery; therefore Morey shall take his seat in the House and Spencer must stand back." The President more than once has recognized him. He is the man who has signed the enactments of the legislature of Louisiana, or he has refused to sign them. If he has approved them, they became laws; if he has vetoed them, they did not become laws unless passed in spite of his veto. He has granted pardons or he has refused to grant pardons; and almost ten millions of the bonds of Louisiana bearing his signature are afloat to-day in the money-markets of the world. Kellogg, I think, will pass here, as elsewhere through creation, as the governor of Louisiana in November last; and he tells you who were the constituted electors of that State, appointed in accordance with the directions of the legislature, to vote for that State in the choice of a President and Vice-President. Do you want more evidence? Can you contradict that? That is the very evidence which our statute tells you to look for, and all it tells you to look for.

I know the Constitution says that each State shall appoint a prescribed number of electors in any such way as the legislature of the State shall direct, and perhaps you may feel authorized to go a little back of this certificate of the governor of a State in order to see whether he has acted in accord with the direction of the legislature or has not. In other words, even if the statute of the United States does not have respect to the authority of the legislature as clearly as it ought, you are bound to keep your eyes upon the legislature of the State and see what it has done, see if it has told the governor he may say what he has said or if he has said something which the legislature did not permit him to say. If you feel called upon to make that inquiry, just one step behind the certificate of the governor you will find that certain officers created by the laws of Louisiana for canvassing the vote given by the people of that State at the election in November last, declared that those people voted, a majority of them, for the electoral ticket headed by Kellogg and Burch, and a minority of them, alone, voted for the ticket headed by McEnery and Wickliffe. You find that board by the law of that State directly instructed to canvass the votes given at all elections and to declare the result of them. "The returning-officers of the State," they are called, and the statute of the State tells you in the most unqualified terms that their determination, when made and promulgated, is prima facie evidence of the right of every man to hold office whose right is so determined by their certificate; and if the statute had not said so, you know such would have been the effect of their certificate and is in law the effect of every such certificate given by every similar board in every State we have in the Union.

Will you then go further than this in that direction? The governor of the State has told you who were the electors of the State, and going back you find he has spoken upon the authority of the returning-officers of that State, the only tribunal known to its laws which can inform the executive by authority what has been the result of an election. Will you go further back? I heard you just now rather affectionately invited to go back further still. I think it was intimated that if you would go still further back, behind the certificate of the governor, and behind the certificate of the returning-officers, some impressive testimony would be laid before you. I am aware, and I ought to say in passing, out of respect to those who have urged that view, that objections are taken to the legal character of this board as it was constituted in November. I thought to spend some time on those objections. I had really taken the trouble to look into some law-books and read some adjudications, and thought I would offer to this Commission some authorities on the subject; but I shall spare myself any such labor and you any such infliction. I see those who are to follow me and I know they will suffer no jot, no tittle of the law to fail. If they do, it is because they have lost their grip, for they have been masters of the law for many years. I think I may be saved some trouble by letting the counsel in this case do the very easy thing, as I think it is, of giving you the constitutional view of that returning-board.

I said that I had heard you rather earnestly entreated to open these seals which are claimed to close in the certificate of the returning-officers and the certificate of the governor of the State, to break those seals, and to go back and listen to what can be proved to you if you will be good enough to listen not only to what all the lawyers in the United States may urge, but to what all the citizens of Louisiana may see fit to swear. I do not undertake to tell you by authority precisely what you would find if you were to throw those doors wide open. I think I can give you a lively hint of what you will find. I have myself been making, under the instructions of the Senate of the United States, some inquiries in that direction.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Hurlbut] who just addressed you was pleased to say that, judging from his experience, a legislative investigation was the poorest instrumentality he knew of for arriving at the truth. If I might be allowed to refer to my own very limited experience, it would not corroborate that of the gentleman to whom I have just referred. A committee of the Senate went to Louisiana. It represented both political opinions which are found in that body, and they went there instructed to ascertain, if they could, whether the right of suffrage in that State had been abridged in any way either by fraud or by force, either by excluding votes from the ballot-box or by refusing to count the votes illegally after they had been deposited in the ballot-box. We did investigate these questions so far as a portion of the State was concerned; we spent all the time we had and all the money the two Houses would furnish us, not by way of an ex parte inquiry, by any manner of means. We took up parish after parish; and when we had entered upon the examination of one parish we did not quit that until we supposed we had every fact concerning it which witnesses could establish before us, not witnesses called on one side, but called on both sides. I know that one political opinion was represented by the larger number of members on that committee; but I believe that when that committee closed its labors a majority of the witnesses who had been sworn in that whole examination—I do not assert this as a fact, but I believe that a majority of those who had been sworn had been called by the minority of that committee.

The first parish of which we made inquiry happened to be the parish of Ouachita, which is on the river of that name almost classic in our history. It was upon that river, I believe, that Blennerhassett and Burr made their purchase of the Baron de Bastrop, whose appellation gives name to the shire town of the adjoining parish; and I think I shall venture to tell the Commission something of what we discovered touching the election in Ouachita Parish.

You have heard it said here, that those returning-officers did not count the votes which were actually cast by the voters of Louisiana at the last election, did not canvass them at all, rejected some from their count. How do you know that? Louisiana has not told you that. They say they will prove it to you if you will be good enough to step behind both the certificate of the governor and the certificate of the returning-officers. Possibly; but as yet you do not know that. Counsel say it is so. I agree with them, it is so; but then it is not Louisiana tells you; it is only what we tell you. You are good enough to hear us argue; I trust you will be altogether too good to hear us testify. Perhaps we are entitled to some consideration while we are merely reasoning; when we come to state facts, to very little. But while you are told that these returning-officers rejected votes that were cast, you may have been told, you can be if you open the statutes of that State, that that board was not only authorized to reject such votes upon certain conditions, but that the statute expressly commanded it. It is said here that certain steps must be taken by the commissioners of election or by the parish supervisors in order to give to that tribunal jurisdiction to reject votes. I wanted to speak upon that, but I leave that to those who shall come after me.

They did reject certain votes. I concede it. The statute told them in express terms that if they were convinced there was not in a given parish or in a given precinct within a parish a fair election, that either fraud or force was employed so as materially to change the result of the election, they should exclude from count the vote of that precinct or of that parish. They did reject portions or the whole of twenty-two parishes. Portions or the whole of seventeen parishes were rejected upon the ground of intimidation, which these returning-officers said they found satisfactorily proved to them.

I have noticed in certain quarters a disposition to ridicule this idea that voters can be induced by intimidation and fear to withhold the vote they want to give, much less made to give the vote they do not want to give; and it does seem a little incredible to a free citizen of the United States in the habit of opening his mouth and lifting his hand on all occasions freely, to believe that such results can be wrought by intimidation. After all, in the light of history, no such incredulity becomes us. We know that Henry of Navarre and his cousin the Prince of Condé were, through intimidation, induced to abjure the Protestant faith. We know that Galileo on his knees promised, under the influence of fear, that he never again would teach the doctrine of the earth's motion. And we know that one of the chiefest of the apostles, moved by fear, swore that he never knew his own Master, that Saviour whom we all make believe now to adore. If great soldiers and great scientists and great apostles can be forced by fear to abjure cherished convictions, are we permitted to doubt that the poor and ignorant freedman of Louisiana may be compelled by fear, either to withhold his vote from the ballot-box or to put a vote therein which he does not choose to put in?

Then again, this theory is assailed by those who speak on behalf of Louisiana and say that Louisiana is occupied by respectable men, by Christian men, men who pray and who hear prayer, men who acknowledge their relations to other men and who acknowledge their obligations not only to this world but their relations to that world which is to come. They say it is a foul libel on the fair name of Louisiana to say any such thing; that Louisiana would not permit force or intimidation to be employed. Would she not? Are we sure of that? Was not force, was not fraud ever employed in the history of the world by men as white, by men as chivalrous, by men as decent, by men as Christian as any who occupy Louisiana to-day?

It is not two hundred years since Louis XIV was induced to revoke that edict, the Edict of Nantes, which for something like a hundred years had performed the part in the constitution of the French Empire which we humbly hope the fourteenth amendment will perform yet for the people of the United States, even the blacks of the United States. I say he revoked that edict, and by that revocation he let loose the iron hand of persecution, not on black men, but white men and white women; that iron hand which drove out of France or slaughtered in France more than half a million of Huguenots. Do you think they were monsters who came to that act? The charming Madame de Sévigné clapped her hands in approval of that act of revocation. Bossuet, the most eloquent preacher of his time I suppose, applauded it, and churches stooped to render thanks to the mistress of the king, through whose influence it was believed that revocation was obtained. Has humanity changed so radically and utterly since then?

I need not go outside of Louisiana for an illustration; the known history of Louisiana. All remember the 14th of September, 1874. Louisiana then had a government as regular, as well recognized, as well known to all the people of the United States as New York has to-day, and as respectably filled, I may say, in all its departments. An armed band of men took possession of the streets of New Orleans, the capital of the State; in a moment, almost in the twinkling of an eye, suddenly drove the constituted governor of the State from his seat, and would have driven him out of existence had he not found protection. I know they say that Kellogg was only a make-believe governor. Who says that? Whoever says it in Louisiana or outside of Louisiana is disloyal to the law of Louisiana. All the authority there was in Louisiana said that Kellogg was governor. If he was not the lawful as well as the de facto governor of Louisiana, there was some tribunal in the land which could declare by authority who was. That tribunal was not the White League with arms in their hands to drive him from his office; there should have been an inquisition found of some kind, I think, before the white-leaguers of New Orleans went for him.

I was about to call attention to what took place in January last. It was only a repetition of the same thing. I must pass over it. I wanted to say something to you about what took place in the single parish of Ouachita at the last election, and I must be very brief. Let me introduce Ouachita Parish to you. In 1868 that parish gave for the republican candidate for governor 1,418 votes, and for the democratic candidate but 347. There was a republican majority of 1,071. In 1870 there was a republican majority of 798. In 1872 there was a republican majority of 798, precisely the same figures as two years before. In 1874, but two years ago, there was a republican majority in the parish of 927. In 1876 there were 2,392 colored voters registered, and there were 992 white voters registered; and in November last that parish returned to its supervisor 1,865 democratic votes to 793 republican votes, giving a democratic majority of 1,072, where two years ago there was a republican majority of 927. There are men uncharitable enough in the world to believe that intimidation was employed to produce that result. There are men, on the contrary, who say that intimidation was not employed at all; it was mere solicitation, it was artifice, persuasion, bargaining, and the like. But the campaign in Louisiana started out early in June, started out with a circular issued by Mr. Patton, chairman of the democratic State committee, in which he said—a confidential circular, it is said, and it was so marked; it is denied that it was intended to be confidential; the fact is it did not get to the public until some time in August, through the columns of a republican newspaper—in that circular Mr. Patton informed his friends of various things, and this among others, that the negro could not be reasoned with, but he could be impressed. I do not use his language; it has been often quoted; but one of the methods he recommended for impressing the negro was that they should not only organize themselves into clubs, but that they should mount their clubs, and as frequently as possible they should make processions mounted in order to make a demonstration of their strength.

During the months of July and August, the evidence shows that the white people of Ouachita Parish were organized into clubs, mounted clubs, and they did better than the instructions of the chairman of the democratic central committee. They not only mounted the clubs, but they armed them. The republican party was also organized into clubs, not mounted and not armed; into such political clubs as are organized all over the country. So in that way, during the month of August, the organization of both parties was completed. On the 30th of August, an event took place in that parish which gave a material coloring to the election in that parish. On the 30th of August, Bernard H. Dinkgrave, a white man, a cultivated man, a native Louisianian, a man against whose character no one has breathed a word except that the chairman of the democratic committee for Ouachita Parish said that he was a violent partisan—Bernard H. Dinkgrave was shot down, about four o'clock in the afternoon, going from his office in Monroe to his house just outside of the town. It is said that that was not done for political effect. It has been suggested that the death grew out of a difficulty he had in 1870 with a man by the name of Wemberly, or it grew out of an arrest that he made two years before, when he was sheriff of Ouachita Parish, of a man by the name of Allen.

Upon that single point a great deal of evidence was taken. I must content myself with saying that, weighing the evidence as carefully as I could, I have no more doubt that Bernard H. Dinkgrave was killed for political effect than I have that he was killed at all. But no matter whether he was killed for political effect or not, his death had a political effect. The people of Ouachita Parish, the colored people at all events, believed that he was killed for political effect. Republican effort was paralyzed at once. Another republican meeting was not held in the parish until some time in October, and after troops had been stationed at Monroe; and no meeting I think was held by the republican party afterward, unless troops of the United States were near the place of meeting.

I ought to have preceded this allusion to the death of Dinkgrave by giving an idea of the state of the canvass on the 19th of August. I read from the Vienna Sentinel a letter directed to that newspaper by the editor, written from Monroe, in this parish of Ouachita:

Politics in Ouachita are gaining more attention than at any previous election since 1860. In fact every man, woman, and child seems to have his or her whole soul in the contest. This is encouraging, and a good sign of state of hope in the democratic mind is that there are, or rather were, numerous candidates for parish offices. I say were, because they are now reduced to one candidate for each office, the democrats having held their parish nominating convention on Saturday last. If the democrats are hopeful in this parish, they have good cause to be so. While they present an unbroken front and an admirable organization, the radicals are wavering, disheartened, and scared. There are a few bold, empty-headed orators among the latter who either have not sense enough to appreciate the situation or are willing to draw us on to any extremes in order that their elevation may be secured. It is human nature to admire boldness, but when boldness is united to rascality it is Louisiana's nature to deal summarily with it. These inflammatory spouters, demagogues in the truest sense of the word, are using their best efforts to instill bad principles into the minds of the colored people, and seem to be anxious to precipitate a violent conflict between the two races. Nothing could be further removed from the wishes of the whites of this community; but if anything of the kind should come about, there is a stern resolve that the foolish cat's-paw, the negro, shall not be the only sufferer. The promoters of these murderous principles are well known and well watched, and the halter for their necks is already greased.

That was written on the 8th of August, and it appeared in the Sentinel on the 19th. It appeared in Monroe on the 21st. A witness swore that up to this time only three republicans had taken part in the canvass in that parish. One was this Bernard H. Dinkgrave; one was his nephew, John H. Dinkgrave; one was George B. Hamlet, a colored man and sheriff of the parish. On the 30th of August following this publication in this newspaper, Dinkgrave, one of the three, was assassinated; Hamlet fled to New Orleans; and no further attempts were made to organize or to rally the republican party in that parish until in October following. On the 10th of October another tragic event occurred. I have got to pass over a multitude. I have here among my papers a schedule of eighty-odd different outrages committed upon persons or property, including, I think, five murders; I do not know the number of whippings; I do not know the number of robbings; I must pass over all these; but on the 10th of October another event occurred.

Eaton Logwood, in the broad daylight, was visited by a party of mounted men, was shot, severely wounded. His brother-in-law at the same place and at the same time was shot dead. Either from the influence of these visitations, where red-handed murder traveled at noon-day, or under the influence of the barbecues and the speeches to which we are referred on the other side, there was a very marked effect produced upon the colored population of Ouachita Parish. A great number of them had been induced up to that time to join democratic clubs. Great numbers of them had not been induced to join democratic clubs even up to that time; but a letter I wanted to refer to, but must pass by, written to one of the organs of the party in New Orleans, and written from Monroe later in October, spoke quite hopefully of the result; said they could not calculate it accurately; it was liable to a great many contingencies and accidents; but that already a great many colored men had joined their clubs and they were inclined to think would stick. But two difficulties were still in the way. There were still a great many colored men who had not joined their clubs, and there was not absolute certainty that those who had joined would stick. For these or other reasons a demonstration seemed to be thought necessary, and that demonstration was made on the Saturday night before the election, which took place on Tuesday.

On that night the house of one Abraham Williams was visited by a party of mounted disguised men, and he was taken from his bed and his house, and he was stripped, and he was whipped brutally. He was a man sixty years old. The house of his son was visited the same night and unquestionably by the same party. He was sleeping in a cotton-field, not daring to sleep under his own roof, and not finding him his wife was taken out of the house and she was whipped. The house of Willis Frazier was visited on the same night and undoubtedly by the same party of men, mounted men, disguised men, and he was taken out from his house and he was whipped brutally. The house of Randall Driver was visited, and he had been admonished over and over again by democrats that he was exposing himself to peril. On this night his house was visited and he was taken out and whipped. The house of Henry Pinkston was visited and he was killed, and his child was killed, and his wife was nearly killed.

I see that I cannot stop to dwell upon any one of these cases. I can speak of the effects produced in a moment. While speeches and barbecues were the order of the day, Willis Frazier, Alexander Williams, Abraham Williams, Henry Pinkston, and Randall Driver had not joined democratic clubs. The Tuesday after they were whipped three of these men went submissively to the polls and voted the democratic ticket. Henry Pinkston did not go to the polls on that day; he had settled his accounts with the world. Randall Driver did go to the polls. Whipped till he could not stand, he had his wife anoint his body, his sores, with kerosene oil and lay him out before the fire on a cot, and there he lay till morning, and then he told his wife to help him on to a chair; he told his wife to help him on with his clothes; he told his wife to help him to his stick; and when she asked him where he was going he said he was going to Monroe to vote "dat" ticket if it took him three days to get there, and he started, and he did get to Monroe. He reached it in the afternoon of Tuesday, and he did vote the republican ticket, and he was the only man visited that night who did. Knowing that they could not vote at any other polls than those in Monroe, the negroes, so many of them as had not been forced into democratic clubs, made up their minds to make their way to Monroe, and to vote there; and against that poor privilege there was an organized effort made. The mayor of the town issued a proclamation to those who had come in to leave, and rifle-clubs picketed the highways leading into the city of Monroe to keep men who had not come in from coming in.

The election was held, and the next step was to get affidavits that the election had been fair.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. Mr. Howe, before you pass to that point, will you be good enough to say whether the facts you have narrated were found to be such by the united report of the committee, or was there a difference of opinion?

Mr. Senator HOWE. There has been no report of the committee. I am stating the impressions the evidence made on my mind—evidence not introduced by one party only. In this very parish of Ouachita, I think forty-eight witnesses were sworn on the part of the republicans and forty-nine witnesses were sworn on the part of the democrats.

But these are my views of the testimony, that I am giving you, and nobody else's. I have only spoken, and briefly spoken, of some very few of the incidents which transpired in a single parish. I shall not allude to any other parish; but I want to submit to the Commission one table which I think is quite suggestive of what would be ascertained if there was a careful examination made of every parish, as was made of this one and of several other parishes.

There are seventeen parishes, as I remarked to the Commission, from which votes were excluded upon the ground of intimidation. In those seventeen parishes there was a white vote registered of 20,320; there was a colored vote registered of 27,269. The colored registration was in a majority in those seventeen parishes, in which the returning-officers said intimidation was employed, of 6,949. In the other forty parishes of the State there was a colored registration of 87,899 and a white registration of 72,034, leaving a colored majority of 15,965. In those forty parishes where no intimidation is alleged the result of the vote I give you. Kellogg's vote in those forty parishes was 65,747 and McEnery's vote was 59,392. Where intimidation is not alleged, in forty parishes, a colored registration of 15,965 majority yields a republican majority on the vote of over 6,000; but in the seventeen parishes where intimidation is alleged the result is very different. One would suppose that, if a colored registered majority of 15,000, where the election is fair, yields a republican majority of nearly 7,000, a colored registered majority of 6,949 would yield some republican majority. On the contrary, in those seventeen parishes 21,123 votes were returned for the democratic ticket and but 10,970 for the republican ticket, making a democratic majority of 10,153 in the seventeen parishes.

I see that I have exceeded my time.

The PRESIDENT. There were seven minutes extended to Mr. Jenks and I proposed to extend the same to you, so that you have a minute or two more. When the time is extended to one side, I always extend it to the other.

Mr. Senator HOWE. I will occupy that minute in stating that I am clear upon the point that in those parishes where you hear so much complaint that votes were rejected from the count, notwithstanding the rejection the democratic ticket has a larger comparative vote in those parishes than it had in the same parishes two years ago.

I close with one other reflection. I remember, and you have not forgotten, how you were invoked just now to exert all the authority you have or could find to save the nation from drinking waters from these filthy pools which it is said are concocted there by the political tricksters who manage politics in Louisiana. I make no such appeal to this Commission. I ask this Commission to listen to the lawful voice of Louisiana as it would listen to the lawful voice of any other State. Give weight to it. Hear it. There is more than one foul stream to be found in the State of Louisiana. That to which you have been pointed may be dirty. Coming right from that State, I know of other and larger streams which are not merely dirty, but are very bloody. I would be glad if in this tribunal or in any there was power to say that only pure water should run anywhere; but the power does not reside in any human tribunal. I want your streams all purified as soon as it can be done. If you can aid in that direction, cleanse the bloody before you attempt the muddy streams.

The PRESIDENT. Who are the counsel in support of the objection to certificates Nos. 1 and 3?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Trumbull, and myself.

The PRESIDENT. Who are the counsel in support of the objection to certificate No. 2?

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. Stoughton, Mr. Shellabarger, and myself.

The PRESIDENT. Three on each side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would ask, may the Commission please, that the time be extended. I understand that there is an allowance of three hours. I would ask permission that the time be extended to six hours for either side, and I would state the reason—

Mr. PRESIDENT. Excuse me a moment. By the rule the allowance is two hours on each side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We ask for six hours on a side, twelve hours in all. The Commission must perceive that on the objections which have been presented, probably every question that can ever arise under the existing laws of the United States and its present Constitution will come up for the examination of this Commission. It comprehends nearly everything that can probably take place in a presidential election and be the cause of any question. Under such circumstances it seems to me that a full and frank discussion ought to be permitted and a sufficient time allowed in order that that discussion may be made.

The PRESIDENT. Would not four hours on a side possibly answer your purpose?

Mr. CAMPBELL. My friends think not.

Mr. EVARTS. On our part, Mr. President, we had supposed that the instruction given to counsel already by the determination of the Commission as announced upon the discussions heretofore had in the Florida case had greatly reduced the possible area of discussion; that the principal and preliminary considerations common to all the cases in the nature of the reach and effect of evidence had already been passed upon; and that we certainly should have no occasion to ask more than the time of an hour for each counsel. We shall submit to your honors' direction in that regard.

Mr. CARPENTER. The court will pardon a suggestion. The great difficulty in arguing this case is to determine in the first place what statute law was in force when the election was held in Louisiana. That requires an examination of a great many statutes and is a question of great intricacy. Then the other questions arising in the case are, as we understand them, totally different from the questions arising in the Florida case. Of course the learned counsel on the other side will not be compelled to speak six hours; it is only permission, not compulsion; and if they do not think it necessary, of course they will not avail themselves of the privilege. But regarding this as the most important case ever heard in this country, regarding it as a case in which the attempt is made to disfranchise 10,000 legal voters of a State, we submit that to ask twelve hours' hearing on 10,000 disfranchisements is not an unreasonable request.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Mr. President, I move you that the time be extended to six hours on each side, as desired. I think it is very much more important that we should have all these questions, which are so numerous and so very important, discussed fully than to shorten the time and not have all the light there is on them that can possibly be given.

The PRESIDENT. The motion submitted by Judge Abbott is that the time for discussion be extended to six hours on a side.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I move to amend by making it four hours on each side.

The PRESIDENT. Do you move to strike out "six" and insert "four"?

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. President, the questions of the character to which Mr. Carpenter alluded, of the existing laws of the State of Louisiana, can certainly be discussed with great convenience upon printed briefs. Counsel have the fullest opportunity to submit printed briefs in addition to their oral arguments. It does not seem to me that there is any case made for any extension whatever.

Mr. CARPENTER. Pardon me a suggestion. If this court could hear on printed briefs and settle that question so that we should know—

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I do not think counsel should take part in the discussions of the tribunal after they have been heard.

The PRESIDENT. I presume not. The matter is now between members of the tribunal.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I move that this Commission take a recess for thirty minutes,

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I think we can afford to sit here later at night for the purpose of having this matter fairly and fully discussed.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Edmunds moves that the Commission take a recess for thirty minutes. I must regard that as preceding the other question, as it may be for the purpose of consultation. The question is on the motion that there be a recess for thirty minutes.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I will say until half past four; that will be three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. Commissioner FIELD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 4; as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Clifford, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, Strong, and Thurman—11.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Field, Hunton, and Payne—4.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Commission (at three o'clock and forty-seven minutes p. m.) took a recess until four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

The Commission re-assembled at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

The PRESIDENT. The Commission has decided to allow four and a half hours for argument on each side. The Commission has also voted to continue the session to-night until nine o'clock.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. I move that the recess be continued half an hour longer.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes) the Commission took a recess until five o'clock and five minutes p. m.

The Commission re-assembled at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the court please, of the four and a half hours' time assigned to each side, if the court will permit it, we ask indulgence to be allowed to make an argument for an hour or so upon these laws and upon the general question which the case involves before offering our evidence; of course with the distinct understanding that we are not closing the case, but that we are opening preparatory to offering our proof.

The PRESIDENT. Occupying a portion of the four hours and a half?

Mr. CARPENTER. Whatever time we take of course to come out of our four hours and a half.

The PRESIDENT. I see no objection to that. If no objection be made, that may be understood.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, and gentlemen of the Electoral Commission: Permit me to state in the outset why I appear here. It is not because Mr. Tilden was my choice for President; nor is my judgment in this case at all affected by friendship for him as a man, for I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with him. I voted against him on the 7th of November last, and if this tribunal could order a new election I should vote against him again; believing as I do that the accession of the democratic party to power at this time would be the greatest calamity that could befall our country, except one, and that one greater calamity would be to keep them out by falsehood and fraud. I appear here professionally, to assert, and if possible, establish the rights of ten thousand legal voters of Louisiana, who, without accusation or proof, indictment or trial, notice or hearing, have been disfranchised by four persons incorporated with perpetual succession, under the name and style of "The returning-board of Louisiana." I appear, also, in the interest of the next republican candidate for President, whoever he may be, to insist that this tribunal shall settle principles by which, if we carry Wisconsin for him by 10,000 majority, as I hope we may, no canvassing-board, by fraud, or induced by bribery, shall be able to throw the vote of that State against him and against the voice and will of our people.

I beg your honors to pause a moment and consider the lesson to be taught to the politicians of this country by this day's work. This is no ordinary occasion, no ordinary tribunal, no ordinary cause. An emergency has arisen which has induced Congress to create a tribunal never before known in this country; a tribunal composed of whatever is most distinguished for integrity, for learning, for judicial and legislative experience, to conduct the nation through a great crisis. Your decision will stand as a landmark in the history of this country. Prior to the election in November last the question was, who ought to be elected. That was purely a political question, and every voter was bound to support the candidate whose election would, in his judgment, best promote the public good. Since the election the question has been, not who ought to be elected, but who in fact was elected; and that is the question the determination of which you are to aid. Before that election no honest man could have supported the candidate he thought ought not to be elected. Since that election no honest man can refuse his support to the one he believes to have been elected. And you have all taken an oath to decide the matters submitted to you—not according to your political preferences, nor in the interest of any political party—but impartially and according to the Constitution and laws.

The case, as we offer to establish it, by evidence entirely satisfactory in the popular sense and conclusive in the legal sense, is this: At the general election in the State of Louisiana on the 7th day of November last, the Tilden electors received of the votes cast for electors about 8,000 majority. This is conceded. The questions upon which the case must turn arise out of proceedings subsequent to the election. By the general election law of that State, (clearly unconstitutional, but at present concede its validity—not applicable to this election, as we shall contend hereafter, but at present concede its applicability, so as to state the case most strongly against ourselves,) it is provided that whenever the return from any poll or voting-place shall be accompanied by a certain statement, in the form provided by the act, supported by the oaths of three citizens, that riot, violence, intimidation, bribery, &c., materially affected the result at such poll or voting-place, the returning-board may inquire into the facts, and if they find it so, they may exclude all the votes given at such poll or voting-place. But the fact is, as we will prove by the returns themselves, that not a single return was accompanied by this statement, which alone confers upon the returning-board the jurisdiction to exclude votes. The reason is obvious. There was no riot, intimidation, tumult, or bribery at the election in question. The election machinery was in the hands of republicans. The State administration was republican. Every sheriff, every deputy sheriff, every constable, every police-officer, every supervisor of registration, and every commissioner of election, and many thousand special officers appointed and charged with the duty of guarding the freedom and purity of the election—every one was a republican appointee. And back of them stood the Federal administration and the Army and Navy of the United States. Yet, not an arrest was made throughout the State for riot, intimidation, or bribery committed on that day. And it is not alleged that even a knock-down occurred in the State on that day. But the returning-board, without the semblance of jurisdiction, threw out about 10,000 Tilden votes, and declared the Hayes electors elected by about 2,000 majority. We shall offer to prove that this proceeding of the returning-board was not erroneous merely, not the result of inadvertence or mistake, or error of judgment; but that it was willful, fraudulent, and corrupt.

Again, we shall offer to prove that of the Hayes electors thus fraudulently declared to have been elected, two, Brewster and Levissee, were on the day of the election holding offices of trust and profit under the Government of the United States. The Constitution of the United States, Art. II, sec. 1, provides that—

No Senator, or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

Another of the Hayes electors was William Pitt Kellogg, governor of the State, both on election-day and on the 6th day of December when he sat in the electoral college and cast a vote for Mr. Hayes; and three others, both on election-day and when they voted in the electoral college, were holding other salaried offices under the State government. The constitution of the State of Louisiana, Art. 147, declares—

No person shall at the same time hold more than one office, except that of justice of the peace and notary public.

Therefore, if electors are to be considered as Federal officers, two of the Hayes electors in this college were constitutionally incapable of being electors; and if they are State officers, then four others were constitutionally incapable of being electors.

And William Pitt Kellogg, as governor, certified that he, himself, Brewster, Levissee, and associates, had been duly appointed electors; and they met on the appointed day as an electoral college and cast their votes for Mr. Hayes. The Tilden electors, McEnery and others, who received a majority of the votes cast at the election, but were counted out by the returning-board and were refused a certificate by the governor, met on the same day and cast their votes for Mr. Tilden. Both bodies, each claiming to be the electoral college of that State, have certified their proceedings to the President of the Senate as required by the constitution.

This being the case, the two Houses of Congress, whose duty it is to count the votes for President and Vice-President, and who must ascertain which are the electoral votes of that State before they can be counted, find themselves confronted with several important questions:

(1.) Whether the Hayes electors, who were not elected, but were counted in; or the Tilden electors, who were elected, but were counted out, constitute the legal electoral college of that State;

(2.) And in case the Hayes electoral college is held to have a better title, founded upon false certificates without votes, than the Tilden college with the votes but without certificates; whether Levissee and Brewster, two electors in the Hayes college, were duly appointed; and

(3.) Whether conceding that the Hayes electors were not duly appointed, and that Levissee and Brewster were incapable of appointment, yet having received the official certificates of election, and having in fact acted—whether their votes should be counted, upon the principle that the acts of officers de facto but not de jure are binding upon the public and third persons?

The two Houses have referred these questions to this Commission for an opinion, after which the two Houses must pass finally upon the matter.

The importance of the opinion you shall give upon these questions cannot be exaggerated. If you shall say of the Hayes electors, for instance, that although they were actually defeated by the people by eight thousand majority, and although two of them were forbidden by the Constitution of the United States to be electors, and four others were so forbidden by the constitution of the State, yet having been counted in by fraud, and having in fact acted, although in violation of express constitutional provision, State and Federal, they were duly appointed, and their votes must be accepted, you will thereby declare that a fraud is as good as a majority and that the Constitution of the Union and of every State may be violated in the methods of a presidential election without affecting the result; and you might as well write out a full license for the perpetration of all the frauds which ingenuity can suggest or self-interest induce.

Since the last election the democrats have been and now are in possession of Florida. Say to them, by your decision in this case, that no matter what frauds are committed by a canvassing-board, this high tribunal will take no notice of them, and if you cannot, neither can the two Houses of Congress, for you have all the power of each House and of both Houses in that behalf; and if the democratic returning and certifying officers of that State do not, in the next campaign, certify 10,000 democratic majority, without regard to the fact, it will be because they have not profited by the lesson you will have taught them. If a governor can certify that an elector has been duly appointed who did not receive a vote, and that, upon the certificate of a returning-board, bribed or coerced to certify a falsehood—a falsehood known to both Houses of Congress from investigations carried on through their respective committees—a falsehood boasted of by its perpetrators and known of all men, who is so hopeful as to believe that there ever will be another President elected by anything but fraud? Why go through with all the tremendous labor of a political campaign; why send your orators upon the stump, and spend thousands of dollars in circulating documents to convince the people that a certain candidate ought to be elected, when you, with a third of that money, can bribe a canvassing-board, and carry an election without a vote?

Your honors will see I am not overstating the case contended for by our opponents. The fraud mentioned would be greater in degree, but not different in character, from the one which is now before you for consideration, and I ought to apologize for saying, for your approval. You are expected to say to the politicians and caucus managers of the country, "No matter what frauds you commit, no matter how glaring and damnable, we see nothing;" as the German colonel, when he went with a regiment from Illinois into Alabama said to the boys, "Now, boys, I shuts my eyes; I opens them at three o'clock;" so this tribunal is expected to shut its eyes to all the frauds committed in the canvass of these votes by which I will show your honors, not by declamation and assertion, but by argument which in any court of justice could not be gainsaid, that this result was reached; disfranchisement was imposed upon 10,000 legal voters by a tribunal which had no jurisdiction to exclude a vote; if these things can be done in the green tree, what may we not expect to see in the dry? If in the centennial year only of the life of our nation such frauds can pass unwhipped of justice, and not only pass unwhipped, but win the prizes, what may we not expect when the degeneracy of this nation shall come?

I.

The first questions naturally suggested by this discussion are, what is the character of this tribunal, and what is the nature of the powers conferred upon it?

The Constitution of the United States embodies the American conception of a republic. It creates a government to exercise the powers of sovereignty as to certain enumerated subjects. It proceeds upon the fundamental idea that the rights, privileges, and liberties of the people can only be secured against encroachment on the part of those charged with the execution of governmental powers by a careful separation of legislative, executive, and judicial powers, and a distribution of such powers among three great, equal, and co-ordinate departments. The legislative power is vested in the Congress, the executive power is vested in the President, and the judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. "The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services, a stated compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."—Const., article 3, sec. 1.

It is well settled that "the judicial power" cannot be vested elsewhere than in courts composed of judges holding their offices during good behavior.

It is therefore certain that no part of "the judicial power" can be vested in a tribunal organized as this tribunal is. No tribunal created by act of Congress, whose decisions are subject to review except by other judicial courts of superior jurisdiction, can be considered as judicial courts. The Court of Claims, as originally constituted, could render judgments so called; but such judgments were submitted to the approval and ultimate action of Congress. For this reason, the Supreme Court of the United States held that no appeal would lie from the decisions of that court to the Supreme Court of the United States.—Gordon vs. The United States, 2 Wall., 561.

After this decision, Congress remodeled that court, and gave conclusive effect to its judgments; since which appeals have been entertained by the Supreme Court.

In The United States vs. Ferriera, 13 How., 40, acts of Congress had conferred upon the district judge of the United States for Florida authority to adjudicate upon certain claims arising under the treaty with Spain; which claims, when adjudicated by him, should be paid, if the Secretary of the Treasury should, on a report of the evidence, deem it equitable. The court, by Taney, C. J., say:

The powers conferred by these acts of Congress upon the judge as well as the Secretary are, it is true, judicial in their nature, for judgment and discretion must be exercised by both of them. But it is nothing more than the power ordinarily given by law to a commissioner appointed to adjust claims to lands or money under a treaty, or special powers to inquire into or decide any other particular class of controversies in which the public or individuals may be concerned. A power of that description may constitutionally be conferred on a Secretary as well as on a commissioner. But it is not judicial in either case in the sense in which judicial power is granted by the Constitution to the courts of the United States.

See also Hayburn's case, 2 Dall., 405.

It is therefore plain that "the judicial power" could not be vested in this tribunal, and it is equally clear that the bill organizing this tribunal does not pretend to clothe it with such power, because the decision, so called, which this tribunal may render is submitted to the approval of and may be reversed by the two Houses of Congress.

What, then, is this tribunal? It is, we submit, a mere legislative commission, exercising political power pertaining to the jurisdiction of Congress. Congress finds itself charged with the duty of ascertaining who, if any one, has been elected President of the United States, by the votes cast in the several electoral colleges on the 6th of December last. And to aid it in the performance of this duty, the exercise of this political power, it has created this commission to investigate and decide and report to the two Houses of Congress upon certain matters embraced in the performance of that duty; and the bill creating this commission provides that its report shall be made to the two Houses, and shall be conclusive, unless reversed by the Houses themselves.

There is no doubt of the power of both Houses of Congress by law, or perhaps by a joint resolution, to create a commission to investigate and report upon any subject falling within the scope of ordinary legislation, or relating to the performance of any duty cast upon Congress by the Constitution. Similar parliamentary commissions have frequently been ordered in England; sometimes raised by the Houses themselves, and sometimes authorized by statute and appointed by the Crown.

For instance, by statute 15 and 16 Vict., chap. 57, a commission was authorized, which was appointed by the Crown to inquire into alleged corrupt practices in elections of members of the House of Commons; which commission was authorized by the statute to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, examine witnesses, &c. And false swearing before such commission would have been perjury under the laws of Great Britain. This commission made report, which became the foundation for legislation upon that important subject.—May's Parl. Prac., p. 593.

The Constitution, amendment XII, provides, in regard to the votes given in the several electoral colleges, that they shall be certified and returned to the President of the Senate, and then provides as follows:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, AND THE VOTES SHALL THEN BE COUNTED.

But by whom the votes shall be counted the Constitution does not declare. Most of the powers conferred by the Constitution of the United States are vested in some designated department or officer. Other powers are conferred upon the United States generally. For instance, article 4, section 4, provides as follows:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the legislature, or of the executive, (when the legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

The last clause of the legislative article confers upon Congress the power—

To make all laws which may be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Congress has provided by law for the execution by the President of the power as to protection against domestic violence.

The constitutionality of the bill creating this Commission may be considered upon one or the other of two grounds.

(1.) If the power to count the votes is vested in the two Houses of Congress, then this Commission is a proper instrumentality for making the investigation necessary to enable the two Houses intelligently to execute the power. If, on the other hand, the case is to be treated as one of power granted generally, that is, without designation as to who shall count the votes, then it falls within the power of Congress to make laws for its execution, as a power vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in some department or officer thereof. If the latter is the true view of the Constitution, then Congress might pass a law creating a commission or court, to be appointed by the President, to count the votes, and leave the matter entirely to such court or commission.

But, evidently, the bill proceeds upon the theory that the votes are to be counted by the two Houses of Congress, because by the bill power is reserved to the two Houses to set aside the report, called the decision, to be made by this Commission. And, considering the matter in this light, it is manifest that Congress may impose upon the Commission such duties, that is, order it to investigate such questions—as it may see fit. It may direct the Commission to report what is the prima facie right of candidates upon certain papers, or it may direct this Commission to ascertain and report upon the de jure right of the several candidates.

What duty, then, does the law creating this tribunal impose upon it? The law declares that you shall—

(1.) "By a majority of votes decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States; and

(2.) "How many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State."

And to enable you to perform this duty, the act clothes you with all the powers of the two Houses of Congress. What this means may be inferred from the fact that the two Houses of Congress in the last count of presidential votes concurred in deciding that the electoral vote of the Louisiana college ought to be excluded, because the votes cast at the popular election for electors had not been canvassed according to the laws of that State; thus going behind a regular certificate of the governor that the electors had been duly appointed, and a regular return of the votes cast by said college. This is at least a construction by the two Houses themselves of their power to go behind the certificate of the governor to ascertain whether the electors were duly appointed. It will be said that this was under the 22d joint rule of the two Houses. It seems now to be a matter of dispute between the two Houses whether or not that rule is now in force; but whether it is or not, is wholly immaterial. Either House, or the two Houses, may regulate practice in the exercise of their constitutional authority; but neither, nor both, can add to that authority by rules of their own. If this joint rule added to the Constitution, it was void; if it took from the Constitution, it was void; if it did neither, it was useless. And the concurrent action of both Houses of Congress in rejecting the vote of Louisiana four years ago must be regarded as a declaration by them of their power in the premises, and that power they have conferred upon this tribunal.

This tribunal has been created to meet a great national emergency. The public welfare and business interests alike require a speedy, final, and satisfactory settlement of the presidential question. The people will be content with, and the rival candidates will acquiesce in, any determination of the question founded upon the full merits of the case. But no one will be content with, no candidate will acquiesce in, a determination of this great question which ignores the merits and rests upon technicalities or false certificates.

It is a total error to suppose that this tribunal can make any decision which, in the judicial sense of that term, can settle this question. And it is an equal error to suppose that Congress has pretended to clothe this tribunal with any such power. On the contrary, section 6 of this bill reserves to the defeated candidate the right—if any such right now exists by law—to prosecute a writ of quo warranto against the candidate who may be counted in.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Mr. Carpenter, I do not think there is a difference of opinion in the Commission on that subject. I have not heard any. It has been universally considered, so far as I am informed, that the powers of this Commission extend so far, and so far only, as the powers of the two Houses of Congress extend.

Mr. CARPENTER. In other words, then, it is agreed on all hands that the powers of this Commission are political powers; they are legislative powers delegated by the two Houses to this Commission. Your honors would have relieved yourselves from the infliction of the last twenty minutes if that had been announced to me a little earlier.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I do not understand that Judge BRADLEY announces the proposition you have stated as the opinion of the Commission.

Mr. CARPENTER. The proposition is so self-evident, so thoroughly fortified by the Constitution, that I will stop with the mere suggestion which Judge BRADLEY has made on the subject. It is perfectly certain that this tribunal is exercising some power, or else we should not be wasting all these candles here to-night, the property of the United States. If its power is not judicial—and that is conceded—nobody will claim that it is executive. Then it must be legislative.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Do you hold that we can pass a bill, that we can legislate?

Mr. CARPENTER.. No; I do not. I do not hold that one of the standing committees of the Senate or House could pass a bill. But I do say that when the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, for instance, is instructed to inquire into and report upon a given subject, and has power to send for persons and papers, and examine witnesses, that committee, in doing so, is exercising the delegated power of the Senate in that behalf. That is what I maintain. Therefore I say that this Commission, sitting here under this act of Congress, is exercising a delegated political power, and that its jurisdiction is precisely what, and its duty exactly that which the law of its creation prescribes. In other words, I contend this Commission is merely a legislative committee of investigation, and it is bound to inquire into and report upon the matters which have been submitted to its determination by the act of Congress under which it is sitting.

This brings me back to consider the precise duties imposed upon this Commission, and the methods by which it may investigate the subject.

I turn now to the text of the act creating this tribunal. The papers are to be sent to the Commission, "which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses, acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from each State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State." The duty imposed on this Commission is to decide, not how many and what electors have a prima facie title, not how many and what electors appear from certain papers and certificates to have been appointed, but "how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State." That is precisely the duty of the common-law courts in trying a case commenced by information in the nature of quo warranto. I concede that you are not trying a quo warranto; I concede that your decision will not bind either party who may be defeated by your determination from maintaining his quo warranto. Nevertheless, considering the public necessities—considering the evils to result from a further contest over this presidential question, Congress has seen fit to direct you to investigate and decide—that is, report, for there can be no decision in the judicial sense of that term—"how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State." And for this purpose you are clothed with all the power possessed by the two Houses of Congress. If you cannot go to the bottom of this subject it is bottomless, and there is no power to defeat the greatest fraud ever attempted in our political history.

To investigate this subject you have the powers of the two Houses of Congress. What are those powers; or, in other words, what methods of investigation may legislative bodies adopt? Sir George Cornwall Lewis, in his work entitled "Methods and Reasonings in Politics," says:

The subject of judicial evidence has been treated by jurists with more or less fullness since jurisprudence became a science; but it has, perhaps, been elaborated in more detail, and has received a more systematic form, in England than in any other country. This has been owing to peculiarities in the procedure of our courts of common law, which need not be here noticed. With respect to our present subject, the most important rule of evidence in the law of England is that which prescribes the exclusion of hearsay testimony; that is to say, of statements of fact made by the witness, not from his own observation but from the observation of others.

In judicial proceedings, therefore, where the facts are determined, not by official agents of the Government, but by the testimony of witnesses taken casually from the midst of the community, the general principle is recognized by our law that the witness must speak to an event which occurred under his notice, and within the reach of his senses.

The process of ascertaining facts for legislative purposes is not, in general, so formal, or subject to such strict rules of evidence as the procedure of executive departments, whether administrative or judicial. Petitions, complaints, remonstrances, statements of grievances, are presented to a legislature, or, if it consist of a deliberative body, individual members of that body may represent facts upon their own authority. It may then either proceed at once to legislate upon the faith of such suggestions, or it may take them as raising merely a presumption, and may institute an inquiry of its own. It may call for papers, accounts, correspondence, and other documents; it may likewise, by proper means, examine witnesses, and thus ascertain, by original testimony, the facts bearing upon the subject under consideration.

Upon this authority, I assert that the testimony taken by the committees of the two Houses of Congress upon this subject is before you, and should be considered in this inquiry; and that you can proceed in the methods usual in legislative bodies, and act upon any information which would authorize a legislative body to act. It is not expected, as the law creating this tribunal clearly shows, that you are to proceed only in the judicial method of investigating facts, by examination of witnesses, &c.

Four years ago the subject of the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana was referred by the Senate to a committee. The committee reported, although the governor had certified in regular form that the electors were duly appointed, and they had met on the proper day and cast their votes for President and Vice-President, that the votes cast at the election for the electors had not been canvassed according to law; and the two Houses of Congress, without further investigation, each by itself, the Senate by the vote of every republican Senator, and the House without a division, decided to reject the electoral vote of that State.

At this point let me refer to the remedy of quo warranto, touching the matter in question.

It has been settled in England for more than one hundred years, and is perfectly well settled in this country, that information in the nature of quo warranto is in its nature a civil proceeding, and must be so classified in the distribution of cases between courts of civil and courts of criminal jurisdiction. Rex vs. Francis, 2 D. & E. 484. In State Bank vs. The State, 1 Blackford, 272, the court said: "We have no need of resorting to the general doctrine or information, for a quo warranto on information is a criminal proceeding only in name and in form; in its nature it is purely a civil proceeding." Citing 2 Kid on Corpo., 439; King vs. Francis, 2 T. R., 484. "The proceeding by information in the nature of a quo warranto is essentially a civil proceeding, and the pleadings in it are as much subject to amendment as they are in ordinary civil actions. It is criminal only in form." (State of Florida vs. Gleason, 14 Flor., 109.)

In Brison vs. Lingo, 26 Mo., 496, the supreme court said: "The inquiry arises, is this a criminal case? For a great while it has been applied to the simple purpose of trying civil right, and regarded as a remedy to try the right to office." The court held it was a civil case. See also State vs. Kupfurle, 44 Mo., 154. "A proceeding by quo warranto is not a criminal proceeding." Ensminger vs. Peo., 47 Ill., 384. In Commonwealth vs. Browne, 1 S. & R., 382, it was held that "an information in the nature of a quo warranto, although a criminal proceeding in form, is in substance but a civil one, and is therefore not within the prohibition of the tenth article of the constitution of Pennsylvania." In State ex rel. Bashford vs. Barstow, 4 Wis., 467, the attorney-general, after some proceedings, filed a formal discontinuance on the part of the State, but the court held the suit must proceed as between the relator and the defendant, and the court proceeded and rendered judgment in favor of the relator; and he thereupon entered into and held the office for the balance of the term.

The Constitution of the United States, article 3, section 2, declares that the judicial power of the United States "shall extend to all cases arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made under their authority," &c. A contest between Mr. Tilden, if he shall be counted out, and Mr. Hayes, if he shall be counted in, touching the right to exercise the office of President, would undoubtedly be a case arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Now let us see whether any court has jurisdiction to try the case.

The act of Congress March 3, 1875, 18 Statutes at Large, part 3, provides as follows:

That the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, &c.

It is well settled that where the title to an office is in dispute, the amount involved, for the purpose of jurisdiction, is the salary of the office. (U. S. vs. Addison, 22 How., 174.)

It is true the act of Congress quoted above says nothing about writ or information of quo warranto. But when an act of Congress confers upon a circuit court jurisdiction of a case or controversy, the power of the court to issue the proper writ, or entertain the proper proceedings to bring the case or controversy before the court, cannot be questioned.

It is well settled that in proceedings by quo warranto the court will ascertain the right to the office, and go through all forms, fictions, certificates of canvassing-boards and commissions of office, to ascertain that right.

People vs. Van Slyck, 4 Cow., 297.

People vs. Ferguson, 8 Cow., 102.

Jeter vs. State, 1 McCord, 233.

People vs. Vail, 20 Wend., 12.

Bashford vs. Barstow, 4 Wis., 567.

Hill vs. State, 1 Ala., (N. S.,) 559.

As a determination of this question by this tribunal based upon the broad merits of the case would give peace to the country, and set the obstructed wheels of enterprise once more in motion, so, on the other hand, a narrow and technical decision which would throw the question into a judicial controversy, to continue for months, would be a calamity to the country, and raise a doubt as to the efficiency of free institutions.

This is undoubtedly the reason why Congress has directed this Commission to inquire into the ultimate, final fact as a court of law would do on a quo warranto—reserving to itself, however, the right to adopt or reject such conclusion in the final counting of votes, which is to be done by the two Houses themselves after this Commission shall have performed its functions. The duty cast upon this Commission to inquire and decide—that is, report—what persons were “duly appointed electors” can be performed in no way but by an inquiry into the ultimate fact; that is, the legality of such appointment. This commission must take judicial notice of the laws of Louisiana. (Pennington vs. Gibson, 16 How., 65.) It must, therefore, ascertain whether any law of that State directs the manner in which electors shall be appointed; whether such State law is in accordance with the constitution of that State, and whether, in fact, the electors were appointed according to such law. Without this it is impossible to say whether or not they were duly appointed.

II.

I come now to another question which I think is one of considerable difficulty, and that is to ascertain what was the statute law of Louisiana on the 7th day of November last. It very rarely happens that in investigating a case you are unable to find out what the statute is. There may be differences about the meaning of a statute, but you can generally ascertain what statute was in force; but anything that comes from Louisiana is full of difficulty to a lawyer; that is, everything that has come up from it except my honorable friend on the left here, [Mr. Campbell.]

The legislature of the State of Louisiana, October 19, 1863, (Laws 1863, p. 218,) passed a general election law for the election of governor, lieutenant-governor, members of the legislature, and other State and parish officers.

Section 32 of that act is as follows, (page 223:)

SEC. 32. Be it further enacted, &c., That in every year in which an election shall be held for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, such election shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, in accordance with an act of the Congress of the United States, approved January twenty-three, one thousand eight hundred and forty-five, entitled "An act to establish a uniform time for holding elections for electors of President and Vice-President in all States of the Union." And such elections shall be held and conducted in the manner and form provided by law for general State elections.

SEC. 33. Be it further enacted, &c., That the foregoing provisions, except as to time and place of holding elections, shall apply to the election of all officers whose election is not otherwise provided for.

Eleven days afterward, October 30, 1868, the legislature proceeded to, and "otherwise provided for," the election of presidential electors, thus taking that election out of the operation of the general election law. The latter act is a complete regulation of presidential electors, and is as follows:

No. 193.—An act relative to presidential electors.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana in general assembly convened, That in every year in which an election is to be held for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, such election shall be held on Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November in such year, in accordance with an act of the Congress of the United States approved January twenty-three, eighteen hundred and forty-five, entitled "An act to establish a uniform time for holding elections for electors of President and Vice-President in all of the States of the Union," and such elections shall be held and conducted in the manner and form provided by law for general State elections.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, &c., That every qualified voter in the State shall vote for seven persons, as follows: Two persons shall be selected from the State at large, and one person shall be chosen from each congressional district in this State; and in case any ticket shall contain two or more names of persons residing in the same district (except the two chosen from the State at large) the first of such names only shall be considered as duly voted for.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, &c., That no person shall be an elector who is not a qualified voter in the district for which he is chosen, or in case of being elected for the State at large, then of some parish of the State.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, &c., That immediately after the receipt of a return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November, if the returns shall not sooner arrive, the governor, in presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns and ascertain therefrom the several persons who have been duly elected electors.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, &c., That one of the returns from each parish, indorsed by the governor, shall be placed on file and preserved among the archives of the secretary of state.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, &c., That the names of the persons selected, together with a copy of the returns from the several parishes, shall forthwith be published in the newspaper or papers in which the laws of the State may be directed to be published.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, &c., That the electors shall meet at the seat of government on the day appointed for their meeting by the act of Congress, (the first Wednesday in December,) and shall then and there proceed to execute the duties and services enjoined upon them by the Constitution of the United States, in the manner therein prescribed.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, &c., That if any one or more of the electors chosen by the people shall fail from any cause whatever, to appear at the appointed place at the hour of four p. m., of the day prescribed for their meeting, it shall be the duty of the other electors immediately to proceed by ballot to supply such vacancy or vacancies.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, &c., That each elector shall receive the same daily compensation and allowance which at that time shall be allowed by law to the members of the general assembly, to be paid by the treasurer of the State on warrants signed by the governor.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted, &c., That all laws conflicting herewith be, and the same are hereby repealed; that this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

March 16, 1870, the legislature passed another election law. Laws of 1870, p. 145-161.

Section 35, page 150 of this act, reads as follows:

SEC. 35. Be it further enacted, &c., That in every year in which an election shall be held for the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, such election shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, in accordance with the act of the Congress of the United States approved January twenty-third, one thousand eight hundred and forty-five, entitled "An act to establish a uniform time for holding election for electors of President and Vice-President in all States of the Union," and such election shall be held and conducted and returns made thereof in the manner and form prescribed by law for the general elections.

Section 38 of this act is as follows :

SEC. 38. Be it further enacted, &c., That the provisions of this act, except as to the time of holding elections, shall apply in the election of all officers whose election is not otherwise provided for.

The last section of said act is as follows :

SEC. 85. Be it further enacted, &c., That all laws or parts of law contrary to the provisions of this act and all laws relating to the same subject-matter are hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect from and after the passage.

REVISED STATUTES, 1870.

This revision took effect April 1, 1870. It contains a general election-law, differing materially from the act of 1870, and made no provisions for a returning-board, and this revision also re-enacted the special act of 1868.

Section 1410 of the revision is as follows :

SEC. 1410. In every year in which an election shall be held for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, such election shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, in accordance with an act of Congress of the United States approved January 13th, 1845, entitled "An act to establish a uniform time for holding elections for electors of President and Vice-President in all States of the Union," and such elections shall be held and conducted in the manner and form provided by law for general State elections.

Sections 2823-2832 of the revision are the same in substance as the act of 1868. Section 2826 of the revision in relation to the canvass of votes given for presidential electors is as follows :

SEC. 2826. Immediately after the receipt of a return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November if the returns should not sooner arrive, the governor, in presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns and ascertain therefrom the persons who have been duly elected electors.

Section 3990 of the revision repealed all former laws or parts of laws on the same subject-matter covered by the revision, with certain exceptions not material here.

THE ACT OF 1872.

November 20, 1872, the legislature passed another general election-law which was in force at the last November election. Sections 1, 29, 32, and 71 are as follows :

SEC. 1. Be it further enacted, That all elections for State, parish, and judicial officers, members of the general assembly, and for members of Congress, shall be held on the first (Tuesday after the first) Monday in November; and said election shall be styled the general elections. They shall be held in the manner and form and subject to the regulations hereafter prescribed, and no other.

By constitutional amendment, 1874, the day for holding general elections was changed from the first Monday to the first Tuesday following the first Monday in November.

SEC. 29. Be it further enacted, &c., That in every year in which an election shall be held for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, such election shall be held at the time fixed by act of Congress.

SEC. 32. Be it further enacted, &c., That the provisions of this act, except as to the time of holding elections, shall apply in the election of all officers whose election is not otherwise provided for.

SEC. 71. Be it further enacted, &c., That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election-laws be and the same are hereby repealed.

Whether the election-law of 1870 was repealed by the revision, or whether it remained in force after April 1, 1870, when the revision took effect, depends upon the effect to be given to several acts of the legislature enacted at the session of 1870.

On the 28th February, 1870, the following act was passed :

No. 50. An act giving precedence in authority to all the other acts and joint resolutions passed by the general assembly at this session over the acts known as "The Revision of the Statutes and of the Civil Code and Code of Practice" when there exists any conflict in the provisions of said acts and revisions.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana in general assembly convened, That all the acts and joint resolutions passed during the present session of the general assembly which may be contrary to or in any manner conflict with the acts of the present session known as "Revision of the Statutes of a general character, and of the Civil Code and Code of Practice," shall have precedence of said revisions, and be held as the law in opposition thereto, and as repealing those acts so far as they may be in opposition or conflict.—Promulgated March 20, 1870.

On the 14th March, 1870, the revision was passed, and by its terms was to go into effect April 1, 1870.

On the 16th March, 1870, the election-law was passed, to take effect from its passage.

The question is whether after the 1st April the revision repealed the election-law of 1870, or whether the election-law of 1870, by virtue of the act of February 28, 1870, remained in force notwithstanding the revision, and nullified the general election-law contained in the revision. The general rule is that an act passed to take effect on a future day, has on that day the same effect as though it had been passed on that day. "A law speaks from the time of its going into effect." Rice vs. Ruddiman, 10 Mich., 125; Peo. vs. Johnson, 6 Cal., 673; Arthur vs. Franklin, 16 Ohio, N. S., 193; Lynner vs. Stale, 8 Ind., 490; Supervisors vs. Keady, 34 Ill., 293; Charless vs. Lamberson, 1 Clarke, (Iowa,) 435; Price vs. Hopkins, 13 Mich., 318.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. Carpenter, do I understand you to claim that, if an act is passed on the 1st of April to take effect on the 1st of May, and on the 15th of April an act is passed repealing that altogether, still on the 1st of May the repealing act itself would be repealed?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not claim so; I do not think so. This is not that case. The Revised Statutes were not repealed before they took effect, unless pro tanto by the inconsistent and conflicting provisions of the general election-law of 1870. Treating the revision as having been passed April 1, 1870, the time when by its own terms it was to take effect, it repealed the election-law of 1870, and also repealed all prior acts denying to it the full force and effect which would otherwise attach to it as a law. And this I believe to be the sound view of the subject.

But if it is competent for the legislature to provide that of two acts thereafter to be passed the first shall repeal the second, then the revision taking effect April 1, 1870, was subordinated to the election-law of March 16, 1870.

It is not very material to this case which view of this matter shall be taken by the court. It is certain that the act of 1868, re-enacted in the revision, was or it was not in force at the last election.

I shall present the case first upon the ground that the act of 1868 was in force, as I incline to that opinion.

1. Assuming the act of 1868 (re-enacted in the revision of 1870) as in force, it is not pretended that the votes given for electors at the last election in that State have ever been canvassed as required by this act. It is evident that the canvass which was made, and which resulted in the exclusion of over 10,000 votes in favor of the Tilden electors, was not only unauthorized by this act, but in direct violation of its express provisions.

By this law, section 2826, revised statutes, it is provided that—

Immediately after the receipt of a return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November, if the returns should not sooner arrive, the governor, in the presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns and ascertain therefrom the persons who have been duly elected electors.

SEC. 2827. One of the returns from each parish, indorsed by the governor, shall be placed on file and preserved among the archives of the secretary of state.

SEC. 2828. The names of persons elected, together with a copy of the returns from the several parishes, shall forthwith be published in the newspaper or papers in which the laws of the State may be directed to be published.

Under this law, no returns whatever could be excluded. The result must be ascertained from all the returns "from each parish." No judicial power, and no discretion, is conferred by this act; the duty is purely mathematical. The returns from each parish are to be preserved among the archives of the secretary of state. It will not be pretended that if this law was in force the election was conducted and returned according to its provisions. If the election law of 1868, as re-enacted in the revision of April 1, 1870, was not repealed by the act of March 16, 1870, then it certainly was in force at the time of the election, unless repealed by the act of 1872. The history of this act of 1872 is well known. In the early part of 1872 the legislature passed this bill and sent it to Governor Warmoth for his approval. He neither approved nor vetoed the bill during the session of the legislature. But after the presidential and the State elections of November, 1872, when Governor Warmoth was engaged in a contest with Judge Durell, months after the adjournment of the legislature which passed the bill, and after Judge Durell, in the circuit court of the United States, had tied up the canvass of those elections, Governor Warmoth, as the only means of counteracting the usurpations of a Federal judge, took this act of 1872 from his pocket, and gave it his approval, and caused it to be promulgated as a law of the State.

The repealing clause contained in this act is very sweeping in terms, but was evidently intended to repeal only the general election laws of the State. An examination of these statutes will show that the legislature always treated the election of electors as a matter distinct from the general elections of the State.

In 1868 the legislature, on the 19th of October, passed an act entitled "An act relative to elections in the State of Louisiana," &c., and on the 30th day of the same month passed another act entitled "An act relative to presidential electors;" and both were published in the session laws of that year as distinct and independent acts.

In the Revised Statutes of 1870 the general election law of the State is published under the head "Elections," on pages 272-282. Under the head of "Presidential electors," on pages 550-553, is re-enacted the act of 1868.

Here the intention is manifest to treat the two elections as distinct, and they are regulated by different provisions. The election of State officers under the authority of the State constitution and the election of electors under the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States are treated in the laws of Louisiana as distinct subjects, and, notwithstanding the repealing clause of the act of 1872 is very broad, it is evident from the whole act that it was only intended to repeal all laws relating to general elections under State authority. It is a well-established rule for the interpretation of statutes, that, for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the legislature in any particular part of the act, the whole act must be considered; and if the general intention manifested by the whole act is clear, such intention will enable the court to control the language of other parts of the act.—

See Blanchard vs. Sprague, 3 Sumner, 279.

In doubtful cases a court should compare all the parts of a statute, and different statutes in pari materia, to ascertain the intention of the legislature.—The Elizabeth, 1 Paine, 10.

Words which, standing alone in an act of Congress, may properly be understood to pass a beneficial interest in land, will not be regarded as having that effect if the context shows that they were not intended to be so used.—Rice vs. Railroad Company, 1 Black, 358.

That the act of 1872 was intended as a regulation only of the election for State officers, and the repeal of former laws upon that subject is manifest from the first section of that act.

SECTION 1. That all elections for State, parish, and judicial officers, members of the general assembly, and for members of Congress, shall be held on the first Monday in November, and said election shall be styled the general elections. They shall be held in the manner and form and subject to the regulations hereinafter prescribed, and in no other.

Presidential electors are not State officers. As between the Union and the States, to determine whether an officer is a Federal or State officer, we have only to determine whether the office is created by the Constitution and laws of the Union or the constitution and laws of a State. Senators are elected by the legislatures of the States, but the office of Senator is created by the Constitution of the United States, and nobody doubts that a Senator is an officer of the United States and not of the State which elects him. The office of elector is created by the Constitution of the United States. The office is therefore a Federal office, and the fact that a State may fill the office by appointment does not change the character of the office. Suppose an amendment of the Constitution to be adopted to-morrow, providing that, in addition to the present number, each State might appoint an additional judge of the Supreme Court of the United States; would it be pretended that a judge thus appointed was any less an officer of the United States than those appointed by the President? The effect of the Constitution is simply this: It establishes an office and authorizes a State to fill it. The only power possessed by the State in regard to the electoral college for each State is the power of appointment; but in what manner the duties of the office shall be performed, when the electors shall meet, and how they shall vote, the manner and order of their proceedings, the authentication of their action, and how to make return to the General Government, whether they shall give bonds or take oaths and receive compensation, and indeed all things concerning the office except the filling of the office, are subjects of Federal regulation; subjects over which the State has no control whatever.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. The Constitution says that the President shall commission all officers of the United States. You would not contend, I suppose, that an elector, in order to exercise the functions of his office, should be commissioned by the President.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Constitution, as I recollect, says he shall commission all officers except otherwise provided.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I do not remember that phrase.

Mr. CARPENTER. I think it is there; if it is not, it ought to be. At all events, I do not undertake to decide that question now. The mere fact that the President had not issued a commission certainly could not determine that he ought not to have issued it, nor could it determine that these are not Federal officers, because a judge of the Supreme Court might go on the bench and sit here twenty years and not have a commission; and yet he might be an excellent de facto judge.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. A great many officers under the Federal Constitution have no commission from the President.

Mr. CARPENTER. I think the only provision for the President's commissioning an officer is in the case of a vacancy happening during the recess of the Senate, when he issues a commission to expire at the time provided in the Constitution. He has authority, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties."

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Mr. Carpenter, please read the last clause of section 3 of article 2.

Mr. CARPENTER. It does provide that he "shall commission all the officers of the United States." I had forgotten that provision, and know as a matter of fact that he does not do it. There is an act of Congress providing that the officers of the internal revenue shall be commissioned by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that is the practice to-day.

I wish now to present the view of the case and what I think are the results, if we hold that the act of 1868 embodied in the revision was repealed by the former act of March 16, 1870.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Mr. Carpenter, let me call your attention to this clause:

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, &c.

That is as you stated at first, as I understand.

Mr. EVARTS. That is appointment, not commission.

Mr. CARPENTER. Upon the question whether the act of 1872 was intended to repeal the act of 1868, let me call attention to what was referred to by Mr. Jenks this morning. Under the act of 1872, if that is the only act which was in force, there is no provision whatever for filling any vacancy in the electoral college except by a popular election.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Is there any provision for electing electors at all except that sentence which simply speaks of the time?

Mr. CARPENTER. That is all.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. No provision for the manner of election?

Mr. CARPENTER. None whatever, nor for a canvass, nor for a return, nor whether the electors shall be elected on a general ticket or from the congressional districts, nor anything on the subject. So then, if the act of 1868 was not in force, there was no provision whatever in force on the 7th day of November last.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Did the act of 1872 repeal the act of 1870?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly, if it was in force down to that time. If it was not repealed by the revision of the 1st of April, 1870, it certainly was repealed by the act of 1872 in the broadest and most unequivocal terms; and, besides, the provisions of the act regulated the same subject; they were both election statutes; and the repealing clause of the act of 1872 repeals all other election laws.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. What do you make of the second section of the act of 1872, that the returning-board shall be the returning-officers for all elections in the State?

Mr. CARPENTER. I am aware of that section and I answer: That provision I understand to be limited; the general language employed there is limited by the whole tenor of the act, which on its face shows, I think, that it was intended to apply to nothing but the election of State officers. It is well settled that where the intention of the legislature is manifest by the whole act to be a certain way, that will authorize a court to control the express language of other provisions in conflict. You are to reach the general intention of the legislature, and for that purpose courts are often compelled to disregard language employed in particular sections.

But another thing follows, if your honors take that view of the case, and hold that these officers are returning-officers for all elections. Then the other provision, that the election to fill all vacancies shall be by the people, certainly includes the vacancy which has been filled by that same election, does it not? If one section applies to all the officers elected in the State, including electors, then certainly the provision in regard to filling vacancies of all officers applies equally, and strikes out two of the votes given by this electoral college.

Again, the act of 1872 contains no direction in regard to the manner of appointing electors. It does not declare, nor does any other law of the State, except that of 1868, whether the electors shall be chosen by the people, elected by the legislature, or appointed by the governor. The act of 1868 is a specific and complete regulation of the whole subject, and provides for the election of electors by a popular vote; and provides that, in case of the absence of any of the electors, the other electors may supply their place by ballot; that two electors shall be elected at large, and one from each congressional district; and provides how the votes given shall be canvassed and certified. The act of 1872 contains no provision upon any of these subjects, and only refers to electors for the purpose of fixing the time for the appointment—a provision wholly useless, because Congress, and not the State, must fix the time for making such appointment. All that the State can do is to direct, by its legislature, the manner in which, and not the time at which, the appointment shall be made, when the time arrives for making it as provided by Congress.

It is not to be supposed that the legislature, in the act of 1872, intended to strike down the only act regulating the manner for appointing presidential electors, without making any other provision covering the subject.

Again, the act of Congress (Rev. Stats., p. 21, sec. 133) provides as follows:

SEC. 133. Each State may, by law, provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

The act of 1868 provides that, when the electoral college meets, if any elector is absent, his place may be filled by the electors present, they voting by ballot. But the act of 1872 provides, (sec. 24:)

That all elections to be held in this State to fill any vacancies shall be conducted and managed, and returns thereof shall be made, in the same manner as is provided for general elections.

Now, if the act of 1872 be construed as repealing the act of 1868, in regard to the election and returns for election of electors, then, beyond question, a vacancy in the electoral college would be one of the vacancies provided for in the section last quoted; and such vacancy could only be filled by a popular election.

In the case at bar, when the electoral college in Louisiana convened, it was found that two of the electors were holding offices of "honor or trust" under the United States at the time of the election, and therefore the election as to them was void under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. We contend here that this was not a vacancy, but was a case falling within section 134 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; in other words, as to them there had been a failure to make a choice, and no law of the State, not even the law of 1868, provided for appointment to fill their places. But the electoral college treated the case as one of vacancy, and proceeded by election to fill the places deemed vacant. Treating this as a case of vacancy, and not a case of a failure to elect, it was a regular proceeding under the act of 1868, but utterly void if that act was repealed by the act of 1872; because the language in the act of 1872, in regard to filling vacancies, is as broad as other parts of the act in regard to the election of officers. And it is impossible for this tribunal to hold that the act of 1872 repealed the act of 1868 in regard to the election of electors, but that the section last quoted did not repeal the section in the act of 1868, which authorized a different method of filling a vacancy in the particular case.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Was the act of 1868 repealed by the act of 1870?

Mr. CARPENTER. Undoubtedly. The election law of 1870, if that took effect, repealed the act of 1868.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Is there anything in the revised statutes of 1870 on this subject that was not taken from the act of 1868?

Mr. CARPENTER. No, sir; it merely re-enacts it.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Then the question of Judge THURMAN amounts also to the question whether the revised statutes took effect.

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly; it all depends on that question. The act of 1870, if that was the law after the revision took effect on the 1st of April, unquestionably repealed the revision as to this subject, because the revision embodied precisely the act of 1868.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. There is no express repeal of either.

Mr. CARPENTER. No, sir; except the repealing clause in the act of 1870, and in the act of 1872, repealing all prior laws on the same subject. Now let us assume for a moment that the act of 1868 was in force. That act was a complete regulation of the whole subject of electing presidential electors. It provided how they should be elected, that is, at a popular election; it provided who should be voters at that election; it provided who should be elected—two at large, and the others elected from the different congressional districts of the State; it provided the entire machinery of the election, and then provided—and the provision is to be found in section 2826 of the revision identical in language:

Immediately after the receipt of a return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November, if the returns should not sooner arrive, the governor, in the presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns, and ascertain therefrom the persons who have been duly elected electors.

SEC. 2827. One of the returns from each parish, indorsed by the governor, shall be placed on file and preserved among the archives of the secretary of state.

SEC. 2828. The names of the persons elected, together with a copy of the returns from the several parishes, shall forthwith be published in the newspaper or papers in which the laws of the State may be directed to be published.

The law of 1868 contains no provision about a canvassing-board except what I have read. The governor must open the returns from each parish, and in the presence named they must then be counted, and the returns from the parishes must then be deposited in the office of the secretary of state to remain a permanent record. No one will pretend that under that act there was any jurisdiction or discretion about excluding any votes. That never has been pretended, and it will not be now. If the act of 1868 was in force at the last election, it is not pretended that there has ever been any canvass of the votes of that election according to that statute. They did not attempt it. They acted upon the theory that the other law was in force. So that if your honors say that the act of 1868 was in force because embodied in the revision taking effect April 1, and therefore repealed the former act of the 16th of March, 1870, the case now is precisely in the attitude in which it was four years ago.

Four years ago there came up from Louisiana a regular certificate of its governor that so many persons had been duly appointed electors for the State; but the Senate, acting upon the theory which I maintain is the true and proper one, raised a committee in advance to examine into the facts about the election of that college. They sent for witnesses, brought them here in large numbers, made an examination, and the committee made a report not expressing an opinion as to whether such votes should or should not be excluded, but stating the fact that there had never been a canvass of those votes by any person authorized to canvass them, and submitting the question whether the vote of that State should be counted or not. The two Houses, acting separately, each House for itself, decided that they should be excluded.

Now, let me ask this Commission whether it will to-day decide that Congress violated its constitutional duty or usurped power in holding that the vote should not be counted four years ago. That the two Houses went back of the certificate is certain. That they went back and condemned the vote on account of infirmities in the election is certain. If they could do so because the votes had not been canvassed, can they not because they had been falsely canvassed? If they could do it for neglect, can it not be done for fraud? And will this tribunal here and now declare that the action of both Houses of Congress in excluding that vote was an outrage upon the people of Louisiana? That must be the conclusion, if you are to hold that you cannot go back of the governor's certificate. The two Houses did go back of it; and they have clothed you with all the power that they then possessed or now possess or ever will possess under the present Constitution.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I understand you to say that the provision of the revised statutes is precisely the same as that of the act of 1868.

Mr. CARPENTER. Identically; so that the act of 1868, which is clearly repealed by the election-law of 1870, if that is in force, was continued by virtue of re-enactment in the revision. If the revision is to be treated as an act passed on the day when it took effect, it repealed the act of March 16, 1870.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. When the revision was made there was no other statute but the act of 1868 in force, and the revisers merely took that statute and put it into the revision.

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly; it is copied word for word.

It is clear that if the election-law of March 16, 1870, survived the effect of the revised statutes, April 1, 1870, then the act of 1868 was repealed, and there was no law in force in that State at the last election directing the manner of appointing presidential electors.

It is very clear that the election-law of 1870 repealed the act of 1868.

The act of 1870, after providing a method of holding, conducting, and returning the general elections of the State, provided, in section 35, that the election for electors should be held on the day fixed by the act of Congress, and provided as follows: "and such elections shall be held and conducted, and returns made thereof, in the manner and form prescribed by law for the general elections."

And the last section of the act provided as follows:

That all laws or parts of laws contrary to the provisions of this act, and all laws relating to the same subject-matter, are hereby repealed, and that this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

The special act of 1868 was, by implication, in part at least, repealed by the 35th section of this act, which made different provision for holding, conducting, and returning the election. But, even conceding that the portion of the act of 1868 which declared who should be voters and who should be voted for, might have stood with the 35th section of this act, and therefore not have been repealed by this section, it is impossible to hold that any part of the act of 1868 escaped the effect of the repealing clause of this act of 1870, because it is evident that the 35th section of the act of 1870 and the act of 1868 were "laws relating to the same subject-matter."

About all that I am willing to assert positively in regard to the act of 1868, is, that it either was or it was not in force at the last election. If it was the whole electoral vote must be excluded, as it was four years ago, because there has been no canvass of the votes, and no electors duly appointed. If it was not in force, then there was no law of the State directing the manner in which electors should be appointed, and the whole college must go down for that reason. Because it is evident that if a State has omitted through its legislature to provide the manner in which electors shall be appointed, or, having made such provision, repeals it and makes no other, no constitutional appointment can be made by such State.

And if this were otherwise, still the two votes given by the two persons elected by the electoral college to fill the supposed vacancies must be excluded, because there was no law of the State authorizing the filling of a vacancy otherwise than by a popular election.

Is the order of the court to proceed till nine o'clock inflexible, unchangeable, for health or sickness, or anything else?

The PRESIDENT. There is no qualification.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am really unable by this candle light to read my brief and refer to these statutes.

The PRESIDENT. There was no qualification made in the private consultation. I was instructed to make the announcement which I did make, and I have no authority to qualify it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Have I authority to ask the court to indulge me till to-morrow morning?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly you have authority to ask them, and I will submit it to the Commission.

Mr. CARPENTER. I make that request.

The PRESIDENT. What is the request?

Mr. CARPENTER. That I be excused until to-morrow morning. It is now half past six o'clock.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Mr. Carpenter, how much time do you propose to take? You have spoken an hour and ten minutes.

Mr. CARPENTER. I meant to go up to two hours.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Cannot some other gentleman go on? We are ready to sit here.

The PRESIDENT. I will submit the question to the Commission. Mr. Carpenter asks that he be excused until to-morrow morning, which, in effect, is an adjournment. Are you ready for the question?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That is, that the proceedings be suspended, if I correctly understand.

The PRESIDENT. That proceedings be suspended until to-morrow morning.

Mr. Commissioner FIELD. Mr. Carpenter, how early are you willing to come in the morning? because we may perhaps make up in the morning the time now lost.

Mr. CARPENTER. Any time after six o'clock.

The PRESIDENT. Shall the proceedings be suspended until the opening of the session to-morrow morning? [Putting the question.]

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. I move that the Commission adjourn until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT. I doubt whether I ought to put that; this is in the midst of a vote.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. I should like to inquire, Mr. Carpenter, whether you are understood as saying you are sick?

Mr. CARPENTER. I am sick, and sick from this smoke. I could sit here for several nights and not be sick; but speaking here and inhaling the smoke of these candles really makes me ill.

The PRESIDENT. The question is whether the proceedings shall be suspended until to-morrow morning at the opening of the session, upon which the yeas and nays are called for.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Has any hour been named?

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I would suggest ten o'clock.

Other MEMBERS. Ten o'clock.

The PRESIDENT. Ten o'clock is suggested. It is moved that proceedings be suspended until ten o'clock to-morrow.

The yeas and nays being called, the result was as follows:

Those voting in the affirmative were Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Bradley, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—8.

Those voting in the negative were Messrs. Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hoar, Miller, and Strong—5.

The Commission thereupon (at six o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow at ten o'clock a. m.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1877.

The Commission met at 10 o'clock a. m., pursuant to adjournment, all the members being present.

The respective counsel appearing in the Louisiana case were also present.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT. Proceed with your argument, Mr. Carpenter.

Mr. CARPENTER. May it please your honors, before resuming my argument, I desire to make my grateful acknowledgment to the Commission for their kindness in excusing me last night. The currents of atmosphere in this chamber, like the currents of authority, proceed from the bench toward the bar with overwhelming force, and I presume your honors sitting against the wall were not aware of it; but the air in the chamber at this point was absolutely stifling, and it would have been impossible for me to stand on my feet twenty minutes more.

Recurring for a moment to the question put me by Senator EDMUNDS in that part of my argument in which I attempted to show that electors were Federal and not State officers, as to whether they were commissioned by the President, the Constitution provides that the President "shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

The construction put upon this provision has always been that those officers who were appointed by the President must be commissioned by him; those officers appointed by the heads of Departments are commissioned by such heads of Departments. For instance, all the postmasters after the first grade, which are not required to be confirmed by the Senate, are commissioned by the Postmaster-General. So all the officers of internal revenue are appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury and commissioned by him. The appointment of electors is to be by the State, and they are not confirmed by the Senate; therefore they are not commissioned by the President. Senators are not commissioned by the President; and although Senators are not civil officers within that clause of the Constitution relating to impeachment, yet in a broader sense, distributing offices between the Government of the United States and the State, nobody would claim that a Senator was a State officer; he is an officer of the United States; he is a Senator of the United States, not a Senator of the State from which he is elected. He is elected to fill an office created by the Constitution of the United States, and he is a Senator of the United States, and not of the State which elects him.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. But is the true meaning of the clause that the President shall commission all the officers of the United States, that he shall commission all officers of the United States who are appointed by him?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly; and that has been the uniform practice of the Government. Nobody would deny that officers under the Internal Revenue Department are officers of the United States. They have been indicted as such, and are in the States-prison as such to-day, any number of them, under statutes punishing officers of the United States; and yet they are not commissioned by the President, but by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Mr. Carpenter, are there not two grades, one called officers proper and the other inferior officers? The President commissions all officers; but the heads of Departments or courts may appoint inferior officers.

Mr. CARPENTER. There is no such distinction in the Constitution whatever.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I think you will find the language is that such inferior officers as Congress may direct may be appointed by the heads of Departments or by the courts.

Mr. CARPENTER. I see the point now, which I did not before, because I did not distinctly hear the inquiry. The question is not whether the man is an inferior or a superior officer; the question is whether he is an officer of the United States; and the clause which requires the President to commission is that he shall "commission all officers of the United States." An inferior officer is an officer, is he not? He would not be an inferior officer if he was not an officer. That clause of the Constitution is that the President shall commission all officers, which would, of course, include the inferior as well as the superior. But the interpretation always put upon it has been that the President must commission those officers who are nominated by him and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and none others.

Now I will proceed with the argument at the point where I stopped last night.

III.

Although we are entirely confident that the vote of Louisiana must be excluded for the reasons before given, yet should the court differ with us in regard to the objections before made, and hold that the act of 1872 repealed the act of 1868 and is itself a complete regulation of the subject of appointment of electors, still we submit that the rejection of over 10,000 Tilden votes by the returning-board under the provisions of the act of 1872 was wholly unauthorized by that act, and void. This brings us to consider the act of 1872 according to its own provisions in regard to the jurisdiction and powers of the returning-board. Section 3 of this act is as follows:

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, &c., That in such canvass and compilation the returning-officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile first the statements from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever from any poll or voting-place there shall be received the statement of any supervisor or registration or commissioner of election in form as required by section twenty-six of this act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented or tended to prevent a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning-officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statements of votes from such poll or voting-place until the statements from all other polls or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning-officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the results of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning-officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning-officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If, after such examination, the said returning-officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning-officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns: Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning-officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election.

Section 26 of this act is as follows:

SEC. 26. Be it further enacted, &c., That in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, in which, during the time of registration or revision of registration, or on any day of election, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place, or place of registration or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, shall prevent, or tend to prevent, a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, occur on the day of election, or of the supervision of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riots, tumults, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, from registering or voting, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish. When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or a supervisor of registration, he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish, if in the city of New Orleans, to the secretary of state, one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning-officers provided for in section 2 of this act when he makes the returns of election in his parish. His copy of said statement shall be so annexed to his returns of elections, by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance, that the same can be kept together, and the other copy the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish for the use of the district attorney.

We contend that the action of the returning-board in excluding from^m their canvass over 10,000 votes for the Tilden electors was void even if the provisions of this act repeal the act of 1868, and were applicable to this election, for the following reasons:

1. The Constitution of the United States provides that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number," &c.

When the Constitution refers to a State, it refers, of course, to a State of the Union—a community organized under a State constitution republican in form. When the Constitution of the United States was adopted, the States were communities organized according to the American idea of republics. One of the most important and essential features of a republican government, according to the American idea, is a separation of legislative, judicial, and executive functions, and a distribution of powers among separate and distinct departments. One of the duties imposed upon the Federal Government is to guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government. And, of course, in admitting new States, it is the duty of Congress to see that such is the form of their government. As it is the duty of the United States to guarantee—that is, see to it that every State has a republican form of government—it follows that the government of every State, its form, structure, and powers, must constantly be in the Federal mind. And the provisions of the Constitution that each State shall appoint electors must be construed to mean that such State, according to the provisions of its own constitution, shall appoint electors. No State could delegate this power to another State or to a foreign prince or power, or to individuals, by name or classifying designation. It is only the State—the constitutional republican State—a State of the Union under its written republican form of government, proceeding according to its constitution, which constitution is constantly subject to Federal supervision, that can appoint an elector. In other words, when the Constitution provides that each State shall appoint electors, it means, of course, that it shall appoint them according to its own constitution and laws. And what its laws may be must be determined by its own constitution, which, on the admission of the State, has been approved by Congress; and which, in all its mutations by amendments, continues to enjoy the approval of Congress as a republican form of government. And when the Constitution of the United States declares that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors," &c., it does in substance provide that the State shall prescribe a manner for such appointment in accordance with its own constitution. The Federal Government knows that any act of a State legislature in violation of its own constitution is void. In yet other words, the Constitution of the United States provides that the State, in providing for the manner of appointment of electors, shall proceed according to the provisions of its own constitution. Therefore, if it can be shown that the manner provided by the legislature for the appointment of electors by a State is in contravention of its own constitution, such appointment is void under the Constitution of the United States.

Now let us examine the constitution of Louisiana, to ascertain whether the provisions of the act of 1872—if the same are applicable to the election of electors—is in conformity to or in contravention of the State constitution.

The constitution of Louisiana provides, title 4, article 73, as follows:

ART. 73. The judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, in district courts, in parish courts, and in justices of the peace.

And then, after defining the jurisdiction of the several courts above mentioned, article 94 provides as follows:

ART. 94. No judicial powers, except as committing magistrates in criminal cases, shall be conferred on any officers other than those mentioned in this title, except such as may be necessary in towns and cities; and the judicial powers of such officers shall not extend further than the cognizance of cases arising under the police regulations of towns and cities in the State. In any case, when such officers shall assume jurisdiction over other matters than those which may arise under police regulations or under their jurisdiction as committing magistrates, they shall be liable to an action of damages in favor of the party injured or his heirs, and a verdict in favor of the party injured shall ipso facto operate a vacation of the office of said officer.

Thus it will be seen that the constitution of the State not only by affirmative provisions vests the whole judicial power of the State in certain designated tribunals or magistrates, but, by negative provisions, forbids the exercise of any judicial power by others.

The sections quoted from the act of 1872 undoubtedly pretend to vest judicial powers in the returning-board. The highest penalty that can be inflicted upon an American citizen for crime is disfranchisement. The elective franchise is not merely a right to deposit a ballot in a ballot-box, but it is a right to have such ballot counted, estimated, and made effectual in determining the result of an election.

The fifteenth amendment of the Constitution provides that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

What would be said of the law of a Southern State which should provide that the vote of a colored citizen should be received and deposited in the ballot-box, but that it should not be canvassed or returned? Manifestly, such provision would be in contravention of this amendment. Hence it follows that a provision of law which authorizes a canvassing-board to exclude from its return any votes legally cast is a disfranchisement of the voters casting such votes. This infliction can only be visited upon the voters by an exercise of judicial power. Consequently, any statute which authorizes the returning-board to exclude such votes authorized such board to exercise judicial power, and is void under the quoted provisions of the State constitution.

Again, it is contrary to the first principles of natural justice that one man should be punished for crimes committed by another. By the provisions above quoted from this act it is provided in effect that the votes cast by a thousand honest men in a certain parish may be excluded from the canvass in consequence of violence, intimidation, or bribery committed by a thousand other men. A law which should provide that any voter who had been guilty of violence, intimidation, or bribery in an election should on conviction thereof be forever disfranchised would be constitutional. But before such disfranchisement can be visited upon any voter he must be tried and convicted, according to the forms of law, in a tribunal possessing judicial power to try for the crime and declare the punishment. But by this act the full and extreme effect of judicial condemnation—that is, disfranchisement—may in effect be inflicted by a returning-board before whom the voter is not summoned to appear, has no hearing, but is condemned without appearance or hearing. A law which provides for such consequences in such case is not only in opposition to the constitution of Louisiana, anti-republican, opposed to natural justice, but it is too outrageous and abominable to be tolerated in any civilized country.

2. But even conceding the constitutionality of the sections above quoted from the act of 1872, they do not pretend to confer this extraordinary power upon the returning-board except when a case is made under the twenty-sixth section of the act; that is when, accompanying the return from the precinct, there is a statement made showing the facts relating to the alleged “riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, and the effect produced thereby in preventing a fair, free, and peaceable and full election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred thereby; said statement to be corroborated by three qualified electors of the parish.”

It is well settled that whenever a judicial court exercises a special and statutory power outside of and apart from its general jurisdiction, it must appear, in order to sustain its jurisdiction, that it was acting in a case clearly within the statute and that it strictly pursued the statute.

In Thatcher vs. Powell, 6 Wheaton, 119, the court, by Marshall, C. J., says:

In summary proceedings, when a court exercises an extraordinary power under a special statute prescribing its course, we think that course ought to be exactly observed, and those facts especially which give jurisdiction ought to appear, in order to show that its proceedings are coram judice. Without this act of assembly the order for sale would have been totally void. This act gives the power only on a report to be made by the sheriff. This report gives the court jurisdiction, and without it the court is as powerless as if the act had never passed.

It is too well settled to require citation of authorities in its support, that when a judicial court is proceeding under statutory provisions apart from the common law, or when a special tribunal or magistrate is exercising a special statutory jurisdiction, it must appear that the case was strictly within the statutory provision, and that the course pursued was exactly in conformity with the statute conferring the authority:

Justices' courts, not proceeding according to the course of common law, are confined strictly to the authority given them; they can take nothing by implication but must show the power expressly given them in every instance.” 3 Burr, 1366; 3 Term Rep., 444; Str., 1256; 2 Ld. Raym., 1144; Salk., 406; Jones vs. Reed, 1 Johns. Cas., 20; Wells vs. Newkirk, 1 Johns. Cas., 228; Powers vs. People, 4 Johns. Cas., 292; Bloom vs. Burdick, 1 Hill, 330; Adkins vs. Brewer, 3 Cowen, 206.

In Walker vs. Turner, 9 Wheaton, 541, it was held that when a magistrate was pursuing special authority, it was “essential to the validity of his judgment and of the proceedings under it that the record should show that he acted upon a case which the law submitted to his jurisdiction."

Now it is submitted, and we offer to prove, that not in a single case in which the returning-board excluded the vote of a parish was the foundation laid for such exercise of its authority.

To show this, let us refer to the machinery of elections in that State.

The method of holding the elections and making returns according to law is as follows :

The polling-place is presided over by three commissioners of election, appointed by the supervisor of registration for the parish, who is appointed by the governor. After the balloting is concluded, the commissioners count the ballots, make two statements of the result, and deliver one statement, together with the ballot-box containing all the ballots, to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and the other statement to the supervisor of registration, together with the tally-sheets, list of voters, &c. The supervisor for the parish is required, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the statements and papers from the different polling-places, to consolidate such returns or statements, to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the same, with the originals received by him, to the State returning-board; such statement and papers "to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail."

Section 43 makes it the duty of the supervisor to forward with his statement "a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally-lists used in making the count and statement of the votes."

Section 26 provides that the supervisors' copy of such statement "shall be so annexed to his returns of elections by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance, that the same can be kept together, and the other copy the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish for the use of the district attorney."

Section 26 also provides what the statement in relation to riots, intimidations, &c., shall be; that it shall be made in duplicate and under oath; and that it shall be—

- (1) "A clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto;
- (2) "And of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election;
- (3) "And of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riots, tumult, &c., from registering or voting;
- (4) "Which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish." And this section 26 also provides that the supervisor shall forward this statement with his return.

The only authority pretended to be conferred by the act of 1872 upon the returning-board to exclude any return or statement of votes which comes within their power to canvass is in section 3 of the act, and is as follows :

Whenever, from any poll or voting-place, there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 26 of this act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences which prevented, or tended to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning-officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statements of votes from such poll or voting-place until the statements from all other polls or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning-officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the results of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning-officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning-officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If after such examination the said returning-officers shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning-officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns: Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning-officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election.

Thus it will be seen that the jurisdiction of the returning-board to pass upon this subject at all is made to depend upon the jurisdictional fact that the return which the board receives from the parish supervisor is not only accompanied with but attached to the statement provided for in the twenty-sixth section of the act in regard to riots, intimidation, &c. If such return is not accompanied by such statement, supported by the affidavit of three electors, in regard to riots, &c., the returning-board is not authorized even by this act to examine at all into the subject, much less exclude any votes. And the principle of law, universally recognized, that a statutory tribunal, as distinguished from a judicial court of general jurisdiction, can only act upon a case clearly within its jurisdiction, and must strictly pursue the methods directed by the statute in exercising such jurisdiction, applies in its full force to the returning-board acting under this act of 1872.

If we are right in this position, it is conclusive against the validity of the action of the returning-board in excluding over 10,000 votes given for the Tilden electors; because the foundation for the exercise of this power by the returning-board was not established in regard to a single parish the votes of which were excluded by the board. And we are supported upon this point by two very high authorities, sitting members of this Commission.

I refer you to the discussion in the Senate on the resolution to admit Mr. Pinchback to a seat in that body from Louisiana; especially to the very able speeches of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Edmunds,] where precisely the doctrine I am claiming here is enforced with that clearness and eloquence of which he is master and I only an humble and hopeless imitator. I refer you to the fountain of this doctrine. I refer you to his speeches upon it, which make it as clear as the sun at noonday.

Again, I refer you to the reports of committees on the condition of the South, second session of the Forty-third Congress, pages 21 to 29, a report signed by Hon. George F. Hoar, Hon. W. A. Wheeler, a candidate for Vice-President at the last election, and Hon. William P. Frye, the distinguished Representative from the State of Maine. From this very able report I will read a few pertinent extracts.

Speaking of affairs in Louisiana, after quoting sections 3 and 26 from the act of 1872, which I have read, they say :

Upon this statute we are all clearly of opinion that the returning-board had no right to do anything except to canvass and compile the returns which were lawfully made to them by the local officers, except in cases where they were accompanied by the certificates of the supervisor or commissioner provided in the third section. In such cases, the last sentence of that section shows that it was expected that they would ordinarily exercise the grave and delicate duty of investigating charges of riot, tumult, bribery, or corruption on a hearing of the parties interested in the office. It never could have been meant that this board, of its own notion, sitting in New Orleans, at a distance from the place of voting, and without notice, could decide the right of persons claiming to be elected.

The board took a different view of its powers, and proceeded to throw out the votes from many polls where they found intimidation and violence to have existed. The result was to defeat persons whom on the returns they should have declared elected, and to elect persons who should not have been declared elected.

Now let us see for a moment what is that statement provided for by the twenty-sixth section which must come up within twenty-four hours, embalmed in wax or paste or some other adhesive substance, to the returning-board. The third section says that when they receive a statement in the form prescribed by the twenty-sixth section they may proceed. Now let us turn to the twenty-sixth section and see what must be shown. That must be—

A clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto—

and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riots, tumult, &c., from registering or voting; which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish.

We will show this Commission that not a single parish sent up any such statement with its return, verified by the affidavit of three persons. In other words, we will show affirmatively that this statutory tribunal had no jurisdiction to exclude a vote, but that, in violation of the very statute they were pretending to proceed under, they excluded 10,000 votes given for the Tilden electors. This we are prepared to show, and show by record testimony. And this brings the present case within the opinion of the committee just read.

But our opponents say, in substance, "Yes; that is all true." My honorable friend, Judge Howe, who opened this case on the other side, did not pretend that there had not been frauds. He said there had, but he said there had been blood also. In other words, one crime was to be offset by another. If the plaintiff's witnesses commit perjury, the defendant is authorized to have his witnesses commit perjury! That is the argument. Now let me show how this was condemned by the report of the committee from which I have just read:

The returning-board claims that in this proceeding they acted under an honest belief that they were right in their construction of the law, and that they were giving effect to the true will of a majority of the people of Louisiana, and that in their construction they followed the precedent set by the democratic or fusion returning-board of 1872. We believe they did follow such a precedent. We have no doubt that they believed they were defending the people of Louisiana against a fraud on their constitutional rights. But there is no more dangerous form of self-delusion than that which induces men in high places of public trust to violate law to redress or prevent what they deem public wrongs.

We are not prepared to declare without further examination how many persons obtained a prima facie title to seats in the legislature through this wrongful action. In some of the cases there were defects either of form or substance in the returns themselves, which, the board claimed, required their rejection without regard to the evidence of intimidation.

But the method adopted to set right this wrong was totally objectionable.

Then they proceed to consider why it was objectionable, giving the reasons among others which I have now given, and they proceed:

We do not overlook the causes which tend to excite deep feelings of discontent in the white native population of Louisiana. There has been great maladministration; public funds have been wasted, public credit impaired, and taxation is heavy. These facts combine with the general prostration of business through the country, and with the diversion of business from New Orleans by reason of the construction of railroads northerly from Texas, to create gloom and discontent.

It is further said—

that this is a question which concerns the people of Louisiana alone, and that they should be left to fight out the question among themselves. But this is an erroneous view, both of the rights and duties of the people of the United States under the Constitution. They have an interest in the question whether Senators and Representatives for Louisiana, thrust into their seats by illegal means, shall sit in Congress to make laws for them, and whether electors, gaining their office in like manner, shall turn the scale in the choice of a President of the United States. The President and Congress are bound to recognize and, if need be, to support the true government of Louisiana against all usurpers; and the American people will abandon their rights and flinch from the performance of their duties when they leave these questions to be settled either by the mob or the assassin.

Again :

The American people are now brought face to face with this condition of things. In the State of Louisiana there is a governor in office—

“In office.” A man who gets into land or office by forcible entry and detainer is nevertheless in.

In the State of Louisiana there is a governor in office who owes his seat to the interference of the national power, which has recognized his title to his office, not by reason of any ascertainment of the facts by legal process, but has based its action solely on the illegal order of a judge. In the same State there is a legislature one branch of which derives its authority partly from the same order, the other being organized by a majority who have been established in power by another interference of the National Government, and which majority derives its title, not from any legal ascertainment of the facts, but from the certificates of a returning-board which has misconceived and exceeded its legal authority. It is not strange that the republicans of Louisiana should delude themselves by any plausible views of laws which will enable them to occupy the places which they believe the will of a majority of the legal voters of the State, if free from violence and intimidation, would award to them. It is not strange that the democrats of Louisiana should believe the whole State government a usurpation, should give it no credit for its best acts, should seek to embarrass, and thwart, and resist it to the extent of their power, and should be unwilling to wait for the slow but sure operation of lawful remedies to cure whatever evil really belongs to it.

This report expresses the deliberate judgment of its signers: Mr. Hoar, a member of this commission; Mr. Wheeler, candidate for Vice-President, and Mr. Frye. Will not Mr. Wheeler be astonished if he shall find himself counted in as Vice-President in violation of the principles thus solemnly declared by him when he was a disinterested and impartial judge in the matter? Will not the American people think this is remarkable, especially if it shall be done by the casting vote of his colleague on the committee, [Mr. Hoar,] the author, I suppose, of the report from which I have read?

This report is clear and full authority in support of the proposition I am maintaining, that even under the election law of 1872 the returning-board had no authority to exclude votes, unless a case was made before them under the third and twenty-sixth sections, upon which their jurisdiction depends.

IV.

It only remains to apply these principles to the case before us. This tribunal is required to report upon two questions:

1. How many and what persons were duly appointed electors in this State; and

2. Which are the electoral votes which ought to be counted.

Your finding will be like a special verdict, and after receiving your report, the two Houses may agree with you upon one proposition and disagree upon the other.

First. Were the Hayes electors duly appointed? We contend they were not, for the following reasons:

1. If the act of 1868 was in force at the last election, then there has been no canvass of the votes according to its provisions, and there is no power, under that act, for the canvassers to exclude or reject votes under any circumstances or for any reason. Therefore, on the facts offered to be established by evidence, it is certain that the Hayes electors were defeated by about 8,000 majority.

2. If the act of 1868 was not in force, there was no law of that State in force at the last election directing the manner in which electors should be appointed; therefore none could be appointed.

3. If the Commission shall be of opinion that the act of 1868 was not in force, then it is agreed that the act of 1872 is the only election-law of that State which was in force at the last election. And if you shall be of opinion that this act did cover the election of electors, which we deny, yet the action of the returning-board in excluding over 10,000 votes given against the Hayes electors was coram non jure and absolutely void; and therefore the Hayes electors were not duly appointed.

It will be claimed that the certificate of Governor Kellogg is conclusive. But it is certain that it is not conclusive as to his own appointment, therefore the Commission must go back of that certificate at least as to his appointment.

It is well settled by the English cases that the king, although he is the fountain of honor and of office, cannot himself exercise an office to which he might make an appointment. An appointment is like any other grant, and the same person cannot be grantor and grantee. Therefore an officer possessing the power of appointment cannot appoint himself, and a pretended appointment is void in such case.

(7 Bacon Abr., title "Offices and officers," p. 281; State vs. Hoyt, 2 Oregon, 246; Peo. vs. Thomas, 33 Barb. N. Y., 287.)

A sheriff cannot certify an excuse for his neglect, but must make his affidavit. (Rex vs. Bolton, Anstruther, 79.)

This rests upon the general principle of law that no officer can exercise the functions of his office for his individual benefit. And whenever a sheriff is compelled to rely upon his own return, made upon process issued in a cause between other parties, such return is only prima facie evidence. (2 Greenleaf's Ev., sec. 585.)

A distinction between the power of an officer to appoint himself to another office and his power to issue a certificate which is conclusive evidence of such appointment is too nice to be substantial. Therefore to show that Kellogg was duly appointed elector, resort must be had to other evidence of the fact. At least resort may be had to other evidence to show that he was not duly appointed. The certificate of the governor is the only evidence prescribed by act of Congress, and when, as in this instance, it is unavailing, inquiry may be made into the fact so certified. What is that fact? Why, that Kellogg was duly appointed an elector. It is not contended by our opponents there is any law authorizing the appointment except by general election. Therefore, if the act of 1872 be held to cover this election, the question is whether Kellogg was elected at that election. This is the fact to be established, and the fact that may be controverted. This brings us to consider what evidence, back of the governor's certificate, must be resorted to to establish or controvert this fact.

It will be said that the return of the canvassing or returning board is the next evidence to be considered, and is conclusive.

I have already shown that the action of this board is void in rejecting votes, unless a case was made in each instance according to section 26 of the election-law of 1872, and that no such case was made in regard to any parish where the vote was excluded.

It would not be pretended that a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States would be of any avail unless accompanied by and attached to the complete record of the cause in which such decision was made. Without such full authenticated record it would not appear that the court had jurisdiction. It would be monstrous to hold that stronger presumption exists in favor of a statutory tribunal than in relation to the Supreme Court of the United States. And it is submitted that, to make the certificate of the returning-board evidence at all, it must be shown that returns were made by the supervisors of registration, what these returns were, and, if the board rejected any such returns, that a case was made giving the board jurisdiction in that behalf.

We submit at least that it may be shown affirmatively that such returning-board did not give effect to the votes as cast, and that no case was shown before them giving them jurisdiction to reject votes.

It will be borne in mind that this is not a case of accident, inadvertence, mistake, or error on the part of the returning-board, but a case of intentional, willful malfeasance—a positive, actual fraud, committed in pursuance of a conspiracy formed before the election was held. The fathers of the common law, the elementary writers, and the adjudicated cases, declare that "fraud vitiates everything." By this is meant that everything—the most solemn judgment, temporal or ecclesiastical—is void, of which fraud is an element. Therefore, when the governor's certificate is found unavailing to conclude inquiry as to his own appointment, and the certificate of the returning-board is relied upon, we meet that with the offer to prove that it is not only false in fact, but that it was made fraudulently and corruptly; that it is not the result of error merely, but the fruit of rank fraud. The doctrine now contended for should be expressed thus: "Fraud triumphs over everything, and especially it paralyzes every instrumentality designed for its correction."

I submit with entire confidence that, at the very least, you must hold that Kellogg's certificate of his own appointment is only prima facie evidence of it and may be controverted; and that when, to establish his due appointment, resort is had to the certificate of the returning-board, we may impeach it for fraud and show it to be false in fact.

Again, and apart from our offer to impeach it for fraud, upon what ground can it be maintained that the certificate of the returning-board is conclusive and cannot be contradicted? Section 2 of the election-law of 1872, under which this certificate is made and promulgated, provides:

The return of the election thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers, until set aside after contest, according to law, of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected.

What is prima facie evidence? It is that which on its face is sufficient to establish a fact, but which may be controverted. And when the law under which this certificate is made declares that it shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers, it does in effect declare that it may be contradicted in all courts of justice and before all civil officers.

Again, were Levissee and Brewster duly appointed? The act of Congress requires that all presidential electors shall be appointed on a certain day—last year, the 7th day of November. It is conceded that on that day both Levissee and Brewster were holding offices of trust and profit under the Government of the United States. The Constitution of the United States, article 2, section 1, is as follows :

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress ; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

This provision of the Constitution applied to the case in hand is this : The State of Louisiana shall appoint eight electors ; but neither Levissee nor Brewster shall be appointed. This does not fix the qualification of electors ; but it is an inhibition upon the State in the exercise of its power to appoint. The Constitution, article 1, section 3, declares :

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years.

He may be elected before he attains to that age and take his seat, that is, become a Senator, afterward. But if the Constitution had provided that no person should be elected before he attained to that age, would any one contend that the election of one under that age could be legal and constitutional ?

It is too plain to be questioned that the Constitution, speaking to Louisiana on the 7th day of November last, forbade the State to appoint Levissee or Brewster. Is it possible, then, that that State could on that day duly appoint both of them ? Duly means legally, properly, regularly. Can that be done legally, properly, and regularly which the Constitution declares shall not be done at all ? It has become an axiom in our constitutional jurisprudence that what the Constitution says shall not be done cannot, in a legal sense, be done. An attempt to do it is void, an absolute nullity, accomplishing nothing. It was at one time contended that an act of Congress in conflict with the Constitution was prima facie valid, a de facto law, valid as to persons acting under it, until set aside by judicial determination. But that sophism was instantly rejected. Such a law is ab initio and always absolutely void, mere blank paper in the statute-book. It follows that an attempt to appoint a person an elector of whom the Constitution declares that he shall not be appointed, is simply and absolutely void ; not voidable, but void.

In the counting of presidential votes in 1837 the Houses raised a joint committee to consider the subject. On the part of the Senate Henry Clay, Silas Wright, and Felix Grundy, three great names in our history, were appointed. The report, in which they concurred, says :

The committee are of opinion that the second section of the second article of the Constitution, which declares that "no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector," ought to be carried in its whole spirit into rigid execution. * * * This provision of the Constitution, it is believed, excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors ; and the disqualification relates to the time of the appointment, and that a resignation of the office of deputy postmaster after his appointment as elector, would not entitle him to vote as elector, under the Constitution.

Second. Having shown, as I think, that no electors have been duly appointed in Louisiana, and, at all events, that Levissee and Brewster were not duly appointed, I come now to the second question : whether, inasmuch as these persons have in fact acted, they are to be regarded as de facto electors, and their votes are to be counted as the electoral vote of the State.

The ground upon which a de facto officer stands is that his election or appointment, though voidable, is not void. But I have attempted to show that the pretended appointment of Levissee and Brewster was in the technical sense absolutely void. In other words, as to them there was a failure to elect. The case was as though the voters had cast ballots with six names instead of eight, thereby appointing six instead of eight electors for the State.

The act of Congress recognizes and provides for two cases: (see Rev. Stats., sections 133 and 134.)

SEC. 133. Each State may, by law, provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

SEC. 134. Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day, in such a manner as the legislature of such State may direct.

The State had by law made no provision for the case of failure to elect. Even conceding the act of 1868 to be in force it made no provision for such case, although it did provide for filling a vacancy occurring after a legal election. But upon the theory contended for by our opponents, that the act of 1872 was the only law in force at the last election, then the only provision for filling even a vacancy was that it should be filled by a popular election. So that the election of Levissee and Brewster by the electoral college was unauthorized and void, and their votes should be rejected.

Again, it is well settled that the principle that the acts of de facto public officers are valid in regard to the public and third persons, is confined to those who hold office under some color of election or appointment and are in the exercise of continuous official acts, being recognized by the public as filling the office to which they pretend. (See Vaccari vs. Maxwell, 3 Blackford, 368.) It is manifest that electors cannot be considered as de facto officers within this definition, nor within any definition ever laid down by the courts upon the subject.

V.

But again this Commission is required by the act of Congress to—Decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States.

Now, conceding that this Commission cannot inquire into the regularity of the election under the constitution and laws of the State, nor redress the frauds committed by the returning-board, and conceding that this Commission is estopped by the certificates of State officials as to what persons received the greatest number of votes for electors, still it is submitted that whether the persons who were duly elected, so far as votes were concerned, were authorized to act in the electoral college and cast votes for President and Vice-President, is a question to be settled, as to Levissee and Brewster, by the Constitution of the United States; and that every Federal tribunal, the judicial courts, and the two Houses of Congress are bound, in every act they perform, to give effect to the Federal Constitution.

It is clear that no person can vote for President and Vice-President who is not an elector of the State. The provision of the Constitution, article 2, section 1, is as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

Every lawyer will concede that a person who is forbidden by the Constitution to be appointed an elector is equally forbidden by the Constitution to be an elector or to cast a vote for President or Vice-President. The provision of the Constitution that no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector strikes at the very root of the matter, because if he cannot be appointed he cannot be an elector, cannot vote for President or Vice-President. In other words, he violates the Constitution by acting and voting in the electoral college. Every vote cast by such person in the electoral college is a violation of the Constitution. Now, it is an axiom in all constitutional discussions that an act done or vote cast in violation of the Constitution is no act, no vote. How, then, can this commission decide that the votes for Mr. Hayes which were cast by Levissee and Brewster are votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States. Their appointment and, consequently their votes, the Constitution forbids; and to hold that their votes are the votes provided for by the Constitution is to hold the Constitution contemplates its own violation. The only decision this Commission can make consistent with the judicial decisions and the universally received and sanctioned canons of constitutional law is that the votes cast by these persons are no votes, and that they must be excluded from the count. The most deliberate, carefully-considered act of Congress, approved by the President, is absolutely void, no act, a blank in the statute-book, if it be forbidden by the Constitution. And it would be simply shocking and monstrous, and a fatal blow to the Constitution itself, to hold that the votes cast by two persons forbidden by the Constitution to vote at all are votes provided for by the Constitution. This is a question independent of the appointment in fact by the State; it relates to the action of the college itself, which college derives its power to act at all from the Federal Constitution. How, then, can it be maintained that an act performed by one of its members, which by the Constitution he is forbidden to perform, can be a constitutional act? Can it be pretended that, when a person is forbidden by the Constitution to cast a vote, nevertheless, if he violates the Constitution and does cast it, it is a vote provided for by the Constitution?

This is the case upon which we stand, and none of the facts are seriously controverted by our opponents. Senator Howe, in substance, admits the frauds we charge; but he says that though some streams in that State are muddy with fraud, other streams run blood. I loathe the sight of blood and the thought of it. I never have vindicated nor justified the outrages committed within this State, nor shall I ever. That there have been violations of law and outrages unnumbered is unquestionable. That there have been murders, maimings, and whippings cannot be denied. But are these things to be cured by inflicting upon the State an injury more injurious to our institutions than are these bloody outrages? They fall upon individuals; if our institutions are to be stabbed, the injury falls upon the nation. If justice is to be slaughtered in her own temple, if the laws are to be sacrificed by their sworn priests, if fraud is to be solemnized and sanctioned as an instrumentality for electing a President of the United States, then farewell to hope for free institutions and for our country.

One thing more. Without making any apology for the outrages that have undoubtedly been perpetrated in this State of Louisiana, let us look for a moment at the condition of affairs there—the condition described by Messrs. Hoar, Wheeler, and Frye, the committee from whose report I have quoted. And I ask, is it a method likely to produce good feeling in that State, to keep them under a government which cannot rest upon “ascertained facts,” but which is based upon nothing but fraud and falsehood? I submit it is not. The injunction of the apostle is, “Be ye first pure, and then peaceable.” There is no assurance that authorizes any one to expect peace who is not himself in the right. Peace, in an American State, with a government forced upon it by the villainy of four men; peace, under a government resting not upon “ascertained facts,” but upon notorious falsehoods! No. Let no man hug such delusion to his bosom. Allegiance to a government and submission to its laws in this country can only be expected when that government is the choice of the people, the government of the people. So exercise your functions as to give back to that people the rights of which they have been defrauded, and you will do more to restore harmony and peace to its citizens than could be done by all the armies of the world.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President and gentlemen, this is the time when I suppose under the ruling of the Commission we shall be required to present our evidence, and we offer now——

The PRESIDENT. That was the suggestion from the bar, that after the close of the first argument you would offer some evidence.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We propose now to prove before the Commission that William P. Kellogg, who certifies as governor of the State of Louisiana to the appointment of electors of that State, which certificate is now before this Commission, is the same William P. Kellogg who by said certificate is certified to have been appointed under said election. In other words, Kellogg certifies to his own appointment as such elector. We offer that proof.

The PRESIDENT. Do you propose now to state all your offers of proof?

Mr. TRUMBULL. We did not propose to do so at once. We proposed to offer the proof. There may be some of it that the Commission might receive and others not. Our proposition now is to prove that one fact, unless there is some objection to it.

Mr. EVARTS. We object that it is not admissible.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Commission please, I suppose we are entitled to be heard upon that question.

The PRESIDENT. I feel constrained to take the advice of the Commission whether they will proceed upon your separate offers of proof or upon the whole together.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Mr. President, if the counsel would offer in writing all that they propose to prove, offer it as a whole, and also offer it in detail, it would very much simplify the labor of the Commission. The Commission could then, on consultation, determine whether the whole or whether any part was admissible. Otherwise we might be obliged to retire for consultation again and again.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then would the argument on the introduction of testimony be limited to fifteen minutes? because there are various branches of it. We could hardly argue the offer of testimony in fifteen minutes.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. If the offer were all made in that way, all that was proposed to be offered as a whole and also the various elements in detail, so that the Commission could then pass upon the whole or upon the various elements and determine what was and what was not admissible, for one I should be very much disposed to give all the time that was necessary for the discussion of its admissibility.

The PRESIDENT. I will submit the question to the Commission. Perhaps without sufficient reason as yet, I derived the impression that your offer would be made altogether, but of course in subdivisions.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Commission will allow me I am quite willing to follow the suggestion made by Mr. Justice Strong to offer the whole of our testimony at once, with the understanding that each part may be considered separately.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. You offer it as a whole and in parts?

Mr. TRUMBULL. As a whole and in parts. I am entirely willing to follow that suggestion if it meets the views of the Commission, and then we shall be allowed a reasonable time.

The PRESIDENT. I think I may assume that that is the general understanding of the Commission. If not, some member will express his dissent.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Have you a printed copy of the offer you mean to make?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; partially so.

Mr. EVARTS. The only offer of evidence that has yet been made to the Commission is to prove that Mr. Kellogg who appears in the certificate opened by the President of the Senate to be governor and Mr. Kellogg, who appears to be elector are the same person. While we regard the admission of any evidence extrinsic to the certificates that were opened by the President of the Senate as inadmissible, we should not in argument upon those certificates contend that they were not the same person.

The PRESIDENT. The counsel are now deliberating as to the form to be taken. I understand Judge Trumbull now to accept the suggestion of Mr. Justice Strong to make all the offers at the same time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; and in parts.

The PRESIDENT. Separately and together. Proceed then to state the offer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In presenting these offers of evidence, perhaps it would be well that we should have some understanding as to how much time will be permitted. I do not wish to take any unnecessary or unreasonable time in stating what we offer.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. How much time do you think it requires?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot tell, because I have not prepared an argument on this particular branch of the subject. I shall have to read the offers and briefly state what each of them is. I do not know how long it will take.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. The reading, of course, will not be counted as part of your time.

The PRESIDENT. You may proceed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have stated the first proposition, and, as I understand, the fact is conceded, although it is objected that we have no right to introduce it in evidence.

Mr. EVARTS. My statement was that we should not contend, on the face of the certificates as opened by the President of the Senate, that Mr. Kellogg governor and Mr. Kellogg elector were not the same person. That is satisfactory, I suppose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The second branch of the first offer which we make is to prove that said Kellogg was governor de facto of said State during all the months of November and December, A. D. 1876. That is in the same category, I suppose?

Mr. EVARTS. That is in the certificate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On this point we refer to the constitution of Louisiana :

ART. 117. No person shall hold or exercise at the same time more than one office of trust or profit, except that of justice of the peace or notary public.

We offer to prove that said William P. Kellogg was not duly appointed one of the electors of said State in A. D. 1876, and that the certificate is untrue in fact.

To show this we offer to prove—

1. By certified copies of the lists made out, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election in each poll and voting-place in the State, and delivered by said commissioners to the clerk of the district court wherein said polls were established, except in the parish of Orleans, and in that parish delivered to the secretary of state, that at the election for electors in the State of Louisiana, on the 7th day of November last, the said William P. Kellogg received for elector 6,300 votes less than were at said election cast for each and every of the following-named persons, that is to say : John McEnery, R. C. Wickliffe, L. Saint Martin, E. P. Poché, A. De Blanc, W. A. Seay, R. G. Cobb, K. A. Cross. (Section 43, act 1872.)

That offer of testimony involves the merits, to some extent, of our case. Your honors will remember that by the law of Louisiana the elections are held by persons denominated “ commissioners of election.” They correspond with judges of election in most of the States. There are fifty-seven parishes in the State of Louisiana, and in each parish there are a number of polls or polling-places, usually from ten to thirty. There is for each parish in the State an officer known as a supervisor of registration. This supervisor of registration is appointed by the governor of the State and he appoints all the commissioners of election throughout the State. He appoints as many places for voting as he pleases, and these voting-places are presided over by the commissioners whom he appoints. The governor appoints fifty-six supervisors, one for each parish outside of Orleans, and each of these supervisors appoints all the commissioners of election, and the commissioners of election designate as many places for holding the election as they please and fix the points where the elections are to be held. We complain very seriously of this arrangement. You will observe that it places the entire machinery of the election in the hands of the governor, and it is in evidence here that these supervisors were all of one party. The commissioners of election are required by the law to be of different parties, but they were generally all of one party. They were all selected by the supervisor of registration.

The law further provides that this canvassing-board for the State, (called returning-officers,) which under the law is to consist of five persons to be elected by the senate and composed of different political parties, shall canvass the returns of the commissioners of election. They take an oath that they will compile and canvass the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election. That is their oath and that is the statute. In the second section, if you will refer to it, you will find that they are required to canvass and compile the statements of the votes sent by the commissioners of election. Those commissioners of election are required under the law to make out duplicate returns upon the close of the polls. One of these duplicates they send to the clerk of the parish. They also send the ballot-boxes to the clerk of the parish.

I will not stop to read it; but the law is very specific as to the duties of these commissioners of election, how they are to make up their returns, and what they are to do with the ballots. They are to make up their returns, you will observe, in duplicate, and one of these duplicates goes to the supervisor of registration of the parish, from which he makes up consolidated returns and sends them to this board of returning-officers for the State. Our offer in this instance is to prove by certified copies of the lists made up, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election at each poll and voting-place in the State, and delivered into the clerk's offices throughout the State, except the city of New Orleans, in what is known as Orleans Parish, where they are delivered to the secretary of state; so that there is in the State of Louisiana a perfect return from every voting-place in the State, made by the commissioners of election to this board of returning-officers, and there is a duplicate in the clerk's offices, the same that the board of returning-officers have before them. From that we say it will appear that the majority given to what are denominated here as the Tilden electors varied from six to nine thousand, speaking in round numbers. We offer now to show that to this tribunal by certified copies of these papers, that you may see what the fact is.

Then the question arises, what is this tribunal? That has been gone over by all the counsel who have spoken; but I trust you will pardon me for stating very briefly my view of what this tribunal is and what its duties are.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Before you proceed to that consideration, allow me to ask you a question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. The action of what is said to be the canvassing-board—that is, the canvassing-board created by the act of 1872—the result at which they arrived, is not before us, I think.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; we propose to present those results to you; that is one of our propositions.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Very well. Then I understand that that is one of your propositions.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That will be one of our propositions.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. But thus far it is not before us.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps I shall be better understood, and the Commission will better understand the state of the case, if I anticipate a little, then, what we propose in that regard.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Give us all your offers first, and the argument afterward.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Shall I read the whole paper through?

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. I think you had better give us all your offers at once.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to that, if it is agreeable to the Commission.

2. In connection with the certified copies of said lists we offer to prove that the returning-board, which pretended to canvass the said election under the act approved November 20, 1872, did not receive from any poll, voting-place, or parish in said State, nor have before them, any statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election in form as required by section 26 of said act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences which prevented or tended to prevent a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place.

3. We further offer to show that in many instances the supervisors of registration of the several parishes willfully and fraudulently omitted from their consolidated statement, returned by them to the State returning-board, the result and all mention of the votes given at certain polls or voting-places within their respective parishes, as shown to them by the returns and papers returned to said supervisors by the commissioners of election, as required by law; and that, in consequence of this omission, the said consolidated statements on their face omitted of majorities against the said Kellogg, and in favor of each and every the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross, amounting to 2,267; but that said supervisors of registration did, as by law required, return to the said returning-board, with their consolidated statements, the lists, papers, and returns received by them according to law from the commissioners of election at the several polls and voting-places omitted as aforesaid from said consolidated statements of said supervisors.

And that the said returning-board willfully and fraudulently neglected and refused to make any canvass of the majorities so omitted, or estimate them in any way in their pretended determination that the said Kellogg was duly elected an elector at the election aforesaid.

4. We offer to show that, by the consolidated statements returned to said returning-board by the supervisors of registration of the several parishes of the State of the result of the voting at the several polls or voting-places within their parishes respectively, it appeared that said Kellogg received at said election 3,459 less votes for elector than the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross, and each and every one of them.

5. We further offer to show that the said returning-board willfully and fraudulently estimated and counted as votes in favor of said Kellogg 234 votes which were not shown to have been given at any poll or voting-place in said State, either by any consolidated statement returned to said returning-board by any of the said supervisors, or by the statements, lists, tally-sheets, or returns made by any commissioners of election to any of said supervisors, or which were before said returning-board.

6. We offer to prove that the votes cast and given at said election on the 7th of November last for the election of electors, as shown by the return made by the commissioners of election from the several polls or voting-places in said State, have never been compiled or canvassed; and that the said returning-board never even pretended to compile or canvass the returns made by said commissioners of election, but that said returning-board only pretended to canvass the returns made by the said supervisor. (Act of 1872, section 43: "Supervisor must forward;" act of 1872, section 2: "Board must canvass.")

7. We offer to prove that the votes given for electors at the election of November 7 last at the several voting-places or polls in said State have never been opened by the governor of the said State in presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, and a district judge of the district in which the seat of government was established, nor in the presence of any of them; nor has the governor of said State ever, in presence as aforesaid, examined the returns of the commissioners of election for said election to ascertain therefrom, nor has he ever, in such presence, ascertained therefrom, the persons who were, or whether any one was, duly elected electors or elector, at said election; nor has he ever pretended so to do. (Revised Statutes, section 2826.)

8. We further offer to prove that the said William P. Kellogg, governor as aforesaid, when he made, executed, and delivered the said certificate, by which he certified that himself and others had been duly appointed electors as aforesaid, well knew that said certificate was untrue in fact in that behalf, and that he, the said Kellogg, then well knew that he, the said Kellogg, had not received of the legal votes cast at the election of November 7, 1876, for electors, within five thousand of as many of such votes as had at said election been cast and given for each and every of the said McEnery, Wickliffe, Saint Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross; and that he, the said Kellogg, when he made and executed the aforesaid certificate, well knew that of the legal votes cast at the popular election held in the State of Louisiana on the 7th day of November last, for the election of electors in said State, as shown by the lists, returns, and papers sent according to law by the commissioners of election, who presided over and conducted the said election at the several polls and voting-places in said State, to the supervisors of registration, and as shown by the said lists, returns, papers, and ballots deposited by said commissioners of election in the office of the clerks of the district courts, except the parish of Orleans, and deposited for the parish of Orleans in the office of secretary of state, according to law, that each and every the said McEnery, Wickliffe, Saint Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had received more than five thousand of the legal votes cast at said election for electors more than had been cast and given at said election for the said Kellogg as elector, and that the said McEnery, Wickliffe, Saint Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had been thus and thereby duly appointed electors for said State in the manner directed by the legislature of said State.

9. We further offer to prove that at the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, in the month of October, A. D. 1876, the said William P. Kellogg, J. H. Burch, Peter Joseph, L. A. Sheldon, Morris Marks, A. B. Levissee, O. H. Brewster, Oscar Joffrion, S. B. Packard, John Ray, Frank Morey, Hugh J. Campbell, D. J. M. A. Jewett, H. C. Dibble, Michael Hahn, B. P. Blanchard, J. R. G. Pitkin, J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson, G. Casanave, L. M. Kenner, George P. Davis, W. L. Catlin, C. C. Nash, George L. Smith, Isadore McCormick, and others entered into an unlawful and criminal combination and conspiracy to and with each other, and each to and with each of the others, to cause it to be certified and returned to the secretary of state, by the returning-board of said State, upon their pretended compilation and canvass of the election for electors to be thereafter held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, that the said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion had received a majority of all votes given and cast at said election for electors, whether such should be the fact or not; and

That afterward, to wit, on the 17th day of November, A. D. 1876, after said election had been held and it was well known to all of said conspirators that said Kellogg and others had not been elected at said election, but had been defeated, and their opponents had been elected at said election, the said returning-board assembled at the city of New Orleans, the seat of government of said State, to pretend to compile and canvass the statement of votes made by the commissioners of election from the several polls and voting-places in said State for presidential electors, and make returns of said election to the secretary of state, as required by an act of the legislature of that State, approved November 20, 1872; that when said returning-board so assembled, said Wells, said Anderson, said Kenner, and said Casanave, who were all members of one political party, to wit, the republican party, were the only members of said board; there being one vacancy in said board, which vacancy it was the duty of said Wells, said Anderson, said Kenner, and said Casanave, as members of said board, to fill, then and there, by the election or appointment of some person belonging to some other political party than the republican party; but that the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave then and there, in pursuance of said unlawful and criminal combination aforesaid, neglected and refused to fill said vacancy, for the reason, as assigned by them, that they did not wish to have a democrat to watch the proceedings of said board; and that, although frequently during the session of said board assembled for the purpose aforesaid, they, the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, were duly, and in writing, requested by said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross to fill said vacancy, they refused to do so, and never did fill the same, but proceeded, as such board, in pursuance of said combination and conspiracy, to make a pretended compilation and canvass of said election without filling the vacancy in said returning-board; and

That said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, while pretending to be in session as a returning-board for the purpose of compiling and canvassing the said election, and in pursuance of said combination and conspiracy, employed persons of notoriously bad character to act as their clerks and assistants, to wit, one Davis, a man of notoriously bad character, who was then under indictment in the criminal courts of Louisiana, and said Catlin, said Blanchard, and said Jewett, three of said conspirators, who were then under indictment for subornation of perjury in the criminal courts of Louisiana; the said Jewett being also under indictment in one of the criminal courts of Louisiana for obtaining money under false pretenses; and Isadore McCormick, who was then under indictment in a criminal court of said State charged with murder. And that in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy aforesaid, the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting in said returning-board, confided to their said clerks and employés, said co-conspirators, the duty of compiling and canvassing all returns which were by said returning-board ordered to be canvassed and compiled; and, although thereto particularly requested by a communication, as follows:

To the honorable Returning-Board of the State of Louisiana:

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, acting as counsel for the various candidates upon the democratic-conservative ticket, State, national, and municipal, with respect show:

That the returns from various polls and parishes are inspected by this board, and the vote announced by it is merely that for governor and electors;

That the tabulation of all other votes is turned over to a corps of clerks, to be done outside of the presence of this board;

That all of said clerks are republicans, and that the democratic-conservative candidates have no check upon them, and no means to detect errors and fraudulent tabulations, or to call the attention of this board to any such wrong, if any exist;

That by this system the fate of all other candidates but governor and electors is placed in the hands of a body of republican clerks, with no check against erroneous or dishonest action on their part;

That fair play requires that some check should be placed upon said clerks, and some protection afforded to the said candidates against error or dishonest action on the part of said clerks:

Wherefore they respectfully ask that they be permitted to name three respectable persons, and that to such parties be accorded the privilege of being present in the room or rooms where said tabulation is progressing, and of inspecting the tabulation and comparing the same with the returns, and also of fully inspecting the returns, and previous to the adoption by this board of said tabulation, with a view to satisfy all parties that there has been no tampering or unfair practice in connection therewith.

Very respectfully,

F. C. ZACHARIE.
CHARLES CAVANAC.
E. A. BURKE.
J. R. ALCEE GAUTHREAUX.
HENRY C. BROWN.
FRANK MCGLOIN.

I concur herein.

H. M. SPOFFORD,

they, the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting as said board, expressly refused to permit any democrat or any person selected by democrats to be present with said clerks and assistants while they were engaged in the compilation and canvass aforesaid, or to examine into the correctness of the compilation and canvass made by said clerks and assistants as aforesaid; and that said returning-board, in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy aforesaid, and for the purpose of concealing the animus of said board and inspiring confidence in the public mind in the integrity of their proceedings, on the 18th day of November, A. D. 1876, adopted and passed a preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas this board has learned with satisfaction that distinguished gentlemen of national reputation from other States, some at the request of the President of the United States and some at the request of the national executive committee of the democratic party, are present in this city, with the view to witness the proceedings of this board in canvassing and compiling the returns of the recent election in this State for presidential electors, in order that the public opinion of the country may be satisfied as to the truth of the result and the fairness of the means by which it may have been attained;

And whereas this board recognizes the importance which may attach to the result of their proceedings, and that the public mind should be convinced of its justice by a knowledge of the facts on which it may be based: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this board does hereby cordially invite and request five gentlemen from each of the two bodies named, to be selected by themselves, respectively, to attend and be present at the meetings of this board while engaged in the discharge of its duties, under the law, in canvassing and compiling the returns and ascertaining and declaring the result of said election for presidential electors, in their capacity as private citizens of eminent reputation and high character, and as spectators and witnesses of the proceedings in that behalf of this board.

But that said returning-board, being convinced that a compilation and canvass of votes given at said election for presidential electors, made fairly and openly, would result in defeating the object of said conspiracy, and compelling said returning-board to certify that said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had been at said election duly chosen, elected, and appointed electors by the said State of Louisiana; and, in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did afterward, to wit, on the 20th day of November, A. D. 1876, adopt and pass the following rules for the better execution and carrying into effect said combination and conspiracy; that is to say:

VII.

The returning-officers, if they think it advisable, may go into secret session to consider any motion, argument, or proposition which may be presented to them; any member shall have the right to call for secret session for the above purpose.

X.

That the evidence for each contested poll in any parish, when concluded, shall be laid aside until all the evidence is in from all the contested polls in the several parishes where there may be contests, and, after the evidence is all in, the returning-officers will decide the several contests in secret session; the parties or their attorneys to be allowed to submit briefs or written arguments up to the time fixed for the returning-officers going into secret session, after which no additional argument to be received unless by special consent.

That the proceedings thus directed to be had in secret were protested against by the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross; but said board thereafter proceeded and pretended to complete their duties as such returning-board, and did perform, execute, and carry out the most important duties devolving upon said board in secret, with closed doors, and in the absence of any member of their board belonging to the democratic party or any person whatever not a member of said board not belonging to the republican party.

That the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting as said returning-board, while engaged in the compilation and canvass aforesaid, were applied to to permit the United States supervisors of election, duly appointed and qualified as such, to be present at and witness such compilation or canvass.

That application was made to said returning-board in that behalf as follows:

To the President and Members of the Returning-Board of the State of Louisiana:

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, of counsel for United States supervisors of election duly appointed and qualified as such, do hereby except, protest, and object to any ruling made this 20th day of November, 1876, or that hereafter may be made, whereby they are deprived of the right of being present during the entire canvass and compilation of the results of the election lately held in the State of Louisiana, wherein electors for President and Vice-President and members of the Forty-fifth Congress were balloted for, and the result of which said board are now canvassing.

That under the fifth section of the United States act of February 28, 1871, they are "to be and remain where the ballot-boxes are kept, at all times after the polls are open, until each and every vote cast at said time and place shall be counted, and the canvass of all votes polled be wholly completed and the proper and requisite certificate or returns made, whether said certificates or returns be required under any law of the United States or any State, territorial, or municipal law."

That under said law of the United States, District Attorney J. R. Beckwith, under date of October 30, 1872, gave his written official opinion for the instruction and guidance of persons holding the office now held by protestants, wherein said United States district attorney said:

"It cannot be doubted that the duty of the supervisors extends to the inspection of the entire election, from its commencement until the decision of its result. If the United States statutes were less explicit, there still could be no doubt of the duty and authority of the supervisors to inspect and canvass every vote cast for each and every candidate, State, parochial, and Federal, as the law of the State neither provides nor allows any separation of the election for Representatives in Congress, &c., from the election of State and parish officers. The election is in law a single election, and the power of inspection vested in law in the supervisors appointed by the court extends to the entire election, a full knowledge of which may well become necessary to defeat fraud."

In which opinion the attorney-general of the State of Louisiana coincided. Whereupon protestants claim admittance to all sessions of the returning-board, and protest against their exclusion as unwarranted by law, as informed by their attorneys has been done and is contemplated to be done hereafter in said proceedings of said board.

F. C. ZACHARIE,
E. A. BURKE,
CHAS. CAVANAC,
FRANK MCGLOIN,
J. R. A. GAUTHREUX,
H. C. BROWN,

Of Counsel.

But that said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting as such returning-board, in further pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, then and there refused to permit said United States commissioners of election to be present for the purpose aforesaid, but proceeded in their absence to the pretended compilation and canvass aforesaid.

That the said returning-board, while in session as aforesaid, for the purpose aforesaid, to wit, on the 20th day of November, 1876, adopted the following rule to govern their proceedings; that is to say:

IX.

No ex parte affidavits or statements shall be received in evidence, except as a basis to show that such fraud, intimidation, or other illegal practice had at some poll requires investigation, but the returns and affidavits authorized by law, made by officers of election or in verification of statements as required by law, shall be received in evidence as prima facie.

But that said board subsequently, while sitting as aforesaid for the purposes aforesaid, having become convinced that they could not, upon other than ex parte testimony, so manipulate the said compilation and canvass as to declare that said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion were elected electors at said election, and, in further pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did subsequently modify said rule and declare and decide that as such returning-board they would receive ex parte affidavits, under which last decision of said board over two hundred printed pages of ex parte testimony were received by said board in favor of said Kellogg and others; and afterward, when the said McEnery and others offered ex parte evidence to contradict the ex parte evidence aforesaid, the said returning-board reversed its last decision and refused to receive ex parte affidavits in contradiction as aforesaid.

And that in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy the said returning-board, in violation of a law of said State approved November 20, 1872, neglected and refused to compile and canvass the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election which were before them, according to law, for canvass and compilation as aforesaid in regard to the election of presidential electors, but that said board did, in pursuance and further execution of said combination and conspiracy, canvass and compile only the consolidated statements and returns made to them by the supervisors of registration of the several parishes of said State.

And that said returning-board, in pursuance and further execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently refuse to compile and canvass the votes given for electors at said election in more than twenty parishes of said State, as was shown and appeared by and upon the consolidated statements and returns made to them by said supervisors of said parishes.

And that said returning-board did, in said canvass and compilation, count and estimate, as a foundation for their determination in the premises, hundreds of votes which had not been returned and certified to them either by the commissioners of election in said State or by the supervisors of registration in said State, they, the said members of said board, then and there well knowing that they had no right or authority to estimate the same for the purpose aforesaid.

And that said returning-board, in further pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, knowingly, willfully, falsely, and fraudulently, did make a certificate and return to the secretary of state that said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion had received majorities of all the legal votes cast at said election of November 7, 1876, for presidential electors, they then and there well knowing that the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had received majorities of all the votes cast at said election for presidential electors, and were duly elected as the presidential electors of said State.

And that the said returning-board, in making said statement, certificate, and return to the secretary of state, were not deceived nor mistaken in the premises, but knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently made what they well knew when they made it was a false and fraudulent statement, certificate, and return; and that the said false and fraudulent statement, certificate, and return, made by said returning-board to the secretary of state in that behalf, was made by the members of said returning-board in pursuance and execution of, and only in pursuance and execution of, said unlawful combination and conspiracy.

And that said returning-board, while in session as aforesaid, for the purpose aforesaid, in further pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did alter, change, and forge, or cause to be altered, changed, and forged, the consolidated statement and return of the supervisor of registration for the parish of Vernon, in said State, in the manner following, to wit: The said consolidated statement, as made and returned to said board, showed that, of the legal votes given in said parish for electors at said election of November 7, 1876, said McEnery received 647, said Wickliffe received 647, said St. Martin received 647, said Poché received 647, said De Blanc received 647, said Seay received 647, said Cobb received 647, said Cross received 647; and that said Kellogg received none, said Burch received none, said Joseph received 2, said Brewster received 2, said Marks received 2, said Levissee received 2, said Joffrion received 2, said Sheldon received 2; and said board altered, changed, and forged, or caused to be altered, changed, and forged, said consolidated statement so as to make the same falsely and fraudulently show that the said McEnery received 469, said Wickliffe received 469, said St. Martin received 469, said Poché received 469, said De Blanc received 469, said Seay received 469, said Cobb received 469, said Cross received 469; and that said Kellogg received 178, said Burch received 178, said Joseph received 178, said Sheldon received 180, said Marks received 180, said Levissee received 180, said Brewster received 180, said Joffrion received 180; and that said returning-board, while in session as aforesaid for the purpose aforesaid, to pretend to justify the alteration and forgery of said consolidated statement, procured and pretended to act upon three forged affidavits, purporting to have been made and sworn to by Samuel Carter, Thomas Brown, and Samuel Collins—they, the said members of said returning-board, then and there, well knowing that said pretended affidavits were false and forged, and that no such persons were in existence as purported to make said affidavits.

And that said members of said returning-board, acting as said board, in pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did, in their pretended canvass and compilation of the legal votes given at said election, on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, for presidential electors in said State of Louisiana, as shown to them by the statements, papers, and returns made according to law by the commissioners of election presiding over and conducting said election at the several polls and voting-places in said State, all of which votes were legally cast by legal voters in said State, at said election, knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently, and without any authority of law whatever, exclude and refuse to count and estimate, or compile or canvass, votes given at said election for electors, as follows, which papers, statements, and returns were before them, and which it was their duty by law to compile and canvass; that is to say, for said John McEnery, 10,280; for said R. C. Wickliffe, 10,293; for said L. St. Martin, 10,291; for said F. P. Poché, 10,280; for said A. De Blanc, 10,289; for said W. A. Seay, 10,291; for said R. A. Cobb, 10,261; for said K. A. Cross, 10,288; they, the said members of said returning-board, then and there, well knowing that all of said votes, which they neglected and refused to canvass and compile, had been duly and legally cast at said election for presidential electors by legal voters of said State; and then and there well knowing that, had they considered, estimated, and counted, compiled and canvassed said votes, as they then and there well knew it was their duty to do, it would have appeared, and they would have been compelled to certify and return to the secretary of state, that said Kellogg had not been duly elected or appointed an elector for said State, but that at said election the said McEnery, the said Wickliffe, the said St. Martin, the said Poché, the said De Blanc, the said Seay, the said Cobb, and the said Cross had been duly elected and appointed presidential electors in said State.

And that by said false, fraudulent, willful, and corrupt acts and omissions to act by said returning-board as aforesaid in the matter aforesaid, and by said nonfeasance, misfeasance, and malfeasance of said returning-board, as hereinbefore mentioned, the said returning-board made to the secretary of state of said State the statement, certificate, and return upon which the said Kellogg, as de facto governor of said State, pretended to make his said false certificate, certifying that himself and others had been duly appointed electors for said State, as hereinbefore mentioned; and that said statement, certificate, and return made by said returning-board, and that the said certificate made by the said Kellogg, as de facto governor, each, every, and all were made in pursuance and execution of said unlawful and criminal combination and conspiracy, as was well known to and intended by each and every of the members of said returning-board when they made their said false statement, certificate, and return to the secretary of state of said State, and by the said Kellogg when, as governor de facto of said State, he made his said false certificate hereinbefore mentioned.

III. We further offer to prove that Oscar Joffrion was, on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, supervisor of registration of the parish of Point Coupée, and that he acted and officiated as such supervisor of registration for said parish at the said election for presidential electors on that day; and that he is the same person who acted as one of the electors for said State, and on the 6th day of December, A. D. 1876, as an elector, cast a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States.

IV. We further offer to prove that, on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, A. B. Levissee, who was one of the pretended college of electors of the State of Louisiana, and who in said college gave a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was at the time of such election a court commissioner of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana; which is an office of honor, profit, and trust under the Government of the United States.

V. We further offer to prove that, on the 7th day of November, A. D.

1876, O. H. Brewster, who was one of the pretended electors in the pretended college of electors of the State of Louisiana, and who in said college gave a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States, and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was, at the time of such election as aforesaid, holding an office of honor, profit, and trust under the Government of the United States, namely, the office of surveyor-general of the land-office for the district of Louisiana.

VI. We further offer to prove that, on the 7th day of November, 1876, Morris Marks, one of the pretended electors, who in said college of electors cast a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States, and a vote for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was, ever since has been, and now is, holding and exercising the office of district attorney of the fourth judicial district of said State, and receiving the salary by law attached to said office.

VII. We further offer to prove that, on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, J. Henri Burch, who was one of the pretended electors who in said pretended electoral college gave a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and a vote for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was holding the following offices under the constitution and laws of said State, that is to say: member of the board of control of the State penitentiary, also administrator of deaf and dumb asylum of said State, to both of which offices he had been appointed by the governor with the advice and consent of the senate of said State, both being offices with salaries fixed by law, and also the office of treasurer of the parish school-board for the parish of East Baton Rouge; and that said Burch, ever since the said 7th day of November, (and prior thereto,) has exercised and still is exercising the functions of all said offices and receiving the emoluments thereof.

VIII. We further offer to prove the canvass and compilation actually made by said returning-board, showing what parishes and voting-places and polls were compiled and canvassed, and what polls or voting-places were excluded by said returning-board from their canvass and compilation of votes given for presidential electors; and we also offer to show what statements and returns of the commissioners of election and of the supervisors of registration were duly before said returning-board.

IX. We further offer to prove that a member of said returning-board offered to receive a bribe in consideration of which the board would certify the election of the Tilden electors.

X. We offer to prove that the statements and affidavits purporting to have been made and forwarded to said returning-board in pursuance of the provisions of section 26 of the election-law of 1872, alleging riot, tumult, intimidation, and violence at or near certain polls and in certain parishes, were falsely fabricated and forged by certain disreputable persons under the direction and with the knowledge of said returning-board, and that said returning-board, knowing said statements and affidavits to be false and forged, and that none of said statements or affidavits was made in the manner or form required by law, did, knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently fail and refuse to canvass or compile more than ten thousand votes lawfully cast, as is shown by the statements of votes of the commissioners of election.

XI. We further offer to prove that said returning-board did willfully and fraudulently pretend to canvass and compile and did promulgate as having been canvassed and compiled certain votes for the following-named candidates for electors which were never cast and which did not appear upon any tally-sheet, statement of votes, or consolidated statement or other return before said board, namely: J. H. Burch, 241; Peter Joseph, 1,362; L. A. Sheldon, 1,364; Morris Marks, 1,334; A. B. Levissee, 829; O. H. Brewster, 776; Oscar Joffrion, 1,364.

Mr. EVARTS. Has the Commission given any direction as to the length of time for discussing the question of admissibility?

The PRESIDENT. I have no instructions on the subject.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I think some time should be fixed. There being so many offers, fifteen minutes would hardly be sufficient. There ought to be some reasonable time.

The PRESIDENT. Does any one submit a motion?

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I should like to know how much time the counsel would desire to argue all these objections in the mass.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. I understood the decision to be that the argument on the offer of evidence would come out of the time allowed to counsel on either side. It was understood this morning that the reading of the offers should not be counted as part of the time. That was fair; but I think the presentation of the evidence is as much a part of the presentation of the case as the rest of the argument. It seems to me that we are breaking our rules, if we allow further time than four and a half hours on each side.

The PRESIDENT. Let us first hear the counsel answer the inquiry. I think we ought to have that answer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On consultation with the gentlemen with whom I am associated, they think that we should have three hours on each side, an hour apiece to each counsel. Each of the gentlemen associated with me desires to present his views; and we think, as suggested by one of the Commissioners, or at least I do, that this does involve to a great extent any argument that will afterward take place.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Mr. President, I did not understand the order which the court made in regard to time, as Mr. Justice Bradley understood it. I did not understand the order we made as requiring that the time occupied in the offer of evidence, or objections that might be made to its admissibility, or arguments made in support of its admissibility, should be taken out of the four and a half hours which we agreed to allow for general argument on each side. I agree, sir, that in one aspect of the case the evidence which is offered is substantially the whole case; in another aspect of the case it is not. I think counsel ought to be allowed a reasonable time for the argument of the question whether this evidence thus proposed is admissible or not. It seems to me that three hours on this interlocutory question is rather large. I should be willing to give what we gave in the Florida case, two hours. I think counsel ought to be content with that.

The PRESIDENT. Do you move that?

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. I move that two hours be allowed.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Commissioner Strong moves that counsel be allowed two hours on a side for the argument of the question of the admissibility of the evidence offered and objections thereto.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Mr. President, I cannot help saying that it does seem to me that counsel on both sides would aid this Commission in arriving with a reasonable degree of expedition and not unreasonable haste at the conclusion to which they must arrive one time or another, and this whole thing should be settled by letting the evidence come in, subject to exception, and then arguing the question. If the four hours and a half that we have allowed are not sufficient for that purpose because of the introduction of the element of the competency or incompetency of the testimony, then that time can be enlarged; but to fritter our time away with arguments upon the admissibility of this point of testimony or that particular item of testimony, instead of treating this subject in a large view and letting the testimony come in subject to exception on both sides, and then arguing its competency and its relevancy as well as the merits of the case, seems to me to be making of this tribunal a court of common pleas instead of the tribunal which it is.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. I will remark that there is no motion before the Commission except that of allowing two hours on a side to the counsel to argue the question. Having permitted discussion by Mr. Thurman, I will also allow Senator Edmunds to proceed.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That was precisely the question, Mr. President, that I was about to speak to. The length of time required for the discussion of this question depends on whether counsel are to discuss the offer of testimony as a mere technical question of whether a particular species of testimony is competent to prove a particular fact that is relevant to the matter, or whether the fact itself proposed is one which falls within the scope of the consideration of the Commission. Inasmuch as we understand from the preceding case exactly how this question arises, really, as Judge Strong has said, in one aspect of the case, the discussion of the question of the admissibility of this testimony, and so of its legal effect, or the question of its materiality in point of law, covers the whole ground. If, therefore, counsel can so manage as to argue the whole subject presented by this offer, as well its materiality as the result that must be drawn from it if the facts were proved, then if the Commission should be of opinion that it was not competent in its judgment to go into that species of proof, that would be an end of the matter. On the other hand if the Commission should be of opinion that it was competent to go into the proof or some portion of it—of course I am not speaking of everything—then we should have already determined the relevancy and effect of the facts if they should be established and not counteracted by counter-proof, and should have made, as it appears to me, more rapid progress than in any other way.

The difficulty about taking proof provisionally, as I understand the other side's attitude, is that if you take proof provisionally on the part of the objectors to certificate No. 1, then you must take proof provisionally on the part of those who support certificate No. 1; and we at once, if I correctly understood the statement of the objectors, go into an indefinite period of taking testimony on the part of the supporters of certificate No. 1 to prove that the very circumstances did exist under which, if this law of Louisiana be constitutional and applies to this case, it was the duty of this board to proceed to reject polls, and so on; and they would ask us on the same principle to waive for the time being the question as to whether preliminary steps had been taken and to take the evidence and then consider whether it was competent for this canvassing-board to receive testimony owing to a defect in the want of protest, or whatever it might be. The result, therefore, of taking evidence provisionally on both sides (for we must on both sides if on either) would be that we might find ourselves at the end of a week or ten days in the attitude of just discovering, as it is possible we might—I express no opinion about it and have none to express—that we had wasted all this time in going into a range of inquiry that we felt, under the law, we had no right to have gone into. So I think the rule which we adopted in the Florida case would be the better one, to hear this question now argued generally upon the effect of this evidence if it should be made out, and the nature of it, and what our powers are, and so on, so that we can make definite progress in the inquiry and upon the whole of the case as it would be presented on this evidence.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. That is very much my view, that we should go on and have it argued as we had the Florida case. It might be considered if not as evidence in subject to objection, at least as evidence offered and demurred to on the other side.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. We must assume then that they can prove what they offer.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Certainly. I would add that no one can shut his eyes, it seems to me, to the fact that the discussion of the admission of this evidence and going into this inquiry is the discussion of the whole case.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Mr. President, I would ask my brothers Edmunds and Bradley whether they mean (which I think is the better course) to give what time now may be proper on all the questions in the case, including the effect of this evidence, so that, when we retire for consultation, if we should conclude that none of this evidence is to be admitted, we could then decide the whole case without coming back for another argument, giving counsel fair time to argue all the questions in the case, including the admissibility of this evidence. Of course, if in conference we determine to receive this evidence, we shall have to come back, let it be admitted, and let counter-evidence be admitted, and hear argument on its effect. If not, can it not be so argued that when we do retire on this question, if the evidence should be excluded, (about which I have no idea what the Commission will hold,) the law will then have been argued on the other papers and we shall be prepared to make a decision.

The PRESIDENT. The only question before the Commission is the motion of Judge Strong to allow two hours on a side.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I move to amend that by substituting the following order:

Ordered, That counsel now be heard on the whole subject as the case now stands, and that three hours on a side be allowed.

Mr. EVARTS. Three hours added to what is already allowed?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. No, sir; three hours now.

Mr. EVARTS. We had four and a half hours on our side yesterday. Two hours have been taken up by the other side.

The PRESIDENT. This is changing the course of the trial.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I will modify my proposition on the suggestion that part of the time has already been occupied.

The PRESIDENT. As modified, the order is:

Ordered, That counsel now be heard on the whole subject as the case now stands, and that four hours on a side be allowed.

It makes no deduction of what is past.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I should like to have the meaning of that order explained.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. It means, as I suppose, exactly what it says. If I read it to my friend again, perhaps he will understand it:

Ordered, That counsel now be heard on the whole subject as the case now stands, and that four hours on a side be allowed.

If I correctly understand the offer of Judge Trumbull, which has been carefully read and is perfectly perspicuous and understandable, it is that the objectors to certificate No. 1 and the supporters of certificate

No. 2 propose to prove certain things. The counsel on the other side object to that as irrelevant and incompetent in this consideration. So that if we now proceed on the subject as the case now stands, it opens the effect of this evidence, as we must take it to be capable of being proved as a matter of course as we now argue it; and the whole duty of this Commission upon the subject, if we decide that it is not within our power under the law to go into an inquiry of that kind, will be disposed of. If we decide that it is in our power to go into a part of the inquiry, then we go into it. If we hold that it is within our power to go into the whole inquiry, we so decide and the evidence proceeds. I think there is no difficulty in understanding it.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I really meant no disrespect to my brother; but I did not understand it. If he means four hours on a side to argue the admissibility of this testimony, it is one thing.

The PRESIDENT. And its effect.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. If he means that the whole case is to be submitted after four hours have been exhausted on each side, then that strikes me as a singular proposition for several reasons. In the first place, one of the sides has already occupied two hours. The proposition then would give to them the advantage of two hours in the argument, give them six hours instead of four.

But again, if, without deciding whether we have anything in evidence at all, without counsel knowing whether we have anything in evidence at all, we are to fix a time to have the whole case submitted and the argument finally closed and then we retire and give our final decision, upon my word I do not know what kind of a judicial proceeding that would be.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Mr. President, let me suggest that the proposed order does not provide that we shall give a final decision; it does not provide that we shall give any decision at all, nor what that decision shall be. It says that we shall hear argument upon the whole case as it now stands, on the effect of the certificates and papers submitted by the President of the Senate and the effect of the offer of testimony. It is easy to see that under such an argument, whether it be long or short, (and I have nothing to say about what its length should be,) when we retire, if this testimony is to be admitted, we have got to come back and let it be submitted and argued; and if it is to be excluded, then the other question of the effect of the papers submitted and the whole of the case will have been argued, and we can then decide the whole case. That I understand to be the purport and object of the order.

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. Mr. President, what is the precise meaning of the words "as the case now stands," if, as has been said by my brother Bradley, the case is to be treated as if on a demurrer to evidence, which considers the evidence before the court, the effect of it simply being in question? If therefore this argument is to proceed upon the basis of the facts which have been offered to be proved being proved and before the court, that is one thing. Then the argument would have for its basis the law as applied to the facts stated by counsel here to us. If that be the understanding, that we are to hear this case as if it were upon a demurrer to testimony, we know what that means; and if after that judgment there will be again argument in case it is desired, with that understanding I shall be content.

Mr. Commissioner FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I should like to know from the objectors to certificate No. 2 whether this time is satisfactory to them. If it is, I shall vote for it. If it is not, inasmuch as the other side have already occupied two hours, I should want the rule made uniform.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Mr. President, I understand, in answer to the suggestion made by Senator Bayard, that this is an argument not only upon the competency of the evidence offered as upon a demurrer to evidence, but it is in addition an argument upon the whole case, so that when this argument is once made we are to decide the whole case unless we admit the testimony. It is not an argument simply upon a demurrer to the testimony, as to the effect of the testimony, but it is an argument upon that and also upon the whole merits of the case if there is anything else outside of this question of testimony. Now, sir, I object for one to mixing up the two matters together. I am content, as suggested by Judge Strong, to take an argument upon this offer of testimony as upon a demurrer to testimony. Let us hear the effect of that testimony argued, whether we will or will not admit it; and then if we agree to admit it, very well; if we agree not to admit it, let us have the argument upon what is left of this case, distinct and independent and by itself. I think the statement made by Judge Strong on that matter covers the whole case. The course now proposed is mixing up two matters which necessarily have no sort of connection with each other.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. President, that would be true if we had unlimited time, and I should quite agree that it would be more convenient to hear the precise point argued on the offer of a particular piece of testimony, just as a court would; but we ought not to forget that time is running very fast and we only have a dozen or thirteen days more within which to dispose of this case and every other that may come to us, and that there are twenty five States, or something like that number, whose voice in this question has not been unsealed, and cannot be until a report is made upon this case. Therefore, to save time, it appears to me that it would be better to argue the case as it now stands, upon the admissibility of this testimony and upon the attitude the case would occupy if the testimony were not admitted, in order that in one event we should be able to make proper and diligent haste and not undue haste, and in the other event we then should have eliminated difficulties and should be ready to go on with the testimony.

The PRESIDENT. I desire to say one word. If the order relates only to the evidence and its effect, I will vote for it. If it embraces not only the offer of evidence and its effect, but also the effect of the certificates and of the evidence which accompanies them and all the other papers submitted to us, I will vote against it.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not understand what is meant by speaking of a demurrer to evidence before this tribunal. Do we proceed by a demurrer to evidence? If we do, we are to give judgment when we overrule that demurrer; that is an end of the case. Furthermore, if we proceed by the technical rules of a demurrer to evidence, then the party who demurs is subject to every possible inference and suggestion that can be drawn from that testimony—every one that is possible. He is subjected to the disadvantages of it. Is that meant here? What is this but a simple objection to evidence, not a demurrer to evidence? I do not understand that the technical rules as to demurrers to evidence apply in this case at all.

If the Commission think that the course pursued in the Florida case is the best way, and will now hear argument on the admissibility of this testimony and then decide that question, and if decided one way, decided in favor of the admissibility, then receive the testimony, and if decided against it, then let the argument take place upon the papers that have been laid before us and which all admit to be in evidence, well and good. Then it is only a question of how much time should be allowed to either side to argue the question of the admissibility of the evidence. I am in favor of a liberal time for that purpose; but I agree with my brother Abbott that if we are to treat the case in that way, let us keep the questions separate. I think a very much better way would be to consider all the testimony in and argue this case on its full merits with reference to the competency of the testimony, and allow ample time to do it; but if that is not agreeable to the Commission, then the only other way that I see is to allow a reasonable time to argue the question of the admissibility of this testimony.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I only desire to say that I used the term "demurrer to evidence" not in its strictest technical sense. I think the Senator from Ohio and myself do not differ as to what we desire. I suppose that the argument of this question of the offer of evidence is upon the objection to the evidence, but it is to be treated precisely as if the evidence was before us, and if it was before us what would be the effect of that evidence upon the objection to the evidence? I only used the term "demurrer to the evidence" as a convenient way of expressing what I meant. God knows I do not desire to import into this tribunal any technical rules and count in or count out a President of the United States upon a technical rule.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I have been anticipated in a great part by the observations that have fallen from Mr. Commissioner Thurman. I wished to guard against any implication by our silence that we assented to the position of counsel who were objecting to the admissibility of evidence as being equivalent to that of counsel who admitted the evidence and demurred to its effect. We certainly do not intend to place ourselves in the position of treating the evidence as if already in and arguing then.

The PRESIDENT. In arguing the question, must we not proceed on the ground that those who offer it can prove it?

Mr. EVARTS. Undoubtedly, and then you determine whether it is admissible.

The PRESIDENT. That is the exact state of the case.

Mr. EVARTS. That is the situation; but a demurrer to evidence concedes it to be already in and says, "What happens then?" We wish to guard against that implication and simply that. Now, in regard to the question that Mr. Commissioner Frelinghuysen put to us, it certainly would seem to enlarge a little the area of argument imposed upon us when, in addition to what was supposed to be the duty imposed upon counsel when four and a half hours were allowed to each side, there is now by introduction of this offer of evidence a somewhat separate consideration. But we agree entirely on our part to the method suggested of hearing the question of the admissibility of the evidence, and then also the question of what would be the result if it were excluded and the certificates opened by the President of the Senate were the only matters before the Commission. The argument of both may properly proceed together; so that if the Commission, retiring from that completed argument, should hold that this evidence was to be excluded and that all the evidence before them was included in the certificates opened by the President of the Senate, it would have heard the argument on that subject.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the order submitted by Senator Edmunds:

Ordered, That counsel now be heard on the whole subject as the case now stands, and that four hours on a side be allowed.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. Mr. President, I am very much opposed, as one member of the Commission, to that order. There are eleven or twelve propositions stated by counsel of what they propose to prove; and under the rules of this Commission one counsel on a side can be heard on each one of those propositions for fifteen minutes. That would make more time than we now propose by this motion to allow for the argument of the merits as well as the argument of the interlocutory question. I do not understand the reason or the propriety of compelling counsel to argue, upon this first proposition as to the admissibility of evidence, the other questions presented in the case, to wit, the constitutionality of some of these laws. They are entitled to three hours to discuss the interlocutory questions. Now, after this statement of counsel that they require the three hours for the discussion of those questions, to require them within the same time to discuss the other questions pertaining to the constitutionality of these laws—some three or four distinct propositions made in the statement of counsel—appears to me grossly unjust and grossly unfair toward the counsel who prosecute this case. I hope, therefore, that the Commission will not so regard the pressing necessity of urgent haste, on the supposition made by Senator Edmunds that there are some twenty or thirty cases yet behind this, as a reason for inflicting this unjust requisition on counsel. I hope, therefore, that the Commission will not adopt that resolution, but will confine it to interlocutory questions.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. Mr. President, in view of the very few days left, I shall be compelled to vote against any extension of time and that we proceed under the rule as it now stands. The order seems to me to be unequal in its character and in effect to give six hours to one side and four hours to the other. It seems to me that the ordinary way is the best way: first, let the question of the admissibility of the evidence be taken up and discussed; and if it should be decided to admit all of it or to admit none of it, then the effect of that which is admitted, what it proves, will be discussed. As far as I am concerned, I prefer to adhere to the rule as it now stands.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Mr. President, as I understand, proceeding with this case as the rule now stands would be, as suggested by Mr. Commissioner Payne, to give fifteen minutes on each single proposition, and if we are to act upon that I do not see that it can be prevented. Then if we have required, as we have, the counsel to present their objections all in a mass instead of separately, I do not see how we can say to them, "You shall expend your fifteen minutes upon one proposition," but they may take the whole time, it seems to me, upon the whole mass. We have massed the propositions, the offers of evidence, and why not consolidate and mass the time?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. May I ask Judge Abbott, supposing exactly the same principle applied to two propositions and two offers of evidence, would you hold that having heard one discussion of fifteen minutes and decided it you could hear the judgment of the tribunal discussed over again on the next one, which was exactly like it?

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. No, sir.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Then it would not follow that the whole twelve would take up fifteen minutes each.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I do not understand that the decision of one offer of evidence necessarily decides all the others. I do not understand that counsel are to discuss over again the judgment of the tribunal that has once been made; but if you will be kind enough, Mr. President, to read the order again, I desire to move an amendment.

The PRESIDENT. I will read it again.

Ordered, That counsel now be heard on the whole subject as the case now stands, and that four hours on a side be allowed.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. If Judge Abbott will permit me, I understand that to be an amendment offered to the order which I moved. My motion was that counsel be allowed two hours on each side to argue the question of the admissibility or inadmissibility of the evidence offered.

The PRESIDENT. I will state the question. The motion made by Judge Strong is that two hours be allowed on a side to argue the question of the admissibility of the testimony offered. Mr. Edmunds's proposition is in the nature of a motion to strike that out and insert—

Ordered, That counsel now be heard on the whole subject as the case now stands, and that four hours be allowed on a side.

The question is upon striking out and inserting.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is very obvious that this is not the ordinary question of presenting evidence in a court on an issue framed. The prime question, we all know, which lies at the foundation of this whole discussion is this: Is the constitutional power vested in the two Houses, or either of them, by the provision that they shall be present at the opening of the certificates, to hear evidence to impeach those certificates? If that power be vested in the two Houses, and through them in this Commission, then there may come up the ordinary questions of detail as to the evidence which is to be introduced, its competency, and its force. If that power be not vested in the two Houses and through them in the Commission, then to ask them to exercise it is to ask them to do exactly what is imputed as a crime to the officers whose action is now laid before the Commission, to wit, to usurp power to redress what we fancy to be a public wrong. That one question cannot be separated from the question of the admissibility of the evidence. If the evidence be inadmissible, it is inadmissible in consequence of one view of that question. If it be admissible, it is admissible in consequence of another view of that question. It seems to me, therefore, that the amendment proposed by Senator Edmunds brings up practically what we already know is and must be brought up practically in the mind of the Commission in any form of the discussion.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon striking out the motion made by Judge Strong and inserting the one made by Senator Edmunds.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I wish to make a single remark. The proposition of Judge Strong proceeds upon the supposition, which is the fact, that our order of last night, which is partially executed, has been arrested by an interlocutory question. The order last night was that we should proceed to hear counsel four and a half hours on each side, and as far as anything before us then was concerned, it was on the final question. That order is partly executed; two hours have been consumed on one side; but we are now arrested by an interlocutory question of the offer of proof and the admissibility of evidence. It seems to me much the plainest, much the easiest mode, to arrest our progress here and hear that question argued, as Judge Strong moves, for two hours on a side. That being settled, we proceed to execute the other order which has half been executed by hearing argument for two hours on one side; two hours and a half more are to be heard on that side and four and a half on the other, and that closes it. I shall vote against the amendment and in favor of Judge Strong's motion.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN I wish there may be no misunderstanding as to the effect of this amendment or substitute. As I understand it, it is this, that after four hours of argument on each side the Commission shall go into consultation; if they decide against receiving the testimony, then without further argument they shall proceed to decide the case. I hope that that will be understood. That is the proposition.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That is as I understand it.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. That we hear eight hours' argument, four on a side, and then go into consultation. Then if the decision be to receive the testimony, we come into open session again and hear it, and then argument follows, as a matter of course. If we decide not to receive it, then without any further argument we decide the whole case. That is the proposition in substance. I rather incline to think that the course suggested by Mr. Justice Strong is better than that, provided the time be extended. I do not believe that the admissibility of this testimony can be argued on either side within two hours, and, therefore, as it is in order to move to perfect the original motion before a substitute is voted on, I move to strike out "two" in Judge Strong's motion and insert "four."

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Only three hours are asked for.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Three, then, I will say.

The PRESIDENT. The first question is on perfecting the motion of Judge Strong by striking out "two" and inserting "three" as the number of hours. The question is on that amendment.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE called for the yeas and nays; and being taken, they resulted—yeas 7, nays 8; as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the substitute striking out all after the word "ordered" in Judge Strong's proposition and inserting the substitute of Senator Edmunds.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE called for the yeas and nays; and being taken, they resulted—yeas 4, nays 11; as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hoar, and Miller—4.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Bradley, Clifford, Field, Garfield, Hunton, Morton, Payne, Strong, and Thurman—11.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of Judge Strong that counsel be allowed two hours on each side to argue the question of the admissibility of the offers of evidence.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, we understand upon our part, and it is important that we should not misunderstand at this stage of the matter, that when the two hours have been consumed by each side on this interlocutory matter of the introduction of evidence, the order of yesterday proceeds to be executed by two hours and a half being allowed to the other side on the merits and four and a half hours to us.

The PRESIDENT. That is my understanding, unless the Commission otherwise direct.

Mr. EVARTS. The pertinency of this suggestion will be seen when I state what I was proceeding to ask in our behalf; that is, we might be of opinion that the argument in full and satisfactorily in point of time of this interlocutory question might well be expected to shorten our final argument upon the merits; we might be allowed to take an hour from the four and a half on the merits, lessening our time in that behalf, to speak on the interlocutory question.

The PRESIDENT. There is no such power in the Chair.

Mr. EVARTS. If the Commission should retire at the end of two hours' argument nothing in supplement to that would proceed from our general discussion of the case, while our opponents have had two hours of general discussion of the case in aid of the considerations they are now presenting.

The PRESIDENT. The present decision of the Commission is that two hours be allowed on a side to discuss the question of the admissibility of the proof offered. When that is concluded, unless the Commission decide to retire, (on which the Chair will not make any determination,) the question then will be the execution of the former order, which has been in part executed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Allow me, Mr. President, to make a remark. I have the same opinion that was expressed by one of the honorable members of the Commission, that the whole merits of this case will be involved in the question of the admissibility of this evidence, because in the question of admissibility is involved the question of the effect; and therefore, I agree with the suggestion of counsel on the other side that if we find it necessary to discuss the question of admissibility at greater length than the two hours, we be allowed to continue the discussion and subtract the time so consumed from the four and a half hours allowed us on the merits.

The PRESIDENT. That is for the Commission, not for the Chair.

Mr. EVARTS. The Commission will see the great disparity in the position of the counsel for the two sides. Two hours have been occupied already in discussing the general merits of the case which involve all this question of admissibility. Now, they are to have two hours to discuss the specific question. We are to have but two hours to discuss the specific question, and then the Commission may retire upon that disparity of argument and preclude us from further argument.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Mr. President, I voted for two hours for a side on this question in consequence of the amount of time still left to discuss the main question; but the proposition now made by counsel on both sides seems to me to be a very fair one, that either side may take so much of their remaining time as they consider necessary in the discussion of this question of the admissibility of the evidence, and I move that they be permitted to do so.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

The PRESIDENT. The motion of Justice Bradley is that counsel may take such time as they desire, if any, from the time previously allowed, four and a half hours, and employ it in the discussion of the question of the admissibility of the proofs, in addition to the two hours already allowed. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. In the absence of any direction from the Commission, the Chair rules that the objectors to the offers of proof open and close.

Mr. EVARTS. That is the opposite order to that which was adopted on the former discussion.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly; but it is the rule in court and I adopt that rule in the absence of any direction from the Commission. The objectors to evidence always speak first.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. In the Florida case it was exactly the other way. I do not know what would be more convenient to counsel.

Mr. EVARTS. We had expected that the course pursued in the Florida case would have proceeded here; we had no intimation of a change.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I move, then, that those who offer the proof shall have the opening and the close.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of Senator Edmunds.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. If the counsel on both sides wish that, there can be no objection to it.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. If counsel can agree on that I should prefer that they should decide it. I think, if they can make a choice themselves, they ought to be permitted to do it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We supposed it properly came from the objectors, but upon that we are entirely willing to submit to the Commission. We are willing to open ourselves.

The PRESIDENT. Very well; then there is no need of a vote. If you are agreed, the counsel making the offer of proof will open, but the rule in court is always the other way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, and gentlemen of the Commission—

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Before Judge Trumbull begins, as we shall have to sit quite late, I move that we now take a recess for thirty minutes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Commission took a recess.

The Commission re-assembled at one o'clock and four minutes p. m.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President and gentlemen, under the ruling of the Commission, we are brought face to face with the question whether a President of the United States is to be made by forgery and conspiracy on the part of the officials whose duty it is to certify the electoral vote of a State; and it is submitted to this Commission boldly and baldly to decide that question. The power rests nowhere else. There is no tribunal in this land, judicial or otherwise, that can inquire into this matter except this Commission; and when I speak to this Commission I consider myself as addressing the two Houses of Congress assembled together for the purpose of counting the electoral votes from the various States.

Is it true that the great Republic, founded by the wisest men and the purest patriots, has made no provision against the inauguration of its Chief Magistrate by fraud, corruption, and forgery? Is that the condition to which the people of this great country are reduced? Is this our boasted freedom? Is this our great American system that has no power to protect the seat occupied by Washington and Lincoln from being filled by a person who goes to it through the forgery, fraud, and conspiracy of those who certify to the election, and thereby thwart the will of the people? I confess myself humiliated that as a citizen of this Republic, in which we all take so much pride, I am called upon to argue such a question before a national tribunal.

In my judgment, there has been a very great misconception in regard to the powers of this Commission. It is neither a canvassing-board, with the powers usually given to persons who are to determine who is elected constable in some small town, nor is it a judicial tribunal; but it is the representative of both Houses of the Congress of the United States, vested with power to go to the bottom and investigate any question that the two Houses have a right to consider. Parliamentary law, the rules and methods of proceeding by legislative assemblies, are as well established as the rules of proceeding of the common law.

You are sitting here as legislators to decide a political question, hampered by no technical rules of evidence, but having authority conferred upon you by the organic act and by parliamentary law to inform yourselves upon any question that you have a right to consider.

It has been settled, and is not now to be questioned, that the two Houses of Congress are to count the electoral vote, and you now represent those two Houses. The question has arisen and has been submitted to you, as to how many, and what, votes shall be counted from the State of Louisiana, and there is submitted to you not only that question, but the law of your organization declares that all questions "upon or in respect" to the double returns from that State have been submitted to your consideration.

Is this tribunal a lie and a cheat, to defraud the American people? When the act passed creating it, there was great satisfaction through this whole country. We were thought by some to be upon the verge of civil war. There was great danger of collision in the land, of the inauguration of two Presidents, and the consequences were dreaded by every well-wisher to his country. When the act passed creating this Commission it was felt that, whatever might be its decision, it would receive the sanction of the whole people; for however much partisans of one candidate or the other might be disappointed, all good men felt that it was vastly more important that whoever succeeded to the Presidency should succeed as the legitimate choice of the people, than that any particular man should be installed by fraud.

Is it to turn out that this Commission was formed for the mere purpose of doing a sum in arithmetic, of adding up certain figures? When it was said to the country that it was to decide "all questions upon or in respect to such double returns," did it mean nothing more than that you should compute the number of votes appearing on the returns? When the oath was taken "to examine and consider all questions submitted," did that mean that you were simply to add up a set of figures? Do "examination and consideration" apply to a mere mathematical proposition of that kind?

But you are required by the law to proceed to consider the objections and to decide what? To decide "whether any and what votes from the State of Louisiana are the votes provided by the Constitution, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in that State." Can you consider how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in the State of Louisiana without inquiring whether the certificate that is read here is a forgery or the result of forgery and a conspiracy? We offer to prove that William P. Kellogg, whose certificate is before you, was a conspirator with others, fraudulently to alter the return of the election and that his certificate is false. We offer to prove that the canvassing-board, upon the action of which his certificate was based, through its president, offered the vote of the State for sale in the markets of the country, and are you only here to count that vote? Is there a man in America fit to be, I will not say President, but fit to be a constable, that would take office through such a source? What the country wants is a decision of the question as to who is duly elected. With that the country will be satisfied, and with nothing else.

I said you were clothed with power to investigate this subject, because it is submitted for your consideration, and I beg leave to refer to an elementary book for authority for what I have said. In Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, at page 253, section 634, it is said :

It has always, at least practically, been considered to be the right of legislative assemblies to call upon and examine all persons within their jurisdiction as witnesses in regard to subjects in reference to which they have power to act and into which they have already instituted, or are about to institute, an investigation. Hence they are authorized to summon and compel the attendance of all persons within the limits of their constituency, as witnesses, and to bring with them papers and records, in the same manner as is practiced by courts of law.

At page 295, section 747, of the same work, it is said :

In addition to what may properly be called evidence, namely, that which is obtained by means of an inquiry instituted by the House or brought forward by a party, all the information of every description which in any way comes into the possession of the House may be regarded as evidence. Messages from the Executive, either at the commencement or in the course of the session, documents from the same source, returns from public officers or commissioners, either in pursuance of law or of the orders of the House, constitute evidence upon which legislative proceedings may be founded.

These are the usual modes of obtaining evidence by legislative bodies, and they are as well established as the rules by which testimony is obtained in courts of law. Have you, then, authority to pass upon the question submitted to you as to which of these returns from the State of Louisiana is the proper return? Have you authority to pass upon the question submitted to you in respect to those returns? Have you authority to determine "how many, and if any, what, persons were duly appointed electors in the State" of Louisiana? If you have power to make that inquiry, you are bound by parliamentary law, you are bound by the oath imposed upon you, you are bound by the proceedings of legislative bodies as old as the existence of parliaments, to investigate this question; and will you say that you will not receive this testimony that you yourselves have been two months in obtaining? The Senate sent its committee to Louisiana, and the House sent its committee to Louisiana, and these committees have taken a mass of testimony, which now lies before you, and we are prepared with that testimony, taken according to the rules of legislative assemblies, to establish the facts we allege. I call upon gentlemen on the other side to show, if they can, that the power of a legislative body does not extend to any investigation it thinks proper to make in regard to a question submitted to its consideration.

What is this State of Louisiana that has sent here these double returns, one of which is just as good as the other? Both these returns come here signed by an acting governor; both come under the great seal of the State of Louisiana, and the real seal is the one affixed to the McEnery certificate. I know it was said here yesterday by my distinguished friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] in his quiet way, that you knew who William Pitt Kellogg was, but you did not know John McEnery; that John McEnery had given certificates to persons who came knocking at the doors of Congress for admission, but that the gate was never opened to them. If I have not forgotten, hardly twelve months have transpired since a person came knocking at the door of the Senate with a certificate signed by William Pitt Kellogg as governor of the State of Louisiana, stating that the applicant was duly elected to the Senate of the United States. Did the Senate open its doors to him; or did it shut the door in his face and send him away? From the day that Kellogg pretended to be governor, more than four years ago, no man has entered the Senate Chamber on a credential signed by him. He is in no better condition in that respect than McEnery.

Let us look at the history for a moment. In 1872 McEnery and Kellogg were opposing candidates for governor. A committee of the Senate, presided over by one of this commission, and of which I had the honor at the time to be a member, investigated that contest. The returns from the State of Louisiana were brought here and exhibited in our committee-room. After careful examination of the returns, the committee reported as follows :

Your committee are, therefore, led to the conclusion that if the election held in November, 1872, be not absolutely void for frauds committed therein, McEnery and his associates in State offices, and the persons certified as members of the legislature by the De Feriet board, ought to be recognized as the legal government of the State.

Such was the report of the committee of the Senate after the most patient investigation of all the facts, showing that McEnery, and not Kellogg, was the legitimate, lawful governor of the State. How, then, did Kellogg happen to get to be acting governor? The history of that transaction is known to the whole country.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Is that the report made by Mr. Carpenter?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir. Kellogg succeeded in being installed as governor through the usurpation of a subordinate judge, who usurped authority and set up a legislature and a government in the State of Louisiana. Under his order no man was permitted to enter the legislative halls of the State as a member unless he had a certificate of election from a returning-board that never had a return before it, from a returning-board that counted forged affidavits by the thousand as evidence of election. The legislature thus organized, in less than twenty-four hours impeached and removed the existing governor. In a few hours more it turned out of office some of the judges of the courts, and appointed others to whom it gave the sole jurisdiction of determining all questions in regard to the right to hold office.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. You mean that they suspended the governor. They never pronounced final sentence.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Whether he was convicted and sentenced I do not know; but under the constitution and laws of Louisiana, the impeachment amounts to a suspension. They removed him in that way. His term, I understand, expired within a very short time.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I merely meant to suggest that the word "removed" was, perhaps, inapplicable; but yet it does not affect the line of your argument.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all.

Immediately a case was brought before a judge whom this legislature had created to determine as to the rightfulness of the legislature, and, of course, this judge, the creature of usurpers calling themselves a legislature, decided that the authority from which he derived his judgeship was legitimate; and that is the way the legitimacy of the Kellogg government was established!

In regard to that usurpation, let me read a sentence from the report of the Senate committee :

Viewed in any light which your committee can consider them, the orders and injunctions made and granted by Judge Durell in this cause are most reprehensible, erroneous in point of law, and are wholly void for want of jurisdiction; and your committee must express their sorrow and humiliation that a judge of the United States should have proceeded in such flagrant disregard of his duty, and have so far overstepped the limits of Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Morton, a member of that committee, commenting upon the acts of this judge, said in his separate report :

The conduct of Judge Durell, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, cannot be justified or defended. He grossly exceeded his jurisdiction and assumed the exercise of powers to which he could lay no claim, and his acts can only be characterized as a gross usurpation.

This same government in Louisiana underwent a review only a year or two ago, when a person bearing the certificate of Kellogg applied for a seat in the Senate as having been elected by the legislature of that State, and in the discussion upon that occasion much was said, and better than I can express it, in regard to the Kellogg government. In speaking of the usurpation of the returning-board which had counted in the Kellogg legislature and of the returns required to be transmitted to the secretary of state by the constitution, a member of this Commission, Mr. Edmunds, said :

They—

are the returns which the various local officers take from the votes of the people, seal up, and transmit, and not the judgment of a body of men unknown to the constitution, who are to take these various papers and produce any result that in their judgment is lawful or convenient.

* * * * *

I shall have no hesitation in saying that, no matter what returning-board had declared this to be a legislature or the other to be a legislature, it is within the competence of our duty to know, as the final and supreme judges of the election and qualification of this claimant to a seat, whether that legislature was composed of persons who appeared by the returns that the constitution speaks of to have been elected or whether they were the creation of some intermediate contrivance that either the cupidity of thieves or the ambition of politicians, or whatever, may have invented as a means of standing between the right of the people to elect their representatives and the persons who are to be authorized to meet and to organize the house.

Then, speaking of the powers of the board, Mr. Edmunds said :

The law itself gives this board no power of its own judgment or its own discretion in any way to tamper with or to change this primary and fundamental evidence, the only evidence which in any government which is to live by law can ever be received for the time being, the certificates from the people to show who have been elected members of the legislature or the governor of the State.

* * * * *

Can any man stand up and say that it is any other thing than what the language of the law says, a compilation of results from the various sources which the law has provided and which has flowed into their hands? Such returns, it says—not those obtained by extrinsic evidence; not those obtained upon affidavit; not those obtained upon the judgment of any court; not those obtained in any other way than that they come from the separate assemblies of the people, sworn to and certified in the manner prescribed by law, their seals broken in their presence, and the results of those statements are to be proclaimed—and such results, thus proclaimed, are prima-facie evidence.

It is a special creation of the law; it has no finality, and it can have none that the law does not expressly or by clear implication confer upon it; and when the law says it may throw out a parish for a certain reason, it is an implied declaration of the law that it shall not throw out a parish for any other reason; and when the law says that it shall compile and canvass the returns that come to it, that is certainly a prohibition against its compiling or canvassing and getting together information, as this witness calls it, derived from his political knowledge or from any other knowledge under the sun, I do not care how sacred or how particular or complete it may be; for the moment these officers of the law, whose duties are so clearly pointed out, depart from the firm foundation of that path which the law has marked out for them, there is no security for liberty or for right or for anything for which government is instituted, for the reason that there is then no guide or limit either to their powers or their discretion; and that people, in my opinion, will make a great mistake who undertake to uphold results produced by a body acting, as this did, outside of the constitution and the laws of the State.

Every word I have read, and much more that was said on that occasion, is applicable to the canvass by which Kellogg, conspiring with the returning-officers, made the certificate which is now before you and on which you are called upon to count the electoral vote for Hayes.

Not to detain you as to this government in Louisiana, I will only say that it is not a republican government, for it is a matter that I think this Commission should take official knowledge of, that the pretended officers in the State of Louisiana are upheld by military power alone. They could not maintain themselves an hour but for military support. Is that government republican which rests upon military power for support? A republican government is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people; but the government in Louisiana has been nothing but a military despotism for the last four years, and it could not stand a day if the people of the State were not overborne by military power.

Hear what an author of great credit in this country says in regard to this Louisiana usurpation. I read from Story on the Constitution, as lately published, with notes and additions by Judge Cooley.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Is the original numbering of the sections preserved?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The original number is 1814, second volume. Judge Cooley in his note to that section says:

The recent case of Louisiana demonstrates that there may be greater wrongs than even the wrongful refusal by Congress to recognize the legitimate government of a State, and yet no speedy and effectual remedy be attainable. Such action on the part of Congress would at least be that of a proper authority, and would imply deliberation, and be supported by a presumption of due regard for the public good and for the supremacy of the law. But in the case of Louisiana in 1873, an inferior Federal judge, without a shadow of authority, and consequently in defiance of law, and for that reason supported by no presumption of correct motives, and with scarcely a pretense of observing even the usual forms, by the process of his court, aided by a military force, installed in power a State government which he sided with as against rival claimants, and in consequence of a pressure of business in Congress precluding prompt attention to the case by that body, has been enabled to sustain this government in power until the present time. Mr. Justice Story has with reason predicted that "if a despotic or monarchical government were established in one State it would bring on the ruin of the whole republic."

How prophetic. We are threatened to-day with that ruin which Mr. Justice Story foresaw.

What government can be more despotic than one elected by an injunction and continued in power by a military force under the order of a judge who, having no jurisdiction, is restrained by no law but his arbitrary will?

It is a despotism according to Judge Cooley.

For the facts of this unparalleled wrong we refer to reports made by the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate in February, 1873. The case requires no further comment than it there receives. The dullest mind cannot fail to see that the facility with which the wrong is committed and the possible immediate advantages which individuals may derive therefrom present constant temptations to its repetition, and if suffered to pass once unrebuked a precedent will be tacitly assented to which cannot fail to threaten constant danger to our liberties, especially at those very periods of high political excitement when prudence, caution, and the strictest regard for the Constitution and the laws are most important. What party or what political leader can at such times be expected to pay scrupulous deference to the laws if a judge may ignore them with impunity? It was thought the climax of wrong had been reached when a local judge in one of the States could seize upon the property of individuals and corporations through his injunctions and mandates and plunder them through receivers; but he at least was not acting wholly without jurisdiction, and if he seized property he did not venture to go so far as to make the liberties of the people the subject of a receivership.

There is the opinion of a judge and one of the ablest elementary writers of our time in regard to this government in Louisiana. The Constitution of the United States says that each State shall appoint, in such manner as its legislature shall direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of its Senators and Representatives in Congress; but it must be a State that does it; and what is meant by a "State?" A despotism, or a State having a republican form of government where the people, and not usurpers, rule? What has become of Durell, the Federal judge who set up the Kellogg dynasty? He resigned to escape impeachment by the House of Representatives, composed at the time of a large majority of political friends of the party he sought to serve, and is now a fugitive from the State of Louisiana, subject to the scorn and contempt of all who know him. He is receiving to-day the punishment which sooner or later will come upon all men who, clothed with official authority, betray their trust, and for party ends encroach on the rights of the people. While the author of these iniquities which have brought ruin upon the people of Louisiana goes forth a vagabond upon the face of the earth, condemned to everlasting infamy, his work stands, and this high Commission is to-day asked to uphold it and give it new force.

But you have here a certificate from a person claiming to be governor, a certified list, as it is called in the statute, of the names of the persons elected electors. What does that amount to? Did the Constitution require it? That instrument says:

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

That is all the electors have to do. The right to appoint electors is not inherent in a State, but derivative from the Constitution of the United States, which is as much a part of the constitution of every State as it is of the United States. Every word and every letter of this Constitution is as binding on the State as on the United States. It was framed for the purpose of forming a general government and also for the purpose of protecting the States in certain national rights. This Constitution says to the State of Louisiana, "You may appoint electors in such manner as your legislature shall direct; they shall meet and cast their ballots in a certain way, and send them to the President of the Senate, and the votes shall then be counted." Tell me by what authority Congress passes a law that they shall not be counted unless certified in a particular manner. By what authority has Congress said to the governor of Louisiana or to the governor of any State, "You make three certified lists of the names of the persons appointed electors?" It may be a matter of convenience for the two Houses to have that sort of evidence; but it is entirely at the option of the governor of the State to obey that act or not; and old John Hancock, nearly a century ago, before he would make any such certificate, sent a communication to the legislature of the commonwealth of Massachusetts to know whether it would meet their approval. I will read what was said by a committee of the Senate in a unanimous report made by Mr. Morton on this subject in 1873:

The third section of the act of Congress of 1792 declares what shall be the official evidence of the election of electors, and provides that "the executive authority of each State shall cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, to be delivered to the electors on or before the first Wednesday in December, and the said electors shall annex one of the said lists to each of their votes." The certificate of the secretary of state is not required, and the certificate of the governor, as provided for in this section, seems to be the only evidence contemplated by the law of the election of electors and their right to cast the electoral vote of the State. If Congress chooses to go behind the governor's certificate, and inquire who has been chosen as electors, it is not violating any principle of the right of the States to prescribe what shall be the evidence of the election of electors, but it is simply going behind the evidence as prescribed by an act of Congress; and, thus going behind the certificate of the governor, we find that the official returns of the election of electors from the various parishes of Louisiana had never been counted by anybody having authority to count them.

What was the result? On that report in 1873 the Senate and the House of Representatives voted not to count the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana, and it was rejected. Governor Warmoth had given a certificate in due form certifying to the election of the electors in that State; but what was it good for? The two Houses went behind it. A committee of the Senate reported that the votes had never been canvassed by anybody having authority to canvass them, and the result was that the vote of the State was rejected. There is authority for going behind the governor's certificate.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Who canvassed at that time? Who made the canvass?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The canvass at that time was required to be made by a returning-board consisting of the governor, the lieutenant-governor, the secretary of state, and two persons designated by name. There was a controversy as to which was the proper canvassing-board.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. And it was held that the proper board had not made the canvass?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was not decided in this report.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. I want to know the meaning of that language.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me read from the report:

And thus going behind the certificate of the governor, we find that the official returns of the election of electors from the various parishes of Louisiana had never been counted by anybody having authority to count them.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I would inquire whether Judge Trumbull has the whole report there?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have. You will find it commencing at page 370 of this book entitled The Presidential Counts.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. Will the Judge then state what the report says in regard to the right of Congress to go behind the evidence prescribed by the laws of the State, a little further on?

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. The thing has passed out of my mind and I merely ask for information.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is the passage, I suppose:

The election of the Greeley electors was certified to by the governor of the State, but the official returns of the election have not been counted by the returning-board created by the laws of Louisiana for that purpose; and the persons who, in fact, made the examination and count had no legal authority to do so. The election of the Grant electors is certified by the Lynch returning-board, but that board did not have the official returns before them, and their election is not certified by the governor of the State, as required by the act of Congress. The committee are of the opinion that neither the Senate of the United States nor both Houses jointly have the power under the Constitution to canvass the returns of and election and count the votes to determine who have been elected presidential electors, but that the mode and manner of choosing electors are left exclusively to the States. And if by the law of the State they are to be elected by the people, the method of counting the vote and ascertaining the result can only be regulated by the law of the State. Whether it is competent for the two Houses, under the twenty-second joint rule, (in regard to the constitutionality of which the committee here give no opinion,) to go behind the certificate of the governor of the State to inquire whether the votes for electors have ever been counted by the legal returning-board created by the law of the State, or whether in making such count, the board had before them the official returns, the committee offer no suggestions, but present only a statement of the facts as they understand them.

That covers, I presume, what was asked of me.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. That covers it.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Do I understand you to mean, Judge Trumbull, in speaking of the action of the Senate four years ago, that the judgment of the Senate was upon the question of fact as to what the real vote of the people had been ?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It would be difficult to state upon what consideration Senators voted. The vote of Louisiana was duly certified to by the governor of the State ; I have the certificate here in proper form ; as the honorable Senator is aware, we never can know the considerations upon which Senators vote, but for some reason or other the Senate and the House concurred in rejecting the vote of Louisiana. The certificate of the governor, however, was in due form and complete ; so that it does amount to a decision thus far that the two Houses of Congress have decided that the certificate of the governor in due form, stating that certain persons are electors, is not conclusive upon the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Under certain circumstances. The resolution, if you will pardon me, was that all the objections presented having been received, no electoral vote purporting to be that of the State of Louisiana should be counted, in favor of which there were 33 affirmative and against it 16 negative votes. Among the objections was one by Mr. Carpenter, a Senator from Wisconsin :

I object to the counting of the votes given for U. S. Grant for President and Henry Wilson Vice-President, by the electors of Louisiana, because there is no proper return of votes cast by the electors of the State of Louisiana, and because there is no State government in said State which is republican in form, and because no canvass or counting of the votes cast for electors in the State of Louisiana at the election held in November last had been made prior to the meeting of the electors.

And another of similar purport by Mr. Senator Trumbull, of the State of Illinois.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Allow me to interrupt Judge Trumbull. I understand that the decision of the Senate went on the question whether the governor's certificate was conclusive, and it was decided not only that his certificate was not conclusive, but it was decided that the decision of that returning-board on which he founded his certificate was not conclusive.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. There was no such certificate before the Senate.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. There was a certificate of one returning-board.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The certificate of Governor Warmoth I had better read, that the Commission may see what the certificate was in that case :

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

State of Louisiana, city of New Orleans :

I, H. C. Warmoth, governor of the State of Louisiana, do hereby certify that the foregoing signature of B. P. Blanchard, State registrar of votes for the State of Louisiana, is genuine ; and I do further certify that Messrs. T. C. Manning, A. S. Heron, and C. H. Weed, for the State at large, and Hugh J. Campbell, for first district ; Louis Bush, second district ; Allen Thomas, third district ; A. H. Leonard, fourth district, and L. V. Reeves, fifth district, were duly and legally elected presidential electors for the State of Louisiana, at an election held in said State on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1872, pursuant to the statutes of the Congress of the United States and State of Louisiana on the subject.

In faith whereof I have hereunto affixed my official signature and caused the great seal of the State to be hereto attached, at the city of New Orleans, capital of the State, this 4th day of December, A. D. 1872, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

H. C. WARMOTH.

By the governor :
[L. s.]

Y. A. WOODWARD,
Assistant Secretary of State.

In the Senate report it is said :

Messrs. Woodward and Bragdon, according to the testimony, looked over the returns to ascertain who had been elected electors for President and Vice-President, and made a statement to the governor of the result of their examination ; and the governor, on the morning of the 4th of December, the day fixed by the act of Congress when the electors in the several States shall meet and cast their votes, issued a paper, in which he declared that T. C. Manning, G. A. Weed, A. S. Herron, H. J. Campbell, L. Bush, A. Thomas, A. H. Leonard, and L. V. Reeves had been elected electors, and placed a copy of the said paper in the possession of each of said persons ; and afterward, on the same day, they assembled in the city of New Orleans, and, as electors, voted for President and Vice-President. It clearly appears from the testimony that the official returns of the State were never examined and counted for presidential electors by any persons except Messrs. Woodward and Bragdon, and up to this time never have been examined and counted by the Lynch board or any person having authority whatever to make such examination and count. While we have no doubt that the returns sent to Governor Warmoth from the various parishes by the supervisors of registration will, upon their face, show that the aforesaid persons named as electors, and whom we shall designate as the "Greeley electors," received a majority of the votes, that fact has never been ascertained by any competent authority, and the action of Governor Warmoth depended entirely upon the unauthorized statements of Messrs. Woodward and Bragdon, who, at the time, had no right to look into the returns at all. In this matter there is no pretense that the law was complied with, and the Lynch board were never at any time permitted to see them.

That is the report made by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which the Senator from Indiana then was, as he now is, chairman.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. I now understand the point. One set of men had the returns but were not entitled to have them, and the other set who were entitled to them did not have them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That was a disputed question, and I do not know that it has ever been settled to this day, except by the judge to whom I referred who was put in office for the purpose of settling it.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That was the contention.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That was the contention, as is very aptly expressed. But however it may have been, one thing was settled by Congress, so far as the two Houses could settle it, that the governor's certificate in due form, the same kind of a certificate as No. 1 now before the Commission, was overruled by the concurrent action of the two Houses of Congress, and they refused to count the vote, and the report of the committee was that the vote had not been properly canvassed. Now we propose to show this Commission that the vote in November last has never been canvassed, that the pretended canvass is a fraud, that the papers were forged, that the returns were altered and falsified, and I should like to know if a count under such circumstances is any better than a true count made by persons who had no authority to make it. If the action of Congress is worth anything, unless it is to reverse its decision, and that in behalf of iniquity, this Commission can go back of the returns. Legislative bodies and courts sometimes, though very reluctantly, overrule former decisions ; but in the history of legislative proceedings or of courts was it ever heard that a former decision was reversed in order to perpetuate a wrong, an iniquity, a falsehood, a forgery ? If the action of Congress is good for anything, it establishes the right to go behind the certificate. That was the understanding when this Commission was created, and it will be a delusion and a snare in the estimation of this whole people if the questions submitted to this Commission are decided upon the technical ground that the Commission has nothing to do but to add up the votes as shown on the face of the certificates. It will be overturning not only the decision of Congress four years ago, it will overturn every settled principle of parliamentary law from the beginning of time, so far as we have any record of it. Is my time up?

The PRESIDENT. You commenced at five minutes past one. It is now twelve minutes past two. You have spoken one hour and seven minutes.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. There were some fifteen minutes lost by a discussion of the Louisiana question which I do not think in all fairness should be taken out of Judge Trumbull's time.

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. Mr. President, I submit that when counsel are compelled to read long papers in answer to members of the Commission and are thereby diverted from their argument, at least the time so occupied in responding to questions of individuals upon the Commission should not be charged to them in the computation of their time.

The PRESIDENT. Judge Trumbull has still time left. The question would hardly arise, unless the time should come when I might consider it my duty to stop him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is another principle of parliamentary law to which I desire to call attention. It is succinctly stated in an elementary work to which I refer rather than quote decisions, in section 441 in what is entitled The American Law of Elections, by McCrary, where it is said:

Fraud, in the conduct of an election, may be committed by one or more of the officers thereof, or by other persons. If committed by persons not officers, it may be either with or without knowledge or connivance of such officers. There is a difference between a fraud committed by officers or with their knowledge and connivance, and a fraud committed by other persons, in this: the former is ordinarily fatal to the return, while the latter is not fatal, unless it appear that it has changed or rendered doubtful the result. If an officer of the election is detected in a willful and deliberate fraud upon the ballot-box, the better opinion is that this will destroy the integrity of his official acts, even though the fraud discovered is not, of itself, sufficient to affect the result, (ante, section 184, Judkins vs. Hill, 50 N. H., 104.) The reason of this rule is that an officer who betrays his trust in one instance is shown to be capable of the infamy of defrauding the electors, and his certificate is therefore good for nothing.

Now we propose to show by evidence which we have offered here that the president of the returning-board with the sanction of his confederates altered the returns of Vernon Parish, took 178 votes from one side and put them on the other by a forgery of the papers. According to this authority, a fraud committed by an officer is fatal to his return.

I see I shall have no time to go, and it is perhaps not proper that I should on this preliminary question of admitting evidence go, into the question of the want of authority in this returning-board under any circumstances to canvass the electoral vote. Assuming that it has such authority under any circumstances, still it would have no authority to reject votes, except the foundation be properly laid. The law is succinctly and clearly stated in the report already cited, made by Senator Morton, as follows:

The statute of Louisiana authorizes the supervisors of registration in the parishes, or the commissioners of election, to make affidavit in regard to any violence, tumult, fraud, or bribery by which a fair election has been prevented, which shall be forwarded to the returning-board along with the returns, and upon which the returning-board may reject the vote of a poll in making the count; and if the evidence of the officers of the election is not sufficient to satisfy the minds of the returning-board in regard to the matters charged they are authorized to send for persons and papers and take further testimony upon the matter; but they have no authority to make such investigation unless the foundation is first laid by the sworn statements of the officers of the election, as before mentioned.

Everybody who ever looked into the Louisiana law agrees with what was stated by the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate in 1873. The same committee in 1875 and the committee of the House of Representatives which visited Louisiana in 1874 both agree that the laying of a proper foundation to reject votes was a jurisdictional fact, without the existence of which the returning-board would have no authority to reject votes or to do anything except to compile the statements of votes that were made by the commissioner of election.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Judge Trumbull, allow me to make a suggestion to you just there. The point came up in the Florida case, and was much considered in the conference and was the ground of some of the votes then cast, and there is a great deal of importance attached to it, in my mind at least. If the only thing which that returning-board could do was to determine whether certain polls should be rejected or counted, your argument is a perfectly just one; but is it not also true that the jurisdiction of that board is commensurate with the duties and functions it is to perform, and is it not true that the one main function it is to perform is to ascertain who was elected and to declare that fact? And can it be said that if they mistake the law in some of the points that they have to determine upon in discharging that function of declaring who are elected, or if they fail properly to weigh the testimony on which they act in any of those points, that is so jurisdictional that their decision is erroneous?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; I do not contend for that.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Then my suggestion is that the jurisdiction of this board, the function which it is called upon to discharge, is to ascertain and declare who are elected. That is their jurisdiction, and all below it is the exercise of means and modes of procedure.

Mr. TRUMBULL. To that I cannot quite assent. I assent entirely to the proposition that upon any matter of which this board had jurisdiction and a discretion to act, their judgment is not to be disturbed; but the point I make is that while it is their duty to canvass and compile the vote—that is their sworn duty—it is also their sworn duty not to take jurisdiction of the question of rejecting votes unless a foundation is first laid for so doing. Upon the want of power of a canvassing-board to reject votes, and that its acts in so doing are without jurisdiction and void, I refer to the cases of The People vs. Cook, 4 Selden, 82; and 10 Bush, 743. In the case of the State vs. County Judge, 7 Iowa Rep., 201, it is said:

The next subject of examination is the answer that the duty had already been performed.

It was a case of mandamus to compel a returning-officer to canvass the votes.

Inasmuch as the canvassers have rejected the returns from three of the townships which they should have counted, it is legally true that duty has not been discharged; and when the writ now commands, it is not, in a proper legal sense, to recanvass, but to canvass, the returns of that election. It is to do that which was before their duty, but which they omitted. What has been done is as if it had not been done, and the judge is now commanded to proceed as if no former steps had been taken.

He had left out three returns that it was his duty to canvass. The mandamus went compelling him to make the canvass. The same principle is very forcibly stated in a recent decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in a case that is not yet reported, decided at the present term of the court. It is the case of Windsor vs. McVeigh. It was an action of ejectment, and there came up collaterally the validity of title derived from a sale under the confiscation acts. Some years ago a suit was instituted in Virginia to condemn property under the confiscation acts, and the owners came in and sought to defend. The judge of the court struck their answer from the files and refused to hear them at all. The case proceeded to judgment and the property was sold. An action of ejection was brought involving the title derived under the sale. The court say in that case:

The law is and always has been that whenever notice or citation is required, the party cited has the right to appear and be heard, and when the latter is denied the former is ineffectual for any purpose. The denial to a party in such a case of the right to appear is in legal effect the recall of the citation to him.

The jurisdiction acquired by the court by seizure of the res was not to condemn the property without further proceedings.

The jurisdiction secured by this returning-board to make the canvass was not to reject a part of the returns arbitrarily and at will. There is much in this decision illustrative of the present case:

If a seizure is made and condemnation is passed without the allegation of any specific cause of forfeiture or offense, and without any public notice of the proceedings, so that the parties in interest have no opportunity of appearing and making a defense, the sentence is not so much a judicial sentence as an arbitrary sovereign edict.

In quoting from Mr. Justice Story in another case, with approbation, the court say—

In another part of the same opinion the judge characterized such sentences “as mere mockeries, and as in no just sense judicial proceedings;” and declared that they “ought to be deemed, both ex directo in rem and collaterally, to be mere arbitrary edicts or substantial frauds.”

The court held the judgment of condemnation absolutely void in a collateral proceeding. A jurisdiction to compile and canvass votes does not confer jurisdiction to reject votes. The latter jurisdiction can only be exercised when the statutory foundation is laid.

There is another point which goes to the jurisdiction of this board which we ought, I think, to be permitted to show, that it was not so constituted as to have jurisdiction of the canvass at all, for the reason that the law declares that “five persons, to be elected by the senate, of all political parties, shall constitute the returning-officers for all elections, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum and have power to make the returns of all elections.” Now, I insist that it was incompetent for four persons to act. Four or three might act if the board was full; but when a duty is required to be performed by five persons of different political parties, it cannot be lawfully performed by four persons all of the same party.

There was an object in the requirement that the board should be composed of different political parties. It is not a mere directory statute. The legislature undoubtedly had in view fairness in the canvass of the returns, and hence it committed it to returning-officers to be made up of all political parties. The fact here is, that four persons, all of one party, made the canvass. Suppose five had existed, could a majority have acted without giving notice to the others? The act of a majority would doubtless be good if the board had been full and all had been notified. Each party had the right to have the advice and the judgment of some of its friends in this board. While three might act they must give notice to all that all might have an opportunity to be present. These four had authority to fill up the board. The statute required them to do it. They were asked to fill the vacancy and refused. Every clerk engaged by them was of the same political party. I insist that this board was not constituted so as to have authority to make the canvass at all. The general rule on this subject is well stated in 21 Wendell's Reports in the case of Downing vs. Ruger, page 182:

The rule seems to be well established that, in the exercise of a public as well as a private authority, whether it be ministerial or judicial, all the persons to whom it is committed must confer and act together, unless there be a provision that a less number may proceed. Where the authority is public, and the number is such as to admit of a majority, that will bind the minority, after all have duly met and conferred.

I do not insist that the whole five must have been present; but I do insist that where the authority existed in the four to supply the vacancy they had no authority to go on and make the canvass without supplying the vacancy. It was not fair; it was not what the legislature intended; and they are in no better position surely, failing to obey the law and supply this vacancy, than they would have been if they had supplied the vacancy and then acted without giving the fifth man notice or affording him an opportunity to attend; and that would have been fatal.

The fact that the statute authorizes a majority to act does not change the rule. A majority could have acted in a case of this kind, if the statute had not said so, provided all had been afforded an opportunity to co-operate.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Your point is, that no step at all could be taken until the board was full?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No step could be taken until the vacancy was filled, the four having authority to fill it.

The constituent elements of which this returning-board was to consist being wanting, I insist the four could not go on without filling up the board, particularly as one of the elements which entered into the mind of the legislature in the passage of the law was wanting in the board as it existed, the four being all of one political party.

My attention is called to the phraseology of the law. It is:

In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning-officers.

The act is mandatory, and a failure to obey it I think is a fatal defect in the organization of the board.

The PRESIDENT. Excuse me for saying that you have occupied an hour and a half.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to call attention to one other matter. It has been stated in another argument in the hearing of the Commission, and I have not the vanity to suppose that I can state it any more clearly, but yet I desire to press it upon your consideration. To my mind it is conclusive and unanswerable. I allude to the inability of the legislature of Louisiana to appoint Brewster and Levissee electors. The language of the Constitution is in that respect peculiar. It is an inhibition on the legislature and not a disqualification or inability on the part of the individual. The attention of the Commission was called to that the other day. The language of the Constitution, that "no person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years and been nine years a citizen of the United States," is very different from the language here. The only power that a State has to appoint an elector at all is derived from the Constitution of the United States. Most of the powers exercised by a State are inherent, belonging to the State itself, but the power to appoint electors of President and Vice-President is derived from the Constitution of the United States. That is the warrant of authority, and it reads thus:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

We have here the evidence that Brewster was surveyor-general of the land-office for the district of Louisiana, an office to which he was nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. He held this office on the 7th of November last. The warrant of authority to the State of Louisiana is, "You may appoint as many electors as you have Senators and Representatives, but you shall not appoint O. H. Brewster." That is what the Constitution in effect says.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does he believe that the control given to the legislature in the appointment of electors can be limited, restrained, or directed by the constitution of the State?

Mr. TRUMBULL. They can determine certainly in the State whom they will appoint, and may put inhibitions on the appointment of particular persons, I should imagine.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. My question is this: inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States gives to the legislature of the State the control of the appointment of electors, is it competent for the State by her constitution to control the legislature in the exercise of that power?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That question does not arise in this case. The power being granted by the Constitution of the United States to the legislature in terms, it may be questionable whether it is competent for the people in their constitution to regulate it.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. Trumbull, is not the question a little deeper even than Mr. Morton has put it? When the Constitution of the United States has fixed the qualifications of presidential electors, or rather has expressed certain disqualifications, is it competent for the legislature of a State, under the mere power of fixing the manner of appointment, to impose other disqualifications?

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. No such question arises here.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. This is a Federal officer.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I understand that was the point you were then arguing, but Mr. Morton called your attention to another, and you were replying to him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The question of the Senator from Indiana, as I understand it, is whether the legislature, in the exercise of this power conferred upon it by the Federal Constitution, is bound by its State constitution? It amounts to that. I should say a legislature is bound to observe the State constitution as well as the Constitution of the United States, both, unless they conflict. If there be a conflict between them, then we all know that the Federal Constitution is paramount; but I think the legislature would be bound by the constitution of the State so far as it did not interfere with any provision of the Constitution of the United States. But that is not the case I am arguing. The case I am presenting to you is this: The Constitution of the United States in the grant of power has said to the State of Louisiana, "You may appoint certain persons as electors for President, but you shall not appoint O. H. Brewster." Now, I say, when the Constitution says that to the State of Louisiana, it is binding upon the legislature and upon every citizen of Louisiana. Any appointment, therefore, made in defiance of that provision is utterly void. It cannot be that such an appointment can stand. You are to inquire here, "Who, and how many electors, were duly appointed;" and I put it to every member of this Commission if he can say, that a man who the Constitution, which is above us all and which we all swear to support, says shall not be an elector, shall nevertheless be an elector, and that his appointment as such is according to the Constitution?

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I ask the gentleman this question, whether it is competent for a State by her constitution to add to the qualifications required for United States Senators ?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Undoubtedly not. That has been settled. That is another question. I do not see its applicability to this point. There are some cases in Louisiana which I shall leave for my associate, Judge Campbell, to discuss, of persons inhibited by the constitution of Louisiana from holding any office; for instance, the law of Louisiana specifically and in terms declares that no supervisor of registration that is, no person who has charge of all this election machinery, shall be a candidate for an office at the election which he superintends. Yet, in defiance of that statute, one of the Hayes electors was a supervisor of registration managing the election when he himself was a candidate. I do not propose to go into that. I am speaking of the other cases of United States officers; there are two of them who claim to have been chosen electors. What is the answer to the suggestions that such persons cannot be electors? My distinguished friend [Mr. Evarts] says the Constitution does not execute itself.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Allow me, Mr. Trumbull. The proposition No. 6 is that Brewster was surveyor-general at the time of the election.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Do you include and intend to prove that he was such at the time of giving his vote?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; at the time of his appointment; he was appointed at the time of the election. I do not wish to state it stronger than it is. I understand that he tendered his resignation some time in November after the election, and it was accepted, very singularly, to date back before the election, although the resignation was not offered until some time after, as Mr. Brewster himself stated under oath.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Let me ask you a question, Judge Trumbull. The law of Louisiana, as I understand, provides that if an elector who has been chosen or appointed does not appear by a certain hour, the remaining electors shall proceed to fill the vacancy?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; there is such a provision in the act of 1868.

Mr. CARPENTER. And nowhere else.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I understand Judge Trumbull contends that act is not in force.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. But if that law is in force, and he did not appear at the time, as the certificate reads, then no matter whether he was an officer or not, there was a vacancy under that law, was there not?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Under the law of 1868?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not consider that there was; I understand that there was not. The statutes of the United States make two provisions: one is for filling any vacancies which may occur in the college when such college meets to give its electoral votes; the other is when a State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day, in such manner as the legislature of the State may direct. Here was no choice. It was just as if two persons had received the same vote.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I do not think you comprehend my question. Is not the real question, whether there is any power to fill a vacancy in the remaining members of the board? Suppose this man had been qualified, but did not appear.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then, if this statute was in force, the other electors could have filled the vacancy.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. But suppose it were not?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then there is no law authorizing the filling of the vacancy—

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Except by popular election.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That brings up complicated questions. The statute of 1872 provides for filling all vacancies by popular election. If that statute was in force, then the vacancy would have to be filled by a popular election. If the law of 1868 was in force, then one of those elected being absent would give the others authority to fill the vacancy, provided anybody had ever been elected. If you will look at the statute of 1868 you will find it says:

If any one or more of the electors chosen by the people shall fail from any cause whatever to attend—

We insist that these men, Brewster and Levissee, were never chosen by the people, and could not be chosen by the people; it was utterly out of their power to choose them. As to the other provision of the law of the United States, there is no statute in Louisiana authorizing the supplying of this want of an election on the 7th of November, unless it be the statute of 1872, and so there must be a popular election if that applies.

But I was about, when interrupted, to reply to the suggestion that the Constitution did not execute itself. That is true in reference to some things; but it is untrue in reference to a great many other things. If you will refer to the Constitution of the United States you will find that a great many of its provisions do execute themselves. Look at section 10 of article 1. You will observe that this is an inhibition on the State, and such provisions do execute themselves. No law of Congress could execute them. How could you punish a State for not obeying the Constitution of the United States? The Constitution says that no State shall appoint a public officer an elector. The Constitution of the United States says:

No State shall * * * emit bills of credit.

Suppose a State does emit bills of credit, are they not void? Did not the Supreme Court of the United States nearly half a century ago decide in the Missouri case that bills of credit issued by the State of Missouri were utterly void; and where is the statute making them void? How many times has the Supreme Court decided that a law passed by a State impairing the obligation of a contract is void? Is there any statute of the United States declaring that if a State passes a law impairing the obligation of a contract it shall be void? Would it not be an absurdity to pass such a statute? Could a United States statute impose a penalty on a State for passing an ex post facto law? Do you propose to put a State in prison or to fine a State? All these inhibitions on the State execute themselves. The case referred to in Mississippi in regard to the importation of slaves into that State is entirely different, governed by different considerations. The constitution of Mississippi provided that—

The introduction of slaves into this State as merchandise, or for sale, shall be prohibited from and after the 1st day of April, 1833.

That was a provision for the legislature to prohibit the importation for certain purposes after a certain time.

I certainly need not take up the time of this honorable Commission further to show that certain provisions of the Constitution are self-executing. There is not a person upon it who does not know that it has been decided over and over again that these inhibitions upon the States are self-executing.

There is only one other suggestion to be made in regard to this disqualified elector, and that is that he was not a de facto elector; but if he was such, his acts as a de facto officer are no more valid than the acts of the Tilden electors. The duties of the office of elector are all performed at one time. It is simply to cast a vote, and McEnery and his associates met together at the proper place, on the proper day, and cast their vote. They were officers de facto just as much as was Brewster. But neither of them was an officer de facto in the sense that the acts of an officer de facto are to stand; and why? Because the reason of the rule that gives validity to the acts of de facto officers has no application whatever to the act of a person who has a single duty to perform, and that act incomplete. The object of the law recognizing the acts of de facto officers as valid is the security of the public. The people having business before officers cannot stop to investigate their legal authority to the offices they occupy; and hence, so far as the public and business interests are concerned, their acts are valid. What act has this elector ever performed that affected the public interest until this vote is counted? The reason that has led to the adoption of the rule in regard to de facto officers has no application to such a case.

I have taken so much more time than I intended that I must close without discussing some other points; and I do so by saying that if a man is to be made President of the United States by counting the votes of Levissee, Brewster, and their associates from Louisiana, it will be by the mere form of law, contrary to the principles of the Constitution and in violation of the rights of the people.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. President, I ask leave to file a brief on the subject of the validity of the acts of officers de facto.*

The PRESIDENT. I think I may receive it.

Mr. EVARTS. Let us have copies.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Commission please, in justice to my associate I really think that all the time I have occupied ought not to be taken from his, as I was frequently interrupted.

The PRESIDENT. I shall submit that matter to the Commission when Mr. Campbell asks for time.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. I move now that the time consumed by interruptions of the Commission be not counted.

The PRESIDENT. I have no definite count of the time so consumed.

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. I should like to ask Mr. Trumbull whether there is any statute of Louisiana requiring a certificate from the governor of the appointment of electors.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a statute of Louisiana which I will refer to, which requires the governor to commission all officers except certain persons who are named, of which an elector is not one.

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. That is the law of 1872. Is there any statute requiring the governor to issue a certificate of election to the electors?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not specifically, but there is a statute of Louisiana and a provision of the constitution. The act of 1872, section 25, provides—

* This brief will be found in the Appendix of Briefs, marked Brief No. 4.

That it shall be the duty of the governor to commission all officers-elect except members of the general assembly, the governor, and the members of the police-jury.

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. Is there any other provision than that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not remember any other provision. I am informed that there is no constitutional provision, and that is the only provision of the statute I can call attention to at this moment.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. It would be a great convenience to some of us if we could have copies of the offers of evidence. I heard them read only.

Mr. CARPENTER. I will see that the judges are furnished with a copy to-night before nine o'clock.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Only a very few of the Commission have been able to obtain copies.

Mr. CARPENTER. I will see that all of them are supplied to-night. If the Commission please, I ask permission for about five minutes to cite some authorities on some of our points, so that they may be before the counsel on the other side before they close, as I understand we have the conclusion. Is there objection to that?

The PRESIDENT. Some not in your brief?

Mr. CARPENTER. One or two not in our brief. Five minutes will suffice.

The PRESIDENT. I suppose there is no objection to that.

Mr. EVARTS. None at all. We understand they have the right to have three counsel speak if they choose, and it comes out of their time.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is the way we understood it. If for instance the discussion had proceeded under the formal rule, we should have had fifteen minutes on each offer, and could have taken the time with one counsel on one objection and another on another.

The PRESIDENT. Are there three counsel to speak on your side of this question?

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes, sir; counting me for five minutes as counsel.

The PRESIDENT. Then two are required to open.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Commission please, in regard to our offer of testimony, some of it is in manuscript. I would suggest, if it is proper for me to do so, that the clerk be directed to have it printed, that you may get a copy of it.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. We had better have it all printed.

The PRESIDENT. I presume there will be no objection to having it printed.

Mr. CARPENTER. We offer to prove, and it is a conceded fact—

The PRESIDENT. I want it distinctly understood that the rule which I have prescribed is that, if three counsel are to be heard on a side, two shall open and only one speak in conclusion.

Mr. CARPENTER. So I understand. We offer to prove, and it is admitted as a fact, that Governor Kellogg, who issued the certificate here to the electors, is the same individual as elector Kellogg certified to by him. On page 38 of my brief I have cited the authorities to show that a person cannot appoint himself. The king is the fountain of honor and of office, but he cannot exercise the duties of an office to which he might make an appointment.

It was decided in 33 Barbour, cited on this brief, that where three officers had the power to appoint an officer, they could not appoint one of their own number, it being all an enlargement of that proverb of the law that no man can be a judge in his own case and that no man can exercise the functions of his office for his own benefit. In this case the distinction between a man's appointing himself and issuing a certificate which would be conclusive evidence that he had been appointed, is too nice to be substantial, and it falls, we think, within that well-settled principle that no public officer can certify anything for his own benefit; that is, in which he holds an interest at the time he makes the certificate. Upon that point, in addition to the cases cited in the brief, I want to call attention to the case of McKnight vs. Lewis, 5 Barbour's Reports, page 584. In that case a note had been protested by a notary; he afterward became the owner of the note, and the question was whether he could read in his own favor the certificate which he made as notary public of the protest of the note. This is what the court say about it:

The next objection is that the official protest and certificate of the intestate were admitted in evidence in favor of the plaintiff, who is his representative. At the time J. E. McKnight made his protest and memoranda of notice at its foot, he had no interest in the note. He had authority by law, and was competent in the particular case, to present and demand payment of it and to give the notice of refusal, and also to make officially the protest and memoranda which, in a certain contingency, the statute had declared presumptive evidence of such dishonor and notice. The certificate of an officer, when by law evidence for others, is competent testimony for the officer himself, provided he was competent, at the time of making it, to act officially in the matter to which it relates. This doctrine is applied daily in cases of justices of the peace, sheriffs, constables, and other officers. No one will doubt that a commissioner of deeds or judge who takes and certifies the acknowledgment of the execution of a deed conveying land, and who subsequently purchases the same land, may use his own certificate to prove the execution of the conveyance to his grantor.

Witnesses who have been examined and afterward become interested, and are made parties in the same suit, have been permitted to read their depositions in their own favor.

All stating the ground to be that, in order to make the certificate available in his own favor, it must be shown that he had no interest in it at the time the certificate was made. The case cited on the brief from Anstruther held that a sheriff could not certify his own neglect or an excuse for his neglect. He must make his affidavit to that. He could not use the functions of his office to certify anything in his own favor. Now, the doctrine applied to this case is this: Governor Kellogg's certificate to himself is worthless. It is no evidence that he was duly appointed elector at all. In the case of a sheriff, it is universally well known to all the judges that where a sheriff on process in a case between other parties makes a return which afterward becomes material in a suit against him, and he offers it in evidence, even in that case where he made it upon process between other parties, at the time merely performing his duty, when he comes to claim any benefit to himself, it is only prima-facie evidence.

Then to show that Kellogg was duly appointed, you have got to go behind the certificate of Kellogg. He cannot appoint himself; he cannot certify that he is appointed; and when you get behind that certificate what do you come to? You come to the certificate of this canvassing-board. It will be claimed undoubtedly by my honorable friends that there you must stop. But what is the effect of that certificate of the returning-board? Its character as evidence is determined by the law which makes it evidence. That law says that the certificate of the returning-board, when filed with the secretary of state, shall be prima-facie evidence in all courts and before all civil officers until set aside by contest.

What is prima-facie evidence? It is evidence that may be disputed; and when the legislature says a certain paper shall be prima facie evidence in all courts and before all officers, it says in effect that in all courts and before all officers you may dispute it. The Supreme Court of the United States in two or three cases have defined what prima-facie evidence is and so defined it. It is that evidence which, of itself and uncontradicted, would be sufficient to establish the fact, but which is always controvertible. So we say this returning-board's certificate is not conclusive. The statute says it shall not be conclusive; it says it shall be prima facie, and prima facie means disputable. Then you must go back of that to the fact in order to prove that Kellogg was elected; or, if it is not necessary for them affirmatively to go back to show that he was elected, it is certainly competent for us to go back to show that he was not, or else you give that certificate, which the law says shall be only prima-facie evidence, the full force and effect of conclusive evidence.

I want to cite also without comment, upon the same subject, the case of Ohio vs. Taylor, 12 Ohio State Reports, 132.

I also call attention to the case of Sublett vs. Treadwell, in 47 Mississippi Reports, 266, and will read simply one clause from the syllabus:

The majority candidate, having been a registrar of voters preparatory to the election at which he was a candidate and elected, was thereby disqualified and his election was void.

The PRESIDENT. The other side may now proceed.

Mr. STOUGHTON. Mr. President and gentlemen, I have heard in the course of to-day some objections made which I think may well be disposed of first and briefly. We are somewhat surprised to hear it objected that the certificate of Governor Kellogg is inoperative for the purpose of certifying to this tribunal the electoral vote. I think it will be remembered that when the vote of Connecticut was counted, her governor, Ingersoll, was an elector at large. I think his certificate was received without objection. Such objections are hardly suitable to the dignity of the occasion.

It has been objected this morning, and argued with much zeal, that Governor Kellogg is not the governor of Louisiana. It has been said that Louisiana is governed by a military despotism, by which I suppose is meant that military force, which, on application sent by Governor Kellogg to the President, he ordered to Louisiana, for the purpose of suppressing insurrection. I think the learned counsel was right in saying that without such aid the government of which Governor Kellogg was the head would have been overturned; but is the gentleman aware that the very fact that Governor Kellogg made such an application, the very fact that it was granted, is decisive evidence here that he was, until his term expired, governor of the State of Louisiana? Need I tell the learned counsel that?

I beg leave to refer this Commission for one moment to the case of Luther vs. Borden, where that question was decided, and where it was held that the very fact that the President of the United States had recognized the then governor and government of Rhode Island, although he had not sent a military force for the purpose of suppressing the Dorr insurrection, was evidence conclusive of who was the governor of that State and what was its government. Has my learned friend forgotten that case?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Did the court say that was conclusive?

Mr. STOUGHTON. I mean to say conclusive until the Congress of the United States in its capacity as such shall determine otherwise.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Could not either House contradict it?

Mr. STOUGHTON. No. I am amazed at some of the doctrines which I have heard announced here, and this one of them, and I pass from it, for this tribunal is entirely familiar with the doctrine decided in the case referred to, binding upon every department of the Government, decided by a court—perhaps the counsel did not entertain the same opinion of it then that he does now—presided over by a judge eminent for his learning and for his integrity, and I may add for the greatness of his abilities, Chief-Justice Taney.

Now let me state briefly and generally what the question is that counsel here are expected to argue. I think I may say it comprehends substantially the whole case; and yet it comes up upon an offer to do what? It comes up upon an offer to prove by a search and scrutiny of many, if not all, the polls of Louisiana, what in fact was the vote of that State for electors last November. Many other facts are superadded. It comes up upon an offer to prove facts upon which it is insisted that this tribunal may overrule, disregard, go behind the action of the final returning-officers of that State and hold for naught their conclusions. They acted under a statute to which I will call the attention of the tribunal for a moment; and in the course of what I shall have to say I shall satisfy this tribunal beyond all question that that board as constituted had the power delegated to it by the State of Louisiana—as a little patience, a little intelligence, will demonstrate—to determine the number of votes cast for electors, and power to certify finally, so far as the authority of that State is concerned, who they were. Confusion rather than clearness has resulted relative to these statutes owing somewhat, I conceive, to their arrangement. I shall take some pains, for the purpose of showing that the board was a final tribunal, empowered by the State to determine who had been chosen electors, to call attention to the different statutes, after a careful examination of which it will be clear that the board, and that only, and not the governor of the State as has been suggested, was the authorized power for the purpose named; and I shall satisfy the Commission, moreover, that the objection raised yesterday by the learned counsel, [Mr. Carpenter,] that if there should happen to be a vacancy in the electoral college it must be filled by a popular election and could not be filled by the electoral college itself, has no foundation whatever.

It seems to me that the decision of this tribunal in the Florida case determines the entire question here raised as to the right to go behind the returning-board; and I beg leave, in order that we may move with chart in hand, to read what this tribunal did in that case decide and determine:

The ground of this decision, stated briefly, as required by said act, is as follows:

That it is not competent under the Constitution and the law, as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Florida, in and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the board of State canvassers of said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, and that all proceedings of the courts, or acts of the legislature, or of the executive of Florida, subsequent to the casting of the votes of the electors on the prescribed day, are inadmissible for any such purpose.

I am unable to perceive from that determination that any question, much less the main question here directed to be argued, is open for argument. The manifest justice of that conclusion, if support can be obtained from such a source—I speak with great respect—is to be found in the report of the committee of the Senate of the United States, of which the learned counsel, Mr. Trumbull, was a member, from the portion of which report that I shall read he not only did not dissent, but by expressly dissenting from other portions he did assent to this; so that we have, before his conversion to a different doctrine, his adhesion to the opinion announced by this Commission, and that conclusion thus stated is as follows:

The committee are of the opinion that neither the Senate of the United States, nor both Houses jointly, have the power under the Constitution to canvass the returns of an election and count the votes to determine who have been elected presidential electors, but that the mode and manner of choosing electors are left exclusively to the States. And if by the law of the State they are to be elected by the people, the method of counting the vote and ascertaining the result can only be regulated by the law of the State. Whether it is competent for the two Houses, under the twenty-second joint rule, (in regard to the constitutionality of which the committee here give no opinion,) to go behind the certificate of the governor of the State, to inquire whether the votes for electors have ever been counted by the legal returning-board created by the law of the State, or whether, in making such count, the board had before them the official returns, the committee offer no suggestions, but present only a statement of the facts as they understand them.

So careful was this committee that it doubted its power to go far enough behind the certificate of the governor to learn whether the votes for electors had been counted by the proper returning-board. To going so far, we here make no objection; but when the purpose is to go further, to violate the rule laid down by this Commission, to violate the principle asserted in this report, to violate the fundamental law of the Union, the Federal Constitution, which provides that electors shall be appointed in such manner as the legislature of the State may direct; when this tribunal is asked to go thus far, and by inquiry ascertain not only what occurred at every poll throughout the State of Louisiana, but to purge the polls, and not merely to do that, but to ascertain for the purpose of enforcing the law of Louisiana, whether violence and outrage and intimidation have been in fact perpetrated, and bring on a trial of the entire case involving every parish and every poll of Louisiana within the circumference of Federal jurisdiction, I say the objection to such testimony, to such a course, instead of being technical, becomes substantial in the last degree, and is asserted, not on behalf of ten thousand, (for whom my learned brother Carpenter said he appeared,) but on behalf of forty-odd millions of people, every one deeply interested to preserve the independence of the States from the aggressions of Congress and the Federal power.

What is the theory on which this power is supposed to rest? We are referred to the bill organizing this Commission, which has been read as though the tribunal had been appointed to ascertain what electors were duly appointed, not in the sense of the Constitution, but in another and aggressive sense—as though this tribunal had been appointed to explore and ascertain step by step, from the time the first voter presented himself at the ballot-box until the time when the election was over, what had been its course and what had been the votes, how many, and for whom. The law under which this Commission was created is an extraordinary exhibition of subtlety and of care. It had a subject to deal with not easy of solution. We know all the surrounding circumstances; we know the causes which led to the framing of this bill; and we know why its language was couched so inexpressively of power delegated here. We know that conflicting opinions were to be harmonized not by uniting upon language which had meaning, but by using that which for certain purposes conveyed none—I mean none as the expression of an opinion of Congress. And to this tribunal was delegated the power to do what? To exercise such powers, if any, as the two Houses or either of them had. For what purpose? For the purpose of counting the electoral votes.

Now, will the tribunal permit me—little entitled as I am to attempt to instruct any one, much less a member of this body—to suggest that there has been a great confusion of ideas presented upon this subject. My learned brother, Mr. Carpenter, yesterday said this tribunal had no judicial power; I suppose he was right; it had no legislative power; I suppose he was right; but had a parliamentary authority to investigate and take testimony by any means it pleased. What is a parliamentary power? It is the power of parliament. And what is the power of parliament? To legislate. And what is the purpose of taking testimony? It is that legislative bodies may be better informed as to how they should legislate upon all subjects; and when a legislative body takes testimony it takes it to inform itself, and hence its mode of taking testimony is loose, confined by no rule, guarded by no objection, often overturning the safeguards, if not of society, certainly of reputation, carefully protected always in courts of justice. So, with a wide, unlicensed discretion, and as wide, unlicensed power, it takes testimony when and where it pleases; but it discharges only its duties as a legislative body, always for the purpose of legislation only, unless for one other purpose, and that is to inquire into the qualifications of its own members, in accordance with that clause in the Constitution which provides that “each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members,” a very familiar clause. But is each House judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of presidential electors? Has either House that power? Are not the learned counsel here seeking to induce this body to exercise exactly that power? Is there any question that they are?

I ask every gentleman upon this Commission, are you not seeking by this course, if you concur in the views of the counsel, to ascertain by inquiry and testimony whether these electors have been properly elected, returned, and qualified? Let every man pause who undertakes to advance toward that result. I repeat, no member of the Commission can discriminate, assuming the evidence offered to be competent, between the power of the House to investigate as to the election, return, and qualification of its members, and the power here asserted.

Again, what happens if this testimony shall be admitted? Is it to be assumed that it will not be controverted by counter-proof? Certainly not. Then are you to undertake to execute the laws of Louisiana by determining as matter of fact whether there has been intimidation, violence, armed disturbance, and therefore whether this board has properly performed its duty? Is that a function which can be exercised by this tribunal? It must be if you enter upon the inquiry suggested. Is it not as well to leave that administration of State laws to the States? The power to count, transferred to this tribunal, is the power of the two Houses, or either of them. That power, if it exists, is subject to other constitutional provisions; and one is, that the electors of the several States are to be appointed in such manner as the legislatures thereof may direct. How has the legislature of Louisiana directed its electors to be appointed? By a majority of votes lawfully cast, to be ascertained and the appointment of electors finally determined and declared by the State officers appointed by its legislature, such officers having exclusive authority so to do.

The national power to count, the power to do what may be needful in counting, is subject to that power of each State to appoint. Where does that power of appointment by the State end? Where does the power to count begin? Does the power of the State end until it fully reaches the appointment by the final authority delegated by the State as the appointing power? The State of Louisiana has but one mode of expressing its will upon this subject; that is, by the returning-board. It may not have been the best way; but it is its mode of expressing its will, and cannot be here overthrown. I am glad to have my argument on this point confirmed by an eminent jurist, an honest judge, and I was about to say a spotless politician, but perhaps that would be going too far, though I think not. I allude to a letter written by the chief-justice of the court of appeals of the State of New York, who says:

I have always expressed the opinion that the authentication of the election of presidential electors according to the laws of each State is final and conclusive, and that there exists no power to go behind them.

This opinion thus concurs with that of this tribunal, and of the eminent gentlemen who made the report in the Senate in 1873.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I would inquire of the counsel when that was written?

Mr. STOUGHTON. It appears to have been dated on the 10th of February, 1877.

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. A letter by Judge Church?

Mr. STOUGHTON. It purports to be signed by him, and doubtless was written as a more correct expression of his opinion than was given by an interviewer; that class of gentlemen not being always absolutely accurate, although I believe very generally so.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Do you understand that to express the opinion that it cannot be shown that fraud, that corruption, that bribery existed in obtaining that authentication? I do not so understand it.

Mr. STOUGHTON. I understand it in this way, and there is no difficulty in understanding it if one will only place his mind toward the subject and in the right road: The State, having power to appoint, is responsible for its tribunals and they are responsible to it; but the circumference of the power of Congress is limited, and that of the power to count very much circumscribed, being neither judicial, as gentlemen say, nor legislative; although legislative powers are here claimed for the purpose of taking testimony, and the broadest judicial powers in the nature of a quo warranto for the purpose of going behind the final returns of the returning-board. The State corrects the frauds of its officers. It does not appeal to Congress, and Congress will best perform its duty by discharging it within its authority, leaving those occasional frauds, which are sometimes assumed and sometimes for effect offered to be proven, to be taken care of by the tribunals having jurisdiction over them.

I think some of my learned friends within the hearing of my voice, who have been much engaged in contested suits, have had their trials somewhat added to by being compelled to object to testimony offered in presence of a jury (and the American people are the jury to-day) to prove frauds of the most infamous character, when peradventure the practice and performance would not come up to the proclamation! But it is the duty of counsel to make objection to the introduction of testimony beyond the function of the tribunal he is before to receive; and we make it here.

And now I proceed to look at some of the questions in this case, assuming that this is a lawful and final returning-board of the State of Louisiana, having the final powers attributed to it, not merely by this body in the decision in the Florida case, not merely in the Senate by the report which I have read, not merely by force of the opinion contained in the letter of the learned chief-justice of New York, but also by the sanction of the highest courts of the State of Louisiana. I believe that if there is one principle settled in our jurisprudence, it is that on a question of local law, on the powers of a tribunal of a local character within a State, the decision of the highest judicial tribunal of the State is a final authority.

I therefore cite the decision of the highest court of Louisiana on the subject of the powers of the returning-board, not in one case only, but in several—in 25 Louisiana Annual Reports for 1873, page 268, declaring the legality of the Lynch returning-board, which did not have before it in 1872 the electoral or other returns, but undertook to canvass and did canvass the vote in favor of the Grant electors without having the returns before it. It was therefore said, if I am not mistaken, by the committee of Congress that inasmuch as the right board did not have the returns, and therefore had not the materials for action, and the wrong board did have the returns, they could not count the votes of either set of electors. The court in Louisiana in the case to which I have referred declares:

No statute conferring upon the courts the power to try cases of contested elections or title to office authorizes them to revise the action of the returning-board. If we were to assume that prerogative, we should have to go still further, and revise the returns of the supervisors of elections, examine the right of voters to vote, and, in short, the courts would become in regard to such cases mere offices for counting, compiling, and reporting election-returns. The legislature has seen proper to lodge the power to decide who has or has not been elected in the returning-board. It might have conferred that power upon the courts, but it did not. Whether the law be good or bad, it is our duty to obey its provisions, and not to legislate. * * * Having no power to revise the action of the board of returning-officers, we have nothing to do with the reasons or grounds upon which they arrived at their conclusion.

There are one or two other cases in this same book to the same effect; and when it was sought under the so-called intrusion act to eject a person who had been returned and commissioned by force of this returning-board, the court held that the commission was conclusive, and that the court could not go behind it. There was no judicial power vested in the court so to do, unless conferred specially by legislative authority. Some courts have given very good reasons for thus maintaining the inviolability of the highest and final returning-board of a State, and I beg leave here to introduce two or three such decisions,

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. What is the name of the case you just read from?

Mr. STOUGHTON. I beg pardon for not mentioning it. It was the case of Bonner vs. Lynch, and I read from page 268. It was decided in 1873, and it passed upon the power of the returning-board organized under the act of 1870, repealed by the act of 1872, the only difference between the two acts being in this, that the act of 1872 now in force requires that the returning-officers shall be appointed by the senate, while the act of 1870 designates the persons to act as the board, as the governor, lieutenant governor, I think, and two persons, naming them. That, I believe, is the only substantial difference between the two; and therefore, when the supreme court of the State of Louisiana held that it had no power to review or reverse or revise the action of the returning-board then existing, it said the same thing as to the returning-board now existing; and this tribunal will not disregard the highest judicial authority of a State upon a purely local question.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Were the duties of that board substantially the same as the duties of this?

Mr. STOUGHTON. Precisely almost. There is hardly the variation of a line. That act was substantially transcribed for the purpose of making it the act of 1872. Now I refer to 47 Illinois, 169, where a statute had expressly authorized a circuit court consisting of a single judge to pass upon a contested election case on appeal from justices, and the constitution giving judicial power to the supreme court of the State conferred it in certain cases "and in all other cases;" and when the supreme court on appeal in this case was asked to revise the decision of the circuit court, it said:

This is not a case within the meaning of the constitution, but a statutory proceeding to recanvass votes cast at an election, in which illegal votes may be rejected and legal votes may be counted and the result ascertained, and that result is not a judgment. It is neither a suit at law nor in chancery.

Why have sensible courts adopted views like that? For the purpose of keeping these inflammatory cases, as far as possible, outside of the reach of judicial authority. As was well said in a Kentucky case which I will refer to, courts of justice have always held in dealing with these questions that unless the legislative power expressly delegates authority to do it, courts have no power to touch election contests. But yet here, under a power to count electoral votes, this tribunal is expected to count the popular votes given for the electors, and to purge the polls from the beginning to the end of the election, upon the theory that it has the power by implication and by a stretch, an enforced stretch, an outrage upon language, which courts of justice take care never to commit.

I refer now to 51 Illinois, 177, where the court said that—

The proceeding was purely statutory; that without the aid of an act of the legislature the contest could not have been brought to the circuit court, and that jurisdiction can be exercised only subject to the limitations of the act.

And then in the Kentucky case, 1 Metcalfe's Kentucky Reports, 538; the court say:

This was a board to determine questions upon an election. A board is to be constituted to examine the poll-books and issue certificates of election. Another is to be organized in the case of contested elections for determining contests between claimants. Upon this the law devolves the duty and confers the power of deciding who is entitled to the office. The courts have no right to adjudicate upon these questions or to decide such contests. Decisions of the contesting-board are final and conclusive; and this is so to accomplish a twofold purpose: a speedy and summary mode of deciding cases of contested elections, and determining finally and conclusively which one of the claimants is entitled; and another, equally important, was to withdraw these contests from the jurisdiction of courts, and as was said in Newcombe vs. Kirkley, (13 B. Monroe, 517,) to prevent the ordinary tribunals of justice from being harassed, and, indeed, overwhelmed, with the investigation and involved in the excitements to which these cases may be expected to give rise.

If there ever was an illustration of the solidity and policy of such a view, it is to be found here before us, where this great tribunal is asked to go into an inquiry, endless in detail, harassing by its very nature, involving the examination of hundreds of witnesses, and leading to that excitement, to be tenfold increased, which we already perceive gathering about this Commission. Here we have offers of testimony, inflamed to the last degree by their mode of statement, involving inquiries of the most extraordinary and painful character, leading to answers, leading to testimony in reply, leading to testimony in justification of the returning-board, endless, difficult of procurement; and all for what? To enable this tribunal to violate the supremacy of the State, to determine how many votes were cast in the State of Louisiana for electors; and all that the public may be satisfied that we have here a tribunal anxious to calm and allay excitement and prevent, as the learned counsel who opened the case yesterday [Mr. Carpenter] said, a judicial proceeding to vex the nation for years, that it may thereby be determined who is elected President. I have heard more than one threat couched under shields of language so that it might not quite reach in plain terms its destination, but I have understood those threats, and they are unworthy of the circumstances under which this tribunal was formed, and equally unworthy of those who seek its justice and its decision.

Now, may it please your honors, I desire to say a few words on the subject of these statutes. My learned brother [Mr. Carpenter] yesterday insisted that this returning-board, as it has been called, had no power under the laws of Louisiana to ascertain the votes cast for electors or who had been elected. He said if that power existed anywhere, it existed in the governor of the State under the act of 1868 incorporated afterward into the revised laws of the State of Louisiana, and that proposition was presented as though the laws of Louisiana had at one time discriminated between the officer or tribunal to count votes for electors and the officer or tribunal authorized to count votes for other State officers. That is a misconception of that law, and I call attention to what the statute law on that subject is. But if it were not, if the governor had the power under the section referred to to count the vote, this tribunal would be bound under the certificate to consider that power as having been properly exercised, the governor having certified that—

Pursuant to the laws of the United States, at a general election held in accordance with law, the following-named persons were duly chosen and appointed electors.

If, therefore, that clause only were contained in this certificate, it would be ample evidence of the election of these electors, if the statute which declares that

Immediately after the receipt of a return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November, if the returns should not sooner arrive, the governor, in the presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns and ascertain therefrom the persons who have been duly elected electors, were repealed.

All who have examined the statute with care know that that provision has been repealed, however, and I will proceed to show under what circumstances it was repealed, and also that instead of that section being isolated and making a distinction between the officers authorized to count the votes for electors and those authorized to count the votes for other officers, it was a part of the scheme of the act of 1868, by which the governor, in conjunction with the district judge of the parish, counted the votes for all officers—the governor counting, subject in certain cases to a prior determination of the district judge as to whether there had not been violence, tumult, intimidation, &c., sufficient to justify the throwing out of the polls, the governor, if the district judge came to that conclusion, being inhibited by the statute from counting the vote. The governor on receiving the judge's decision, if it was to reject the poll or any number of polls, was authorized to do so and count the remainder; but he could not count the contested parish as having voted until after receiving the decision of the district judge. That was the scheme of 1868, never really to any extent put into practice; a scheme of a returning-board very imperfect, quite inadequate, and still a part of a general scheme in which the governor participated, not merely by ascertaining the votes for electors, but by ascertaining and certifying as to all votes.

Another view taken by the learned counsel, Mr. Carpenter, and very much relied upon, was this: That if a vacancy should occur in the electoral college, he did not care how this tribunal determined the question as to which statute was in force, for he could under either cast out two electoral votes and still attain his object, which seemed to me somewhat strange, his purpose being, as he told us at the outset, to appear not for Mr. Tilden, whose future supremacy he deplored as one of the greatest disasters which might befall this country, but for the ten thousand persons who had been deprived of their votes in Louisiana. A rejection, therefore, by this tribunal of two electoral votes, while it would answer his purpose, would bring upon us the calamity he so much deplored. I think he will be disappointed. Let us look at this objection. Assuming, as the learned counsel assumed, for the purpose of inquiring into this objection, that the act of 1872 is in force, let us learn whether vacancies in the electoral college are to be filled by a popular election. He referred us as authority for that to section 24, page 104 of the covered book :

That all elections to be held in this State to fill any vacancies shall be conducted and managed, and returns thereof shall be made, in the same manner as is provided for general elections.

Now, says the learned counsel, that covers the case of an election to fill a vacancy in the electoral college. But the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they give their votes, "which day shall be the same throughout the United States." By an act of Congress, section 133 of the Revised Statutes, each State is authorized to provide by law for the filling of any vacancy which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote. Then the Louisiana law provides—

If any one or more of the electors chosen by the people shall fail from any cause whatever to attend at the appointed place at the hour of four p. m. of the day prescribed for their meeting, it shall be the duty of the other electors immediately to proceed by ballot to supply such vacancy or vacancies.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. But is not that the law of 1868 ?

Mr. STOUGHTON. It is a law passed in 1868, an old law.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Did not the act of 1872 repeal that ?

Mr. STOUGHTON. O, no ; it did not touch it.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. This was also in the act of 1870, the revised statutes.

Mr. STOUGHTON. It does not touch this at all. It would be an absurdity to hold that the express purpose in the Constitution, carried out by Federal legislation, supplemented by State legislation, could be defeated by giving a violent construction to the clause, section 24, when it has abundance to feed upon in the sections that I will refer to in one moment. Look at the vacancies provided for in section 24, to be found in sections 28, 30, and 31.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. The clause that I referred to as repealing the section you have mentioned will be found in section 71 of the act of 1872. It says that "all other acts on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. STOUGHTON. Yes, that means all other acts on the subject of election laws, for the purpose of carrying on the machinery of elections within the State.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. Stoughton, I do not wish to interfere with the course of your argument, but I will venture to ask you if you think it is worth while to spend much time in the endeavor to satisfy the Commission that section 24 refers to vacancies to be filled by popular election, and can refer to nothing else ?

Mr. STOUGHTON. I do not propose to spend a moment, only to refer to the three sections which are referred to by section 24, and which relate to vacancies which may occur, and those three sections you will find to be sections 28, 30, and 31, on page 106 of the covered book.

In the revised statutes of the State which were adopted on the 14th of March, 1870, will be found the act of 1868, originally passed in that year, containing the scheme that I have mentioned, and the scheme under which the governor was to count the electoral vote, as he was in substance all other votes. That act of 1868 in entering into the revised statutes was very much divided in space; the section authorizing the district judge to act being found at page 274, section 1386. Upon a statement made by a commissioner he was to make a duplicate, transmit one to the judge and one to the governor. If the governor thought the statement of riot and tumult was of such a character that the vote ought to be thrown out, he directed the district judge to investigate it. During the investigation the governor was prohibited from counting the vote of that poll or parish. When the district judge decided, he certified his decision to the governor; the governor could then proceed to count, and he did; but he acted always in subjection to the mandate of the statute, which was that he must not count until the decision of the district court should be presented; that is, he must not count that parish. That was found to be inefficient and the act of 1870 was passed. It was passed on the 16th of March, 1870.

A question is raised that inasmuch as the act of 1870 incorporated in the revised statutes was not to go into operation until the 1st of April, that might by its own operation repeal or stand in place of the act adopted on the 16th of March to go into operation immediately. The answer is this: The act of the 14th of March repealed all prior acts on the subject of these election laws providing for elections within the State and the mode of returning votes, but repealed nothing else. It did not repeal those clauses of the act which had always stood in substance authorizing the election of electors, only changing the mode by which their election should be ascertained after the vote of the State had been cast. Then the act of 1872 was passed, I think approved on the 20th of November, 1872, and that provided for the present returning-board, adopting substantially the prior act of 1870, adopting it in all respects with the exception of the composition of the returning-board.

I have not troubled the Commission as fully as I had marked upon my notes with the different sections of these laws. I only desire to say that it will appear by looking at page 101 of the covered book that the act of 1872 provided in a general way for the election of electors, and the returning-board having been abolished and with it the functions of the governor for the purpose of counting the votes, the returning-board provided for by the act of 1872 took their place—the act of 1872 declaring in terms that “five persons to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning-officers for all elections of the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections.” And then we have at the close of the act that it “shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed.” Will any one seriously contend that the operation of that was to blot out from the statute-book the power to elect electors when their election was provided for in a previous part of the act in a general way? Will any one pretend that section 24, which has ample means to give effect to it in other sections of the act, was intended to declare that needful authority given to the college of electors to elect on the day they assemble, if need be, was blotted out, and that the State must lose its electoral vote because it could not possibly then go through on that day with another election? Such frivolous objections are sometimes made elsewhere; but I think are entitled to but very little force. It has been said that this board to be appointed by the senate should consist of five persons. Originally that number were appointed. Having ceased to be five and having become four only by the resignation of one, it is said it had no power to act by means of these four. The gentlemen who urge the objection say that although it had no power to act there being but four, if there were five it could act by three alone. "A majority of whom shall constitute a quorum and have power to make returns of all elections." Is it to be said that with the power expressly conferred upon three to act alone, they could only act alone when there were five and could not when there were four?

Then it is said that the political complexion of this board was not of the right color; there should have been a democratic infusion; and there has been read an application for the admission of a democratic member. I suppose, upon that theory, if after the election of these five, two being democrats and three republicans, the two democrats (not an improbable supposition) should have changed their faith, the board would cease to exist by that operation! This clause is directory merely. The failure to observe it in no manner interferes with the capacity or jurisdiction of the board.

I suppose that it is entirely proper and respectful to this tribunal to argue the leading questions involved here without assailing the reputation of any one, and I shall follow no example of that kind. I have heard the members of this board stigmatized by the speech of counsel in a way that I have been somewhat sorry to hear. Personally they are unknown here, personally they were perhaps unknown to counsel who spoke of them. They are to be respected as officials when acting as such, and their determination is to be respected and followed.

An example of that kind was set in a very celebrated case where the question arose, in 1792, as to whether George Clinton or Mr. John Jay was elected governor of the State of New York. There, as the members of this tribunal may remember, there was a clear majority of votes deposited in the ballot-boxes of the State of New York for Mr. Jay. The sheriff appointed to carry the votes of one county, giving a majority of some four hundred for Mr. Jay, was an officer whose term of office had expired for a few days, no one having been appointed to succeed him. Mr. King, an eminent lawyer, advised that he was a proper messenger to carry the votes, being sheriff de facto. Aaron Burr advised that he was not. The lineal ancestors of the democratic party of to-day adopted the views of Aaron Burr, threw out the county vote, and defeated Mr. Jay; and inasmuch as the canvassing-board had final and absolute power to determine who was elected, although an effort was made by the friends of Mr. Jay to induce him to rebel against the decision, to vex the State of New York for years perhaps with the judicial question of who was elected, he declined to do it, considering that the tribunal had final and absolute power to determine the question, and he cheerfully submitted to its exercise; and moreover, he added that no man, no set of men, did wrong who did right under the law—holding to the precept that justice is the law executed, and not that wild and unlicensed thing which we sometimes call justice, but is the law executed, whatever the law may be; and whoever executes the law, if he be empowered by it so to do, is entitled to respect, and if his determination is final, it must stand unresisted. You can no more invade the domain of State jurisdiction than you can direct your marshal to enter my house and take my property or my person. And he who invites any departure from that respect for loyalty to the law and its officers is not performing his duty as a minister of justice, and he who denounces a judge who has discharged his duty because it does not suit the prejudice or political views of another, is unworthy to speak his name or to come into his presence. Such was the teaching of Mr. Jay.

I have heard it said that the law authorizing what the learned counsel calls the disfranchisement of these voters is unconstitutional. Is it? Will the Commission indulge me for a moment while I refer to the doctrine of one of the ablest, one of the purest, and one of the most distinguished of men belonging to the democratic party at this day. I find this doctrine in a report written by him—I allude to Senator Stevenson, of Kentucky—founded upon authority so solid that nothing can shake the views he presents. If it be unconstitutional to pass laws for the purpose of protecting men from violence and outrage at the polls, then we have been under a delusion for many generations. I refer for this purpose to reports of committees of the House of Representatives, second session, Thirty-sixth Congress, volume 1, 1860-'61. He is considering the question of the effect of intimidation and violence at an election where the sitting member received 10,068 votes and the contestant 2,796; and I allude to it upon the general question that such legislation as we have in Louisiana is right in all States and countries, but especially right in that State where in 1868 a lesson was taught which led to the legislation now before you; a lesson written in blood, as was said by the learned Senator [Mr. Howe] who addressed you yesterday; a lesson taught us by the death by violence, as reported authentically by committees of Congress, of two thousand people, where whole parishes were disfranchised on one side. No horror has been expressed at outrages like those. Great horror is expressed for fraud, perjury; none for violence and murder. While Louisiana was teaching the lesson that led the legislature to pass this act, the State of New York was teaching a lesson in its chief city which led the Congress of this country to pass the law to take care of the elections for members of Congress, because in 1868 25,000 votes were manufactured—we all know it; it is a matter of authentic history—in the city of New York. They were needed to carry the State; they carried it by 10,000 majority. A governor was elected by them; a President was to be. Sitting over and managing the scene was an individual as chairman of the State committee whose name I will not mention, and his instruments, in the city of New York, who actually manufactured the votes that led to the legislation we all know. Such legislation in cases of fraud and violence and murder and outrage sometimes becomes necessary.

In the report of Senator Stevenson it was said "that illegal voting was a trifling wrong—altogether a venial offense—in comparison with the overshadowing outrage of intimidation and violence upon which the burden of his evidence bears."

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. In what case was that report made?

Mr. STOUGHTON. I read from the report made by Mr. Stevenson from the committee on the Henry Winter Davis election case, in which report he cites for his propositions authorities the most eminent we have in the common law, and he says:

Indeed, there is no conflict of authority, nowhere a hint of an opposite doctrine, no intimation of a doubt that elections must be free, or they cease to have any legal validity whatever. * * * The very word election implies choice, the declaration of the preference, the wish, of those who have the right to make a choice, * * * but if bribery be found to have corrupted the well, if violence prevented access to the poll, or reasonable fear deterred electors from a determined effort to exercise the elective franchise, there is no question made as to the number of votes affected by this bribery, violence, or intimidation.

In Louisiana, under the statute, it is said that 10,000 votes were thrown out by the returning-board, and my learned brother yesterday said he appeared for those men here. I will state the problem: I think after what has been said I may state the problem that was solved in Louisiana by those who managed the election there. In forty parishes there was 6,097 republican majority. In the remaining seventeen parishes there were 20,323 colored voters registered and 16,253 registered white voters. What do you suppose the problem to be solved was? How to get a majority to overcome the 6,000 republican majority in the forty parishes. That was the problem. Out of what material? Sixteen thousand white votes registered to 20,000 colored. Was the problem solved? Yes. How? Does any man in this court-room believe that the problem could have been peacefully solved by 12,000 majority with 20,000 colored republican voters to 16,000 white voters? What became of the latter in the seven-teen parishes? I appear for them, in imitation of my learned friend. Were they disfranchised? How?

Again, five of these parishes had 13,244 registered colored voters and 5,134 white. The problem was what? To get a democratic majority of 4,495 by means of 5,000 white voters to 13,000 colored. Was it solved? Yes. How? Let the record of the five parishes answer. Solved by bloody hands. I hurl back the charge of fraud and disfranchisement of voters! There are two sides to this question, and if you sit here to go back and canvass votes, you sit here to administer the laws of Louisiana, and you will administer them by learning who have been disfranchised and what was the lawful vote of that State in harmony with her laws, and not in harmony with the will of any party.

I will not trouble the Commission further except to say, as to the objection made to some of the electors because they held offices under the State government when elected electors, that I conceive there is here no disqualification whatever. The constitutional provision inhibiting the holding and the exercise of two offices refers only to offices under the State constitution, to offices mentioned in it; and on that subject I desire to call attention to a case to be found in 25 Louisiana Annual Reports, page 138.

I now leave it to my learned brothers to make such further observations upon the questions presented as they may see fit.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, I know how weary you must be, and it is with extreme reluctance that I rise to address you. There is this reflection with which we may all sustain ourselves in this protracted trial, that we shall probably never have to go through such an experience again, certainly never such an experience again so far as it relates to the matter of its dignity and its supreme importance. I know, judging by what I have already experienced and observed of your kindness, that you will be forbearing in indulging me in my part of this discussion. I shall endeavor, Mr. President and gentlemen, to eschew everything in the way of an attempt at extended elaboration, to try to state, if I can, what seem to me to be the points on which this case now, as it is presented, must turn.

Of course, at the very threshold of your inquiry now is the question, what are the statutes which have been enacted by Louisiana under the authority of the Constitution of the United States directing the appointment of electors—what are the statutes which were in force this last year governing that matter? My friend, who has just taken his seat, has gone over that subject; it has been gone over by others; I had designed to discuss it; but I think I will omit any extended analysis of the statutes. I will venture to make this statement, gentlemen, that after you have carefully gone over the statutes and have looked at them in all their parts, you will be unanimous. One of your body said to me a day or two ago that you had proven to be unanimous on one subject, and that was that this was a great Commission and that the members thereof were all great men.

The PRESIDENT. There has been no vote on that question.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Now, I will venture the prediction that when you go over these statutes you will be unanimous upon another subject, that is, that the act of 1872 did govern in 1876 the presidential election. You will be unanimous in the opinion that that provision of the revisory act of 1870, which provided for the canvassing of the returns by the governor, &c., was repealed and was not in force in 1876. You will be unanimous upon that subject for the very plain reason that that provision which made the governor a canvasser for the purposes of the election was inconsistent with the fifty-fourth section of the session acts of 1870, which expressly provided a different tribunal for all elections, including the electoral elections.

There is not a particle of difficulty or doubt or obscurity upon either one of the propositions that I have thus far stated. You will also, I think, be unanimous upon the proposition that the election law of 1872 applies to all elections, and furnishes the machinery or means of conducting all in the State, including that for the electoral college. You will be so for several quite conclusive reasons. One is that when an act undertakes to revise and provide for a subject-matter in its totality, such a revisory act is always considered to repeal and to take the place of the acts that it revises in so far as it purports so to do. This act of 1872 purports to supply the machinery for every popular election in the State by its scope. But a more conclusive reason perhaps than even that, is that its express terms in its section 2, in so many words, declare that this returning-board shall be "the returning-board for all elections held in the State," and you have simply to disregard the express wording of the act, without any authority for so disregarding it, or else you have got so to treat this law.

I say I have no apprehensions in regard to either one of those propositions. Now the only other one left is the question whether the consequences of the propositions that I have now gone over lead me to any result hurtful to the position that we take in this case in regard to this, to wit, that that section of the act of 1870—I mean the revisory act which provides for filling vacancies in the electoral college—is thereby also repealed. That is the predicament that we are claimed to place ourselves in, when we say that the act of 1872 has superseded and swept away the act of 1870, including that section in regard to the governor canvassing the vote.

Now, sirs, it is never wise, it is never manly, it is never lawyerlike, it is never respectful to a court to blink or dodge any question in a great discussion or in a small one; and it would be eminently unworthy that we should undertake to avoid every possible consequence of the positions we take in this regard; and upon that subject I have not the slightest difficulty, though in that I may be deceived.

My question at the present moment is, how can I preserve and keep in force that provision of the act of 1870 revising that of 1868, which provides for filling the electoral college, consistently with what I have just been saying? I answer first of all that it is a cardinal, as it is an exceedingly benign, canon of interpretation that a law is never repealed by a new act unless either expressly so done, or unless the repugnance be such (and now I am using the very words of the Supreme Court of the United States, at least half a dozen times repeated in the most solemn judgments) that it is impossible for the two acts to stand together. Those words are so familiar, so thoroughly established as law, that they have become the formula of statement upon which courts seize in stating the rule on this subject, that a succeeding act shall not, where the prior act is not expressly repealed, repeal the preceding one unless the two cannot stand together.

Another rule of interpretation equally salutary, equally well established, equally familiar, you will find stated in the case of The United States vs. Kirby, 7 Wallace, pages 482, 486, and 487.

I beg to impress this part of my statement upon the memory of every one of you. There is of course nothing new in that case, as you will see when I state it. It is only in cases of doubt that the office of interpretation comes in at all. Where the language of an act is clear, one of the maxims, one of Domat's rules, one of the American rules, as you will find it laid down in Dwarris, is that there is no place for interpretation except where the words are susceptible of doubt. Wherever, then, the business of the interpreter comes in at all and has play, another rule for his guidance is this, and it is one that I want to impress on your memories, from 7 Wallace, pages 482, 487, that wherever interpretation would lead to consequences that are either absurd or hurtful to the public welfare, that interpretation shall never be tolerated unless its escape is impossible.

Then keeping that in your mind, go with me the next step. Is it possible to escape the conclusion that, under the legislation of Louisiana, Louisiana was disfranchised?

I invite gentlemen on the other side who may suppose that this act is repealed, by which a vacancy in the electoral college can be filled if filled at all, to show me some statute that forces upon you, either by direct provision or by any fair interpretation, the conclusion that Louisiana has been disfranchised in these processes of legislation. There is nothing, absolutely nothing, to repeal that section which provides for the filling of vacancies under the law of 1868 and the law of 1870, except the repealing clause of 1872, which is in these words:

That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Is it possible for the act of 1870, providing for filling vacancies, to stand consistently with that repealing clause? If it is, you are bound by your oaths and by all the rules of interpretation to let it stand; first, because of the rule I have stated, that you shall not make it work a repeal by implication if you can help it; second, because if you do make it work a repeal, you work a disfranchisement of the State. The provision for filling a vacancy in the electoral college is not an election law at all in the sense that that language is used there. Taking that section by itself, it is not an election law at all. I mean in the popular and legal sense of that repealing clause. It is filling a vacancy where there was a failure, the gentlemen say, to elect; we say where there was a vacancy under the provisions of these acts of Congress on the subject of vacancy and this legislation of the State.

Mr. President and gentlemen, having said that much, you are in possession, without any elaboration at all of the discussion, of my views in regard to what you will find out for yourselves when you go to your chamber, and I take the next step in this discussion. The law of 1872 was in force; it governed this election; and the provision for filling the vacancy is one that was resorted to and was in force.

I ought to have added, by way of abundant caution, in the connection in which I was a moment ago, another rule of interpretation which is exceedingly valuable here, and that is where a statute has received what your Supreme Court calls a practical construction, and has been executed according to that practical construction, in every case of doubt, that is exceedingly valuable. The Supreme Court of the United States, in a decision that I will hand up—I think it is in 21 Howard, 66—says that, in a case of doubt, the practical construction that has been given to a law is conclusive. This law for filling vacancies has been practically construed as applicable to the presidential elections, because all the elections that have been held since it was upon the statute-book have been conducted under it, there being in fact two.

I take my next proposition. I have not deemed it necessary in marking out my part of the work to take these propositions up in any particular order. I therefore come at once to the question as to what opportunity there is left for doubt, dispute, or debate in regard to the question of the power of Governor Kellogg to certify this election. I want to add to what was said by Mr. Stoughton, whose argument has just been concluded, in the way of refreshing your memories, the words of the Supreme Court of the United States upon that point that are so exactly apposite, so completely conclusive here, as it seems to me, as to shut up forever, to all intents and purposes, all discussion in regard to the question which was the rightful government in Louisiana and which was entitled to make the certificate.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. Mr. Shellabarger, before you proceed to that point, I should like to ask you if there are any of the sections of the law of 1868, on which you have been just commenting, that you claim are not repealed by the repealing clause of the law of 1872, except the one you referred to about filling vacancies?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I have not gone over the law of 1868 nor even the law of 1870, as it revises that of 1868, in all its parts. I therefore cannot answer that question categorically, for I do not know, not having any concern about any other parts of the law except those that were involved in this case. I answer generally that I understand that an examination will result in finding that all the provisions of 1868 are superseded without exception by the revision of 1870. Then, if your question means to ask me what part of the legislation of 1870 is left alive, I reply that my analysis has not been such as to enable me to answer except as to the case in hand, and that as to that, the section relating to vacancies has been preserved, first by the fact that it is not within the repealing clause of 1872, it not being a matter as to holding an election; and second, it has not been repealed, because to do so would disfranchise a State; third, it has not been repealed because it is possible to stand. That is my whole position on that subject.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. The law of 1870 is an entire revision of the whole statute law of the State on this subject. It contains provision as to the presidential electors meeting, how they shall certify their acts, and a like class of provisions.

Mr. EVARTS. I rise to ask Mr. Commissioner Payne whether, in his inquiry as to the law of 1868, he referred to the general election law of 1868, or the electoral election law of 1868, which are two independent acts?

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. May they not be "election laws?"

Mr. EVARTS. They are two independent acts, found in the session laws of the same year.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Now, Mr. President, I take the language of the Supreme Court of the United States from a case that has been often referred to, Luther vs. Borden, and I apply it here. It is in these words :

It rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State; * * * and when the Senators—

And it is especially to this that I invite your attention—and when the Senators and Representatives from a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character—

Note, for here are two objections, first, that the State has not a republican character ; second, that it is not a State, or that the Kellogg government was not the government. The Supreme Court replies to that, that when members are admitted to the councils of the Union—the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority, and its decision is binding on every other department of the government and cannot be questioned in a judicial tribunal.

I said, gentlemen, that that language was absolutely conclusive of this whole question, and it is, unless the suggestion made by Judge Trumbull to my friend who preceded me is an answer. His suggestion was, "Well, that says it is for Congress to determine, and here we are in Congress for the purpose of having you determine the thing the other way." Now, plainly and most manifestly, the suggestion is founded in error, first, because if you were Congress, with all the sovereign powers of Congress, and could make a law, still you could not make your act ex post facto or retroactive. If that thing was in November, 1876, a State by the recognition of the two Houses, by the action of the Executive under the act of 1795, by the fact of its passing laws and taking the government and exercising it, by all the facts that make and create a State of this Union de facto and de jure—if that were so of Louisiana as it was in November, 1876, then will my friend have the courage, not to say the temerity, to tell this Commission that even Congress can take that status away and rob the State by post hac action of its capacity to elect, as it was held on the day when the election was made ?

I come next to the question of the ineligibility that is alleged to be wrought as to certain of these electors by the fact that certain of them held State offices. Let me take now and let me make illustrious, if I can, my speech by a quotation. I know it has been quoted a hundred times, so that it has become familiar to you all ; but the oftener the better, because, first, of the intrinsic excellence of the statement itself ; second, because of the time whence it comes to us, away back in the very morning of our life as a nation ; and, third, and perhaps especially, because it comes from one of the most illustrious of the framers of the Constitution. I mean Charles Pinckney. It is a speech that he made on the bill that was pending in Congress in 1800, proposing to make a commission something like this. I am now reading from Mr. Pinckney for the purpose of showing to you that it was not the design of the Constitution to permit the States by any method to add to or subtract from the qualifications of the presidential electors. I have now reached the point that it is said disqualifies Kellogg and one or two other men because they held State offices, and I wish to make use of what Mr. Pinckney here states upon that point. But in order that I may use what he states in other connections, I will read as well what he stated on other points as upon that one. He says :

Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument, to give to Congress no interference in or control over the election of President. It is made their duty to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses, and for the President of the Senate to declare who has the majority of the votes of the electors so transmitted.

It never was intended, nor could it have been safe, in the Constitution, to have given to Congress thus assembled in convention the right to object to any vote, or even to question whether they were constitutionally or properly given.

This right of determining on the manner in which the electors shall vote; the inquiry into the qualifications, and the guards that are necessary to prevent disqualified or improper men voting, and to insure the votes being legally given, rests and is exclusively vested in the State legislatures.

When I come to read this, it reminds me that my friend who sits before me [Mr. Trumbull] drew his wisdom from this speech, for it is almost in hæc verba the language of his report made in 1873.

If it is necessary to have guards against improper elections of electors and to institute tribunals to inquire into their qualifications, with the State legislatures—

That is just what you said in 1873; it is with the State legislatures—and with them alone, rests the power to institute them, and they must exercise it. To give, to Congress, even when assembled in convention, a right to reject or admit the votes of States would have been so gross and dangerous an absurdity as the framers of the Constitution never could have been guilty of. How could they expect that in deciding on the election of a President, particularly where such election was strongly contested, that party spirit would not prevail and govern every decision? Did they not know how easy it was to raise objections—

Very easy, as we have found out to-day, for there are whole piles, cart-loads of them here—how easy it was to raise objections against the votes of particular electors, and that in determining upon these it was more than probable the members would recollect their sides, their favorite candidate, and sometimes their own interests?

These being the avowed reasons for introducing this bill, I answer them by observing that the Constitution having directed that electors shall be appointed in the manner the legislature of each State shall direct, it is to be taken as granted that the State legislatures will perform their duties, and make such directions as only qualified men shall be returned as electors. The disqualifications against any citizen being an elector are very few—

Now note—

The disqualifications against any citizen being an elector are very few indeed; they are two: the first, that no officer of the United States shall be an elector; and the other, that no member of Congress shall.

Having read that, we have the indication of the point I am now upon, that it was for very wise reasons that the disqualifications imposed upon the electors were very few; also, we have it indicated, what is plain of course upon the face of the instrument, that the Government of the United States, the Constitution itself, was the only authority upon that subject of eligibility, and that the States can exercise none whatever.

I now pass to another authority. Let me refer you to the language of Mr. Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, page 64:

Another rule of construction is that when the Constitution defines the circumstances under which a right may be exercised—or a penalty imposed, the specification is an implied prohibition against legislative interference to add to the condition or to extend the penalty to other cases. On this ground it has been held by the supreme court of Maryland (4 Maryland, 189) that where the Constitution defined the qualifications of an officer, it was not in the power of the legislature to change or superadd to them, unless the power to do so was expressly or by necessary implication conferred by the Constitution.

The electoral right here—

So that, both by the most obvious reason of the case and by the authority of Mr. Pinckney, one of the framers of the Constitution, stating why it was that so few disqualifications were imposed upon the holding of the electoral office, and also by the decisions of the courts, and by every possible view that applies to the case, it is true that the holding of office under the State government neither is nor can be made to be a disqualification to hold the electoral office. I add more, that the Congress itself cannot add to or subtract from the qualifications of an elector. There they stand, broad, wide, and unlimited, except, as Mr. Pinckney states, by two solitary disqualifications.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Would it be unconstitutional for a State to require its elector to be a citizen of the State?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. A citizen of the State in which he resides? I answer that in my judgment it would be. I see not why it is that a State can on any account add to or subtract from the provisions that the Constitution has made upon the subject of qualification.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Could then a State select an alien for an elector?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. If the State may not choose an alien for an elector, it must be because the Constitution has prohibited it. The Constitution of the United States has not prohibited it. It has, as Mr. Pinckney has expressed it, made but two prohibitions. It was long doubted whether the States could appoint their electors by an act of the legislature, but long ago it was settled that there was no limitation, no fettering of the power of the State in regard to the methods of the appointment. That there was a provision in regard to what the qualification of the electors should be, I think is express and plain upon the very face of the Constitution, and two disqualifications being named the addition of others is excluded. Whether I am right or not upon that, is not very material for the purposes of this discussion, because the question put to me by the Senator does not arise in this case. No such extreme case has occurred here, and it is an abstract proposition.

The next question I propose to consider is whether the returning-board as it was organized was a good returning-board; I mean good as to numbers. It is said that because it had but four in it, when there ought to have been five, that spoils the board and renders it incapable of action. Now, without any elaboration, permit me to state the authorities and the propositions upon which I rely in that regard. In the case of Gildersleve vs. The Board of Education, 17 Abbott's Practice Reports, 201, you will find a case where the court held that a board composed of ten persons with power to fill vacancies could by a vote of five of its members remove a superintendent of schools at a time when there was an unfilled vacancy in the board, because they could act by a majority, and five was a majority of nine.

I have selected this case simply because, although a decision of a common pleas judge, the facts happened to be so exceedingly like those of the case we are dealing with. It was a case where the number was fixed by statute at ten; it was a case where there was a vacancy at the time of the action; it was a case where there was a power to fill the vacancy in the board; it was a case where they failed to fill the vacancy; and it was a case where had they filled the vacancy the vote by which the act was done, to wit, five, would not have accomplished the removal. There the court was brought square up to the very question whether that board thus constituted could act. It is the exact case with which we deal. There the court says that in private affairs all must meet and consider, and then proceeds:

But where the powers to be exercised are a continuous trust or duty confided to designated persons, the discharge of the public trust is not to be interrupted or fail through the death or absence or inability of any of the persons to whom the exercise of it is intrusted; provided, there is a sufficient number to confer together, to deliberate, and, in view of the possibility of the division of opinion, to decide upon what course is to be adopted.

I said that this was the decision of a common pleas judge.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. By whom was the opinion delivered?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. By Judge Daly; but I want now to say for Judge Daly's opinion and for his authority that he has quoted what I have read from the very highest sources of the law, and I give you the cases from whence he derived it. You will find it first in the case of Blacket vs. Blizard, decided in 1829, found in 9 Barnewall and Creswell, pages 856 to 859. You will find the same principle in Cooke vs. Loveland, 2 Bosanquet and Puller, 31; also in Rex vs. Beeston, 3 Term Reports, 592; also in Grindley vs. Baker, 1 Bosanquet and Puller, 229. You will find the same thing in its legal effect laid down in Bouvier's Law Dictionary under the title "Quorum." Precisely the same thing is decided in the great case of The People vs. Cooke, 4 Selden, 67. That was a case where the court decided that a vacancy or an absence in the election board did not vitiate the poll. That is one of the leading American cases. It is quoted everywhere ever since it was decided, on a great many different points, and it is so long that I will ask you to make a note of the place where you will find the fact especially stated as to how that board was organized in the dissenting opinion of Judge Taggart, pages 95 and 96. There you will find that the board held an election when but two out of the three were present a part of the time, and other irregularities appeared in the case.

You will find the same thing decided in The State vs. Stumpf, 21 Wisconsin, 579, where two out of three judges were held to be competent to hold an election. The same principle you will find decided in the State of Louisiana in 4 Louisiana Annual Reports, 419, decided in 1849, where it was held that when the power of a motion was conferred upon two-thirds of the body, then two-thirds of a quorum were capable of acting. So also in a case in 10 Wendell, 658, and in 16 Iowa, 284, where the same thing is laid down.

The result of all these cases is that wherever a body has a public or political duty to discharge, as distinguished from private arbitration or trial of that sort, there because it is a public tribunal exercising, as in the case at bar, political functions with the presence of a quorum, a majority of a quorum is competent to act and the public business will not be suffered to be arrested or put in peril by reason of the death or the absence of any member. The law as laid down in the case of Gilderleve is the law upon this subject.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Permit me to ask a question. Have you examined those cases so as to say whether the board was full, that is, that the number required by law had absolutely been appointed and were in existence, or whether there was a mere absence?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I answer that, and it is a very pertinent inquiry, they are not all so directly on all-fours with the case at bar as the case I first read, because in most of them, perhaps in all for aught I know, the absence was not by reason of death so as to create an actual vacancy; and the reasoning of the court is entirely in support of our position, to wit, that the public interests will not be imperiled nor stopped absence, whether that absence be caused by death or what not. They employ that very language, so as to show that it makes no difference what the cause of the absence is, whether it is death or what; it being a public function, a public tribunal disposing of public and political affairs, it can act by a majority when a majority is present. That is the law of this body, and it makes no difference, as you will see by reading the cases, whether the absence is caused by death or what.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I put the question, sir, because there are very respectable cases, I am sure, where the courts have holden, even with the provision of the statute that a majority may act, that, if the board is not full, the action of a majority will not bind, because that is not the board provided by law.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I am very much obliged for the suggestion, and every one that I can answer I will, and if I cannot I will say so.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. If it would not interrupt you I should like to ask you a question. According to my recollection, all the authorities you have read are very good law; but do they touch the case where the board is required to be constituted of different elements, where the statute creating it requires it to be constituted of different elements, and requires certain persons to constitute it in practice, and one element excludes the other element?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. That question I will discuss under another head; but my answer now to that suggestion is that that provision is, in its very nature and by the necessities of the case, directory, and it does not go to the essential power of the body. You must know that from the very common sense of the case, because how are you to test whether a man is a democrat or a republican? How are you to find out whether his politics change yesterday, to-day, or to-morrow? It is most obvious, I submit to your long experience and excellent learning, it must be so, that that is a directory provision to be abided by and performed in good faith, and if not performed in good faith and if there were no reason for its being omitted in this case, then it is an act reprehensible and to be condemned; but it does not go to the jurisdiction of the body. I will state here, Mr. President and gentlemen, what I happen to know. Gentlemen have been talking about the testimony they propose to give. Now, let me state the testimony that I propose to give if you open this door. I shall prove, and say so on my professional honor, that if these gentlemen—and they seem to me to be gentlemen of the very highest character—have not falsified to me, I will prove, if you compel us to go into this door, that we tendered again and again the filling of that vacancy and it was refused by every man, and there were several to whom the application was made, because they did not want to be mixed up with the troublous affairs of Louisiana and the long labor, or some such reason as that. I only say that, in passing, to repudiate and repel these incessant inundations that we have in the way of denunciation, of invective, and of declamation about fraud. I undertake to meet it just where I have; and if I am deceived in that, it is not my fault, but it is the fault of the gentleman who stated it to me, he being one of the leading members, not the president, of the board.

I now come to the next point that I have marked in my brief, and that is a proposition that my friend Senator Carpenter seems to attach some consequence to, though I do not know that anybody else on his side has especially discussed it; and it is the proposition that these functions of the returning-board of Louisiana are judicial in their nature, that they could not under the constitution of Louisiana be conferred except on a court, and that hence this law goes by the board for that reason. Let me in the first place give your honors a reference to the case of The State vs. Hufty, 11 Louisiana Annual Reports, 304, decided in 1856. I give you the date of the decision in order that I may get you away back of the unhealthy influences that are alleged to have pervaded and affected these courts since the rebellion. In 1856, when the State constitution had a provision, as every constitution has, divorcing the executive, the legislative, and the judicial parts of the government, keeping them separate; away back in 1856, under a constitution that prohibited the exercise of judicial powers by anything except the courts of Louisiana, this question arose in the case of The State vs. Hufty. There an address was made—that was what it was called—an address by the legislature to remove Mr. Hufty from the office of sheriff to which he had been elected. One of the grounds for removal was the very ground with which we deal to-day, to wit, that his election had been carried by violence, intimidation, and fraud. It was alleged that there were organized bands of men that broke up the ballot-box, disturbed the election, and prevented its result being fair. The counsel in that case made the point directly that that was a judicial question, that it could not be tried in the legislature, and that the law providing for such address was unconstitutional. The court decided this very question that it was not a judicial but was an administrative process—that was the word of the court—and was entirely competent to be committed to the legislature, and that that was therefore constitutional.

Then I give you three other cases: the case of Collins vs. Knoblock, 25 Louisiana Annual Reports, 263; The State vs. Lynch, the same book, 267; also 13 Louisiana Annual Reports, 90, in every one of which the question of the validity of laws giving this power to the returning-board was involved, although perhaps in none of them, certainly not in all of them, was the question directly and expressly made; but it was involved in each one of these cases, the one in 13 Annual Reports being under a former constitution, because that was about 1858, the others under the present constitution and under the law of 1870, all holding and agreeing that this is a valid law, and that the judicial powers, or the quasi-judicial powers, as the court calls them, that are conferred upon this returning-board are entirely competent to be so conferred under the constitution of Louisiana.

Then upon that question—that local question of the constitution and laws of Louisiana—you have the judgment three times, nay four times over, pronounced under similar constitutions by the court of last resort of the State of Louisiana. Surely, that ought to be enough upon that. But pardon me again, by way of making “assurance double sure,” for adding to them other authorities. First I take Cooley’s Constitutional Limitations, page 623, and I use his words in the way of fortification of what I have said. Speaking about the proposition that boards of canvassers generally act ministerially in our States, he proceeds:

This is the general rule, and the exceptions are those where the law under which the canvass is made declares the decision conclusive, or where a special statutory board is established with powers of final decision.

So that, according to the authority of Mr. Cooley, it is perfectly competent for their legislature to confer the quasi-judicial powers upon the board, and where that is done by the State statute it is final, and neither by quo warranto nor by any other trial can you reverse the decision of the returning-board, as has been decided in Louisiana in the four cases that I have now given to you. I may refer also to Greer vs. Shackelford, Constitutional S. C. Reports, 642. There is also a case in 1 Metcalf, Kentucky, Reports, Batman vs. Magowan, 533; The People vs. Goodwin, 22 Michigan, 496; The State vs. Marlow, 15 Ohio State Reports, 114; The Commonwealth vs. Garrigues, 28 Pennsylvania State Reports, 9; The Commonwealth vs. Baxter, 35 Pennsylvania State

Reports, 263; The Commonwealth vs. Leech, 44 Pennsylvania State Reports, 332.

In every one of these cases there were special statutory tribunals provided. In most of them they were not the courts. In my State it happened to be one of the courts; but in every one of them, whether they were special statutory tribunals or whether they were courts, it was held, just as Cooley says, that wherever or whenever a special tribunal is constituted as the one to try, as this does, it can be made final. It is administrative, to adopt the language of the supreme court of Louisiana in the old case in 13 Annual Reports, 90, and requoted in every subsequent decision. It is administrative; it is a part of the political machinery of your country; and it is perfectly competent, unless the constitution of the State otherwise provides, to confer it upon these special tribunals; and that is as well settled as anything that is settled in our law.

Mr. President, how long have I been speaking?

The PRESIDENT. One hour and eight minutes, to be exact.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I want to add now to the authorities that were read by my friend who preceded me upon this subject of the finality of the acts of the returning-board in Louisiana, and also upon the question I have just passed over, to wit, that it is competent to bestow this power upon this special tribunal, and is not unconstitutional. He read one, The State, on the relation of John M. Bonner, vs. B. L. Lynch, in 25 Louisiana Annual Reports, page 267, and I add the case of Collins vs. Knoblock, 25 Louisiana Annual Reports, page 263, and also 13th Louisiana Annual Reports, page 90. The court go over very thoroughly and carefully, and, I think, very strongly state, the law of Louisiana upon this subject; but whether strongly or not, for the purposes of this tribunal, by the judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States, making the laws of the States and their interpretation by the local courts the law of this tribunal, you are bound to abide.

Gentlemen, I have gone over these various outlying questions as well as I could. I come now to the main question in this case, and really, as it seems to me in all frankness and fairness of statement, the only question there is; and that is decided by what you have just decided in the case of Florida, and that is whether or not it is competent for you to go behind the action of the returning-board of Louisiana for the purpose of finding out what happened in its exercise of the jurisdiction vested by the statute. I need not restate, indeed I will not, what has been decided in the Florida case. I know that the logic and law of that case has decided all there is in this, if I can appreciate legal principle at all, except the question whether that Louisiana returning-board was one authorized by valid law to exercise the jurisdiction that it undertook to exercise.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Was it offered in the Florida case to prove that the State board of canvassers of Florida were actuated by corrupt motives in whatever mistakes they were said to have made? In this case it is directly offered to prove that the motive of the board in doing these alleged wrong things was corrupt.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I understood, your honor, that the proposition in the Florida case offered to prove—without designating whether it went to the question of motive or not—fraud generally, corrupt action on the part of the Florida returning-board. That was the proposition, to prove conspiracy and corrupt motive or action on the part of that board.

Now I come to the consideration of that question so far as I shall discuss it at all, because I shall assume in the remarks that I am about to make that the Florida case decided nothing. That is the assumption we are compelled to adopt, because it is adopted and this debate is conducted and the whole case is conducted on the idea that nothing has been decided in the Florida case. Now let me state what I understand to be the main question or foundation-inquiry that we have reached, and it is this: It being assumed that the law of 1872 is in force and is constitutional—I have gone over that—it being assumed that this board had the functions that the second and third sections purported to give to the returning-board, then is it competent for this tribunal to inquire into the method of the exercise of the jurisdiction that the board did possess? Let me restate my proposition. It is really the same question, very much less clearly stated, that was suggested by his honor, Judge Miller, to wit: Whether there being a board competent to make these returns, competent and required by the law, as it expressly is, to find out, to declare, and certify who were duly elected to the offices in the State, including that of elector, that being the jurisdiction of the board, you have the power in this tribunal to try the question as to how they reached the result they did reach?

Upon the threshold of that inquiry, pardon me for saying to you that when we deny in this stage of inquiry and in this tribunal the power of going behind the finding of that board, the charge that we are thereby covering up fraud or seeking to escape scrutiny is, I submit, unutterably unjust. It has not even the semblance of fairness in it. Why? Simply because—and I concede his law—my friend, Mr. Carpenter, has furnished us with a reply to all the loud denunciations in which he indulged yesterday; and, with my friend Stoughton, I must say that I too was surprised at the language that was brought into this high tribunal when he undertook to denounce four men that he probably never saw, as four villains of Louisiana. I say the language was not worthy of my friend. It is surely not worthy of this tribunal. Why do I say that our position is no concealment of fraud? First of all, because it is begging the whole question to say that you have a right to try the question of fact that discloses this fraud, in this tribunal. I said a moment ago that he begged the whole question when he said we were undertaking to cover up fraud by our objection to this evidence. It just occurs to me that in a case not long ago decided by his honor, Mr. Justice Field, in 13 Wallace, 347, where Mr. Bradley sued Mr. Fisher, a judge of this District, because he fraudulently, maliciously, wantonly, and corruptly turned him away from the bar, Justice Field met that as a court, as a lawyer would, by saying that is one of the cases where you cannot show fraud for reasons that are given by the Justice in the decision. It would have been strange logic and stranger law for Mr. Carpenter to have got up and insulted the court by saying, "You are nine villains and conspirators undertaking to shut out the light of truth from the courts of the country." It would have been just as worthy, though, as this remark here to-day.

Then take the case of Field vs. Seabury, 19 Howard, 331, an action of ejectment coming up from California on a writ of error, where a law making a grant had been got through the legislature by fraud, whereby the grantee under the fraudulent deed brought himself within the category of persons whose titles to land were confirmed by an act of Congress. He got his grant by a fraud in the legislature. He brought himself within the category. His opponent sought to set up the fraud; but no, said the Supreme Court of the United States, it is not true that fraud in every forum vitiates everything; you are in the wrong forum; you must attack this thing in the right place. So with us to-day here and now. Gentlemen, it is an insult to your intelligence to say that, because as mere counters, as mere ministerial officers, you cannot go into frauds, therefore here is an attempt to cover up fraud.

Look at it for a moment in another light. This argument of the gentlemen contains in itself an utter felo de se. How wide-mouthed was their declamation when they were talking to you about the fraud of the returning-board in Florida. What was the fraud? It was a fraud which was committed by them, they being mere ministerial officers, in usurping jurisdiction and going behind the returns from the counties and undertaking to throw out votes, in violation of law. There, my friends, a case of that sort could not be inquired into according to your law. Abide by your law; stand up to its logic, and take its consequences. It is right, and it is right because of what you put nto your report in 1873, to wit, that the two Houses combined have not the power of a quo warranto court. You could not go behind the returns. Therefore, do not talk to me about our position being one designed either in logic, law, or morality to shut out evidence of fraud. But more than that, do not forget that my friend, Senator Carpenter, said to you last night, and he read the law-books to prove it, that the courts of the United States to-day, under the existing law bestowing jurisdiction upon the circuit courts, have power to try which of these two men has been elected President of the United States. Did he not say that? Did he not read the statutes to prove it to you? Did he not take the ground that there was such power to-day; and that to-morrow, if you make your decision, after the 4th of March, he can come with his quo warranto and can retry the question as to who is President? I do not undertake to say whether that is law or not; but, if it be law, then it ill-becomes our friend to talk to us about this being an attempt to put a man into the presidency of the United States by fraud.

I remember reading a remark that was made by King James in regard to the Novum Organon of Lord Bacon. He said the book was like the peace of God, that it passed all knowledge. These objections on the other side are just of that sort. At one moment we find them saying to you that the divorcement between the judiciary and the executive and the legislative is complete, and therefore Congress cannot exercise judicial powers; but the very next moment they say to you, "Yes, you have all judicial powers; you can do the same thing that a quo warranto could, and because a quo warranto could try this thing, therefore you can try it." Thus my brother Carpenter gets felo de se into his argument there. Then in another place you find these gentlemen coming up and saying that Mr. Kellogg was the governor of Louisiana, and therefore he is no elector, and then the next moment you have them coming forward and saying, "No, he is not an officer at all; he is not the governor of Louisiana, but McEnergy is." To such strange positions, gentlemen most eminent are driven in this frantic endeavor to escape from the familiar requirements of the law.

Now, if you will pardon me, I will read on this point one single authority and then will trouble you with no more. I read it because of its application to the point upon which I am now engaged. It is the case of Hulseman vs. Rems, in 41 Pennsylvania State Reports, 396. It was a bill to restrain the defendants from using election-certificates to get their seats as members of the common council from the nineteenth ward in Philadelphia, and among the grounds for the injunction were:

1. That when the returning-board met and made the canvass it was without authority of law, and the proceedings were therefore null and void, because issued by a defunct board.

That brings squarely up your biggest question, the want of authority in the body.

2. That this defunct board counted forged returns.

That is another big thing here.

3. That even these forged returns never reached the board in any lawful way, but surreptitiously and without certificates, and the bill alleged that the certificates were therefore utterly void.

There are two things in that decision that I want to call attention to. The first proposition is in these words:

It is alleged that on the second Tuesday of November some of the return-judges refused to meet, and that those who did meet met at an unusual place to count the soldiers' votes and to issue the certificates; but the affidavits of the defendants seem to us sufficiently to account for this by showing that the duties of the return-judges were so interfered with by a disorderly crowd that they could not be performed at the usual place.

While I am on that, let me make use of it in another connection. There was a case where the returning-officers were required to meet and make their return within a certain time, and were also required to have their meeting at a certain place. It does not appear in the report whether that certain place was pointed out by statute or by usage; it is spoken of as a failure to meet at the usual place. Perhaps Judge Strong, who, I think, was on that bench at the time, will enable me to know how that was. At any rate, that is the way it appears in the report. There were two defects in the return; one was that the board met at the wrong time; the second was that they met at the wrong place. The supreme court of Pennsylvania say that it was a sufficient reason for their not meeting at that time and at that place, that they could not do so by reason of mob violence, and that they could perform that act at another time and place. I say that for the purpose of stating this, and I want to state it once for all, for I shall probably not have time to discuss the question in extenso; but I want to lay it down and state it carefully, that these provisions in regard to the sending up of affidavits, to their being attached with wax, in regard to the time of their taking, &c., are just like this one in the Pennsylvania State Reports relating to an election; they are directory, and they are not jurisdictional in the sense of that word as applied to the trial of private rights of the citizen. Let me restate it, and perhaps in a little different form, for I wish to leave it in your minds, if it is worthy of being left.

Because this is a political process, because it is a step in government as distinct from a trial of private rights of suitors in the courts, therefore the law is that any affirmative requirement of this kind which is either not accompanied or connected with negative words prohibiting the thing from being done at another time or in another way, or else is not of such essence of the very provision as to spoil the provision if it is not done in the time and way pointed out—in every such case the law is directory. I do not say that these acts in regard to the returning of affidavits can be dispensed with; but I say the things required can be done at other times and in other ways as soon as the violence will suffer them to be done.

Gentlemen, look at the reason of the thing. Is it possible that you are going to hold that that same violence which rendered it impossible to vote, and at the same time rendered it impossible for the officers safely to make their affidavits and their returns, shall triumph so that they cannot do it at another time? Beware before you come to such a conclusion. If you do, you will do it in the face of the law. You will find Parsons, that chief-justice who stands in his illustrious fame next to Marshall himself, and perhaps his peer, declaring in 2 Massachusetts Reports that whenever one of these laws contains no negative words and the provision as to time, place, and circumstance does not go to the essence of the transaction or affect it, in every such case the provision is directory merely.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Judge Shellabarger, I should like to ask you a question, whether that is not of the essence of the transaction? What do you make of the provision that "any person interested in the office by reason of being a candidate shall be allowed a hearing on making application within the time for the forwarding of the returns of said election?" In order to give the person interested in the office the opportunity for a hearing or the power of complying with the requisition that he shall make that application in time, must he not find on the copy sent to the clerk's office, notice that the validity of the voting at the particular polling-place or particular parish is to be drawn in question? In other words, can the essential right of the person interested in the office to be heard before the returning-board be preserved, if you regard this as merely directory, and not essential?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I answer that first by saying that that is a suggestion addressed to the consideration of convenience. It is a useful provision beyond all doubt; it is a proper provision to be obeyed; but it being a mere suggestion going to convenience, it is not so of essence as that no violence or impossibility of executing it at the time shall forbid that notice being given to the candidate in some other way, or in that way at some later date, or in some way that is adequate, so that he shall have the opportunity in the language of the statute to have his hearing before the time for making returns shall have expired. That, it seems to me, is an answer. If it is not, I accept the consequences of its not being. It is not essential at all to the case that we should maintain the proposition that I am stating; still I believe it to be the law, and I submit it to this tribunal.

I was about, when Mr. Hoar kindly asked the question, to take the case of the jurisdiction conferred by the act of 1795 on the President of the United States to make proclamation and to require insurgents to disperse, and all that. There, you remember, it is a constitutional provision that interference can only occur upon a vote and request of the legislature, if the legislature be in session, or the executive, if it be not in session; but yet when the time came, as it did come sadly in our history, when that same violence that made the insurrection rendered it impossible for the legislature to send the summons, when the legislature itself went into the mischief, was a part of it, and when the executive made a part of the mischief, then came the time when the life of the State was rescued by still issuing the proclamation calling for the troops and attempting the suppression of the insurrection in the absence of all requests. I take it as entirely analogous to and confirmatory of the proposition that I now restate in the light of the case of Hulseman vs. Rems, in 41 Pennsylvania State Reports, in the light of the reason of the thing. It is that the time of making the return, the attaching of it, &c., are not jurisdictional in the sense that they cannot be done at another time; but that, wherever the mischief in fact exists, wherever the violence in fact has destroyed the election, and wherever that fact is made known in due time to the returning-officers, there their jurisdiction to exclude votes has attached and they can make the exclusion.

But that is not necessary to the purposes of our case, as I said a moment ago, and I now come back to the proposition that I stated awhile ago, that, these men having the requirement put upon them that they shall canvass and make return as to every officer and declare who is properly and duly elected, there is the scope of their jurisdiction. Under that they had power to decide who was elected and to grant these certificates; and that maxim applies which presumes that all things are done rightly by officers until the contrary is shown, which you will find decided in a number of cases that I have on my brief, but will not stop to read (see 12 Wheaton, 70) because it is not only familiar law, but it is a maxim of the law that all things done officially are presumed to be rightly done until the contrary is proved. Therefore, as suggested by the question of Judge Miller, as suggested by the manifest law of the case, these men having power to exercise this jurisdiction, the jurisdiction having been exercised, you not being a court can only count, not having judicial functions sufficient, as my friend Trumbull's report says, must stop without going behind and canvassing the votes for electors. Such being your function, I say this jurisdiction of this board thus exercised is presumed to have been lawfully exercised; and for the purposes of this count, you have rightfully decided the law as stated by Pinckney, as stated by your decision in the Florida case, and as recognized by the decisions that I have read, and I was about to conclude by reading a single one more. Lowrie, Judge, says, in the case in 41 Pennsylvania State Reports:

We have, therefore, no ground left for our interference, but the single one that the return-judges included, in their enumeration, returns purporting to be from three companies of volunteers which were mere forgeries. We admit that, in the evidence before us, it appears clear to us all that those returns are forgeries, and that it was only by their inclusion in the enumeration that the defendants have obtained certificates of their election. We admit, therefore, that the evidence proves that these certificates of the election of the defendants are founded in manifest fraud, the forgery of some unknown person, but we do not find that the defendants had any hand in it, and we trust they had not.

Can we, on this account, interfere and declare the certificates void? We think not. According to our laws, the election has passed completely through all its forms, the result has been in due form declared and certified, and the defendants have received their certificates of election, and are entitled to their seats as members of the common council. The title-papers of their offices are complete, and have the signatures of the proper officers of the law; and if they are vitiated by any mistake or fraud in the process that has produced them, this raises a case to be tried by the forms of "a contested election."

Gentlemen, this case goes all over the one at the bar; it answers all this exclamation about fraud, about our attempt to cover up fraud, about what are the functions of a counting-board and what the functions of a contesting-board:

And if they are vitiated by any mistake or fraud in the process that has produced them, this raises a case to be tried by the forms of "a contested election," before the tribunal appointed by law to try such questions, and not by the ordinary forms of legal and equitable process before the usual judicial tribunals. It is part of the process of political organization, and not a question of private rights; and therefore the Constitution does not require that the courts shall determine its validity.

The law has appointed a special tribunal to try just such a question as this, and we can have no right to step in between the case and that tribunal, and alter the return of the election judges, and annul their certificates. Plain as the fraud appears, and earnestly as we condemn it as citizens, it is no part of our functions as a court to sit in judgment on it. The common council is the proper tribunal to try cases of contested elections relative to its own members, and there the fraud and forgery must necessarily be tried and decided with final effect. They are appointed by law to try the whole case, and they alone can try it. We decided this last year at Philadelphia, in the case of The Commonwealth vs. Baxter, 11 Casey, 264, a case from Bradford County, where a commissioner of highways had received a regular certificate of election, and where we decided that it could be avoided only by a regular process of a contested-election case. Perhaps that case may be found worthy of examination.

If in this way we suffer a gross fraud to pass through our hands without remedy, it is not because we have any mercy for the fraud, but because we cannot frustrate it by any decree of ours without an act of usurpation. Another tribunal is appointed to administer the remedy, and we believe that, on proper application, it will administer it rightly, according to the evidence it may have.

And, gentlemen, I say here now and once for all that there is a proper tribunal, according to my friend Carpenter's able argument last night; that tribunal is the courts of the country, and there we invite them to go with this case, where our side can be heard as well as theirs.

I now conclude this argument by an allusion or two to what has been the weight and the burden of debate on the other side. It is in regard to this alleged outrage in the State of Louisiana. Why, gentlemen, are we to shut our eyes in scanning this question as to where this wrong and fraud and violence is going ultimately to be found when it comes to a tribunal that can try it. Can you shut your eyes to what now is the saddest—if not the saddest, certainly one of the saddest chapters of American history?

I remember, Mr. President, as you do right well, though I was then but a boy, when the Caroline was set on fire, sent adrift, and it was believed that one, two, or more American citizens were destroyed by the act of the British government. O, the thrill of indignation and of unutterable horror that pervaded the whole body-politic! It was only by the matchless diplomacy and the strange power of such intellects as Webster, who was then guiding the helm of state, that your country was rescued from universal war with the mightiest power of the earth, because we believed that by an outrage of the British government one or two lives of American citizens had been lost. So that thing struck us then; but how marvelously inured has the public mind become since those better days to this business of the destruction of American citizens! Why, gentlemen, by actual count made in an official report to the Government of the United States, through the aid of General Sheridan, it is set down as a part of your history that in this blighted and blasted State of Louisiana four thousand and odd citizens have been murdered by plan, murdered by system, by organization, murdered for the purpose of putting down the right of the black man to vote, and that thing has been going on and on and on through these dark and terrible years.

It was my misfortune to go once myself to this State, sent by the Congress of the United States. I went there in 1866, and I took the testimony of hundreds of men; and when I was taking it I literally sat with my feet in pools of human blood (clotted and dried up then, but still visible) shed there, that of Dr. Dotsie and others, in putting out the free government of the State of Louisiana, and they did put it out right well and effectually. So that thing has been going on and on in the attempt to put out the right of the black man to vote.

Gentlemen of America, you have written in the last fifteen years a grand history for your country, a grand one in its general, large aspects. I remember with gratification, and I shall till I die, that I was once thrown in company with the most illustrious man now living in Great Britain, illustrious by reason of his intellect, illustrious by reason of his great deeds, illustrious by reason of his service in the British Parliament for thirty years, illustrious because of his adhesion to the cause of human liberty in his own country and in all others; I mean John Bright, of England. I remember with gratification what he said to me in regard to the last chapters that we had written in our American history. Said he to me: "Sir, I have been a part of the British government now for thirty years. In that time I have thought we in the British country had enacted some great affairs; and so we have. We have extended the right of the Englishman to vote; we have obliterated the rotten borough system; we have emancipated the Jews; we have elevated our colonies; we are extending the right of the children to be educated," and so he went on in a grand catalogue of the affairs that had been enacted during his time in the British government, and then he concluded by saying: "Sir, notwithstanding what I have said about my country, I say to you that you have dwarfed it," and he brought his hand down on the table with an emphasis that was startling, "you have dwarfed all that we have done in the life of the British nation by what you have enacted in the last ten years of your life. You have saved the life of the last, the one republic of the earth, and the cynosure of all eyes loving human liberty. You have done more than that; you have put out of the Constitution of your country and thereby ultimately out of the earth the chattelization of the human soul." Was it not a grand tribute? But let me say to you now, if this career of yours as a nation which began fifteen or twenty years ago in this direction by the election of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidency, then by the putting down of the rebellion, then by the extinction of slavery by the thirteenth amendment, then by your fourteenth amendment making all men equal before the law in all their civil and political rights, then making all men free to vote—if this procession of yours as a nation, and which is indeed like the procession of the gods, which in every foot-fall marks a constellation and shakes from its sandals the star-dust of the heavens—if your career of that grand description is to end by going back, turning around, and abandoning to these murderers who are drenching our country, in this part of it which is under consideration to-night, in blood for purposes of their disfranchisement, then indeed this career of yours will be like that French astronomer's, described so magnificently by one of our most gifted men, who went in search of the central sun of the universe until he found it, and then denied the existence of the God that made it, and walked back to perdition in the night of his own shadow.

I conclude this discussion by saying, gentlemen of America—that is a higher designation than gentlemen of the Commission—gentlemen of America, remember that there is on trial here to-night the question whether those laws made in Louisiana in pursuance of article 103 of her constitution and enjoining it on the legislature to make laws for the protection of the right of the freedman to vote, can be sustained and enforced. If you fail to execute these laws you will have stabbed your country in that place where by the very traditions of the children we are taught the life of the country is to be found, and is to reside, to wit, in the freedom, the purity of the ballot-box.

Mr. EVARTS. I was expecting to address the Commission, not to so great length as my associates, and I certainly would much prefer to do so to-morrow morning. I have been in the room ever since ten o'clock, not being able to leave it during the recess that was given.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I move, Mr. President, that we adjourn. It seems to be desirable to the counsel on either side. My motion is that we adjourn until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I propose half past ten.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I will accept the amendment; say half past ten.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Let us take ten o'clock, and not call the yeas and nays.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I have no choice about the hour. I will return to the original motion.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment is to strike out "ten" and insert "half past ten," I understand. I will put the question on that amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion that the Commission adjourn until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON called for the yeas and nays, which being taken, resulted—yeas 7, nays 7.

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bradley, Clifford, Garfield, Hunton, Payne, and Strong—7.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Edmunds, Field, Frelinghuysen, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Thurman—7.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I move that we adjourn until quarter past ten to-morrow.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON called for the yeas and nays, which being taken, resulted:

| | |
|------------|---|
| YEAS | 8 |
| NAYS | 7 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Bradley, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—8.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—7.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Commission adjourned until to-morrow at ten o'clock and fifteen minutes a. m.

THURSDAY, February 15, 1877.

The Commission met at ten o'clock and fifteen minutes a. m., pursuant to adjournment, all the members being present.

The respective counsel appearing in the Louisiana case were also present.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, the general subject of controversy before the Commission is, how this Commission, under the powers conferred upon it and in discharge of the duty confided to it by the act of Congress under which it is organized, shall advise the two Houses of Congress, in the discharge of their duty under the Constitution of the United States in counting the votes for President and Vice-President, what votes shall be counted for the State of Louisiana. The Constitution has undertaken to determine that the State shall have the power to appoint electors as its legislature may direct, and no authority or argument can disparage or overreach that right of the State. That right is in the State. It is not a gift from the Federal Government, for there was no Federal Government to give it. It is not carved out of any fund of power and right that the Federal Government possessed, for the Federal Government had no general fund of power or right out of which it could carve a gift to a State. The State of Louisiana stands in this behalf as one of the original thirteen States stood. Whatever was the right of one of the original thirteen States in the election of Washington, is the right of Louisiana now in the election of a President. And, therefore, it is not to be measured as a gift, not to be measured by its relation to any general fund of authority on the subject that the United States had and which it has limited, but as one of the original conditions, one of the original limitations, one of the original distributions of power out of which and by which combined comes the Government of the United States and exists the government of each State as a member of the Union.

This topic at once leads us to consider wherein the Constitution of the United States has established and how it has distributed the authority of choosing a President of the United States, what part of it is administered and administrable as the action of the Federal Government, and what part of it is administered and administrable as a part of State action in the matter. On the terms of the Constitution is this demarkation to be drawn and adhered to? And in this regard, as well as in every other respect of power, are the maxims of the Constitution as to construction concerning the line drawn to be observed as well as in any other? The Government confers nothing upon the States. The Government comes into existence by and through the States and their people. The location of authority is primarily in the State, and is in the General Government only by its allotment in the terms of the Constitution. There is therefore the same method of construction and interpretation in drawing the line and in maintaining its defenses in this matter of the election of President as in all others. Whatever the Federal Government has in this matter of the election of a President, it has by force of terms in the Constitution; and whatever the State has, it has upon the same terms; and then the ninth and tenth articles of the amendments made soon after the adoption of the Constitution apply, that there is to be no disparagement of rights that are reserved by rights that are conferred, and that whatever is not conferred upon the Federal Government by this Constitution, and is not forbidden to the States, is reserved to the States or to the people.

It is not for me to repeat the arguments made by my learned associates so well, and by me, so far as I could aid them, in the general discussions which were presented under the Florida case. These general propositions were that the whole matter of creating the elector belonged to the State; the whole matter of ascertaining, accrediting, setting forward with credentials, belonged to the State so far as the text of the Constitution read; and that whatever the statute of 1792 had sought to prescribe in the matter of these credentials was directory and for the convenience and instruction of the body that was to count the votes, as to the fact of the action of each State; that the elector was not an officer of the State; that in no very considerable sense could he be treated as an officer of the United States; that he was an elector, having the right under the Constitution of the United States to vote for President, and that he was a representative elector, and was to be measured only to discern whether he was deputed to act as an agent or whether he was accredited with the voting power to vote as an elector having the suffrage in his hands. To say that he is a representative elector because he comes to be the elector in representation of a participation in the government of a State, comes to nothing more than to say that you, members of the two Houses of Congress, are representative legislators. You are representative legislators. You are legislators in a Government resting upon the will of the people and on its communicated authority to you as representatives; but you are not deputies to derive your instructions and authority from a principal at home. You are representatives of the legislative authority, lodged theoretically in the people, and in the theory of representation possessed by you in the same plenary power that the people themselves would have exercised it.

It was then announced as our proposition, that after the appointment of the elector, the vote, and the title to vote, and the exercise of the right, and performance of the duty to vote on the part of the elector had come under the exclusive dominion of the Federal Constitution; the representation, so far as it entered into the creation of the title and the conferring of authority, had been exhausted.

In the Florida case, as here, these considerations had their weight and were accepted or declined by the different members of the Commission, according to their estimate of the constitution and laws of their country. In that case, as in this, there were present before this Commission matters of consideration, about which, as open entirely for your inspection and necessarily forming a part of your determination, there was no question—I mean the papers that were opened by the President of the Senate, according to the Constitution, in the presence of the two Houses of Congress. They are before you under the law of 1877, as they were before that assemblage in that presence under the Constitution without the law of 1877, and now the question as to what more is or can be before you is a question under the law of 1877, as interpreted by its own terms in the light of the Constitution of the United States. It has passed beyond dispute; we did not dispute it in the Florida case; and, if we are to receive the intimation of Mr. Justice Bradley, it has passed beyond dispute in your own deliberations, as receiving the concurrence of all, that you have the powers that the two Houses have in the act and transaction of counting the votes, and no other powers; not that you have the powers that the two Houses of Congress together or separately have as the legislature of the country; not that you have any of the powers that either of them separately has in respect to what is accorded to either of them separately in the Constitution outside of legislative power.

You have no particle of any authority that is lodged in the two Houses of Congress under any of the general grants of authority to them as the legislature or to either of them separately, except what is granted by the Constitution within the very terms of this article, that the transaction being completed in the States and they having forwarded their votes hither under such authenticity as entitles them to the first reception and brings them into the presence of the two Houses of Congress that their contents may be disclosed and acted upon, whatever action thereupon proceeds by the two Houses there met or by the two Houses separating in the discharge of and in the continued exercise of the function of counting the votes, this is passed over to you that your advice may be given to them, as it would proceed out of their original, their independent deliberations and construction if they had limited themselves to the conduct of the counting of the votes in the simple terms of the Constitution. They then proceed to count. They count the votes. Having made a law unto themselves, which they cannot transcend without its repeal, this instruction as to what votes ought to be counted under the Constitution of the United States they will act upon as determining what votes under that Constitution ought to be counted unless their united judgment shall contravene this great authority they have given to you.

We insisted, therefore, in the Florida case that one great consideration in determining what the powers of Congress were in this mere procedure was what the nature of the procedure was, what the constitutional objects and sollicitudes in providing for the transaction had indicated as the will of the people when they adopted the Constitution of the United States, and we were met by very learned and very authoritative statements from very eminent lawyers.

Mr. Field, in behalf of the House of Representatives, proposed to you that you had at least the powers of a court on quo warranto. Mr. O'Connor, with that accuracy and precision and acceptance of all logical results that proceed from his statements, demanded the same authority; insisted that otherwise the correction of frauds, the redress of violence, the curbing of excesses of authority would be remediless, and yet in their nature being festering wounds in the body-politic would work its ruin.

Those demands we met; those demands we answered. And now, without one particle of change in the law, the Constitution, or the area of this debate, we are told by the responsible representatives of the Houses of Congress through their objections and by the eminent counsel that have thus far put forth their positions, that you have no judicial power whatever; that we were quite right about that; there could not be any judicial power outside of the courts inferior to the Supreme Court, the judges whereof were appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and holding their offices for life upon a stated compensation. Why might we not have been saved the former discussion if we are to enter upon this with any great trust in its soundness or its permanence? Obedience to the conclusions of this Commission as requiring this shifting of ground in our favor would be a respectable support for the maneuver, but I have not heard that assigned as the reason why the argument in the Florida case was abandoned and an independent and inconsistent one proposed here.

Now, what is the power? It is what is called a legislative power that is supposed to reside in this Commission in determining how it should advise that the votes should be counted, it being a legislative power in the two Houses. Now, there are quite as many constitutional objections to a legislative power vested in this Commission or a legislative power resting in the two Houses of Congress in the matter of counting the votes, as there are to any other form or description of power. The legislative power, the great principal power of the Government, is vested in those Houses when they act in such concurrence as the Constitution requires before any legislation is effected. It is not, therefore, in that sense that our learned friends attribute legislative power either to the two Houses or to you. It is in the sense of a political power, of political action in a political transaction, and those are the limits that we had assigned in our argument of the Florida case to any possible powers of the two Houses, to wit, that in a transaction of election which starts from the primary polling-places and proceeds to the point of developing and accrediting the elector up to the scrutiny, so far as it is open here, and the counting of the electoral votes, (not of votes for electors, but votes of electors,) it was all a part in the series of movements that had for their purpose the transaction of the political act of bringing into office a President of the United States; and that the two Houses of Congress, under the Constitution as it reads, must discharge, when the President of the Senate opened the certificates, that duty on those certificates alone, unless by some prior legislation of Congress—putting in execution, and thus interpreting, some other powers that they assumed to possess, in their construction of the Constitution—Congress had provided legal means for the exercise of such further powers. The terms of this act carefully observed the limitation that this act was not to be interpreted as carrying any congressional powers that were determined and created by the act or any interpretation to be put upon it in its own terms, but that this act was to carry only such powers as were in the two Houses under existing law, and as solely determinable by the Constitution and existing law.

As a primary consideration, then, as in the Florida case, it is to be determined not as an abstract question. Let me ask the Commission to consider that it is to determine not what hypothetical proofs might be received, but what proofs within the offers are rightfully to be received and added to the elements and funds of proof which the papers opened by the President of the Senate themselves disclose.

What then is the offer of proof, not in its details, but in its principles? What is the state of proof as presented on the certificates in aid or supplement or contradiction of which this proof aliunde is to be introduced? The first certificate contains in itself every certainty and every conclusive credential that the laws and the Constitution of the United States or of the State of Louisiana prescribe. This certificate also discloses a special state of facts concerning two of the electors who cast their votes; I mean Levissee and Brewster; this special state of facts, that being among the electors that were voted for and that were covered by the governor's certificate, when the electoral college met they were not in attendance; that the statute prescribed that their attendance should be waited for until four o'clock in the afternoon of the day, and that for non-attendance by itself and of itself alone on the part of any person chosen or accredited by the action of the State authorities, the vacancy thus created should be filled by the acting electors; that at that moment, on that fact, the college of electors proceeded and chose these same men, who thereafter on that title took their seats in the electoral college and voted, and are to be counted or disparaged on that showing, to wit, the entire showing of this certificate opened by the President of the Senate.

Beyond that there is not in this argument about evidence any particular circumstance that I care to call attention to in regard to that first certificate; nor do I need certainly to make any addition to the observations already made to discuss the second certificate at all.

What proof, then, is offered? I now proceed to discuss it as matter of proof as to its application and where its effect, if at all, is to be expected.

In the first place, the offers of proof do not seek, any of them, to disparage the truth of that certificate; I mean its truth as made up of the elements of the governor's certification of the fact in the State's action that he is to certify, nor any impeachment of the transaction which by the certificate is shown to have taken place in the election. No proof offered touches that space in the transaction or questions the governor's right to certify, his right by being governor to certify, or that the fact in the culminating and recorded result of the election in the State comports with the fact that he did so, nor on the point that Brewster and Levissee came into the electoral college on the transaction preserved in the minutes of the electoral college as presented here. If we look at the offers of proof, we see that at once. So far from introducing, therefore, any element of proof that is to separate the governor's certificate from the thing certified, or that is to disparage the governor's right under the Constitution of the United States, these offers of proof expressly concede that condition of things, and plant themselves wholly upon something antecedent in the State's transaction to this action of the governor, and which is the occasion of this action of the governor, to wit, the action in the State which produces the recorded result on which the governor must certify.

In the first place, we are saved any question, and I think we might have been saved any argument, about Governor Kellogg's being a de facto governor, filling the office and performing its duties, for they offer under their first head to prove "that said Kellogg was governor de facto of said State during the months of November and December, A. D. 1876." Then, when you come to other offers concerning the disqualification of Levissee and of Brewster, found on the seventeenth page, you will observe that there is not the least proposition that on the 6th day of December, when these two men came into the office of elector by the choice of the electoral college filling the vacancies, they were under any disqualification whatever. The proposition is—I read now from what is called the fourth proposition—

That on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, A. B. Levissee, who was one of the pretended college of electors of the State of Louisiana, * * * was at the time of such election a court commissioner of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.

And for Brewster in the same way. The offer of proof, then, falls entirely short of disparaging their capacity to receive an election on the 6th day of December, and the proof does not offer to contradict the transaction by which they came in through the vote of the electoral college as displayed in the certificate.

Now, in regard to the substantive matters of proof, so far from being obliged to rest upon the proposition that there is no offer to intervene with proof between the recorded result of the election and the governor's certificate to that result, as producing these electors and no others, the offers of proof are affirmative in their propositions that that state of facts does exist, and is part of the things that they are able and ready to prove. I ask attention to this principal offer of proof, which is, I suppose, the one on page 13, the last paragraph but one on the page.

And that said returning-board, in further pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, knowingly, willfully, falsely, and fraudulently did make a certificate and return to the secretary of state that said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion had received majorities of all the legal votes cast at said election of November 7, 1876, for presidential electors, they then and there well knowing that the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had received majorities of all the votes cast at said election for presidential electors, and were duly elected as the presidential electors of said State.

And that the said returning-board, in making said statement, certificate, and return to the secretary of state, were not deceived nor mistaken in the premises, but knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently made what they well knew when they made it was a false and fraudulent statement, certificate, and return; and that the said false and fraudulent statement, certificate, and return, made by said returning-board to the secretary of state in that behalf, was made by the members of said returning-board in pursuance and execution of, and only in pursuance and execution of, said unlawful combination and conspiracy.

We have, then, in the offers of proof a recognition of the fact that the governor's certificate in No. 1 is by the acting governor of the State; that it is of a fact which has been deliberately produced and made of record in the proper office of that State; that by the authority intrusted with that final act of canvass and certification these electors did receive a majority of the legal votes in the State of Louisiana; that that was done mala fide and fraudulently. It was then done. The act was consummated. You are relieved, therefore, from any disturbance of this definite and limited proposition of whether it is competent for the two Houses of Congress to penetrate the action of the State and determine, first, whether it conforms to the real facts of the election as deducible through successive steps from the deposit of the votes in the ballot-box; and secondly, whether, though conforming to legal authority, it has been a corrupt, mala fide transaction.

It is necessary for us, then, before we can approach definitely the consideration of whether any of this proof can be offered, to understand at least what the laws of Louisiana are; not that it will follow that we have any right here to consider the conformity of the action of the canvassers or any of the subordinate functionaries in the election or of the voters themselves to that law, but that we may see at least upon what state of statutory enactments these objectors seek to base their question of the action had in these subordinate departments of the transaction.

I confess to an inability to understand that there should really exist any confusion on this subject as to what the statutory enactments in force—I mean on their face—were. This election, as it took place on the 7th of November, in the primary deposit of the votes, was concluded later in the year by the final result of the canvass certified and recorded. Some confusion, I am afraid, has been made out of the attempt to shorten a little the reprint, so useful in all particulars, made under the direction of the Commission. I have before me the session laws of 1868. In the acts of that session are found two independent acts on independent subjects, both of which were in force until either or both of them were repealed. They were not inconsistent; and they were not in pari materia, unless so far as that some portion of an enactment that might have been included in a general law, and was not, was included in the special or particular law to which I shall call attention. The first of these acts is found at page 218 of the session laws and is numbered 164. Its title is, “Relative to elections in the State of Louisiana and to enforce article 103 of the constitution of the State.”

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Where is that in this pamphlet which has been printed for us?

Mr. EVARTS. I do not think it is there. Subsequent laws that are supposed to have taken its place have been printed, but this has not been printed at all. A portion of the revised statutes is printed, and somebody has put at the top of it “laws of 1868.” It is not a print of any part of the law of 1868. It is a reproduction of certain sections of the revised statutes which were passed in 1870.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. It was stated to us that this revision and the law of 1868 were precisely the same.

Mr. EVARTS. I will proceed with my argument, if you please, because my object is to show exactly how the thing does run. That law printed on that page is not any part of the law that I have asked your attention to thus far; it is not a reproduction of that; it has nothing to do with it. There is another law of 1868.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. That law is a general election law.

Mr. EVARTS. A general election law to enforce article 103 of the constitution. On page 245, No. 193, is another law, of which I will read the title, to wit: “Relative to presidential electors.” That is a short act. It contains in its first section an attribution of the conduct of their election to the provisions of the general election law:

And such election shall be held and conducted in the manner and form provided by law for general State elections.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Mr. Evarts, while you are on that, I wish to ask a question for information. I have tried to get hold of those acts of 1868 for about twenty-four hours, but have been unable to do so. Does that first section commence in this way: "In every year in which," &c.?

Mr. EVARTS. It does.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. And the thirty-fifth section of the act of 1868 is in the same terms exactly. These two are copies of one another, are they not? I wish to ascertain that fact.

Mr. EVARTS. I will look. The thirty-fifth section of the act of 1868?

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Yes.

Mr. EVARTS. No; that comes into the act of 1870, if at all. There is nothing of the kind in the act of 1868. There is section 32 of the act of 1868, which I will read. I will read not section 35, but section 32, which relates to the subject.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Which of these two acts do you read from?

Mr. EVARTS. The general election law of 1868, which begins on page 218 of the session laws of that year.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. What is the date of it?

Mr. EVARTS. It is the 19th of October, 1868. This is section 32, which is probably the section to which Mr. Justice Bradley had reference.

That in every year in which an election shall be held for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, such election shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, in accordance with the act of the Congress of the United States approved January 23, 1845, and such election shall be held and conducted in the manner and form provided by law for general State elections.

Which is, I believe, an accurate statement.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. An exact copy.

Mr. EVARTS. It is identical with the first section of the presidential-electors statute. Now, in this presidential-electors act there are two provisions which do bear on the questions which we are to discuss as to the proper method of carrying on, certifying, and canvassing the election held last November. There is no doubt about that, if they were in force, and I will ask attention to them. The first is section 4 on page 245 of the session laws of 1868:

Immediately after the receipt of a return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November if the returns should not sooner arrive, the governor, in the presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns and ascertain therefrom the seven persons who have been duly elected electors.

Then there are certain administrative provisions which are not important. Then section 8 on the same page.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. It speaks of "seven persons" there.

Mr. EVARTS. That word is there; the State then was entitled to seven electors. The eighth section is:

If any one or more of the electors chosen by the people shall fail from any cause whatever to attend at the appointed place at the hour of four p. m. of the day prescribed for their meeting, it shall be the duty of the other electors immediately to proceed to ballot to supply such vacancy or vacancies.

Our learned and ingenious friend, Mr. Carpenter, brought your honors to this result from his discussion, that it was wholly immaterial to the practical result in this case whether you hold that the law was repealed or whether you hold that it was in force; he contending that, if it was repealed so as to carry down the canvassing section, and therefore make the canvass proper by this canvassing-board—I mean in respect to its authority—then section 8, being carried down, the power to fill vacancies did not exist, and two vacancies were therefore left in the college of electors, which, as he said, would be enough for his purpose, and which is true; two vacancies are enough, perhaps one. But we are under no such alternative as that. By the subsequent laws, the canvassing section was repealed, and by no subsequent laws was the rest of the electoral act affected. That is a proposition which at once liberates us and this Commission from any confusion or from any resort to either of the horns of the dilemma.

On what does our proposition rest?—for it needs but to be stated to be understood, and the laws need but to be pointed out to carry the evidence of what the existing state of law was in Louisiana in 1876. There came about in 1870 a revision of the statutes of the State of Louisiana, not a repeal, not a re-enactment, but a revision of the laws that were or were understood to be in force, in regard to which the joint of the legislature was to be impressed upon them that they were the laws in force, a transaction entirely similar to that which took place in Congress in the production of the Revised Statutes of the United States, under which we now are. In this revision which I read from, a book published in 1876—

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. I have the original.

Mr. EVARTS. We shall be greatly obliged to you if we can get the pages from that. My friend who provided this book could not find the other in the Library; we were obliged to resort to this; but the sections, as I understand, are the same. I shall be very glad to refer to that volume instead of this for those two laws, and I will give the citations as they shall be determined; but for the purpose of my present argument, without giving pages, I can now say how the matter stood on these revised statutes. In the first place, there was a statute entitled "Elections," and it was, we will assume, the statute of 1868. So far as I know, there is nothing to be said on this subject.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. You mean by that, that there is a head in the revised statutes "Elections"?

Mr. EVARTS. A head in the revised statutes called "Elections." I will now give the page, to avoid confusion, that is found in this edition of the revised statutes of Louisiana printed in the year they were passed; in 1870. It is page 272, and it is headed in the margin by these figures, "1868, 218," which means this law that I have read.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. The same reference that you made to the session acts of 1868.

Mr. EVARTS. The same reference. Then there comes, after exhausting, I believe, the general provisions about elections, grouped under this general title of "Elections," a statute concerning contested elections, which in the same manner is referred to as a statute of 1865, page 408.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Is that in the same title?

Mr. EVARTS. The same title.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Under the same title, but at the end.

Mr. EVARTS. Exhausting the general election law, you then come into an independent subject, and that is "Contested Elections," and there is reprinted another law not material for us to consider, but it is reprinted and referred to as a law already in existence.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Are you reading from the revised statutes of 1870?

Mr. EVARTS. I am; and the edition of 1870, which is the proper one to refer to.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Was that passed as one act?

Mr. EVARTS. Passed as one act. Then we have another title in these revised statutes separated by one hundred pages, and indeed the arrangement is, I think, alphabetical, and the title of this section of the revised statutes is "Presidential Electors." That is at page 550. It begins by reciting the acts of Congress, and then it proceeds in ten sections, numbered from 2823 to 2832, which contain the election law, and the heading in the margin of this is "1868, 245." Nine of the sections, to 2831 inclusive, are embraced in that notation, and in fact in the act of 1868 section 2832 is noted as a section proceeding from the act of 1855, 481, and is simply, "when a new parish shall be established, it shall form a part of the district to which it belonged previous to its change of organization."

Those two laws being for our purposes as the two laws of 1868, were in force when these revised statutes came into operation, unless by actual repeal, or by the methods of legislation which operate repeal, before these revised statutes went into operation, a repeal of one or the other of them in some part had taken place. These were passed on the 14th day of March, 1870; and on the 16th day of March, 1870, a law was passed, which was printed and is to be found in the first edition of this compilation which is without a cover, and I will refer to the act of 1870 itself in pursuance of my previous intention.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Is there any law or provision of the constitution in Louisiana which provides generally at what time acts passed at a session shall take effect?

Mr. EVARTS. I do not know whether there is or not.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. These acts that we refer to, all declare the time when they shall take effect.

Mr. EVARTS. I do not understand that there is any general provision, and as a matter of fact the general declaration of the acts is that they shall take effect from and after their passage. There was passed in 1870, on the 16th day of March, an act which is found in the session laws of 1870, at page 145; it is numbered 100. I will read the title of this act:

To regulate the conduct and to maintain the freedom and purity of election; to prescribe the mode of making and designate the officers who shall make thereturns thereof; to prevent fraud, violence, intimidation, &c.; limiting the powers and duties of sheriffs; and to enforce article 103 of the constitution.

The title of this act is the same as that of the election act of 1868 in its general purpose to regulate elections and enforce article 103 of the Constitution. This act provides, at section 54:

That the governor, the lieutenant-governor, the secretary of state, and John Lynch, and T. C. Anderson, or a majority of them, shall be the returning-officers for all elections in this State.

There is no other description and no limitation; they are "the returning-officers for all elections in this State;" and there is at section 85, the final section of the act, this repealing clause:

That all laws or parts of laws contrary to the provisions of this act, and all laws relating to the same subject-matter, are hereby repealed; and this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

What went down under that repeal? In the first place, upon general principles, all of the revised statutes that was on the title of "Elections" and enforcing this article of the constitution, No. 103, and all parts of other laws that were within the purview of the conduct of elections, any election held in that State, and no other parts of such laws, were repealed by that section. You have, then, in the general start of the first section of the act, a provision "that all elections for State, parish, and judicial officers, members of the general assembly, and for members of Congress, shall be held on the first Monday in November; and said elections shall be styled the general elections. They shall be held in the manner and form, and subject to the regulations hereinafter prescribed, and in no other."

Then the provisions go on. Section 35 of this act, which is the number which was in Mr. Justice Bradley's mind, is the equivalent of section 32 in the general election act of 1868, and is identical with section 1 of the electoral act of 1868. It is reproduced here as section 35; so that we have a provision that all general elections so called shall take place on the first Monday of November; that an election for electors shall take place on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, according to the provision of the act of Congress, and then, in a section coming after the description of general elections, and after the section that has relation to presidential electors, you have the fifty-fourth section, which provides that the canvassing-board there provided "shall be the returning-officers," not for all general elections, but "for all elections held in this State," covering by necessary statutory construction the elections that had been mentioned preceding, some of which were called elections of State officers, members of Congress, &c., and called general elections, and one which was called a presidential election.

The election of 1872 was held under that law. Did anybody in the State of Louisiana conceive that the governor was to canvass? Some question was raised about whether the act of 1872, which was passed on the 20th of November, providing another returning-board, was in operation; but the courts of the State, in the authorities that have been proposed for your honors' consideration by my learned associates, disposed of this question as to who were the returning-board and the canvassing-board, being one and the same thing, on November, 1872, prior to the 20th of November of that year. Therefore the whole operation of this act of 1870, in repeal of this or that portion of the independent acts—the general-election act and the presidential-electors' act—was not an act concerning their election, but concerning their discharge of their duties; giving them nothing but the State apparatus, unvaried except in a canvassing-board. Now what the canvassing-board of 1868 for general elections was, I have not stopped to inquire; whether it was the same governor or not, it is not material here. Now comes the act of 1872, which is reproduced.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Right here is a matter which I wish to understand. The digest of the statutes, made immediately after the revision and published in January, 1871, contains these two titles which the revision does, the title "Elections" and the title "Presidential Electors." The digest was made by John Ray, under the direction of the committee of revision; and in that digest, under the head of "Elections," he inserts the act of 1870 instead of the act of 1868, and under the head of "Presidential Electors" inserts the same title that the revision contained, with the exception that the section establishing the returning-board replaces the original canvass. This seems to indicate the opinion of the profession at that time as to the state of the law. What effect it would have, I do not know.

Mr. EVARTS. In other words, what we now contend for, that the section which gave a special canvassing-board for presidential electors was repealed by the act of 1870, and the rest of the statute, and which had nothing to do with their election but only with their conduct as electors after they were elected, was left standing; and Mr. Justice Bradley enables me to refer to a digest of the statutes of Louisiana.

In volume 2 of that digest, at page 356, is found the electoral law, and it is attributed under its various sections to the acts on which it is supposed to rest. The first section is attributed to the act of 1870, page 145. This is substantially the same section as is found in the act of 1868. Then the second section is attributed to the act of 1863, page 245; the third the same. The fourth, which is the provision of a returning-board, takes the section that makes the governor, the lieutenant-governor, the secretary of state, John Lynch, and T. C. Anderson, the returning-board, and attributes that to the act of 1870, page 145. And then it goes on, resuming at the fifth section its attribution to the act of 1868, page 245, and in the sixth section is reproduced the provision about electors filling their vacancies. This act is found on page 355 and page 358 of the second volume of this digest, published under the authority of the State in 1870.

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. Does it contain no memorandum of the date when it was passed?

Mr. EVARTS. I have stated that these sections which are thus digested are each referred to their appropriate originating statute.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Here is the act under which the digest was made, Mr. Evarts, showing that it had a quasi authority.

Mr. EVARTS. It is very apparent that this is no new construction that we are putting upon the force of the repealing act. It is the published construction, in the authorized publication of the statutes in the form of a digest, followed by the courts, and accepted by the profession. The novelty is in the stress that now here for the first time seeks to produce a collapse of statutory law in order to destroy an election. Did any of those eminent lawyers that attended in New Orleans through the month of November suggest to Governor Kellogg to canvass these votes for presidential electors? And now the vice, the fault, the irremediable wound of this election is that Governor Kellogg did not canvass them!

The act of 1872 takes up this whole subject and substitutes itself for the act of 1870 and repeals all existing regulations that properly are in the very matter of conduct and regulation of elections in general, and all special provisions found in any other act that are at variance with the imposition of its form, its methods, and its agents on all elections held in the State. But the act of 1870 had already excluded the section of the electoral law that related to canvass, and excluded that alone, and left standing the clause that relates to the conduct of the electoral college, among other things, in filling vacancies.

Now, I have satisfied your honors that not only was it wholly immaterial which of Mr. Carpenter's views you adopted, but it was immaterial that you adopted them both, for the subsequent legislation had left the matter in this shape, that the canvassing-board for all elections had been applied to presidential elections, and the conduct of the electoral college, after it was elected, in its transaction under the laws of the State and of the United States, was left wholly untouched, as it well might be. What change could you have made, what change was needed? That is not the point; but the point is that the legislature had suppressed presidential elections by having no law under which they could be conducted. Well, if there is any State that in the election of 1872 or in anticipation of the election of 1876 has had the attention of all its citizens, all its lawyers, all its judges, all its politicians, all its honest men attracted to it, it is the State of Louisiana; and they all thought that they could elect presidential electors, and one political party was perfectly convinced that it had, and the other political party was perfectly convinced that it had, and the only question was which of the two sets produced by this birth was the genuine child.

Mr. Commissioner FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Evarts, did you refer to the act authorizing the revision?

Mr. EVARTS. I beg pardon. That is in the first volume of the digest. It is an act passed on the 16th of March, 1870, the very day this act was passed:

That John Ray be, and is hereby, appointed and authorized to compile a digest of the statutes of the State of general character from the acts passed at the present session of the general assembly, including the act of revision, and to superintend the printing, and that such digests and codes be stereotyped and printed as required, &c.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. Was there a provision requiring that digest to be subsequently submitted to the legislature before it went into force?

Mr. EVARTS. I think not.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. There was not.

Mr. EVARTS. I cannot say without looking at the act, because this is only one section of the act that answers the purpose of advertising the book.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. It was submitted to the committee of revision. The act required that, and that was all.

Mr. EVARTS. It was to be submitted to the committee of revision, Mr. Justice Bradley suggests, of that session which conducted this whole matter. Here is a little act, which is at page 80 of the session laws of 1870, "An act giving precedence in authority to all the other acts and joint resolutions passed by the general assembly at this session over the acts known as 'the revision of the statutes, and of the civil code and code of practice,' when there exists any conflict in the provisions of said acts and revisions."

I think nothing could be made clearer than that. We have, then, the proposition that our act of 1870 was passed two days after the revision—enough of itself to amend it. They did not pass an unamendable revision. They passed a revision that when it came into force had all the dilapidation which has been accomplished in its frame by all the legislation of that session of 1870. Such provisions are necessary. Something similar to that was the arrangement in which your recent great work of revision was carried on.

This law, then, as to what its text is, is understood: Whatever there is in the election law of Louisiana that governs, gives authority in, prescribes methods of, the election of others in that State, applies to the presidential electors' elections, and nothing that reaches the conduct of the electors after their election is different from the act as it stood in 1868.

In the act of 1872, which governed, of course, the election of 1876, there are provisions, mainly of sections 3 and 26, which include the powers, and prescribe the methods of their execution, accorded to this returning-board; and those powers were exercisable according to the law of Louisiana and exercisable in reference to the election of electors just as well as in regard to any other officers of the State; and in regard to their exercise in respect to the election of presidential electors the Government of the United States had no more power and authority than it had in regard to any other election in that State. Why should it? It would have been very easy to have inserted in the Constitution of the United States a provision which, while it fixed in the frame of the government the power of election in the States, had made Congress the judges of the elections, of the returns, and of the certificates of electors. That might have been done; but if it had been done, all that had been done by the convention up to that time would have been annulled, for the independence of the State's transaction would have been subjected to the political authority of the United States, ungoverned by any paramount dominion over it; and our ancestors that would not let the little finger of Federal influence be inserted into the State election by having a Federal officer voted for by it, is now laying the thickness of a hand on the State election by judging of the election, the qualifications, and the returns.

I ask the eminent lawyers who are to stand by their proposition, if there is one particle of power possessed by the Houses of Congress, or that was ever exercised by them in the experience of this Government, in searching the elections, the returns, and the qualifications of members of Congress, that falls within the whole range of this proposition of proof? Is it not offered to you as the measure and the means and the resort of your inspection of the Louisiana election of electors? Could you do anything more? Where do you get the right to do what you do about members of Congress? You could not get it by mere parliamentary law; and the framers of the Constitution put it in that there might be no doubt about it; for the jurisdiction of Parliament to judge of the qualifications of its members is a resident and remaining part of its authority as the great court of the realm. For, according to the principles of the common law, the execution of a writ is to be determined by the court where it is returnable; and when the Crown issues its writ to the burgesses and shires it is returnable in Parliament, and Parliament judges of the return. But when you are making a complex frame of government and distributing authority between the States and the General Government, you must determine exactly how far the States are to have authority on the subject of this election of members of Congress and how much is to belong to the Federal Government. In other words, while the States are allowed to provide for the election of Congressmen and while the suffrage is measured out by the Constitution to be the same that they accord to the lower house of representatives in the States, yet there is secured to Congress the power of making and altering those regulations; and this final political power acts, irresponsible for the exercise of its will; will governed by duty, if you please, but will not controlled by any authority of law. And now it is gravely pretended here, not in terms—for the effrontery of the proposition would affright the lawyer that made it; but on the basis of that offer of proof they ask you to ascribe to the two Houses of Congress, when met to count the vote, with the President of the Senate in the chair, precisely the same power in extent, in measure, in uncontrolled execution, that is attributed to the election of members of Congress.

Why did not the wise framers of the Constitution say so if they meant that? And how could they anticipate that the whole spirit and purpose of excluding Federal authority in the choice and the election and the certification of the choice of electors should be perverted into the monstrous claim that an uncontrolled political authority rests in the two Houses of Congress to sift and sift, discard, discount, destroy the election, and make such men as it chooses, or annul the vote of a State when it will answer the purpose, as it will here upon this pretension of authority?

If any further elucidation of my general views is needed, I must respectfully ask attention to the reported arguments of Mr. Matthews and myself in the Florida case.

I now come to consider the very matter of the proof offered. How about these Federal disqualifications? We talked about that subject in the Florida case. It so happened that the proofs which were allowed provisionally did not raise the question there; but our propositions are unchanged. In the absence of congressional regulation furnishing the appropriate, adequate, seasonable means to purge the lists that the governor has certified, on the Federal disqualifications that should discard an elector, the two Houses, met in the presence of the President of the Senate, cannot execute the Constitution; and you can do no more. They are elected; they are acting; they are certifying, for there is nothing in that idea of the subject at all that a man made ineligible cannot be elected. You might as well say that the forbidden fruit could not be eaten because it was forbidden. I ask attention to an authority of great weight, the supreme court of Pennsylvania, where Gibson, justice, gives the opinion before he was chief-justice in 11 Sergeant & Rawle's Reports, page 411. I cannot detail the particular circumstances of the case; but these observations are in point in that case and are important here. It is the case of Baird vs. The Bank of Washington:

The bank was governed by thirteen directors, five of whom were competent to the business of ordinary discounts, but nothing less than a majority of the whole number constituted a quorum for transacting any other business. At the meeting of the 11th of August, just spoken of, only seven members, including George Baird, were present when the vote was taken; so that if he were not a director, either de facto or de jure, there was at that moment not a quorum present, and hence a question as to the validity of his appointment is thought to be material. As has been just said, to constitute a quorum competent to fill vacancies or transact any other business than that of ordinary discounts required a majority of the whole number of the directors; and this gentleman was elected at a meeting at which only five were present, so that originally his election was unquestionably invalid. And this brings us to the first question, whether he is to be considered as an officer de facto, or as an usurper. The judge who tried the cause was of opinion that his election was not merely irregular as to time, place, or notice of it, and therefore voidable, but that it was absolutely void; and that he was an unauthorized agent, who could do no act to bind the bank; in other words, that he was an usurper.

In analogy to the distinction between judicial proceedings that are absolutely void for want of jurisdiction and those that are only voidable for irregularity, there is something extremely plausible in this opinion. Still, however, it will be found that the question does not depend on whether the appointment is void or only voidable, or whether it emanated from an authority which had full power to make it; but whether the officer has come in under color of right or in open contempt of all right whatever. (The King vs. Leslie, Ans. Rep., 163; S. C., 2 Stra., 190.) This distinction runs through all the cases. Where an abbot or parson, inducted erroneously, and having made a grant or obligation, is afterward deprived of his benefice, this shall bind; but the deed of one who usurps before installation or induction, or who enters and occupies in the time of vacation without election or presentation, is void. So, if one occupies as abbot of his own head, without installation or induction, his deed shall not bind the house.

McEnery acted "of his own head;" doubtless a very good head, but "of his own head" and nothing else, and the electors named on the second certificate were hurried to execute on the 6th of December an office into which they had not been inducted, into which they had not been installed, did it "of their own head;" but they might have been prompted. You can put ideas into one's head; nevertheless it is his own head that he acts upon.

In the case at bar, the court put the matter on the ground that five directors did not constitute a board for any other business than that of ordinary discounts; and that, having no right to go into an election at all, their act could not give color of right. But in Harris vs. Jays, Cro. Eliz., 609, it was conceded that the Queen's auditor and surveyor had not the right to appoint the steward for the manor in question; yet it was resolved that a steward appointed by him was an officer de facto, and that his acts were good. This is exactly in point. The inquiry then is, was there the color of an election in Mr. Baird's case? He was elected by the very body in which the right to elect was vested, the only thing wanting to the perfect validity of the act being the presence of two or more electors. But the presence of these would not have changed the board to another and a distinct body ; it would still have been the president and directors of the Bank of Washington. It is impossible, therefore, to say that Mr. Baird usurped the office without the semblance of right.

Now this clause in the judge's opinion I ask particular attention to :

This principle of colorable election holds not only in regard to the right of electing, but also of being elected. A person indisputably ineligible may be an officer de facto by color of election, (Knight vs. The Corporation of Wells, Lutw., 508.) So, even where the office was not vacant, but there was an existing officer de jure at the time.

Perhaps this is the only authority on this subject that I shall need to add to those that were adduced in the argument on the Florida case and that have been presented by my learned associate in this.

Now suppose that Levissee and Brewster were each of them ineligible. They are elected ; they are inducted ; they are in execution of the office, and the State is not to be stripped in an execution that is satisfactory to itself by extraneous evidence adduced at the moment of counting the votes, that a man was ineligible. Congress must give that consequence by some legislation and some mode of determination, or it cannot arise.

But here these men are in by the election to fill vacancies. Well, the Oregon brief, contrived not only a double but a treble debt to pay, comes up again to prove that when an ineligible person is elected there has been no election, and from that it is argued that when one out of eight fails to be elected, then there has failed to be an election within the sense that a legislature may fill the place ; and then, to make all this applicable to the existing state of law in Louisiana, you are asked to believe, you are asked to hold, against all the authorities, that an elector ineligible is not elected, and that if he has not been elected there is not a vacancy in the college ; when one State has said, " Our method of filling any vacancy that shall happen for any cause, any defect of full numbers that shall show itself at 4 o'clock for any reason, is that it shall be filled by the State of Louisiana in this way, that those who have been chosen and attend shall fill the place," this cannot avail. What more do we need to say ? We arrive at the same result. Our learned friends, so precise in language, hold that there not being a vacancy, that an office not being vacant, that there being no vacancy in an office, is equivalent to the office not having been filled ; that if it has not been filled it is not vacant. That is the proposition : if it has not been filled, it is not vacant.

Now, an office is either vacant or full. There are no terms in law between those two qualifications of being vacant or full. It is not half full ; it is not full with an embryo that may grow ; it is full or it is vacant. The Constitution of the United States provides that in the case of a vacancy in the representative force of a State in Congress the governor shall issue writs to fill the vacancy. That phrase is used. In 1837, at a special session called of Congress, commencing I think in September, some States had no Representatives elected for that Congress. Congress began usually in December. There was time enough to elect them to send them in season, and have the freshest choice of the people. The governor of Mississippi, not desiring that State to be unrepresented in that important special session, issued his writs for a special election to fill the vacancy. Was there a vacancy or not ? Certainly our learned friends would have found out a void vacancy in that case. Nobody had perceived it. Messrs. Gholson and Claiborne were returned, and the question came up on their qualifications, on the validity of the election, within the power doubtless of Congress ; and the House held that they were duly elected, and gave them seats for the full term.

They concluded in Mississippi that they would have another election for the rest of the term, and they sent up other persons chosen in November at the regular election. So in December we had a new choice of Congressmen, and it was concluded I think then that the admission of them for the whole Congress was erroneous.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The House rescinded the former resolution, and refused to allow the newly-elected members to come in, on the ground that the people had been misled as to the time of the election.

Mr. EVARTS. They held them only to be entitled to fill the vacancy, and they did not admit the new people, because they were judges of the whole matter, and concluded that it was better to have another election. What happened then is unimportant; but you can have no better case than that. This is to be found, I think, in the volume of Contested Elections of 1834 to 1865, page 9, and in the fifth volume of the Congressional Globe, pages 80 to 96, and Appendix, page 85.

Now, then, we say in regard to the Federal disqualification, no proof can reach the point, none is offered that touches the point, none would be admissible if it did touch the point, because of the want of legislation or of means of ascertaining it.

I now come to the question of State disqualification. The constitution of this State of Louisiana has a provision :

No person shall hold or exercise at the same time more than one office of trust or profit except that of justice of the peace or notary public.

Governor Kellogg was governor; Governor Kellogg was elector. Some of these other electors held minor offices, it is said. Proof of this fact is offered in regard to the others in order that State disqualification may now be inquired into and verified in the counting of the vote here. There are sufficient answers to this. Let us look at another clause of this constitution which provides some other disqualifications :

ART. 99. The following persons shall be prohibited from voting and holding any office: All persons who shall have been convicted of treason, perjury, forgery, bribery, or other crime punishable in the penitentiary, and persons under interdiction; all persons who are estopped from claiming the right of suffrage by abjuring their allegiance to the United States Government, or by notoriously levying war against it, or adhering to its enemies, giving them aid or comfort, but who have not expatriated themselves nor have been convicted.

So on with a numerous list of disqualifications for holding any office in the State. Suppose an imputation were made against an elector, in the certified forwarded lists by the electoral college and authenticated by the governor, of any of these disqualifications, could you try it? Certainly not. It is a judicial inquiry.

But this office of elector, say Mr. Trumbull and Mr. Carpenter, is not a State office. It is not a State office; he is an elector, a representative elector. When he comes into office he holds the office under the Constitution of the United States, and he acquires the office by the action of the State, the function, the right to vote. He is a representative elector. This clause of the Constitution does not say that no officer under that State shall hold a Federal office. The courts of that State have settled the question that it not only means State officers, but it means constitutional officers. They have not hampered all future legislation of that State with the inconvenience of never having a man a member of two charitable boards, as one of these electors is charged to have been. They have not hampered the future legislation of that State in the trammels of providing that a citizen shall be made useful in no two occupations, employments, or commissions; but it is constitutional officers that it applies to; and I ask attention to the cases in 5

Louisiana Annual Reports, 155 ; 6 Louisiana Annual Reports, 175. The case in 25 Louisiana Annual Reports, 138, I think was referred to by Mr. Shellabarger.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Do you mean to be understood as admitting that an elector is an officer at all, either Federal or State ?

Mr. EVARTS. I do not think he is. Certainly he is not a State officer. I do not think he is an officer. I think he is a voter, having qualifications, and his office is of the same kind with the office of a citizen who is an elector, so called in the constitutions of most of the States, but whose qualifications are primary. This is a representative elector, and the moment the representative credentials are closed and accorded to him, he is then an elector. In other words, he is not a State officer.

Therefore there seems to be nothing in that proposition which should produce proof, because proof would be entirely ineffectual, first, for the reason that the inhibition does not prevail; secondly, for the reason, which would apply to the supervisor as well, that there is no provision by any legislation of Congress that can give this action of the two Houses, either in their joint assembly or in this Commission with the rights accorded to it, jurisdiction over the question of fact involved in abuses or violations of the State constitution; and, further, for the reason, insisted on already, that these provisions of the State constitution do not touch the Constitution of the United States, which, while it was careful to exclude Federal intervention of office-holders, was not guilty of the folly of saying that no State should accredit as its elector an honored citizen who filled in the affections of the people and the authority of the State a place of trust. If anything, it was desired that these electors should be State notables, men who had the adhesion of their fellow-citizens; and to say that we must take the residuum of public character and of public interest and of public repute after all the State's offices are filled, from constable to governor, from whence we cannot have an elector, is imputing a folly to the framers of our Constitution that they are not open to and which cannot be forced upon them by State legislation.

Governor Ingersoll, of Connecticut, heads the electoral choice of that State. Every man honors him as a representative of his State. He is governor. He certifies to himself. He discharges a governor's duty to certify to whomsoever the people choose. He does not make himself an elector. He certifies upon the recorded evidence, as John Adams declared that he was President of the United States by the count of the votes.

This being so, we come to the primary question of interest to the public, of interest to all citizens, of interest to every man who loves his country, every man who loves its Constitution in its spirit of being popular government, obedient to law; and I am at a loss to see that anything that I have to say on this subject should approve itself to one portion of this Commission and be unpalatable to another by reason of any political adhesions of one side or the other. I shall say nothing that I would not say as a citizen holding the common ground with all of you who are citizens first and partisans afterward.

When I talk of the mischiefs in the State of Louisiana which are attempted to be curbed and robbed of their rapine by the energetic laws of that State, I do not understand that to any man, because his inclinations or his convictions incline him in favor of the elevation of Governor Tilden, I am to impute that he looks with less horror upon that subjugation of the suffrage, that degradation of citizenship, that confusion of society, that subversion of the Constitution than I do. He only wishes that it should be curbed and redressed by law. And when I speak of the frauds as charged—for I must speak of them as charged at this stage of the business, for they have not been proved at all—when I speak of them as charged, involving falsification, oppression, false counting, forgery, conspiracy, every shade of the crimen falsi, am I to be charged in this presence or any other with having less complacency even in the lowest grade of this vice than those who uphold their correction and desire that they shall be frustrated, when I demand that it shall be done by law?

That is my demand. Is it a partisan demand? It is the same demand that is made in respect to the gross afflictions which every citizen feels as beaten by the same stripes that were inflicted on the backs of those poor, unbefriended negroes. That is citizenship; it is not partisanship. And when this other vice is added to violence, together ruling the evil in the world—violence and fraud—when that other form is corrupting and afflicting our citizenship, I feel it as bearing a full share of the common shame, whether it be inflicted by the relentless and shameless tyranny of the New York dynasty or by the alleged frauds of the Louisiana dynasty. But why is it that fraud is so detestable? Why is it that the law searches for it as with candles and condemns it when it is brought into judgment? Because it is but another form of violence—Fraus æquiparatur vi. That is the reason why the violence that ravishes is more heinous than the fraud that secretly purloins the virtue and the fame of American citizenship.

We do not wish to be told that fraud is worse than violence. Its vice is that it robs the act of that consent on which its freedom depends, to the same effect as violence does. Fraud is compared, as in a simile, to the principal evil, itself described as violence. Here all agree that under the great national transactions that closed the war and under the experience of the condition of society in Louisiana thereafter there was exhibited, not indeed a continuation of armed revolt against the Government, but far from the repose that belongs to peace. There were these outbreaks of a bastard and seditious soldiery, the authors of which, by the laws of war, while flagrant, would all be hanged in either camp. What was the scene? Was it revolt? Was it peace? It was that more dangerous condition of the body-politic which, unproved and unproved, must breed a conflagration both of civil and domestic war. "Nec tumultus nec quies; quale magni metus et magnæ iræ silentium est."

It is that brooding silence of preparation which is to determine whether outbreak shall assert, or whether fear reduced to despair shall surrender, liberty; and to that state of things the independent action of the State of Louisiana was directed. It was to them a real state of things. It was not a state of things to be smiled at at a distance, whichever side the smile came from. It was the brooding of great fear and great wrong over a whole population, and they undertook to put it into the frame-work of their constitution that—

The privilege of free suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections and prohibiting under adequate penalties all undue influence thereon from power, bribery, tumult, or other improper practice.

In pursuance of that duty, imposed upon the legislature by the same independent right, dealing with an actual situation, the legislature undertook to support the free suffrage, and in their judgment, in the choice they made, who can control them? Shall the proud purity of New York City judge of the means to be used in Louisiana? Shall the saint-protected postures of Senators and Representatives and judges and advocates judge in the silence of this court-room of the means? No. There is but one limit to the means; I mean one limit to be imposed outside that State; under that clause of the Constitution, none in the State, except that these means should be adequate, appropriate, and reasonable, and they might be used.

Now, eminent statesmen and lawyers say that, when these methods in this law prescribed are resorted to by a State to save itself from the ruin of civil and domestic war, it prevents the State from being considered republican; and the demonstration and the proof of what was republican government advanced by the learned counsel, Judge Trumbull, was that if a government needed to be supported by arms, it was not republican. Well, was our Government a monarchy because we had to support it by arms through four years of civil war? What else did support it? What else prevented the pillars of this court-room crushing the judges in their office? What but armed men, servants of the civil power, citizens in arms supporting their Government because they loved it; and they loved it because it was republican. I think that the quod erat demonstrandum does not come by that process.

What is the proof offered; what in principle, what in nature? How far is it within the disposition of the offers made in the Florida case? The offer there was to show that, though the governor's certificate was conformed to the recorded canvass of the final State authority, and there was no room for intervening proof between them, yet behind the canvass a resort to simple and record facts would show that the returning-officers acted without jurisdiction. That was the principle of the offer. Will any one say that the act of officers without jurisdiction is a mild and moderate form of defective authority, compared with which fraud was a more evident and a more palpable defeat of such action? By no means. When, therefore, you had an offer to produce by proof the county returns in Florida, in order to base on that fact an argument that the action of the canvassing-board on those returns, wherein it assumed to redress or re-arrange them, was without jurisdiction, it carried every possible legal and constitutional ground of proof that can be conceived. Let me show that I speak by the card, when I refer to the very accurate statement of his proposed proof by Mr. O'Connor, found on page 44 of the Congressional Record of February 4:

In so doing—

That is, stating what they did in respect to the manipulations of the county returns—

In so doing the said State board acted without jurisdiction, as the circuit and supreme courts of Florida decided. It was by overruling and setting aside as not warranted by law these rejections that the courts of Florida reached their respective conclusions that Mr. Drew was elected governor, that the Hayes electors were usurpers, and that the Tilden electors were duly chosen. No evidence that in any view could be called extrinsic is believed to be needful in order to establish the conclusions relied upon by the Tilden electors, except duly authenticated copies of the State canvass—

That is, "the erroneous canvass," as Mr. O'Connor considered it—and of the returns from the above-named four counties, one wholly and others in part rejected by said State canvassers.

In order to show that their return rested on action behind it that was without jurisdiction. Well, one ground covers all. Extra vires, without law, without authority, is as much a condemnation, if the proof will sustain it, as it is possible to suggest.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Mr. Evarts, allow me to suggest to you that, if a majority of the Commission thought the Florida statute authorized what was done, then the introduction of proof would have been improper; and therefore it does not follow, because an argument was made that the board exceeded its jurisdiction in throwing out votes, that this Commission so held, for a decision that the true interpretation of the statute would justify what they did made it immaterial to inquire what the motive was.

Mr. EVARTS. I can only say that the offer of proof was offered only on that ground, only on the single ground, and the grounds here are of that nature and of the nature of fraud or mala fides in the transaction itself, which last I shall consider.

Mr. O'Connor, as was to be expected from his clear relish of legal propositions, understood that that involved in principle going behind the returns at the polls, and he argued that our objections to that were of that somewhat disfavored complexion of its being inconvenient to go into those proofs. He did not, as I think, correctly appreciate our position; but he did not deny that if he were allowed to adduce that proof, we had a right, on the principles on which he was allowed to introduce it, to go to the bottom of every precinct poll, and he met the difficulty of time and resources for it by saying that the Commission here might temper that jurisdiction by going as far as they found it convenient, and then stopping; that, I suppose, if they found themselves getting beyond their depth they might swim ashore, and leave to drown the candidate that at that stage of the water found it over his head. But here our friend, Mr. Carpenter, proposes another solution, that the fact that they have not time to do the thing is not a reason for concluding that perhaps it is not one of the duties assigned to you, but simply affords a reason for peremptory adjournment; that the thing had better be undone than done; and there is no choice but one way or the other; for, if anything, these proffers go into the whole untraversed sea of action, jurisdiction based on the action of subordinate officers in the conduct of the election on days, on forms, on the facts that must appear, and the proofs that must show the facts to give jurisdiction, and you are turned into a supervising court that takes up the transactions of a special jurisdiction by certiorari to search it, and see whether the jurisdictional facts existed; whether they existed in throwing out this poll, that poll, the other poll; and whether, when it is rectified, the object being to produce only then a prima facie officer, you have been discharging the duty that the Constitution imposed upon you, or whether it rested on the governor and the canvassing-board to determine.

Well, now, the fraud, in the sense of mala fides, of returning-officers or canvassing-boards is extraneous fact, is fact that does not vitiate as much as being ultra vires does or can. It is more opprobrious in epithet; it is more damnable in its morality; but in its legality it is a step lower than ultra vires.

Now let us look at once and briefly at the very proposition as to the right to trouble the State's elections, whether they have been honest, whether they have been wise, whether they have been careful, whether they have been prosperous. Supposing that the Constitution had given the casting of the electoral votes of a State to the governor of that State; he should be the representative elector; he should throw the votes that were distributed to the population of that State; what right would you have had to inquire beyond the single point who is governor, who is governor de facto, who is the governor governing the State at the time that he enters upon that transaction? Could you inquire whether he had been fraudulently elected, whether in his election the liberties of the people had been suppressed, whether he was in by a fraudulent conspiracy by which he bought his office, whether he had taken part in the plots that had subverted the suffrage and falsified the action of the people? You could not. It is enough for you that the governor who governs is the man who is to represent the electoral votes of that State. What other right have you in regard to electors in inquiring into the facts by which the State has transacted the business of bringing into existence electors de facto? I submit, on principle none whatever. And on this question of fraud or mala fides or oppression, upon what possible principle can you enter into that inquiry? Who does not see that if you give the great power of the Federal Union a judgment in the matter of how the State has performed its duty you give the judgment that the wolf had over the conduct of the lamb, and can trace the vice in that conduct to any remoteness of relation that you choose?

I apprehend that nothing is sounder and safer than this, that we are to redress these mischiefs by law and the Constitution, although fraud may make us recoil from its touch, and although violence may make us shudder at its degradation of the American name. I have heard that fraud vitiates everything, and it is spoken of here as if it did it of its own force; that every factum in which an ingredient of fraud entered thereby became infectum, and so the bane always bred its antidote. Fraud would not be so dangerous an element if that were so. I have heard that the liberties of the people are to be paramount in every particular juncture, and that laws, and constitutions, and courts, and the permanence of the system of justice, and the truth that will endure, are all to be thrown aside upon the mere intrusion of this afflictive element of fraud, and that this course alone will secure their liberties to the United States and their people. We have a maxim of the law, and of social ethics and philosophy, that goes behind all this: Misera est servitus, ubi jus vagum aut incertum. There is no condition of a people so abject as where the law does not rest upon firm foundation, and its lines are not certainly drawn.

In the pressure of particular considerations that affect the sympathies and the conscience, this is always the appeal. What, it is said, is a constitution compared with human interests and human liberty? Nothing, to be sure, except that all our social interests and all our liberties rest on law and the Constitution. These are not the deity, but they are the shrine, without whose shelter no human worshiper can detain the goddess from the skies.

Now, for these poor people of Louisiana, if the Federal power now undertakes to thwart, to uproot this scheme of energetic law to preserve society there from destruction, and leaves these unbefriended, uneducated, simple black people to the fate from which the State strove hard to save them—I say that you will have made them, by that action, the victims of your Constitution, for your Constitution gave them the suffrage, and they are to be slaughtered for having the gift found in their hands. I say that you make them the sacrifices to the triumph of the Government over the rebellion. I say that such self-abasement of the powers of this Government is beyond all cure. It teaches the sad lesson that the American people, in the attempt to make good the largeness of its promise and to work out the glory of its proud manifesto of freedom and equality before the law, finds itself thwarted by the exhibition of violence in this turbulent population, and forced, with its own hand, to crush the methods of law by which the State has sought, alas! how vainly, to curb and redress this menace and this mischief to its honor and its peace.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I move that the Commission take a recess until a quarter to two o'clock.

The PRESIDENT. A recess for half an hour?

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Thirty-two minutes.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Commissioner Thurman moves that the Commission take a recess until a quarter before two o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The Commission re-assembled at one o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.

The PRESIDENT. Before proceeding to business I will read a copy of a resolve sent to me by the Secretary of the Senate.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 15, 1877.

Resolved, That the Electoral Commission have leave to occupy the Senate chamber for its sittings in the evening after the Senate shall have taken a recess for the day.

Attest:

GEORGE C. GORHAM,
Secretary.

I suppose this will lie on the table for the present. That course will be pursued if there be no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the length of time that will be allowed to me?

The PRESIDENT. The time on your side, under the order passed on motion of Justice Strong, has expired. You have, however, two hours and thirty minutes of the other time left.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, I differ so fundamentally with the learned counsel who preceded me upon the principle of the generative process by which the electors of President and Vice-President came into the Constitution that I shall alter the arrangement of my argument as I had prepared it and follow the arrangement pursued by the learned counsel who last addressed the court. I do not understand that the election of President had its origin in any State constitution or that it derived its existence from any reserved fund of power belonging to the States. My impression of that office, my impression of the means by which that office is to be filled, is that it is from the first to the last a power derived from the people of the United States, the people of the States united; that it owes its birth to no State constitution; it derives the power from no State law or State will. I do not assert that the Government of the United States came into being only with this Constitution, or that the United States themselves came into being by the ratification of this Constitution. The Constitution came into being by the ratification and acceptance of the States; but if the States had rejected this Constitution there would have been still a United States. The United States came into existence with the Declaration of Independence.

We are told by Mr. Justice Chase, in one of the most interesting opinions that ever came from the Supreme Court, in the case of Ware vs. Hilton, that during the war of the Revolution the United States exercised all the powers of a sovereign government without much inquiry as to where the source of their authority came from. During the period of the Confederation they were still the United States under confederate articles; but the people of the United States constituted some sort of a Union, a historical Union, stronger than the Union formed by the confederate compact; and so, when they sent delegates to Philadelphia who formed and organized the articles which compose the Federal Constitution, it was a proposition to the States to accept those articles and to form a Union, not for the first time, but, as declared in the very face of the Constitution itself, "a more perfect Union." When they spoke again in the language of this Constitution, and which language became "the supreme law of the land" on the adoption of this Constitution, it was no language that they spoke to the States on this subject such as has been represented to the Commission. The people of the United States on the face of this Constitution speak with power, with sovereign power: "We, the people of the United States, do ordain and establish this Constitution." When they came to the subject of the Presidency they said, "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America;" and when those words were accepted as law, he was the President of the United States of America; and when they came to speak of the manner of his appointment, it is said "each State shall appoint electors." Each State is permitted to appoint, each State is charged to appoint, each State is required to appoint, each State is commanded to appoint "in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct." It is not the State saying "We allow you to make a President of the United States, provided you will allow us and our legislature to show the manner and means by which that election shall be made." The language of the Constitution is imperative; it is the absolute "shall appoint."

Coming now to the conclusion of it, what are the powers that the two Houses of Congress have exercised in relation to the exercise of this power? Do the States come before you in the shape of sovereigns, claiming of you by any title superior to that of the Constitution that their votes shall be counted? Do they come here and tell your President of the Senate, "Lay these votes before these Houses and tell that Senate and tell that House of Representatives to count them at the peril of our displeasure"? Has that been the soul and the temper with which the States have come to the two Houses of Congress; and has their reception been with any submissive tone and temper on the part of the two Houses in joint convention? Why, sir, there is one instance, the like of which I trust will never appear again, when these two Houses of Congress said to four of the original States, to that one of the original States to which more than any other may be ascribed the production of this Constitution, and said to six others in company with the four original members, "We will not count any votes that may come from those States;" said it in advance of the reception of any votes, without the expectation of receiving any votes, but in the vindication of their own authority, expressing the will of a proud and powerful people carrying on hostilities with those States. Seeing here an apparent title on this Constitution which might allow them to present the votes of electors for President and Vice-President, in advance of any presentation of votes Congress passed a resolution that such votes should not be received.

There were some chimerical governments, so called, existing in those States that did pretend to send electoral lists to the two Houses; but they were regarded as being unworthy of any consideration. The two Houses knew perfectly well that the ten States they excluded were not in any manner represented by those caricatures of governments; and dealing with the principals, dealing with the States themselves, they declared to them that they could not employ the power granted in this Constitution. Now, I can suppose a case. Suppose that the legislature of Virginia had sent here electoral lists in 1865 to vote for the incumbent of the office at that time; suppose that she had demanded her right under this Constitution; suppose she had told you, "It was our Washington who signed that document; it was our Madison who furnished the eloquence that enabled it to succeed; it was the profound wisdom of George Mason that appears in the lines of it; we come here by that title; here are the votes of our electors, appointed by our legislature; count them;" what would have been the answer? It would have been as haughty and as proud as the demand: "You are no longer entitled to the benefits of this Constitution, because you have attempted to abrogate it; and we will not count your votes or allow you even to come so far as our Houses to present them;" and this Government, these two Houses speaking in that voice of authority for the whole people of the United States, which was vested in them for that purpose, is now the poor, feeble, paltry imbecile thing that cannot deal with a certificate of a fraudulent returning-board!

But I am told that the action of the legislature of the State is conclusive; no examination can be made into their authority, no inquiry into the force of their acts; they have the supreme authority to direct on this subject; it is their reserved right; you cannot touch it; you cannot impair it; it belonged to them before you existed; while those States were living you were unborn, and all that you have has been given from them to you; this they never gave, and here is a gross usurpation if you venture to inquire into the act of that legislature. Is that true? The State has the power to appoint; the legislature the manner and means of that appointment. But is it not a trust power? Is that power given to it for the benefit of the State or any gratification of the State, or as a bauble for the State to play with? This joint convention has the power to look into every act of that legislature; and if that legislature offends the spirit of the Union, if it contravenes the fundamental principles that lie at the foundation of American liberty, it can reject the votes. While the learned gentleman was speaking I drew up the form of an act of the legislature of Louisiana to enable me to put the case fairly before you:

Be it enacted, &c., That William Pitt Kellogg and J. Madison Wells, and their associates, are made a body corporate, and with all the powers of a corporation under the civil code of Louisiana; and that there is granted to them the sole and exclusive power and privilege to nominate and appoint, in all the forms and at the times that may be designated in the acts and statutes of the United States, electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, at each presidential election under the Constitution of the United States, which may be apportioned and allotted to the State of Louisiana, or which the State of Louisiana may be entitled to appoint; and from time to time the legislature contracts to make such directions as may be necessary to make this grant effective; and the governor shall grant all such certificates and commissions, and do all other acts in furtherance thereto.

It is not very far from the case before the court. But if electoral votes were presented by that corporation with the seals and the signatures that the laws of United States have provided, is there a member, either of the House of Representatives or of the Senate, not being a stockholder in that corporation, who would hesitate for a moment to reject it with contumelious scorn? The answer would be clear; it would be unequivocal, and the judgment would be a just judgment.

It is the United States, now thirty-eight in number, who are interested in the exercise of this power. The subject of the exercise is the appointment of the Executive Chief Magistrate of this Union. He commands our armies; he commands our navies. The might of the nation is under his command. He represents us, through ambassadors commissioned by him, in all foreign nations, and he receives ambassadors and ministers from foreign nations; he conducts intercourse with them, negotiates treaties. He comes down with a veto upon the acts of our Congress, the legislative department of the Government, and an enlarged majority must be given to overcome that veto. The judges of the Supreme Court and other courts are nominated and commissioned by him. He is the head, the most distinct representative of the nation abroad and of the nation at home; and we cannot consent to receive appointments of electors who elect him, from William Pitt Kellogg and James Madison Wells, although sanctioned by legislative enactment. You may treat it with sorrow and you may treat it with rebuke, but you will be obliged, by your oath to support the Constitution, not to permit it to interfere in the election of that officer.

The State must appoint, that corporate being composed of persons; and if it had not a person on it, still having rights under the Constitution as a territorial corporate being; and unless the voice that comes to the two Houses be the voice of that State, whether expressed by its legislature or expressed by its people, that voice must come before the electoral lists can be received. You must have assurance that it is the State, the member of the Union, the equal of all the other States of the Union. Its voice must be heard in that vote; no voice other will be accepted.

Such being the fact, let us go one step further. The legislature may direct the manner. I have put a case in which I have not a question every member of this Commission would concur with me that that voice could not be given by a corporation. If this presidential appointment cannot go into the market as stock to be bought and sold, although there may be "millions in" a presidential election, it must speak the present voice of the State; it ought, if it is to represent its best feelings, its best intelligence, its highest honor; and if you see certainly that none of these can possibly be represented in the directions of the legislature, you will discard the directions.

Having shown, I think, that the legislative directions must be conformable to the spirit of the Constitution and in harmony with the general purpose to be accomplished, it follows inevitably that these two Houses of Congress must look into the nature and character of those directions. I do not claim for these two Houses any nice critical or captious spirit; but a broad and generous interpretation is to be given to the action of the legislature. It is not an absolute or an arbitrary power that is conferred upon the legislature. They do not possess it in full sovereignty, as the argument would seem to imply. They are responsible, and responsible to the people of the United States, quite as much as the legislature is responsible to the people of its own State. Then, looking at those directions and finding those directions to comport with the terms and spirit of the Constitution, what next is it that these Houses can do?

The next thing for them to see is that those directions have been conformed to; and precisely here another exercise of power by the two Houses of Congress, in my judgment a perfectly justifiable and proper exercise of power, was made in the case of Louisiana in 1873, as her vote was rejected in 1865 by the two Houses. The case there was a quarrel in Louisiana between two returning-boards. The one returning-board under which the election was made, some ten days after the election was made, was annulled by the act of the governor of the State. Your honors ought to know that a most pernicious practice or privilege allowed to a governor, who receives a bill within five days of the adjournment of the legislature, is to hold it until the next legislature. You will notice to nearly all these laws the signature and approval of the governor were given in what may be termed ordinarily the vacation, in the time between one legislature and another. The governor of that State at that time had procured, a year or two before, the act of 1870; and possibly—for there is no other material difference between the laws—possibly doubting his returning-board under that act, which consisted of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and two other persons, another act was passed appointing another returning-board, constituted differently and selected differently. He held up that act until a bill was filed for the purpose of causing the returns that were in his hands as the president of the first board to be produced. Proceedings were begun to cause him to recognize that board and to put these returns in their hands. There had been two boards constituted. In order to put an end to all discussion on that subject, within a few days—four or five days—after the service of the bill, he signed and promulgated that act of 1872 which repealed all acts and parts of acts in conflict with or relating in any manner to it.

He had not, in my judgment, the slightest title to appoint the second board, because that board was to be appointed by the State senate; but the other board was certainly extinguished, because that act repealed the act in which it had its existence and which gave it any power. The committee of the Senate of the United States which investigated the subject, apparently recognized his power to fill the board under the second act. The first board was certainly annihilated; and it was held that he might fill the vacancy, as it was called, that the act had appointed the senate to fill. They examined it. Regular certificates and regular votes were sent to the Senate; but it appeared in proof that Warmoth's clerks had done all the canvassing that was done and furnished all the estimates that were made; that the returning-board then, if it were a good returning-board, had nothing to do with the canvassing and compilation of votes according to the statute. Thereupon the Senate, in a very clear opinion, and with perfect logic in its conclusions, said that it would not receive a return computed and collected in that manner, even though the office had been accepted by the electors claiming to have been chosen and their votes had been regularly returned.

This case is parallel with the case we make before the Commission. The case we make before you is that the returning-board appointed by that act, and required by their oath of office, which defined their powers with perfect precision, to canvass and compile the original returns, never made such a canvass; we say that that compilation never took place; that those original returns were thrown aside and another paper, called by some of the witnesses a "contabulated statement," substituted. It was so called by a member of that board before a committee of Congress. He said they never examined any paper but the "contabulated statement" of the supervisors; and all of them concur in the fact that a compilation and canvass of the commissioners' returns was never made. If the opinions contained in the report to which I have alluded, clearly and distinctly expressed and adopted by a very large majority of the Senate, have any weight as authority, the whole weight of that authority is in favor of the proposition I maintain.

Proceeding with the constitutional clause, the State appoints electors in such manner as the legislature may direct. Of course that comprehends all the directions of the legislature. "The manner" of an election includes all the regulations leading to and proceeding to carry out an election; and those, I say, are all examinable here. Then the twelfth amendment becomes a part of it.

The learned counsel who argued last is unable to tell what sort of a creature an elector is. I am not sure that in his conception he is a human being. He need not be a citizen of the United States or of the State; he is not an officer of the United States; he is not an officer of the State; but whatever he be, the Constitution of the United States, having obtained his appointment, not according to any State power, not according to any State direction, the State getting the power to appoint from the Constitution, the legislature getting the power to direct from the Constitution, those directions become a part of this Constitution; and the power to direct being so derived is examinable by the superior authority, and if conformable to the Constitution the directions are as if they had been written in the Constitution.

He then becomes an elector in the manner and by the process directed by the Constitution of the United States, and he comes to perform his duty, and he is to perform his duty by giving votes and sending lists to this body, and at a certain day this body meets, opens the votes, and is to count the voices. If those voices have any uncertain sound; if they are not the clear, full, sonorous voice of a State coming to the assembly of the States on the one hand and the assembly of the people on the other, they will not hearken, they will not accept the treble voice of Jacob: if it comes in subtle guise clothed in a garment not suitable. It must be a lawful, legitimate voice before they will give any hearkening to it. This being so, if it be doubtful, if it be uncertain, then the power and the duty and the obligation rest upon them to do it, for how else can it be done? Would the people of the United States agree that the capacity of the persons chosen for electors should be determined by thirty-eight different supreme courts or the circuit courts that exist through thirty-eight States? Would the judgment of any State court be accepted as such a judgment ought to be accepted; that is, in the fullness of its cordial reception—would it be accepted as irrefutable proof by the people of the United States? Would they consent that the gentlemen of this Commission or the two Houses should look to the transcript of a record certified from a circuit court in Florida or Colorado as determining the result of an election and according to the result of their election receive the votes of such parties? It is perfectly evident that no such acceptance could possibly be given.

Seventy-five or eighty years ago, in the infancy of the Republic, when the history of every State and the name of every prominent man was known to the whole country, the character of its tribunals was ascertained, and there was entire confidence among the bar; then, possibly, a State tribunal might have commanded some degree of respect for its decision. But now when the breadth of a continent separates one State from another; when it is very hard to carry in your minds the names of the States, and very few of us can state exactly where they are; under such circumstances it is impossible for the States to exercise such a power. Where, then, is it proper that such a power should be placed? I know the enormous difficulty that arises out of its deposit here, because of the force of partisanship, the diversity of interest, the jealousy of the various parts of the country, and various other considerations. There are objections to it; but where else can you place it? If the assemblies of the States and the representatives of the people be entirely unfit and incapable, where else are you to look for fitness and capacity, coupled also with power? Where else will every man in the United States be represented in the final decision? In the two Houses every man in the United States has some measure of representation; in the Senate every State stands on an equality; and if bodies thus composed be unfit and incapable, where else can you find a body to make the depository of this vast power?

We learn a great deal, Mr. President and gentlemen, from the experience of our mother-country. Her institutions have been growing up for hundreds of years, and the vicissitudes and changes in them have been the result of the vicissitudes and changes in the condition of the people. The learned counsel in speaking of a member of Parliament said the returns were made into Parliament; that the writs came there; that had they been made elsewhere the returns would have been examinable where the writ was returned. That was precisely what James I said in a famous incident in history, reported in 2 State Trials. James I in his proclamation for the convention of his first Parliament lectured the people as to what sort of Parliament he wanted. He did not want any outlaws or bankrupts, among other proscribed classes. In a sharply contested election Sir Francis Goodwin was elected, and he was under a civil sentence of outlawry. The king took that to be a base affront on his proclamation. The Lords sent down to the Commons a message that they desired to have a conference on the subject; and in the committee of the Lords were nine earls, one viscount, six bishops, and thirteen barons, who were attended by two lord chief-justices, four judges, Mr. Sergeant Crook, and Mr. Attorney-General, the attorney-general being Coke. They sent for the Commons to meet them, and the Commons said they had no business with them on that subject; that it was the privilege of the House of Commons to examine its own returns. Then the King directly interfered. They sent a committee of sixty to wait upon the King, and the King told them:

His Majesty answered: He was loath he should be forced to alter his tune; and that he should now change it into matter of grief by way of contestation. He did sample it to the murmur and contradiction of the people of Israel. He did not attribute the cause of his grief to any purpose in the house to offend him; but only to a mistaking of the law. For matters of fact, he answered them all particularly. That, for his part, he was indifferent which of them were chosen, Sir John or Sir Francis; that they could suspect no special affection in him, because this was a counselor not brought in by himself. That he had no purpose to impeach their privilege; but since they derived all matters of privilege from him, and by his grant, he expected they should not be turned against. That there was no precedent did suit this case fully: Precedents in the time of minors, of tyrants, of women, of simple kings, not to be credited, because for some private ends. By the law this house ought not to meddle with returns, being all made into the chancery, and are to be corrected or reformed by that court only into which they are returned. (35 Hen., 6.) It was the resolution of all the judges that matter of outlawry was a sufficient cause of dismissal of any member out of the house.

The Commons made answer, and finally they went to their house and reduced their reasons to writing:

The reasons of the proceeding of the house in Sir Francis Goodwin's case, penned by the committee, were, according to former order, brought in by Mr. Francis Moore and read by the clerk, directed in form of a petition.

In the petition, they said that every Parliament writ contained this clause:

Et electionem tuam, in pleno comitatu factum distincte et aperte, sub sigillo tuo et sigillis eorum qui electioni illi interfuerint, nobis in cancellarium nostram ad diem et locum in brevi content certifies indilate.

That they should return the writ to the chancellor. The Commons said that there was a period when that was the case:

And also the Commons, in the beginning of every Parliament, have ever used to appoint special committees, all the Parliament time, for examining controversies concerning elections and returns of knights and burgesses, during which time the writs and indentures remain with the clerk of the Crown, and after the Parliament ended, and not before, are delivered to the clerk of the petty-bag in chancery, to be kept there; which is warranted by reason and precedents: Reason, for that it is fit that the returns should be in that place examined, where the appearance and service of the writ is appointed. The appearance and service is in Parliament, therefore the return examinable in Parliament.

From that time forth the Commons have been in the possession of that privilege, and for a long time the privilege was greatly abused; but in 1774 a law placed it in the hands of special committees organized for the purpose of giving judicial decisions upon those returns. De Lolme says of that law of Mr. Granville, that it was "one of those victories which the Parliament from time to time gains over itself, in which the members, forgetting all views of private ambition, only thought of their interest as subjects."

Now, I say that the Constitution of the United States obviously intended when these returns were brought to the two Houses of Congress, representing as they did the legislative department of the Government, and their business being to furnish an executive head, with, out which no law could be passed and no administration conducted—that these two Houses should examine fully and entirely, and just so far as it was necessary to ascertain that there was a concurring will in the appointment of a majority of the electors. That was the question to be submitted to and determined by them, and until that decision was made by the two Houses there could be no President appointed by electors, no President could have any commission from any source. He became the President of the United States of America solely, exclusively by the count made by the two Houses and their certificate that he had received a majority of all the electors; and before they can be possibly required to make any such judgment, they are, in the necessity of the case, bound to find all the just and proper grounds on which such a judgment shall be based. Hearn gives a very interesting account of the struggle, lasting more than a century, of the Commons to get into the position which they now occupy, and in the work called Hearn's Government of England, discoursing on this case, he says:

Such a power as that claimed by the Crown was manifestly fatal to the intelligent action of the House of Commons. This truth seems to have been fully recognized by all parties.

I return to the point where I commenced, to the inquiry in respect to the directions made by the State of Louisiana in reference to the election of President and Vice-President. I shall not follow the discussion in respect to the acts of the legislature and whether the act of the legislature of 1868 has been repealed or not. I will come directly to the question, assuming it to be true for the present that the act of 1872 fully provides for the election of electors for President and Vice-President.

I call your attention to the oath of office that the members of the returning-board are to take, found on page 96 of the compilation printed by order of the Commission, the latter part of section 2 of the act of 1872:

I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of a returning-officer as prescribed by law; that I will carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes, and make a true and correct return of the election: So help me God.

What statements of votes? That is prescribed in the succeeding sentence:

Within ten days after the closing of the election said returning-officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state. They shall continue in session until such returns have been compiled.

Therefore it is defined in the following sentence that the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election are the statements that the members of the board have sworn to compile, and they are the only papers that are referred to or mentioned in that oath of office. They swear to "carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes and make a true and correct return." It is offered on our part to prove that they never canvassed and compiled a single return made by the commissioners of election. As I mentioned before, they had a "contabulated statement" of the supervisors, which was a secondary paper; and here it may be proper, and perhaps in answer to a good deal of the tirade that has been spoken on the other side in reference to affairs in Louisiana, it would be right, for me to tell you precisely how this election came about, and who were the persons that were watching the precincts and controlling the election.

You will perceive that there is a supervising registrar appointed by the governor of the State, that governor being then a candidate for elector, and eventually a candidate for Senator to the Congress of the United States, which since this election he has, in some manner or other, got some sort of election for or title to. Fifty-seven parishes in the State and eighteen or twenty wards in the city of New Orleans each have a supervising registrar. The supervising registrar has the absolute power to reject or admit any voter on the list. The law, as you will perceive, prohibits mandamus, injunction, or any interference of the courts with his function, and prescribes that his judgment shall be absolutely conclusive upon the capacity of giving a vote. That supervisor of registration in each parish appoints three commissioners at each poll. He is required to take men of fair standing in their parties, so as to make something like a fair representation. I will assume that he takes two from his own party and one from the other. There are over seven hundred polling-places in the State, in round numbers. There are, then, twenty-one hundred persons in all, fourteen hundred of them of one party, and those men are to take the vote from the hands of the voter, and it is a criminal offense for anybody else to touch the vote in its passage from the voter's hand into the box. There are fourteen hundred, then, members of the supervisor's party distributed over the different polls of the State. In addition to that, he has the power to appoint a special constable to attend the polls and to perform all the duties that are required of him by the commissioners; he may appoint just as many as he pleases—"one or more" is the language of the law—say eight hundred. That makes twenty-nine hundred persons.

In addition to this, the United States court in New Orleans appointed sixteen hundred supervisors, two for each poll. In addition to that, the marshal of the district appointed eight hundred deputies for New Orleans and fifteen hundred deputies for the country, to attend the polls in the country. In addition to that, under the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, large detachments of the Army were placed in various parts of the States, so that they might be "bystanders," I think was the language of the opinion, to serve as a sort of posse comitatus in the event that the marshal should find any use for that sort of assistance.

Taking out the Army, there were about seventy-five hundred persons who were employed, lawfully or unlawfully, but still with a show of authority, all coming either from the governor or his friends. They were there engaged in watching the polls. Now, is this Commission astonished, under that sort of array, that there was not from a single poll, unless perhaps one, a protest or report by any commissioner of election that there was riot, tumult, intimidation, confusion, or anything else that the statute speaks of at his box? Nor was there, so far as I have been informed, a single report from any supervisor of registration that there was tumult, riot, or interference, or obstruction in the performance of his duty as registrar. On the contrary, on the registration-books there are 225,000 voters registered and the census of the State was 827,855 population. Of the votes appearing on the face of the returns there were 83,000 for one ticket and 75,000 for the other. I undertake to say that two-thirds of the States of this Union that voted at that election have not shown the same quantity of voting population in comparison with the population recorded on the census. I have been informed that there is not a single State.

With these facts standing here upon the face of the law, clearly to be discerned and ascertained, with these votes given, no scene of tumult, no scene of confusion reported by the only authority that could report it, I ask on what foundation, on what show of justice, right, or propriety, have these denunciations of the people and society of Louisiana been ringing in the ears of this Commission and the persons here present?

I can tell you another fact. I can tell you a fact more startling than any fact which has been reported here and which may serve at the next election for the campaign speeches of that time. On the 30th of October there issued out of the circuit court of the United States at New Orleans ten thousand and upward of warrants of arrest to seize ten thousand different individuals, inhabitants of the city of New Orleans, for having falsely registered themselves in 1874 as competent voters. They embraced some of the most respectable men in the city, my friend and family physician among the number; one of our delegates in Congress among the number of those arrested for fraudulent registration. That is quite equal to the two thousand fights and murders and bloodshed we have heard of. A whole community, comprising its very best citizens, apparently best in standing, in property, in social position, startled by warrants of arrest to seize them and bring them before an officer of the United States court for fraud! Never was such a picture of any community as that. There were ten thousand lies sworn to in order to procure those warrants. There was not a scintilla of proof nor any desire to have any proof. One thousand three hundred and sixty cases were tried and dismissed on sight; but it served the purpose. The affidavits were made by two men—policemen—all of them. I have read a portion of the affidavits myself, piled up in the court covering a table so high.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Were the whole 10,000 men arrested on those affidavits?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir. Two policemen in each ward made the affidavits, I am advised. On the affidavits of those two policemen a red line was drawn around the names of the citizens on the registration-list, and several thousand voters were unable to restore their names to that list so as to vote. The commissioner who issued those papers brought his account into court for fifteen thousand and odd dollars against the United States for his services, and Judge Billings told him: "On the face of these papers there is a gross fraud, and I will not certify to a cent." That is the character of the proceeding.

I ask if any such thing had happened in the sober, steady States of Vermont or Connecticut, if ten thousand writs had been issued charging men with crimes, what would have been the sentiment and what would have been the act of those people? Would they have been satisfied to go up and clear themselves of the accusation and return quietly home? I have the opinion that the inhabitants of the State of Ethan Allen would have been rather violent; at all events there would have been ten thousand suits against the officers if there had been any means of making them answer for that sort of dealing. But they were perfectly irresponsible, they were mere tools; I question whether they understood that there was any impropriety in the proceeding at all. But I think that is sufficient to show a perfect answer to those accusations of the wrong that was done some four or five or six years ago, based on newspaper statements.

Of course, neither one of these facts goes in the least toward solving the problem before this tribunal. The problem is whether these commissioners of elections' returns have been examined and whether it is necessary for their examination to take place before a valid return can be made. I hardly feel that I am doing justice to the Commission and adding anything to that which has been said on this subject, not simply said by my associates, but which has been said in the Congress of the United States in discussing this very election law, which was said with so much force in the report made to the House of Representatives and that has been read here, and said with so much force in the discussion in 1872 and 1873 and so lately as in 1875, and in which there appeared to be no diversity of opinion between the different members of the Senate who composed this Commission or the members of the House who composed this Commission. The discussion both in the House and in the Senate seemed to be concurrent to the same result in reference to the construction of this law.

Why, sir, if a body is charged to do a duty in a particular manner, in a specified manner and none other, if their oath be to do it in that manner and their commission is to do it in that manner and none other, how can any effect be given to the return unless they follow that commission? The whole frame of this act is to lift up into prominence and supremacy the original returns made by the commissioners of election, and none others. Without those returns the returning-board is not allowed to advance a step. "The first thing you are do," says the act to them, "is to ascertain from those returns which are contested and which are not contested;" and in this case neither the contested nor the uncontested returns have been examined and reported upon. In a late case, in 1875, reported in 10 Law Reports, Common Pleas, page 744, Lord Chief-Justice Coleridge says:

As to the second, i. e., that the election was not really conducted under the subsisting election laws at all, we think, though there was an election in the sense of there having been a selection by the will of the constituency, that the question must in like manner be whether the departure from the prescribed method of election is so great that the tribunal is satisfied, as matter of fact, that the election was not an election under the existing law. It is not enough to say that great mistakes were made in carrying out the election under those laws; it is necessary to be able to say that, either willfully or erroneously, the election was not carried out under those laws, but under some other method.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. In what form did that case arise, Judge Campbell?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It arose on an action for submitting an election under a late act of Victoria to the judgment of the court composed of the Right Honorable Lord Coleridge, chief-justice, and Judges Keating, Brett, Grove, Denman, Archibald, Huddleston, and Lindley.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. It is under the English statute.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir; the ballot act. The language which I have read to the court applies precisely to the act of the returning-officers in this case.

For instance, if, during the time of the old laws, with the consent of a whole constituency, a candidate had been selected by tossing up a coin, or by the result of a horse-race, it might well have been said that the electors had exercised their free will, but it should have been held that they had exercised it under a law of their own invention, and not under the existing election laws, which prescribed an election by voting. So now, when the election is to be an election by ballot, if, either willfully or erroneously, a whole constituency were to vote, but not by ballot at all, the election would be a free exercise of their will, but it would not be an election by ballot, and therefore not an election under the existing election law. But if, in the opinion of the tribunal, the election was substantially an election by ballot, then no mistakes or misconduct, however great, in the use of the machinery of the ballot act, could justify the tribunal in declaring the election void by the common law of Parliament.

Now, apply that to the case of the returning-board. The returning-board has a prescribed duty to perform under the act of its organization.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Judge Campbell, was that tribunal a tribunal erected for the trial of elections of members of Parliament?

Mr. CAMPBELL. There is a provision for the election of members of Parliament. This does not arise in the case of an election for Parliament.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. It is for the trial of the election of other officers as well?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir. This was a municipal election. They have a jurisdiction over elections for Parliament; and they certify their opinion; but this is not such a case.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Are the operative words of the section of the act which confers the power on the tribunal in that case, before you?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, sir. The question was under the ballot act. There were some instructions given to the returning-officers which would give you the information you ask for; I will read them from page 738 of the volume to which I have referred:

The returning-officer will attend at ———, at four o'clock p. m., on the day of election, to receive the ballot-boxes and papers from the officers; when all the boxes have been delivered to him, he will then—

1. Open the ballot-boxes.
2. Count the number of ballot-papers in each box separately, and record the number on the inclosed form.
3. Mix all the ballot-papers together, (keeping their faces upward.)
4. Sort into separate packets the votes for each candidate and the doubtful votes.
5. Examine the doubtful votes, and reject for the following reasons only:
 1. For want of official mark;
 2. Voting for more candidates than entitled to;
 3. Writing or mark by which voter could be identified;
 4. Unmarked or void for uncertainty.
6. Count the votes for each party. [It is very convenient to arrange them in heaps of twenties.]
7. Seal up in separate packets: 1. The counted ballot-papers; 2. The rejected ballot-papers.

[The packets of tendered ballot-papers, marked copy of ward-list and counter-foils, must not be opened.]
8. Verify the presiding officer's ballot-paper accounts.
9. Fill up and sign return on the printed forms.

I refer to this case for the principle which was announced. There had been an election and there had been a return, and there was a contest as to the election. The principle is:

To render an election void under the ballot act, by reason of a non-observance or non-compliance with the rule or forms given therein, such non-observance or non-compliance must be so great as to satisfy the tribunal before which the validity of the election is contested that the election has been conducted in a manner contrary to the principle of an election by ballot, and that the irregularities complained of did affect or might have affected the result of the election.

And so I say in regard to the returning-board, that if this returning-board proceeded in a manner which was in contradiction to the letter and the spirit of the act, so as to satisfy the revising tribunal that they did not follow that act, either from error or from fraud, (and we charge in this case both error and fraud,) then the returns of those officers cannot be accepted as valid and proper returns under that act. Let me refer you to Adolphus and Ellis's Reports in Queen's Bench, new series, volume 1, page 892, Caudle vs. Seymour; and the object of the citation is to show that there must be a conformity with the directions of the act, that a court or tribunal does not acquire jurisdiction by the mere fact of dealing with a case that has some connection with the subject of the act, but where the act prescribes a mode of proceeding to an inferior court that must be pursued. The syllabus of the case is:

A justice's warrant commanding a constable to apprehend and bring before him the body of A B to answer all such matters and things as on Her Majesty's behalf shall be objected against him on oath by C D, for an assault committed upon C D, on, &c., is bad, as not showing any information on oath upon which the warrant issues.

A deposition on oath, taken by the justice's clerk, the justice not being present, nor at any time seeing, examining, or hearing the deponent, is irregular, and no justification of proceedings founded upon it.

The judgment is this:

An affidavit is a document which is to speak for itself, and to avail or not, merely according to its contents; the court does not examine the party; but, in the case of depositions, the magistrate does; and I am not aware that deputing that office to a clerk has ever been held equivalent to an examination by the magistrate.

* * * * *
A magistrate has no jurisdiction in such a case as this, without a charge on oath.
* * * * *

The taking of affidavits in this court is quite different; the act is purely ministerial; the party says what he pleases, and the effect of it comes to be considered by the court afterward. But a magistrate taking depositions has a discretion to exercise; he is to examine the witness, hear his answers, and judge of the manner in which they are given.

The act was considered void and an action of trespass was brought against him. In this case I have communicated to the court the terms of the act of 1872 which required these persons to compile and canvass papers of a specific character, and their whole duty is performed when they canvass and compile those papers, and they have no other duty to perform until they make that canvass and that compilation. If in making the canvass and compilation they come across a protest made on the day of the election in the presence of the commissioners and corroborated by three parties, and they find in that a sufficient warrant for further examination and necessity for further examination, then they have an independent and separate duty to perform. And here let me state to the Commission that their duty upon the subject of intimidation and their power upon the inquiry into intimidation is a limited and special power. They do not have the power to go through the country and examine whether there was intimidation which kept persons from the polls, however such intimidation may have affected the election. They have not power to examine into intimidations or tumults or riots occurring at a different place than the place of holding the election, nor at a time other than the election-day. It is the interference on the day of election by tumult, riot, or intimidation, that the commissioners of election have the power to report, and when reported the returning-board have the power to examine.

I do not pretend to say but what at the common law and under the acts of the legislature of the State of Louisiana intimidation and threats and violence in any form, corrupting practices in any form, would invalidate an election. But we are not dealing with any inquiries of that kind. We are dealing with the powers of a returning-board, with a special, limited commission addressed to them, and the manner of performing that commission carefully and rigidly specified. The act of Louisiana is no new act. Here is an entire volume, an Election Manual, and these are the chapters contained in it relative to an election: "acts of agency; bribery; conduct; conveyance; corruption; influence; intimidation; fraud," &c., and the most extensive and ramified inquiries are made there, and rules of the strongest and most rigid character prescribed in order to secure purity in elections. Such unquestionably would be a suitable subject for examination upon a trial where a party had received a certificate of election from any returning-board. In the State of Louisiana, in the decisions contained in the twenty-fifth volume of Annual Reports, made in 1872 and 1873, there has been a perfect abdication or rather abnegation of every sort of jurisdiction over elections in any shape, although our intrusion act is a literal copy from the act of New York, and although the opinions of the courts of New York have extended the operation of the act to every sort of inquiry in elections.

The supreme court in the State of Louisiana held in the decision against Bonner that there was no law authorizing the courts to deal with contested elections, and their decision was to dismiss the case for want of any connection or control over it. That was all that is contained in those decisions. But, unquestionably, in any well-ordered court no such decision could possibly have been made, and when those opinions came before the committee of the Senate (and the report of Mr. Carpenter was submitted several years ago) that committee did not hesitate to say that those opinions were contrary to law and that the law was in the dissenting opinion. In every well-ordered system of jurisprudence, those inquiries, that delegation of power would be co-extensive with the limits; and any party who had a title to office and wished to establish that title against a party who had been counted in unfairly or who had procured his election unfairly and dishonestly ought to have been heard; but in the state of the law in Louisiana no such case could have been presented—I mean the state of the law before that supreme court.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Mr. Campbell, with regard to a portion of your argument, I should like to ask a question if it will not be interrupting you.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. What is the position you take in regard to the power of the State over the final action of its returning-board? To put the question a little more in the concrete, was it in the power of the State of Louisiana to have directed the action of the returning-board or State canvassing-board to have been completed on or before the 20th day of November, and was it in the power of the State to constitute another tribunal to try contests between the two sets of electors which claimed under the election?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Unquestionably, sir.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Then, as I understand you, you contend that the power of judging of the honesty or accuracy of the decision of the returning-board is in the State.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In the case of State officers.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. I am speaking of electors.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That I will come to after awhile. In reference to that, my own opinion is that the State has no jurisdiction over the elector.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Cannot review its own election for electors?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It cannot review the election for electors, in my judgment. I say that the election is to be reviewed and examined finally by the two Houses of Congress when their certificates of returns come.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. How then could they constitute a returning-board to make any decision at all ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. They make a returning-board with a view of compiling the returns. I am speaking of the final disposition as a final determination on the subject of the right of an elector to cast a vote. Perhaps the question is a doubtful one, and I have not very fully considered it ; but my view of these electors under the Constitution is, that the State is the instrument and the agency, and its laws are instrumental for the purpose of communicating to the two Houses of Congress the election of electors, and the two Houses of Congress, in determining who has a majority of all the electors, necessarily can inquire whether those electors were fairly chosen or not.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Pardon me for one question, and that is this: whether you contend that Congress occupies the position of a tribunal for contesting the election of State electors, the same position which a tribunal for the trial of contested elections constituted by a State would have as to any State officer ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That Congress could ?

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Whether Congress occupies that position ; in other words, whether Congress is the tribunal for the trial of contested elections of electors ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no question that Congress could create a tribunal to inquire into the validity and truthfulness and regularity of any election for electors for the purpose of determining the question whether the votes cast for President and Vice-President are cast by the men competent to do so. It is the only legitimate place where such a tribunal could come from, because the power to be exercised by electors affects every citizen and every interest in the United States ; every State in this Union is interested in that decision, and no State would be justified in allowing the determination of such questions finally to rest in a State tribunal.

On the subject of the value of those certificates there is one authority that I ask the attention of the Commission to. It is in 7 Lansing's Reports, page 725, and the same case was affirmed by the court of appeals, page 527 of the fifty-fifth volume New York Reports. I prefer to read from Lansing because it presents the subject very succinctly. We have offered to prove this certificate to be false. In this case it is said :

At common law, where, as in this case, the people are a party, the certificate of the board of inspectors is, first, prima facie evidence of the truth of such statements as they are permitted or directed to certify. But it is only prima facie evidence, it is not conclusive, and like all other merely presumptive evidence, it is subject to be overcome or destroyed by better, higher, or more certain evidence, and may be entirely so overcome or impeached. In this country it is the actual expressed will of the electors, not the certificate of inspectors, that confers the title to an office. It is truth, not form, that confers the right.

On another page :

When the truth has been so far inquired into and ascertained as to show that the certificate is not true, can it be the duty of the court to hold that, though false and uncertain, it may still be used as evidence ? Can such a paradox be introduced into the law as that a thing false in fact may be true as evidence ? Or this, that an official certificate proved to be beyond the power of the officer to make certain in what it contains, shall still be held to be certain because it is certified ? I think not. If such rules are not found to be established by authority, surely they should not be now first introduced to thwart that inestimable right of a freeman, the right to hold an office when such right is proved by the evidence to be the will of the legal voters.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. How did that case arise?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It arose on a contest about an election.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Under the New York intrusion act?

Mr. CAMPBELL. This action "was in the nature of a quo warranto to try the title of the defendant to the office of mayor of Albany, to which office the defendant was declared to have been elected on the second Tuesday of April, 1872."

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. If it would not be disagreeable to you, Judge Campbell, I should like to ask a question, as I did not precisely understand your answer to Judge Strong. Suppose, when, in the process of counting, the vote of the State of Oregon was reached, proof should be offered on behalf of one of the candidates that at every polling place in the State of Oregon there had been a different number of votes cast from that certified, so as to change the result in the State, do you claim that it would be the duty of the two Houses to pause in the process of counting the vote until both sides should have put in evidence on that question and the fact should have been ascertained?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is not the case I have been arguing at all. It is entirely outside of the proffer that we have made in respect to evidence.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. But I think it would perhaps help us to understand your view of the power and duty of the two Houses, to inquire whether you thought, if such proof were proffered on behalf of one of the candidates as to what the true vote was in that State, it would be the duty of the two Houses to pause in the count until that fact had been settled?

Mr. CAMPBELL. If I was a member of one of the two Houses I would give it all the pause and inquiry that was allowed to me, and then I would decide it according to the result of that conclusion.

I present now the question as to the objections that were raised to some of the alleged electors. The statute law of Louisiana, being the registration act, provides:

That no supervisor of registration, appointed under this act, and no clerk of such supervisor of registration, shall be eligible for any office at any election when said officers officiate.

We charge that another party held several offices, one of them being a senator in the State legislature, and therefore was not eligible; holding one office created under the Constitution, as well as several others under the law, they are disqualified under another article of the State constitution.

It was inquired yesterday by one of the members of the Commission if it were competent for the State to require that an elector should be a citizen of the State. The answer was, I believe, that the State had no right even to put that requisition. The State of Louisiana, in the act of 1868 and in her constitution, has not only required that he should be a citizen of the State but that he should be an inhabitant of one of the congressional districts. It has declared that two of the electors shall be appointed electors at large. As to them no requirement of residence is made except in the State. But six of the eight electors are required to be inhabitants respectively of the various congressional districts.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Are those six chosen by districts?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, sir; chosen by general ticket. But one of the questions which occur in this case is that in one of the districts the voters concluded they could only vote for the two electors at large and the inhabitant of their own district, and so neglected to vote for any other member on the ticket except the two electors at large and their own district elector. The returning-board, under a general equity jurisdiction, concluded that that meant the whole ticket and allotted to the other members of the ticket just as many votes as had been given to the three in that parish.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. What was the number of votes?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Twelve hundred, I think.

The PRESIDENT. Counted 1,200 votes not cast?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The exact figures are 1,362, 1,334, 1,364, 1,364, and 298. They did not allot them impartially, it appears. They allotted some more than others, but that was the excuse that was made.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Does that appear in the eleventh point of the offers of proof?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir; and that is the point that I am now making.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I meant to inquire whether the eleventh offer of proof was directed to that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir; the point I am making now is on the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth pages of our offers:

We further offer to prove that Oscar Joffrin was, on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, supervisor of registration of the parish of Pointe Coupée, and that he acted and officiated as such supervisor of registration for said parish at the said election for presidential electors on that day; and that he is the same person who acted as one of the electors for said State, and on the 6th day of December, A. D. 1876, as an elector cast a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States.

And so on the following page is the objection to Morris Marks, one of the pretended electors, who—

Was, ever since has been, and now is, holding and exercising the office of district attorney of the fourth judicial district of said State, and receiving the salary by law attached to said office.

Again:

We further offer to prove that on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, J. Henri Burch, who was one of the pretended electors who in said pretended electoral college gave a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and a vote for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was holding the following offices under the constitution and laws of said State; that is to say: member of the board of control of the State penitentiary, also administrator of deaf and dumb asylum of said State, to both of which offices he had been appointed by the governor with the advice and consent of the senate of said State, both being offices with salaries fixed by law, and also the office of treasurer of the parish school board for the parish of East Baton Rouge; and that said Burch, ever since the said 7th day of November, (and prior thereto,) has exercised and still is exercising the functions of all said offices and receiving the emoluments thereof.

The Constitution of the United States requires the State to appoint eight electors in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct. It has been decided that they might retain the power themselves and appoint the electors, or they might confer it on the people, or they might elect them by general ticket; and the question is presented whether they could as a part of that power designate the class of persons from whom the election was to be made; that is, designate persons from whom the election should not be made. In the exercise of that power they have specifically said that a person who is concerned with the registration, who has the appointment of a commissioner of election of a parish, who is the returning-officer of that parish, shall not be a competent person to be elected. There is an obvious propriety that a supervisor of registration should not be capable or eligible to any office while conducting the election. Such is the common law, decided very early:

The sheriff of Rutlandshire was chosen, and returned himself, one of the members for that county. Unanimously resolved, that the return was void.

The question arose in Mississippi, and it was there determined under a statute similar to ours that the election of a supervisor of registration to a State office was absolutely null and void :

We entirely concur in so much of this judgment as holds that the appointee was disqualified to take the office. The law prescribes who may vote as well as who may hold office.

The gentlemen on the other side have insisted that on the subject of the appointment of these electors the State has plenary power; that even Congress in determining who shall be President and Vice-President, in the counting of the votes, have no power or authority to go behind the certificate of the State and judge who has been elected. I do not go to that length; but I say that the term "manner of election," "in such manner as the legislature may direct," does include sufficient authority to determine who shall and who shall not be elected. They may say that an infant should not be elected; they may say that an alien should not be elected; they may say that persons convicted of felony should not be elected; they may disqualify from election the persons who have the control and the power to make the returns of the election, and who would be in such condition in respect to the election that fair and impartial action could not reasonably be expected from them; and under that view of the case they have disqualified the whole body of State registrars from acting as returning-officers for themselves, or being in any manner candidates at the place where they are elected.

In the same respect is the governor of the State, a candidate for the office of elector. He has the appointment of every registrar in the State, and is therefore directly interested in having such a registration as would render him a successful candidate; and how potential such an interest is will be sufficiently clear by evidence. Here is a circular that passed to every supervisor of registration; this one is addressed to the supervisor of registration in the parish of Assumption :

HEADQUARTERS REPUBLICAN PARTY OF LOUISIANA,
ROOMS JOINT COMMITTEE ON CANVASSING AND REGISTRATION.
MECHANICS' INSTITUTE, September 25, 1876.

DEAR SIR: It is well known to this committee that, from examination of the census of 1875, the republican vote in your parish is 2,200 and the republican majority is 900.

You are expected to register and vote the full strength of the republican party in your parish.

Your recognition by the next State administration will depend upon your doing your full duty in the premises, and you will not be held to have done your full duty unless the republican registration in your parish reaches 2,200 and the republican vote is at least 2,100.

All local candidates and committees are directed to aid you to the utmost in obtaining the result, and every facility is and will be afforded you; but you must obtain the results called for herein without fail. Once obtained, your recognition will be ample and generous.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. J. M. A. JEWETT,
Secretary.

SUPERVISOR OF REGISTRATION,
Parish of Assumption, Louisiana.

Your honors, therefore, must see that there was an adequate reason for an enlightened legislature to put that restriction upon the appointment of supervisors of registration and also for putting the governor out, having obtained the place of governor, to prevent him from holding any other office, so that he should not contribute to his election to another office to take effect after the expiration of his term as governor. That impartial administration in the matter of elections, that purity o elections which is an object of so much consideration in the constitution and laws of that State, could never be secured if such practices as we bring to your notice should be tolerated. Therefore we think that, if the Commission was to reject all these electors for the reasons set forth, it would be a vindication of the will of the people as manifested in their organic law and in their statutes.

These considerations are as much as the length of time I have will enable me to submit to the court. Upon the whole case, I feel it to be my duty to say that the State of Louisiana is much more concerned in the assertion of her power and of her right to vindicate the purity of elections in the State than she is in the election of any candidate for President or Vice-President. The court must observe, from what I have already exhibited of the laws of the State, that the State is in the possession of an oligarchy of unscrupulous, dishonest, corrupt, overreaching politicians and persons who employ the powers of the State for their own emolument. There is no responsibility on their part to any moral law or constitutional or legal obligation. For years they have usurped the powers of the State by means that have brought upon them the condemnation of the Senate of the United States, of the House of Representatives of the United States, and, I may say, of the whole people of the United States. Those practices have been covered, impunity has been granted to them because of their intercourse and connection with the politics and the parties of the Union; and without that connection they would not stand in that State for a single hour. By their association they have prostrated every material and endangered every moral interest within the limits of the State.

Reading a few days ago a work upon the present state of Turkey, written by a member of the British Parliament who went there to see for himself the situation, I was struck with the way he described the government of Turkey. It was not a government of Mohammedans nor a government of Christians. He said that there was a ring in Constantinople composed of apostates and renegades and adventurers from every state in Europe; that all reform was trampled upon by them because it interfered with their powers and their privileges and their opportunities to enrich themselves; that they inspired and inspired the massacres of Bulgaria and the oppression of the Servians; that reformation in Turkey was to be accomplished by no other means than the expulsion of that ring. My residence in Louisiana for ten years enables me to fully understand the perils and dangers and miseries under which that empire labors, and which threaten the whole peace of Europe. The rings in Louisiana have affected the peace of this country. The fact that this tribunal is now sitting, and that the whole people of this land look with breathless expectation to see whether their purposes have been accomplished by results, has been brought about mainly by the toleration of misgovernment in that State.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, there are two authorities that I will ask to hand to you: one is the case of Morgan vs. Quackenbush, 22 Barbour's Supreme Court Reports, page 73:

That the duty of the common council, in making the first canvass, was purely ministerial, and consisted in a simple matter of arithmetic; they not being at liberty to receive evidence of anything outside of the returns of the inspectors. That in receiving affidavits tending to show fraudulent practices at the polls, and in omitting to canvass the votes of two election districts, on that ground, they acted illegally, and assumed to exercise a judicial power which the legislature had not vested in them. But that, having jurisdiction to make the canvass, their certificate entitled P to the office until the other error should be corrected by legal proceedings.

Mr. HOADLY. Permit me to ask a question. Did the law under which that case was conducted prescribe the kind of testimony on which the tribunal could act?

Mr. EVARTS. What tribunal?

Mr. HOADLY. The tribunal there of which you read.

Mr. EVARTS. That I do not know. The statement of their powers is given, and it is said they exceeded them, and that action was illegal. Whatever their powers were they exceeded them, and that action was illegal.

I also refer to the case of Brown vs. The City of Lowell, in 8 Metcalf, page 175, as pertinent to the inquiry of what the operation is in respect of an act that is to take effect at a future day as compared with an act passed after the date of the first and between its date and the time it comes into effect.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That question is considered in 3 Dallas, the case of Ware vs. Hilton.

Mr. EVARTS. It is sufficient for me refer to it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand I have a few minutes more. There is a point that I omitted to deal with, which was the vacancy in the board not being filled.

The PRESIDENT. You have ten minutes yet.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to refer your honors to an authority on that point, Grant on Corporations, page 155:

When a meeting at which a specific thing is to be done is to consist of the different integral parts of a corporation, and each of these integral parts consists of a definite number of corporators, then the meeting will not be properly constituted unless it be attended by a majority of the members of each integral part respectively. Where an act is to be done by a select body consisting of a definite number of corporators, it will not be valid unless a majority of the select body are present at the meeting to do the act. If the act is to be done by an indefinite body, it is valid if passed by a majority of those present at the meeting, however small a fraction they may be of the body at large.

In this case the language of the act is:

That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning-officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning-officers.

And the word "then" imports time, and when the vacancy occurs that it shall be filled. In this case the vacancy occurred three years ago, in 1874. Repeated requests and demands were made upon this board to fill that vacancy, but that vacancy was not filled, and has not been filled. The reason given for it in the testimony which we shall offer, if permitted, is from the corrupt motive of escaping observation. It was perfectly within their means to have filled it; it was their duty to have filled it; and they acted corruptly in not filling it. It was said yesterday by one of the counsel that they had offered it repeatedly and it had been repeatedly refused. No person to whom the offer was ever made has ever been brought before any committee to testify that the offer had been made to him and that he had refused it. The members of the board themselves, at least one of them, did testify that it was not filled for the reason that they did not wish to be subjected to any sort of observation in the performance of that work. It stood upon that ground. It is such malpractice as to vitiate their subsequent proceedings in the non-performance of that duty, as well as the legal requirement on them to perform it.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Supposing, Judge Campbell, that they were not legally required to perform it in the sense of making their after-acts invalid, then would their failure to perform what the law did not compel them to do, from bad motive, change the validity of their subsequent acts?

Mr. CAMPBELL. They were bound under the terms of the law to have filled the vacancy. Observe the language:

In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning-officers.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I do not think you understood my question. Supposing you to be correct, that it was their duty to fill the vacancy, that they had no power to take any step in the performance of their duties until it was filled, then do you claim that their subsequent acts would be invalid, no matter what the motive was? But, supposing on the other hand that it was not a duty to fill it, in the sense of their incapacity to proceed afterward, would the presence of the corrupt motive make any difference in the validity of their subsequent acts? That is the question I should like to have your view upon.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I suppose that the failure to perform any duty enjoined by the law, from a corrupt motive which affects the election, would have the effect. A case in 50 New Hampshire, 140, was this:

It appeared that there were declared as cast at one of the precincts 27 more votes for county commissioner than were marked on the check-list. The court said, "if from the fact of this discrepancy the court ought to find that it was the result of fraud in the managers of the election, the court would hesitate long to count any of the votes cast at an election so tainted, on the ground that, with such proof of fraudulent and corrupt purposes, no confidence could be entertained in coming to any reliable conclusion as to what votes were actually given." And the safe rule probably is, that where an election-board are found to have willfully and deliberately committed a fraud, even though it affect a number too small to change the result, it is sufficient to destroy all confidence in their official acts, and to put the party claiming anything under the election conducted by them to the proof of his votes by evidence other than the return.

I read from the American Law of Elections by McCrary, section 184. I know of no case which is a precise parallel to the one before the Commission, where the fraud has originated in the failure to fill a vacancy; but as the legislature contemplated that there should be five persons and that the board should always be of five, comprising all political parties, the fraudulent refusal to do that would render them incompetent to perform further acts.

The PRESIDENT. The time is exhausted on the side of objectors to certificate No. 1, and an hour and two minutes are left to the other side.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. President and gentlemen, may I be allowed to file a brief on the subject last referred to by Judge Campbell?*

The PRESIDENT. I think you may submit it to the Commission.

Mr. MERRICK. I beg to call the attention of the Commission to it. It contains some authorities directly in point on the question that this board under the law, while composed of four, did not possess legal authority to act. Among those authorities is an opinion in a case from Mr. Justice Miller. I will state to the Commission with the permission—

The PRESIDENT. It is suggested that I have computed the time wrong; that I have given the objectors to certificate No. 2 too much. I will not stop to revise it now. I shall stand by what I have stated until I see that I was wrong. The journal-clerk thinks I have allowed an hour too much.

Mr. EVARTS. I think you said we had an hour and two minutes left.

* This brief will be found in the Appendix of Briefs, marked "Brief No. 5."

The PRESIDENT. He thinks you have just three minutes left.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to call attention for one moment, by permission of the Commission, to the question of time. It will be recollected that yesterday my time was occupied for at least half an hour with a discussion that occurred between members of the Commission and in reading some incidental papers called for by the Commission. At the time something was said about the propriety of not deducting that from the time used by us, and it seems to me that it is depriving us of some little time that we may want to use, to enforce the rule under such circumstances as against the time that I occupied.

The PRESIDENT. I made no deduction for interruptions. I left that for the Commission to decide. It is proper, therefore, that you should ask the Commission, if you see fit, to make an allowance. I made none.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not desire at this moment to make any remarks, but Mr. Merrick does.

Mr. MERRICK. I merely desire, may it please your honors, to make a statement in reply to a statement made by Mr. Evarts, that during the entire progress of the investigation of this subject that took place in Louisiana no protest was made, and no objection intimated, to the power of this board to canvass the electoral vote.

Mr. EVARTS. I did not state it in that form. I stated that no claim was made that Governor Kellogg was to canvass it. I said nothing about a protest.

Mr. MERRICK. Then I misunderstood. A protest was duly filed by those representing the democratic party against the power of the returning-board in Louisiana to canvass the electoral vote on the first day of the session.

Mr. EVARTS. I said nothing on that subject whatever.

The PRESIDENT. I think I am not authorized now to receive any further discussion; the discussion of the pending proposition is concluded. Shall notice be now given that there will be no further public proceedings to-day? [Putting the question.] It is so ordered.

After the doors were closed, at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS moved that the Commission take a recess for fifteen minutes; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner STRONG, the vote on the motion was reconsidered.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS moved that the Commission take a recess for one hour;

And after debate,

The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. Commissioner FIELD moved that the Commission adjourn until to-morrow.

The motion was decided in the negative;

| | |
|------------|---|
| Yeas | 7 |
| Nays | 8 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Bradley, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman.—7.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Clifford, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar; Miller, Morton, and Strong.—8.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR moved that the vote on the question of the admission of testimony in the matter pending be taken at four o'clock p. m. to-morrow;

And after debate,

The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD moved that the Commission take a recess until six o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON moved, as a substitute, that the Commission take a recess until seven o'clock p. m.

Pending which,

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON moved that when the Commission adjourn it be until ten o'clock a. m. to-morrow; and that the vote on the question of the admission of testimony in the matter pending be taken to-morrow at four o'clock p. m.

After remarks,

The question being on the adoption of the motion of Mr. Commissioner Hunton,

It was decided in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner HOAR,

Ordered, That the Secretary notify counsel to be present at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m. to-morrow to proceed under the direction of the Commission.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON moved that the Stenographer be allowed to attend the secret sessions of the Commission and take notes thereof.

The question being on its adoption, it was determined in the negative:

| | |

| Yeas | 5 |
| Nays | 9 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Field, Hunton, and Payne.—5.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Clifford, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Strong, and Thurman.—9.

So the motion was not agreed to.

And, on motion of Mr. Commissioner PAYNE, (at five o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.,) the Commission adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 16, 1877.

The Commission met at ten o'clock a. m., pursuant to adjournment, with closed doors, for the purpose of consultation on the question submitted relative to the offers of proof connected with the objections raised to the certificates of electoral votes from the State of Louisiana.

After debate,

Mr. Commissioner HOAR submitted the following order:

Ordered, That the evidence offered be not received.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT offered the following as a substitute for the proposed order:

Resolved, That evidence will be received to show that so much of the act of Louisiana establishing a returning-board for that State is unconstitutional, and the acts of said returning-board are void.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute, it was decided in the negative:

| | |
|------------|---|
| Yeas | 7 |
| Nays | 8 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That evidence will be received to show that the returning-board of Louisiana, at the time of canvassing and compiling the vote of that State at the last election in that State, was not legally constituted under the law establishing it, in this: that it was composed of four persons all of one political party, instead of five persons of different political parties, as required by the law establishing said board.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute, it was decided in the negative:

| | |
|------------|---|
| Yeas | 7 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That the Commission will receive testimony on the subject of the frauds alleged in the specifications of the counsel for the objectors to certificates numbered 1 and 3.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute, it was decided in the negative:

| | |
|------------|---|
| Yeas | 7 |
| Nays | 8 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That testimony tending to show that the so-called returning-board of Louisiana had no jurisdiction to canvass the votes for electors of President and Vice-President is admissible.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute, it was determined in the negative:

| | |
|------------|---|
| Yeas | 7 |
| Nays | 8 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That evidence is admissible that the statements and affidavits purporting to have been made and forwarded to said returning-board in pursuance of the provisions of section 26 of the election law of 1872, alleging riot, tumult, intimidation, and violence at or near certain polls and in certain parishes, were falsely fabricated and forged by certain disreputable persons under the direction and with the knowledge of said returning-board, and that said returning-board knowing said statements and affidavits to be false and forged, and that none of the said statements or affidavits were made in the manner or form or within the time required by law, did knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently fail and refuse to canvass or compile more than ten thousand votes lawfully cast, as is shown by the statements of votes of the commissioners of election.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute, it was decided in the negative:

| | |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON offered the following as a substitute :

Resolved, That evidence be received to prove that the votes cast and given at said election on the 7th of November last for the election of electors as shown by the returns made by the commissioners of election from the several polls or voting-places in said State have never been compiled or canvassed, and that the said returning-board never even pretended to compile or canvass the returns made by said commissioners of election, but that said returning-board only pretended to canvass the returns made by said supervisors.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute, it was decided in the negative :

On motion of Mr. Commissioner FIELD, it was—

Ordered, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the proceedings of the Commission.

The order was agreed to.

The doors were thereupon opened at five o'clock and five minutes p. m., and the respective counsel appeared.

The action of the Commission on the various motions and orders submitted was read.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Chair whether any of the time that counsel were entitled to under the order of the Commission remains, or whether it has been exhausted. The Chair was not certain yesterday on that point.

The PRESIDENT. The time on the side of the objectors to certificates Nos. 1 and 3 was exhausted. In regard to the time remaining on the part of the objectors to certificate No. 2, I find that I made an error in my announcement yesterday, by the correction of my associate, Judge Miller, and the journal clerk. By these corrections I am advised that ten minutes are left to that side, but, substantially, the time is exhausted.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. I move that the time be extended to counsel on each side for one hour on the general question.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I heard no request for that.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Payne moves that one hour on each side be allowed to counsel for the discussion of the main question that remains.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I wish to say that the order under which four hours and a half of time were allowed to each side for the discussion of the whole question was proceeding to be executed when it was intercepted by an offer of testimony, and it was then agreed that two additional hours should be given to each side for the discussion of that question. After that agreement was entered into, it was also agreed that the counsel might draw on their final time on the whole question and use it on that interlocutory question, if they chose to do so.

The PRESIDENT. And they did use it up.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. They did use it up, and they discussed the whole question, together with the interlocutory question. The counsel have not asked for additional time; and if they had, I should myself consider that we ought to stand by our order. I shall vote against the motion of Mr. Payne.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is that an hour on each side be allowed for argument.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. Unless counsel desire that, I shall certainly vote against it.

Mr. EVARTS. I think that counsel distinctly presented to the Commission, and certainly felt thoroughly, that the discussion thus opened to them covered the whole merits of the case. That was our view.

The PRESIDENT. You are satisfied, then ?

Mr. EVARTS. We are satisfied with the discussion as it now stands.

The PRESIDENT. I will put the same inquiry to counsel on the other side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The time which was granted by the Commission was granted with a view to the discussion of the questions arising on the case presented. We have nothing to add to the case we have submitted to the Commission.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I understand you to say, Judge Campbell, that the Commission having ruled out all the evidence you offered, you have nothing further to add before the deed is done.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Nothing, sir.

The PRESIDENT. The motion of Mr. Payne is withdrawn.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I move that a committee of three members of the Commission be appointed to prepare the report, and that we take an intermission of one hour for that purpose.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. What is that motion ?

The PRESIDENT. The motion is that a committee of three be appointed—

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Allow me to suggest that the only question formally passed on is the question of the admissibility of the evidence that was offered. We have not passed on the merits of the case, formally at least. I think we ought first to go into deliberation for that purpose.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. It is possible that on a discussion of the merits of the case among ourselves we may come to a conclusion which nobody is now authorized to anticipate.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I move that the Commission go into consultation.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Commission proceeded to consultation with closed doors.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON offered the following resolution :

Resolved, That the persons named as electors in certificate No. 1 were the lawful electors of the State of Louisiana, and that their votes are the votes provided by the Constitution of the United States, and should be counted for President and Vice-President.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN offered the following as a substitute :

Strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert :

That inasmuch as the votes of the people of Louisiana for electors of President and Vice-President in November last have never been legally canvassed and declared, therefore the votes purporting to be votes of electors of that State for President and Vice-President ought not to be counted, and no electors of President and Vice-President can be regarded as chosen in that State.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute, it was decided in the negative :

| | |
|------------|---|
| Yeas | 7 |
| Nays | 8 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON moved to amend by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting:

That the votes purporting to be the electoral votes of the State of Louisiana be not counted.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment, it was decided in the negative:

Yeas..... 7
Nays..... 8

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

And the question recurring on the adoption of the resolution of Mr. Commissioner Morton, it was decided in the affirmative:

Yeas..... 8
Nays..... 7

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER moved that Commissioners Strong, Frelinghuysen, and Bradley be a committee to draft a report, as required by law, of the action of the Commission in the matter pending.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD moved that said committee consist of Commissioners Edmunds, Bradley, and Miller, the committee appointed to prepare the report of the Commission in the case of the State of Florida.

On motion,

Mr. Commissioner Edmunds was excused from serving on said committee on account of ill-health.

And on motion of Mr. Commissioner FRELINGHUYSEN,

Commissioners Miller, Hoar, and Bradley were appointed as said committee.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner MILLER, (at six o'clock and five minutes p. m.,) the Commission took a recess until seven o'clock p. m.

The recess having expired, on motion of Mr. Commissioner HOAR, the Commission took a further recess until seven o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.

After the recess,

Mr. Commissioner MILLER, on behalf of the committee to prepare a report of the action of the Commission in the matter of the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana, offered the following:

Ordered, That the following be adopted and signed by those members of the Commission agreeing therein, as the decision of the Commission on the matters submitted to it touching the electoral votes of the State of Louisiana, and the brief grounds of said decision, and be transmitted by the President of the Commission, with all the accompanying papers, to the President of the Senate, to be laid before the two Houses of Congress at the meeting provided for in said act.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION,

Washington, D. C., February 16, A. D. 1877.

To the President of the Senate of the United States, presiding in the meeting of the two Houses of Congress, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, A. D. 1877.

The Electoral Commission mentioned in said act having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates, and papers accompanying the same, of the electoral votes from the State of Louisiana, and the objections thereto, submitted to it, under said act, now report, that it has duly considered the same, pursuant to said act, and has, by a majority of votes, decided, and does hereby decide, that the votes of William P. Kellogg, J. Henri Burch, Peter Joseph, Lionel A. Sheldon, Morris Marks, Aaron B. Levissee, Orlando H. Brewster, and Oscar Joffrion, named in the certificate of William P. Kellogg, governor of said State, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by the certificates submitted to the Commission, as aforesaid, and marked Nos. one (1) and three (3) by said Commission, and herewith returned, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely: Eight (8) votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and eight (8) votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice-President.

The Commission has, by a majority of votes, also decided, and does hereby decide and report, that the eight persons first above named were duly appointed electors in and by the said State of Louisiana.

The brief ground of this decision is that it appears, upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject, that the beforementioned electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, A. D. 1877, of the State of Louisiana, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the law.

And the Commission has by a majority of votes decided, and does hereby decide, that it is not competent, under the Constitution and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Louisiana, on and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the returning-officers for elections in the said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, or that the determination of the said returning-officers was not in accordance with the truth and the fact, the Commission by a majority of votes being of opinion that it is not within the jurisdiction of the two Houses of Congress assembled to count the votes for President and Vice-President to enter upon a trial of such question.

The Commission by a majority of votes is also of opinion that it is not competent to prove that any of said persons so appointed electors as aforesaid held an office of trust or profit under the United States at the time when they were appointed, or that they were ineligible under the laws of the State, or any other matter offered to be proved aliunde the said certificates and papers.

The Commission is also of opinion by a majority of votes that the returning-officers of elections who canvassed the votes at the election for electors in Louisiana were a legally-constituted body, by virtue of a constitutional law, and that a vacancy in said body did not vitiate its proceedings.

The Commission has also decided, and does hereby decide, by a majority of votes, and report, that as a consequence of the foregoing and upon the grounds before stated, the paper purporting to be a certificate of the electoral vote of said State of Louisiana, objected to by T. O. Howe and others, marked "N. C. No. 2" by the Commission, and herewith returned, is not the certificate of the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that they ought not to be counted as such.

Done at Washington the day and year first above written.

The question being on the adoption of the report of the committee, it was decided in the affirmative:

| | |
|------------|---|
| YEAS | 8 |
| NAYS | 7 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

So the report of the committee was adopted; and the decision and report were thereupon signed by the members agreeing therein, as follows:

SAM. F. MILLER.
 W. STRONG.
 JOSEPH P. BRADLEY.
 GEO. F. EDMUNDS.
 O. P. MORTON.
 FRED'K T. FRELINGHUYSEN.
 JAMES A. GARFIELD.
 GEORGE F. HOAR.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD, it was Ordered, That when the Commissioners adjourn, it be until to-morrow at four o'clock p. m.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER offered the following :

Ordered, That the President of the Commission sign and transmit to the President of the Senate the following letter, to wit :

“ WASHINGTON, D. C., February 16, A. D. 1877.

“ SIR: I am directed by the Electoral Commission to inform the Senate that it has considered and decided upon the matters submitted to it, under the act of Congress concerning the same, touching the electoral votes from the State of Louisiana, and herewith, by direction of said Commission, I transmit to you the said decision, in writing, signed by the members agreeing therein, to be read at the meeting of the two Houses, according to said act. All the certificates and papers sent to the Commission by the President of the Senate are herewith returned.

“ Hon. THOMAS W. FERRY,

President of the Senate.”

The question being on the adoption of the order, it was determined in the affirmative, and the letter was accordingly signed as follows :

“ NATHAN CLIFFORD,

Mr. Commissioner MILLER offered the following order :

Ordered, That the President of the Commission sign and transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives the following letter :

“ WASHINGTON, D. C., February 16, 1877.

“ SIR: I am directed by the Electoral Commission to inform the House of Representatives that it has considered and decided upon the matters submitted to it, under the act of Congress concerning the same, touching the electoral votes from the State of Louisiana, and has transmitted said decision to the President of the Senate, to be read at the meeting of the two Houses, according to said act.”

“ Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.”

The question being on the adoption of the order, it was decided in the affirmative; and the letter was accordingly signed as follows :

“ NATHAN CLIFFORD,

President of the Commission.”

On motion of Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT,

Ordered, That the injunction of secrecy imposed on all former consultations of the Commission be removed.

At eight o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m. the Commission adjourned.

Hon. THOMAS W. FERRY,

Mr. Representative KASSON made the point of order that before action was taken on the pending resolution, a message from the Senate must be received, the Secretary of the Senate being now at the door of the House with a message from that body pertinent to the said communication.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order, on the ground that the pending resolution was also pertinent to the subject-matter of said communication, and that the previous question had been demanded thereon.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE TWO HOUSES.

JOINT MEETING.

MONDAY, February 19, 1877.

Each House resumed its session at ten o'clock a. m. At eleven o'clock a. m. the Senate appeared in the hall of the House of Representatives, and was announced by the Doorkeeper of the House.

The Senate entered the hall preceded by its Sergeant-at-Arms, and headed by its President pro tempore and its Secretary, the members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as Presiding Officer of the joint meeting of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying a chair upon his left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of Congress for counting the electoral vote resumes its session.

The objections presented to the certificates from the State of Louisiana having been submitted to the Commission, the two Houses have reconvened to receive and consider the decision of that tribunal. The decision, which is in writing, by a majority of the Commission, and signed by the members agreeing therein, will now be read by the Secretary of the Senate, and be entered in the Journal of each House.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows:

ELECTORAL COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 16, A. D. 1877.

To the President of the Senate of the United States, presiding in the meeting of the two Houses of Congress under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, A. D. 1877:

The Electoral Commission mentioned in said act, having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates, and papers accompanying the same, of the electoral votes from the State of Louisiana, and the objections thereto submitted to it, under said act, now report, that it has duly considered the same pursuant to said act, and has by a majority of votes decided, and does hereby decide, that the votes of William P. Kellogg, J. Henri Burch, Peter Joseph, Lionel A. Sheldon, Morris Marks, Aaron B. Levissee, Orlando H. Brewster, and Oscar Joffrion, named in the certificate of William P. Kellogg, governor of said State, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by the certificates submitted to the Commission, as aforesaid, and marked Nos. one (1) and three (3) by said Commission, and herewith returned, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely:

Eight (8) votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President; and Eight (8) votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice-President.

The Commission has by a majority of votes also decided, and does hereby decide and report, that the eight persons first above named were duly appointed electors in and by the said State of Louisiana.

The brief ground of this decision is, that it appears, upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject, that the before-mentioned electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, A. D. 1877, of the State of Louisiana, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the law.

And the Commission has by a majority of votes decided, and does hereby decide, that it is not competent under the Constitution and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses, to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Louisiana, on and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the returning-officers for elections in the said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, or that the determination of the said returning-officers was not in accordance with the truth and the fact; the Commission, by a majority of votes, being of opinion that it is not within the jurisdiction of the two Houses of Congress assembled to count the votes for President and Vice-President to enter upon a trial of such questions.

The Commission, by a majority of votes, is also of opinion that it is not competent to prove that any of said persons so appointed electors as aforesaid held an office of trust or profit under the United States at the time when they were appointed, or that they were ineligible under the laws of the State, or any other matter offered to be proved aliunde the said certificates and papers.

The Commission is also of opinion by a majority of votes that the returning-officers of elections who canvassed the votes at the election for electors in Louisiana were a legally constituted body, by virtue of a constitutional law, and that a vacancy in said body did not vitiate its proceedings.

The Commission has also decided, and does hereby decide, by a majority of votes, and report, that as a consequence of the foregoing and upon the grounds before stated the paper purporting to be a certificate of the electoral vote of said State of Louisiana, objected to by T. O. Howe and others, marked "N. C. No. 2" by the Commission, and herewith returned, is not the certificate of the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that they ought not to be counted as such.

Done at Washington the day and year first above written.

“Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT offered the following as a substitute :

“Resolved, That evidence is admissible that the statements and affidavits purporting to have been made and forwarded to said returning-board in pursuance of the provisions of section 26 of the election law of 1872, alleging riot, tumult, intimidation, and violence at or near certain polls and in certain parishes, were falsely fabricated and forged by certain disreputable persons under the direction and with the knowledge of said returning-board, and that said returning-board, knowing said statements and affidavits to be false and forged, and that none of the said statements or affidavits were made in the manner or form or within the time required by law, did knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently fail and refuse to canvass or compile more than ten thousand votes lawfully cast, as is shown by the statements of votes of the commissioners of election.

"Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

"On motion of Mr. Commissioner FIELD, it was—

"Ordered, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the proceedings of the Commission.

"The doors were thereupon opened, and the respective counsel appeared.

"The action of the Commission on the various motions and orders submitted was read.

"Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Chair whether any of the time that counsel were entitled to under the order of the Commission remains, or whether it has been exhausted? The Chair was not certain yesterday on that point.

"The PRESIDENT. The time on the side of the objectors to certificates Nos. 1 and 3 was exhausted. In regard to the time remaining on the part of the objectors to certificate No. 2, I find that I made an error in my announcement yesterday, by the correction of my associate, Judge Miller, and the journal clerk. By these corrections I am advised that ten minutes are left to that side, but substantially the time is exhausted.

"Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. I move that the time be extended to counsel on each side for one hour on the general question.

"Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I heard no request for that.

"The PRESIDENT. Mr. Payne moves that one hour on each side be allowed to counsel for the discussion of the main question that remains.

"Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I wish to say that the order under which four hours and a half of time were allowed to each side for the discussion of the whole question was proceeding to be executed when it was intercepted by an offer of testimony, and it was then agreed that two additional hours should be given to each side for the discussion of that question. After that agreement was entered into, it was also agreed that the counsel might draw on their final time on the whole question, and use it on that interlocutory question if they chose to do so.

"The PRESIDENT. And they did use it up.

"Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. They did use it up, and they discussed the whole question, together with the interlocutory question. The counsel have not asked for additional time; and if they had, I should myself consider that we ought to stand by our order. I shall vote against the motion of Mr. Payne.

"The PRESIDENT. The motion is that an hour on each side be allowed for argument.

"Mr. Commissioner MORTON. Unless counsel desire that, I shall certainly vote against it.

"Mr. EVARTS. I think that counsel distinctly presented to the Commission and certainly felt thoroughly, that the discussion thus opened to them covered 'the whole merits of the case. That was our view.

"The PRESIDENT. You are satisfied, then?

"Mr. EVARTS. We are satisfied with the discussion as it now stands.

"The PRESIDENT. I will put the same inquiry to counsel on the other side.

"Mr. CAMPBELL. The time which was granted by the Commission was granted with a view to the discussion of the questions arising on the case presented. We have nothing to add to the case we have submitted to the Commission.

"Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. Then I withdraw the motion.

"Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I understand you to say, Judge Campbell, that the Commission having ruled out all the evidence you offered, you have nothing further to add before the deed is done.

"Mr. CAMPBELL. Nothing, sir.

"The PRESIDENT. The motion of Mr. Payne is withdrawn.

"Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I move that a committee of three members of the Commission be appointed to prepare the report, and that we take an intermission of one hour for that purpose.

"Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. What is that motion?

"The PRESIDENT. The motion is that a committee of three be appointed—

"Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Allow me to suggest that the question formally passed on, was a question of the admissibility of the evidence that was offered. We have not passed on the merits of the case, formally at least. I think we ought first to go into deliberation for that purpose.

"Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I withdraw the motion.

"Mr. Commissioner STRONG. It is possible that on a discussion of the merits of the case among ourselves we may come to a conclusion which nobody is now authorized to anticipate.

"Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I move that the Commission go into consultation.

"The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Commission proceeded to consultation with closed doors.

"Mr. Commissioner MORTON offered the following:

"Resolved, That the persons named as electors in certificate No. 1 were the lawful electors of the State of Louisiana, and that their votes are the votes provided by the Constitution of the United States, and should be counted for President and Vice-President.

"Mr. Commissioner THURMAN offered the following as a substitute:

"Strike out all after the word 'Resolved,' and insert:

"That inasmuch as the votes of the people of Louisiana for electors of President and Vice-President in November last have never been legally canvassed and declared, therefore the votes purporting to be votes of electors of that State for President and Vice-President ought not to be counted, and no electors of President and Vice-President can be regarded as chosen in that State."

"The question being on the adoption of the substitute, it was decided in the negative:

Yeas..... 7
Nays..... 8

"Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

"Mr. Commissioner HUNTON moved to amend by striking out all after the word 'Resolved' and inserting—

"That the votes purporting to be the electoral votes of the State of Louisiana be not counted."

"The question being on the adoption of the amendment, it was decided in the negative:

Yeas..... 7

"Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

"And the question recurring on the adoption of the resolution of Mr. Commissioner Morton, it was decided in the affirmative:

Yeas..... 8

"Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

"Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7."

Second. For that the said Commission refused to receive evidence offered, as in the annexed paper stated, or any part of said evidence, and decided that the votes mentioned in the certificates numbered 1 and 3 shall be counted for Hayes and Wheeler, said evidence to the contrary notwithstanding.

The "annexed paper" referred to in the foregoing is as follows :

I.

We offer to prove that William P. Kellogg, who certifies as governor of the State of Louisiana to the appointment of electors of that State, which certificate is now before this Commission, is the same William P. Kellogg who, by said certificate, was certified to have been appointed one of said electors. In other words, that Kellogg certified his own appointment as such elector.

That said Kellogg was governor de facto of said State during all the months of November and December, A. D. 1876.

CONSTITUTION OF LOUISIANA.

ART. 117. No person shall hold or exercise at the same time more than one office of trust or profit, except that of justice of the peace or notary public."

II.

We offer to prove that said William P. Kellogg was not duly appointed one of the electors of said State in A. D. 1876, and that the certificate is untrue in fact.

To show this we offer to prove—

(1) By certified copies of the lists made out, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election in each poll and voting-place in the State, and delivered by said commissioners to the clerk of the district court wherein said polls were established, except in the parish of Orleans, and in that parish delivered to the secretary of state, that at the election for electors in the State of Louisiana, on the 7th day of November last, the said William P. Kellogg received for elector 6,300 votes less than were at said election cast for each and every of the following-named persons, that is to say: John McEnery, R. C. Wickliffe, L. St. Martin, E. P. Poché, A. De Blanc, W. A. Seay, R. G. Cobb, K. A. Cross. (Sec. 43, act 1872.)

(2) In connection with the certified copies of said lists we offer to prove that the returning-board, which pretended to canvass the said election under the act approved November 20, 1872, did not receive from any poll, voting-place, or parish in said State, nor have before them, any statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election in form as required by section 26 of said act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences which prevented or tended to prevent a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place.

(3) We further offer to show that in many instances the supervisors of registration of the several parishes willfully and fraudulently omitted from their consolidated statement, returned by them to the State returning-board, the result and all mention of the votes given at certain polls or voting-places within their respective parishes, as shown to them by the returns and papers returned to said supervisors by the commissioners of election, as required by law; and that in consequence of this omission the said consolidated statements, on their face, omitted of majorities against the said Kellogg, and in favor of each and every the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross, amounting to 2,267, but that said supervisors of registration did, as by law required, return to the said returning-board, with their consolidated statements, the lists, papers, and returns received by them according to law from the commissioners of election at the several polls and voting-places omitted as aforesaid from said consolidated statements of said supervisors.

And that the said returning-board willfully and fraudulently neglected and refused to make any canvass of the majorities so omitted, or estimate them in any way in their pretended determination that the said Kellogg was duly elected an elector at the election aforesaid.

(4) We offer to show that by the consolidated statements returned to said returning-board by the supervisors of registration of the several parishes of the State of the result of the voting at the several polls or voting-places within their parishes respectively, it appeared that said Kellogg received at said election 3,459 less votes for elector than said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross, and each and every of them.

(5) We further offer to show that the said returning-board willfully and fraudulently estimated and counted as votes in favor of said Kellogg 234 votes which were not shown to have been given at any poll or voting-place in said State, either by any consolidated statement returned to said returning-board by any of the said supervisors, nor by the statements, lists, tally-sheets, or returns made by any commissioners of election to any of said supervisors, or which were before said returning-board.

(6) We offer to prove that the votes cast and given at said election on the 7th of November last for the election of electors, as shown by the return made by the commissioners of election from the several polls or voting-places in said State, have never been compiled nor canvassed; and that the said returning-board never even pretended to compile or canvass the returns made by said commissioners of election, but that said returning-board only pretended to canvass the returns made by the said supervisor.

Act of 1872, section 43: "Supervisor must forward." Act of 1872, section 2: "Board must canvass."

(7) We offer to prove that the votes given for electors at the election of November 7 last at the several voting-places or polls in said State have never been opened by the governor of the said State in presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, and a district judge of the district in which the seat of government was established, nor in the presence of any of them; nor has the governor of said State ever, in presence as aforesaid, examined the returns of the commissioners of election for said election to ascertain therefrom, nor has he ever, in such presence, ascertained therefrom, the persons who were, or whether any one was, duly elected electors or elector at said election; nor has he ever pretended so to do. (Revised Statutes, section 2826.)

(8) We further offer to prove—

That the said William P. Kellogg, governor as aforesaid, when he made, executed, and delivered the said certificate, by which he certified that himself and others had been duly appointed electors as aforesaid, well knew that said certificate was untrue in fact in that behalf, and that he, the said Kellogg, then well knew that he, the said Kellogg, had not received, of the legal votes cast at the election of November 7, 1876, for electors, within five thousand of as many of such votes as had at said election been cast and given for each and every of the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross; and that he, the said Kellogg, when he made and executed the aforesaid certificate, well knew that of the legal votes cast at the popular election held in the State of Louisiana on the 7th day of November last, for the election of electors in said State, as shown by the lists, returns, and papers sent, according to law, by the commissioners of election, who presided over and conducted the said election at the several polls and voting-places in said State, to the supervisors of registration, and as shown by the said lists, returns, papers, and ballots deposited by said commissioners of elections in the office of the clerks of the district courts, except the parish of Orleans, and deposited for the parish of Orleans in the office of secretary of state, according to law, that each and every the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had received more than five thousand of the legal votes cast at said election for electors more than had been cast and given at said election for the said Kellogg as elector, and that the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had been thus and thereby duly appointed electors for said State in the manner directed by the legislature of said State.

(9) We further offer to prove—

That at the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, in the month of October, A. D. 1876, the said William P. Kellogg, J. H. Burch, Peter Joseph, L. A. Sheldon, Morris Marks, A. B. Levissee, O. H. Brewster, Oscar Joffrin, S. B. Packard, John Ray, Frank Morey, Hugh J. Campbell, D. J. M. A. Jewett, H. C. Dibble, Michael Hahn, B. P. Blanchard, J. R. G. Pitkin, J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson, G. Casanave, L. M. Kenner, George P. Davis, W. L. Catlin, C. C. Nash, George L. Smith, Isadore McCormick, and others entered into an unlawful and criminal combination and conspiracy to and with each other, and each to and with each of the others, to cause it to be certified and returned to the secretary of state by the returning-board of said State, upon their pretended compilation and canvass of the election for electors, to be thereafter held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, that the said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrin had received a majority of all votes given and cast at said election for electors, whether such should be the fact or not; and

That afterward, to wit, on the 17th day of November, A. D. 1876, after said election had been held and it was well known to all of said conspirators that said Kellogg and others had not been elected at said election, but had been defeated, and their opponents had been elected at said election, the said returning-board assembled at the city of New Orleans, the seat of government of said State, to pretend to compile and canvass the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election from the several polls and voting-places in said State for presidential electors, and make returns of said election to the secretary of state, as required by an act of the legislature of that State, approved November 20, 1872; that, when said returning-board so assembled, said Wells, said Anderson, said Kenner, and said Casanave, who were all members of one political party, to wit, the republican party, were the only members of said board, there being one vacancy in said board, which vacancy it was the duty of said Wells, said Anderson, said Kenner, and said Casanave, as members of said board, to fill, then and there, by the election or appointment of some person belonging to some other political party than the republican party; but that the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, then and there, in pursuance of said unlawful and criminal combination aforesaid, then and there neglected and refused to fill said vacancy, for the reason, as assigned by them, that they did not wish to have a democrat to watch the proceedings of said board; and that although frequently during the session of said board, assembled for the purpose aforesaid, they, the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, were duly, and in writing, requested by said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross to fill said vacancy, they refused to do so, and never did fill the same, but proceeded as such board, in pursuance of said combination and conspiracy, to make a pretended compilation and canvass of said election without filling the vacancy in said returning-board; and

That said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, while pretending to be in session as a returning-board for the purpose of compiling and canvassing the said election, and in pursuance of said combination and conspiracy, employed persons of notoriously bad character to act as their clerks and assistants, to wit, one Davis, a man of notoriously bad character, who was then under indictment in the criminal courts of Louisiana, and said Catlin, said Blanchard, and said Jewett, three of said conspirators who were then under indictment for subornation of perjury in the criminal courts of Louisiana; the said Jewett being also under indictment in one of the criminal courts of Louisiana for obtaining money under false pretenses; and Isadore McCormick, who was then under indictment in a criminal court of said State charged with murder.

And that, in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy aforesaid, the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting in said returning-board, confided to their said clerks and employés, said co-conspirators, the duty of compiling and canvassing all returns which were by said returning-board ordered to be canvassed and compiled; and, although thereto particularly requested by a communication, as follows—

“ To the honorable returning-board of the State of Louisiana :

“ GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, acting as counsel for the various candidates upon the democratic-conservative ticket, State, national, and municipal, with respect show :

“ That the returns from various polls and parishes are inspected by this board and the vote announced by it is merely that for governor and electors ;

“ That the tabulation of all other votes is turned over to a corps of clerks, to be done outside of the presence of this board ;

"That all of said clerks are republicans, and that the democratic-conservative candidates have no check upon them, and no means to detect errors and fraudulent tabulations, or to call the attention of this board to any such wrongs, if any exist;

"That by this system the fate of all other candidates but governor and electors is placed in the hands of a body of republican clerks, with no check against erroneous or dishonest action on their part;

"That fair play requires that some check should be placed upon said clerks and some protection afforded to the said candidates against error or dishonest action on the part of said clerks;

"Wherefore they respectfully ask that they be permitted to name three respectable persons, and that to such parties be accorded the privilege of being present in the room or rooms where said tabulation is progressing, and of inspecting the tabulation and comparing the same with the returns, and also of fully inspecting the returns, and previous to the adoption by this board of said tabulation, with a view to satisfy all parties that there has been no tampering or unfair practice in connection therewith.

"Very respectfully,

"F. C. ZACHARIE.

"CHARLES CAVANAC.

"E. A. BURKE.

"J. R. ALCÉE GAUTHREAUX.

"HENRY C. BROWN.

"FRANK MCGLOIN.

"I concur herein.

"H. M. SPOFFORD,

"Of Counsel"—

they, the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting as said board, expressly refused to permit any democrat, or any person selected by democrats, to be present with said clerks and assistants while they were engaged in the compilation and canvass aforesaid, or to examine into the correctness of the compilation and canvass made by said clerks and assistants as aforesaid.

And that said returning-board, in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy aforesaid, and for the purpose of concealing the animus of said board and inspiring confidence in the public mind in the integrity of their proceedings, on the 18th day of November, A. D. 1876, adopted and passed a preamble and resolution, as follows:

"Whereas this board has learned with satisfaction that distinguished gentlemen of national reputation from other States, some at the request of the President of the United States and some at the request of the national executive committee of the democratic party, are present in the city, with the view to witness the proceedings of this board in canvassing and compiling the returns of the recent election in this State for presidential electors, in order that the public opinion of the country may be satisfied as to the truth of the result and the fairness of the means by which it may have been attained; and

"Whereas this board recognizes the importance which may attach to the result of their proceedings, and that the public mind should be convinced of its justice by a knowledge of the facts on which it may be based: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That this board does hereby cordially invite and request five gentlemen from each of the two bodies named, to be selected by themselves respectively, to attend and be present at the meetings of this board while engaged in the discharge of its duties under the law in canvassing and compiling the returns and ascertaining and declaring the result of said election for presidential electors, in their capacity as private citizens of eminent reputation and high character, and as spectators and witnesses of the proceedings, in that behalf, of this board."

But that said returning-board, being convinced that a compilation and canvass of votes given at said election for presidential electors, made fairly and openly, would result in defeating the object of said conspiracy, and compelling said returning-board to certify that said McENERY, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had been at said election duly chosen, elected, and appointed electors by the said State of Louisiana; and, in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did afterward, to wit, on the 20th day of November, A. D. 1876, adopt and pass the following rules for the better execution and carrying into effect said combination and conspiracy; that is to say:

"The returning-officers, if they think it advisable, may go into secret session to consider any motion, argument, or proposition which may be presented to them; any member shall have the right to call for secret session for the above purpose."

(10)

"That the evidence for each contested poll in any parish, when concluded, shall be laid aside until all the evidence is in from all the contested polls in the several parishes where there may be contests, and after the evidence is all in the returning-officers will decide the several contests in secret session; the parties or their attorneys to be allowed to submit briefs or written arguments up to the time fixed for the returning-officers going into secret session, after which no additional argument to be received, unless by special consent."

That the proceedings thus directed to be had in secret were protested against by the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross; but said board thereafter proceeded and pretended to complete their duties as such returning-board, and did perform, execute, and carry out the most important duties devolving upon said board in secret, with closed doors, and in the absence of any member of their board belonging to the democratic party or any person whatever not a member of said board not belonging to the republican party.

That the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting as said returning-board, while engaged in the compilation and canvass aforesaid, were applied to to permit the United States supervisors of elections, duly appointed and qualified as such, to be present at and witness such compilation or canvass.

That application was made to said returning-board in that behalf, as follows:

"To the president and members of the returning-board of the State of Louisiana:

"GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, of counsel for United States supervisors of election, duly appointed and qualified as such, do hereby except, protest, and object to any ruling made this 20th day of November, 1876, or that hereafter may be made, whereby they are deprived of the right of being present during the entire canvass and compilation of the results of the election lately held in the State of Louisiana, wherein electors for President and Vice-President and members of the Forty-fifth Congress were balloted for, and the result of which said board are now canvassing.

"That under the fifth section of the United States act of February 23, 1871, they are to be and remain where the ballot-boxes are kept, at all times after the polls are open, until each and every vote cast at said time and place shall be counted, and the canvass of all votes polled to be wholly completed, and the proper and requisite certificate or returns made, whether said certificate or returns be required under any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law.

"That under said law of the United States, District Attorney J. R. Beckwith, under date of October 30, 1872, gave his written official opinion for the instruction and guidance of persons holding the office now held by protestants, wherein said United States district attorney said:

"It cannot be doubted that the duty of the supervisors extends to the inspection of the entire election from its commencement until the decision of its result. If the United States statutes were less explicit, there still could be no doubt of the duty and authority of the supervisors to inspect and canvass every vote cast for each and every candidate, State, parochial, and Federal, as the law of the State neither provides nor allows any separation of the election for Representatives in Congress, &c., from the election of State and parish officers. The election is in law a single election, and the power of inspection vested in law in the supervisors appointed by the court extends to the entire election, a full knowledge of which may well become necessary to defeat fraud."

"In which opinion the attorney-general of the State of Louisiana coincided. Whereupon protestants claim admittance to all sessions of the returning-board, and protest against their exclusion as unwarranted by law, as informed by their attorneys has been done and is contemplated to be done hereafter in said proceedings of said board.

"E. A. BURKE,

"CHAS. CAVANAC,

"FRANK MCGLOIN,

"J. R. A. GAUTHREAU,

"H. C. BROWN,

"Of Counsel."

But that said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting as such returning-board, in further pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, then and there refused to permit said United States commissioners of election to be present for the purpose aforesaid, but proceeded in their absence to the pretended compilation and canvass aforesaid.

That the said returning-board, while in session as aforesaid, for the purpose aforesaid, to wit, on the 20th day of November, 1876, adopted the following rule to govern their proceedings; that is to say:

(9)

"No ex parte affidavits or statements shall be received in evidence, except as a basis to show that such fraud, intimidation, or other illegal practice had at some poll requires investigation; but the returns and affidavits authorized by law, made by officers of election, or in verification of statements as required by law, shall be received in evidence as prima facie."

But that said board subsequently, while sitting as aforesaid, for the purposes aforesaid, having become convinced that they could not, upon other than ex parte testimony, so manipulate the said compilation and canvass as to declare that said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion were elected electors at said election, and in further pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy did subsequently modify said rule, and declare and decide that, as such returning-board, they would receive ex parte affidavits, under which last decision of said board over two hundred pages of ex parte testimony was received by said board in favor of said Kellogg and others; and afterward, when the said McEnery and others offered ex parte evidence to contradict the ex parte evidence aforesaid, the said returning-board reversed its last decision, and refused to receive ex parte affidavits in contradiction as aforesaid.

And that in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy the said returning-board, in violation of a law of said State, approved November 20, 1872, neglected and refused to compile and canvass the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election which were before them according to law for canvass and compilation as aforesaid in regard to the election of presidential electors, but that said board did, in pursuance and further execution of said combination and conspiracy, canvass and compile only the consolidated statements and returns made to them by the supervisors of registration of the several parishes of said State.

And that said returning-board, in pursuance and further execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently refuse to compile and canvass the votes given for electors at said election in more than twenty parishes of said State, as was shown and appeared by and upon the consolidated statement and return made to them by said supervisors of said parishes.

And that said returning board did, in said canvass and compilation, count and estimate, as a foundation for their determination in the premises, hundreds of votes which had not been returned and certified to them either by the commissioners of election in said State or by the supervisors of registration in said State, they, the said members of said board, then and there well knowing that they had no right or authority to estimate the same for the purpose aforesaid.

And that said returning-board, in further pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, knowingly, willfully, falsely, and fraudulently did make a certificate and return to the secretary of state that said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion had received majorities of all the legal votes cast at said election of November 7, 1876, for presidential electors, they then and there well knowing that the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had received majorities of all the votes cast at said election for presidential electors, and were duly elected as the presidential electors of said State.

And that the said returning-board, in making said statement, certificate, and return to the secretary of state were not deceived or mistaken in the premises, but knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently made what they well knew when they made it was a false and fraudulent statement, certificate, and return; and that the said false and fraudulent statement, certificate, and return, made by said returning-board to the secretary of state in that behalf, was made by the members of said returning-board in pursuance and execution of, and only in pursuance and execution of, said unlawful combination and conspiracy.

And that said returning-board, while in session as aforesaid for the purpose aforesaid, in further pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did alter, change, and forge, or cause to be altered, changed, and forged, the consolidated statement and return of the supervisor of registration for the parish of Vernon, in said State, in the manner following, to wit: The said consolidated statement, as made and returned to said board, showed that of the legal votes given in said parish for electors at said election of November 7, 1876, said McEnery received 647, said Wickliffe received 647, said St. Martin received 647, said Poché received 647, said De Blanc received 647, said Seay received 647, said Cobb received 647, said Cross received 647; and that said Kellogg received none, said Burch received none, said Joseph received 2, said Brewster received 2, said Marks received 2, said Levissee received 2, said Joffrion received 2, said Sheldon received 2; and said board altered, changed, and forged, or caused to be altered, changed, and forged, said consolidated statement so as to make the same falsely and fraudulently show that the said McEnery received 469, said Wickliffe received 469, said St. Martin received 469, said Poché received 469, said De Blanc received 469, said Seay received 469, said Cobb received 469, said Cross received 469; and that said Kellogg received 178, said Burch received 178, said Joseph received 178, said Sheldon received 180, said Marks received 180, said Levissee received 180, said Brewster received 180, said Joffrion received 180; and that said returning-board, while in session as aforesaid, for the purpose aforesaid, to pretend to justify the alteration and forgery of said consolidated statement, procured and pretended to act upon three forged affidavits, purporting to have been made and sworn to by Samuel Carter, Thomas Brown, and Samuel Collins, they, the said members of said returning-board, then and there well knowing that said pretended affidavits were false and forged, and that no such persons were in existence as purported to make said affidavits. And that said members of said returning-board, acting as said board, in pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did, in their pretended canvass and compilation of the legal votes given at said election on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, for presidential electors in said State of Louisiana, as shown to them by the statements, papers, and returns made according to law by the commissioners of election presiding over and conducting said election at the several polls and voting-places in said State, all of which votes were legally cast by legal voters in said State at said election, knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently, and without any authority of law whatever, excluded and refused to count and estimate or compile or canvass votes given at said election for electors, as follows, which papers, statements, and returns were before them, and which it was their duty by law to compile and canvass, that is to say: for said John McEnery, 10,280; for said R. C. Wickliffe, 10,293; for said L. St. Martin, 10,291; for said F. P. Poché, 10,280; for said A. De Blanc, 10,289; for said W. A. Seay, 10,291; for said R. A. Cobb, 10,261; for said K. A. Cross, 10,288; they, the said members of said returning-board, then and there well knowing that all of said votes which they neglected and refused to canvass and compile had been duly and legally cast at said election for presidential electors by legal voters of said State; and then and there, well knowing that had they considered, estimated, and counted, compiled, and canvassed said votes as they then and there well knew it was their duty to do, it would have appeared, and they would have been compelled to certify and return to the secretary of state, that said Kellogg had not been duly elected or appointed an elector for said State; but that at said election the said McEnery, the said Wickliffe, the said St. Martin, the said Poché, the said De Blanc, the said Seay, the said Cobb, and the said Cross had been duly elected and appointed presidential electors in said State.

And that by false, fraudulent, willful, and corrupt acts and omissions to act by said returning-board as aforesaid in the matter aforesaid, and by said nonfeasance, misfeasance, and malfeasance of said returning-board, as hereinbefore mentioned, the said returning-board made to the secretary of state of said State the statement, certificate, and return upon which the said Kellogg, as de facto governor of said State, pretended to make his said false certificate, certifying that himself and others had been duly appointed electors for said State, as hereinbefore mentioned; and that said statement, certificate, and return made by said returning-board, and that the said certificate made by the said Kellogg as de facto governor, each, every, and all were made in pursuance and execution of said unlawful and criminal combination and conspiracy, as was well known to and intended by each and every of the members of said returning-board when they made their said false statement, certificate, and return to the secretary of state of said State, and by the said Kellogg when, as governor de facto of said State, he made his said false certificate hereinbefore mentioned.

III.

We further offer to prove—

That Oscar Joffrion was on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, supervisor of registration of the parish of Point Coupee, and that he acted and officiated as such supervisor of registration for said parish at the said election for presidential electors on that day; and that he is the same person who acted as one of the electors for said State, and on the 6th day of December, A. D. 1876, as an elector cast a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States, and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States.

IV.

We further offer to prove—

That on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, A. B. Levissee, who was one of the pretended college of electors of the State of Louisiana, and who in said college gave a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was at the time of such election a court commissioner of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, which is an office of honor, profit, and trust under the Government of the United States.

V.

We further offer to prove—

That on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, O. H. Brewster, who was one of the pretended electors in the pretended college of electors of the State of Louisiana, and who in said college gave a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was at the time of such election as aforesaid holding an office of honor, profit, and trust under the Government of the United States, to wit, the office of surveyor-general of the land-office for the district of Louisiana.

VI.

We further offer to prove—

That on the 7th day of November, 1876, Morris Marks, one of the pretended electors who, in said college of electors, cast a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and a vote for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was, ever since has been, and now is holding and exercising the office of district attorney of the fourth judicial district of said State; and receiving the salary by law attached to said office.

VII.

We further offer to prove—

That on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, J. Henri Burch, who was one of the pretended electors, who in said pretended electoral college gave a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and a vote for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States was holding the following offices under the constitution and laws of said State; that is to say: member of the board of control of the State penitentiary, also administrator of deaf and dumb asylum of said State, to both of which offices he had been appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate of said State, both being offices with salaries fixed by law, and also the office of treasurer of the parish school-board for the parish of East Baton Rouge; and that said Burch, ever since the said 7th day of November, (and prior thereto,) has exercised and still is exercising the functions of all said offices and receiving the emoluments thereof.

VIII.

We further offer to prove the canvass and compilation actually made by said returning-board, showing what parishes and voting-places and polls were compiled and canvassed, and what polls or voting-places were excluded by said returning-board from their canvass and compilation of votes given for presidential electors; and we also offer to show what statements and returns of the commissioners of election and of the supervisors of registration were duly before said returning-board.

IX.

We further offer to prove that a member of said returning-board offered to receive a bribe, in consideration of which the board would certify the election of the Tilden electors.

X.

We offer to prove that the statements and affidavits purporting to have been made and forwarded to said returning-board, in pursuance of the provisions of section 26 of the election-law of 1872, alleging riot, tumult, intimidation, and violence at or near certain polls and in certain parishes, were falsely fabricated and forged by certain disreputable persons under the direction and with the knowledge of said returning-board, and that said returning-board, knowing said statements and affidavits to be false and forged, and that none of said statements or affidavits were made in the manner or form required by law, did knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently fail and refuse to canvass or compile more than 10,000 votes lawfully cast, as is shown by the statements of votes of the commissioners of election.

XI.

We further offer to prove—

That said returning-board did willfully and fraudulently pretend to canvass and compile, and did promulgate as having been canvassed and compiled, certain votes for the following-named candidates for electors which were never cast, and which did not appear upon any tally-sheet, statement of votes, or consolidated statement or other return before said board, namely: J. H. Burch, 241; Peter Joseph, 1,362; L. A. Sheldon, 1,364; Morris Marks, 1,334; A. B. Levissee, 829; O. H. Brewster, 776; Oscar Joffron, 1,364.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the decision of the Commission?

Mr. Senator WALLACE. I offer the objection which I send to the desk, signed by Senators and Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection will be read by the Secretary of the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

The undersigned, Senators and members of the House of Representatives, object to the decision of the Electoral Commission as to the electoral votes of the State of Louisiana, because—

First. The said decision was made in violation of the law under which said Commission acts, in this, that by said act the said Commission is required to decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in said State; yet said Commission refused to examine and ascertain who were duly appointed electors in and by the State of Louisiana, and what votes from such State are within the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Second. Because the act creating said Commission was passed to the end that the Commission would hear and examine evidence and honestly decide which electors in any disputed State were fairly and legally chosen; whereas the said Commission refused to hear and consider evidence offered to show that the electors whose votes the said Commission has decided shall be counted were not duly chosen, but falsely and fraudulently acted as such electors, as well as the evidence offered to show that the pretended certificates of election of said electors were produced by corruption and were wholly untrue.

Third. Because the said decision is in disregard of truth, justice, and law, and establishes the demoralizing and ominous doctrine that fraud, forgery, bribery, and perjury can lawfully be used as a means to make a President of the United States against the well-known or easily ascertained will of the people and of the States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the decision of the Commission?

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. I desire to offer a further objection to the decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House will read the objection.

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

The undersigned, Senators and Representatives, do object to the counting of the votes as recommended by eight members of the Joint Commission, and do protest against counting the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana, for the reasons following, to wit:

First. It was not denied before the Commission that the Tilden electors received a large majority of the votes cast.

Second. It was not denied before the Commission that Wells and his associates, who style themselves a returning-board, were guilty of gross fraud; that their certificate given to the Hayes electors was false and fraudulent; and that their action in canvassing the votes was in violation of the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana.

Third. The action of the eight members of said joint commission in declining to hear evidence of the above and other facts was a violation of the letter and spirit of the act under which said Commission was created and of the spirit of the Constitution of the United States.

It was further

Ordered, That the Clerk inform the Senate of the action of this House, and that the House is now ready to meet the Senate in this hall to proceed with the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President.

JOINT MEETING.

TUESDAY, February 20, 1877.

At one o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m. the Senate entered the hall of the House of Representatives, preceded by its Sergeant-at-Arms and headed by its President pro tempore and its Secretary, the members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as Presiding Officer of the joint meeting of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying a chair upon his left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of Congress for counting the electoral vote resumes its session. The two Houses acting separately have considered and decided upon the objections to the decision of the Commission upon the certificates from the State of Louisiana. The Secretary of the Senate will read the resolution of the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

Resolved, That the decision of the Commission upon the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana stand as the judgment of the Senate, the objections made thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House will now read the action of the House of Representatives.

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

Ordered, That the votes purporting to be electoral votes for President and Vice-President which were given by William P. Kellogg, J. Henri Burch, Peter Joseph, Lionel A. Sheldon, Morris Marks, Aaron B. Levissee, Orlando H. Brewster, and Oscar Joffrion, claiming to be electors for the State of Louisiana, be not counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two Houses not concurring in a contrary opinion, the decision of the Commission stands, and the counting will now proceed in conformity therewith. The tellers will announce the vote of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. Senator ALLISON, (one of the tellers.) The State of Louisiana casts 8 votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, for President, and 8 votes for William A. Wheeler, of New York, for Vice-President.

UNDISPUTED STATES.

The count then proceeded, the certificates from the States of—
Maine, casting 7 votes for Hayes and Wheeler;
Maryland, casting 8 votes for Tilden and Hendricks; and Massachusetts, casting 13 votes for Hayes and Wheeler—being opened by the Presiding Officer and read by the tellers, and the votes thereof counted without objection.

MICHIGAN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hands to the tellers the certificate of the electoral vote of the State of Michigan, received by messenger, and the corresponding one received by mail.

Mr. Senator ALLISON (one of the tellers) read the certificate in extenso.

Mr. Representative TUCKER. I offer objections, signed by Senators and Representatives according to law, to the electoral vote of Daniel L. Crossman, of the State of Michigan, and also send up a duplicate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection presented by the Representative from Virginia will be read by the Clerk of the House.

The Clerk of the House of Representatives read as follows:

The undersigned, Senators and Representatives, object to the vote of Daniel L. Crossman as an elector for the State of Michigan upon the grounds following, to wit:

That a certain Benton Hanchett, of Saginaw, Michigan, was voted for and certified to have been elected and appointed an elector for the State of Michigan; that the said Benton Hanchett was on the 7th day of November, 1876, the day of the presidential election, and for a long period prior thereto had been, and up to and after the 6th day of December, 1876, the day on which the electors voted according to law, continued to be an officer of the United States, and held the office of United States commissioner under and by appointment of the United States court for Michigan, which was an office of trust and profit under the United States, and that as such officer he could not be constitutionally appointed an elector under the Constitution of the United States.

And further, that by the laws of the State of Michigan there is power to fill vacancies in the office of electors under and by virtue of the following statute, and not otherwise:

“The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the capital of the State on the first Wednesday of December; and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, by the hour of twelve o'clock at noon of that day, or on account of any two of such electors having received an equal and the same number of votes, the electors present shall proceed to fill such vacancy by ballot and plurality of votes, and when all the electors shall appear or vacancies shall be filled as above provided, they shall proceed to perform the duties of such electors, as required by the Constitution and laws of the United States.”—Compiled Laws of 1871; compiler's section, 115.

And the undersigned further state that there was no vacancy in the office of elector for which said Hanchett was voted and to which he was not appointed by reason of the disqualification aforesaid; nor was any vacancy therein occasioned by the death, refusal to act, or neglect to attend of any elector at the hour of twelve o'clock at noon of the 6th day of December, 1876, nor on account of any two electors having an equal vote, nor in any manner provided for by the statute aforesaid. And the undersigned therefore object that the election of Daniel L. Crossman by the electors present at Lansing, the capital of Michigan, on the 6th day of December, 1876, was wholly without authority of law, and was void, and he was not appointed an elector in such manner as the legislature of Michigan directed.

Wherefore they say that said Daniel L. Crossman was not a duly-appointed elector for the State of Michigan, and that his vote as an elector should not be counted.

And the undersigned hereunto annex the evidence taken before the committee of the House of Representatives on the powers, privileges, and duties of the House, to sustain said objection.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES, January 30, 1877.

BENTON HANCHETT sworn and examined.

By Mr. TUCKER:

Question. Where is your residence?—Answer. Saginaw, Michigan.

Q. Were you a candidate for the position of presidential elector in Michigan at the late election?—A. I was.

Q. On what ticket?—A. On the republican ticket.

Q. Were you elected?—A. I was.

Q. Did you vote in the college of electors?—A. I did not.

Q. Were you present?—A. No, sir; I was not present.

Q. Did you absent yourself?—A. I remained away; I did not attend.

Q. For what reason did you remain away?—A. The facts are these: In the spring of 1863, when I was living at Owasssee, in the county of Shiawasse, Michigan, some statements were made to me in reference to a man living in an adjoining town, who, I think, sold liquor and paid no taxes under the revenue law. The parties desired me to write to the district attorney, living in Detroit, in reference to the matter. I did so. I received a reply from the district attorney saying that he would have me appointed a commissioner by the United States court, and he inclosed to me instructions what to do in the case. About the same time that I received that, I received a letter from the clerk of the court saying that I had been appointed, and, I believe, inclosing the form of oath for me to take as commissioner, and, I believe, I took it and returned it to him. I have no recollection on the subject, but I suppose I did of course. I forwarded instructions to the district attorney in reference to the matter and issued a warrant for the man. He came in and paid it, the matter dropped, and there my services as commissioner ended, to the best of my recollection. It was not an office which I wanted to hold, but I performed that duty. In the fall of 1865 I went from that county to where I now reside, in Saginaw. The matter had entirely passed out of my mind. I have never acted since. Two or three days before the time appointed for the meeting of the electors, my attention was called to the subject in two ways. One was that some person spoke to me and said, "You are a United States commissioner," and the other was that I had noticed that an objection had been made to one of the electors in New Jersey on that ground. This called my mind to the circumstances which I have related to you, and in order to avoid any doubt that might arise on the subject, I determined not to meet with the electors and did not.

Q. You were, then, duly appointed United States commissioner in 1863, and acted under the appointment by issuing a warrant against a party. Have you ever resigned it?—A. No, sir, I never made any resignation. I declined to act, and that was all there was to it.

Q. How did you decline to act?—A. Some persons applied to me to do further duties as commissioner, and I stated that I would not act.

Q. And you never resigned your position?—A. I never resigned my position formally.

Q. Then you failed to perform the duties of the office after the particular case mentioned?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But you never resigned the position?—A. I never resigned the position.

Q. Do you know who was appointed in your place in the college of electors?—A. I know by hearsay.

Q. Who was he?—A. Mr. Daniel L. Crossman, of Williamstown.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Did you resign the office of elector?—A. No, sir.

Q. You just failed to attend?—A. I just failed to attend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificate from the State of Michigan?

There was no further objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An objection having been submitted by the member from Virginia, the Senate will now withdraw to its chamber, that the two chambers may separately consider and decide upon the objection.

The Senate accordingly withdrew to its chamber at two o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.

IN SENATE, Tuesday, February 20, 1877.

The Senate returned to its chamber from the joint meeting at two o'clock and twenty-eight minutes p. m., when the President pro tempore took the chair and caused the objection to the vote of D. L. Crossman, as one of the electors for the State of Michigan, to be read;

Whereupon

Mr. Senator ALLISON submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the objection made to the vote of Daniel L. Crossman, one of the electors of Michigan, is not good in law, and is not sustained by any lawful evidence.

Resolved, That said vote be counted with the other votes of the electors of said State, notwithstanding the objections made thereto.

After debate,

Mr. Senator WHYTE moved an amendment to strike out all after the first word "Resolved," and insert:

That while it is the sense of the Senate that no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust and profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector, and that this provision of the Constitution shall be carried in its whole spirit into rigid execution, yet that the proof is not such as to justify the exclusion of the vote of Daniel L. Crossman as one of the electors of the State of Michigan, and that his vote should be counted.

The amendment was rejected by a vote of 27 yeas, 39 nays.

Mr. Senator McDONALD moved to amend the first resolution by striking out the words "is not good in law, and."

The amendment was rejected by a vote of 26 yeas, 38 nays.

The question recurring on the resolutions submitted by Mr. Senator Allison,

A division of the question was called for by Mr. Senator Cooper.

The first resolution was agreed to by a vote of 40 yeas, 19 nays.

The second resolution was unanimously agreed to—63 yeas, 0 nay.

A message was directed to be sent to the House of Representatives, announcing the action of the Senate and its readiness to meet that House in order to proceed with the count.

At five o'clock and thirteen minutes p. m., the Senate was advised of the action of the House of Representatives, and immediately proceeded to the House hall to resume the joint meeting.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 20, 1877.

The Senate having withdrawn from the hall of the House of Representatives at two o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m., the House resumed its session.

Mr. Representative SOUTHARD moved that the House take a recess until Wednesday, February 21, at ten o'clock a. m.

Mr. Representative HALE made the point of order that the motion was not in order under section 4 of the electoral act, approved January 29, 1877.

The Speaker overruled the point of order, holding that nothing in the section referred to, or in any part of the act, prohibited the taking of a recess at this stage of the proceedings.

The motion for a recess was then rejected by a vote of 57 yeas, 192 nays.

A message from the Senate was received announcing its action in the case of Daniel L. Crossman, whose vote as an elector of the State of Michigan had been objected to.

Mr. Representative TUCKER submitted the following resolution :

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That Daniel L. Crossman was not appointed an elector by the State of Michigan, as its legislature directed, and that the vote of said Daniel L. Crossman, as an elector of said State, be not counted.

After debate,

Mr. Representative JENKS offered the following as a substitute for the resolution :

Whereas the fact being established that it is about twelve years since the alleged ineligible elector exercised any of the functions of a United States commissioner, it is not sufficiently proven that at the time of his appointment he was an officer of the United States : Therefore,

Resolved, That the vote objected to be counted.

The substitute was agreed to without a division ; and the resolution as amended was agreed to without a division.

A message was directed to be sent to the Senate informing it of the action of the House, and that the House was ready to receive the Senate to proceed with the count.

JOINT MEETING.

TUESDAY, February 20, 1877.

At 5 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m., the Senate entered the hall of the House of Representatives, preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms and headed by its President pro tempore and its Secretary, the members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

The President pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as Presiding Officer of the joint meeting of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying a chair upon his left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of Congress for counting the electoral vote resumes its session. The two Houses retired to consult separately and decide upon the vote of the State of Michigan. The Secretary of the Senate will read the resolutions adopted by the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

Resolved, That the objection made to the vote of Daniel L. Crossman, one of the electors of Michigan, is not good in law, and is not sustained by any lawful evidence.

Resolved, That said vote be counted with the other votes of the electors of said State, notwithstanding the objections made thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House of Representatives will now read the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives.

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

Whereas the fact being established that it is about twelve years since the alleged ineligible elector exercised any of the functions of a United States commissioner, it is not sufficiently proven that at the time of his appointment he was an officer of the United States : Therefore,

Resolved, That the vote objected to be counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Neither House having concurred in a mere affirmative vote to reject the vote of the State of Michigan, the entire vote of that State will be counted as cast.

Mr. Senator ALLISON, (one of the tellers.) In the State of Michigan 11 votes were cast for Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, for President, and 11 votes for William A. Wheeler, of New York, for Vice-President.

UNDISPUTED STATES.

The count then proceeded, the certificates from the States of—Minnesota, casting 5 votes for Hayes and Wheeler;
Mississippi, casting 8 votes for Tilden and Hendricks;
Missouri, casting 15 votes for Tilden and Hendricks; and Nebraska, casting 3 votes for Hayes and Wheeler—being opened by the Presiding Officer and read by the tellers, and the votes thereof counted without objection.

NEVADA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Having opened the certificate from the State of Nevada, the Chair hands it to the tellers, who will announce the vote of that State. Is there objection to the counting of the vote of that State?

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I submit the following objections to the counting of the vote of one of the electors of the State of Nevada.

The Clerk of the House read the objection, as follows :

The undersigned Senators and Representatives object to the vote of R. M. Daggett as an elector from the State of Nevada, upon the grounds following, namely :

That the said R. M. Daggett was, on the 7th day of November, 1876, and had been for a long period prior thereto, and thereafter continued to be, a United States commissioner for the circuit and district courts of the United States for the said State, and held therefore an office of trust and profit under the United States, and as such could not be constitutionally appointed an elector under the Constitution of the United States :

Wherefore the undersigned say that the said R. M. Daggett was not a duly-appointed elector, and that his vote as an elector should not be counted.

And the undersigned hereto annex the evidence taken before the Committee of the House of Representatives on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House to sustain said objection.

W. H. BARNUM, Connecticut,
WILLIAM A. WALLACE, Pennsylvania,
FRANK HEREFORD, West Virginia,

COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES,
Washington, February 9, 1877.

R. M. DAGGETT sworn and examined.

By Mr. TUCKER :

Q. Were you present in the college at the time of the vote for President and Vice-President?—A. Yes.

- Q. Did you cast a vote for President and Vice-President?—A. I did.
- Q. For whom did you vote?—A. I voted for Hayes and Wheeler.
- Q. Mr. Hayes for President and Mr. Wheeler for Vice-President?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. Are you the messenger who brought the vote to Washington by the appointment of the college?—A. I am.

- Q. Was that under the State government?—A. Yes; Nevada became a State in 1864, I believe.
- Q. Do you hold that office now?—A. I do not.
- Q. Who holds that office?—A. I think it is a man named McLean.
- Q. When was he appointed?—A. I don't know exactly when he was appointed.
- Q. By whom were you appointed?—A. I was appointed first by Associate Justice Field of the circuit court, and subsequently by Judge Sawyer of the circuit court and by Judge Hillyer for the district.
- Q. The appointment was made not by the judge but by the court, was it not?—A. Made by the judge.
- Q. In court?—A. No, I believe not; it may have been.
- Q. Where were you when you received the appointment?—A. I was in Virginia City; for the circuit court.
- Q. How was the appointment notified to you?—A. It was sent to me by mail.
- Q. Did you appear in court and take the oath and give the bond required by law?—A. Yes, sir; subsequently.
- Q. You were the keeper of the records of the court. Was not your appointment made a matter of record in that court?—A. I presume so.
- Q. And your qualification was also entered upon the record?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. When did you cease to be the clerk of the court, or cease to perform its duties?—A. I ceased on the 6th day of November, the day before the election.
- Q. What made you cease to perform its duties?—A. Because it was a question in my mind whether I would be eligible as an elector if I continued to hold the office, and I therefore resigned.

- Q. Directed to what point?—A. To San Francisco.
- Q. Does he live in San Francisco?—A. Well, he is judge of the district comprising those three States, California, Nevada, and Oregon.
- Q. Does he reside in San Francisco?—A. Most of the time.
- Q. You say you sent a telegram to another judge; whom?—A. Judge Hillyer, of Carson, the district judge.
- Q. And you have no copy of that telegram?—A. I have not. I did not think of saving it.
- Q. Did you ever receive an answer to that telegram?—A. I received an answer from Judge Sawyer the same day, about an hour afterward.
- Q. Where is that telegram?—A. I left it in Virginia City; I did not think of bringing it. I believe I have it.
- Q. Why did not you bring it?—A. Well, I did not know that there would be any question about it.
- Q. Did not you know what you were sent for?—A. I was only subpoenaed here two or three days ago.
- By Mr. FIELD :
- Q. You telegraphed Judge Sawyer on the 6th of November?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. Can you not give the exact words of the telegram?—A. I think I can.
- Q. Give the exact words, then.—A. I think the telegram read this way: "Honorable Alonzo Sawyer, San Francisco: I have this day filed my resignation as clerk of the circuit court of the ninth circuit, and request the acceptance of my resignation." I, at the same time that I sent that telegram to Judge Sawyer, sent to Carson my resignation.
- Q. No; do not say you sent your resignation. I am only asking about the telegram to Judge Sawyer. Have you given the whole of that?—A. Yes, sir; I think that is about the substance of it, and I think pretty nearly the words.
- Q. You received from him an answer?—A. Yes, sir.

- Q. On the same day, about an hour afterward?—A. An hour or two afterward.
- Q. That you have got, I suppose?—A. I think it is among my papers in Virginia City.
- Q. Do you remember the exact words of that?—A. Pretty nearly.
- Q. Give them.—A. "Your resignation as clerk of the circuit court is accepted. Alonzo Sawyer."
- Q. Have you ever had any other communication with Judge Sawyer on the subject?—A. I have not.
- Q. You have never written him?—A. I never have.
- Q. Nor received a letter from him?—A. Never.
- Q. You did not send to him a copy of your written resignation?—A. By telegraph?
- Q. No. You say you wrote something; you did not send him a copy of that?—A. No; do you mean, sent it by mail?
- Q. Yes; or any way.—A. I did send it.
- Q. How?—A. I sent it to Carson the same day.
- Q. I am talking about Judge Sawyer. Did you send to Judge Sawyer any copy or any paper?—A. Yes.
- Q. What did you send him?—A. My resignation.
- Q. In what form?—A. In the usual form of resignations.
- Q. You sent him a copy of your written paper?—A. My written paper; my resignation, you mean?
- Q. Yes; do not you understand me? Did you send Judge Sawyer anything in the world but the telegram?—A. Yes.
- Q. What else?—A. I sent him my resignation.
- Q. You mean a written paper?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. Did you send him the original that was filed or a copy?—A. I sent him the original. I only made one.
- Q. You made one; then you did not file it?—A. I sent it down to be filed.
- Q. You sent it to him to file by mail?—A. I did not send it to San Francisco.
- Q. Where did you send it?—A. I sent it to Carson.
- Q. Now I think I get an answer. Did you send anything to Judge Sawyer?—A. Yes.
- Q. What?—A. I sent that resignation.
- Q. That paper?—A. Yes.
- Q. To Judge Sawyer, at San Francisco?—A. I did not say that I did send it to San Francisco.
- Q. Well, he was there, was he not?—A. He was there that day, I think.
- Q. Then that day you did not send it. Did you send it to San Francisco the next day?—A. I did not send it to San Francisco.
- Q. At all?—A. Not at all.
- Q. Did you ever send the original paper anywhere?—A. Yes.
- Q. Where did that go?—A. To Carson.
- Q. How did you send that?—A. I sent it by mail.
- Q. You mailed it in Virginia City direct to Carson, did you?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. When did you mail it in Virginia City?—A. I mailed it on the 6th.
- Q. What time or hour on the 6th?—A. Along about eleven o'clock in the day.
- Q. When did the next post leave Virginia City for Carson?—A. At about half-past two in the afternoon.
- Q. You say you telegraphed to Judge Hillyer?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. Have you that telegram?—A. They were very much alike, except the change of name.
- Q. As near as you can remember, were they exactly the same?—A. Yes, sir; precisely the same, with such changes as there would necessarily be in telegraphing to a different person.
- Q. Did you receive an answer from him?—A. I did not.
- Q. He never answered you at all?—A. No.
- Q. By letter or telegraph?—A. No.
- Q. Has the circuit court ever been in session since that time?—A. Yes.
- Q. When?—A. On the 6th of November.
- Q. In session where?—A. In Carson City.
- Q. Were you there?—A. I was not.
- Q. When were you, next after the 6th of November, in the court?—A. I have not been there since.
- Q. Personally, therefore, you do not know who transacted the business, as clerk, in the circuit court on the 7th day of November?—A. I do not.
- Q. Did you yourself give any directions about the business of the court to be transacted on that next day?—A. I did not.
- Q. Have you ever since?—A. I have not.
- Q. Who is doing the business of the clerk?—A. There is a clerk there—Mr. McLean; I have forgotten his first name.

Q. Do you know whether he has been appointed by the circuit court?—A. Yes; I am certain he has.

Q. How you understand that he has?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When was he appointed?—A. That I do not know exactly.

Q. What month?—A. O, he was appointed in November.

Q. Do you know that?—A. Yes.

Q. You know that?—A. Well, I do not know it, because I never saw the appointment.

Q. And you have never seen any record of his appointment?—A. No; I never have.

Q. Was Mr. McLean your deputy?—A. No, he was not.

Q. Did your deputy make the entries and keep the minutes of the court until Mr. McLean took possession of the office?—A. I presume he did. I do not know. I never was there afterward.

Q. Did you make any communications to him?—A. I did not.

Q. Where is the paper that you call your written resignation?—A. It must be on file in Carson, in the clerk's office.

Q. That is to say, as far as you know?—A. So far as I know.

Q. Give the language, as near as you can, of that written paper which you call your resignation.—A. I think it was addressed to Judge Sawyer, and ran about in this style: "Having been nominated as presidential elector, I hereby tender my resignation as clerk of the circuit court, ninth circuit, and trust the resignation may be immediately accepted." I think that is about the purport of it.

Q. You inclosed that in an envelope, did you?—A. Yes.

Q. Directed to whom?—A. To Judge Sawyer.

Q. At Carson City?—A. At Carson City.

Q. It was sealed up, directed to Judge Sawyer, and put into the mail?—A. Yes.

Q. Judge Sawyer was then in San Francisco?—A. Yes; he was then in San Francisco.

Q. Do you know of your own knowledge that Judge Sawyer has ever been in Carson City since?—A. Yes.

Q. Were you there?—A. I was not.

Q. Do not you know what I mean by your own knowledge? Did you see him?—A. No, I did not see him,

Q. Very well; you do not know of your own knowledge that he has ever been there since?—A. Not by seeing him.

Q. That is your knowledge. You do not know, then, of your own knowledge that Judge Sawyer ever saw that package or letter?—A. I do not.

Q. You do not know of your own knowledge that it is not now in the post-office?—A. I do not.

Q. Have your accounts as clerk ever been settled?—A. Yes; I think so.

Q. You think so; do you know?—A. I did not attend to the business much; my deputy always did it.

Q. What deputy?—A. Mr. Edwards.

Q. Is he still there?—A. He is in Carson.

Q. Is he still in the office of the clerk?—A. I do not know.

Q. Do you know whether he has ever been out of it?—A. I do not know; I presume he was out of it after I resigned.

Q. Do you know that he was ever out of it? Were you there? Do you know whether he did not attend in court every day and transact business?—A. I do not, of my own knowledge.

Q. Did not you as clerk receive money to be deposited to your credit in bank?—A. Frequently.

Q. In what bank?—A. I have forgotten where the deposits were made. We shifted them around quite often.

Q. In different banks?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Give us the names of some of them?—A. The Bank of California, and Wells, Fargo & Co.

Q. What amount of money had you standing in your name or to your credit as clerk of the circuit court of the United States?—A. I think not a dollar.

Q. It had all been previously paid out?—A. Yes.

Q. Paid out for what purposes?—A. Paid out in the regular course of business.

Q. You think there were no moneys on deposit to your credit as clerk at that time?—A. I think not; I am not positive.

Q. Has your bond ever been discharged?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. I repeat now what I asked you before: Have your accounts as clerk to your knowledge ever been settled?—A. We made our quarterly settlements.

Q. That is not an answer to my question.—A. You mean since that time?

Q. Have your accounts ever been finally settled?—A. Well, I do not know that there was any accounts to settle.

Q. You received fees?—A. I received fees.

Q. And you were paid through fees?—A. Paid through fees.

Q. Up to a certain amount, or all the fees?—A. Up to a certain amount.

Q. Very well, then, there must have been, of course, an account to be kept of the amount of fees received, and so far as they exceeded the limit you paid them over to the Treasury, did you not?—A. I should have done so had they ever exceeded the amount.

Q. When were your periodical accounts regularly settled?—A. They were settled semi-annually.

Q. In what months?—A. In June and December, the 31st.

Q. Then you settled an account on the 31st of June, 1876?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you ever settled an account since?—A. I have not.

Q. Could you state, if you were asked, the items on different sides of the account?—A. O, no; I could not.

Q. Have you ever had any communication with Mr. Edwards since the 6th of November?—A. I have not; I have never been in Carson since but once; that was at the meeting of the college, and I did not see him.

Q. Did you have any communication with him on the 6th of November?—A. No, sir; I was in Virginia City.

Q. When first after the 6th of November did you visit Carson City?—A. Not until the meeting of the college.

Q. That was on the 6th of December?—A. I think so.

Q. In what business have you been engaged since?—A. Well, I am in the mining business principally, and always have been.

Q. Do you say that the circuit court has been in session since the 6th of November?—A. Yes.

Q. Was it not the district court?—A. The circuit court was in session also.

Q. Are you sure?—A. I am pretty positive.

Q. What are the times for the meeting of the circuit court in Nevada?—A. I don't remember just now; they made some changes, I think, in the last Congress.

Q. As the law stood on the first of November, what was the time for the meeting of the court; not the district, but the circuit court?—A. My opinion is that the circuit court was to meet on the 6th of November. That is my impression now, and that is what I thought at the time.

Q. Your impression from what?—A. From the law. The first Monday, I think, in November.

Q. You can easily tell, cannot you, by looking at the law?—A. Yes, I can tell.

Q. I wish you would tell us, then, before you leave the city.—A. I will do so.

By Mr. TUCKER:

Q. You did not file the paper that you call your resignation, in the clerk's office on the 6th of November?—A. I transmitted it for filing, or rather to the judge.

Q. To Judge Sawyer, at Carson?—A. Yes.

Q. He was that day at San Francisco?—A. I understood that he was.

Q. Well, you got a telegram from him from there?—A. Yes.

Q. How long would it take Judge Sawyer to come by the quickest route from San Francisco to Carson?—A. Twenty hours, I believe.

Q. Coming by steamer?—A. No; by rail.

Q. You do not know when he did come?—A. I do not.

Q. Then, if he had left San Francisco on the 6th, he would not get to Carson until what time?—A. He could have got there on the 7th.

Q. What time on the 7th?—A. It would have been along in the evening.

Q. When you communicated with the judges, as you say, on the 6th, did you communicate to your deputy, Edwards, that you were no longer clerk of the court?—A. I did not.

By Mr. BURCHARD:

Q. You did not exercise the duties of the clerk since the time of your telegram?—A. I have not.

Q. And they have been performed, as I understand, by a successor appointed by the court?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Your recollection is that the district and circuit court were then in session that day in Carson City?—A. I believe that was the day fixed for it.

Q. Where do I understand you to say Judge Hillyer was?—A. He was in Carson.

Q. Is there a railroad from Virginia City to Carson?—A. Yes.

Q. How far is it, in time, by rail?—A. Well, the railroad is a little long and pretty crooked, about twenty-four miles; they make it generally in about two hours and a half, sometimes a little less.

Q. The telegram was sent at what time to Judge Hillyer?—A. I think along about noon some time.

Q. You put your resignation in the mail before the hour of sending the mail from Virginia City to Carson?—A. Yes; in order that it might reach there on that day, the 6th.

Q. Do you remember whether the envelope was addressed to your deputy, or a clerk, or to the judge himself?—A. It was addressed to the judge himself.

Q. And you sent a resignation to each judge, if I understand?—A. To each.

By Mr. FIELD :

Q. Not a written paper to each?—A. Yes, I sent a resignation to each.

Q. The telegram, you said, you sent to each?—A. I sent the resignation also.

By Mr. BURCHARD :

Q. Then you sent a resignation to each of the judges, through the mail, on the 6th?—A. Yes, and at the same time I telegraphed them that I had so sent it.

Q. And Judge Hillyer was then, as I understand, holding court at Carson City?—A. The circuit court, I think, was to meet.

By Mr. MAISH :

Q. He was the district judge?—A. Yes, sir; but I had understood that Judge Sawyer was in San Francisco. I had learned it from some source, and therefore telegraphed to him there.

By Mr. FIELD :

Q. Let me see if I understand you about this resignation directed to the district judge. Did you send exactly the same paper to the district judge that you had sent the circuit judge?—A. Not the same paper.

Q. Was it a copy of the same paper?—A. Pretty nearly.

Q. Can you give the contents of the paper?—A. A moment ago I gave it, and the other was pretty nearly a copy of it, with the exception of such changes as would necessarily be made.

Q. Did you put that in an envelope directed to somebody?—A. I did.

Q. How was it directed?—A. To Judge Hillyer.

Q. Give the direction all together.—A. "Hon. E. W. Hillyer, U. S. District Judge, Carson City."

Q. Was the inside also directed in the same way to Judge Hillyer?—A. Yes.

Q. With the same designation of office and everything else as in the other?—A. Yes.

Q. You do not know whether he ever received that letter or not?—A. I think he told me he had received it.

Q. That is not evidence. Do you know it in any way?—A. O, no.

Q. You think that he afterward told you he had received it?—A. Yes, in Virginia City.

Q. When do you think he told you?—A. Well, probably a week after, or possibly two weeks.

Q. You do not know that Judge Hillyer was in Carson City on the 6th or 7th of November, do you? Knowledge is what I ask for.—A. I was not there.

Q. Well, you do not know, then, in any way, that they were received, either of them?—A. That seems to be the kind of information you want. I do not.

Q. And if he did receive that letter to him, you do not know when he received it?—A. Of course not; I don't know that he received it at all, unless I take his word for it.

Q. And you have no information of his having received it within two weeks?—A. What kind of information?

Q. From him?—A. I tell you I think he told me so.

Q. Within two weeks he told you that he had received it; that was the information, was it not?—A. Yes, sir. He talked about sending the bankruptcy letters down—they were in Virginia City; that is the reason I happened to be there. He said he would send Mr. McLean up and remove the bankruptcy records. They had been in Virginia City for seven years, and I had been attending to that branch of the business.

By Mr. TUCKER :

Q. In your possession?—A. In my possession.

By Mr. FIELD :

Q. And remained in your possession until when?—A. They were locked up until Mr. McLean came up, some two or three days afterward.

Q. They remained in your possession until two or three weeks after?—A. No; not so long.

Q. For how long?—A. Well, some days.

Q. Some days after the 7th of November they remained in your possession?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then you gave them up?—A. Yes.

Q. Were those records locked up on the 6th of November?—A. Yes; they were always locked up.

Q. Did they remain locked; had they been touched?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. Who had charge of them?—A. I had.

Q. Nobody else under you?—A. Mr. Strother, the register in bankruptcy, had an office in the same place, and sometimes he had access to the documents.

Q. Was that bankruptcy business going on all the time from the 6th of November to the 6th of December?—A. It was not. There was no work done in the office, or in any part of the office.

Q. Where was that bankruptcy business going on?—A. It was not going on at all.

Q. There was none?—A. There was none.

Q. But Mr. Strother remained there, did he not?—A. He was a register in bankruptcy in the same office.

Q. And he was there all the time?—A. Not all the time.

Q. Well, he was off and on?—A. Off and on.

Q. From the 6th until the present time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was he kept in office by Mr. McLean?—A. He is a register in bankruptcy, appointed by the judge.

By Mr. TUCKER :

Q. When did you mail your letter to Judge Hillyer?—A. I mailed it about the time I sent the dispatch, or pretty soon afterward.

Q. What time did you send the dispatch?—A. Some time about twelve o'clock; between eleven and one, sometime.

Q. When did the mail leave Virginia City for Carson?—A. I think there are two mails; one in the morning, and one at 2.30 p. m., or at 1.30; I am not sure which—along in the afternoon.

By Mr. BURCHARD :

Q. Is there any special provision of law in regard to the appointment of district or circuit clerks in Nevada?—A. No.

Q. Nothing but the general provision that the clerk shall be appointed for each district court by the judge thereof, and that the clerk shall be appointed for the circuit court by the circuit judge of the same?—A. Yes.

Q. Your appointment was made by the judge?—A. Yes.

By Mr. LAWRENCE :

Q. Did you put on to the two letters that you sent to Carson City the proper postage-stamps?—A. Yes.

Q. What time would these letters reach Carson in the ordinary course of the mail?—A. They ought to have reached there along in the evening of the 6th, about five or six o'clock.

Q. Did the fees of the office, or either of your offices, ever exceed the limits fixed by law?—A. No. I lost $500 a year running the office for eight years.

Q. At the time you resigned, was there any excess of fees above the limit prescribed by law?—A. O, no.

Q. You would owe the Government nothing, then?—A. O, no.

By Mr. BURCHARD :

Q. What do you mean?—A. Well, there was nothing in the office. I had to pay the rent; the Government did not; that is what was the matter, and I kept it on to accommodate a deputy.

By Mr. TUCKER :

Q. You have spoken of the time of mailing these letters; are you certain you mailed them in time for the evening mail on the 6th?—A. That was my purpose in putting them in; I presumed so at the time; I did not doubt it at the time; exactly at what time the cars went I am now unable to say, but I put them in the office on the supposition that I would get them there in time.

By Mr. LAWRENCE :

Q. You signed your name to both resignations?—A. I did.

By Mr. TUCKER :

Q. How many hours does it take the mail to go from Virginia City to Carson?—A. About two hours and a half, sometimes a little less; it is twenty-four miles by rail.

Gov. of Oregon.

Attest:

[SEAL.] S. F. CHADWICK,
Secretary of State of Oregon.

This is to certify that on the 6th day of December, A. D. 1876, E. A. Cronin, one of the undersigned, and John C. Cartwright and William H. Odell, electors, duly appointed on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, as appears by the annexed certificate to cast the vote of the State of Oregon for President and Vice-President of the United States, convened at the seat of government of said State, and for the purpose of discharging their duties as such electors; that thereupon said John C. Cartwright and William H. Odell refused to act as such electors; that upon such refusal the undersigned, J. N. T. Miller and John Parker, were duly appointed electors, as by the laws of Oregon in such cases made and provided, to fill the vacancies caused by the said refusal; that thereupon the said electors, E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker proceeded to vote by ballot, as by law provided, for President and Vice-President of the United States, they being duly qualified to act as such electors, and the electoral college of said State having been duly organized; that upon the ballots so taken Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, received two (2) votes for President, and Samuel J. Tilden, of the State of New York, received one (1) vote for President, and that William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, received two (2) votes for Vice-President, and Thomas A. Hendricks, of the State of Indiana, received one (1) vote for Vice-President; that the said votes were all the votes cast and the said persons were all the persons voted for. And we further certify that the lists hereto attached are true and correct lists of all the votes given for each of the persons so voted for for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Done at the city of Salem, county of Marion, and State of Oregon, this 6th day of December, A. D. 1876.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any objections to the certificates from the State of Oregon?

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. On behalf of the Senators and Representatives whose names are signed thereto, I present an objection to the lists and certificates signed by E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker, claiming to be electors for the State of Oregon, and to the votes cast by them respectively for President and Vice-President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary of the Senate will read the objection submitted by the Senator from Oregon.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows:

OBJECTION No. 1.

The undersigned Senators and members of the House of Representatives of the United States object to the list of names of the electors E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker, one of whom, E. A. Cronin, is included in the certificate of La Fayette Grover, governor of Oregon; and to the electoral votes of said State signed by E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker; being the certificate second presented by the President of the Senate to the two Houses of Congress in joint convention, for the reasons following:

1. Because neither of said persons, E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, nor John Parker, was ever appointed elector of President or Vice-President by the State of Oregon, either in the manner directed by the legislature of such State or in any other manner whatsoever.

2. Because it appears from the records and papers contained in and attached to the certificate of W. H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and John W. Watts, as presented by the President of the Senate to the two Houses of Congress in joint convention, that said W. H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and John W. Watts were duly and legally appointed electors for President and Vice-President by the State of Oregon, in the manner directed by the legislature thereof, and duly cast their votes as such.

3. Because it does not appear from the face of the certificate of La Fayette Grover, governor of the State of Oregon, attached to and made a part of the returns of the votes cast by E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker, that such certificate was issued by the governor to the three persons having the highest number of votes for electors for the State of Oregon, and were duly chosen and appointed by said State, according to the laws thereof; but was issued by him to the persons whom he deemed to be eligible to said appointment, although one of such persons, E. A. Cronin, was not appointed thereto according to the laws of said State.

4. Because it appears from the certificate of S. F. Chadwick, secretary of state, under the seal of the State, attached to and made a part of the returns and certificate of W. H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and John W. Watts, that said persons, W. H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and John W. Watts, received the highest number of votes at the election on the 7th day of November, 1876, for the office of electors of President and Vice-President; and that the secretary of state on the 4th day of December following, officially declared in pursuance of law that they, Odell, Cartwright, and Watts, had received the highest number of votes; and that therefore the certificate of the governor, in so far as it omitted to certify the name of John W. Watts as one of the electors appointed, and in so far as such certificate contained the name of E. A. Cronin as one of the electors appointed, fails to conform to the act of Congress in such case made and provided and the laws of Oregon in that behalf, and that such certificate is, as to said Cronin, without authority and of no effect.

5. Because it appears from both certificates that W. H. Odell and John C. Cartwright, a majority of the electoral college, were duly appointed electors by the State of Oregon in the manner directed by the legislature thereof; that their record presented to the President of the Senate, and by him to the two Houses of Congress, shows that a vacancy in the office of elector existed on the day fixed by law for the meeting of the electors, and that such vacancy was filled by the appointment of John W. Watts.

United States Senators.

WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
HORATIO C. BURCHARD,
JAMES W. McDILL,
Members House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates from the State of Oregon?

Mr. Senator KELLY. I present objections to the electoral vote for President and Vice-President as cast by J. C. Cartwright, W. H. Odell, and J. W. Watts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objections will be read by the Clerk of the House.

The Clerk of the House read as follows:

OBJECTION No. 2.

In the matter of the electoral vote of the State of Oregon for President and Vice-President of the United States, the undersigned, United States Senators and members of the House of Representatives, make the following objections to the papers, purporting to be the certificates of the electoral votes of the State of Oregon, signed by John C. Cartwright, William H. Odell, and John W. Watts :

I. The said papers have not annexed to them a certificate of the governor of Oregon, as required to be made and annexed by sections 136 and 138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

II. The said papers have not annexed to them a list of the names of the said Cartwright, Odell, and Watts as electors, to which the seal of the State of Oregon was affixed by the secretary of state and signed by the governor and secretary, as required by section 60 of chapter xiv, title 9, of the general laws of Oregon.

III. The said J. W. Watts, therein claimed to be one of the said electors, was, in the month of February, 1873, appointed a postmaster at La Fayette, in the State of Oregon, and was duly commissioned and qualified as such postmaster, that being an office of trust and profit under the laws of the United States, and continued to be and act as such postmaster from February, 1873, until after the 13th day of November, 1876, and was acting as such postmaster on the 7th day of November, 1876, when presidential electors were appointed by the State of Oregon ; and that he, the said John W. Watts, was ineligible to be appointed as one of the said presidential electors.

IV. When the governor of Oregon caused the lists of the names of the electors of said State to be made and certified, such lists did not contain the name of the said John W. Watts, but did contain the names of John C. Cartwright, William H. Odell, and E. A. Cronin, who were duly appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States in the State of Oregon on the 7th day of November, 1876.

V. It was the right and duty of the governor of Oregon, under the laws of that State, to give a certificate of election or appointment as electors to John C. Cartwright, William H. Odell, and E. A. Cronin, they being the three persons capable of being appointed presidential electors who received the highest number of votes at the election held in Oregon on the 7th day of November, 1876.

VI. The said John C. Cartwright and William H. Odell had no right or authority in law to appoint the said John W. Watts to be an elector on the 6th day of December, 1876, as there was no vacancy in the office of presidential elector on that day.

VII. The said John C. Cartwright and William H. Odell had no right or authority in law to appoint the said John W. Watts to be an elector on the 6th day of December, 1876, inasmuch as they did not on that day compose or form any part of the electoral college of the State of Oregon as by law constituted.

VIII. The said John C. Cartwright and William H. Odell had no authority to appoint the said John W. Watts to be an elector on the 6th day of December, 1876, because the said Watts was still on that day the postmaster at La Fayette, in the State of Oregon, and was still on that day holding the said office of profit and trust.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates from the State of Oregon ?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. I present additional objections to the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral vote of the State of Oregon cast by E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary of the Senate will read the objections.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

OBJECTION No. 3.

The undersigned Senators and members of the House of Representatives of the United States object to the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of the State of Oregon cast by E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker, and by each of them, and to the list of votes by them and each of them signed and certified as given for President of the United States and for Vice-President of the United States, for the following reasons :

1. The said E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker were not, nor was either of them, appointed an elector of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Oregon.

2. For that W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts were duly appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Oregon, and as such electors, at the time and place prescribed by law, cast their votes for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States; and the list of votes signed, certified, and transmitted by such electors to the President of the Senate are the only true and lawful lists of votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

3. That the said W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts received the highest number of all the votes cast for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States by the qualified voters of the State of Oregon at the election held in said State on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, and the secretary of state of Oregon duly canvassed said votes and made and certified under his hand and the great seal of the State of Oregon and delivered to said W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts two lists of the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States elected by the qualified voters of said State at said election, and showing that said W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts were the persons having the highest number of votes of said qualified voters at such election, and were elected, which certificate is dated the 6th day of December, A. D. 1876, and which has been read before the two Houses of Congress; by reason of all which said Odell, Cartwright, and Watts were the lawful electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates from the State of Oregon? If there be no further objections, the certificates objected to, with the accompanying papers, together with the objections, will be submitted to the Commission for its judgment and decision. The Senate will now retire to its chamber.

At twelve o'clock and fifty minutes p. m. the Senate withdrew.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

WEDNESDAY, February 21, 1877.

The Commission met at 11 o'clock a. m., pursuant to adjournment, all the members being present.

On motion, the Commission took a recess until 1 o'clock p. m.

The Commission re-assembled at 1 o'clock p. m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

OREGON.

Mr. George C. Gorham, Secretary of the Senate, appeared and presented the following communication; which was read:

HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 21, 1877.

To the President of the Commission :

More than one return or paper purporting to be a return or certificate of the electoral votes of the State of Oregon having been received and this day opened in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, and objections thereto having been made, the said returns, with all accompanying papers, and also the objections thereto, are herewith submitted to the judgment and decision of the Commission, as provided by law.

T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I move, Mr. President, that all the papers received be printed.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I hope that order will not be entered, because I trust we shall be able to use the papers here, as they are evidently tolerably brief, and no doubt both sides understand exactly what are the points. I hope the papers will be here for the mere purpose of examining them; and upon them it is understood a question of law arises. The only doubt about the printing is that it may involve a delay until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to print.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I think they ought to be printed.

The PRESIDENT. One of the assistant secretaries has suggested to me that they are pretty long.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. If by printing is meant that they shall be printed when it is convenient to send them out, I see no objection; but if it is meant that they shall be sent out at once to be printed, I for one object to it. I think we ought to get along with this case; but if we can have them printed by to-night or to-morrow morning, very well, we going on in the mean time.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I want to get along with this case as fast as anybody else. Nobody is more desirous of getting on fast than I am, and I believe I have given evidence of it generally; but I do not think with the bundle of papers here submitted, which we are to pass on, that we ought to pass on them without seeing them in print. I think it is better to get along rightly than to get along too fast and not get along rightly.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. May I ask if there are not duplicates of each set? I have no doubt there are. Now, Mr. President, if I can have the attention of my brother, Judge Abbott, I understand, as undoubtedly the fact is, that there are duplicates of each of the conflicting certificates; and, that being the case, I have no objection to the order to print, because only one set need go away, reserving the question of what shall be done if the printing is not completed in time.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to print.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, I ask that the papers be read, that we may see what we have before us.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Commissioner Edmunds moves that one set of the papers, as he understands there are two, be read.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. By that I mean one copy of each set.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of Mr. Commissioner Edmunds.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the papers.

The Secretary read the various certificates and objections.

The PRESIDENT. Two objectors to certificate No. 1 are entitled to be heard. Who represent the objectors?

Mr. Senator KELLY. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, I will open the case on the part of the objectors to the first certificate. I should like, however, a few minutes.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. What other objector appears to certificate No. 1?

Mr. Senator KELLY. Mr. Jenks, of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT. Who appear for the objectors to certificate No. 2?

Mr. Senator SARGENT. Senator Mitchell of Oregon, and Mr. Lawrence of Ohio, of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Representative JENKS. Mr. President and gentlemen, before proceeding with the hearing of the cause, it may be necessary to have certain testimony obtained—the certificate of appointment and the commission of J. W. Watts as postmaster from the Post-Office Department, and also the certificate of appointment and commission of his successor. I applied personally to that Department for those papers, and they declined to give them unless ordered by the Commission. We would ask that an order be made that they may be produced. We also desire a subpoena for two witnesses, Mr. Watts and Senator Mitchell. Senator Mitchell, however, is here, and I suppose will readily respond.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. Jenks, is it not possible for you to agree with the other side as to the facts?

The PRESIDENT. Please wait a moment, Mr. Hoar. Let me suggest that the application had better be made by counsel.

Mr. Representative JENKS. I apprehend that it is not important from whom the application comes. Those who make the objection have a right to be heard personally. It is only to save time that we make the application now, so that the witnesses may be here when wanted.

Mr. MERRICK. It is done at the suggestion of counsel.

The PRESIDENT. The request is before the Commission. What order shall be taken?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I move that the Commission issue the subpoena as requested and ask for certified copies of the papers wanted, to be furnished by the Post-Office Department. Whether the evidence will be competent is another question.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Commissioner Edmunds moves that the Commission grant subpoenas for the witnesses named and also an order for the papers called for from the Post-Office Department.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Are the witnesses within reach?

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. I will say in reference to the witnesses Mr. Jenks desires, that they are here in the court-room and will respond at any time whenever the Commission determines that it is proper that they should be called.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of Mr. Commissioner Edmunds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Senator KELLY. I should like a few minutes' time to gather together some books before proceeding.

The PRESIDENT. How much time do you wish?

Mr. Senator KELLY. Half an hour, or any time that will suit the Commission.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move that the Commission take a recess for half an hour.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Commission took a recess for half an hour.

At two o'clock and ten minutes p. m. the Commission re-assembled, all the members being present.

The objectors were also present, and the following counsel:

| Richard T. Merrick, esq., | } | In opposition to certificate No. 1. |

The PRESIDENT. The objectors to certificate No. 1 may proceed under Rule 4, two hours to a side.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. I desire to know whether the objectors on that side both proceed before the objectors on the other side?

The PRESIDENT. They both speak first. Counsel alternate, but objectors do not in this proceeding.

Mr. Senator KELLY. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, the first objection to certificate No. 1 on which I shall dwell is this:

The said J. W. Watts, therein claimed to be one of the said electors, was in the month of February, 1873, appointed a postmaster at La Fayette, in the State of Oregon, and was duly commissioned and qualified as such postmaster, that being an office of trust and profit under the laws of the United States, and continued to be and act as such postmaster from February, 1873, until after the 13th day of November, 1876, and was acting as such postmaster on the 7th day of November, 1876, when presidential electors were appointed by the State of Oregon, and that he, the said John W. Watts, was ineligible to be appointed as one of the said presidential electors.

There will be no dispute, I presume, of the facts averred here. It is true beyond doubt that this Mr. Watts was a postmaster, and I do not think it is necessary for us under the circumstances to offer any proof of that, because the view we take of it is that that matter was found by the returning-board, and the returning-board really decided that he had no part in that election. I think, therefore, it will be unnecessary for us to produce proof of that fact. But be that as it may, if it become necessary we shall establish the point.

Now what is the result of these facts? I refer to the Constitution of the United States:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

The question occurs, is this an office of profit or trust? If so, the constitutional inhibition is as clear as the English language can make it. No person shall be appointed an elector who holds an office of trust or profit. On the first point, whether it is an office of trust or profit, I will refer in the first place to the fifteenth volume of California Reports, the case of Searcy vs. Grow, reported on pages 120 and 121. I will read only so far as may be necessary and no further, because I do not wish my time to be consumed in reading unnecessary matter:

This case was before us at the last term, and was decided upon a point not now presented. The proceeding is a contest for the office of sheriff of Siskiyou County. Grow, the appellant, was returned as elected to the office at the September election, 1859. The ground of contest is that, at the time of the election, he was postmaster in the town of Yreka, and that the compensation of the office exceeded $500 per annum. The court below found for the contestant, and Grow appeals.

I call attention to this:

The court below found for the contestant.

That is, for the person next highest. I shall dwell upon that in an after portion of the argument, to show that the person next highest to the ineligible candidate received the office.

The constitution, in the twenty-first section of the fourth article, provides: "No person holding any lucrative office under the United States, or any other power, shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this State: Provided, That offices in the militia to which there is attached no annual salary, or local officers and postmasters whose compensation does not exceed $500 per annum shall not be deemed lucrative." The act of the legislature prescribing the mode of contesting elections and the grounds of contest makes the fact that the returned candidate was ineligible at the time of the election one of those grounds. Grow was postmaster at the time of the election, but had resigned at the time of his qualification. It is in proof, and so found, that the income of the office of postmaster was some $1,400, but that the expenses of assistant, rent, &c., were some $1,000 per annum, so that the net sum received or enjoyed by Grow was less than $500.

The counsel for the appellant contends that the true meaning of the constitution is that the person holding the Federal office described in the twenty-first section is forbidden to take a civil State office while so holding the other; but that he is capable of receiving votes cast for him, so as to give him a right to take the State office upon or after resigning the Federal office. But we think the plain meaning of the words quoted is the opposite of this construction. The language is not that the Federal officer shall hold a State office while he is such Federal officer, but that he shall not while in such Federal office be eligible to the State office. We understand the word "eligible" to mean capable of being chosen, the subject of selection or choice. The people in this case were clothed with this power of choice; their selection of the candidate gave him all the claim to the office which he has; his title to the office comes from their designation of him as sheriff. But they could not designate or choose a man not eligible; i. e., not capable of being selected. They might select any man they chose, subject only to this exception, that the man they selected was capable of taking what they had the power to give.

We do not see how the fact that he became capable of taking office after they had exhausted their power can avail the appellant. If he was not eligible at the time the votes were cast for him, the election failed. We do not see how it can be argued that, by the act of the candidate, the votes which, when cast, were ineffectual, because not given for a qualified candidate, became effectual to elect him to office.

Can it be contended that, if Grow had not been a citizen of the county or of the State at the time of the election, or had been an alien at that time, the bare fact that he did so become a citizen at the time he qualified would entitle him to the office? Or suppose a man, when elected, under sentence and conviction for crime—if such a case can be supposed—would a pardon before qualification give him a right to hold the office?

When the words of the constitution are plain, we cannot go into curious speculation of the policy they were meant to declare. It may, however, have been a part of the policy of the provision quoted to prevent the employment of Federal patronage in a State election.

I refer to that case as conclusive if the law stated be sound. And here I may just as well as at any other time call attention to the marked distinction that exists between a person who is ineligible or incapable of being appointed and one who may hold the office. If a person may hold the office he may be elected while he is under disqualifications, and if he becomes qualified at the time of holding, it is sufficient. For instance, let us refer to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States as to the election of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives:

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years.

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained a certain number of years and have certain other qualifications. "No person shall be a Senator;" that is, while he may be disqualified before, yet if the disqualification is removed when he becomes a Senator or Representative, he can hold the office. For instance, a man is holding the office of governor this day, a State office; he has been elected Senator while so holding the office. It is no bar to him taking his seat on the 4th of March next if on that day he does not hold the office of governor. That, however, is a very different case from this, which strikes at the beginning of the matter; that is, where the prohibition is to the election, or, in this instance, to the appointment.

Now, when does the appointment begin? What is the day of appointment? It is contended, or at least was by other gentlemen in Oregon—it was contended by Mr. Watts that he could hold the office of elector if he was eligible at the time the vote was cast; that the appointment was not complete until the certificate was given; and I here say, if it was not complete until the certificate was given, it was never completed at all, because he never got one. But he contends that the appointment was not perfect by the election of the 7th of November, but was perfected when the canvass of votes was made. That is a fallacious position. It cannot be maintained, because the returns of a canvass are merely evidence of appointment; they are not the appointment itself. The Constitution gives the right to Congress to appoint the time of holding the election, and section 131 of the Revised Statutes provides:

The electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed, in each State, on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November in every fourth year succeeding every election of a President and Vice-President.

They must be appointed on that day; if they are not appointed on that day they are not appointed at all. I contend, therefore, that the appointment of Mr. Watts, if it was not made on the 7th day of November, could not be made at any other time by a canvass of the votes. The mere evidence of a fact is not the fact itself. That I am correct in that position I think there can be no doubt. So it was held by the court in California.

I refer now to the election in the State of Vermont. Of course I do not know all the facts attending it except those which were current at the time or shortly after the election; but as nearly as I can recollect them they are these: A man by the name of Sollace was a postmaster at the time of the election on the 7th of November; he resigned a few days afterward; he was a candidate for elector. The legislature of Vermont convened, I do not know whether by proclamation, but I think the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] stated sometime ago that it was by virtue of some law in that State, without proclamation of the governor. At all events the legislature of that State convened. They took this matter into consideration; they declared virtually, I do not know whether by resolution or otherwise, that Sollace was not appointed on that day, and proceeded by legislative enactment, as prescribed by the Constitution, to fill that vacancy occasioned by a failure to elect. It was under this section of the Revised Statutes, I presume:

SEC. 134. Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day, in such a manner as the legislature of such State may direct.

So the State of Vermont in its sovereign capacity declared that a postmaster was an officer holding an office of trust and profit under the United States, and that there was a failure to elect, and they proceeded to provide for the case. So in Rhode Island: Mr. Corliss was a centennial commissioner under the United States. Under the peculiar provisions of many of the New England States the governor has the right to submit questions of law to the courts. The governor of Rhode Island did submit the question to the supreme court of Rhode Island. There was one dissenting voice as to whether the position of centennial commissioner was an office of trust or profit. The majority of the court held that it was, and the unanimous voice of the court was that, if it was an office of trust or profit, the person holding it who had been voted for was not elected, and that, not being elected, there was a failure to elect; and the legislature proceeded to provide for the case.

There are two legislatures who have established this fact clearly beyond doubt, that a person holding an office of profit or trust under the United States could not be an elector, and that a resignation of the office after the election did not make him qualified.

In addition to that, let me refer to what was said by a committee appointed by the Senate and House of Representatives in 1837, of which Mr. Grundy was chairman. It was composed on the part of the Senate of Felix Grundy, Henry Clay, and Silas Wright, certainly three persons who ought to carry weight. Wherever they signed their names to any document of a political character, it ought to carry conclusive weight as to its integrity and its worth. I do not care about reading it all, but I will read a portion of it. Certain postmasters had been elected electors in North Carolina, Connecticut, and New Hampshire; but it made no difference at that time whether their votes were disallowed or not, as it would not change the result of the election; so there was nothing done in the matter, but the committee gave this opinion in their report:

The committee are of opinion that the first section of the second article of the Constitution, which declares that "no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector," ought to be carried in its whole spirit into rigid execution, in order to prevent officers of the General Government from bringing their official power to influence the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States. This provision of the Constitution, it is believed, excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors; and the disqualification relates to the time of the appointments, and that a resignation of the office of deputy postmaster after his appointment as elector would not entitle him to vote as elector under the Constitution.

In the debate ensuing in the House of Representatives upon the report of this joint committee, Mr. Francis Thomas, chairman of the House committee, said that—

The committee came unanimously to the conclusion that they (the postmasters in question) were not eligible at the time they were elected, and therefore the whole proceeding was vitiated ab initio.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Those postmasters voted.

Mr. Senator KELLY. I suppose they did vote, but I do not know; their votes, however, made no difference in the result. Here I will call attention to this fact—it is a little out of the way, but it is an answer to a suggestion—I contend that a State has the power to enforce the Constitution if the Federal Government does not. I contend that every State has a right to exclude Federal officers. Here the mandate of the Constitution is clear. If other States have permitted it to be violated, the State of Oregon has not. If other States have failed to take advantage of the provision, the State of Oregon has decided that the Constitution shall be obeyed; and I contend that whatever may have been done in 1837 has no application now. The mandate is clear that these persons shall not be appointed electors, and each State has a right to appoint presidential electors in its own way, and if the law of the State excludes these men from that office, the State has a perfect right to exclude them, and the decision in this case has done it. I do not see how anything can be plainer than this, and as I have dwelt long enough on the point I will leave it.

The next question presented is, if Mr. Watts was not eligible, then was Mr. Cronin, who received the next highest number of votes, elected? It is impossible for me to refer to all the decisions in the brief space of one hour; I must necessarily be hurried; and I will, therefore, only cite a few to show that where a person who is ineligible has received the highest number of votes, the next highest takes the election. It has been so decided in Indiana, in Maryland, and in Maine, and it was confirmed by legislative enactment in the latter State, and I contend that in California this is the rule. I shall refer to decisions in support of that position. On account of the rapidity with which my time is going, I will refer to the brief more than I will to the law-books. Here is what is said in Gulick vs. New, 14 Indiana Reports, page 93:

The governor may determine, even against the decision of a board of canvassers, whether an applicant is entitled to receive a commission or not, where the objection to his right to receive it rests upon the ground that the constitutional prohibition is interposed. If the governor should ascertain that he has commissioned a person who is ineligible to the office, he may issue another commission to the person legally entitled thereto. Where a majority of the ballots at an election were for a person not eligible to the office under the Constitution, it was held that the ballots cast for such ineligible person were ineffectual, and that the person receiving the greatest number of legal votes, though not a majority of the ballots, was duly elected and entitled to the office. The mayor of a city, under the general law, has jurisdiction as a judicial officer throughout the county, and the voters of the county are therefore chargeable with notice of his ineligibility under the Constitution to any office other than a judicial one during the term for which he was elected.

To the same effect are the cases in 41 Indiana, 572, and 15 Indiana, 327. It is the doctrine in Maine, so adjudged by the supreme court upon a question submitted by the legislature to the court. I have referred already to the case of Searcy vs. Grow, in 15 California. In that case—

The ground of contest is that at the time of the election he was postmaster in the town of Yreka, and that the compensation of the office exceeded $500 per annum. The court below found for the contestant, and Grow appeals.

Grow was the postmaster. The office was adjudged to the contestant in that case.

Now, there are facts that we cannot produce here, I suppose, though taken before a committee of the Senate, showing that notice of the disqualification was given to a great many voters in this case; that Mr. Watts had proclaimed at a meeting in Portland, one of the largest meetings held there, that he was postmaster; the fact that he was postmaster was declared at Oregon City; it was published in a newspaper published in his own town, and also in a paper published in Portland; but these facts I cannot, I suppose, bring before this tribunal. I contend, however, as matter of law and upon principle, that in Oregon the next highest person to an ineligible candidate takes the place. We have in our constitution this clause:

In all elections held by the people under this constitution the person or persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected.

There are certain prohibitions in our constitution, among others that a person who is a defaulter shall not be elected; a person who has sent a challenge to fight a duel shall not be elected; a man who has been convicted of an infamous crime shall not be elected. Now, can it be contended, taking these clauses together, that when the constitution says the person who receives the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected, the people can elect a person who has been convicted of felony, a defaulter, one who has fought a duel or sent a challenge? No, they must be construed together; and they mean this, that the person who is qualified to receive the votes shall be elected if he receives the highest number of votes, and if the person having the most votes is ineligible, the qualified person receiving the next highest number shall be declared elected.

Again, the Constitution of the United States says that persons shall be elected electors on the day prescribed by Congress; Congress has fixed the day; and the law of Oregon provides:

On the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1864, and every four years thereafter there shall be elected by the qualified electors of this State as many electors of President and Vice-President as this State may be entitled to elect of Senators and Representatives in Congress.

There is a positive injunction that they shall be elected on that day ; there is no authority to hold an election after that time ; and I contend according to principle that the first election should decide the whole matter, because it is impossible to convene the electors at a subsequent time and hold a new election to supply a vacancy. In all those cases where it is held that the next highest to the ineligible candidate is not elected, it is because it may be referred to the people to vote again upon the question ; but here they cannot do that. The power of the people having been exhausted, they cannot vote a second time. They have not time to do it, because the presidential electors vote within thirty days after the State election, so that it is impossible to hold a second election, and necessarily the first one must decide the matter. The three highest eligible candidates must be chosen then, or the State will have no representation ; there will be a failure to elect one person, and the State will lose its rights. The position I take here is that there is a positive injunction that the State must do that. The law is mandatory. It says the election must take place on that day ; three electors must be chosen on that day.

A State cannot elect a man that the Constitution says cannot be elected ; and therefore if three must be elected on that day, it must be the three highest qualified persons. It is different, I contend, from ordinary cases of office where a majority not being had, the matter is referred back to the people. A plurality elects in the State of Oregon. And I may as well here state the difference between the case of Abbott, which was before the Senate of the United States a few years ago, and this case. Mr. Abbott claimed that he was elected Senator from North Carolina because Mr. Vance, his competitor, was ineligible. He received but a few votes. The Senate rejected him and for a very good reason ; not because Mr. Vance was not ineligible, but because the law regulating the election of Senators says that the person receiving the highest number of votes, provided it shall be a majority of all the senators and representatives of the legislature present, shall be elected, and he must have that majority. No person contended that Abbott had such a majority. In this case it is not required that a man shall have a majority, but a plurality or the highest number of votes ; that is, as I contend, the highest number of votes if he be eligible to be elected.

The next point which I shall discuss is the one which will probably be most strenuously contested, and therefore I shall refer to it at greater length. It is said that the governor had no right to decide this matter ; that it was a judicial question and not a question for the executive. There is nothing more fallacious. In every department of the Government of the United States, as well as in the government of the States, every officer, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, is compelled to exercise judgment in certain cases. Take for instance the Executive of the United States. When the disposition of land has to be made between two persons, rival claimants, is it referred to the courts to settle that matter ? Not at all. The Land-Office adjudicates it. They settle the case where two rival claimants, two settlers holding adversely to each other, present themselves before the Land-Office. The Land Department decides the case preliminary to a final adjudication according to law in the courts. It is a preliminary decision that must be made.

So there must be a preliminary decision made in regard to many other matters that it is needless for me to call to your attention. So it is in the State governments. The executive is called upon to exercise certain duties and rights. He must decide. For instance, an office-holder has ceased to be a resident of the State, or he has died. The executive must take cognizance of the fact of the death of an incumbent without having a court decide that fact. He takes cognizance of an abandonment where a person leaves the State, and makes an appointment to fill the vacancy. Here let me refer to decisions in support of this position which I take—

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Are these cases cited in your brief?

Mr. Senator KELLY. Yes, sir. I will only read the syllabus of the case in 1 Arkansas Reports, page 21:

The Supreme Court has the power to issue writs of mandamus. The party applying for this writ must show that he has a specific legal right, and no other adequate specific legal remedy.

A collector or holder of public moneys who was in default for moneys collected at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, at the time of his election to another or the same office, and at the time of his application for his commission, is not entitled to his commission.

I will now read a part of the opinion of the court:

He is, then, clearly within the meaning of the Constitution, and consequently ineligible to any office of profit or trust. So far as the rights and interests of the present applicant are concerned, the Executive has done nothing that the law forbids; and whether his subsequent acts in relation to the same matter are inconsistent with his constitutional obligations to the country, or in violation of private rights, this court will not take upon themselves to determine; for that question is not properly before them. The Executive, in common with every other officer, is bound by oath to support the Constitution, and whenever an effort is made to evade or violate it, it is not only his privilege but his duty to interpose and prevent it.

So in 14 Indiana Reports, Gulick vs. New. This was a case of mandamus to compel the governor to issue a commission. The court say:

The governor may determine, even against the decision of a board of canvassers, whether an applicant is entitled to receive a commission or not, where the objection to his right to receive it rests upon the ground that the constitutional prohibition is interposed.

If the governor should ascertain that he has commissioned a person who is ineligible to the office, he may issue another commission to the person legally entitled thereto.

So in 39 Missouri Reports, a mandamus was asked against the governor to compel him to give a certificate to a person who was ineligible. The court took this position:

The governor is bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and he has taken an oath to support the constitution. In the correct and legitimate performance of his duty, he must inevitably have a discretion in regard to granting commissions; for, should a person be elected or appointed who was constitutionally ineligible to hold any office of profit or trust, would the executive be bound to commission him when his ineligibility was clearly and positively proven? If he is denied the exercise of any discretion in such case, he is made the violator of the constitution, not its guardian. Of what avail, then, is his oath of office? Or, if he has positive and satisfactory evidence that no election has been held in a county, shall he be required to violate the law and issue a commission to a person not elected because a clerk has certified to the election? In granting a commission, the governor may go behind the certificate to determine whether an applicant is entitled to receive a commission or not, where the objection to the right of the applicant to receive it rests upon the ground that a constitutional prohibition is interposed—(Gulick vs. New, 14 Indiana 93.) The issuing of a commission is an act by the executive in his political capacity—

Not his judicial.—

The issuing of a commission is an act by the executive in his political capacity, and is one of the means employed to enable him to execute the laws and carry on the appropriate functions of the State, and for the manner in which he executes this duty he is in no wise amenable to the judiciary. The court can no more interfere with executive discretion than the legislature or executive can with judicial discretion. The granting of a commission by the executive is not a mere ministerial duty, but an official act imposed by the constitution, and is an investiture of authority in the person receiving it. We are of the opinion, therefore, that mandamus will not lie against the governor in a case like this.

I will now turn to 1 Arkansas, page 595:

In all of these cases he certainly possesses a political discretion, for the use of which he is alone answerable to his country. Why, then, is his discretion taken away or destroyed when his duty concerns the issuing of a commission? It certainly is not. His duty is as clearly political in that case as in any of the other enumerations, and if the courts have jurisdiction in that instance to prescribe the rule of his conduct, by a parity of reasoning they certainly possess it in regard to all the other cases. This would make the judges the interpreters not only of the will of the executive, but of his conscience and reason; and his oath of office, upon such a supposition, would then be both a mockery and a delusion.

Again, the executive is bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and he has taken an oath of office to support the constitution. How can he perform this duty if he has no discretion left him in regard to granting commissions? For should the legislature appoint a person constitutionally ineligible to hold any office of profit or trust, would the executive be bound to commission him? and that, too, when his ineligibility was clearly and positively proven? In such a case, the exercise of his discretion must be admitted, or you make him not the guardian but the violator of the constitution. What, then, becomes of his oath of office?

Not only that, but the State of Oregon itself has decided this matter. I will call the attention of the Commission now to not a reported case, but to a matter familiar to my colleague and to myself. In the election of 1870 Ex-Governor Gibbs was elected district attorney for the State—prosecuting attorney, as we call it there. After entering upon the discharge of the duties, in March, 1872, he received from the President of the United States an appointment to the office of United States district attorney, and he was holding both offices at the same time. The governor knowing that fact, knowing too that the constitution of the State of Oregon prohibited any person who was holding an office under the Federal Government to hold a State office, this very Governor Grover appointed C. B. Bellinger prosecuting attorney for the State. Ex-Governor Gibbs refused to recognize that appointment; he claimed the right to prosecute the criminals in the State courts and in the Federal courts. Mr. Bellinger presented his certificate of appointment from the governor to Judge Upton, chief-justice then of the State, who refused to recognize him because he said the governor had no right to ascertain that matter; it was a question for the judiciary to ascertain. On the other hand, Mr. Bellinger, believing himself right, brought a writ of quo warranto to ascertain that fact, whether he was not entitled to hold the office. He brought it in the court where Judge Upton presided, who was chief-justice of the State. He decided adversely to him on the same ground, that it was a matter of judicial inquiry and the governor had no right to act. An appeal was taken to the supreme court, and by a unanimous court it was decided that the governor had that right. The case is not yet reported, for reasons which are given by the present chief justice of Oregon in this letter to the governor:

SUPREME COURT ROOM,
Salem, Oregon, December 20, 1876.

SIR: Your communication of the 18th instant was duly received, and, in reply thereto, I beg leave to submit the following:

The case of the State of Oregon ex rel. C. B. Bellinger, appellant, vs. A. C. Gibbs, respondent, was heard and determined at the January term, 1873, of the supreme court. The action was instituted in the circuit court of the State of Oregon for the county of Multnomah, and was determined at the March term, 1872, of said court. The complaint alleged in effect that the respondent had been elected to the office of prosecuting attorney in the fourth judicial district in June, 1870, for the term of two years; that he entered upon, held, and exercised the office; that thereafter, and while so holding, he was appointed to the office of United States district attorney for the district of Oregon, and that he qualified and entered upon said office on March 2, 1872. Allegations showing that both offices were lucrative were duly made, and it was further alleged that on March 6, 1872, the governor of Oregon duly appointed the relator to the office of prosecuting attorney for the said fourth judicial district, and that said relator duly qualified on March 8, 1872, and thereupon made demand upon the respondent for the office, which demand was refused.

Respondent demurred to the complaint in the court below upon the ground, among others, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The court below (Upton, J.) sustained the demurrer and entered a judgment against the relator for costs, &c.

An appeal was thereupon taken to the supreme court at the term mentioned. Upon the argument in the supreme court the respondent, in support of his demurrer, contended "that the governor could not determine for himself that a vacancy existed in the office of prosecuting attorney in the fourth judicial district so as to authorize the appointment of the relator, for the reason that the determination of that fact involved the exercise of judicial functions by the executive."

This was the principal legal question in the case, and the court unanimously declared that the governor was invested with authority, in cases of the kind, to look into the facts and pass upon the same without awaiting the action of the courts.

The justices of the supreme court were, at the time, Hon. W. W. Upton, chief-justice; Hon. A. J. Thayer, P. P. Prim, B. F. Bonham, and L. L. McArthur, associate justices. As the case was from the fourth district, Upton, chief-justice, did not participate in the hearing and decision in the supreme court. The writing of the opinion was assigned to Hon. A. J. Thayer, who died shortly after the adjournment of the term, leaving the duty unperformed. Ex-Chief-Justice Bonham and Justice McArthur authorize me to say that their recollection of the case and the point decided comports with my own.

I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant,

P. P. PRIM,
Chief-Justice of Oregon.

His Excellency L. F. GROVER, Governor of Oregon.

There is the very point decided that the governor has a right to inquire into these facts; has a right to inquire into ineligibility and to issue a commission when there is any infraction of the constitution. In the very words of the constitution of the State, he is to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and he is to take an oath prescribed there that he will support the Constitution of the United States and of the State. Shall it be held that the governor of the State of Oregon is all-powerless when the Constitution of the United States is to be invaded and he is to certify that a man has been elected who cannot be elected without a violation of that Constitution? Is he to sit quietly by when the fact is presented to him, as it was by affidavits at the time of the canvass of these votes, that this man was a postmaster, that he was holding an office of profit and trust under the United States? And I again ask, in the language of the courts of Missouri and other States, is he, when he has sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and of the State of Oregon, to see both trampled under foot by giving a certificate to a man who is ineligible? No, it is not so. They say, Why not go to the courts? The executive has the right, as I have shown you, to decide questions of this kind.

It is impossible for me to elaborate on these points in the limited time allowed me; but I call attention to this law of Oregon:

The votes for electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress.

Another duty, in addition to that, is imposed upon the secretary of state:

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting.

This is the evidence of their appointment; this is their right to act, from what has appeared from the reading of the certificates. There is no canvass mentioned; there is simply a list of the votes given. I contend that the governor of Oregon and the secretary of state are the persons to canvass these votes. There is no evidence that there was any canvass by any other person. They must decide upon that question; it is for them and them only, and they have decided and they have given their certificate that these three gentlemen are eligible, including Mr. Cronin. It matters not how they came to that conclusion; the presumption of law will always be that it was upon sufficient evidence. They had evidence of the ineligibility of one of the candidates, and they decided upon that point. They decided that that was sufficient to exclude him, and therefore a certificate was given in the language that was read here, that the highest eligible candidates were Cartwright, Odell, and Cronin.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. Mr. President—

Mr. Senator KELLY. I cannot yield any part of my time, it is so short.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. I simply want to say, if my colleague will permit me—

Mr. Senator KELLY. You can answer me in your own time. I say it is clear that these two officers had the right to decide and did decide that matter. They are the only medium of communication between the State and the Federal Government. What authority had Cartwright, Odell, and Watts by going to the secretary of state and getting a list of the votes of the people?—what right have they to say that they are electors simply by getting that? Any person can go and get that certificate by paying the fees. Suppose three or four persons who did not care anything about their obligations as good citizens of the United States had gone and got a certificate of the same kind, as they could get it from the secretary of state by paying for it, and signed the names of Watts, Odell, and Cartwright, and given their votes for Tilden, how would you know the difference? You cannot tell by it; you cannot tell whether their signatures are genuine or not, excepting from the fact that they have the certificate of the governor, which attests them and which is required by the law of the United States. I contend that the United States have the right to prescribe how those votes shall be certified. The legislatures of the States have the right to regulate the manner of election, the exclusive right. That I admit; but when the election was completed, when the electors were chosen, and the votes were to be certified from the State to the President of the Senate, it must be done under United States laws. They regulate that in the State itself, and the State laws of Oregon demand that this certificate shall be signed by the governor and attested by the secretary of state.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Mr. Kelly, I should like to ask one question. Does the law of Oregon require the secretary of state to give any decision at all, or does it require the governor to give the evidence of the decision?

Mr. Senator KELLY. I will read the law:

The votes for electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress.

That is, so far as the mere counting and tabulation go, it is given to the secretary, the governor being present. Then in addition:

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected—

So that they have a right to judge of the qualifications—

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Now I want to ask a question of fact; did the secretary of state make out that list including the name of Watts?

Mr. Senator KELLY. No, sir; he did not include the name of Watts. Upon the facts and upon the law—the interposition of a protest by a number of gentlemen to the counting of the vote of Watts, an affidavit being made that the identical man was a postmaster—the governor undertook to decide that matter, as he had a right to decide it under the decisions I have cited, and under the laws of Oregon. He did so in pursuance of his right as chief executive of the State and by authority of law, and the secretary of state attested his act; and that decision is in evidence here, and is the only evidence of who had a right to cast the electoral votes, and that was given to Mr. Cronin as well as the other two.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. Senator KELLY. I will not allow you a moment; you have an hour.

The PRESIDENT. The speaker has the floor unless he yields.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. Certainly; I understand that, Mr. President.

Mr. Senator KELLY. Mr. President—

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Perhaps you will answer me a question.

Mr. Senator KELLY. Certainly.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. "The votes for electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress." How do we find out how that is done?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Section 37 of the general laws seems to provide for it.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. Found at page 139 of your compilation.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I wish to ask a single question of fact, whether the certificate No. 2 which we have here is not in exact accordance with that provision of the law of Oregon which you have read; that is, that a certificate should be given signed by the secretary of state and the governor?

Mr. Senator KELLY. It is in exact accordance with the requirements of the law of Oregon and the law of the United States.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Have you any other board in Oregon to certify to the election of the electors but that board?

Mr. Senator KELLY. None.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. Senator KELLY. I find I have but five minutes left, and I will give that to my associate objector.

Mr. Representative JENKS. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, we propose to plead the cause of truth and justice, the cause of thirty-five millions out of forty of the free people of the United States; a cause whose justice is attested by a clear majority of 250,000 of the popular vote; a cause whose justice is corroborated by a clear majority of 25 in the electoral college of the United States. With these facts behind us, and with the questions of law and fact involved in this case, we shall ask at your hands that it shall be decided according to them. We ask no technical advantage, but recognizing that the law of the land is truth in law as facts may be truth in fact, we ask that you shall give them their true weight; and regarding the Constitution of the United States as the primordial law, the all-controlling fact in this case, we ask, all having sworn to its support, that that support, without abatement, shall be fully accorded to it.

The first question, necessarily, is a question of evidence. What evidence is there before this tribunal, or what evidence can or will be received by it, are the first questions; and in answer to them, if we are to judge by the precedents established by this tribunal in the past, we would infer that there is to be no evidence except those papers which come, with the several returns, from the President of the Senate. That would narrow the inquiry to a very small space, and that space first we propose to discuss; not that we say differently from what we said before, that we would ask you finally to a frugal feast; we would invite you, as before, to go down to the bottom facts, for if our case be not founded upon the merits of truth and justice I would not have it.

But inquiring in the light in which this tribunal must first inquire, we will consider it on the narrow ground of the papers submitted by the President of the Senate. With reference to these, the inquiry would arise, which of these, if any, is legal evidence? If either one be legal evidence and the other be not, if you are guided by the law of the land, you must find in accordance with the legal evidence. The evidence as offered with the returns by the President of the Senate is, first, the certificate of the governor of Oregon, in the following words, also attested by the secretary of state, under the great seal thereof:

STATE OF OREGON, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Salem, December 6, 1876.

I, L. F. Grover, governor of the State of Oregon, do hereby certify that, at a general election held in said State on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, William H. Odell received 15,206 votes, John C. Cartwright received 15,214 votes, E. A. Cronin received 14,157 votes for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States. Being the highest number of votes cast at said election for persons eligible, under the Constitution of the United States, to be appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, they are hereby declared duly elected electors as aforesaid for the State of Oregon.

And there is the usual clause of attestation, with the seal of the State, the signature of the governor, and the countersigning of the secretary of state. That is the evidence on the part of certificate No. 2. The evidence on the part of certificate No. 1 consists of an affidavit of three persons whom we know not, because there is no evidence to identify them as having been any of the persons voted for at that election, swearing that they had gone to the governor and asked for a certificate. Is it not his duty to judge to whom he will deliver certificates? May there not be two John Smiths in this world? And what right have these men to come in and by their oath attempt to supply that which is fixed by statute as the only legal evidence of a given transaction?

There, then, is the oath of three men, whom you know not and who have no identification before this tribunal of any character recognized by the law, that they have gone and asked for a certificate, and that the governor would not give it to them. That is the first paper; and if that be legal evidence before this tribunal, what would not be? The affidavit of any other three men in the United States would be received with the same weight as theirs; and if this tribunal acts on the same theory it has heretofore promulgated, that is a simple nullity.

Then the next evidence of authentication which they attempt to originate is a statement of votes in that State, with the certificate of the secretary of state that it is a true statement of the votes as cast, with the electoral vote of the persons therein claiming to be electors thereto attached.

Now, we stand on the legal proposition that where there is a statutory mode of authentication, no other mode of authentication can be received as legal evidence in a court of justice. Then the inquiry would be, what is the statutory authentication required by the law? In support of this proposition we will give your honors an authority. We will cite you to the case of Bleecker vs. Bond, 3 Washington's Circuit Court Reports, page 531. There the offer made before Judge Washington was:

The certificate of Joseph Nourse, the Register of the Treasury Department, under his hand, that certain receipts, of which copies are annexed, are on file in his office, with a certificate of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the seal of the Department, that Joseph Nourse is Register, was offered in evidence, and objected to.

The court overruled the evidence upon the ground that it is not sufficient that the officer who gives this certificate has the custody of the papers, unless it also appeared that he is authorized by law to certify such papers, which this officer is not. A sworn copy ought to have been produced.

Then as a sequitur from that we would cite your honors to the case of Pendleton vs. The United States, 2 Brockenborough's Reports, page 75, in which the principle announced is that "the certificate must be in the form prescribed by law."

Then if the officer has not power to certify, or if the certificate be not in the form prescribed by law, it is not evidence before any tribunal. Now is there a form prescribed by law that this certificate shall have; and, if there is, will you, in the face of clearly-established law, rule that this is any evidence, for any purpose whatever, as against a certificate that fully, in all particulars, conforms to the law of the land? What is the law of the land in reference to that? First, with reference to the law of Oregon, what does it require? It says:

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

Then, by the law of Oregon, it is necessary that the certificate shall have, first, the attestation of the secretary of state; second, it shall have the signature of the governor. Our certificate has this; the other has not. If the law of Oregon, then, is to be your rule as to evidence, no other can be received in the face of that statute. But is there any other law beside that of Oregon that can be used as a guide in this tribunal? We will give you the law of the United States, in which it is provided that—

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet.—Section 136, Revised Statutes United States.

Here, then, is the statute of Oregon and here is the statute of the United States, each of which prescribes the mode of testifying to a given fact. There is a conformity to that, in all particulars, in the one, and there is not even the semblance of a conformance in the other; and which shall be received?

We say, then, that this evidence, in the absence of fraud, intentional fraud, should be received and held conclusive. If the allegation were, and it were proven, that the governor fraudulently refused to do a duty, it would be your duty, I should say, to inquire concerning that, and never give vitality to infamy; but, in the absence of the allegation of fraud, the certificate of the governor and the secretary of state must be taken as complete and conclusive evidence of the fact therein contained; and that fact is that this man Cronin, with two others, was elected.

Then as to the question of evidence: one side offers you the evidence required by law; the other gives you no evidence authorized by law. This certificate and its delivery by the governor and the secretary of state are not altogether purposeless either. The object of that and the requirement of the statute of the United States, which says that it shall accompany their votes, is to identify the persons who do the voting with the persons who were voted for. If a man came without a certificate, how do you know, in a large State like New York, that there might not be a dozen men of identically the same name as his who recorded the vote? Hence, the statute of the United States has wisely said, in order that we may judge as to whether the person who has cast the vote is the identical person voted for and commissioned, that the presence of the certificate is required with the vote, and it must attend it. So this is not to be neglected either.

But the question of evidence being the narrow plank of this platform, let us go beyond it. The next question is, what would be the effect of that evidence even in the case of error or mistake? If that error were willful and fraudulent, we assert now, as we have ever asserted, that fraud vitiates all things into which it enters as a constituent element; but if it were merely a mistake or error in the integrity of the person whose duty it was to give it, it must be received as a verity; and to sustain this we first assert the proposition that granting the commission is a political act, and as such cannot, except for willful fraud, be inquired into by any other tribunal than that whose duty it is to exercise the political function. In support of that we would call your honors' attention to Gulick vs. New, 14 Indiana Reports, page 96:

As to the second branch of the objection. It is made the duty of the governor to issue commissions in certain cases and to certain officers. The sheriff is one of the officers that thus receives a commission upon his election; and we have no doubt that if the governor should ascertain that he had, through mistake or otherwise, improperly issued a commission to one person to fill that office, when in truth it ought to have been issued to another, he may correct the error by issuing one to the person legally entitled thereto.

Again, I cite High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, page 98, speaking of political duties:

The doctrine as thus stated has been most frequently applied in cases where it has been sought by mandamus to compel the governor of a State to issue commissions to persons claiming to be rightfully elected to public offices. And the courts have held the duty of issuing such commissions to be of a political nature, requiring the exercise of the political powers of the governor, and none the less an executive act because it is positively required of the governor by law. The mere fact that no discretion is left with the executive as to the manner of its performance, does not render it a ministerial duty in the sense that mandamus will lie to compel its performance, and whatever constitutional powers are conferred upon the executive are regarded as political powers, and all duties enjoined upon him as political duties.

Then if the governor issues this, even to the wrong person, it is a political duty imposed upon him by the law of the land and by the constitution of the State, and when he is acting under the obligation of his oath to support the Constitution of the United States his act, if exercised bona fide, cannot be inquired into elsewhere, and in the absence of the allegation of fraud that certificate, no matter how groundless it might be, is entirely conclusive on this tribunal and every other.

But the evidence is attested, as I might have stated before, by the very canvassing-board itself. The secretary of state and the governor, the canvassing-board, declare that as the result of the election; and the governor in pursuance thereof having exercised a political function, you have no legal right to go back of that in the absence of the allegation of fraud and inquire into its issues.

But having considered it in the light of an evidential question, we do not propose to limit ourselves to that narrow sphere, for a President of the United States ought not to be elected upon a mere technicality. The ruler of a great people needs some title broader than a hair-splitting distinction on which to rest his title, and we ask to go to the merits and the truth of the case. Assuming now for the sake of the argument that Mr. Watts received a greater number of votes than Mr. Cronin, and that he was a postmaster of the United States at the time those votes were cast, was he elected? We propose to demonstrate that he was not elected, even if he received a majority of the votes cast; and in support of that, of course, the fundamental proposition would be the Constitution of the United States, and I will refer to it in order to call your honors' attention to a distinction which exists between cases which must be distinguished or cause utter confusion in the law as administered and announced in the different States. On this subject the Constitution of the United States says:

No * * person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector.

It does not say no person holding an office of trust or profit shall hold the privilege of an elector; nor does it say he shall not be an elector; but it says he shall not be "appointed an elector." The time of appointment is the all-important time with reference to this. The very object in putting this provision in the Constitution doubtless was that the Federal Government should never exercise its influence in the election of electors to perpetuate itself in power. The influence in the election was what was wished to be excluded; and hence the appointment was the vital moment intended to be taken into consideration. You will notice the language is, that they shall not be "appointed." It is not that they shall not hold, or, that they shall not exercise the functions; or, that they shall be incompatible, as many of the statutes of the States are; but, he shall not be appointed at all.

While noticing that distinction, allow me to call the attention of the Commission to what will explain consistently all the decisions throughout the United States. We find in one of the Pennsylvania reports an opinion delivered by his honor Mr. Justice Strong, in Commonwealth vs. Cluly, 56 Pennsylvania State Reports, in which the expression is made that he knows no judicial authority to support the proposition that a man who does not receive a majority of votes can be elected, and he cites congressional authority against it, ruling on what has been done in Congress and in the Senate of the United States in reference to determining the law as to contested appointments. In reference to Representatives of the United States, the language is:

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States.

It does not say no person shall be elected to Congress or nobody shall be appointed a Congressman, but it says he shall not be a Congressman. The same language holds with reference to the Senate:

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years.

Showing that the time of holding is what is referred to in these several sections. This is also corroborated by the next clause:

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

There are three qualifications: he shall not be a Representative unless he is twenty-five years of age; he shall not be a Representative unless he shall have been seven years a citizen of the United States, and then there is another qualification of a different class, the distinction being made in the same section, "and who shall not, when elected"—going back from the time of holding to another period—"be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen." He must at the time of the election be an inhabitant of the State in which he is chosen; but at the time of being a Representative he must be seven years a citizen of the United States and he must be twenty-five years of age. The same distinction is made between the time of election and the time of holding with reference to Senators, because—

And who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

Making the very distinction that is necessary to render consistent with each other all the well-considered authorities on this subject. The time of the appointment is what is here spoken of by the Constitution of the United States as to electors. When it says no person of this class shall be appointed an elector, it is an utter denial of power in the voter to vote for him. The citizen is just as much bound by the Constitution as is the officer. He has taken the oath either directly himself or inherited it, and when he swears "I will not appoint one who is holding an office of trust or profit under the United States," and he violates that oath, are you entitled to give validity to that violation, or are you to consider it as a nullity? It is to be treated as though it was not done.

It is true that, on the theory announced by learned counsel (Mr. Evarts) in a former case, that may be gotten over. It is not utterly conclusive, provided you resort to the grounds taken by the learned counsel in a former case, who said this:

They are elected; they are acting; they are certifying; for there is nothing in that idea of the subject at all that a man made ineligible cannot be elected. You might as well say that the forbidden fruit could not be eaten because it was forbidden.

That is true; you can violate and defy law. The forbidden fruit could be eaten notwithstanding it was forbidden, but it could be eaten in defiance of the laws of God, and that defiance brought upon the world "death and all our woe."

And will you adopt the same theory that a man can do that which is forbidden and sustain argument upon it; that when it is forbidden he may do it and you will approve and give validity and vitality to that act? Can you, on the line announced by the learned counsel in one of the former cases, say that when a man swears he will not do a thing he may do it; when he swears that he will not do it he can do it? It can be done only on the principle that the Constitution has become obsolete literature, merely for the study of the antiquary.

So we say there can be no power to appoint an ineligible person. But it is not mere reasoning on which this rests. We will furnish authority to corroborate it. The first case that we call your attention to is the case of Gulick vs. New, (14 Indiana Reports, page 93,) in which the following language occurs:

True, by the constitution and laws of this State the voice of a majority controls our elections, but that voice must be constitutionally and legally expressed. Even a majority should not nullify a provision of the constitution or be permitted at will to disregard the law. In this is the strength and beauty of our institutions. * * * Suppose that eight years ago, at the first election under our new constitution, when nearly all the offices in the State were to be filled, a majority of the voters in the State, and in the several districts and counties, had voted for persons wholly ineligible to fill the several offices, would those offices have thereby remained vacant? Could that majority, by pursuing that course, have continued the anarchy that might have resulted from such action? Or, rather, is it not the true theory that those who act in accordance with the constitution and the law should control even a majority who may fail so to act?

We also find that principle corroborated in 41 Indiana Reports, 577, Price vs. Baker, in which the following language is held :

It is a principle of law, well settled in this State, that where a majority of the ballots at an election are given to a candidate who is not eligible to the office, the ballots so cast are not to be counted for any purpose. They cannot be counted to elect the ineligible candidate or to defeat the election of an opposing candidate, by showing that he did not receive a majority of the votes cast at such election. They are regarded as illegal, and as having no effect upon the election for any purpose. As a consequence, it follows that the candidate who is eligible, having the highest number of legal votes, though that number may be less than the number of votes cast for the ineligible candidate, and less than a majority of all the votes cast at such election, is entitled to the office.

So that the legal votes are to control those that are illegal.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Does that case put the question independently of the knowledge of the voter?

Mr. Representative JENKS. It puts it independently of the knowledge of the voter. We shall consider that further on.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I simply wish to know how the court held.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. The court there held that there was constructive knowledge.

Mr. Representative JENKS. I have read what the court said. The next case we cite is on the same subject, the case of Hutchenson vs. Tilden and Boardley, 4 Harris and McHenry, page 280, in which the following occurs; this is a Maryland case :

All votes given for a candidate not having such qualification are to be thrown away and rejected as having no force or operation in law.

The same as if not cast at all. We may also say that Chief-Justice Thompson, in the case of Commonwealth vs. Cluly, asserts the same principle in Pennsylvania, the court resting its decision upon the decisions of the Houses of Congress. I will read from that case in 56 Pennsylvania State Reports, page 273. The decision of the court was that an illegal person voted for was not elected and his competitor was not. That was the conclusion of the court; but that was founded on the false hypothesis that the decisions of legislative assemblies settled the question by acting on the language of the Constitution, which spoke of a person not being a Senator or a Congressman, under which those who were disqualified at the time of the election, but became qualified before the time of their admission, were admitted.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. I do not so recollect the case.

Mr. Representative JENKS. I will read to your honor, and then perhaps it will call back your honor's recollection.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. My recollection is that the political cases were referred to as a mere illustration, not as the basis of the decision.

Mr. Representative JENKS. Your honor there said that here there were no judicial cases on record.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. In this country.

Mr. Representative JENKS. After announcing that the person who received the minority vote is not elected, the court, through his honor Judge Strong, say in that case :

We are not informed that there has been any decision strictly judicial upon the subject; but in our legislative bodies the question has been determined.

We think we have shown the true difference between those two. In the present case it would be baseless founded on that kind of decision. Then his honor goes further, and says :

Besides, a man who votes for a person with knowledge that the person is incompetent to hold the office, and that his vote cannot therefore be effective, that it will be thrown away, may very properly be considered as intending to vote a blank or throw away his vote.

But the present relator—

Applying it to the facts of the case—

But the present relator suggests no such case. He does not even aver that, if the votes given for Cluly were thrown out, he received a majority, though doubtless such was the truth. He has, therefore, exhibited no such interest as entitles him to be heard.

Now I refer to 7 Maine Reports, pages 497 and 501, which to me seems to be very pertinent in this case. That arose under the authority of the governor and council to submit certain propositions to the supreme court for their opinion. This is the question asked by the governor and council :

Cau ballots having the names of persons on them who do not possess the constitutional qualifications of a representative be counted as votes under the fifth section of fourth article, part first, of the constitution of Maine, so as to prevent a majority of the votes given for eligible persons constituting a choice ?

That is a question covering this whole case. The answer is :

To the fourth question proposed, without a particular statement of reasons, we merely answer in the negative

This occurred in 1831. In 1833 an act was passed in Maine conforming to the theory or doctrine laid down by these judges in this opinion ; so that it has been authoritatively announced in many States. The English cases assume this doctrine, that if the person who votes knows that the person for whom he votes is disqualified, in that event his vote is thrown away. If that were the doctrine in this country, where the people are principals and the officers their agents, still the case would be covered by the fact. Suppose we now assume that the English doctrine is the true doctrine, that the voter must know that a disqualified person is disqualified. What is the theory of our Government ? The people are the principals ; the officers are their agents. The principal knows who his agents are. Hence when he votes for a public officer he votes knowing that he is voting for his own agent. He cannot have an agent, is not to be presumed to have any agent, that he does not know of. The theory would not hold good in the British government, where the source of power is the Crown and the people are not constructively notified of who the agent is ; but here when we appoint an agent ourselves, either directly or indirectly, can any man say in law "I did not know who he was ?" So, in consequence of the construction of our Government, in opposition to that of the British government, constructive notice exists to every individual of every officer in the United States, and the doctrine of constructive notice, that the principal knows who his agents are, would bring this within the doctrine of the judicial decisions that no one disputes, either English or American, that where the provision is that a man shall not be voted for, a vote for him, so far as the power of being elected is concerned, does not have that power. So Watts was not elected, even if he received a majority of the votes.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Your proposition is that where the man cannot be voted for, then knowledge on the part of the voter is of no consequence.

Mr. Representative JENKS. It is of no consequence at all. The English authorities do not pretend to allege that it was necessary that the voter should know that he was voting for a disqualified candidate. The only question was whether the result was to elect the next highest where this knowledge did not exist. In any event the man was not elected who received the highest number of votes, but the question was whether the other was elected; but I say under the theory of our Government that the people are the principals and the officers are the agents, there is notice per se to every principal of every agent he has got, constructively, and we know who our agents are.

We first will assume, then, that Watts was not elected. If he was not elected, the next question would be, was Cronin elected? We have already cited authorities on that point sufficient to call your attention to the principle, and as time is short I will pass to the next point. The question whether Cronin was elected or not will be elaborated by counsel.

Then the next question that would arise would be, if Watts was not elected and Cronin was not elected, what would be the effect? Would there be a vacancy? We assume there would not be a vacancy. If Watts was not elected, and if Cronin was not elected by the smaller number of votes, then there was no vacancy.

Before entering upon the discussion of this on principle and authority, it may be well to respond to the argument made by the very learned counsel on the part of the opposite party in a former case, that there must be a vacancy where there is not an incumbent. The proposition was stated something like this: If there is not some person in possession, there must be no person in possession; and if there is no person in possession, there must be a vacancy. That was about the form of the syllogism. Let us inquire concerning that. We start with the proposition, which seemed to be conceded by the same learned counsel the other day, that the electors for President of the United States are qualified persons, not officers, but citizens of a given qualification, voters for President of the United States, not having a public employment or private employment, (whatever is the definition of office,) but the privilege of performing a given act. Now, if a man does not exercise a privilege, does it necessarily become vacant at all? Take the common case of the elective franchise. Suppose there be a township with a hundred voters, and one of them—a privileged voter—does not attend the election. Does that make a vacancy, or does it not? Is there a vacancy in that election? Where there is a privilege that a man may use or may not, and he does not exercise it, that failure does not constitute any vacancy whatsoever. A neighbor may grant me the privilege of walking in his garden. I may exercise that privilege or I may not, depending upon my own volition; but whether I do or do not, there is no vacancy either in the privilege or the right to it. It does not exist at all except at the option of the person to whom that privilege belongs. Hence it is not a sequitur at all that, if a man having a privilege does not exercise it, there is necessarily a vacancy in anything.

Then starting with that proposition, is there a vacancy? On this subject I call your honors' attention, first, to a very recent case decided during this presidential election, that of George H. Corliss, of Rhode Island, which I find in the American Law Register of January, 1877, on page 19. The inquiry was made by the governor of Rhode Island, as in the case in Maine, of the supreme court of the State. The second proposition is:

We think a centennial commissioner, who was a candidate for the office of elector and received a plurality of the votes, does not by declining the office create such a vacancy as is provided for in general statutes.

And now comes the quotation from the statute :

If any electors, chosen as aforesaid, shall, after their said election, decline the said office, or be prevented by any cause from serving therein, the other electors, when met in Bristol, in pursuance of this chapter, shall fill such vacancies, and shall file a certificate in the secretary's office of the person or persons by them appointed.

When they decline the office or are "prevented by any cause," full and comprehensive words, so that if there be a vacancy it can be filled. Then the court proceed :

Before any person can decline under this section he must first be elected, and no person can be elected who is ineligible, or, in other words, incapable of being elected. "Resignation," said Lord Cockburn, C. J., in The Queen vs. Blizzard, Law Report 2 Q. B., 55, "implies that the person resigning has been elected unto the office he resigns. A man cannot resign that which he is not entitled to and which he has no right to occupy."

Hence there is no vacancy where there is nothing to resign. It is a privilege in the first instance ; and this man's declining would not authorize the filling of the place as a vacancy. I call your attention to another case in order to show more especially the comprehensiveness of the language of the statute under which they acted : that is the Lanman case in Connecticut, which is found in Clarke & Hall's Contested Elections, page 872. Lanman had been a Senator up to the 3d of March, 1825. There was no meeting of the legislature of Connecticut between the 3d of March, 1825, and the fall of the year. There was an interim there when the State had no Senator. A meeting of the Senate was called. The governor appointed Lanman to fill the vacancy from the time of his last incumbency up to the meeting of the next legislature, and for warrant therefor this was the statute of Connecticut :

Whenever any vacancy shall happen in the representation of this State in the Senate of the United States, by the expiration of the term of service of a Senator, or by resignation or otherwise, the general assembly, if then in session, shall, by a concurrent vote of the senate and house of representatives, proceed to fill said vacancy by a new election ; and in case such vacancy shall happen in the recess of the general assembly, the governor shall appoint some person to fill the same until the next meeting of the general assembly.

The appointing power of the governor was co-extensive as to vacancies with that of the legislature, and the language in reference to the legislature was that "if the term of service of the Senator expired, or by resignation or otherwise," a vacancy happened. The decision then was that there was no vacancy as prescribed by that statute. There must be an incumbent, in other words, to constitute a vacancy ; there must be some person in the enjoyment to constitute such a vacancy as came within the terms of the broadest statute.

I cite next the case of Broom vs. Hanley, 9 Pennsylvania State Reports, page 513, which decided substantially—

That even death, after a lawful election and before qualification, does not create an incumbent of the office ; nor does it create a vacancy which can be filled by appointment, where the law authorizes vacancies to be so filled.

In corroboration of that we also cite the cases of People vs. Tilton, 37 Cal., 614 ; People vs. Parker, 37 Cal., 639 ; Stratton vs. Oulton, 28 Cal., 51 ; People vs. Stratton, 28 Cal., 382 ; Battle vs. McIver, 68 N. C. R., 469 ; Dodd ex parte, 6 English, (Ark.) 152 ; State vs. Jenkins, 43 Mo., 261.

Then let us look to the statutes of Oregon to see if there be no provision to fill any given vacancy, even if there were a vacancy to be filled, which we deny, because an incumbent signifies one in possession of an office ; and where there has been no incumbent it has been decided all the time that there is no vacancy, and if there is no vacancy there can be nothing to fill. But the statutes of Oregon have defined what shall constitute a vacancy, and confined it to an office; and this, as conceded by the learned counsel, is not an office. That definition is as follows:

SEC. 48. Every office shall become vacant on the occurring of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office:

1. The death of the incumbent;

There must be an incumbent; that is, one in possession.

2. His resignation;

That is, the resignation of an incumbent.

3. His removal;

The removal of an incumbent.

4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village;

“His” referring to the incumbent’s ceasing, &c.

5. His conviction of an infamous crime;

The incumbent’s conviction of an infamous crime.

6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office;

The incumbent’s refusal.

7. The decision of a competent tribunal, declaring void his election or appointment.

The only instance in which a vacancy can occur under that statute is when the decision of a competent tribunal declares his election or appointment void; and that was not done in this case.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. How would that apply to this action of the governor in declaring the election void?

Mr. Representative JENKS. The act of the governor was an act in pursuance of a duty conferred by the Constitution upon that governor, on which he was to exercise that discretion with which God and nature had endowed him; and if honestly exercised, that was conclusive, because it was a political duty. He having sworn that he would not commission one who was disqualified, he could not commission one who was disqualified, and he had a right to decide the question as to whether there was an election or not.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. If I understand you, then, had this been an ordinary State office, with a term for a year, for instance, and the governor had done exactly the same thing, it would not have been competent for the courts to have reversed the judgment and to have decided the other way?

Mr. Representative JENKS. In conformity to the law of the land it would. Without that conformity, by express statutory authority, it would not, because the governor is limited by the same law as the others are in the exercise of their duties. But if, in the first instance, we are to be controlled by an express statutory provision, this action of his would be conclusive; and there is no statutory provision of that kind, as I understand.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. I ask whether, in his opinion, it is competent for a State, by the State constitution, in any way to regulate the appointment of electors.

Mr. Representative JENKS. The Constitution of the United States confers that power, in some instances, upon the legislature of the State.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. You spoke about the governor being empowered by the Constitution to do thus and so. My inquiry is whether it is competent for a State, by its constitution, to regulate in any way the appointment of electors.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. By the constitution as distinguished from the legislature?

Mr. Representative JENKS. By the Constitution of the United States, which becomes a part of and incorporates itself into that of every State, the two constituting one, he is authorized to so do. The constitution of each State and the United States Constitution are equally binding upon legislature and governor. At least this position stands always the same, that the governor's functions in commissioning are political, and as such, when not in contravention of well-ascertained law, they are conclusive. If it be a discretion which must be exercised politically, that discretion, unless done mala fide, is conclusive.

Then the propositions we have attempted to establish are these:

First. That with reference to evidence, the only evidence before you which conforms to the law of the land is the evidence as required by the law of Oregon and the law of the United States, being that which is certified to by the governor of the State of Oregon.

Second. That the act of that governor, if discharged in good faith, is conclusive upon this tribunal in this inquiry.

Third. That Watts could not be elected even if he had a majority of the votes.

Fourth. That if Cronin was the next highest, and those votes were cast for one who could not be appointed, the next highest, Cronin, was elected.

Fifth. That even if Cronin was not elected there was no vacancy, and being no vacancy, there could be no filling by any college whatever.

Then, as a consequence, how does the case stand? Cronin came up and voted; two others came and voted. You do not know whether they are the persons voted for or not, because they do not come identified as the law says they shall come. But, assuming that they were the same persons who were voted for, and are properly identified, each of these voters being one, that which is evidenced according to the law of the land, would have to be counted as the true vote. Cronin's vote must be counted as cast, the other two as they are cast. This would be the conclusion I would come to from these several propositions. We believe this to be a correct exposition of the law and the truth of the case, because the constitutional language of this qualification is not one that is to be forgotten or repudiated. It is, perhaps, too common now to regard the provisions of the Constitution as directory, to be obeyed or disobeyed at the option of the person who may have the administering thereof, but the constitutional truth remains that an office-holder should not be appointed an elector. We ask you to give to this truth its proper weight in this decision, and giving it its proper weight, the result would be, as we maintain, as stated before.

This tribunal is such a one as the world has never known before. Questions of this kind have heretofore been decided on the field of battle, decided amid smoking hamlets, decided amid the clash of arms. Successions have not heretofore been settled peaceably. Standing, then, as the last arbiter instead of the last resort to arms, I would ask that you do your duty impartially and in full view of the whole facts and truth of the case.

Then further, as this is such a tribunal as was never constituted before, and the first of the kind known on earth, it can either give character or discredit to its kind. If this tribunal forgets its high obligations and guides itself by aught else than simple truth and simple justice, it will again throw back mankind to the place from which they started, leaving the question of succession to be decided by the wager of battle, as lawsuits often were in barbarous ages. We ask you not to turn back this hand on the dial of time. Let it go on. Let peace be the rule, and not war. It is true many would have preferred war. The corrupt, the deformed, would have preferred war, just as when the mighty deep is disturbed from its slimy abysses the crude monsters come to the surface and there disport themselves; so in the ruin of a country, so in the turmoils of internecine war, these crude monsters now in the abyss might rise to the surface and once again disport themselves. From this deliver us. Give to mankind confidence in their fellow-men that they can be trusted to decide impartially according to the truth and verity of the case.

We leave this in your hands, asking that you give it a candid consideration, deciding upon principles of right and truth, bearing in mind that in the case of Florida a certain list came from the secretary of state, a compilation of votes canvassed by a returning-board came from the State, and this was overruled by the governor's certificate; that in Louisiana evidence was offered you to show what was the true state of the votes, and that was declined. Now we ask that in this case the principles of law and the principles of truth be recognized and the vote be cast as in truth and justice it should.

THE PRESIDENT. We will now hear the objectors on the other side.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, I desire that the words I shall employ in this important cause shall be measured, and the principles I announce and upon which I claim your decision shall be well considered. The limited time prescribed by the rules of your honorable body for the presentation of cases upon the part of objectors admonishes me that I must advance directly and without prefatory remark to a discussion of the issues involved. So momentous are these in the effect of their decision, though not in point of solution, that to their final determination by this high tribunal the whole people of this nation, and may I not say of all Christendom, are with bated breath looking forward with ever-increasing and intense anxiety. The hopes, the fears, the aspirations of two great political parties, each struggling for the control of the administration of a great government, have, on the faith of the right, the justice, and the law upon which each bases its claim to the votes of certain disputed States, by common consent, by solemn legislative enactment, in which leading members of both political parties have voluntarily and earnestly joined, been submitted to the arbitrament of this dignified and honorable Commission.

The Constitution of the United States declares that—

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

The law of your creation provides in substance and effect that if more than one return, or paper purporting to be a return, from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, purporting to be the certificate of electoral votes given for President and Vice-President in any State, all such returns, after having been opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses and read by the tellers, shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision of your honorable Commission as to which is the true and lawful electoral vote of such State.

The State of Oregon sends two returns; hence your jurisdiction under the Constitution and the law to determine which of these is the true one and which the false, which comes from the electoral college of that State, which of the six persons claiming to have been appointed electors by that State in the manner directed by the legislature thereof, if any, were so appointed, and which votes cast for President and Vice-President by the six persons claiming to have been appointed electors should of right be counted. A perfect understanding of the facts presented by the two returns is important. From these, taken together, it appears that, at the recent election in Oregon, the three republican candidates, W. H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and John W. Watts, received respectively 15,206, 15,214, and 15,206 votes. The three democratic candidates, E. A. Cronin, Henry Klippel, and W. B. Laswell, received respectively 14,157, 14,136, and 14,149 votes. That John W. Watts, who received the lowest republican vote, had a majority of 1,049 votes over E. A. Cronin, who received the highest democratic vote. That on the 4th day of December, 1876, that being the day on which it was his duty under the law to canvass the votes and determine who had received the highest number, the secretary of state did, in the presence of the governor, canvass the votes, and did officially declare that Odell, Cartwright, and Watts had received the highest number of votes. That the governor, notwithstanding this official declaration of the secretary of state, issued his certificate not to Odell, Cartwright, and Watts, but to Odell, Cartwright, and Cronin. That these three persons, so certified by the governor, did not, in the organization and proceedings of the electoral college, act together; but that Odell, Cartwright, and Watts, the persons whom the State had appointed at the election, acted together, organized as an electoral college, and cast three votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, for President, and three votes for William A. Wheeler, of New York, for Vice-President. That Cronin, acting alone, organized or attempted to organize a college of his own; declared or attempted to declare two vacancies; and appointed or attempted to appoint, to fill such alleged vacancies, J. N. T. Miller and John Parker, neither of whom had received any votes from the people. That these three persons, so claiming to be an electoral college, cast 2 votes for Hayes and Wheeler and 1 vote for Tilden and Hendricks. That the return of Cronin, Miller, and Parker contains the certificate of the governor to Cronin, Odell, and Cartwright. That the return of Odell, Cartwright, and Watts has no certificate of the governor attached, but has the certificate of the secretary of state under the great seal thereof, showing that these three persons constituting this college received the highest number of votes at the election, and that this was so officially declared by the sole canvassing-officer, the secretary of state, at the time and place and in the manner designated by law.

It is claimed, and the papers show, that Watts, at the time of the election, was a postmaster, and therefore ineligible, as it is claimed, to be appointed an elector. The evidence establishes the facts in reference to this postmastership to be these: Watts, at the time of the election, was a deputy postmaster at the town of La Fayette, Yam Hill County. His compensation was about $268 per annum. The whole number of votes in the county of Yam Hill was 1,484. Of these, 810 were cast for the republican candidates for electors, and 674 for the democratic candidates. There were at the time of the election eleven other post-offices in that county. The total vote of La Fayette precinct, in which Watts was postmaster, was :

| | |
|---------------------------|-----|
| For Hayes electors | 106 |
| For Tilden electors | 83 |
| Total votes..... | 189 |

This precinct includes considerable scope of territory outside of the town of La Fayette, and which is nearer to other post-offices, and not more than one hundred voters of both political parties receive or transmit their mail through the La Fayette post-office. It is further shown that the fact that Watts was postmaster was not generally or publicly known throughout the State or in any part of the State prior to the election, except in his own immediate town; that neither the democratic nor republican leaders, nor the masses of the voters of either political party in the State, nor any considerable portion of them, knew that he was postmaster until several days after the election; nor was the fact that he was postmaster or the question of his ineligibility publicly discussed during the campaign.

It is insisted that these facts made Watts ineligible to appointment as an elector; that the governor of the State for this reason had the jurisdiction, and rightfully exercised it, to refuse to issue his certificate to Watts and to issue it to Cronin, the candidate having the next highest vote.

Had Governor Grover the right to refuse Watts a certificate, and, if so, had he any jurisdiction to issue it to Cronin, and what effect is to be accorded such certificate?

I contend with perfect confidence in the integrity of our position that the governor of Oregon had no jurisdiction whatever to entertain or adjudicate upon the question of the alleged ineligibility of Watts, and that all his proceedings in that regard were ultra vires, void ab initio, affecting no interest, attaching to no subject-matter, and binding no one. If Governor Grover possessed any such power he must derive it from one of four sources: the Constitution of the United States, the laws of Congress, the constitution of Oregon, or the statutes of that State. So far as the Constitution of the United States is concerned, it confers no power whatever on the governor of a State to pass upon the eligibility of any person elected to office under either national or State authority. It prescribes qualifications for office and imposes disqualifications. It nowhere vests the appointment to any office, Federal or State, in the executive of a State, save in the case of a vacancy in the office of Senator of the United States when the legislature is not in session. It nowhere, directly or by implication, constitutes him a tribunal to act as the conservator of the constitution in the matter of the eligibility of persons elected or appointed to office. Were the appointment of electors vested by the Constitution in the executive of a State instead of in the State itself, then there might attach to him by reasonable, if not necessary, implication the power to pass upon the constitutional qualifications of any person by him appointed. Or had the legislature of the State, under the clause of the Constitution authorizing the State to appoint electors in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, provided by statute that such electors should be appointed not by the people but by the governor, then it might with some propriety and claim of support in law be held that he could pass upon the question of the constitutional qualifications of those appointed. The Constitution of the United States in one clause says:

No Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector.

And in another clause that—

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen.

And in still another that—

No person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

Here, then, are several constitutional disqualifications in reference to members of Congress and presidential electors. If it is the duty of the governor to pass upon the question of ineligibility of an elector before issuing his certificate, then it is also his duty to pass upon the question of the ineligibility of a member of Congress before granting his certificate, as his duty in reference to each is under the law precisely the same, namely, that he shall issue his certificate to the person having the highest number of votes; and if he can pass upon the question of fact as to whether the person receiving the highest number of votes for elector was at the time of the election a postmaster, and also upon the question of law as to whether such fact when found disqualifies him from being appointed as an elector, and in such event to withhold from him his certificates, then he also has the power to adjudicate upon the question in the case of a person elected to Congress as to whether he is twenty-five years of age, has been seven years a citizen of the United States, and an inhabitant of the State at the time of his election; and also upon the further question as to whether any person elected to the lower House of Congress is holding any office under the United States. The extent to which the position would lead shows the absurdity of the position assumed. It will not do for my friend, Mr. Jenks, to say that this disability in the case of a member of Congress applies only to his acting as a member of Congress, and not to his appointment; for, as I maintain, he claims his right to his seat in Congress prima facie, by virtue of the commission issued by the governor.

Again, if the governor has the power to adjudicate upon the question and refuse a certificate upon a conceded state of facts as to ineligibility, then he also has the right to determine the question of both fact and law in a case wherein both are contested; and this too without the power to issue process for, or to compel the attendance of a solitary witness, and barren of all right or authority to administer an oath to any that might voluntarily attend.

In a case, therefore, wherein the facts and the law were controverted—for instance, as to whether or not a person appointed an elector held a particular Federal office, and, if so, whether such office was one of trust or profit within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States—a trial before the executive would be little else than a farce. That the framers of the Constitution, either national or State, or Congress, or the legislatures of States, ever contemplated lodging such a power in the hands of the governor of a State is conclusively negated by the results that would flow from its assumption and exercise.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I should like to ask you, for my own understanding of your position, who you understand has this right to adjudicate under the laws of Oregon.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. I understand that it is the duty of the secretary of state, and him alone, under the laws of Oregon, to declare who is elected; in other words, to declare who has received the highest number of votes; and when that declaration is made, then the electors are appointed by the State in the manner directed by the legislature thereof, and that beyond that this tribunal cannot go. I shall, as I proceed, state my views as to the tribunal that may adjudicate upon the question of alleged ineligibility, and the time when this may properly be done.

But it is said the clause in article 6 of the Constitution of the United States declares that—

All executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath to support this Constitution.

And, furthermore, that the constitution of the State of Oregon requires the governor to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and, inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States provides that no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector, therefore the governor, in order to conform to the letter and spirit of his oath of office, must, before issuing a certificate to any person appointed an elector, determine the question as to his constitutional eligibility, and, if in his judgment such person is laboring under such constitutional disability, then to not only refuse to issue to him his certificate but to issue it to somebody else. In other words, that by virtue of these provisions the governor becomes the conservator of the constitution and to the extent that authorizes him to determine grave questions of law and fact, whether controverted or conceded, relating to the eligibility of persons elected to office; questions, too, that in many instances not only touch the question of eligibility to office but affect the person concerned criminally, and in reference to which such person has under the Constitution of the United States the right of trial by jury; because it must be borne in mind that several causes of ineligibility to office under the constitution of Oregon—and I contend the duties of the governor are the same in either case—are by the laws of Oregon declared to be felonies. No such claim can be successfully maintained for a moment. It is untenable, illogical, and baseless as the fabric of a dream. It is unsupported in law and unaided by any rule of ethics.

The Constitution of the United States says :

No * * person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector.

Does the governor appoint electors? By no manner of means. It is the State that appoints electors, in such manner as its legislature has directed. It has directed that the manner in which they shall be appointed is by a plurality of the votes of the people; and, furthermore, that the person receiving the highest number of votes shall, in the language of the statute, be deemed elected. The governor has nothing whatever to do with the appointment of electors, nor yet with the question of determining who have been appointed. The appointment is by the people—the legal voters. The question as to whom they have appointed is, under the law, to be determined by the secretary of state, and in that determination but one ingredient can enter, and that is, who had the highest number of votes? and, after this has all been done, after the people have appointed and the secretary of state has determined and officially declared whom they have appointed, then, and not till then, has the governor anything to do in connection with it. Until all this has taken place, he has no jurisdiction whatever to do any act or thing, ministerially or otherwise, save and except to be present when the secretary of state canvasses the votes. And even after all this has been done, his only authority in connection with the whole matter is, if he follow the State statute, to sign the certificates made out by the secretary of state to the persons having the highest number of votes, or, if the act of Congress, to cause three lists of the names of the electors to be made and certified and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day of meeting. No act of his can undo what has necessarily been done by the State and passed into history before his right to act at all could, under the Constitution or the laws, possibly attach, namely, the appointment of electors and the determination by the secretary of state as to the persons appointed. Can it be said therefore that the oath of the governor to support the Constitution of the United States would call upon him, either in law or morals, much less empower him, to undo not only the appointment made by the people, but also the official determination of the secretary of state as to the persons appointed, and usurp the functions of State, people, and secretary of state, and make an appointment himself, and that too of a person rejected by the people? The absurdity of any such claim is the conclusive answer to the proposition.

So far then as the Constitution of the United States is concerned, the governor of the State has no connection whatever with electors or the electoral college.

Let us examine, then, as to his power and duties under the act of Congress under which he claims to have acted in issuing his certificate; and in this connection I desire to speak also as to the effect of a certificate issued by the executive of a State in pursuance of the act of Congress of 1792. The third section of the act of Congress of 1792, section 136 of the Revised Statutes, provides that—

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet.

By the preceding section, 135, of the Revised Statutes, the electors are to meet on the first Wednesday in December in the year in which they are appointed.

By this act the executive authority is required to make and certify three lists of the names of the persons who have been appointed electors, which are to be delivered to the electors on or before the first Wednesday in December. These lists certified by the executive authority are simply evidence to the persons that they have been appointed electors. The governor's certificate is no part of the appointment of an elector. The appointment is to be made by the State, and can only be made in such manner as the legislature has directed. The manner in which the several legislatures have declared these appointments shall be made is through an election by the qualified voters of the States; and the governor's certificate is intended only to furnish evidence of the result of the election. The statute in regard to the governor is merely directory, and is no part of the appointment of an elector, which is left exclusively by the Constitution to the several States. Should the governor of a State choose for any reason to withhold his certificate, he could not thereby defeat the appointment of electors by the State, nor could he do so by giving a false certificate of the appointment of persons as electors who were not appointed; nor by giving a true certificate to persons who were not electors and withholding the same from the persons entitled. In any of these cases the title of the electors appointed by the State in the manner directed by the legislature thereof would not be affected; but such electors, or those claiming rights under and by virtue of their action, would have a right to resort to the next best evidence of their appointment, which would in the case of Oregon be a certificate of the secretary of state, (the secretary of state being the canvassing-board,) under the seal of the State, showing the result of the election and who had been appointed electors and declared such by the canvassing-officer. The part to be performed by the governor is merely ministerial, and constitutes simply a form of evidence as to who have been appointed electors. Such certificate cannot confer title, neither can it take away title. It is no part of or ingredient in title; it is merely a prescribed form of evidence of title, but not by any means a conclusive one. It cannot be converted into an instrument of fraud, or made the means of defeating the vote of the State, or falsely giving the election of President or Vice-President to persons who were not appointed by the State.

If the governor's certificate be any part of the manner of appointment, then the form and character of the certificate are solely a matter within the power of the State legislature, and in such event sections 136 and 138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are unconstitutional and void, for it must be conceded that the Constitution of the United States grants to the States the exclusive power of appointing electors in such manner as the legislatures may direct. No power on earth can prescribe the manner of appointment except the legislature of the State. If, therefore, the certificate of the governor is a part, one ingredient in the manner of appointment, then Congress, in attempting to prescribe the form and character of the certificate, has transcended its constitutional limit by undertaking to regulate the manner of appointment, thus encroaching upon a jurisdiction which under the Constitution belongs exclusively to the legislatures of the States. But the certificate of the governor, as prescribed by Congress, is no part of the manner of appointment. Congress has not in prescribing the character of the governor's certificate undertaken to interfere with the manner of appointment, but simply to prescribe a convenient form of evidence of the appointment. Any certificate that Congress has provided for or could prescribe could rightfully confer no power upon the governor to do anything except certify the ultimate result of the vote as declared by the canvassing-officers of the State. He must take what the State has done in the manner prescribed by its legislature. He cannot in the slightest degree interfere with or change the appointment made by the State.

In Oregon there was no law authorizing the governor to certify a minority candidate elected. The legislature of Oregon might have provided that the electors should be appointed by the governor, the supreme court, or the secretary of state, but it did not; it did direct that the people, the qualified electors, shall by a plurality of votes to be cast in the different precincts choose electors, but the result of this vote cannot be ascertained unless the manner prescribes more. The manner of appointment necessarily includes, not merely the way in which the votes shall be cast, but also a means of determining what votes were cast, and the result of such vote; hence the legislature of the State has provided, as a part of the means necessary to an appointment, the mode of determining and declaring the result of the vote. This in Oregon prescribes returns from precincts to county boards, from county boards to the secretary of state, whose final duty it is to canvass the votes and ascertain who has the greatest number of votes. This is the last act in the process of the appointment of a presidential elector by the State, the closing scene in the manner of appointment. This done and officially declared, and the electors are appointed. What follows is no part of the appointment, but simply matter of evidence of the fact. All that precedes enters into and constitutes a part of the manner of appointment.

Governor Grover in the matter of issuing his certificates, he tells us, ignored the State statute and followed that of Congress. If Congress had the power to prescribe the form of a certificate, and I believe it had, then such certificate is no part of the manner of appointment, and in issuing it the governor could not change the appointment as made by the State and officially determined by the secretary of state as the final and conclusive act in the process of appointment. Behind this ultimate determination of the canvassing-board, neither the governor of the State nor the tribunal whose final duty it is to count the votes for President and Vice-President, whether it be the President of the Senate, the two Houses of Congress, or the electoral tribunal, can rightfully go. The determination of the canvassing-board is final and conclusive on all departments and on all persons, concluding voter and candidate, State and nation. Not so, however, with the certificate of the governor, which, whether issued under the State statutes or the Revised Statutes of the United States, is in no respect a part of the manner of appointment, but simply a species of evidence of such appointment, which, if false or fraudulent or issued through mistake, is not conclusive upon the tribunal whose duty it is to count the votes of the electors appointed, and which cannot count the votes of persons whom the State never appointed but who through mistake, fraud, or corruption may have succeeded in obtaining a certificate from the governor. The electoral tribunal can question this or any other proceeding down to the boundary-line where they touch the manner of appointment; there the jurisdiction ends—the decision of the State through its canvassing officer being final and conclusive.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Allow me to ask whether the language of the thirty-seventh section of the law of Oregon, that requires the governor to issue a proclamation declaring the election of the officers, applies to the election of electors?

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. It does not.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. And whether as a matter of fact the governor does issue a proclamation of election to the electors?

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. He does not. I do not understand that the language applies. My own opinion is that it does not apply.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Does he issue a proclamation to that effect?

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. Not as a matter of fact. It does not apply at all, I claim.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Is there any other law on this subject of canvassing the votes except the thirty-seventh section?

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. That is all; and that prescribes that it shall be done in the manner prescribed in reference to members of Congress and set out in the foregoing section.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I see there is no provision that the secretary shall certify who has been elected, but simply that he shall canvass the votes and the governor give the certificate.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. It prescribes that the secretary of state shall canvass the votes and declare who has received the highest number of votes, and that he shall prepare lists to that effect, that he shall sign his name to those lists, and that it shall be the duty of the governor to certify to those lists.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I do not see here—will you please point it out to me—where the secretary of state is to ascertain that?

The PRESIDENT. The floor is yours, Mr. Mitchell.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. I have no objection to yielding, but I do not desire that it shall be taken out of my time.

The PRESIDENT. The Commissioners would object if I did not take it out of your time. I have therefore admonished you that you have the floor.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. I have no objection to yielding except that it shall not be taken out of my time.

I pass now to consider the question as to the power and duty of the governor in this regard under the constitution of the State of Oregon.

Should it be held that the determination by the governor of a State of a question as to the ineligibility of an elector is the exercise of judicial power, then clearly neither the constitution of the State nor the statutes confer such power. If, upon the contrary, it is the exercise of administrative or political power, then it can only be exercised in pursuance of some warrant contained in the statutes of the State. Without stopping to inquire what it is, I will proceed to show that there is no authority for the one or the other either in the constitution or the statutes.

The jurisdiction of the different departments is clearly defined in the constitution of the State of Oregon, and under the distribution of powers therein contained the governor can exercise no judicial functions whatever, while all the judicial power is expressly conferred upon other departments and officers. Article 3 of the constitution of the State provides as follows, under the head of—

DISTRIBUTION OF POWERS.

SECTION 1. The powers of the government shall be divided into three separate departments, the legislative, the executive, (including the administrative,) and the judicial; and no person charged with official duties under one of these departments shall exercise any of the functions of another, except as in this constitution expressly provided.

Section 1 of article 7 reads as follows:

The judicial power of the State shall be vested in a supreme court, circuit courts, and county courts, which shall be courts of record having general jurisdiction, to be defined, limited, and regulated by law in accordance with this constitution. Justices of the peace may also be invested with limited judicial powers, and municipal courts may be created to administer the regulations of incorporated towns and cities:

While section 9 of article 7 is in these words:

All judicial power, authority, and jurisdiction not vested by this constitution or by laws consistent therewith exclusively in some other courts; and they shall have appellate jurisdiction and supervisory control over the county courts, and all other inferior courts, officers, and tribunals.

From these several provisions it is clear that the governor of Oregon cannot rightfully exercise any judicial power; that any attempt to do so is an usurpation of power, and his action would be not merely voidable, but absolutely void for want of jurisdiction. And these several provisions of the constitution are in full consonance with the well-recognized division of the powers of a free republican government, as stated by elementary writers.

Story on the Constitution, page 520, in speaking on the subject, says:

In the establishment of a free government, the division of the three great powers of government, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, among different functionaries, has been a favorite policy with patriots and statesmen.

It has by many been deemed a maxim of vital importance that these powers should forever be kept separate and distinct. And, accordingly, we find it laid down with emphatic care in the bill of rights of several of the State constitutions. In the constitution of Massachusetts, for example, it is declared that "in the government of this Commonwealth, the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative or judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them; to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men."

Again, a writer in the Federalist, in adverting to the great danger of an accumulation of legislative, executive, and judicial powers in the same hands, and of the importance of keeping them separate, says:

The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may be justly pronounced the very definition of tyranny.

We inquire further, moreover, as to the startling magnitude of the power claimed by Governor Grover in assuming to pass upon and determine the question as to the ineligibility of persons elected to office under the constitution and laws of Oregon, whether it be called judicial, administrative, or political. As has been said, if he has the power in one case of alleged disability he has it in all cases, and it is his duty to exercise it in all cases coming before him. The statute of Oregon provides that—

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress.

On a reference to how votes for members of Congress are given, received, returned, and canvassed, we find that the votes for secretary of state, State treasurer, State printer, justices of the supreme court, and district attorneys are given, received, returned, and canvassed in precisely the same manner. In any and all these cases the certificate of the governor is to be given to the person receiving the highest number of votes. This being so, we turn again to the constitution of the State of Oregon for the purpose of inquiring as to the constitutional causes of ineligibility of persons to be elected to any of these offices under such constitution, and to the character of the inquiry the governor would necessarily be compelled to make in case of a contest in determining these several questions of ineligibility; all of which will show conclusively that to act on any such assumption is the exercise of judicial power of the very gravest character. For instance, section 7 of article 2 of the constitution of the State of Oregon, under the head of "suffrage and elections," reads as follows:

Every person shall be disqualified from holding office during the term for which he may have been elected, who shall have given or offered a bribe, threat, or reward to procure his election.

Here, then, is a constitutional disqualification. Under the position assumed by Governor Grover, if it is suggested to him by some ex parte affidavit or otherwise that a person who has received the highest number of votes for State treasurer, secretary of state, State printer, or any of the officers named had given or offered a bribe, threat, or reward to procure his election, and the person accused denies it, he must enter upon an investigation of the charge, which under the statutes of the State is a criminal one, and, because he has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the State and of the United States, he must determine this question as to the eligibility of the person elected. And so in reference to section 9 of article 2, which provides that—

Every person who shall give or accept a challenge to fight a duel, or shall knowingly carry to another such challenge, or who shall agree to go out of the State to fight a duel, shall be ineligible to any office of trust or profit.

Section 10 of the same article reads as follows :

No person holding a lucrative office or appointment under the United States or under this State shall be eligible to a seat in the legislative assembly ; nor shall any person hold more than one lucrative office at the same time, except as in this constitution expressly permitted: Provided, That offices in the militia, to which there is attached no annual salary, and the office of the postmaster, where the compensation does not exceed $100 per annum, shall not be deemed lucrative.

And section 11 reads as follows :

No person who may hereafter be a collector or holder of public money shall be eligible to any office of trust or profit until he shall have accounted for and paid over, according to law, all sums for which he may be liable.

Passing then from a consideration of the powers of the executive of Oregon as prescribed by the provisions of the constitution of the State, we next inquire what are his powers and duties as prescribed in the statutes of the State in so far as they relate to the electoral college. And here we find that in all legislation on the subject the limitations in the constitution on executive power have been carefully borne in mind and jealously guarded by the law-making power of the State, the duties prescribed for and imposed upon the governor being of a purely ministerial character. Before proceeding, however, to introduce the statutes of the State, it may be well to attract attention to section 16 of article 2 of the constitution of the State, for the purpose of showing that in all elections by the people, which of course includes the election of presidential electors, the person or persons receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected. The section reads as follows :

In all elections held by the people under this constitution the person or persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected.—Section 16, article 2 of State constitution.

Here is a constitutional mandamus to the secretary of state directing him to declare the person who has received the highest number of votes duly elected ; and neither the secretary of state as the canvassing-officer, nor the governor as the ministerial officer, whose sole duty it is to place his signature to the lists made by the secretary of state, and which the secretary alone has the power to make, has any power whatever to adjudicate the question as to whether such person so receiving the highest number of votes was ineligible or for any other cause not duly elected. That belongs to another department and another tribunal.

I now pass to a consideration of the powers and duties of the governor under the statutes of Oregon.

Section 10 of the election laws of Oregon provides that—

The county clerk, immediately after making the abstracts of the votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each of said abstracts and transmit it by mail to the secretary of state at the seat of government, and it shall the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, State printer, justices of the supreme court, member of Congress, and district attorneys ; and the governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes, and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person. In case there shall be no choice, by reason of any two or more persons having an equal and the highest number of votes for either of such offices, the governor shall by proclamation order a new election to fill said offices.

It will be observed that the secretary of state is made the canvassing or returning officer of the State to count the votes and determine who have been elected to the offices named therein, which is to be done in the presence of the governor. The governor takes no part in the canvass or determination of the result, but is simply required to be present as a witness, and then he is required to grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes, and is thus precluded by express provision from passing upon questions as to the eligibility of candidates, his duty being peremptorily prescribed by the statute to grant a certificate to the person having the highest number of votes.

Section 3 of the act providing for the election of presidential electors provides that—

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

By the section of the statute first quoted, it is made the absolute duty of the governor to give a certificate of election to the candidate for Congress having the highest number of votes; and the section relating to presidential electors provides that the votes for electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are for members of Congress. Thus it is made the absolute duty of the governor to give a certificate to the candidate for elector having the highest number of votes. The statute leaves him no discretion whatever. The secretary of state is, as in the other case, made the returning-officer, and he is to prepare the lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same.

The secretary of state, as in the case of members of Congress, is to certify the "names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same." The lists thus prepared by the secretary of state the governor is required to sign, and by the secretary of state they are to be "delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December." It is made the peremptory duty of the governor to sign the lists as prepared by the secretary of state. The secretary of state is positively required by law to give the certificate to the person having the highest number of votes. For the governor to assume to exercise the judicial or discretionary power in regard to the eligibility of candidates for Congress, supreme judge, treasurer of the State, secretary of state, State printer, prosecuting attorneys, or electors, would be to act in the face of a direct provision of the statute of the State. With the effect of the certificate the governor has nothing to do. His duties are purely ministerial, and are prescribed in plain, direct terms by the statute, and about them there can be no possible room for controversy.

Governor Grover assumes that there is a conflict between the act of Congress of 1792 and the statute of Oregon, and bases his justification for a violation of the statute of Oregon upon his duty to execute the act of Congress. There is no possible conflict between the act of Congress and the statute of Oregon, except in the one immaterial particular, namely, that the act of Congress requires three lists of the names of electors to be made out, while the statute of Oregon prescribes only two. The third section of the act of Congress touching this question reads thus:

That the executive authority of each State shall cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, to be delivered to the electors on or before the said first Wednesday in December, and the said electors shall annex one of the said lists to each of the lists of their votes.

The governor is required to make three lists or certificates of the electors of the State. How is he to know that they are electors? By an inquiry inaugurated on his own account upon an issue raised by ex parte petitions or affidavits coming from unofficial sources or irresponsible parties? Certainly not. But simply because they have been certified to him as having been appointed electors in the mode prescribed by the legislature of the State, the legislature being expressly authorized by the Constitution of the United States to prescribe the mode of appointment. Whoever, then, are officially declared or certified to have received the highest number of votes in the mode prescribed by the legislature are the persons to whom the act of Congress requires he shall give the lists or certificates. With the appointment of these electors he has nothing to do and can have nothing to do, for that by the Constitution is expressly left to the State, to be done in the manner prescribed by its legislature, and when their appointment has been declared by the officer or officers of the State appointed by the laws of the State for that purpose, which under the laws of Oregon is the secretary of state, and him alone, they are the electors to whom the act of Congress requires that he shall give the certificates. The assumption upon his part of the right to decide that the persons who have been appointed electors in the method prescribed by the legislature are ineligible is wholly without warrant in law. The act of Congress simply provided a form of evidence as to who had been appointed electors by the State, and the executive authority of the State is introduced simply for the purpose of making the certificates or lists. The statute of the State requires the secretary of state to canvass and return the votes for electors as it is done for members of Congress; and as he is required in the case of members of Congress to certify to the candidate having the highest number of votes, so he is required in the case of electors to certify to the candidate having the highest number of votes; and as the governor is required in the case of a candidate for Congress to give a certificate to the person having the highest number of votes, so he is required in the case of an elector to give a certificate to the person having the highest number of votes; and he has just as much right, and no more, no less, to pass upon the eligibility or qualifications of a candidate for Congress as he has upon those of a candidate for elector. And to illustrate the absurdity of the position assumed by the governor, he, in his evidence before the committee, said that he considered it his duty to pass upon the qualifications of a candidate for Congress in giving his certificate, and that he would refuse a certificate to a candidate whom he believed to be ineligible. The idea that the governor of a State may refuse to grant a certificate of election to a candidate for Congress who has received the highest number of votes because in his opinion the candidate is ineligible under the Constitution or law, and that he may exercise a like judicial power in regard to candidates for electors, seems to be supremely ridiculous, entirely destitute of support in law, and at irreconcilable variance with reason and common sense.

Mr. Commissioner FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask one question?

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. Commissioner FRELINGHUYSEN. Does this act, which provides for canvassing the votes for electors, provide for any declaration or proclamation being made by the governor?

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. It does not. It simply provides that the secretary of state shall canvass the votes and issue the certificate to the person having the highest number of votes, and the law makes it the imperative duty of the executive of the State to sign that list. No power whatever is given him, ministerially, politically, judicially, or any other wise, to pass on the question whether the person receiving the highest number of votes was eligible or ineligible.

I now pass to a consideration of the question, could Cronin, being a minority candidate, be elected ?

Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that the governor of Oregon had jurisdiction to pass upon the question of the ineligibility of Watts—an assumption I have tried to show is wholly destitute of support in law—the next inquiry is as to whether it was his right, under the law, to issue the certificate of election to a minority candidate, or, in other words, whether a minority candidate was elected if the majority candidate were ineligible to receive the office.

It may be stated, without fear of successful contradiction, that no decision can be found in the English or American reports which would give the election to a minority candidate under the circumstances of this case. It has been held in England that the minority candidate is elected where the electors have personal and direct knowledge of the ineligibility of the majority candidate. It is believed that no case can be found in England where it was held that constructive knowledge of the ineligibility of the majority candidate would be sufficient to give the election to the minority candidate. All the cases in which the minority candidates have been held to be elected were where there were very small constituencies, generally corporations, and where the knowledge of the ineligibility was brought home to every voter. More than that, it is the well-settled law in England that the voter is not in such a case presumed or required to know the law, and that it is not to be presumed that he knows either what the law is creating the ineligibility, or even if he knows the law that he knows the effect of it to be such as to make the candidate ineligible. It must, therefore, not only be shown that he knows the disqualifying provision of the law or the decision of the courts which, in fact, made the candidate ineligible, but that he also knew the legal effect of the law or of the decision, and that it had the effect to disqualify the candidate from being elected to the office.

The doctrine of the law in England on this subject cannot be better, more ably, or clearly stated than by quoting from the able speech made by Senator Thurman, of Ohio, in the United States Senate in the Forty-first Congress, in the contested case of Abbott vs. Vance. The Senator in that case used the following language :

Again, in the English cases the intention of the voter to throw away his vote might well enough be imputed to him, because, as I said, it belonged to him ; and if he knowingly and willfully voted for a man whom he knew would never be allowed to hold the office, the natural presumption was that he intended to throw away his vote ; and it is upon this ground, that he did willfully throw away his vote, that his vote is rejected from the count. This can be proved in a sentence almost. If the English voter voted for a disqualified man, not knowing of the disqualification, then the minority man is not elected. We all agree to that. Every case says that. The bare fact, then, of disqualification or disability on the part of the man receiving a majority does not elect the minority man. It is necessary not only that the majority man shall be disqualified, but that the voters shall have had clear, positive, certain knowledge of this disqualification, and yet contumaciously, willfully, and knowingly cast their votes for him ; and when that is the case they may well enough be presumed to have intended the natural result of their act, intended to throw away their votes.

I proceed to show further differences between the English cases and the case before us. In the English cases the voter knew, to a moral certainty, that the person for whom he voted would never be permitted to hold the office. There was nothing in the British constitution, nothing in any act of Parliament, nothing in any judicial or parliamentary decision that held out the least idea or hope that the disqualification of the person voted for would be removed, and he permitted to take and hold the office.

Again, in England numerous decisions had settled the law. The Senator from Wisconsin said it had been settled for three hundred years. I do not care about going into the chronology to know whether that statement was perfectly exact or not; but it was well settled in England that in the elections of the kind that have been referred to, if the voter knowingly cast his vote for a disqualified man that vote would be rejected. Every voter, therefore, casting his vote for a disqualified man, knowing him to be so, knew that the minority man would be seated, and therefore he might be held to have assented to the seating of that minority man. But no such thing was known to the general assembly of North Carolina. They had no right to think any such thing; for from the very foundation of this Government down to this day, at least from 1798 down to this day, there is an unbroken chain of cases in both Houses of Congress against the idea of seating a minority man, while there is not one single instance from the foundation of the Government to this day in which a minority man has been seated in either branch of Congress on the ground that the man who received a majority of the votes was a disqualified person.

Again, further on in the same speech, the distinguished Senator said :

Again, here is another thing that the legislature of North Carolina had a right to know, and that distinguishes this case from the English cases, and that is, that the weight of judicial decision in the United States is decidedly against the claim of a minority man to an election. That is an element wholly wanting in the English cases. In England the entire current of decisions was that the minority man could have the seat. In America the decided weight of judicial, in fact every case but one decided by a supreme court, is against the pretensions of the minority candidate; and that the legislature of North Carolina had a right to look at and to build their expectations upon when they voted for Mr. Vance.

Here, then, are no less than six or seven important, nay almost every one of them conclusive, elements in this case, not one of which was in the English cases; and yet it is contended that the Senate of the United States is to disregard the first principles of republican government and seat a man who did not receive one-third of the votes of the legislature upon the doctrine of the English cases, when those cases and the case before us stand on wholly different foundations.

The Senator in the above quotation stated the case broadly and strongly as to the rule in England. He did not, however, mention one ingredient of importance in the rule as laid down by the decisions in the English courts and in Parliament, namely, that this knowledge upon the part of a voter referred to by him must apply as well to the disqualifying law as to the disqualifying fact. And under the English law a knowledge of the disqualifying fact alone was not sufficient to elect a minority candidate, but he must have actual knowledge of the disqualification in law arising from the existence of such fact. In other words, the doctrine that all men are presumed to know the law does not apply in this class of cases; while, as a general rule, ignorance of the law excuses no one, in this case it does. He must have actual knowledge both of the existence of the disqualifying fact and the disqualifying law.

In the case of The Queen vs. The Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Tewksbury, reported in English Law Reports in 1868, the court held “that the mere knowledge on the part of the electors who voted for B. that he was mayor and returning-officer did not amount to knowledge that he was disqualified in a point of law as a candidate; and therefore their votes were not thrown away so as to make the election fall on the fifth candidate.”

The reason of the rule as held formerly in England is given in a few words in Southwark on Elections, page 259, as follows :

That it is willful obstinacy and misconduct in a voter to give his vote for a person laboring under a known incompetency.

Clarke on Election Committees, page 156, in referring to the English rule, says :

Whenever a candidate is disqualified from sitting in Parliament, and notice thereof is publicly given to the electors, all votes given to such disqualified candidate will be considered as thrown away.

In King vs. Hawkins, 10 East, 210, Lord Ellenborough said the election of a person ineligible was void when the votes were cast after notice of ineligibility.

Heywood on County Elections says, page 535 :

If before the election comes on or a majority has polled, sufficient notice has been publicly given of his disability, the unsuccessful candidate next to him on the poll must ultimately be the sitting member.

Male on Elections, page 336, states the English rule thus :

If an election is made of a person or persons ineligible, such election is void where that ineligibility is clear and pointed out to the electors at the poll.

The English rule, as above stated, is the one laid down in the celebrated case of Wilkes vs. Luttrell. It is believed, however, that during late years the rule in England, as above stated, has undergone a change in the direction of the American doctrine. In a recent case decided in England, The Queen vs. Mayor, 3 Law Reports, Queen's Bench, 629, the rule as to knowledge of the disqualifying law being necessary in England, was stated strongly, as follows: After holding that though the elector had actual notice of the fact which had been adjudged by the courts to disqualify, yet knowledge or notice in the elector of the adjudication could not be presumed, it further said :

It is not enough to show that the voter knew the fact only; but it is necessary to show sufficient to raise a reasonable inference that he knew that the fact amounted to a disqualification.

In the United States the general current of authorities sustains the doctrine that the ineligibility of the majority candidate does not elect the minority candidate, and this without reference to the question as to whether voters knew of the ineligibility of the candidate for whom they voted, and herein is the distinction between the English and American authorities. In England actual knowledge of the existence of a fact and actual knowledge of the disqualifying consequence following from the existence of such fact, it has been held in certain cases, elect the minority candidate. In America the doctrine is that the minority candidate is not elected under any state of circumstances.

This doctrine has been fully declared by the Senate of the United States in several adjudications and by the House of Representatives, as well as by the decision of the supreme courts of many of the States. The only case that has been produced which would give even a shadow of excuse or pretense for the claim of Cronin, the minority candidate in Oregon, to have been elected, is the case of Gulick vs. New, 14 Indiana Reports. That case has been expressly referred to and overruled in argument in the Senate and House of Representatives, as well as by the decisions of the courts of some of the States. By the law of Indiana the mayor of the city of Indianapolis had judicial power in certain classes of criminal cases co-extensive with the county in which the city is situated, and by the constitution of the State he was not eligible to be elected to any other office during the period for which he was elected mayor. Before the expiration of this period, Gulick, the mayor, was elected sheriff of the county of Marion, and the question arose as to his eligibility. The supreme court of Indiana held that the voters in the county, inasmuch as the criminal jurisdiction of the mayor extended all over the county, must take constructive notice of his ineligibility.

The decision was unsupported by any authority whatever, and applying it in this case in its full length and breadth it would furnish no excuse for the action of Governor Grover.

Dr. Watts, the candidate for elector on the republican ticket, was postmaster at a little town, La Fayette, in Yam Hill County. There were eleven other post-offices in the county and one within two miles of La Fayette, and the testimony shows that the whole number of voters receiving their mail-matter at La Fayette did not exceed one hundred, while the entire majority of Dr. Watts in the State was 1,049. If it should be held that the voters within the mail-delivery of Dr. Watts must not only have taken notice of the fact that he was postmaster, but also of his consequent ineligibility under the Constitution, and the votes of such persons should be deducted from his majority, it would still leave him over nine hundred majority among the voters who could not be presumed to have even constructive knowledge of his character as a postmaster and of his consequent ineligibility.

In America the settled doctrine of the law as established not only by the judicial tribunals but by both Houses of Congress is that voting for an ineligible candidate, even with full knowledge of the disqualifying fact and its legal consequences, does not elect the minority candidate where either a majority or plurality of votes is required to elect.

In McCrary's American Law of Elections, page 167, the following is stated on this subject:

We come now to a question which has been much discussed and upon which the authorities are somewhat conflicting; it is this: Suppose the candidate who has received the highest number of votes for an office is ineligible, and that his ineligibility was known to those who voted for him before they cast their votes, are the votes thus cast for him to be thrown out of the count and treated as never cast, and should the minority candidate, if eligible, be declared elected in such a case? No doubt the English rule is that where the majority candidate is ineligible, and sufficient notice of his ineligibility has been given, the person receiving the next highest number of votes being eligible must be declared elected. Great stress is laid upon the fact of notice having been given, and the reason of the English rule is said to be "that it is willful obstinacy and misconduct in a voter to give his vote for a person laboring under a known incompetency." (Southwark on Elections, page 259.) An examination of the English cases will show that in some of them the election was declared void and sent back to the people on the ground that there was not sufficient notice of the incapacity of the successful candidate; while in others the minority candidate was declared elected on the ground that due notice of the ineligibility of the person receiving the majority was given. The following are some of the principal English authorities upon the subject: Rex vs. Monday, Cowp., 537; Rex vs. Coe, Heywood, 361; Rex vs. Bissell, ibid., 360; Rex vs. Parry, 14 East., 549; Regina vs. Cookes, 28 Eng. L. and Eq., 304, Q. B., 406; Heywood on County Elections, 535; Male on Elections, 536; King vs. Hawkins, 10 East., 210; Claridge vs. Evelyn, 5 B. and A. 8; Clarke on Election Committees, page 156; Southwark on Elections, page 259.

Mr. McCrary then cites numerous authorities in support of the position assumed by him to be the rule in this country, in the following language:

Thus, in Commonwealth vs. Cluly, 56 Pa. St., 270, the supreme court of Pennsylvania held that where in an election for sheriff a majority of the votes are cast for a disqualified person, the next in vote is not to be returned as elected; and the supreme court of California, in Saunders vs. Haynes, 13 Cal., 145, holds the same doctrine, and enforces it by cogent reasoning. And in Wisconsin we have the same ruling in State vs. Giles, 1 Chand., 112, and in State vs. Smith, 14 Wis., 497, and see opinion of judges, 38 Maine, 597; State vs. Boal, 46 Mo., 528; Cushing Election Cas., 496, 576, and see State vs. Anderson, 1 Cox, N. J., 318; People vs. Clute, 50 N. Y. But in Indiana the doctrine of the English authorities has been followed. (Gulick vs. New, 14 Ind., 93.)

And then in section 234 the whole matter is summed up by Mr. McCrary as follows:

Thus it will be seen that the weight of authority in this country is decidedly against the adoption here of the English doctrine. And we think that sound policy, as well as reason and authority, forbids the adoption of that doctrine in this country. It is a fundamental idea with us that the majority shall rule, and that a majority or at least a plurality shall be required to elect a person to office by popular vote. An election with us is the deliberate choice of a majority or plurality of the electors. Any doctrine which opens the way for the minority rule, in any case, is anti-republican and anti-American. The English rule, if adhered to, would in many cases result in compelling very large majorities to submit to very small minorities, as an ineligible person may receive, and in many cases has received, a great majority of the votes.

In the case of the Commonwealth vs. Cluly, 56 Pennsylvania State

Reports, which was a case wherein at an election for sheriff in a certain county of Pennsylvania a person receiving the majority of votes was ineligible under the constitution of that State, Justice Strong, now of the Supreme Court of the United States and present member of this Commission, then on the supreme bench of Pennsylvania, in delivering the opinion of the court, said :

Now, on this showing, what interest has the relator in the question he attempts to raise? What more than any inhabitant of Allegheny County, or of the Commonwealth? He was a rival candidate at the election for the office, but he was defeated, with a majority against him of six thousand nine hundred and ninety. Doubtless, if his successful rival is incapable of holding the office on account of the constitutional provisions "that no person shall be twice chosen or appointed sheriff in any term of six years," or for any other reason, and that incapacity entitles him, the relator, to the office, he has an interest. He certainly can have none if a judgment of ouster against Cluly would not give the sheriffalty to him. But surely it cannot be maintained that in any possible contingency the office can be given to him. The votes cast at an election for a person who is disqualified from holding an office are not nullities. They cannot be rejected by the inspectors, or thrown out of the count by the return-judges. The disqualified person is a person still, and every vote thrown for him is formal. Even in England it has been held that votes for a disqualified person are not lost or thrown away so as to justify the presiding officers in returning as elected another candidate having a less number of votes, and if they do so a quo-warranto information will be granted against the person so declared to be elected, on his accepting the office. (See Cole on Quo Warranto Informations, 141, 142; Regina vs. Hiorns, 7 Ad. & E., 960; 3 Nev. & Perry, 184; Rex vs. Bridge, 1 M. & S., 76.)

Under institutions such as ours are there is even greater reason for holding that a minority candidate is not entitled to the office if he who received the largest number of votes is disqualified. We are not informed that there has been any decision strictly judicial upon the subject, but in our legislative bodies the question has been determined. It was determined against a minority candidate in the legislature of Kentucky, in a case in which Mr. Clay made an elaborate report, and was sustained. In 1793, Albert Gallatin, elected a Senator from this State, was declared by the Senate of the United States disqualified because he had not been a citizen of the United States nine years, and his election was declared void for that reason, but the seat was not given to his competitor. Nobody supposed the minority candidate was elected. There have been several other cases of contested elections in which the successful candidates were decided to have been disqualified, and denied their offices.

John Bailey's case is one of them. He was elected to Congress from Massachusetts and refused his seat in 1824. But neither in his case, nor in any other with which we are acquainted, were the votes given to the successful candidate treated as nullities, so as to entitle one who had received a less number of votes to the office. There is a class of cases in England apparently, but not really, asserting otherwise. The earliest of them are referred to by Mr. Butler in his argument in Rex vs. Monday, Cowper, 530. They were followed by Rex vs. Hawkins, 10 East., 211, and Rex vs. Parry, 14 Id., 549. In these cases it is said that if sufficient notice is given of a candidate's disqualification, and notice that votes given for him will be thrown away, votes subsequently cast for him are lost, and another candidate may be returned as elected if he has a majority of good votes after those so lost are deducted. There is more reason for this in England, where the vote is viva voce and the elective franchise belongs to but few, than here, where the vote is by ballot and the franchise well nigh universal. In those cases the notice was brought home to almost every voter, and the number of electors were never greater than three hundred, and generally not more than two dozen. Besides, a man who votes for a person with knowledge that the person is incompetent to hold the office, and that his vote cannot therefore be effective, that it will be thrown away, may very properly be considered as intending to vote a blank, or throw away his vote.

In the supreme court of the State of California, in the case of Saunders vs. Haynes, 13 California Reports, Justice Baldwin, in announcing the opinion of the court, said :

It will be observed that the point of this defense is, that the votes cast for treasurer, supposing he received the highest number, were nullities, because of his assumed ineligibility. But we do not so consider. Although some old cases may be found affirming this doctrine, we think that the better opinion at this day is that it is not correct.

The celebrated controversy in the British Parliament between Wilkes and Luttrell has given rise to much discussion, and the opinions of jurists and statesmen have been somewhat divided. But the prevailing opinion, English and American, of modern times, seems to be against the precedent established in that case. In the case of Whitman and Maloney, (10 Cal.,) Mr. Justice FIELD clearly intimates his opinion in favor of the principle that the votes given for an ineligible candidate are not to be counted for the next highest candidate on the poll. In the State of Wisconsin vs. Giles, (1 Chandler, page 117,) the same doctrine is held, and it is enforced by the judges of the supreme court of Maine in their opinion, to be found in 38 Maine Reports, page 597.

Our legislative precedents seem to be the same way. Upon principle we think the law should so be ruled. An election is the deliberate choice of a majority or plurality of the electoral body. This is evidenced by the votes of the electors. But if a majority of those voting, by mistake of law or fact, happen to cast their votes upon an ineligible candidate, it by no means follows that the next to him on the poll should receive the office. If this be so, a candidate might be elected who received only a small portion of the votes, and who never could have been elected at all but for this mistake. The votes are not less legal votes because given to a person they cannot be counted for; and the person who is the next to him on the list of candidates does not receive a plurality of votes because his competitor was ineligible. The votes cast for the latter, it is true, cannot be counted for him; but that is no reason why they should, in effect, be counted for the former, who possibly could never have received them. It is fairer, more just, and more consistent with the theory of our institutions to hold the votes so cast as merely ineffectual for the purpose of an election, than to give them the effect of disappointing the popular will and electing to office a man whose pretensions the people had designed to reject.

The supreme court of California, with a democratic chief-justice, (Mr. Wallace,) no longer ago than the 13th of last November, in the case of Crawford vs. Dunbar, held to the same doctrine. The chief-justice, in announcing the opinion of the court, refers with unqualified approval to the doctrine laid down in 13 California, that the ineligibility of the person receiving the highest number of votes cannot operate to elect the minority candidate. The facts and conclusions of law in this recent case, as found and enunciated by the supreme court of California in their opinion, are as follows:

1. The office of inspector of customs at Stockton, in the San Francisco collection district, to which there is annexed a salary of $1,000 per annum, is a lucrative office within the meaning of section 21, article 4 of the constitution of the State, and if the defendant, Dunbar, held that office in September, 1875, then he was ineligible to the office of school superintendent in the county of San Joaquin, which is a "civil office of profit under the State," the salary thereof being $1,500 per annum.

2. It is settled here that a mere de facto incumbency of the inspectorship of customs would not render Dunbar ineligible to the office of school superintendent under the disqualifying clause of the constitution referred to. He must have been inspector de jure in order to work that result. (People ex rel. Attorney-General vs. Turner, 20 Cal., 142.)

3. The case made upon the part of the contestant established that Dunbar, on the first Wednesday of September, 1875, was de jure as well as de facto inspector of customs at Stockton. It appeared from the evidence adduced by the contestants that upon the nomination of the collector of customs, and with the approval of the secretary of the treasury, Dunbar had been appointed such inspector of customs, and had taken the oaths, two in number, prescribed by law, and had entered upon the discharge of his official duties, pursuant to his appointment. His appointment and the taking by him of the prescribed oaths of office, the last of them on the 6th day of April, 1875, was established by the records thereof in due form, which, or copies of which, duly certified, were produced from their proper custodian, and it was proven and found by the court below to be the fact, that, pursuant to his appointment, Dunbar, thereafter and on or about the 10th day of April, 1875, took possession of all the public property belonging to the office of inspector of customs of Stockton, theretofore under the control of his predecessor, and then and there entered upon the discharge of the duties pertaining to said office, and that he had not resigned nor been removed therefrom.

4. It further appears by the findings that at the regular election in question, the respondent, Dunbar, received 1,702 votes, the contestant, Crawford, (the next highest vote,) 1,182 votes, and Jenny Phelps 830 votes.

Upon these facts the contestant claims that he is entitled to the office, and should have judgment here to that effect. This claim is in argument put upon the ground that Dunbar, being ineligible, the votes cast for him, though amounting in number to a plurality, were mere nullities, and that the respondent received a majority of the votes over Jenny Phelps, the only other eligible candidate for the office. But this position cannot be maintained. This was directly ruled here, and adhered to upon a petition for a rehearing, in Saunders vs. Haynes, (13 California Reports, 145.) In that case the court said—

And then they go on and quote the portion which has been read from their opinion, and conclude by saying:

It results from this view that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to render judgment vacating the office.

In the case of The People ex rel. Furman et al. vs. Clute, 50 New York Reports, the authorities, English and American, are reviewed, and the doctrine clearly and forcibly stated in the following extract from the opinion:

In the multitude of cases in which the question has arisen, we think that up to this point there is no essential difference of result. All agree that there must be prior notice to or knowledge in the elector of fact and law, to make his vote so ineffectual as that it is thrown away. But some say that if there be a public law declaratory that the existence of a certain fact creates ineligibility in the candidate, the elector having notice of the fact is conclusively presumed in law to have knowledge of the legal rule and to be deemed to have voted in persistent disregard of it. Others deny that the maxim "Inorantia juris excusat neminem" (even with the clause of it, "quod quisque scire tenetur," not often quoted, and of which we are reminded by the very thorough brief of the learned counsel for the relator) can be carried to that length, and insist that there does not apply to this question the rule that all citizens must be held to know the general laws of the land and the special law affecting their own locality.

That maxim, in its proper application, goes to the length of denying to the offender against the criminal law a justification in his ignorance thereof; or to one liable for a breach of contract or for civil tort, the excuse that he did not know of the rule which fixes his liability. It finds its proper application when it says to the elector, who, ignorant of the law which disqualifies, has voted for a candidate ineligible, "Your ignorance will not excuse you and save your vote; the law must stand and your vote in conflict with it must be lost to you." But it does not have a proper application when it is carried further, and charges upon the elector such a presumption of knowledge of fact and of law as finds him full of the intent to vote in the face of knowledge, and to so persist in casting his vote for one for whom he knows that it cannot be counted, as to manifest a purpose to waste it. The maxim itself concedes that there may be a lack of actual knowledge of the law. For it is ignorance of it which shall not excuse. Then the knowledge of the law to which each one is held is a theoretical knowledge; and the doctrine urged upon us would carry a theoretical knowledge of the statute further than goes the statute itself. The statute but makes ineffectual to elect the votes given for one disqualified. The doctrine would make knowledge not actual, of that statute thus limited, waste the votes of the majority and bring about the choice to office by the votes of a minority. We are not cited to, nor do we find, any decision to that extent of any court in this State. The industrious research of the learned counsel for the relator has found some from courts in sister States. Gallick vs. New (14 Indiana, 97) is to that effect. Carson vs. McPhetridge (15 id., 331) follows the last-cited case. Hatcheson vs. Tilden (4 Har. and McH., 270) was a case at nisi prius, and is to that effect. With respect for these authorities, we are obliged to say that they are not sustained by reasoning which draws with it our judgment. Commonwealth vs. Read (2 Ashmead, 261) is also cited. But that was a case of a board of twenty assembling in a room to elect a county treasurer. On motion being made to elect viva voce, a protest was made that the law under which they were acting prescribed a vote by ballot. Thus, actual notice of law and fact was brought directly to each elector before voting. Nineteen persisted in voting viva voce. These were held to be wasted votes. One voted by ballot; and his vote was held to prevail, and the person he voted for to be elected. Commonwealth vs. Cluly (56 Pennsylvania State Reports, 270) is also cited. But the language of the court there is: "The votes cast at an election for a person who is disqualified from holding an office are not nullities. They cannot be rejected by the inspectors or thrown out of the count by the return judges. The disqualified person is a person still, and every vote thrown for him is formal." And that was the case of one who was ineligible by reason of having held the office of sheriff of a county, and became a candidate in the same county for the same office before the lapse of time prescribed by the constitution; a case in its facts quite like this in hand.

The relator also cites many instances of the action of legislative bodies and their committees. As to these, a respectable authority on these questions has remarked "that they cannot be said to afford any precise or useful principle," (1 Peckwell, 500;) and learned counsel, arguing in support of the principle now claimed by the relator, has conceded that "no fixed principle is established by the decision of committees," (Galway Election Cases, 2 Moak English Cases, 714;) and it may safely be said that they are not so conclusive and satisfactory as judicial determinations, as it is difficult to arrive at the exact principle upon which the votes of so many as constitute a legislative body are put. Besides that, they are not uniform, but quite diverse in their results, as appears from the citations of the counsel of the relator, and the instances noted in 56 Pennsylvania State Reports, (supra.)

We have consulted many of the authorities cited to us from the English books, and in them it will be found, we think, that where it was held that votes for an ineligible person would be treated as thrown away, it was not extended beyond cases in which there was actual notice of fact and of law to the voters before their votes were cast.

And there are American authorities which hold that if a majority of those voting, by mistake of law or fact, happen to cast their votes upon an ineligible candidate, it by no means follows that the next to him in poll shall receive the office. (Saunders vs. Haynes, 13 California, 145; State vs. Giles, 1 Chandler, [Wisconsin,] 112; State vs. Smith, 14 Wisconsin, 497.) And in Dillon on Municipal Corporations (page 176 section 135,) it is stated that unless the votes for an ineligible person are expressly declared to be void, the effect of such person receiving a majority of the votes cast is, according to the weight of American authority and the reason of the matter, (in view of our mode of election, without previous binding nominations, by secret ballot, leaving each elector to vote for whomsoever he pleases,) that a new election must be had, and not to give the office to the qualified person having the next highest number of votes. And this view is sustained by a preponderance of the authorities cited by the author in the foot-note, some of which are cited above.

We think that the rule is this: The existence of the fact which disqualifies and of the law which makes that fact operate to disqualify must be brought home so closely and so clearly to the knowledge or notice of the elector as that to give his vote therewith indicates an intent to waste it.

The following letter, read during the debate in the Senate over the Oregon electoral controversy, will indicate the opinion of the Hon. Jeremiah S. Black, late Attorney-General under President Buchanan, and present counsel of the democracy of the nation upon this question. It reads as follows :

HOLLIDAYSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA, December 9, 1876.

DEAR SIR: At the October election of 1846, Ephraim Galbreath was the whig candidate for the office of recorder of Blair County, and died on the morning of the election before the opening of the polls. It was found by the return judges that a majority of the votes for recorder were cast for Galbreath, and at the October term of the court of common pleas, held by Hon. Jeremiah S. Black, then president judge, the democratic candidate, Samuel Smith, appeared and asked to be qualified as recorder, on the ground that the votes cast for Galbreath, having been given for a dead man, should be disregarded, and the votes given for the claimant only should be counted.

Judge Black referred to the case of Mr. Wilkes, in the British Parliament, and denounced the seating of Luttrell as a high-handed outrage. He followed the line of argument of those who opposed the seating of Luttrell and declared emphatically that two things were settled by the election in question: first, that the people did want Galbreath; secondly, that they did not want Smith.

The result was that the democratic governor, Shunk, I think, filled the vacancy by the appointment of John M. Gibbony.

Truly yours,

SAM'L S. BLAIR.

HON. SIMON CAMERON.

But the rule upon this subject established by the judicial tribunals of this country has also received the sanction of the National House of Representatives, and of the Senate of the United States as well. In the case of Samuel E. Smith vs. John Young Brown, contestant for a seat in the House of Representatives in 1868, from the second district of Kentucky, the doctrine that the minority candidate is elected when the person receiving the majority of the votes was disqualified was repudiated. In that case Brown received 8,922 votes; Smith, 2,816. Brown was ineligible, and Smith claimed that he for that reason, although receiving a minority of the votes, was elected. In the able report made in that case by Mr. Dawes of the Election Committee, after referring to the English doctrine, as above stated, the following language occurs, 2 Bartlett's Digest of Election Cases, pages 402 and 403 :

But the committee do not find any such law regulating elections in this country in either branch of Congress, or in any State legislature, as far as they have been able to examine. Their attention has been called to no case, and it was not claimed before the committee that, as yet, this rule by which one receiving only a minority of the votes actually cast had been adjudged elected, had ever been applied in this country.

On the other hand, there have been many cases of alleged ineligibility in both branches of Congress since the formation of the Government, in some of which seats have been declared vacant on that ground, and in which, had there existed in this country any such rule, it certainly would have been resorted to. The very first contested election, at the first session of the First Congress, in 1789, Ramsey vs. Smith, (1 Contested Elections, 23,) was based on alleged ineligibility. The case was very ably and elaborately debated by Mr. Madison and others, and neither Ramsey nor any one in his behalf claimed for a moment that the ineligibility of Smith, who had received a majority of the votes, elected Ramsey, the minority candidate.

In 1793, Albert Gallatin was elected a Senator from Pennsylvania before he had been nine years a citizen of the United States. After a very lengthy discussion, (1 Contested Elections, 85,) his seat was declared vacant. In 1807, (1 Contested Elections, 224,) sundry electors of Maryland memorialized Congress to declare vacant the seat of Philip Barton Key, one of the Representatives from that State, because of alleged ineligibility arising from non-residence. Much time of the House was occupied in deciding the case, but no one appeared or found an advocate as a minority candidate. In 1824, on a like memorial, the seat of John Bailey, of Massachusetts, was for a like ineligibility declared vacant and a new election ordered, without a claim on the part of or in behalf of a minority candidate. In 1849, the seat of James Shields, a Senator from Illinois, was declared vacant because of ineligibility, and the right of a minority candidate was not even raised; and Mr. Brown himself was elected to the Thirty-sixth Congress before he had reached the age of twenty-five years, and therefore when he was ineligible and could not take the oath of office. At the opening of that Congress there was a protracted struggle for power, and the organization of the House was not effected for several months, after failing for lack of a single vote. There was a very strong temptation in every quarter to secure every possible vote; yet not only did no one appear to claim, or was the claim made, in behalf of any one as a minority candidate, that votes cast for Mr. Brown were to be thrown away and himself seated in his place; but at the second session Mr. Brown, having become of age, took his seat unchallenged, by force of the very votes cast for him when he was, in fact, ineligible. In very many other cases ineligibility has been discussed and passed upon without ever mooted the question now under consideration.

If any such rule as is now claimed, by which a candidate with a minority of the votes is put in a seat vacated for ineligibility, had ever obtained foothold in this country, this uniform current of decisions could not have run undisturbed through all Congresses from 1789 till the present time.

* * * * *

The committee are of opinion that a recurrence to the origin and history of this rule in the British Parliament will show the impossibility of its application to a case in the American House of Representatives. Parliament has no limitation of written constitution upon its powers. Sir Edward Coke says that "its power and jurisdiction are so transcendent and absolute that it cannot be confined, either for causes or persons, within any bounds."

Blackstone says "it hath sovereign and uncontrollable authority in making, conforming, enlarging, restraining, abrogating, repealing, reviewing, and expounding of laws concerning matters of all possible denominations, ecclesiastical or temporal, civil, military, maritime, or criminal—this being the place where that absolute despotic power which must in all governments reside somewhere is intrusted by the constitution of these kingdoms."

And either house of Parliament may, upon proof of any crime, adjudge any member disabled and incapable to sit as a member.—1 Black. Com., page 163.

With this power, called by some omnipotent, Parliament grants and takes away the right to vote at its pleasure, erects and destroys constituencies when and where it pleases.

If there has been bribery at an election, it sometimes fines and sometimes disfranchises a whole constituency.

Indeed, it is not the theory of the British government that power originates with the people. In theory the right of the monarch is a divine right, and he has graciously conceded from time to time to the people whatever share in the government they possess.

It matters not to the theory that the people, in point of fact, wrenched all this power out of the hands of the monarch; the conclusion is very easy, that what has been conceded to the people can, at pleasure, be modified, limited, or even taken away.

Parliament has, therefore, exercised its omnipotence with an exceedingly lavish hand in the matter of elections to its own body, declaring by statute, George II, chapter 24, that "the right of voting for the future shall be allowed according to the last determination of the House of Commons concerning it," and, 34 George III, chapter 83, "that all decisions of committees of the House of Commons with respect to the right of election, or of choosing or appointing the returning-officer, shall be final and conclusive upon the subject forever." Thus they have made the rule here contended for a statute of the realm.

There certainly can be no need of argument to show that such law can find no place in our system.

In concluding this report, which received the sanction of the House of Representatives by a very large majority, Mr. Dawes employed the following language:

The committee are therefore of opinion that the case does not come within the law of the British Parliament, for want of a sufficient notice to the electors at the polls of an ineligibility known and fixed by law; that the law of the British Parliament in this particular has never been adopted in this country, and is wholly inapplicable to the system of government under which we live.

The will of the majority, expressed in conformity with established law, is the very basis on which rest the foundations of our institutions, and any attempt to substitute therefor the will of a minority is an attack upon the fundamental principles of the government, and if successful will prove their overthrow.

In the case of Abbott vs. Vance, of North Carolina, for a seat in the Senate of the United States, the question was elaborately and ably discussed, as has been already shown, and the decision of the Senate was against the doctrine that the minority candidate is elected where the person receiving a majority of the votes is ineligible, and in the report of the committee in that case, which received the able advocacy of Senator Thurman and others, and which was adopted by the Senate, it was distinctly stated that the fact that the voters have notice of the ineligibility of the candidate at the time they cast their votes for him makes no difference.

The concurrent authority, therefore, of the judicial and legislative tribunals of this country is in direct contravention of the position assumed by Governor Grover in holding that Cronin, the minority candidate, was elected and in issuing him a certificate, and not only so, but even were the rule as formerly held in England as above stated to obtain, as it does not, it would not furnish the executive authority the slightest vindication for his action in this regard under the clearly established circumstances of this case.

I now pass to the question as to whether a person who is ineligible under the Constitution to be appointed an elector, and who is a candidate before the people, receives a majority of all the votes cast, and is so officially declared by the proper canvassing officer, and who takes his seat in the college of electors, participates in its proceedings and casts his vote for President and Vice-President, the question of his ineligibility not having prior to that time been passed upon by any competent tribunal, is a mere usurper or an officer de facto acting under color of title. If the former, it must be conceded that all his acts are absolutely void. If the latter, as I insist he clearly is, then his acts are not void; and while his right to act might have been questioned in a competent tribunal prior to the meeting of the college of electors, it cannot now be questioned by any power on earth.

It is true the Constitution of the United States declares that no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector; but suppose the people of a State, in ignorance of both the disqualifying fact and the consequences attaching to it, by their unanimous votes or by a plurality, as they may in Oregon, appoint such a person as an elector, and his right to be appointed is never questioned or adjudicated upon by any tribunal having authority, and he takes his seat in the electoral college unchallenged and participates in its proceedings and casts the vote of his people and party for President and Vice-President, the record of the fact is made up and transmitted to the President of the Senate, and the college of electors, having lived its time, its existence expiring by limitation of law, dissolves and is an electoral college no more forever, nor are its individual members any longer presidential electors, they being functus officio. Can it be said in such a case that the vote given by such ineligible person is void as to third persons and the public; that the people, upon the one hand, who have acted in perfect good faith and in entire ignorance of the ineligibility of the elector, are to be deprived of their voice in the selection of a President and Vice-President, and the candidates for President and Vice-President, on the other hand, for whom such vote was cast, to be deprived of the benefit of it?

It would seem that such a doctrine would be at variance with the well-settled principles of law applicable to the acts of de facto officers acting under color of title in their relation to and effect upon third persons and the public. McCrary, in his American Law of Elections, in speaking of the acts of officers de facto acting under color of title, after referring to several authorities, in section 77 of that work uses the following language:

But in the case of Barnes vs. Adams, which arose in the Forty-first Congress, (2 Bartlett, 760,) the question was reviewed at length, and most of the cases arising both in Congress and the courts were cited and examined, and the conclusion was reached both by the committee and by the House that in order to give validity to the official acts of an officer of an election, so far as they affect third parties and the public, and in the absence of fraud, it is only necessary that such officer shall have color of authority. It is sufficient if he be an officer de facto, and not a mere usurper.

The report in this case, after quoting from numerous decisions, both in the House and in the courts of this country, continues as follows.

Here Mr. McCrary quotes from the report of the committee of the House of Representatives in the case of Barnes vs. Adams, which quotation is as follows:

The question, therefore, regarded in the light of precedent or authority alone, would stand about as follows:

The judicial decisions are all to the effect that the acts of officers de facto so far as they affect third parties or the public, in the absence of fraud, are as valid as those of an officer de jure.

The decisions of this House are to some extent conflicting; the point has seldom been presented upon its own merits, separated from questions of fraud; and in the few cases where this seems to have been the case the rulings are not harmonious.

In one of the most recent and important cases, (Blair vs. Barrett,) in which there was an exceedingly able report, the doctrine of the courts as above stated is recognized and indorsed.

The question is therefore a settled question in the courts of the country, and is, so far as this House is concerned, to say the least, an open one.

Your committee feel constrained to adhere to the law as it exists, and is administered in all the courts of the country, not only because of the very great authority by which it is supported, but for the further reason, as stated in the outset, that we believe the rule to be most wise and salutary. The officers of election are chosen of necessity from among all classes of the people; they are numbered in every State by thousands; they are often men unaccustomed to the formalities of legal proceedings. Omissions and mistakes in the discharge of their ministerial duties are almost inevitable. If this House shall establish the doctrine that an election is void because an officer thereof is not in all respects duly qualified or because the same is not conducted strictly according to law, notwithstanding it may have been a fair and free election, the result will be very many contests, and, what is worse, injustice will be done in many cases. It will enable those who are so disposed to seize upon mere technicality, in order to defeat the will of the majority.

Mr. McCrary concludes his reference to this case by saying:

The report of the committee in this case was adopted by the House nem. con., after a full discussion, (Congressional Globe, July, 1870, pages 5179 to 5193,) and the doctrine there asserted may now be regarded as the settled law of the House.

Again, in section 79 of the same work, American Law of Elections, the following statement of the rule as established by the judicial courts is made :

In the courts of the country the ruling has been uniform, and the validity of the acts of officers of election who are such de facto only, so far as they affect third persons and the public, is nowhere questioned. The doctrine that whole communities of electors may be disfranchised for the time being and a minority candidate forced into an office because one or more of the judges of election have not been duly sworn, or were not duly chosen, or do not possess all the qualifications requisite for the office, finds no support in the decisions of our judicial tribunals.

In the case of The People vs. Cook, 4 Selden New York Reports, the court says :

The neglect of the officers of the election to take any oath would not have vitiated the election. It might have subjected those officers to an indictment if the neglect was willful. The acts of public officers being in by color of an election or appointment are valid, so far as the public is concerned.

Again :

An officer de facto is one who comes into office by color of a legal appointment or election. His acts in that capacity are as valid, so far as the public is concerned, as the acts of an officer de jure. His acts in that capacity cannot be inquired into collaterally.

In the case of Baird vs. Bank of Washington, in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, 11 S. & R., 414, the court said :

The principle of colorable election holds not only in regard to the right of electing, but of being elected. A person indisputably ineligible may be an officer de facto by color of election.

This case, it will be observed, is directly in point upon the proposition that a person "indisputably ineligible" may become an officer de facto by color of election, and, such being the case, it follows, under the rule as it exists in this country, as before stated, that his acts as such officer de facto are valid as to third persons and the public. Again, in the case of Pritchell et al. vs. The People, in the supreme court of the State of Illinois, 1 Gilmer's Reports, 529, the same doctrine was held. The court, in their opinion in that case, use the following language :

It is a general principle of the law that ministerial acts of an officer de facto are valid and effectual when they concern the public and the rights of third persons, although it may appear that he has no legal or constitutional right to the office. The interests of the community imperatively require the adoption of such a rule.

The same court, in the case of The People vs. Ammons, 5 Gilmer, 107, enunciated the same doctrine and used this language :

The proof offered would have shown that he was an officer de facto, and as such his acts were as binding and valid when the interests of third persons or the public were concerned, as if he had been an officer de jure.

The supreme court of the State of Missouri, in the case of Saint Louis County vs. Sparks, 10 Missouri, 121, say :

When the appointing power has made an appointment, and a person is appointed who has not the qualifications required by law, the appointment is not therefore void. The person appointed is de facto an officer ; his acts in the discharge of his duties are valid and binding. * * * A statute prescribing qualifications to an office is merely directory, and, although an appointee does not possess the requisite qualifications his appointment is not therefore void, unless it is so expressly enacted.

The supreme court of the State of New York, in the case of The People vs. Cook, 14 Barbour, 259, in discussing this question, says that the principle is so well established as to have become elementary, and uses the following language :

The rule is well settled by long series of adjudications, both in England and this country, that acts done by those who are officers de facto are good and valid as regards the public and third persons who have an interest in their acts, and the rule has been applied to acts judicial as well as to those ministerial in their character. This doctrine has been held and applied to almost every conceivable case. It cannot be profitable to enter into any extended discussion of the cases. The principle has become elementary, and the cases are almost endless in which the rule has been applied.

In the case of McGregor vs. Balch, 14 Vermont, 428, it was held that, although a person cannot legally hold the office of justice of the peace at all while holding the office of assistant postmaster under the United States, yet having entered the former office under the forms of law he was a justice of the peace de facto, and his acts as such were valid as to third persons and the public.

These cases go to the extent, therefore, of holding that if a person who is ineligible to be elected or appointed to office is voted for by the people, and receives the requisite number of votes to elect or appoint in case he had been eligible, and enters upon the duties of the office, he is not a mere usurper but an officer de facto acting under color of title, and that his acts as such officer, in the absence of fraud, are binding upon third persons and the public. In all these cases and in others that might be cited, distinction is clearly drawn between the case of a person who is a mere usurper, and whose acts are absolutely void, and that of a person who, although ineligible or disqualified, acts under color of right, and is therefore an officer de facto, whose acts are not void, but binding upon third persons and the public.

But it is said that the clause in the Constitution of the United States, conferring upon the States the power to appoint electors, not only imposes a personal disqualification on a certain class of persons, rendering them ineligible to be appointed electors, but limits and circumscribes the power of the States in the matter of appointment as to such persons by the very terms of the grant, and that therefore, if the State appoint a person falling within this class, in reference to which it is claimed no grant of power is given to the State to appoint, such appointment is void and the person so appointed would not be an officer either de jure or de facto, but a mere usurper. But the answer to this is twofold. In the first place, even admitting that the true construction of the constitutional provisions is that the grant is circumscribed and confers no power on the State to appoint except from a certain class of persons, or rather that no power is conferred upon the State to appoint from a certain class, is there any greater or weightier reason for holding that a person actually appointed by a State from among the prohibited class, and who, clothed with all the insignia of office, entered upon and discharged the duties of the same, should not be considered an officer de facto acting under color of title, than a person who might be appointed, but who was laboring under a constitutional disability preventing him from exercising the duties of an office? It seems to me not. In either event, the person is constitutionally prohibited from holding the office. In either event, he comes into possession of it under color of legal authority, surrounded by all the insignia attaching to office.

But again, suppose there is a grant of power to the State to appoint electors, but that this grant is limited as to persons, excepting from its scope a certain class of persons—Federal office-holders for instance; who must determine this question of fact in the first instance as to whether a person about to be appointed comes within the prohibited class? Clearly the State. It has jurisdiction to appoint, and jurisdiction necessary to pass upon and determine the question in the first instance as to whether a person is or is not within the class to which the power of the State attaches; and having jurisdiction to pass upon this question, a mistake in the matter by appointing a person really within the prohibited class, would not be a void act upon the part of the State, but simply voidable by the decision of a competent tribunal made at any time before the act, which the elector was appointed to perform, was accomplished; and if no such decision is made, his act is the act of an officer de facto and cannot afterward be questioned.

In such a case rights have vested, by virtue of the act of a person, acting in the capacity of an elector under an appointment from the only power authorized to appoint electors, and such a person is no usurper; his acts are not void.

But another, and it seems a conclusive answer, is that this provision of the Constitution is not self-executing, that it requires legislation to enforce it, and no such legislation has ever been enacted.

In the present case, therefore, conceding for the argument that Watts was ineligible at the time of election, that he was not within the class from which the State was authorized to appoint, and admitting that the fact of his ineligibility was not questioned or adjudicated upon by any competent tribunal, (and I will speak of that hereafter,) having, as is conceded, received 1,049 more votes than his competitor, and having acted as an elector in the electoral college and voted for President and Vice-President, such vote cannot now be questioned either by the judicial courts, by Congress, by the electoral tribunal, or any other power on earth, so as to invalidate the vote thus cast by him as an elector for President and Vice-President.

The legislature of Oregon in its legislation upon the subject of vacancies in office treats the election or appointment of an ineligible person to office in that State as merely voidable and not void, and provides that a vacancy shall occur in the office to which he was elected upon the decision of a competent tribunal declaring void such election or appointment.

Section 45 of the election laws of Oregon, relating to vacancies in office, reads as follows :

Every office shall become vacant on the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office :

1. The death of the incumbent.
2. His resignation.
3. His removal.
4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village for which he shall have been elected or appointed, or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged.
5. His conviction of an infamous crime, or of any offense involving a violation of his oath.
6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law.
7. The decision of a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment.

From the provisions contained in this last subdivision of the section relating to vacancies, it would seem conclusive that the legislature contemplated that an office might be filled by a person whose election or appointment was really void by reason of ineligibility or any other cause, until the decision of a competent tribunal was had declaring such election or appointment void. The legislature does not state what the competent tribunal is. Unquestionably, however, under the constitution of the State of Oregon the only competent tribunal would be a judicial tribunal.

I come now to the question as to the powers and duties of the electors present, under the statutes of Oregon, to supply by appointment any deficiency in the number of electors that may exist on the day fixed for the meeting of the college.

And first, admitting Watts to have been ineligible to be appointed an elector, and that the election is the appointment within the meaning of that term as employed in the Constitution, did his resignation as such elector, tendered by him to the electors present on the day of the meeting of the electoral college, create such a vacancy as could, under the statutes of Oregon, be filled by the electors present? I submit with all confidence that it did create such vacancy, and that the same was lawfully filled by the electors present in the election of Watts.

The statute of Oregon, section 2 of the act of 1864, is as follows:

The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day; and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill by viva voce and plurality of votes such vacancy in the electoral college; and when all the electors shall appear or the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled as above provided, such electors shall perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

In title 7, section 45, general laws of Oregon, page 709, it is provided that—

Every office shall become vacant on the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office:

1. The death of the incumbent.
2. His resignation.
3. His removal.
4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village for which he shall have been elected or appointed, or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged.
5. His conviction of an infamous crime or of any offense involving a violation of his oath.
6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law.
7. The decision of a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment.

It is contended in justification of the action of Governor Grover that under the circumstances of this case there was no vacancy in the office of elector that could be filled by the electors present under the provisions of the statute quoted; in other words, that Watts being, as claimed, ineligible to be appointed, and the election being the appointment, there was in this case no election; and there being a failure to elect there was no vacancy created within the legal definition of that term as employed in the statute. Doubtless, the very strongest possible presentation of argument in favor of such a position is made by Governor Grover himself, in a printed pamphlet entitled "Executive decision by the Governor of Oregon in the matter of eligibility of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for 1876; printed at Salem, Oregon: Mart. V. Brown, State printer, 1876." If the position assumed by Governor Grover cannot be maintained by the arguments presented in this "executive decision," it is fair to presume that it cannot be maintained at all.

What, then, is the result in the way of argument upon the part of the governor in defense of the position assumed by him? It is this and this only: There can be no vacancy in the office of presidential elector in Oregon, "occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise," unless there has been an incumbent; and, as Watts never was, as argued, an incumbent, therefore no vacancy can be created in the office either by his death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise. I quote the argument in the governor's own words, copied from the executive decision referred to:

Watts being ineligible to be elected, is there a vacancy in the electoral college to be filled by the other electors? What constitutes a vacancy in office in this State?

In title 6, section 48, General Laws of Oregon, page 576, of vacancies, we have the following provisions:

"Sec. 48. Every office shall become vacant on the occurring of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office:

- "1. The death of the incumbent;
- "2. His (the incumbent's) resignation;
- "3. His (the incumbent's) removal;
- "4. His (the incumbent's) ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village for which he shall have been elected or appointed, or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged;
- "5. His (the incumbent's) conviction of an infamous crime or of any offense involving a violation of his oath;
- "6. His (the incumbent's) refusal or neglect to take his oath of office or give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law;
- "7. The decision of a competent tribunal declaring void his (the incumbent's) election or appointment."

The word "incumbent's" placed in parentheses in this quotation from the code of Oregon is placed there by me to indicate clearly the construction which is given the law.

There can be no vacancy in office in this State unless there has been an incumbent and that incumbent has gone out of office.

An "incumbent," says Webster, is a person who is in the present possession of a benefice or any office.

Bouvier says: "It signifies one who is in possession of an office;" and Sawyer, C. J., in the case of The People vs. Tilfon, 37 Cal., 617, defines a vacancy as follows: "A vacancy, in the statutory sense, is when the party enters upon the duties of the office and afterward dies, resigns, or in any manner ceases to be an incumbent of the office before the expiration of the term."

In Comm. vs. Harley, 9 Penn., 513, it is decided that even death, after a lawful election and before qualification, does not create an incumbent of the office, nor does it create a vacancy which can be filled by appointment where the law authorizes vacancies to be so filled. In this case Watts was never an incumbent of the office of elector. His approach to it was absolutely barred by the Constitution. * * * On the subject of filling vacancies in the college of electors in this State the statute (Code, page 598, section 59) provides that—

"If there should be a vacancy in the office of elector occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college."

As far as Watts is concerned, there has been no "death," no "refusal to act," no "neglect to attend," and there has been no vacancy "otherwise," for the vital reason that he has never been an incumbent of office. It is, then, clear that there has occurred no vacancy that can be filled by the other electors under the authority of the statutes of Oregon.

It will be observed that it is contended by Governor Grover that no person is an incumbent of an office until he is not only elected to such office, even where there is no question as to his eligibility, but has also qualified and taken possession of the same, until he has entered upon the duties of his office. In other words, even admitting him to have been eligible to be appointed an elector and to have been duly elected, still, unless he had first actually taken possession of the office, in the language of one of the opinions quoted "entered upon the duties of the same," no vacancy could have been created by his "death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise."

That the authorities quoted by the governor have no sort of reference to a case like the one before us, and can possibly have no bearing whatever upon the construction of the Oregon statute, is so transparent as to meet with the instantaneous comprehension of the most casual observer, either lawyer or layman, and to scarcely need more than a passing notice. The argument of the governor proves too much, and its application ingulfs him in inextricable confusion. His argument would prevent a vacancy, such as could be filled by the electors present, in a case where a person who was clearly eligible and who had been legally elected should, before the meeting of the electoral college and before he had entered upon the duties of his office, either have died, or for any cause refused to act, resigned, or neglected to attend. Not having been an incumbent, says the governor, which as construed by him and his authorities—and I do not question the construction, but simply its application to the case—means a person in possession of an office, one who has entered upon the duties of an office, no vacancy therefore, it is claimed, within the meaning of the Oregon statute, could be created that could be filled by the electors present.

The clause in the Oregon statute as to vacancies in the office of elector and the manner in which they shall be filled, is evidently different from most of the clauses in constitutions, Federal and State, and in statutes generally. It is broad and comprehensive, including every possible vacancy that may occur, and not merely those that happen when an incumbent in possession of the office and exercising its duties, for any reason refuses to act or is disabled from acting further, but those occasioned by the "death, resignation, and refusal to act, or otherwise," which includes the case of a failure to appoint. Hence the technical, legal construction as given by courts to the term "vacancy," where standing alone in constitutions and statutes without words of definition or construction as to what it means and is intended to include, could have no kind of application to the case under consideration.

It has been said that the words "occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise" in the Oregon statute are words of limitation, contracting rather than enlarging the definition of the term "vacancy." This is not so. They are words of definition and not of limitation. The terms "vacancy" and "all vacancies," as used in constitutions and statutes, had by some judicial tribunals (although such does not appear to be the weight of authority) been construed to mean only such as were created in a case where an incumbent in the actual possession of an office, exercising its duties, had either died, resigned, or become legally disabled. And it was to obviate the application of any such construction of the terms "vacancy" and "all vacancies" that the legislature of the State of Oregon gave definition to the word "vacancy" in the electoral statute, and to the end that it might not be limited merely to cases where there had been an incumbent, an elector actually in possession of the office, exercising its duties as such incumbent, who had either died, resigned, or become legally disabled.

The reason why a different rule should have been established in reference to filling vacancies in the office of presidential elector from that relating to many if not all other offices, is apparent. While the office of presidential elector is one of the most important created by the Constitution of our country, it is the shortest lived. The term of office is confined to less than a single day. He enters upon its duties, takes possession of it, becomes an incumbent in it at twelve o'clock meridian on a certain day, and with the performance of his duty (which usually does not require more than an hour) his term by operation of law ceases; his official robes drop. He is functus officio and a private citizen. To hold, therefore, that, under the Oregon statute, the electors present could only fill such vacancies as might by "death, resignation, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise," occur after twelve, meridian, on the day of meeting, after they had entered upon their duties and become incumbents, would be to insist upon an absurdity so glaring on the very face of the proposition as to put to shame and confusion the lawyer that would seriously insist upon it. If there can, as contended by Governor Grover, be no vacancy such as the electors present could fill unless there had first been an attendance of the elector who had entered upon the duties of his office and become an incumbent of the office, then why, I would inquire, did the legislature of Oregon provide that the "electors present should immediately proceed to fill by viva voce and plurality of votes any vacancy caused," among other things, by neglect to attend or otherwise? Are these words meaningless? Are they to be eliminated from the statute, and their force obscured and buried under a legal interpretation of the term "vacancy," when standing alone?

But again, the governor in his decision assumes that no person but one who is eligible to be appointed can become an incumbent. And yet the very statute he quotes, subdivision seven relating to vacancies, contemplates that a person whose election is void may become an incumbent and exercise the duties of an office. And although his election is void, no vacancy occurs until by the decision of a competent tribunal such election is declared to be void. But not only so, says Governor Grover in his "executive decision," but "no vacancy could be created in the office of presidential elector which the electors present could fill, unless there had been an incumbent." If this is true, then, although Watts had been clearly eligible, there had been no question about the legality of his election, yet, if before he had entered upon the duties of his office as elector and become an incumbent, which he could not do before the 6th day of December, he had died, resigned, neglected to attend, or refused to act, no vacancy, according to the law and logic of the governor, would have been created which the electors present could fill.

Should it be held, therefore, that the appointment of Watts was not merely voidable but absolutely void—and I insist in any possible view of the case it was but voidable—and that there was, as to him, a failure to elect, still under the statute of Oregon, broad and comprehensive as it is, the electors present had the right, and it was their duty, to fill the vacancy occasioned by such failure to elect. If his appointment was merely voidable and might have been declared void under the statute by a competent tribunal, but was not so declared, then he could rightfully act in the college of electors either under his original appointment by the people as an elector or by virtue of his appointment by the electors present when they accepted his resignation.

Or, again, should it, for the sake of argument, be conceded that Watts was not appointed and that Cronin was—and it is also conceded, as it must be as a matter of fact, that Odell, Cartwright, and Cronin did not act together as an electoral college, but that Odell and Cartwright, a majority of the college, acted together with Watts, whom they elected to fill the vacancy; and Cronin, a minority of one, acting by himself, and declaring or attempting to declare, and filling or attempting to fill two vacancies—which, in such case, is the legally constituted college? There can be but one college of electors in a State, and under these circumstances the former must be held to be that one. The only record the law contemplates as to vacancies in the electoral college is the record made by the electors themselves: the certificate of the organized tribunal, the electoral college. This is not merely the only record, but it is, as I confidently insist, conclusive upon that subject; and Odell and Cartwright being a majority of the electors constituting the electoral college in Oregon, whose title is indisputable, questioned by no one, not even by the governor in his certificate, but by it approved, their certificate as to the fact that there was a vacancy, and that such vacancy was filled by them, is conclusive, not only against Cronin, but all other persons, the State, the General Government, Congress, and the electoral tribunal as well.

This appointment to fill a vacancy is an appointment by the State, in the manner directed by the legislature, and in pursuance also of the Constitution of the United States and the act of Congress; and as the canvass of the secretary of state is conclusive as to those appointed by the people, so the certificate of the electoral college is conclusive as to the fact of vacancy as well as to the person appointed to fill it. And it is immaterial to inquire or know whether such vacancy was occasioned because Cronin did not act with the majority or because Watts resigned. And the fact that Cronin set up or attempted to organize a college of his own, filled or attempted to fill two vacancies, and voted for President and Vice-President in connection with the persons brought to his assistance, must be held to be conclusive against Cronin that he did not act or attempt to act with Odell and Cartwright; and in that event, conceding that Cronin was elected, there was a vacancy which was legally filled by Odell and Cartwright, and the record made by them is the record of the real electoral college. If Cronin was appointed an elector, then it was his duty to act with the majority, and that he did not act is conclusively shown in the fact that he organized a college of his own. It will not do for Cronin to say that Odell and Cartwright refused to act with him or to permit him to act with them. He is in no position to make any such claim, nor is his party. If such had been the fact—and it clearly was not—Cronin instead of attempting to set up a college of his own should have contented himself with insisting upon his right to act with Odell and Cartwright; and, had they refused to act with him, then presented and filed his protest and cast his vote for President and Vice-President, and stood upon his rights as a member of that, the only electoral college in the State. It is clear, however, as before stated, that all the acts of Cronin at the meeting of the electoral college were inconsistent with any claim that may be made that Odell and Cartwright refused to recognize him or to act with him. They demanded an exhibition of his credentials to act as an elector, that they might determine as to their validity and as to his right to act as an elector. This he peremptorily refused to do; and it is no excuse to say that the reason he refused to produce or exhibit his credentials was from a fear, imaginary or otherwise, that he would not be treated fairly by the majority of the electors. He had no right in law or, so far as the testimony shows, in fact, to act upon any such presumption, although he held in his hands three certificates from the governor, each one containing the three names of Odell, Cartwright, and Cronin, yet, against the repeated requests of Cartwright and Odell to produce them or exhibit them for the guidance of the college, and that they might determine as to his right to a seat in the college, he kept them in his pocket, only reading one of them in part, as testified to by the republican electors, and in full as testified to by democrats present who were not electors, and who had no right to be present, and peremptorily refused to deliver any of them to either Cartwright or Odell. He might have delivered one to each, and had they then refused to act with him or treat him fairly, he would have had in his possession the third certificate from the governor showing the fact that he had been certified to as one of the electors for whatever it might have been worth. Such a course, however, upon his part would have been inconsistent with the harmony of the conspiracy planned in New York and executed in Oregon, conceived in corruption and brought forth in shameless, unblushing fraud, with a view of robbing the majority of the people of the State of their choice, as expressed at the ballot-box, for President and Vice-President of these United States.

Upon this point, that Cronin's own version may be seen, I quote from his testimony. After describing the situation of the parties in the room of the electoral college, those present, &c., Mr. Cronin said :

After we had taken seats as I have described, Mr. Cartwright demanded those certificates of me. I told him he should not have them. He remarked, "We have as much right to those as you have, and there are two of us, and we have a right to those certificates, and we want them." I repeated again that he should not have them; that the certificates were of no use any way except to attach to our return. He replied to that, as near as I can recollect, "We want those certificates, and why don't you give them to us?" I replied by saying, "I don't think you intend to treat me fairly. In the first place here is a United States marshal who takes possession of the college; then Mr. Odell takes the key; and you might as well understand first as last that you shall not have those certificates." About that time, I think, Dr. Watts got up and read his resignation, and his resignation was accepted, and he was elected to fill that vacancy, as they called it. I then remarked, "Gentlemen, you refuse to act with me?" I am quite positive that Mr. Odell said, "You give us those certificates; we have got nothing to act on; we want those certificates," or words to that effect. I suppose I might as well say here that I did not hear Mr. Cartwright or Mr. Odell in terms refuse to act with me.

* * * * *

Q. Why did you not produce the certificates and put them on the table?

A. Because I did not propose that Mr. Cartwright, Mr. Odell, or Mr. Watts should get those certificates.

Q. Did you not consider that Mr. Cartwright and Mr. Odell had as much right to them as you had?

A. Certainly.

Q. Why did you not put them on the table before them?

A. Because if I had put those certificates on the table or had given those certificates either to Mr. Odell or Mr. Cartwright or Dr. Watts, I suspected they would do just what they did do, and I should be left without a certificate. The certificates made out in proper order would have been returned to President Ferry with their proceedings, and that would have been recognized in preference to any other.

Q. Still I ask you if you did not feel bound to obey the majority of the electors known to be elected, when they asked you to put the certificates on the table?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you think you had a right to take them away from the majority?

A. The question of right did not enter into that as much as the question of expediency.

From this it would seem that Mr. Cronin was not acting from a sense of right or duty, but solely from considerations of expediency.

By the statutes of all the States the electors are authorized to fill vacancies in the college. The certificate that goes to the President of the Senate is from the electors themselves, and not from the governors of the States. The only way the President of the Senate has knowledge of the certificate of the governor is through the certificate of the college of electors. To that body, the college of electors, is referred the determination of all questions of vacancy. If its journal recites that there was a vacancy which had been filled by the body, it is not competent to go behind that certificate and inquire whether there was such a vacancy. If there are two or more certificates from the same State, the first duty of the counting officer or tribunal is to find out which came from the electoral college, and when that certificate which contains the names and the action of a majority of the electors, conceded by all to be such, is found, we may be sure we have the record of the electoral college; and when the true college is found, the counting officer or tribunal may look to its action with entire certainty as that by which the count must be governed. For example, if a certificate made by two of the known and conceded electors in Oregon is found, the counting officer or tribunal may know that those two constitute the electoral college of that State, and their decision must govern in determining the question whether there was a vacancy, and how it was filled, and by whom.

In the case under consideration two certificates have been opened, one made by two of the known and recognized electors about whose election there is no dispute; hence this tribunal is bound to receive that as the certificate of the college of electors and to be governed by its determination in regard to any question of vacancy, although the other certificate contains the name of one man who was certified by the governor as having been appointed, and who has assumed to act as the college of electors, and who had attempted to appoint two substitutes in the place of the other electors who are known to have been appointed and who executed the former certificate. The latter certificate amounts to nothing, and should be utterly disregarded, except in so far as it contains the certificate of the governor of the appointment of the two electors who executed the former certificate. To that extent and that only can the certificate of the governor be accorded recognition, for the reason that only to that extent is it true to the purpose of its creation, which is to chronicle a pre-existing fact; only so far is it a faithful record of the fact of appointment by the State; and being no part of the manner of appointment but merely a form of evidence, but not a conclusive one, of the fact of appointment, it should only be received in so far as it is a true and faithful chronicler of the facts as to the persons appointed by the State; and in so far as it falsifies the fact it should be repudiated and disregarded. In so far, then, as the governor's certificate bears evidence that Odell and Cartwright were appointed by the State it is a faithful and true certificate of the fact, and should be accorded full faith and credit by the counting tribunal; but in so far as it certifies Cronin to have been appointed it is a falsifier of history, a misrepresenter of a great fact, a contradiction of the record made by the canvassing officers, the product of usurpation, fraud, or mistake, and entitled to no recognition or credence upon the part of either this high tribunal or any other officer or department of government.

It has been said that the supreme court of the State of Rhode Island has recently decided that the resignation of a person who was ineligible to be appointed an elector, and who had received a majority of the votes, did not, under the statutes of that State, create such a vacancy as the other electors could fill. This may all be true, and still it does not affect the Oregon case. The State, having the sole power to appoint, may prescribe for filling vacancies in the electoral college, whether arising from death, resignation, neglect to attend, refusal to act, or any other cause, including that of a failure to elect. The legislature may direct that a vacancy occurring from a failure of the elector to attend, or from a failure of the people to elect, shall be filled by a new election by the people, or it may direct that the other electors, or the electors present, shall appoint persons to supply such vacancies, and upon this point the statutes of the several States are different, and the statute of the State of Rhode Island is, in this respect, widely different from that of Oregon. The Oregon statute, as we have seen, provides that "If there shall be any vacancy in the office of elector occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill by viva voce and plurality of votes such vacancy in the electoral college"—evidently intended to cover all cases where the requisite number of electors was not present, whether such number was diminished by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or failure to elect, whereas the statute of Rhode Island provided as follows:

If any electors chosen as aforesaid shall after their said election decline the said office, or be prevented by any cause from serving therein, the other electors * * * shall fill such vacancies.

It may well be said that under the Rhode Island statute the electors present, or, as the statute has it, the "other electors," have no right to fill a vacancy occasioned by a failure to elect; but such cannot be claimed under the statute of Oregon, as there the statute clearly authorizes the electors present to fill any vacancy, whether occasioned by death, resignation, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or, under the "otherwise" clause, failure to elect.

The statutes of the several States upon this subject are very dissimilar, and the power of the electors present in each State to fill vacancies must be determined in each State by reference to and construction of the statute of such State.

The statutes of California, for instance, provide that—

In case of the death or absence of any elector so chosen, or in case the number of electors shall, from any cause, be deficient, the electors then present shall forthwith elect from the citizens of the State so many persons as shall supply the deficiency.

Under this statute, therefore, the electors present clearly have the right to fill any vacancy, whether occasioned by death, resignation, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or failure to elect.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission: I submit this case upon the papers before you. Were I authorized to invoke your judgment upon facts aliunde the record, then would I feel justified in directing your attention to acts of intrigue, corruption, and fraud in connection with the Oregon electoral vote that will stand forever in history as the crowning infamy of an unrestrained and insane personal and political ambition. While the charge of perjury and fraud against the returning-boards of Louisiana and Florida is by disappointed and maddened partisans echoed throughout the land, I might, were it proper, point you to a conspiracy that had its origin at No. 15 Gramercy Park, New York City, at the home and by the fireside of Samuel J. Tilden, the democratic candidate for President, that had for its purpose the purchase of an electoral vote, upon the faith of which his title to the Chief Magistracy of the nation might be established.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. I would rather not hear anything on that subject. There is no such evidence before us.

Mr. Senator MITCHELL. I submit to the intimation, and though the law of your creation may not authorize you to look into or consider this record of intrigue, corruption, and fraud, it will stand nevertheless as a part of the history of the times, a changeless, palsied plague-spot upon the record of the democratic party, that time cannot obscure or repentance obliterate.

Mr. President, I have faith in this Commission and in the justice of its final judgment. I feel that when the arduous and responsible labors of you and your honorable associates have ended, forty-five millions of people can raise their eyes to heaven and exclaim in the language of the gifted bard—

Great God! we thank thee for this home,
This bounteous birth-land of the free,
Where wanderers from afar may come
And breathe the air of liberty.
Still may her flowers untrampled spring,
Her harvests wave, her cities rise,
And yet, till Time shall fold his wing,
Remain earth's loveliest paradise.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, so much time has already been consumed continuously in this debate that I know very well that any words I may utter must fall upon weary ears. In a matter of so much consequence as this, I can only invoke the indulgence and patient attention of the Commission.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Allow me to interrupt you, Mr. Lawrence. I beg leave to make a suggestion. There are five hours more of argument, one by Mr. Lawrence and four by counsel. I do not think it is possible for us to sit here for those five hours to-night, and I suggest that it would be more convenient to proceed to-morrow, and unless Judge Lawrence prefers to proceed to-day I move that we adjourn until ten o'clock to-morrow. If he wishes to proceed now, I have not a word to say.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. It will suit my convenience in any way that meets the approbation of the Commission.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. If we could get through to-day I should prefer to do so.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. It seems to me it will be convenient to the Commission if we can at least have the authorities that have been cited and are to be cited by the objectors. If we can have to-morrow morning in print before us the argument of the objectors, I think it would make a complete exhibit of the objectors' case on both sides, and I would prefer that the objectors should finish to-night.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. I have authorities which I think may be of some value and weight in the way of aiding the Commission.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Had we not better take a recess and get on with part of the argument to-night?

Mr. HOADLY. I desire to make a suggestion to the Commission. On our side we shall desire an extension of time. We do not think that we can present the very great number of questions of law and authorities within the time allowed by the Commission. We are willing to sacrifice our own convenience in order to arrive at a speedy result. I am authorized by my associates to say that we would prefer very much, in order that the decision of the Commission may be hastened, to sit this evening to any hour rather than not to have our request for additional time granted.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Will Judge Hoadly be kind enough to state, if he has considered, what additional time he proposes to ask for?

Mr. HOADLY. We desire that our time be extended to double the amount which the Commission allows by its rules; and as I said, we are willing to take it out of the hours of the night rather than not have the extension.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I venture to submit this motion for the decision of the Commission, that we now take a recess until half past six o'clock, to meet in the Senate Chamber, which is at our disposal.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. I should rather hear the objectors.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. I think we had better hear the objectors.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Very well, I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Mr. President and gentlemen, the Commission before which I have the honor now to appear is charged with the momentous and solemn duty of considering "the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes" of the State of Oregon, with the "objections" thereto, and with the further duty to "decide whether any, and what, votes from" that "State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many, and what, persons were duly appointed electors in" the State.

There are before the Commission duplicate papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes cast by two different sets of persons each claiming to be the electoral college. It is my purpose to maintain that W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts, whom I will for brevity designate "the Hayes electors," were duly appointed; that they present the proper evidence of this fact, and that the votes by them given for Rutherford B. Hayes for President and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President are the votes provided for by the Constitution; and that E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker, the so-called "Tilden electors," were not duly appointed; that they are without sufficient evidence of title to office, and that the votes they gave for Samuel J. Tilden for President and for Thomas A. Hendricks for Vice-President are not the votes provided for by the Constitution.

In conducting the inquiries which are to be answered by this Commission I will first ask attention to the constitutional and statutory provisions which create the office of elector, provide for filling it, and prescribe the appropriate evidence of title to it.

The Constitution of the United States provides that—

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and together with the Vice-President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.—Article 2, section 1.

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the vote shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President.—Article 12, Amendments.

No person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years, and been fourteen years a resident within the United States.—Article 2, section 1.

The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.—Article 2, section 1.

The Congress shall have power * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.—Article 1, section 8.

Congress has legislated upon the subject of electoral votes by repeated laws, and among other provisions has enacted that—

The electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed, in each State, on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, in every fourth year succeeding every election of a President and Vice-President.—March 1, 1792, ch. 8, sec. 1, vol. 1, p. 239; January 23, 1845, ch. 1, vol. 5, p. 721, Revised Statutes, section 131.

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required to meet.—Act March 1, 1792, ch. 8, sec. 3, vol. 1, p. 240, Revised Statutes, section 136.

Each State may, by law, provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.—Act January 23, 1845, Revised Statutes, section 133.

Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such a manner as the legislature of such State may direct.—Revised Statutes, section 134.

The electors for each State shall meet and give their votes upon the first Wednesday in December in the year in which they are appointed, at such place, in each State, as the legislature of such State shall direct.—Act March 1, 1792, Revised Statutes, section 135.

Congress shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, and the certificates, or so many of them as have been received, shall then be opened, the votes counted, and the persons to fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared, agreeably to the Constitution.—Act March 1, 1792, Revised Statutes, section 142.

The electors shall vote for President and Vice-President, respectively, in the manner directed by the Constitution.—Revised Statutes, section 137.

The electors shall make and sign three certificates of all the votes given by them, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, one of the votes for President and the other of the votes for Vice-President, and shall annex to each of the certificates one of the lists of the electors which shall have been furnished to them by direction of the executive of the State.—Revised Statutes, section 138.

The electors shall seal up the certificates so made by them, and certify upon each that the lists of all the votes of such State given for President, and of all the votes given for Vice-President, are contained therein.—Revised Statutes, section 139.

The electors shall dispose of the certificates thus made by them in the following manner:

One. They shall, by writing under their hands, or under the hands of a majority of them, appoint a person to take charge of and deliver to the President of the Senate, at the seat of government, before the first Wednesday in January then next ensuing, one of the certificates.

Two. They shall forthwith forward by the post-office to the President of the Senate, at the seat of government, one other of the certificates.

Three. They shall forthwith cause the other of the certificates to be delivered to the judge of that district in which the electors shall assemble.—Revised Statutes, section 140.

The constitution of Oregon provides:

In all elections held by the people under this constitution, the person or persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected.—Article 2, section 16.

And again:

The powers of the government shall be divided into three separate departments: the legislative, the executive, (including the administrative,) and the judicial; and no person charged with official duties under one of these departments shall exercise any of the functions of another, except as in this constitution expressly provided.

The legislature of Oregon has also provided by statute that—

In all elections in this State the person having the highest number of votes for any office shall be deemed elected.—General Laws, section 40, page 574.

On the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1864, and every four years thereafter, there shall be elected by the qualified electors of this State as many electors of President and Vice-President as this State may be entitled to elect of Senators and Representatives in Congress.—General Laws, section 58, page 578.

The statute provides that abstracts of votes shall be sent to the secretary of state. And then the mode of canvassing the votes and certifying the appointment of electors is provided for as follows:

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the electors elected and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.—General Statutes, section 60, page 578.

The canvass of votes for members of Congress is provided for as follows :

And it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes for * * * member of Congress; * * * and the governor shall grant a certificate to the person having the highest number of votes; and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such persons.—General Statutes, section 37, page 574.

This proclamation is not required as to electors.

In another portion of the general statutes relating to the governor it is provided that—

He [the governor] shall grant certificates to members duly elected to the Senate of the United States, and also to members of Congress, which shall be signed by him and countersigned by the secretary of state under the seal of the State.—General Laws, section 3, page 489.

But this does not apply to electors.

The statute of Oregon, in a title relating only to State officers, shows what shall be deemed a vacancy in a State office. It provides :

Any person who shall receive a certificate of his election as a member of the legislative assembly, coroner, or commissioner of the county court, shall be at liberty to resign such office, though he may not have entered upon the execution of its duties or taken the requisite oath of office.—General Statutes, section 46, page 575.

Every office shall become vacant on the occurrence of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office :

1. The death of the incumbent.
2. His resignation.
3. His removal.
4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village for which he shall have been elected or appointed or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged.
5. His conviction of an infamous crime or of any offense involving a violation of his oath.
6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office, or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law.
7. The decision of a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment.—General Statutes, section 48, page 576.

But the Oregon statute, when providing for vacancies in the electoral college, does not limit vacancies to those arising from specific causes, but declares that—

The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day, and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill by viva voce and plurality of votes such vacancy in the electoral college, and when all the electors shall appear, or the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled as above provided, such electors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States.—General Laws, section 59, page 578.

Here, then, are all the constitutional and statutory provisions creating the office of elector, the material provisions for filling it and for furnishing evidence of title to the office.

That the office is created by the Constitution of the United States, admits of no doubt, and is not disputed.

That the electors are to be appointed in each State "in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct," is equally certain and undisputed.

That the legislature of Oregon has provided for the original appointment of electors by popular vote is conceded on all hands.

That it has provided for filling vacancies "occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise," is declared by the statute, and is not disputed.

The Hayes electors present as evidence of title to the electoral office the following :

1. A "list of the electors elected" for Oregon, duly certified and signed by the secretary of state, with the seal of the State by him affixed thereto. This has every formality required by law except only that the governor has failed to comply with a directory and immaterial provision of the statute requiring that it "shall be signed by the governor."

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. What is the date of that?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. It is without date. Next :

2. A certified abstract of the popular vote for electors as canvassed according to law by the secretary of state, dated December 6, 1876, showing that the Hayes electors are "the persons having the highest number of votes," on which fact the statute says "they shall be deemed elected."

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Is that the certificate of the secretary of state as to the number of votes for electors?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. That is the abstract of votes—a different paper. The paper I first referred to is the certificate of the secretary of state.

Mr. HOADLY. There is no such certificate.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. There is such a paper, unless I am greatly mistaken.

Mr. HOADLY. I heard the papers read, and there is no such paper.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. I have copies of what purport to be the papers. It is a full list of electors, showing the number of votes given for each.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Is it anything more than this: a certificate of the names of the persons voted for, showing the votes given to each?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Yes; but it is different from the tabulated result.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. But no certificate.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. That is a certificate. I shall claim to this honorable Commission that that is a certificate within the meaning of the statute of Oregon. That is what I call a certificate in complete compliance with the statute of Oregon, lacking only the unimportant signature of the governor, the lack of which cannot invalidate a paper made in pursuance of law.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Judge Lawrence, may I ask you if you have examined the statute of Oregon to see whether any one has a right to demand an exemplification of any paper on the files of that office?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. I have not, nor do I deem it material. The question is not, as I respectfully submit, whether any one has a right to demand it, but does any one come with that as evidence of title? We have it; it is made in pursuance of law; it is made in pursuance of the statute of Oregon, which authorizes and requires the secretary of state to make these lists of electors. Then we have—

3. The certificate under the seal of the State, signed by the governor and secretary of state, dated December 6, 1876, by which the governor of Oregon certifies that W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright, and E. A. Cronin received each a given number of votes at the election, November 7, which "being the highest number of votes cast for persons eligible," they "are hereby declared duly elected electors."

4. The record of the proceedings of Odell, Cartwright, and Watts, as electors, dated December 6, shows that Odell and Cartwright met, accepted the resignation of Watts, and they two only being present, they re-appointed Watts, who accepted, and all three voted for Hayes and Wheeler for President and Vice-President and made the proper return.

This, as the Constitution requires, is certified by the electors—made absolutely certain—beyond contradiction by any other evidence.

For the so-called "Tilden electors" the entire record shows as their evidence of title to office—

1. The certificate of the governor, attested by the secretary of state, for Odell, Cartwright, and Cronin, already referred to, showing not that Cronin, as the law requires, "received the highest number of votes," but only that "Cronin received 14,157 votes, being the highest number of votes cast at said election (November 7) for persons eligible," and he, with Odell and Cartwright, is "declared duly elected."

2. The record of proceedings of the so-called Tilden electors shows that Cronin assembled on the 6th of December, "solitary and alone in his glory" or shame, declared that Odell and Cartwright "refused to act," whereupon Cronin appointed Miller an elector, and these two then appointed Parker, when all voted, one vote for Tilden for President and Hendricks for Vice-President, and two for Hayes and Wheeler for the same offices.

Here, then, are the two sets of electors; here the whole evidence of title to office; here the votes cast by each for President and Vice-President.

From this it will be seen the Hayes electors all claim title to office by original appointment or election by the people of Oregon, and as to one of them a title after a resignation by appointment of the remaining electors.

One of the Tilden electors, Cronin, claims title by original appointment or election by the people and the remaining two by appointment to fill vacancies.

The one important and indisputable fact to be noticed so far in these proceedings is that the title of Odell and Cartwright, two of the Hayes electors, is clear beyond question and is not disputed. As to these, elected by the people, there are just five provisions of law relating to the evidence of title. They are these:

1. The act of Congress declares that—

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified and to be delivered to the electors.

It does not say in terms that the governor shall certify or sign the lists. When it says the governor shall "cause" the lists to be made, this means that he, as the officer charged with the duty of executing the State laws, shall cause the proper State officer to make the lists, whether he be the officer designated by the State law or some other; or if no State law direct the mode, then the governor shall certify.

2. The constitution of Oregon provides that—

In all elections * * * the person or persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared elected.

3. The statute of Oregon provides that—

In all elections * * * the person having the highest number of votes * * * shall be deemed elected.

4. The statute again provides that a return of votes shall be sent from the several counties to the secretary of state, and then—

It shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor,—

But the governor is a mere witness with no power—

* * * to canvass the votes.

5. And again the statute says:

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors.

This is the mode in which Oregon executes the act of Congress. The governor has no power over the canvass or the result, except to attest what the secretary of state certifies as mere matter of authentication.

Now, Odell and Cartwright come with the evidence of title which satisfies all these provisions. The secretary of state canvassed the votes of the people, as shown by his certified abstract. Odell and Cartwright had the highest number of votes, and must, as the constitution and statute say, "be declared and deemed elected," and they have the properly certified lists of election "signed by the governor and secretary" under the seal of State.

I say they have these lists of electors because they are here, and it matters not how they came. No law requires that all the evidence of title shall be transmitted in one envelope, nor that it shall come with the votes for President, nor even that it shall be transmitted by the electors. The mode of transmitting at most could be only directory, and the manner is not material.

All the records, so far as they contain lawful evidence, may be considered. (Switzler vs. Anderson, 2 Bartlett, 374; McCrary, section 104.)

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I am sorry to interrupt you—

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Nothing interrupts me.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I want to ask you whether that paper which you said was without date, appears to have been sealed up with the other papers which were sealed on the 6th of December.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Undoubtedly. It comes with the papers. But even that would not be material. The provision which requires papers to be transmitted by the electors is directory, and no matter how they come they are evidence.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. The point of my inquiry was that at least it must have been made as early as the 6th of December.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. O, yes; it must have been made as early as the 6th of December; but its date cannot be material. I repeat that the one important fact to which I desire first to call attention is that the title of two of the Hayes electors is undisputed.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Permit me to ask whether the certificate you refer to states that the secretary of state had ever canvassed any votes and determined who had been elected.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. It is not necessary that he should.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I only ask whether the fact is so.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. The certified abstract of votes, by inference, if not directly, shows that he did canvass the votes, and there is that certificate which satisfied the statute, the list of electors made by the secretary of state, the only officer who has power to make any paper. The governor has a duty, but not a power, to witness a paper, although made by another officer.

Upon these facts, and upon the law, this whole controversy may be disposed of in favor of the Hayes electors by a single proposition, which is:

That, if the monstrous position could be maintained that Cronin was legally appointed, yet he "refused to act," "neglected to attend" with Odell and Cartwright, his place became vacant, and Watts was duly appointed to fill it.

This leaves no question of eligibility to be considered, and no controversy over any question of vacancy by non-election. If this position is supported by law, it is conclusive, and it is unnecessary to go beyond it to show, as the fact is, that Cronin was not elected, and on the whole record is without evidence of title.

The electoral college is charged with three duties: (1) to fill all vacancies, (2) to vote for President and Vice-President, and (3) to make and transmit to the President of the Senate "distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and Vice-President, which lists they shall sign and certify." Here are duties to do certain acts and to furnish evidence of them.

The statute of Oregon provides that—

If there be any vacancy in the office of an elector occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall fill such vacancy.

The electoral college is a deliberative body, as much so as Congress; the single individual members, acting separately and apart from all others, can do no official act, no more so than individual members of Congress, or of a court, or of this Commission; and the record of what the college or a majority of its members does is conclusive evidence, and can no more be impeached aliunde than the record of Congress, or of a court, or of this Commission.

The major part of the electors present is a quorum; the acts of a quorum are valid to decide when a vacancy has arisen, and to fill it.

All this I propose to show from the Constitution and laws, from their manifest purpose, from the authority of the courts, and from the necessities of the case.

1. The electoral college is a deliberative body. The Constitution says:

The electors shall meet and vote by ballot for President.

They shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President.

They shall sign and certify and transmit, sealed, to the President of the Senate [these lists.]

The statute of Oregon says:

The electors shall convene at the seat of government. * * * If there be any vacancy the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill by viva voce and plurality of votes such vacancy. * * * Such electors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them.

The electors when convened are declared to be the "electoral college."
